The acting Chairman of committees resumed the Chair, and,

House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

THURSDAY, 9th April, 1896.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have not taken up much of the time of the House in discussing this question, and I hope hon. gentleman will bear with me patiently to-night. This Bill is being forced through the House with undue rapidity. If it is as important as the leader of the House says, it requires very careful consideration, and if it is fraught with as much injury to the province as is contended, then of course, grave attention should be given to it. It is impossible in the dying hours of the last session of Parliament, to give it mature deliberation. The leader of the House told us that he was much devoted to this Bill, and was prepared to die in order to pass it. I trust that sad and melancholy event will not occur during the passage of this measure. The House heard that announcement with a great deal of trouble and anxiety. I have an idea that the Secretary of State would run considerable risk of his life for the purpose of staying in power, but I do not know of any Bill that would induce him to do so. It was noticed that when he spoke of that dire calamity, there was very little alarm amongst his followers.

Not a groan was heard, not a pitying note
  As down on the floor he hurried ;
Not a member offered to lend him his coat
  Or asked how he liked to be buried.

It is wonderful that his colleagues at least, did not show a sympathetic anxiety, least that dire event should follow their leader's efforts in connection with this Bill. We desire that the Secretary of State should remain in good health, because we do not want to beat a sick man. It is thought, Mr. Chairman, that the more intelligent supporters of the Government who have a regard for their political future have left the ranks of the party. That is my opinion too. If I thought that this Bill would be any benefit to the minority I would have no hesitation in supporting it, but I believe that the Bill is bad for the minority and bad for the majority too. It leads to a dual system which will entail injury on both the majority and minority in Manitoba. I believe the Bill will do a great deal of harm, and will confer no benefit upon any class of the community. I believe, like my leader, that before the province of Manitoba should be coerced, there should be a full investigation. The Government also believed that recently, and they sent a commission to Manitoba. I regret that that commission has been treated with so much discourtesy by the Government that the report which they made has not yet been brought down to the House. If we get these papers it will have a considerable effect upon the passage of this measure. The Government by their conduct persist in every way in obstructing the passage of this Bill. I have watched the skill displayed by the Secretary of State in taking up the time of this House on outside issues, so as to lead us away from the discussion of this remedial Act. It would never do to have this measure passed hastily, and then to have us snubbed because Parliament passed a Bill which was ultra vires.

It would be well to consider all these questions in order to prevent litigation. I am surprised at the action of the Government on this question. After the Manitoba School Law of 1890 was passed, the Government of Canada had power to restore the rights of the minority, but they did not see fit to exercise that power. If those people are so much oppressed, how is it that the Government waited for five years before showing so much zeal and interest in them? This question should not be made a political question. If ever there was a question that should be settled on its merits, this is one. It should have been kept out of the political arena, where it is likely to linger for a long time to come. As soon as the decision of the Privy Council was announced, however, the Government exhibited an unseemly haste to bring this question into politics. They issued their remedial order, with the intention of going at once to the country. But their colleagues from Quebec would not consent to that. The consequence was that they had to meet the issue, so they called Parliament last session. But they did not introduce the Bill then. Three Ministers resigned and stayed out two days, when two of them went back and one has remained out ever since. Then, they called Parliament together this session on the 2nd of January to pass this Bill, and two days after the House met seven of the Ministers bolted. The Premier stated that they had bolted because they were opposed to the Remedial Bill. After about ten days sulking, they came back and accepted the Remedial Bill; but no Bill was introduced until two months had passed away. It was introduced a little more than a month before the date of the expiration of Parliament; and now the Government are trying to force it through the House by compelling the House to sit continuously night and day. In the hope of making some political capital they are determined to force this Bill through, if possible, regardless of the rights of the members of the House or the rights of the people, or the rights of either the majority or the minority of Manitoba. The school law of Manitoba passed in 1890 very much resembles the school law introduced in Nova Scotia some years ago by the Secretary of State. We have been told on all hands that that law gives entire satisfaction to both Protestants and Catholics in the province of Nova Scotia. If the Secretary of State is satisfied with that law, why does he object to a law in Manitoba which is precisely similar, especially when the people of that province are a unit in its favour? I believe this Bill will do no good to the minority of Manitoba, and will do an injury to the majority. If I thought it would be any benefit to the minority in Manitoba, I would be one of the last to raise my voice against it. If there is any grievance complained of by any minority, I would be one of the first to demand its redress; but these grievances are more imaginary than real. It would be very easy for me to show how this Bill has been obstructed by the Government--how they have wasted time, how delay was caused by seven ministers bolting, and how they delayed to introduce the measure for two months. When the professed friends of the measure are striving by every means in their power to get the Bill passed, the Government are evidently determined that it shall not go through this session. I believe that the Secretary of State, while appearing to press the measure, really desires to strangle it. He did not introduce the Bill, but acted as a sort of step-father to it, and I fancy that on that account he does not like it. Now, I oppose this Bill because I believe it will be bad for the minority and worse for the majority; and I for one am not willing to go against the will of the majority of the people of a province who know its local conditions very much better than the members of this House can know them. I am willing at all times to support any government in redressing the grievances of any class of people, but I would not like to commit myself to vote for a measure of that kind until every fact in connection with the alleged grievances had been fully investigated.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must express my surprise at the tirade of abuse, virtually a dose of political Billingsgate, which the Secretary of State gave to the House this afternoon. It proved to me very clearly that if he is anxious to secure the passage of this Bill, he has taken the wrong course to gain that end. There is no evidence to show that the Government are anxious to proceed with the Bill. They appear desirous of consuming the remaining days of the life of this Parliament by permitting and encouraging discussions of an irrelevant character, instead of taking up the clauses of the Bill. I was anxious to have from the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith) a statement in regard to the deputation which went from this Government to Manitoba for the purpose of negotiating for a settlement of this important question. I think the leader of the Government should give to the House a full statement of the views interchanged between the representatives of this Government and those of the Manitoba government. I have been very much pleased to gather from the papers that considerable concessions were made on both sides, after two or three days of conference, making it evident that if this Bill had been withdrawn and the Manitoba government had been left to themselves, the question would very soon be settled. I should like to have heard the view of the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) to-night. I believe he came from Montreal for the purpose of giving his opinion with regard to the course that should have been adopted; and no doubt were he to express frankly his mind on this whole question, he would say that the best way to settle the whole difficulty would be to appoint a commission from this Government to meet the Manitoba government and try to come to some arrangement. The hon. leader of the Opposition, during the afternoon, took the Government to task for the discourtesy to the Opposition and to those who are disposed to criticize the provisions of this Bill in not consenting to an adjournment this morning at two or three o'clock, after we had discussed a number of the provisions of this Bill and pointed out some very objectionable clauses. The hon. Secretary of State appears determined to keep the House in session day and night with the view of showing the country his sincerity in trying to make this measure become law. If the hon. Secretary of State had displayed better tactics and prudence, such as his predecessors were wont to display, he would have made much better progress. I can well remember when we had got into difficulties with the Chairman of the committee on a former occasion and sat all night, the leader of the House, the late Sir John Macdonald, came down in the morning and settled the difficulty in a few words by allowing the committee to rise, and in the afternoon the House got down to practical work and good progress was made. Had such a course as that been followed, the Government would have made much better progress with the Bill. No doubt the Catholics of Manitoba feel that they have been deprived of certain rights and the decision of the Privy Council has clearly shown that they have a grievance, and having a grievance they are entitled to have it removed. But it would be much more desirable that the adjustment should take place in Manitoba and be done by the Manitoba legislature than by this House. One ounce of remedial legislation by Manitoba would be better for the minority than a pound of remedial law by this House. Whatever concessions might be made the minority by the legislature of Manitoba, would command itself to the approval of the majority in that province, and that in itself would be a guarantee that no injustice would be done the minority in any other respect. It would be deplorable if by our legislation in this House we should exasperate the majority in Manitoba to act unjustly towards the minority by imposing upon them taxes for common schools as well as separate schools, and I do not know that we would have the power to prevent that. From my reasoning of the constitution, it appears to me that the province of Manitoba have absolute control of taxation and the appropriation of all moneys that come into their hands for any purpose ; and I do not believe that this House has the right to dictate to Manitoba what she shall do with her own money or in what way she shall impose taxes, or whether she shall impose taxes on the entire community for school purposes or simply impose on the Protestants taxation for common schools and on the Catholics taxation for separate schools. It would be deplorable if the majority of Manitoba should be goaded into a determination to take revenge for the legislation we are imposing upon them, by compelling the minority to pay taxes in some other way and thus set at nought the legislation of this House. If we cannot protect the minority against such legislation as that, would it not be better to try to secure a peaceable settlement of the question rather than increase the friction between the two sections. I do not challenge the decision of the Privy Council, which says the minority have a grievance, and I should like to see that grievance removed and am prepared to do everything in my power, constitutionally and prudently, in the interests of Manitoba and the Dominion, to secure a peaceable and satisfactory settlement of the whole difficulty. If I thought that this Bill would settle the difficulty, I would give it my most earnest consideration, but I do not see how it can. I have every confidence in the views expressed by my esteemed leader (Mr. Laurier), and by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who are experienced parliamentarians of twenty or thirty years standing, and who have all expressed the opinion that the passage of this Bill could not, by any possibility, secure to the minority the relief they desire, but that on the contrary it will be only prolific of lawsuits from start to finish. We should endeavour to settle this difficulty finally and avoid any grounds of litigation, and we can only do that by the co-operation of Manitoba. After carefully listening to the opinions expressed in this House, I do not believe that many provisions of this Bill will stand in law ; and the clauses we have considered have been so amended that they cease to be, in any shape or form, the clauses of the Bill as originally drafted. Everything considered, it is most desirable that we should obtain the co-operation of Manitoba. I notice that Mr. Greenway is said to be on his way from Manitoba to this city, and I trust he is coming here in the spirit of conciliation and earnest desire to meet the Government and agree to some concessions which will restore harmony. It is not to be expected that the desire of the minority in any province, whether Catholic or Protestant, can be completely acceded to, and no doubt there is considerable difficulty in adjusting this question so as to perfectly satisfy the Roman Catholic minority, but our experience in the past shows that the people themselves will remove any grievance if only their better sentiments are appealed to. Take, for instance, the difficulties that existed in New Brunswick. I have been reading over the lengthy and heated discussions that took place over the school question in that province ; and while neither the Conservatives nor the Reform Government of the Dominion would interfere to the extent of bringing in a measure in order to apply the powers given us by the constitution for the relief of the minority, yet the lapse of time has cured the evil. Year after year concessions were voluntarily made by the majority, and this session we had the gratifying announcement made by those who are in sympathy with the Catholic minority that they were perfectly satisfied with the condition of things existing to-day both in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia. Time cured all the trouble in these provinces as no doubt it will in Manitoba. I have already said that in my humble opinion, the legislation in Manitoba was harsh, although I must say, on looking through the school books used in the Manitoba schools, that there is nothing in them to which any Roman Catholic could object. Still no man who reads the constitution and then compares the present legislation with that which was abolished can fail to see that the minority has suffered a grievance, as decided by the English Privy Council. Even the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) admits that they have a grievance. In fact I have not heard that denied by any one. But if the grievance exists who should remove it ? The proper body to act is the legislature of the province where the grievance exists. I remember when the late Sir John Macdonald was Minister of Justice and a question with regard to education was before this House, he very properly said that the Nova Scotia legislature was the only place where proper relief should be given to the minority in that province. I agree with him in that view. You may give momentary relief by the passage of this remedial law ; but that will not protect the minority against injustices of another kind. If you exasperate the majority by such a Bill as this, you certainly cannot hope to keep them within the lines of prudence and justice. If they are goaded into opposition, they will no doubt do many things that they would never think of doing otherwise. Manitoba must be asked to act if ever you can secure a peaceable, satisfactory solution of the difficulty. The evidence of the desire of Manitoba to remove the difficulties, is apparent to every mind, and I hope that from time to time Manitoba will evince a disposition to meet the conscientious scruples of the minority, and that they will not subject them to any conscientious injustice in the matter of education. The Catholic people of this country are our fellow-citizens, having all the rights and privileges of any other class, and they should be granted all the rights and privileges they are entitled to under our constitution. I am sure that after mature consideration the majority in Manitoba will see matters in a different light, and that Christian charity, and forbearance, and toleration will more and more characterize their legislation from year to year. I listened to the Secretary of State trying to evade the charge that he had made some prophetic utterances with regard to the production of grain in the North-west, and as to the amount of money we would realize to the sale of lands in that country. I think the Secretary of State failed in meeting the charges. But, what has he to say with regard to his prophecies which are reported in "Hansard," and which I heard him make myself, in reference to the great prosperity, and increase of population, that would follow on the iron duties that he proposed. Surely he knows that his prophecies in that direction have been absolutely unfulfilled.

Mr. OUIMET. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the hon. gentleman is getting away from the question before the House, when he talks about coal and iron.

Mr. McMULLEN. I hope the Minister of Public Works will allow me to proceed, because I intended to make these observations earlier in the evening when the Secretary of State was in the House. However, I may say that this is another of the false prophecies that he has made. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is quite time that the committee should rise. Out of fifteen Ministers, we have only three in the House, the remainder having gone off to sleep. From whom are we to get information regarding this Bill ? Is the Minister of Public Works prepared to say that we will go on considering the clauses of the Bill if this motion that the committee rise is disposed of?

Mr. OUIMET. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, he knows more than I ever thought he did if he is ready to give all the information necessary. It will require a better head and a brighter intellect than he possesses to engineer the clauses of the Bill through this House, because they appear to have been drafted by a new hand, and they require a great deal of explanation, indeed. I do not believe that this Bill gives the minority of Manitoba any relief. I believe that the Government is deceiving that minority, and I am satisfied that the more the provisions of this Bill are discussed, the more the people will get light upon the whole question, and the more they will see that instead of its being framed with a view of granting relief, it is framed with a view of humbugging the people. After listening to the tirade of the Secretary of State this afternoon, I have come to the conclusion that the Government have no desire whatever to crystallize this Bill into law before this Parliament closes. They want to be able to say to the Catholic minority : We are your friends ; we will give you remedial legislation ; and they will wink the other eye at another party in the Dominion and say : We never intended to do anything of the kind. I believe that the people and the press of this country will look upon it in that light. Can the Minister of Public Works say what particular clause of the Bill he desires us to consider ?

Mr. OUIMET. I am sorry to see that the hon. gentleman does not know on what clause we are.

Mr. McMULLEN. I know well enough.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I have not had an opportunity of addressing the permanent Chairman of Committees, but I have no doubt that I will receive every consideration from you, Sir (Mr. Joncas), who have taken his place. There is a class of people in this country known as the Patrons who are beginning to take an interest in politics. I have reason to be aware of that fact, because I am opposed at the present time by a gentleman of that order.

Mr. McCARTHY. So am I.

Mr. TYRWHITT. One of the chief planks in the platform of the Patrons is with regard to the superannuation of Civil Servants. We have a Deputy Speaker here, for whose salary I voted, and I shall be obliged in contesting my riding with my Patron opponent, to defend the Deputy Speaker's course and to say that he has earned his salary. I have defended him in the past, and I had hoped that I would be placed in a position to defend him again. I wish to explain my vote to-night, and I must say that I should prefer to see the Deputy Speaker oftener in the Chair, in order that I would be placed in a better position to defend my course in voting for an appropriation for his salary. The leader of the House, this afternoon, in describing the condition of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia, stated that Conservatism and anti-Catholicism appeared to be synonymous in that province at the time he accepted the leadership of his party there. I believe that politics and religion should not be mixed up at any time, and in opposing separate schools I am not animated by any ill-feeling towards those who are of a different religion from myself. I believe that people of all religions in this country should be on good terms, and I believe, also, that those who talk most about religion have probably least of it. While I am a supporter of the Government, yet I am opposed to this measure. I deprecate the attacks made on private members of this House who do not see fit to take part in the discussion. These attacks are unjustifiable, because the only people these gentlemen have to account to are their constituents. It appears to me that the people of Manitoba, in abolishing separate schools have only followed the example of almost all the civilized countries in the world. I sympathize with the settlers in Manitoba, because I live in a school section in which I think there are only thirteen ratepayers of any prominence, and I know the difficulties of carrying on a school in a sparsely populated district. It seems to me that is one of the most powerful arguments that can be advanced for the existence of national schools. When the Manitoba legislature saw fit in 1890 to abolish separate schools, they took the same course that has been followed by every civilized country in the world. They were simply following the example of countries of greater experience. (The hon. member read extracts from a pamphlet in reference to the educational systems of various European countries.) I am in a position to give some information to the House from my own personal experience during my residence in France. It was the desire of the institution I attended that I should attend the prayers morning and evening; but owing to my want of knowledge of the language in which they were expressed, I am afraid I did not receive the benefit from them that I might have done.

Mr. EDGAR. I think it would be very instructive to the House if the hon. gentleman could recite some of those prayers in the French language.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I should be only too happy to comply with the wishes of my hon. friend, but, as the greater portion of the prayers were in Latin, I am afraid he would not understand them. At the same time I agree with many members of this House that it would not be reverent to do so, and I cannot say that I was edified by the exhibition we had this afternoon. I am very firmly convinced by my own experience that the religious education given at the public schools is not of the character that we should expect to make good Christians, although I would be quite prepared to support any measure for the purpose of devoting a certain portion of time in the schools to religious instruction. I think that religious instruction could be given to children at their homes and in the Sunday schools much more effectively than in the public schools. In our own Canadian provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia separate schools do not exist by law, and gentlemen who are familiar with the state of things in those provinces inform us that it is highly satisfactory to the people, both Protestant and Catholics. Now, I do not think we are adopting an extraordinary course in leaving our party on this question. I disclaim for myself, and I think I can for the hon. gentlemen who are voting with me, any collusion with the Opposition in this matter. We are simply acting for ourselves and in accordance with what we believe to be in the best interests of the people, and the desire of our constitutents; and we believe that what we regard to be in the interests of our own province we should not refuse to the province of Manitoba. I disclaim any intention of changing my political allegiance; but at the same time I disclaim the right of the Government or of any body of men to control my actions in this matter. Instead of threats changing me as to the course I intend to pursue, they are more likely to make me persistent in it, because they imply that a challenge is offered to me to do so. I regret very much the course that has been adopted of abusing and impugning the motives of members of this party, who from conscientious reasons, or from pledges given to their constituents, have seen fit to oppose this measure. I shall be only too happy, if given the opportunity, to vote against it again at the third reading.

Mr. SEMPLE. When the history of this country comes to be written, this will certainly be described as a most remarkable Parliament. It began in its first session with the memorable scenes in the Privileges and Election Committee, where an inquiry was held into the conduct of members of the Cabinet and the use of public funds for the corruption of the electorate, which brought to light a system of organized corruption that the people until then could hardly realize as possible to exist in any constitutionally governed country. And now at the closing hours of the Parliament, we find this same Government taking the Parliament by the throat and compelling us to sit continually, day and night, without recess, in order to exhaust our physical energy and thus compel us to give consent to a measure which cannot fail to be productive of endless litigation, and which cannot fail to provoke sectional feelings and irritation throughout the whole country and especially in the province of Manitoba. The hon. leader of the Government, when he moved the second reading of the Bill, declared that it was the most important measure with which he had anything to do. According to him, it was more important than the forming of confederation, more important than the creation of Manitoba into a province, even more important than the Government measure for the introduction of two-rowed barley. And yet the same hon. gentleman asks us to pass this Bill without giving it proper discussion, and is seeking to endeavour, by these continuous sittings, to reduce us to such an exhausted condition that it will be absolutely impossible for us to give any of the important clauses of this measure the intelligent consideration they deserve. In my opinion, the judgment of the English Privy Council does not call upon us to pass any such Bill as the one before the House. It does not ask the Dominion Parliament to abolish the Manitoba Act of 1890, but all that it requires is to take what measure as may be deemed advisable to remove any real grievance under which the minority suffer, and it seems to me that the offer of the Manitoba government to allow the minority to have religious instruction given in their schools to their children was a very seasonable offer. They have also offered to secularize the school system which seemed to satisfy the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) at one time, but no doubt the Government have forced him against his will to change his opinion. At all events he has not recently offered us any proposition to that effect. The recent votes in the Ontario legislature prove beyond dispute that the people of Ontario are in favour of Manitoba being approached in a conciliatory spirit on this question, and that every possible source should have been exhausted before coercion was entered upon. It reflects no credit upon the Government that they should try to force so important a measure through this dying Parliament, and especially is that the case when it is said that this legislation is irrevocable. I believe that a dying Parliament should not pass live legislation, and I further believe that there is no parallel case for such action either in Great Britain or in Canada. We know that in 1891, Sir John Macdonald dissolved a Parliament, only four years old, because, as he said, he wanted the opinion of the people upon the question of reciprocity. Sir John acted wisely in taking the opinion of the people upon that question, although in one sense it cannot be considered as being of such importance as the question we are now considering. This Parliament was elected on lists which are now seven years old, and many changes have taken place in the electorate since then. Not only that, but the fact that our redistribution Act has made many changes in the constituencies of the Dominion, is another reason why this Parliament should not deal with the question. If the Government is sure, as they have repeatedly said, that the general elections will increase their majority, what is the necessity for having an extra session, which the Secretary of State says will cost half a million dollars. Well, that is his fault and not ours. I suppose the Secretary of State would like to have his Estimates, but what right has this Parliament to give money to a Government which may not be called upon to expend it. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) need not talk about spending money for an extra session, when he advocates the Chignecto Ship Canal which will involve a capital expenditure of three and a half million dollars. It appears to me that the cost of an extra session does not trouble him so much as he pretends it does. The leading lawyers in this House have stated that this Bill is worthless to the minority, and so far as I can learn the Government believe that themselves. Principal Grant in a very able letter also advocates this view, and he has come to the conclusion that something should be done to satisfy the wants of the minority. We are glad to know, and as the result of the conference recently held between the representatives of the Dominion and the government of Manitoba, that the differences are not so great as some would expect. It is my opinion that a compromise should be effected, and that we should have no friction between the two governments. I remember well the school system as it existed in Ontario forty-five years ago. Those interested in sending their children to school would put up a log building, sometimes about twenty feet square; and hire a teacher as best they could, and they were not very particular about inquiring what his creed was. I remember that two teachers from whom I received instruction were Roman Catholics. These teachers had to pass no examination, but were simply approved of by the superintendent of schools, and in those days there was not so much costly paraphanalia about the schools as now. Though in the cities and towns the people of Manitoba could support dual schools, in the rural districts they would not be able to support them. This Government have been very inconsistent in the manner in which they have dealt with this question. They do not seem to be satisfied that Manitoba would remedy the grievance of the minority ; both the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) have expressed themselves to this effect ; and yet they sent commissioners up there to try and effect a settlement. Even if the minority got much less than they are asking, and got it with heart and good-will from the province, it would be far more in their interest than any remedy they could get from this Government, because in the latter case they would antagonize the province. The raising of this race and creed cry has a bad effect on the country. I will read an article from a Conservative paper, the Toronto "Telegram," which touches on this question. It says :

> When remedial legislation is once enacted the majority is freed from those higher obligations which would bind them as good neighbours to deal fairly in educational matters with their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens. Honour is a harder task-master than law.
> The Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba would be better off under the worst provincial law generally administered than under the best Federal law ignored or administered in a hostile spirit. In a few years there would be no Manitoba. The history of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, would be repeated in Manitoba if Federal interference did not embitter the strife between the majority and the minority in the province of Ontario. The Liberals have done everything within their power to carry out the separate school law as guaranteed to the Catholics in that province, and the Conservatives tried all in their power to pamper and make legislation unpleasant and to hamper and to curtail the well understood principles of the separate school law in Ontario.

Now, I have no doubt that if the province of Manitoba were approached in a friendly spirit, a satisfactory settlement of this question could be accomplished in a short time. Even if it should take another year to attain that end, it would be for the benefit of the country to help to create a good feeling, that should always exist among the people of this Dominion. Now, the Government in not dissolving the House and appealing to the country on a question of this importance, is deceiving the people. The people have given this House no mandate on this question, and the Government, by a high-handed action are forcing members to sit here day and night debating it. But I would like the leader of the House to understand that though we have been here for 50 or 60 hours what we can do for 60 hours we can do for 120, and what we can do for 120, we can, if necessary, do for 240 hours. He cannot bulldoze this House. Such action may suit the South American Republics, but it is not suited to the free soil of Canada, and the sooner the leader of this House understands that the better. Hon. members who are staying here night after night to defend the rights of the people are doing it as an act of self-denial, but they do it with pleasure because it is their duty, and without expectation of any reward in the future.

Mr. EDGAR. I think there are a great many more tangible reasons now for this committee rising than there ever were before. We have been sitting a great many more hours. As far as I can make out, we have been sitting now a little over 60 hours. We have beaten the record of the whole world. Previous to 12 o'clock last night this Chamber had beaten the record of the world for having sat 57 hours. In 1885, an interesting discussion arose on the Franchise Bill. We began sitting at three o'clock in the afternoon, and the question was very vigorously discussed until twelve o'clock on Saturday night. That was only fifty-seven hours, but it beat the record. The highest record before that, in physical endurance, was in the British Parliament, when the Home Rule question was first under discussion by Mr. Parnell. There they sat some forty-two hours, and that was considered as a tremendous evidence of their energy and the endurance of the British race, because in that Parliament were Irish, English, Scotch and Welsh. But the hardy sons of Canada easily surpassed that in 1885, and I now stand in the proud position of being a member of the Canadian Parliament which has even beaten its own record. We are far ahead of the world, and by Saturday night, if we are still kept here by the leader of the House, we will have created a new record altogether in representative institutions. The one thing to be said in favour of it is that it will be an advertisement to the whole world of the healthy and vigorous race which peoples Canada, and we will have proved beyond peradventure that there is no people so fit for representative institutions, because we will have shown what can be done in a free Parliament by determined representatives of the people. Having made history, as we have been doing, this committee should rise. We should rise if only out of consideration for the officials of the House, for the Hansard reporters, for the press, and for the little page boys. It is adding insult to injury especially to keep those poor little page boys here without paying them their wage, simply because the hon. leader of the House chooses to say that his own free will shall prevail. The hon. leader of the House, from having associated so long with crowned heads and princes, and the mighty of the land, seems to have made up his mind that if he is not something more than human, he is at any rate something more than Canadian, and therefore he comes out here and undertakes to treat us rather as southern slaves than free members of this House. But he should remember that he has not bought us all, and that therefore he should not treat us as slaves. We are not all bought and paid for with collectorships, or inspectorships, or even judgeships.

Mr. McCARTHY. What has become of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) ? Would it not be in order to move for the issue of a writ in North Grey ?

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think that the Chairman would issue it, although, according to the last ruling, he has absolute power. Another reason why we should rise is out of respect for the memory of our late colleague, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), who was amongst us a few days ago in manly life and vigour, and who—and it shows the uncertainty of life—has gone to his reward. His reward came to him more quickly than even he anticipated. I have seen a telegram this evening which mentions that the late member for North Grey was sworn in before the deputy treasurer in Toronto, one hour before the Lieutenant-Governor assented to an Act which would have reduced his salary, if he had not been sworn in.

Mr. McCARTHY. Worse than that, the Act would have prevented his appointment. The new Act provides that two judges shall not be appointed in a county that has not more than 80,000 inhabitants. There is one judge in the county of Huron now, and if this Bill had become law, there would have been no vacancy.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not suppose that anything of that kind could possibly have influenced the hon. gentleman's course in this House. I would be very sorry to say so, but there are people outside this House who would be mean enough to insinuate that his course was influenced by such a thing. We were told before we were in committee two hours, that the principle of this Bill having been adopted, the Committee of the Whole House was in duty bound to rush the Bill through committee. But what is the committee for, if not to discuss the measure ? I was glad to-night to hear the Secretary of State apologize to the hon. member of Albert in such a handsome way. A few days ago, when the Secretary of State had read first one member of his party out of it, and then another, I could judge from the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite that they had no sympathy with the tactics of their leader, and that they were not in the frame of mind to allow even the great, imperative leader to go on with that kind of thing any longer. I am perfectly certain that he has been disciplined by his party, and the result we have witnessed in his apology to the hon. member for Albert. I do not know that he apologized to the leader of the Opposition. In an outburst of candour yesterday the Secretary of State complimented my leader for desiring to proceed with the consideration of the Bill. But he was disciplined since then by his spporters from Quebec, who told him that if he talked in that way about Laurier, he would ruin them in that province. Hence to-day, in the mild manner for which he is remarkable, the Secretary of State took back all the nice compliments he paid to my leader yesterday. The Secretary of State made a mistake in tactics, when he laid the taffy on too thick on my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Devlin), and referred to that gentleman as having denounced his leader. After having seen so many members of the Conservative party denounce their imported leader on the floor of this House, it was a grand sight to hear the member for Ottawa, with the eloquence for which he is so famous, praise our leader up to the skies, and express the most entire confidence in him, although he differed from him on this question. I do not think we will hear any more from the Secretary of State about the brilliancy and eloquence of the hon. member for Ottawa. The effort of the Government seems to be, not to pass the Remedial Bill, but to throw the blame for its not passing upon the members of the House who are opposed to it. What is all this hurry about now ?

Mr. FRECHETTE. Because we want to make it law.

Mr. EDGAR. And why ?

Mr. FRECHETTE. To relieve the Manitoba minority.

Mr. EDGAR. No, because the hon. gentlemen are going back to their constituents.

Mr. FRECHETTE. You are going back, too.

Mr. EDGAR. It is because they want to use it in the elections.

Mr. FRECHETTE. You want to use it the other way.

Mr. EDGAR. They have a mistaken idea that it is going to help them with their constituents, and that is why they are in a hurry about it now. All the blame for the delay with this Bill rests with the Government. They passed the remedial order, and the majority of the Cabinet wanted to dissolve, but the minority of the Cabinet had so little faith in their brother Ministers that they would not allow them to go to the country without putting this law on the statute-books.

Mr. FRECHETTE. How do you know that ?

Mr. EDGAR. How do I know that the sun is behind the earth to-night ? How do we know ninety-nine out of a hundred things ? The hon. gentleman knows it as well as I do.

Mr. FRECHETTE. No.

Mr. EDGAR. They called the Parliament of 1895, and the trouble commenced again, and there was no remedial legislation. Three of the Ministers went on strike. Senator Angers, who was the most in earnest, had no confidence in the majority of his colleagues, and he did not go back and will not go back, because he has no confidence in the Government yet.

Mr. DUGAS. How do you know he has no confidence in them ?

Mr. EDGAR. You can judge from Senator Angers' language on many occasions. These gentlemen know well that the Government does not expect that this Bill will become law.

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes, they do.

Mr. EDGAR. The Secretary of State let the cat out of the bag yesterday when he said that it made no difference whether the Bill became law or not, and that if they could show the people that the Opposition prevented its becoming law, it would answer the purposes just as well for the elections.

Mr. FRECHETTE. Let us pass the Bill now and you will see.

Mr. EDGAR. The leader of the House this very day obstructed the Bill by making four speeches.

Mr. BELLEY. Nonsense.

Mr. EDGAR. The feeling of the people of the country irrespective of party, or of race, or of religion, is that the Government does not intend to have this Bill passed. The Secretary of State says he is ready to lay down his life for it, but he goes to his bed. He comes here once a day roaring like a lion at every one in the House, and then goes back to his den. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman from Megantic (Mr. Frechette) of having such a weak intellect as to think that he supposes that the Government want this Bill to become law.

Mr. FRECHETTE. You may accuse me, I believe it.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman represents a county in which I lived as a boy, and I never thought that county would be represented by a man whose intellect was so weak that he would believe the Government were in earnest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. EDGAR. Why did not the Government call Parliament together in November last if they were desirous of passing this Bill.

Mr. FRECHETTE. You would make the same obstruction.

Mr. EDGAR. We do not make any obstruction.

Mr. BELLEY. Explain.

Mr. EDGAR. We moved that the committee rise because it was four o'clock in the morning, and I am prepared to defend that course before any constituency in Canada. Again, on the 2nd of January this year the trouble commenced in the Cabinet, and we were told that it was because they wanted to throw Sir Mackenzie Bowell out. In the Russell House a friend of mine told me that he had been talking to a leading Conservative who was in the confidence of the majority of the Cabinet, and who said : "Bowell has to be got rid of at all hazards." My friend said : "How are you going to get rid of him ? He is the first Minister ?" The gentleman answered, "If he won't go out, we will smoke him out." What does that signify ? You know that a bear, when followed by hunters, will often take refuge in a hollow tree, and they will build a smudge fire and try to smoke him out. There is a story of some hunters who tried to smoke out a bear from a hollow tree, but, instead of the bear coming out, seven rattle snakes came out ; and when these gentlemen lately tried to smoke out the bear, the old bear did not come out, but seven rattle snakes came out. Now, Sir, how long did it take these gentlemen to get in earnest on this Bill ? We know that it was not introduced until the 7th of March. Then, on the second reading, while a larger number of Conservatives spoke than Liberals, and a good deal longer, too, we heard them talking of obstruction. Why, Sir, this talk of obstruction then was the greatest fraud in the world. In order that we might reach a vote on the second reading, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House refrained from addressing the House, although anxious to do so. Then, when the Bill went into committee, it had not been in committee for two hours before the leader of the House got up and began his diurnal shout of obstruction. He thinks that by shouting that often enough, the people of this country will think he is in earnest. I do not know how many hours have been spent in the discussion on the clauses of this Bill, but what has been the result ? The third section was passed so hurriedly at the urgent request of the Government that it has been discovered since that it is probably ultra vires, and the Minister of the Interior himself has told us that he has the greatest doubts on that subject, and that we ought to go back and reconsider it. It was the discussion on section 4 that opened the eyes of the Minister of the Interior about the doubtfulness of section 3. Then, the result of the discussion on section 4 was that the Minister of Justice asked us to let the most important clause of that section stand. Section 5 has been passed, but it has been so changed as to be almost entirely different from the section as originally drafted. In the face of these facts, it is idle for them to talk of obstruction. Do these facts not show that these clauses of the Bill required discussion, and that they have not had enough discussion yet ? We have been willing to discuss the Bill up to three o'clock in the morning, but nothing would satisfy the Government but to go on continuously night and day. There is no constituency in Canada that will ask its representative to work 24 hours a day for three or four days running. We would not be doing our duty to our constituents if we undertook to discuss any important legislation at four o'clock in the morning. But even if we went on with the discussion of the Bill, who would be prepared on the Government benches to deal with it ? Look at those empty benches ? There is the Minister of Trade and Commerce—how much assistance will he give us? He took a hand once or twice, but he did not throw much light on the subject. The Minister of the Interior knows a good deal more about it than he likes to tell us, I think, he is engaged largely in trying to conceal what he knows about it. There is no French Minister here to discuss the question. The strikers who took so much interest in the Bill that they resigned, and so little interest in it that they came back, are not here at all ; they do not want any discussion. And the hon. leader of the House, who I honestly believe, has not read three lines of the Bill, has not given us a single idea on the subject of any of the clauses if he has any idea. He does not know or care what it means, so long as he can hold it up as a rag to catch votes by. I say that this whole affair is a flagrant attempt to bid for the Roman Catholic vote of the Dominion.

Mr. FRECHETTE. That is what you have done yourself for five years.

Mr. EDGAR. Our leader is bidding for the vote of Catholic and Protestant, French and English alike. He is not seeking to array creed against creed and class against class. After the reasons I have given for this committee rising, the committee may be prevailed to do so. This should be a private member's day, and there are many important pieces of legislation down on the Order Paper in the hands of different members. There is the North-west Territories Act. When is the hon. Minister of the Interior going on with that ?

Mr. DALY. In proper time.

Mr. EDGAR. Then there is the bill of the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) relating to tobacco. Is not that a bill of importance.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. It is, but the liberty of the citizens of Manitoba is of more importance than that.

Mr. EDGAR. Of what use is the liberty of any of the citizens if you destroy your own life.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. If I could have the pleasure of always hearing you, I would sit here for two weeks.

Mr. EDGAR. I always try to discuss matters in a pleasant way, and sympathize with hon. members on that side. My sympathies are not restricted to any class or section, but I am always in favour of the under dog in the fight, and I sympathize with the minority on this occasion.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Do you sympathize with the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba ?

Mr. EDGAR. Of course I do.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Then vote for the Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. Do you think I would insult them by voting for a Bill like that, which gives them a stone when they ask for bread.

Mr. FRECHETTE. The hon. member for Simcoe finds it gives them too much.

Mr. EDGAR. Why, he has an amendment in the hands of the Chairman to provide for the use of the French language in the schools of Manitoba which the Government forgot to provide for. You will find that when section " c " is proceeded with, all the French speaking members on both sides will be supporting the hon. member for North Simcoe.

Mr. FRECHETTE. When the Bishop of Manitoba finds the Bill satisfactory, you should be satisfied.

Mr. EDGAR. No doubt the Bishop is an excellent man, and I never heard anything against him, only I think he is too simple and too confiding. He trusts these gentlemen too much. If he knew them as well as I do, he would not trust them.

Mr. TURCOTTE. Follow him ; he would be a good leader for you.

Mr. EDGAR. I follow as good a leader as I want, and as long as he is willing to lead I am willing to follow. Then there is a measure introduced by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), who calls himself the war horse of Glengarry. I never heard anybody else call him the war horse, but in a speech he admits that he was often known as the war horse of Glengarry. But whether he is a war horse or a saw horse, this measure is important. In view of all those very important matters for legislation which are on the Order paper, and which should be disposed of, I think the most sensible thing the House could do would be to permit the committee to rise, so that some of those important matters could be considered.

Mr. STUBBS. I merely rise to protest against the sitting of this committee, and also against the language of the Secretary of State this afternoon, when he classed me as one of the co-conspirators in obstruction. I came here from my constituents with a clear record, and I hope I will be able to return home with the same character. We are considering a Bill which is, I believe, of great importance. There are some clauses in this Bill which it is difficult to understand, and yet we have no Ministers in this House able to give an explanation of them. It is my belief that the Ministers themselves do not understand this Bill, and that it was drawn up for them by Mr. Ewart, the counsel for the minority. If it is against the rules of this Parliament to allow Mr. Ewart on the floor of the House to discuss the Bill, then why do not the Government hire the Grand Opera house, and invite members there so that we can have a fair understanding about this measure. Whether before this committee, or before our constituents, or before the courts of the country, this Bill must be explained. In the shape it is in at present, it is an utter impossibility for it to be of use to any class of people. This Parliament has no mandate from the people to deal with this question, and I dispute the assertion of the Secretary of State that it has ever been properly before the electors. I know that in Conservative constituencies in Ontario, it has been said, some times in public, and whispered some times in private, that the Conservative party would never allow the Bill to become law. Even in Cardwell, the Government candidate admitted on the hustings that he would support the Government in putting this Bill through, but in his private canvass he winked at it, and said it would never become law. If the Government is honest in trying to force the Bill, I hope they will be equally honest in the general election, and not try to work both ways. It is not human nature that any man can sit here day and night for weeks, and consider this measure properly. I have counted the House for the last three nights and on one occasion there were only twenty-three members present, while this morning at half-past one o'clock there were only thirty-two members present out of 215. Is that the way that the business of the country should be conducted? It appears as if the Government thought that physical endurance was preferable to mental intelligence in this matter. The Government have refused to take advice from my leader, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), because he has been the counsel for the Government of Manitoba, but I find they are quite ready to take advice from Mr. Ewart, the counsel for the minority, because the Minister of Justice told us the other day that he was advised by Mr. Ewart to leave in a certain clause of the Bill. How is it possible, any way, that this Bill can be carried into practice, when you have to depend on the Manitoba government to furnish the funds, while, at the same time, you create a new Education Board at great expense, and refuse to leave the working of the measure to the present advisory board, who could do it cheaper and better.

Now, Manitoba offers very fairly to allow religious instruction during school hours in every school attended by Catholics. They also offer to give Catholic representation on the advisory board and Board of Examiners, to allow Catholic ratepayers to appropriate their own taxes to their own schools, to share in the Government grant, and to have the aid of the provincial authority in the administration of the Catholic schools. The hon. Secretary of State told us that the defeat of this Bill would mean the defeat of the Government. Well, I do not think we should pass this Bill even if the party in Opposition should succeed thereby in gaining power. Therefore, I do not agree with the Secretary of State. We had a commision to negotiate with the Manitoba government on this question, and I think it was the duty of that commission to report to this House. I think the Government are guilty of a breach of faith towards this Parliament in not having their report brought down.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Before the question is put, I wish to make a few remarks. I think the motion that this committee should rise and report progress is perhaps the most important that we have had before us for some time. I do not think the Chairman will have much trouble in reporting progress, because there has not been much progress made. I have formed the conclusion, from the way in which business has been conducted this week, that the Government have no desire to pass the measure now before the House. If they had any such desire, they would refrain from imposing this continuous session on the members of the House, because they must know now that they are gaining nothing by it. I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the Government have a double policy in this matter. They are trying to make one portion of the country believe that they desire to have the Bill passed, while inwardly they rejoice in the prospect that the Bill will not be passed. The fact that no member of the Government has been able to explain satisfactorily to the committee any of the clauses that have been under consideration shows that they have not seized the meaning of the Bill itself, and are incapable of explaining it. If they desire to pass the Bill, they should be ready to explain its clauses to the committee. But what members of the Government have we here to-night? The Controller of Customs, sound asleep and snoring, and other members of the Government who are sound asleep. Yet they say they are desirous of passing this Bill. The members of this House must see that that is only a pretense. What do we see? No member gets up with the desire to discuss the matter or throw any light upon it. We are simply talking against time, and there is no use of denying the fact. If we were not talking against time, we would be discussing the provisions of the Bill; but the Government have refused to allow the committee to rise and report progress, and then go into committee again to discuss the provisions of the Bill. The Government are responsible for this state of things, and the people will hold them responsible. I will try from my standpoint to explain the views I entertain on this question. I have always been consistently opposed to the establishment of separate schools in this or any other country. I can date my recollection back to 1854, when the discussion with regard to separate schools was taking place in the province of Ontario, then Upper Canada, and I have the satisfaction of knowing that at that time, being a newspaper publisher, I consistently and persistently opposed the establishment of separate schools. I do not think they are for the benefit of the community at large. I believe in a thorough system of secular education, and this has been offered by the government of Manitoba. The religion taught in the schools has very little effect on the children. The places to teach religion are the family circles, the Sunday schools and the churches, and not in the schools. Now, Sir, the first decision of the Privy Council on this question established the fact that the legislature of Manitoba was within its right in abolishing separate schools in that province. That being the case, a second appeal was carried to the Privy Council, and it was decided that the minority had a grievance, and that this Parliament had power to grant a remedy. But the assumption which was made that that decision amounted to a mandate, and that this Parliament was bound to grant the remedy, is not sustained by anything in the decision of the Judicial Committee, and it is now admitted on all hands that the decision bears no such construction,—but that it was optional with the Dominion Government to pass the remedial order, and that after the remedial order was issued, it was optional with this Parliament to legislate in reference to the grievance. When the remedial order was issued, the government of Manitoba tried by every means in their power to induce the Dominion Government to have an investigation by a commission; but the Dominion Government shut their ears and would not listen to that offer. A second attempt was made to induce the province of Manitoba to comply with the mandate of the Dominion Government, and the same reply was given. The government of Manitoba were willing to do what was just and fair for the minority; but they wanted the Dominion Government to establish a case by an investigation to show that the minority were labouring under a grievance. Instead of the Dominion Government listening to this reasonable suggestion, they insisted that the government of Manitoba must comply with the remedial order, and undertook to drive them with a club. This long-continued debate is another consequence of the tyrannical conduct of the Government. If this committee had been allowed to rise and report progress, and go into committee again, we might have been at the 20th or 25th clause of the Bill by this time. It is pure stubborness on the part of the aged man who was brought out here to give new life to the Conservative party, it is by his downright stupidity that this legislation is being blocked at the present time. The drastic remedial order was first issued, no doubt, with the view of securing the vote of a certain class of people at the general election which was then contemplated. Then we find that after the Government passed this remedial order and made a demand upon Manitoba for concessions to the minority, they announced during last session, with a flourish of trumpets, that a special session would be called, not later than 2nd January, 1896, for the consideration of a remedial measure. And I may tell the House that notwithstanding the fact that this Bill was not introduced until some weeks after the opening of this session, it is generally understood that it was actually in print last session, and ready to be presented to this House, if the Government had had the courage to present it. Therefore, they were without any excuse for delaying the measure any longer than a day or two after we met on the 2nd of January last, and had it not been for the internal complaint from which the Government was suffering at that time—

An hon. MEMBER. A Bowell complaint.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I suppose it will not be uninteresting to members if I refer briefly to some of the little troubles that occurred in the Government. We all know that last session there was a kick in the Government. We know that three Cabinet Ministers, one of whom had a seat in the Senate, and two of whom have seats in this House, went out because the Government could not be induced to present a measure last session and press it forward to completion. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), and the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) went out together, but it was said at the time that the Postmaster General only went out in order to coax the Minister of Public Works back, and he succeeded. These two Ministers came back, but Senator Angers refused, and in that respect has shown his consistency all through this matter. We also were the eye witnesses of difficulties during this session. We were treated to the lamentable spectacle of half the Government on strike. Seven members of the Cabinet declared that they had no confidence in their First Minister, and we had the Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) getting up here and reading to us a type-written statement, in which he declared that the seven bolters had been compelled to leave the Government because they had no confidence in the ability of the First Minister. He told us, in so many words, that they considered him rather an imbecile, not fit to preside over the deliberations of such an intelligent body of men as they were. Then, on the other hand, we had the First Minister, in the Senate, denouncing these men as traitors and conspirators; and I well remember that immediately after the Finance Minister had got through his type-written statement, the House rose, and the First Minister, who had been listening attentively behind the Speaker's Chair, instead of rushing into the ranks of his own party for sympathy, came over to this side in order to vent his feelings and obtain our sympathy in consequence of the treachery to which he had been subjected. I have known Sir Mackenzie Bowell for forty years and have always looked upon him as a gentleman, and a man possessed of more than ordinary ability, and I cannot see why these men should presume to say that he was unfit to preside over their deliberations. They sent across the Atlantic to get a man to lead the Conservative party, and I wish them joy of their experiment, for a more conspicuous failure we have never had in this House than the hon. Secretary of State has proved himself to be since the day he took his seat among us this session. I do not envy the Conservative party the prize they secured in the person of the High Commissioner. To use a colloquial but expressive phrase, he never opens his mouth but he puts his foot into it right up to the thigh. I have heard members of his own party in this House express themselves as thoroughly disgusted with the way in which the High Commissioner leads the party, and no doubt, he will lead them to destruction at the next general election. And I fancy that they have rather repented of their course and would much rather remain under the leadership of Sir Mackenzie Bowell. In spite of all their professions, this Government has not displayed any desire to put through this Bill this session. We were called together on the 2nd January for that special purpose. The Bill was to have been immediately introduced and rushed through with all possible speed, and yet the second reading did not take place until the third month of our sitting. Every day we are told the same old story by the leader of the Government, that the Opposition are obstructing. How can we obstruct when the Government refuse to allow us the opportunity of discussing the measure? We are anxious that this committee should rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, so that we may come back refreshed and in proper condition to discuss this measure with the care which should be given to it. Consider for a moment the offer which has been made by the government of Manitoba and the reply which was given to this commission sent up from here by the Dominion Government. The Manitoba government replied that they were willing to make the schools entirely secular or to repeal the present provisions of the School Act relating to religious exercises, and to enact instead a clause allowing Catholics to teach religion in the schools between 3.30 and 4 p.m. What greater concession to the minority do you require, especially when we consider the fact that members of this House who are Catholics have declared that such a system as that established in Nova Scotia is perfectly satisfactory. It has furthermore been announced that the late Archbishop O'Brien declared that the Nova Scotia schools were perfectly satisfactory to the Roman Catholic minority. Yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) stated that the school system in the North-west Territories was similar to the Nova Scotia system, and that the Roman Catholic minority were satisfied with it there. When we have such a consensus of opinion with regard to the fairness of the offer that was made by the Manitoba government, surely we ought to come to the conclusion that this offer embraced everything that the minority in Manitoba could ask for. But the Government of the Dominion, for the purpose of trying to save their scalps at the next election, do not want the question settled, and so they try to create an agitation throughout the Dominion. The offer made by Manitoba is a fair offer. I am satisfied from the manner in which the Government is proceeding, that they have no intention of placing this Bill upon the statute-book. I believe that if the government of Manitoba had been approached in a proper spirit, this question would have been settled long ago, but no people wish to be dragooned into performing something they are not inclined to do. A good many remarks have been made with reference to the manner in which the Government obtained its majority on the second reading of this Bill. I do not wish to say anything harsh about gentlemen on the other side of the House, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that within the last twenty-four hours the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) has been appointed to a judgeship, and he made a speech in favour of the passage of this Bill. He has gone to his reward already. I understand that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) has declared in his newspaper that he was offered certain inducements.

Mr. HUGHES. How do you know?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Because I have read it.

Mr. HUGHES. I would not join an ultra remedial legislation wing of a cabinet that had the very men who are now helping you to obstruct this Bill scrambling for seats in it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Do you say that you scrambled for a seat in the Cabinet.

Mr. HUGHES. I refused to be a scrambler.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. But they offered to allow you to be a scrambler.

Mr. HUGHES. Who are "they"?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The Cabinet who wished to pass this legislation.

Mr. HUGHES. Some of the ultra remedial legislationists—yes, sir.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. And what did they want you to scramble for ?

Mr. HUGHES. That is another matter. Certain gentlemen are here now helping you in your obstruction in this House, and these men during the crisis were anxious to take seats in that very ultra remedial legislation Cabinet.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. HUGHES. They were scrambling for seats in it, and these men are now in the House obstructing this Bill.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) ought to inform the House who they are. I am glad to know that he had honesty enough to say that he scrambled for something, and was to get it.

Mr. HUGHES. He refused to accept any of their offers.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. They did offer.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What did they offer you ?

Mr. HUGHES. Not a civil service position like what you are after, but a Cabinet position.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Well, well, a Cabinet position !

Mr. HUGHES. I suppose you were going for a Senatorship, and your party were offering civil service positions and judgeships all over the country, to induce the Grits to favour their policy on this Bill. The ultra remedial legislationists were offering positions just as freely as your side have been offering positions all through the country.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What were you to get ?

Mr. HUGHES. What did your party promise to give you ?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I never asked the Government for anything in my life.

Mr. HUGHES. They knew the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) was opposed to separate schools, and he is about the only consistent member on that side of the House on that question ; and in order to get him into line they had to offer him something. Was it a Senatorship they offered you on the other side with the old men ?

Mr. GUILLET. Mr. Greenway is to be the Minister of the Interior in their new Cabinet.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What Cabinet position was the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) offered ?

Mr. HUGHES. Never mind.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think we ought to know.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Why do you not talk about section 6 ?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I was talking about that last night.

Mr. BELLEY. Then sit down, and let us go on with the Bill.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We cannot until the Government allows the committee to rise so that we can take some rest and consider the Bill properly.

Mr. HUGHES. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would vary the proceeding by giving us a list of the offices the members of the Reform party were promised in case they would upset the Government.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I was not aware that the Liberal party had any offices in their gift.

Mr. HUGHES. Yes ; 400, in case you got into power.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I never asked for an office in my life, nor anything else from a government ; not even a newspaper advertisement. We will have lots of offices to dispose of after a while, because the Liberal government will be in power soon. In the meantime, the hon. member for South Victoria is happy because he says he was offered a place.

Mr. HUGHES. That is a falsehool, sir.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I appeal to the Chairman, if the member for South Victoria did not say a few minutes ago that he was offered a Cabinet position.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. I object to the hon. member referring to me. He has alluded to the member for South Victoria several times. I am the member for South Victoria. Let him allude to the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes).

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am glad to make the correction, because I do not class you with the other man.

Mr. HUGHES. He is a thoroughbred.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. In discussing this question of separate schools——

Mr. HUGHES. Give us a list of the Grits that were offered jobs in case your party came into power.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You do not know what you are talking about. We ought to take into consideration the fact that we were asked to pronounce upon a matter similar to this before, and we declared by a vote of 188 to 13 that this House and Parliament were determined to maintain provincial rights. I voted with the 188, because I thought that the province of Quebec should have her provincial rights maintained, and in this case when the Government is seeking to interfere with Manitoba, I still maintain that Manitoba should have her rights maintained. The gentlemen in this House who stood up for provincial rights on the Jesuits' Estates question should now stand up for the rights of Manitoba. The leader of the House declared to us that this was the most important measure ever submitted for our consideration, but while we have it under discussion, instead of remaining here to give us explanations, he goes off to his bed every night about 11 o'clock, and we see no more of him for 12 hours. He should take his share of the labour as well as any private member of this House.

Mr. FRECHETTE. Where is your own leader ?

Mr. BELLEY. Do you mean Laurier or McCarthy ?

Mr. FRECHETTE. I mean Mr. Laurier.

Mr. DESAULNIERS. He is asleep.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We have lots of good men in the Liberal party to lead us. You have been so badly in need of a leader that you had to send to England for a man. You declared to the great people of Canada that the only man on the face of the globe that was fit to lead the Conservative party was Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner, who had been living on the fat of the land in England, and at the expense of the people, for twelve years. You had to import a leader from across the ocean.

Mr. DESAULNIERS. And a good importation he is.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You had to import him to try and save the Conservative party from utter destruction.

Mr. HUGHES. And he always succeeds.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There is nothing like success they say, and he has always succeeded in securing a pretty good job for himself, and for all his connections.

Mr. HUGHES. And he is going to have the best job ever he had soon.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not know about that. I have some other remarks to make on this question, but I know there are gentlemen who are more capable of addressing the House than I am, and I will make way for them.

Mr. HUGHES. Go on. It is the best speech you ever delivered.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not think a certificate from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) would carry much weight even amongst members on his own side of the House.

Mr. HUGHES. You are lucky to get a certificate like that.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would be afraid to tell any one about it. I wish now to refer to the attack made by the leader of the House on the leader of the Opposition. The other night, by a slip of the tongue, the Secretary of State referred to the Hon. Mr. Laurier as the "leader" of the House. Well, he is a prophet, no doubt, and in a very short time the leader of the Liberal party will be the leader of the House. But he complimented the Hon. Mr. Laurier on the manner in which he endeavoured to discuss the Bill. However, some of the French Conservatives declared to the Secretary of State that it would never do for the leader of the Conservative party to give the leader of the Opposition such a certificate of character as that, and so he decided to take it all back, and he attacked the Hon. Mr. Laurier in the House this afternoon. Well, from the time the good character was given by the Secretary of State until it was withdrawn, the leader of the Opposition had done nothing to merit that attack. He had sat in the House assisting to pass the Bill and discuss its clauses.

Mr. HUGHES. Did not the leader of the Opposition protest against the clause in the Bill which permitted Protestant teachers to teach in Catholic schools in Manitoba ?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Oh, sit down ; your head is crazy on Protestantism and Catholicism. I did not hear anything of the kind.

Mr. HUGHES. The Hon. Mr. Laurier certainly opposed the principle of allowing Protestant teachers to teach in the Catholic schools of Manitoba.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You had better ask somebody who was here.

Mr. HUGHES. Then why do you blame others for not being here ?

An hon. MEMBER. He is always here. He is one of the leaders of the party.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Yes, he has told us that he was invited to take a seat in the Government.

Mr. HUGHES. Not in this Government ; it was in the rump government.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. As I had been stating, the leader of the House was sorry for the certificate of character which he gave to the leader of the Opposition, and the supporters of the Secretary of State from Quebec got around him and forced him to withdraw that certificate. The leader of the Opposition requires no certificate as to his character or standing in this country from an old worn-out political hack like the gentleman who leads this House. The name of Wilfrid Laurier will live in the minds of the people of this country, not only in Quebec, but throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, when the name of the High Commissioner, who has cost this country so much, has been forgotten ; and it will be remembered as that of a patriot of the purest type, whose name has never been stained by an act of corruption.

Mr. BELLEY. He had $250,000 of Mercier's money in the last election. That is proved.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The country is proud of the position taken by the leader of the Opposition since he has had a seat in this House. Not only the French Liberals, but the French supporters of the Government, recognize that he is destined before long to occupy the leading place in the Government of this country. Artemus Ward said that a man must be a mighty limited cuss who could not build himself up without pulling his neighbour down. That is the position that was assumed to-day by the leader of the House. If he cannot build himself up in the estimation of this House and this country without trying to pull down and defame the leader of the Opposition, I will not say that he is a limited cuss, but he is not worth very much. Now, I will not take up the time of the committee any longer. My hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Bowman) is loaded up with a magnificent speech.

Mr. BOWMAN. I do not address this House very often, but on this occasion I feel it to be my duty to say a few words. I look at this question as a very important one, and it has given rise to a great deal of agitation and excitement throughout the country—perhaps more so than any other question since confederation. There are no questions on which people get so excited as questions of race and religion, especially religion. I fully agree with the last speaker that it would be much better to have one set of schools in each province of the Dominion, than two. I believe the schools would be much more efficient. I believe it would be especially unfortunate to have the two sets of schools in Manitoba, because the population there is so sparse. I do not go so far as to say that I would force the minority in all cases to accept one set of schools: but I believe the Roman Catholic minority would be willing to join with the Protestants in carrying on one system of schools, provided the subject were approached in the proper spirit. To see how this question should be settled, it might be as well for us to consider the systems we have in the older provinces. In the province of Ontario, for instance, we have common schools and separate schools. Separate schools were established many years ago in order to meet the views of the Catholics of that province; but I venture to say that a larger proportion of the Roman Catholics of the province of Ontario do not really desire separate schools, if the question were kept out of politics and they were left to decide the matter themselves according to their own judgment. For instance, I have a letter in my possession, which I received during the earlier part of the session, written by a prominent German Roman Catholic in my county, a gentleman who occupies a high position among his co-religionists, and is highly respected in the community where he lives. Among other things he says:

> The teacher should teach the ordinary course in all schools, and the priest should teach religion. Separate schools should be abolished, and Protestants and Catholics should go to the same school. An arrangement should be made, either by having a separate room for the purpose, or certain hours set apart to be devoted to religious instruction, and this religious instruction should be given by the priest to the Roman Catholic children, and by the Protestant minister to the children of his church.

In this way, he maintains, our public school system should be worked out, and this is just what Mr. Greenway is offering the Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba. We have other instances to show that the Catholic minority in the province of Ontario prefer the common school to the separate school. For instance, I was told the other day by a gentleman who understands the working of the common school in the city of Windsor, that although there are a large number of Catholics in that city, there is no separate school, and the Catholics and Protestants join together in a common school, and work it out with greater success and satisfaction to themselves than they could the dual system. He told me that the Protestants are sometimes in the majority on the school board, and sometimes the Catholics; during one term the school board had a Catholic chairman. In one part of my county there is a German Catholic settlement where they formerly carried on a common school, and for three years in succession they engaged a Protestant teacher; but when the anti-Catholic cry was raised in the province of Ontario by the Conservatives, the people in that school section established a separate school. Another example of Protestants and Catholics working together harmoniously in carrying on a common school system is furnished by the working of our high schools. Roman Catholics have no high schools in the province of Ontario, but they join the Protestants in carrying on high schools which are common to both religions, they have representation on the High School Board, and they are satisfied. In the provnce of Quebec we have also a dual system of education, which is perhaps unavoidable under the circumstances. In the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick a different system exists, and it seems to me that system should commend itself to every one who desires to see our schools kept in as efficient a state as possible. We are told by representatives from these provinces that that system works satisfactorily to both Catholics and Protestants. The Catholic minority are perfectly satisfied with the teaching they are receiving here. By common consent, by mutual forbearance between the two sections, they receive fair treatment in connection with their schools, and it seems to me that such an arrangement could be established in Manitoba, which would be equally satisfactory to all concerned. Previous to 1890, it seems that there was a dual system in Manitoba, under which the Protestant schools and the Catholic schools were managed by two different boards, each of which prescribed the books, examinations of teachers and regulations generally for its own particular school. Owing, no doubt, to the scarcity of the population and the inefficiency of some of the schools, the government of that province decided to make a change, and in 1890 an Act was passed repealing the old school law, enacting in its place a system of common schools. It is charged by the minority that the Manitoba government simply abolished the Catholic section and continued the Protestant section. If it can be shown that the old Protestant schools, which existed previous to 1890, were simply continued and the Roman Catholic schools abolished, I would admit that the minority have a just grievance. But from what information I can get, I am persuaded that the charge is unfounded, and that a proper investigation would show that the Protestant schools which existed before 1890 do not exist there now, but are replaced by a system which all classes might attend. A short time after this Bill was passed in Manitoba, the minority appealed to the Government of this Dominion asking that the school law of 1890 should be either disallowed or that some remedial measure should be adopted by Parliament to restore the separate schools. The Dominion Government might have disallowed the Acts, for they had the authority to do so, but referred the question to the Supreme Court to determine whether they had the right to interfere. The Supreme Court decided that they had not, and an appeal was made to the Privy Council of England, and that high judicial authority decided the minority of Manitoba have a grievance, and were entitled to be heard before the Privy Council of Canada. The Government have tried to show that they have received a mandate from the Privy Council compelling them to adopt this legislation. That contention is not well founded. All they were bound to do, was to give the minority a hearing, and then decide according to their judgment. Taking into consideration the intense feeling which has been excited all over this country, it would have been much better if the Dominion had gone about this matter in a different way. If, instead of making a peremptory order upon Manitoba to restore separate schools, they had gone to the Manitoba government in a friendly manner and endeavoured to secure a friendly settlement, I have no doubt that we would not now be confronted with this serious difficulty. If that had been done, I feel confident that the Manitoba government would have consented to concessions that would meet the grievance of which the minority complained, and prevented all the heart burning and ill feeling which is now being excited. This Bill, in the opinion of the men most competent to judge in this House, has so many faults and deficiencies that it is practically worthless, and a number of the leading lawyers in this House have expressed their strong conviction that it is unconstitutional, and considering the doubts which exist, both with regard to the constitutionality of this measure, and to its fitness to meet the claims of the minority, it would be much better if the Government would withdraw the Bill altogether, and hold the general elections, so that the people may have an opportunity of pronouncing on the question. If this Bill be forced through the House, it will excite such a feeling of indignation, it will kindle such sectarian feeling throughout Canada, as it will take years to allay. I think that we should avoid in every possible way arousing sectarian feeling, and exciting one section of the community against another, but that instead we should approach the subject in a conciliatory spirit, and if we do, I feel confident that the Manitoba government will consent to an arrangement which will restore harmony and good feeling.

Mr. YEO. I must protest against the course of the Government in attempting to force this important measure through the House at such unreasonable hours. In my opinion the remedial order was passed in a hasty and unjustifiable way, which only had the effect of creating irritation and exciting hostility, in Manitoba, whereas if a different course had been taken, there would have been no necessity for the question coming before this House at all. There is no doubt when this remedial order was passed in March, 1895, the Government intended dissolving Parliament and appealing to the country, but they became divided in their counsels. Some members of the Government wanted to appeal to the country and others did not. Those who were opposed prevailed, and consequently we had the session of 1895. It is almost needless to refer to what took place that session. It does not appear that any very strong efforts were made to effect an arrangement with Manitoba, and as a consequence this Parliament met on the 2nd of January. Instead of the Government being prepared to proceed with this Bill immediately, we were astounded to find that half the Government had resigned the second day after Parliament met. Various reasons have been assigned, but I think it is evident to all that the school question was at the bottom of the trouble. After the Cabinet had been reconstructed, it was supposed remedial legislation would be at once introduced, but it was not until the month of March that the Bill was brought up for second reading. This is conclusive proof to my mind that the Government had no desire to pass this Bill. They were using this simply as a means of obtaining support from a certain class of the electors. That is the way it appears to me, and I hope I am not judging them harshly in saying this. Every one who has studied the question closely must know the Government had no real intention of putting this Bill through. I do not think there is any right thinking man in Canada, no matter what his religion or nationality, who would not say, that it is certainly in the best interests of the country that the Government should have tried to settle this question amicably. We have been accused of being obstructionists on this side of the House. This charge comes with very bad grace from the Secretary of State, because if there is one man more than another who has been the means of obstructing the business of the House, it is that gentleman. On several occasions when the business was being proceeded with, he has risen in his place to read members out of his own party, or to make speeches which were not calculated to smooth matters. I have very great faith in the decision of the electors of this Dominion, and I am quite ready to appear before my electors at any time on this question. One objection which I have to this House proceeding with this legislation at the present session is, that the members cannot represent anything like the present electorate of the Dominion. Neither has the question ever been submitted to the people. I must say that so far as I am concerned, I have never had an opportunity of discussing the matter with my constituents. Nearly twenty years ago our present school system in Prince Edward Island became law. When the change was proposed there was strong opposition to it from the Roman Catholics, who contended they should have separate schools. The law was very objectionable at first, but although very few amendments have been made since, the law in Prince Edward Island has been so administered that it gives entire satisfaction to the whole people. I have been a trustee for many years, and I am correct in saying that neither Roman Catholic or Protestant finds fault with the school law of Prince Edward Island. I understand that the same thing may be said with regard to the school law in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and I have no doubt at all if the people of Manitoba were left to themselves, the same state of things would soon exist there. The people of that province are, no doubt, reasonable, and they know that in the interests of the province it is necessary that all creeds should be satisfied. In my judgment, this Bill, if it became law, would give very little satisfaction to the Manitoba minority. There is no provision made for funds to carry it out, and without that it must be a failure. Within the last few weeks the Government have seen fit to adopt in part the suggestion thrown out by the leader of the Opposition, and they have held a conference with the Manitoba government. From what we can gather from the newspaper reports, the Manitoba government went a very great length to arrange this question in a satisfactory way. I believe if the propositions they made were accepted, it would have been more satisfactory to the minority than this Bill, if passed. I quite agree with what was stated in the second reply of the Manitoba government to the Federal Government. I believe the latter Government were remiss in their duty in not thoroughly investigating this whole question. I can come to no other conclusion than that this Government had only one object in view, and that was the object of attempting to create the impression they were the only friends of the Roman Catholics, and that the Liberal party were opposing them. There is no foundation in fact for such an impression as this. In any case, the policy of coercion is a bad one, whether it relates to education or anything else. It would have been far better to have tried conciliation——

Mr. PRIOR. Has conciliation never been tried ?

Mr. YEO. It has been tried very feebly within the last few weeks.

Mr. PRIOR. It was tried months and months ago.

Mr. YEO. And even while that was being tried, the Government were forcing this Bill through Parliament. It was like holding a gun at the heads of the Manitoba government and threatening to destroy them. This is not the way to deal with a great province. If the Manitoba government had given a blank refusal there might be some justification for a remedial Act, but coercion is the last resort, and wherever it has been tried it has always resulted in ignominious failure. The hon. Secretary of State has professed to be a strong advocate of this measure, and to be ready to go almost any length in support of it. In fact, I think he has gone so far as to say he would die for the minority in Manitoba ; but this is only mere talk. I do not think any one who listened to him could place much importance on that statement. I think the hon. gentleman, like the rest of us, would like to live as long as he can ; and if, instead of making statements of that kind, he would try to point out the merits of the measure, it might have a better effect. I have been astonished to hear members on the Government side of the House say that they are opposed to separate schools and opposed to this Bill, and, when the vote came, to find them supporting it. It seems to me they are more anxious to support the Government than to be governed by principle. Whilst we have a party system of government, it is true, members may consider it right to support the Government ; but when it comes to a matter of principle it should not hold good. Even if the defeat of this Bill resulted in a change of Government, I do not think it would be a very serious thing for this Dominion. We could not have a worse Government than we have to-day, and a change would certainly be an improvement. It would be better to break up a dozen Governments than to create discord in the province of Manitoba. In contrast with the policy of coercion pursued by the Government is the policy of the hon. gentleman whom I am honoured to call my leader, which has been from the beginning a policy of conciliation. If that policy had been adopted, I do not think the House would be here now attempting to pass a Bill of this kind. Speaking for myself, I am as anxious to do justice to the minority in Manitoba as any other member of this House ; but I want to see it done in a way calculated to do the least injury. I am quite satisfied, from the experience of the other provinces, especially the Maritime Provinces, that if left to the people of Manitoba themselves, the education laws would soon be to the satisfaction of all parties. If the Government had been really in earnest about this measure, they would not have waited till the second of January before calling this House together to pass it. This Parliament will die a natural or an unnatural death by effluction of time on the 24th of April, and the Bill now before it will be in about the same state then that it is at present, unless the Secretary of State adopts a different course from what he is now pursuing. I have not heard any gentleman supporting this Bill say that it will afford the minority in Manitoba the relief they think they are entitled to. Gentlemen have said that it is better than nothing ; I think that is about as far as they have gone. Looking at it in every way, I come to the conclusion that it can possibly do no good, and that if left to the people themselves, any grievances that exist there would soon be remedied. The members of this House will soon have to give an account of their doings to their constituents, and I for one am ready to bow to the decision of the people ; but I must protest again against this House going on in this way, to the great waste of time, to the great discomfort of members, and to great loss of dignity to this legislature. I think we should take the rest necessary to put us in a fit frame of mind to properly discharge our duties in this House.

Mr. COLTER. There are many reasons why this committee should rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. One reason for that is the character of the Bill itself. Another is that the tactics pursued by the Government are not such as to put the Bill through. The farce being played at the present time is not one calculated to impress the country with the wisdom of this Government. Another reason might be given, and that is the health of members of this House. You know, as well as I, that one hon. member who a few days ago was discussing this Bill is no more, and the papers are unanimous in ascribing his early death to the continuous sitting of this House on the second reading of the Bill. A great many events have occurred since the Bill was introduced and read the second time which, in my judgment, entitle us to demand that the committee should rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. Among those events is the conference which lately took place in Winnipeg—a conference that should have been held long ago, and which, if it had been held long ago, would have settled the whole qeustion. The Government sent three of the members of this House to Winnipeg to meet the government of that province and see if some arrangement could not be made to settle this question. What is the result of that conference ? Our delegates made certain proposals which were not accepted, and the representatives of the Manitoba government also made proposals which, I think, ought to be accepted by this Government. I think it would be well to read these proposals to this House. (The hon. gentleman read the proposals.) I shall not take up time by reading the reply of the representatives of Manitoba, but shall consider the proposals made by that province. They were two in number : First—Completely to secularize the schools, a proposal to which many would object ; the second—That from 3.30 to 4 o'clock religious instruction should be allowed. This would give the minority : First, Catholic religious instruction during school hours in every school attended by Catholics ; secondly, Catholic representation on the advisory board and the examining board, also text-books satisfactory to the Catholics. Many who have the cause of the minority at heart thought that this latter proposal was all that was necessary to redress the grievances. This appeal arises through the passing of what is known as the Common School Act of Manitoba, which abolished both Protestant and Catholic schools which previously existed. I believe that the law is very similar to that which prevails in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I wish to assure the House that as far as New Brunswick is concerned, the common, non-sectarian School Act is acceptable to all classes. I do not think you can find a public man who would dare to stand up for the repeal of that school Act, or even of a modification of it. In the county I have the honour to represent there are not, I believe, ten men who would vote for any other system of schools than that we have. We have a very large Catholic population in my county, and there are no stronger supporters of the School Act than they are. I have been surprised to hear the talk about Protestant teachers and Catholic teachers. With us it is no uncommon thing to find in a purely Protestant district a Roman Catholic teacher, and vice versa. In fact, the creed of the teacher is never asked. And if the offer made by Manitoba were accepted, the minority there would be in a better position than the minority of New Brunswick. While in two or three of our large cities there are schools largely attended by Catholics, in which, after school hours, religious instruction is given, that is done by common consent and not by law. But if the Manitoba government's offer had been accepted, the minority of Manitoba would have had a similar system by statute and not by grace. When the Act of 1890 was passed, test cases were made to ascertain its constitutionality, and the Privy Council of England held that the law was constitutional. The minority then appealed to this Government and the Parliament for redress of grievances. This appeal was based on subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, which says :

> An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province or of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

Also subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act :

> Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exist by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

The question of the Government's right to consider this appeal was referred to the Supreme Court under the provisions of an Act of this Parliament passed, I believe, in 1890. The Supreme Court decided in the negative, but the Privy Council reversed the decision. Before the judgment was received in proper form by this Government, as I understand, a remedial order was made, calling upon the government of Manitoba to restore the rights claimed by the minority. The Manitoba government refused to carry out the order and asked for an investigation. Now, I claim that this Government did wrong in not accepting this offer, and investigating the case. Before the following session of this Parliament, the session of 1895, one member of the Government went on strike. But he was pacified in some way, and after being out of the Government a few days, he returned. When we were about half through the session three other Ministers resigned for the avowed reason that the Government was not doing all it should do to remedy the grievances of the minority. On a promise being given that a sixth session of this Parliament would be called to pass remedial legislation, two returned to their places. No sooner had this session taken place than seven other members of the Government went out on strike, but afterwards this difficulty was also arranged. The committee are aware of what has taken place since the House finally got to work. The Bill was introduced on the 3rd day of March, and came to a vote on the 20th March. From the time this Remedial Bill has been taken up by the House, as much time in its discussion has been consumed by the friends of the Government as those opposed to the Government. In fact they have taken up more time. An hon. gentleman has stated to this House that on the second reading of that Bill, forty-seven Conservatives addressed this House, and twenty-eight Liberals ; and the speeches of those forty-seven Conservatives occupied 761 columns of the "Hansard," and the speeches of the twenty-eight Liberals only occupied 506 columns.

Mr. NORTHRUP. What is the proportion in the House ?

Mr. COLTER. Well, there were 47 Conservatives and 28 Liberals who spoke on the second reading.

Mr. GUILLET. Do you count the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) as a Conservative ?

Mr. COLTER. Certainly, he is a Conservative, and one of the best of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, I think it is apparent to every member of this House that the course pursued by the Government has not been such as would lead me, at least, to believe that they have any intention of pressing this Bill along.

Mr. PRIOR. That is a little too thin.

Mr. COLTER. No, the Government's action is altogether too thin.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Are you helping it along ?

Mr. COLTER. The Secretary of State took up two hours at least in one of his characteristic speeches, which made it impossible for any hon. member, with the instincts of a gentleman, to put up with the language used by that hon. gentleman, and he has ever since pursued a course in this House which can leave no doubt that the hon. gentleman is not in earnest in putting this Bill through. His whole course in this House compels me to come to the conclusion that his sole aim and object is simply to catch a certain vote.

Mr. FLINT. This is an hour at which a majority of the labouring men of the country have begun the labours of the day. They have rested in their beds at home, and recuperated their physical systems by sleep ; they have partaken of their frugal meals, and have wended their way to the various workshops, and factories, and scenes of the days' operations. It is a wise provision of nature and of law that those who are carrying on the great industries of the country, should have those hours devoted to rest and refreshment previous to undertaking the labours of the day. Contrast the position of the humble labouring man with the position which the Government has compelled the representatives of the people to assume in this House during the past few days. I ask the committee if they think the Government has been fair in its treatment of the representatives of the people, in insisting that they violate all the rules of physical health, all the ordinary rules pertaining to the discharge of labour, and that they remain here day and night to discuss the details of this measure. I think under these circumstances that the committee is acting wisely and prudently in resisting so great a violation of ordinary proceedings, and a greater violation of all legislative propriety. The question has now become one, not as to whether this particular measure shall be passed by the House, not as to whether some details of the Bill are wise or unwise, but whether the representatives of the people in this House should vigorously stand up for their rights as representatives of a free people, and should on this occasion say once for all to the Government of this country, and to all future governments, that no matter what may be the character of the Bill, no matter what may be the importance of the measure, no combination of men in this country shall bulldoze the representatives of the people here, and shall violate all rules of health and all rules of decency. In the province of Nova Scotia we have settled this school problem, and in that connection I must give considerable credit to the Secretary of State, not, however, the whole credit of being the originator of the public school system, or as a man who risked his political existence in carrying that law into effect. History will not bear out the claim the hon. gentleman makes on his own behalf, but he happened to lead the provincial government at the time when, with the aid of the Liberal Opposition, they carried the Free School Measure. Hon. Joseph Howe had risked his popularity many times by advocating that system. The bulk of the Conservative party up to the eve of the election of 1863-64 had opposed the Liberal efforts to secure free public schools. At those elections the Conservatives came back to power, and with the aid of the Liberals solved the problem. The result has been that this law, with a few administrative amendments, has remained in force for over thirty years. It has given satisfaction to all parties, and the citizens are a unit in supporting that measure ; Roman Catholics and Protestants are equally loyal in praising it. That system is in principle and details the law of Manitoba, which this Government is seeking to change against the wishes of the vast majority of that province.

Mr. McCARTHY. How does it differ from the school law of Manitoba.

Mr. FLINT. It does not differ in any material respect. A separate school system is not recognized in Nova Scotia, while the system in its practical operation is perfectly satisfactory to the Roman Catholics.

Mr. HUGHES. Is not the law of Ontario more under the direct control of the local authorities than the law of Nova Scotia ?

Mr. FLINT. I do not think so.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Is it not a fact that the system is a separate school system in practice ?

Mr. FLINT. The law does not recognize a separate school system, but where the circumstances permit the good sense of the people, the harmony between the Roman Catholics and Protestants, and their desire to meet each other's views have permitted the growth of the system in such directions as to meet the views of the Roman Catholics.

Mr. O'BRIEN. And without injury to the public schools.

Mr. FLINT. Yes ; and under a system which, I think, would grow up in Manitoba.

Mr. McCARTHY. Would the hon. gentleman say what he means by separate schools?

Mr. FLINT. I speak in the popular sense. You visit a district which is mainly Roman Catholic and you find that the school, in respect of its financial arrangements, is the same as others—the ratepayers elect the trustees, and these take charge of the affairs of the school——

Mr. McCARTHY. And how about textbooks ?

Mr. FLINT. These are prescribed by the Council of Public Instruction.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then they are the same in all schools ?

Mr. FLINT. Yes ; and the teachers receive the same diploma and the schools are subject to the same inspector. Provided the teacher proves himself capable and the pupils pass the requisite examinations to show their proficiency in the studies prescribed by the Council of Public Instruction, the law asks no more.

Mr. EDGAR. Are there two superintendents ?

Mr. FLINT. No ; nor two inspectors.

Mr. McCARTHY. What does the hon. gentleman mean by "separate schools ?"

Mr. FLINT. I am not using the word in the legal sense, but whatever moral or religious instruction is given by the teacher, it forms no part of the inspector's duty to inquire into that. That is ignored. If, after school hours, or any other part of the day, as far as I know, the teacher desires to convey religious or moral instruction, that is a matter at the will of the teacher.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask if in the city of Halifax and other large centres there are not separate buildings or separate rooms set apart for the Roman Catholic children ?

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). And owned by the Roman Catholic body ?

Mr. HUGHES. And a part of the convent building, I believe ; those schools being controlled by teachers who have not passed the regular examination.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). And have not gone to the normal school ?

Mr. FLINT. The phrase used by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) while true as a matter of fact, would convey a false impression. It is true that public schools are conducted in certain buildings that may be owned by the Roman Catholic corporation : but they are leased——

Mr. HUGHES. Does not the school board of the city of Halifax pay the Roman Catholic Church rental for certain buildings ?

Mr. FLINT. They pay the Roman Catholic Church rental just the same as they would pay rental to Mr. Smith or Mr. Jones or anybody else. It does not alter the position ; it does not alter the relations of the pupils to the teacher.

Mr. HUGHES. If it is not considered too much of an interruption——

Mr. FLINT. Certainly not ; I desire to explain matters as I understand them.

Mr. HUGHES—are not the Sisters of Charity allowed to teach in these schools without being required to pass the ordinary provincial examination ?

Mr. FLINT. I think not. I am certain they are not. Every school teacher in the province must have the same certificate. There is no distinction recognized by law or by practice.

Mr. HUGHES. I know there is.

Mr. FLINT. Then the hon. gentleman knows something that I do not know. The school commissioners of Halifax recognize as all our citizens do, that there are differences of opinion on religious matters and with regard to systems of education, and like reasonable people they try to accommodate their institutions to the feelings of all. Our public men seek to show the people that the points upon which they agree are more numerous and more important than those upon which they differ instead of trying as some agitators in other provinces do to stir up strife. The only teaching in religion or morality is such as would not be offensive to Christians of any denomination.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is that prescribed by the Council of Public Instruction, or how ?

Mr. FLINT. The law of Nova Scotia does not prescribe any religious teaching. I have here the Schools Act of Nova Scotia. Section 75 says :

> No person shall be deemed qualified to receive public money under this chapter unless he shall hold a diploma from the Council of Public Instruction.

That applies to all teachers, whether they are Sisters of Charity, members of Christian brotherhoods or others. The provision regarding moral instruction, is that the teacher is to inculcate by precept and precept the Christian virtues. It might be said that the schools of Nova Scotia were purely secular schools. So far as the law is concerned there is no recognition of Christianity as a series of doctrinal propositions, but the duty is thrown upon the teacher of inculcating Christian morality, and this is acceptable to Roman Catholics as to others. I have always admitted that the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba had a claim that was by no means baseless. Under the constitution, even apart from the various decisions that have been given, it seems clear that two series of schools were recognized in respect of religious doctrine. I do not think it is necessary to go back to the adoption of the Manitoba Act for the purpose of discussing this question. I think we all agree it would have been better if the provisions of the Manitoba Act had not been adopted, as then the troubles which have succeeded would have been avoided. And it has always seemed to me, and I have found many to agree with me—that the provisions of that Act in this respect were made vague by this Parliament in its desire to avoid stirring up public feeling upon this school question at that time. It is to be remarked that in the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council there is no order to this Parliament to legislate at all. There is simply a statement that we have the jurisdiction to legislate, and that this Parliament in its wisdom might or might not exercise this power, and that if the legislature of Manitoba exercised a power satisfactory to the views of this Parliament, then this Parliament might hold that power in abeyance. But there is no direction here to legislate, there is no statement that it is essential that the Act of 1890 should again be made law. The consequence of all this is that much of the argument made by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of the Interior falls to the ground. When any clause is criticised, the contention is put forward that that was the old law, and that we are bound to restore the old law, which certainly is a proposition that we cannot accede to. If we are to legislate at all, we must simply remove the grievance so far as we can. After this decision was rendered, the Government adopted the policy of summoning Manitoba before the Privy Council, of having the case argued there, and then issuing an order upon which legislation should be founded. The alternative policy which has been advocated in this House by the leader of the Opposition, and by a majority of this House supporting him, was this: Having now settled all the legal and constitutional questions outstanding, the whole case is clear for a decision upon matters of policy. We are aware from the highest authority that the Act of 1890 was thoroughly constitutional; that that Act was unimpeachable and unchangeable by any other power than the legislature of Manitoba. Another point settled definitely is that if there was a grievance, then there was an appeal to this Government to issue a remedial order, and if the remedial order was disobeyed, then this Parliament could act. Then arose the duty on the part of wise statesmen to take this situation into consideration. It has been said that reasonable conciliation has been used towards Manitoba, and that Manitoba has refused the approaches of the Government. A great stress has been laid upon the celebrated Order in Council of July 26th, 1894. Now, the circumstances under which that Order in Council was issued were altogether different from the circumstances as they existed after the decision of the Privy Council was rendered. When the Act of 1890 was passed, there had been petitions to the Government, signed by the most distinguished clergy of the Roman Catholic Church in Quebec and Manitoba, asking the Government to disallow certain Acts passed in the North-west Territories, a thing which the Government could have done with the greatest propriety, and without violating any of the principles upon which the Government has been conducted from the time of confederation. I think also there was sound reason for asking the Government to disallow the Manitoba Act of 1890. They were aware that this Act affected the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority, because they saw that it struck down the system of separate schools, which was dear to the Roman Catholic citizens. Had they disallowed that Act, accompanied by an Order in Council stating the full reasons therefor, there was a magnificent opening for correspondence between the Government of Canada and the government of Manitoba, which might have led to such an amended measure being passed at the ensuing session of the legislature, as would have removed all these difficulties. They might have pressed upon the government of Manitoba the reasons which have been put forward in this House by themselves and their supporters, in favour of restoring the separate school system which the Act of 1890 had abolished. I contend that the Government has never faily recognized the position of the Manitoba government. No power can deliver an order to a constitutional government, supported by a legislature, as an order of a court can be handed to a financial corporation. Both political parties in the legislature had decided on this educational policy, and if they were willing to concede points to the minority, in order to meet the views of the Dominion Government, time should have been allowed for internal negotiations between the leaders of the Government and the Opposition, in order that they might combine to carry out the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the wishes of the Privy Council of Canada and those who sympathize with the Manitoba minority. The Dominion Government summoned the Manitoba government as a court, heard arguments, and issued an order of a very stringent character. This order was so unwise that the Government was impelled by public opinion to recognize the impossibility of the province obeying it, and it was subsequently declared to be a purely formal and perfunctory document. That document should have been withheld. After the public mind had been prepared, commissioners should have been appointed to interview the Manitoba government and discuss the question. If, even when the Bill came before the House, a policy of conciliation had been pursued, and commissioners had visited Winnipeg, the situation would have been better than it is to-day. In regard to this remedial measure, the Government have undertaken to legislate too much, for they have laid down not only legislative principles, but principles of administration which this Parliament has no power to carry out.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is desirable to call the attention of the committee to the events which preceded and led up to the present position of affairs. If we go back to the early history of this question, we find that if the Dominion Government had disallowed the Manitoba Act of 1890, which they had the power to do, their action would have been justified, in view of the strong reasons given, and complaints made as to the extreme injustice done to the minority. No doubt the Government of that day hoped to escape the responsibility of action through the courts deciding against the validity of the Act. But the Act was sustained and Sir John Thompson was called upon to take action in the interests of the minority. The minority's appeal was then made, and the Government, not satisfied with their own legal knowledge, submitted to the Supreme Court the question whether they had the right to appeal. The Supreme Court decided in the negative, but that was reversed by the Privy Council on appeal and the matter came back here to be dealt with. Pursuing its policy of seeking to avoid responsibility, the Government have taken a position in this matter that it was a judicial rather than a political question and that they were carrying out the judgment of the court. The course of the Government on this question has been tortuous throughout. No doubt they intended to hold a general election before last session—everything pointed to that course having been decided upon. But for some reason they changed their minds and another session was held. During that session three members of the Cabinet resigned. It would be interesting to know the inner history of that transaction. All of these Ministers evidently felt that the Government would not redress the grievances of the minority. But a compromise was effected and two of the members returned, but the third, evidently feeling that his colleagues were not sincere remained out, as he has done up to the present time. A distinct pledge was given by the Government that a special session would be held to pass remedial legislation. But it became evident that not only were they not agreed about the nature of the measure but they were not agreed that any remedial measure should be introduced. Parliament met on 2nd January as promised, and immediately adjourned until the 9th. But it was evident that this adjournment was for the purpose of patching up Government differences rather than for the convenience of members. For no sooner had the House met than we had the unseemly spectacle of a Cabinet quarrel, one-half pronouncing the other as imbecile and the imbecile half denouncing the other as treacherous. I remember a good many ministerial crises and differences in this country, but anything so disgraceful as this has never been known. But when those Ministers who had gone out became convinced that the Premier was both able and willing to replace them they agreed to go back. A more humiliating surrender could not be conceived. They agreed to serve under the man whom they declared they could not serve under because he was imbecile, and he agreed to take back the men whom he had denounced as traitors. But it was evident that some compromise was made. These gentlemen brought back one of their own servants to lead them in this House. So weak were they in ability, I might almost say in integrity, that the great Conservative party, which was once the pride of this country and which claimed to have done so much for the country was reduced to the humiliating alternative of sending to London for a public servant to lead them, a gentleman who has distinguished himself by incapacity for leadership which was wholly unexpected in a man of his high reputation. The debate on the Address proceeded. It was not unduly protracted and gentlemen supporting the Government took their share in it. But still the Bill was not ready as it would have been had the Government been united and earnest in their determination to redress the grievances of the minority. Instead of discussing the Bill we entered upon the discussion of the Budget. This occupied a long time, as might have been expected, for we are on the eve of a general election and gentlemen on both sides naturally desired to lay their views before the country. Gentlemen on both sides took part in that debate. Six weeks of the session had elapsed before the Bill was introduced and it was some time after that that the Bill was printed. We have a most vicious practice in this Parliament, to which I have called attention before. The proper practice, the British practice, is that important measures to be introduced are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, so that members may know what subjects are to be discussed and so prepare themselves to discuss them intelligently.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the charge has been made that several hon. members in this House are supporting the Government in their policy on this question, who are no longer responsible to their constituents, and who have no intention of seeking re-election. It has been said that members are supporting the Government who have received promises of reward for so doing. Within the last twenty-four hours, we have had the most convincing evidence of the charge that gentlemen are supporting this measure who cannot be held entirely free from the imputation of being influenced by hope of reward. The fact has been disclosed within the last twenty-four hours, that a gentleman, who has been supporting this Government for more than one Parliament, has been sworn in as a judge under circumstances of the most remarkable character. Those circumstances will, no doubt, be made subjects of discussion at a later period, and I will not enter upon them now, because, when the discussion is brought up, there will be an abundant opportunity of pointing out the very extraordinary and very disgraceful nature of the transaction. It is sufficient for the present purpose to point to that as an instance of the manner in which, we may assume, that some hon. gentlemen in this House at any rate have been influenced in their support of this measure. This Bill is objectionable on a great many grounds, one of which is that it is fraught with constitutional difficulties of the gravest character. In the first place, it is scarcely possible that Manitoba can be expected to put it in force, even if they were inclined to do so, without resorting to the courts to ascertain whether the measure is valid. But, even if the province does not undertake that business, it would be in the power of any individual who wishes this law to fail, to take action upon almost any one of the clauses which we have hitherto been discussing. So that we are forcing upon Manitoba a measure which settles nothing, but which, besides opening up an endless era of litigation, will leave to that province a legacy of racial and controversial difficulties which there is no possibility of allaying.

Mr. CASEY. The discussion which has already taken place on the early clauses of the Bill, has shown that the Government are practically ignorant of the meaning and scope of those clauses, and we may reasonably assume, also, of the entire Bill. The other evening, when we were discussing section 4, the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) offered an amendment, which was immediately accepted by the leader of the House. Thereupon the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), who, as one of the representatives of the persecuted minority, should be consulted as to the feelings of that minority, repudiated the position taken by the leader of the Government, and told the House that it would never do, because it would tie up the Catholic school board in Manitoba in the choice of books, except on religious matters and history, to such as were authorized for the public schools of Manitoba. The objection of the member for Provencher was that this would cut out the French books, which, above all things, some of his constituents wished to have used in their schools. Strange to say, a little later in the debate, the much-dreaded member for North Simcoe, the bogey who is used by the leader of the House to scare everybody who is interested in our French Canadian friends, this gentleman came forward and pointed out the injustice of this amendment, and urged that the Catholics of Manitoba who speak the French language, should have the right to use French books in their schools. Here we find the Government and its supporters tangled up in a few minutes on this clause, and so badly tangled up that they had to allow the clause to stand over. It reminded me very much of a man trying to disentangle a fishing-line.

No doubt, this whole Bill was constructed for fishing purposes, and every clause may be regarded as a little fish-line, in its purpose. But this fish-line got so thoroughly entangled that no way to unloose it was evident at first glance. The Government and their supporters began pulling at any end they saw sticking out; they pulled at that end as far as it would come, and, when they found it would not come any further, they would let it drop and pull on another. When they had pulled all the ends that were sticking out, and brought the whole thing into a hard knot, they had to ask the indulgence of this committee to give them some time to unloose it. This is only one instance of many to show what a crude measure this is, and how little care and intelligence have been used in its preparation. This Bill is a complete paradox. It reminds me of a beast in the animal kingdom known as Ornithorhynchus paradoxus. It has four feet with claws, and a bill like a duck; lays eggs and hatches them, and suckles its young when they are hatched. This animal is found in Australia. It combines all the characteristics of all the genera. This Remedial Bill contains the nature of the Public School Act, of an Act to establish separate schools, of a municipal Act, of an Act to amend the constitution. The effect is to represent not a complex unit, but a measure thrown together as if by children at play.

Mr. DALY. That is hard on the local legislature of Manitoba.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Ewart, the late Minister of Justice, the present Minister of Justice, and the Secretary of State have all assisted in throwing this Bill together.

Mr. DALY. It can all be found in Manitoba statutes from 1881 to the present time.

Mr. CASEY. How can that be when there is reference in it to the Governor General in Council ?

Mr. DALY. There are five new clauses in the whole Bill ; the rest were taken from the Manitoba Act.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. And yet it took the Government a year to put it together.

Mr. CASEY. A leading lawyer in expressing to me his opinion of this Bill said it was purely amateurish. The measure, indeed, seems to be an attempt to frame a complete school system. That was wholly unnecessary, for a Bill containing a few clauses could have been framed so as to confer the desired privileges on the Catholics. The Government have placed in this Bill over 250 clauses and subsections, and these afford an equal number of opportunities to thwart its progress. This is further proof that the Government never expected or intended to pass it through the House. The present policy of the Government was well described by the Toronto "Globe" correspondent in a recent article, in the course of which it is said that the Secretary of State was the most scientific obstructionist in the House ; that he entered the chamber at a certain hour in the day and aroused a sufficient amount of ill-feeling to call for sufficient replies from hon. members to continue the debate during the night. The speech delivered by that hon. gentleman last night was additional evidence of his obstructive tactics. He insulted not only the leader of the Opposition, but the French Canadian race. That race will resent his insult and show their appreciation of the leader of the Opposition during the forthcoming election. Mr. Laurier is the first French Canadian, since the days of Lafontaine and Cartier who has attained the highest position in the politics of this country, and he will be the first French Canadian Premier. It is extraordinary that such an attack should have been made by the Secretary of State, who has never been a friend of the French Canadians as regards their race or religion. He (Mr. Laurier) has given to English-speaking Canada a loftier idea of what the best type of French Canadians can be. Though he is the best specimen, he is by no means alone of his kind, but is supported by men of his own race who deserve and enjoy the highest respect of their English-speaking friends.

One more point with regard to the remarks of the Secretary of State. I had the temerity to state the other day that the hon. gentleman was afflicted with that form of big-headedness known in the medical profession as megalomania. I refer to his late remark for justification of that statement. He said that Sir John Thompson had been a devoted follower of his to the day of his death. Could anything be more gross ? Imagine such a man as Sir John Thompson, and the Premier of this country, the devoted follower of the High Commissioner—and such a High Commissioner ! The hon. gentleman said that he had saved the Conservative party before—the Conservative party was successful in 1887, why ? Because I—capital I—came out to help them. The party was victorious in 1891, why ? Because—I—capital I—came out to help them. The Conservative party will be successful in the next election, why? Because I—capital I—have come out again. But though he says that he has been importuned to come out, we find from the telegrams laid before the House at my request, that the despatch suggesting that the hon. gentleman should come out here is signed "Tupper," and addressed to "Bowell," and not from "Bowell" to "Tupper."

He says he took no part in the Cabinet intrigues. We are accustomed to taking his statements in such matters with a little pickle, and must do so in this case. But as the result of his own suggestion, he had come out, and he is now in the Cabinet and he treats himself now as the first man in the Cabinet. The new Controller of Customs (Mr. Prior), the rather fresh Controller of Customs, says that we are afraid of the leader of the House. It may please him to think so. But long before the hon. Controller thought of coming to Ottawa, we, the older members of the House, had learned that this scarecrow of which we are supposed to be afraid is stuffed with straw. We are as familiar with these speeches of his—barring the change of a few proper names—as, when children, we were with the phrases we conned in our spelling books. There is the same noise, the same pretentious manner, the same abuse of members who differ from him. We enjoy the noise as much as his own supporters, in fact, I think we enjoy it better. The leader of the Opposition last night received cheers such as I have seldom heard any leader receive in this House, while the leader of the House was supported only by a beggarly array of empty benches, and the cheer that greeted his utterances was a very thin and shaky affair. We enjoy the noise as well as hon. gentlemen opposite, because we know that every boast and every word of abuse from him was only another nail in his coffin, as a played-out leader of a played-out party.

It is not from lack of material that I draw my remarks to a close. Nor is it from physical exhaustion. We who have been here all night are as lively as we were forty-eight hours ago, and shall probably get fresher as the time goes on, even if this unreasonable sitting continues, because we shall get used to it. But I would suggest that this experiment has gone far enough to show the hon. gentleman that this Bill cannot be forced through without discussion, but that he will make more progress by sitting in reasonable hours, and allowing the members to get their needed rest.

Mr. MARTIN. I think there are some things that should be said before this question is voted on. I think that we should consider what we are doing. The leader of the Opposition, with the capacity for stretching for which he has attained renown——

Mr. MULOCK. The leader of the Government.

Mr. MARTIN. I was only anticipating for a few weeks. However, I do not know. I do not think the Conservative party will do the "Great Stretcher" the honour of having him for a leader in Opposition. I think that a few weeks of leadership while in power will convince them that this exploded humbug——

Mr. OUIMET. I rise to order. I do not think that such an expression should be applied to any hon. member of this House.

Mr. MARTIN. I think he is a humbug.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). I think it is not such an expression as should be used. It is not in accordance with the rules of debate.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought it was, but if the Chairman thinks otherwise, I will withdraw it. I thought that was about the mildest thing I could say about him.

Mr. CASEY. Say some of the strong things.

Mr. MARTIN. He is not worth it. In his process of stretching, he stretched two into twenty-three. That is pretty good. He informed this House that in New Zealand, where the members had obstructed——

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman inform the House where New Zealand is ?

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman told us that in the New Zealand House obstructionists had moved twenty-three motions from the time the obstruction commenced, and that more than that had been moved during this sitting. Well, my own motion that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again was moved at half-past four on Tuesday morning. Shortly after three o'clock on Monday afternoon, the Government moved that the House go into committee on the Remedial Bill. No opposition was made to that, there was not the slightest attempt at obstruction. In committee, the sections of the Bill were taken up. And I would ask any Minister, or any hon. member if the debate on Monday afternoon was not a legitimate debate ? It was joined in by members of the Government, and resulted in some material alterations of the Bill, we will presume for the better. Subsection "b" of section 4 was carried after no more than proper discussion at two o'clock on Tuesday. At 4.30 I moved the first motion that was moved on this side, that the Speaker should leave the Chair. I did not move that as a matter of obstruction, but gave what I considered an excellent reason for its being carried. I said that subsection "c" was one that required discussion. That subsection provides that the Board of Education should have power within certain limits to select the books, &c., to be used in these separate schools. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont), seconded by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) moved an amendment that the old law should be restored and the selection of books relating to religion and morals made subject to the approval of competent religious authority. This opened up a wide question. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) dealt with it exhaustively, but without wasting a word, and giving conclusive reasons why the proposal of the Government was absurd and ridiculous. At half-past four I moved the motion I have referred to on the ground that my remarks were of a character which were not to be made to a House consisting of ten or twenty members, many of them asleep, and I refused to go on. Now, Mr. Chairman, what are we going to do ? The leader of the House says that we have made twenty-three motions for the purpose of obstructing the consideration of this Bill, when, in point of fact, only two motions have been made since the House went into committee on the Bill at three o'clock on Monday afternoon, and both motions were that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. FREMONT. But the two motions to adjourn have been discussed longer than twenty-three motions would have taken.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the hon. gentleman if he really thinks that four o'clock in the morning is a reasonable time to discuss the important matters in this Bill. We are registering our disapproval of the attempt to force us to sit here night and day. In order that we may discuss this Bill intelligently, we have got to be serious about it.

Mr. FREMONT. You are not serious, then?

Mr. MARTIN. No, I am not serious now: I am filling in time to register my disapproval of the attempt of the Government to force us to sit night and day. It is not possible for any member to do that. But very few members are present in the House at this moment, and what folly to attempt to discuss a Bill of this revolutionary character under such circumstances. Therefore, I ask the committee now to rise, and I promise that if we are allowed to go home and get a rest, and come back here at three o'clock in the afternoon, we will go into committee again on that Bill, and give it a fair and reasonable discussion. We have already made that offer, and we continue to make it, but we will not be bulldozed by the Secretary of State or any other member of the House to sit here night and day. Now, let us see what took place yesterday morning, when the 6th clause of the Bill was under discussion. In the Ottawa "Citizen" I find the following report of what took place :—

> Dr. Macdonald (Huron) arose at 5.30 with the excuse that he just wanted to warm himself up a bit. By half-past six, however, he warmed himself up to the pitch of remarking that it was said Mr. Coatsworth was to receive a reward for his vote on the Remedial Bill.

Now, there is something here that, perhaps, we should consider for a moment. The hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) denies that he is going to get any reward for his vote. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has been charged with being bought up to vote for this Bill, and he denies it also.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, he denies it with qualifications.

Mr. MARTIN. We don't know whether he has been or not, but here we have the clear fact that the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) was bought up, and he has got his reward by being appointed to a judgeship ; the goods have been delivered.

An hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. MARTIN. He is no longer a member of this House, and I can call him all the names I like, and I am quite in order. It is with me entirely a matter of taste, and not of order. Now that he is a judge on the bench, is he to be protected against what hon. members of this House may be pleased to say about him ? Because he is a judge, is he not to have the truth told to him ? The fact is that that man is a judge to-day because he was bought up by that judgeship to vote this Bill through the House. Can't that be said in this House ? Is not that parliamentary ? I say it is, and I am going to say what I think of the late member for North Grey, because I am satisfied that his position is that of some other members of this House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is out of order. The hon. member has stated that a late member of this House was bought up by a judgeship into voting for this Bill, and that other members in the House are in the same position.

Mr. MARTIN. I say they are charged with being in the same position.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. gentleman should not even make an insinuation of that kind.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know whether it is true or not, but it is in the newspapers. I am not charging him with it. I say it is in the newspapers. It is stated over and over again in the newspapers that the hon. member for South Leeds has been promised a position on the Rideau Canal, and that the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) has been promised a county court judgeship.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). I must call the hon. gentleman to order. To read statements in the papers that the hon. member would have no right to make himself in the first instance in the House, is certainly not in order. It is not only in bad taste, but it is contrary to the rules of the House.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think so. The late hon. member for North Grey was charged with giving his vote for the second reading of the Remedial Bill having at the time a promise of a judgeship in his pocket; that he voted for the second reading because he was promised a judgeship, and the goods have been delivered. Otherwise, if he had been going to stand for re-election, he would have been bound to vote against the Bill, for no man could stand in his constituency as a candidate of the Conservative party having voted for the Remedial Bill.

Mr. HAGGART. I shall have to ask that the words be taken down.

Mr. MARTIN. I make that statement.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not think it is fair to the hon. gentleman who represented North Grey, for it is within my recollection that the hon. gentleman last session was just as strongly in favour of remedial legislation.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think that improves the position one iota. The promise was as good then as later, I suppose.

Mr. HAGGART. To whom is the hon. gentleman referring? I understood he was referring to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth).

Mr. MARTIN. I am referring to the late member for North Grey.

Mr. TAYLOR. But the hon. gentleman has referred to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth).

Mr. MARTIN. I said the newspapers did.

Mr. TAYLOR. And the hon. gentleman made a reference to the hon. member for South Leeds.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. That the hon. member for North Leeds had made certain statements in this House, and he repeated newspaper assertions. I claim the protection of this House against vile newspaper slanders repeated by hon. members from their places in this House. I ask my statement to be accepted.

Mr. MARTIN. I heard the hon. gentleman's denial last night, and I think there were very large loopholes in it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I made the statement last night, and the hon. gentleman is bound to accept it.

Mr. MARTIN. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but as a denial of the charges the statement left very large loopholes. I do not dispute the truth of the hon. gentleman's statement so far as it went, but as an attempt to answer the charge in the newspaper it left loopholes—the hon. gentleman might be quite correct, and the charge might be true.

Mr. TAYLOR. Where was the loophole? I declared that the position had not been promised me, that I would not accept it, and that I would go before my constituents for re-election.

Mr. MARTIN. The last question asked by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) was whether in case the hon. gentleman went to his constituents and was elected, or in case he was defeated, would he not accept the position afterwards if the Government were in power? That is the question which the hon. gentleman for West York put to him, but it has not yet been answered. He can answer it now if he likes.

Mr. TAYLOR. The answer I gave the hon. member for West York last night was that I expected to be elected by a large majority, and that I would meet him or any other hon. gentleman in the riding and contest it, that my election was assured.

Mr. MARTIN. That is no answer. That leaves a loophole through which fourteen elephants could pass. I am very sorry that as regards the hon. member for North Grey, who was a very popular member of the House and against whom there was nothing personally, that the statement in the newspaper is true. I am very sorry that any hon. member should vote against the wishes of his constituents for the sake of a bribe. It is very unfortunate that a Bill of this nature, which is a coercive Bill, for the purpose of attempting to impose a system of education on the province of Manitoba, should be pushed through this House; and so far as that hon. gentleman's vote was concerned by a direct bribe. It is a sorrowful incident for the Bench of Canada which has been supposed to be pure.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It is disgraceful for an hon. member to rise and declare that a judge should have been appointed to the Bench as a bribe. As a lawyer the hon. gentleman should have more esprit de corps than make such a charge.

Mr. MARTIN. It is because I have esprit de corps I declare it is most important to Canada that the Bench should be kept pure. I say here is an unfortunate example of an hon. member going on the Bench, getting his appointment to the Bench because he voted against the wishes of his constituents in order to put through a coercive Bill against the province I represent. It is an incident to be regretted for all time to come, and one that will be so regarded throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). This is a melancholy spectacle.

Mr. MARTIN. It is my duty to point out an unfortunate incident of this kind. Can it be denied ? I ask hon. members acquainted with public feeling in North Grey whether public sentiment is not emphatically in opposition to this Bill. I believe that the reason which induced the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) who is as strong a Conservative as is the hon. member for North Grey, to vote and speak against this Bill, is public feeling in that part of the country. Yet the hon. member for North Grey voted against the wishes of his constituents, against public opinion in his riding ; and without regard to decency, for the Government must have postponed the appointment a few weeks until he ceased to be a member of that constituency, the hon. gentleman left his constituency unrepresented and accepted this bribe of a judgeship for giving that vote. It is a most unfortunate and disgraceful thing.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He would have lost his surrogate fees.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought it was very indecent. But I am now told that he could not have got his full pay if his appointment had not been made yesterday, and it had been delayed until 24th of April, because the Ontario government has passed a law by which certain surrogate fees which were paid to the county court judges will be taken away from those judges and pass into the provincial treasury. It appears therefore that this hon. gentleman wanted to get everything he had bargained for, and he was not prepared to wait until part of his emoluments as judge were taken away.

An hon. MEMBER. It amounts to $1,200 a year.

Mr. MARTIN. He makes $1,200 additional, a bigger bribe. It is a sorrowful incident for this House that we should lose an hon. member under such circumstances. That hon. gentleman goes on the Bench, supposed to administer justice between man and man. This opens up the worst possibilities as to the occurrences similar to what we have read of as occurring in some of the newer portion of the United States. If judges are to accept positions under such circumstances, how can we continue to feel respect for our Bench, in which respect Canadians feel themselves superior to our friends to the south. It is something we have prided ourselves on—the purity of the Bench in Canada. Yet here is a most deliberate attempt made on the part of the Government of the day for the purpose of saving themselves, to take away from Canadians one of the dearest privileges they think they possess, of having a pure and unsullied judiciary.

(The hon. gentleman read the report of the proceedings of the House from the Ottawa " Citizen.")

Mr. MARTIN. I observe that the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) wished to rise that the chamber might be swept and garnished. I think that is quite proper. But it may be that the reason that this is not done is that the charwomen, not having been paid, have refused to work. The Government would regret very much to have the House rise, and, when members re-assembled at three o'clock, find that the chamber had not been swept out. It may be in order to hide the fact that the Minister of Public Works has no money to have this chamber swept and garnished that we are kept sitting here day and night.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. member may be glad to be informed that I have nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. MARTIN. Then, who has ?

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman should apply to the authorities of the House.

Mr. MARTIN. Who are they ?

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman should ask the Clerk.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know whether it would be parliamentary to get a speech from the clerk. If we could introduce a rule of that kind, obstruction would be easy, for when we get tired of speaking we could call upon the Clerk to speak. I see here also that the leader of the House says that Dr. Bourinot's opinion is that persistent obstruction is contempt of the House, and tells us about the case of New Zealand and the case of Great Britain. But in New Zealand and Great Britain an insignificant number of members undertook to say that Parliament should do no business. Has that, or anything like it, been attempted here ? The Opposition have shown that they are willing to do business, that they wish to help the Government to make this Bill perfect, even though they do not approve of it. Suppose that the Irish members in the British Parliament had taken that course—had declared that they were perfectly willing to behave themselves in a parliamentary way and to discuss fairly the business that came before them, but when three o'clock in the morning came, after a long day's work, they demanded as a matter of fair-play, that the House should not continue sitting, that it should not sit for twenty-four hours a day, but that the members should be allowed to go home and get their meals and their rest. If that had been done, would cloture have been introduced ? Would Mr. Gladstone—I believe it it was under the Liberals that cloture was introduced—have been justified by the House in proposing such a rule ? No ; all fair-minded men would have said that the Irish members were perfectly right. We are anxious that Parliament should make progress with its work, but we say that after three o'clock in the morning the sitting should not proceed. I believe members on the other side do not believe in the policy of the Government, but that it is forced upon them. The leader of the House in his old spirit of bulldozing, says : I will make these Grits swallow this Bill without due investigation, and you must support me or I will leave you. I believe that he is not supported by the rank and file of his party.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Nor the better element.

Mr. MARTIN. No. They believe our course is perfectly justifiable. For my part, I go further and say when the House has sat for twenty-four hours, members are not in a condition to do business, whether it is morning, afternoon or evening. We cease to be the House of Commons and are only a small section of the House, the other members being away to get their necessary rest. I agree that persistent obstruction is contempt of the House. But for the Government to say to the House : You must sit here from three o'clock on Monday afternoon until twelve o'clock on Saturday night, I say that that is contempt of the House, and that we are only doing our duty when we protest and prevent the Government, as we are preventing them, effectually carrying out a threat of that kind. The leader of the House says, according to this report :

> He believed that in the circumstances the only course open to the Government was to resist this motion to rise and press this measure in the House.

In spite of everything we had told him. The leader of the House learns nothing. But one unfortunate thing is that he will not stay here to be taught. He proposed to die for this Bill. But we have seen no signs of dying. We cannot keep him here. He believes that while the rest of us should lose our rest and meals, he should have his meals three times a day, and rest at night.

Mr. GUILLET. You would like to kill him.

Mr. MARTIN. Not at all ; I think he is rather a valuable commodity for the Liberal party. He brought out of the leader of the Opposition last night one of the finest speeches I ever listened to. I think the Liberal party would subscribe, if necessary, for the purpose of prolonging the life of the Secretary of State. What is he doing ? He is destroying his own party.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) You ought to be glad of that.

Mr. MARTIN. That is the reason we don't want him killed.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) You ought to be praising him, instead of running him down.

Mr. MARTIN. I am not running him down ; I am praising him up for the great services he is rendering the Liberal party. We remember that the other night the Secretary of State took great praise to himself for passing the Nova Scotia Act in 1864, dealing with education. Now, it seems to me that is absurd. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) tells us that the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia are entirely dissatisfied with the present law.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman say they are perfectly satisfied with it ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No, I say that a large portion of the Catholics of Nova Scotia are satisfied with the law in Nova Scotia in practice ; but I say, also, that in many sections, including Halifax, the schools are in violation of law. The Catholics are more satisfied with the violation of the law than with the law itself.

Mr. MARTIN. Exactly. Now, where did that law come from ? That law came from the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I beg your pardon, it did not come from the hon. Secretary of State. The law, as passed by the Secretary of State, did not permit religious education in the schools. It was the violation of that law which gave offence to the minority in Nova Scotia, and, by an arrangement afterwards between the Archibshop of Halifax, as I was informed, and Principal Grant, the law was permitted to be violated —not in his time ; we had no difficulties then ; it was since his time that a new arrangement was made by which separate schools were permitted in the city of Halifax, and that arrangement has been extended to the eastern part of Nova Scotia. It is, therefore, in the violation of the law that the minority got justice, not in the law itself, nor in the law which was passed during the time of the Secretary of State, in 1864.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand the hon. gentleman contends that the law itself is bad, from a Catholic standpoint, and that one reason Catholics are satisfied is because the law is allowed to be violated in their interest.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No, it has been violated against their interest in several sections of the province, and because it was violated by the majority, it was therefore necessary that it should be violated in the interest of the minority, as well. Religious instruction was given by the majority, in violation of the law, which was not very palatable to the minority ; therefore, as the law was permitted to be violated in the interest of the majority, by an agreement between the majority and the minority the law was permitted to be violated in the interest of the minority as well.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the law itself, apart from practice, would not be acceptable to Roman Catholics.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). If strictly carried out, it would not be very offensive to them.

Mr. MARTIN. It does not provide for separate schools ; if it was strictly carried out, they could not carry on religious instruction in their schools. Therefore, the law, from a Catholic standpoint, is bad, but by practice they are allowed to enjoy certain privileges, which reconciles them to the law. Now, who is responsible for that law? The Secretary of State boasts that he passed the Public School Act in Nova Scotia which exists to-day, and which the hon. member for Inverness says is bad in itself, but that in practice it is satisfactory. I may point out to the hon. member that during the past twenty-one years, out of the twenty-five years since that law was passed, the province of Nova Scotia has been under Liberal rule, and the Roman Catholics in that province have got their privileges from the Liberal modification of a hard law. The Secretary of State glorified himself for passing the School Act of Nova Scotia, and he tells us that the poor unfortunate Roman Catholics of Manitoba have been suffering for six long years from that unfair Act that was passed by the government of Manitoba of which I was a member, which, in its terms, is almost like the Nova Scotia Act. I cannot understand how the Secretary of State is to be allowed to praise himself to the skies for passing the Nova Scotia Act, and that I am to be reprobated for passing the same Act in Manitoba.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It was not the same Act. The Manitoba School Act prescribes religious instruction, such as was described yesterday by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I told him that would be objectionable to the minority in Nova Scotia. There was no such provision in the Nova Scotia law ; on the contrary, religious instructions were permissible, if the trustees of a section would only permit it, but in Manitoba religious instruction is prescribed by law, and that religious instruction is chosen by the majority.

Mr. MARTIN. The only difference in that respect is that in Nova Scotia religious exercises were left entirely under the control of the teacher.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No.

Mr. MARTIN. I am quite sure that the teaching of religion was left to the teachers. Section 32 of the Nova Scotia School Act provides as follows :—

> No person shall be deemed a qualified teacher under this chapter, or receive any portion of the school grant, unless he holds a license from the commissioner of the county or district in which he is employed.

Then, further on it says that one of the duties of the teacher shall be "to inculcate, by precept and example, a respect for religion and the principles of Christian morality." From the religious standpoint, it would be a far more dangerous power than that exercised in Manitoba. In the latter province the public school system is unsectarian, and teachers are expressly prohibited from giving religious instruction.

Mr. GILLIES. Section 6 of the Manitoba Act of 1890 prescribes the way in which religious exercises shall be carried on in the schools, and it is according to the regulations of the advisory board. The advisory board has exclusive power to prescribe religious exercises, and it may prescribe such as it thinks proper without any restriction, and may impose that duty on the teachers ; whereas, in Nova Scotia, there is no religion whatever taught in the schools. The teacher, of course, is enjoined by the statute to inculcate subjects of morality by precept and example. Every law compels a teacher to do that ; he is bound to show an example as regards inculcating morality and good conduct to pupils.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. If the matter of the regulations is to be left to the advisory board, and they have to be published, then the public can see whether they are fair or not. That is a better system than leaving the matter of religious instruction to the teacher. What religion is the teacher to respect ?

Mr. GILLIES. All religions.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think Protestant teachers would be likely to respect the Roman Catholic religion.

Mr. GILLIES. Why not ?

Mr. MARTIN. He is not going to inculcate, by precept and example, respect for the Roman Catholic religion if he is a Protestant. It is absurd to suppose that he will do it. So this matter of religious instruction is left in Nova Scotia to the teacher, while in Manitoba it is left to the advisory board.

Mr. GILLIES. The advisory board may be either exclusively Roman Catholic or Protestant, as chance may have it. If, in the turn of events, all the members of the advisory board should belong to one or other of these persuasions, what is to prevent the members of the board making regulations under which their own religious faith exclusively will be taught in the schools.

Mr. MARTIN. There is nothing at all.

Mr. GILLIES. Then there is a marked difference and marked contrast between the two systems as prescribed in Manitoba and Nova Scotia.

Mr. MARTIN. No. While it is possible for the advisory board to be unfair to Roman Catholics in Manitoba, such is not the case in practice. With regard to the appointment of the advisory board, the first person selected was the Archbishop of St. Boniface. The Premier of the local government wrote and told him that the government would be glad to appoint him to the board, but he refused to accept.

Mr. GILLIES. And there is no member of that religious body on the board ?

Mr. MARTIN. We would have appointed another one, if the Archbishop had accepted, but it was useless to do so when the head of the church refused to accept a position on the board because he considered the Act unconstitutional. We would have been prepared to appoint two members of the Catholic persuasion on the board. As a matter of practice, the Roman Catholics have no cause for complaint ; they do not object to the religious exercises as such, and they could obtain representation on the advisory board if they wished. Roman Catholics form about one-tenth of the population of the province, and there are seven members of the advisory board, four of whom are appointed by the government, two by the teachers, and one by the University of Manitoba. There is nothing to prevent any of those three members of the board being Roman Catholics ; and the vice-chancellor of the university is always a Roman Catholic. So I claim that in Manitoba we would have been just as reasonable and fair as the government in Nova Scotia. One of the serious charges brought against the Greenway government last election was that they allowed schools in exclusively Roman Catholic districts to obtain government grants without complying with the law respecting religious exercises. I believe, in such districts, the government winked at the evasion of the law as regards religious instruction, so long as the schools were maintained at a high standard. The Conservative Opposition and the Conservative press in the province charged against the Manitoba government that they were disposed to do what had been done in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and allow a certain laxity with respect to this matter, so long as no one was injured. If this Bill was passed, it would hang as a cloud over the Dominion for years, and the Catholic minority would be acting far more in their own interest if they would accept the action of the Manitoba government and some arrangement in the way of compromise that might be agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. Having listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) with respect to Mr. Masson, lately a member of this House, and who has been appointed a county court judge, I feel that he has been unfair to one of his late colleagues. I can remember very well that Mr. Masson, in 1895, delivered a very strong speech in favour of giving relief to the Catholics of Manitoba. After visiting his constituents, he formed the opinion that he would be representing their wishes if he supported the Remedial Bill.

Mr. TYRWHITT. If our late colleague was so well satisfied with his vote and position on this question, how is it that the candidate of the party now in the field is discussing this very question and is pledging himself, if elected, to oppose the legislation?

Mr. HENDERSON. The hon. gentleman's remark may be quite true, but I know nothing of it. I am only making a statement with regard to the position of the hon. gentleman and his constituents.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the vacancy has been open about a year, and that the position was really open when Mr. Masson made the speech to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was under the impression that the vacancy had occurred since. It is possible I may be wrong. I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) to modify the strong language he has used with regard to our late colleague. I think Mr. Masson is the best judge of what his views were, and whether the views he expressed were conscientiously held or not. I think he conscientiously acted as he thought best and as he thought in the interests of his constituents. It is well known that he was a strong opponent of secularizing the public schools and in favour of religious teaching in the public schools. I think that the hon. member for Winnipeg should modify his expression with regard to Mr. Masson, who was a highly respected member of this House.

Mr. MARTIN. I regret that I cannot modify my statement. The circumstances prove to me, and I think it my duty as a member of Parliament, to say that Mr. Masson gave his vote for the second reading not because he believed in the measure or because his constituents so desired him to vote, but because he was promised and expected an office, which he has since been appointed to.

Mr. DALY. I can only characterize the hon. gentleman's language as unheard of in this House. I am satisfied there is no other hon. member who would make such a charge against Mr. Masson in the language he has used. On behalf of the Government and of Mr. Masson, I repudiate such a charge, that Mr. Masson was to get a judgeship——

An hon. MEMBER. He has got his reward.

Mr. DALY. He deserved the appointment, and will fill the position most acceptably to the people. So far as his position on the school question is concerned, it is well known to hon. members who have been here during the years this matter has been discussed, that Mr. Masson gave just as pronounced views in favour of the Government's position before as he has given this year.

Mr. FRASER. They say the position was vacant then.

Mr. DALY. That makes no difference. I say on behalf of Mr. Masson that he was not influenced in the slightest degree in the vote he gave by any promise of an appointment by the Government.

Mr. FRASER. Now that the matter has come up—and I do not object to its coming up—I may say that I regard it as a most important one, for a man going upon the bench should have no smirch upon his character. It seems to me that the hon. member for Halton proved too much. He said that the present Judge Masson had spoken in favour of remedial legislation when there was no vacancy. Now, I find here that F. Thoms died on the 14th April, 1895. That was just before we met last year.

Mr. HENDERSON. I gave it as my impression.

Mr. FRASER. I am not blaming the hon. gentleman, but I am pointing out that the fact upon which his argument is based is not a fact at all. I agree with the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson), that from a scriptural point of view nothing should be said against Mr. Masson. For the scripture says that, When thou does well unto thyself, all men will speak well of thee. The hon. gentleman seems to have done well for himself, and from a scriptural point of view the language of the hon. member for Winnipeg is unseemly. I understand that not only has the late member for North Grey been appointed to a position for himself, but that his brother was appointed to a junior county judgeship and his brother-in-law to a post office.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). He must have held his vote high.

Mr. FRASER. Higher than some hon. gentlemen. The fact that he looked after his relatives so well indicates that he would look after himself twice as well. It is said Mr. Masson was in favour of religious instruction in the schools. Did he support Sir Oliver Mowat, who was so strongly attacked because of his support of religion in the schools ? I understand he not only voted against him but used all his influence to elect the Opposition candidate in his county. My hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) tells me that he actually met this champion of religious instruction in the schools on the public platform where he was speaking against Sir Oliver Mowat's candidate. A good deal is being said against Sir Oliver Mowat because he has appointed members of Parliament to offices under the government. I do not take that position, I think that members of Parliament should be eligible, as other men are, and, if they serve faithfully in Parliament and do their duty, even more eligible. But if men are to be rewarded for their votes in Parliament by appointment to public office—if they are to vote against previously expressed convictions and then take offices—that is a thing to be condemned. In this country we have not an elective judiciary, the scourge and disgrace of any country, but if judges are to be appointed because of their support of the Government that has the power of appointment, we may have something that is infinitely worse for the country. There was another question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg concerning which I desire to say a word. He represents that in Nova Scotia the teacher may give religious instruction at his own option. But he cannot do it without the consent of the trustees.

Mr. McALISTER. The trustees have no authority to prescribe religious instruction.

Mr. FRASER. There is no legal authority, but it is sometimes done and winked at. Religious exercises are held, but such a thing as teaching religion is not known, except in some special cases. I agree with the exposition given of it by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) as to the duties of the teacher. He is to teach by example. He shall not be an atheist, he shall not lie, he shall not get drunk, he shall not be unclean, he shall not be guilty of conduct that would cause the children to imbibe disrespect for religion or that would be offensive to good men, Catholic or Protestant. So far as the Manitoba Act is concerned—I speak for myself alone—I would say that, much as I respect all that is good, I would not favour handing over to anybody the preparation of instruction for religious teaching in the schools. That would interfere with the rights of some in a country where we have Catholics and Protestants, and those of all religious professions.

Mr. MARTIN. The law in Manitoba provides that the religious exercises shall be such as are provided by the advisory board, and no teacher has power to vary those exercises or to introduce religious teaching.

Mr. FRASER. But the hon. gentleman knows that, if you have religious exercises, it is more than you should expect of human nature, if there is a strong Protestant or a strong Catholic as a teacher, that he will not say a word in explanation.

Mr. GILLIES. It is not against the law to have religious teaching in the schools in Manitoba. It is provided that there shall be religious exercises "conducted according to the regulations made by the advisory board."

Mr. MARTIN. They are religious exercises, not religious teaching ?

Mr. GILLIES. What are religious exercises but religious teaching ? These are prescribed by the advisory board and the teacher must teach them.

Mr. FRASER. I disagree with the hon. gentlemen for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) on that. I admit that religious exercises may be of such a character as to give them a certain colour, from a denominational point of view, and therefore I am opposed to them.

Mr. MARTIN. Another section of the Act provides that the schools shall be strictly non-sectarian.

Mr. FRASER. "Non-sectarian" is a phrase that may be very easily got over. I notice that when various bodies of Protestants are together, they are very non-sectarian, but the moment each one gets to his own little place, he becomes very sectarian. I can understand that the various bodies of Protestants might come to a consensus of opinion on religious exercises, and that they might agree very well, but still those exercises might be offensive to the Catholics.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The Roman Catholics claim that they are not a sect.

Mr. FRASER. The Roman Catholic Church is not a sect, therefore everything in the Act relating to the teaching of a sectarian character, does not refer to them. I am afraid the hon. member for Provencher is not the best theologian in his church, because, evidently, this does seem to strike at the Roman Catholic religion, just as well as at the others. But my objection is not to religious exercises, per se, being held in schools, but on account of this difficulty of making them unobjectionable to all sects, therefore, I would exclude them altogether. I would make the schools of such a character that both Roman Catholic and Protestant children could attend them together. There is nothing going to rub away the little animosities that prevail amongst us, better than for the children of Catholics and Protestants to associate together and be educated together. I claim that the very fact of Protestant members and Catholic members meeting together here and learning to understand each other, has done more to broaden our views in regard to our religion, than if we had a Protestant Parliament and a Catholic Parliament.

Mr. MARTIN. Allow me to point out that the Manitoba government have offered to make the schools entirely secular, by removing the religious exercises which the Catholics have claimed to be a grievance, and which I myself have always considered to be a grievance.

Mr. FRASER. That is a step in the right direction.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has alluded to the fact, which is of considerable significance in connection with a discussion of this question, that a recent member of this House had been appointed to a judgeship. I think the circumstances in connection with that appointment are somewhat suspicious, and must warrant the inference that the hon. member who represented a riding where his colleague in the local legislature represents a P.P.A. organization, and where the state of public sentiment is overwhelmingly opposed to the legislation before the House—I say the inference is a fair one that that hon. member has received the appointment as a reward for supporting a measure which he would not have dared to support if he had intended to face his constituents again, or to explain his vote before them. Now, there are rumours in circulation in the country, we find them in almost every paper we pick up, as to the possibilities of future appointments. If there is any reliance to be placed on one-third of these rumours, it is quite evident that but for the influences the Government may be able to exert in this manner, their majority would speedily melt away. Of course I do not vouch for these rumours, I only refer to them as matters of public interest. We have it stated in the press than the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) is to be elevated to the Senate ; we have a report in the newspapers that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay) is to take the place of the late collector in that city ; we have the statement made that the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) has a promise of a judgeship ; we have a statement that the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis) is to be made collector of the Yukon district. Now, what foundation there is for these statements, I do not know, but in the light of future events, we will be able to judge whether there is any foundation for them. We have the statement that the hon. member for East Middlesex (Mr. Marshall) is to be made postmaster. That gentleman would not show a very great discretion if he faced his constituents after supporting the Government upon the Remedial Bill. We have it stated that the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle) is to be collector at Niagara Falls, that he has the promise in his pocket.

Mr. BOYLE. Have you any authority for that statement other than a mere rumour ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I would ask the hon. gentleman if there is any foundation for the rumour ?

Mr. BOYLE. That is not a fair way to put it. Either make the charge direct and follow it up in a proper manner, or else not make it at all.

Mr. COCKBURN. I must protest against these unworthy insinuations of the hon. gentleman, these indirect calumnies against hon. members of this House—making insinuations and then asking them to deny that they are true. The hon. gentleman might as well ask : Did you steal anything, and if not, say so. I wish to be treated as a gentleman here, and I demand that the other members of this House on both sides shall be treated as gentlemen.

Mr. CHARLTON. The same degree of indignation would have been expressed a day or two ago if reference had been made to the fact that the hon. member for North Grey was about to be appointed a judge. Sir, the people of this country believe that this is a corrupt Government. We know its methods for the last dozen years or more. We know it is not beneath this Government to use its powers of patronage for the purpose of securing support in this House for a measure which is obnoxious to the great majority of the people of the premier province of this Dominion. I say the country is suspicious in regard to the character of the methods of this Government in prosecuting this Remedial Bill. It is stated that a judgeship is to be conferred on the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff), who well knows that it would be sheer insanity to attempt to run another election in that constituency. We have the statement made that the hon. member for St. John is to be made a judge. I do not know whether there is anything in the statement or not.

Mr. McLEOD. Did the hon. gentleman ever see it stated in the papers that he made a false affidavit once ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I take that as an admission by the hon. member for St. John as to the promise—that he dare not deny it, and he is supporting the Bill on account of that promise.

Mr. McLEOD. I take it that you admit the truth of what I say.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), who recently had a brother appointed to the penitentiary at Kingston ; and the hon. gentleman himself may have some promise.

Mr. BENNETT. He has been there two or three years.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think he has been promoted. It is reported that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hodgins) is to be made a senator. It is stated that the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. White) is expecting a judgeship or a senatorship. The hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Patterson) is expecting to be appointed post office inspector—that, in fact, is semi-officially stated. It is said that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) is to be made a judge. He can deny it if he wishes. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Metcalfe), it is rumoured, is to be made warden of the Kingston penitentiary. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), it is reported, is to be made superintendent of the Rideau Canal. He may run an election, and be appointed afterwards. I call attention to these rumours as indicating that the Government are not properly managing public affairs. The people believe that the Government are seeking to procure the passage of this measure by promises of office. The people expect to see these promises implemented, and the appointments made in due time. If it is proved that hon. members are supporting the Bill when they know their action is contrary to the wishes of their constituents, and when they know they intend to retire from political life, and accept offices with large emoluments, these facts amount to a confession on the part of the Government that they are using improper influences to secure votes. But such action is not inconsistent with the Government's record. In 1882 they put through Colonization Bill No. 1, under which 2,300 townships were granted in the North-west within eleven months, and every one interested became a supporter of the Government. During 1885-86-87, the Government granted 25,000 square miles of timber land without competition and without obtaining any bonus, simply for the purpose of increasing their political influence. The Government have made grants to the construction of railways simply for political purposes. I do not wish to be understood as endorsing all these newspaper rumours. We will know in time whether these rumours had any foundation in fact or not, and whether the hon. gentlemen duly received the offices. We know that hon. gentlemen are supporters of the Government, and are supporting this Remedial Bill, but we do not know if they are influenced by promises, but if they receive offices, we shall have reason to believe that the Government made use of that patronage to obtain the necessary votes to carry this Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. A very important point has been raised in this debate owing to the circumstance that since we last met we have lost one of our members, he having met with favour at the hands of the Government and retired into a position of emolument within the gift of the Crown. History is repeating itself in respect to this measure. Hon. members are familiar with what occurred at the time of the abolition of the Irish Parliament. Legislation in that case was accomplished by means so corrupt that never, from that day to this, has public opinion sanctioned the legislation of 1800, which abolished the Irish Parliament. Altogether apart from the question as to whether the union was in itself wise or unwise, the corrupt means adopted to pass that statute has so shaken public opinion that the Irish people, feeling that by unconstitutional methods, by the vilest means known in Parliament, they were robbed of their Parliament, have refused to acquiesce in that iniquitous legislation. We are told that we are passing a very important piece of legislation, legislation that is invoked for conscience's sake. It is stated, and I believe it is the firm conviction of the people, that the vote obtained on the second reading of this Bill was not a vote given by all hon. members solely on the merits of the question, but that many of the hon. members who recorded their votes did so knowing they would never come back from their constituencies, and many of them had hopes of office, and some of them had promises of office at that time in their pockets. If the public believe that these charges are true, that this measure has got thus far, has received its second reading, not because the majority believe in the Bill, but through some other influences, that circumstance alone is enough to cause us to pause and cease to press on a measure that will never be accepted by the people. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has mentioned several hon. gentlemen who are sitting here and voting practically with promises of office in hand, and none of them, in fact, have denied it. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the senior member for Hamilton. It is notorious that the hon. gentleman is to receive an office.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. I have listened to such statements for a long time. Yesterday I called the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to order for making the very same imputation. Last night the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) made the same imputations, and I called him to order. I now call the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) to order. The hon. gentleman can make insinuations, which, I understand, are in order, but he cannot impute bad motives to his colleagues. I leave it to the hon. gentleman himself whether he is not entirely violating the rules of the House in imputing bad motives to a colleague for giving a vote. The statement that everybody knows that the hon. member for Hamilton has in his pockets a promise of a position is entirely out of order, and I ask the hon. member to take back that statement, and make no more accusations of that kind against hon. members of the House. I call on the committee to assist me in enforcing this rule, because it is impossible to carry out the rules unless the committee sustain the Chairman.

Mr. MULOCK. I will deal with this question in a proper way.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DALY. The Chairman has called upon the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. MULOCK. I will not withdraw it until I give my explanation. I know what the Chairman has said, and I propose to exercise my rights here. I did not say that the hon. member was influenced in giving his vote. I was raising the constitutional point whether members of Parliament could continue to sit in this House and exercise their privileges, if, at that time, they had promises of office, which offices, if accepted, would disqualify them from sitting in this House. I maintain that I am strictly in order in making that statement. If the hon. member for Hamilton will rise and admit that he has the promise of office in his pocket, I will at once raise the question of constitutionality as to whether the hon. gentleman is qualified, under the Independence of Parliament Act, to remain a member of this House and speak and vote.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is not the question.

Mr. MULOCK. That is my point.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has said that everybody knew that the hon. member for Hamilton had the nomination for an office in his pocket when he gave his vote. The hon. gentleman should not have said that. The hon. gentleman has now referred to a different matter entirely.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not in a position to say, I do not say, that the promise of office has caused an hon. member to vote one way or the other. Do not misunderstand me. I do not pretend to be able to look into men's hearts and ascertain the influences that cause them to vote, but the law has provided for such cases.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. I have explained what I said to the satisfaction of the Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes; but I ask the hon. gentleman to take back his statement, that it was notorious that the hon. member for Hamilton had a promise of office in his pocket.

Mr. MULOCK. I will not take it back; I say it is true.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No hon. member is entitled to impute motives——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Bad motives.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend is not imputing motives, but it is a matter of common notoriety ; it is published in the newspapers, and is made public in other ways. He has simply called attention to the fact that it is publicly stated that that hon. gentleman has such a promise. He is not imputing to the hon. gentleman that he was influenced by that promise to vote as he did, for I think that would be unparliamentary, but I hardly think that you would rule that it is unparliamentary on the part of my hon. friend to call attention to the fact that the public newspapers have stated that such was the position occupied by the hon. gentleman referred to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) was not here when the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) expounded a theory in the House as to how easy it was for hon. members to give votes when they knew they would not return to this House. My attention was called to this matter by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), but I did not say anything because the hon. member for North Norfolk made no direct accusations, but advanced a theory. I call on hon. gentlemen to support the Chair. The hon. member for North York has accused the hon. member for Hamilton of all the things that the hon. member for North Norfolk has stated.

Mr. MULOCK. I refuse to allow the Chairman to attach a meaning to my words.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. I am in order. I have repudiated any desire whatever to assign motives. I am not adopting any line of argument in that direction. If the hon. gentleman will rise in this House——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. I am in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think so.

Mr. MULOCK. How many times do you want me to say that I do not impute motives.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman does not understand me. I am aware that he knows what he has said. He said that it was common rumour, that it was notoriously known, that it was in the papers, and everybody knew it, that the hon. member for Hamilton had a nomination in his pocket.

Mr. MULOCK. And it is notorious——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I ask the hon. gentleman to take back that statement.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, it is true ; and you, Mr. Chairman, know it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is making things worse.

Mr. MULOCK. The rumour is true.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. When an hon. gentleman speaks about rumours, I cannot call him to order, only when names are mentioned. The hon. gentleman, when he thinks over the matter seriously, will see he is in error, because his accusation is a special accusation brought against an hon. member mentioned by name, the hon. member for Hamilton. It is my duty to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw those words.

Mr. MULOCK. I will try to get within the rules of the Chair. I am arguing this point as regards the Independence of Parliament Act. I have said before, and I repeat, that I do not wish to attribute improper motives, and I am not assigning motives. I wish to uphold the dignity of the Chair, and to abide by your ruling. I do not wish it to be understood that I say that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay) is influenced by the hope of office. Is that plain enough ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will follow the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. Now, I state a fact, and I wish to state it in parliamentary language. It is currently rumoured, and I have seen it in the public papers, and I believe it is commonly accepted by the public, that when this Parliament is over, the hon. member for Hamilton is to receive an office of emolument under the Crown. Is that unparliamentary ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No, if the hon. gentleman goes no further. But he says that everybody knows that the hon. gentleman is to be appointed.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes ; I say that again.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Then, the hon. gentleman is out of order. It is impossible to keep order unless gentlemen will support the Chair. I do not wish the hon. gentleman to do anything against his dignity, but I leave it to his own sense of justice. He brings an accusation against the hon. member, when he says that everybody knows that that hon. gentleman has a nomination to office in his pocket.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, the whole question is whether they know it or whether it is said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is a great deal of difference ; it might be said, and not be true.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, then, am I now in order ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Not altogether, if the hon. gentleman asks me. But there is the point I have already repeated several times, when he says that everybody knows—

Mr. MULOCK. That part of it I have taken back.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Since I am on my feet—and I hope this will be taken in good part—I may say it is not in order to say that a certain thing is rumoured concerning an hon. gentleman, and ask him to deny it, if he can. Members of Parliament ought not to be treated in that way.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, I will be in order, if I say that it is not known.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That would be another imputation. The hon. gentleman knows the English language better than I do, and I think he could put this matter right without making any imputation.

Mr. MULOCK. I have not made any imputation. You, Mr. Chairman, attached that meaning to my words, as I understand, because I followed my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). But I decline to have the words of other gentlemen imported into my speech.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the hon. member for Hamilton did not vote with the nomination in his pocket.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not say that the hon. member for Hamilton was influenced by any promise.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am satisfied with the explanation.

Mr. McKAY. As the hon. gentleman has apologized sufficiently, perhaps, Mr. Chairman, you will allow the business of the House to go on.

Mr. MULOCK. Under the Independence of Parliament Act, if any hon. gentleman got a promise in the form of a document that entitled him to emoluments, he would forfeit his seat, the reason being that he would cease to be independent. Now, follow me, Mr. Chairman, for fear I get out of order. If the actual possession of a patent is a disqualification for the position of a representative of the people in this House, then, if an hon. gentleman only had an understanding with the executive that when he ceased to be a member, he would receive an office, the principle of the Act would still be violated. Such a position would make him even less independent than actual appointment, because he would have a slighter hold upon the office, and would be more dependent upon the Administration. Now, let me illustrate the effect of this. Suppose that twenty or thirty members, supporting the Government, are suppliants for office, having more or less reason to believe that they will succeed. Those members move about among their fellow-members. And with what effect ? Is there a plainer proposition than that "a gift blindeth the eye." You do not need to find that a man votes as he was bribed to vote, in order to find guilty the man who gave the money. These members I refer to would know that their reward would depend upon the success of the Government, and, according to the commonsense principle of this law I have quoted, it would be assumed that they would be all the more likely to do all that they could do to assure that success. There is a well-grounded belief in the public mind that among the Government supporters are men who expect rewards in the near future, and the majority of the Government on the second reading of this Bill is so accounted for. Whether that belief is well-founded or not, in what respect are the people going to hold legislation passed under such discrediting circumstances, by members, one-fifth of whom will not face their constituents again, particularly when this is a Parliament that has not received a mandate from the people to pass this law ? What good can result from such legislation? We found to-day a vacant seat. A member who voted in a certain way, and, as was stated by an hon. member, contrary to the sentiments of his riding and to his successor as the candidate of the Conservative party in the coming election. When we consider this, and consider that this vacancy, which is now filled by his appointment, has existed ever since this question came into Parliament, there is an irresistible impression made upon the public mind which is injurious to the standing of this House. If yesterday I had made the same remarks in reference to the late member for North Grey that I have made with respect to the hon. member for Hamilton, I can understand that he would have risen and with great indignation invoked the rules of Parliament to prevent me unjustly decrying the honour of a member of this House.

Mr. McKAY. I did not call the hon. gentleman to order. I wanted him to go on.

Mr. MULOCK. I admit that. And I have not suggested that the hon. member for Hamilton has been unduly influenced by the alleged promise of office. I leave that to his own conscience. The hon. member himself will feel the force of what I have said, and I should think he has had many an unhappy moment, if it be true, since he got himself into this inconsistent position. I have under my hand the "Historical Reminiscences of Ireland," by Sir Jonah Barrington. I shall not read from it, but when this subject came up, I was reminded of this account of the extinction of the Irish Parliament. The purchased vote which led to the extinction of that parliament brought to those who gave it nothing but misfortune, and to their names nothing but dishonour. I object to legislation being placed upon the statute-book that the public may deem to have been passed by means of similar influences. If we have any regard for the reputation of Parliament, which reputation has been smirched, let us not, for the sake of passing legislation which is said to be to relieve the consciences of others, leave ourselves open to the imputation that wrong influences have been brought to bear to bring about that end. If this Parliament met in a centre of public opinion, where what is done here could be known, not by finding its way through the public journals, but more directly, there would be such an expression of feeling, I venture to say, as would cause Parliament to abandon this measure and appeal to the country at the earliest possible moment. We are told that we were assembled here for the purpose of passing this Remedial Bill, but everybody knows that the Government convened this Parliament merely for the purpose of trying to catch votes. We find the Secretary of State coming here every day, and giving us our daily ration of abuse and making his demagogic speeches. A few days ago he said he was going to die for his country. Where is he dying? He comes here regularly each afternoon to make his denunciations, and then he retires and loads up for another day. He is trying to impress upon one section of the people what sacrifices he is making for them, and he expects they will be duly grateful for it at the proper time. Here is what the "United Canada" says about the effort of the Secretary of State to free the Catholic minority of Manitoba from oppression. (The hon. gentleman reads an extract from "United Canada.") Yesterday the hon. gentleman came in here and did not only do all that is said of him in this paper, but he diversified the exhibition by absolutely foaming at the mouth. I suppose he must ascend the climax, and probably by Saturday night he will throw himself prone on the floor of Parliament, and die as they die on the stage, and then he will be removed to recover gradually as public opinion is being formed. No, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State can hardly humbug the people of Canada in that way. Why, yesterday we saw the Secretary of State coming into the House and assailing all the members along the front row of his own party, and he calls that leading his party to victory.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK:

'Tis the voice of McGillivray, I rise to explain.
I have wabbled before and I will wabble again.

The forces led by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1891 are still here, but they were not led by your present leader.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. We are satisfied with our leader.

Mr. MULOCK. Who is the hon. gentleman's leader ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The Premier and the leader of the House—a double header.

Mr. MULOCK. You can point both ways, according to circumstances. It is handy to have two leaders.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Who is the hon. gentleman's leader. The leader of the Opposition, or the hon. member for North Simcoe ?

Mr. MULOCK. I have a leader, Sir, of whom I am proud. I have a leader who is of French extraction, and who is a Roman Catholic in religion ; and if there is one thing for which I envy the French Canadian people to-day, it is the fact that they have been able to give to Canada a man like that.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. You do not always hear us abusing him as you abuse the leader of this House.

Mr. MULOCK. Render tribute unto Cæsar on all occasions. If you had a leader like Wilfrid Laurier, I might be prepared to follow him.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). Your leader says he cannot keep you from obstructing.

Mr. MULOCK. I have not heard any such statement by the leader of the Opposition, and I think you will have some difficulty in placing your hands upon any such statement.

Mr. WALLACE. Public opinion is opposed to this Bill becoming law. Advocates of the measure themselves are now in fear and trembling as to the difficulties standing in the way, and the evils that might follow its enactment. I am obliged to repeat the arguments I advanced at different hours during the day because members supporting the Government come here in battalions, and I am satisfied that if they would remain here in a body they would be convinced by the arguments advanced in opposition to the Bill. Addressing the House in this manner is very much like entering on a political campaign, where a candidate repeats his speech at different points in the constituency. For instance, I would show the advantage of the National Policy in one town——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot enter into a debate on the National Policy.

Mr. MARTIN. I pointed out yesterday that hon. members supporting the Government were travelling wide of the subject.

Mr. McNEILL. I remember that within the last twenty-four hours we have had a discussion as to the capabilities of the North-west as a wheat-growing country. That is far of the mark, although, of course, the North-west is within measurable distance of Manitoba. But the National Policy affects Manitoba and the North-west, and I do not see that it is as much out of order as other questions that have been introduced into the discussion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right. No doubt, part of the discussion yesterday was out of order. The leaders of the House passed compliments to each other, and kept the committee out of order the whole evening. I am now endeavouring to keep the committee in order.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand the hon. gentleman from West York was pointing out that as this Parliament was sitting throughout the day and night, an hon. member, in order to make known his views to Parliament as a whole, was obliged to repeat them to the different collections of members who sat here throughout the day. And he illustrated by saying that it reminded him of the time when he used to go through the country and explain the National Policy to different audiences. While I agreed that the leader of the House was grossly out of order, I think that cannot apply to the illustration the hon. member for West York is giving.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I ruled that the hon. gentleman could not discuss the National Policy on the motion now before the Chair.

Mr. McNEILL. We cannot carry on any consecutive policy——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is discussing my ruling.

Mr. McNEILL. Not at all, Mr. Chairman. I was rather making an apology, as it seemed I had not quite understood the argument, not having been able to attend and follow it. And, of course, this is inevitable while we sit so long as we do. And I wish to point out that this is not the way to make progress.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is making another speech.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not wish to do that, but only to point out the necessity that exists for repeating arguments if we are to have the views of an hon. member known to the House generally.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad you have decided the point in my favour, Mr. Chairman, as I was sure you would. I was pointing out that it is necessary to repeat one's arguments to those hon. gentlemen who come in to take the places of others who leave the chamber, I trust not for ever——

Mr. CAMPBELL. One gone yesterday.

Mr. WALLACE. Is it possible ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. member for North Grey.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member (Mr. Campbell) may not speak except from his place.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad you have ruled on that point, Mr. Chairman, there is too great a tendency to interrupt hon. members who have the floor. Interruptions tend to raise points wholly irrelevant to that one he is discussing, making it difficult for him at the moment to resume the thread of his argument. But I was speaking, I believe, of the different audiences we have to address. I have addressed the House briefly on former occasions during this sitting, but this is the first opportunity I have had to speak at two o'clock in the afternoon. Therefore, while I see around me some familiar faces, there are some who are almost entire strangers, some whom I have not seen during the course of this long and interesting debate. I have not before had the pleasure of seeing my hon. friend from East Bruce (Mr. Cargill). I know that he is a gentleman who is open to conviction, and I desire to call his attention to some important matters with regard to this Bill. Now, this is a moribund Parliament. I will not attempt to explain that, but everybody says this Parliament is moribund, and that such a Parliament has no right to undertake important legislation of this kind. The people should be consulted. Legally speaking, we can go on until the 24th April. But it is contrary to British practice to go on until the last hour of Parliament. Would it not be better for the leader of the Government to go to the Governor General and say ; Mr. Governor Gen——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. Is that not a proper term ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No.

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to put it in unobjectionable form. Would it not be better to go to the Governor General, as Sir John Macdonald did on several occasions, and ask for a dissolution ? Is it not always a compliment to go back to the people and ask them for a renewal of their confidence before we are actually compelled to do so ? What a humiliating position it will be for us if we are still here when Parliament closes. And the Governor General is compelled to tell us, in however polite terms, that he refuses to take any advice from us on any subject. But the wound to our own feelings is comparatively unimportant. If Parliament dies in this way, we shall be left without any Parliament to be summoned in case of any extraordinary emergency arising.

A circumstance has just occurred which, in my opinion, renders it very important that this committee should rise, in order that the House may consider that circumstance with the Speaker in the Chair. I notice in the papers that Mr. James Masson, Q.C., M.P., was sworn in by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, in the city of Toronto, on Monday last, as judge for the county of Huron. It has sometimes been said that a man who has taken an active part in politics, is thereby disqualified from holding the position of judge, but I do not think so. I do think, however, that when a man is appointed to a judgeship, there should be no stigma of any kind attached to his appointment. I have heard it stated that members of the House of Commons were willing to barter their principles and their views on this question for the sake of appointments to high offices. Now, discussing the general principle on which that appointment should be made, I say that if an appointment were made under such conditions, it would be a disgrace to the judiciary of Canada. I say, if such an appointment were made, that man, instead of being on the bench, should be placed in the dock, and be put upon his trial for high crimes and misdemeanours. Now, let us see whether the conditions surrounding the present appointment warrant any suspicion of that kind. It is well known that Mr. Masson's constituents hold very strong views against this remedial legislation, and, if that gentleman had sought re-election, after voting for that Bill in the House, he would undoubtedly have been defeated by a thousand majority. I think that when a member knows that he does not represent the views of his constituency on any important question, it is his duty to resign. It is no secret that Mr. Masson has been long seeking the retirement of a judgeship; it is further known that after the death of the late judge of the county of Huron, he was an applicant for that position, as well as for another judgeship where a vacancy occurred previously. After he made his speech in the House of Commons in favour of the Separate School Bill, he knew very well that he could no longer represent North Grey. Another gentleman was nominated for that constituency whose views are in accord with those of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who is prominent in opposition to this Remedial Bill. Mr. Masson was, therefore, out of the race, and he accepted a judgeship. Was there anything improper on his part in accepting that judgeship? Now, so far as the reward for political services is concerned, it is a well-known fact that his brother was appointed to a very lucrative position in the county by this Government; therefore, it was conceded that an ample reward had been made to the family of the member for North Grey for any political services that he had rendered the party. Therefore, when we consider that, after thus misrepresenting the views of his constituents, he immediately afterwards received the position of judge in the county of Huron, it raises the question whether that was an act that should be condemned. Perhaps we have not all the information on that point that we require, and that is one reason why the committee should rise, in order that there may be fuller inquiry into this matter, with the Speaker in the Chair. This is an additional reason why this Bill should not be proceeded with at the present time.

Mr. CARGILL. Reference having been made to me by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), I desire to say a few words in reply to him, and on the school question. The hon. gentleman says that when a member of this House finds that he does not represent the views of his constituents on any important question of legislation that comes before this House, it is his duty to resign his position as a member of the House. I take issue with the hon. gentleman. When an hon. gentleman goes before his constituents for election, and he is returned by his constituents, he comes here to Parliament to represent them for four or five years. Until that time has expired I do not think that it is his duty to consult his constituents on every occasion when a question may come up. As a humble follower of the present Administration I have confidence in their ability to administer public affairs. They are paid certain salaries and are expected to devote their whole time and attention and ability to settling those questions which come before them, and which perplex the minds of ordinary men. Among the representatives in this House are many constitutional lawyers. As a layman I have had so much constitutional law pumped into me that I can easily understand how the masses of the people fail to understand this important question now under discussion. Two sessions ago this subject was before Parliament and was discussed by some of the most able legal minds in this country. After listening last session to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) for several hours, and to the reply of the ex-Minister of Justice, who was followed by a professor of a legal institution in New Brunswick, I came to the conclusion that we, as laymen, should take a common-sense view of the whole matter ourselves, and in that way we would be less troubled than by the many intricacies involved. I regret very much that reference has been made here to a very worthy representative who has represented for a number of years the constituency of North Grey. Is it sufficient that an hon. member should be appointed to a particular position in the gift of the Government to cause him to lose the privileges which he should enjoy as a British subject? I think it is a stain on an intellectual assembly to impute such motives as have been charged against one of our late colleagues, who was one of the most prominent and honourable men in his constituency. He was entrusted with the duty of representing his constituents, and he came here and sought to promote their interests, and for such an hon. member to have improper motives attributed to him is beneath the dignity of this House. I have known that hon. gentleman ever since he came to Parliament, and on all occasions he has had the courage of his convictions and has acted sincerely, and no doubt he acted conscientiously in giving his vote in favour of remedial legislation. So far as I am individually concerned, motives may be attributed to me, for it is said and rumoured that I have been promised a senatorship. If so, it is unknown to me. I have no axe to grind ; I am not particularly fond of political life. I care not whether I ever come back here again, and I have so told my constituents, and whenever they wish to bring forward another man I shall be glad to assist in electing him to support the Conservative party. I consider it is my duty to support this Government, because I believe they have been actuated by a desire to promote the interests of the people. The claim made that the Roman Catholics in Manitoba should not have the right to educate their children as they please, while at the same time they are prepared to pay the expense, is a monstrous proposition. I have often thought that the British North America Act could advantageously be amended so that if people living in a province of the Dominion found it necessary to emigrate to another province they should take with them the rights and privileges they enjoy in the particular province they left. This is claimed to be a British and free country, and I am very much surprised to hear hon. members who profess to be full of liberality and generosity attempt by their votes to withhold from the Manitoba minority privileges to which they are entitled. Much has been said about the constitution. I, as an ordinary layman, sincerely believe that the Roman Catholics of Manitoba distinctly understood when they came into the union that the rights and privileges which they enjoyed at that time were to be perpetuated. I sincerely and firmly believe that the parties to the contract were of that opinion, that the rights and privileges were to be extended and perpetuated to the minority. Supposing one-third of the population of Manitoba were Roman Catholics, does any one believe we would have this question here to-day ? It would never have come before this House. The provincial government know that their action was popular, and I repeat that if there was a large percentage of Roman Catholics in Manitoba this question would never have been brought up. Last night I was very much surprised when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), an old parliamentarian and an able man in debate and able to hold his own against an opponent, read a letter which appeared in the " Mail " in 1891.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a letter, an editorial.

Mr. CARGILL. Thank you. We all know what the political views of the " Mail " were at that time. We all know how anti-Catholic it was, what a very high opinion it held of the Secretary of State, and when the hon. gentleman read from that editorial in order to present fairly the character of the Secretary of State, he asked from this House more indulgence than he is entitled to. Not only so, but he read the Secretary of State a lesson upon his policy in regard to the North-west and a statement imputed to him with respect to the production of wheat, the calculation being that if there were 100,000 farmers there, each occupying 320 acres of land and producing 20 bushels to the acre, there would be 640,000,000 bushels. The Secretary of State said he never made such a prophecy. It turned out that the hon. member for South Oxford had made the calculation, and so fully was he satisfied with it that he took the trouble to prepare it and put it away for future reference. I have observed that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) becomes very serious when discussing the merits of the National Policy, which he considers to be a matter of more importance than this school question. The hon. gentleman has entered into this debate with a great deal of frivolity and has occupied the time of the House in making excuses and attempting witty sayings. Many remarks have been made as to the probable result of the elections in Ontario. I have implicit confidence in the liberality and generosity of the people of that province and I am satisfied that when this discussion becomes known throughout the province they will not insist on withholding from the minority of Manitoba rights to which they are justly entitled. I have had a few letters from my constituents referring to this question, but none in any way endeavour to compel me to vote against remedial legislation, my constituents being willing to leave that matter to myself. Sometime ago we had a similar contest in Ontario between Mr. Meredith and Sir Oliver Mowat and that was a test of appealing to the Protestants of Ontario, and the verdict was that you cannot deprive people of rights to which they are entitled. A great deal has been said about equal rights. It is difficult to define what is meant by equal rights. There is one class who arrogate to themselves the right to say what their own rights are, while at the same time they ask the privilege of defining the rights of the other class. That other class want to define their own rights also. I cannot understand the objections to this Bill by representatives from Ontario. We have a separate school system in Ontario, and it works admirably. We had constant agitation before that law was passed, but since then we have got on peacefully. A great deal has been said of the inefficiency of the separate schools. Concerning that I cannot speak authoritatively, but I am inclined to think these reports are exaggerated. But I cannot see where it would be an injustice to the people of Manitoba to give the Roman Catholics the schools they want. I am quite willing to stand by my vote on this Bill, and, if I wish to come back here, I see nothing in the way, as I believe my constituents have confidence in me, and no exception has been taken to my vote on remedial legislation. The hon. member for West York speaks of the necessity of repeating arguments to hon. gentlemen coming into the chamber. I do not think any arguments could be adduced to convince the hon. gentleman that he is not sincere in the course he has taken. I believe he is sincere. But I think it unbecoming in him to accuse other hon. members of being actuated by mercenary or other unworthy motives. I have more respect for hon. members of this House than to say that of any of them. I claim the right to judge questions that come up, and when it comes to sacrificing my individual opinion in order to retain the position of representative of others. I am ready to step out, whatever honour may be attached to such a position as that. I have always held and expressed my own opinions, and I intend to do so in the future. I do not see what other course the Government could have taken, under the constitution, as decided by the Privy Council in Great Britain. It was held that there was a grievance, and it is admitted that there is a clause in the constitution giving an appeal to this Government and Parliament for the redress of grievances. What was the use of that provision in the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act but to protect the minority, whether Protestant or Catholic. If the minority had been Protestant, and they had appealed to this House for the redress of grievances, I believe that that appeal would have been answered unanimously, and that the rights taken away would have been restored. It is very well for lawyers to talk technicalities on this question, but it is impossible for ordinary men to comprehend what they are driving at.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. Or for themselves.

Mr. CARGILL. At any rate, they differ among themselves—no reflection upon the profession ; it is a peculiarity of theirs. It was the duty of the Government to act, the government of Manitoba having refused to do so. We should all have been glad if the Manitoba government had settled this question. The Government have my support. I believe, and have always said, that party government cannot exist unless the supporters of the government are loyal and stand by them in cases of necessity. I give every man the right to his own opinion ; at the same time I think cases arise in which it becomes necessary for men to make sacrifices in order to keep in power the party in which they have confidence. The party now in power has built up the country and made it prosperous, and a man takes great chances in opposing such a party. Gentlemen opposite have a right to their own opinions ; but we, on this side, differ from them on their fiscal policy ; and it is a very serious matter for members to consider before they vote against their party and strengthen the hands of their opponents, a course which must lead to the introduction of legislation which we regard as inimical to the interests of the country.

Mr. McNEILL. Every member of the committee must have been gratified to hear the courteous remarks of the hon. member for East Bruce (Mr. Cargill). All those who have the privilege of his acquaintance, know how sincere those remarks were when he spoke in favour of the measure before the House. No one regrets more than I do, and I am sure I can say the same for other hon. members who have felt obliged to take the same course in reference to this measure, the unhappy element of personality that has been introduced into this discussion. When my hon. friend (Mr. Cargill) referred to charges mala fides, that had been urged against certain members that take the same view as he does, perhaps he did not recollect that these charges were first indulged in by gentlemen on the Treasury benches. During the debate on the second reading, the Minister of Railways and Canals levelled a general charge of that kind against those members on this side of the House who had been pursuing a course that seemed to us, with the greatest possible regret, the course dictated by conscientious conviction. I referred to that in my remarks on the second reading. I was surprised to find that reference I made to members of the Conservative party who, along with myself, had acted in this way, was represented as though I had referred exclusively to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I did not refer to that hon. gentleman at all, and he was not even present to my mind when I spoke. But I saw the object of that imputation, when later I found that it was made the basis of a charge that I was acting with the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in endeavouring to defeat the Conservative party. So far as I am concerned, I have attributed to no one an improper motive in the course he has pursued. I think every hon. member must reconcile his course with his own conscientious convictions.

Now, with regard to some of the remarks made by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who recently addressed the House, I wish to say a word. My hon. friend reduced into exceedingly short bounds the fallacy which lies at the root of the arguments that have been adduced in favour of this measure. He said that certain rights which had existed prior to the union were to be "extended and perpetuated," and that that was the understanding. Now, the very opposite of this contention is the fact. There is no foundation for such a statement. The statement that the rights that had existed prior to the union were to be extended and perpetuated, is a statement which is directly in contravention of the act of union itself. The fallacy into which my hon. friend fell is a reproduction of that which lay at the root of the speech of the hon. Finance Minister. When we were children we used to be told that Archimedes said once that if you only gave him a lever long enough, and a fulcrum to rest it upon, he could move the world. If you only give a fallacy sufficiently potent to a gentleman of my hon. friend's ability and oratorical powers, he can raise thereon a very magnificent superstructure. Now, that is exactly the fallacy that lay at the root of my hon. friend's argument, namely, that the rights that had existed before the union were to be extended and perpetuated. Sir, the very opposite is what was decided, the opposite of that is what the constitution says. There are a great many drafts made upon our credulity in regard to this matter, and I think one of the greatest is the supposition that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) and the late Sir George E. Cartier were very simple-minded folk who did not understand what was going on in the House when this constitution was being framed. We are told that the half-breeds in the North-west Territories have certain rights and privileges, and that at the time of the union, certain promises were made to them, and that these poor, simple people were beguiled, and that the promise was not properly carried into effect by the terms of the constitution. I want to know if my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) and others, who were looking after the interests of their co-religionists at that time, were such simple folk as that ? I do not think so. The words of the constitution are so simple in this regard that it requires no lawyer to understand them. The words simply mean that the rights that existed at the union shall be continued in perpetuity—and the continuation of the rights in perpetuity is strictly limited in the plainest English to the rights that existed at the union. When we come to the rights that were granted after the union, we find a perfectly different arrangement made. But the fallacy of the hon. Minister of Finance was just the fallacy of my hon. friend from East Bruce (Mr. Cargill), namely, that these rights which did not exist prior to the union, were to be extended and perpetuated. If there was an understanding at the time of the union, as it is said there was, that the half-breeds in Manitoba were to have their separate schools after the union, that understanding was carried out. They had their schools granted to them ; but the understanding was most explicit that these schools, granted after the union, were not to be granted in perpetuity.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend cannot controvert that position for a moment. No lawyer in this House, on either side, will get up and say that he will controvert that proposition, there is no lawyer on either side who would, for a moment, say that there was any intention, under the constitution, that those rights were to be continued in perpetuity.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council said so.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend has heard a good deal of the discussion here, and I thought he had sufficient intelligence to understand the question by this time. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council said nothing of the kind, directly or indirectly. The Judicial Commitee of the Privy Council said what the constitution says, and the constitution says that those rights enjoyed at the union were to be continued in perpetuity, but the rights that were to be continued in perpetuity were specially limited to the rights before the union.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). And those acquired afterwards.

Mr. McNEILL. Nothing of the kind. The hon. gentleman is making a statement that no lawyer on either side of the House will, for a moment, attempt to substantiate. It just shows that this Bill is being forced through the House with little intelligence on the part of those who are supporting it.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). My hon. friend seems to claim all the intelligence.

Mr. McNEILL. No, I do not. I only say what every lawyer in the House will say.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Lawyers have not too much common sense.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish the hon. gentleman would speak more respectfully about the Minister of Justice. He is very hard upon the Minister of Justice, a gentleman for whom I have great respect. On a question of law it is to be presumed that the lawyers do know something. I am astonished to find that hon. gentlemen are proceeding on the assumption that the Judicial Committee decided that all post-union rights were in perpetuity. There could be no more ridiculous statement, and it only shows that hon. members are voting in support of the measure without knowledge. The arrangement made at the time of the union, and embodied in the constitution, was that the rights at the time of the union were to be guaranteed in perpetuity, but not the rights guaranteed after the union had been accomplished. If, therefore, there was any understanding that the schools were to be guaranteed to the half-breeds of Manitoba when the union was perfected, and if there was legislation, as there was, in regard to granting separate schools, the understanding was that those separate schools were not necessarily to be in perpetuity. What occurred ? In good faith, that arrangement was carried out. Separate schools were granted and went into a fair trial in the province. But the distinct understanding was that they were not to be guaranteed in perpetuity. The assumption that they were so guaranteed is the fallacy which lies at the root of the whole argument addressed by some hon. members to this House, especially by the Finance Minister when he made that brilliant speech which has been circulated broadcast throughout the country. The understanding was, I repeat, that the schools which were guaranteed after the union were not to be guaranteed in perpetuity. So we are at this point: the schools were guaranteed in good faith to the minority on the terms agreed upon, and after nineteen years these schools were proved to be a failure in the view of the government of the province, and in the interests of the province, as well as of the minority of Manitoba, the government determined that those separate schools had better be abolished. We hear the argument advanced that because other schools, different from those schools altogether, had been guaranteed in perpetuity, therefore the right to those schools, which the framers of the constitution refused to guarantee in perpetuity, should now be guaranteed in perpetuity. That is the exact position of the controversy, and I want the people to understand it. In view of the fact that the schools established after the union were by the constitution not to be guaranteed in perpetuity, that they had a fair trial for nineteen years and were found wretchedly inefficient, the government of Manitoba came to the conclusion that in the interest of the province a national system of schools should be established. I do not wish it to be understood that I desire to do violence to the conscientious convictions of any class, no matter how small, in Her Majesty's dominion, but I understand the government of Manitoba did not desire to do violence to the conscientious convictions of the minority there, and that they have made an offer, which should have been accepted as satisfactory, that there shall be permission given to the minority, whether Protestant or Catholic, to give religious instruction in the schools. How can there be any violence done to conscientious convictions if such a proposal be accepted? If time is to be given for the religious instruction of children by a pastor or a priest, or any one appointed by the priest, how can there be any violence done to conscientious scruples? When we appear to be within reach of such a reasonable compromise, we should not be asked to go on and attempt to coerce a province, and to carry out a policy which the province has refused to adopt. Why should the Dominion Government undertake to interfere in a case of this kind and to take a province by the throat. It would mean an era of discord, during which race would be marshalled against race and creed against creed; and yet those who have been endeavouring to prevent these unhappy conditions arising are charged with raising religious cries. So far as I am concerned, and my hon. friends with whom I am acting, it is our earnest wish to take this unhappy question out of Dominion politics, and to prevent religious and racial animosities and lack of harmony. In view of the reasonable terms offered by the Manitoba government, this Government should at once withdraw this coercive Bill, especially as we have not any proof that the minority have conscientious scruples against attending national schools. In Walkerton there are a considerable number of Roman Catholic families, and it was desired to establish a separate school there some years ago, but very strong resistance was met with. The leading men of the Roman Catholic body were earnestly opposed to the establishment of a separate school, but notwithstanding that opposition, a separate school was established and parents were compelled to send their children there. In view of those facts, would it be reasonable to ask me to help to pass a measure like this Remedial Bill in order to meet the conscientious scruples of the minority in Walkerton and to erect a separate school, if such school were abolished? I know, from information I have, that the minority there do not want separate schools, and I should be doing no violence to their conscientious convictions if I took part in abolishing those schools. How do we know that the minority in Manitoba desire this system of separate schools any more than the minority in Walkerton? The best evidence we have is the evidence of the provincial government. Now we have an interview with the Minister of Justice in which he speaks of the bona fides of that government. This is an extract from that interview:

> "There is, however, one thing of which I cannot speak too strongly, and that is the courtesy and frankness with which we were met by the Manitoba delegates. They were exceedingly kind, and did everything in their power to show us good-will."
> "Was it not expected that Mr. Greenway would take part in the conference?"
> "I think he would probably have done so but his health was uncertain, and it was felt that it would be unfortunate if he were to enter upon the conference and then find his health give way while it was in progress. That is, I believe, the reason he did not act."
> "What do you think will result from the conference?"
> "I think good cannot fail to come out of it. Having met these gentlemen in such a friendly way, we now know one another much better than before. For my own part, I feel that I can now deal with them on a very different basis. I found a very kindly spirit existing, and am confident that the conference has been productive of a better understanding between the two governments. I have no reason to doubt the sincerity of the Manitoba government in its attitude in this matter. Our relations throughout the conference were cordial, and even confidential."

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend knows my feelings towards him and knows that I would not interrupt him in an unfriendly way. I would like the hon. gentleman to tell me why it is that he urged a conference? Why is it that Mr. Greenway and his Ministers were in favour of a conference? What in the constitution gives a proposition of a conference a locus standi? Because, as I understand, most of his argument on the real proposition is that there is no locus standi.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman rose to ask me a question, and he has asked I don't know how many. I am astonished at my hon. friend, who has become so ardent a supporter of the Government's policy, and whom, above all others, I expected to favour the Government's policy with regard to a conference. I did not know but that perhaps the fact of their going into the conference had something to do with the startling and brilliant conversion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIN. I expected something different from that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to answer my hon. friend.

Mr. DAVIN. How is it we find such difficulty in answering?

Mr. McNEILL. I have stated so often that I do not understand why he interrupted me to ask. It is too late in the day; the conference has been held. I am sure he did not interrupt me for the sake of interrupting, for he has always been most courteous. But I do think his question is entirely irrelevant. So far as I am concerned, the reason is that I disapproved of coercion, and believed a friendly arrangement might be arrived at, that I disapproved of coercion, and believed rather in the British policy of conciliation and compromise. I have been led away from the point to which I was referring: I was quoting from an interview with the Minister of Justice, who, I may say, all the more readily in his absence, I regard as an ornament to the Cabinet and to this House, as one of the ablest men we have, and as one who addresses himself to every question, with an open, candid, and logical mind. He stated that the Manitoba commissioners had dealt with them in good faith. Now, here is the statement of the government of Manitoba with regard to the position of the minority on this question of the separate schools, as stated by these commissioners, of whom the Minister of Justice speaks in the terms I have quoted:

> At present in every city, town, and village in the province, outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, the Roman Catholic children attend the public schools. Not a word of complaint is heard. Absolute contentment and satisfaction prevail. The children have the advantage of efficient instruction, and numbers of them are qualifying themselves to become teachers in the public schools. We do not hesitate to say that not only is there no desire to separate, but if left to themselves the Roman Catholic people in the cities, towns and villages outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface would not consent to a change in the direction indicated.

There is a statement which goes to show that the minority do not wish this action of this Parliament, that is said to be taken in their behalf.

Mr. CARGILL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask, why do the minority outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface not favour separate schools?

Mr. McNEILL. I should be sorry to attempt to answer that question. I do not pretend to give reasons for the views of the minority. I think it is because we assume that they hold views that they do not hold, that we have got into this trouble. I do not think it matters what the reason is, but I give the fact according to the statement of the commissioners who, the Minister of Justice said, acted in good faith.

Mr. CARGILL. I might answer my own question by saying that I believe that very few of the minority live outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface. It is only in sections where they can support separate schools that they complain.

Mr. McNEILL. This Bill is not limited to Winnipeg and St. Boniface. Therefore, I do not think it would make any difference.

Mr. DAVIN. A short time ago I asked my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) a question about the conference. The hon. gentleman knows that I was in favour of a conference, and but for that conference being on the tapis, I would not have voted as I did. But let me ask the hon. member why is it that any one opposed à outrance to this legislation, should consider a conference at all? What locus standi has a conference?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is because they are opposed to it that they seek a settlement by conference.

Mr. DAVIN. Will my hon. friend tell me the locus standi for a conference?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will tell you, but it will take me more than a minute to do it.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend is very chirpy in interruptions, but when he is challenged, although he can pour forth volumes of inconsequential and pretended ratiocination in this House, and howl out by the hour and by the fathom all sorts of obstructive tirades, he cannot give a reason for the faith that is in them. It could be given in a single sentence, but he does not attempt to do it. The hon. member dare not attempt it for his life. There is not a man in this House that will attempt it. The hon. member for Simcoe dares not attempt it, and he is one of the boldest men in the House, and he is a capable man. I asked the question, What is the locus standi for a conference? Why is it that Mr. Greenway and his friends should have entertained the proposition for a conference? The moment my hon. friend argues for a conference, he admits that the principle of remedial legislation is in the constitution, and that there is a grievance. If the principle of remedial legislation is in the constitution, why did not Mr. Greenway and his friends say to the Dominion delegates: Gentlemen, go about your business? Take my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) who is a bold man; he won't attempt to deal with that question, and it goes, as I say, to the root of the matter. Hon. members get up in this House and say that they are against any legislation on the part of this House altogether. That is the position of the hon. member for Albert.

Mr. WELDON. That is distinctly not my position. The hon. member has evidently been asleep on the two or three occasions when I have spoken. I say that if the conscience rights of the Catholics of Manitoba are not safeguarded by an amendment in the local legislature, I will take the responsibility here of giving that protection which the constitution enables us to give, although it does not compel us to give.

Mr. DAVIN. So I have not risen in vain, because I have got from my hon. friend from Albert, for whose standing as a politician I have the greatest possible respect, a plain statement that the principle of remedial legislation is in the constitution.

Mr. McNEILL. We all admit it.

Mr. LAURIER. Nobody denies it.

Mr. EDGAR. It is, "nobody can deny."

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad that I rose. I knew that the party led by my hon. friend from Quebec East were fully convinced that remedial legislation is in the constitution.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Read the third clause of the constitution, and you will see it.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to hear all these interruptions by these gentlemen who say that the principle of remedial legislation is in the constitution. The hon. member for Quebec East says that nobody ever denied that remedial legislation was in the constitution. Well, we remember that last night the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin), in stentorian tones, declared that one reason why he was proud of following the leader of the Liberal party was because, if he got into power, he would give us a more advanced measure of remedial legislation than the present Bill. Why, in the name of anything but the most blatant faction, is it that the hon. member who leads the Liberal party did not under the circumstances, vote for the principle of remedial legislation when the second reading was on? Then, the moment we got into committee, he would be able to say to the Secretary of State: "I am in favour of remedial legislation, but your Bill is not strong enough, it does not go far enough; I want a stronger clause here, and a stonger clause there?" Then, Mr. Chairman, we would have found a certain consistency in his political course. I have noticed that a great many arguments take the form, not of antagonism to this Bill, but of antagonism to any Bill whatever, or to any action on the part of the Government whatever. But I am not prepared to say that that would not be a course that might not be strongly taken. I am not prepared to say if this 22nd clause, providing for a certain course of action and furnishing no machinery whatever to enforce it, that if I felt that the results of taking action might be of such magnitude that they would be out of proportion to the evil to be redressed, I am not prepared to say that I might not take that course under the circumstances, and I might think that it was better not to act at all on that clause. Now, the only locus standi for a conference is that the principle of remedial legislation is in the constitution, as was admitted by Mr. Sifton, and as is admitted by the proposal made by the Manitoba government. When there is introduced in this House a Bill embodying the principle of remedial legislation within the constitution, I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen who declare the principle is there, can yet deliberately vote against the principle. I can understand those hon. gentlemen voting for the principle, and stating that they meant to vote for the principle, but they differ from the measure; but when they say that the principle of remedial legislation is there, I fail to understand the course taken by some hon. members of the Opposition. Take the leader of the Opposition. He declared there is a grievance, that the House is seized of it, that the principle of remedial legislation is in the constitution, that redress must be given, and yet, when the Bill is brought forward, he moves the six months' hoist. One of his supporters announced that the reason he opposed the Bill was that he knew that if the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) became Prime Minister, he would give a stronger Remedial Bill than the present measure. I have not endeavoured to contribute to this discussion of the Bill in committee, because the tactics adopted put out of all question any bona fide criticism of clauses. I simply ask the hon. gentleman who was addressing the committee, what gave those things 'locus standi'? My sole object was to bring the hon. gentleman to this position where he now seems to be, to admit that there is this power in the constitution, and that the Government was pursuing either a wise or an unwise policy, that it was trying to carry out the constitution, and has a 'locus standi' in sending commissioners to Manitoba, and that the Greenway government and the provincial commissioners, by meeting them, admitted the 'locus standi' to which I have referred.

Mr. McNEILL. I am surprised at some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The hon. gentleman said he was going to ask a question ; he has asked several questions, and it is difficult for me to answer all of them, and it is also difficult for me to understand what point he desires to make, and what bearing his questions had on the subject under discussion. It turns out that when he asked me the question, he wanted me to admit that the principle of remedial legislation was in the constitution. Every one admits that the principle of remedial legislation is involved in the constitution ; but it depends on the sense in which the expression is used. It is admitted that we have power to intervene, if we see fit, but there is no legal obligation on our part to interfere. That is distinctly laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. There was a very clear statement to that effect made by Lord Watson. I now ask the hon. member for West Assiniboia, if Parliament is under legal compulsion to interfere.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly not. You cannot place a Parliament under compulsion.

Mr. McNEILL. Are we under any legal obligation to interfere under the constitution in this matter ? Does the constitution impose a legal duty on this Parliament to interfere, or is it not open to us, under the constitution, to interfere or not, as we please ?

Mr. DAVIN. I think that question is very easily answered. A parliament is a body of individuals, and has an intelligence and conscience of its own, and when it has duties to discharge, it has to consider whether or not a power and duty at any given time should or should not be exercised.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not talking about the duty. The question is whether the constitution imposes or not a legal obligation to interfere.

Mr. DAVIN. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has forgotten his legal studies at the Middle Temple, and the language a lawyer should use. How can the constitution impose on a sovereign body a legal obligation ?

Mr. McNEILL. Then, the hon. gentleman admits we are under no obligation to legislate. I admit that the principle of remedial legislation is in the constitution—that is to say, the constitution gives us the right, if we please to interfere. That is all. I do not understand that, because we have a right to interfere, if we please, it is any reason why I should not approve of a conference. I cannot follow the hon. gentleman's argument. I approve of a conference. I admit that this Parliament has power under the constitution to interfere in this matter and endeavour to set up a system of separate schools in Manitoba, if it thinks fit. I hold that Parliament should not interfere, except under very special circumstances, and that the proper course to have pursued would have been to have held the conference long ago, and endeavoured to arrive at a friendly conclusion with Manitoba. It is, however, better late than never, and it is well that a conference has been held. The position of the hon. member for West Assiniboia is unintelligible, and I am unable to understand the position taken by him on this question.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) It is a matter of regret to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Conservatives in this House, should resort to obstruction, not only to the point of preventing the important measures now before us making any progress, but also of preventing us from speaking a few words in the French language. I do not rise to reply to the argument of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) who has already made four or five speeches on the question at issue, probably at the request of the Government and to keep up the blockade of business. At all events, it would be impossible to reply to his speeches, because he has contradicted himself in every one of them, and in thus changing his mind, he is only keeping up his previous record. I do not rise either to discuss the question before the House, for, prior to the second reading of this Bill, the reasons pro and con have been given and the second reading was voted by a narrow majority. And now that we are in committee, I am of opinion that we should proceed with our work with all possible despatch. Unfortunately, a motion that the committee rise and report progress has been before you, Mr. Chairman, for a long time, and I am sorry to find that the Government, from the ridiculous way in which they conduct the business of the House, while refusing to accept this legitimate demand, evince the fact that they are not anxious to see this Bill making any progress and to have us discuss, as long as possible, the motion before you. At any rate, the country and the electors will judge their course, and I have no intention to say anything further on the matter. If I rose, under the circumstances, it was with a view to record my protest against the course pursued by certain Conservative newspapers of the province of Quebec, and mainly against certain editors or correspondents who occupy seats in this House, or who are in the press gallery, and whose statements I wish to formally contradict. We find in "L'Evenement," of Quebec, and in "La Minerve" of Montreal, and other newspapers subsidized by the Government, correspondences penned by men who, being unable to palliate their own conduct, and to explain plausibly why the Bill now before us is still lingering in committee instead of being now passed into law, do not hesitate to lie unblushingly in charging the Liberal party, and especially the hon. leader of the Opposition, with being the cause of the present obstruction, and they even go to the length of taxing the hon. leader of the Opposition with religious and national apostasy. Thus they hope to deceive public opinion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) I do not think the hon. gentleman has the right to bring up this question before the House; it has no relevancy to the question before the House.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I believe that I have the right, while discussing the question now before the House, to show that the Conservative organs and members of this House who are the correspondents of those papers, wilfully lie when they state that the hon. leader of the Opposition and the Liberals are obstructionists.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Translation.) The hon. member may say that those papers lie when making such statements; but we are not here to control the statements of the press. At any rate, the hon. member has no right to say of any member of this House that he is a liar. The hon. member must withdraw that expression.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I have nothing to withdraw of what I have said and I still strongly adhere to my statement; but as I wish to bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I shall abstain from discussing any longer this matter. I shall content myself with registering my protest against the course adopted by the Government, and their policy of obstruction which they have pursued for over a year. It is a notorious fact that, in the month of April of last year, the hon. Minister of Public Works, calling God to witness, in Verchères, declared that a Remedial Bill, based on the lines of the remedial order, would be introduced and passed. A session was then called together, and when the question of the Remedial Bill being introduced in the House came up in the Cabinet, and the Government were forced to introduce it, they carried out their policy of obstruction to the point of bringing about the resignation of three Ministers. To tell the truth, two of the bolters came back to the fold, but obstruction was carried to such a point, that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Angers) declined taking back his portfolio. In July last, the Government made the announcement that a session of Parliament would be called together not later than the second day of January next, and that they would introduce their Bill, which was actually introduced only two months after the opening of Parliament. During those two months they kept up their policy of obstruction, and prevented the Bill being introduced. Therefore, I throw back at the Government and their supporters the charge of obstruction which they have levelled at the Liberal party. And grounding myself on the attitude of the ex-Minister of Agriculture and the " Moniteur de Lévis," a Conservative organ, I tell the Government and their friends that they are the men who, for over a year, have been carrying on a policy of obstruction. It is a matter of regret to me that the rules of the House should preclude me from branding, as I intended to do, the course followed by those Conservative editors and members who, knowing that they cannot justify their conduct, level those charges of obstruction at the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends. I would like to stigmatize the conduct of those men who taking the words of peace and conciliation uttered every day in this House by the leader of the Opposition, turn them into charges, after the example of certain editors who know how to transform sardine into herring when it serves their purpose, and it is a paying business.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) As the remarks of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) were levelled at me, I may be allowed, Mr. Chairman, to say a few words in reply. I do not by any means intend to participate in the already too lengthy debate which is going on upon the Bill before the House, but the challenge of the hon. member for Montmagny is altogether foreign to this issue. Let me first reply to one of the innuendoes and remarks fallen from one hon. member. He spoke about sardine and herring. This is not the first time that the hon. member indulges in that kind of talk. I remember that, when I was addressing this House, a few days ago, upon the second reading of this Bill, the hon. member, not unlike certain creatures, as the skunk, the distinctive feature of which is to cast, while slipping away, their venom to the face of those they attack, the hon. member, I say, unchallenged, ventured to cast that innuendo in the debate. For over two years, the Liberals have been ventilating that matter in the press of the province. I challenged the hon. member for Montmagny and his friends at that time, to bring up the matter before the House. They chose to resort to insidious charges, which is the favourite weapon used by poltroons and cowards. They dared not come before the House and ask for an inquiry in order to substantiate the charges which the Liberal newspapers, for motives best known to themselves, kept circulating throughout the province of Quebec. Now, the House will forgive me for resenting and reflecting rather sharply on the remark passed by the hon. member, which was certainly out of place in this debate. The hon. member rose, as he said, to record his protest against two things. He first stated that the Conservatives are those who obstruct the business of the House, during the present debate. It is only fair that the country should know that the hon. members among the Conservatives who obstruct the Bill and keep up the blockade of business, attempting by all the means within their power to prevent the Bill from passing into law, have left the ranks of the Conservative party and serve under the leader of the Opposition along with the hon. member for Montmagny. These are the men who with the gentlemen of the Opposition have made an alliance to prevent justice being done to the Manitoba minority. Since the beginning of this debate, on Thursday of last week, who are they who have participated in the discussion? It is those Conservative dissentients who have bolted and joined the other side. They are also found among the Liberals. I shall not say that the hon. leader of the Opposition has largely participated in the debate, but his lieutenants have all along been helping those dissentients to defeat the Bill. Such are the actual facts, and it is only fair that the country should be aware of that. In the issue of "La Patrie" of the 8th and that of "L'Electeur of to-day, I find a list of those who are making obstruction in this House. Do you know, Mr. Chairman, who were the Conservatives set down on the list? The hon. members for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), from West York (Mr. Clarke Wallace), from Albert (Mr. Weldon), from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). Are these gentlemen Conservatives?

Some hon. MEMBERS. (Translation.) Yes, certainly.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) They were Conservatives, but they are no longer so.

Mr. LAVERGNE. (Translation.) Have all these gentlemen been read out of the party?

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) I may reply to the hon. gentleman that they have not been read out of the party, but that they have read themselves out of it. The best proof that these hon. gentlemen have crossed over to the other side of the House is found in the fact that they are hand and glove with Mr. Laurier and his friends. What have we seen since Thursday last? For over sixty hours this House has been continuously sitting, we have seen the hon. leader of the Opposition and the Conservative bolters coalescing in order to obstruct the Bill. I avail myself of this opportunity to make that statement before the House and before the country. And this coalition is evinced by the fact that when the obstructionists, the ultra Protestants went away to get the necessary rest, they were relieved by the lieutenants of the leader of the Opposition. And when the hon. member for Montmagny stands up and charges the Conservative members with carrying out a policy of obstruction, I have a right to tell him that his charges is at variance with the facts. Let us see what has been going on, within an hour, this morning, at this time of speaking. Who are they who have been keeping up the blockade of business and carrying out a policy of obstruction of the most flagrant character? These hon. gentlemen have resorted to all expedients for killing time, spinning irrelevant yarns, making speeches hours in length on all kinds of subjects, and never addressing themselves to the question at issue. Here is a list of the speeches irrelevant to the question under debate, made this morning. Mr. Semple spoke from 2.10 to 3.05, and he is no Conservative, while Mr. Edgar spoke from 3.05 to 4.45. The latter gentleman is one of the chief lieutenants of the leader of the Opposition, and he must take his orders from him, otherwise, the hon. leader of the Opposition is no longer the leader.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) It is the leader of the Opposition who takes the hon. member's orders.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Either the leader of the Opposition countenances the obstruction which is now going on, and as stated by the hon. leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) has been conspiring with the Conservative bolters to prevent this Bill from becoming law; or he can no longer exercise over his followers the control which a party leader should command.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) He never had any.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Next to Mr. Edgar comes Mr. Stubbs who spoke about ten minutes. He is no Conservative. Then Mr. Somerville spoke from 4.55 to 6.55. He is one of the lieutenants of the leader of the Opposition. Then Mr. Bowman spoke from 5.55 to 6.20. Another Liberal.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I tell you it was worth hearing.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Mr. Yeo, from 6.20 to 7; Mr. Colter spoke from 7 to 7.30; Mr. Flint, from 7.30 to 9; Mr. O'Brien, from 9 to 9.35; Mr. Casey, from 9.35 to 10.15; Mr. Martin, from 10.15 to 11; Mr. Henderson, from 11 to 11.05; Mr. Martin, from 11.05 to 11.06; Mr. Daly, from 11.06 to 11.07; Mr. Fraser, the right-hand man of the leader of the Opposition, one of the stump speakers of the party who preaches the gospel of Liberalism to the faithful throughout the Dominion, spoke from 11.07 to 11.40. Mr. Charlton, who did not read from his Bible to-night, spoke from 11.40 to 12.50. Then Mr. Mulock spoke from 12.50 to 1.45; Mr. Wallace, from 1.45 to 2.45, and Mr. McNeill, from 2.45 to 3.25. Now, Mr. Chairman, through that list I have just read, you will not find a single Conservative name; and I ask, is not "L'Evenement" warranted in stating, along with the other papers, that all the obstruction is carried on by the Liberals and the Conservative bolters? I go still further and I say that had the leader of the Opposition declined co-operating with the hon. members for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and for West York (Mr. Wallace), the obstruction complained would never have taken place. The seven or eight Conservative bolters, who are now serving under the Liberal banner would have found it impossible to carry on their policy of obstruction. It is but right that the country should be made acquainted with these facts. I do not challenge the right of the hon. member for Montmagny to protest against erroneous facts. I do not know what number of "L'Evenement," whose editor I am, he refers to. All that is published in "L'Evenement" does not come from my pen; but I do not hesitate to assume the whole responsibility for it. "L'Evenement" has merely published what I just stated before the House; all the hon. members who have sat here since Monday, are fully aware of it. I do not believe that the hon. member for Montmagny had any right to make, in connection with "L'Evenement"—for I presume it was the editor of the paper, the member for Gaspé, who was a target for his shafts—the remarks he has just passed. Now, it strikes me that the hon. member for Montmagny was never seen to rise in this House in favour of the Manitoba minority. He never rose upon the second reading of the Bill, and, for several days past, he is conspicuous by his absence from this House. "L'Evenement" makes a statement to-day, which I think, commends itself to every man endowed with common sense, namely, that the French Canadian members, instead of keeping away from the House, would do better to be at their seats and to protest as they are bound to do, against the obstruction carried on by their friends. They should say: We protest against your conduct; the Bill now before the House is not perhaps as perfect as we would like it to be, but allow us to perfect it in committee, so as to make it satisfactory. I was here during all the sittings of the House, and with the exception of the hon. members for Ottawa, for Dorchester, and for the county of Quebec who have voted for the Bill, I have seen very few French Canadian Liberals here.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) As a rule, they run away.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) There may have been some other gentlemen present, among others, the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau); but I say that the duty of the hon. gentlemen was to stay here and to protest against the conduct of their friends.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Will the hon. member allow me to ask him whether he has continuously been present here from Monday to this very hour, and whether he did not absent himself to go home and get his meals and his rest? How can he state that while he was away from the House, there were not some Liberal members present here?

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) My reply to the hon. gentleman is ready. I was here at three o'clock in the afternoon, on Monday, and I went back to my boarding-house at three o'clock in the morning, on Tuesday. I came back here at three o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, and I remained here till three o'clock in the morning, on Wednesday. Yesterday afternoon I came back at three o'clock and returned to my boarding-house only at eight o'clock this morning.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) At all events, the charge levelled by the hon. gentleman is utterly groundless. The Liberal members from the province of Quebec have been as assiduous as the members of your own party.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) The facts are there, and "L'Evenement" stated nothing that was not grounded on facts. How many French Canadian Liberals were here, when the vote was taken on the amendment moved by Mr. O'Brien on Thursday last? You need only refer to "Hansard" to ascertain it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for Gaspé, who, to the great surprise of everybody on this side of the House, fancied that my remarks were directed against him, when I spoke of extraordinary and magical ichthyologic transformations being brought about by some people who could even change herring into sardine. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) all of a sudden assumed the dreamy look of a halibut emerging out of the waves, and why? Because, the other day, when the hon. member, while addressing the House, having asked in an emphatic tone: "How hath the pure gold been changed into a baser metal?" I happened to reply as a matter of course without in the least reflecting on the hon. gentleman: "Just as sardine is sometimes changed into herring." At all events, this sardine matter has been threshed out in the Quebec press, and if the old proverb applies here, that "he who excuses himself, accuses himself," one may be led to believe in the end that the hon. member is endowed with a kind of magical power in such matters. The hon. member has taken the trouble to give us a list of the hon. members who addressed the House, last night; the only trouble is that he did not go any further, for he might have found out that the hon. members for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) and even the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) have also addressed the House, within the three or four last days, and they are all supporters of the Government. I may be told that the hon. members for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) are no longer friends of the Government. The same remark may apply to the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), and some fifteen or twenty Conservative members who are opposing the Government on this question. It serves their purpose to class those hon. members in the ranks of the Opposition, reserving it to themselves later on, when the general elections take place, to provide them out of the public treasury with means wherewith to be returned to Parliament. The hon. member for Gaspé has acknowledged, a moment ago, that the hon. leader of the Opposition had not taken a prominent part in this debate. In fact, as I have already stated, the hon. leader of the Opposition has uttered nothing but words of peace and conciliation with a view to prevail upon the Government to follow a wise course, calculated to bring about an understanding as to the discussion of this measure. The hon. member for Gaspé in his paper, charges the Liberals with making obstruction. He is bound to admit that the leader of the Opposition does not participate in the debate, and he must also admit that upon the second reading of the Bill, a good many Liberal members and among others, the hon. member for L'Islet and myself, abstained from speaking in order to make better progress, at the very time when the hon. member for Gaspé made a great speech. The hon. leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) even congratulated the leader of the Opposition about his attitude. Notwithstanding all that, the Conservative papers go on stating that the leader of the Opposition has constituted himself the leader of the obstructionists. And yet, in the same paper, the leader of the Opposition was looked upon, hardly a month ago, as the leader of the Catholic party, and the champion of national honour. The hon. member for Gaspé wrote, about two months ago that before long, sixty-four members from the province of Quebec would follow the hon. leader of the Opposition. But, if we are to believe the "Moniteur de Lévis" and his correspondent, "Lefranc," the hon. member for Gaspé, since he wrote those words, has been seized with a cerebral disease, and that explains why he no longer sees things in the same light as he used to. Evidently to my mind, those contradictions show that there is something wrong with the hon. member. When I rose to enter my protest against certain newspapers, the hon. member for Gaspé himself supplied me with the best proof that such editorials were baseless, when he wrote in his own paper that the leader of the Opposition did not take part in the debate and that the Liberal members from the province of Quebec refrained from taking the time of the House discussing this measure. Still, the Government protests against amendments moved even by their own friends, as it happened the other night, when the hon. member for the county of Quebec moved an amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont). Had the Government been anxious to pass a measure calculated to redress the wrongs of the minority, they would not have delayed so long introducing it. They first delayed five years meting out justice to the minority. The hon. Secretary of State, who happened the other day to be in a communicative mood, cried out that the minority had suffered enough, during six years. How is it that the Government and the Conservative party during those six dreary years of suffering, did not think of somewhat alleviating the tortures of the minority ? How is it that the Government, last session, did not fly to the relief of the minority, when the Minister of Agriculture told them that if they delayed any longer, it would be too late ? Now, the hon. gentlemen charge the leader of the Opposition with being an apostate ; they couple his name with that of Chiniquy, one of the best friends of the Conservatives, thus hoping to fool public opinion ; and yet, the hon. gentlemen decline accepting the assistance offered by the Opposition.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) I wish to say a few words in reply to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I wish to set myself right with the House as to certain statements made by the hon. member. When the hon. member says that I stated that the hon. leader of the Opposition would come back to Parliament supported by sixty-five members from the province of Quebec, he makes a statement at variance with the facts. I never made such a statement. The hon. gentleman is free to take stock in any statement made by reporters, and throw it in the face of his opponents, if he feels so inclined ; but let me tell him that I shall never stoop down to such tactics. I may say that I have always professed the utmost respect for the leader of the Opposition, for his talents and his character. Ever since I have been connected with the press, I never yet failed in the respect due to a man in the exalted position occupied by the leader of the Opposition. However, if a month ago or so, I spoke with respect of him, I am free to state that the course pursued by him in this House, when he moved the six months' hoist, was calculated to alter the good opinion I entertained of him.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) I do not rise to repel any charge levelled at me by "L'Evenement," as before long there will likely be a change of Government, and then "L'Evenement" will take charge of my defence.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Never, while I am editor of that paper.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) It is mainly on that ground, and because you will be the editor of that paper.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Will the hon. member allow me to ask him whether, since I occupied the position of editor of "L'Evenement," that paper has varied in its course ?

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) I do not know whether it has done since you are there ; but, three or four years ago there existed no stronger supporter of the Liberal government of the province of Quebec than "L'Evenement"; but let us not anticipate events, for I am positive that we will then be as strongly supported by that paper as we are now attacked by the same. Now, I wish to reply to certain statements made by the hon. member for Gaspé. He stated that he had been here from three in the morning every day this week. Now if the hon. member was present all the time, either he must have been asleep or else have paid no attention to the debate if he did not find out that the members of the Opposition were lending their exertions to advance the Bill now before us. We have tried to perfect the Bill, which has neither head nor tail, and is so poorly framed that it is open to doubt whether it was framed by legal men. We have discussed a section of paramount importance, which deserved to be obstructed sooner than throwing it such as framed to the face of the minority. We have succeeded in eliminating that section from the Bill. The Government accepted two or three amendments, and stated first that they were perfect, while a few moments later, they would no longer accept them; finally, after having accepted an amendment moved by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), it suddenly dawned upon their minds that it was an insult offered to the Manitoba minority, and then, they asked that subsection (c) of section 4 should stand over. Was the hon. member asleep at that moment? The only blame I have incurred during the discussion of this Bill is that I have endeavoured to render it, not as perfect as possible, but the least defective possible; for, to tell the truth, I never yet met with a Bill of that importance so miserably framed. Evidently the framers of the Bill never intended to put it in operation. Such is the part I have played. I have exerted myself to perfect this Bill, and I shall continue doing so, as long as it will be before the House; and the hon. member for Gaspé will, I hope, be wide awake this time to what is going on around him. As to obstructing the Bill, I may say, for my part, that I did not say a single word during the general debate which took place in this House. I voted against the second reading of the Bill, and I shall still vote twice against such a defective Bill.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I desire to say a few words on the charge made against me that I have been wabbling on this question. The hon. member for North York stated this afternoon that I had managed to vote on both sides of this question, and his remarks evidently find an echo in the minds and mouths of a number of the hon. gentleman's political friends opposite. I must brush up the recollection of that hon. gentleman, because, if he will cast his mind back to the election in North Ontario, he will find that it was the hon. member for West York who was charged with wabbling. This charge was made in the "Globe" of 29th and 30th November. The hon. member for North Simcoe also charged the member for West York with wabbling, up to a short time ago. Yet we see both those hon. gentlemen to-day sitting almost in the same seat. Only last session the member for West York gave this House and the country his opinion of the hon. member for North Simcoe. He minced no words on that occasion. He charged the member for North Simcoe with corruptly voting and acting in this House on this very question. If I had the time, I could quote his words from "Hansard."

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That will not clear you.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I will reply to the hon. gentleman later on. If the argument adduced by the hon. member for West York in regard to the hon. member for North Simcoe was pertinent to the issue six months ago, it is pertinent to-day, namely, that, having taken a fee and acted as counsel for the Manitoba government, he had no right to speak or vote on this question in the House of Commons. I ask the hon. member for West York, is that still his opinion of the hon. member for North Simcoe? If it were a fair argument then, it is a fair argument to-day; yet we see them in happy agreement sitting together and talking over this great question which is disturbing the House and the country. An hon. member suggests that they sit cheek by jowl, but, in my opinion, they sit together as pleasantly as two cooing doves. What was my position in the contest in North Ontario? I had the endorsement of the hon. member for West York throughout. I can read his language from the "Mail." I read this in the "Mail":—"Some people asked the question, why should we come here to advocate the election of the Conservative candidate, Mr. McGillivray?"

An hon. MEMBER. Where was that?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. At Severn Bridge. The conversation referred to the other night by the hon. member for West York was a private conversation that took place between four gentlemen in this House. Two hon. members are here who heard the entire conversation, and I leave it to them whether I used the word wabbling. It was only used throughout that county when the member for West York was speaking of the leader of the Opposition. He charged the leader of the Opposition with wabbling on this question, and I believe his charge is true. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has told us that the hon. leader of the Opposition, believing in the principle of this great measure before the House, yet moved the six months' hoist, thus declaring against the principle. The hon. member for West York charged me with wabbling and inconsistency. But I, not believing in the principle of the Bill, voted against it. Why did I vote against it? For the very reason expressed here in the "Globe" and "Mail" by the hon. member for West York. He could not during the North Ontario contest find language strong enough to speak of the wabbling course of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He spoke of that hon. gentleman as having said that he thanked God that there was not an Orangeman in the Reform ranks.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is not true, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) knows it is not true.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The gentleman who was the then leader of the party, which is perhaps still led by him, perhaps by the hon. member for West York, perhaps by the hon. member for North Simcoe, is alleged to have made this statement. And though the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) believes that his leader denied it, the hon. member for West York refused to believe that denial. Here it is reported in the columns of the "Globe" and "Mail and Empire." The hon. member for West York goes on to say:

> Some have questioned why we should come here to advocate the election of the Conservative candidate, Mr. McGillivray. For my part, I do so with a very great deal of pleasure, because I have known that gentleman for many, many years, and deem him from experience to be a capable, intelligent man who would do honour to any constituency——

Mr. MULOCK. You did not wabble then.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. He was the wabbler then, if we may believe the "Globe."

> —and know him likewise to be a gentleman who will worthily represent you, I believe, in every respect, and represent the feelings of the people of the North Riding of Ontario.

The hon. gentleman formed that opinion of me after he had seen the work I had done for the party in the riding I now represent and in the county in which I was born. The people there had known me for forty years, and had known my record on this question. The hon. member for West York knew what my record was. Therefore, he gave me this certificate of character, which he would now possibly fain take away from me. He goes on:

> It is said that on the question of separate schools Mr. McGillivray desired to come before you unpledged and asked to be judged by his record. Well, I know his record, because I have been side by side with him in many fights.

And so he goes on. I have not heard the leader of the Opposition deny the charge hurled against him by the hon. member for West York in the North Ontario campaign. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) may have been told by his leader in confidence that he had never made the statement. Perhaps the leader of the Opposition will deny it yet before the debate is over. I hope he may, to the satisfaction of his supporter of the six months' hoist, the hon. member for West York. I was saying that as the hon. member for West York and I had always been friends, before he charged me with wabbling, he might have been expected to inform me that he would make such a charge against me in the House. Instead of charging me with wabbling then, he took my Severn Bridge meeting afterwards, and then went to Bracebridge on my behalf and arranged to hold two meetings in the township of Brock later on. And from that day, until he charged me with wabbling here in the House, he never told me why he had not taken those meetings. He might at least have done me the courtesy to let me know. But there were other reasons, and no one knows that better than he. I have here his letter of congratulation on my election, which I will read if he consents.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on. Read.

Mr. WALLACE. I have just heard a remark across the floor to the effect: Let her go, Gallagher. I endorse that.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Perhaps that language is parliamentary; it is certainly not elegant. However, this is the letter written to the man he said was wabbling, and written the day after the election.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He said he had not found you out.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. But he found me out enough to take two meetings for me after the conversation to which he refers. He says in this letter:

> My dear McGillivray,—I have great pleasure in congratulating you on your splendid victory in North Ontario, and on the fact that you have realized your early expectations. The Grit-Patron combination did not work very well. Wishing you continued prosperity.
> N. CLARK WALLACE.

If you can say that that letter and the answer made by the hon. member for West York in the House the other night are both honest, so much the better for the hon. member. The day before I was elected, he thought well to resign. The hon. member for North Simcoe had been urging him and charging him with impropriety, in remaining as a member of the Government as "Hansard" shows. He charged the hon. gentleman with taking his wages and sitting in a government in which he had no confidence. Am I only to be held to be a wabbler, when charges and counter-charges of wabbling passed between the hon. member for West York and the hon. member for North Simcoe, and when the leader of the Opposition was subjected to a similar charge by the hon. member for West York.

Mr. MULOCK. This is starting a new breed of politicians.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I cannot catch the hon. gentleman's remark.

An hon. MEMBER. He is a light weight.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. No, he has no light weight. He has been my friend for twenty years, and nothing he can say in banter across the floor will offend me.

An hon. MEMBER. You are both farmers.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Yes; the hon. gentleman spoke of me as a sheep farmer; he is a cattle expert. I have done what the hon. gentleman for West York told my constituents I would do. He said my vote would be such as to satisfy the people of North Ontario. It has been such as to satisfy them. I have letters in my pocket——

Mr. LANDERKIN. Read.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) stands at the bar of the House. I do not think he has a right to speak from there.

An hon. MEMBER. Question.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I am speaking to the question.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Do not obstruct business.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. It would not be much wonder if a fellow did get a little confused with so many after him. The hon. member for West York is a genial fellow, a man we all like, a man whom I expected to see in the Government and to support as his follower. But he cannot expect that any man is greater than the party of which he is a member. And then the organization of which he is the head—he cannot be greater than that whole body. I am an Orangeman and a Conservative. There is no man in this House or out of it who could induce me to follow him, when he says it is necessary to adopt tactics that would bring the blush of shame to the cheeks of members of a village council in the North-west Territories or the United States, nor has he the right to chastise me when I refuse so to follow him. If I voted against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, I did it conscientiously. I care little whether I appeal to my constituency again or not. I do not doubt that if I do so appeal, I shall receive the strong endorsation of my constituents. It is said I did not read the Bill through. I read the preamble, and I went far enough to know that it was a Bill I could not favour, on principle, no matter how it was amended in committee. I voted against the second reading, and when the third heading comes, as it may come, I shall have pleasure in voting against it with the hon. member for West York. I suppose the hon. member for West York is in the position of an independent Conservative. I hope so; I hope he has not gone from us altogether. The hon. member for South Oxford was once in the same position. I can remember the time when that hon. gentleman was classified in the "Parliamentary Companion" as a Conservative.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the hon. gentleman never found me classified as a Liberal-Conservative. That is the distinction. I take no stock in political mulattos.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Although he was not termed a Liberal-Conservative, he was termed by his then friends, as an old-time Tory, a blue-blood of the bluest kind. Now, the hon. member for South Oxford was then in the wabbling stage. He wabbled away from the Conservative party until he got into the Reform Government; and, according to the "Parliamentary Companion" I have in my hand, every year he was in that Government, he allowed that book to be printed calling him an Independent Conservative. That is a kind of Conservative that the Liberal-Conservatives do not care very much about. It was not until after he left the Mackenzie Government that at last he is put down in this book as a Liberal. So it took him twenty years to get there, but he got there all the same. Now, the hon. member for North Simcoe commenced wabbling a little at first, and finally he got clean away on the trade policy and on every other. I do not wish to speak of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), as I have a little account to settle with him later on. I am holding up these men as examples to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), for I want to keep him in the party. We see the hon. member for South Oxford was once just as good a Tory as he is, and the hon. member for North Simcoe was just as good, and yet the member for North Simcoe deserted us in the Ontario campaign. All he seemed to want was to destroy the powers that be at Ottawa; he did not care a fig for Mowat.

Committee rose and reported, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and the clause as so amended will read as follows:—

> Any member of the board absenting himself, without permission of the board, from the meetings of the board for three successive meetings thereof, unless from sickness, shall be considered ipso facto to have resigned his position, and the superintendent of the board shall notify the Provincial Secretary of the vacancy so caused, and the member appointed to replace him shall hold office only for the unexpired term of the member whom he replaces.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I see no objection to that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The amendment is right as far as it goes, but in case there should be no appointment by the Provincial Secretary there ought to be a provision for a notice to the Government here, or otherwise the vacancy might continue for a long time without being known.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then we will add the words "or Secretary of State, as the case may be," after the words "Provincial Secretary."

Section 6, as amended, agreed to.

On section 7.

7. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall appoint one of the members of the board to be the superintendent of the separate schools, and the superintendent shall be the secretary of the board. If no appointment shall be so made the board shall appoint one of its members to be the superintendent.

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not see any provision for paying the superintendent. If you want a man of ability you must give him a good salary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman not to interpose an objection of that kind at this stage. The question of payment will rise later.

Mr. LANGELIER. This is the proper place to provide for it, otherwise the clause will be useless. We have the right now to know what the Government proposes to do.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman wants to interpose difficulty in the way of getting the Bill through I cannot prevent him; but if he is disposed to assist in carrying the Bill through it is not desirable to raise this question now.

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not see in any other part of the Bill a provision for the pay of the superintendent, and I do not see when the question can be raised if not now.

Mr. MARTIN. I beg to move that after the word "made" in the fourth line, be added the words "within thirty days." Notice of that amendment was given by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), but as he is unfortunately absent, I beg to move that these words be inserted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I see no objection to that.

Mr. POWELL. This clause is general, drawn so as to cover all time, but the amendment would only refer to the first appointment.

Mr. MARTIN. What is your suggestion?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Make it within thirty days after being notified by the board.

Mr. MARTIN. If at any time thirty days elapse without a superintendent being appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, the board shall appoint one of its members to be superintendent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The difficulty is this. If it means thirty days from the vacancy, the whole thirty days might expire before it was known a vacancy occurred, and then the appointment would go to the board.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Why does this clause confine the appointment of the superintendent to a member of the board? In Ontario there is no such restriction. The board is composed of a small number of members, and there might be rivalry among them for this appointment. If they can get a better man for superintendent outside of the board than in it, let them have the option of appointing him.

Mr. McCARTHY. I quite agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for North Brant, but before we come to that I would ask why it is proposed to put the duty on the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The Department of Education is practically the same thing, and we have recognized it in the third clause. Why not authorize it to appoint the superintendent; and if it does not act, we can compel it to do so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will have to leave that as it is. The matter has been carefully considered, and I do not see any possible difficulty in asking the Lieutenant-Governor to make the appointment; and if he fails to discharge that duty, then the board shall make the appointment.

Mr. MARTIN. It is a very unsatisfactory answer that the Government have duly considered it. We may suppose that they have duly considered all these other portions which we have torn to pieces.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid that is the particular desire.

Mr. MARTIN. To tear them to pieces and put them into shape. We had to do that in order to make the clauses workable or even understandable.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. These are exactly the same clauses as existed in the provincial law, and the hon. gentleman, who was a member of the Manitoba legislature when these clauses were agreed to, knows that he agreed to them as well as I. That they may not be improved I do not deny, and any suggestions we have accepted have not changed the value or meaning of the clauses and to avoid friction and try to pass the Bill through, we have accepted such suggestions.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman says I was in the legislature and agreed to these clauses, as they were made from time to time. I did no such thing. When the hon. gentleman was in power in Manitoba he adopted the system in vogue in this House, of putting things through regardless of the protests of the Opposition. Any suggestions of the Opposition were not regarded when we were discussing educational matters, while the hon. gentleman was in power, because he practically was the Government at that time.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. My hon. friend (Mr. Martin) had the same means he has to-day to obstruct, but he never did it.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, we did several times, and I remember that on one occasion seven of us had to hold the House for several days. I must say, however, that the government of which he (Mr. LaRiviere) was a Minister, bad as it was, never asked us to sit for twenty-four hours when we had made reasonable progress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. After the long period we have been engaged in discussing everything but the Bill, I must ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) to confine himself to the Bill.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not care what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) asks me to do, it won't have the slightest effect upon me. I shall do just as I please. The hon. gentleman may dictate to his own supporters. We had an instance of that a moment ago when the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) begged for a few minutes to make an explanation. and he was told by his leader to sit down. If the leader of the House undertakes to order me around it won't have any effect upon me. I utterly repudiate that I ever agreed to any statutes passed while the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRiviere) was in the government of Manitoba. The government there tried to ride rough shod over us, until we appealed to the people and the people put them out. I have no doubt the people of Canada will do the same thing with the Government opposite.

Mr. FOSTER. The people will put you out.

Mr. MARTIN. They cannot put us out because we are not in. I utterly repudiate the suggestion that we must necessarily pass this clause because it was in the old Act. On the contrary so imperfect was the old Act, that that is a very good reason why we should not pass it. The proposition of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is reasonable, and it should be accepted. The matter should be left to the Department of Education which is properly equipped to do it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The best answer I can give to my hon. friend from Winnipeg is, that when he proposed an amendment I with all the courtesy possible. accepted it. I believe his amendment was accepted by common consent.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) came in to the chamber this amendment suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was accepted.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is a Department of Education in Manitoba which this Bill recognizes. One of their duties is to appoint inspectors of high and public schools. Surely that is the proper body to do this.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. For the purpose of facilitating business, I would say, that if the hon. gentleman thinks that this "Board of Education" should be inserted in the clause instead of the "Lieutenant-Governor in Council," I would rather accept that suggestion than detain the Bill.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I object to that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read him out.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I will give my reasons why I object. This Board of Education that we are creating is equally high in position with the Department of Education. That Department of Education in existence in Manitoba has taken the place of the Protestant section of the Board of Education. We are now re-establishing the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education, and we are asked to allow a sister institution to the same standing to appoint the other wing of the institution. I must protest against that.

Mr. McCARTHY. You have already recognized the Department of Education in clause 3 of the Bill.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I consider that the Department of Education on one side is of equal standing to this Board of Education on the other. Why should the appointment of one depend on the other ? You might as well provide that the Department of Education should be appointed by this Board of Education.

Mr. MARTIN. The Department of Education is composed of the government.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. They are not members of the Board of Education. The Act provides that four of the Ministers shall form the board, but there are not more than four members in the government. The Department of Education has taken the place of the Protestant section of the Board of Education and that is only a change in the name.

Mr. MARTIN. Not at all. The hon. gentleman from Provencher is thinking of the advisory board.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not see that it matters whether they are called the "Governor in Council or the "Department of Education."

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In that case why make the change ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would prefer to leave the matter as it stands in the clause.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I know you do, but the others don't.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for Provencher is wrong when he says that this Board of Education is of equally high standing with the Department of Education. The Department of Education is really the government of Manitoba. I must protest against the member for Provencher dictating to the Government the course they should pursue in this matter. He is no more than any other member of the House. There are many objections against the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope the hon. gentleman will deal with the clause. He must not deal with the Bill generally.

Mr. WALLACE. It was a slip of the tongue. I meant the clause. This superintendent of the board must give his whole time to the work and the House must be told where his salary is to come from. You should leave the board perfectly untrammelled and free to select the best man. But you are confining the selection to nine men, not one of whom may be fit for the position. The statement made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), that this provision is the same as that in the old Act is the old exploded reason that has been given for every clause of this Bill. There must be a better reason given. The very fact that this is part of an old Act that has been repealed is sufficient to condemn it.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think the hon. member for Provencher heard the reason I gave for the hon. gentleman's proposition ; that is, that while the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and the Department of Education are nearly the same, the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council are Orders in Council, which are recorded in the books of the Executive Council office, and are in no way connected with educational matters, whereas the Department of Education have an entirely different set of books, dealing exclusively with the ordinary educational work of the province.

Amendment (Mr. McCarthy) agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I notice that the section does not say anything with reference to the tenure of office of the superintendent. Is he to hold office during life or during pleasure ?

Mr. POWELL. The power to appoint implies the power to dismiss.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think that follows at all. It should be specified.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Unless otherwise expressed, I take it for granted that the term of office will be during pleasure, as all appointments are.

Mr. McMULLEN. Why confine the appointment to the members of the board ? I would move that the limiting words be struck out, and the clause made to read :

The Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall appoint the superintendent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The board itself is appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and this clause providing that one of the board shall be superintendent imposes a duty upon the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, which I am quite sure they will observe, of appointing a board of competent persons. The very fact that the board is appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and that one member of the board is to be superintendent, is a sufficient guarantee that they will not appoint a board of persons all incapable of being superintendent. Therefore I think the clause might be left as it is.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is not to be supposed that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council will appoint a board all of whom are capable of being superintendent.

Mr. POWELL. They will only appoint one.

Mr. McMULLEN. Something might occur to prevent or disqualify the one appointed from discharging the duties, and he might still be a member of the board. In that case, they could not go outside of the board for another superintendent.

Mr. FREMONT. There is another objection. By the first clause of the Bill members of the Board cease to be members after a lapse of time. The members of the board are appointed by rotation. Nine will be appointed when the Act goes into force, but three of them will go out of office after one year, three others after the second year, and so forth, three retiring every year ; so the superintendent would be sure to cease to be a member of the board, and it would be useful, if he is a good officer, that he should continue in office.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I suggested some time ago that this clause should be amended so that the superintendent might be either a member of the board or some outside person, because among the nine members there might be rivalry for the position, or the board might be composed of men none of whom might be competent for the position. In the province of Ontario the superintendent of schools is never a member of the board, but a special officer appointed for the purpose of looking after the general management of the schools. He is an employee of the board, and is paid a salary. Therefore, I move to strike out all the words after "appoint" in the last line, and substitute the words " a superintendent may be a member of the board." That leaves it optional with the board to appoint either a member of the board or an outside person. That, I think, is a reasonable and proper amendment.

Mr. McNEILL. I think there is a great deal of force in what has been said by the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Frémont). that the superintendent, who will be a man of experience, and we may assume, a thoroughly competent man, would be required to fall out of the board by this system of rotation. It would be very undesirable if he were to be made ineligible for re-nomination.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is not ineligible. He could be re-appointed a member of the board.

Mr. McNEILL. But he would have fallen out in the meantime. If the choice is to be confined to the members of the board. it might be a very restricted choice indeed, because, so far as I can see, by this Act the members of the board may not be more than two in number. The first section says that the number of persons is not to exceed nine. The second section says that if the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not within three months after the coming into force of this Act make appointments to the separate school board, then the Governor General shall make appointments not made. It does not say "the" appointments. It does not say how many; it only says not more than nine. If the Lieutenant-Governor makes two appointments, he will have performed his duty under this Act.

Mr. POWELL. If he only appoints two, it would be difficult for three to retire.

Mr. McNEILL. No doubt it would be difficult. That is just an evidence of the contradictory nature of this Act.

Mr. MARTIN. We will take our time and get it all right.

Mr. McNEILL. This clause 2 was passed very rapidly through the committee. If it had been more carefully considered, I have no doubt this defect would have been observed and the correction made.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that the superintendent should be made an ex-officio member of the board, and that he should not require to be a member of the board before his appointment. The rule of rotation is a very good one with reference to the board itself, because it prevents it getting into a groove, and enables the Department of Education to get rid of men who are found to be crotchety and not disposed to keep up with the requirements of the time; but under such an arrangement an efficient superintendent would be required to go out when his time expired as a member of the board. It seems to me highly desirable that the superintendent should be a permanent officer of the board, and be a member of the board by virtue of his office as superintendent. I would not give the board power to make the appointment, even temporarily. If appointed by the board, he is absolutely controllable by them, which would not be desirable. The superintendent is naturally expected to be a man who would keep up to the times, whereas you will probably find members of the board whose education belongs to a past period, and is rather old-fashioned. If the Department of Education do not make the appointment, it ought to be made by the Government here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Might not a serious difficulty arise in that way? Suppose the appointment is not made by the Department of Education, then it is made here. The superintendent is appointed by a different body from that which has appointed the board. That might interpose a serious difficulty in the way of the smooth working of this measure.

Mr. WELDON. For the effective working of the schools the responsibility devolves on the superintendent, who is supposed to be a man experienced in educational work, and the work will be better done if he be clothed with strong legal power. If he is appointed by the board, they are likely to have too much power over him. He will be able to do more effective work. In a very few months a slight change could be drafted that would strengthen his position and make him keep his school up to the highest standpoint. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, our experience is that where the superintendent has a strong legal position, he is able to do more for the province.

Mr. DICKEY. There seems to be a general agreement that the superintendent should be a member of the board. That is necessary because he is to be the secretary of the board, and a greater portion of his duties are those of secretary. His appointment is an independent one, because he is appointed by the Department of Education; and, although the choice is limited to the nine members of the board, they are appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and, in making appointments on the board, the Lieutenant-Governor will keep this point in view, that one of the members is to be superintendent and secretary. To make the secretary an additional man would only be removing the difficulty one more. and, if we undertook to appoint nine members of the board and the secretary outside of that, we would be increasing the number of the members of the board, and there might be some question as to our powers. That opinion has been expressed by legal gentlemen who have strong views on the matter.

Mr. MARTIN. Better put it that way, if Mr. Ewart says so.

Mr. DICKEY. If it were Mr. Ewart's opinion, the hon. gentleman knows that it is entitled to a great deal of consideration.

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly, because he has furnished the law to the Government.

Mr. DICKEY. Because he has special knowledge, his opinion is entitled to weight, just as is that of the hon. gentleman. This is the old system, and I have not heard anything to show any necessity for changing it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was for many years superintendent of schools for the county of Kent, and we had a Board of Public Instruction, composed of three members of the county council. My greatest difficulty in the discharge of my duties arose from the fact that these members of the board were members of the council, and had the appointments to office, and they seemed to think that I ought to defer to their judgment in a way I would not do to any other members of the council. If you require your superintendent to be a member of the board, before he is eligible, you seriously hamper him in the discharge of his duties. If he is fitted for the office, he is likely to be much better qualified to discharge those duties than the board with which he is associated.

Mr. COCKBURN. My experience leads me strongly to the view of the hon. member for Bothwell. It is very important that the superintendent should be entirely independent of the board. In many districts gentlemen are elected members of the Board of Education, who, owing to early circumstances, have not been able to receive the education to fit them for the position, but who, on account of their wealth or other circumstances, are chosen, and it would be an evil day for the future of education in Manitoba, if the man who desires to be superintendent, must first canvass in order to be elected on the board, and then canvass the members of the board to secure the position. I should desire to see the superintendent a permanent officer and his appointment made by totally different parties than the members of the board.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I do not see that in our great wisdom we can very much improve a law that was in existence for over nineteen years in Manitoba, and the carrying out of which never gave any difficulty. When appointments on the board were to be made by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, the necessity of having among the members a man qualified to be superintendent of education was always kept in view. Every member of the board of both the Catholic and the Protestant sections was qualified to be superintendent. The superintendent of education, under this Bill, does not exercise such extensive powers as similar officers exercise in other provinces. He is chiefly the secretary of the board, and his duties are confined to exercising the powers vested in him by the board.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The necessity for this amendment I have placed before you is important, if the Act is to be of benefit to the minority in Manitoba. It will be admitted that the Ontario Education Act is a good Act, that it accomplishes the purpose for which it was created, and that Act provides for the appointment of superintendents and secretary-treasurers of boards. The superintendent in a county has supervision over all the schools in that county, and is appointed by the county council, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council or the Minister of Education, and the secretary-treasurer of the board is scarcely ever a member of it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Who appoints the county board ?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The county council is elected by the people. In this case it is different, but the same rule will apply. I think it is important that the secretary and superintendent should not be a member of the board, because he will then be able to act more independently.

Mr. FRASER. Does the superintendent cease to be a member of the board after he is appointed ?

Mr. MULOCK. He may cease to be a member of the board, but he would not cease to be superintendent. His tenure of office would not be affected. It is only required that he shall be a member of the board at the time he is appointed.

Mr. FRASER. He ought to hold office during good behaviour. He should be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and hold office right along.

Mr. WELDON. I would move that the clause be so amended as to require the Governor General in Council to make the appointment, in case the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not do so.

Mr. FRASER. Would you not also amend the clause so as to make the term of office continuous ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see how you are going to have the office continuous or during pleasure, if it is necessary that the superintendent should be a member of the board before he can be appointed. The legal implication clearly is that, when his time expires as a member of the board, it also must expire as superintendent.

Mr. COCKBURN. I suppose that the desire is not that the superintendent should retire at the end of three years, even if he should be a member of the board. The duties assigned to him are very important.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would wait awhile before he deals with that. We are very anxious to get on with this work and we have not yet assigned any duties to this officer.

Mr. COCKBURN. I am perfectly in order. The office is very important and it should be of a permanent character.

Mr. MULOCK. I agree that the office should be permanent, but as I understand it, the superintendent would not lose his office if he cease to be a member of the board.

Mr. RIDER. I move as an amendment to the amendment:

That the said superintendent shall be a person speaking the French and the English language.

It seems to me that the efficiency of the whole system depends largely upon the qualification of the superintendent, and he certainly should speak the two languages.

Mr. LANGELIER. We are all agreed, that the superintendent should be a member of the board, and it is of the greatest importance that he should be independent of the board. I would move as an amendment:

The Department of Education shall within thirty days from the passing of this Act, appoint a competent person to be superintendent of schools. The said superintendent shall be a person belonging to the Catholic faith and shall speak both the French and the English languages, and he shall be ex-officio a member of the Board of Education for separate schools, and the secretary of the said board. He shall hold office during pleasure. If the said appointment is not made within thirty days then the Governor General in Council shall make said appointment.

I think that would make the section complete, and would meet most of the objections taken.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would be quite willing to withdraw my amendment in favour of the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Langelier).

Amendment (Mr. Somerville) withdrawn.

Mr. MARTIN. Perhaps the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. I object to that.

Mr. DICKEY. I must ask the committee not to make the superintendent a member ex-officio of the board, because I can see a good deal of difficulty in that. I would suggest this as an amendment:

The Department of Education shall appoint a superintendent of the separate schools who shall be a Roman Catholic, and who shall be the secretary of the board.

Mr. RIDER. Speaking both languages.

Mr. DICKEY. That is unnecessary.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Yes, it is necessary.

Mr. DICKEY. It is unnecessary to put it in the clause because no man would be appointed unless he had that qualification. It is necessary to put in the words "Roman Catholic" because that has connection with the rights of the minority, but the other is a mere matter of qualification.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Why not put it in, then?

Mr. DICKEY. I think it would be entirely out of place. We are dealing with the rights of the Catholic minority, and we should recognize them, but I do not think we should go any further to designate his age and qualifications generally.

Mr. MARTIN. It seems to me we should consider whether the Department of Education in Manitoba will consider all these matters. You must remember that you are forcing something on them, and you are taking for granted that they will fall into line, and do everything that is acceptable and in the very best way; whereas, it is quite evident that they could frustrate the whole Act.

Mr. DICKEY. They could appoint an illiterate man, but you would not put into your Bill that a man must be able to read and write.

Mr. MARTIN. I would not do that, but I think the other should be provided.

Mr. McCARTHY. You would have to provide also for the Germans and Mennonites.

Mr. MARTIN. They are all Protestants.

Mr. McCARTHY. But they might have separate schools.

Mr. DICKEY. There is just one view which I would like to put to the committee. This legislation, we know, is not very agreeable to any of us, and I do not think it is desirable that the Governor in Council should meddle much with it after the thing is running. For that reason I think it undesirable that the Governor in Council should have any patronage in connection with these schools. The Governor in Council is not able to administer the schools; they have no means of knowledge in regard to them. Therefore, I think it is desirable that the appointive power should rest with Manitoba, and the Department of Education is the responsible body. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council may appoint a very good man; but if they do not, I think it would be undesirable to make the appointment here.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think so. It would be a great mistake.

Mr. DICKEY. I think we cannot be making much mistake if we trust the appointment of their own secretary to the board as an alternative.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Have you an interpreting clause defining what "board" means?

Mr. McCARTHY. There is not yet.

Mr. DICKEY. I think it can easily be arranged.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It will be very inconvenient if the superintendent is not required to understand both languages.

Mr. McNEILL. With regard to the appointment by the Governor in Council, in case the provincial authority does not act, I think there is not much practical use of our dealing with that matter, because if it is to be an appointment with a considerable salary attached to it, I think there is not much doubt that the authorities in the province will take care of it.

Mr. FRASER. I think we can safely leave the matter exactly as the Minister of Justice has it. Why should we suppose that the person appointed will not have the necessary qualifications ? Does any one suppose that the authorities will appoint a superintendent for French schools who will not understand French ? We must assume that they will know their business. I do not think it is necessary to make a special provision for that. If we are going to provide here for everything that they must do, we shall have a Bill of 5,000 pages. Let us accept the amendment of the Minister of Justice and get on. It is all right.

Mr. LANGELIER. The Department of Education might appoint a person who would be a first-class educationalist, but might not understand French. The objection that the original law did not contain that provision is of no value, because under the original law there was a board of separate schools, composed almost exclusively of French-speaking people, and it was a matter of course that the Superintendent of Education should know French. But if we pass this law without that provision, the government of Manitoba may appoint a man who might not know one word of French. I think it would be very unjust to the population there for whom the law is intended, if it were not made part of the law.

Mr. LAVERGNE. We know that the large majority of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba are French-speaking people, and I do not see that it would prejudice any one to insert the provision that the superintendent must speak French. I would like to hear some serious reason against it. We are bound to make the matter safe, and this Bill will not prevent an Englishman or an Irishman getting the appointment, so long as he can speak French tolerably. I think the amendment ought to be insisted on.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. We go to the trouble of providing that the superintendent shall be a Catholic. It is just as necessary that he shall speak both languages. We provide in this House that the Deputy Speaker shall speak both languages, and as we are making a law that we cannot amend or alter, it is our bounden duty to see that all these matters are provided for.

Mr. DALY. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether there is any provision in the law of Ontario that the inspectors of separate schools shall teach both languages. In the eastern part of Ontario there are large French-speaking communities having French schools, and the inspector of those schools must necessarily speak both languages ; but there is nothing in the law providing that he must. I think it is ridiculous to suggest that the body that makes the appointment shall not see that the person appointed has that qualification. The hon gentleman is only quibbling.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I should like to hear one single reason for not putting it in the Bill. We are not providing for Ontario, but for Manitoba. That provision could be put in one line.

Mr. DICKEY. The only objection I have to it is that it is unnecessary. If you do that, you are logically obliged to provide for every other qualification. The question of the religious faith is another question altogether. It is a question of minority rights, which we have to provide for ; but the other is merely a question of qualification.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not absolutely essential that the superintendent shall speak both languages in the sense that he shall be educationally a qualified man. But if he did not speak French, he would not have the spirit that is essential ; he would not be in friendly touch with the schools in which the French language is taught. It seems to me, therefore, that there is a substantial reason for the amendment. If the Minister of Justice sees no objection to it, while a number of members, both English and French, think it is important, why not put it in ?

Mr. DICKEY. If the hon. gentlemen who made the other amendments would withdraw them, and mine were put, then the question of adding that he shall speak both English and French could be dealt with. I have no objection to it in the world, except, as I said before, that it is unnecessary.

Mr. RIDER. My amendment might be simply added to that of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. LANGELIER I am willing to withdraw my amendment, if that of the Minister of Justice is substantially the same.

The amendments of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). The question now is on the amendment of the hon. member for Stanstead to the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice.

The clause as proposed to be amended by the hon. Minister of Justice, shall read as follows :—

The Department of Education shall appoint a superintendent of separate schools who is a

Roman Catholic and who shall be the secretary of the board. If no appointment shall, within thirty days after notification by the board, be so made, the board shall appoint a superintendent, and such superintendent shall hold office during pleasure.

To this the hon. member for Stanstead moves in amendment:

That the words "speaking the French and English language" be added after the words "Roman Catholic."

Mr. McCARTHY. I see no necessity for this amendment. That is a matter that may be safely left to the board. They will surely appoint a superintendent who will speak such language and have such qualifications as may be necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that amendment should be added. It is well known that the hon. member for Simcoe does not believe in the dual language and that the government of Manitoba have abolished it. Therefore I think we should provide that the superintendent should be conversant with both languages, as he would then be better fitted for his work.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that this is carrying amendments to an absurdity. We might as well provide that he shall be able to read and write. Whatever qualifications may be necessary to a superintendent, the board will see that the man they appoint possesses them.

Mr. RIDER. What objection has the hon. gentleman to the superintendent being required to speak both languages?

Mr. SPROULE. I simply think it is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. RIDER. It does not harm them.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The very fact that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) insist on this qualification not being inserted is sufficient for me to insist on its being put in.

Mr. McNEILL. I think my hon. friend opposite might have spared us that observation. I wish to say that, in my opinion, it is reasonable and right that this amendment should be introduced. We are providing that the Department of Education do not make the appointment, it shall be made by the board, and the assumption is that the body whose duty it is to make the appointment may not perform that duty. In other words, the Board of Education may not be working in harmony with this Act; and if that be so, it might purposely appoint some one who was not qualified. There can be possibly no objection to the superintendent speaking both languages, and it seems to me very material that this amendment should be introduced.

Mr. McCARTHY. This is the first serious attempt to interfere with the rights of the minority in limiting the power of the board. In the old law there was no such limitation. I am here defending the rights of the minority by insisting that it shall be left to their discretion to appoint the kind of man they want.

The amendment of the Minister of Justice as amended by that of Mr. Rider, agreed to.

On section 8,

8. In addition to the duties specified in other clauses of this Act, it shall be the duty of the superintendent, and he is hereby empowered,—

(a.) To call all meetings of the board, and also to call any school meeting required to be held under this Act when the parties who are otherwise invested with the power to do so, either neglect or refuse to exercise it.

Mr. MARTIN. We have passed clause 7, which we have put into very good shape, after taking a great deal of pains, and I draw this reflection to the fact that we have been sitting continuously from three o'clock on Monday afternoon. I would like to know if we are to be compelled to sit here all tonight and all day to-morrow, or whether we shall be allowed to go home at a reasonable time. I do not feel inclined to go on working hard as we have been doing, and I think that the Government ought to inform us what course they intend taking.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I objected as strongly as any one at first to being compelled to sit from Monday morning until Saturday night, but now that we have got the work, as far as I am personally concerned. I desire that we should go on and see how far we can proceed.

Mr. MARTIN. I cannot accept the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You ought to.

Mr. MARTIN. It may be that I ought to, but I am the best judge of that myself. If there is an hon. member of this House who says that my request is not reasonable, I am willing to withdraw it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think there is no member on either side of the House, with the exception of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), who considers that the committee has made reasonable progress with the Bill. I am certain that the fair and wise suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Sutherland) will meet with universal concurrence on both sides of the House. It is not correct to say, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) does, that there has been any reasonable progress made with this Bill.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am another member of this committee who entirely agrees with the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). Had it not been for the manner in which the leader of the House has been trying to bulldoze the members by compelling them to stay here day and night, more progress would have been made. I charge the leader of the House with trying to defeat the object which he appears to have in view. If an answer is not given, I will join with the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), in moving that the committee rise.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We are not all such big patriots as the leader of the House, who says he is prepared to die in order to carry this Bill. If he is prepared to die himself, all right, but he has no right to require that every other member of the House should die to gratify his obstinacy.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Just one word. I hope it is not useless to recommend it now, but I would ask my hon. friends (Mr. Martin and Mr. Somerville), who perhaps had reason to speak as they have done, to help us to go on with the Bill for a few hours more, and about two or three o'clock in the morning, we will see what we will do. I hope then that the leader of the House will accept the proposition that the committee should rise then.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Let him give the promise now.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. We will see about that afterwards. We should proceed a little faster than we have done up to the present. It is not our fault on this side of the House, but it is useless to recriminate, and I ask my hon. friends to lend us their talents to give help for the minority.

Mr. BELLEY. Oh, oh.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Let us proceed with the consideration of the Bill for a few hours more.

Mr. McCARTHY. I really think that the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is not unreasonable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to see that meets with the approval of the leader of the House, and perhaps he will agree to it. The request would not be made, if it were an ordinary sitting, but we have been in session since Monday last, and, although it is quite true we have not made any progress——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes we have.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not very substantial progress. Nothing like the progress that would have been made, if we had sat during regular hours. For my part, I believe that this proceeding is bringing parliamentary institutions into contempt.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite agree with you.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is ridiculous to think that this measure should be proceeded with properly, when only one-third of the members are present at a time. I am willing to assist, so far as I can, in trying to make this very imperfect measure as good as it can be made. It is not too much to ask that an answer be given to the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to add my voice to the voice of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette), and ask that the committee should go on with this Bill for a few hours longer. I entertained the opinion that when the House met at the regular hour this afternoon, we should proceed with the Bill at once. But the debate at that time became intensely interesting, and it went on until six o'clock. I think we can very well go on with the Bill for a while longer, and I am quite sure that the Secretary of State will then allow the committee to rise.

Mr. MARTIN. We endeavoured to make what progress we could this afternoon. The Secretary of State refused to answer my question, and if he had stopped at that, there might be some reason in it. It was not in his nature to do so, and he had to make the gratuitous statement that I was the only member in this House that would ask the question I did. I think in the heart of every member in this House, with the exception of the leader, there was sympathy with my desire that we should adjourn at two o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MARTIN. It is the fault of the Government, and of the Secretary of State particularly, that we have not made more progress than we have done since Monday last. He started out on Monday with the threat that the House should sit until Saturday next.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, we all understood it so, and he divided his forces into two gangs. I moved that the committee rise at half-past four on Tuesday morning, because I was not then prepared to discuss an important clause, and that request was most reasonable. But the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Public Works told us that they were under instructions from the bulldozer of this House, the Secretary of State, not to allow the committee to rise until he got out of his bed, in which he was dying for the passage of this Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. member what he means by "bulldozing." Does he mean one who endeavours to restrain a man who acts like a bull in a china shop ?

Mr. MARTIN. No. But a man who thinks he has power to make men go in a direction they do not want to. That is a bulldozer, and that is what the hon. gentleman thinks he is. We tried to force the Government not to ask the House to sit at unreasonable hours.

Mr. NORTHRUP. And you have not succeeded very well.

Mr. MARTIN. We have succeeded in not allowing the House to do any work after two or three o'clock in the morning. I do not propose to ask the House to rise now, but I have a right to an answer from the Secretary of State.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Shall clause 8 be adopted.

Mr. MARTIN. No, I am not going to do it that way.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to endorse what has fallen from the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and from the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) suggested that, if we went on with the consideration of this Bill until two o'clock, there would be an adjournment. As the leader of the House did not controvert that statement, we may assume that it is his intention to comply with it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Why cannot he say so ?

Mr. McNEILL. We have good reason to assume that it is his intention, when he did not contradict the statement of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Mr. CAMPBELL. While I think there is a good deal in what the hon. member for Winnipeg said, I think it is too early to adjourn now, and we should go on with the Bill until two o'clock. I, for one, will object to proceeding after that.

Mr. DICKEY. The change made in the previous section renders some alteration necessary in paragraph (a) of section 8. After the word "board" I propose to add the words "and he shall call a meeting when thereunto required by any two members of the board," and after the last words in the subsection to add the words "or when no other provision therefor is made by the Act." There are some meetings provided for, and there is no method provided for calling them. Therefore I propose to add "or where no other provision is made by this Act." Then, there is no provision for calling meetings in the absence of the superintendent ; therefore, while it may not be necessary, it seems prudent to make some provision for that, and I propose to add at the end of the section, "in case there is no superintendent appointed, or in case of his absence or illness, meetings of the board may be called by two members of the board."

Mr. McCARTHY. I would suggest to my hon. friend if this is not very foolish legislation. Why should you attempt to lay down a code for every possible thing you can think of ? This is something that cannot be found in any other legislation. The difficulty will be that, with regard to anything you may omit, it will be said there is no provision, and there is no power to do it. If you leave it at large, the law, which is supposed to be reasonable, must be read in such a sense as to enable the clause to be made effective ; but when you provide for all these little contingencies, and some other contingency which has not been foreseen arises, the board will be paralysed. These provisions were not in the old law, and I do not see why you should put them in here. Surely, it is sufficient to say that he shall call meetings of the board if directed by the chairman. Why do you give power to two members to call meetings ? Do you suppose the chairman will not call a meeting when necessary ?

Mr. FRASER. I think the Minister of Justice is right. I can see that a difficulty might arise unless the clauses he proposes are added. They certainly would not affect the Act or prevent the board doing by law what they are empowered to do, although not specifically mentioned in the Act.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it will increase the chances of litigation.

Mr. FRASER. I should think the hon. gentleman would be glad of that. But I do not think the addition will add a law suit.

Mr. RIDER. I would like to inquire of the Minister of Justice if he has considered the desirability of having a fixed date for the meetings of the board.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think it is desirable.

Amendment of Mr. Dickey agreed to, and subsection "a" of section 8, as amended, agreed to.

On subsection "b," of section 8,

To have, as the executive officer of the board, the general supervision and direction of the schools, and of the inspectors that may from time to time be appointed ; and to have authority to take measures to enforce and carry into effect all the provisions of this Act, and the regulations issued under its authority that relate to the schools within their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. DICKEY. I propose to strike out the words "within their respective jurisdictions." That is from the old Act.

Mr. MARTIN. I object most strenuously to the latter part of this clause. The first part is all right ; but the latter part gives a power to the superintendent which is a power for the board, and was not given to the superintendent in Manitoba until 1884. That was given to the superintendent at that time, as a result of a tendency in Manitoba to accumulate power in the hands of the superintendent and to make him a kind of autocrat. I do not see why the superintendent should have that power. It is the business of the board to carry out the law.

This gives the superintendent authority apart from the board.

Mr. FRASER. Would this mean that he could enforce by litigation the provisions of this Act? If so, I think that would be a dangerous power to give him.

Mr. DICKEY. I think it simply means that the superintendent would be the motive force behind the board to keep everybody up to his duty—the executive officer of the board. But I think there is something in what the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) says in reference to making him an autocrat. Would this meet the view of the committee—to insert after the word "measures" the words "under the direction of the board?"

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me this is another instance of the difficulties created by not distinguishing between procedure and right. Suppose the local government were to undertake to provide for the administration of the law; you are not providing here alternative provisions, such as fall within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, but absolute provisions. Under subsection 2 of section 3, the Department of Education may make, from time to time, such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools. Under these regulations, they may impose certain duties on the superintendent, outside of any jurisdiction which the board may exercise. But by this amendment of the Minister of Justice, you propose to subject the superintendent to the authority of the board in everything he does, and may thus bring about a conflict between his duty to obey the directions of the board and his duty to carry out the regulations of the Department of Education. The very object of appointing a superintendent, independent of his being previously a member of the board, was to give him independent executive action otherwise there would be no object in giving him independent tenure of office. What do you accomplish by that, if you are going to authorize the board to overrule him with regard to matters of which he has a special knowledge. Take the case I have mentioned under subsection 2 of section 3. Suppose the Department of Education makes regulations imposing certain duties on the superintendent, are you going to make him, with respect to those regulations which are outside the functions of the board, a simple executive officer of the board to do as the board directs?

Mr. DALY. Under the law, as it stood in 1881, the superintendent had the general supervision and direction, but a trouble might arise that would necessitate immediate action by him. Under the law, he had not authority, of himself, to take that action without calling a meeting of the board, although by the time he would get the board together, it would be too late to take any action. The law was therefore amended by the provisions of the Act of 1884, which gave him authority to act immediately.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman is correct, the amendment of the Minister of Justice should not be pressed, because that only allows the superintendent to act under the direction of the board.

Mr. LANGELIER. The carrying out of the law will depend much more on the superintendent than on the board. It is not contemplated that all the members of the board shall be appointed from Winnipeg, where the board meets, and as there is no provision for their travelling expenses, it is not at all likely that the board will meet more than twice a year. If you do not give power to the superintendent to take independent action, and the board only meets twice a year, you will practically stop the working of the law. Of course, he should be subject to the control of the Department of Education. He should have independent action subject to that control.

Mr. DICKEY. How would it do to compromise the matter by adding the words "under the general direction of the board"? I move that those words be added, and I withdraw my previous amendment.

Amendment agreed to, and subsection "b," as amended, agreed to.

(c.) To give such explanations of the provisions of this or any other School Act, and of the regulations and decisions of the board, as may be required and to enforce the same.

Mr. LANGELIER. To whom is he to give these explanations? The section is meaningless.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This subsection is a fragment of the old School Act of Upper Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. A survival of the fittest.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, but without the necessary associations to make it intelligible. It was provided in that Act that the superintendent should give explanations and instructions to trustees, school teachers, and other subordinate authorities. In this matter the hon. gentleman should provide that he has to give such explanations to school trustees, teachers, and inspectors.

Mr. FRASER. This section provides that not only shall he give explanations, but he shall enforce the same. Is he to enforce his own explanations? If that means anything, it means that his explanations of the law are to have the authority of the law.

Mr. DICKEY. Strike out the words "and to enforce the same."

Mr. MARTIN. Why should he be empowered to give such explanations of the provisions of the Act as may be required. He would do that naturally.

Mr. DALY. This makes it compulsory.

Mr. MARTIN. Then the school trustee or teacher who obtained his explanation of a provision of the Act would be bound by that. We do not want to give any such power or place any such authority in his hands. It would be his duty to answer all letters and give explanations, but when you put in the statute a provision of this kind, it looks as if you were delegating to him the power of putting a construction on the different clauses.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. MARTIN. Do you wish the superintendent to make uniformity by giving him the right to decide what is the law ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is a particular provision of the old law of Upper Canada, which bound the superintendent to give explanations to school trustees and others, but in this Bill the clause is meaningless, because it does not say to whom he is to give these explanations.

Amendment (Mr. Dickey) agreed to.

On section 8, subsection (d),

> To prepare during the first term of the school year a report to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council upon all the schools under his supervision for the previous school year, accompanied with full statistical tables, showing among other things, the number of children of school age in each district, as shown by the census returns for that year, the number who have attended school and the average attendance as shown by the semi-annual returns of the different teachers, and such report shall also contain a statement of the receipts and expenditure of all government money furnished to the board for school purposes, a copy of such tables, statements and returns to be presented to the board and to be retained of record by the board.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I move that on the 41st line, before the word "separate school," shall be inserted before the word "district."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DICKEY. I move that the words "Roman Catholic" be inserted before the word "children" on the 41st line.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McLEOD moved that the words "during the first term of the school year" on the first line be struck out and replaced by the words "annually."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MULOCK. I would suggest that in line 45, before the word "statement," the word "detailed" be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think that in line 44, after the word "teachers," should be inserted the words "the number of days during which the school has been kept open."

Amendment agreed to ; section, as amended, agreed to.

FRIDAY, 10th April, 1896.

On subsection (c) of section 5,

Mr. DICKEY. Perhaps the committee will now allow me to go back to subsection (c) of section 5, the troublesome section about school books.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think we ought to have that printed, because it is an important clause.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was all settled except a single line.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think so. When I was last in the committee, that is, before I was driven out by fatigue, I moved an amendment, which stood over, and I understood that the Minister of Justice was going to frame a comprehensive amendment embracing that.

Mr. DICKEY. I have done so. This from the first has been a clause of very great difficulty, and some observations have been made in reference to the number of changes which the Government had agreed to in it. I do not think that was altogether justifiable, because the desire of the Government in a very difficult matter like this is to meet the wishes of the committee as far as they consistently can. Since the committee sat before, I have considered this matter very carefully. It was decided that the clause should read something like this :

> To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control ; provided, however, that no book, map or globe shall be selected, other than books relating to religion and morals, unless such book, map or globe has been authorized for use in the high or public schools of the province of Manitoba.

And it stopped there. It was pointed out that that made no provision for books in the French language, and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) moved an amendment that was intended to deal with that question. There is also before the Chair a suggestion of the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Frémont), which leaves the clause as it was before, that is, gives the Board of Education absolute authority to choose any books they like without any restriction, and gives the clergy the right to settle the books on morals and religion. Now, I have looked the whole subject over, and I want to make a suggestion to the committee. Seeing that this board is a Catholic board, I do not think it is necessary to appeal to the ecclesiastical authorities to settle the books on religion and morals. If you add to the clause the power to select French books, you will practically give the board almost indefinite range. I think it would be better to go back to the old clause and simply authorize them to select the books to be used in the schools, adding to that the proviso that the books they choose shall be equal to the standard of the books used in the public schools in Manitoba.

Mr. MARTIN. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. DICKEY. That, of course, is the great difficulty—who is to say that they are of the same standard ? That is technically a difficulty ; but I think it would be of great service to set up a standard for the board, which any single member of the board could insist on being observed.

Mr. MULOCK. How ?

Mr. DICKEY. Morally, I mean. Any member of the board could morally insist on the board observing that standard.

Mr. MULOCK. Suppose the majority did not agree with him in his judgment as to the standard ?

Mr. DICKEY. I do not mean to say that you should decide fine shades of judgment ; but it would prevent any serious weakness in the system by an efficient selection of books. The amendment I propose has these two features : striking out the ecclesiastical control with regard to books on morals and religion, and giving the board absolute control of the books ; but, on the other hand, fixing a standard up to which the board will be required to work. Now, the board is appointed by the provincial government. It is a board that I presume will want these schools to work properly ; and when we fix a statutory standard, I think we are going a long way to secure an efficient system of books for the separate schools. Of course, I would be very glad to hear discussion on the question ; but this seems to be about as practical a way out of the difficulties that surround it as any.

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not for myself accept the whole of the amendment. I am not prepared to differ in opinion with the Minister of Justice as to it being unnecessary to leave the selection of books on religion and morals to the clergy. As he says, the board will be composed of Roman Catholics, and I suppose it is expected that some important ecclesiastics will be on that board. Another strong objection to this proposed amendment is that it will be very humiliating to the Roman Catholic minority. Why should they be put in an inferior position to the Protestant majority ? They will be subject to the ruling of the Protestant majority as to the books to be used.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, only as to the standard.

Mr. LANGELIER. Suppose we had to make a law for the Protestant majority, would we not think it a humiliation to them to say that the standard of books for that majority shall be determined by the representatives of the Roman Catholic minority ? I do not admit that the standard of the books to be used in the schools should be determined by one section of the community for the other section. Each section must be supposed to understand its own requirements better than the other section. Then, who is going to be the judge whether the books selected are up to the standard or not ? It is quite possible that the representatives of the Roman Catholic minority might claim that the books they had selected were superior to the books selected by the Protestant majority ; why should the Protestant majority overrule their judgment ? This amendment is against every principle involved in this Bill, which recognizes that the Catholic minority have an independent existence. This would leave them dependent on a Protestant majority in regard to the most important question of all—the selection of books. If we adopt the amendment suggested by the Minister of Justice, we might as well not give the Catholic minority separate schools at all.

Mr. McCARTHY. What the Minister of Justice proposes to do we are unable to do. We have already adopted the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), and all we have to do is to add to that or leave it alone ; we cannot amend or repeal it. Is that not so, Mr. Chairman ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is so.

Mr. McCARTHY. I propose to meet the difficulty suggested by the hon. member for Provencher by proposing the adoption of a bilingual series. I did so because I found that in this province the teaching of English in the French schools was most inefficient.

Mr. LANGELIER. I was present when we discussed that question. The amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland was accepted by the Government and voted upon rather hastily, and just after it had been accepted by the committee, I objected to it on the ground that there were no French books at all used in the Manitoba schools, and a number of other members rose to endorse my objection. I understood then that the hon. Minister of Justice obtained the consent of the committee to allow the clause and the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland to stand over in order that he might consider the question and prepare a new clause.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question before the committee is the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe, namely :

That in districts where any large number of the pupils attending separate schools do not understand English, but speak French or a foreign tongue, the books and maps, shall, as far as practicable, be bi-lingual in the English or French or foreign language spoken by the pupils, with the object of teaching the English language in the most effective way.

Mr. LANGELIER. I understood that the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland, although accepted, would be reconsidered, and we would be at liberty to proceed as if that amendment had not been carried.

Mr. DICKEY. As far as the question of order is concerned, I thought that the committee had given me authority to look into the whole question and submit a new clause, but in view of the legal position which the hon. member for Simcoe has assumed, I have a suggestion to make, if he persists in that position. But it seems to me that it would be better for the committee to reconsider the whole clause.

Mr. McCARTHY. I cannot consent to that. It would not be fair to those gentlemen who were present the other night and took part in the discussion and who are not here now.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I object to the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I do not wish to abridge the rights of the Catholic minority. The Manitoba Catholics prior to the law of 1890, enjoyed the right and privilege of selecting their own books. A little while ago there came up a matter of much greater importance, as it involved the qualifications of the superintendent of the separate schools, as to whether that officer should be conversant with both languages, and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) objected to it on the ground that it was a matter that might be safely left to the board, as that body would have sense enough to appoint a man having the proper qualifications to discharge the duties of that office. If the hon. member still holds the same view, he must grant that the members of the separate school board in the province of Manitoba will be intelligent enough to provide those schools with such books as may be required to teach the children their vernacular language. It is to be presumed that when a scholar speaks neither the French nor the English language, or when speaking German, he knows neither French nor English, the trustees or the members of the Board of Education will oblige the teachers to teach those children in their mother tongue. In my opinion, the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would greatly impair the privileges enjoyed by the minority prior to 1890. I think we ought to leave it with the Board of Education that shall be appointed to make the selection of such books as may be required, unless we take it as granted that that board will be composed of men unable to select such books, or that they upon whom that appointment rests will appoint incompetent men. I presume that those who shall appoint the members of the educational board will be intelligent enough to appoint men competent to make the selection of suitable books, otherwise they should not be appointed nor entrusted with the educational interests of the children of the minority. Otherwise the appointment of the members of the Board of Education should be made by the Governor General in Council. But I presume that those appointments will be made judiciously, either by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council or by the Governor General in Council, and that the members of that board may be safely entrusted with the exclusive right of selecting school books for the children of the minority. As to the choice of books on history and relating to morals and religion, as the board will exclusively be composed of Roman Catholics, and they will have the right to select text-books, they will not presumably select books containing anything hostile to the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church. As stated by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), it would be an insult offered to the Catholic minority, and putting a stigma on the intelligence of the board, were we to limit it in the choice of books. I hope that the hon. leader of the House will not allow the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe to be adopted, and I beg the committee, Mr. Chairman, not to place the Catholic minority of Manitoba in an inferior position to the Protestant majority of that province. We ought, therefore, to enact that the Board of Education shall administer the schools of the minority, and have exclusively the choice of books. Why should the minority be bound to the choice made by the representatives of the majority ? Why not leave the separate school board free if they choose to go and buy their books in England, where are to be found the best French and English translations ; for it is a well known fact that in England, they study French much better than in Manitoba.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman would let the Minister of Justice state his amendment, he would find that perhaps it would meet his views.

Mr. DICKEY. From what the Deputy Speaker has stated I am afraid that we are prevented from going back to the clause as it originally stood, and must accept the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland. The only thing we can do is to build up on the clause as it now stands. The hon. member for Simcoe has proposed an amendment which does not meet the case at all. I stated my objections to it the other night. The only thing I can propose is this. Under the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland, which was carried, the books are to be chosen from those in use in the public schools in Manitoba, with the exception of books on history, religion and morals. We are bound up to that point. The only thing I can suggest is to add to the clause as amended :

Or is now or shall hereafter be in use in any of the public or separate schools of any province of the Dominion.

That gives the board a range over the Dominion to choose its books.

Mr. LANGELIER. I understood the other day that with the unanimous consent of the committee, the whole of subsection C was to stand over for reconsideration and that the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland which had been adopted too hastily, had been set aside. Having that in view, I had prepared a motion to substitute a clause for subsection C as follows :—

To select all the books, maps and globes which may be exclusively used in the schools, with the exception of books on morals and religion, which books shall be exclusively selected by the competent religious authority.

This restores the law as it was before 1890.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The only thing left over the other day was the question of language.

Mr. LANGELIER. Twelve members at least, on the other side, got up when I pointed out the effect of the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland, to protest against it. The amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice does not take away the objection, because it still puts a stigma on the intelligence of the board that is to be appointed. By this amendment, we declare that we do not consider the board will be intelligent enough to make a good selection.

Mr. MARTIN. Are you satisfied with the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland ?

Mr. DUPONT. No, I wish to give them the choice of their books. Let them go to England if they like, because there they would have a better choice of good books in different languages than we have in Manitoba or Ontario or perhaps even than in Quebec.

Mr. DEPUTY CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland was carried the other day, and we cannot undo it without the consent of the whole committee. The only amendment for the committee now is the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I understood that the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) had not been adopted the other day. If, on the contrary, it was adopted, I think we should, with the unanimous consent of the committee, frame a new clause, and make up for the error committed the other day when voting rather hastily upon the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland. As it has been evinced that there exists a better mode for the minority to select their books, we should not hesitate to take the course suggested. I hope the committee will not ground itself on the fact that the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland has been adopted, to decline accepting a better mode of settling that troublesome point, and granting the minority the exclusive right to the choice of their books.

Mr. LANGELIER. Suppose a man in Manitoba writes a good book on the subject of education, the public school board would not be at liberty to accept it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes they will.

Mr. LANGELIER. No, their selection is limited to books already selected in other provinces. I object to that. I say it is putting a stigma on the intelligence of the separate board.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Let us hear you read the amendment of the Minister of Justice, together with the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell).

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It reads as follows :—

To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control ; provided, however, that no book, map or globe other than books in history, morals or religion shall be selected, unless such book, map or globe has been authorized for use either in the high schools or public schools of the province of Manitoba, or is now or shall hereafter be in use in any of the public or separate schools of any province of the Dominion.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I think that is fair.

Mr. LANGELIER. It is not fair at all. Why should the board in Manitoba have less authority than they have in Quebec, or less authority than the Protestants in Manitoba. That is putting the Roman Catholic minority in the position of inferiority.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LANGELIER. If those who represent the Manitoba minority in this House agree to that, let them take the responsibility ; I will not agree to it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. We ought not to stop on any mere question of sentiment. I would rather that the contention of the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) should be carried out, but, at the same time, on a mere question of sentiment, I do not think it would be wise on our part to insist that this suggestion of the Minister of Justice, which is a fair one, should be refused. We have all to give and take in this matter, and when there is no question of principle involved, I do not think we should retard the progress of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Is not the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Langelier) impracticable ? Suppose some person in Manitoba should write an excellent set of books for the Manitoba schools, you must remember that you have a small number of Catholic children attending the separate schools in that province, and it would be economically impossible to write and print a suitable series of school books for the limited use there. When you have a large range of books to select from in the great educattional provinces in the Dominion, you will get them at a very much cheaper price. It is a sentimental idea but it is not practicable. It does not relieve the Manitoba minority, because, make them as intelligent as you like, they are not more intelligent than the Catholic majority in Quebec, or the Catholic minority in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. They would not be able to get any higher standards than these.

Mr. LANGELIER. I admit the Manitoba minority are intelligent, and that is the reason I would put them on the same par with the other provinces. We would look upon it as an insult in Quebec if our selection of books were confined by law to the selection made by other provinces. If the minority of Manitoba does not take it as an insult, I would take it as an insult if it were applied to the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman (Mr. LaRivière) may say this is a question of feeling. Well, this law is more a question of feeling than anything else.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGELIER. Nine-tenths of this law may be very well left out, if we are not going on a question of feeling; but these are feelings that deserve to be respected. If the Manitoba minority have any self-respect they should not accept such a humiliating law as this.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Nonsense.

Mr. LANGELIER. The Minister of Finance says that the Catholic population in Manitoba is very small. He must remember that we are making this law for ever, and does he expect that the Roman Catholic population of Manitoba will not increase. One hundred years ago the French population of Quebec was only 65,000, but it is now 1,500,000. Even at the present time, why should not the Manitoba minority be at liberty to select books published in France or in England, where splendid educational works are published. It would be just as well for them to have no separate schools at all, if you deprive them of their most important privilege, namely, the selection of their school books.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Although I would rather that the amendment of my hon. friend from Quebec County (Mr. Frémont) were carried out, I shall, however, accept that moved by the Minister of Justice, as it is impossible to undo what was done the other day by the committee, or to correct the amendment and make it clearer. I accept the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice as a compromise. I consider that in adopting the amendment of the hon. Minister, I give up none of the rights of the minority. I am sorry that we can no longer undo the amendment carried through the other day and which limits our rights to change the clause; otherwise, I would strongly insist, with the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) that the separate school board be left untrammelled in the choice of their school books as also in that of books concerning religion, history and morals. As I already stated, if we cannot undo what has been too hastily done by the committee, I accept the proposition of the hon. Minister of Justice as a compromise, as I believe that under the circumstances, that is the best course to pursue.

Mr. MARTIN. As a Manitoban, I say that the limitation of the selection of books to those published in other provinces would not be agreeable to the Roman Catholic people of Manitoba, or to any one else. That principle was decided by the committee the other night by a large majority, but the Minister of Justice now proposes to reinstate it in the Bill. I would suggest that since we are bound by the amendment of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) that these words be added:

> But the said board may select such French books as may be required.

There is no objection to their selecting Ontario or Quebec books, but why confine them to these books.

Mr. McCARTHY. My objection goes much deeper than that of my hon. friend (Mr. Martin). It must be remembered that the separate schools, prior to 1890, were very inefficient in every respect. That is admitted.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That never was admitted.

Mr. McCARTHY. If it is disputed by the hon. member (Mr. LaRivière) I will assert it to be an indisputable fact. The text-books that were used in the separate schools then were those in use in the province of Quebec.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not all.

Mr. McCARTHY. Practically all. My hon. friend (Mr. Martin) will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. MARTIN. I would not like to corroborate the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McCARTHY. So I have been informed.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Even if they were the Quebec books, they would be good.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think so.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You do not know much about them. I have studied these books and I am just as good as you are.

Mr. McCARTHY. You can have your own opinion about that, and I will have mine.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Yes, and I suppose I am entitled to my own opinion.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Government in the by-elections have pledged themselves to make the teaching efficient in these separate schools, and amongst other things they promised that the books used should be efficient. The hon. member for Winnipeg says this amendment would be humiliating to the province of Manitoba. I agree with him in that, if they are forced to go to other provinces to get their books. This is an extraordinary proposition when we come to understand that there is no standerd of text books in the separate schools of Ontario, and that evey separate school can use its own set of books. The Department of Education is trying to get the separate schools to use the same books, but as Sir Oliver Mowat explained, there is no power to compel that.

Mr. GILLIES. There is a series of books recognized by the educational authorities of Ontario called the La Salle series. The hon. gentleman is quite right, when he says there is no legal authority to compel their use.

Mr. McCARTHY. You cannot go to Ontario to find out what are the books in use in separate schools because there is no uniformity. What we objected to the other night by a very large vote is now proposed to be attained in a more offensive way. Instead of saying that the books shall be equal to the books used in the separate schools of Ontario, the amendment says that they shall be equal to those used in any province. Instead of making a pretense of securing efficiency, we had better leave the matter absolutely to the board. The policy of the Government when they came down with their Bill was to make these schools efficient. They had abandoned that, and we are now asked to undo what we did the other night. There are no separate schools in any province of the Dominion except Ontario: but we struck those words out, and now it is proposed to put in the same words in a different way.

Mr. DUPONT. We have separate schools in Quebec.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, you have dissentient schools. This provision is practically to nullify the whole section. What I submit is the proper way to deal with this subject is to say that the books in secular subjects in use in Manitoba should be the books for the separate schools; and the books on religion and morals and history, you may if you like leave to the discretion of the Board of Education.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for Quebec Centre has an amendment which I prefer to my own.

Mr. LANGELIER. I propose to add that at the end "or books published in any country." The object of this, I may say frankly, is to give full power to the board to select any books they think proper.

Amendment of Mr. Dickey agreed to; amendment of Mr. Langelier agreed to; subsection "c" of section 4, agreed to; and section 4 agreed to.

On section 9,

In case of temporary absence of the superintendent, he may, with the sanction of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, or of the board, appoint a member of the board to act for him.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I propose that the words "or illness," be added after the word "absence."

Mr. DALY. There is a more important amendment than that. The words "Lieutenant-Governor in council" must be struck out and the words "Department of Education" inserted instead, to meet the change made in section 7.

Mr. MARTIN. I think, anyway, the superintendent should not have the power to appoint a man to act in his place.

Mr. DALY. I am quite satisfied to strike it out.

Section 9 struck out.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would ask the hon. Secretary of State whether he does not think it is about time the committee should rise. It is now half-past one, and we have been sitting here since half-past eight. No person can pretend that we have not made satisfactory progress, but it is utterly impossible to go on working night and day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I fully appreciate the concessions of the committee tonight and the great assistance we have received in making progress with the Bill, and I only wish it were possible to meet the views expressed by the hon. gentleman; but if any one will take the trouble to look at the portion of the Bill which has been passed, and compare that with the time spent in passing it, and with the balance remaining to be passed, he will see that it is absolutely impossible to hope to carry the Bill through unless by continuous sittings. That is the condition of public business which makes it impossible to adjourn the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would like to say, with all deference to the hon. leader of the House, that many of us expressed our opinion in the early stages of this Bill that it was hardly right and proper to ask us to sit from Monday afternoon until midnight on Saturday without rising, and we advanced then the suggestion that perhaps that was not the best way to make progress. I think the House will bear me out that, so far as I am personally concerned, I have endeavoured to have the Bill advanced and properly discussed, but I am sure it is unreasonable to expect that hon. gentlemen can sit in the House continuously and be in a position to properly consider the clauses.

It is hardly reasonable to expect that those who are determinedly opposed to the Bill, and think it their duty to be present while it is under consideration should remain here continuously, and I am satisfied that had the suggestion from this side been accepted, and had we sat not later than two or three hours after the usual hour for adjourning, instead of nine or ten clauses of the Bill being passed, we would probably have passed some sixty or seventy. In justice to the members of the House and the dignity of Parliament, it is unfair to ask us to remain in continuous session, and the hon. leader of the House can hardly expect that those who are opposed to the Bill will go on discussing it after the proper hour to adjourn has been reached.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No hon. member ought to be determinedly opposed to the Bill. The hon. member for Simcoe expressed his earnest desire to go on and perfect it. So far from obstructing it, he expressed his desire to perfect it. Under those circumstances, no hon. gentleman should be determined to obstruct it. It is perfectly obvious that if the attention the Government has given to the measure had been responded to by the committee other nights, as it has been to-night, the Bill would have been through by this and sent to the Senate. It is because the only chance, in the present position of the Bill, of getting it through is to continually proceed with it, until some substantial progress is made, that I cannot accede to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I may have been wrong in the language I used as to determined opposition. I did not mean to say that any one desired to improperly obstruct the Bill, but that there were members in this House who were strongly opposed to it, and would offer opposition to it at every stage. The hon. leader of the House must remember that we differ in our opinions. He has expressed his opinion from the first that the discussion was fractious and for obstructive purposes, but there are a number of hon. gentlemen in the House who do not agree with him, and they are entitled to their opinions. There are hon. gentlemen who take a part in the discussion of the Bill on both sides who are in favour of its passing, and it is not fair to charge them with obstruction.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not speaking of the Opposition proper.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In my opinion, if the hon. gentleman had listened to the suggestion of those at least who are inclined to be friendly and to carry on business in a parliamentary way, the result would have been different. If he persists in his course, I have not the slightest doubt but that he will meet with the same opposition that he did when his proposition was first made.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. It is not very late yet, and, for my part, I am willing to wait a little longer. But surely the hon. leader of the House must be in a position to say how long he intends us to sit. If he will allow the committee to rise at half-past two or three, he will gain much more than by persisting in going on. We are willing to help the Government to pass this Bill, but are not willing to go so far as to consent to be kept here all day and night.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to call attention to the fact that when the hon. member for Queen's suggested that the committee should rise at two o'clock, and the hon. leader of the House did not object, the inference, as the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has said to be drawn from the fact that the suggestion of the hon. member for Queen's was not objected to by the hon. leader of the House, is that the hon. gentleman gave a distinct pledge that this House shall rise at the hour named. In departing from that, the hon. Secretary of State was guilty of a most gross breach of faith.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the hon. leader of the House was not willing to accept the proposition of the hon. member for Queen's, he ought to have said so at the time; and when he did not, he practically accepted the suggestion. If he now repudiates it, it is a gross breach of faith worthy of the hon. gentleman, and which no other hon. member of the House would be guilty of.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) It strikes me that the hon. gentlemen who are asking the committee to rise are the very men who have systematically obstructed the business of the House this week. They have wasted two nights, spinning irrelevent yarns, talking incoherent nonsense, and they feel too exhausted to go on discussing the Bill. When they are here, they prevent us from making progress, and when they are absent, we see our way to proceed with the work and to make satisfactory progress. For my part, Mr. Chairman, I am ready to work. I am one of the few who have been found here through the night, all this week. I have been in this House from three in the afternoon till three in the morning, and I know who those are who have been present. It is the first time that I see so many French Liberals in the House at this late hour of the night. I think they should stay here till seven or eight o'clock and lend their exertions in support of this Bill. We might thus be enabled to extricate ourselves from the difficulties which confront us. As the French Liberals, by their absence, have encouraged the opponents of the Bill in their policy of obstruction, they should now at least lend us their assistance in making progress with the Bill. Let the Government beware being caught in the trap set for them.

It is notorious that the French Liberals are bent upon preventing this Bill passing ; that is a well known fact, both in this House and out of it ; and should we now refuse going on with this Bill, the Liberal papers would cry out : See how the Government are gulling the Catholics ! They had given a distinct pledge that they would proceed with the business till the end of the week was reached, and instead of going on with the business, they have adjourned the committee. Should the committee now rise, do you fancy that at three o'clock this afternoon, the House will go into committee ? We are not innocent to the point of believing that. No, a lot of questions will be put, objections will be raised, and I venture now to tell the committee that no progress is likely to be made at the sitting of the House this afternoon, nor at the sitting on Saturday, Monday, or on Tuesday next. Such is the position in which we find ourselves. We, on this side of the House, have been sitting here day and night, but we want no rest. The hon. gentlemen opposite have been away all week ; let them now sit through the night, in their turn.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Some hon. gentlemen say no, no. I am not to be imposed upon by their denials. Was the hon. member for Lotbinière here last night ? I was here all through the night and I know whereof I speak. Did the hon. member for Montmagny sit all through the night with us ? No.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I stayed here, and I even voted at one o'clock.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) And after the vote was taken ?

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) I was here.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) You were not in the House ; you were probably in the smoking room or somewhere else. Of all the French Liberals only three, the hon, members for Dorchester (Mr. Vaillancourt), for Quebec (Mr. Frémont), and for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) have been here since the beginning of the week.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Where were the hon. Postmaster General (Sir A. P. Caron), and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) ? Did they remain here continuously ?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Those hon. Ministers have remained with us through the night sittings. They have done all in their power to defeat the obstructive methods resorted to by the Opposition. These hon. gentlemen opposite who have slept well this week can afford to be here and sit all night with us. What is now going on here I look upon as a game of " bluff." The hon. gentlemen opposite begin to realize that public feeling in the province of Quebec is running high, since by voting against the second reading of the Bill, they have so shamefully betrayed the interests of their co-religionists in Manitoba. And public feeling is running still higher, and public indignation knows no bounds, now that the people understand that, not satisfied with trying to kill the Bill upon its second reading, the hon. gentlemen opposite are now bent upon killing it in committee, by their dishonest, shameful and unconstitutional obstruction ; and fully realizing that, the hon. gentlemen now ask us to adjourn the committee. All they wish is to gain time. Well, Sir, let them work now, and do like us ; we are not here to sleep but to go on and do business. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) last Saturday voted for the motion that the House rise, because he wanted to take an airing and go home. The country expects us to work, and we are not sent here to lose our time. We have an important problem to solve. The Bill under consideration will give us plenty work for several days yet, even supposing that business should not be obstructed. I think it is our duty to go on and make progress. The province of Quebec expects us to continually proceed with the work, until some substantial propress is made.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Chairman, while I was out, a few moments ago, I heard that the leader of the House declared that he was of opinion that we should proceed with the work until we reached the end of this week. I met the hon. gentleman on my way back to the chamber.

Mr. MARTIN. On his way to bed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not inquire about that from the hon. the Secretary of State. I mentioned to the hon. gentleman, that, instead of going on discussing, as we have done, for two or three nights, we might perhaps for this night take up such portions of the Bill as could be passed without any great objection, and reserve the sections on which there would be great differences of opinion for consideration during the day, to-morrow. The leader of the House authorized me to say that he certainly would be of that opinion, as he thought we would make a great deal of progress and attain the object we all have in view—at all events, those of us who are in favour of the Bill—to finish the work we have undertaken, and not lose more time. Under those circumstances, I offer the suggestion to the committee. I think we will better meet the views of the country and of the House, as a whole, by proceeding with the measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have a great number of clauses that we could go through during the night, and then take up the clauses that are subject to discussion to-morrow.

Mr. WELSH. Thank you for nothing.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman (Sir Hector Langevin) offers this suggestion in the proper spirit, but, coming from the leader of the House, it is the most ridiculous proposition that could be made. Our grievance is that our endurance won't last for ever, and, as we have worked hard with the Bill to-night, we have asked the committee to rise. Who is going to say what clauses are important and what clauses are not ?

Mr. FRASER. That is a fine proposition ; take the easy sections at night and the hard ones in the morning.

Mr. MARTIN. If, by working day and night, we would advance the Bill, there might be something in the proposition, but every one knows that is the very worst way to make progress. It was understood that the Secretary of State tacitly gave a promise to rise at two o'clock, and it is my view that no more business should be done between this and the regular hour for the meeting of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MARTIN. We have shown our willingness to do business.

Some hon. MEMBERS. When ?

Mr. MARTIN. From three o'clock this afternoon until two this morning.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. You have showed your willingness to make obstruction since three o'clock last Monday. You have spoken a hundred times.

Mr. MARTIN. I deny that there was obstruction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Nonsense.

Mr. MARTIN. We discussed the Bill from three on Monday until half-past four on Tuesday morning. We are not obstructing the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MARTIN. We are obstructing the determination of the Government to make us sit here unreasonable hours.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. It is utterly impossible for us to properly discuss the Bill at this hour. This unseemly sitting up all night is a concession made to the Conservative supporters in the province of Quebec and in order to make political capital out of it. I defy any reasonable man in the province of Quebec or elsewhere to say that we are obstructing the Bill, when we have given it every consideration up to this hour in the morning.

Mr. McNEILL. I should apologize to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), because at an earlier stage of the proceedings I suggested that we should go on discussing the Bill at that time. I was beguiled into the belief that the intention of the Government was that the committe should rise about two o'clock.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You are very innocent.

Mr. McNEILL. I certainly understood that, when the Secretary of State did not contradict the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). That is not a question of obstructing this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, not at all.

Mr. McNEILL. Any one who desires to be fair, must say that there was a proper discussion on the Bill to-night.

Mr. GIROUARD. Indeed.

Mr. FRASER. I have brought to-night to the discussion of this Bill the best power that I am possessed of.

Mr. GIROUARD. Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman may say "oh, oh," who has never given a suggestion with regard to the Bill, and who does nothing else but obstruct.

Mr. GIROUARD. I did not waste time talking for two hours, like you did yesterday.

Mr. FRASER. Some hon. gentlemen come here and do nothing but shout and some of them have never read the Bill. Some of them cannot read it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FRASER. These are the men who are obstructing the Bill. Every suggestion that I have made has been in the direction of perfecting that Bill. It was presented to the House like a scrap-book, and, if it were sent before a court of judges in that shape, I would be ashamed of the Parliament of Canada. Did any one ever hear anything like the childlike suggestion that was made by the ex-Minister of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin) ? To take up the easy sections when we are sleepy at night, and tomorrow to go on with the hard sections. Who is going to tell us which are the easy sections and which are the hard ones.

Mr. FOSTER. They are all easy.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman would swallow anything that looks easy, if he thinks it would have a political effect. I suppose there would have to be a committee appointed to find out the easy sections, and then we could say : Oh, Jack, go to bed, this is an easy section, but we will have a hard one for you when you get up in the morning.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I must rise to a point of order. We are supposed to be very respectful to each other in this House, but my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) pointed his right hand to my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and said : Oh, Jack, you go to bed.

Mr. FRASER. There would be some point in that, if I had said : See here, Dick, you go to bed.

Mr. IVES. The same thing applies to the whole lot of you.

Mr. FRASER. Or if I called him Buffalo Bill, or Texas Jack.

Mr. IVES. You were not referring to Jumbo, I suppose.

Mr. FRASER. No, I was referring to a Bullock, and not to a Jumbo. I say that the suggestion made by the leader of the House, through the hon. gentleman (Sir Hector Langevin), is most ridiculous.

We are asked by the ex-Minister, in his gentle, child-like, bland way to take the easy sections and leave the difficult ones. I suppose we are to take the sections with the easiest words, as children do in school. What is an easy section ? I suppose no section with any word of more than two syllables could be struggled with to-night. Another way to get at the easy sections would be to count the lines. What criterion are you going to apply ? N.B.—Sections 8, 15, and 28 are night-shift sections ; sections 80 and 95 are day sections ; prepare for the night sections and the day sections ; night sections to be taken up after two o'clock ; and the section will be graded, so that as the House grows drowsy, they will grow easier until when the gray dawn comes, the section we are dealing with will get so easy that we will not know it is a section at all. This is a proposition to be made by a government, isn't it ? Fancy a number of statesmen sitting down in a drowsy attitude to find out which are the easy and which the difficult sections. Did any one ever hear such a thing in a Parliament of free men ? I did think that after eight hours of close attention to this Bill, we might have been allowed one square night's rest. Have we not had an example to-night of the progress that would be made with this Bill under fair treatment of the House ? If the good sense exhibited by the Government to-night had been exhibited from the time this Bill was introduced, it would have been through now. Was there a disposition to-night to obstruct the Bill ?

Mr. IVES. Yes.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman who was not here says there was.

Mr. IVES. I judge that the passing of two clauses from eight to two is obstruction.

Mr. FRASER. Indeed ? Passing the clauses from 6 to 8, and going back and passing one of the most important sections of the Bill, is obstruction. We are not to say anything, because anything we say is obstruction. Under the circumstances, I submit that the Government are not helping the end they profess to have in view by this conduct. Not very long ago the aged and astute politician who leads this House said he was ready to die for this measure. Did he show that he was ready to die by staying here ? No, but every night he goes off to his comfortable couch.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is very small potatoes for so big a man as you.

Mr. FRASER. A hale and healthy man going to bed does not indicate his desire to die.

Mr. FERGUSON. You will not die in your bed.

Mr. FRASER. No, I will not die in bed, because I will never have you to attend me.

Mr. DALY. I do not wish to interrupt the speaker, but I would point out that clause 10 of this Bill is before the Chair.

Mr. FRASER. I was speaking of the necessity of adjourning.

Mr. DALY. You cannot discuss that under clause 10.

Mr. FRASER. Then I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I rise to a point of order. The standing orders of this House, adopted on the 10th of February, 1885, provide :

> That the member elected to serve as Deputy Speaker and Chairman of Committees shall be required to possess the full and practical knowledge of the language which is not that of the Speaker for the time being.

Now, we all know that the Speaker who presides over this House does not speak French ; and if the Chairman of this committee does not speak French, this committee is not properly constituted.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Last night, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) moved an amendment exactly similar to that proposed by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I say, Mr. Chairman, that all this is done with a view to prevent us making any progress with the consideration of this Bill. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) is well aware that the English language is used most of the time in committee during this debate, and the motion he moves is with a view to prevent the committee going on with the Bill now under consideration. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) is not playing a creditable role. That might do for the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) who is pandering to the Protestant prejudices of the province of Ontario, but the hon. member for Montmagny is not in the same position. I venture to tell the hon. gentleman that his attitude will not commend itself to the judgment of his constituents.

Mr. FRASER. I rise to a point of order. Am I to be disturbed in this way without your ruling whether the point of order is well taken ?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). The hon. gentleman is discussing the point of order.

Mr. FRASER. You must decide the point of order without discussion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). If you force me to a decision, I decide that I am properly here. I am not the elected Deputy Speaker ; I am the substitute of the Deputy Speaker.

Mr. FRASER. Of course, I acknowledge the justice of your decision, and I bow at once to it, although as a matter of law I always understood that the power of the agent could not exceed that of the principal. Let us see how the matter stands. The hon. leader of the House, at the outset, struck an attitude and courted death. Life hung upon such a slender thread and he was willing to submit the thread to any strain in the interests of his country. There was a time in the history of England when something similar occurred—when the great Chatham, wearied and worn, was carried into Parliament to make his last speech, ready to die in order that he might speak to the nation words of wisdom and show his earnestness. He did not say he was ready to die, but every one saw he was, because he had to be carried in, pillows under and around him, and it was a grand spectacle to see this infirm old man so anxious to serve his country. Well, the hon. Secretary of State thought he would not be undone by the great Chatham, and he told us, in thundering tones, that he was ready to die.

> For he himself has said it,
> And its greatly to his credit.

He did not require even any time to prepare, he had settled with his Maker, because when a man says he is ready to die, the presumption is that he has so prepared himself that the angels are only waiting to receive him. But it comes out that the whole thing is a piece of by-play. As he spoke to us, indignantly and pathetically about obstruction, I watched his countenance, and could see the smile that crept into it as he turned to his colleagues and winked the other eye. The country can be fooled sometimes and many times, but not every time. If the Government had any desire to see the Act passed, they would approach the House in a dignified way and seek to push it through in reasonable hours. I care not whether I am called an obstructionist or not, I will go before any audience in the Dominion of Canada, and I will say that when we have tried to perfect a Bill from three in the afternoon till two in the morning, that the Government is responsible for the defeat of the Bill if they want to keep us here any longer. The evidence is irresistible that the whole object of the Government is to defeat this Bill, and I have no doubt that many of their supporters in their hearts will thank those who have enabled them to do that.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Why do you not come out straight then, and oppose the Bill ? You oppose the Government in everything else.

Mr. FRASER. Simply because I want to be honest, and try to perfect the Bill.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Do you not give other persons credit for acting honestly as well as yourself ?

Mr. FRASER. I am not speaking of the hon. gentleman at all, I have nothing to say to him.

Mr. COATSWORTH. The hon. gentleman has represented the Government supporters as not being really desirous of passing this Bill, why does he make that statement ; what ground has he for making it ?

Mr. FRASER. I say that all the indications prove that.

Mr. COATSWORTH. It seems to me that if that could apply to any hon. member on this side of the House, it would apply to me representing the constituency of East Toronto. I want to assure the hon. gentleman of this : That the greatest misfortune in my view, that could attend me is that I should go back to my constituents without the Bill passing.

Mr. FRASER. That may all be. It might be a great misfortune, because the hon. gentleman won't go back to his constituents.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). That is not fair.

Mr. COATSWORTH. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) should keep his insinuations to himself

Mr. FRASER. Is it not fair to say that the hon. gentleman may not seek the suffrages of the people ? He may not get the nomination. I am not saying there is any motive for the vote of the hon. gentleman. I will assume that he was honest in voting on this question. Except for the action of the Government, I would assume that they were honest too, but when I see that every step taken by them is a step in the direction of defeating this Bill, then I say there is method in their madness. Suppose I knew that the hon. member (Mr. Coatsworth) had in his pocket a writing that appointed him to a position, then I might accuse him, but otherwise I will not say that the hon. gentleman is not honest in his vote. Does any one pretend to say that the tirades of the Secretary of State would mollify this House, and help to pass the Bill ? In the interests of the House, in the interest of the Bill, and in the interest of those gentlemen who have been cooped up here for sixty hours and who want to get some sleep, I move that the committee now rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). Is the House ready for the question ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, Sir ; not quite. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) has under-estimated the time we have been here. We have been eighty-four hours subjected to this unexampled piece of tyranny, and it is about time to review the situation.

Mr. OUIMET. Why do you not review the Bill ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because, if the hon. gentleman does not understand it —it has been explained to him often enough —I will tell him. No Government has the smallest right to call upon members of this House to consider so important a measure at hours when it is utterly impossible for the majority of the House to be present. It is gross and rank tyranny of the vilest kind to attempt to rush this Bill through by brute force, and I am sorry to say that the Government of Canada is led, and largely officered by men who are only capable of passing the Bill in such a way. We are making progress at the rate of about one clause in ten hours, and it is quite as much progress as a Government deserves to make which resorts to such methods. This kind of bulldozing, this kind of tyranny, this kind of outrage never yet succeeded in carrying a measure, and, thank Providence, never will. It must have dawned on the mastermind that has come across the ocean to assist our deliberations that a great blunder has been committed. I think, Sir, it has also dawned on the minds of his followers, that they have been very badly led all through. In my parliamentary experience, I have never seen a great party worse led, or worse handled than the party opposite has been this session by the men entrusted with its political guidance. Perhaps not all of them. but it applies more particularly to their chief and leader, and to that inner council who always constitute, under such circumstances, the real guiding power in the Cabinet. They are going to the country after a session of very nearly four months, with absolutely empty hands.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). And clean hands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Clean hands, because they have not been able to put their hands into anything. On this occasion, they will not have the power of having anything but clean hands, for we will take care that nothing will go through the House without our knowing the reason why.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). We always had clean hands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman's representatives appear in the post office, and elsewhere.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I deny it, and I challenge proof of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have some little proof.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I deny it ; trot it out now if you have any proof.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we have had some little proof in the Post Office Department.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I never received a dollar outside of my indemnity as a member of this House, and I have been in the House for twenty-three years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not say the hon. gentleman had put money in his own pockets. There are other ways of making things pleasant.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). No, Sir; nor has any relative of mine got any.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman has got some relatives in the post office.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Then you are quite wrong.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we had some evidence laid before the House.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Then you can produce the evidence, and I am here in the House to explain it to you.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unless I am greatly mistaken, the hon. gentleman has not only served the country in his own person, but in the person of his relatives.

Mr. GUILLET. Shame.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). A single relative of mine never was in the Civil Service since I have been in the House, for twenty-three years ; and I question if any other member in the House can make that statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps all the better for the public service.

Mr. GUILLET. Shame.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Not a single dollar to my advantage outside of my parliamentary indemnity, which the hon. gentleman draws too, ever went into my pockets or in the interest of my family.

Mr. GUILLET. The hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) cannot say that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to hear it in the interest of the public service.

An hon. MEMBER. Take it back.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I am not the sort of duck you think I am.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At another time we will have the opportunity of referring to that again.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). All right, and if I am here I will discuss the question with you.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When the post office estimates come up we will have an opportunity. I hope the hon. gentleman's memory has not quite failed him.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds) Not at all, Sir. I am growing old, but I am not growing imbecile.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very glad to have the hon. gentleman's authority for that fact.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I am perfectly willing that the country should compare you with myself in that respect.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it has dawned upon the followers of the Government, that they have been pretty badly led this session. We have never had a session in which we have sat so long and done so little, nor has there ever been a session during which the Government deserves to have done so little. There are two hypotheses which may account for the conduct of the Government with respect to this Bill. This is the first hypothesis that the Government of Canada had no sort of real wish or intention of passing this Bill at all, and that all their proceedings with regard to it are simply organized hypocrisy. First of all, this is anything but a new measure on their part. Their pledge was to introduce legislation on the lines of the remedial order. That pledge was made by the Minister of Public Works in Verchères in April, 1895 ; but it was not carried out last session. Then they proposed to call Parliament together not later than the 2nd of January, this year, to pass remedial legislation. In the meantime, they allowed six months to pass without making a serious attempt to negotiate with the province of Manitoba. Had they had any honest desire to bring this matter to a determination, there is no doubt that they would have utilized the recess to hold a conference with the government of Manitoba ; but they wasted that valuable time. But there was another course open to them. After communicating their decision to the government of Manitoba, there was nothing in the world to have prevented them calling a session of Parliament in October or November to pass remedial legislation. If that had been done, it would have been utterly impossible to have prevented the Government passing the measure, if so disposed. I trust the House and the country will bear that in mind, and I defy hon. gentlemen to contradict it or dispute it. But they would not negotiate with Manitoba, or hold a session in October or November, when this measure might have been put through ; but they delayed it till the 2nd of January ; and, instead of introducing it then, this Government, or the major part of them, went on strike. They consumed fifteen days in deciding whether they would oust the present Prime Minister or not. They made an exhibition of themselves ; they disgraced themselves, their party and the country ; and since that time we have had the spectacle, unprecedented in Canada, of the nominal chief of the Government unable to hold any intercourse with half his followers, except in the most strictly official way. If they had had an honest desire to pass this Bill, it would have been prepared before the 2nd of January, it would have been laid on the Table of Parliament the day Parliament met, and we would have been called upon to deal with it the moment the Address was disposed of. But I do not believe the Bill was ready when Parliament met ; I do not believe these hon. gentlemen had any idea of the provisions it would contain. As a matter of fact, the Bill was not put in type until six weeks after this House met, and it was not presented for the second reading until the House had been two months in session. Every member knows that that conduct on the part of the Government is utterly irreconcilable with any honest desire to pass the Bill. They knew that this Parliament was to come to an end by efflux-ion of time on or before the 24th of April ; they knew that it was a Bill of extraordinary difficulty, and one that would require a great deal of discussion ; and their conduct in allowing two months to pass, and allowing the Budget debate to be interpolated, before they proceeded with the Bill, proves conclusively that they had not the slightest real intention to bring this measure to a conclusion. That is one of the hypotheses. There is a second hypothesis, of which I give them the benefit. It may be, that, on the part of some members of the Government, there was a sheer downright stupidity which led them to imagine that they had only to appear before us, and all of us would at once fall down and worship the golden image they had set up. If that was the idea of the great statesman who leads them, he must have been extremely astonished at the reception he received. I do not think he found this House disposed to take him at his own valuation. It is probable that both of these hypotheses are more or less true. But the truth is, I suppose, that the members of the Government have never been at unison with themselves on this question. They have been divided into two camps and hostile camps. It was worth while seeing what was said in the Senate by Sir Mackenzie Bowell on that question.

Mr. OUIMET. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to raise the question of order. I am quoting from Bourinot :

> It is a part of the unwritten law of Parliament that no allusion should be made in one House to the debates of the other Chamber, a rule always enforced by the Speaker with the utmost strictness.

Without saying any more, I will call upon you, Mr. Chairman, to enforce this rule.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I will say it is stated.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not think the hon. gentleman can do that.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). I do not think the hon. member can refer to the debates in the other House. The rule is a very broad rule.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not a written law.

The CHAIRMAN. I doubt if any allusion whatever can be made to anything that has taken place in the other House under this rule.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not understand that that is the rule of our House, but merely a gloss, no doubt by a gentleman whose opinions are entitled to very considerable weight, but I do not think you can point to any absolute rule on the subject.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman may very well dispense with quoting again these things, for they have been quoted repeatedly in this House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not know that I shall be disposed to admit that everything you find in a text book on the subject can be regarded as official authority, and I am not sure that it might not be worth while to have His Honour's ruling on the subject. However, the facts are pretty well known, and I do not think it is worth while to take up time and bring the Speaker out of his bed. Hon. gentlemen opposite have justified their course on one particularly absurd pretext. They declare that because they had a small majority for the second reading of the Bill—which by no means proves that the majority acquiesce in all the provisions of it—they are, therefore, entitled to force it through Parliament 'per fas et nefas.' I admit that when a Government come fresh from the people, or within a reasonable time, thereafter, there is a reasonable assumption that they do represent a majority of the electorate ; but when the House is in its sixth year, and more particularly when it was elected on a voters' list about eight years old, it is certain that the majority of the House do not represent the majority of the electorate. It is physically impossible that they should represent it. They do not represent more than a majority of three-fifths of the electorate, and consequently the majority of this House at present represents a bare majority of three-fifths, or something like 36 per cent at the utmost of the existing electorate. Although that is not technically and legally fatal to their claims, it is morally and entirely fatal to any pretense for alleging that the Opposition in this House, are defying the will of the majority of the electorate of Canada in refusing to accept the decision of the majority in this House as final on a question of this kind. If there were anything that would more than another show the utter folly of holding a session at the extreme end of a parliamentary term, it is exactly what has happened. Had the hon. gentlemen any real knowledge of the constitution and any tactical skill, the very last thing they would have done, particularly under existing circumstances, would be to hold a sixth session of Parliament. I do not mean to say that no circumstances could arise under which a sixth session might be justified, but I say that the only cause that I can conceive of would be a great danger to public interests if Parliament were not to meet. But no human being can pretend that the public interests would have suffered had this House been dissolved at the usual time. The reverse is the case. It is perfectly clear, not merely that great loss has been sustained, not merely that a very considerable amount of money has been uselessly expended, but that there is danger of great injury to the public service resulting from the course the Government have seen fit to adopt. There is no one thing better established by the unwritten law, by the usage and practice of the British Parliament, than this, that a Parliament which is summoned at the extreme end of its term should, under no consideration other than great public danger, attempt to transact anything more than the merest ordinary business. The reason is obvious. It is because the existing majority of Parliament do not represent the majority of the electorate, but only at the outside a majority of less than three-fifths of the electorate, or under 40 per cent. Under the circumstances, it is utterly contrary to the genius and spirit of representative institutions that any important measures should be passed by a Parliament the majority of which do not and cannot represent the people at large. Then we come to another question which would deserve more attentive consideration than the little time at my disposal will permit, and that is the nice and curious question under what conditions a minority have a right to compel an appeal to the people. I admit frankly that any minority which attempts to oppose the decision of the majority, does so at its peril. If we decide that it is our bounden duty to oppose the Government, or the majority for the time being, in every constitutional and reasonable way, we do it at our peril, and must be responsible to our constituents. But in all these cases, due regard must be had to the surrounding circumstances, and in particular to the duration of the parliamentary term. There is a very great deal justified at the end of a parliamentary term which would not be justified at its commencement. Had the Government done their duty and submitted this question to the electorate and returned with a clear majority, I would not think it proper or right that any extraordinary objection should be made to their carrying out the mandate they had received from the people. But, under existing circumstances, there is no sort of pretext for saying that hon. gentlemen opposite represent the majority of the electorate. All these considerations are very much increased in force by the circumstance that we are a federal Parliament, and that it is a fundamental part of our constitution that every province should be represented here in proportion to its population at the last census. At present this Parliament is not properly constituted, because three of the maritime provinces are over represented to the extent of 10 per cent of their total population, and the province which is chiefly interested in this question before us is very much under-represented in Parliament. I will not enter into the question that there is the strongest reason to believe that the representatives from Manitoba and the North-west do not, in the slightest degree, represent the feelings of their constituents on this question. We are here debating a question in which federal relations and provincial relations are concerned, and we are doing so with a full knowledge on the part of the Government that the province specially affected is not properly represented. It might very well come to pass on the third reading of the Bill, if it is ever reached, that it might be carried by a very small majority, and that that might be composed of the excessive vote of the maritime provinces, and that it might have been prevented passing had Manitoba been properly represented. As more than two years have elapsed since our Redistribution Act passed, there is no excuse for this House departing from the good old English rule and precedent that, wherever a redistribution act had been passed an appeal to the people should be had without delay. I object to recognize the authority of this Parliament to deal with this question now, under the circumstances I have narrated. Nothing more objectionable can be done, nothing which is more likely to strain our constitution, nothing more likely to establish a bad and mischievous precedent and lower the dignity and tone of Parliament, than holding a session at this time. It is well known that in the last session of the Parliament a good many things are apt to be done which should not be done. When you call a sixth session, under the circumstances and at the time this was called, all I can say is that if it was the intention of the Government to deliberately offer a premium on obstruction, they could not have devised a better scheme. It is not one of the least evils of holding a session under those conditions that it wholly deprives the people of proper control over their representatives. The Government are attempting to secure the support of representatives to a measure, of which they do not approve in their hearts and consciences, by offering these men an asylum and a retreat from the cares of political life. The power of the Government to appoint members of Parliament to office is one of a questionable kind, which always requires to be exercised under the strictest safeguards. We have had in this Parliament, which is now fortunately reaching its termination, some glaring instances of the utter disregard by the Government of the principles which underlie the Independence of Parliament Act. I am sorry to say it, because I like the hon. gentleman himself, but the late hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was notoriously sitting in this House for the last two or three sessions with the pledge and promise of the collectorship of Montreal in his pocket. Now, that hon. gentleman, under the circumstances, had entirely ceased to be a free agent, and he ought not to have sat and voted in this House; and, although, at long and last, he took up courage and released himself from the bondage which, no doubt, he found hateful to him, still he set a bad example by lending himself to the scheme of the Government of keeping the important position of collector of Montreal vacant for three years and using it to procure the support of a memebr of this House. But while that, at any time, is a danger to representative government, it becomes tenfold more dangerous when a session is being held at a time when it is utterly impossible for the constituencies to express their opinion. Within a few days, within a few hours, I may say, the Government have appointed an hon. member of this House to a judicial position on the bench, and they did that under circumstances which show clearly that for a considerable time back that hon. gentleman has been, to all intents and purposes, practically violating the Independence of Parliament Act. The principal check against violation of the Independence of Parliament Act consists in the fact that the Government must at once vacate a seat when they appoint one of the people's representatives to an office. Clearly they have had their reasons of late years for not desiring to open more seats than was absolutely necessary. There is no such check in a session held under these circumstances, and that in itself is a strong argument against holding a session under circumstances which tempt the Government and its supporters to this outrageous violation of all decency, by appointing members of this House to offices on the judicial bench, and that at a time when an important debate was going on in this very Chamber. Perhaps the only good thing that is likely to arise from this sixth session is, that it will warn the Government, even if they possess a large majority, of their utter powerlessness to dragoon the House, and compel members to accept whatever measure they may bring down, even supposing, for the sake of argument, they really wish to pass this measure. What earthly gain do the Government expect to secure from the absurd position in which they have placed Parliament. It has not been to the advantage of parliamentary institutions that we should exhibit the spectacle of keeping this assembly in session for 84 hours, for the nominal purpose of passing an extremely complicated and difficult measure. If the hon. gentlemen are to impress a certain section of the country that they are determined, coute que coute, to force this measure through, they can attain that object with far more decency and propriety, by asking this House for a reasonable number of hours, in dignified and decorous discussion, to consider this measure, and then let the responsibility of opposition lie on those who unduly discuss it. All this fanfaronade, all this dramatic profession, won't satisfy the astute gentlemen with whom the Government have to deal, and who will understand perfectly well what kind of a little game the Government are playing in this matter. Suppose the Bill should get through committee, are they aware that there is such a thing as a third reading, on which discussion must take place with the Speaker in the Chair ? They would find if they get through committee, that the third reading is a harder hedge to get over than even the committee stage. Looking at the matter from every point of view, I may say to the hon. gentleman, that I can understand no real reason to force this through, unless it be downright cussedness, not on the part of the hon. gentlemen upon whom the burden of the fight falls, but downright cussedness on the part of the leader of the House. We are perfectly willing to discuss this Bill in a rational way for a rational time. But the country knows, and the House knows, that far greater progress would be made in that way than possibly can be made under the circumstances I have alluded to. If it were their honest intent and purpose to make it impossible to get through the Bill this session, they are to be congratulated on their course, because the right way to do that was to threaten, as the Secretary of State did at the very beginning, that we would be compelled to sit here day and night until the Bill passed. Such a threat is not one to be addressed to a free Parliament, and it was properly resented. We would be unworthy the name of a Liberal party, unless we set our faces against any such attempt to practically enforce the closure. I am not in the slightest degree obstructing this measure, but I am contending for the plain and simple principle, that it is the right of every free member of every free parliament to see to it that the business of the House is conducted at such hours that every gentleman who wishes shall be physically able to consider what measures are submitted to us.

Mr. IVES. It would seem to be a well-settled fact that the opposition to this Bill comprises not only the members of the Conservative party who are opposed to it, but also practically the whole force of the Liberal party in this House. No remark of mine is needed, after what has taken place already this week, to satisfy the House or the friends of this measure in the country, or the country as a whole, that the Liberal party—I won't say in conjunction with, but working with the McCarthy party in this House—have determined that this Bill shall not become law.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. When the chief lieutenant of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Richard Cartwright) occupies an hour and a half of the time of this committee—which might be profitably spent in discussing the clauses of this Bill—in speaking on matters which have no relevancy to the question whatever, it is certainly manifest that unless some change takes place, and takes place soon, this measure cannot—no matter what the efforts of the Government may be—this measure cannot become law. It is manifest from what has occurred that instead of the Government coercing the Opposition in this House, it is the Government and their supporters who are being ruled and coerced by the minority in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. The Opposition from the first of this session have assumed the role of being the governing and ruling body in this House. When the Estimates were brought down, we were told plainly by the leading members of the Opposition that this session was called for a special purpose, and that the Remedial Bill and nothing but the Bill should receive consideration. We were told that grievances must always be discussed before supplies were granted. It was necessary that the financial statement should be made by the Minister of Finance, and the Remedial Bill was brought down immediately afterwards. Then when we went into Supply, the Opposition, taking the matter into their own hands, said : You shall not have supplies ; we will put the country to the expense of half a million dollars for an extra session ; we have determined upon that policy, and by that policy you must be guided. Then, when we brought the Bill down—and we brought it down in ample time to receive full consideration and discussion, and as soon as the financial statement which had to be made to the country was made—when we asked for the consideration of that Bill, obstruction commenced ; obstruction in every possible way, and obstruction in every possible manner. I will not say that for a measure of the magnitude and importance of this, there might not be considerable discussion on the second reading. I will not say that the discussion was entirely confined to the Opposition side of the House ; but I will say that it occupied more time than the discussion of such a Bill would receive in the Imperial Parliament, or in any other Parliament of the world that I know of. Then we got into committee, and when we were not devoting all the time of the House to this measure, and not sitting day and night, how did we get on ? The hon. gentlemen opposite, while pretending to discuss the clauses, spent three days on a single clause, and so the obstruction went on, till finally the Government came to the conclusion, that if there was any real progress to be made, all the time of the House must be devoted to its discussion. We have passed but a few clauses altogether this week. Why was the whole of the day before yesterday, and the whole of the day yesterday, spent on the motion to adjourn, and what came over the spirit of the dreams of hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon, that they consented to give a little time to the discussion of the clauses of this Bill. They apparently relaxed their obstruction for a few hours. For six mortal hours we were kept in this House passing three or four minor clauses. That was obstruction just as much as the other. It was a pretense to permit the Bill to be considered in committee, but it was real obstruction to the passage of the measure. Well, this Bill contains only eight clauses which require any special attention from the committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which are they ?

Mr. IVES. We have passed one referring to the organization of the board ; the 74th clause is another, and if the hon. gentleman cares to know, I will hand him a list of the sections, when I resume my seat, that I consider to be important, and which might properly occupy a considerable time. From my knowledge of this Bill, from having gone through it carefully when it was before Council, I know that there are only eight clauses that require time in the discussion thereof, and that the rest are simply the machinery making the law workable.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). And effective.

Mr. IVES. Yes, workable and effective. We have now come to the 10th day of April, and the life of this Parliament expires on the 24th of April. I say there is still time to properly discuss this Bill and to pass it, and also to pass, at least, the Supplementary Estimates before the Parliament prorogues, if hon. gentlemen opposite only consent to the patriotic course of stopping obstruction and going on with the consideration of this Bill. What is the position at the present moment in this House ? The McCarthyites, trusting in the faithfulness of obstruction of their friends the Liberals, have each and every one of them left the Chamber.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. Not a soul of them is left. There is not a hand to prevent the consideration of this measure and good progress being made, if the lieutenant of the Liberal party (Sir Richard Cartwright), and his own friends, do not obstruct. With the ability of the hon. gentleman leading the other side of the House (Sir Richard Cartwright), with his aid, with the aid of many of the best lawyers of the House, who are here or within easy call, we can go into committee and pass more than half of the clauses of the Bill to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DALY. Far better than if the House were full.

Mr. IVES. Far better than if the House were full. I would rather trust the consideration of this Bill to half a dozen, or a dozen, lawyers, selected from each side of the House, than to trust it to the whole committee ; for better work would then be done, more expedition would be had, and we would get better results. I can see, however, only one chance of this Bill becoming law this session. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has handed me a list of the important clauses in this Bill, which I will give to the hon. gentleman from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). They are clause 1, and clause 4, which have already passed ; clause 6, which has also been adopted, and clauses 10, 28 and 74. Only three important clauses remain for discussion. These clauses may be left over for the present, and all the other clauses of this Bill might be put through to-night without any trouble or difficulty. I was about to say, that from my experience in public life, I see only one chance for this Bill becoming law, considering the tactics that are being pursued on the present occasion, and that is this : If the members of the Liberal party from the province of Quebec would use that influence which they might use on their Liberal friends, progress could be made. The whole matter is in their hands, and they could force, if they wished, hon. gentlemen of their party who are obstructing this Bill to desist. The hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party from other provinces, who consider it to be to their political advantage to be identified with this obstruction, could easily be forced to change their course by the Liberal members from the province of Quebec.

Sir, where is the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver)?

Mr. LANDERKIN. He is where every honest man should be at four o'clock in the morning—in bed.

Mr. IVES. Then, I take it, you are not an honest man. Where is the hon. member for Huntingdon, the man who, I believe, is always selected to preside at the party's caucuses. That gentleman cannot be indifferent to this question. He represents a constituency in which more than one-third of the voters are Roman Catholics. They have an enormous interest in this question—where is he? If he and the other thirty-five Liberals who represent constituencies in the province of Quebec were to go to the leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition to-night, and say to them, "The people of the province of Quebec, the Roman Catholics particularly, insist on justice being done to the Manitoba minority," they could in twenty-five minutes bring about a change and put an end to all this obstruction. Where are the French Liberals to-night? Just where they have been, I suppose, on every occasion since the House went into committee to discuss this measure. Having made the fatal blunder they did in voting against the second reading of the Bill, they consider that they are now performing their duty by absenting themselves from the House. Do these gentlemen fancy that the electors of the province of Quebec are going to forgive them, forsooth, because on some little minor motions they have voted with the Government? Not by any means. The people of the province of Quebec know full well that this matter is in the hands of the French Liberals of that province. They know full well that if these gentlemen exercise the influence they might exercise, they could easily bring about the removal of this obstruction. And if this obstruction were removed, we would have no difficulty, by sitting night and day, as we are now doing, in breaking down the miserable obstruction that we have to meet from a few gentlemen on this side of the House. Those gentlemen are not here to-night. They could go and sleep, and safely trust to the Opposition to hold the fort as they are doing to-night. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Angers) is here to-night; but where is the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard)? Where is the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion)? Where is the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau)? Where is the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll)? Where is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Charbonneau)? Where is the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette)? Where is the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay)? Where is the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte)? The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Delisle) is in his seat; he voted for the second reading of the Bill; and the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Vaillancourt) is here. But all these other members are prominent by their absence; and if they fancy that they can satisfy their constituents by simply voting with us on two or three minor divisions that have taken place since the main division on the second reading, they will find themselves greatly mistaken.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They will never get back if they vote with you.

Mr. IVES. It is not settled yet that you will get back. There is another doctor named Jamieson who is likely to get there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Oh, Dr. Jamieson is in jail.

Mr. IVES. Before I resume my seat I wish in the most forcible manner to call on the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), the senior of the Liberals from the province of Quebec, to bring with him the other thirty-five Liberals from the province, and help us to pass this measure, in the interest of the minority in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us of obstructing the Bill; but they are obstructing it themselves to-night.

Mr. DALY. How can we obstruct a Bill on a motion to rise and report progress?

Mr. McMULLEN. Now, they claim that they cannot pass the Bill unless they get the support of the Liberals from the province of Quebec. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says the Liberal party are opposed to the Bill. He has no right to make any such statement. There is no evidence that the Liberal party are opposed to the principle of the Bill. They have endeavoured to criticise it courteously and minutely; but they object to being compelled to sit here and discuss it day and night. The Government never intended and do not want to pass the Bill. All along they have played into the hands of the opponents of the Bill. Why did they not introduce the Bill at the beginning of the session, so that they would have the entire time of the session to devote to it? It is no time, at this hour of the morning, to discuss the provisions of the Bill. There was a very able and intelligent discussion of its clauses from the time the House met yesterday afternoon till two o'clock this moring; then, as on previous evenings, the committee thought they had done a very good day's work, and felt that they were entitled to their regular rest. We have passed nine clauses in about three days; that is, about three clauses a day, at the same rate if the Government had taken up this Bill in time, in forty days the Bill would have passed. But instead of that, they played in to the hands of the opponents of the Bill, and I believe they did it intentionally. The provisions of this Bill are such as to show that it never can be, and never was intended to be, a measure of real relief to the minority. But the Government think that they can persuade one set of people that they are doing their best to pass this Bill, and that they can turn round to the other party and say that it is no good. They knew very well that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and many other members on their own side, had declared that under no circumstances would they permit a Bill to pass for the re-establishing of separate schools in Manitoba ; and knowing that, if they wanted to pass remedial legislation why did they not bring the Bill down in time ? The fact is that they did not want to pass the Bill, and played into the hands of those gentlemen in order to prevent it passing.

I contend that if there is any obstruction the Government are responsible. Had they treated the Opposition with courtesy, they would have got along much better. But no sooner had the hon. Secretary of State taken a seat in this House than he began to treat it in a very lofty, dictatorial manner. In this respect he differed very much from his predecessor, the late Sir John Macdonald, for if ever there was a man who treated the Opposition with courtesy and fairness, it was that hon. gentleman. But the hon. Secretary of State undertook to strike out a new line. He came in with a flourish of trumpets and the air of a dictator and undertook to check every hon. gentleman who dared to attempt any criticism in his august presence. But he has by this time found that he has made a serious mistake and woke up the wrong passenger. There can be no question but that the measure before us is a very peculiar one. This is the first time since confederation that we have endeavoured to give practical effect to that clause in the British North America Act which gives to this House the power to remedy any grievance, with regard to education, under which the minority may suffer ; and according to the opinion of the best constitutional lawyers in this House, it is almost impossible to bring relief to any minority in any province without the cordial assistance and co-operation of the province. Under these peculiar circumstances, we are asked to rush this Bill through at all hours of the day and night, and when it is impossible, under the severe strain to which we are subjected, that we should be able to give it proper consideration. If the time is rapidly approaching an end when this Bill can be passed, and if the Bill is still far from its final stage, to whose fault is that due ? The House met on the 2nd January and the second reading of the Bill was not proposed until the 3rd of March.

Mr. INGRAM. The Bill was introduced on the 11th February, and the hon. gentleman will remember that the leader of the Opposition asked that a day should be selected for the reading of the Bill, and that day was fixed.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Government, in pursuance of its pledge, and if they were sincere in deserving that this Bill should become law, should have introduced it as soon as the session opened, and moved for a second reading within a few days later. Instead of that they began by introducing the Budget and treated us to protracted discussion on the financial position of the Dominion, on which hon. gentlemen opposite consumed more time than hon. gentlemen on this side. Then when we did get down to work on this Bill, we had a series of violent speeches from the leader of the House, which was calculated more than anything else to delay progress. The other afternoon he burst upon the House in a violent paroxysm of abuse, which resulted in the whole afternoon being lost. There has not been that statesmanship, that astuteness and diplomacy and courtesy exercised by the Government which they should have exercised. The Government knew they only had until the 24th April to pass this Bill, and they should have made it the leading feature of this session and pressed its consideration from day to day and from hour to hour, from the very first day that Parliament met. We know that the great cause of delay was on account of the dissensions in the Cabinet. Some of them in favour of the Bill, and some of them opposed to it, and they are not agreed on it yet. I have no doubt that some of the Cabinet would be glad if the Bill did not become law. The President of the Council pointed out to-night that some of the Liberals from Quebec province are not here to lend their exertions in support of this Bill. Well, we have not the Postmaster General here to-night, nor have we most of the French Conservatives here to-night.

Mr. FRECHETTE. He was here for three days and three nights.

Mr. McMULLEN. He is not here to-night. We have only two Ministers of the Crown in the House, and I do not think either of them is in charge of the Bill. The responsibility for obstruction and delays rests with the Government themselves. If they had proceeded properly the Bill would have passed this House now, and would have been in the Senate, and we would have been considing the estimates. The Government have filtered away the time. I believe that the Opposition are disposed to give every consideration to the Bill, and if the sittings of the House were confined to proper hours we would get on much better. The Opposition is perfectly justified in refusing to discuss this Bill at such an hour in the morning.

Mr. BELLEY. Withdraw your motion and we will discuss the Bill.

Mr. FRECHETTE. You (Mr. McMullen) are obstructing now.

Mr. McMULLEN. What hour is this to go on with the Bill ? The Government themselves or their supporters are not here.

Mr. BELLEY. They are outside the door, and will be here in a minute if you let us discuss the Bill.

Mr. McMULLEN. You got two or three clauses through to-day, and is not that a fair day's work ?

Mr. BELLEY. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. The President of the Council has been trying to associate the Reform party with the McCarthy party, as he calls them. As far as we are concerned we are not responsible for the conduct of that gentleman. He has taken his course and we have taken ours.

Mr. FRECHETTE. It is the same course.

Mr. McMULLEN. I know that the hon. gentlemen opposite would be glad to try and show in the province of Quebec that my hon. leader is hand and glove with the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). That kind of humbug won't work. The people of the country are too intelligent to take any stock in that. We are not responsible for what is done by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) or by the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace). They are opposed to all separate schools. We are willing and anxious that justice should be done. If the country hands the matter over to us, we will settle it and we will not ask the Conservatives to help us. Mr. Laurier will have no difficulty with his followers, in settling this measure and the country will find that he will arrange a peaceable and satisfactory settlement. Where is the leader of the House and where are the other Ministers at this hour in the morning ?

Mr. BELLEY. Where is your leader ?

Mr. McMULLEN. My leader is not taking an active and prominent part in connection with this Bill.

Mr. FRECHETTE. That is an admission. Withdraw your motion and let us discuss the Bill and our men will be here in five minutes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I suppose they are in beds outside.

Mr. BELLEY. Not at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know how many beds have been paid for at the expense of the country to keep these gentlemen comfortable. They are in bed while we are forced to take our lives in our hands staying here all night. The men responsible for this condition of things will find that the country will hurl them from power. They will be sorry that they have sunk so far in the political gutter as to resort to such means.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, a single glance at the clock opposite recalls to my mind the fact that from the hour of midnight till now, five hours have elapsed. At twelve o'clock a motion was made that the committee rise and the House be adjourned. It is now five o'clock. Five weary hours have since elapsed, which might have been turned to much better account, in making progress with the Bill under consideration. Happening to cast a glance at the seats in this House, I notice that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is not here. He is gone since midnight. I notice also that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) are not here. The hon. member for North Simcoe and all the hon. members who have of late, offered such a strenuous opposition to this Bill, and have resorted to obstructive methods in order to delay the progress of this measure, those men, I say, who are still presumed to be Conservatives, all those hon. members are not here. Those hon. gentlemen, worn out, exhausted by their obstructive campaign, have felt it necessary to desert the battle field in order to recuperate. If I cast a glance at the other side of the House, I see Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, now under the leadership of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has just resumed his seat. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), one of the leaders of the Liberal party, is the gentleman who moved the motion to adjourn, so that, Mr. Chairman, if these five weary hours have been lost, the fault is due to the Liberal members who are responsible for keeping up the blockade of business. We might go on and make progress with this Bill, and probably we might have passed, I do not say one-half of the sections, but I venture to say the whole Bill, with the help of the Opposition and the Government supporters, for there are only left a few important sections, which are sections 10, 28 and 74. All the other sections, relating to the administration and government of schools, are such as are to be found in all Bills of a similar character. Now, I ask, Mr. Chairman, had the hon. members of the Liberal Opposition, had the French Liberal members from the province of Quebec remained here, is it not true that we could have reached, this very night, a favourable solution ? I am overwhelmed with sorrow, Mr. Chairman, at the thought of the motion now before us. Had the Liberal Opposition been willing, this very night, the Remedial Bill would have been passed in committee and we might have reached the third reading. I venture to say that this will be marked out as a fatal night for the interests of the Manitoba minority. If another day has been wasted, the fault is due to the Liberal members of this House, to the cowardly attitude of the French Liberal members who are absent from the committee, and who have been away these last five hours. Where is the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) ? He is quietly lying down at his hotel. Where is the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) ? Where is that great champion of the Catholic minority ? Lying down also. Where is the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) ? He is gone to rest. Where is the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll) ? Retired also. Where is the hon. member for Montmagny, another great champion of the Catholic minority, the very gentleman who, to-night, volunteered to assume the part played these last four days by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) ? He is lying down. Where is the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who represents here a constituency, the majority of which are Catholics ? He has left the battle field. He is lying down. Where is the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Fauvel), a Protestant who represents an essentially Catholic constituency and who has pledged his word that he would protect the rights and privileges of the Manitoba minority ? He is quietly lying down. Where is the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) who subscribed a pledge to vote in favour of the Remedial Bill ? He is gone to rest. Where is the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Harwood) ? He has also left the battlefield. Where is the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) who poses as the great champion of the Manitoba minority, the leading light of the French Canadian Liberal party, but, to quote Victor Hugo's words, a " dark light."—where is he ? He is lying down at his hotel. Where is the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) who told the electors of Chicoutimi, last year : I give you my word that the Catholic minority will have justice at my hands ? gone to rest. Where are the hon. members for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne), for Nicolet (Mr. Leduc), for Maskinongé (Mr. Legris), for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane), for Yamaska (Mr. Migneault), for Napierville (Mr. Monet), for Chambly (Mr. Préfontaine), for Stanstead (Mr. Rider), the latter gentleman who represents a great many Catholic voters ? Where are the hon. members for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), for Shefford (Mr. Sanborn), for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Yes, Mr. Chairman, where is the hon. member for L'Islet, the advocate of the Catholic minority, and where is the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Proulx) ? Where are all these hon. gentlemen gone to ? All these hon. members have been sleeping since midnight, at the very time when their brethren in Manitoba are crushed under the weight of injustice, are being persecuted by a Liberal government ; while they are being robbed, and coerced into paying annually a large sum for the support of public schools to which they cannot conscientiously send their children. All those hon. gentlemen had vowed and pledged their word that they would protect that weak, patient and oppressed minority ; all those gentlemen have gone to rest, sleeping a sound sleep, while the French Conservative members are here ready to pass the Bill and to come to the rescue of the minority. But if most French Liberal members from the province of Quebec have left their post, I am bound, in all justice, to make an exception for the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Vaillancourt) who has worked several nights with us, without minding the fatigue ; he is still here and ready to work. The same may be said of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) who is ready to lend us his help, should the obstruction come to an end. So with the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Delisle) whom I now see in his seat. In all fairness, I am bound to say that the hon. gentlemen mentioned show themselves as willing to do their duty as the others are ready to shirk it. I am bound to pay the same encomium to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Angers), and the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Frémont), whom I saw in their seats, a little while ago. At the very time when their Manitoba brothers are being persecuted, the French Liberal members, with the exception of the hon. members mentioned, are shamefully deserting the cause of the oppressed minority. As I said, the sittings of yesterday and to-night will prove fatal to the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, because, as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and their friends, those so-called Conservatives, were all away, we might have been able, with the assistance of the Opposition, had the Liberals been willing to do their duty, to pass this Bill at this sitting of the committee. The responsibility which rests on these gentlemen is very heavy, and they shall have to render a very strict account to their constituents. They shall have to render a very strict account to those before whom they pledged themselves to uphold the rights of the minority, to those electors before whom, on every possible occasion, they so strongly protested their devotedness to that minority, and before whom they had taken the engagement to defend the rights and privileges of the minority. Let us not forget, Mr. Chairman, that the people of the province of Quebec keep their eyes open on the doings of the Conservative party and of those members who are ready to come to the rescue of the minority. Should the members of the Opposition drop their motion to adjourn, we might pass this Bill within a few hours, for the few Conservative members who are not in their seats, but are within call, may be here directly. Let the Opposition under the leadership of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) withdraw their motion to adjourn. and there will not be found a single member in this House willing to oppose the passing of this Bill. Such is the course pursued by the Opposition. I now understand why. about midnight. the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) rose to a point of order. and raised an objection to the effect that. as the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) did not possess a full and practical knowledge of the French language. he should leave the Chair. This gives me an insight into the motives of the hon. member in raising such an objection ; it was to prevent the committee proceeding with the business. and to gain time. probably to enable the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) or the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). and all those who oppose the Bill. to come back to their seats. That objection was raised solely with a view to force the committee to rise. so that the whole sitting. from midnight to three o'clock in the afternoon. should be wasted. As the hon. member for Montmagny and his friends found that they could not force the committee to rise. their objection being sheer nonsense. these gentlemen sent out for the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to assume the leadership of the Opposition during the night. hoping. through their obstructive tactics. to reach the object they had in view. They thus expect. by keeping up obstruction and the blockade of business. to prevent the Bill passing in committee. Such is the shameful part played by those gentlemen. and I was right in saying that this night would prove fatal to the cause of the Manitoba minority. Had not the French Liberal members pursued the course they have adopted. had they not been so base-hearted as to betray the Catholic interests. and. if instead of lying down through the night. they had remained with us. the Conservative members. we might have passed this Bill. The people sent us here to work. and at the next elections. they will not ask them : did you sleep well ? No. but the people will ask the members : Did you work well ? Then. to those who have slept. the people will say : Since you need so much rest. stay at home and we will send to Parliament men who are able to work instead of sleeping.

Mr. GIBSON. I suppose the last two speakers on the Conservative side might be called the brains and the Belley of the party.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman who has taken his seat (Mr. Belley) has gone to a great deal of trouble to name the members on this side of the House who are absent. I venture to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that if he looks around on the Conservative benches he will find that there are not more than thirty members of his party present. and indeed we could count out the House if we wanted to. I was looking for the whip of the party but I see he has just arisen from the couch which he has arranged for himself in the House. Every night we have had a tirade of abuse from the Secretary of State. who has charged the Opposition with obstructing this measure. Now. this farce has gone about far enough. The Opposition have no desire to obstruct this Bill. The Minister of Trade and Commerce appealed to the Liberals to help the Government to pass the Bill. Are the Government so weak that they cannot pass the Bill themselves ? Up to the 2nd of March two months of the time of this session were spent on matters of far less importance than the measure. which the Government are now trying to force through in the dying hours of the session. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been threating the dire consequences that were going to happen to members of the Opposition who are absent to-night : yet. with one exception. none of the gentlemen on the Government side of the House who voted against the Bill are here to-night. And where are those who voted in favour of the Bill ? If there was any real desire on the part of these men to carry this Bill through. they ought to be here. But it is ridiculous to try to make the country believe that the Government want to put this measure through the House. They do not desire to put it through. They simply want to go to the country and say : " We would have passed the measure but for the obstruction we met with from the Opposition and other members opposed to the Bill." The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and nearly every member of the Government. who have spoken on this important matter. have always laid great stress on the desire to go to the country. Well, we are prepared to meet the Government on that question. and I am confident the Government are living in a fool's paradise as far as they are politically concerned. If the hon. Secretary of State would take a trip through the province of Ontario, he would come back with an altogether different idea from that which he expresses, regarding the opinion of the people on the conduct of the Government in forcing this measure through the House at this stage. The opinion in the mind of every fair-minded man is that the Government have no more desire to pass this measure than they had a year ago. when three or four of the Ministers struck over the question of submitting it to the House. Last session they were to have brought down a Remedial Bill. but the Cabinet could not come to a decision. and three of its members resigned. Then. in order to get the strikers back, they agreed to call the present session together for the special purpose of passing this remedial measure. Well, it is just as far away to-day as it was last session. From beginning to end the Government have been simply deluding the people, but they will find out that the people are not so easily deluded as they imagine.

Mr. BORDEN. It is really six o'clock on Friday morning, but according to the proceedings of this House it is still Monday last. This House has been in session continuously since three o'clock last Monday. This morning we had another act in the comedy. We had a remarkable speech from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and another from the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley), both of whom had evidently entered into an arrangement to indulge in their violent diatribes at an hour when they knew that the greater number of the Liberal members from the province of Quebec would not be in the House. They took occasion to call attention to the absence of Liberal members from the province of Quebec at an hour when it is unfair to expect that any of us should be in the House. It was pretty poor business on the part of these hon. gentlemen, to take advantage of the hour to make an attack when they knew the hon. members whom they were attacking were not present to reply. I undertake to say that every one of the members to whom these gentlemen referred has spent as much time following the business of the House this session as either of these gentlemen. When the Quebec Conservatives had played their little game, sprung on the House by the member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, they left the Chamber. If we entered into a discussion of the intricate clauses of the Bill what member of the Government are here now to explain it.

Mr. OUIMET. Try it.

Mr. BORDEN. I have great confidence in the Minister of Railways in matters affecting his department, but surely he would not ask me to take his opinion on any legal point, not to mention a difficult constitutional question like this. I believe that the Minister of Public Works is a lawyer, but I do not think he has given much attention to explaining this Bill in this House.

Mr. OUIMET. You never gave me a chance.

Mr. BORDEN. Lots of chances. I will sit down now and give you an opportunity.

Mr. OUIMET. Withdraw the motion to adjourn and I will explain the Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Public Works has a better opportunity to explain it on this motion. He can go into the whole Bill.

Mr. OUIMET. Does the hon. gentleman know what clause we are on ?

Mr. BORDEN. I do not think the Minister of Public Works does, but I am happy to be able to inform him that it is clause 10.

Mr. OUIMET. Has the hon. gentleman any criticism to offer on clause 10 ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, that it is not a proper clause to discuss at 6 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The committee should rise now because there are only four Quebec Conservatives here and one of them is asleep.

Mr. OUIMET. They will be all here in a few minutes if you give them an opportunity of hearing something about the clause under discussion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The point should be emphasized, if it is not denied, that there are only four Conservative members from the great province of Quebec in the House at present.

Mr. OUIMET. There is no use taking our friends away from their sleep if it is only to listen to idle talk and not discussion on the Bill.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How can they discuss the Bill if they are asleep ?

Mr. OUIMET. They are outside and will discuss the Bill if you let them.

Mr. BORDEN. The Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that from the beginning of the session, the Opposition had assumed the role of governing the House. Well, half of the Cabinet were on strike, and it was a good thing that there was an Opposition in this country to govern, because without them there would be no government.

Mr. WALLACE. Tell us why they went on strike.

Mr. OUIMET. This is a reflection on the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He told us everything about it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I merely touched on the outskirts of it, and I did not enter into details of the small strike, the smaller strike, and the smallest strike.

Mr. BORDEN. I will give the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) the view which I have been able to ascertain with reference to that interesting event. I believe that the strike was strictly due to the differences in the Cabinet on this Remedial Bill. I believe that they never had any intention of carrying this Bill into law. They passed the remedial order for the purpose of getting a certain vote in this country and they intended to go to the country afterwards in order to get that vote, but their game was up. That is the game the member for Chicoutimi is helping them to carry out. They never had any intention of carrying this measure into effect.

I repeat here that this moribund Parliament is not such a Parliament as should pass a measure of so paramount importance. We are expected to pass this measure in a Parliament elected on lists eight years old—a Parliament which does not represent to-day one-half of the electors of this Dominion ; a Parliament within three weeks of its expiration by effluxion of time, and composed of members, many of whom have not the slightest intention of returning to their constituents again, and who, honourable as they may be, are not, and cannot be, much influenced by public opinion or much interested in endeavouring to ascertain and be governed by the wishes of their constituents. Yet we find the Government resolved to force this measure through such a Parliament at such a time by the application of brute force. I say it is an undignified position for Parliament to occupy. It is a position which would justify a resort to obstruction. There has been no obstruction yet. The discussion of this Bill so far has been legitimate, so far as it has been permitted by the Government ; but the resort to such tactics would justify, and if persisted in will not only justify but render necessary, in order to maintain the dignity of Parliament, obstruction of the most determined kind ; and if persisted in, it will receive that. But I would hope that even yet, better counsels may prevail. On several occasions the olive branch has been held out from this side of the House ; the Government have been asked to have the discussion on this measure carried on in a business-like way and within reasonable hours ; but they refused, and they propose to dragoon this Parliament, which up to the present time has been supposed to be a free Parliament, to stay here from three o'clock on Monday afternoon till 12 o'clock on Saturday night. I say this is outrageous, insufferable conduct. It is conduct which should be condemned by a majority of this House. It is conduct which will receive the most severe condemnation and the most condign punishment when the facts are placed before the people, as they will be.

Now, I wish to speak of the effect of these long sittings upon the health of the members of this House. As a medical man it is to me inconceivable that the gentleman leading this House, himself a medical man, should force this House to persist in a line of conduct which may result in the permanent loss of health, perhaps the loss of life, to many members of this House. I say it would be inconceivable to me if I had not watched that hon. gentleman. He comes in here once in a while and sees things running nicely, and then, as the leader of the Opposition has said, like a volcano he vomits all kinds of vituperation—or "vitupperation"—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BORDEN. I suppose that is allowable at this hour of the morning—against members who are opposed to him on this side of the House, and then he goes to seek his downy couch. So the hon. gentleman is not much alarmed at what happens to us. He should be the last man to launch the members of this House into a course that is likely to injure their health ; and he is more responsible than he would be if he were not a member of the medical profession. Now, everybody knows that a supply of fresh air is absolutely necessary for health, but when the same air is breathed for several hours, it is turned into actual poison. I will now proceed to prove that. (The hon. member read at length from "Kirk's Handbook of Physiology," and other medical works.)

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). After reading clause 10, I would like to ask what Minister is in charge of the Bill.

Mr. DALY. I am.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant. I would like to ask him if we are to have power under this Act to compel municipalities to do any thing in reference to it.

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We must first settle the motion that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. DALY. I am prepared to answer any question the hon. gentleman asks in reference to clause 10, just as soon as the motion before the Chair is disposed of.

Mr. WALLACE. When a motion is before the Chair, and an amendment is made to it, we have the privilege of speaking both on the motion and on the amendment. We were told that clause 10 was the clause we had reached, and then an hon. member moved that the committee rise, and on that amendment we can either discuss clause 10 or the motion to rise. But if, when we have an opportunity to discuss clause 10, the hon. Minister refuses to do so, then the hypocrisy of the whole thing crops out.

Mr. DALY. I do not proposed to be accused of hypocrisy by the hon. gentleman. I am astonished that an hon. member who has been in the House as long as he has, would state a proposition such as that. A motion that the committee rise and ask leave to sit again is hardly a motion in amendment to the consideration of clause 10. It is true that the committee can discuss any clause in the Bill they choose, but when a motion to adjourn is before the Chair, members can ask the Government any questions they choose, but the Government are not called upon to discuss any clauses of the Bill under those circumstances. We sat here till nearly three o'clock this morning for the purpose of discussing the Bill, the hon. member for Guysboro' was talking about extraneous matters, and when called to order, he moved that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Clause 10 has not even been put before the committee from the Chair. Clause 10 is no more under discussion than clause 74.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is your ruling ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We shall have to decide the motion to adjourn before we take up clause 10.

Mr. WALLACE. Clause 9 was under discussion by the committee, it was dropped, and we proceeded at once to clause 10. I would remind the Chairman that when the hon. member for Guysboro' was speaking the Chairman himself called him to time, and said he must speak to clause 10. The member for Guysboro' said : Then I will put myself in order by moving that the committee rise and report progress. Now, we want to investigate and examine into these clauses and see what this Bill means, and the moment the hon. member for Brant attempts to do that, the Government and their supporters try to prevent him.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). Why don't you get to work and discuss the Bill ?

Mr. WALLACE. The member for South Ontario has sat here ever since three o'clock and has not attempted for one minute to discuss this Bill.

Mr. DALY. I am in a position on behalf of the Government to answer any questions about clause 10 as soon as that clause has been put by the Chairman. The Government has been prepared at all times to discuss this Bill when any one of its provisions is properly before the Chair.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see we have now, after an interval again, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his place. I listened to his speech this morning with a good deal of amusement, mingled with righteous indignation. I thought it was a speech that might have been looked for from some one who was in a better position to make it than he was himself. He seemed to desire to discredit and injure the Liberal members from Quebec by pointing out that they were not in the House.

Mr. MACDOWALL. There is only one here now.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister of Trade and Commerce ventured to ask, Where was the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), mentioning his name. Now, I want to tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that it may go upon record where this question has gone, that although I have not by watch kept the time, I have been in this House a good deal by day and by night, and I firmly believe that the member for Huntingdon has been in this House during the discussions on this Bill at least three times as long as the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would like him to deny it if he can.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman having appealed to me, perhaps I ought to say that I was referring to a peculiar concatenation of circumstances, which I considered as peculiarly favourable to making progress with the Bill, namely, that all the McCarthyites were absent from the House. I regretted the absence of the member for Huntingdon at that particular moment, because I might influence the hon. gentleman who is leading the Opposition to desist from his obstruction, and, in that case, as there were only three or four other Liberals in the House, they could be easily persuaded to withdraw their objections, and we might pass the Bill in the absence of the McCarthyites.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The explanation we have from the Minister is this, that provided the McCarthyites were out of the House, and there were only some half dozen Liberals in the House, the 103 remaining clauses of one of the most important Bills, according to the Secretary of State, that has ever been before Parliament, would have been passed before these gentlemen arrived upon the scene. That is the hon. Minister's idea of legislation, that he has solemnly put upon the "Hansard." When the hon. Minister this morning was pointing out the absence of a number of the Liberal members by name, and asking where they were, he was rather checkmated when my hon. friend pointed out the fact that there were only four Conservative members present from the province of Quebec, and then the French whip went out, and soon came back with the member for North Victoria and another, a French member. He simply emphasized the fact that this Bill is being pushed through while the Conservatives from the province of Quebec as well as the Liberals from that province who have the greatest interest in this measure are at home taking their needed rest. He has emphasized the fact that of the forty-five Quebec members on the Conservative side only four of them were found here through the night. I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce was followed by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley). He took the same line. That is all he has contributed to this debate, except unseemly interruptions. He could put it on "Hansard" that the French Liberals were not present. I put it on "Hansard" that he is here, but that he has not been and cannot be here day and night. And although an urgent whip was sent out the only addition that they could make to the Conservative members present, was in the person of the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte). It is said the McCarthyites are away. If the member for West York is to be counted in that list they have no more been away than have the French bleu members. The hon. gentleman has only emphasized the fact that barely five French Conservative members are here.

Mr. BELLEY. Withdraw your motion and they will come.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That will not bring them here. The whip has been sent out, and they are not within the precincts of the House. Why were they not here giving support and countenance to the Minister of Trade and Commerce during his attack upon the French Liberals, instead of cutting the ground from under his feet and convicting the Government of insincerity by their absence. He asks: Where is Scriver? If I might follow his unparliamentary form of expression, I might say, Where is Caron? He is not in this House.

Mr. BELLEY. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). He is not in this chamber. Let that go on "Hansard." Let that go to the French constituencies together with what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The hon. Postmaster General is in his room, within reach. Withdraw your motion and he will be here directly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Where is the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) The Minister of Public Works is here also.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). (Translation.) Speak English.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) You speak French well.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). (Translation.) I do not speak French well.

I do not know the members of the constituencies of the different Quebec Conservatives, and cannot enumerate them as these hon. gentlemen did. But I mention this fact that during these long hours of our sitting there have only been five of them, sometimes only three. The names of these can be ascertained, and it will then be known to their constituents who those are who are absent.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Let the hon. member have the motion to adjourn withdrawn, and forty Conservative members will be here directly, ready to discuss this Bill.

Mr. PATTERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman is getting somewhat excited about it. He begins to see that it was somewhat of a mistake to call attention to the matter. If I were to follow the hon. gentleman's unparliamentary form of address, I would ask: Where is Tupper? Where is the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) who has charge of this Bill?

Mr. PRIOR. Do not worry about him.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is amusing to hear the Controller of Revenue bearing testimony on this subject. He has been here, but asleep with his mouth open and actually obstructing business with his snores.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, I never snore.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Where is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey)? I call attention to his absence, not at four o'clock in in the morning, but at eight o'clock in the morning when it is daylight, when people have had their breakfast. He is not here to answer questions. And when I propose to discuss clause 12 the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) who was supposed to have charge of the Bill in the absence of the others either would not or could not answer a simple question. He said he would not. But, though all these are absent, they ask the House to go on and do business. Why, there are more McCarthyites, as they call them, present than there are Ministers, and almost as many as there are supporters of the Government. The Minister of Trade and Commerce wants 109 clauses passed, before the members who had been away for an hour or two's rest have returned to the chamber. He said there were only eight important sections in the Bill and when I asked what they were, he could not tell me. And the Minister of Public Works had to hand him a list, and it was found there were only six at that. By this discussion we have brought to our notice the abject position—if that is not an unparliamentary phrase—of the followers of the Government. The leader of the House sits here during his convenience until about one or two in the morning, while the Bill is being discussed. And when he wishes to take rest, as he ought to do he leaves his commands to those about him: I am going to bed, but you must deny yourselves rest; do not dare to move out of your places, but keep this thing going until it suits my convenience to come back. And he will come back at twelve or one o'clock the next day. And members receiving their orders obey them. The humble member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) must obey his order and carry on this child's-play of pretending to enact this Bill. And the whip (Mr. Taylor) the independent member of the party who proposes to move an amendment which will have the effect of reconstructing this whole Bill. He has not moved it on any of the clauses, though many of them are so objectionable from his point of view. But on the third reading, which may never be reached he is going to move for a special committee to bring in a new Bill to be passed at this session which comes to a close on the 24th April. It is lamentable to see in a Canadian Parliament, men who, at the mandate of one man will sit here depriving themselves of their rest, not to do business but simply to obey the mandate of a man who is in control. I have been interested to notice how that hon. gentleman seems to have made a point of humiliating one by one those about him. He has tried to crush the independence out of all. In such gentlemen as the hon. member from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and others he found men who would not bend their necks to his dictation, he was only able to denounce them, to threaten them with the wrath of their constituencies, but he has not cowed them. We had thought that the Minister of Railways and Canals was a gentleman who would not submit to indignity at the hands of the leader of the House. He was credited with being the leader of that section of the Cabinet opposed to this measure. But the leader of the House was determined to humble that gentleman, and humble him he did in the sight of all the members of this House. He handed the hon. Minister a document and said: Read that. He made the Minister of Railways and Canals the medium of his own humiliation and the glorification of the Secretary of State. It was a statement which it was alleged Mr. McCarthy had made about Sir Charles Tupper, and it was this:

> No men felt ashamed to acknowledge Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper as their leaders.

Mr. DALY. It is only fair that we should have this matter put properly. The hon. Secretary of State has spoken before, and the Speaker ruled that he could not speak again. So, of necessity, he had to hand it to the Minister of Railways and Canals

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the hon. Minister of the Interior tell me that there was a gentleman in the Chair of this committee at the time who ruled that a member having spoken, might not speak again?

Mr. DALY. That question shows how much the hon. gentleman knows about what took place. I said the Speaker was in the Chair, and ruled that the leader of the House could not speak again.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Without the consent of the House.

Mr. DALY. Yes; without unanimous consent.

Mr. WALLACE. When a member of the House offered to give the Secretary of State an opportunity of making his own statement by moving an adjournment he would not accept but handed the document back, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has said, to the Minister of Railways and Canals, to do his bidding.

Mr. DALY. Which he had a perfect right to do.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Haggart moved the adjournment, but the Speaker did not take it, and it was not seconded. And it was because it was not effectively moved that the paper was handed back to the hon. Minister.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). According to the report here it was moved by two gentlemen.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) objected to the Secretary of State reading the document. If the hon. member will read the record he will see that.

Mr. BORDEN. I have a distinct recollection of the matter. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was perfectly willing that the Secretary of State should speak, provided the adjournment was moved which would give the hon. member for North Simcoe an opportunity to answer.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I find, according to the record, that the Minister of Railways, in reply to the hon. member for North Simcoe, read that hon. gentleman's language:

> No man felt ashamed to acknowledge Sir John Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper as their leaders.

Then the Secretary of State determined that he would degrade the Minister of Railways by making him the instrument to read words involving his own condemnation, and so that the hon. Minister was forced to read the continuation:

> But look at these men now in power, and you will hang your head in shame.

The Secretary of State forced two divisions in the committee and then boasted that all the members who voted with the Government, including those members who voted against the second reading of the Bill, are now supporting the Bill and seeking to pass it into law. One reason why the Government refused to allow this committee to rise is to prevent the submission of the report of the commissioners to Manitoba and a discussion thereon. Members of this House are obliged to glean their information regarding the conference from the newspapers. It is true that a statement has been submitted to the Senate. This should have been submitted to the popular House long ago. In the correspondence a telegram is published purporting to have been sent by Mr. Greenway to Sir Donald Smith. The question as to the accuracy of that telegram was brought up in this House, when the Secretary of State was compelled to admit that an important sentence had been omitted. That sentence does not appear in the telegram as published in the correspondence. The correspondence also showed that a distinct agreement was entered into between the Dominion Commissioners and Manitoba Commissioners that the progress of the Remedial Bill should be stopped during the negotiations. Nevertheless it is well known that the Bill was advanced a stage while the negotiations were being proceeded with. That is a most serious charge, and an opportunity should be given by the committee rising and reporting progress, to Ministers to explain this gross breach of faith. Now, we find in this document the Manitoba Commissioners complaining of a grave breach of faith on the part of the Dominion Government, and the representatives of the Dominion Government acknowledging that they so view it. It is of the utmost concern that this matter should be at once brought before the House, and an opportunity afforded of explaining that gross breach of faith. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have also to consider the fact that many members who voted for the second reading of the Bill do not represent the views of their constituents in reference to it. According to the organs of public opinion, this is the case with the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald), the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), and the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis), together with the four members from Manitoba—these gentlemen misrepresent their constituencies when they voted for the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The hon. gentleman is utterly mistaken so far as the member for Saskatchewan is concerned, and for this reason, that in 1891, before the general elections, I pledged myself to my constituents to do nothing that would interfere with separate schools in the North-west. I therefore had a direct mandate from my constituents ; and when the hon. gentleman knows that, perhaps he will withdraw the charge of misrepresentation.

Mr. McDONALD (East Assiniboia). I believe in my constituency there are eight newspapers printed, and not one of them has expressed a reverse opinion upon my vote in this House.

Mr. WALLACE. I have received a number of letters from that hon. gentleman's constituency, expressing great dissatisfaction with him.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do I understand the member for Saskatchewan to say that he pledged his constituents he would vote for this Bill ?

Mr. MACDOWALL. If the hon. gentleman had listened to what I said, he would have understood that I pledged myself to my constituents not to do anything that would interfere with separate schools during the life of this Parliament.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That has reference to the North-west Territories, and not to the subject of this Bill.

Mr. MACDOWALL. It has to do with the North-west, and with the principle of separate schools.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then you are interfering when you establish them in Manitoba.

Mr. MACDOWALL. No ; I am not interfering. The Greenway government are interfering.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman has no other answer.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I consider that my mandate had reference to this Bill.

Mr. DALY. I am perfectly satisfied as to what was the position of the hon. gentleman upon this question. During last session and the whole of the present session, there was no question as to how he was going to vote.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I want to know if this Minister is the father-confessor of the hon. gentleman, and knows all his secrets. The Minister of the Interior thinks it is necessary to answer for him. Let the member for Saskatchewan answer for himself.

Mr. DALY. It is my business to know the hon. gentleman's opinions on that subject, for I am the Minister who represents in the Cabinet the portion of country the hon. gentleman represents in this House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman surely will not be ashamed to get up and say so himself.

Mr. MACDOWALL. What does the hon. gentleman wish me to say ?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That you have been all along in favour of voting for this Bill now before the House.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I told the hon. gentleman that I was pledged to maintain a certain principle.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). A principle that has nothing to do with this Bill at all.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The hon. gentleman seems to misunderstand me. I said I was pledged to this principle. The Bill supports the principle, the principle does not support the Bill.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman cannot get around it in that way. There is a plain statement made by the Minister of the Interior. Does the hon. gentleman say that is true ?

Mr. MACDOWALL. Certainly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That you have been in favour of this Bill for the past year, and that goes on record ?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I could not be in favour of a Bill which I had never seen. I said that I was in favour of the principle of the Bill. I gave notice that I would introduce a Bill myself which covers the principle, but of a little broader kind.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I stated that if we take the organs of public opinion in the North-west——

Mr. MACDOWALL. What organs ?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Regina "Leader."

Mr. MACDOWALL. That is not an organ of public opinion in the North-west.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Regina "Leader" has received more Government subsidy than any other paper in the North-west, many times over.

Mr. DALY. Not from this Government, we have nothing to do with it. It gets its subsidy from the North-west government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman will not deny that it is favourable to the Administration ?

Mr. DALY. It has not been favourable to the Administration for some time.

Mr. McDONALD (East Assiniboia). The Regina "Leader" is not an organ of public opinion in the constituency I represent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Here is what the Regina "Leader" says on this point :

> Regardless of political lines—Conservatives, Liberals and Patrons alike—the people of the West are practically unanimous against unnecessary interference. If Mr. Davin voted under coercion, we have no words to designate his conduct. If he voted honestly and honourably according to an altered conviction, we say he knowingly cast a vote which he had no warrant from his constituents to cast,—and he occupies a position of an usurper in casting it.

Mr. BERGIN. What are you reading from?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am reading an extract from the Regina "Leader," which is embalmed in the "Hansard" of April the 7th. I may mention that the other day I had occasion to send into the Library to get the Regina "Leader," when I found that this particular article had been cut out of it. Now, Sir, I desire to discuss clause 10, and ask questions about it, and we are told that it cannot be discussed. The Minister of Justice is not here, the Minister of Public Works is not here, the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not here—the gentleman who, at three o'clock this morning, asked, where was the member for Huntingdon ? The member for Huntingdon is now in his seat, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce has disappeared.

Mr. DALY. Will the hon. gentleman withdraw the motion and allow us to discuss the Bill.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not make the motion, and I cannot withdraw it.

Mr. MACDOWALL. But the hon. gentleman has the power to allow the chairman to vote on this. Then we can discuss the Bill.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). While I am thinking that point over, will the hon. gentleman think over what the Minister of the Interior said with reference to his position.

Mr. DALY. That is in accordance with the rules of the House. Let the hon. gentleman withdraw the motion or allow it to be voted on, and then we can discuss clause 10, and I will answer any questions he may ask.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman has power to answer my question, but I have no power to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. DALY. I will suggest a way out of the difficulty. The hon. gentleman has talked an hour. Let him sit down and allow others who wish to speak on this motion do so. Then we shall be all the nearer to a vote on the motion before the committee.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I will accept that offer, and make way for others who wish to speak.

Mr. WALLACE. The reason why I think the committee should rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again is because we are face to face with clause 10, which is the most iniquitous and inconsistent in the Bill. It purposes in the first place to give municipal councils the power to do several things. Among others it gives them power to establish and alter the school districts. Now, where do the municipal councils get their power from ? All the powers they have are delegated to them by the local legislature ; therefore, this provision is a clear invasion of the rights of the legislature. But that is not all. This power of the local legislature must be exercised subject to the approval of this precious Board of Education ; which may not meet for six months, the machinery of the Act being blocked in the meantime so far as the making of the school districts is concerned, and this may delay the building of school-houses. An appeal is also allowed to the school board from the decision of the municipal council in certain cases, and they may cut and carve school districts to suit themselves, just as the parish priest or the bishop does in Quebec.

Mr. JONCAS. No.

Mr. WALLACE. I say yes.

Mr. JONCAS. It is done by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Mr. WALLACE. But the Lieutenant-Governor in Council is only a tool in his hands. And the same system is proposed to be forced upon the province of Manitoba. I do not wonder that the Minister of the Interior does not wish to answer the questions put to him, for this clause is the worst that could be put upon the statute-book.

Mr. DALY. But it was upon the statute-book of Manitoba from 1871 to 1890.

Mr. WALLACE. There was no board of education of this kind in the province of Manitoba. But even if it is claimed that there was, the system was found so bad, so absurd, that the Manitoba legislature repealed the law. The people of Manitoba do not want it and we are not going to force it upon them, and these hon. gentlemen know it. If they do not know it now, they will probably be better informed on Saturday at midnight. I am sure that the members of the Cabinet are too capable and sensible to have adopted a clause like this after fair consideration. It has been thrust upon them by Mr. Ewart, or Mr. Somebody-else, the agent of Archbishop Langevin. If we ever reach this clause to consider it on its merits, I am sure the House will unanimously vote it down, or modify it so as to make it reasonable and workable. We should rise and give the Government an opportunity to consider and amend this clause.

Mr. DALY. Why did they give the municipalities this power under the present law ? You are exhibiting ignorance of the present law which is lamentable.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has not been listening to my observation. What I was trying to show was, that the municipality was not given any power at all. This law takes it away while professing to give it. Does the hon. gentlemn dispute my assertion ?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. I will have to repeat to him what I have said. The action of the Government involves an attempt to coerce Manitoba, and to do so by coercing this free Parliament. Never in the history of Canada, nor, so far as my political reading goes, in any country having British institutions, has such a flagrant and barefaced attempt been made as that now made by the Secretary of State to capture the Roman Catholic vote.

Mr. TURCOTTE. He did right.

Mr. WALLACE. I contend that this country should not be governed on religious lines. The leader of this House is making a serious political blunder, and at the same time is not acting as a patriot and statesman. The Roman Catholics cannot be hoodwinked by such a transparent subterfuge. Religious issues will not conduce to the prosperity and unity of the people, and must be followed by retaliation on both sides. The elections should be fought out on the question of protection or free trade.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I must express surprise at the little interest taken in passing this Bill through committee. Later in the day, when it suits hon. members to be present, they come in and declare in loud tones their determination to put this Bill through. I have heard the leader of the House assailed on account of being absent from the Chamber. Considering his years and the state of his health, I am prepared to excuse his absence, but similar allowance must be made for other hon. members who may not be in robust health. I have been a life-long opponent of separate schools. As long ago as 1890, when there was a question of a disallowance of the Manitoba School Act, Mr. Robert White, then representing the adjoining constituency to mine, sent a telegram to Sir John A. Macdonald for instructions, as the convention at which he was a candidate had asked him to pledge himself in writing to oppose the veto of the Manitoba School Act, should the Dominion Government of that day see fit to veto it. Mr. White having consulted with me, I thought I was at liberty to act on the same lines.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). What was Sir John's answer ?

Mr. TYRWHITT. Sir John did give Mr. White permission to pledge himself in writing to his future constituents, that he would oppose the Government if they vetoed that Act, and acting upon that telegram, I pledged myself in the same way : and from that time till now I have repeated my pledge whenever this subject was under discussion, in my constituency or elsewhere. I will not criticise the members of the House who have not pledged themselves in the same way, and who are able to answer to their own conscience for their conduct. I feel that in taking the position I do now, I am acting up to my own convictions. I wish the Minister of Public Works would not leave the Chamber, as I shall have something to say to him shortly. I believe, also, that I am acting in the interests of my own constituents, and furthering a cause which is for the best interests of this Dominion. Now, we who have not been able to follow the Government on this question, have been described as McCarthyites, a term which may not be so great a disgrace. But let me draw the attention of this committee to the conduct of some of those hon. members who reproach us with deserting the party. In days when some of those hon. members might have faltered, in days of danger to the party in my constituency, I stood by the party and supported Sir John Thompson when, for reasons it is not necessary for me to elaborate, but which can be readily imagined, that hon. gentleman was not popular in my constituency. We have now another question before the country which calls upon us to act up to our conscientious convictions. Let me draw attention to the conduct of some of the men who have criticised us severely. I will begin with the Deputy Speaker, a gentleman who ought to be in his chair at the present time, and doing something for the additional salary which he is paid. We remember the time when a motion of want of confidence was moved in the Conservative Government, and when that hon. gentleman voted against the party of which he was a member, and when he rose in his place on the opposite side of the House, and reviled our late leader, Sir John A. Macdonald, for having brought to justice a man who should have been twice convicted of crime instead of once. Now, that hon. gentleman appears to have a tender spot in his heart for criminals of this character, for if we are to believe common report of the day, he has approached the representative of the sovereign in this land and asked that justice should not be meted out upon a criminal equally guilty. I do not make this assertion knowing it to be true, but because I have heard that it is commonly reported in the country. This is one of the gentlemen who taunts me today with deserting my party, and yet when there was actual necessity to stand by the party, he acted in the manner I have described. Then we have the Minister of Public Works, the prince of kickers, a gentleman who kicked himself into the Speaker's chair, a gentleman who kicked himself into the Government, and who kicked himself out of it. It is within the recollection of many members of this House that the Minister of Public Works formed a conspiracy with others in room No. 8, to make a raid on the Treasury of this country, when I and other friends of the party sat in this House expecting that he would march in with his band that he had formed and with which he had conspired against the Government. And this is one of the gentlemen who would read me out of the party : this is one of the gentlemen who alluded to myself and others as renegade Conservatives. Only recently again this gentleman has refused to obey the party discipline which he wishes to enforce upon others. Only a year ago that hon. gentleman, because he could not have his own way in the Cabinet, resisted the authority of the Premier, and temporarily read himself out of the party ; and I regret that on account of the weakness of the head of the party at that time, he was not allowed to remain out of the Cabinet. I need not go further to quote precedents of a member of a party taking action different from that of others. These are two instances of gentlemen who would assume to discipline me now, and teach me the duties of a Conservative. I was born in that faith, and I do not propose either to be read out, or driven out, of the party by gentlemen whose loyalty is like that of the Minister of Public Works. Now, I regret that the hon. gentleman is not present, for the simple reason that I have a little further to say to the hon. gentleman, but as I asked him to remain, I think I am quite justified in proceeding in his absence. Now, Sir, we hear occasionally of men who are willing to die for their country. That gentleman was once willing to die for his country. As the fortunes of war would have it, I happened to be following him on one train, and you can easily imagine my surprise in meeting the Minister of Public Works returning by the same train which had taken him up ; in fact he took the next train back again, he got out of the country as soon as possible.

Mr. ROOME. What has that to do with the question.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I will attend to the hon. gentleman shortly. Now, allusion has been made to the fact that the hon. member for North Grey, who now, by courtesy, we must call His Honour Judge Masson, has been appointed to the bench. He occupied a seat beside me, and he and I have had a few altercations over this subject. I will not criticise His Honour, but I will just make this announcement, which has not been made to the House, that while he represented the riding of North Grey in this House and voted as he saw fit on the second reading, his successor, Mr. McLaughlin, who is now stumping the constituency, has voluntarily pledged himself as being opposed to the legislation which is now attempted to be forced through this House. I think it ill-becomes some hon. gentlemen to taunt us with want of party loyalty, in view of the example they themselves have set. Now, there is the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who I regret also not to see in his seat, and who, although a western member, apparently takes little interest in the subject under discussion. I have known him intimately, and up till within a few hours of the vote on the second reading, he led me to suppose that he was opposed to the second reading. I was led to believe that he was in earnest in that intention, for the reason that, like myself, he had been educating public opinion in his part of the country to believe that this Bill was not in the interest of the Dominion, or of his particular section of country. I am further led to believe that he was sincere in that opinion, for the reason that the paper of which he has been the manager, has announced to the public the fact that he and they had parted ways, for while he and the Regina "Leader" were originally on the same platform, the "Leader" since then denounces the member for West Assiniboia. But for some unaccountable reason the hon. gentleman saw fit to change his mind at the eleventh hour, and vote contrary to the views which he had been expressing for a number of years, and contrary to the views of his constituents. He now offers some paltry excuse to this House for his change of views. I noticed yesterday, in his speech in this House, that he made use of the hackneyed phrase "evil communications corrupt good manners." I think the hon. member for West Assiniboia has had some evil communications immediately before giving his vote on the second reading. Now, in mentioning the number of kickers who have at some time or other opposed their party, I must not except the Minister of the Interior, and the Controller of Inland Revenue. I was reminded the other day that the Minister of the Interior voted against the party on the question of the disallowance of an Act of the Manitoba legislature. Disallowance in Manitoba was a live issue which affected the interest of his constituency, and this is a live issue in my constituency, and directly affects me. Now, there was a debate in the House the other night in the course of which the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) described the character of the structure that this House was attempting to rear by passing this Bill. He said that one class of workmen came in during the day and built it on a Grecian model, and another class of workmen came in during the night, and built it on a Doric model, and the question was, what kind of structure it was going to be. Thereupon the leader of the House announced that his intention was that it should be a Roman structure. Now, my constituents have a very decided objection to that class of building, and would prefer that it should be given some other name. As the hon. member for West Middlesex has seen fit to interrupt me, I must say that I am sorry to see that he is so derelict in his duty as not to appear until half-past nine in the morning, while the rest of us have been here all night trying to throw light on this question and get information from the discussion. While we are here, this hon. gentleman goes away and remains for a week or ten days——

Mr. ROOME. Not at all.

Mr. TYRWHITT. About a week, I think.

Mr. ROOME. I was away from Saturday until Tuesday morning.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I apologize. It was only two days that the hon. gentleman was away. But I would draw his attention, and that of his constituents, to the fact that if he was so anxious to press this Bill to a conclusion, he should have been present and not neglect his duties while compelling the rest of us to remain in the House for 24 hours a day.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. It is evident that the hon. gentleman who last spoke has picked up a cap that will never fit his head. He said he had been classed among the renegades. If he thought he was being classed as a renegade to the Conservative party, I do not blame him for referring to the matter and repudiating such an expression. But I do not believe that that expression was ever intended to embrace the hon. gentleman—as true a Conservative as ever sat in this House. He may differ from his friends on some points, and in that case has a right to express his conscientious convictions. It would be a sorry day for this House if gentlemen who feel compelled to vote against their associates are to be accused of not voting conscientiously. If I were to take a different view, I should stigmatize myself for my own vote. No vote that I ever gave was more conscientiously given than that I gave on this Bill. And I believe that no man voted more conscientiously on the other side than the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt). It has been said that the Government is not candid in pressing this Bill through, but that their desire is to represent to the Frenchmen that they did all that they could to get the Bill through, while being able to turn to the Protestants and say the Bill was no good and, therefore, they allowed it to fall through. Though not a member of the Cabinet, I repudiate the statement. I believe no Government ever brought a Bill before Parliament with a greater determination to put it through, if possible, than that with which the Government laid this Bill before this House. I believe there has been plenty of time to give due consideration and discussion to the Bill, if hon. gentlemen opposed to it will—not give their assistance—but will avoid obstruction. I have no objection to legitimate discussion. What are we here for but to discuss the Bill ?

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. I think we have discussed the clauses of the Bill for some thirty or forty hours—at any rate a great many hours. Has the hon. gentleman taken any part, and, if so, what part, in the discussion of this Bill, which he says should be so fully discussed ? He is talking now upon what he calls an obstructive motion.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I have not used the words "obstructive motion."

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman said "obstruction."

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I said I objected to obstruction.

Mr. EDGAR. I have asked the hon. gentleman a question. How often did the hon. gentleman occupy the attention of the committee in the discussion of these clauses which we have discussed and amended greatly to the improvement of the Bill ?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I am proud to say that I am one of the members who have not taken up any time in this discussion in committee. I took up enough time on the second reading. I think it would have been in the interests of the country if a great many others had refrained from speaking on the clauses.

Mr. EDGAR. Oh, I do not say that the country lost anything by the hon. gentleman not speaking.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I would ask the hon. gentleman to follow what I say. I have never said that there had been obstruction by the Opposition as a party. I approve of fair discussion, but I object to obstruction. The last ten or twelve hours have been taken up with the discussion whether the committee should rise or not, and some peculiar arguments have been used. One hon. gentleman read for an hour from a medical work. I think that was a little aside from the question.

Mr. EDGAR. Was it not on the subject of the ventilation of this Chamber ?

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman was not present yet he knows what went on. It would seem that it must have been arranged last night.

Mr. EDGAR. I was told so.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) was not here, compelled to breathe the vitiated air of this Chamber, but he can come here now and sneer at those who have been present attending to their duties.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I was not sneering. And if I was away, I think there are few but will say : We are glad you had a few days off. The reading of the medical work may have been proper in a professional gentleman. But all school books contain similar information in regard to health. One hour was thus occupied by the gentleman, which might otherwise have been devoted to the consideration of clause 10. The hon. gentleman even went so far as to charge the leader of the House, who is a physician, with keeping hon. members in this Chamber sufficiently long to injure the health of members of the Opposition, and that some benefit would follow to the party. Surely that must have been uttered as a jest. Another class of argument used is that the Government are so desirous to pass the Bill that they have bought up some members. It has been deliberately stated that all members were not voting independently. If there is any truth in that charge, it indicates a determined effort by the Government to carry the Bill. My name has been mentioned two or three times during this debate. I do not think any hon. gentleman undertook to say that I had a position in my pocket, but the roundabout way was resorted to of stating that some newspapers contained such a report. That is hardly an honourable way for an hon. gentleman to act. If he is not prepared to make a charge, it is better for him not to make the insinuation in an underhand way. I should not like to charge the hon. gentleman with voting in a certain way because he had the promise of a position in his pocket, and any hon. gentleman who made such an insinuation should on reflection regret it. I will, however, take this opportunity of saying, in answer to the insinuation that has been made, that neither have I a promise of office nor have I looked for one yet at the hands of the Government. I observe that while hon. members of the Opposition are declaring that the Government do not sincerely desire to pass this Bill, the " Globe " in a recent issue declared that the leader of the House was not only determined to pass this coercion Bill, but to do so without discussion. The Conservative party have voted for this measure, and if other hon. members who favour it will unite with them, it may yet be carried, as I understand there are only six or eight more clauses which will involve serious discussion. This could be done in view of the majority already given in favour of the Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the majority in favour of the Government according to the hon. gentleman's calculation ? I desire to obtain that information in view of a calculation made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. There was a majority of 18 in favour of the second reading.

Mr. IVES. It may be placed at 60 or 70, if you include those who voted against the Bill and are now sorry for it.

Mr. EDGAR. The Secretary of State calculated the majority at 90.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I was speaking of the majority on the second reading. The estimate of the Minister of Trade and Commerce may, however, be more nearly correct. If hon. members are changing their opinion in favour of the Government as rapidly as are the voters in the district where I have been lately, the majority may certainly be placed at about 90.

Mr. EDGAR. Is the hon. gentleman referring to his own county ?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I have been in my county and can assure the hon. gentleman that voters by the dozens and scores who thirty days ago were opposed to the Government, to-day consider that the Government course is the proper one. In the north part of the county a large executive meeting was held and strong resolutions passed endorsing the action of the Government and my action in supporting them. Having been there three of four days. I have met with people who a month or two ago were opposed to the Government's action, and yet now declare they have the utmost confidence in the course pursued by the Government.

Mr. EDGAR. We should like to hear if the hon. gentleman is going to run again, especially in view of this reported change in public opinion ? One of the matters talked about a good deal in connection with the hon. gentleman's vote was that he voted as he did because he was not going to run again, and that if he had been going to run he would not have so voted. I should be glad to hear whether the hon. gentleman has reconsidered his determination and is going to run again.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I never told any one I would not run again. I do not know how the hon. gentleman has that information.

Mr. EDGAR. It is the talk of the House.

Mr. IVES. It is the talk on the Opposition side of the House.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I have never made such statement outside of the House or inside of the Chamber. The hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is the author of a pamphlet addressed to ultra-Protestants, and he must feel glad indeed if the ultra-Protestant views are being moderated. At the same time I may say that I should be very glad to be out of politics, and such action would suit my family. I came here to support the Conservative party, and I have done so. I have also endeavoured to promote the interest of my constituency, although I hold the view that I come to Parliament not only to represent my county, but in a general sense all the constituencies in this Dominion.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman has been good enough to allude to a little brochure of which I am the author. In it I protested against any unfair treatment of the Catholic minority of Ontario or the Catholic minority in Manitoba. So much do I resent unfair treatment to the Catholic minority that I would not be a party to insulting them by offering them such a Bill as that now before the House, which is introduced on the eve of a general election to serve political ends.

Mr. SEMPLE. The Government have not yet shown this House the courtesy of placing before us an official copy of the proceedings of the Winnipeg conference, though I see that a copy of the same has been presented to the Senate. Now, there are some things in this document which this committee might well devote some time to considering. (The hon. gentleman read at some length from the report of the Winnipeg conference, including a proposition about normal schools). Here the Dominion commissioners ask that a normal school should be established for the special benefit of the Catholic minority. In the province of Ontario we have two excellent normal schools. One of them is situated in this city of Ottawa, and the Government has appointed as its head. Dr. MacCabe, a distinguished Catholic gentleman. There is no question of religion in the normal schools, and we find that Dr. McCabe has under his care both Protestant and Catholic students, whom he instructs in the best mode and manner of teaching in the public schools of the province. I think it was unreasonable in the Dominion commissioners to ask that a normal school should be established in Manitoba to instruct teachers how to teach in separate schools. The report shows that outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface the minority are perfectly satisfied with the present system. And it shows also, that the Manitoba government is ready to remedy any well-founded grievance. This is proof of the wisdom of my leader's course, in proposing that a commission should be appointed to learn the facts in this dispute. The commission appointed by this Government made good progress, and if they had had more time, no doubt they could have reached a settlement. The Secretary of State told us that this Bill was carried by a substantial majority. That majority was eighteen, and if ten members who voted for the Bill had changed their votes, the Bill would have been defeated. And it has been reported throughout the country, and I think it is generally believed, that a number of the members were dependent upon the Government, and expecting positions, and that they voted against the well-understood wishes of their constituents. One of these gentlemen has gone to his reward, and is now to be styled judge of Huron.

Mr. BENNETT. Has the hon. gentleman any authority for saying that Mr. Masson voted against the wishes of his constituents?

Mr. SEMPLE. I heard the statement made by an hon. gentleman this morning that Mr. Masson's successor as a Conservative candidate is canvassing the riding, and has stated on the platform that he is opposed to the Bill.

Mr. BENNETT. Is the hon. gentleman aware that Mr. Masson made a speech in favour of remedial legislation last year, and that since then a convention was held in his riding which did not disapprove of the sentiments he expressed? I rise because I do not believe that it is fair that men should be attacked who are not here to defend themselves.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Possibly I may have misled the hon. gentleman who is speaking by saying this morning in good faith that Mr. Masson's successor was now canvassing——

Mr. TAYLOR. Stumping.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Stumping the riding opposed to the Remedial Bill. Since making that statement I have been informed that Mr. McLaughlin is now in town. The member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) attempts to quibble on words. When I said "stumping" I did not use it in the sense of excluding a private canvass and the feeling of the pulse of the riding, preparatory to taking the stump and carrying on a general campaign. He may be in the adjoining room, and still be on the stump, in a certain sense of the word. One thing is certain—he is the Conservative candidate, and I believe he has expressed himself as strongly in opposition to the Bill before the House. I am prepared to stand corrected if this is not the case. Of course, I cannot answer for anything that may happen in the meantime between the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and others, for whatever version may be given. I made the statement in good faith, and after having seen letters on the subject from the constituency.

Mr. EDGAR. I think it is plain that the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is thoroughly "stumped."

Mr. SEMPLE. I gave what I believed to be the facts of the case. And I would call attention to the fact that the hon. member for East Simcoe, who voted against the Bill, is actually doing all he can to get the Bill passed.

Mr. BENNETT. I voted against the second reading of the Bill, and I will vote against the third reading. While the hon. gentleman may charge those who are present with having promises of offices, I say it is unfair and unmanly to attack those who are not here to defend themselves. Let him make charges against those who are here, and take the flat contradiction that he will receive in every case. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made the statement that the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) was influenced in his vote by the fact that his brother had received an appointment. As a matter of fact, the man received the appointment four years ago.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think it is well to call attention to the fact that this man has got his reward, and, whatever may be said of others, there is proof positive that at least he was influenced in his vote by the fact that he was to get the appointment. The hon. member for East Simcoe has said that the hon. member made a speech in favour of this legislation last session. But, at that time, it was supposed that he had the judgeship of Wentworth in his pocket.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. How do you know?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I happen to live there. And I know it was currently reported. Conservatives and all assumed that Mr. Masson was to be appointed judge of Wentworth. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple) is perfectly right in illustrating the point he was making by referring to Mr. Masson having received his reward. We have no evidence as to the other having been promised an appointment, but we believe that such influences have been used, and here is the proof in one case.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). Will the hon. gentleman tell me how he knows that Mr. Masson got this appointment as a reward?

Mr. MULOCK. He is endowed with common sense.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). If it is common sense, at least it is not Christian charity.

Mr. BENNETT. The point I took was that the hon. gentleman insinuated rather than alleged that Mr. Masson had voted against the wishes of his constituents. He should not make that statement without proof. The convention held since Mr. Masson's speech in favour of remedial legislation did not disapprove of his position. Do hon. gentlemen object to members of Parliament receiving appointments? The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) lives, I believe, in the riding which was represented by Mr. Awrey in the legislature. And Mr. Awrey dropped out of his place in the legislature into a Government position. He does not mean that Mr. Awrey having accepted a position is proof that he was bought to support the Government. Then, there is Mr. Wood in North Brant and in Simcoe, there are the cases of Sheriff Drury and his predecessor, Sheriff Phelps, and so on through the list.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. They were not induced to support the Government by promises of office.

Mr. SEMPLE. I did not make the statement positively. I said I had heard it stated, and the facts seemed to verify the general impression. The Dominion commissioners, in their report, which has been presented in the Senate, express their opinion that this is a doubtful measure, and surely a Bill in regard to which doubt is cast, should not be forced through this House in the dying hours of Parliament. Hon. members will remember the debate on the Jesuit Estates Bill. On that occasion I voted with the Government, on the ground that the legislature of Quebec had a right to pass the Bill. Although I was called to account for that vote by some of my constituents, I was always able to successfully defend it, because I was distinctly voting for provincial rights: moreover, the Quebec legislature had the right to pass the measure, and it was no interference with any other parts of the Dominion. The decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was to the effect that there was a grievance, which the Dominion Parliament should relieve, and, in order to do so, allow religious instruction in the schools. This decision was given by four learned judges. But a different decision was given by the Supreme Court of Canada, when Sir Henry Strong, Chief Justice, and Judges Taschereau and Gwynne held that the Manitoba Act of 1890 was constitutional. In view of these difficulties, there should be no interference with the clear right of the province. Much has been said about the rights of minorities. But in this case there was a Roman Catholic minority, and there was another minority of Roman Catholics, represented by Mr. John O'Donohue, who favoured the present system of public schools. As to the negotiations with Manitoba, the opinion expressed by Mr. Holmes, the former Conservative leader of Nova Scotia, was that the offer made to the Dominion commissioners by the Manitoba government was a liberal one, and should be accepted by the Dominion. If such offer were accepted, the minority of Manitoba would have secured to them by law privileges which are only given to the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia by courtesy. Nevertheless, the people of the maritime provinces of different religious beliefs live together in peace and harmony, and, if religious instruction is desired in the schools, it is given. It must be remembered, in considering this question, that members of the Opposition are not looking for judgeships or collectorships. They are determined to follow an independent course, in spite of the action of the Government, which resembles that of governments which dominate South American republics.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In regard to the position taken by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), it is important that the committee should know that the hon. gentleman, in moving the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne last year, took a strong position in favour of remedial legislation. In his speech last year the hon. gentleman said :

> I have recapitulated all the facts, I have recapitulated all the steps that have been taken in the case : and all that has been done has been the handing over of the case by the Dominion Government to the government of the province of Manitoba.

Is that true ? They never handed over the decision of the Privy Council to the province of Manitoba. That was the old argument that was made about a year ago when it was stated upon the public platforms of this country that the Governor in Council simply took the decision of the Privy Council and handed it over in the form of a remedial order. The hon. gentleman goes on :

> And, Sir, it is to be trusted by all those who would wish to see the disappearance from the arena of federal politics of matters of this vexed nature that the province of Manitoba may be pleased to arrange amicably between the parties the rights or privileges of the minority in respect of the matters complained of, and which the Privy Council stated had been affected.

Now, I want to know if the hon. gentleman is of the same opinion this year as last year. This was an admirable speech. I do not know whether there is any office for him in sight or not ; I do not suppose there is. Now, you see the hon. gentleman is supporting the Government's contention that this was really dealing with a question over which the Government had no control whatever, that the Privy Council demanded that the Manitoba government would restore the so-called privileges taken from the minority previous to 1890, and that therefore this Government was justifiable in issuing the remedial order, because the remedial order was identical with the decision of the Privy Council.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman is misquoting me if he says that I desired that all these matters which had been interfered with, would be restored as they were originally. Now, that is deliberately an incorrect statement, if it is based on what you have just read. I expressed the wish that the matter might be amicably arranged, and I hope and trust yet that it will be amicably arranged by the people of that province—not that what existed before should be restored.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I read it just as it is there, from page 10.

Mr. BENNETT. But don't misquote me.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I challenge you to say where I have misquoted one single word.

Mr. BENNETT. This is what I said :

> And, Sir, it is to be trusted by all those who wish to see the disappearance from the arena of federal politics of matters of this vexed nature that the province of Manitoba may be pleased to arrange amicably between the parties the rights or privileges of the minority in respect of the matters complained of, and which the Privy Council stated had been affected.

Now, there is not a single word there to bear out your allegation that I had stated a year ago that I was in favour of the perfect restoration of the rights of the minority as they existed prior to 1890.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You only read one sentence in regard to your desire that the question be taken out of the federal arena and be placed in the hands of Manitoba. The only inference that can be drawn from the quotation is that the Government were acting in the interests of Manitoba, and that they were perfectly justified in doing so ; and when they introduced the Remedial Bill this year to carry out their promise, you voted against the Bill that was designed to restore to the people the rights and privileges that were taken from them, and which you told us that time should be restored to them. How in the world is it possible for a man to wiggle out of such a hole as that ?

Mr. BENNETT. Will you please read in the whole speech where I expressed a hope that there would be a restoration of every right the minority had had prior to 1890 ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have read it all. I am not bound to make a hole in a man's head and shove in knowledge, when there are no other avenues.

Mr. BENNETT. Charity begins at home, and I know of no more admirable hole where something could be drilled in than that cranium of yours. The hon. gentleman stood up here for four hours, a few weeks ago, reading page after page about matters that he resurrected and exhumed from places where they had lain for years, and we did not hear one original thought or one original idea coming out of that depleted cranium of yours.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). There is no use in my talking to the hon. gentleman, because it would require a surgical operation to make him understand anything. If

I were to take and cut a hole in the top of his head and put in these papers, probably he would have more brains afterwards.

Mr. EDGAR. I would ask whether that could not be done by injection.

Mr. BENNETT. If you will look over the top of the head of the hon. member for West Ontario, perhaps you can find a soft spot where you can cram something in.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It would require a saw to cut through the skull of the hon. member for East Simcoe.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. member cannot throw stones when he lives in a glass house.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. member for North Ontario is one of the most impudent men, for a first year man, who ever came into this House. He has more gab, and talk, and bluster, probably, than any other half dozen men combined. He wiggled and wabbled in his election to such an extent that really his friends had no hopes that he would be elected.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Wherever you went I had a good majority.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It is evident from the way he has been conducting himself, in a kind of a hop-step-and-jump fashion, from the beginning of the session to the present time, that he will never get back to the House again. I do not think he expects to come back. Even his own friends had to go back upon him. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) who is a strong supporter of the Government, went up there to help him, and became so disgusted with his wabbling that he actually deserted him near the end of the election.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. And sent me a letter of congratulations afterwards.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. member, upon a public platform, attacked the Mowat government for making a few amendments in the Separate School Bill, that were agreed to by the leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Mr. Meredith, and by every other member in the House, amendments that were intended to make the separate schools of Ontario more efficient. He asks us to attack him upon his record. His record has been that of an opponent of separate schools, and yet he had not the manliness in North Ontario to state to the electors that he was opposed to separate schools when he wanted to come here.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. If the hon. gentleman says that I did not say in North Ontario that I was unalterably opposed to separate schools, he states what is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). How could he say he was unalterably opposed to separate schools, when he refused to say that he was opposed to forcing them upon another province. He had not the manliness to say that he was opposed to imposing separate schools upon Manitoba.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I rise to a point of order. It is unparliamentary to say that an hon. member is guilty of unmanly conduct ?

Mr. EDGAR. I wonder if it would be parliamentary to say that a man's conduct was like that of an old woman.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I have often heard your electors say that of your conduct.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am not going to make such a reflection upon the old women. There are thousands of old women in this country who have more manliness than the hon. member. I say it is a reflection upon the old women to call him an old woman. The old women are womanly, but the old man from North Ontario is not manly.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The electors do not think much of you, anyway.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). I would ask the hon. gentlemen to not indulge any longer in this style of discussion.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You will excuse me, Mr. Chairman, for using such language in a moment of excitement. But seriously, when we are trying to address ourselves to the question before the House it is annoying when we are met by these interruptions and attempts at obstruction.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Are you in favour of separate schools ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Let me tell this hon. gentleman that before he was born—and the world would not have lost much if he had never been born—I opposed separate schools. The party to which I belonged then and to which I belong now opposed separate schools, but the party that he belongs to imposed separate schools on the province of Ontario. If the hon. gentleman knows the history of his party he knows that it was in [illegible]63 that they passed the Bill establishing separate schools in Ontario.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. It was by a coalition.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman is mistaken and let me tell him that the man whom his friends opposed so bitterly for making amendments in the school law that were necessary to make it workable voted in Parliament against that Bill. I refer to Sir Oliver Mowat. The hon. gentleman does not know the history of this country, but he is still mouthing. However, I think he does not intend to come back. That is a good thing.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman says that the world would not have missed much if I had never been born. I may reply, that the world will not miss much when he is dead. That makes us even on that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I like a man to show originality ; not simply to turn one's own words back upon him. I do not see how the Conservatives can accuse the Liberals of obstructing, I am sure that in what I have attempted to say, hon. gentlemen have thrust in more than I have. I think they must have been put up to it by the leader of the House. The leader of the House told us that he was ready to die for this Bill. There was a man in the English House of Commons named Fergus O'Connor, who on one occasion said that he was ready to sacrifice himself to get a certain Bill passed and he rushed down the aisle as though to make the sacrifice there and then. "Punch" commenting on this a few days later, said :

Not a groan was heard or a pitying note,
  As down on the floor he hurried,
Not a member offered to lend him his coat,
  Or asked how he'd like to be buried.

I think the same may be said of Sir Charles Tupper, for I believe gentlemen opposite have lost much of their appreciation of that hon. gentleman. Who have been the obstructionists? This Bill was obstructed before it came into the House by the revolt in the Cabinet. The Government has not yet explained why the Bill was not introduced until the House had been in session forty-one days, and why the second reading was not moved until the sixty-first day. The Poet Laureate of England seems to have been informed of what has been going on here, and I find the following :—

As we want to get our supper
You must knuckle down to Tupper,
For he holds the loaves and fishes in his care.
He may bully and browbeat you,
Like a galley-convict treat you,
But he holds the loaves and fishes, so beware.

Hon. members must remember that the Secretary of State has control over the loaves and fishes, and that only the other day he gave an hon. member not only a fish but also a loaf. Another poet seems to have come to the rescue of the Secretary of State, and he says :

  I stand upon the gory deck,
    When all but I have fled ;
  I'm Master-Mind aboard this wreck,
    I slew the Official Head.

It does not, however, appear that the official head has been slaughtered. These verses, I consider, describe the exact condition of affairs to-day. In regard to the conference which took place the other day, I contend that Mr. Greenway's government made substantial and satisfactory concessions to the minority. If similar propositions were submitted to the Catholic minority all over the Dominion, they would undoubtedly be accepted. It is admitted by members of Nova Scotia that there is no dissatisfaction among the minority in that province. It is important that the House should understand clearly the concessions offered, and they are these : 1. To make the text-books satisfactory to the Catholics. 2. To give representation to the Catholics on the advisory and examining boards. 3. To give a share of the public grant to all schools irrespective of religious denominations.

The support of separate schools will be a heavy burden upon the Catholic ratepayers if they receive no support from the province. I have in my hand a letter written by a Roman Catholic farmer in Manitoba in which he says—I will not read the letter but give the substance : In the section in which I am living there are about ten Roman Catholic families. In order to establish a school, it would cost $400 or $500, or $50 for each family. It will cost from $250 to $300 a year to pay the teachers and other expenses, which means $30 for each of the farmers in this district. It is utterly impossible that these ten farmers will be able to bear that burden of taxation. But under the Remedial Bill we will be forced to support our own schools at great expense, and it is ten times better for us to place ourselves under the Greenway offer than to accept the Remedial Bill. Mr. Chairman, that is only one of a hundred testimonies of a similar character which may be given from the farmers of Manitoba in the same direction. We have heard the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), and the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), both warm supporters of this Bill, declare that the present Nova Scotia school system is satisfactory to the Catholic minority of that province. Now, when we see that the Manitoba government offers to give the Catholic minority of that province substantially the same privileges as are enjoyed by the minority in Nova Scotia, I do not see why this Government should not withdraw this Bill, and come to some arrangement with the Manitoba government on the lines offered by the Manitoba delegates.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman who has resumed his seat said in the course of his remarks, that last year I had pronounced myself without reservation in favour of the principle of remedial legislation, and in support of his assertion he read an extract from a speech I made last year on this subject. (The hon. gentleman again read the extract in question.) Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that is very plain English, to the ordinary mind. No man can understand from those words that I was in favour of any interference by the Federal Parliament at all, but rather that there should be an arrangement by the people of that province of the matters in dispute. What I meant was that I trusted there would be on the part of the Federal Government no interference, but that the matters in dispute should be arranged amicably by the province of Manitoba itself. Now, to show that such is the fair inference from my words, I will quote from a speech made by the hon. leader of the Opposition. (The hon. member reads an extract from Mr. Laurier's speech.) Now, I do not want to disparage the gigantic intellect of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald), but I think most intelligent men would rather prefer to rely upon the intelligence of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He drew this inference from my words, that there should be upon the part of the Dominion Government no interference at all with those rights but that the case having been relegated to Manitoba, they could then arrange the matter amicably among themselves. I have voted against the second reading of the Bill, and if it comes to a third reading I propose to vote against that also.

Mr. SPROULE. I went home last night, and returned at half-past nine this morning, and regret to find that the committee has been kept sitting although no progress has been made.

Mr. McALISTER. Whose fault was it ?

Mr. SPROULE. I can only regard it as the fault of those who compel us to sit here all night and work when we are not in condition to do that work. Among wage-workers, it is a common thing, when a man works at night, to give him double pay. But no such inducement is offered to us by our country, and none should be offered, for the people who sent us here do not expect or desire that we should work at unreasonable hours. But I would remind the Government that, during hours when members might fairly be expected to attend to their parliamentary duties, we have made good progress, but, after that time, we have made no progress at all. Why should this Bill absorb the whole attention of Parliament ? This should teach the Government the lesson that it is better in the interests of this Bill which they are pressing forward, to sit during reasonable hours.

Mr. FREMONT. If the hon. gentleman and his friends would not make such long speeches we could make more progress.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman and his friends would allow the House to sit during reasonable hours, we should make more progress.

Mr. FREMONT. The hon. gentleman has been absent eight or ten hours.

Mr. SPROULE. I have. I did not feel that my duty called upon me to be here all night to attempt business that I was not in condition, through fatigue, to undertake. Nor did I think, from the temper of the House, when I left it, that business would go on, as the Government expected it would when it refused the very reasonable request made at two o'clock that the committee should be allowed to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Are there no other measures, I say, before us, that require consideration except this ? We are at a standstill, as it were, for want of money to pay pages, messengers, and others who are working for us. And we have been expecting Supplementary Estimates. We seem to have fallen into all sorts of irregularities. The Supplementary Estimates were asked for, and promised, time after time. But, so far as I know, these Estimates have never been laid upon the Table of this House, but they have reached us by a roundabout and wholly irregular course. It is usual for a member of the Government to place in the Speaker's hands a Message from the Governor General conveying the Estimates, which Message is received by hon. members standing. But this has not been done, I believe, and yet we find the Supplementary Estimates published in the daily press. They cover a total of $2,504,941. Among other items, I notice that of an additional amount required for sessional messengers, pages, and others. This is the matter I called attention to the other day, making the very moderate request that these people who worked for us should receive their pay. But I was rebuked for that, and told that I should have consulted the Government, and asked permission to bring the matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the Finance Minister has not arranged for payment for these services ?

Mr. SPROULE. Except in so far as putting an item in Supplementary Estimates is concerned.

Mr. MULOCK. These wages were due weeks ago, I understand. And since attention was called to the matter, a long time has passed.

Mr. SPROULE. So far as I know, the putting of this item in the Supplementary Estimates is the only step that has been taken.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not the worst of it. If this obstruction goes on much longer, I suspect that members themselves cannot get anything.

Mr. MULOCK. How about the salaries of the Ministers ?

Mr. FOSTER. If we have to work so hard, we will have to have something.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman speaks of obstruction. But this forenoon—the hon. gentleman cannot know it, as he was not present—the supporters of the Government occupied a large portion of the time. Will they be called obstructionists ? I was pointing out other matters that should engage our attention. I see that $1,000,000 is proposed for arms and ammunition for the militia. I support that, but we should get the information through the regular channels, and not be obliged to depend upon the press. There is also an amount of $99,000 extra to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the conveyance of mails, and other very important items.

Mr. MULOCK. May I ask the hon. gentleman to explain that item ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not see what that has got to do with the motion before the Chair.

Mr. MULOCK. It is a very important matter.

Mr. SPROULE. I am drawing attention to the fact that there are other important matters demanding our attention, besides this Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. But the hon. gentleman has no right to go into the details of the Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. CHARLTON. Surely the hon. gentleman has a right to illustrate his argument to some extent in detail.

Mr. McNEILL. To bring the matter clearly before the committee and to impress it upon the public mind, it is surely necessary that details should be referred to to some extent.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not make the rules ; they were made long before I was born. He can give all the reasons he wishes in favour of the committee rising and reporting progress, but he has no right to go into the details of the Supplementary Estimates, for he could talk until next July upon those matters.

Mr. McNEILL. Surely he can give the arguments necessary to impress the point he is making, and he must be largely the judge of that.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Chair, chair.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Chairman, this gentleman (Mr. Mills, Annapolis), who is sometimes in the Chair, and who is a very unfair Chairman——

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to impute unfairness. He transgresses the rules of this House and the proprieties of this House in doing so.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have called the hon. gentleman to order. And I have given the reasons. He has no right to discuss the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not calling in question your ruling, but——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has no right to speak to a point of order after it has been decided.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. McNEILL. I am going to ask for information from the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. Besides, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) destroys the very foundation of respect for this House, when he accuses a gentleman of unfairness while in the Chair. If the hon. gentleman wants to speak to some other question, he may do so, but I have already ruled that he cannot discuss the point to which he was then referring.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then the hon. gentleman can proceed in a general way, but without detail.

Mr. McNEILL. What I want to say is this : As I understand your ruling, Mr. Chairman, it is that the hon. gentleman cannot go into details. What I want to ask is to what extent does that rule apply.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. To the whole extent.

Mr. McNEILL. What does the hon. gentleman consider to be details ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will find ten or fifteen books in the Library which will explain to him that point.

Mr. MULOCK. Let the hon. member for North Bruce get them and read them to the committee.

Mr. McNEILL. We have a right to understand your ruling, Mr. Chairman. Is an hon. gentleman not allowed to refer to any item ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. To no items.

Mr. COATSWORTH. The hon. member for North Bruce has stated that the hon. member for Annapolis acted unfairly in the Chair. I submit that he must withdraw that statement.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman cannot take a point of order in regard to a past debate, when the words were not taken down by the Clerk at the time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This is not an ordinary question of order, but it is a charge of unfairness, affecting both the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) and myself. It is very convenient to me to have, now and then, assistance from hon. members of the House, for it could not be expected that I should sit here from three o'clock on Monday until now. When I ask an hon. member, in whom I have confidence, and in whom, I think, members of the House have confidence, to act for me, I am bound to endeavour to protect that hon. gentleman. I believe the remarks of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) have been unfair to the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), and I would ask him, as a matter of fairness, to take back those words, because the hon. member for Annapolis, from what I know, has been a fair Chairman, and has rendered justice to both sides of the House.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to say this, that so far as you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, are concerned, I find you always act most courteously and most fairly; and so far as the hon. member for Annapolis is concerned, if you, Mr. Chairman, consider that I am out of order in making the remarks I have made, I have nothing to do but to withdraw the expression. But, so far as the impression on my mind is concerned as regards that hon. gentleman, it is just what I have stated. But I will withdraw the remark at once, if you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, say that I am out of order in my remarks with respect to the conduct of an hon. member called to the Chair.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). A criticism in regard to the Speaker, I do not think can be made the subject of a point of order. This question does not, however, refer to the permanent Chairman, but to an hon. member who has been temporarily called to the Chair, and whose functions as Chairman are at an end. What he did as Chairman has become a matter of history, and is as open to criticism as if it had happened twenty years ago.

Mr. CRAIG. There might be some force in the contention of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) under certain conditions, but I do not think those conditions exist in this case. It also must be remembered that the hon. member for Annapolis may be again asked to act as Chairman. While some hon. members, no doubt, may have had the impression at the time that the Chairman was unfair, still, it is very unfortunate for an hon. member, because the Chairman does not happen to agree with him, to hold that opinion. We must uphold the dignity of the Chair and the dignity of Parliament. If an hon. member can charge unfairness against an hon. member who acted as Chairman, because he happens to rule in a certain way, the dignity of this House will disappear, and especially under conditions like the present, when the feelings of hon. gentlemen are very much excited, and they are so exhausted as not to be in a proper frame of mind to judge calmly any issue. Sometimes questions are raised that are very difficult for the Chairman to decide, but he must decide them. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) did not ask to occupy that position, and decide those issues; but, having been placed in the Chair, he was called upon to decide them. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) is not a man who would impute improper motives to an hon. member who happened to be Chairman. On consideration, he will no doubt withdraw those words, because the time might come when he will be called upon to occupy the Chair himself, and while I might think he was not ruling fairly, it would be very unfortunate if I were to say so. I repeat that we should do everything possible to uphold the dignity of the Chair, and if an hon. member occupying the Chair rules in some way that does not happen to agree with our views, we must submit.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not expressing an opinion on the fairness of what the hon. gentleman said, but I am expressing an opinion in respect to the conduct of one who occupied the Chair some time ago. We find the conduct of Ministers criticised every day, and while, as a matter of policy it is highly inconvenient to permit the conduct of a Speaker or Chairman to be criticised while he is Speaker or Chairman, yet, when his functions are at an end, as they are in the present case, his actions are as much open to criticism as are those of any other party discharging any other functions. Any one who criticises the action of a judge in the discharge of his duties when a certain case is before him, may be punished for contempt. But it cannot be said that for all time the course of a judge or an ex-judge, whose functions are at an end, and whose actions have passed into history, is not to be subjected to criticism. Precisely so is it in this case. The hon. gentleman is not imputing any unfair conduct to the permanent Chairman: he was speaking of the conduct of an hon. gentleman who had been in the Chair, and whose functions were at an end.

Mr. MULOCK. I submit that the point of order was taken too late. I understand it is said the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) used unparliamentary language towards the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills). Dealing with this matter, in the abstract, what occurred? After the hon. gentleman had made those remarks, the hon. member for Annapolis arose and made an objection. Thereupon, the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), and the hon. member for North Bruce, delivered a joint speech for some time, and the debate was participated in by the Minister of Finance, and since then, other hon. members have spoken; and, up to this moment, no one has taken the first step towards laying the proper foundation for this appeal. The rule is perfectly clear. When exception is taken to language not deemed parliamentary, that exception must be made before any further debate has taken place, and the words must be recorded and made record of. That has not been done. In "May," 9th edition, page 377, I find:

> Whenever any disorderly words have been used by an hon. member in debate, notice shall be immediately taken of the words objected to, or if any hon. member desires them to be taken down, the Speaker or Chairman of Committee shall direct the Clerk to take them down.

What are the particular words complained of in this case? They are not of record, and we cannot trust our memories to prove what has passed. In this case, half a dozen speakers have intervened. We cannot know what the words are, after this lapse of time. In a case cited by "May," the objection was ruled to be out of order, because the hon. gentleman committing the alleged offence had been allowed to proceed with his speech. In the House of Lords the rule is that any word complained of must be taken down instantly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I said before that when the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) rose to call attention to the point of order, which he afterwards explained, the committee was still listening to the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) speaking to a point of order which I had decided. We had to settle that before we listened to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Toronto. In the meanwhile, I indicated that I would call attention to this matter myself in order to defend hon. gentlemen who sometimes take the Chair to relieve me. The hon. member for North Bruce imputed unfairness on the part of the hon. member for Annapolis when in the Chair. I take the position that when an hon. gentleman is occupying my place I am responsible for anything that may happen. I now ask the hon. member for North Bruce, for the sake of the dignity of the Chair, and the committee, to take back the charge of unfairness brought against the hon. member for Annapolis.

Mr. MULOCK. I would rejoice if the hon. member for North Bruce thought fit to withdraw any statement. Do I understand that you have made a ruling, or you have made a request to the hon. member ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The law, as the hon. gentleman described it a few moments ago, is perfectly clear. The point of order raised was that the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) had used insulting and unparliamentary language. I look upon that language as a reflection upon the hon. member (Mr. Mills, Annapolis) who was occupying this Chair temporarily for me, and I hope that the hon. member for North Bruce will take back the expression. I would ask the hon. member to do so, in view of this additional fact. As he must know very well, I am not able to sit in this Chair continuously for twenty-four hours, and I am compelled to invite some other gentleman temporarily to take my place. I feel myself, to some extent responsible for their conduct. I am desirous, also, that they should receive the same courteous treatment from members that I receive myself, in order that I may have no difficulty in finding substitutes, when occasion requires.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand, Mr. Chairman, that you rule that you are responsible, and hold yourself to have personally discharged the duties that are discharged by members whom you call to take the Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is my view.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Supposing the member in the Chair does some censurable act, are we to understand that that censure should fall upon you, and not upon the member who has done the act ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I believe so.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that you have selected a member to take your place who does not understand French, which is distinctly contrary to the rules of the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Whenever I ask a gentleman to take my place, I am entirely responsible for his acts.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Then, he must be able, as you are, to speak both French and English, and you have violated the rules of the House in putting the member for Annapolis in your place.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. According to the rules of the House, the Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, or the Chairman of committee must be of a language different from that of the Speaker, that is to say, when the Speaker is English, the Deputy Speaker must be French, and vice versa.

Mr. McNEILL. In view of the statements you have just made, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as you feel that you are, to some extent, in honour bound to protect the dignity of the member you have requested to occupy your position, in view of your own personal feelings, and in view of the fact that you have been sitting in the Chair, with very short intervals, since Monday afternoon, and are compelled to find temporary substitutes, for whose conduct you hold yourself responsible, I am willing to say that what appeared to be unfairness on your part, was not really intended to be so.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to bear my testimony to the admirable manner in which the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) fills the Chair, while you are absent ; and also to the fact that that hon. member is, like yourself, qualified in both languages. We have had no trouble at all during the several occasions when the hon. member for Gaspé has filled the Chair.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad to acknowledge, Mr. Chairman, that you are always agreeable to this House, and I have no fault to find with the manner in which you have performed your duties. Now, coming to the question before the committee, we are told that we are obstructing the progress of this Bill. Once in twenty-four hours the members of the Government come into the House, after having been enjoying themselves quietly at home, and complain that we are obstructing this Bill. Now, we cannot forget the fact that six months ago the Governor General announced that a session of Parliament would be called for the purpose of passing this Bill. This six months appears to have been employed in the incubation stage of that Bill, and, after we met here on 2nd January and wasted a little over a month, it was brought down. The incubation stage had not succeeded in hatching out that bird, if we may call it such. But one month and a half later the bird was hatched out, and, after the shell was cracked and the chick appeared to the world, it was found to be a political monstrosity such as we have never seen in this Parliament before. We set ourselves to the task of assisting the Government in endeavouring to raise up this very interesting fowl. It is represented by one of the cartoons, that, instead of turning out what it was expected to be, it turned out to be an alligator that was eating up all the chickens belonging to the Government. Another cartoon represents the leader of the House digging worms to feed it, and the other chickens eating the worms ; so that a process of starvation is going on, and the poor unfortunate fowl is dying through inanition. Its sponsors have refused to take care of this political monstrosity or to recognize its paternity. Once in twenty-four hours the Minister of the Interior comes here and endeavours to act as dry-nurse, but it still seems that the process of starvation is going on. If I were asked, as a medical man, my judgment on the prognosis of this unfortunate case, it would be that it is bound to die from inanition.

Mr. FOSTER. What is prognosis ?

Mr. SPROULE. I said, if I were to be asked, as a medical man, what my prognosis was, I should say that inanition was likely to be the end of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. What is your diagnosis ?

Mr. SPROULE. My diagnosis is, that it is a political monstrosity to begin with, and that it requires a different kind of food to nourish it than has hitherto been given to it. The Minister of Finance and the leader of the House come in here from day to day, and endeavour to assist the Minister of the Interior in performing the functions of a wet-nurse ; but all seems to be of no avail. I reiterate that there should be a lesson for the Government in the fact that while we sit in reasonable hours we make progress, and while in unreasonable hours we make no progress.

Mr. CHARLTON. The discussion upon this motion may have touched all the points that are pertinent to it, and I may, in the few remarks I shall make, reiterate what has already been said. But this will only be because it is impossible for any member to be here during the whole discussion to know what is being said. The course that the Government is pursuing is one calculated to defeat fair discussion. After we have sat for a reasonable time discussing this measure, it is only to be expected that a motion to rise should be made, and that members should object to go on with the business without proper rest. If the Government had desired satisfactory progress on this measure they might have taken the assurance of the leader of the Opposition that the Opposition had no intention of impeding the progress of this Bill, and might have allowed the committee to rise at a reasonable hour. The Government are wholly to blame for what has followed. The Opposition would have been destitute of a single spark of manliness if they had not resented this course on the part of the Government. The Government must have known that they could not make progress by any such methods as these, for these methods have been tried before, and always without success. I alluded a day or two ago to the facts that the House had no official information as to the character of the negotiations that had taken place at Winnipeg between the Dominion commissioners and the representatives of the Manitoba government. I referred to the statement of those negotiations which have appeared in the press, which I did not say was reliable. We cannot say with absolute correctness that we have yet had the statement officially laid before the House, but we have the return laid before the Senate, a co-ordinate branch of the legislature, and I suppose we are justified in taking that as an official statement of the proceedings. This document gives four statements, being the several written communications that passed between the commissioners. It does not profess to give a summary of the verbal statements that passed, further than to say that they were of the most cordial and friendly character, and that the Dominion commissioners were met in a spirit of friendliness and treated with the utmost consideration and cordiality and that candour and a desire to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the difficulty characterized the proceedings on the part of the Manitoba representatives. The first of these documents is marked confidential. They are the suggestions for the settlement of the Manitoba school question from the Dominion commissioners for the Manitoba government.

(The hon. gentleman read the document referred to.)

The last paragraph of this document, it will be seen, provides that not only is a written agreement to be arrived at, but the necessary legislation to be passed before the Remedial Bill now before Parliament is to be withdrawn. I wish to say that these further pretensions strike me as being not only unreasonable, but impossible of fulfilment. If the Dominion commissioners had been actuated by a desire to settle the question, I cannot understand how they could make the proposal that a written agreement having been arrived at, the necessary legislation should be passed before the Remedial Bill now before this House should be withdrawn. It must be borne in mind that this Parliament will cease to exist, by effluxion of time, on the 24th of this month, and that the Manitoba legislature was not to be convened until the 16th of this month. That would allow the Manitoba legislature eight days to introduce, discuss and carry through its various stages the legislation necessary. It was clearly impossible that this condition should be complied with. It strikes me as a suspicious circumstance that our commissioners should have made a condition that they must have known it was impossible to comply with. The reply of the Manitoba government is dated the 30th March. (The hon. gentleman read from the reply of the Manitoba commissioners.) It will be seen that the Manitoba commissioners said that it was agreed that during the conference the Remedial Bill should be held in abeyance, and that in the event of an agreement being reached it should be withdrawn. These are reasonable stipulations that it is difficult to see how the Manitoba government could have avoided making. Besides, it was clearly impolitic to proceed with two measures for the settlement of the difficulty. But we did do that. We proceeded with the Bill and with the negotiations at Winnipeg, and as a natural consequence, the negotiations failed.

(The hon. gentleman continued to read from the reply of the Manitoba commissioners.)

Respecting religious teaching in the schools, the Manitoba representatives at the conference made two propositions, the second, or alternative, proposition providing for religious instruction between 3.30 and four o'clock in the afternoon. They say they believe that that proposal will remove any well-founded grievance. Now, I think it is the duty of the Government to ascertain whether these offers to the Manitoba government are acceptable or not to the Roman Catholic minority. It appears to me that this alternative proposition is deserving of very serious consideration by this Government. It may require modifications, but the principle is one which the Manitoba commissioners themselves say they think will prove acceptable to the minority. But the Dominion commissioners rejected this proposition, they do not even deign to discuss it with the representatives of Manitoba, they do not deign to point out in what respects either of those propositions were objectionable. There was no attempt made by the Dominion Government to secure a settlement, or any agreement upon this matter, but they summarily rejected the offers of the Manitoba government. Now, I ask the leader of the House to explain to me why, having received a proposition from the Manitoba government which they say they believe to be satisfactory to the minority, I want to ask him by virtue of what reason is he warranted in assuming that the minority of Manitoba would not accept that proposition, or any modification of that proposition that might be secured. If a proposition is made acceptable to that minority, their grievance is redressed. Here is a proposition which the representatives of the Manitoba government believe, with some slight modification perhaps, would be acceptable to the minority in Manitoba. In heaven's name, why are we pressing the Remedial Bill here instead of taking steps to ascertain whether the minority will accept the proposition ? We send our commissioners to Winnipeg, they lay before the Manitoba commissioners their terms, and the Manitoba commissioners make counter propositions. These counter propositions the Dominion commissioners summarily rejected, they returned to Ottawa, and the Government, assuming that no proposition was made which can be acceptable to the minority, are proceeding to press the Remedial Bill. Under these circumstances, I assert that it is an outrageous proceeding on the part of the Government to force this measure through without ascertaining whether the parties who are interested would be satisfied with the proposals made, or with the modifications that might be secured.

(The hon. gentleman proceeded to read the reply of the Dominion commissioners to the propositions submitted by the Manitoba delegates.)

I would like to ask the leader of the House whether it is true that the representatives of this Government had agreed that the Remedial Bill should not be pressed until Tuesday, 31st March, and had informed the Government of that stipulation, and, if so, why that agreement was not lived up to, and why the good faith of the Government was not preserved in reference to the negotiations with the commissioners ? I take my seat for the purpose of receiving an answer to that inquiry.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Is the committee ready for the question ?

Mr. CHARLTON. No ; but it is ready for the answer. The hon. leader of the House does not answer. I suppose I am to assume that he thinks the Government's conduct is indefensible. And in that I quite agree with him. I again ask the leader of the House whether it is true that, after receiving a communication from the Government's commissioner at Winnipeg such as is indicated, he proceeded with the Bill ?

An hon. MEMBER. He cannot hear you.

Mr. CHARLTON. No ; he is oblivious. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Does he believe that the commissioners of the Manitoba government were not warranted in the belief, from the conversations that were held with regard to this matter, that the proposals to withdraw the Bill, in case of an agreement being made, was a reasonable understanding, particularly in view of the fact that the Manitoba government would have only eight days in which to pass legislation before this House ended by effluxion of time ?

Mr. DICKEY. I expect at a future stage to make a statement on this question, and I think it would be very unfair to myself and to the Manitoba government to answer questions in detail before I make that statement. Therefore, I would respectfully decline to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. MULOCK. When do you make the statement ?

Mr. DICKEY. As soon as we get the papers before the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I thank the Minister of Justice for the courtesy of his reply, a courtesy not extended to me by the hon. leader of the House. I contend that it is casting an imputation upon the bona fides of the Manitoba commissioners and the Manitoba government for the Dominion commissioners to say that an agreement to settle this question would not be enough. It was saying in effect : We cannot believe you, and we will not withdraw our Bill until this agreement is implemented by the legislature. It was not only imposing an impossible condition, but it was offering an insult to the Manitoba commissioners and government.

(The hon. gentleman continued to read from the answer of the Dominion commissioners.)

Referring to the correspondence submitted to the Senate, I should like to ask the Secretary of State why there was reproduced in that return laid on the Table of the Senate from the Governor General a telegram which he was obliged to admit in this House he had garbled ; why he did not insert in that return a copy of the original telegram : how it was that words were added which did not appear in the telegram as read to this House. I do not, however, suppose that the Secretary of State thinks it necessary to defend any turpitude. In my judgment it would have been wise if the Dominion commissioners had remained in Winnipeg a few days longer and discussed propositions on the lines suggested by the Manitoba commissioners, for it would appear manifest that the proposition made with respect to religious teaching would be acceptable to the Catholic minority. The Dominion Government are not, however, actuated by any desire to meet the views of the Manitoba minority, but with a desire to secure political advantage.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I had not concluded my remarks when the House adjourned at six o'clock yesterday afternoon, and at the request of the leader of the House, I deferred making any further remarks until a later period. Exception was taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), to the action of my leader in that respect but I took no exception to that request, for I recognize the Secretary of State not only as leader of the House but as my leader, except on the question now before the committee. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) attributed unworthy motives to me because of the vote I gave for the second reading, and I will now answer that hon. gentleman. While I do not approve of the manner in which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), made use of the scriptures, and while he has been one of the honourable elders of the Presbyterian Church, of which I am an humble member, in my knowledge of Presbyterianism I have never seen an elder of that church do anything of that kind before, yet if the reasons for taking this action had been as stated by the hon. gentleman, he would have read all the selections ; he did not do that, but he read the driest portions in order to delay the proceedings of the House. I refer the hon. member for Muskoka to the sermon on the Mount—the first four verses of the seventh chapter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Anything there about wabbling?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. member for Muskoka has gone clean out of the Conservative party and into yours. I saw him on the other side last night, and I sincerely hoped he had gone for good.

Mr. MULOCK. I would suggest if the hon. gentleman desires to quote from the book, that he should complete his quotations and not intermingle them with debates on party politics and frivolous remarks generally. I do not think it is respectful, and I protest against it.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman pretends to be sober, but I see a twinkle in his eye all the same. He knows that I have not read a word from this book in any other than a devout spirit. I have another quotation for the hon. gentleman.

(The hon. gentleman reads from Luke, chap. xviii., from the 10th and three succeeding verses.)

Now, I am going to endeavour to teach the hon. member for Muskoka a lesson that he never learned, a lesson that he should have learned at his mother's knee, or somewhere else. He got up in this House and mentioned the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), the member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), the member for North Ontario and others, some of whom voted precisely like myself, and to whom he attributed unworthy motives. I tell him that I voted on that question honestly, and it does not lie in his mouth to call us hypocrites, as he did, and to charge us with double-dealing. Now, men who live in glass houses should not throw stones ; and I will endeavour to show the kind of a house this gentleman has been living in all his political life, for he is my next door neighbour, and I have squandered a lot of shoe leather in running over the rocks to help him in his constituency. Now, the hon. member belongs to the militia, as I do, and a very disturbing element he is in the militia of Canada. He is always complaining on militia matters. He has gone clean out of the Conservative party on the trade question of this country. There is a man in this House whose genius commands the admiration of every one, a member of this House whom, although we disagree with him politically, we admire, I mean the hon. member for North Simcoe. He is a man whose legal talents command the greatest admiration; he is a man whom friend and foe like personally. But what of his supporter? Has he commanded the admiration even of his opponents?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, he has.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I submit that the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., has no data upon which to base his "yes."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have. I have over twelve years' acquaintance with him in the House.

Mr. FOSTER. You are an interested party just now.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. What does the former leader of the hon. member for Queen's say about the member for Muskoka? The Hon. Edward Blake, who led the Liberal party for years, a man with a transcontinental reputation—what did he say of the member for Muskoka?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would like to know what the character of the member for Muskoka has to do with the subject under consideration? This is sheer obstruction. The leader of the House has gone out just for the purpose of giving the member for North Ontario an opportunity to obstruct this legislation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He is put up for that purpose.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask your ruling as to whether this discussion is in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The discussion which has been going on is, no doubt, out of order, and I have been considering whether it is not time to stop it. I would ask the hon. member for North Ontario to make haste and draw his remarks to a close.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I am repelling a slander that has been put upon me by the member for Muskoka. Now, I was going to tell you the opinion of the Hon. Edward Blake of the member for Muskoka. He said he was corruptly elected to Parliament; he said it in this House, as "Hansard" shows.

Mr. CHARLTON. When did he say that?

Mr. HUGHES. With whom did the hon. member for Muskoka saw off last election?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I am coming to that. The Hon. Edward Blake challenged him to go on with his case in court, and he would show him up—challenged him in this House.

Mr. CHARLTON. Give us the quotation.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. It is easy to ask that when I have not the "Hansard" before me. Not only that, but one of the Liberals in Muskoka petitioned against his election, and stated that he was corruptly elected. But did he face the courts? He did not dare to do so, but he sawed off with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). He arranged a saw-off within the corridors of this Parliament building. He coaxed and begged to be let off, and said that he would be ruined if they did not let him off. I do not wish to deal with any innuendos in this House, but the hon. gentlemen opposite have been doing so when they charge that the judge of the county court of Huron was bought body and bones, that he took the policy of this Government and swallowed it hook and line, bob and sinker, in order to get a judgeship. But they know nothing about it, whereas we do know that it has been charged against the member for Muskoka that he got moneys for improper purposes, and that his election returns do not show the expenditure thereof in the manner required by the election law. That is the man who is charging me with corruptness in the Parliament of Canada. I was told before I became a member of this House that while drawing his pay in this House, drawing his sessional indemnity, he actually wanted to draw the pay of a colonel of militia, in the same manner and to the same extent as if he were doing duty upon the field.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I rise to a point of order. I object to members of the Tory party washing their dirty linen in this House, as they have been doing for the last twelve hours. I want to proceed with the business of the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understood that the member for North Ontario got up to make a personal explanation. I ask him to bring it to a close as speedily as possible.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Well, I will draw my remarks upon that point to a close very soon. But I wish to say that the member for Muskoka, with a record such as that, has no right to charge me with corruptness on the floor of Parliament. Now, I could give you a number of other instances here; I could go into the dealings that he had with a barrister in Muskoka, Mr. Reid, but as the Chairman requested that I should not do so, I will forbear for the present.

Mr. O'BRIEN. When the hon. gentleman has made a personal attack upon me with reference to transactions with which the House has nothing to do, I will ask the hon. gentleman to say what those transactions were.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. You can say a good deal better than I can.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask the hon. gentleman to say what my transactions with Mr. Reid were.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I stopped at the request of the Chairman. If I have to go on, I will indicate to him and this House what those transactions are, but I will have to go into a good deal of what was charged against him as corrupt and bad, and I do not care to do it. But he knows very well about Mr. Reid, and the letters he wrote him ; he knows more about those letters than any other man living.

Mr. EDGAR. I rise to a point of order. I consider it is highly irregular and improper for an hon. member to make insinuations of a personal character against another hon. member, and then stop there. The hon. member for Muskoka has called upon the hon. member for North Ontario to specify the charge here, so that it can be answered.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I do not care what the opinion of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) of my actions may be.

Mr. EDGAR. I was not giving an opinion, I was raising a point of order—that the hon. gentleman has no right to make an insinuation against the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) and then refuse to substantiate it.

Mr. CASEY. Speaking on the point of order, I would go further and say that it is not seemly that these personal charges should be ventilated in this House. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) is evidently very green, or he would know that. But as he does not seem to know it, I think that the common sense and decency of the rest of the House should put a stop to this disgraceful exhibition. I would call for your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. This proves what I have said that for the last twelve hours the House has been entirely out of order. The leniency of our rules allow members great latitude. I understand that this arises in consequence of what was said before and that the hon. gentleman is answering the charges that were brought against him by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). I admit that this is not the place for these things. But I do not know that I would be justified in stopping the discussion now. In the name of the whole committee, I would ask every hon. member to assist the Chair in maintaining order. And one thing I would call attention to particularly. Hon. members have used the bible in their speeches in this House. This is spoken of in the press and throughout the country in a very condemnatory way. I think that this is a practice that should not be maintained. I ask the committee to sustain me in this.

Mr. MULOCK. Although the hon. member for Muskoka has challenged the hon. member for North Ontario, and though the latter is quite ready to accept the challenge, no doubt, it is unbecoming that we should listen to charges that we cannot investigate or express any opinion upon. I submit that the continuation of such a line of debate, if it can be dignified with such a name, will only bring Parliament into disrepute. I wish to assist the Chairman in maintaining the dignity of Parliament as far as possible. It is quite evident that Parliament has survived its usefulness, and the sooner it is dissolved the better.

Mr. EDGAR. The point I made was not that the personal charges—which, of course, we regret—must not be made in the House, but that when an insinuation is made and denied, the gentleman who makes it should, like a gentleman and a member of Parliament, either retract or proceed with it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. My reference to the hon. member for North Ontario—with whom as he says, quite truly, I have no personal acquaintance—was of a purely political character. I pointed out what I considered inconsistencies in these gentlemen voting against the second reading of the Bill and then—as I had reason to believe, and have still no reason to disbelieve—assisting the Government in endeavouring to force the Bill through.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. You said "double-dealing," and "hypocrite."

Mr. O'BRIEN. I said that such conduct was hypocritical. That is far different from a personal charge of hypocrisy. I did not know that there was anything in what I said that would justify a reference to personal matters with which this House has not, and cannot have, anything to do. The hon. gentleman must be absolutely ignorant of the practice and duties of Parliament if he supposes that by references of that kind he can gain any possible advantage. The matter to which he has referred is one on which I profess entire ignorance. There was a person named Reid who lived in the constituency. I have had no personal transactions with him except upon one matter. In regard to that I would advise the hon. gentleman to apply to Mr. Birmingham, the Secretary of the Conservative Association, who will give all the necessary information.

Mr. CASEY. Your ruling is quite right, Mr. Chairman. I would like you to rule on this point also. I do not agree that we should allow the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) to prove his insinuations. It is his duty to withdraw those insinuations, unless he intends to follow up his charge by a motion affecting the hon. member's seat in this House. You spoke of the hon. gentleman as answering charges made against him. I did not so understand it. He was making charges on his own account and starting recriminations to which there is no end.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The language used by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), and I remember it well, was unparliamentary. No hon. member has a right to call another a hypocrite or say that he is guilty of hypocritical conduct and double-dealing. To put a stop to the whole thing, I would call upon both these hon. members to withdraw their expressions.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for Muskoka gives an explanation which practically removes all offensiveness.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. That is the only way to settle the matter. Let both these hon. gentlemen withdraw the expressions.

Mr. SPROULE. I submit that this is a very irregular way to settle a controversy of this kind. An hon. member can hardly be called upon to withdraw language he used last week and to which no exception was taken, because another hon. gentleman has used an unparliamentary expression.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think that is the only way to put a stop to this controversy. Otherwise there will be no end to it.

Mr. CASEY. I would ask your ruling upon the clear point of order that no hon. member has the right to attack the private character of another unless he wishes to move a motion in effect declaring the gentleman attacked is unfit to be a member of this House. I am not asking for advice for these gentlemen, but for a ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have ruled that these two gentlemen should withdraw their expressions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I submit that you cannot rule on a matter that took place yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. This is still Monday's sitting.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to point out that there is a precedent for your ruling, Mr. Chairman, though I do not know that it occurred in any parliamentary body. You will find it in Knickerbocker's History. Counter charges were made against each other by two eminent Dutch merchants and the case was brought to trial before a judicial tribunal. The judge weighed the account books of the parties and counted the leaves in those books, and having satisfied himself in this way that the accounts were equal, decided that the parties should give each other a receipt in full.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I will say no more about the matter.

Mr. CASEY. It was ruled that you should withdraw.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Not unless the hon. gentleman will withdraw the language he has used toward me. I simply dealt in innuendo. The hon. member for North York has read me a lecture, but did not he make a charge, though not in direct words against the late hon. member for North Grey? I do not pretend to know the facts of the case I have stated. I have followed the example of the hon. member for North York and give what I am told. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) says I do not know the rules of this House. I certainly do not, if one member can call another a hypocrite in a parliamentary manner. I wish to deal with a statement made by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) that this question of the Manitoba schools was not before the country in 1891. In North Ontario the late Mr. Madill was pledged in convention in 1891, by a straight iron-clad pledge to oppose interference with Manitoba. It was a live issue, at least in East Simcoe, in North Ontario, Victoria and in our part of the province generally. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) made charges to-day because an hon. member on this side did not deny an allegation that he made and said that silence gave consent. I would ask the hon. leader of the Opposition, does silence give consent. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) complained that the leader of the House had refused to answer his question, the leader of the Opposition now refuses to answer mine.

Mr. LAURIER. What is your question?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has said that at Chicoutimi the hon. leader of the Opposition declared that he thanked God that there were no Orangemen in the ranks of the Liberal party. Will he deny that charge?

Mr. LAURIER. I have treated that charge with great contempt. If the hon. gentleman wants to have my answer to that charge, I advise him to take the report of my speech—

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Here it is.

Mr. LAURIER. The report of my speech in the organ of the Conservative party at Chicoutimi. I have told the hon. gentleman more than once, and I have told this House that I will not stand responsible for the report of anything I said, unless that report pretends to be a verbatim report.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. But he has not denied it. Here is the statement taken from "Le Progrès de Saguenay," dated March 19th, 1896, founded upon a despatch to "L'Electeur" of December 2nd, 1895. The latter paper, I understand, is the special organ of the leader of the Opposition. This refers to Dr. Macdonald, the hon. member for East Huron, and represents that hon. gentleman as stating that there are as many Orangemen in the ranks of the Liberal party as there are in the ranks of the Conservative party. Will the hon. gentleman say that now?

Mr. MACDONALD. There are.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I am willing to take that statement as a gauge of the accuracy of all the statements made by the hon. gentleman in his long speech of this morning.

> A good number of our electors firmly believe there is not a single Orangeman in the ranks of the Liberal party, since the Hon. Mr. Laurier has affirmed it at a full meeting during last summer at Chicoutimi.
> It appears though that all the Liberals are not of the opinion of Mr. Laurier. Thursday, at Ottawa, Mr. Taylor, a Conservative member, recalled the famous speech of Chicoutimi, in which Mr. Laurier exclaimed : "Thank God, there is not an Orangeman in the ranks of the Liberal party.
> Doctor Macdonald, a Liberal member did interrupt him : "Mr. Laurier has not been able," says he, "to say that, because there are as many Orangemen in the ranks of the Liberal party as in the ranks of the Conservative."
> Mr. Belley rose up to affirm what every one here knew, that Mr. Laurier had made that declaration at Chicoutimi, in his county.
> Mr. Belley could have added it would be easy to obtain fifty affidavits of the most respectable citizens of the county to support his declaration.
> What is most interesting to us is to know who of the two says the truth.
> Is it Mr. Laurier, saying at Chicoutimi before an assembly exclusively Catholic : "Thank God, there are no Orangemen in the ranks of the Liberal party," or is it Mr. Macdonald, a Liberal member, talking in the House itself when he can be contradicted if he transgresses the truth, affirming that there are as many Orangemen in the ranks of the Liberal party as in the Conservative. The circumstances are evidently against Mr. Laurier.

That is from one of their own newspapers. In order to get the exact language used by the leader of the Opposition, I took one of his own newspapers ; and let me give the hon. gentleman another translation :

> I know that I shall be called upon to carry out this undertaking, for the present Government cannot settle the question. How could you expect men who have taken an oath to stifle Catholic influence, to re-establish Catholic schools, which are the very source of that influence ? Thank God, there are no Orangemen among us Liberals, and whensoever the people entrust to me the control of public affairs, I shall only need to appeal to the Christian sentiments of my supporters to induce them to render justice where justice is due.

Mr. FLINT. Where is the translation from ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. It is from "L'Electeur."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Who translated it?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I called into requisition a French member on this side of the House. There is no person better able to correct it than the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier).

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The leader of the Opposition referred to a report in a Conservative paper in that constituency. If the hon. gentleman is fair, he will have that report translated and given to the House and the country.

Mr. LAURIER. As the hon. gentleman has appealed to me, I will answer him now. I have stated on the floor of the House more than once that I will not be responsible, and I will not be responsible, either, at the present time, or at any time, for any words attributed to me in a speech unless it pretends to be reported verbatim. If a speech of one hour is delivered, and if it is not reported, but is pretended to be reported in five or ten lines, I submit there is not a fair-minded man in this House who will hold me responsible for the report. I will give evidence to the hon. gentleman. In the paper cited, "L'Electeur," which is a Liberal organ in the province of Quebec, I am reported to have said : Thank God, there is no Orangeman in the Liberal party. I am not sure what I said on that occasion—I do not pretend to remember what I said—but I must be given credit for some common sense, and I could not have stated that there were no Orangemen in the Liberal party, because there are a few. But I heard the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who is an authority on the subject, declare the other day, more than once, that the bone and sinew of the Conservative party is the Orange body in the province of Ontario. Here is a report from the Liberal paper of a meeting held on September 3, which was published on September 5, by "Le Progrès du Saguenay," published in Chicoutimi, which does not publish a full report, but a report summarized in this way :

> We have taken the declarations made by Mr. Laurier as he gave them to us, and we believe it is unnecessary to comment on them. Every one naturally expected to hear Mr. Laurier say : "If I come to power I will re-establish separate schools at once. I will crush fanaticism and Orangeism, and I will give justice to my co-religionists."
> Far from that, Mr. Laurier contented himself with using the following words, the text of which we cite without giving them any colouring :—
> "If I were in power, I believe I could settle this question. I do not say that I would settle it, because I do not make promises as the Conservatives do, but I believe I would be able to settle it. I will not follow the tactics of the Conservatives, but I will appeal to the sentiments of equity and justice common to all races. My past is before you. If I had been in power during the last five years the question would be settled to-day. Do not forget that when there will be a Liberal Government at Ottawa the leader will be a Canadian and a Catholic."

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. What is the date?

Mr. LAURIER. September 5. There is another article on the same subject on September 12. The paper says :

> "Le Courier de Charlevoix" refers at some length to the visit of Mr. Laurier to Les Eboulements, and states, that it is evident the hon.

> leader of the Opposition has been better received at Charlevoix than at Chicoutimi. We perceive further, that Mr. Laurier delivered at Les Eboulements absolutely the same speech as he delivered at Chicoutimi, and we do not believe that that speech has produced much result anywhere.

This speech is produced in " Le Courier de Charlevoix," and extends over two columns.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Two or three columns.

Mr. LAURIER. Two or three columns, perhaps so, I have not read it. I ask the hon. gentleman, in the face of two such contradictory statements as there are here, in Liberal and Conservative papers, neither of which pretends to be verbatim, both of which are condensed in five or six lines, if it is fair to hold me responsible for one or the other report. Whatever conclusion he may come to, I declare that I do not hold myself responsible for any such garbled report.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I am quite ready to accept any statement on that question made by the hon. leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentleman asked me if it is reasonable to hold him responsible for two statements made, one in a Conservative and the other in a Liberal paper ? I do not hold him responsible, unless he approves what appeared in either newspaper. But the hon. gentleman has quoted from a paper dated September 5, and I quoted from a paper dated September 2.

Mr. LAURIER. One is a weekly, and the other a daily paper.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I accept the statement, so far as it goes, made by the leader of the Opposition. He has shown that he is a bright and shining light to the profession to which he belongs, for he has been able to answer in a non-committal way. He has not stated that he did not say anything of that kind, or the contrary. What he has said is that he could not have said anything of that kind, and the reason is that there are a few Orangemen in the Liberal party. I ask the hon. gentleman to go back to the tablets of his memory, and to say whether he remembers having made a speech of that character in regard to the Orange body. That is as far as I ask him to go.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I was on the same platform as the leader of the Opposition, both at Charlevoix and Chicoutimi, at his meetings there. I heard every word said by him on those two occasions, and I say here that anyone, I do not care who it is, who says the leader of the Opposition said those words would say a lie.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Those are the very words he used. I challenge the hon. member for Quebec East to deny that. I affirm that he used those words at Chicoutimi, and he cannot deny it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. An hon. member cannot tell an hon. member that he has said a lie. The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) stated that the hon. member for Quebec East used those words. So the hon. member says that that hon. gentleman said a lie. I rule that is unparliamentary.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I have nothing to take back, and I will not take back anything. I say that I do not care who it is, if any one says the leader of the Opposition used such an expression, he says a lie.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will have to take it back. The rule is very clear. An hon. gentleman cannot say to another hon. member that he said a lie.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has confessed doing so, by saying that he heard the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay repeat it.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) If the hon. leader of the Opposition flatly denies across the floor of this House having used the words attributed to him, I am quite ready to accept his statement, until proof of the contrary, and I am bound to accept it ; but so long as the hon. gentleman denies it, I repeat that those expressions were used by the hon. leader of the Opposition. Should he deny them, I will accept his statement, but I may tell him that fifty men, among the most respectable citizens of the county, are willing to make affidavit that those were the words he used, and, moreover, I will have the shorthand notes taken down by the mayor of Chicoutimi himself

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to be that one hon. gentleman cannot give the lie to another. But to characterize a statement made elsewhere as unfair or false or a lie is not an unparliamentary declaration. I understand this statement to be one that appeared in the newspapers, and the whole of the discussion has referred to the accuracy of that statement. The hon. gentleman has asked whether it is true or not. So I understand the hon. gentleman was informed by somebody else. I do not understand your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to be that this applies to a statement made by parties who are not members of the House, and who have no responsibility to the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) has stated that the hon. member for Quebec East made that statement. I understand this is the fact, and on it I base my decision, which, of course, I can change if it is shown that I am not correct as regards the facts. I understood the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay to say that the member for Quebec used the words imputed to him by the hon. member for North Ontario. The hon. member for Montmagny says anybody who uses such language lies. If he applied that language to the hon. member for Chicoutimi, he must take it back.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman from Chicoutimi to say that he heard me use those words ?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) That is what I stated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Speak English.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) Let the hon. leader of the Opposition speak French. Why cannot the hon. gentleman sometimes use the French language in this House ?

Mr. LAURIER. I asked the hon. gentleman if he was at that meeting, and heard me use those words. If the hon. gentleman states here on the floor of this House that he was present and heard me use those words, we should have to accept the statement, and I would be the first to ask the member for Montmagny to withdraw his words. But if the hon. member merely says that he heard some one else state that I used those words, then that would be another question for you to rule upon.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I affirm here that is the statement I made a little while ago, and I never stated anything else ; I affirm that the hon. member for Quebec East used the expression attributed to him, and I challenge him to deny it.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he affirmed that the member for Quebec East did make use of those words.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He was not there.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes no difference. If the hon. member has affirmed that the member for Quebec East used those words, and the member for Montmagny gets up and says that any person who affirms that, lies, it does seem to me that those are words which ought not to be used by any member of this House. I am not obliged to tell the hon. gentleman upon what basis I make my affirmation ; but if I affirm that so and so has been said, and another hon. gentleman gets up and says that I am a liar, I think he goes beyond decency as well as parliamentary rule.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The member for Chicoutimi says he was not present, but he says he was informed that the member for Quebec East had used those words. Under those circumstances I call on the member for Montmagny to change his accusation, and to say that the member for Chicoutimi has been badly informed.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. That is just what I said, that any man who says that he heard the leader of the Opposition using those words, lied.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would ask the hon. member to say that the member for Chicoutimi has been misinformed.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest to my hon. friend from Montmagny to submit to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I am willing to change the words, and to say that if the member for Chicoutimi said that he had been so informed, he has certainly been very badly informed, and the man who told him so, lied.

Mr. CARROLL. I was present at that meeting at Chicoutimi, and was standing near the leader of the Opposition, and the member for Chicoutimi was not at that meeting. I now affirm that the leader of the Opposition did not use the words attributed to him by the member for Chicoutimi.

Mr. FOSTER. Since this question is up, it would be far more satisfactory if the hon. member, who could not have made such a statement as that without it being pretty firmly imprinted on his memory, would say here and now, just what he did say.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you mean to doubt the hon. gentleman ?

Mr. FOSTER. One hon. gentleman rises and says that such expressions were never used by the leader of the Opposition, and another says they were. The leader of the Opposition is the principal in the matter, he knows exactly what he did say. So far as I have heard, he has never denied it.

Mr. MULOCK. Do you think you could repeat all you stated at a public meeting.

Mr. FOSTER. The statement that he is said to have made was in a report published in "La Patrie," as being a revised and exact report of the hon. gentleman's statement. This is the statement that appeared in "La Patrie" :

> As the Conservative papers have published chimerical reports of the speeches delivered, we give here the correct text of the declaration made by the hon. Mr. Laurier :
> "I know," said Mr. Laurier, "that I will be called upon to implement that engagement, for the present Government cannot settle the question. Is it possible for men who have vowed to stifle Catholic influence to restore Catholic schools, which are the very source of such influence ! Thank God ! There are no Orangemen among us, Liberals. And on the day when the people intrust to me the management of public affairs, I will only have to appeal to the Christian feelings of my followers to induce them to mete out justice to whom justice is due."

Now, that is a statement made officially, made by a very respectable paper, "La Patrie," which is looked upon as one of the first papers in the province of Quebec, a paper that has done service to the Liberal party all through the province. I have never seen in a French paper an explicit denial by the hon. gentleman of those sentiments. It is a most important statement for any man to have made, a statement which I should hope my hon. friend has not made, and which I am bound to suppose he has not made, if he denies it. But I am not aware that he has taken the trouble to deny it in the province of Quebec. Let him deny it now, and set the matter at rest.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman thinks that his cleverness will draw me from the position I have taken, he is very much mistaken. I have been in the habit of speaking for many years in this House, and out of it. I think I have been in the habit of governing my tongue, and I think I have been given credit for possessing, at least, some common sense. I am responsible, I repeat again, for the two speeches which purport to be delivered by me, and which are reported. The hon. gentleman calls this an official statement. It is reproduced from "L'Electeur," which was published on the 4th September. The "L'Electeur" received a report from Chicoutimi, which it published, purporting to be a report of my speech, and which contains these ten lines. I ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks it is fair to hold me accountable for such a report of a speech. Would he himself like to be held accountable for such a report of a speech of his? The hon. gentleman says it has done duty in the province of Quebec. This is another matter. I want to ask the hon. gentleman, who is a public man, who is in the habit of speaking, and will speak again, if he speaks for an hour or two and his speech is reported in ten lines, would he accept that as an authentic report of his speech? Would he himself like to be held accountable? I appeal to the hon. gentleman's fairness to say if he would like to be held accountable under such circumstances. Now, Sir, I was travelling at that time, and attention was drawn to it for the first time by Mr. Smith, who is organizer for the Liberal party in the province of Ontario. I wrote to him a letter which was published in the "Globe," and which contains the denial that I gave on that occasion. I ask if there is any gentleman in this House who is acquainted with me, who can believe that I would have made such a statement as that, that there was not an Orangeman in the Liberal party?—knowing well that my hon. friend from Addington (Mr. Dawson) is an Orangeman. Why, I could not make such a statement with truth.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Did the hon. gentleman know that then?

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman must be sure that I know something. I say that under such circumstances, putting myself in the judgment of both sides of the House. I cannot be called upon to say more than this. I am willing on this question to abide by the judgment and the sense of fairness of both political friends and foes.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Perhaps I may now be permitted to go on. Let me read an article from the "Globe" of 20th November, 1895, showing what the member for West York thought of this matter.

(The hon. member read the article, also the opinion of the "Globe" on the matter.)

Now, I think every hon. gentleman would like to hear a more explicit denial from the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What does the hon. member make of the denial of the two gentlemen who were there?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Supposing these two gentlemen had been out of hearing at that particular moment?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I was there all the time.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. He may have been talking to some one else at that time. I do not intend to dwell on that longer. I have not succeeded in getting the denial I had hoped for. But I have been told that the mayor of that town had the words taken down by a shorthand reporter, and that fifty men are willing to make affidavit that these words were used.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Does the hon. member know who the mayor of Chicoutimi is?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. No.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He is the brother-in-law of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) and a Tory—he is of the same breed.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Because he is of the same breed, to use the hon. gentleman's term, and a Conservative, is that any reason why he should not be believed? Have none of the hon. gentleman's relations been honest?

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) has threatened us with affidavits. Let me say that the mayor of Chicoutimi is proprietor of the "Le Progrès du Saguenay." If he took my speech down verbatim, why did he not publish in his paper the statement he now says I made. Why did he publish a different report?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) There is nothing extraordinary in the fact that the "Progrès du Saguenay" did not report the words attributed to the hon. leader of the Opposition, because he understood that those words had been used by the hon. gentleman in order to allow his friends to make political capital out of them against the Conservatives.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). I wish the hon. gentleman would bring his remarks to a close. They provoke denials on every hand.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I am trying to get through, if they will allow me. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said that before I was born Sir Oliver Mowat had opposed the establishment of separate schools. If the hon. gentleman cannot diagnose a case of illness better than he can judge my age, I would not give much for his professional skill. I remember very well when Sir Oliver Mowat came into public life and appeared before the electors of South Ontario. We then see the Hon. Oliver Mowat insulting the Orangemen of the province of Ontario. It may be said there are Orangemen on the other side of the House. The hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson) is an Orangeman. I believe the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was once an Orangeman, but that he says now that it was a foolish indiscretion of his youth that he has long since abandoned. But at that time the present Sir Oliver Mowat declared that the Orangemen must be incorporated, and, backed by the "Globe," which now takes a much different stand, he appealed to the ultra-Protestant and Orange vote. Let me say to the leader of the Opposition that the Orangemen of Ontario are a most respectable body of men. Does he, or do those who speak for him, try to cast a slur upon a body of men such as that ? If the hon. leader of the Opposition ever made use of such language as has been imputed to him, he showed himself unworthy of the high place he now occupies.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I rise to a point of order. The leader of the House has told us that they are anxious to press this measure. He is not present. I think he ought to be sent for to choke off the hon. member for North Ontario. That hon. gentleman willingly obeyed the mandate of his leader to sit down before. If the order were to come from the same source again, he would probably cease. What he is saying is not pertinent to the subject under discussion. It is evident, from the course the supporters of the Government are pursuing, that some of them are being put up to obstruct business.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). I do not see that that is a point of order.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He is not discussing the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Those who have spoken for the last ten hours have wandered from the question. I hope the hon. gentleman will keep as near to the question as he can.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I will close very soon, if they will not interrupt me. This is the first time I have spoken since we got into committee. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) said the leader of the House had called me down. Did not the leader of the Opposition do the same thing just now with the hon. gentleman sitting beside him (Mr. Choquette) ? When my leader asks me to defer speaking, I will obey my leader.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). We must send for him, and get you shut up.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I shall not devote much attention to that hon. gentleman ; his language is neither parliamentary nor gentlemanly. He made a charge that Judge Masson voted with the Government on this measure because he had the promise of an office, and said that the fact of Mr. Masson occupying that office was proof of it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Allow me to interrupt——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I want to make a personal explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Order. It will be better to let the hon. gentleman go on with his argument.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I would like to say one word.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that you do not order the hon. member for North Ontario to come to the question. When I see you denouncing the obstructionists in your paper, I think you ought to do so.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. member for North Brant comes from the county where the Hon. Nicholas Awrey lives, a most respectable man, who left his place in the legislature to take an office under the Crown. Is that proof that Nicholas Awrey was purchased ? I do not believe he was. It is a shame to make such charges on the floor of this House as have been made against Judge Masson. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) made charges in this House also. Whether my stay in Parliament be long or short—and I do not care how long it is—I will not submit to misrepresentation, if I can reply in parliamentary language. If I appealed to scriptures in my argument, it was only to answer the hon. member for North Norfolk with the same authority he had used. I would have been glad had the hon. member for West York been now in the Chamber, but, as he is not here, I must proceed in his absence. He has accused me of wabbling. But let me say that in the convention in North Ontario I was opposed by Dr. Gillespie and Mr. W. H. Hoyle. Mr. Hoyle believed that we should pledge ourselves against the action of the Government with regard to remedial legislation. The first letter I received from my constituency with regard to my vote was from Mr. Hoyle. He writes me that he is delighted that I voted against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition and the second reading also, and declares that this vote will secure me the unanimous nomination by the convention and put my election beyond peradventure. And I have received many other letters of the same kind. But I got the disapproval of the hon. member for West York because I could not see with him and vote for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition. I have the approval of the Conservative press of the entire county of Ontario in my action. I am endorsed by the Orillia "Packet," which is edited by a stalwart Protestant; by the Muskoka "Herald," which edited by an Orangeman; by the Cannington "Gleaner," which is edited by two Orangemen; by the North Ontario "Times," and every other Liberal-Conservative paper in the district. If I have not the approval of the hon. member for West York, that is a matter of regret to me, which I cannot help. But I have also the approval of the Hamilton "Spectator," which has been quoted as being opposed to the Government on this question.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Will the hon. gentleman point out the difference between supporting the motion for the six months' hoist and a vote against the second reading in a Parliament that will expire on the 24th April?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. "May" says that the six months' hoist is a means of postponing the question. Perhaps it may postpone it for a few months. Bourinot says that the second reading is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and settle the principle of the Bill. I voted against the second reading of the Bill, when it was affirming the principle. I did not vote against the Government.

Mr. MULOCK. Because you wanted to see that it would not hurt the Government before you voted against them.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I have not imputed motives to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). I have not accused him of acting so as to secure the Orange vote in North York, although at the same time he supports separate schools in Ontario. That hon. gentleman supports one school measure for Ontario and another for Manitoba. I did not vote for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, first, because the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) told me that his leader was wrong: and secondly, because the French members supporting the Opposition said one after the other in this House: "Let the leader of the Opposition form a government, and he will introduce a stronger Bill than that under consideration." I wanted no such amendment, and I did not support such an amendment. Why do I not support remedial legislation?

Mr. MULOCK. Why do you?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Because ever since I have spoken on a public platform, I have supported the public school system. I accept the judgment of the Privy Council as a judgment and as an order. I believe those judges went outside the record and went further than the questions submitted to them, and I do not care to obey their order, and therefore I voted not only against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, but the second reading of the Bill as well. I am sorry we cannot all see alike. It may be said that some members are looking both ways, but I am not looking both ways, I am acting consistently. Having gone through North Ontario, where the people of the riding are opposed to remedial legislation, and where I was elected three months ago and having come here as a delegate to represent the views of my people, who are opposed to remedial legislation, I therefore oppose it.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman appears to have been elected mainly to secure the passage of a certain Bill, and when this has been accomplished, he will no doubt retire from politics.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I never made such a statement; I do not care who says to the contrary.

Mr. CASEY. At all events, the hon. gentleman is going out of politics to stay. I am reminded of a story. There was a jackass on one side of a river and a bale of hay on the other, and the jackass could not swim and there was no boat; and the conundrum was as to how the jackass was to get at the hay. After thinking a long time, I gave the conundrum up, as did the other jackass. I would invite the hon. member for North Ontario to follow the same example, as an explanation of how he came to vote as he did. The hon. gentleman has created as much excitement in this House today as is usually attributed to a dog with a tin-pan attached to its tail. Hon. members have, however, had a good time, and they are grateful to the hon. member for it; but perhaps the object of all this excitement may not have had so good a time. We have been interested and excited in the evolutions of the hon. member for North Ontario, and we probably would not have been so except for the painful adjunct in question. However, the time has arrived when the committee should discuss clauses in the Bill. The hon. Minister in charge of the Bill is not present, and the committee can scarcely be asked to proceed in his absence. He is going to die for the Bill. We want to see him dying right here, where we can pay decent respect to his latter end. In New York "Life" and other comic papers, characters are often designated as "Timmy Toddles," and so on. I am afraid the hon. member for North Ontario should be called "Wiggle Wabbled," because he wabbled into the House, he has wabbled around ever since, and he is going to wabble out at the next elections.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I thought the hon. gentleman indicated that I would go out before the elections.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman may not retire before the elections, but he will wabble out about that time. The hon. gentleman had a minority of 200 in his riding, and he really represents a minority. Referring to the Secretary of State, I think an admirable description of the hon. gentleman is given in the story of an old naval officer who had some strange experiences. It is entitled "The Yarn of the Nancy Bell," and is by Gilbert, who is well known in connection with opera bouffe.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that the leader of the House and the hon. gentleman responsible for this Bill has at last returned to his place, it is perhaps well that we should return to the consideration of the Bill, and perhaps to some detailed consideration of the clauses. But I must protest, as everybody else has done, that it is not obstruction to keep away from the clauses of this Bill in hours which are not business hours, and at times when the promoter of the Bill is not present. He is present a very small part of the time of the day, and it is impossible to discuss the Bill when he is not here, for no one else knows how far the Government would be willing to modify the Bill. For twelve hours we are willing to work, but during the other twelve hours we are not willing to work at this Bill. We know that even if the House were favourable to this Bill, it would take weeks after weeks of detailed discussion in the committee before it would receive its final form. But everybody in the House is not in favour of it. We know the Government were aware of that, we are convinced that they postponed it until a late period of the session in knowledge of this fact, and prepared to take advantage of this fact. I believe that I am expressing the opinion of the great mass of those who have looked into the matter, who have taken an intelligent note of the conduct of the Government, when I say that their pretensions of a desire to pass this Bill through at this stage are hollow, and that the fault and delay rest entirely with them. I believe they will find that to be the case on inspecting journals published in the province of Quebec. The Government should, by accepting reasonable propositions to work at reasonable hours, show their real desire to proceed with this Bill, if they have any such desire.

Mr. FLINT. The rules of Parliament in the mother country, of which Parliament ours is a model, have wisely provided that certain hours should be devoted to the business of legislation, and that the rest of the time should be devoted to rest and refreshment, and to study of the subject under legislation, either in the seclusion of their own homes or in the Library of Parliament. But the Government here has completely ignored those wholesome rules, and made it impossible for us either to take our needed rest and refreshment or to give this Bill the careful study which its importance requires at our hands. I think it requires an enormous amount of assurance on the part of the Government and their supporters to charge us, under these circumstances, with pursuing an obstructive line of conduct. We know that the Government themselves delayed for months the introduction of this measure into the House. Even the lengthy debate on the second reading has been charged upon the opponents of the Bill, as a result of their policy of obstruction.

It was only on the second occasion of the House assembling after being in committee on the Bill that the leader of the House charged obstruction and intimated tactics in terms which would rouse the feelings of men accustomed to free discussion and determine them to show that they could not be threatened, to show, in short, that the House could not be bulldozed into passing a Bill like this at one sitting of the committee. That charge of obstruction has been kept up. But the fair and reasonable offer made that the House should sit until three o'clock, and should then rise that members might get their needed rest, was refused, and consequently on this motion that the committee rise and report progress, the discussion has broadened into the character of that which would have taken place on the third reading of the Bill. But, Sir, the course of the Government in this matter is understood. I have here the file of "La Verité," a Bleu journal published in Quebec, and supposed generally to reflect the sentiments of a very large number of the most learned clergy of the province. This journal has contributed to this discussion a series of very able articles. This is the "La Verité" of March 7th, from which I quote the following:—

ANOTHER WORD YET.

> The parliamentary correspondence of the "Trifluvien" considers that the present time is not well chosen for discussing the merits of the Remedial Bill. We believe it is infinitely better worth our while to examine this Bill now when it is at least theoretically possible to modify it, than to pass it first and then to estimate its shortcomings.
> It will be said : "if there are defects they will be removed by subsequent legislation." Let no one create this illusion for himself. As the Act is when passed—so it will remain. Never can Parliament be led to legislate twice on the question.
> It is enough to remember what is going on at Ottawa to convince one of this.
> If the Bill is not modified so as to make it conform entirely to the remedial order of last March, it can be attacked as unconstitutional. In effect, the Federal Parliament has no right to legislate on the school question, except in so far as the Manitoba legislature has refused to legislate itself.
> Now, the remedial order of 21st March, 1895, declared that the minority had a right to three things, viz. : (a.) To construct, maintain, manage Roman Catholic schools. (b.) To receive a proportionate share of every subsidy granted from the public funds for educational purposes. (c.) Finally, exemption for the Catholics from taxes imposed for the maintenance of public schools. It is a, b, c, which the Federal Gov> ernment ordered the legislature to do. It is, therefore, a, b, c, which the Manitoba legislature has refused to do. It is, therefore, a, b, and c, which the Federal Parliament has the right to do, in virtue of the constitution.

> But by the Bill actually before the public, the Government only invites Parliament to do (a) and (c) ; for no matter what we may say, clause 74 does not do (b), that is to say, it does not give the minority a proportionate part of every grant made for educational purposes out of public funds.
> Winnipeg may then say : " I have refused to do a, b and c, but I have not refused to do a and c.
> You have therefore the right to legislate on a, b and c, because of my refusal ; but you have not the right to legislate on a and c, because you have not, in the first place given me notice of action—(vous ne m'avez pas mis en demeure) to legislate myself in regard to a and c alone. It is useless to do like the ostrich, to hide one's head in the sand and believe oneself under shelter. If clause 74 is not modified so as to do c, the Act will probably be declared unconstitutional.

As to the charge that the Opposition are responsible for the defeat of the measure, I would like to call the attention of the House and the country to the strong and pointed expressions of opinion of this journal :

> Because it has not suited the Government to submit its Bill to the House in good time journalists are forbidden (according to " La Presse") to examine it and the members of Parliament to work for its improvement. Such is the logic which they cultivate at the " La Presse " office.
> We warn the Montreal sheet and the Bleu press in general that that will not take. If the Government had introduced its Bill in July, as the Hon. Mr. Angers desired, or even at the beginning of the session, the members and the press would have had ample time to study the measure from all points of view without putting in peril in the least degree the final passage of the Bill.
> To-day the Government and the Bill are at the mercy of the Opposition.
> Whose fault is it ?
> What is regrettable and mal-inspired is neither the article in " La Verité " nor Mr. Dupont's amendments ; it is in the first place the conduct of the Government which has delayed in a culpable manner the introduction of the Bill, and in the next place the language of " La Presse," which pretends to hold " La Vérité " and Mr. Dupont responsible for the Ministerial check.
> Again, that will not take.
> If the Remedial Bill is not adopted at this session, it will be the fault solely of the Federal Government, which in spite of the warnings of its true friends has persisted in withholding the Bill from the House until the moment when Parliament is about to pass from existence.
> That is what every one will say and that will be the truth.
> Many will say also that the Government has acted in this way solely for the purpose of making remedial legislation a failure. And they probably will not be wrong.

It has already been pointed out how much this Bill was delayed by the differences in the Cabinet and the revelations concerning them which shocked the country.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of Mr. Fraser that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. All in favour of that motion will please say " aye."

Mr. WALLACE. Before that motion is carried, I wish to say a word or two. There are very strong reasons why it should be adopted. We have passed some clauses of the Bill, amended some, and dropped others, and we are now face to face with clause 10, on which clause we should pause. This is the most objectionable clause which we have come to yet. I am sorry that more members of the Cabinet are not here at the present time, because it may necessitate my repeating my arguments when they come in at a later hour in the evening. However, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Postmaster General, the most select of the Ministers are here, and of all the members of the Government I do not think there are two gentlemen more amenable to sound argument. If we convince these two gentlemen it will be a comparatively easy task to convince the others, because I have no doubt they will convince them for us. I am glad to see that the Minister of Justice is coming into the House. He is quite an acquisition to the galaxy of able men who are attentively listening to my remarks to-night. Now, this clause 10 proposes to give to the municipal councils the power to form separate school districts, but what it gives with one hand it takes away with the other. It is very proper to give that power to the municipal council, but when we look a little further down in the clause we find that they are compelled to be guided by the regulations of the Board of Education. Here, contrary to the rule in all self-governing countries, the local legislature is wiped off the slate and the Board of Education is vested with plenary powers. One would think that the municipal council would refuse such a humiliating position. However, there is worse than that, because even when the municipal council does make its regulations, any one who wants to kick can make an appeal to the Board of Education, and the municipal council are hauled up again like a lot of culprits to justify their action. This clause is calculated to harass municipal councils at every step they take, and for that reason we should pause here, wipe it out altogether, or mend it so that the Parliament of Canada may be proud of its handiwork. It appears to me that the Government and most members of the House of Commons are willing to stop right here. The only ones who appear to be restless and uneasy are some of those who have voted for the Bill, and who are not quite sure what kind of a reception they will get from their constituents. When they go back they will be asked: What did you do? and they will say: Well, we sat in committee all last week. And what did you accomplish; and the reply will have to be: Nothing, but we just stamped our feet until the soles were worn off our boots, and yelled "carried." Was it not a glorious job for the Government whip to try and coerce the members to try and force this Bill through. They will have to go back to their constituents and tell them they were trying to hold the fort as they call it, but they will have to admit at the same time that the fort did not hold worth a cent. This Bill is objectionable because it proposes to coerce Manitoba, and not only have the Government tried to do that, but they have had the assurance to try to coerce the free Parliament of Canada. Well, as far as my observations go, they have not been eminently successful in that. It is true that our physical powers have been tested, but we are glad to find how equal to the task we were. I am sure it must be gratifying to the members of the Government to see that we all feel so well after our efforts, and more especially is it so to the leader of the House, because I know that while he is reckless of his own health, he is anxious and solicitous for the health of the members of the House of Commons. Therefore, it must gratify him to find that, notwithstanding our long session and our arduous labours, the members of the House of Commons to-night are in such vigorous health and in such excellent temper. Now, why are we asked to pass this legislation? The history of other countries which have tried for many years the system of denominational schools, is such as to discourage any attempt on our part to go back to a system that has been discarded in almost every country where it has been tried. Some hon. gentlemen have said: See what secularism has done for France; it has made France, they say, a nation of infidels. I protest against that statement. If France is a nation of infidels, it was so before the system of secular schools was established. If it is a nation of infidels, it became so under a system of religious denominational schools.

Mr. LANGELIER. If my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him, I beg to say that there have been no religious schools in France for over a century.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. gentleman is a little wrong in his historical facts. My information is that both in the time of Louis Philippe and in the time of the Emperor Napoleon, religious schools prevailed, and that it was not until the establishment of the republic, twenty-five or twenty-six years ago, that religious schools were entirely abolished, and the secular system adopted.

Mr. LANGELIER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There were only religious schools for a short time during the Restoration. During the time of the Second Empire, from 1851 to 1870, it was strictly prohibited by law to open private schools. There was only a national school system. I know that, because I lived in France at that time. The present republic has not altered the system. The only difference is that it gives more money for public education than was ever given before; but it has not secularized the schools any more than they were for a long time before—I may say, from the French Revolution of 1789.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to hear the explanations of the hon. member for Quebec. Of course, his residence in that country has enabled him to speak with knowledge of the subject. I can only repeat that, during the Napoleonic regime, the schools were religious—that even when the secular system was supposed to prevail, as a matter of fact, the schools were largely religious schools. Therefore, I repeat that, if there is any infidelity in France, it is due to other causes than secular schools. Now, I was going to make some reference to the schools in Quebec and to the statements of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) and the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) in regard to them; but I will reserve what I have to say to a later hour in the evening.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, on the motion which is now in your hands, namely, that the committee rise and report progress, I desire to say a few words. We have now been here for nearly 100 hours.

Mr. FOSTER. A record.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not only the longest sitting of this Parliament, but I venture to say that it is the longest sitting of any parliament; and, although some gentlemen may say that it is a record. I think it is a record of which we have no reason to feel proud. This is a deliberative assembly; we are here for the purpose of deliberating and legislating; and we have laid down in our rules that this House is to meet every day at three o'clock on the different days of the week on which it is to assemble, except Saturday; and the result of the present proceedings is practically to suspend or abolish our rules. Whether the Government, in the course they are taking, are designedly shutting off the inquiries which might be put, according to our rules, if the House met in the ordinary way, I cannot say; but, Sir, it is the fact that, although all the days of the week, except Wednesday, have been given up to the Government, those days have not altogether passed out of the hands of private members, because questions, at all events, were permitted to be put—questions sometimes on matters of very grave importance, and on which it is needful and proper that we should have answers before we proceed with other business. Now, it has been stated so often that I need not repeat it, that it is impossible that the members of this House can remain here day in and night in, and day in again, and discharge their duties. The result is that one section of the House of Commons are present at one stage of the proceedings, and another section at another stage; and at no time can the whole House be here to consider the questions submitted to the committee. The result, of course, must necessarily be very disastrous to this Bill. What one section of the House do at one part of the day the next section of the House know nothing of when they come to proceed, if they do proceed with the other portion of the measure. Therefore, it did appear to me on Monday night, after this House had given full consideration to the clauses submitted to it, that the proper thing to do was for the committee to rise. I think the hon. gentleman who then moved that the committee rise, took the proper course; and we would have done better, in my judgment, if, after that, we had never again considered a single clause of the Bill. It has been said that we have been guilty of obstruction. Now, I desire to state very shortly what we have done, in order to show the committee that that charge is not well-founded. This House had been in committee on the preceding Tuesday, and on that day we passed three very important sections of the Bill. It is undoubtedly true that we had not given sufficient consideration to the last of those clauses, because, as the Government themselves have admitted, it may be necessary for them to reconsider that clause, and finally to ask the House, at a later stage, to expunge it. We met again on Saturday, and went into committee at eleven o'clock. Section 4, the most important section in the Bill, was then submitted to us, and we debated that section from eleven o'clock in the forenoon until the committee were compelled to rise at night; and I do not think any hon. gentleman will say that the discussion of the clauses in that section—because there were several—was undue, or anything but fair and reasonable. Unfortunately, on Saturday, the Minister of Justice, who is primarily responsible for the Bill, was not in his place; and, as the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), who had charge for the day, was not able satisfactorily, as he himself admitted, to answer some of the arguments which had been urged, and which undeniably, as he stated, were of considerable importance, it was not unnatural that on Monday, when we again went into committee, with the Minister of Justice in his place, we should have brought to his attention the arguments on the difficult legal questions which had puzzled us on the preceding Saturday. The discussion on Monday was therefore, to a certain extent, a review of what had taken place on Saturday; but it was only proper and necessary under the circumstances. Since that Monday we have finally passed section 4, which, counting its subsections "a," "b," "c," "d," "e" and "f," really consists of six clauses; we have disposed of section 5, section 6, section 7, section 8, which embodies four subsections, and section 9, which has been stricken out. Now, how much time has been occupied in the discussion of these clauses? Go back to last night, for example, when the Secretary of State was good enough to tell the committee that the work that had been done was satisfactory to himself, and he thanked the committee for the aid it had given the Government in perfecting this measure. Last evening we had passed sections 6, 7 and 8, and we went back and considered a part of section 4. How long did it take us to do that? It took us from half-past eight until half-past one. We know now that on the Monday, without any indication and without there being a shadow of ground for charging that the committee were not dealing properly with this measure, it was known before four o'clock that arrangements had been made by the Government for sitting the whole of this week. Before anything had occurred in the committee at all, even before the committee had met, it was known throughout the lobbies of this House that arrangements had been made for a continued sitting, and that the Government had divided their forces into two or three gangs, in order to enable them to endure the physical strain that would be necessary, if this scheme were to be carried out. I want to point out that this Bill contains not merely 112 clauses, but that, if the subsections are taken into account—and, although not numbered, they are clauses just as much as if they were—the Bill contains 260 sections; and, if the rate of progress we made last evening be looked upon as fair and reasonable—and I do not think any man will say it was not—admittedly it was, because we had the admission from the leader of the House that it was—then this Bill could not be properly considered in committee in less than twenty-five days. That would be an average of an hour to each clause, which would be a smaller average for the remainder of the Bill than the time occupied on sections 6, 7 and 8, and a part of section 4, which we dealt with last evening, between half-past eight and half-past one. If we are here to be of any service in aiding to perfect this legislation, it is apparent, from what we have seen and know of this measure, that we could not possibly discharge our duties properly in less time than the hour we have devoted to each one of these clauses. Then, let us see whether the committee's deliberations have been of any service. With the exception of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd clauses—and it is practically admitted that these last two clauses were passed with too great speed in the small hours of the morning—each and every one has undergone most material changes. Clause 4 would hardly recognize itself, the changes in it have been so numerous.

Clause 6 has been amended; clause 5 completely changed; clause 9 has been wiped out. So that in the time we have taken, we have accomplished some good. I venture to say, under these circumstances, that we are doing no credit to ourselves or parliamentary institutions by continuing the farce of attempting, by physical means, to force this Bill through the committee. I looked with curiosity to see what was the longest period of time occupied by the Imperial Parliament in any sitting, and I suppose I am right in assuming that it was during the obstructive tactics which brought Mr. Parnell into notice that we find the longest sitting. Starting with 1880 down to the present, the longest sitting of the English House of Commons was not more than forty-seven hours, and we have already doubled that in the sitting which is already going on In 1880 the longest sitting beyond midnight, was twelve and three-quarter hours; in 1881, the longest sitting beyond midnight, was fourteen hours and five minutes; in March, 1884, it was five and three-quarter hours; in March, 1885, it was five hours and fifteen minutes; in June, 1886, it was four hours; and in June, 1887, thirteen hours and twenty minutes. The longest sitting of all, in 1881, was thirty-three and a half hours beyond midnight, or about forty-seven hours altogether. It is clear that nothing can justify these proceedings but the appearance of obstruction in the committee itself; and I destroy any ground for any such contention when I say that the plan of this perpetual sitting was determined on before the committee had entered on its duty on Monday, before there had been the slightest indication on the part of the committee that any obstructive tactics would be resorted to. The hon. leader of the Government has told us that in New Zealand, at one time, there had been an insignificant minority, almost as bad as the insignificant minority here, and that it had been guilty of obstruction by moving, alternately, without entering on the Bill submitted to them, that the committee rise, and made twenty-three motions in succession, without anything else being done. But here we sat all Monday until four o'clock in the morning, considering the Bill, and it was not until human nature was unable to continue the exertion that a member of the committee protested against the protracted sitting, and asked that the committee rise. I am not speaking now so much of myself personally nor my fellow-members, but I am making an appeal to the committee, because of the damage and injury we are doing to the Parliament we ought to be proud of, and whose honour is in our keeping. I make this appeal, because it may be said of us, after this, that we are hardly fit for responsible government, and that, if properly dealt with, we would be relegated to the position of a Crown colony. The responsibility of this course rests with the leader of the House and the majority behind him who are taking this unnatural and unreasonable course without any pretense of justification. But there is another ground why this committee should rise, and I allude to it with a great deal of pain. I have had the honour of sitting in this House a number of years, and one of my fellow-members, who has just disappeared was a gentleman who frequently sat on my right. Sir, it has been known to all of us, it was published from time to time in the press, that the gentleman who was then the member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) had the promise from the Government of the county court judgeship of the county of Huron, and it has been plain to all of us that the hon. gentleman was a thick and thin partizan in the last period of his parliamentary life. No one who knows North Grey, as I happen to know it, can doubt that if there is a constituency in Canada which is opposed to this Remedial Bill, it is the one which this hon. gentleman represented until Monday last. We all witnessed with surprise the course that he took in supporting the policy of the Government on this measure, and whispers were not wanting that the arrangement, which we have now seen carried out, had been entered into. Why was the appointment of a judge of the county of Huron allowed to remain open from the 14th May, 1895, until Monday last? Why is it that this and other appointments have not been filled? Is it possible for us to doubt that promises have been made to these hon. gentlemen, whose names are mentioned, from time to time, in the press, and even on the floor of this House, or that, whether promises have been made or not, there is ground to suspect that these gentlemen are anticipating a reward if they support the Government? Can there be a more flagrant case than the one I am alluding to? Why was the appointment to the county judgeship of Huron made on Monday last? Because a Bill was going through the local House, which became law on Tuesday, which enacted that in the county of Huron, because there were not 80,000 people in that county, no second county judge was to be appointed. The Government, therefore, could not wait, the hon. member for Grey could not wait until the 24th of this month. The appointment would not stand, for if not made on Monday there would be no place to give. Now, is it possible to doubt that that hon. gentleman has been sitting in this House pretending to represent the people of North Grey, with the promise of the distinguished position of a judge of the county court in his possession? Why, I do not know that in all Canadian history—and it contains some remarkable events of that kind—there is a more flagrant, a more disgraceful proceeding than the one that has taken place during this week. And if there are other gentlemen sitting here in the position of the hon. member for North Grey, is it not right that this committee should rise and refuse to proceed a single step further with the Bill? Their names are mentioned, and I will take the responsibility of giving these gentlemen an opportunity of contradicting the statements on the floor of Parliament. There is an hon. gentleman in this House for whom I have the very greatest regard, whose constituency was swept away at the last rearrangement. I allude to the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle), and I hope he is now in his place; and I say that it is published in newspaper after newspaper that he is to have the collectorship of customs at Niagara Falls, which has been vacant for the last two years. And if kept vacant, what other reason can there be except that some member of this House is to fill the position?

Mr. EDGAR. Like the Montreal customs.

Mr. McCARTHY. Exactly. For three years was that important position vacant, with the knowledge—just as we can have such knowledge—on the part of every member of this House that it had been promised to the late member for Cardwell (Mr. White). When the Government were questioned, they replied that there was no promise, but it is now perfectly clear that there was, because the late member for Cardwell, tired of the procrastination, ashamed of his position, finally resigned and forced the hand of the Government, and they were obliged to give him the long-promised office. Now, it is not merely the hon. member for Monck that I desire to mention. I refer also to the senior member for the city of Hamilton (Mr. McKay), and I hope he will make a clear and explicit statement, before this discussion closes, as to his position. Sir, Hamilton is a city which has given no uncertain sound on this question. Both the hon. members for Hamilton, more especially the senior member for the city, have repeatedly and openly declared their hostility to any measure of this kind. The great Conservative newspaper of that city has voiced the feeling of the Conservative electorate of that part of the country, including the city of Hamilton, against the measure. And yet this hon. gentleman was found voting for this Bill, and we find it stated that arrangements are being made in order that he may be appointed collector of customs for the city of Hamilton. I take my authority from the Government newspaper of this city. This Government organ did not seem to think there was any shame about it. On the 24th of last month, it published this statement, which has been verified by the proceedings that have since taken place in this House:

> The Controller of Customs has given notice of a Bill to amend the Act respecting the Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue. It is understood that the purport of the Bill is to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Customs, which is now $2,800 a year, and this in turn points to the retention at Ottawa of the acting commissioner, Mr. Kilvert, who is now collector of customs at Hamilton. He is understood to have all along declined the appointment on the ground chiefly that the salary is less than that which pertains to his office as collector at Hamilton.

And the organ of the Government, drawing its inspiration, day by day, from the members of the Government, tells us that should Mr. Kilvert accept the commissionership of customs, in all probability Mr. McKay, M.P., will be appointed to the collectorship at Hamilton. I would like that hon. gentleman to remove the stain, which, under these circumstances, attaches to his character as a public man. I hope he will be able to tell us that there is no truth in this, that there is no understanding, expressed or implied, that he is to be the collector of Hamilton, if the Bill, of which the Collector of Customs gave notice, becomes law. I will mention another hon. gentleman—I am not going through this long black list—and he shall have an opportunity also of denying the charge, for I make it upon the authority of the newspapers which have repeatedly referred to it, and that is the hon. member for the city of Kingston (Mr. Metcalfe) It has been common talk and report, and uncontradicted, that that hon. gentleman is to be made warden of the penitentiary, and that the incumbent of that office is to be superannuated. That is a statement made so frequently, and without any attempt at denial or contradiction, that one can hardly say I am not warranted in bringing it to the attention of the House. I will not speak of others, because I do not like to mention the names of gentlemen in this House, although a list has been furnished me, unless I have strong ground, as I think I have in the cases I have already referred to, of believing in my own mind that the charges are well founded. But, Sir, there are one or two things that I may refer to. In the province of New Brunswick the Chief Justiceship has been practically vacant for a long period, and it is impossible to suppose that the vacancy remains unfilled except for some public or private reason. Public reasons there are none. There can be no ground for leaving the collectorship at Niagara vacant for two years. There can be no public ground for leaving the county court judgeship of Huron vacant since May, 1895, if it was so absolutely essential to fill it that a gentleman had to be removed from this chamber, and sworn in within an hour of the time that a law was passed saying that his services were not required in the public interest. There can be no ground, except that these offices are kept to be dangled before the eyes of members of this House. Here we are within a fortnight of dissolution, passing a most important measure, and a measure which is causing strife and bitterness throughout this land from end to end, and we do not know who around us, is sitting, as free and independent representative of the people, or who is sitting here with a Government commission practically in his pocket. Under these circumstances, I think the committee ought to rise. Under these circumstances, I think in decency we ought not any longer to continue the consideration of this measure ; and I hope that the committee will rise without considering another line, or another letter of this Bill, so that the country will understand that the facts which have been brought to the attention of this House, are sufficient to call upon members to pause before they proceed further with a Bill fraught with such consequences as the one now before the committee.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I have listened with a considerable degree of attention to the remarks of the great nisi prius lawyer of Canada (Mr. McCarthy) whose ability is of such undoubted a character. I have come to the conclusion that his action here, is a mere repetition of the first play of the great English dramatist, Shakespeare : " Much Ado about Nothing." I am surprised at that gentleman, who ought to have experience of the affairs of Canada, taking the responsibility of obstructing such a great measure as this Remedial Act. He has told us, that this Bill, if passed, would be the means of creating strife from one end of the Dominion to the other. Does the hon. gentleman know that this question can be put into a nutshell. It is not a question which concerns the great Catholic community of Canada ? We wish to give them equal rights, we wish to give them justice, we wish to treat them as we wish to be treated ourselves, and yet we find hon. gentlemen in this House, who are striving might and main to prevent that justice being done them. We see these gentlemen obstructing in every way the Government of Canada, who are desirous of doing their best in the interests of this country, and who are now endeavouring to bring to a final issue this great legislative enactment. This, Mr. Chairman, is a factious opposition. Any individual of common sense who has observed our proceedings knows, that from the beginning, the Budget debate was obstructed and delayed in order to retard the bringing down of this great measure. Sir, the country will understand thoroughly that everything has been done by the Conservative party to advance this legislation, and that everything has been done by the Opposition to prevent its becoming law. To-night we have had the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) dealing with extraneous subjects. His object was, first to retard the measure, and secondly, to try to make the people of the country believe that an appointment recently made was not proper. So far as is concerned the hon. member (Mr. Masson) who has recently been elevated to a judgeship, we know that for twenty years, on account of his high and well-known attainments, he has been spoken of as one most likely to secure a position on the bench. If he is now given a judgeship it is because he has earned it by his legal qualifications, and not because he has supported our party. It just happens at this moment that the position was vacant and why should he not receive it ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JAMES GRANT. We know that when gentlemen opposite were in power their friends were always provided for. We know that every great measure which has been brought forward by the Conservative party has been obstructed by the Liberal party in this country. They opposed the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the people of the country defeated them. They oppose this measure now and the people of the country will defeat them again. If the Bill does not become law this session, the great Catholic community of Canada will fully appreciate that the Government of Canada have done their best to make it a legislative enactment, and that their efforts were thwarted and opposed by the Liberals in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir JAMES GRANT. It is all very well for gentlemen opposite to say " no," but they know in their hearts that what I say is correct. The hon. gentleman from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says that we are hardly fit for responsible government. Most assuredly that is the case if the Opposition are permitted to act in the way they are doing, and are successful in their efforts to prevent legislation. The responsibility of opposing this measure rests on the shoulders of these men. At one time, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) was one of our best supporters, but he left the very man who made him and gave him an opportunity of advancement. Because that right hon. gentleman did not consult him when he was forming an Administration, he saw fit to get on his high horse and left the Conservative party. To-day he has but a small following, because he is endeavouring to place class against class, and religion against religion. He was one of the very first to propose the abolition of the dual language and one of the first to oppose separate schools in conjunction with the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I say, Sir, that no man in Canada can hope to obtain any position of power who is not willing to give equal rights and privileges to Protestants and to Catholics, to Frenchmen and to Englishmen. I trust that the day is not far distant when the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) will wake up to see that the measures he is now advocating are not in accordance with the principles of law and justice. He may rely upon it, that if this Bill does not become law now, it soon will, because the people of Canada will understand that the Conservative party are trying to do what is just, in the interests of the people from one end of Canada to the other.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. A few words, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He alluded by name to a few gentlemen who occupied seats in this House, and said that there were a few other names, but he would not mention them out of delicacy.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not say so. I said it was because I had no evidence.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. He also gave as a reason for not mentioning them, that he had no means of satisfying himself that there would be any truth in the statement or rumour that had been circulated. The hon. gentleman might with safety have mentioned my own name as one which recently has been rather flippant on the tongues of a few members of the House. He might have said that I have been mentioned in some of the newspapers of Canada, as being a person who had the promise of a judgeship in his pocket. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) yesterday afternoon referred to myself, when I was not present in the House, and in the report of his speech in the "Globe" of this morning, I find the following :—

> The member for East Lambton was to get a judgeship. He dare not show his face in his riding.

Now, Sir, whether this matter had been brought up by the hon. gentleman for North Simcoe, (Mr. McCarthy) or not, I had intended to refer to it at the earliest possible opportunity. I deny, Sir, that there is any foundation whatever for the statement of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I have never, directly nor indirectly, applied for, or sought for, any such position from this Government. I have no promise, directly or indirectly, expressedly or impliedly, of any such office or of any office of any other kind under the Government.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. It is not manly, and not becoming for any member to make such a statement with regard to another member in this House, unless he has some reasonable proof to sustain the charge, or is willing to take the responsibility for it and ask for an investigation. To do as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) did—make a charge against me when I was not in the House and had no opportunity to answer it—is unmanly and unfair, to say the least of it. It is a pity, indeed, that any member should so far forget himself as to make an insinuation of that kind against another member of this House, without the slightest foundation whatever upon which to base his charge. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) had delicacy enough to refrain from mentioning names, when he had no proof, and the same reason should have actuated the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to keep his mouth closed under similar circumstances. In common decency, he should not have mentioned any name, unless he had proof or reasonable ground for believing his statement. He took up a newspaper, and he reiterated its statement to the House, and that, Sir, in my opinion, is just about as reprehensible as if he himself had made the story out of whole cloth. It is a very poor excuse indeed to give, to say that it was mentioned in a newspaper. How many slanders could be circulated in that way ? All hon. gentlemen in this House should feel, as I feel on this occasion, that perhaps an attack may be made on them in the same flippant manner in time to come. There is a dignity in this House which must be maintained, and, when any member resorts to ungentlemanly conduct, unmanly conduct, unfair conduct towards any other member of this House, it is, I believe, the duty of the balance of the members to protect the honour of their brother member. I do not intend to occupy the time further than to say that I am glad to have an opportunity to speak on what I consider a breach of parliamentary etiquette, and a breach of decency, which has been committed, to the knowledge of every member of this House, within the past few days.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know how difficult it is for hon. gentlemen to remain quiet under the attacks which are made upon them. But I would really take it as a very great favour from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House if they would occupy as little time as possible in reference to these matters, because I am in hopes that this motion may be disposed of, and that we may be able to get a little of the time of this very long sitting for the Bill. I therefore hope, Sir, that the question may now be put.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that motion is carried, I think the least the leader of the House could do is to explain the circumstances of the very extraordinary appointment of the late member for North Grey to a county judgeship. The hon. member for North Simcoe made a statement on that subject which deserves the most serious consideration of this House. He called the attention of the House to the fact that that judgeship had been vacant for a whole year ; and he also called attention to the fact that within a few hours of his appointment an Act had been passed by the legislature of Ontario, who are the proper judges as to whether an additional judge is required or not, by which it was declared that it was not necessary to have an additional county judge in the case of counties having a population under 80,000. But the Government of Canada, finding that the legislature of Ontario had come to the conclusion that this officer was not wanted, deliberately appoint a member of this House to that office, thereby entailing a very considerable charge upon the public. I can conceive of no more outrageous job per se, and the thing is doubly reprehensible, made as it was under circumstances which go extremely far to show that the hon. member for North Simcoe was perfectly right in his contention that, for the last year at any rate, the hon. member for North Grey has been practically a salaried servant of the public, and has been violating the Independence of Parliament Act, in the spirit, if not in the letter, during every day he sat in this House this session, and on every vote he gave. I can conceive of no more indefensible job, and I think and it is the bounden duty of the leader of the House, if he has any justification for it, to offer it now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret very much that the hon. member for South Oxford has not made this inquiry in the presence of the Minister of Justice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not my fault.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can quite understand the matter being pressed at the moment, because it has just been brought under the attention of the House by the hon. member for North Simcoe. But I think I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to allow the Minister of Justice, in whose department these judicial appointments are made, to make the explanation to the House, especially as the fact stated by the hon. gentleman, as to the long period during which this judgment was vacant, was learned by me for the first time at this moment. I will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the matter, and I have no doubt he will make the explanation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unless my memory deceives me, the hon. Minister of Justice was here when the hon. member for North Simcoe was speaking.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I myself was called out of the House while the hon. member for North Simcoe was speaking, and did not hear the statements that were made.

Motion that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, negatived.

On section 10,

10. For the purpose of this Act the council of each municipality may establish and alter when necessary, the school districts within its own bounds, and in case any school district or proposed district should be included in more than one municipality, its formation or alteration may be made by the reeves or mayors of such municipalities, and the local inspector or inspectors of schools ; provided that the formation or alteration of school districts by municipal councils or by the reeves and mayors of municipalities and the local inspector or inspectors shall be made under the regulations that may from time to time be issued for that purpose by the Board of Education, and all by-laws and resolutions for forming or altering school districts, shall be submitted to the board and receive its sanction before they can be carried into effect ; provided also that upon the refusal or neglect of any council, or of the reeves and mayors and local inspectors of the municipalities concerned to establish or alter any school district, when petitioned to do so by at least five heads of families resident therein, or upon an appeal against the action of such body forming or altering any school district, the board shall be empowered to confirm or annul the action appealed against, or to form or alter such school district as they may think fit, within three months after their receipt of such appeal or petition ; provided further that no school district shall be organized under this Act unless there shall be at least ten Roman Catholic children of school age living within the same, and situated not over three miles from a point that may in anywise be fixed as the first school site.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What reason is there for giving to the board the power to make regulations in this matter ? If the duty of forming the school districts is to be imposed upon the municipalities, why restrict them ?

Mr. DICKEY. In section 4 the board is empowered to make these regulations.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The province of Manitoba is a large province, and the board, in all probability, will be at Winnipeg. They cannot know the local circumstances as well as the municipalities. If you would make the inspector a party to act with the municipal officers, I think you would have a much more efficient system. It will involve a good deal of unnecessary expense, if you impose jurisdiction on the board.

Mr. DICKEY. I take for granted that this composite authority will meet the difficulty which the hon. gentleman refers to. It was thought better that the board should have the ultimate control of the school districts ; but, as they were a central body, it was thought more convenient that a local authority, like the municipal council, should form the district. The scheme of this section is that the Board of Education shall make general regulations for the efficiency of the schools, and within the lines of these regulations the municipal council will do the local work of fixing the boundaries of school districts, and the Board of Education will ratify the work of the municipal council. If the work of the municipal council is not satisfactory, the Board of Education, I suppose, would have to act through their superintendent, and fix the boundaries.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You do not intend the superintendent to be a peregrinating officer. He is not so in the other provinces. The officers who visit the various schools would be the inspectors. They would have local knowledge, and it would be more suitable for them to have supervision over the work of the local municipalities. I am looking at the matter from two points of view—that of the authority having the necessary knowledge, and that of the system that would avoid unnecessary expense.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What possible object can there be in limiting the power of the municipality to establish these school districts ? What possible regulations can the board issue with respect to the formation of a district ?

Mr. DICKEY. As to the size, the number of children to be included, and all that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If you are going to let the board define all these things, there is nothing left for the municipality to do. It struck me that it would be better to leave a simple matter of that kind to either one body or the other exclusively, uncomplicated by regulations.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You have really three parties—the inspector, the board, and the municipality.

Mr. DICKEY. This is the machinery that was used under the old Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Inasmuch as the trustees of these school districts will have power to levy taxation, and very serious questions are likely to arise in connection with assessments, and it may be necessary to enter suits of assessments against ratepayers, you will have a great deal of difficulty if you require, first, a regulation of the board, and, second, the action of the municipality. If you required to recover an assessment you would have to have double proof.

Mr. DALY. It worked all right under the old law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You had not this before. You had a denominationl system before, and this is supplementary to that.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Under the actual law in Manitoba, these school districts are laid out by the municipalities in the same way as we are asking that it should be done in this case.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But in this case the municipality does not act untrammelled. It seems to me the work should be left to the municipality simply or to the board simply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the machinery under the present Public School Act ?

Mr. DICKEY. The municipal council.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why not give the power to the municapl council, to act at the request of the Board of Education, with the aid of the inspector.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think that would do in this particular case, because there are a good many municipalities and their complexion is very different. You could not be always sure that the council would act at all or that they would act with a single eye to the interests of the minority.

Mr. LANGELIER. According to this cluase whenever five heads of families belonging to the Roman Catholic religion want to have separate schools, their first step will be to present a petition to the municipal council. If the municipal council does not act in three months, the Board of Education shall be at liberty to establish those school districts. The clause does not provide that the five heads of families shall be Roman Catholics, and consequently even Protestants or Jews may present the petition. It would be better to insert the words "Roman Catholic," so as to make it clear. But there is a much more serious objection. Suppose there were fifty heads of Roman Catholic families, and that only five of these were desirous of having separate schools. Those five heads of families would petition for the creation of a school district, and what would be the result ? The forty-five other heads of families would be compelled to adopt separate schools unless they took proceedings to separate themselves from them. I do not think these five heads should be allowed to compel the rest of the minority to form part of this system of separate schools, or take steps to get out of the system. We should fix a certain proportion. The majority of the minority should petition, because otherwise the law would work an injustice.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I am surprised that the hon. member for Quebec Centre should make such a suggestion. He asks that the majority of the minority should decide. But suppose there were twenty-five Catholic heads of families, and that twelve of these were in favour of separate schools, under the hon. gentleman's contention they would be deprived of their schools. The clause is much more reasonable. Under it those who do not want to form part of the separate school districts have only to notify the municipal clerk, which is a very simple matter, and they will be freed from it.

Mr. ROBILLARD. All that the Roman Catholics have to do who do not want the separate schools is to notify the municipal clerk. There would be no hardship under this clause. All that those who do not want the separate schools have to do would be to notify the clerk of the municipality. That is the way separate schools in Ontario are worked now.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think it would be better to establish a system of separate schools as it exists in the province of Quebec. In that province the formation of separate schools is a very easy matter. No number of heads of families is at all required to petition. No majority of the minority is required, but any number of heads of families may make a declaration to the president of the school commissioners declaring that they have a sufficient number of children of school age to form a school.

The law puts that number at fifteen. There can be no school for a less number than fifteen children. There may be only three heads of families that make the declaration, but if they have a sufficient number of children they get the school, and they do not impose their own views on the rest of the minority.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Neither will they in this Act.

Mr. LANGELIER. They will, because in subsequent clauses we find that the whole of the Roman Catholic minority in the municipality, where a system of separate schools has been established, will be compelled to follow suit.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. They can free themselves by simply giving notice to the clerk of the municipality.

Mr. LANGELIER. Why compel them to give notice ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Why deprive the minority of their schools ?

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not want the minority of the minority to compel the majority of the minority to do something.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. You merely compel them to notify the clerk, while on the other hand, you would be compelling the minority of the minority to do without their schools.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The rights of all parties are secured where you give the right to establish separate schools to those who are asking for them. You here include everybody of the same faith as supporters of the separate schools, and compel them to give notice in order to get out of that support, if they do not want these schools. You go sufficiently far when you authorize what you consider a proper number to ask for separate schools to have them ; but if there are any Roman Catholics who prefer to remain under the public school system, you ought to allow them to remain there until they themselves indicate their wish to go elsewhere.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is carrying compulsion to an absurdity if you adopt this clause. My hon. friend says you are legislating to give the minority certain rights. How is the minority to speak. There is only one way, and that is to get the majority of the minority to speak. The proposition that this Bill should be amended by providing not only that five heads of families should, of themselves be entitled to separate schools, even if ten were opposed to it, but that the majority of the Roman Catholic heads of families in a certain place must petition for a separate school system before you could establish it.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that what the member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) wants ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is my proposition, anyway.

Mr. LANGELIER. This is what I said : If we are to maintain the other portions of the Bill, this should be altered. I suggest as an alternative that we might adopt the system which exists in Quebec, and I believe that system is in Ontario also, and it has worked well.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. And this system has worked well for nineteen years in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman loses sight of the fact that in Manitoba we will have to assess real estate here and there which belongs to Roman Catholics, while in Quebec you can take a whole district and form a school corporation.

Mr. LANGELIER. I am not aware of any difficulty in Quebec in the working of the law there.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. And I am not aware of any difficulty in Manitoba in the working of this law.

Mr. LANGELIER. It works no injustice to anybody in Quebec. They have a choice to remain with the majority or minority whichever they like. Under this Bill, the result will be that five heads of families can compel the whole of the Roman Catholic minority in a locality to form separate schools.

Mr. FOSTER. No, no.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier) wants to protect the public school system in Manitoba as against this separate school system, he had better say so right away.

Mr. LANGELIER. We are proposing a system of separate schools for Manitoba, and the best thing we could do would be to take the system in Quebec.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. No, Sir ; we want our system as it existed.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Five heads of families cannot impose their will upon the forty-five mentioned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier). Those who do not wish for a separate school have only to give notice that they wish to belong to the public school.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But why should you place the onus on them of getting out ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no onus at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There may be twenty in a district who may not agree to separate schools, but they will have to agree until they get out by giving notice.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What hardship is it to give notice.

Mr. FREMONT. There is a difference between the system in the province of Quebec and the system in the province of Manitoba. In the province of Quebec we have dissentient schools, and those who want them must make a declaration to that effect. They naturally form part of the schools of the majority. But in the province of Manitoba the law which existed before the Act of 1890, and which we intend to re-enact, is a separate school law. There are the public schools for the different creeds and there are the separate schools which are the schools of the Roman Catholics. The Roman Catholics naturally form part of the separate school system in Manitoba. There is no hardship whatever in those giving notice who do not want to form a separate school district. If a Roman Catholic desires to continue to pay taxes to public schools, section 28 provides that he has only to give notice to the clerk of the municipality.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why should he ?

Mr. FREMONT. There is no trouble in doing that. There is no hardship or no injustice in that. This law existed previous to 1890, and those who belong to the province of Manitoba tell me that it always worked in a very efficient way. I cannot accept the suggestion of the member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), under which the majority of the minority would decide whether or not there would be a separate school municipality. It would be an injustice, and it might deprive the minority of their separate schools.

Mr. LANGELIER. I am afraid I did not make myself understood. If we are to maintain the Bill as it is let us require the majority of the minority, if the establishment of separate schools is to be compulsory. I would not be desirous of establishing that system, but I say, let us adopt the system of separate schools in the province of Quebec, which works so well. Give separate schools only to those who want them, and do not force them on those who do not want them.

Mr. ROBILLARD. We do not form those separate schools in the dark. Do you suppose that five heads of families would be stupid enough to start out to establish a school without consulting the rest of the minority. We call a public meeting, and if the majority are against a separate school they cannot be forced to it by the heads of five families, because they would say we will not contribute, and so the heads of five families would not be stupid enough to proceed and to support their school themselves. The law of Ontario used to be that we had to give notice every year, but now once you give notice you remain a separate school supporter until you recall it. There is no great hardship in that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. member (Mr. LaRivière) said that if the member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) wanted to keep the present Manitoba school system in operation, there was nothing better calculated to do so than if we adopted the suggestion he made. That suggestion was that those who are desirous to form a separate school shall be at liberty to do so. There can be no other inference drawn from that statement of the hon. member (Mr. LaRivière) than that the minority in Manitoba do not want separate schools. He is afraid to trust them. If they do not want separate schools, he wants to compel them to have them. If this suffering minority are in favour of separate schools, why do you not leave it to themselves to say whether they are or not. You want five families to compel forty-five families in the district to come in. That is an emphatic declaration that the minority do not want separate schools.

Mr. ROBILLARD. It is practically the same thing in Ontario and do we not trust the minority there?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If there are twenty-five Roman Catholic families in the district, you propose to allow five families to compel the other twenty families to adopt a separate school, whether they want it or not. The hon. gentleman (Mr. LaRivière) seems to have no confidence in this system. If he has not undertaken to mislead the House in this matter, then he ought to leave it to say whether they will come in or not, and let them judge for themselves. I am willing and anxious to see the minority get the rights they were entitled to under the compact, but I am not willing to force upon them that which they do not want. What right has this House to force them to give notice to the clerk of the muncipality ? They are free men, over twenty-one years of age, and they ought to be allowed to judge for themselves. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. LaRivière) undertakes to bulldoze the minority.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. A milder word, please.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What we should do here is to see that those who want separate schools should have them, but those who do not want them should not be compelled to have them.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman is arguing about something that does not exist. By this Act we are re-establishing the separate schools we had, and we merely want the same law which we had before, and which worked so satisfactorily. Now, what will be the consequence of the law. In one case we will have a number of ratepayers applying to be organized into a school district, who can not get all the signatures of those who would be called upon to contribute to the support of the school, because there is the case of non-residence. After the district is organized, if there are any ratepayers who do not wish to contribute to the maintenance of that school, all they have to do is to give notice to the clerk of the municipality and they are exempt. On the other hand, we have some parishes in Manitoba where there is not a single Protestant family. You want to limit the school to those people who apply for it, and those who do not apply would have no school at all, because there is no public school in the district. We now maintain our private Catholic schools in these parishes, and there are no public schools there. I could name a dozen parishes in Manitoba, some of them having seven or eight schools, among which there is not one public school. If we have to organize these schools as they existed before, a certain number of ratepayers will apply, while you would confine the organization of the school district to those who sign the application for its establishment, and the rest of the parish would be thus exempted from school taxes altogether. A bachelor or a Catholic non-resident would not be called upon to contribute to the maintenance of these schools at all. You will hamper the working of the Act, and exempt people who should be called on to contribute to the support of these at all, if they have not applied for the same. You will hamper the working of the schools. The system proposed by the Bill is perfectly good, and the only inconvenience is that when the district is organized, one who does not wish to join it gives notice, and that is the end of it ; and if he comes back, he is included again. This proviso is something new ; it is one of the concessions granted, in order that those Roman Catholics who might wish to avail themselves of the public school system will be free to do so. I do not think the hon. gentleman will consider this unreasonable.

Mr. LANGELIER. The more I hear the proposed system defended, the more unjust I find it. If a number of Roman Catholic families want to have a separate school, it is only necessary for five of them to petition the municipal council. As soon as that petition is presented and the school district is formed, the rest of the Roman Catholics in the district, whether they wish it or not, form part of the organization, and from that moment are assessed for the support of separate schools. If any one wants to be exempted from the assessment, what has he to do ? Under section 28, subsection 3, he must give to the secretary-treasurer of the separate school district, and the clerk of the municipality, a written notice to that effect at any time prior to the completion of the assessment roll. He must give two notices, these notices must be in writing, and he must know at what time the notice must be given ; otherwise, he will have to pay the tax.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. When he pays it he will find out.

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not think he should be compelled to pay the tax. Those who want the separate schools should be allowed to have them, but those who do not want them should not be compelled to support them.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Will my hon. friend tell me whether, in the province of Quebec, any ratepayer is allowed to exempt himself from paying school taxes because he says he does not want a school ?

Mr. LANGELIER. In the province of Quebec every one must form part of some school organization. If there are not a sufficient number of dissentients to form a school, they cannot dissent. The minimum number of children for a school, under the Quebec law, is fifteen ; if there is not that number, they must pay taxes for school purposes to the commissioners of the majority. There is no injustice in what I am proposing because under the law it will be necessary to have five heads of families, at least, to have a separate school ; but I do not want to assist the passage of a law which would compel people to pay taxes in support of a system of separate schools for which they do not care.

Mr. DICKEY. This Bill, as I understand, is for the relief of minorities on conscientious grounds. Under the old system in Manitoba, all Roman Catholics were obliged to contribute to Roman Catholic schools whether they wanted to or not. I could not agree to the proposition that a majority of the minority should petition for a school. That would not meet the point of the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), because the majority of the minority would then be coercing the minority of that minority on matters of conscience, which would be quite as objectionable for the Protestant majority to coerce the Catholic minority. It is impossible for the hon. gentleman to say that, under this Bill, there is coercion of any portion of the minority, because section 28 provides an absolute choice. The difference is that a Roman Catholic must take certain steps before he is withdrawn from the separate school system.

Mr. MULOCK. You start with a presumption.

Mr. DICKEY. We start with a presumption, if you put it that way. This Bill, being based on the assumption that it is required to meet the conscientious convictions of the Catholics of Manitoba, all practical injustice will be removed if every Roman Catholic has a right to withdraw from the separate schools if he chooses to do so. When he makes his election, that settles the question. It may be said that that is putting a man in a false position—that he will be influenced to stay in the schools. You cannot except a man from influence of that kind. It is purely a matter of convenience to him. Five heads of families who may sign a petition for a school, will not as practical men do so unless they see a way ahead of them to support the school, and there is nothing in the Bill to compel them to do so. That, I admit, would be an act of tyranny. I think the proposition in the Bill which is the old practice, is the most convenient, and should be adopted by the committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let me show you how the system would work. There are, I believe, at present in the province of Manitoba forty-five schools in districts where the people are all Roman Catholics, conducted under the present public school law.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That is not a fact. I do not think there are ten.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman does not speak from his own knowledge of that. I speak from reports made to me from persons who are supporting those schools. They are treated as public schools ; they have religious instruction, just as they had under the former system, at all events after half-past three o'clock ; they are taught by Roman Catholic teachers ; they are practically separate schools, which are receiving public aid, just like the other schools of the province. The hon. gentleman's proposition will have this effect—that if five people sign a petition for a separate school, every one of those schools is disorganized, and they cease to receive provincial aid or to be treated as provincial schools. They come under this law, although there might be fifty heads of families in that section who did not desire to be interfered with.

Mr. DICKEY. We must presume that ordinary motives will actuate men. The hon. gentleman mentions the case of a school sharing in the legislative grant, and giving religious education, and satisfying the people. There is no earthly motive for men to desire to change a system with which they are entirely satisfied. A fraudulent application might be made by five persons who wanted to wreck such a school.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman say, if five persons in such a district were to apply under this Bill to be organized into a separate school district, whether that would not make every member of that school district a supporter of the new school ?

Mr. DICKEY. Prima facie it would ; but all that the members of that school section would have to do to make such an insane action impossible would be to give notice that they did not want to join the school section.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I ask the hon. member for Provencher if he does not expect that every one of those institutions will organize under this Act.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes, I do, because those people have been induced to accept the Government grant, and, contrary to the law of 1890, the inspectors have shut their eyes to the fact that they continue to use books in the schools that are not authorized. It was just to enable opponents of the Bill to come here and say that 42 school districts have accepted the law ; and, contrary to the Act, they have allowed those school districts not to change the teaching in the schools, but to say as many prayers as they choose. When the teacher was making his return, all he had to do was to draw his pen through those parts of the report he could not swear to, and that was allowed under the system. What is the consequence ? Since attention has been called to these facts, all these school districts have been deprived of the grant. There are not ten left under the present law, because they were allowed to break the law in order to be induced to come in, and that is used as an argument that the law is acceptable to the people. It was treachery, and nothing else.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I cannot dispute the facts——

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I can read to the hon. gentleman twenty affidavits made out by statements.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I accept the hon. gentleman's statement for the moment. I have under my hand Inspector Young's report, in which he makes the statement that 32 schools are working under the Act, and that the conscientious scruples regarding religion are respected, and they use the books and prayers they like.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Against the law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What I am pointing out is that, whatever the technical meaning of the Manitoba law may be, in its practical operation it is so worked that these people have no grievance at all. The same wisdom, moderation, common sense, conciliation and fair-play which prompted Nova Scotia and New Brunswick people to work their system so that justice might be done to those who had conscientious scruples against sending their children to a school where they could not get religious education, have prompted the people of Manitoba to work their schools in the same way. The argument of the hon. member for Bothwell is unanswerable, so far as the school districts are concerned. Supposing there are 20 of them, and they want to remain as they are, we are passing a law to break up these school districts, whether the people wish it or not, at the instance of a small minority. Is that fair ? By your plan you allow a small minority to overrule the will of the majority and break up the existing system.

Mr. SPROULE. I see by this report of the Minister of Education of Manitoba that there are 37 schools already organized and in operation. If this Bill becomes law, any five heads of families can break up every one of those schools. It does seem to me that it would be fair to allow these people to be regarded as public school supporters, and, if they want to get out, let them give notice and get out.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I do not share in the opinion of the hon. gentlemen who contend that the Roman Catholics are not presumed to belong to the Catholic school system or to become the supporters of such schools by the very fact that they are Roman Catholics, and I believe that the absolute choice provided under this law for those Roman Catholics who wish to contribute to the support of public schools, is a sufficient ground for protecting the freedom of those who do not wish to belong to the public school system. I move, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that section 10 now under discussion be amended by adding after the words "neglect of any council" in the sixteenth line, the words "during 30 days."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the Government should force this section on the committee in its present shape. This House has pledged itself to extend to the Roman Catholic minority certain religious rights in the matter of education, but this House has not pledged itself to force upon them, against their will, any right or privilege they once enjoyed. This House has not pledged itself to enable a small minority of the Roman Catholic minority to coerce their fellow-citizens and compel them to adopt a system to which they may be averse. This enables five ratepayers to break up public schools now established. Why should the will of five men prevail against the will of the majority ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. All they have to do is to give notice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why force them to give notice ? The hon. gentleman (Mr. LaRivière) says that if you leave it to them they won't come in.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I did not say that at all. I said that my opinion was that these people will be only too glad to come under the system. They are not compelled to, and we cannot compel them under this Act. This new provision which did not exist under the old law enables them to remain under the public school system if they choose.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I move in amendment that the following be added to the clause :—

> Provided also that no Roman Catholic head of a family shall be considered a supporter of such separate school, unless he has signed such petition, and provided further, that any Roman Catholic head of a family in any such district so organized, may become one of the supporters of such separate school by giving notice of his desire to do so to the clerk of the municipality in which such district is situated.

This will enable those who want separate schools to have them, and those who do not want them need not have them.

Mr. McLEOD. Under the Bill, no member of the minority need spport a separate school unless he wants to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There are a number of schools of the minority which have come in under the public school system, and they are allowed to teach whatever prayers they like.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Against the law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Never mind, they are allowed.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. They were allowed at that time, but they are not now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This clause will allow any five ratepayers to break up these schools.

Mr. FREMONT. Not at all.

Mr. POWELL. Your amendment reverses the provision made in clause 10.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I stop coercion.

Mr. POWELL. Is that for the country or for the Bill ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is for you.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Justice admits that any five heads of families can break up these forty-five schools, in which they are teaching religion in Manitoba.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. My conviction is that these people will come back under the separate school system, because they were dragged into the other system. This clause will not break up at all any public school.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why not allow them to continue as they are when they are giving religious instructions satisfactory to the minority. You propose to allow any five persons to disorganize these districts. I say it is a mischievous provision.

Mr. POWELL. This Bill entitles them to organize a separate school district, but not to disturb any public school district.

Mr. SPROULE. It says distinctly that they can rearrange districts and so break up the present schools. There are forty-five of those schools now as given in the report on the public schools.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. There are not ten out of that number now.

Mr. McLEOD. The basis of this Act is a separate school Act, and that being so, is it not reasonable that we should allow those who do not want separate schools to get out of it. The separate school system is the basis of this Act, and if any of the minority do not want it they can get out of it.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). These forty-two schools in Manitoba are allowed to teach religion in violation of the law, the same as is done in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. This Bill therefore only gives them by law what they have by practice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If it did that I would have no objection to it, but it allows them to break those schools up.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Why not break them up if they are illegal ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is not our business.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Better put a stop to that illegality.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). So anxious are they to have the separate school system that they have refused to adopt the public school system, and the authorities wink at the illegality. In some places the feeling is so strong, and the prejudices are so strong, that they have refused to permit these illegalities. There are cases of very great hardship in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia under the existing condition of things. In Newcastle, N.B., where the minority paid $20,000 for a school building in that town, they receive not a single dollar of provincial aid for their school, simply because they are Catholics. These schools are in exact accord with the law except that they teach religion ; and under this Bill, these schools would be legalized. It would not interfere with the districts at all.

Mr. FREMONT. I think what the hon. member for St. John has said is very striking. We established separate schools, and there is a presumption that those who have petitioned the Government, and for whom this law is brought forward, are in favour of separate schools.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why will they not sign the petition, then ?

Mr. FREMONT. It is not necessary, and there may be several reasons. I will give the hon. gentleman one reason. The presumption is that they desire a separate school and, acting on this presumption, it is quite natural to suppose that they form part of the separate school district until they have made a declaration to the contrary. The hon. member for Queen's started on the assumption that when five Roman Catholics sign a petition to organize a separate school district, they are the only persons in favour of the separate school in the district. I say that assumption is altogether false. The presumption is that those five have started the movement to organize a separate school; but naturally those who are Roman Catholics in the district, and have not shown their intention to the contrary, are to be presumed as joining in the movement. Now, to illustrate that this presumption is the proper one, suppose I own a farm in Manitoba and reside in Quebec. I am Roman Catholic, and I favour the separate school system ; but I do not reside in the locality and am not in a position to sign that petition According to the contention of the hon. member for Queen's, I am supposed to be against the separate school system, whereas the fact is quite the contrary. This example, I think, shows clearly that it is an improper assumption to say that those who have not signed the petition are opposed to the separate school system and desire to form part of the public school system. Of course, I am not at all in favour of a system of coercion, by which they would be obliged by law to form part of the separate school system. I am in favour of their having the privilege of forming part of the public school system if they prefer ; but so long as they have not formally expressed their objection, the presumption is that they desire to form part of the separate school system. Another point that has been made is that the action of five heads of families in petitioning for the formation of a separate school district would disorganize the public school district. I believe that is not well-founded, for the reason that the moment that petition is made, the public school is not disorganized, and the separate school organized immediately. It always takes a certain lapse of time—a few days, or perhaps a few weeks—for that to be done ; and during that time the Roman Catholics who desire to form part of the public school system have ample time and opportunity to exercise that option. For these reasons, I believe the principle of the clause is essential to the separate schools and should be accepted.

SATURDAY, 11th April, 1896.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that this provision is a very mischievous one, and that the intention of including it in the Act was frankly disclosed by the hon. member for Provencher. The hon. gentleman mentions a presumption. I can well understand a presumption of that sort against a secular or non-denominational school ; but he must understand that these forty odd schools in Provencher and elsewhere, that have come under the Public School Act, are to all intents and purposes denominational schools. They are practically as much separate schools as they would be under this Act. It seems to me desirable to secure local action as far as possible ; and where the provincial government have removed the grievance in practice, you do not want to put barriers in the way. Yet by this provision of the Bill, you propose to put it in the power of any five persons residing in any of those forty-five school districts, composed altogether of Roman Catholics, most of them speaking the French language, and having religious instruction in the schools at the close of the day, as they had before—you propose to put it in the power of those five persons to compel every one of the other ratepayers—and there may be fifty in the district—some of whom perhaps cannot read or write, to give notice in order to escape from the meshes you throw around them. These people at the present time are receiving their share of taxes and public aid, as fully as if that power were conferred upon them by statute. They do not stand in the position of a few Catholics scattered amongst a Protestant population. These five persons may be persons who take an extreme view, and who may wish to organize under this statute; and you put it in their power to deprive the others of the local aid they now receive, by coming under this law instead of under the other.

Mr. FREMONT. Can they make an option?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why should you put them to the trouble? Many of them may be illiterate men, who cannot read or write. If the local government were to withdraw their right or privilege to teach religion in the schools, every one of them would probably come under this statute; but as long as that right or privilege is untouched by practice, it is to their interest to remain as they are. What you want to do, what your commission went to Winnipeg to do, was to induce the local government to act so as to prevent action here; yet, so far as they have acted you propose to break up the arrangement by this provision. It is not only unwise, but mischievous.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. McLeod) says why not follow the system in Quebec. There, a man is presumed to belong to the school of the majority until he gives notice to go out of that school. Why not let the system obtain under this Act? If the people are satisfied with the public school system and wish to continue under it, we should allow them to do so until they express a desire to come under this law, by signing a petition for that purpose, or giving notice to the clerk of the municipality in which they reside. But the provision in the Bill is unfair, because it practically coerces them by placing upon them the responsibility of giving notice, though they may not be able to read or write, or know the form of the notice they are required to give.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I think the motion embodies my views on this matter. I see from the report of the Minister of Education for 1894 that there were at that time 37 French schools which had adopted the national system in Manitoba, and I understand that eight or ten more have adopted it since that time.

They are permitted to use religious exercises in the last half hour of the day, and they appear to be perfectly satisfied with the arrangement. They have the same arrangement as prevails in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, with which the Roman Catholics are perfectly satisfied. Now, this clause provides that any five heads of families can urge upon the board to appoint a separate school, and that if such a school be established, the other Roman Catholics, who may not want it, must notify the clerk of the municipality. I think that the reverse should be provided. It should be provided that the application should be required to form part of the separate school system, and leave the public system.

Mr. WALLACE. In my opinion, we should adopt this amendment. It has been said that the people should be divided into two sections—that the Protestants naturally belong to the public school system, and the Roman Catholics to the separate school system. I do not share that view. When a public school system is adopted, the whole community is supposed to approve of it, unless some expression to the contrary is given, and those Roman Catholics who are now supporting the public schools should not be compelled to leave those schools unless they give notice of their desire to support the separate schools. In a district where there are forty-five Roman Catholics, five should not be allowed to dictate to the other forty.

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that to start upon the presumption that the Roman Catholics in Manitoba are presumed to become public school supporters, until some expression to the contrary is given, would be unfair and unwise. We are endeavouring under this remedial legislation to restore to the minority the rights which have been taken away from them. Prior to 1890, the Roman Catholics were presumed to be separate school supporters. It seems but natural that they should be restored to the old status quo. It is urged that forty odd schools have adopted the national system in Manitoba, and it is contended that the supporters of that system are not presumably desirous of coming under the separate school system. This position, to my mind, is far from being as unassailable as some pretend it is. I say first that those Roman Catholics who came under the new system created by the law of 1890, are likely to have done so because they could not help it, and chiefly because certain concessions had been made to them respecting religious teaching at certain fixed hours, and also in relation to the use of school books. In short, they were compelled to come under the public school system because they had no better schools available. Moreover, such concessions as were made to them are ignored by the law, and do not constitute a permanent state of things for which any allowance ought to be made under the law. Now, Mr. Chairman, with the exception of those forty odd schools which came under the Public School Act and which are presumed, as stated, to adhere to that system, unless they express a desire to the contrary, there are found all the other Catholic schools, forming the great majority and as to which no such presumption can apply. By complying with the wishes, not to say the caprice of those Roman Catholics who would become public school supporters, a wrong would be inflicted upon the rest of the population, which is the large majority of the Roman Catholics in Manitoba. In my opinion, there is a question of justice involved here, and we must revert to the principle of the law done away with by the Acts of 1890. To legislate in a contrary direction would be, to a large extent, denying the separate school principle which is now at stake.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice has admitted that whilst we cannot go beyond the old law, we can legislate within it. That being so, why should you not make the number more than five heads of families.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That is the law under the Public School Act of to-day.

Mr. DICKEY. The Bill is founded on that assumption, and adopted by the House.

Mr. MULOCK. If we are bound to go on any such assumption as that, then there is no use considering the Bill in committee. The vote on the second reading simply decided on the principle of remedial legislation, and nothing else. Why should we assume that every member of the Roman Catholic faith in Manitoba is prima facie willing to become a supporter of separate schools. There are twenty thousand Roman Catholics in Manitoba, and out of those only two hundred have petitioned for the law. Why should we be required to adhere to this number of five. It seems to me that in each district a large number of the minority, or even the majority of the Roman Catholics should be in favour of establishing a separate school.

Mr. MARTIN. It seems to be wrong that this clause should provide that all regulations must receive the sanction of the Board of Education. Why not adopt the public school law as it exists in that respect ? Why should we make any additional law for separate schools, except where the necessity of the case requires it ? If there is any dispute as to the formation of the district, and if any person thinks he is aggrieved, he has an appeal to the county judge. The system provided in the Bill was the old system in Manitoba, which was found to be a nuisance and was abolished, because very often the matter was decided by the board without the parties being properly represented ; or, if they undertook to get representation before the board, it was both very expensive and very inconvenient, because the Board always met at Winnipeg. It might take the parties two or three weeks to go to Winnipeg, while the county court judge is always accessible to the school district, and he holds sittings three or four times a year. I would like to know why the Government have adopted the old law rather than the new, in that respect.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman will admit at once that the cases are not parallel —the public school system and this. I have no doubt that he is endeavouring to make a workable Act ; but he will see that if the various municipal councils in Manitoba were left to deal with this matter, it might imperil the whole working of the Act. The municipal councils are not elected on this question ; it is no part of their regular duty to form these school districts, and they might consider it a matter thrown upon them, and refuse to touch it at all. Therefore, by throwing this duty upon them, you might be unable to have a single school district in the province formed, and so render the whole Act unworkable. So it becomes necessary to put it directly upon the board. Then, the question arises, what commissioner shall we adopt ? The old machinery seemed to be as good as any that could be got ; and in subsection "e" of section 4 we have given the board power to make regulations for the formation of these school districts by the municipal councils. That was discussed before, and, while there was a difference of opinion, there was no substantial division on that.

Mr. MARTIN. That is one of the unfortunate circumstances of this continued sitting ; we cannot all be here at one time, for I certainly would have objected to that subsection, if I had been here. That provision in the old law was deliberately changed, without any reference to the question of separate schools at all, and I do not see why you should make a different law from the public school law in that respect. Why should we undertake to say that we know better than Manitoba in a matter of this kind ? The Manitoba legislature, in which the Roman Catholic faith is pretty well represented—I fancy, fully represented, because there are six or seven Roman Catholic members out of forty—have deliberately changed the old law, which worked very badly, and have made the appeal to the county court judge, for the reasons I have pointed out. This board is to take the place and perform the functions of the Department of Education with regard to separate schools. The Department of Education has nothing to do with the formation of school districts. That is a judicial matter, involving the determination of a question between two sets of men, therefore it should go to the county court judge, rather than to the Board of Education.

Amendment negatived.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. I had risen to address the Chair, Mr. Chairman, when you called out "carried," and I certainly think that I should be given the opportunity to press a further amendment.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. You can do that on the next section. You can find fault with the next one.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know. I have not looked at the section yet ; I will find fault with it if there is any to find. That is what we are here for. I must ask you, Mr. Chairman, in fairness, to revise your decision, and allow me to go on discussing the clause.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). It is too late now, because I have declared the clause carried.

On section 11,

11. In case of the readjustment of any school district subsequently to an issue of debentures by such district, and before the said debentures have been fully paid, all lands added to the school district by such readjustment shall thereafter be liable to taxation in common with the remaining portion of the school district for the purpose of meeting payments on such debentures as they become due ; and all persons assessed for land detached from any school district after an issue of debenture in such district and before the said debentures have been fully paid, shall in case of their assessment for the payment of debentures in any other school district, be entitled to receive back all sums for which they may hereafter be assessed for payments on debentures in any school district except that in which they then reside.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think we should make the law different from the public school law except where necessary. If the circumstances are the same for the separate school as the public school, we should adopt the law in force in Manitoba for public schools, and apply it to these separate schools. You take a quarter section of land out of district No. 12 has issued debentures. There is no means of reaching that quarter-section for those debentures. My impression is that this clause, which is copied from the law of 1884, was founded in that law on the erroneous opinion that the debentures were in some way a lien upon the land. But the only way you can reach the land for debentures is by assessing it and having it sold for taxes. If the land goes out of the district that district cannot tax it any more. If a man has been taken out of the district he cannot possibly be made to pay for the debentures issued before he left.

Mr. DALY. The trouble is that taxes have been levied in the meantime, and the land is liable. He may not have paid his taxes for the school section and he goes out of the district, the land should only be liable for his portion of the taxes due before the readjustment. If this provision were not in the Bill the land which he owned in the district at the time the debentures were issued would still be liable. Those who purchase the debentures, purchase them on the strength of their being liens on the land. That is their security.

Mr. MARTIN. I have looked into this matter most thoroughly, and I know that there is no possible means of enforcing a lien on the land if it has gone outside of the district. That lien is not in the nature of a mortgage under which you can proceed by equity of redemption.

Mr. POWELL. Where a party resides he is liable to pay his school tax, and by virtue of the lien the land is responsible for the debentures that attach to the district of which it originally formed part. He is only to be responsible once, and he is to be responsible in the district in which he now resides. He must, therefore, be recouped by the first district when he is assessed in both.

Mr. MULOCK. The clause requires amendment in the last line. The words "in which they then reside" should be replaced by the words "of which the detached lands form a part." It is not where the parties reside that is taken into account, because the parties may not reside in the province at all, but where the lands are situated.

Mr. DALY. I do not think there is any difficulty in the clause at all. It seems to me that the amendment suggested by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) would clear the meaning ; that is, to strike out the words "in which they then reside," and put in the words "of which they then form a part." I am quite willing to accept that.

Mr. MULOCK. I think there is a weakness in the clause from the standpoint of the debenture holder, for it provides for the diminution for the security without his consent. The return of taxes to any one who becomes detached from the school district lessens the security to that extent. If he is paid back the taxes, it is the same as if he had never paid them at all.

Mr. MARTIN. A school district cannot have power to mortgage the land for the school debt, because it does not own the land. All the debenture holders can do, in case of non-payment, is to take out a writ of execution against the school trustees, and the sheriff will then be empowered to levy the amount of the writ by rate on the assessable lands in the said school district. He can only levy on the lands which are in the school district at the date of the writ, and cannot touch any lands which may previously have been transferred from that school district to another. Now, if you give a man, as you do by this clause, the right to recover from the old school districts in which his land originally was, any sums assessed for payment of debentures issued in that district, you are by that much diminishing the security of the debenture holder. I don't see the necessity for this clause at all, and I move that it be struck out.

Amendment (Mr. Martin) negatived.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). The question now is on the amendment of Mr. Mulock, that the words "of which the detached lands form part" be substituted for the words "in which they then reside" at the end of clause 11.

Mr. WELDON. I move to add to section 11 the words :

And no person shall be liable to assessment for any issue of new debentures on land detached from any school district until the former issue of debentures has been paid off.

Mr. WALLACE. It is perfectly clear that we cannot come to any understanding on this very much mixed clause. The lawyers have been trying to do so for the last two hours and it is getting worse. They cannot understand it at four o'clock in the morning, and I think it is time to move that the committee rise.

Amendment (Mr. Weldon) negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Mulock) negatived: yeas, 20; nays, 33.

Section agreed to.

Mr. McNEILL. I really think, Mr. Chairman, that it is not right to go on any longer at this hour, and I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Wallace, that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. In fact, I would have moved this long ago had not hon. gentlemen apparently desired to dispose of the clause they have been discussing. I do not know whether my hon. friend who is now in charge of the Bill intends to let this motion carry or not.

Mr. DALY. I do not.

Mr. McNEILL. He says he does not. We are not now discussing the Bill. We are discussing the propriety of keeping this House in session from Monday at three o'clock till Saturday at twelve o'clock. One would have thought it did not require a great deal of discussion to induce any reasonable man to come to the conclusion that that is altogether wrong. I would like to see this Bill more fully discussed, because the more it is discussed the more clearly it is seen that it can be a measure for no good. It is evidently because they fear to have its absurdities exposed by discussion that hon. gentlemen are taking the course they are, because they know that the way to prevent progress with or discussion of the measure is to insult this House, as they are doing.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). Surely the hon. member for North Bruce knows as well as I do that he owes some respect to the House of Commons, and I would ask him to discuss the motion now before the committee with that seriousness which is due to the committee and this House.

(Mr. Wallace supported the motion that the committee rise.)

Mr. FRASER. We have now been sitting for 110 hours, and we cannot be expected to give any intelligent consideration to this Bill. Looking over this whole Bill, I do not think I ever saw an Act of Parliament so unskilfully drawn. The truth is, I believe, that it was not drawn by any member of the Government, but by some one outside of the Government. I see three members of the Government here, and I venture to say that not one of them read this Bill before it was presented to the House.

Mr. OUIMET. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to be enlightened on that subject. The Act was first prepared by the Department of Justice, it was then submitted to a sub-committee of Council, who examined it several times, clause by clause, and it was then submitted to the whole Council, and discussed clause by clause in Council, and that several times.

Mr. FRASER. Then, where could these men's eyes have been when they permitted section 8 to pass as it stands in the Bill? It deals with the duties of one superintendent at the beginning, and before the end of the section is reached, it speaks of "their respective jurisdictions," as if there were two, showing plainly that the section was simply clipped from the old school law, under which there were two systems of schools, instead of being properly re-drafted.

(Mr. McNeill spoke in support of the motion.)

Mr. TYRWHITT. It would appear that a melancholy spirit has taken possession of this Chamber, possibly owing to the fact that even all our efforts will not enable us to crystallize this Bill into legislation this session. I apologize, Sir, for what I said in your absence the other evening, and I do so with very great pleasure because of the fact that you appeared here this morning at twenty minutes past six o'clock. I see that you are making heroic efforts to retrieve your character, and I must congratulate you on being an early riser. It appears to me from the remarks of the hon. gentlemen in this House, that they have not read this Bill, and, therefore, in order that they may know what it is, I propose to read the 112 clauses. It is now seven o'clock, and I think I shall be able to accomplish that task in half an hour.

(The hon. gentleman proceeded to read Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba).)

Mr. MACDOWALL. We have already had the first reading and the second reading of this Bill, and, I presume, that the House will consider, after the hon. gentleman has finished, that the Bill has been read the third time.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Chairman, I must take exception to that.

(Mr .Tyrwhitt continued to read the Bill.)

Mr. JEANNOTTE. You are going too fast.

Mr. TYRWHITT. My object is to get on with the Bill. The object which we have had from the outset has been to expedite matters, and, if I may use the term, to rush this Bill through the House as rapidly as possible. I have just got through clause 13. Here I would like to stop and compute how long it would take me to finish the reading of the Bill, but as clause 13 is an unusual number, and I cannot very well divide 13 into 112, I think I shall proceed a little further before making the calculation.

(The hon. member read clause 14.)

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman has been twenty-five minutes reading 14 clauses, and as 14 goes in 112 eight times, it will take him three hours and twenty minutes to finish the Bill.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Having undertaken the task, I am determined to go through with it if it takes all day.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Read it in French.

Mr. WELDON. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I would like the ruling of the Chair on the question of a quorum. I have been counting carefully, and there are clearly not twenty members present who are awake. I would ask if hon. members, whose minds are away in a far country, come within the meaning of the statute regarding a quorum.

Mr. IVES. I do not think the point is well taken, because if you hold that it is, you must hold that it is also requisite that a member of Parliament should have sensibility of mind.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Clause 18——

Mr. WELDON. I think the member for Simcoe should treat the point of order with some respect, and wait for a ruling from the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). I do not think there is occasion for any ruling. I consider it trifling with the committee to raise such a point of order.

Mr. WELDON. Then you rule that there are twenty members present, counting those who are asleep.

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order. Is it not contrary to the rules of the House for an hon. gentleman to have his feet on top of a desk ?

Mr. MARTIN. To whom does the hon. gentleman refer ?

Mr. TYRWHITT. I would like to draw your attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is obstructing the Bill. I am being constantly interrupted, and amongst my interrupters is the hon. member for Leeds, who professes to have such faith in the Bill, and is so anxious to get it passed this session. Clause 20——

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I would like the hon. member to talk French a little.

Mr. TYRWHITT. Je parlerai français plus tard. Clause 21——

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I rise to a question of order. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis) has his feet above his head. I think he is out of order, and wanting in respect for you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I must protest against these interruptions. I repeat what I have already said, that I am most anxious to get through with the Bill. It appears to me that I have undertaken a very heavy task.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I asked the hon. member to hand me his bill, and I would settle it for him, but I think he does not want a settlement.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I have only got through 21 clauses, and I have been more than half an hour about it.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I suppose the hon. member had not read the Bill before, and he wants to read it now to see what is in it.

Mr. MARTIN. I draw your attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that an hon. member is playing on a mouth organ.

Mr. TYRWHITT. It appears to me that in the course of our proceedings on this Bill, a certain part of the time should be allotted to music. Perhaps it would be as well for me now to allow the musical part of the entertainment to proceed. But I am subject to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. If you rule that the musical portion of this entertainment shall now proceed, I am quite prepared to wait and allow the hon. member for L'Assomption to proceed.

Mr. GUILLET. It is evident that the music is promoting harmony.

Mr. TYRWHITT. "Provided further——

(The hon. gentleman continued to read the Bill ; and also read in French from a work of Lamartine.)

Now, Sir, I have fulfilled my promise of reading the Bill, I have not only read the Bill myself, but I have read the Bill to the members of the committee, who are attempting to do their duty to their constituents and to their country. I feel that the members of the committee are making a great sacrifice in remaining here at this hour in the morning, for the purpose of considering this Bill. Allusion has been made to the health of the members. I feel that I am here sacrificing myself on the altar of my country, in attempting to do my duty to my country and to the county which I have the honour to represent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The conduct of the Government during the last few days tend very strongly to confirm the popular impression that they do not intend, and never did intend, to pass this Bill. Although some of their friends seem yet to have faith in their good intentions, I believe that the majority of the people now are beginning to think that they have been fooling this House, and trying to fool the people, in fact that they have never been in earnest. I confess that when I survey the situation, and the conduct of the Government during the last three months, I am strongly of that opinion myself. If we take a retrospective glance at the course of the Government ever since the time when last year they promised to call another session early in January to pass this Bill, we can come to no other conclusion than that they have been insincere from the beginning. They had had ample warning from some of their most influential supporters that these supporters were unalterably opposed to the Bill, and would do everything in their power to prevent its passage. Prominent among these gentlemen was the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) who gave up a situation in the Government worth $5,000 a year, rather than sacrifice his principles in regard to this measure. Notwithstanding the importance of this Bill, its second reading was delayed until two months after the opening of the session. The Budget debate was allowed to proceed to an unprecedented length, and for some time afterwards the Government abstained from applying for additional days. In introducing the Bill the Secretary of State dwelt on almost every possible topic and thus opened wide the discussion. At first substantial progress was made, but within a few days the Government made the announcement that they would sit continuously for some time. Subsequently the Secretary of State made most insulting and irritating statements to the Opposition, and in this way progress has been delayed. Much attention has necessarily been given to amending clause 4, which as drafted was ungrammatical, unconstitutional and would have proved useless. Clause 3, which appears to have been passed in undue haste, is now under the re-consideration of the Government with a view to its rejection. The proper course for the Government to have pursued was to have presented the Remedial Bill at the opening of the session, to have referred it to a select committee composed of leading members on both sides of the House. The Budget debate could then have been proceeded with during which time the Bill would have received the careful consideration of the committee, and within a reasonable time they would have reported a comparatively perfect Bill, which no doubt could have been passed through the House this session. A similar course was followed in respect to the Criminal Code Bill, introduced some years ago, although it was not a measure of such importance as the Remedial Bill, which it must always be remembered cannot be amended when once passed by Parliament. Throughout the discussion it has become apparent that the Government are not really anxious to pass this measure. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) and the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) and other hon. members on the other side of the House will be held responsible by their constituents for not having approached the Government in the early part of the session and compelled them to pursue a course which would push forward the Bill. Who are the men who have really obstructed this Bill? Why was not the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) shut off instead of being allowed for three long hours yesterday afternoon to obstruct the progress of business? Why was not the leader of the House shut off in the bitter, ugly, tantalizing, irritating, unparliamentary speech that he made the other day?

Mr. DALY. It seems to have struck home.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It struck home in the wrong quarter. It did not have the effect it was expected to have. I believe the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) was pleased with that speech because it did so much to obstruct the progress of the Bill, and I believe, down in his heart, he does not want this Bill to pass. I give him credit for more common sense.

Mr. DALY. I cannot accept the hon. gentleman's strange compliment. I am most anxious that the Bill should go through.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the hon. Minister had really wanted the Bill to go through, would he not have introduced the measure in a form which would call forth less objection and criticism? Everything goes to prove that the Government are only humbugging the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) and others who really want this Bill to become law. I wonder that that hon. gentleman, who is a shrewd, far-seeing man, did not denounce the course of the Government in delaying this Bill so long.

Mr. CAMERON. I denounce the factious opposition of the hon. member for Kent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But I have been calling attention to the absurd position in which Parliament is placed. Here we have been sitting all night with barely enough in the House to form a quorum, and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), a short time ago, was running through the lobbies hunting up members to enter the chamber, for fear the number present would fall below twenty.

Mr. TAYLOR. I may just say that it was necessary for me to do that because the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) tried to count out the House, and at his bidding both members of the Opposition and McCarthyites went out.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman has no foundation for that statement. I was here during the whole sitting, but had to leave the chamber for a short time, and the hon. member for Leeds, fearing there would not be a quorum, was rushing through the lobbies to send in the members.

Mr. TAYLOR. I spoiled the little job you had put up.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) now leads the House. He must see that it is a disgrace to Canada that we should be compelled to sit here——

Mr. STEVENSON. Who is making us sit here ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. member for Peterboro' (Mr. Stevenson) would like to see the Bill become law as it is. He does not believe in making any changes.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is right.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He is going to the Senate, I understand. I believe he had the promise of a senatorship, but during the Cabinet strike last January, the promise was lost, and he is afraid now that it will not be fulfilled.

Mr. STEVENSON. I gave the hon. gentleman credit for being a man of sense. He is talking of what he does not believe.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I esteem the hon. member for Peterboro'. I believe he is a man of Cabinet rank. I would like to see him appointed Postmaster General. I am a little surprised that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd) has not taken more interest in this Bill. As he comes from Manitoba, he should be specially interested in this Bill. Manitoba is interested in it more than any other province. The Manitoba minority want to see a perfect Bill, a Bill that will give them the remedy they desire. Now, I do not think the hon. gentleman has done his duty to the people of that province. He should be here deliberating on this Bill, suggesting changes and alterations, and bringing to bear his ability and talents to make this as perfect a measure as possible. The hon. member for Marquette voted for the Bill all right enough, and the Government can fairly claim that he should give them every assistance in his power to pass the Bill.

Mr. MARTIN. I think that it is time the committee should rise and ask leave to sit again. On Tuesday of last week the Government very arbitrarily decided to take Saturday, so that Saturday, that is to-day, is set apart for Government business. Moreover, they decided that the House should sit on Saturday morning at 10 o'clock. It is now 9.30 on Saturday morning, and I would like to know how the House is going to sit at ten o'clock this morning if the committee do not rise and allow the charwomen time to sweep up the newspapers and clean up the House. The last clause this committee was working at was clause 11, and hon. members know how much difficulty we had in understanding it. As we found it in the Bill, it was absolutely meaningless, and after discussing it three or four hours we were obliged to leave it as it was, although we were satisfied on both sides that it was entirely meaningless. This fact shows how little care has been bestowed by the Government in drawing up the Bill in the first place. (The hon. gentleman read the Imperial Order in Council.) You will observe that this Order in Council concludes with the following paragraph :—

> Her Majesty having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council to approve thereof and to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed, and carried into effect in each and every particular. Whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being, and all other persons whom it may concern are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

Of course, hon. members of this committee understand that these concluding words are merely formal, and are to be found in every other Order in Council covering the decision of an appeal by Her Majesty's Privy Council. But you will be surprised to learn, Mr. Chairman, that in the election which resulted in the return of the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) for Victoria, one of that hon. gentleman's supporters there gravely argued that on account of these formal words in the Order in Council that there was no discretion in the Dominion Parliament, but that it would be treason both in the Parliament and Government to refuse to pass a Remedial Bill for Manitoba. You would hardly think it possible that such ignorance could exist, but I assure you that on the public platform a prominent lawyer belonging to the Government party seriously urged that as a reason why the Government should pass this Bill. I would not have believed it possible, had I not been there. I did not hear the argument, but I know it was advanced, because it was discussed, and it was reported in the newspapers at the time. This shows the extremes to which people are driven to find a reason for supporting the peculiar action of the Government in connection with this Bill. I would call attention to the fact that it is now ten minutes past ten on Saturday morning. Now, this House passed an order that the House should meet on Saturday morning at ten o'clock. But this House cannot meet until this committee rises, and it seems to me that there is a grave constitutional question whether we have any right to sit, and thus prevent the House from carrying out its order. I would like your ruling on that point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that this is still the sitting of Monday, even though the committee should rise now, and the House should meet, I take it for granted that we should be beginning the sitting of Tuesday. In this way, it would take us a long time to reach the sitting of Saturday. It seems to me that there are difficulties in the way of carrying the hon. gentleman's point of order into effect.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me that there has been an effort by some members in this House to improve their own personal position by the course they have deemed it their duty to take with regard to this Bill. It is greatly regretted that party politics should be allowed to take any part in the settlement of a question which involves the peace, harmony and prosperity of an important province of this Dominion. This is a sad spectacle in the history of this Dominion. Now, for very nearly a week the Government has forced this House to sit, night and day in a pretended consideration of this Bill, at the risk of the health, and even the lives of members. It appears to me that a peaceful settlement of this whole difficulty could have been reached long ago were it not for the mandatory terms in which the remedial order was issued. The Government are evidently anxious to show to the minority and to their advisers throughout this country that they are overloaded with a desire to do them justice. It appears to me that by the course they have adopted in postponing the consideration of this Bill for two months after the session had been called, and by the course they have pursued since the Bill has been before the House, they have no sincere desire of passing it into law. If they had really wished to legislate in the direction of this Remedial Bill, they would have asked the House to go into committee a long time before the date when they finally took that step. But they did not do that for reasons best known to themselves. I presume that to one section of the country they want to be able to say that they were very anxious to press this Bill through to a conclusion; and to another section they want to be able to wink with their eyes and tell them they never were sincere, that they never intended to press this remedial measure. We have had too much of this kind of political humbug in this country for the past few years. It is not creditable to any party who indulge in it: and I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that if they think by this manœuvre they are going to impose upon the credulity of the people of the country, they will find themselves very much mistaken. Now, when the Secretary of State carried a resolution that the House should sit on Saturday, it was decided that the House should meet at ten o'clock in the morning. Well, here we are at 10.30. Where are the Ministers? There is not one present, unless it is the Controller of Customs. I would like to know from him if he is so completely and intelligently in charge of this Bill that he is prepared now to go into a consideration of the 12th clause?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, it appears to me that they must all be wonderfully well posted upon the different clauses of this Bill. The Minister of the Interior claims that he is in charge of the Bill; the Minister of Justice claims, when he is here, that he is in charge of the Bill; and the Secretary of State, when he is present, claims that he is in charge of the Bill. They all appear to be in charge of the Bill by odds, and none of them very long at a time. It is somewhat amusing. I have witnessed the passage of Bills through this House in past years. When it was a Bill that affected the Customs, the Minister of Customs usually attended to it. When it was a Bill affecting the Department of Finance, I have noticed that the Minister of Finance took charge of that Bill; and, when it was a Bill affecting the Inland Revenue, the Minister of Inland Revenue took charge of it. But here is a Bill which all the Ministers take charge of by turns, and a pretty mess they have made of it. I shall be prepared, when before my constituents at the approaching elections, to defend any act of mine in obstructing this Bill. The Opposition have invited the Government to consider the Bill from three p.m. to two a.m., and make steady progress with it. Yesterday, however, after three o'clock, the hon. member for Assiniboia occupied the time for three hours, and was followed by other members on the Government side until six, with the exception of forty-five minutes. It must always be remembered that it is impossible for members to consider this question morning, noon and night. Soldiers on the battlefield are not compelled to stand on duty day and night. Generals have more mercy than the leader of this House shows towards his followers and the members of the Opposition. The Secretary of State expects to influence votes at the approaching elections by pointing to the superhuman efforts made to put this Bill through. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) has been present in the House during two successive evenings, no doubt prepared to make a statement of his mission as one of the Dominion commissioners to the Manitoba government. If the Government had been disposed to allow him an opportunity of presenting his views on the situation, they would have put the Speaker in the Chair, and asked the hon. member to make a statement as to the prospects of arriving at a settlement of the school difficulty. But they failed to do so—an action which was very unfortunate, as undoubtedly his advice would have been most valuable. We are not willing to take Manitoba by the throat, as was unfortunately done at the time when the provincial railway charters were disallowed. I believe the Manitoba government is prepared to so adjust their legislation as to afford the relief required by the minority. I should feel ashamed of Protestants, if they were not prepared to remedy any injustice, and I earnestly hope that the legislature will adjust any differences existing and mete out to the Roman Catholic minority a full measure of relief, consistent with the development of the province and the true interests of education. The minority cannot expect that they will ever be replaced in their former position. The old system of education had its day. Advancement is needed in education, as in everything else, and I believe it is the desire of the minority that legislation should be in the direction of raising the standard of education and making it more efficient for the rising generation, in order that the children and young people of Manitoba will be placed on a par with the youth in the other provinces. We have got through an average of three clauses a day on this Bill, and have made many amendments although the Government seemed to think at first that practically no amendments would be necessary. I cannot see, under these circumstances that this sitting should be prolonged, as members cannot be expected after the committee have been sitting so long without adjournment, to give due attention to their duties here. And I trust the Government will not ask us to sit to-morrow. That would be an outrage upon the Christian sentiments of the community and upon the religious feelings of members. According to the Minister of Public Works there are very few important clauses or clauses likely to prove long discussion. In that case we must surely have finished those clauses that are most likely to be discussed, and, if we adjourn now and come together in good time after the rest we so much require, we shall be able to make satisfactory progress.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before entering upon the consideration of matters now before the committee, I would like to say a few words with reference to myself and my position in this House. However, as I observe that the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who was present a few moments ago, is not here just now, I will defer that part of my remarks until he returns. There is one matter to which, it seems to me, sufficient attention has not been directed. It will be remembered that the Manitoba commissioners in their answer to the first memorandum of the Dominion commissioners called attention to the fact that they had made certain stipulations, one being that during the conference the Remedial Bill should be held in abeyance providing the conference did not extend beyond Tuesday next. In reply to this the Dominion commissioners say :

> We regret to find that there has been some misapprehension as to any understanding upon which the conference was proceeded with. As to the first of those matters mentioned by you ; we understand the facts to be that you insisted that no further consideration of the Remedial Bill should be pressed for by the Dominion Government until to-day (Tuesday) and that we directed your attention to the announcement to that effect in the newspapers of the day, and having every desire to meet your wishes we further promised to communicate with the Dominion Government asking that the Bill be not taken up on Friday. This communication we sent, and we were as much surprised as yourselves to find that late on the night of the Friday sitting the Bill was advanced a stage. We cannot say what consideration forced the Government to the conclusion that this step was necessary, and we sincerely regret that any misunderstanding has arisen as to a point upon which we carried out what we believed to be our engagement, and upon which we did all we could to have your wishes observed.

It is plain from these words that Mr. Dickey, the Minister of Justice, who represented the Government, fully understood—had, in fact, agreed on behalf of the Government—that the proceedings under the Bill should be held in abeyance and that he did all he could to have this carried into effect. I do not see how he could have entered into an agreement in more formal terms or how that agreement could have been stated more clearly. We have had many instances of what we thought breaches of faith on the part of the leader of the House. We had one the other night when the hon. gentleman's silence, his failure to take exception to an arrangement proposed, would natural'y be regarded among gentlemen as an acceptance of it. I was surprised that any man sitting as a gentleman among gentlemen should have repudiated that engagement. But it is of a piece with this. And I can hardly understand how the Minister of Justice can reconcile his treatment by the leader of the House or by the head of the Government which refused to carry out an engagement he had evidently entered into, an engagement which was reasonable in itself, with the respect that is due to him. How the Minister of Justice can allow himself to be placed in such a position by his leader is a thing which I do not profess to be able to understand. It does seem to me that the Minister of Justice and his colleagues on this commission have strong reasons to feel aggrieved with the action of the hon. gentleman who is in charge of the Bill in repudiating, or at any rate in not carrying out the engagements they had made. I do not lay stress upon the second part of the agreement, because upon that it would seem that there was a misunderstanding. As I see that the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has returned, I wish to speak of the matter to which I referred on rising. I pay no regard whatever and shall not attempt to reply to the personal attacks made upon myself either by that hon. gentleman nor by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray). If my position in the House and in the country is not sufficiently well established for me to pass such remarks in silence, it is time I retired from political life and from public life in any form. Public life would be intolerable if matters with which this House can have nothing to do, matters which, even though they might properly at the time they occurred have been subject to controversy, have passed into oblivion, are to be dragged forward and made the ground of personal attack. And one cannot help feeling that when this line of attack is adopted, it shows great weakness somewhere, otherwise it would hardly be imagined or expected by anybody that the public would accept such an attack upon an opponent as an answer to any argument that opponent might make. What I wish to say is that upon mature consideration of the language I used with reference to the hon. member for East Simcoe and some other members of the House in reference to what I thought of their conduct with regard to this measure, I think I used language which, perhaps, the facts did not warrant; and therefore in justice to myself and in justice to these hon. gentlemen I desire to say that I had no intention whatever of using language which could be construed into an attack upon the personal integrity of these gentlemen. I used the language in purely political sense and only desired to charge these gentlemen with great inconsistency in having first voted against this Bill and then having done all they could to assist the Government in pressing it through the House. Therefore I say that, influenced not at all by the personal references to myself, but influenced only by what I think is just to these gentlemen and just to myself—because I should be sorry to remain under the imputation of having used in the course of debate language which the facts did not justify—I desire to say that, upon reflection, I think I did use words with reference to these gentlemen which, so far as I can understand the facts, were not warranted, and therefore, so far as the inference drawn is concerned, I desire to retract them. One of the strongest arguments used by the promoters of this Bill is that it is only intended to place the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba upon the same basis as that upon which stand the Protestant minority in Quebec. I think there is a good deal of misunderstanding as to the position of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. I have before me a document which, I think, places the position of that minority in a light in which many members of this House have not been accustomed to view it. I shall take the liberty of reading the opinions of a gentleman, who, I think, may be fairly taken to be an exponent of the views of the Protestant minority in Quebec. I refer to Mr. Robert Sellar, editor of the Huntingdon "Gleaner," a paper published in the Eastern Townships. He sets forth the position of the Protestant minority in relation to this question in so clear a light that I shall have to ask the indulgence of the committee while I read it. The letter is written chiefly in answer to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who, in speaking upon the Remedial Bill, argued that it was necessary to pass this legislation in favour of the Manitoba minority in order to place them on the same footing as the Quebec minority. Mr. Sellar writes:

> The keynote sounded by Sir Charles Tupper, in opening the debate on the second reading of the Remedial Bill, that what the Government proposed to do was to extend to the Manitoba minority the same privileges as are enjoyed by the Quebec minority, has been taken up by succeeding speakers, who have prolonged its tone and introduced variations of their own. It would be tedious to follow all who have re-echoed this cuckoo cry of the Government, and it will suffice to take up the speech of the gentleman who stood up in the House of Commons on Thursday and assured the members he spoke as the representative of the Protestants of the province of Quebec. From the portion of his speech we print on the first page it will be seen that he asserts:
> (1). That the Protestants of Quebec have separate schools.
> (2). That they have these schools by grace of the majority.

These words are very emphatic, Mr. Chairman, and require careful attention—that the Protestants have religious schools by grace of the majority. It will be important, in considering this question, to bear in mind the statement that it is purely by the grace and generosity of the Roman Catholic majority in Quebec that the Protestants there are allowed any schools at all; that it is owing, not to their sense of justice, not to their toleration, that the Protestants are not compelled to pay taxes for the support of what are called public schools in that province. I think the public are beginning at last to understand the distinction—at any rate, it is time they did—that the public schools of Quebec are sectarian schools, pure and simple, and that in those schools the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church form a large portion of the education that is given. If that is so, it is clear that there is no analogy between those schools and the public schools; and if that is so, then the whole argument based upon there being any analogy between what are called separate schools in Quebec, and the Roman Catholic schools in Ontario, or those it is proposed to establish in Manitoba—this whole argument falls to the ground.

> (3). That if separate schools are now refused to Manitoba, the Quebec majority may adopt a coercive policy by so changing the character of the schools of the Quebec minority that they would become valueless.
> (4). That the schools of the Quebec minority depend for their existence on the right of appeal provided for in the constitution.
> Mr. Ives's argument rests on one point—that the Quebec Protestants have separate schools in the same sense that he, as a member of the Government, seeks to give separate schools to the Manitoba minority. If this assumption of his is true, then the force of his argument must be acknowledged. If it is not true, his plea is valueless. Let the reader then ascertain: Has the Quebec minority separate schools?

Now, that will be a somewhat startling proposition. Mr. Sellar asks the question, and he proposes to answer it :

> On this continent a distinction is drawn between common schools and separate schools. By common schools is meant schools that confine themselves to giving an every-day education, and which are, therefore, common to all who desire such an education.

You see there he gives a definition of what is a common school. It is not a school called common with reference to the existence or non-existence of any religious teaching in it ; it is a common school in the sense that it is common to anybody who chooses to attend it. We are in the habit of speaking of common schools as if they meant a school in which religion is not taught. Mr. Sellars here draws the distinction, and points out that the true definition of a common school is a school common to everybody, which everybody may attend :

> By separate schools is meant schools that, in addition to giving an every-day education, add instruction in the doctrines and ritual of a religious denomination.

So here we have a clear distinction drawn between common schools and separate schools. We have common schools defined as being schools existing without reference to religious teaching, which is given to everybody, and which everybody may attend ; and the separate school we have defined as a school in which the religious teaching of some particular denomination forms part of the instruction given.

> The one school is open to all ; the other is shut to all children whose parents do not belong to the church whose doctrines are taught in it. Is this definition correct or not ? Would it be just to speak of a school devoted solely to imparting secular knowledge as a separate school ? We think not, and those like Mr. Ives who say so should tell us in what regard they are separate. There is nothing separate about them. They are the schools of the people, schools true to their own name, school which welcome all and impart solely that knowledge of which all children stand in need. If it be an abuse of language then, and designed to convey a false impression to call the schools maintained by the Quebec minority "separate," is it not an even greater perversion of the truth to designate schools that are exclusive, and designed solely for the members of one religious denomination, common ? Yet it is by this misrepresentation of realities, by this juggling with the names separate and common, on which the argument of the Government in favour of the Remedial Bill depends.

Hon. gentlemen will understand the distinction which is drawn. Mr. Sellar points out the distinction between common and separate schools, and he makes it apparent that what are called common schools in the province of Quebec are in reality separate schools, because it is in them that religious education is given, the religious education of one particular denomination ; and therefore those schools are not common to all, because no one could possibly attend them who is not prepared to accept the teaching of that particular church.

> We are only proposing to give to the Catholics of Manitoba the same rights as are possessed by the Protestants of Quebec, declares Sir Charles Tupper. And when he sat down up rises Mr. Ives with the statement that not only all his leader had declared is true, but if the House will not do as he asks, the majority in Quebec will put the screws on the Quebec minority, and he beseeches the members not to leave them to such a dreadful fate.
> We ask Sir Charles Tupper, we ask Mr. Ives, we ask whoever makes the assertion that the Quebec minority stands on the same level with the Manitoba minority, to prove that the schools of the Quebec minority are separate schools. That is the point, gentlemen, for you to prove.

Mr. Sellar asks Mr. Ives and Sir Charles Tupper if there is any foundation for the argument, to commence by proving that what they state is the fact, to prove that the schools of the Quebec minority are separate schools, and if they cannot prove that, their whole argument falls to the ground.

> You say they are ; then prove it. Show us in what regard the schools controlled by the commissioners of these townships are separate. Do they teach the doctrines of any religious denomination ? Is a catechism of any church among their text-books ? Do they drill their scholars in the ritual of any church ? Are their teachers members of any religious community ? No man knows better than Mr. Ives that the schools of the Quebec minority do not possess even one of these features ; why, then, should he speak of them as separate and as equivalent to the schools which he proposes to force upon Manitoba.

It is evident from this statement that these schools in the province of Quebec which are called separate, are not separate, but they are common schools, because they are open to everybody, everybody can attend them without any danger of his religious faith being interfered with, or being called upon to accept any ritual specially belonging to any denomination. So you will see that the so-called separate schools in Quebec are really common schools, and that the so-called common schools are really the separate schools.

> The truth is, as every speaker who alleges that the Remedial Bill is going to extend to the Manitoba minority the rights already possessed by the Quebec minority knows, that what they are really trying to do is to extend to Manitoba the schools of the Quebec majority.

Not the schools of the Quebec minority, but the schools of the Quebec majority.

> They are working under false pretenses. Manitoba has already schools similar to those of the Quebec minority, and no Federal intervention is required to give them. What it is seeking to do is to fasten on Manitoba the separate school system of Quebec, the schools of the Quebec majority.

Now, this is a light in which the hon. members of this House have not been in the habit of regarding this question. They have been in the habit of looking upon the schools of the Quebec minority as separate schools, and it is a new view of the question to be told that what the Government are trying to force upon Manitoba are not the schools of the Quebec minority, but the schools of the Quebec majority.

> It is as cowardly as it is false to endeavour to make the people of the Dominion believe that the Remedial Bill is giving to Manitoba what is equivalent to the schools of the Quebec minority, for the representation is made at the expense of the weak and decreasing English-speaking population of this province. Let this deception cease, let the Remedial Bill stand on its own merits, let its advocates boldly declare that it is intended to give to Manitoba the church schools of Quebec, and Parliament and the electorate will know what they are about.

Now, that is just what it is the duty of those members of this House who are opposed to this legislation to do. It is their duty, among other things, to study this question in the light in which it is presented by Mr. Sellar, and they will find out from that examination that the schools which the Government are trying to establish in Manitoba are not the schools of the Quebec minority, but are in reality the schools of the Quebec majority, not common schools such as those of the Quebec minority are, but separate schools such as the schools of the majority are. Now he asks the question whether the Quebec minority owe their schools to the toleration and fair-play which we are told actuate the Quebec majority. It is just as well, without attributing to that majority any harshness of feeling towards the Quebec minority, to get at the facts. I am willing to give the Quebec majority every credit for toleration to which they may be entitled by fact, but let us get at the facts to find out how much they are entitled to. Mr. Sellar goes on to say:

> While it must of necessity be acknowledged that the schools of the Quebec minority are not separate schools, yet it may be contended the very fact of the minority being permitted to have common schools is a concession on the part of the majority.

Well, I think any one who knows what the schools of the minority in Quebec are, will not be willing to accede that they are the result of a concession. When you concede a thing, the implication is that you are giving something you are not compelled to give; the very word concession implies the granting of a favour. What Mr. Sellar proposes to establish is that there was no concession, that there was no favour, and that the Quebec minority had nothing to thank the majority for.

> All through Mr. Ives's speech this assumption runs. The majority has been kind enough to allow the minority to live in a house alone, but the majority "owns the door, windows and staircases," and he ascribes this partial possession of a house of their own to Cartier and Langevin, and their tenure of it he declares to depend on the educational guarantees in the Act of confederation.

Now, this happens to be a view of the question that hon. gentlemen will find it to their interest to study, and it is their duty to study it if they wish really to understand the history of this educational question.

> These assertions are not confirmed by facts. The rural schools of Quebec trace their origin to Acts passed during the administration of Lord Dalhousie, and it is needless to tell those conversant with his rule that no superiority to the majority was given. They provided that in the parishes the fabriques could organize schools and in the townships the people could do so.
> The principle of the early Acts, giving neither the majority nor the minority preference, but legislating for both as equal, was adopted in all subsequent legislation until after confederation took place.

So the existence of these schools of the minority in Quebec cannot be due to any spirit of toleration on the part of the majority, for they were in existence long before confederation:

> In no Act during that period will it be found that the majority were given control of education, but in every one of them the schools of the minority are treated of as independent in their origin and existing by equal authority as the schools of the majority. Indeed, we are not aware that any provision whatever was made for separate schools in the townships until after the union. So scrupulous were these anti-confederation legislators in making it clear that the continuance of the schools of the minority did not depend on the will of the majority, that the words Catholic and Protestant are not used to designate them, but the term "dissentient" applied to wherever a minority, whether Catholics or Protestants, formed a school, and in the townships the dissentient schools were Catholic. We challenge Mr. Ives to prove that the schools of the townships are not of independent origin. In face of these facts is it truthful to speak of the schools of the minority having been granted as a matter of privilege and being dependent on their future existence on the pleasure of the majority? For the establishment of township schools we have to thank Lord Dalhousie and not the majority, and for their continuance up to confederation the old Quebec legislative council and the Upper Canada members.

In these few lines the fiction that the Quebec minority enjoys their schools by virtue of the grace of the majority is pretty effectively dissipated, for we have it established that they rest on the same foundation and date from the same period as the schools enjoyed, and used as separate or religious schools by the majority. The writer asks:

> The air is full of it, the words are heard everywhere—the generosity of the Quebec majority towards the minority; the consideration with which that minority is treated; what an example to the majorities of the other provinces!

Every hon. member has heard those sentiments time and again. We have heard them used on every platform and in debate in this House—in fact, we never cease to hear of the generosity of the Quebec minority. Mr. Sellar goes on to say :

> When those who speak thus are asked to give instance of this striking liberality they always mention the schools. Just think of it, they exclaim, here is this Quebec majority, we were taught to believe to be so bigoted, acting so generously in giving the minority their own schools, and then look at Manitoba how it is using its minority ! This implies the Quebec minority are receiving more than they could claim. Now, is it true that the Quebec minority in the matter of schools are getting more than their right ? Look at what poor, innocent affairs their schools are, colourless as to creed, inoffensive as to curriculum, taught not by religieuse but by the daughters of the farmers themselves. If the minority are to be allowed schools at all, could they use more humble and unpretending means for teaching their children ? But from the talk at Ottawa it seems it is a wonderful instance of toleration to allow the Quebec minority to teach their children the three R's, and slavish adulation is sounded in praise of the majority for such a gracious condescension.

We have all this adulation of the majority because these people are allowed to teach the elements of education without the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. This is indeed wonderful and extraordinary toleration. It is time the public of this country should know the real facts of the case, for they have been already too long deluded by this fiction which has been so constantly farmed off upon them. The writer continues :

> We confess when we read the speech of Sir Mackenzie Bowell in the Senate last April, and the Hon. Mr. Baker's in the Commons last July ; when we noted the expressions in Mr. Foster's Ontario election addresses, in J. L. Hughes's manifesto to the Orangemen, in Sir Charles Tupper's speeches, and this later utterance of Mr. Ives, we have been staggered and forced to ask if Quebec is a British province or a South American republic, that non-Catholics are required to be devoutly thankful they are permitted by the majority to give their children the elements of education ? Quebec is a British province, and the minority are not here by permission or the tolerance of the majority. They are here as equals among equals, and in exercising so simple a right as teaching their children in non-sectarian schools they thank nobody, ask no permission, and are under no obligation whatever to the majority. If in their schools they taught the distinctive doctrines the parents profess, if their text-books contained passages offensive to their fellow-subjects, if the teachers were members of oath-bound societies who trained the children to form a caste in the community, then the continued existence of such schools might be quoted in proof of the tolerance of the government of Quebec, but when it is acknowledged these schools are the reverse, that they are objectionable to the majority just because they do not meddle with creed, but keep an open door for all, no matter what their faith, to enter, it is astounding to listen to the paeans of the politicians in praise of the majority. How steeped in the darkness of bigotry must be the minds of those who smile complacently on being praised for allowing the minority to have common schools ; how lost to manly feeling the office-seekers and office-holders who offer the incense of compliments they know are not deserved.

How the members of the hierarchy must laugh in their sleeves at the credulity of the great Protestant population in the Dominion, when their leaders come forward, and without any reality or basis for doing so, utter these pæans of praise and adulation for the majority of Quebec ; how gratified they must feel at obtaining on such cheap and easy terms this applause, simply because the people in the townships are permitted to teach the rudiments of education without at the same time inculcating the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church. It is a fiction which should be exploded, and the time has arrived. The writer further says :

> Let it ring out over this broad Dominion, that the minority of Quebec enjoy no exclusive privileges and seek none, that their schools are non-sectarian and common, and that for their origin and continuance they are under no obligation whatever to the majority. The effrontery of the Quebec majority in claiming credit for not compelling the minority to send their children to Catholic schools is only surpassed by their impudence in demanding as an equivalent for such a marvellous exhibition of tolerance on their part that Manitoba furnish funds to establish Catholic separate schools. Matters have surely come to a sore pass when, in a British province, the fact that non-sectarian schools are permitted to exist is trumpeted forth as a proof of toleration, and low indeed have sunk our public men when they re-echo the cry in order to curry favour with those upon whom they fawn.

We have a good many of such people in Canada, and we have some of this class in the House, and it is because this fallacy is being found out by the people of the country that we have this reaction against the course now being pursued in our political affairs. The writer says :

> Self-respect still survives among the Quebec minority, and why they have not given public and emphatic refutation to the widespread perversions of the truth regarding their status we do not comprehend, except it be that they have been waiting for Montreal to lead.

Unfortunately, Montreal does not seem very much inclined to do so. Unfortunately, material considerations affecting business and personal interests keep many of the people of that city from expressing sentiments which they are well known to entertain. Mr. Sellar next asks :

> The majority never had the power to deal with the schools of the minority until confederation took place, when they fell under the control of the Quebec legislature, and fear of what it might do caused Sir A. T. Galt to frame the guarantee clauses. That the attitude of the legislature has been as satisfactory during the past 29 years as Mr. Ives wishes the public to understand, we do not think. First, it introduced a hard and fast line between the two > classes of schools on the basis of creed. The old mixed schools were ignored, and it was required schools be either Catholic or Protestant.

The real distinction between the two classes of schools was lost sight of, and the common schools were designated Protestant schools, when they were not sectarian in any way whatever. This attempt to designate public schools as Protestant was the beginning of the mischief which has already produced so many injurious results. The writer continues :

> The proper division was sectarian and non-sectarian schools, but that did not suit the majority, and colour for the existence of Catholic schools was got by styling our common schools Protestant. Second, while thus ascribing certain schools to the Protestants, the reasonable request that the taxes of manufacturing corporations be divided according to the creed of their stockholders was inconsistently and unjustly refused, and Protestants are thus, to this day, taxed to support Catholic schools.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not tell the committee about that injustice. Under the Ontario system of schools, suppose a corporation consists of nine Roman Catholics and one Protestant, how would the money paid in taxes be divided ? The taxes paid by the nine Roman Catholics go to support separate schools, and the amount paid by the one Protestant would go towards the general schools. In the province of Quebec the result is very different. Suppose there were nine Protestants and one Roman Catholic in the population, the taxes of the nine Protestants would be paid out towards the support of the Catholic schools on the basis of population ; so that if in the district there were one thousand Roman Catholics and one hundred Protestants, all the taxes paid by the nine Protestants would go to sustain the schools of the Roman Catholics, and the one-tenth would go to the so-called Protestant schools. So this division is exceedingly unfair. This is especially the case in Montreal, where the vast bulk of the business is in the hands of Protestants, where the taxes paid by Protestants are divided on the basis of population, and do not go to support the Protestant schools, if you choose to call them such. If the population is ten Roman Catholics to one Protestant, all the taxes paid by the Protestant population on the basis I have mentioned go to support Roman Catholic schools, with the exception of the fraction to which I have referred. That is a gross injustice. It simply amounts to this, that in the province of Quebec, in spite of all this talk of toleration on the part of the majority, Protestants are compelled to pay their taxes practically for the support of Roman Catholic schools. This means, in effect, the support of the Roman Catholic Church. So what is the use of talking about there being no state church in this country, when, as a matter of fact, the Protestants are compelled to pay taxes to support the Roman Catholic Church. This is not done in any other part of the Dominion. If this majority were so tolerant and generous as they are said to be, they would allow taxes paid by Protestants to go to support so-called Protestant schools, and not Catholic schools. The writer continues :

> Third, in organizing the Protstant Committee of Public Instruction the just method would have been to provide for the choice of its members by those electors who pay taxes to the schools under its control. Instead of that the committee is formed of gentlemen nominated by the government of the day, a government which is always Catholic, and more than once has been Ultramontane. With the exception of two or three, it may be safely said the present members of the committee would have no chance of election by the Protestants of the province. They are either church dignitaries and college officials, who combine for the division of the superior education fund among the institutions in which they are interested, or gentlemen chosen for their political views and services. To say that the minority have the control of their schools, when the schools are managed by a committee which commands neither their respect nor confidence, and whose tenure of office is dependent upon a Catholic governmnet, is misleading.
> Under the management of such a body the schools of the minority exist, but they do not prosper. Red tape regulations, irritating rules, and a persistent effort to give the teaching of the schools a religious complexion, is all the committee has done for them. There is a general feeling among the Protestant farming community that if they could get rid of Government interference altogether, and were left to provide for and control their schools themselves, they would become more efficient and be again acceptable to English-speaking Catholics. To represent the Quebec minority as satisfied with the treatment they have received under confederation will not be confirmed by investigation, and few of our farmers will endorse Mr. Ives's statement that a " full measure of justice and of control over their own schools is given " them.
> Mr. Ives holds out the threat that unless we throw our influence on behalf of the Remedial Bill dire ills may overtake us, and our schools be rendered inefficient—in his own expressive language, the doors, windows and staircases of our house be taken away. We read of the Mahommedans closing the mission schools and forcing the Armenians to send their children to Moslem schools. Mr. Ives insults the Quebec majority by supposing them capable of similar conduct—rendering useless the schools of the minority and leaving Protestants the alternative of sending their children to schools taught by nuns and Christian Brothers. That the peril Mr. Ives conjures to frighten the opponents of the Bill is impossible a moment's reflection will show. The worst the Quebec government could do would be to withdraw government aid from the schools of the minority, and as that aid is only some 60 cents a year per scholar its loss would be no hardship. If the majority ever undertake to remove the doors and windows of the little red school-houses of the minority, the withdrawal of that munificent grant of 60 cents is the limit of their power to do harm. To talk about the majority having the power to force upon the minority obnoxious text-books, or to shut the school-houses and leave none but separate schools efficient, is absurd. The right of toleration depends neither on the Act of Confederation nor the Federal Government ; it is the inherent right of every British subject. To endeavour to induce Parliament to pass the Remedial Bill by representing that the Quebec minority is in the same boat with the Manitoba half-breeds is as contrary to fact as the statement that the privileges of the Quebec minority are those that Bill professes to confer upon the Manitoba minority.

Then there is another consideration that appears here. The separate schools in Ontario rest upon precisely the same basis, so far as the Act of Confederation is concerned, as the separtae schools—to use the term that is improperly used in Quebec. Let the majority lay their hands upon the rights of the Protestants of Quebec and they will soon find that the Protestants of Ontario can retaliate and will retaliate by withdrawing from the separate schools in Ontario every privilege that they have gained since the Confederation Act was passed. The friends of those schools have persistently agitated with the result that they have obtained a great deal from the government and the legislature beyond that which they hold under the constitution. And what has been given to them by the legislature can be taken away by the legislature., I think Mr. Sellar has pretty well made out his case. He has proved that these so-called separate schools in Quebec do not exist by virtue of the generosity or toleration of the Quebec majority. He has proved that they existed long before the present legislation was thought of, either in the Dominion or in the province, that they existed upon precisely the same footing as other schools of the province. They are not sectarian schools, they are not separate schools : they are common schools. The schools of the majority are separate schools, and therefore there is no analogy between the province of Quebec and the province of Manitoba in this respect, and no argument can be drawn in favour of this Bill from the condition of things that exists in Quebec. Having disposed of this question based upon the assumption that justice to the minority in Manitoba is required by the treatment of the minority in Quebec, he goes on to speak of the principles on which it is based. I think these principles are not sufficiently understood by the House, and one great reason why this committee should rise and report progress is that the Government should have time to consider the basis of their Bill.

SHOULD THE PRINCIPLE OF THE REMEDIAL BILL BE ENDORSED ?

Stripped of the pretenses with which the politicians have surrounded it, the principle of the Remedial Bill will be found to be, that when the clergy of a church ask that day-schools be set aside for the use of their people, the legislatures are to be compelled by the Federal power to give them support. The issue, therefore, which the Bill presents to the people of the Dominion for settlement is, whether or not the state is bound to pay for the teaching of denominational doctrines. It is necessary to keep in mind that it is not the teaching of religion in its broad sense that is meant, the fundamental truths of Christianity, or the inculcation of the faith, love and obedience which these truths lead to and which all desire, but what is asked by the Bill is that the distinctive and peculiar tenets, doctrines and ritual of one particular church be taught at the public cost. Is it any business of the state to give money to train children in any particular denomination ? If it is, the Remedial Bill is right ; if it is not, it is wrong. This is the crucial point in the question before the Dominion, has the state the right to use public money to impart sectarian teaching ? That it is within the right of the state to see that every boy and girl be taught the elements of education, that they learn to read so as to become intelligent, to write and count that they may discharge the duties of life, is admitted by all, and also that in imparting this knowledge it is not improper for the state to teach the children the duties of good citizenship ; forbearance, toleration and kindness towards neighbours ; patriotism and obedience to law towards the state. Further than this has the state any right to go ? Is it, for instance, within its jurisdiction to give money to teach the catechism ? If it be, then every denomination which can produce a sufficient number of children to form a school under the Remedial Bill has a right to a school of its own, and so the Government would become involved in teaching children to be Anglicans, Methodists, Presbyterians, Mennonites and Catholics. That is the fair conclusion of any person who holds that the state should assist denominational schools, but few who do will approve of so wide an application of their view, and put in the plea that it is only Catholics who should be so favoured. That makes the matter worse, for instead of dealing with all alike they would have the state make a preference and bestow a favour on one denomination which it refuses to all others.

That strikes at the very foundation of this legislation.

THE QUESTION OF CONSCIENCE.

The plea that the Catholic hierarchy hold it as a matter of conscience that their people should have schools by themselves involves providing a great deal more than separate schools. It means that the state shall provide them with separate hospitals, separate deaf mute and blind institutions, separate lunatic asylums and separate criminal reformatories. The claim of conscience applies to every one of these with like force as to schools. Should the Dominion endorse the principle of the Remedial Bill, it commits itself to compelling the provinces to supply the hierarchy with whatever institutions it declares are necessary to meet its claims of conscience, which would lead to all that is to be found in Quebec being reproduced in every other province, and the state thus made the provider of what a particular church declares is necessary to meet its conscientious scruples.

The plain and common-sense view we take to be, that while it is the duty of the state to do nothing calculated to give offence to the conscience of any church, it is not called upon to give exceptional treatment to any under the pretense of conscience, for the simple reason that doing so implies violence must be done to the consciences of others. If one class say they will not use the common school it is obviously wrong to give them a separate school at the expense of those who do not believe in their views. The consciences offended by public money being used to teach sectarian doctrines in schools are entitled to as much regard by the state as the consciences of those who say they will not send their children to common schools. There are two sides to this talk of conscience, and when a man stands up and tells us he cannot comply with this or that regulation of the state he should consider whether granting him exceptional treatment will not as grievously offend the consciences of those at whose expense he seeks the exceptional treatment if it be granted. A conscience that asks its requirements be provided at the public expense is one not considerate of the consciences of others. If a man be so fastidious and exclusive that he will not sit down at the table with his fellows nor eat a slice off the loaf baked for all, his views are to be respected and nothing said to hurt his feelings, but it is not unreasonable that he be told he ought to provide a table and a loaf for himself at his own cost or else hold his peace. When the bishops affirm that to send children to the common school is to do violence to the Catholic conscience, they should bear in mind other people have consciences also, and that a great many who support common schools have strong conscientious objections to being taxed to provide schools that will teach the doctrines demanded by the bishops.

It has been alleged in the debate now going on at Ottawa that Catholics are entitled, at least, to receive back the school rates they have paid. Will those who say so consider whether it would be possible to carry on the Government of the country if every dollar the state collected was to be labelled with the creed of the man who paid it, and expended accordingly ; the Methodist and Catholic, Presbyterian and Anglican Churches receiving back their respective portions ? Taxes are not levied according to creed, and we pay them neither as Catholics nor Protestants, but as citizens. The money goes into a common fund, and the Government that applies any portion to any church violates the bond upon which we all contribute. The Government should know no church beyond protecting all alike, and it should know their members solely as British subjects and citizens of the Dominion, and treat them as such. For the state to take cognizance of creeds and to favour one at the expense of the other is to court strife and endanger the stability of our country.

He points out here with great force that if you accept this principle with regard to education, you cannot refuse it with regard to other matters that rest upon a similar basis. If you arrange your laws not to offend a Roman Catholic by having his children taught in the school, why not the same with regard to hospital and various other institutions to which the provinces contribute.

THE OUTLOOK.

That the Remedial Bill will be settled in accordance with these elementary principles of government is not to be expected. On one hand we have the bishops demanding its passage ; on the other, men like Samuel Hughes, who oppose it chiefly because those bishops are Roman Catholic. We see the members of one party supporting it in order to retain clerical support, and the other fencing with the Bill to avoid provoking violent clerical opposition. What will be the outcome it is impossible yet to see. If the Bill be carried it may end in Manitoba withdrawing from the confederation ; if it is lost Quebec may form an irreconcilable third party. Grievous as are these alternatives, either would be preferable to a compromise that would postpone the evil day, for we hold the great issue, whether this Dominion is to be ruled by the people and for the people, or by a church and for a church, cannot be long evaded. And when it is, we trust it shall be with a full knowledge that the case of the Quebec minority is no parallel of that of the Manitoba minority, because there is no semblance between those who resist and those who demand sectarian schools ; that the Quebec minority enjoy no exceptional favours and have nothing to thank the majority for, and therefore they have nothing to fear from retaliation by that majority ; that if the measure of assumption is to be the measure of privilege the Dominion Government can never satisfy those who are now clamouring at its door ; and that the safety and peace of the Quebec minority with that of the entire Dominion rests upon the firm application to all creeds and all men of the principle of equal rights to all and favours to none.

R. SELLAR.

Now, I think the time I have taken up in reading this letter of Mr. Sellar is not lost, as it will give hon. members of this House a much better idea of things in Quebec than they had before. I think it will show that the fears entertained by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Ives—I will not say entertained by him, because no one can suppose that he is so wanting in knowledge of the facts or in intelligence as to believe that his predictions will come true—are not well founded. It should be remembered that this is not a question of education of Manitoba alone ; it is a question underlying the whole constitution of the country, a question whether one church is to be supported at the expense of the community. We all know that the Roman Catholic hierarchy look upon these schools not in the same sense as that in which we look upon them. They do not regard them as necessary for the secular education of the people, but as a means to perpetuate and inculcate the peculiar doctrines of their church. No one can take the standard of results which are attained, the books which are used, the curriculum of education which is followed, without coming to the conclusion that, so far as the hierarchy are concerned, who are the principal movers in this agitation, it is not an efficient system of education which they desire, it is not that the Roman Catholic children shall be placed on the same footing as others, as regards the advantages of education, but it is that they shall be obedient children of the church, and the first and last consideration is that their children should be taught in the doctrines of the church, not that they should be given a good education. What the result has been in Manitoba we know already. When we take the province of Quebec, we find that of all the provinces in the Dominion it stands lowest in the scale of education. We know that such men as Senator Masson and others have been compelled to rise in revolt against the system, and in opposition to the bishops and clergy, and they publicly declare that that system has been a failure and is a failure. Then, how manifestly absurd and ridiculous it is to force upon Manitoba a system, the evil results of which have been found elsewhere. In the province of Quebec they have an educational system which has been in force for some two hundred years; it has been supported by enormous endowments, it possesses more wealth than all other systems in the Dominion combined, it has trained teachers by the thousand, whom it costs very little to pay and to support, and, notwithstanding all these facts, that province stands the lowest in the scale of all the provinces in regard to education. Well, how monstrous it is to ask this House, in face of these facts, in face of the opposition of the people of Manitoba, in face of the many reasons which can be urged against it on constitutional and other grounds, how exceedingly unjust it would be to persist in the efforts now being made to force this Bill through Parliament.

Mr. WELSH. I think this is a rotten Bill, and ought to be denounced by every honest man in the country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Are you in favour of remedial legislation?

Mr. WELSH. I am in favour of letting Protestants and Catholics settle their own affairs without force and without compulsion. I want to know whether the Manitoba government had a right to pass a Bill which has been declared constitutional by the Privy Council? I have not heard any one say that they had not that right. But the Privy Council said there was a grievance. The people of Manitoba had been following a certain custom in regard to schools for years, and the people of Manitoba thought that it was a bad custom, and they introduced a new one. They had a legal right to do it. Then the minority went to the Privy Council, claiming they had a grievance, and the Privy Council said they had. But the question is whether it is a legal grievance, or whether it is one with which the Dominion Government ought to interfere. I do not think the Dominion Government had a right to interfere in the manner they have chosen to adopt. What they should have done was to follow the course of appointing a commission long ago, as the leader of the Opposition advised them to do. They treated his advice with scorn. But finally they had to haul down their flag, and they appointed a commission, and adopted a policy of conciliation. They sent a commission to Manitoba with a flag of truce in one hand and a remedial knife in the other. Their commission failed, as they must have known it would fail, and now they have again resorted to the policy of coercion. I am firmly convinced that a coercion policy will never be submitted to by the people of Manitoba, and that the Government will signally fail to set this matter right in the course they are now pursuing. The picture presented by the Secretary of State in regard to wheat-growing in the North-west was as fanciful as that regarding the effect of the National Policy. The hon. gentleman visited Charlottetown and declared before a great meeting, that if the National Policy were endorsed he could guarantee the island reciprocity with the United States within two years. That prophecy was not fulfilled, but the people have not forgotten it. The Secretary of State complained because the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) read from the "Mail" newspaper in regard to himself, but the Secretary of State read an opinion expressed by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with respect to the leader of the Opposition some time ago. This House has been in session during four months, but the amount of business done has not been worth four pence to the country. Undoubtedly, the Manitoba school question will be settled by the provincial government without the interference of this Government. The life of this ship of state is nearly up. It will have shortly to be sold for the benefit of all concerned. She is covered with barnacles; there have been no dividends paid. There will have to be a survey on the eleven clauses that have been got ashore, because they are damaged and will have to be sold. If greater progress is not made, what is to become of the Chignecto Ship Railway Bill and other private measures? No progress, however, can be made so long as the Government pursue the present policy of coercion and tyranny. If there were opportunity, a Bill for the closure no doubt would be attempted, but the Government are shut up by the fact that four months would be required. I am in favour of remedying any grievance of the Manitoba minority, and they will obtain more from this side of the House than from the other side, because this Bill will not benefit the minority in any particular.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman in favour of a stronger Bill?

Mr. WELSH. I am in favour of Manitoba settling the question. I have always voted for provincial rights, and I gave my vote for the Jesuit Estates Bill.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. Secretary of State the other day repudiated the "Mail," which condemned the Government for trying to force remedial legislation through the House at this stage of the session. The Minister of Finance should refer to the Hamilton "Spectator," one of the oldest Conservative papers in the country, and he will find the opinion expressed that it would be far better if, instead of striving to coerce members of the House, the Government took up Estimates and other business. The article to which I refer is headed "Determined Mr. Foster," and was published on March 21st. This is only one of many articles in the Hamilton "Spectator" within the last twelve months warning the Government against the course they were pursuing. As to the attempt at coercion of this House the Hamilton "Spectator" has the following also :—

DETERMINED MR. FOSTER.

Hon. George E. Foster announced last evening in the House that the coercion Bill would be pushed through to its third reading this session, even if it became necessary, in order to do so, to drop the Estimates. It may be that the Government will be able to do this ; but there are nearly as many members in the House opposed to the coercion Bill as there are in favour of it, and it is possible for the members of the Opposition, if they feel like doing it, to talk all summer. It, however, makes no great difference. The members are already committed for or against the principle of coercion, and the third reading can neither change that fact nor the opinion their constituents have formed of them because of their vote. The dead ducks are dead—third reading or no third reading.

If Mr. Foster were to announce that in order to give more time to the pushing through of the coercion Bill, the Government had decided to drop the proposition to "advance" two million dollars to the Montreal Harbour Commissioners, he would be doing at least one good thing.

THE COERCION VOTE.

An analysis of the vote on the second reading of the bulldozing Bill shows that 105 Conservatives and 7 Liberals voted to coerce Manitoba, while 73 Liberals, 18 Conservatives and 3 Independents were opposed. It will be seen that the Conservatives give a majority of 11 for the Bill, and the Government could have carried the second reading without any assistance from the enemy. The Government's majority ordinarily is 44, and over the Liberals and Independents, 41.

The vote by provinces shows some figures which, in view of the coming elections, will make an interesting study. The vote was :

	For.	Against.
Ontario	35	52
Quebec	32	29
Nova Scotia	16	5
New Brunswick	13	3
Manitoba	4	1
Prince Edward Island	2	4
British Columbia	6	0
North-west Territories	4	0

It will be noticed that Ontario was strongly against coercion, and that Quebec, with all the power of the hierarchy exercised to force the vote in favour of the Bill, gave a majority of only 3 in favour of the coercion of Manitoba ! New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, in which provinces, the Government claims, the Manitoba school questions cuts very little figure, went strong for coercion. The odd thing about the vote was the attitude of the western provinces. With the exception of one Manitoba member—Martin—every vote west of Ontario went with the Government ! It is nonsense to suppose that that represents the sentiment of the people of Manitoba, the Territories and British Columbia.

We leave the gentle reader to get any other information out of the figures which he may desire. The figures don't lie about what has already been done ; but they may be terribly misleading in respect of what is to be done in the future.

There are other small comments from day to day, for instance I notice the following :—

Sir Charles Tupper affirms that there is no coercion in the Remedial Act. He says to Greenway : You must die. In the meantime you are at liberty to cut your own throat ; but if you refuse to do that we shall hang you. It is quite evident that Greenway "controls" the situation.

We are told by the political doctors that the Remedial Bill is necessary to save Canada's constitution. This country's constitution is not in danger. But it may be endangered by compelling the country to swallow a quack medicine which contains a lot of poison and no nourishment.

The Ottawa "Citizen" professes a desire to "read the 'Spectator' into the party again, under present circumstances." Under the circumstances the "Citizen" would do well to follow the "Spectator's" example and read into the party the wholesome advice and warning which this journal, with all loyalty and love for the party, has been giving.

The determination of Sir Charles Tupper to keep the House in continuous session from today until Saturday, is nothing short of an outrage. There is entirely too much coercion going on at Ottawa.

That the Government ought to be sustained on the Remedial Bill was never doubted by those who took a broad view of the question at issue.—London "Free Press."

What do you think of that, Mr. "Spectator" ? —Hamilton "Times."

We think that the gentleman who wrote that ought to get a fat office immediately.

FORGOT TO NOTIFY HIM.

When Nicholas Flood Davin left his prairie home he was opposed to the coercion Bill. Nicholas forgot to notify his editor at Pile o' Bones that he had flopped, and the result was that, about the time Davin was voting for the coercion Bill the Regina "Leader" made its appearance with a fierce denunciation of the coercion Ministers for their "contemptible exhibition of the essence of selfish stupidity." "When such tales are told," says Mr. Davin's "Leader," "we may well believe the tales that are told of the buying up of members with promises of office. The attempt to coerce a province is bad enough, but this attempt to coerce members of Parliament is ten times worse." The "Leader," utterly ignorant of the fact that Davin had turned himself inside out, goes magnificently along to say that, "Fealty to party is good in its place ; but when the interests of party and country clash, the man is a traitor to patriotism who allows the former to outweigh the latter." The article winds up with this statement : "Those who forced the measure, which is contrary to the principles of the Conservative party, are the ones who are guilty of disloyalty to the party !" There will be a lively scene when Davin and his editor meet.

I hope the hon. senior member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay) will take notice of this remark in the paper that has supported him so long. In viewing the situation at Ottawa, the Hamilton "Spectator" of the 5th March, has the following remarkable article :—

THE SITUATION.

The time has gone by in which the people of Ontario and other British provinces can be cajoled into submission by politicians whose actions are governed by a desire to please Quebec, and who are ready and willing to give anything and everything the Quebec bishops may choose to demand, in expectation of receiving in exchange the votes of a people dragooned by their spiritual advisers. It may be that the manner of knuckling down to the French has been changed ; it may be because of a deterioration in the personal magnetism of the politicians ; it may be that the trick has been performed several times too often, and that the people have grown tired of it. Whatever the reason, Sir Mackenzie Bowell's attempt to capture Quebec at the expense of the feelings and principles of the people of the British provinces has been a sad failure. It was evident from the first move that Sir Mack had made a terrible blunder ; but he persisted in his course and went on, step by step, plunging deeper and deeper into the mire ; determined, in spite of all danger signs, in spite of the warnings of his friends and of the by-elections, to go on to the bitter end.

Finding that the Remedial Bill was likely to be defeated, Sir Mack recently made a strong appeal to Conservatives who believe him to be in the wrong, and who are firmly convinced that his course is most dangerous to the party, asking them for the love they bore to the old party, for the safety and preservation of the National Policy, for the sake of good government, to cease their opposition and help him to accomplish the very thing which they look upon as equivalent to ringing the death knell of the Liberal-Coservative party. The Manitoba school question was described as being a "paltry sentimental affair," and Conservatives opposed to coercion were asked if they would assist in the defeat of the Government on account of so small a thing. And much more was said of the same tenor and about the same date.

It did not occur to Sir Mackenzie Bowell that, inasmuch as he alone was responsible for the present position of the Government ; that inasmuch as he alone devised and insisted upon the grand scheme to capture Quebec by coercing Manitoba ; the proper thing for him was to drop out, and leave the party to restore itself to its former position. It does not seem to have occurred to Sir Mack to make an appeal to the Quebec members to remember the National Policy, and let up on their insistance upon the coercion of Manitoba. It does not appear to have dawned upon Sir Mack that the bishops might be appealed to to loosen a trifle the grasp they have upon the Government's throat, and defer their demand for the coercion of Manitoba which, made now upon the eve of an election, and insisted upon, will wreck the Government which has been so anxious to please them. These people, for whom the Government is prepared to do anything and everything, are not asked to save the old party, to preserve the National Policy, or to set aside their "paltry sentiment" in respect of the Manitoba schools. No, they must have what their paltry sentimentalism demands even if it wrecked the party, and the long-suffering people of Ontario are asked to once more throw their convictions, their opinions and their principles to the dogs, and stand by the National Policy, as if they were the only people in the broad Dominion who are at all interested in that policy.

We are much afraid that this preposterous demand has been made upon Ontario once too often, and that, if the Government insists upon pressing the coercion Bill to a vote, and committing the Conservative members to the coercion scheme, it is simply making first-class arrangements for its overwhelming defeat at the coming elections. Once more we ask the Government to drop the whole business, or seek some plan whereby a vote can be avoided. The situation in Ontario is not being improved, from a Government standpoint, by the debate on the second reading of the coercion Bill.

I am glad the Secretary of State has returned to the House because he repudiated a statement read by the hon. member for South Oxford from the "Mail" saying that it was most unfair to quote against him the "Mail," of 1891, because at that time that paper was strongly opposed to him. He said also that he had received no resolutions nor any complaints from any part of the Dominion of Canada against the course of the Government in forcing this Bill through Parliament. I would like to read him, more particularly as the senior member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay) is just behind him, from a paper that has supported his party for the last forty years, a resolution that was passed by an influential body. This article is headed "McKay and his Lodge."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have ruled—I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was then in the chamber—that it was not in order for hon. members to read from newspapers ; that is going altogether too far.

Mr. GIBSON. I shall be obliged to appeal from your ruling, Mr. Chairman, for this reason—the Secretary of State said it was unfair to quote against him a paper which he said was at that time opposed to him. I now propose to read from a paper which has always supported his party.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I made no such statement. The point was an entirely different one and had nothing to do with the Bill. The quotation was one read by the hon. member for South Oxford from the "Mail" of 1891, my remarks applied to that.

Mr. GIBSON. Quite so, but I think the hon. gentleman said it was most unfair to quote that paper against him, because, at that time it was unfriendly to him. That is not the case with this paper.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I know the hon. gentleman would not do anything unjust——

Mr. GIBSON. I do not wish to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER—but I leave it to himself. The hon. member for South Oxford proposed to read against the Secretary of State an article from the "Mail" of 1891, which, as the Secretary of State pointed out, was, at that time, opposed not only to him but to the whole Government. If he were referring again to that, I could hardly rule him out of order. But I leave it to his sense of right whether we should quote from newspapers, because if that is allowed we shall never get through.

Mr. GIBSON. But this refers to the Remedial Bill. This is a report of a meeting of perhaps the most influential Orange lodge of the city of Hamilton, at which a resolution was passed, which resolution appears in the public press. I cannot understand your ruling out this article.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It seems rather hard, Mr. Chairman, after other members have been allowed to quote from newspapers so freely that my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) should not be allowed to do so, particularly as what he wishes to quote refers to the subject before the Chair and goes to show the state of public opinion. Bourinot says that it is now in order for a member to quote extracts from books and other printed publications if he does not infringe any rules of order. That is, I suppose, he must not read for the purpose of making an attack upon other members, or stating inferentially what he would not state upon his own authority. It is a very serious point that is raised as to whether a member has a right to read a newspaper article which is pertinent to the debate. May says that it is irregular to read extracts from newspapers, letters or other documents referring to debates in the House during the same session. For instance, any paper commenting on a debate during this session, could not be read this session, under parliamentary practice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman is wrong. According to Bourinot, a member may make extracts from book or other printed publications containing a report of his speech, provided that in doing so he is not infringing upon a point of order. The point of order is that you must not make an attack upon a member of the House, that you cannot, by reading a newspaper article, make an attack which you would not otherwise be permitted to make, if coming through yourself.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think we can come to an agreement on this matter. All our rules are based on common sense. Certainly many hon. gentlemen have read extracts from newspapers, short extracts, or an analysis of a whole article. But we have not hitherto allowed full articles of newspapers to be read. The hon. member for Lincoln wants to read an article from the Hamilton "Spectator" which condemns the Government of the day. He may read extracts from that article, but I understood that he wished to read a lengthy article, which it is clearly out of order to do in a deliberative assembly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The point of order is not what the hon. gentleman might wish to do; it is a question whether a member has a right to do it. Yesterday we listened to an article being read from "La Vérité."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was that relating to this session?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly. We wanted to know what the opinion of the official organ of the church in Quebec was upon this matter. Now, if you lay down a precedent that a member cannot read an article from a newspaper, it is going to be a serious thing. I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that you can only do so when you are satisfied that the article being quoted is irrelevant to the subject before the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) read the article of "La Vérité," and nobody objected to it, as it was pertinent to the subject. According to the strict rules of the House, I might have asked him not to read it all, although I permitted him to do so. But in this case I understood that the hon. member for Lincoln had a long article to read.

Mr. GIBSON. The article is only a paragraph, and if you will not permit me to read it, I think you are laying down a rule that was broken yesterday by the Minister of Finance reading an article from "La Patrie."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Of course, I rely upon the hon. gentleman's own knowledge of what it is he wants to read, and whether it is pertinent to the subject.

Mr. GIBSON. The article I wish to read is directly bearing on the subject before the House, because it shows that the sentiment of the people of the city of Hamilton, both Conservative and Liberal, is strongly opposed to the policy of the Government in regard to this Remedial Bill. It is far more pertinent to this question than are many of the extracts that have been read to this House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not want to prevent the hon. gentleman from reading it, if he thinks he is entitled to do so. When the Minister of Finance read the article yesterday from "La Patrie," it was to verify certain words that had been used by an hon. member, and words only. But this is a different case. The hon. gentleman may read extracts, but not the whole paper.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not wish to transgress the rules, but I shall see that the rules you are enforcing against me are hereafter enforced against others. It is only a paragraph, and I have no doubt the senior member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay) has seen it. It was a resolution proposed by his friends in Hamilton, and I have no doubt he was furnished with a copy of it.

Mr. McKAY. What right has the hon. gentleman to make that assertion, or even to quote from the Hamilton "Spectator" that such a resolution was passed by any Orange body in Hamilton? He is himself a member of a secret association, and he knows well that everything done in a body like that is supposed to be absolutely secret. I know if anything of that sort was done, it was not given to the press by any officer of the lodge, but it must have got out surreptitiously, and was picked up by the paper as a matter of street gossip. He knows that the Hamilton "Spectator" was the only one that published it, the "Herald" and the "Times" did not refer to it. I think the hon. gentleman himself will acknowledge that street gossip is no foundation upon which to lay a charge against any man.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not wish to hurt the feelings of the hon. gentleman. What he says is quite correct, that this resolution had no right to get into the newspapers; and he must admit that it is not my fault if it has got into the newspapers. If he objects to my reading it, I will not do so.

Mr. McKAY. I object to your reading an article like that, knowing it does not come from any authoritative source. You know yourself it cannot be official.

Mr. GIBSON. I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman says, but if my memory serves me, the Hamilton "Herald" also says that that resolution was passed, and a copy of it was sent to the hon. member, and to the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace). Now, whether I am allowed to read this article or not, there is no doubt that it correctly expresses the opinions of all the Liberals, and a vast majority of the Conservatives in the city of Hamilton, and, indeed, of all western Ontario, in opposition to the policy of the Government on this Remedial Bill. The Secretary of State, who said he was prepared to die for this Bill, appears to have withdrawn the death clause, and goes to bed, as a good old gentleman should do. Nevertheless, members have to sit here night and day, from Monday until Sabbath day, in endeavouring to pass through this Remedial Bill. Already there have been two strikes in the Government on that issue. The conspirators or traitors to the present Premier were compelled to return and accept office. A singular fact is that while they were on strike, Sir Mackenzie Bowell filled thirty or forty appointments, and did more business during a few days than the combined Cabinet had done for months. Since the opening of the session two months have been frittered away, and, in fact, the whole obstruction has been done by members supporting the Government. This Bill, however, is not a Government Bill, but a Bill prepared by Mr. Ewart, counsel for the Catholic minority, for it appears that the seven or eight lawyers in the Cabinet have not sufficient ability to prepare a Bill. About four hours are spent in discussing the Bill, and twenty hours in discussing points of order during the day. If the Government had any desire to press forward the Bill, the Minister of Justice should be in his place. Bad tactics have been followed throughout by the Government. They have not shown staying capacity, although they have compelled the members to remain in their seats for the week. It is perfectly evident that the Government never intended to pass this measure, and the minority in Manitoba are further from obtaining it than they were when the remedial order was passed.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would not address the committee at this time if I were under the impression that the motion that the committee rise and report progress would be carried. But perhaps it may be adopted after I have used a little more persuasion and argument in its favour. We have had incidents in connection with this long sitting of the committee which convince us how unjustifiable this course has been and which shows that the person who is responsible for it committed a grievous blunder. The House is a demoralized House. As Chairman of the committee, you must have realized the difficulty of keeping order, and you must have noticed with regret the many incidents that have occurred quite out of keeping with the dignity of the Canadian House of Commons. It has been impossible to keep the House in proper order. That might have been expected. Members being kept here so unreasonably long become irritated. We have a bar under this chamber, and those who indulge in drinking are liable to indulge to too great an extent. We have had unseemly scenes, resulting, in some cases, I fear, from indulgence in the liquors served at that bar. This sitting injures the health of members but it has not done so, I am glad to believe, to so great an extent as was to be feared. The reason that might be assigned for this long sitting was the desire to make progress with the business. If that was the case, it has proved a failure. The business of the committee would have been much further advanced if we had sat in reasonable hours. The person responsible for this course, if he is not a member of this House, is a monumental tactical donkey, and if he is a member of this House he would be the same, if it were parliamentary to call him so. It is the work of a tactical ass to have the House held in session from Monday afternoon until Saturday. If this was the work of the leader of the House, I can only say that he is an imperious, dictatorial bungler, in having attempted to drive the House of Commons in this way with a slave whip. He is unfit to lead the House if he has not more sense than that. If he does not understand better what is due to the House and does not understand better the temper of the House, he is unfit to sit on the Government benches. Now, in my opinion, the reasons that have been urged from time to time for the committee rising and reporting progress have hardly been given the proper attention by the Minister of Justice. There is one of them to which I have called attention before, but which I would refer to particularly again. I wish to remind him and to remind the Government that we have taken no steps to ascertain the wishes of the Manitoba minority. We are not in a position to know whether the offer made by the Manitoba commissioners would be accepted by the minority or not. We have a right to know that before we proceed with this Bill. We have the assertion made in the reply of the Manitoba commissioners that the minority do not ask for the change proposed under this Bill. The following is the assertion to which I refer :—

> At present in every city, town and village in the province outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, the Roman Catholic children attend the public schools. Not a word of complaint is heard. Absolute contentment and satisfaction prevails. The children have the advantage of efficient instruction, and numbers of them are qualifying themselves to become teachers in the public schools. We do not hesitate to say that not only is there no desire to separate, but if left to themselves, the Roman Catholic people in the cities, towns and villages outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface would not consent to a change in the direction indicated.

Is that statement true ?

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if that statement has ever been contradicted ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not aware that it has ever been contradicted. This statement is made by two responsible members of the Manitoba government, and it could come from no higher source. I hold that it is an outrageous thing for the House of Commons to proceed with the consideration of this Bill, or to attempt to formulate a measure with reference to this matter with that statement staring us in the face. I assert that it is our duty to pause and take the steps necessary to ascertain definitely what the desires of the Manitoba minority are. We know that the pressure for this Bill has not come from them, but from another province. I called attention a day or two ago to the written communication made by a representative Roman Catholic of Manitoba to the Privy Council when this appeal was before them. I am told by my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) that this gentleman, Mr. O'Donohue, is a cattle buyer, and consequently does not know anything about public schools. Whatever may be his occupation, his statement before the Privy Council, prepared by himself, is an able document, and shows that he is capable of forming an opinion on public questions. I read a portion of that statement on a former occasion. I intend now to read the remainder of it. (The hon. gentleman read the document referred to.) Now, I adduce this evidence, not as conclusive as to the opinion of the minority, but as conclusive in favour of the point that we ought to pause before settling this matter finally, and ascertain more definitely than we now know what the condition of affairs is and what the opinion of the minority is. If the minority are satisfied with the existing condition of affairs, certainly we have no business to proceed with this Bill. We should drop this law and let the people pronounce upon it, leaving it to the incoming Parliament to deal with it. Everything in connection with this matter convinces me that the Government are not actuated by a desire to do justice to the minority, but that they are acting from political motives. When this case was before the Privy Council, Mr. McCarthy was called upon to represent the Manitoba government, and asked for delay as the Manitoba government had not been given time to prepare their case. The Manitoba legislature was then in session, and was to prorogue in a few days. In the absence of Mr. Greenway through illness, Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General, was leading the House and an adjournment of the Privy Council was desired long enough to allow him to finish his duties in the legislature and to prepare his case before coming to Ottawa. That reasonable request was denied. The Government has held the House during the whole of this week, but it must be remembered that more obstruction has been done by their friends than by the Opposition, for, when three o'clock arrives in the afternoon, supporters of the Government rise and address the House at great length, and thus prevent the consideration of the Bill during proper hours. I desire to point out that the trial at London before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was one at which Manitoba was practically unrepresented. The minority were represented by two able counsel, thoroughly posted in the facts, Hon. Edward Blake and Mr. Ewart ; while the Manitoba government were represented by English counsel, who were employed hurriedly, and who were not posted in the circumstances or the facts of the case. But this question was also tried before the Supreme Court of Canada, when the judgment was given in the first place in favour of the minority, but subsequently in favour of the province, and our Supreme Court judges are thoroughly familiar with Canadian law, our institutions and constitution. The decision of that court should have much more weight attached to it than the decision of the Judicial Committee, especially when the case of Manitoba was really not presented. (The hon. gentleman then read extracts from the judgment of the President of the Judicial Committee.) The Remedial Bill, founded on the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, is full of incongruities, contradictions and tyrannical positions, one notable instance being section 10. The circumstances connected with the progress of this measure are distasteful to the Government. At the eleventh hour they sent a commission to Manitoba. Those commissioners made certain propositions. These were rejected by the provincial government, and reasons assigned. Manitoba made counter-propositions, of a more liberal character than those now enjoyed by the Roman Catholics of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and the North-west Territory. Further, the Government are seeking to enforce a law on Manitoba which will not be any remedy, and which they have no ground for believing will be accepted by the minority.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to spend any long time in reviewing the present Bill. I will, however, say this, that we are probably likely to distinguish this Parliament as having completely broken the record in regard to foolish obstinacy on the part of the Government of the day. I am afraid that we will also completely break the record as to the extent to which these proceedings, to which the Government have contributed, will degrade Parliament as a governing body. I doubt if any more stupid absurdity has been perpetrated than that to which the Government have been parties during the past six days. Here they are professing to be actuated by a desire to advance this Bill. What they have done practically is this, and it has been pointed out by no one more effectively than by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon): They have rendered it necessary to the proper discussion of the Bill that any point of importance which really requires serious discussion must be repeated three different times at different periods of the same day, in order that it may be physically possible that members of Parliament should know what has been said. In other words, any attempt to keep the committee in session twenty-four hours means to involve the delay of three times repeating the same statements. This has now become exceedingly apparent to every one. I put a case in point. I was compelled to be absent last night during part of the discussion, at which an exceedingly important question was taken up. If this discussion goes on long enough, I shall see that statements are repeated, and that I have an opportunity of replying to statements made, and every hon. gentleman will be absolutely in his rights in doing so. So, practically, what the Government are doing by holding twenty-four hours sessions is to unnecessarily treble the length of the discussion. There is another matter to which I wish to call attention. There are, at the outside, ten parliamentary days in which to deal with public business; I say ten, because one or two necessarily must be taken up in the Senate with the usual formalities. Although the Supplementary Estimates have not been formally placed in our hands, yet they have been brought down, and have been made public in the press, although afterwards withdrawn from circulation among members. Those Estimates show several large items which involve quite new departures on matters of important public business, which will meet considerable discussion. As to the ordinary Estimates, it is utterly idle for the hon. gentleman, the Finance Minister, to suppose he will get them. Over and above the infringement of our rights, there is another way in which, I am sorry to say, Parliament has been degraded, and of which this session is affording ample truth; I refer to the practice of purchasing members of the House, which has evidently been going on more or less. We had a very bad instance last session, and the session before that, and the session before that, of the way in which appointments to offices of public importance had been used to secure the votes of members, who have retained their seats in this House, and voted and spoken on questions, while they were, to all intents and purposes, violating the Independence of Parliament Act in the spirit, and, I might almost say, the letter. We had one very bad case, when the office of collector of customs at Montreal was deliberately kept vacant for three years, although it is well known that the late hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was practically the nominee to that office. That is a very bad case; but, black as it was, it was white or gray compared with the case of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson). That is a case to which it is absolutely necessary without further delay to call the attention of the House. It was perfectly well known by public rumour and statement in the newspapers that the office of county court judge for the county of Huron had been kept vacant for a year to afford a berth for the member for North Grey, Mr. Masson. This is a very notorious case, and I repeat that, whatever the qualifications of that hon. gentleman may be, he neither consulted his own honour or the honour of Parliament by sitting here and voting when he knew he would never face his constituents again, and when, to all intents and purposes, he was an officer, in expectation, of the Government, and incapable of discharging his duties to his constituents in a fair and honourable manner. But I find the case to be even considerably worse than that. I had not in my hand at the moment the paper last night, when the subject was brought up, and at that time the Secretary of State referred me to the Minister of Justice, and so I desire to call his attention to the facts. The "Globe," in an article on Friday, yesterday, states:

> There is a phase of Mr. Masson's appointment as judge of the county of Huron as a reward for his vote on the Remedial Bill which is not probably generally understood. By the County Courts Bill, passed at the recent session of the legislature, it is provided that there shall not be two judges for a county having a population of 80,000 or less. This clause was inserted in the Bill on Thursday of last week, and the Bill was read a third time on the same day, when the House finished its business and rose. The next day being Good Friday, the Lieutenant-Governor did not come down to sanction the Bills, but that ceremony was deferred until the following Tuesday. In the meantime telegraphic information was no doubt conveyed to the Government and Mr. Masson at Ottawa of this new provision. Mr. Masson was snatched from his duties as a watcher over the coercion Bill, his commission was issued on Monday, he made haste to reach Toronto on Tuesday, and was sworn in on the forenoon of that day, before the Lieutenant-Governor gave his assent to the Bill in the afternoon. It was a lively scramble and a narrow escape. We can with difficulty conceive a more striking illustration of the keenness of the traffic carried on at Ottawa than this appointment presents.

Mr. DICKEY. Can the hon. gentleman tell me the nature of that Bill?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know no more about it than is contained in the statement of the hon. member for North Simcoe, from which it appears that it was a Bill declaring that after the Bill became law two county court judges should not be appointed in any county having less than 80,000 population.

Mr. EDGAR. And, in addition to that, it was provided that no surrogate fees should be paid to any county judge; therefore a large portion of the emoluments of county judges appointed after the passing of the Act would be taken away.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a particularly atrocious job. In the first place, it is a piece of practical bribery of members of Parliament, and that of the very worst sort. It is as clear as daylight that the late hon. member for North Grey had a pledge and promise of that office, and he sat in this House with that promise in his pocket. How it was made, I do not pretend to say, but the facts must prove to every human being that he considered that he had a patent right to the position. The Independence of Parliament Act has been completely violated in the spirit, if not in the letter. And I point out further that all this is being done in defiance of the Ontario legislature. Under our constitution the provincial legislatures are the only authorities to decide how many county judges—and I believe I am correct in saying, how many superior court judges—are required for the administration of justice in the province. And here we find a Federal Government deliberately and defiantly disregarding the decision of the Ontario legislature, which had decided, unanimously, I believe, that one county court judge was all that was necessary in every county of not more than 80,000 population. If this is correct, I would like to ask this House in what respect this differs from giving Mr. Masson a vote of $30,000 in a lump sum. We present him with an annuity of $2,600 practically for doing nothing. He is a gentleman of forty-nine years of age, and I hope, for his sake, that he will continue to flourish, though I would rather not see him flourish as a county court judge. In all human probability he will draw his annuity at our expense for thirty years, perhaps more, if he belongs to a reasonably long-lived stock. If I go into the market and purchase an annuity of $2,600 a year for a man of that age, it will cost a little more than $30,000.

Mr. EDGAR. Then, there are the surrogate fees.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The surrogate fees I know nothing about. But the Government have done to Mr. Masson precisely what they would have done if they had given him a vote of $30,000 for his services for the last few years in supporting the Government. That would have been a bad precedent, but it would not have done half as much injury to the public as they have actually done. I would strongly recommend them to abandon this practice of appointing men to office in this manner and, instead, to add to the Supplementary Estimates a column to reward their friends in proper fashion.

Mr. BELLEY. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend here (Mr. Belley) is willing to support that. At least, it has the advantage of being comparatively honest, if "honest" may be used in this connection at all. In thirty years Mr. Masson will draw some $80,000 from the public chest, and, if I add interest, after the fashion of my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the gross amount Mr. Masson will receive in thirty years will amount to $160,000. That may be a useful thing in fixing the tariff for similar services rendered to hon. gentlemen opposite. Now that I have been specially referred to by the Minister of Justice, I wish to demand what he has to say on the subject. Does he, in the teeth of the legislature of Ontario, pretend to say that an extra county court judge is required in the county of Huron? If he is not prepared to say that in defiance of the legislature and in defiance of the Attorney General and his cabinet, I want to know how he justifies such an act as this? The explanation is easy, but justification is quite another thing. The only possible explanation is that the promise had been given to Mr. Masson, and it had to be redeemed. But such an explanation will not in the slightest degree justify the action of the Government, which I impeach on the three grounds I have given, but most particularly because it is the most outrageous defiance that can be imagined of the prerogative of the Ontario parliament to decide how many judges are wanted for the proper administration of justice in that province.

Mr. DICKEY. So far as I know, the hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying that an Act was passed at the last session of the Ontario legislature dealing with the number of judges in the county of Huron. I am not aware what legislation was enacted at the last session of the legislature upon the subject of county court judges. But I have heard what the hon. member for West Ontario said, that there was a law passed affecting the fees to be received by the judge as surrogate. The hon. gentleman has said a great deal that I think had better been left unsaid. He said that Mr. Masson did not consult his own honour in accepting that judgeship. Mr. Masson was, of course, a politician supporting the Government warmly. There is no disguise to the fact that appointments to office are made by every party, other things being equal, from the ranks of their own political supporters. Now, that should not be the case so much with regard to judges, perhaps, as with regard to other appointments, and I do not know that it is. The hon. gentleman has suggested that this amounts to a purchase of Mr. Masson's vote for the second reading of the Remedial Bill. I give that, so far as I am concerned, and so far as my knowledge goes, the most emphatic denial possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not say the purchase of his support for this particular Bill.

An hon. MEMBER. But generally.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not see how that mends the matter very much.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not anxious to mend it.

Mr. DICKEY. No doubt; and I do not think that anything I could say would induce the hon. gentleman to do so. So far as I know, no promise whatever was made to Mr. Masson in connection with this judgeship.

Mr. EDGAR. Was the hon. gentleman aware of any application by him or on his behalf ?

Mr. DICKEY. There was none, so far as I know. Reflections have been made before now in this committee with regard to Mr. Masson's position upon this Bill. But all Mr. Masson's friends know that he has always taken the view which the vast majority of lawyers in this House have taken—that the minority in Manitoba had constitutional rights, which it was the duty of this Parliament to restore, if necessary. Hon. gentlemen know that—aside from the expediency of acting now, and aside from the merits of this Bill—the body of legal opinion in this House is in favour of that position. Mr. Masson made no secret of his opinions. Last session he made one of the strongest speeches that was delivered along that line. Therefore, while it is perfectly open for any hon. gentleman to say that his course was influenced by the prospect of this judgeship, if any think it desirable to do so, I say that there is nothing in Mr. Masson's course that is not consistent and above-board, irrespective of any ulterior motive. I recommended Mr. Masson for this judgeship, because I thought he was competent to fill such an office. He has always taken a prominent part in the legal discussions in this House, and in private consultations with him I have always found him show the qualifications of a good practitioner, thoroughly versed in the practice of the courts. He is a man of eminent respectability in every way. I think none on either side of the House will dispute his qualifications for the office. As to the appointment flying in the face of the legislature of Ontario, I am not able to answer at the moment, because I do not know the Act to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I refer to the Act passed on Thursday week.

Mr. DICKEY. I am not aware what that was, and therefore cannot express an opinion about it; and, not knowing it, I can hardly be said to be flying in the face of it. This position has been vacant for some time, and, in the judgment of the officers of the department and myself, it was desirable that it should be filled, and that the emoluments should be sufficient to enable the judge decently to maintain his position. I make no secret of my opinion—but I know that the majority of this committee do not agree with me—that the judges of this country generally are quite insufficiently paid. I would be glad if an Act were passed, increasing the salaries of judges all along the line, for the sake of the efficiency of the bench. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, personally, I would willingly have appointed Mr. Masson to office at a time when the emoluments would be sufficient to enable him to live properly and be independent of outside consideration, as a judge should be. Therefore, I believe that the public service will not suffer by Mr. Masson's appointment. While it is open for the hon. gentleman to say that his action in this and other matters has been affected by the hope of that appointment, I say that, from Mr. Masson's record as a party man, and from his record on this question. there is not the slightest foundation for any assertion of that kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not state why he saw fit to recommend Mr. Masson on Monday, 6th April. Why did he select that date ?

Mr. DICKEY. I said I should be glad, indeed, to appoint Mr. Masson on Monday, if it would make his salary a thousand dollars more than it would be if he was appointed on Tuesday, because I think the judges are insufficiently paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman heard the member for North Simcoe, who is an authority on matters of law in Ontario, make precisely the same statement that I made last night, and I have given him the editorial in the "Globe" of yesterday. The "Globe" reporters were present, no doubt, during the whole session of the Ontario legislature, and they state explicitly that that legislature passed an Act declaring that one judge is enough for 80,000 inhabitants or less. Now, I ask him to explain why, if the Ontario legislature thought 80,000 people could be served by one judge, the Government should appoint two ?

Mr. DICKEY. All I can tell the hon. gentleman is that, after the statement made by the hon. member for Simcoe, I inquired of my deputy, Mr. Newcombe, if there was any foundation for that statement. He made inquiries that he thought were sufficient, I suppose ; at any rate, he informed me that he could find no foundation for the statement. The only thing he knew was what the hon. member for Ontario has said, that there was a question with reference to the fees as a surrogate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Supposing the case to be as the member for North Simcoe stated, and as I stated, it appears to me that under those circumstances the Government have been deliberately defying the legislature of Ontario. Has the hon. gentleman no opinion to express on that point ?

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman cannot expect me to take any blame for that, supposing it should turn out that there was such legislation, which I beg leave to doubt, unless I get better information. I never knew about it, I do not know about it at the present time. I might express an opinion on the abstract question of the desirability of appointing a judge under a case like that, but I would not take any blame to myself in this case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the hon. gentleman, in his capacity of Minister of Justice, consults with the Ontario legislature as to how many judges there should be.

Mr. DICKEY. The number is fixed by statute. There was an Act passed by the Ontario legislature, last year, that in counties where there were less than 80,000 inhabitants, no junior judges should be appointed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On the ground that one judge was enough. Is the hon. gentleman's defence, as I understand it, that he has appointed Mr. Masson a senior judge, in addition to the junior judge, and that because he is appointed a senior judge, therefore he does not violate the Ontario Act ? Is that the defence ?

Mr. DICKEY. Not necessarily.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think the Minister of Justice has been quite as candid in his explanation as I expected he would be. He admits that Mr. Masson was appointed to the judgeship on his recommendation as Minister of Justice, yet he does not know, he could not tell, if Mr. Masson ever applied for it. He is absolutely ignorant of it.

Mr. DICKEY. He certainly never applied to me.

Mr. EDGAR. He says he had only the general information that everybody else had, he never applied to him. Well, it turns out that the general information which everybody had was absolutely correct, because it was on that same general information, apparently, that he was appointed by the Minister of Justice, without any application or expectation on the part of Mr. Masson. Are we to suppose that it dropped from the clouds, like manna, for Mr. Masson ? Here was a vacancy of twelve months. Was it urgent to fill it ? The Minister of Justice says he understands it was considered important in his office to fill that vacancy. Why did not the Minister of Justice, when he came into the office, within a reasonable time, fill the vacancy, if he considered it was important to do so ? Why this indecent haste ? Why this sudden recommendation, and sending Mr. Masson up to be sworn in on that particular date ? Why, Sir, it is because he had earned his reward, and he demanded his pound of flesh. If he had not made a bargain with the Minister of Justice —and the Minister of Justice denied it, and I believe him, of course ; I do not think he would personally make such a bargain. But the facts prove, and any jury on their oath would find, that there has been a bargain, from the circumstances, from the action, and from the results. And what was the consequence, apart from its effect on this House ? What was the effect upon the independence of Parliament ? It was practically to disallow and to repeal a statute of the Ontario legislature, relating either to the appointment of the judge, or to the surrogate fees he was to receive. The practical repeal of that Act by this Parliament is a gross breach of propriety. It was technically right, of course, to hurry through an appointment under such suspicious circumstances, and allowing Mr.

Masson to be sworn in one hour before the assent to the Ontario Act was given, technically repealing and disallowing that Act so far as the county of Huron was concerned. But was it straightforward ? Was it manly ? Was it within the spirit of the constitution that that sort of thing would be done, that high-handed interference with the legislature ? Why, here was the member for Grey, who, we know, was not going to run in his county again, who, as we know, is out of sympathy with his constituents, and the Conservative candidate running in his county to-day is unfavourable to remedial legislation. We know that Mr. Masson had abandoned all hope of public life, and he rushes forward and seizes this judgeship at a critical time. I know it must have been a hard wrench for the Government to pay their debt at this particular time, when the attention of the whole country is upon the votes of hon. gentlemen opposite. It must have been a very hard bargain that forced them to give the pound of flesh to the member for Grey, when he demanded it. Everybody knows that the whole country will have but one opinion, that not only is the independence of Parliament attacked, but the honour and dignity of the Canadian bench is prostituted by this appointment for political purposes. That is what it amounts to, that is what the people will think about it. I am sorry indeed that the Minister of Justice, who I thought was a little above his colleagues in these things, would have lent himself to be a party to an action of this kind. He might have said : I will sign this, and won't ask any questions about it ; but the public won't free him from responsibility. There is a blot forever upon his position as Minister of Justice, from having made that recommendation under those circumstances.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) really feels so intensely what he says, or that he is so perturbed over this appointment. If so, I want to ask him what he considers of the appointments to much higher judicial positions made by the Government which he was glad to serve between 1874 and 1878. What were the reasons that induced that Government to take Mr. E. B. Wood out of this chamber, after he had steadily supported the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, and make him Chief Justice for the province of Manitoba ? What inducements were there for the appointment of Mr. Dorion, a member of that Government, to the position of Chief Justice of the province of Quebec ? What inducement operated to translate from this chamber Mr. Fournier and make him a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada ? What induced them to appoint Mr. Thomas Moss Chief Justice of Ontario ? If they cannot understand any other motive than the base one which they allege has induced this Government to appoint a former supporter to a county judgeship, then we can understand some reasons for the appointments to which I refer. That reminds me that the Liberal Government of 1874-78 came into existence by trafficking in Cabinet positions. They stole from their opponents three or four members of this House. They took Mr. Ross from the Conservative ranks, and, when he appeared in the Liberal ranks, he was a full-fledged Minister of the Liberal Cabinet. They dealt with Mr. Coffin in the same way. They got Mr. Cauchon as a colleague in the same way ; and, forsooth, we are to listen to these gentlemen delivering us a lecture on the proprieties of appointing members of this chamber to high offices in this country. Then, they took Mr. Bodwell, a member of the Reform party, out of this House, and appointed him superintendent of the Welland Canal. They appointed Mr. Ross collector of customs at Halifax ; they appointed Mr. McDonald Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario ; they took from this chamber Mr. Tremaine, and made him a county court judge in Nova Scotia ; they appointed Mr. David Laird Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west ; they appointed the present Auditor General, after he had done good service in the Reform ranks in this House for, I think, four years. They appointed Mr. Sturton postmaster of Guelph; they appointed Mr. Horton first-class clerk in the Auditor-General's Office ; they appointed Mr. Charles Lajoie superintendent of the St. Maurice Works ; they appointed Mr. H. J. Taschereau judge for Kamouraska; they appointed L. A. Boyle inspector of Harbours, Montreal ; they appointed Mr. Chandler Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick; they appointed Mr. E. Richard sheriff of the North-west Territories. I do not say these were corrupt appointments ; I do not say there was a bargain made with any of these men, except the first three (Ross, Coffin and Cauchon) I have mentioned, when those gentlemen were appointed Ministers under suspicious circumstances. But the rest of them, no doubt, earned these legitimate rewards in various lines of public service. But, if we are to believe hon. gentlemen to be sincere to-day, if we are to go with them the full length, we would not be permitted to credit them with the purest motives in making these appointments. According to the hon. member for South Oxford, the very fact of appointing Mr. Masson to this position seemed to him to afford evidence of corruption, bribery of members, a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. Well, if the hon. gentleman will plead guilty in the several cases I have mentioned, perhaps I would not be able to make out so strong a case as I have done in behalf of the Government. But the hon. member had to assume that there has been a pledge and a promise of the office of judge of the county court to Mr. Masson. But not a scintilla of evidence was produced to prove that grave charge, and, instead of the appointment being atrocious, I say that it is atrocious to fling so positive a charge on such flimsy evidence across this House. It is not fair to Mr. Masson, it is not fair to this House, to make such a charge without any evidence to support it. Now, the Minister of Justice knows nothing of that bargain; he has so stated. I was Minister of Justice for a comparatively long period, perhaps the balance of the period during which this vacancy occurred. A vacancy of ten or eleven months is not an extraordinary thing in the case of a judgeship. I have had occasion to look into the records of the length of time in which vacancies have been permitted to exist in the different courts of Canada from time to time; and I find that under both Administrations the time varies; in one case it was as long as ten months; in other cases, five, six or seven months. Now, I can state that, so far as I am concerned, I never heard of any understanding with Judge Masson. I do not think I ever discussed with him, or he with me, the vacancy in my time. I may have done so, but whether I did or not, as to his being either an applicant or desiring the position, the matter was never discussed between us. I have not now the slightest evidence of any understanding, direct or indirect, with him or with his friends, or with my late Ontario colleague in the Cabinet, that would have prevented me making the appointment. On the contrary, if hon. gentlemen want to corroborate the statement I am making, I did hear rumours that there was a desire in the county that the present member for Huron should be appointed. Friends of his had mentioned his name, and that rumour came to me. I know nothing in connection with an arrangement with Mr. Masson, or any one else, that would have prevented my recommending that gentleman's name to His Excellency. So far as a pledge is concerned, you have the statement of the present Minister of Justice, and you have my own; therefore, I think this bargain for a pound of flesh, as the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) calls it, is wholly imaginary. So far as I can see, there has been no violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. Now, if the hon. member for South Oxford feels this matter at all keenly, I ask him, was it not necessary for him to take the trouble to obtain definite information in regard to the subject which is now not well understood on either side of the House? Neither myself nor the Minister of Justice had seen any copy of this legislation, and no one here seems to be familiar with the exact terms of it. This Act, said to have been passed in the last session of the Ontario legislature, is not in the possession of the member for South Oxford; he is not familiar with it. He may be led to that conclusion by hearing some hon. gentleman refer to the provisions of the Bill as preventing the appointment of a second judge where the population of a county, or of two adjoining counties, is not over 80,000. But some gentlemen who refer me to that Act, which was passed last year, were not evidently familiar with it, because it constitutes no bar to the appointment of Judge Masson. One may read out of that Act a principle that was involved, and claim that it prevented the appointment of a junior judge in the county, with this population. But, when we consider that the Act came from Sir Oliver Mowat, it is hardly fair to him to suppose that it meant anything else than what it says; and, if Sir Oliver Mowat wished to prevent the appointment of a senior judge, as well as a junior, he could very easily have expressed that intention afterwards in his legislation. He did not do so, and I do not think the argument is sound, that we are to assume that he meant anything more than we can find in the Act. It seems to be generally conceded that the last Bill had become an Act at the time of the appointment of Judge Masson.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am somewhat surprised at the speech made by the hon. gentleman and his references to a large number of appointments which he says were made by the Mackenzie Administration, and his argument that because they were made, therefore this is a proper appointment. The hon. gentleman ignores the real point in this case. If we look at the English practice we find many men who are members of Parliament taken from time to time and appointed to important and responsible positions in the public service. I have never regarded that as an improper practice; on the contrary, I think it is a practice that is eminently proper. In England we find, that usually the chief justices of the various law courts were taken from members who had served in Parliament as law officers of the Crown. In fact it was regarded as the right of law officers of the Crown, when the courts were differently constituted, to accept the position of Chief Justice of Common Pleas, or Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer, when those positions became vacant. The Government have taken members from the bar, either friends or opponents, and have placed them in judicial offices. I know very well that Sir Montague Smith, a member of the Conservative party, was by Lord Palmerston appointed a Justice of the Common Pleas, and was afterwards promoted; Sir John Karslake, a member of Lord Derby's administration, and afterwards of the Disraeli administration, was appointed by the government of Mr. Gladstone to the Court of Appeals, and we find Sir Colin Blackburne, and Sir Henry Keating, both Conservatives, were appointed by the government of Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone to seats on the bench. In all those cases the appointments were made when vacancies occurred. No one could have foreseen there was a vacancy.

Those gentlemen were engaged in discharging their duties as members of the House of Commons, but they were not kept there twelve months discharging their duties as members so as, at a later period, to accept vacancies on the bench to which they might look forward. That is the point, and the hon. gentleman will find in every case he has cited the essential element is wanting. Take the case which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, the appointment of Mr. Fournier to the Supreme Court Bench. The court was not before that time constituted—he was appointed immediately before the constitution of the court. Take the case of Mr. Moss, who was appointed Chief Justice of Ontario on the death of Chief Justice Draper. Mr. Moss was a very eminent lawyer in Ontario.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He was a man who naturally could look forward to that position.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman profess that because a man possessed ability to fill the appointment of judge, the place should be reserved for him ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am with the hon. gentleman. I do not attack the appointment of Mr. Moss. I say he had a right to look forward to obtaining that position, as Mr. Masson had a right to look forward to obtaining the position in question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the case of the appointment of the Auditor General, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) carried a Bill through creating an audit office and Mr. McDougall was appointed. He was not kept in this House supporting the Government for years before the appointment was made. No, there is no analogy between the cases cited by the hon. gentleman and the case with which the hon. gentleman has undertaken to deal. The hon. member for Pictou has said—and the Minister of Justice made the same statement—that it is provided in the Act of 1895 that where a county does not possess 80,000 population, a junior judge should not be appointed. In what sense is the phrase junior judge used there ? It is in the sense of a second judge. The county of Huron has not a population of 80,000, but because the senior judge died twelve months ago or more, the hon. gentleman says that does not preclude the appointment of a senior judge, and therefore the appointment is within the strict letter of the statute. What is the position of the matter ? You appoint a second judge to conduct work that the senior judge is incapable of overtaking. It is assumed that the junior is competent to discharge the duties, as is the senior judge, and if the office of the senior judge becomes vacant, the statute provides that there shall not be a second judge ; and the contention of hon. gentlemen can only be supported by the assertion that the junior judge is incompetent to discharge the duties of the office. Is the Minister of Justice prepared to say that the junior judge of the county of Huron who was appointed by a previous Conservative Government is unfit to discharge the duties ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That affords an additional ground for a construction of the Ontario Act differing from that which the hon. member for Bothwell first placed on it, that Sir Oliver Mowat had in his mind that some junior judges would not be fit to occupy the position of senior judges, and therefore he had either to promote the junior to the position of senior, and leave one judge only, or where a junior was not fit to discharge the duties of senior, a new man must be appointed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I remember very well that certain judges asked that junior judges be appointed, to assist them. This whole question was considered by Mr. Blake, and when the work of the county courts was investigated he came to the conclusion that only in the counties of York, Middlesex and Wentworth was a second judge required. But when the Mackenzie Government went out, and a Conservative Government came into power, the Government appointed a large number of junior judges, because no statute existed inhibiting them. What has been the result ? That a large number of persons who could not regain their professional income have been cast on the public treasury by being appointed junior judges. The object and intention of the Act of 1895 have therefore failed to be accomplished. The Minister of Justice made the extraordinary statement that the county court judges receive only $2,600 a year and that this was not sufficient. He held that it was justifiable to enable the new judges to secure the surrogate fees. If, however, the salary is inadequate, he is responsible, and it is his duty to come before Parliament and propose an increase. I have here a copy of the Act passed the other day by the legislature of Ontario with respect to the surrogate fees, in which it is provided that the change shall not affect any judge who is now judge of a Surrogate Court. The appointment of the county court judge of Huron was made on Monday. On Tuesday Mr. Masson appeared before the assistant provincial secretary and took his oath of office. The hon. gentleman had not time to go to his own county, and that was the only way in which he could be sworn in. What made him a judge ? Was it the Act of being sworn in, or the patent of his appointment ? Unquestionably the patent of his appointment, and his functions as a judge began at the moment he received it. Yet that gentleman was under the impression that if he was not sworn in before the Surrogate Act was passed, notwithstanding the fact that he had his patent in his pocket, he would be deprived of the emoluments of a Surrogate Court Judge. He succeeded in getting sworn in two hours before the Lieutenant-Governor gave his consent to the Bill. That is a rather singular commentary on the legal attainments of the gentleman who was appointed over the head of the second judge who has been acting for some time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He wanted to make assurance doubly sure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was rather singular that this newly appointed judge should not be aware that it was his patent that gave him the office.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How long was he ahead of time ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Two hours.

Mr. DICKEY. He was a prompt judge, at all events.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where his own interest was concerned. It must be remembered that the local legislature, which alone has a right to say whether two county judges are required or not, has prescribed that two judges are required only in counties where the population exceeds 80,000. So I have shown that a double offence has been committed, and the Minister of Justice has defended in both cases that which was in neither case defensible.

Mr. TISDALE. I deprecate strongly these attacks made on the appointment of hon. members to positions of importance. I do not think it is fair to the gentleman appointed or to hon. members of this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have made no attack, but I have pointed out that in this case there has been a departure from the spirit and principles of law which governs appointments of hon. members of this House to office.

Mr. TISDALE. There must be something wrong when the hon. gentleman has made an attack, although I admit he has spoken more moderately than other hon. gentlemen who have referred to this matter. He does not, like the other hon. gentlemen, impute motives. I regret that such statements should be made on either side of the House. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) confines himself to the fact that the position was kept open for some time. He qualifies the statement by saying that he does not impute anything to Mr. Masson. But if all he charged is that the position was kept open for ten months and then given to a gentleman who had been a member of the House all that time, it is a much less serious thing. I suppose he wishes that to be fully understood, because it relieves Mr. Masson from the charge of doing anything wrong or corrupt. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that we cannot construe the Act of 1895 to mean anything but that there shall not be two judges in any county having 80,000 people or less. As pointed out by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Tupper) he discredits the legal attainments of Sir Oliver Mowat by so saying. I say it to his credit, though a political opponent, that I admire Sir Oliver Mowat as a lawyer and because of the clearness of the Acts drawn under his direction. It was easy to make it clear that he meant to have only one county judge in a county if that was really what he meant. But what was the position when the Act was passed ? Certain large counties in Ontario had a senior and a junior judge each. I think it is clear from that Act that Sir Oliver Mowat meant that there should not be an extension of the system of junior judges in the lesser counties. Take the county of Huron. That is one of the largest counties. It sends three members to this House. No man will say that it is not fair and proper that there should be two judges. Sir Oliver Mowat cast the responsibility upon this Parliament to either appoint a senior judge, leaving the junior, or to promote the junior judge, leaving the responsibility with this Parliament to say whether there should be one or two. I am surprised that my hon. friend from Bothwell should endeavour to distort the meaning of that Act. I agree with the Minister of Justice that the judges of this country as a rule are underpaid. A few years ago there was an agitation amongst the county judges of Ontario, a number of whom were appointed by gentlemen opposite, many of them being known to me, and all excellent men. They could hardly keep up their position on the salaries they were receiving. And I believe that the bar generally felt that there should be an increase. I am surprised and grieved, as one belonging to the legal profession, that an Act reducing the emoluments of the judges should have been passed in the Ontario legislature. I know the members of the Ontario government, most of them lawyers and all honourable men—politicians, it is true. I do not understand why they should take these emoluments from the county court judges, particularly in view of the difficult positions the judges have to fill in connection with the local lists and frequently in connection with the Dominion lists. I am grieved and surprised, I say, that the Mowat government has given the judges this slap in the face by cutting off about one-third, or at least one-quarter of the salaries. What will be the effect ? There will be a place for some man poorly paid to fill the position of surrogate judge, but it will be at the expense of the county court judges. I am sure that the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) and the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) will agree with me that the county judges were not overpaid before. But I am sure that both sides of the committee will agree that the real question before the committee is : Was Mr. Masson honestly appointed for his merits and is he fit to fill the position ? I regret the remarks made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. It is my pleasure to have known James Masson for twenty years, and my county is in such close communication with the counties on the Georgian Bay that I know the feeling of the people there. No man will contradict me when I say that no lawyer stands higher in the district as a good practitioner and as an honest, straightforward man than James Masson, and not one man, be he Conservative or Reformer, but will feel that it is an outrage upon him that he is charged with truckling with his conscience upon any question.

Mr. STUBBS. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question ?

Mr. TISDALE. Certainly.

Mr. STUBBS. You claim that Mr. Masson was appointed on his merits as a man and as a lawyer. If he had voted according to the voice of his constituency and against the Government on this Bill, do you mean to tell me he would have got that appointment ?

Mr. TISDALE. I believe he would have been given the appointment just as quickly, one way as the other. Does the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs) stand up in this House and say—dare he stand up in this House and say—that James Masson is not an honest man in the vote he gave on this Bill ?

Mr. STUBBS. I believe he did not vote with the voice of his constituents.

Mr. TISDALE. Be a man. Either say it or take it back. Do not insinuate that a man—is it parliamentary to say cowardly ?—do not be so cowardly as to insinuate what you dare not say. I respect a man who will make a strong charge, for he will as readily withdraw it if he finds he has been mistaken.

Mr. STUBBS. I think I asked a reasonable question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman asked a foolish question, because he knew I could not tell. I had nothing to say about the appointment. I never knew that Mr. Masson was an aspirant to the office until I saw that he had been appointed. I am not in the councils of my leaders in such matters. In regard to this question of Mr. Masson being bought—I like to use plain words, because people then understand the gravity of the charge—I want to tell the hon. members of this House one thing. We hear it said that Mr. Masson dare not seek re-election. Does the hon. member for Cardwell know that after Mr. Masson's speech in favour of remedial legislation last year there was a convention in his riding and that he was offered the nomination, and that he declined it, after taking time to consider it, and that then the convention was held at which Mr. McLaughlin was nominated ? The hon. gentleman should have made himself acquainted with the facts. Mr. Chairman, I may have spoken warmly, but I feel warmly. A man who does not feel indignant when he hears an honest man and a friend of his traduced is unworthy of the name of friend. And what is the object of these charges ? To gain, if possible, a petty political advantage. Unless we can get our politics upon a higher plane than this, the people will get a poorer idea of this Parliament and its members than they ought to have, in justice to us and in the interest of the country. Let me illustrate how easily a man might be condemned if the methods of reasoning followed here were sufficient to condemn him. I am not insinuating anything against the hon. member from North Ontario (Mr. Edgar) who made a very warm speech on this subject. Does he remember a man named Wheler ? I find that my hon. friend was first elected to his present seat on the 22nd August, 1884—elected by acclamation. Who was Mr. Wheler ? He was a member of this House. He resigned and went up to Ontario where he was appointed to a position in the central prison, and the hon. member was returned in an election that would not have been held but for the resignation of Mr. Wheler.

Mr. EDGAR. Did not I face the people? Did Sir Oliver Mowat elect me ? Did Mr. Wheler elect me ?

Mr. TISDALE. I do not believe—I say that frankly—that there was any corrupt bargain between the hon. member and Mr. Wheler.

Mr. HUGHES. Merely an understanding.

Mr. TISDALE. No ; I do not believe there was any understanding. It was a coincidence. But as strong a one as this. But I would say more. I believe that Mr. Wheler was a fit man for the place.

Mr. BENNETT. It turned out that he was not.

Mr. TISDALE. I believe that the Government that appointed him thought he was. I believe that proper appointments in the public service of members of Parliament who have faithfully performed their duties are not injurious but beneficial to the public interest. But I say we had better be forbearing with our fellow-men, and do all we can to inspire respect in the minds of the people for this their chief representative body, rather than inspire the opposite feeling.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to set the hon. gentleman right in one thing. I understood him to say that after Mr. Masson spoke in the House last year he was chosen as the standard-bearer of his party in the county.

Mr. TISDALE. He was offered the nomination at a convention called for that purpose.

Mr. SPROULE. According to my information that is not correct. The convention was held the year before, and since that no convention was held until this spring. I am sure, from my knowledge of the riding, that had Mr. Masson submitted himself to the convention after the speech he made in this House last year, he would not have had the slightest chance in the world.

Mr. BENNETT. I would like to ask the hon. member if, at the meeting where Mr. McLaughlin was nominated, there was any resolution passed condemning Mr. Masson for his speech of last year, and asking him to change his course in this House? Does not the hon. gentleman know that Mr. Masson addressed a public meeting, as I was informed last night by Mr. McLaughlin, and did he not state in his riding what his course would be on this subject? And yet the convention did not ask Mr. Masson to change his course.

Mr. SPROULE. The convention did not pass a resolution condemning him, because it was well understood that he would not run again.

Mr. DAVIN. The point in this discussion is that raised by my hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs), who asked whether, if Mr. Masson had voted against this measure, the judgeship would have been given to him. That is not the question at all. The question concerning Mr. Masson's integrity is this: Would Mr. Masson have voted as he did vote, judgeship or no judgeship? That is the real question. Anybody who has known Mr. Masson in this House, knew him to be a stalwart Conservative, and no one can doubt that he would have voted as he did irrespective of the judgeship. The difference between doing what the hon. member for Bothwell says is quite right, and doing that which he says is not right at all, is simply the difference between a general invitation and a special invitation to dinner. It is a great crime that an office should be vacant for a certain time, and that a member of Parliament should take that office; but in case the office has not been vacant for a certain time, and the vacancy has just occurred, there is, it seems, not much of a crime in that.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) wandered over a wide range in discussing this question, and has introduced subjects entirely foreign to the discussion. I may say of Judge Masson that I have known that gentleman ever since he has been in the House. Our social relations are intimate, and I have learned to respect him, and to have a personal friendship for him. I should be sorry indeed to say anything disrespectful of him, or deprecatory of the position he now occupies. But I must say that the question put by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs) is very pertinent, and strongly points out the impropriety of the appointment at this particular time. While we are all willing to believe that there was no corrupt bargain between the late member and the Government, the action of the Government has left the country at large to draw an unfavourable inference. The facts that exist enable the people to draw the inference that there was some arrangement between Mr. Masson and the Government. What are the facts? This office became vacant a year ago. It was the duty of the Government, if it was necessary that two judges should be appointed for that county, to have filled that office at once. Nobody could have objected to the appointment of Mr. Masson, everybody on both sides of the House, I am sure, would have been pleased if the Government were determined to appoint anybody as junior judge, that Mr. Masson should have been appointed. But one session passed over, and no appointment was made. We knew last session that this school question was to be an important one, and this session the question has indeed been so. The Government were not sure that they would be able to carry their Bill by a majority of their own supporters. Every vote was of the greatest importance to the Government, and we find that in order to carry that Bill the Government thought it was necessary that an appointment should be made to that judicial position, and the hon. gentleman is appointed to the position. Now, I say that, knowing the constituency as well as we do, knowing that the position was open for a year, knowing the stress to which the Government was driven for support, the people at large will think it a reasonable inference that there was an implied understanding that Mr. Masson was to get that position. Then I say it is unfortunate, not only for the Government, but for Mr. Masson himself, it is unfortunate for the people of the country at large, who have been taught to look upon the judiciary of this country as above any impropriety, it is unfortunate from every standpoint, that the appointment of Mr. Masson was delayed until that vote was taken in this House. I feel that the Government have left themselves open to the charge of using the patronage of the country for the purpose of securing support. I do not charge Mr. Masson with it, but I do say that all the facts put together make a case so strong that the people will believe that there was an implied understanding between the Government and Mr. Masson that he should have this position. Now, there is another point involved, and that is whether the Government should have made any appointment at all. Governments in this country are not formed on purpose to fill up vacancies, on purpose to make appointments that will be a charge upon the treasury. They should have been satisfied that two judges were required to discharge the judicial duties in that county. I am told that Judge Doyle, the junior judge, a good lawyer, eminently fit for the position of county court judge, has informed the Government that he alone could do all the work for the county of Huron. If that be so, then upon what pretense can the Government defend the appointment of the second judge in the county of Huron ?

Mr. DICKEY. I may inform the hon. gentleman that there is no such correspondence on file in the Department of Justice.

Mr. LISTER. If the hon. gentleman says so, then I accept his statement. But I am told that Judge Doyle informed the Government here that he could perform that duty alone. The correspondence may not be in the office of the hon. gentleman, it may be in the office of the Premier. But I think there is no dispute but what one judge is sufficient to discharge the judicial business in that county. I know that Judge Doyle is fully qualified to discharge every duty thrown upon him under the law. Now, is it right that a second judge should be appointed at all ? But if a second judge were necessary, is it fair that the junior judge, a man performing all the duties of a senior judge, is it fair to him that he should be passed over when the appointment could have been given to him honestly and justly, and that a man without any experience should be placed over his head, and that he should remain in a subordinate position for the rest of his life ? Hon. gentlemen say that the emoluments of these offices are not all they should be. I grant that there are many complaints as to the inadequacy of the salaries of the judges. It is quite likely that many of them are underpaid ; but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that when a vacancy does occur, there are many applications for the position. I desire to point out to the Government again that where a vacancy takes place in the senior judgeship, if the junior judge is qualified to discharge the duties of the office, in all fairness he ought to be promoted to the position, and a stranger should not be put over his head.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The importance of the point we are now discussing will be best understood by the hon. gentlemen who were not present yesterday afternoon reading the opinion expressed in regard to it by a gentleman who holds the acknowledged position of one of the leaders of the Ontario bar. The hon. member for Simcoe, speaking in the House yesterday, speaking, as he stated, with all the responsibility upon him of a leading member of the bar and a member of this House declared :

> I do not know that Canadian history shows a more flagrant, a more disgraceful, or a more reprehensible proceeding than has taken place this week.

That flagrant, that reprehensible, that most disgraceful proceeding, was the appointment of the hon. member for Grey to the judgeship of the county of Huron. Now, my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) labours under a constitutional disability in reference to these matters. He never can see where there is political disgrace attaching to the Government, or any man in it, and I rule him out as being incapable of expressing an opinion upon a question of this kind. My hon. friend from South Norfolk simulated a great deal of passion here, which I do not think anybody gave him credit for. He skirmished a good deal around the quesion, but either he did not understand it, or he tried to obscure it with a cloud of words. Hon. gentlemen in this House who have objected to this proceeding do not object to it because the appointment has been made from the ranks of members of this House. There is nothing wrong in appointing a member of this House to the bench, or to any position in the Civil Service. I never heard anybody make that charge. It is eminently proper that from time to time vacancies on the bench or in the Civil Service should be filled by men who are fit to fill them, whether they are members of this House or not. It would be a serious thing indeed if the fact that a gentleman possessing the confidence of the people, and elected to a position in this House, is thereby disqualified for appointments to office. It would be a serious thing, and my hon. friend from Bothwell was careful, in opening his remarks, to declare that the fact of the appointment being made from the ranks of members of this House was not a fact which exposed the appointment to attack. That is done in England every day. The best men on the bench in England have been taken from the ranks of the House of Commons ; and the same may be said in Canada. If the chief justiceship of Nova Scotia became vacant to-morrow, would anybody think it improper or wrong in any sense that either the Minister of Justice or the member for Pictou should be appointed there ? Not at all. They would either of them be eminently fit and proper appointments to make. The chief justiceship of New Brunswick was vacant twelve months ago. Would anybody have thought it wrong if the member for St. John (Mr. McLeod) had been appointed to that office ; not at all. He is a gentleman who holds a very high and distinguished position at the bar where he practises, and it would not have been considered improper if he had been appointed to that position. But when that appointment has been kept vacant for twelve months, or two years, when the incumbent, unfortunately paralyzed as he has been for a long time, and unable to discharge any duties of that office, has been confined to his bedroom for nearly two years, when that office is left vacant, and the hon. member for St. John is known actually to be an aspirant for it, then there comes in another element entirely. This is the question, Is the independence of Parliament being properly defended and guarded by the Government when they keep that office vacant, and make no appointment to it? The hon. gentleman knows that the constitution of the country requires that the full number of judges shall be appointed to each of the provinces; they have kept the position of the head of the bench in New Brunswick vacant for nearly two years.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; it is not vacant.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman knows that Sir John Allen has been paralyzed and unable to do anything for two years. His resignation is in the hon. gentleman's hands, and has been there for months.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I never saw it there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the hon. gentleman knows it is true.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I say distinctly that while I was Minister of Justice I never heard of his resignation, and do not know now that it has been given.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The opinion of members of the bar does not enter into the discussion. If the chief justice did not desire to resign, if there was no possibility of his resigning his position, he might remain, although unable to perform his duties, to enable him, for a certain time, to draw salary. It is known in the maritime provinces that the judge has either forwarded his resignation or a letter announcing that he would place, at any time, his resignation in the hands of the Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I never heard of his resignation or intended resignation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have heard it frequently; it is talked of by everybody. The scandal does not lie in appointing any hon. gentleman to the position, but in keeping the position dangling before the eyes of an hon. member, and thus affecting his independence. The hon. member for Pictou has said that the Liberal Government sinned in the same way. There is no complaint of wrong being committed because appointments were made from members of the House. Take the case of Judges Dorion, Moss and Fournier. Are those appointments such that any government is called upon to apologize for them? They are among the most distinguished appointments made since confederation to the bench—the office sought the man, not the man the office. We may therefore dismiss the argument put forward by the ex-Minister of Justice, and get down to the point. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) designated this appointment as a violent, disgraceful and reprehensible proceeding, and the hon. gentleman said he weighed his words well; that he had personal respect for Mr. Masson, both as a man and as a lawyer, but that the hon. gentleman had been appointed after the office had been vacant during eleven months, and when it was necessary to appoint him in a hurry in order to secure him surrogate court fees, amounting to nearly $1,200 a year. The use of the term senior and junior judge is merely a conventional one. The statute provides that in cases where there is more than one county judge, the judge whose commission has priority of date shall be called the county judge, and the other junior judge.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Under the statute, the junior does not become the senior in case of vacancy.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He becomes the senior.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not by operation of statute.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, unless otherwise expressed in the commission, he shall be styled judge of the county court.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the case we are dealing with it does not so apply.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He becomes so by operation of law. The legislature provided on May 14, 1895, that there should not be two judges in the case of the county of Huron.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It declares that in counties where there was not a population exceeding 80,000, on the death or retirement of a senior judge there should not be an appointment made of a junior judge.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The provision is that there should be only one judge appointed in a county with less than 80,000 people. Unless it is distinctly stated on the face of the commission that Mr. Masson is appointed senior judge, the appointment is not worth the paper on which it is written, for the Government have not the power to appoint him, unless it is expressly stated in the commission that he is to be senior judge. If Mr. Masson has been appointed junior judge, this Government has gone directly in the teeth of the Ontario statute, which states that there shall be no junior judge, but only one judge in a county with a population not exceeding 80,000. That is a scandal and a disgrace, and it is a greater scandal because it was made eleven months after the legislature had enacted that in the county of Huron there should be only one judge. And worse and worse, this appointment was made after the legislature had passed an Act, of which the Government were aware when they made the appointment, because the third reading passed on April 1st, declaring that after the passage of that Act surrogate fees to the value of about $1,200 in Huron County should pass to the Ontario treasurer. Hon. gentlemen opposite have talked about Mr. Masson's honour, but the more important question is the action of the Government in violating the Independence of Parliament Act, and holding appointments before the eyes of members. There is nothing in the fact that Mr. Masson may have expected this appointment, but the wrong consists in keeping it open when, at the same time, the hon. gentleman knew that by supporting the Government he would be acting against the wishes of his constituents. The late hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) sat in this House two years expecting the collectorship of Montreal, but when this Bill came forward he resigned his seat, because he knew that his constituents were adverse to the passage of this measure, and that if he voted against the Government he would not obtain the collectorship. The present member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs) asked the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) whether he believed Mr. Masson would have obtained his appointment had he voted against the Government, and had he voted as his constituents desired. No one will believe that Mr. Masson would have obtained the position if he had voted against the Government. I therefore charge against the Government that their action in this case is without justification, that it is a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, and is deserving the condemnation of this House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I desire to explain that the statute distinctly refers to the junior judge. It says that no junior judge shall be appointed in a county when the population is less than 40,000. That appears in the Consolidated Statutes. An amendment increased the population to 80,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Under that statute the junior judge was so designated simply for purposes of convenience.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We require to see the commission. It is tolerably clear that the Government are without a defence for their action.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I speak positively in regard to this case, because I am familiar with it. I know that in this particular case the position of the present judge, as stated by his commission, is that of junior judge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking in regard to the commission given to Mr. Masson, which should be laid before the House. I do not retract in the slightest degree what I stated, that this appointment reflects discredit on Mr. Masson and all concerned. I beg it to be understood that I maintain my statement to the full, and quite as fully as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who designated it as a most disgraceful, and reprehensible proceeding. If the hon. member for Pictou had understood the first principles of constitutional practice he would have known that the whole case depended on the surrounding circumstances. No one contended that the hon. member could not be appointed, but we contend that it is an utter violation of parliamentary decency and parliamentary practice, and a defiance of the Independence of Parliament Act, and everything that makes parliamentary government, to hold an appointment dangling for months and years before the eyes of an hon. member. It was a disgraceful course which was followed in this case. Everybody knows that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs) hit the nail on the head when he asked the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) whether he supposed the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Masson) would have been appointed if he had voted against the Remedial Bill. We are men who do know the principles on which the Government administer their affairs. And if the hon. member for Grey had voted against the Remedial Bill—I do not say that he voted for the Remedial Bill on consideration of the judgeship—there was not the slightest chance that the present junior judge of Huron would have been superseded by Mr. Masson.

Mr. HUGHES. He would have been appointed before the vote if he was going to vote against the Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I fancy that is possible enough. If it had been likely that the hon. gentleman would have voted against the Bill, I am quite sure one of two things would have happened, he would have been appointed before the vote, or he never would have been appointed at all. I repeat that the Independence of Parliament Act has been violated in the worst possible way, by an appointment being kept open during a number of months, with an understanding, a tacit or implied understanding, either with the whip or the Premier or with confidential friends of the Government, that that particular place should be given to that particular man. It was notorious that the name of the hon. member for North Grey was associated with his office ever since it became vacant. It was notorious before last session, during last session, during all this session, and all the surrounding circumstances go to show that the hon. member had the promise of this appointment ; and if he had not had the promise he never would have been appointed in this hot haste ; and, therefore, I repeat, that we are perfectly justified, as was the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) the other night, in declaring that this is a gross violation, an outrageous violation of the Independence of Parliament Act in the spirit if not in the letter. As to the plea made by hon. gentlemen opposite that because the legislature distinctly declared it was not expedient to have two judges in a county with less than 80,000 people, therefore they were justified in the absurd quibble raised with regard to the hon. member for North Grey, and that all the legislature meant was that in cases where a junior judge was acting it was legitimate for them to appoint a senior judge, the proposition needs only to be stated to refute itself. An hon. member stated that the county of Huron has very nearly 80,000 people. it has been so gerrymandered that it is difficult to say what the judicial county of Huron may be, but the county as represented here contains only 58,000 people according to the last census, and I am afraid it has lost some population since then. That is 22,000 less than 80,000. The county has lost, I believe, by the operation of the gerrymander, a couple of townships. I am not able to say what their population may be, but I should think it would not be more than 6,000 or 7,000. So, while the legislature fixed 80,000 as the lowest limit for a county to have two judges, the Government appoint two judges for a county of little more than 60,000 souls. I think it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to have informed himself and to have considered extremely carefully, under the circumstances, whether two men were required for the proper administration of justice in the county of Huron. Had he had the slightest regard for the public interest, had he desired to administer his office properly, he would undoubtedly have conferred with the Ontario government, or with the Attorney General of the province, in order to ascertain the facts. The law of 1895 was ample warning to him to have done that, and, in my judgment he gravely neglected his duty if he made the appointment without satisfying himself by examination of the case and reference to the Ontario authorities whether two judges were needed or not. If one judge is enough, it is clear that $30,000 or $40,000, or the equivalent of it, is to be given by the Government for the purpose of rewarding a political supporter.

Mr. WALLACE. For an hour we have listened to a discussion upon the appointment of Mr. Masson to the judgeship of the county of Huron. That appointment must be condemned by all right-thinking men in this House and in the country, under the circumstances. But that is not the subject properly before the Chair, and I do not intend to be dragged away from the consideration of that subject. Before the House prorogues I think we shall have an opportunity of discussing this and many other appointments that have been made or are going to be made under the same circumstances or even more flagrant circumstances, warranting condemnation by this House. But at present we have before us this Bill relating to the Manitoba schools. It is said that the Manitoba schools are godless schools and that if they are not so now, they will be made so by the alternative proposition submitted by the Manitoba government. I have in my hands a sermon delivered by the Rev. Mr. McIntosh, in Ottawa, on the subject of godless schools, which expresses so clearly and forcibly the views I hold, that I shall call the attention of members to it. Mr. McIntosh points out that there is no ground for saying that a secular school is a godless school, any more than there would be for saying that because a music school or an art school that is not opened with religious exercises is a godless school. I have already pointed out that the experience of the world shows that schools that are conducted under the direction of the church become rather devoted to the teaching of dogma than to the training of the children in matters of value to them in everyday life. The result is that in such places as Mexico and the Central and South American republics, after long experience of the control of the church in matters of education, they have decided to pursue the other course. They have refused to permit the church to control the education of their people. It is notable that of all the Government's supporters from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, only one has declined to vote for this proposal to force separate schools upon Manitoba. Such a system does not exist, and would not be permitted in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and yet these gentlemen insist in forcing upon Manitoba a system which they would not have for their own provinces. A more tyrannical or unjustifiable proceeding has never been known. They say there was a bargain before confederation, and that that bargain must be carried out. But the Privy Council has declared in most emphatic terms that no such bargain or agreement as they allege was ever made. What, then, is the reason for forcing this system upon Manitoba ? There is only one reason.

An hon. MEMBER. Let us have it.

Mr. WALLACE. It is that the bishops demand it. We have been told that the people want it. But we have challenged those who say so to leave it to the people themselves, either by petition or simply by holding up their hands, or by any other way. But they have not accepted the challenge. Now, there is another point of some importance to which I wish to refer. A good deal has been said upon the question whether the privileges that have been given to the Protestant minority in Quebec should be denied to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba. Well, I say myself that if any privilege that is given to the Protestant minority in Quebec were refused to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, it would be most unfair. There could be no justification for such a course, and I for one would be the first to condemn it. But what are the facts ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his speech on this subject, made an elaborate statement on this branch of the question, as did also the Postmaster General, but their arguments were altogether beside the mark, because they failed to understand the character of the schools of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec and wherein they differ from the schools of the majority. On this point a very important letter has been written by Mr. Robert Sellar, editor of the Huntingdon "Gleaner," and as it sets forth the facts in a very clear manner, I propose to read his letter to the committee. (The hon. member reads Mr. Sellar's letter). Now, Mr. Chairman, I think this authoritative statement made by the Huntingdon "Gleaner," is of such importance that I would like to have an answer to it by some member of the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I am afraid he will not get any answer from the Government. With his permission and with the permission of the committee, I would like to clear up a disputed matter about which there was a good deal of contradiction of sinners the other evening. It is well to know to whom we are indebted for certain historic phrases. Now, there is a historic phrase the paternity of which is in dispute, but the authority for which I am able to lay before the House :

Sir Charles Tupper to J. A. Macdonell.

Ottawa, May 20, 1879.

My dear Macdonell :

I have consulted Sir John about that matter of the old Bank of Upper Canada premises, and we have decided to knock off the interest, as you suggest. The case will go before council forthwith, as Sir John says, but little confidence is to be placed in the breed, we shall hold its final settlement in abeyance until after the election, when it can be passed through.

The whole correspondence is to be found in the Toronto "Globe," of Thursday, April 5, 1883, to which I refer the hon. gentlemen who have any desire to know. But now the paternity of the historic phrase that "but little confidence is to be placed in the breed" is clearly placed where it belongs, and that is with the present leader of the House. We now know exactly what opinion, when the election was on, that hon. gentleman entertained about the gentlemen he is now patronizing. It is well for the House to have that little matter settled. It was disputed and denied publicly by the Secretary of State, if my memory serves me right, and although I do not see him here, I have no doubt that his friends can communicate with him, and show him where the authority for the statement can be found.

Mr. DICKEY. Where is that ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The letter is dated May 20th, 1879. The three correspondents are James J. Foy, J. Stewart Tupper and John A. Macdonell.

Mr. WALLACE. I pause for a moment to give the members of the Government an opportunity to reply to the statement of Mr. Sellar.

Mr. TISDALE. Was not the hon. gentleman in accord with the Government on this measure when he was a member of the Government ?

Mr. WALLACE. In the first place, I never was a member of the Cabinet. In the next place, I do not think the hon. gentleman can find any statement that will justify him in making the insinuation. Did I ever appear to be in accord with such legislation ? From the first day the question came before Parliament, when the telegram was received on the 29th January, 1895, announcing the decision of the Privy Council, I have expressed my determination to oppose at every stage this so-called remedial legislation. I invite any hon. gentleman to say to the contrary.

Mr. TISDALE. An hon. gentleman who is a member of the Government, when a positive statement as to the course of the Government has been made, and he does not agree with that course, but does not withdraw until it is requisite to take definite action, he drawing pay in the meantime, is not an hon. member who should lecture the other members of this House in regard to motives.

Mr. WALLACE. I waited on the Premier and told him my views and my position, and that I was ready to hand in my resignation at once. His reply was that my position was not in question in any way, and that my resignation was not needed.

Mr. TISDALE. I say that you remained a member of the Government.

Mr. WALLACE. I never led any one to imagine that I occupied a dual position. In justification of my action, I need only quote the speech of the Minister of Justice of that day, and the Premier himself, who told me that the speech of the Minister of Justice was a complete justification of my course. I was willing to resign—I thought I would not remain any longer in the Government. I went to West York and laid the case before my constituents, and talked over it with 300 or 400 of the leading Conservatives in the county. They said the time had not come for my resignation ; that if the Manitoba question was settled by the local legislature it never would come before this Parliament, and therefore no issue would be raised. I accepted their view with respect to my resignation. The Premier was also of that opinion, and the Minister of Justice. I have never occupied a position where my honour was in doubt, and I never will. It has been suggested that Mr. Sellar, whose views have been quoted, was a representative of Colonel Mulberry Sellar. That, however, is a poor reply to make to an argument, and it appears to be all that the hon. gentleman can make. The St. John's "News," the leading Conservative paper in the Eastern Townships, has recently published an article on the political situation, in which it states that it is not satisfied with the comparison made by Sir Adolphe Caron and Mr. Ives, as between the position of Quebec and the position of Manitoba if the present Remedial Bill became law, and that the minority in the Manitoba province would enjoy privileges which are not now possessed by the Protestant minority of Quebec, among which would be a superintendent of schools of the religion of the minority. I should like to ask the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Robillard) whether he thinks it is absolutely necessary to have a Roman Catholic superintendent of schools.

Mr. ROBILLARD. If they were as fair in Manitoba to the Catholics as the Catholics in the province of Quebec are to the Protestants, it would not be necessary.

Mr. WALLACE. Then the hon. gentleman appears to think that the Roman Catholics of Quebec are more fair and generous than the Protestants of Manitoba, and I suppose he can produce evidence of that fact. The history of Protestantism in this country shows, not only toleration and fair-play, but great generosity to the Catholics, a great feeling of regard for the Catholic minority in the different provinces, and I repudiate the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa that the Protestants in Manitoba are actuated by bigotry or want of generosity and fair dealing.

Mr. ROBILLARD. I did not say so. I said that if the Manitoba government was as favourable to the Catholics as the Quebec government is to the Quebec Protestants, there would be no necessity for the Catholics having such power.

Mr. WALLACE. That is an amended statement. There was no question of the government in the first place. However, it cannot be said that the government of Manitoba is one wanting in generosity and fairness, and in saying so I have no special interest in defending the Greenway government. There is no reason, as regards politics, why I should defend them. I ask the hon. member for Ottawa to read over the correspondence regarding the negotiations between the Dominion and Manitoba commissioners, and see whether there is not evinced an honest desire on the part of the Manitoba commissioners to conciliate and effect a settlement, although they may not be willing to go so far as the hon. member for Ottawa desires. They strongly protest against separate schools, and in doing so they occupy a strong and impregnable position.

Mr. DICKEY. I should like to make a statement.

Mr. WALLACE. I had intended to finish my speech; but I will give way on the distinct understanding that I shall have an opportunity of continuing my remarks.

Mr. DICKEY. I wish simply to refer to a matter while it is fresh in the memory of hon. members, and that is regarding a statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I was very much surprised to hear the Secretary of State, among the rest of his misdeeds, charged with being the author of the phrase "there was no confidence to be placed in the breed." I do not know whether it is a credit or not to have originated that phrase, but if it be a credit, I do not think he is entitled to it. I always understood as part of the political history of Canada that Sir John Macdonald had found that striking phrase in one of his happy moments, and that he had been very sorry afterwards that he used it. There is nothing in the statement read by the hon. gentleman to change my impression in the slightest degree. The letter he read is evidently a quotation—that phrase is a quotation. I shall read it thus: "As Sir John says but little confidence is to be placed in the breed, we shall hold this final settlement until." and so on. I am not responsible, nor is the Secretary of State responsible for the punctuation used by the "Globe." But " as Sir John says" could not refer to the fact that the case would go to council, because that was information which the Secretary of State was giving. It must refer to what comes after—that the matter was to be held over.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And acquiesced in it.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not dispute that. He quoted a phrase as used by Sir John.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And adopted it.

Mr. DICKEY. It may have been a joke or it may not. But he was writing to a Roman Catholic friend, and one who hugely enjoys the joke. But the hon. member for South Oxford read this to show that the Secretary of State was the author of the phrase. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) says that the punctuation of the "Globe" makes out that the Secretary of State is the author of the phrase.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does it not?

Mr. DICKEY. I think probably it does. But at the head of the column in the "Globe" appears "Sir John's real opinion of Catholic electors," which shows that the opinion of the "Globe" was that this was Sir John's opinion, in which case the Secretary of State could only have quoted it.

Mr. McGREGOR. The hon. Minister of Justice said that this letter was written to a Catholic. But it was to a Scotch Catholic, and it was to the French Catholics that the phrase was applied.

Mr. DICKEY. No ; to the Irish Catholics.

Mr. DAVIN. The grammatical construction was that that was the reason given by Sir John.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Evidently, if the leader of the House had been quoting the expression of another he would have enclosed the expression in quotation marks.

Mr. DAVIN. Either the hon. member for South Oxford has forgotten his Trinity College training or he was trying to misrepresent the leader of the House.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LANGELIER. Mr. Chairman, this afternoon the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) brought to the attention of the committee a part of a certain correspondence which took place in 1879. I think it is of some interest to the House to become acquainted with the whole of that correspondence, which has a great bearing on the question before the House. In 1867 a certain property belonging to the Bank of Upper Canada on Duke street, in the city of Toronto, was transferred to the Government of Canada. In 1870 that property was put up for sale, and it was sold to the Christian Brothers, not directly in their name, but to one Mr. Stock, acting in their interest. The selling price was $8,000, which was to be paid in five annual instalments, with interest. One instalment had been paid in 1879, at the time to which the correspondence I am going to read refers. At that time the elections for the legislature of Ontario were about to take place within a few days. The late Archbishop of Toronto, Archbishop Lynch, was very anxious for a settlement of the question of the indebtedness of the Christian Brothers to the Dominion Government for the balance of the purchase money, and applied to Messrs. Foy, Tupper and Macdonell, barristers, of Toronto, to use their endeavours with the Dominion Government to obtain a settlement of that claim—not to obtain a complete release, but a reduction of the claim, especially of the interest. I will now read the correspondence, which speaks for itself. The first letter is as follows :—

Foy, Tupper and Macdonell.
Barristers, Solicitors and Attorneys,
Office, Equity Chambers,
Corner Adelaide and Victoria Sts.

James J. Foy, J. Stewart Tupper, John A. Macdonell.

Toronto, January 23rd, 1879.

(Private.)

Dear Mr. Tupper :

The Archbishop of Toronto has asked me to attend to some business for him, and before writing to you officially on the subject I would like to know what your views are : In 1870 the old Bank of Upper Canada premises, which in 1867 were conveyed by the bank to "the Queen" were sold by order of the Minister of Public Works to the Brothers of the Christian schools for $8,000 at auction. One-tenth of the purchase money was paid at the time of sale ; one-fifth was to have been paid in 15 days, and the balance in four equal annual instalments, with interest at 6 per cent.

Since the day of sale nothing has been done. No portion of the principal or interest has been paid or called for. The Archbishop now wishes to have the matter settled up, the purchase money paid, and the deed procured from the Government. The old gentleman is not without hope that the Government may not claim all the interest on arrears, but he does not care to ask the Government to grant this favour. His object in coming to us, I fancy, was in the hope that we could get him favourable terms, and both in a business and political point of view I would like to meet his wishes. It will be a great matter for the office to get the business of the archdiocese, and I am most anxious to get his ear politically. There is no doubt that he was unfavourable at the last election, believing that the Government will be returned ; and the Ontario men conciliate him in every conceivable way with the view to securing his influence at this coming election. I want to counteract Fraser's influence with him, and if he sees that Foy and I can secure favours at Ottawa for him he is likely to remain neutral at least.

The way in which I would put the application in behalf of the Brothers is that they were perfectly prepared and willing to carry out the agreement entered into at the time of sale, but the Government never enforced it or gave them an opportunity of doing so, and I would ask for the carrying out of the purchase now on payment of the principal and the interest, which would have been paid had the Government enforced the bargain entered into.

Would you speak to Sir John about it if you have a chance ? He knows the Archbishop and his little peculiarities.

We will be obliged if you will have the papers in the matter forwarded to us. When we receive them and hear from you we will write to you officially, and instructions can be sent to Foy in proper time to carry through the transaction on such terms as the Government may decide.

I am acting for the Archbishop,
Faithfully yours,
(Signed) J. A. MACDONELL.

No immediate action was taken by the present Secretary of State. Here is the letter that was written by him in reply :

My dear Macdonell :

I have consulted Sir John about that matter of the old Bank of Upper Canada premises, and we have decided to knock off the interest as you suggest. The case will go to Council forthwith ; as Sir John says, but little confidence is to be placed in the breed, we shall hold its final settlement in abeyance until after the elections, when it can be passed through. In the meanwhile if you could send Foy here on some kind of business with instructions to also inquire how this particular affair is progressing, he will ascertain that it has been referred and recommended by you to Council, which he will naturally report to your client on his return to Toronto.

That is the private letter. Here is the report to Council :

Department of Public Works,
Ottawa, 22nd May, 1879.
(Memorandum).

The undersigned has the honour to report that the property on Duke street, Toronto, known as the old Bank of Upper Canada, deeded to the Government, on the 20th August, 1867, in payment on account of the general indebtedness of the bank to the Government, was under the authority of Order in Council passed on the 13th of September, 1869, and on the 30th of August respectively, sold at public auction to Mr. James Stock for $8,400, the terms of payment being one-fifth cash and the remainder in four annual instalments with interest at 6 per cent.

That the purchase was made by Mr. Stock for and on behalf of the Christian Brothers, who have since the purchase and up to the present time occupied the building for school purposes.

That no further payment than the fifth cash paid at the time of the purchase has been made by the Christian Brothers, and that until recently no demand has been made to them for payment.

That the Christian Brothers, through their agent, now represent that they should not be made to pay the interest which, through the inaction of the Government, has accrued on the unpaid instalments of the purchase amount, alleging, moreover, that the premises were a source of loss while occupied by the Government and that they have not enhanced in value since purchased by them.

That Mr. J. Samond Smith, who was agent of the Government, and in charge of the premises for some years previous to the purchase, and Mr. E. B. Osler, general manager of the North of Scotland Canadian Mortgage Company (Limited) of Toronto, have been asked for an estimate of the present value of the property, and both have expressed the opinion that, apart from the improvements made to it by the Christian Brothers, the property is not worth any more to-day, or perhaps not as much as it was when sold in 1870.

The undersigned, under all circumstances of the case, and in view of the charitable use to which the building in question is applied by the Christian Brothers, and seeing that it could not be sold for the price obtained in 1870, would recommend that on condition of the immediate payment of the whole amount of the purchase money by the Christian Brothers, the property be transferred to them without interest.

Respectfully submitted
(Signed) CHARLES TUPPER,
for Minister of Public Works.

Then, the paper from which this is extracted, states that, according to the endorsation on the back of the report, it was referred to the Committee of the Hon. the Privy Council, and was referred back to the Minister of Public Works. The last part of the correspondence is a letter from the Secretary of the department, as follows :—

Ottawa, June 27th, 1879.

Gentlemen,—As agents on behalf of the Community of the Christian Brothers of Toronto, who have made application to be relieved from the necessity of paying accrued interest on the amount of the purchase money from the building known as the old Bank of Upper Canada, I am directed to convey to you the regret of the Hon. the Minister that the view taken by the Government, as to the necessity of carrying out the terms of the purchase (such purchase having been effected through public auction) has rendered it impossible for them to accede to the representations made by him on behalf of your client.

I am, gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
F. BRAUN,
Secretary.

Messres. Foy, Tupper, Macdonell, barristers, Toronto.

This correspondence, in my opinion, is of still more importance as a whole, when all the facts are taken together, than the portion which was quoted this afternoon by the hon. member for South Oxford. We must not forget the fact that the elections for the legislature of Ontario were to take place on the 7th June of that year. That correspondence commenced on the 23rd of January, 1879, and the report to Council is dated the 22nd of May, 1879. The present Secretary of State says, repeating a remark of Sir John Macdonald, that he has no confidence in the breed, and that he does not want to pay for the goods before they are delivered, but he will make arrangements to make the goods believe that they are paid for ; and the arrangement which appears from that correspondence is this. A sham report is prepared, to be shown to the representatives of the interested parties, to make them believe that the release shall be obtained for the Christian Brothers, and that if the Catholics of Ontario behave properly, that is to say, vote for the Tory candidates, the report will be carried into effect; but if the goods are not delivered, that is to say, if the Roman Catholics of Ontario do not vote for the Tory candidates, the report will be set aside. As the Roman Catholics did not vote according to the wishes of the writer, the result was that the report was not carried into effect, as is shown by the letter from the secretary of the department. All the good reasons given in the report seem to have been of no effect after the elections took place. This shows the way the principal member of this Government was dealing with the Roman Catholics of Ontario at that time, and the opinion he and his Government had of them. And now these are the people who want to make the Catholics of the whole Dominion believe that they are their best friends.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to have the book ?

Mr. LANGELIER. Yes. It is published in the "Globe," of the 5th of April, 1883, as having been taken from the Hamilton "Tribune," which, I am told, was an independent paper.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, when the hon. leader of the Opposition stated, a few evenings ago, that I had, on a former occasion stated, in reference to the Roman Catholics, that I had no confidence in the breed, I promptly challenged the accuracy of that statement, and I defied any man living to produce any such statement ever made by me during my life. A good many things have happened since 1879, and I had a vague recollection of a charge of this kind having been made either against myself or against the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald; but I felt perfectly certain that it was quite impossible that I ever could have made such a statement as that, as it was in contradiction to the whole tenor of my public life, and I am very much obliged to the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) for having given me an opportunity of meeting this attempted support of that slander, on the present occasion. I denounced it then as an unfounded slander, and I am prepared to prove that I properly denounced it as an unfounded slander. The statement here is in a letter addressed by me to Mr. John A. Macdonell. In that letter it is said:

> I have consulted Sir John about that matter of the old Bank of Upper Canada, and we have decided to knock off the interest as you suggest. The case will go to Council forthwith, as Sir John says but little confidence is to be placed in the breed.

It is not a statement, therefore, made by me. It does not profess to be a statement made by me: it intimates Sir John said that. That is the only construction I can give this letter. I see the hon. gentleman smiling and evidently under the impression that some little quibble can be raised on this point; but I am happy to say that I stand here in the position to-night not only of throwing back this vile and miserable slander upon the parties who have ventured to bring it up here but of giving the most convincing evidence possible of its entire falsity. How any gentleman, how any intelligent man could suppose that I, professing, as I do in this matter, my desire to obtain the approval and meet the views of a gentleman who had addressed me on a public question—how any man of the lowest order of intelligence could suppose that I, in writing to a Roman Catholic gentleman, would make use of such an expression as that, passes my comprehension. The circumstances occurred so long ago as 1879, and a good deal having happened of interest since that period, my recollection was very hazy of the matter, but I recollected that some such charge had been made and had been promptly refuted at the time. But happily for me, a gentleman who was a prominent actor in the whole of this matter, and who consequently has the subject more within his recollection, Mr. John A. Macdonell, a barrister of high character and standing in this country, a Roman Catholic gentleman, who was the person who communicated with me with reference to this business, and with whom I had this correspondence, wrote me a letter which I received yesterday. I am not quite aware where my private secretary is, but shall have great pleasure in laying before the House that letter from Mr. John Macdonell, the gentleman mainly concerned in this transaction, at that time a member of the firm of Foy, Tupper and Macdonell, with whom this correspondence took place, and I may mention, at the same time, that Mr. Foy is a Roman Catholic gentleman of as high standing as any man in this country—I shall say nothing about the third partner in the firm. But that it could be supposed possible, that I, in addressing the firm of Foy, Macdonell and Tupper, would use such language as that, or that even if Sir John Macdonald had made use of such a term, I would repeat it in a letter which, if it had any influence at all, would necessarily and naturally be shown to his Grace the Archbishop of Toronto, passes my comprehension. Mr. Macdonell, who remembers the facts perfectly, has addressed a letter to me, stating that no such words were contained in the letter addressed by me to him, and he adds that these letters were stolen out of the office of Foy & Macdonell and that a vile forgery was perpetrated by interpolating those words. The facts, as I have said, have long since passed away from my mind, but I had perfect confidence in challenging any man living to pretend that any such statement or any evidence of any such statement ever having been made by me. Mr. Macdonell, unsolicited by me, sent me a letter which I will have great pleasure in laying before the House to-morrow. I would do so at this moment, but cannot find my private secretary, to whom I gave it for the purpose of having it typewritten, in order that it might be more easily read. Mr. Macdonell informed me that, with my approval, he proposed to send the letter to the hon. leader of the Opposition. He declares that his letter never contained any words of the kind, that those papers were stolen from the office of Foy, Macdonell and Tupper, and that this forgery was then perpetrated and given to the press. I need not waste much more time on this question, and I leave it for the committee to decide how hard driven hon. gentlemen opposite are to find some evidence by which they can attack the character of a man who, from the commencement of his public life down to this hour, has never committed an act or uttered a word with reference to the Roman Catholic body in this country that has not been of the most respectful character. I need not take the time of the committee longer than to say that I shall have great pleasure in giving the evidence that this letter of mine which was shown—if my memory serves me rightly; I read it over hastily—to His Grace the Archbishop, contained no such words and no reference of the kind charged against me. I may mention for the information of hon. gentlemen who may think that this was perpetrated to secure Catholic votes at the election, that this correspondence appears to have taken place in 1879, four years before there was any election.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Secretary of State has told us that the paragraph which appears in the letter is an unfounded slander and that Sir John Macdonald did not say any such thing as there reported, and that no such statement was in the letter. I am not going to contradict the hon. Secretary of State in that matter, because it is quite out of my power to do so, but I may call the attention of the House to this fact, that this letter was read when Sir John Macdonald was living and a member of this House, and that while he jested with regard to it, he never denied or contradicted it, and that was very much nearer the period when the correspondence took place. Then there is to be borne in mind, that in that letter it is said that a certain proceeding will be adopted. I call the hon. Secretary of State's attention to this fact, that in the letter he repeats words that Sir John Macdonald had employed, that he had no confidence in the breed, and that is intimated as a reason for the course which was marked out to be taken with reference to this property and with reference to the famous terms or understanding with regard to the agreement come to between those solicitors and the Government. The charge made and the course of procedure adopted are exactly in the same line; and I will call the attention of the hon. leader of the House to this fact, that it is not only necessary to show that no such phrase was used by Sir John Macdonald and no such phrase repeated by him in this correspondence, but it is equally necessary, in order to maintain the position which the elimination of these words would imply, that the policy adopted with regard to the remission of interest upon this property and with regard to the time at which this arrangement was to be carried out was altogether different from that represented in the correspondence. I did not understand the hon. leader of the House to say that the rest of the correspondence was not genuine.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not had time to look over the correspondence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not understand him to say that he recollected sufficiently to challenge the accuracy of that letter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, his challenge is not upon his own recollection, but upon the letter received by him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I challenged the statement, when first made, as unfounded, and defied any person to the proof; but though my recollection of the circumstances of such a charge having been made some time ago was dim, I said I knew there could be possibly no truth in the statement and that I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that by the statement in the correspondence which he read—I have not read it myself since the time it appeared, some twelve or fourteen years ago—this is indicated that we have no confidence in the breed, you want this course adopted, as you say in your correspondence, partly for political consideration. That political consideration was that you should support the Conservative party in the local elections, and that then, if you do that, we will carry out this understanding. Now, we propose to submit an Order in Council, but we do not propose to ask that that Order in Council shall be adopted, we will communicate that Order in Council to you, and if you fulfil the political obligations on your side, then we will fulfil these pecuniary obligations on ours. And as the political obligations were not fulfilled, as the Conservative party did not in the local election receive the support of the Roman Catholic electors of the province of Ontario, as the Roman Catholic electors supported the government of Mr. Mowat, the arrangement have fallen through in part upon the one side, was abandoned on the other. That is what the correspondence, if it is a genuine correspondence, shows, and that is exactly in harmony with the contention that you had no confidence in the party with which you are dealing. If you had confidence in that party, you would at once have adopted the rule which prevails in ordinary business transactions; but having no confidence in them, you will not make the remission of interest, you will not act upon the report of your officer or agent in the matter until the elections are over, and you see whether the other party fulfil their obligation. The hon. Secretary of State will see that, if the correspondence is genuine, to say that you have no confidence in the breed is a very subordinate part of the whole matter, and of much less consequence than those other portions of the correspondence, which assume that you do distrust the parties and that you will not fulfil the arrangement until the elections are over and you see that they have carried out their obligation. These are the facts which appear upon the face of that correspondence if it is genuine.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a different question altogether.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. gentleman will see that it is in perfect harmony with the statement that you have no confidence in the other party.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do not say my statement, please.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). With the statement in that letter, which the hon. gentleman says is a forgery, because if it is not a forgery—and I am not calling in question the words of the hon. gentleman—then by quoting the words, as they stand there, which are quoted because the writer agrees with them: "Sir John Macdonald says he has no confidence in the breed"—assuming for a moment that that was a genuine expression, the hon. gentleman was adopting that idea as the basis of the negotiations which were to follow—I am not saying that the hon. gentleman did use these words, because he has denied that himself.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, he has not. He says that Mr. Macdonell denies that these words were in the letter he received.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did deny most emphatically, and the hon. gentleman knows that I denied it, and I challenged any man living to prove that I ever in my life used any such language.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not understand the hon. gentleman when he rose a few moments ago to say that he had sufficient recollection of the letter to enable him to pronounce those words to be an interpolation and a forgery, but that Mr. Macdonell would say so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have given it the most emphatic denial a man can give any statement and defied any person to prove it, and I offered to produce Mr. Macdonell's letter, in which he declared that the papers were stolen and that no such statement was in the letter, and that it was a forgery.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not questioning any statement of the hon. gentleman, but I am merely asking whether he says that those words were a forgery.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do. I say that such words were never written by me in my life, and have said so repeatedly.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have nothing further to add. The hon. gentleman says he has not read the rest of the correspondence and cannot speak with regard to it. I just rose for the purpose of calling attention to the facts which I have stated, and I understand the hon. gentleman, not only to deny upon the statement of Mr. Macdonell, but upon his own recollection, that any such letter was written by him.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the question is put to the committee I wish to enter my protest at the interference and obstruction which are practised here from day to day and night to night when we propose to discuss this Remedial Bill now before the committee. Why, Sir, before six o'clock, I was asked, when I was discussing some of the clauses, if I would postpone my remarks for a few moments in order to enable the hon. Minister of Justice to read a statement to the House. I did so, and ever since then we have been taken away from the question, which we supposed would receive our most serious consideration. Now, with your permission, I shall try to bring the House back to the consideration of this very important question. Before six o'clock I was discussing a point that had been raised by hon. gentlemen—not recently, but five weeks ago,—and that was that, as a matter of fair-play, and of right and justice, the minority in the province of Manitoba should receive the same treatment as the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. Now, I shall endeavour to establish that the minority in Manitoba are not satisfied with the measure given to the minority in Quebec. The fact is, that in Quebec the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church are taught in the schools of the majority, and it could not be asked that the children of Protestant parents should attend these schools, or that Protestants should be asked to support them. As a matter of fact, Protestants are asked to support these schools in places where they are not sufficient in number to establish a Protestant school. On the other hand, in the province of Manitoba, the public school is not sectarian, and there is nothing taught that will interfere with the consciences of the children. The only grievance raised against them is, that Roman Catholics are not allowed to teach the doctrines of their church in schools supported by the state. I submit to the fair consideration of every man in the country, that that does not constitute a grievance. I have letters here which I will read in order to support the statement I have made, that the schools in the province of Quebec are sectarian in their character. A writer to the editor of the Ottawa "Journal" compares the system of schools existing in Quebec with the present school system of Manitoba. Here is what he says:

> To the Editor of the "Journal":
> Sir:—So much has been said in course of the discussion upon the Manitoba school question by way of comparison of the position of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba with that of the Protestant minority in Quebec, that the public has already come to believe that the Quebec Protestant minority are allowed all sorts of latitude and run their schools as they please. The law quoted below will show how the treatment of Protestant schools starts at its foundation. I give hereunder the law upon which the structure is built:
> FROM REVISED STATUES, QUEBEC.
> 1893. The Council of Public Instruction is composed of Roman Catholic and Protestant members, as follows:—
> 1. The bishops, ordinaries, or administrators of the Roman Catholic dioceses and apostolic vicariates, situated either in whole or in part in the province, who are members ex-officio.
> 2. An equal number of Roman Catholic laymen appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.
> 3. A number of Protestant members, equal to the number of Roman Catholic members appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, who are appointed in the same manner.
> (That is one Protestant for each Catholic layman).
> 1908. Each Roman Catholic bishop, vicar apostolic or administrator of a Roman Catholic diocese, if unable through illness or absence from > the province to be present at the meetings of the council, or at those of the committee of which he forms part, may appoint a delegate to represent him, and such delegates shall have all the rights of the person appointing him.

> ### THE DEDUCTIONS.

> You will notice from this that the Protestant minority representatives (?) are appointed by the Roman Catholic majority ; that they are outnumbered two to one.

There must be two Protestants to one Catholic on the school board in the province of Quebec, and in that case the two would have their way whether it is just or not. I do not, however, make any complaint that there is any injustice at the present moment. I merely mention the fact now, and show that the Catholics in Manitoba are better treated than the Protestants in Quebec.

Mr. JONCAS. The Protestants have their own separate Board of Education in Quebec.

Mr. WALLACE. I am quoting the law.

Mr. JONCAS. But they have a board for themselves, and they can manage their own affairs.

Mr. WALLACE. Excuse me, a large part of the business is conducted by the joint board. I will point that out afterwards.

Mr. JONCAS. What are you reading from ?

Mr. WALLACE. A letter addressed to the editor of the Ottawa "Journal."

Mr. JONCAS. By whom ?

Mr. WALLACE. By a citizen of Montreal.

Mr. JONCAS. What is his name ?

Mr. WALLACE. His name is James Harper.

Mr. JONCAS. Is he quoting the law of the province of Quebec ?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. JONCAS. Then he is misquoting it.

Mr. WALLACE. These statements were made in the Ottawa papers on the 29th of March, and if there is anything incorrect in them, they could have been corrected by anybody who pretends to know the law. I say that the statements contained in this letter are correct. The question about the assessments for school purposes on corporations also comes into this Act, and the manner in which the law, in this respect, is administered in the province of Quebec, is most unfair to those men who invest their money in joint stock corporations. Suppose a Protestant in Montreal has $100,000 invested in his business, he can see that all his rates go to the Protestant schools, if he so wishes. That is fair. But suppose he finds it more convenient to change his business into a joint stock company, and although the men who compose that company be all Protestants, the school tax on that company is not given by law to the Protestant schools, but it is divided in proportion to the school population, or the school attendance, I do not know which, respectively, of the Protestants and Roman Catholics. In Montreal, where there are six Catholic children to the one Protestant, $6 of the taxes of that Protestant joint stock company would go to the Roman Catholic schools, and only $1 to the Protestant schools.

Mr. LANGELIER. That law to which the hon. gentleman refers was adopted in 1869 by the legislature of Quebec, with the unanimous consent of the Protestants in the legislature. There was no opposition at all to it, and I never heard any objection or opposition made to that law, except within the last two or three years. I may say, that the threat alluded to in one of the letters read was, that if the Protestants insisted upon their contention in that matter, the Catholics would insist upon some other things. At the present time, the Protestants get for higher education much more than their proportionate share, because, otherwise, they could not maintain their normal schools. The threat to which allusion is made there, was that if the Protestants wanted to have the money obtained from corporations distributed in a different way, they would not receive more than their due proportion for their higher schools.

Mr. WALLACE. Even if the law were adopted by unanimous consent in 1869, that does not make it right. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier) himself says that complaints have been made during the last few years of the injustice of this law. We all know that the course of business has changed since 1869, and that enterprises which were then conducted by private firms are now turned into joint stock companies. This change perpetrates a gross injustice on the Protestants of Quebec, because a Protestant conducting his business privately in former years could pay the taxes as he liked, but now if he turns his business into a joint stock company, he has to pay the greater part of the taxes of the Roman Catholic schools. What might have been a small grievance in days past, has become a grievance of enormous magnitude at the present day. As to the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier) about the share which the Protestants obtained for higher education, I do not know about the circumstances, and cannot say anything as to that. The writer further says :

> That the Roman Catholic bishops and clergy are privileged to be always present, if not in person, by proxy, with full powers from the bishop or priest to do his will ; that the Protestant, be he layman or minister, has no power to send a proxy ; and that no person unless he be a Protestant subservient to the powers that are may be appointed.

> When people speak of giving Manitoba Roman Catholics rights equal with those of the Protestants of Quebec, they should first ask what rights the Protestant minority of Quebec enjoy. The so-called Protestant schools of Montreal are managed by Protestants appointed, one-half of them, by the Roman Catholic majority of the Montreal city council and the other half by the Roman Catholic majority of the province—the Quebec government.

Representatives of the hierarchy have said that they will accept no less for the minority of Manitoba than the Protestant minority of Quebec receives.

In face of the facts given above, would the hierarchy accept such an arrangement as this, even if the Protestant system permitted it to be fastened upon them? Fancy the Archbishop of Canterbury appointing a cordon of bishops who should by virtue of their appointment by him become not only members but arbiters with special privileges of the school government of Manitoba, Protestant and Catholic. Nevertheless, it is the Pope's bishops, appointed by him in Quebec, who hold that position towards the Quebec Protestants.

In face, even, of the statute I have here quoted, such gentlemen as Sir William Dawson and others actually champion an extension of privileges enjoyed by the hierarchy in Quebec to Manitoba. Such gentlemen declare over their own signature that Quebec Protestants have nothing to complain of.

SOME PROTESTANT EXPERIENCES.

Principal Shaw at this very moment is hat in hand before the Quebec government asking relief for certain Protestants in Montreal who have been commanded to pay taxes to the Roman Catholic school parish of St. Gregoire le Thaumaturge, which is within the city limits, and who have already paid and still are liable to pay to the city of Montreal Protestant schools as well. The Rev. Principal MacVicar several years since endeavoured to have the joint stock corporation's tax, most of which goes to Catholic schools, though nearly every dollar of it is paid by Protestants, more fairly distributed. He failed, and could not find a Protestant member of Parliament with courage enough to fight it through Parliament. As for the council of education, there leaked out from its star chamber a story that Dr. MacVicar had been threatened that if the Protestants decided to press that just claim it would be worse for them, as they would lose more in other directions.

So much for the application of the rights, save the mark, which Protestants in Quebec enjoy. The privileges, as you will observe, all belong to the majority.

The so-called freedom for Quebec Protestants from Roman Catholic supremacy is chimerical. The very law above quoted shows them to be under the heel of the hierarchy, because the legislature will not alter anything in either law or practice except at the bidding of the council of education. That means the cardinal and bishops who are, as the law shows, its privileged governors and law interpreters. Quebec's Protestant minority should not be made a foil for the Manitoba minority, and all that high lay or clerical dignitaries of our province may say about the generosity of the majority in Quebec cannot alter the facts above stated. If these exhibit any generosity it must be of the nature of the fabled sunbeams that are extracted from Quebec cucumbers.

JAMES HARPER.

Montreal, March 20, 1896.

In the face of these facts, which are incontrovertible and undisputed, we may see that the demands made in favour of the minority in Manitoba are much greater than those granted to the minority in Quebec. Protestants in the province of Quebec have stated to me many a time that if the schools there were such as they could send their children to without their religion being interfered with, there would be no demand for dissentient schools in that province. Now, efforts have been made to settle this difficult problem; but I regret, and I am sure every member of this House will deeply regret that efforts had not been made long before to get the difficulty settled by the province of Manitoba on a basis which, if not all that the Roman Catholic Church might demand, would be fair, just and conciliatory, not only to the minority, but also to the majority of the people of that province. Our Premier visited the North-west, accompanied by the Minister of the Interior, and was in the city of Winnipeg for several days, during which he met the board of trade and the municipal council, and conferred with them about various matters, and yet not one step was taken by these gentlemen to meet the government of Manitoba and endeavour, by mutual concessions, to arrive at an agreement that would be fair and reasonable to all parties. The whole of this correspondence shows the anxious desire of the government of Manitoba, and also of the commissioners of this government, to settle this question. But after the commissioners had gone out, with instructions which permitted them to use their discretion largely, I regret to say that a subsequent Order in Council, limiting them to agree only to such terms as would be satisfactory to the minority, completely nullified their former instructions. The two governments meet to use their best efforts to come to an agreement, and before they get to work, supposing themselves to be untrammelled, an Order in Council is passed tying their hands. What do the minority want? They want the principle established that this Parliament of Canada, unnecessarily, as I contend, thrusting their power into the province of Manitoba, shall make a declaration which shall be not only for the province of Manitoba, but for every province of this Dominion. If it is wise and just to establish separate schools in the province of Manitoba, why is it not wise and just to establish separate schools in the province of Nova Scotia? If it is to be done for one province, let it be done for all the provinces by changing the constitution of the country. That is a great reason why, in my opinion, we should stay our hands, and decline to pass this legislation. While the Government have been compelling this House, day after day, and night after night, to sit to carry through this legislation, what have they been doing? I see the Finance Minister. We know his great abilities as an orator.

and his acumen as a statesman; we know his patriotic instincts; we know that he is imbued with the great policy of uniting this country more closely with the greatest Empire the world has ever seen: we know that he is a man whom we have heard with great satisfaction on this measure as it proceeded day by day. He made one strong speech on the Bill, but we have not heard from him from that day to this. We have seen him sitting in his seat and resting, evidently not caring about the Bill. What for? To coerce the Parliament of Canada as well as the province of Manitoba? Is that the object these hon. gentlemen have in view? Then, there is the Minister of Justice. He has had large control of this measure. He is supposed to have drafted its clauses. I do not believe it. I do not believe that these crude, ill-considered clauses have been drafted by a man of his great legal ability. There is another man in this House—the Controller of Customs.

Mr. HUGHES. The late Controller.

Mr. WALLACE. The late Controller has been heard from several times, and, his voice holding out, I hope he will be heard from again. But I am speaking of the present Controller of Customs. We all admire the career of that hon. gentleman from the day he came into Parliament. We know the impartiality he displayed as Deputy Speaker, and we know the able manner in which he has discharged the duties of Controller of Customs. Yet with all this experience, and with that judicial look which no man can bear better than he, with the training he has obtained in Parliament, and in the legal profession, giving him the high standing he very properly holds, we might reasonably have expected that his eloquence and good sense would have been given to expounding the provisions of this Bill, and justifying and defending it. We have expected all this, but we have been disappointed. I remember well when he and I were deputed to visit the farmers of this country and to ascertain their views as to what changes should be made in the tariff, in the interest of that important section of the community. If hon. members of this House had been present and seen the ability with which that hon. gentleman conducted those negotiations, ferretted out the facts, and laid down the law for the guidance of the farmers of this country, they would have been delighted that Canada possessed such an able and eloquent statesman. But on this important question, I regret to say, like his colleagues, he has not a word to say. When we are discussing its clauses, or discussing its general provisions, as we are doing to-night, they remain silent. When they do get an opportunity to speak, they do not discuss the Bill at all. The leader of the House has addressed the House several times with great vigour; but what has he said about the Bill? Not a word: he never mentions it. Why is it? Because the principle and the clauses of the Bill cannot be defended. It is left to the minority in this House to discuss the provisions of this Bill. Every clause of this Bill which we have discussed we have taken to pieces and turned inside out, and we have not done enough of that yet. Why, the first two or three clauses which we took hold of, I must confess we did not consider as carefully and lengthily as we should, and consequently they are in such a position to-day as to render the Act unworkable: but we are determined, when the other clauses come along, to scrutinize them more carefully, so that we may be able to justify our legislation before the people. Now, how about the other members whom I am delighted to see around me to-night. Look at my hon. friend the member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), a gentleman whom every member of this House delights to meet, and who, in the county of L'Assomption, which he represents so worthily, and in the city of Montreal, where he resides, is greeted with an affection such as falls to the lot of no other representative in this chamber. But it is not only in the county of L'Assomption and the city of Montreal, but all over the province of Quebec the hon. gentleman is held in equally high esteem. Why, even in the county of West York, hundreds of miles away, the name of the hon. member for L'Assomption is a household word.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I hope the hon. gentleman will spare me his compliments, unless he wants to ruin me in my county.

An hon. MEMBER. Did you not support him at one time?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I supported the Government of which he was a member, but always spoke against him, when the opportunity offered.

Mr. WALLACE. That shows that I am a much better Christian than the hon. gentleman, for I am prepared to go down into the hon. gentleman's county and prove every word I say. The hon. gentleman has gained a reputation for himself unique of its kind. Do we not know that on that great question of Canadian tobacco he was the champion who insisted that the Canadian tobacco-grower should be given ample protection.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. Speak to the question.

Mr. WALLACE. Then, there is the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). We heard his charming voice to-day, after he had been silent for a week or more; but, when we did hear it, he was obstructing the business of the House. Did he talk on the Bill which is engaging our attention? No: not one word. Are we not all delighted, when we go to the Committee of Railways and Canals, to find our genial friend, who is the Chairman of that committee, expounding the laws and regulations regarding railways, and, when we try to get in a word, we cannot get it in edgeways. The Chairman will simply say: You are entirely wrong; allow me to explain the law to you. And he explains it so lucidly that we acquiesce in his opinion and fall into line; but, though he is able to speak intelligently and fluently on every question that comes up in this House, on this important question now before us, for a whole week has his tongue been silent. What is the reason? Surely, it is not with the intention of letting us go blindly in this discussion, because I know he could give us many valuable pointers with regard to this measure? We have other gentlemen who are constantly engaged in giving us the benefit of their views in promoting the business of Parliament, but who on this question have not a word to say. We have members of Parliament who on this question, instead of giving us here the advantage of their views and taking part in the discussion, write to the newspapers under such noms de plume as "A West York Conservative," relating slanders and misstatements of every description about myself, but when we ask them to come before the committee and state their views and objections, not one word can we get from them. What is the reason? Is it because the order has gone out that they are not to speak? I could not suppose so. This is a free Parliament, and we are bound by our duty to our constituents to legislate wisely and well. We are responsible to our constituents, to Parliament and to our consciences, and, if we do not endeavour to carry out our duties as members of Parliament, we are failing in our trust, and will have to account to the people for that failure. Some hon. gentlemen seem to imagine that because this Parliament has lasted so long, we are going to sit here for ever. They are mistaken. I am told that on the 24th of this month, what has never occurred in the history of this country, nor in any country favoured with parliamentary institutions, since Oliver Cromwell ordered the bauble, as he termed the Mace, to be taken away, is going to occur here. On that day we are to be told that we can no longer remain here, but must depart at once. Is not that a humiliating position? On the 24th of April our powers to do anything are to be exhausted. Are we going to stay here until the Governor General, as it is his bounden duty to do, will order us to go away, and tell us that he wants another body of men, who will come back representing the views of the people? For these reasons I strongly urge that this Parliament is not performing its duty in attempting to carry legislation through this House. I am told that the business of the country will require us to meet again, a few short weeks after the elections are held, and they should be held at the earliest possible moment. If that be the case, why not wait for the verdict of the people? Are we above the people, that we are not going to pay any attention to their opinions? Sir, they have been looking into this question, as we have; they are interested in it equally with us. They are the men who sent us here, and, that being the case, we are not doing our duty in attempting at this late hour, and in the dying hours of this Parliament, to force this legislation upon an unwilling people and adopt a system that has never yet been tried in this Dominion. Power has been given us in our constitution to pass remedial legislation, but that power has never yet been exercised, and it should only be exercised with the greatest discretion and caution. In view of these facts, I do not think that the Government should insist on forcing this measure through. But let the question be discussed in its various phases before the people, and then those words of wisdom that fall like dew from heaven will have their effect upon the next Parliament, and we will have more careful legislation, if it be then thought necessary to legislate at all in this matter, than can possibly be enacted in these dying hours of this dying Parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. Before we adopt the motion in your hands, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this question, as we may never have another opportunity. There is no denying the fact that we are building up history very fast at present. One of the most important pages in our history will be, no doubt, that containing the account of the long sitting of this extraordinary session—the longest we have ever had. But, if the sitting has been a long one, there has been a very good reason for its extreme length. We were told at the beginning of the debate that this was the most important measure which had ever engaged the attention of the Canadian Parliament; and, as the debate went on, we began to realize more fully the force of that declaration made by the hon. leader of the House, in moving the second reading. We began sitting on Monday afternoon, and by tweleve o'clock to-night we will have sat 129 hours, during which our whole time has been given to the consideration of this most important measure. Nor is it to be wondered at that this Bill should require so much of our time, because there is no precedent for legislation of this exceptional character. It is now the 11th of April, and since we commenced considering this Bill on the 3rd of March eleven clauses have been passed or disposed of in some way. It would be an interesting problem in mathematics to calculate what length of time it would require to pass the remaining 101 clauses. Considering that this Parliament must prorogue on the 24th of April it is apparent to every one that this Bill cannot be put through the committee stage before that time. I might to-night with perfect safety pronounce the valedictory on this measure, because I believe it extremely improbable that it is likely to be introduced in any future Parliament or that we will ever be able to whip this Bill into a condition that will make it workable. There are some important clauses in this Bill, but the House last night saw what difficulty there was in understanding them. It is said that in a multiplicity of counsel there is wisdom, and I never saw a better illustration of that than I saw last night when eminent lawyers in this House were giving their opinions on certain clauses on which no two of them could agree as to the interpretation of the clause, or that it was suitable for the purpose intended. If doctors differ it is plain that lawyers differ also, when we saw them here considering a single clause for hours without being able to agree as to what it meant. I have no doubt that there has been a great deal of time wasted in this debate, but I cannot be accused of wasting time. Every time we discussed this Bill I endeavoured to make my remarks as brief as possible so as to convey what I intended, and to present the amendments which I thought necessary. I have not obstructed this Bill, unless it may be said that the giving of short explanations was obstruction. I may fairly say that I have endeavoured to devote myself as assiduously as possible to the task that was before me. Now, with regard to the result of the commission which was sent to Manitoba the other day. From my reading of the report of that commission it struck me as wonderful how difficult it sometimes is for men to come together when the differences between them are so slight. Looking at the proposal of the commissioners and at the reply of the Manitoba government it occurs to me that the whole trouble might have been settled within four hours deliberation. I believe, Sir, that the greatest good is going to follow from that commission. I believe that at no very distant time in the future it will result in bringing about a satisfactory settlement of this vexed question. Although this session may end without passing the remedial law, I am still hopeful that it is not only possible but probable that if a reasonable effort is made this question may be settled before the general election. I am sure that every one would gladly welcome such a result. It is desirable that it should be done, and the more I examine this report of the commission to Winnipeg, the more I am inclined to believe that a settlement can be effected. I have no doubt that the hon. gentlemen who went there on this commission tried to do their best. I have every respect for them. I know them to be men of amiable disposition, men of high integrity and great ability, and men who would try to accomplish what they had in view. I look upon it with a feeling of regret that they did not succeed. But I am still hopeful that their efforts will be ultimately crowned with success. Sir, if the motion that the committee do rise had been adopted at three o'clock this morning and had we met at a reasonable hour to-day, I believe that greater progress would have been made with the Bill. There is no doubt the Government desire to pass this Bill and that they are doing their best in that direction, but I think that there has been a mistake of judgment on their part. I know that the Secretary of State or leader of the House was actuated by the best intentions, but at the same time it was not right that he should ask members of this House to sit day and night. We have heard a great deal of talk about the vote on the second reading, and the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) gave a lengthy explanation of his vote on that occasion. My desire was to prevent this Bill from becoming law, because I regarded it as an unsuitable measure, and so I voted for the six months' hoist, because if carried that effectually killed the Bill, and I also voted against the second reading. I have the authority of Dr. Bourinot that the best way to kill a Bill is to vote for the six months' hoist, and that course I pursued. Dr. Bourinot says:

> The Commons have no rule on the subject, but the practice of the House is always to discuss the principle of a Bill at this stage. Any member may propose as an amendment a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the Bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosection or otherwise opposed to its progress, or seeking further information in relation to the Bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence, or the opinion of judges. All amendments must "strictly relate to the Bill which the House by its order has resolved upon considering."

Now, the member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) voted against the six months' hoist, but said that when the Bill got to the committee stage he would move an amendment of which he had given notice and which would practically change the principle of the Bill. The member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) did the same in effect. But it is a very strange thing that at the very time when these gentlemen had an opportunity of moving their amendments on the motion for the second reading of the Bill they never said a word about them. I say that this House and this country cannot regard these gentlemen as being sincere in the action which they have taken in connection with this matter. These two hon. gentlemen said: Wait till we get into Committee of the Whole. Well, we have been in the committee during the last week, and during all that time neither of them attempted to move the resolutions of which they had given notice. Are these hon. gentlemen sincere, or are they trying to befog the House and the country? Why have they not moved their amendments? Up to the present time they have not made a single effort to get the principles of those proposed amendments accepted by this House. They have made long speeches in explanation of their position, which I am told they have sent out in large numbers to the country to show that they desired to oppose the Bill ; but at the time they should have done so neither of them attempted to do it. Both of these hon. gentlemen have said time and again that they were against the principle of this Bill. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has said so to his constituents, both in public and in private ; the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) has, I think, said so repeatedly, in his paper, on the platform and in this House. But the resolution which was moved, and which above all other resolutions was best calculated to kill this Bill for the present session, which means to kill it for all the time we can kill any Bill—that is, for giving it the six months' hoist—was voted against by both of those hon. gentleman. Dr. Bourinot, in his work on parliamentary procedure, says :

> If a resolution adverse to the Bill be resolved in the affirmative, or the motion "that the Bill be now read a second time" be simply negatived on a division, the measure will disappear from the order book, but it may be revived at any subsequent time, as the House has only decided that it should not then be read a second time, and the order previously made for the second reading remains good. When a Bill disappears in this way from the Order paper, it is competent for a member to move at any time : "That it be read a second time next." On this motion being agreed to, the Bill takes its place on the orders.

That is to say, if the motion that the Bill be now read a second time be lost—the motion which both of these hon. gentlemen voted against—does that kill the Bill ? No ; it only removes it from the Order paper for twenty-four hours, when it may be restored to the Order paper, as was done in the case of the Chignecto Railway Bill this session, and the second reading may be carried. When it is desired to kill a Bill effectively, the practice, as stated by Dr. Bourinot, is as follows : —

> It is customary for those who are opposed to a Bill to move "that the word 'now' be struck out, and the words 'this day three' (or four, or six months)" be added at the end of the question.

In this case, the proper and legitimate motion for killing this Bill was made, that it be not read the second time now, but that it be read the second time six months hence. If that motion had carried, six months hence this House would not be in session, this Parliament would have been ended, and the Bill would have been killed and could not have been revived during the present session. If these hon. gentlemen had voted for that motion, the country could have credited them with a sincere desire to kill this Bill. But they did not show a sincere desire to kill the Bill by the vote they gave, because if that vote had carried, the Bill could have been restored to the Order paper twenty-four hours afterwards, and could have been read a second time then. Now, I have seen a long letter from one hon. gentleman to explain that vote against the motion for the second reading was the way to kill the Bill. Surely he could not have read May's "Parliamentary Practice," or Dr. Bourinot's work on the same subject, or he would not have made that statement, because the rule is so plain that no person can mistake it. Therefore, I do not think these hon. gentlemen can go back to their constituents and justify the vote they gave. I do not believe they will attempt to do so, because the people know enough of parliamentary practice to know the meaning of that vote. They know that when these hon. gentlemen voted against the six months' hoist they really voted for the Bill. When Mr. Speaker declared the motion for the six months' hoist was lost, the next motion he put was that the Bill be now read the second time ; and if the yeas and nays are not called for by five members, he declares the motion carried, or carried on a division ; but there is no division of the House, so far as taking down the names is concerned. Suppose the motion for the second reading of this Bill had been carried without a division, or simply on division—and it came within a fraction of being carried on division, because if my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) had not joined with those who called for a division, there would not have been a division of the House—what would have been the position of these hon. gentlemen ? They would have been in the position of having voted against the motion to kill the Bill, the motion for the six months' hoist, and not against the motion that was carried. They would have stood before the country in the position of not having made the slightest effort to kill the Bill in this House. I give this explanation, because I saw a letter in the "Mail and Empire" from one hon. gentleman explaining the vote he gave on the Bill ; and that letter was so disingenuous that I thought it would be a pity to allow it to go to the world to mislead the people of this country without explaining the real position in which these hon. gentlemen stood. I mistake the people of this country if in the coming elections they do not look into this matter and see how far these hon. gentlemen are representing their constituents, and whether they have shown an honest desire to kill this Bill.

Now, I would like to refer to another matter very briefly—not for the purpose of reflecting upon the hon. member concerned, who I see is not in the House, but for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to make any explanation he may think due to himself. We have heard a great deal of influences having been brought to bear on members of this House to induce them to vote for this Bill. I would be sorry to think that many members of this House were influenced to vote for the Bill against their honest convictions. It is a very serious thing to interfere with a member of Parliament in the discharge of his parliamentary duties. Sometimes it is said that there are no evidences that efforts have been made to influence any hon. member to vote one way or the other on this Bill ; but there is something in this paper which I hold in my hand, the "Victoria Warder," which leads me to a different conclusion. This paper is the property of the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes), and I believe this article was written by that hon. gentleman. Lest I might do him an injustice, I will read what he states :

> Mr. Hughes believes in consistency. He opposed Sir Mackenzie Bowell's policy of remedial legislation before the crisis, during the crisis and since the crisis.

But I have shown that he was not consistent—that he did not vote in the way he should have voted if he wished to kill the Bill. The article goes on :

> During the crisis, though very strong influences were brought to bear on Mr. Hughes, to induce him to give up his principles on the school question for personal preferment, he promptly refused to listen to any such proposals.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Oh, surely not.

Mr. SPROULE. I merely read this to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to it, so that he may give whatever explanation he thinks fit ; and I read it in justification of the assertion, made too frequently, I think, in this House, that efforts have been made to influence members of this House to vote for this bill. There is an acknowledgment by the hon. gentleman himself, in his own paper, that some kind of influences, whatever they were, were brought to bear upon him. He was not amenable to them, to his credit, be it said. But this indicates that there were influences at work to induce some members to vote for this Bill. That is all I have to say as to that.

I have spoken because I believe, from what I have heard, that an attempt has been made to create a false impression upon the public mind in regard to the nature of the votes which have been given on this Bill. One hon. gentleman said to me that he would not vote for the motion for the six months' hoist, because it was made by the leader of the Opposition. I said to him, "If it had been made by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), would you have voted for it then ? If it was right that you should vote for it in the one instance, it was right in the other instance. If you wished to kill the Bill, this was the only motion you could vote for to attain that end." If the hon. member for North Victoria desired to introduce some other principle into the Bill relating to schools, he should have moved it then as an amendment to the Bill at the second reading, for that is the only time he could do it. If the hon. member for South Leeds wished his principle to prevail, he should have moved it at that time. But as neither of these hon. gentlemen took that course, I have a right, and the country has a right, to assume that they were not sincere when they gave notice of their amendments. Since giving notice of them, they have never attempted to proceed with them, or to say one word with regard to them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Chairman, we have now been here nearly one week, both night and day, working away with all the energy we possess, and you need not be surprised if we feel rather wearied at this hour of Saturday night. If the members of the Government and their supporters had not obstructed the progress of this Bill so much as they have done during this week, I think a great many more clauses would have been passed, and greater progress would have been made. In fact, looking over the history of the week, I think there have been more columns of "Hansard" filled by speeches made by members of the Government and their supporters than by members on this side of the House. What do the Government really mean ?

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman say that in looking over the history of this week's debate, he finds that more columns of "Hansard" were filled by speeches of Ministers and gentlemen on this side of the House, supporting the Government, than by gentlemen on the other side of the House ?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I will explain it in this way—that the Ministers and their supporters, and those who usually work with them—meaning those of the Conservative party who have had sufficient independence to oppse the Government in this measure——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is, the opponents of the Bill ?

Mr. FOSTER. That is quite a different statement.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I still consider that these gentlemen are supporters of the Government, largely. They are only opposed to the Government on this particular measure ; and I think that if the columns of "Hansard" are counted, my statement, including that explanation, was within the truth.

Mr. FOSTER. Then my hon. friend means to state that those who are supporting the Bill, and those who were formerly and are yet Conservative members, but do not support the Bill, have filled more columns of "Hansard" in this debate than members of the Liberal party ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the point important ?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not suppose it is, but the hon. gentleman seemed to make it the substance of his speech, and it was so unfairly wrong that I thought I would like to know exactly what he did state.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do not think the statement matters much.

Mr. FOSTER. No, it is a mere matter of veracity.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I think I was within the truth. It is not necessary that the Finance Minister and myself should bandy words over that matter. I think a great many columns were spoken that it would probably have been as well not to have been spoken—probably by all parties. I admit that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I admit that. I admit this, too, if the Government had acted more wisely and had taken reasonable hours for the consideration of the Bill. "Hansard" would not be so large at the close of the session as it will be. I was willing to stay here twelve or fourteen hours to consider the Bill and make its clauses as perfect as possible; but I was not willing to stay for the remaining hours of the twenty-four, during which the members should be away getting that sleep and rest which are necessary to prepare them for their duties on the following day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask the hon. gentleman to allow me to make a remark. It is now a quarter to twelve, and I would be greatly obliged if the hon. gentleman would terminate his speech, so as to enable a Message from His Excellency transmitting important papers, to be laid before the House, with the Speaker in the Chair, before the adjournment.

Mr. LAURIER. I am very glad that at last the hon. gentleman has come to the conclusion to adjourn the House. He might have laid these papers on the Table a week ago, if he had chosen to do so.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I just wanted to say a few words.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I must ask the hon. gentleman to desist, unless he wishes to carry this discussion into Sunday morning. If he does that, the hon. gentleman must take the responsibility of invading the Sabbath.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I will conclude in a minute or two. I wanted to say that if the Government had long ago taken the position they had taken a week ago, and had had a conference with Manitoba, instead of sending the remedial order in the language in which it was couched, it would have been much better for the whole country—better for the minority, better for Parliament, better for everybody—and the whole matter would have been settled; during this session, if a session had been called, we would have been discharging the duties of the country and passing the Estimates, instead of remaining here——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Time, time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have fifteen minutes of Saturday yet, and those fifteen minutes belong to me as much as to the Secretary of State; and, if he wants a portion of that time, he must keep his followers in order. I say I think the Government will be held responsible for having caused the country to be disturbed and torn assunder by racial and religious feelings in the way we have witnessed during the last few months. Their own friends, to the right of them and to the left of them, and the whole country condemn them for putting themselves in the position they have done, and for rending assunder the different classes of the community from one end of the country to the other.

Motion (Mr. McNeill) that committee rise and report progress, negatived.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION—REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, the Report of the Commissioners appointed to confer with the government of Manitoba on the subject of the schools in that province.

Government House,
Ottawa, 6th April, 1896.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1895-96.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of Canada for the year ending on the 30th June, 1896, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, 6th April, 1896.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON laid on the Table the answer from Mr. Chamberlain to Lord Aberdeen with reference to the tender of service made by Colonel Domville, of his battalion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I move that the House do now adjourn, and, in doing so, it will perhaps be convenient for hon. members to know that the Government propose on Monday, at the meeting of the House, to take up the Remedial Bill.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at midnight (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 13th April, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION ACT.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 94) to amend the Acts respecting the Representation of the North-west Territories in the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. LAURIER. Explain, please.

Mr. DALY. As hon. gentlemen are aware, at present the Territories are represented in this House by four members, from Saskatchewan, East Assiniboia, Western Assiniboia and Alberta. We propose under this Bill, to divide Alberta into two constituencies giving an additional representative to Alberta, and in consequence an addtional representative to the North-west Territories. Clause 44 of the original Act was struck out some two years ago, and I have received a petition from the Assembly of the Territories asking that the clause should be restored. I am restoring clause 44 by this Bill, but providing that the oath is not to be taken by the elector presenting himself at the poll in the manner set forth in the original Act. He must subscribe to and take the oath in the form prescribed in the schedule. I am informed that clause 44 was struck out of the original Bill in the Senate, because a great deal of perjury had taken place in Eastern Assiniboia, and I have endeavoured under this Bill to prevent anything of that kind, by providing that those who apply to the deputy returning officer to have their names put on the list, shall subscribe to the oath and swear to it before the deputy returning officer. It is believed that there will be less danger of perjury if the person has to sign the affidavit. I have changed the oath of the enumerator, making it similar to the oath of the revising officer under the Franchise Act. The oath provided for in the Bill is as follows:—

> I, enumerator for the polling district No. (or as the case may be), of the Electoral District of swear (or solemnly affirm) that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties assigned to me, without favour or partiality; that I will place no name on the list of voters for the said polling district and will strike no name off the said list, unless I shall be satisfied that the said name should by law be placed on or struck off the said list; and that I will in all respects conform to the law to the best of my judgment and ability. So help me God.

These are the only provisions of the Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. This Bill, as I understand, meets the point that was intended to be met in the Bill which I placed upon the paper, and I think also the Bill that my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) placed there. There is in addition to that, an additional member provided for in the North-west Territories. The chief thing which the people up there are interested in is met by the first part of the Bill.

Mr. MARTIN. Do I understand the Minister of the Interior to say that Alberta is simply divided into two, and that he does not alter Eastern or Western Assiniboia?

Mr. DALY. It is simply a division of Alberta by the line which is the southern boundary of Saskatchewan being extended westerly to the western boundary of Alberta. This line runs south of Innisfail. It is nearly as equal a division of the population of Alberta as it is possible to make. The boundaries of Eastern and Western Assiniboia remain as before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is there any provision for another Senator?

Mr. DALY. That is provided for in a Bill that is being introduced in the Senate by the Premier.

Mr. McCARTHY. Who is the elector to subscribe the oath before?

Mr. DALY. The deputy returning officer on polling day.

Mr. McCARTHY. Provision ought to be made for the deputy returning officer having these forms?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. That system might cause delay on polling day.

Mr. DALY. I do not think there will be any trouble about that.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 95) to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. FOSTER. This Bill is to provide power to inspect horses that are being exported from Canada, or through Canada, at our seaports to the old country. The present Act does not give that power although it was supposed it did.

Mr. EDGAR. I notice from the papers that the spread of glanders in Liverpool is attributed to horses imported from Canada. Has the Government any information as to that ?

Mr. FOSTER. Nothing more than the rumours in the papers. It is doubtful if under the present law we have power to detain horses which had the glanders. This Bill will give us power.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman who leads the House to a resolution that stands on the Order paper with reference to the Armenian outrages, a resolution for which he was kind enough to express sympathy, and which I requested him a few days ago to take over as a Government order, as otherwise it could not be reached this session. I now renew the application, in order that it may be acted upon by the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I expressed the sympathy of the Government with the resolution which was placed on the Order paper by the hon. gentleman ; but I expressed my regret that the state of business in the House was such as to preclude us at present from naming any time when it could be taken up.

Mr. CHARLTON. I may say, Mr. Speaker—and I will follow up my remarks with a motion, if necessary—that when I was considering this matter, I consulted the hon. gentleman as to what course I should take. I took the course suggested by himself, and thus precluded myself from proceeding in any other way The motion is similar to the one passed by the English House of Commons, except——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is aware that there is nothing before the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will put something before the House, if necessary.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would point out to the hon. member that he cannot discuss a motion that appears on the Order paper on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not discussing a motion that appears on the Order paper. I am reminding my hon. friend of the communications in relation to this matter that passed between himself and myself, which I think is pertinent and proper. I ask the hon. gentleman simply to implement a promise he made to me that this motion should be taken over by the Government. I have here a communication from the hon. gentleman, with his compliments, directing what course I should take on the motion, which was submitted to him and met with his approbation ; and I wish to know if this course is to be taken. As I gave up my opportunity to bring up the motion on the House going into Supply, the hon. gentleman assured me that if there should not be time for me to discuss the motion, the Government would adopt it as a Government order. It is a matter of some importance that this motion should be moved, and I feel that the Government should carry out the promise made in reference to it.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BERGERON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to rise to a question of privilege. I find in the Montreal "Star" an article or despatch, which reads thus :

> Rumoured Appointments—Snug Berths said to be waiting many Members.—The following appointments will, it is rumoured, be announced at or previous to the end of the session.

Then follows a long list of names, among among which I find this one : "Mr. Bergeron, to be Deputy Postmaster General." I wish to declare, Sir, that never has any such position been offered to me, never have I asked for any, I am not looking for any, and I do not want any. I may say that this is a delicate question. The other day when I was presiding in the House, I heard the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) mention some names of gentlemen who, it was alleged, were to be appointed to positions. Sixteen years ago the then Minister of Public Works, now the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) offered me a judgeship in the North-west, which I declined. When Senator Trudel died, I was offered a senatorship by Sir John A. Macdonald, which I declined ; and when Senator Tassé died, I was again offered a senatorship by the present Minister of Public Works, which I again declined. I intend to remain in politics and give the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) the best thrashing he ever got in his life.

RETURN OF LICENSE FEES.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries whether arrangements have yet been made, and if so, what arrangements, for the payment of the claims for a refund of license fees in the case of the Canadian fishermen at Newfoundland, to which I referred a short time ago, in a question before the House.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Satisfactory arrangements have been made to refund that money to the parties entitled to it. The only question of delay was in consideration of the costs, and that has been arranged so that they will come out of the public treasury.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. COLTER. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works when I may expect a return to an order of the House of the 10th of February, now over two months ago, in reference to improvements in the St. John River. I received a letter from the Deputy Minister stating that I might expect to receive it in the beginning of last week. I also notice by that letter that the order of the House, made on the 10th of February, did not reach the department until the 20th of February. I would like to know if I may expect that return this session.

Mr. OUIMET. On inquiry, I find that all the officers of the department who could be spared have been put to work on that return, and it will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. PERRY. I also wish to ask the Minister of Public Works when he intends to lay before this House a return showing the amount of money spent by the Dominion Government from 1880 up to date on certain Government works in Prince Edward Island. That order was made by the House on the 3rd of February, and I do not want the return to be left till the 3rd of May. I would like to know when I may expect it.

Mr. OUIMET. My impression is that that return will be found among the papers which have been laid on the Table. If not, I will see that it is brought down.

DISALLOWANCE OF A MANITOBA ACT.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg to ask the hon. Secretary of State whether it is true or not that a certain Act of the legislature of Manitoba with regard to the taxation of loan and other companies has been disallowed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My recollection is that it has been.

CHEESE UNSOLD ON GOVERNMENT ACCOUNT.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Rider) asked:

1. How much cheese made under Dairy Commissioner on Government account remain unsold, and if sold unpaid for, and where stored ?

Mr. FLINT.

2. Where made ?

3. Have any offers been received for the balance on hand? If so, by whom made and how much ?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. Less than 100 boxes of cheese made at the dairy schools at Kingston, Ontario, and St. Hyacinthe, Quebec, on Government account are not yet disposed of because not cured enough for shipment. 2. 693 boxes of cheese made at the dairy stations in Prince Edward Island on account of the patrons there, were on hand at Charlottetown, P.E.I., at the date of last report, 2nd April. These are to be disposed of as soon as weather permits them to be shipped safely. 3. 126 boxes of cheese slightly damaged by rats or water are in the warehouse of the Montreal Cold Storage and Freezing Company. These were made at the dairy stations in Prince Edward Island. Negotiations are in progress for a settlement of the loss caused by the damage. 4. 250 boxes of cheese sold to Messrs. J. C. & G. D. Warrington are still unpaid for. The account has been put in the hands of a lawyer for collection.

TAY CANAL.

Mr. CHARLTON asked:

1. What amount of tolls were collected upon the Tay Canal in the year 1895 ?

2. What was the cost of management of the Tay Canal in the year 1895 ?

3. What amount of money was expended in repairs upon the Tay Canal in the year 1895 ?

Mr. HAGGART. Amount expended upon said canal last year, 1895, for repairs and maintenance, was $3,189. Amount of revenue last year, 1895, was $120.

FISHING LICENSES, PORT ARTHUR DISTRICT.

Mr. McCARTHY asked:

1. Who is the fishery overseer for the Port Arthur district ?

2. Is it the fact that fishermen of the name of Nuttalls were fishing in the season of 1894 in the Port Arthur district, claiming to do so under six licenses for pound-nets ?

3. Is it the fact that only three licenses had been issued to the said Nuttalls, but they claimed that they had receipts for the payment of the fee chargeable for six licenses, viz., $300 ?

4. Is it a fact that only three licenses had been issued to them, when in truth they had paid to the fishery overseer the sum of $300 ?

5. Did the same state of things exist in the season of 1895 ?

6. How many license fees did the overseer for the said Port Arthur district return for the year 1894 ?

7. Is the Department of Marine and Fisheries aware that it is said that the fees for fifty licenses were paid in fact to and received by the overseer of fisheries ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Donald F. Macdonell. 2. The Nuttalls were fishing in 1894 in the Port Arthur district and had licenses from this department for six pound-nets. 3. Four licenses had been issued to the said Nuttalls covering the privilege of fishing six pound-nets. They may have had receipts for $300, as department received that amount on their behalf. 4. Covered by No. 3. 5. In 1895, the Messrs. Nuttall held licenses from this department for four pound-nets and two boats with gill-nets, for which they paid the requisite fees aggregating $220. 6. Fifty license fees. 7. The fee covering the fifty license fees were received by the department from the overseer.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

Mr. BROWN (for Mr. Devlin) asked :

1. Was Mr. Justice Drake instructed to make inquiry into the general administration and affairs of British Columbia penitentiary, or did his commission confine him to an investigation of which the Deputy Warden Fitzsimmons was to be the sole subject ?
2. If instructions and authority were given him to make a full inquiry, why did he not exercise it ?
3. On what grounds did he refuse to hear the evidence of witnesses in defence of Fitzsimmons ? Why did he not examine the accountant, Mr. Foster ?
4. Is it true that the accountant Foster sent a confidential report to the Minister of Justice previous to and advising an investigation ?
5. Is it the intention of the Government to have a full and impartial inquiry made into the affairs of British Columbia penitentiary ?
6. What is Mr. Foster's present official position and what salary does he draw ? Is Mr. Foster accountant of penitentiaries, and is Mr. Douglas Stewart also accountant of penitentiaries, or does the latter simply discharge the duties connected with the position ? How has Mr. Foster been employed since the appointment of Mr. Moresby as warden of British Columbia penitentiary ?
7. Have any complaints been received by the Government regarding the manner in which Mr. Foster administered matters confided to him ? If so, from whom, and of what nature ?
8. How much has been paid to Mr. Foster from all sources during the years 1891-92, 1892-93, 1893-94, 1894-95, 1895-96 ?

Mr. DALY. 1. Mr. Justice Drake was instructed to make inquiry into the general administration of British Columbia penitentiary. 2. He reported that he had done so. 3. The department is not aware, further than is stated in his report already brought down. 4. Mr. Foster did not advise an investigation in any report, confidential or otherwise. 5. No. 6. Mr. Foster is accountant of penitentiaries. His salary is $1,800 per annum. For some months after the reorganization of the staff at British Columbia penitentiary he remained at that institution to assist the new officers. He is now on leave of absence owing to a severe family affliction, which prevents him from returning to Ottawa. 7. No. The payments to Mr. Foster for the fiscal years 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895 will be found in the Auditor General's Reports for those years. The returns for the current fiscal year are not yet complete.

WELLINGTON BRIDGES.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Landerkin) asked :

What was the original estimate of cost of construction of the Curran Bridge ? What has been paid upon it up to date, and what is still claimed ?

Mr. HAGGART. Estimated cost of construction of the Wellington bridges for 22-feet navigation, $223,000. Amount paid for the work up to 1st April, 1896, $405,179.40. Amount still claimed, $79,000.

LITTLE RAPIDS LOCK.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Landerkin) asked :

What was the original estimate of the cost of constructing the Little Rapids Lock ? What amount has been expended upon it ? What amount is still claimed ?

Mr. OUIMET. The work originally consisted of a lock and dam and was estimated to cost $45,000. The plans were afterwards found to be defective and had to be altered, as also the location of the work. New plans were made and new estimations prepared which brought up the cost of the work to more than four times the original estimate. The prices of Messrs. Poupore & Company's contract were schedule prices, and remained the same after the changes were made. The total amount paid to the contractors was $185,873.96, for work done according to that contract. After the completion of the contract further works, such as lock gates, dredging, timber slide, were executed by the department, which brings the total expenditure, made up to date, to $255,384.91, that sum covering in addition to the works themselves all expenditure of superintendence and other contingencies connected with the works.

GALOPS RAPIDS.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Landerkin) asked :

What was the contract price of the Galops Rapids ? What has been paid upon it ? What is still claimed ? Is that part of the canal now used ?

Mr. HAGGART. Tenders were invited in August, 1878, and no alteration has since been made. The contract price for the Galops Rapids as per extension of tender prices was $312,600. The amount paid thereon, including the judgment of the Exchequer Court, $629.630. No further sum is claimed.

ST. CHARLES BRANCH RAILWAY.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Landerkin) asked :

What was the estimated cost of the St. Charles Branch Railway ? What has been expended upon it ? What is still claimed ? What land damages have been paid ?

Mr. HAGGART. The estimated cost of the St. Charles Branch was :—Land. $228,800 ; works, $327,200 ; total, $556,000. Total expenditure upon the Charles Branch up to 7th April, 1896, was :—Land, $909,366 ; works, $822,272 ; total, $1,732,238. Amount still claimed, $5,500.

COST OF LANGEVIN BLOCK.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked :

What was the original estimate of cost of the Langevin Block ? What amount has been paid upon it ? If any, what amount is still claimed ?

Mr. OUIMET. The construction of the Langevin Block was carried on with different contractors, separate contracts being made for the building itself, the roofs, the staircases, the heating apparatus, the elevators, &c. I have been unable to find the bulk estimate for the total of the works, but the records of the department show that the estimate of the chief architect for the part of the work executed under contract by Mr. Charlebois was $440,000, while the payments to him on that account, were $405,990. The most accurate estimate of the cost I can find, is that which was stated in the House of Commons by the then Minister of Public Works, in 1889, who placed the total estimated cost of the building at $714,000. The total cost was $727,546.29, including the site, which cost $96,000. After the completion and occupation of the building, several changes, alterations, &c., furniture, and fittings were supplied, which have amounted to date to $52,080.38, bringing the total cost to $783,801.51. There is a claim of Mr. Charlebois amounting to $295,000, which has not been recognized by the department.

IMPORTATION OF UNLEAVENED BREAD.

Mr. LISTER (for Mr. McShane) asked :

Whether unleavened bread used by the Hebrews during Passover, and imported into Canada, was exempted from duty in some cities in the Dominion, and not in Montreal, where 9,000 Hebrews reside, the only exemption in Montreal being for the poor ?

Mr. WOOD. Unleavened bread imported into Canada for use during the Passover was not admitted free of duty in certain cities in the Dominion and not in Montreal. In every instance, uniformity of action prevailed, and no free entry was passed, except the conditions were in accord with the provisions of the Order in Council of 1st August, 1894, which admits the said bread, when not imported for sale, but for free distribution among the Hebrew community in connection with their religious rights. This Order in Council has been in force since the above date.

MAILS BETWEEN KESWICK AND ROACH'S POINT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

1. Did Allan Jones, post office inspector, Barrie, or any other person in the service of the Government, receive any offer for carrying the mails between Keswick and Roach's Point on the expiry of the existing contract ? If so, what were the terms of such offer, and when was it received ?
2. Who has the present contract for such service ?
3. What is the amount paid for such service ?
4. Who are the sureties for the proper performance of the contract, and in what amount have they given security for the performance of the contract ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have telegraphed for the information in reply to the first question, but a reply has not yet come to hand. I will furnish the facts to the hon. gentleman when the answer is received. In reply to the second question, the present contractor is James Cake. 3. The amount paid for the service is $130 per annum. 4. The sureties are Levi Miller and David Hamilton, and the amount in which they have given security is $300.

SHEIK'S ISLAND DAM.

Mr. MARTIN (for Mr. Mulock) asked :

1. Has any water power from Sheik's Island dam been leased or granted ?
2. If so, to whom ?
3. How much in horse power has been disposed of and at what price, terms and conditions.

Mr. HAGGART. No water power from Sheik's Island Dam has been leased or granted.

REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

On the order,

House again in committee on Bill (No. 58), the Remedial Act (Manitoba).—Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. McCARTHY. Before that order is called, I desire to draw the attention of the House——

An hon. MEMBER. The order has been read.

Mr. McCARTHY. I rose before the order was read.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman did not rise before the order was read I must leave the Chair.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did rise before the Order was read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may go on.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire to draw the attention of the House to a matter of sufficient importance to justify me in so doing. I propose to close with a motion for the adjournment of the House. Late on Saturday night the papers in connection with the negotiations which took place in Winnipeg were brought down to this House, and we are now officially seized of the facts which, of course, were known to us, more or less, from the newspaper reports which we had had an opportunity of reading before these papers were formally brought before us. Now, Sir, the negotiations, it will be remembered, originated in a proposition made by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) and that proposition, according to the statements we have had, was assented by His Excellency the Governor General. The hon. member for Montreal West then went to Winnipeg and had an interview with Mr. Greenway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow me to interrupt him to say that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), who was one of the delegates, and who is conversant with this question, is unfortunately confined to his bed to-day by illness, but is expected to be out very shortly, and I thought, perhaps, under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman would defer the consideration of this question until the hon. Minister was in his place.

Mr. McCARTHY. I see the reasonableness of the request made by the Secretary of State; but I think, if the hon. gentleman asks me to accede to it, he will be good enough to tell us that the committee will rise at a reasonable time, so that an opportunity may be afforded of discussing it. I have not the slightest objection to let it stand until the Minister of Justice is in his place, but there may be no opportunity to call attention to the matter if the committee is to sit again through until Saturday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity before Saturday, certainly, of raising the question when the hon. Minister of Justice is present. The hon. member will see that this question may be dealt with just as effectively, at any time, on the calling of the Orders of the Day, or on going into committee, as at present.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, there is no order to go into committee, there is no debate allowed on that. The only way I could put myself in order is to move the adjournment of the House, as I do. If the hon. gentleman will say that the committee is to rise to-night so that the House may meet again to-morrow, I will be willing to accede to his suggestion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is impossible to make any arrangement of that sort until we see what progress is made.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then I think under these circumstances, I can not accede to the request, which otherwise I would have been most happy to do, so that the Minister of Justice could be present to give us such other information as is not to be found in the printed papers. Now, when I was interrupted by the Secretary of State, I was outlining very shortly the condition of affairs that existed when the commissioners were sent to Manitoba. There had been an interview between the hon. member for Montreal West and Mr. Greenway, at Winnipeg, and certain communications had passed between them which gave the hon. member reason to hope that if a compromise was attempted, it would be attended with success. Now, it must be remembered that when this negotiation commenced, there were certain existing conditions which no doubt had to be taken into consideration. After the remedial order had been disobeyed, after the legislature of Manitoba had deliberately determined that they would not carry the remedial order into effect, it will be remembered that on the 27th of July a communication was made to the government of Manitoba, which is to be found in our blue-book at page 357. In that communication the reasons advanced by the Manitoba government were discussed, and amongst them it was stated that:

> Compliance with the terms of the order would restore Catholic separate schools with no more satisfactory guarantee for their efficiency than existed prior to said date. * * * The said schools were found to be inefficient. As conducted under the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education, they did not possess the attributes of efficient modern public schools; their conduct, management and regulation were defective; as a result of leaving a large section of the population with no better means of education than was thus supplied, many people grew up in a state of illiteracy. So far as we are aware, there has never been an attempt made to defend these schools on their merits, and we do not know of any ground upon which the expenditure of public money in their support could be justified.

Having stated these difficulties, the memorial proceeds :—

> “ We are, therefore, compelled to respectfully state to Your Excellency in Council that we cannot accept the responsibility of carrying into effect the terms of the remedial order.”

After reviewing other phases of the educational systems recently and now in force, in the province of Manitoba, the memorial asserts :—

"We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order."

The sub-committee desire to call special attention to the following paragraphs in the said memorial :—

"We respectfully suggest to Your Excellency in Council that all of the above considerations call most strongly for full and careful deliberation and for such a course of action as will avoid irritating complications."

"We deem it proper also to call attention to the fact that it is only a few months since the latest decision upon the subject was given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council."

So far, I have been quoting from the reply given by the Manitoba legislature to the remedial order passed by the Governor General in Council. I now proceed to read a passage or two from the communication sent from this Government to the government of Manitoba :

Fully appreciating the importance of the points involved in the above quoted paragraphs, the sub-committee beg leave to suggest that Your Excellency's Government should avail themselves of the invitation expressed in the memorial for further discussion of the subject, and that the attention of the provincial authorities of Manitoba should be invited to certain considerations suggested by the foregoing extracts.

In the interest of all concerned, it will not be disputed that if possible the subject of education should be exclusively dealt with by the local legislature. Upon every ground in the opinion of the sub-committee this course is to be preferred, and with the hope that this course may yet be followed the sub-committee have now the honour to recommend that Your Excellency will be pleased to urge upon the government of Manitoba the following further views which may be pressed in connection with the remedial order.

The remedial order, coupled with the answer of the Manitoba government, has vested the Federal legislature with complete jurisdiction in the premises, but it by no means follows that it is the duty of the Federal Government to insist that provincial legislation to be mutually satisfactory should follow the exact lines of the order. It is hoped, however, that a middle course will commend itself to the local authorities, so that Federal action may become unnecessary.

With a view to a settlement upon this basis, it seems desirable to ascertain by friendly negotiations, what amendments to the Acts respecting education in public schools in the direction of the main wishes of the minority may be expected from the Manitoba legislature.

It is believed by the sub-committee that the religious opinions and rights which have been recognized in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council could be sufficiently met by the local legislature without impairing the efficiency or proper conduct, management and regulation of the public schools.

It is with the object of effecting some such changes in the educational system of Manitoba that the sub-committee desire that an expression of opinion be obtained from the government of Manitoba. It was with this view that the Canadian Government at the last session of the Federal Parliament made the following announcement.

Now, I come to the reply, because it is important to bear in mind that when these negotiations were opened, the Government had before them this reply of the government of Manitoba, and the further fact that this reply had been, as we know, submitted to the people of Manitoba, who had approved of it by a very large majority. Now, this is what the government of Manitoba said :

Attention may be drawn to the following extracts :—

"It is believed by the sub-committee that the religious opinions and rights which have been recognized in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council could be sufficiently met by the local legislature without impairing the efficiency or proper conduct, management and regulation of the public schools."

The expression "religious opinions and rights" evidently refer to the contention that the Roman Catholic people of the province are entitled to special privileges in regard to education.

In another portion of the Order in Council may be found the following :—

"The Government has therefore decided not to ask Parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent to the Manitoba government on the subject with a view to ascertaining whether that government is disposed to make a settlement of the question which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament. A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If by that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievances of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared at the next session of Parliament, to be called as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order of the twenty-first March, 1895."

The above extracts, taken in connection with the history of the question at issue and the expressed views of those who claim to represent the minority, leave no room for doubt that the remedy of relief sought for is the re-establishment in some form of state-aided separate schools. Whether the proposal is to place such separate schools in effect under clerical control, as were the Catholic schools prior to 1890, does not appear. It is, however, reasonably certain that no concession which does not admit the principle of such separate schools and embody the same in the Educational Statutes of the province will be regarded as an adequate measure of relief or accepted as a solution of the difficulty. If this conclusion be correct, and it is submitted that no other conclusion can be deduced, any present consideration of suggested concessions other than the restoration of separate schools may be dismissed as being irrelevant to the issue. The Order in Council in question may in effect be stated to be a declaration that the advisers of His Excellency the Governor General have as a matter of educational policy decided upon the re-establishment of state-aided separate schools for the Roman Cath> olic minority, that it is desired by His Excellency's advisers that such policy shall be adopted and carried into effect by the government and legislature of Manitoba, and that should such policy not be so adopted and carried into effect, the Parliament of Canada will be forthwith asked to override the wishes of the people of the province, its legislature and government, and re-establish such separate schools by Dominion legislation.

Then it goes on, after further argument, to say :

> The question of relief to the minority, therefore, came before the Governor General in Council, and will now come before Parliament as a question of policy, to be decided upon its educational merits, subject always to the well-recognized principle that the central authority ought not to interfere with a province, except in a case of the most urgent necessity.
> The Governor General in Council was in no way bound by the constitution to make a remedial order, granting the prayer of the appellants in whole or in part, nor is Parliament now bound by the constitution, expressly or impliedly, to give effect to the remedial order in whole or in part.
> This fact being clear, it is submitted with confidence that no sufficient ground has been established for interference in our educational affairs by the Government or Parliament of the Dominion.
> The remedy sought to be applied is fraught with great danger to the principle of provincial autonomy. An independent consideration of the subject, as well as the recognized constitutional practice in analagous cases, clearly indicates that it should only be made use of as a last resort ; and after the clearest possible case has been made out, it is obvious that so drastic proceeding as the coercion of a province in order to impose upon it a policy repugnant to the declared wishes of its people can only be justified by clear and unmistakable proof of flagrant wrong-doing on the part of the provincial authority.

I pass over other arguments and come to the conclusion, as follows :—

> It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the legislative assembly to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as above stated, the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is equally a matter of regret that Parliament is apparently about to be asked to legislate without investigation.

Then it goes on :

> With a view to so doing, the government and the legislature will always be ready to consider any complaint that may be made in a spirit of fairness and conciliation.
> It seems therefore most reasonable to conclude that by leaving the question to be so dealt with, the truest interests of the minority will be better served than by an attempt to establish a system of separate schools by coercive legislation.

So, Sir, it appears by this document, from which I have culled, that the Manitoba government definitely and absolutely refused to re-establish state-aided or denominational schools. That fact must be borne in mind, when we come to inquire into the policy of the Government in sending the Manitoba commissioners to Winnipeg with a view to secure a settlement. The authority given to those commissioners appears in a document which was brought down to this House, which has not yet been printed, but which I hold in my hand. This document reads as follows :—

> The committee of the Privy Council have had under consideration, a report, dated 16th March, 1896, from the Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Prime Minister, to the effect that, on the 9th of March instant, he communicated to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, a statement made that day by the Honourable Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., in the House of Commons, which statement is as follows :—
> " Since answering the question asked a few days ago by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the following telegram has been received by Sir Donald Smith :—
> Winnipeg, 2nd March, 1896.
> Your telegram has received most careful consideration of myself and colleagues. While fully appreciating all you say, it is quite clear to us that we can only proceed to Ottawa for the purpose of holding a conference, upon the official invitation of the Dominion Government. I fully appreciate your very kind offices in this matter. In view of the assurance that the government of Manitoba are willing to have a conference, the government propose, so soon as the second reading of the Remedial Bill is carried, to have a conference with Mr. Greenway's government, with a view to arrive at a settlement of this question on terms that will be satisfactory to his government and the minority of Manitoba, but in the meantime to proceed with the question before the House, de die in diem, as previously arranged."
> (Sd.) GREENWAY.

This is the famous telegram, the whole of which was not given, but part of which was eliminated, without any intimation being conveyed on the face of the document that the whole had not been submitted to the House. I draw attention to the words "minority of Manitoba."

> The Prime Minister adds that, to the foregoing communication, the following reply was received on the 16th March instant :—
> Government House,
> Winnipeg, 10th March, 1896.
> " Dear Sir Mackenzie :
> I sent Mr. Greenway a copy of your telegram this morning, and had an interview with him after the legislature rose at six o'clock this evening. He takes the ground on behalf of the provincial government that, not being the complainants, it is not for them to volunteer suggestions. He says that the provincial government would treat with respect an official invitation to visit Ottawa. By 'official' he means an inviation by Order in Council, in which would be set forth clearly the object of the proposed visit, and the subject-matters intended to be discussed at the suggested conference. At the same time, he stated frankly that he did not see what practical results would be attained by the proposed visit.

Faithfully yours,
(Sd.) J. C. PATTERSON.

The Honourable
Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G., &c., &c., &c.

The Prime Minister recommends that, in view of the foregoing, the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba be informed that Your Excellency's advisers are prepared to hold a conference with the government of Manitoba for the purpose of ascertaining whether legislation cannot be obtained from the legislature of Manitoba, during its present session, which will deal, in a manner satisfactory to the minority of Manitoba, with those grievances of the minority which are now before the House of Commons in connection with the Remedial Bill (Manitoba).

The Prime Minister further recommends that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba be requested to inform his advisers that, immediately after the second reading of the Remedial Bill, Your Excellency's Government proposes to send a deputation to Winnipeg, if they are prepared to receive it.

This recommendation was approved, and on 17th March an Order in Council having been passed, the commission was sent to the government of Manitoba. On 21st March we had a further Order in Council, and the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Militia and Sir Donald A. Smith were appointed to proceed to Winnipeg to hold a conference with the government of Manitoba for the purpose of ascertaining whether legislation could be obtained during the present session which would deal with the matter in a manner satisfactory to the minority, and with the grievances now before the House of Commons in connection with the Remedial Bill. I emphasize that point, that this negotiation was to be conducted between the two governments, but it was to be conducted on the part of this Government for and on behalf of the minority in Manitoba. I do not think I am putting that at all too strongly. There was to be no arrangement made that was not satisfactory to the minority in Manitoba, and I apprehend, if it had not been for that fact, an adjustment would have been reached. Two things are very important in this report which has been brought down. First, we have the statement by the representatives of the government of Manitoba. It will be remembered that they stated in their letter of 30th March to the Dominion commissioners :

We desire first to refer to the understanding upon which the conference was proceeded with. You will remember that we thought it necessary before proceeding with the discussion of the question involved, to stipulate :

1st. That while the conference was proceeding, the Remedial Bill now before Parliament should be held in abeyance, and no proceedings taken thereon in the meantime, provided that the conference did not extend beyond Tuesday next.

There is a positive statement made by those gentlemen, Messrs. Sifton and Cameron, that at the outset it was agreed that, while the conference was proceeding, the Remedial Bill was to be held in abeyance until the following Tuesday. The answer to that is as follows :—

We regret to find that there has been some misapprehension as to any understanding upon which the conference was proceeded with. As to the first of those matters mentioned by you ; we understand the facts to be that you insisted that no further consideration of the Remedial Bill should be pressed for by the Dominion Government until to-day (Tuesday), and that we directed your attention to the announcement to that effect in the newspapers of the day.

If I understand it rightly, when this demand was made—a very natural and proper demand—that, pending negotiations, there should be a truce, and that the warfare carried on against the Manitoba government should cease. To that the Dominion commissioners say, that they direct attention to the statement in the newspapers of the day, which stated that the Government here had intended to stop after the second reading of the Bill, until the close of the conference. Further they state :

And having every desire to meet your wishes we further promised to communicate with the Dominion Government asking that the Bill be not taken up on Friday. This communication we sent, and we were as much surprised as yourselves to find that late on the night of the Friday sitting the Bill was advanced a stage.

Here we have, in effect, though not in terms, the substantial admission made by the commissioners from this Government, that they had referred to the statements made in the public press that the Bill would not be pressed after the second reading, and not only so, but that they had communicated the desire of the Manitoba government—no doubt, with their practical assent thereto—and they expressed their great surprise to find—their surprise being, as they put it, as great as those of the members of the Manitoba government, with whom they were negotiating—that these proceedings had been pressed. I venture to say, that if there was any desire on the part of this Government to reach a settlement of this vexed question, if there was any desire at all to come to terms with the province of Manitoba—I venture to say that it was absolutely necessary that they should observe not only the very best faith, but that they should show the most placable disposition. And to be holding out, or pretending to hold out, the right hand of fellowship one moment, while with the other hand they were pointing a pistol at the head of the Manitoba government, may be the way to ask a man for his money or his life, but it certainly is not the way to obtain a settlement between friendly governments. We must remember that that follows a long series of hostile acts. We must remember that this Government has never treated the Manitoba government in this matter, except as an enemy. We must remember that, from the beginning to the end, this Government has placed itself, as it did at the last, in the hands of this minority. It has not acted as a central power ought to act, as a friend to all—a friend to the minority, a friend to the Government against whom the minority were complaining—in order to reconcile their differences, if that were possible ; and, if not possible, to bring about a proper adjustment by means of the legislative power vested in this Parliament. But, Sir, this Government has placed itself in the hands of the minority of Manitoba, and it has forced the claims of that minority, from first to last, against the government of Manitoba, as if that Government were a hostile power. Never, from the first moment that this petition was presented in 1891, and that this Government determined by Order in Council, which, of course, was not communicated to Manitoba—not to interfere by the exercise of the veto power ; never has there been, from that up to the 1st of July last, any communication with the Manitoba government, other than the summons to appear at the Bar to answer for its legislation, with the threat held over its head, that if it failed to appear, and if it failed to show cause, and if it failed to submit, that interference would be had at the hands of the central power. Now, Sir, I think I am not wrong in saying that that course has been unprecedented, that that course has been one which was sure to cause exactly what we find—a difficulty between the central body and the province. Sir, that course, irrespective of every other consideration, calls for the condemnation of all those who are not so immediately interested in this question as are the particular minority of the province of Manitoba. But if that is an important matter, and I venture to think it is ; still more important are the suggestions made in this most interesting communication from the commissioners of this Government to the government of Manitoba. Now, Sir, we are bound to assume, having regard to the instructions that I have referred to, that these negotiations were to be carried on on the basis of reaching a result satisfactory to the Manitoba minority. We are bound to assume that these communications which I am about to read, stated what the Manitoba minority were prepared to accept as a settlement. One proposition is :

> Legislation shall be passed at the present session of the Manitoba legislature to provide that in towns and villages where there are resident, say, twenty-five Roman Catholic children of school age, and in cities where there are, say, fifty of such children, the board of trustees shall arrange that such children shall have a school-house or school-room for their own use, where they may be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher ; and Roman Catholic parents, or guardians, say, ten in number, may appeal to the Department of Education from any decision or neglect of the board in respect of its duty under this clause, and the board shall observe and carry out all decisions and directions of the department on any such appeal.

Now, contrast that with the provisions of the Bill. The Bill is, that not merely in cities, towns and villages——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is beginning to discuss the Bill ; that is out of order.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was only going to point out the difference between the Bill and this proposition ; not to discuss the Bill. If that is not in order, I will bow to your rulin, Mr. Speaker. What I propose to do is to point out the differences, but not to discuss the Bill in any other way.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. member can make a comparison without discussing the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. Of course, if you say so, according to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I will not say what the provisions of the Bill are ; but we have had them so much before us, that I dare say we all know what they are. I point out here, in this proposition, that in towns and villages there have to be twenty-five children, and in cities fifty children, before there can be a separate school. In rural municipalities there is no provision at all for separate schools. That is the proposition that is made here. Then, ten heads of families, Roman Catholics, parents or guardians, could alone enforce this provision, which hon. gentlemen will quickly realize is very different from any proposition which has been made before, whether in the Bill or elsewhere. Then, the next clause in the proposal of the commissioners is as follows :

> Provision shall be made by this legislation that schools wherein the majority of children are Catholics should be exempted from the requirements of the regulations as to religious exercises.

Well, Sir, that need hardly have been provided for, because that is the law now. The law now is that the religious exercises are not to be had in any school except by the consent and authority of the trustees. In a school, therefore, where the majority of the children were Catholics, the strong probability is, at all events, that the majority of the trustees would be also Catholics, and, if they objected to it, they would not permit the religious exercises which are enjoined by the advisory board.

Mr. DAVIN. Does not my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) misapprehend the point of that ?

Mr. McCARTHY. If so, I would be obliged to the hon. gentleman to give me the point.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman looks further into it, he will see that what this document stipulates or proposes would exempt them from the regulations in the present law, but it would leave them free to make any regulations they pleased.

Mr. McCARTHY. If that is the point it is now very clearly stated.

Mr. MARTIN. I think my hon. friend is right. I understand that to mean this. Now, it is quite true the trustees cannot have any religious exercises. If they have any, they must be those prescribed. I understand this to mean that schools where the majority of the children are Roman Catholics should be free from that requirement, and that any religious exercises which they may see fit to have should not disentitle them to their share of the Government grant, and that that should apply to all rural districts where the majority of the children are Catholic children, and to schools in cities and towns, where there are twenty-five or fifty Catholic children.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, I will suppose that is so. The next clauses are :

> Catholics to have representation on the advisory board. Catholics to have representation on the Board of Examiners appointed to examine teachers for certificates.

Now, the importance of that is this, that the Government representing the minority were willing to recognize the advisory board; and all they stipulated for was that upon that advisory board there should be a Catholic representative, which as I said before, and I say again, was most reasonable, and that there should be a Catholic representative on the board of examiners, clearly indicating that the examination was to be had by the public advisory board of the province, and not by any newly-created organization

> It is also claimed that Catholics should have assistance in the maintenance of a normal school for the education of their teachers.
> The existing system of permits to non-qualified teachers in Catholic schools to be continued for, say, two years, to enable them to qualify, and then to be entirely discontinued.
> In all other respects the schools at which Catholics attend, to be public schools, and subject to every provision of the Education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba.

Now, Sir, if I understand that, although it is not put in very definite or clear language, it means that the system of state-aided or separate schools was to be recognized in the manner stated by the hon. gentleman who interrupted me a moment ago, and who, I dare say, interpreted this better than I—that the exemption from the requirement of the regulations as to religious exercises implied the right of the trustees of these schools to have such religious exercises as they saw fit ; in other words, to establish in rural sections as well as in cities, towns and villages, a system of separate schools. But the important matter, and the only important matter in these suggestions—the only difference, or the substantial difference between the secular system as it exists in Manitoba to-day and that which the Dominion commissioners, on behalf of and representing the minority, desired to have—was the recognition of state-aided separate or denominational schools. If that was so, it was an idle task to send these commissioners to Manitoba ; because, Sir, it was impossible for the Manitoba government to state that they had any hope of giving state-aided separate schools, regard being had to their reply of December last, upon which they had appealed to the electors of the province, and upon which the electors of the province had decided by an overwhelming voice that it was impossible for the Government of Manitoba to recede from that position, while almost anything else was practicable in the negotiation. Now, Sir, did this Government recognize that fact or not ? Is it possible to doubt that this government failed to recognize that salient fact—that while every other possibility of settlement existed, it was impracticable for the government or the legislature of Manitoba to recede from that which their electors had decided on, namely, the absolute refusal to recognize state-aided separate or denominational schools ? Let me draw attention in the end to the final reply on this point, of the commissioners of the government of Manitoba :

> The point of difficulty in arriving at a basis of settlement seems to be very clearly defined. You maintain that, in the words of your memorandum, " the Roman Catholics " certainly have important legal rights in " connection with separate schools," and that your idea of the object of the conference is to give effect to those rights in the most unobjectionable way, through the action of the legislature of the province.
> We hold on the contrary that the constitution gives the Roman Catholics no legal rights in reference to separate schools, except the right of appeal under which the Federal authority may, or may not, restore any rights formerly enjoyed under provincial legislation.
> Your proposition aims at the legal recognition by the legislature of Manitoba of the right of the Roman Catholic people to separate for school purposes. Our proposition aims at removing every practical objection to the present system without giving a legal right to separate. We understand that by Order in Council your authority is limited to making a settlement satisfactory to the minority, and that as a matter of fact the minority will accept nothing short of statutory recognition of the right of separation.

Now, is this not absolutely conclusive ? Is it possible for the government of Manitoba, representing and supported by the legislature of that province, or for that legislature, under such conditions, to make any other answer ?

> We regard ourselves as precluded by our declaration of policy preceding our last election from assenting to such statutory recognition. While joining with you in the earnest desire to > reach a settlement, we are unable to suggest any way of reconciling these two propositions.

> We are of the opinion that there would be no objection on principle to the plan we propose, and that its practical operation would prove to be very satisfactory. It would give substantial relief on every material matter without legal separation. If the minority insists on legal separation there does not seem to be any possibility of reaching a basis of compromise.
> We cannot but express our regret and disappointment at the failure of our negotiations. We assumed when a conference was asked for by the Federal Government, with full knowledge of the fact that we were clearly estopped by the terms of the Order in Council of December 20th, 1895, from assenting to the re-establishment of separate schools in any form, that it was with the object of securing substantial modifications, which while falling short of the principle of separation, would remove every alleged reason for Roman Catholic opposition to the use of the public schools. We think that the proposition which we have made would, if adopted, remove every such reason, and it is therefore such a proposition as we believed you had come prepared to accept. Its non-acceptance apparently is due to the determination of the minority to insist upon the most extreme, and in our opinion, unsound view of their legal rights.
> We entered upon the task of seeking a settlement of the question at issue in the face of grave and obvious difficulties.
> In the first place, so far as the re-establishment of separate schools is concerned, the question has for years been considered settled so far as the people of this province, to whom we are responsible, are concerned.
> In the next place we have hitherto believed that a state-aided separate school system, and that only, would be accepted by the minority. This view we have repeatedly stated, and we have not yet been authoritatively informed to the contrary. That our contention in this respect was, and is correct, is shown by your proposition, which indubitably means a system of schools separating by law Protestants from Roman Catholics and wholly dependent for support upon municipal taxation and the legislative grant.

I submit either the Government knew what this basis of settlement could possibly be or they rushed headlong into the negotiations for the mere purpose of show. Did they or did they not recognize, not merely the memorandum from the government of Manitoba communicated here last December, but the fact, that upon that document the government of Manitoba appealed to its people and the people had sustained and approved of its course. Was it possible, under these circumstances, to expect the Manitoba government to recede from that position, and was this Government disposed to recommend the minority—because that may be a possible explanation why this Government sent its commissioners—look upon this matter in a reasonable way and accede to reasonable proposals, which, of course, could not include the restoration of state aid to separate schools. But let us see what the counter proposition was to that submitted on behalf of Manitoba.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would like to call his attention to a phrase in their order of December which, to me, is not at all as broad as that stated in the last communication. They say "whether the proposal is to place such separate schools in effect under clerical control, as were the Catholic schools prior to 1890, does not appear." They seem to object to separate schools so placed and not to separate schools which would not be so placed.

Mr. McCARHTY. My hon. friend does not quite see that as it should be read. What these gentlemen here say is this, that whether the communication from this Government in July is to place such separate schools under clerical control, as were the Catholic schools prior to 1890, does not appear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why should it be a matter of consequence whether it appeared or not, if that were not the basis of objection ?

Mr. McCARTHY. It seems to me what they mean is this. What you propose to us is some modification of the school law, something in the direction of a settlement, we are now reciting the substance of what you have said, and we are unable to say whether you desire that the separate school system should be restored under clerical control or without it, but still separate schools. Then they go on to affirm that they will have no separate schools under any circumstances.

Mr. MARTIN. The next two sentences make it clear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. McCARTHY. They proceed to say :

> It is, however, reasonably certain that no concession, which does not admit the principle of such separate schools and embody the same in the educational statutes of the province, will be regarded as an adequate measure of relief or accept as the solution of the difficulty.

They say they do not intend, whether in the communication of July it was intended to ask the control of the clerical schools—that separate schools under the control of the clerical authorities—or separate schools not necessarily under ecclesiastical authority, to restore such schools. Their answer, however, is what I was dealing with. It is emphatic that they would not, under any condition, restore separate schools. That has been the settled policy of Manitoba ever since 1890, from which the legislature has never deviated or given any indication of any intention to depart. I want to draw the attention of the House to the reply to the offer made by these gentlemen.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me. On page 362 they put beyond any doubt what they mean :

It is therefore recommended that so far as the government of Manitoba is concerned, the proposal to establish a system of separate schools, in any form, be positively and definitely rejected, and that the principle of uniform nonsectarian public school system be adhered to.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am obliged to my hon. friend for supplying the place. I did intend to quote that, but could not put my finger on it at the moment. Let us see what this proposal was, it being perfectly plain and clear that is was impossible even to ask the government of Manitoba to recede from the system of non-sectarian schools, under the circumstances which I have mentioned. Let us see then what was the offer, and whether the offer made was such as ought to have been accepted, if this Government had not chosen to hand over its authority into the hands of this minority. What I am urging now is that the Government of this Dominion—which certainly ought to act in an impartial way, which is as much the Government of the majority in Manitoba as it is that of the minority—should not have made itself a party to that very section, but should have held the balance fairly and evenly between both, and endeavoured to do what was right and proper in seeking to effect a compromise between those who are complaining and the government of Manitoba who refused to yield to their complaints. Here is the offer of the Manitoba government :

First—Should it be accepted as a satisfactory measure of relief to the minority and as removing their grievances, we hereby offer to completely secularize the public school system, eliminating religious exercises and teaching of every kind during school hours. We desire it to be understood in connection with this proposition, that it is made as a compromise offer and not embodying the policy which the Government and legislature of the province are themselves desirous of pursuing. We are willing, however, to adopt such a measure in order to attain a settlement of the dispute.

Now, if the complaint was, as raised in the petition for the disallowance of the Act and which has been reiterated in other documents, and which was contended by their counsel before the Privy Council here—if the complaint was that these were Protestant schools, that they were sectarian schools, that it was a great injustice to compel Catholics to support these schools to which they could not conscientiously send their children, while leaving them the burden of paying for the education of their children in addition to contributing for public schools, this offer was destined to remove it. And it was an offer, as stated here, which was not agreeable either to the government or the legislature, and, I venture to say, to the majority of the people of Manitoba. It is perfectly certain, if we are to judge at all from the statements made by the representatives of religious bodies of Manitoba, whether they be the church of England, or Presbyterian, or Methodist, or Episcopalian, that they all believe in a certain amount of religious teaching and religious exercises. It is certainly clear, from the statement of the Bishop or the Archbishop of the Episcopalian Church, that they are not satisfied with the religious teaching which exists there at this time. They want more of it, and they put up with what they get, because they cannot very well better their position in that respect. At page 384 of this blue-book, we have a communication from the Bishop of Rupert's Land, in which he puts the matter in this way :

The system at first established by the local legislature, by which the Roman Catholics had separate schools entirely under their own management, and all others, grouped under the name of Protestant, had common schools, never worked to our satisfaction, though we always had the hope of improvement.

That system failed to give the state a proper security for good secular instruction in the Roman Catholic schools, while it gave that body an unfair advantage over other denominations—an advantage which in this province it was not entitled to by any numerical majority. But, as we realized that like advantages could not be given to other bodies in the circumstances of the country, we submitted to the denominational disadvantage, in the hope that a fairly satisfactory system of religious instruction might be established in the so-called Protestant schools. We never thought of any instruction beyond what is recognized in England by the state as unsectarian—the opening of the school with authorized forms of prayer and the reading of the Bible—the reading and teaching and learning by heart selected portions of the Holy Scripture and the learning of the Apostles' Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer.

This is not regarded by the state authorities in England as Protestant instruction, but as unsectarian, that is as giving instruction on what is believed in in common by at least all the great religious bodies, Roman Catholic and Protestant. But so many members, placed by the government on the Protestant section of the Board of Education, were favourable to simply secular instruction, that our hope was never realized. Arrangements were under consideration for giving instruction in selected passages of the Bible and the Apostles' Creed was required to be learned by heart, but neither it nor the Bible was ever taught.

Then the present system of education was established. As a church we took no part in the struggle. The new system does not satisfy us any more than the old. But I address you now, as we are anxious that the schools should not become still more unsatisfactory.

At the present time we gladly welcome in the short prayer and the reading of Holy Scripture, an acknowledgment of the need of the divine guidance and blessing and of the need and place of that divine word, that should be the lamp to our feet and the light to our path. There is also the learning and teaching of the Ten Commandments, as the divine foundation of moral instruction.

Now, what would be the meaning of the exclusion of these and the secularizing of the schools thereby ? Surely not merely the loss of these important advantages, but the exclusion from instruction of every allusion to God or what could touch religion in fact or history. It would be, I dare say, impossible to teach English literature at all adequately on such terms, yet contrary to the spirit and intent of the law to act otherwise.

I need not pursue this further. I only read it to show that, as far as the Church of England is concerned, the Synod adopted these resolutions which the bishop communicated to the Prime Minister here. It is certainly the same, I think I am safe in saying, with the Presbyterians, and I think it was the same with the Methodists, and these form the great proportion of the population of Manitoba. What I am emphasizing is that the Manitoba government were willing to yield, for the sake of peace, they were willing to say: If it is complained that these schools are Protestant, we are willing that they should become secular schools, and thus remove the objection—which, after all, is the only one, it will be remembered, which appears in the petition presented and signed by the late Archbishop, and quite a number of his co-religionists in the province of Manitoba. That proposal, of course, was not acceptable to Roman Catholics. We know from statements which have been made, and to which I have referred more than once, that the Catholics prefer the educational system which exists in Manitoba to-day to the secularization of the schools. I remember that it was made a charge against the leader of the Opposition that his policy was to secularize the schools. In a very celebrated speech by Mr. Pelletier, delivered some time last winter, or the winter before last, the charge was made against the leader of the Opposition that he was in favour of what Mr. Pelletiér called neutral schools, which, this gentleman went on to say, speaking, I believe, for his party, and his church as well, were more objectionable to them than schools in which there are such religious exercises as there are in the schools of the province of Manitoba. There is the further fact, known to all, that in the province of Ontario, the late Archbishop Lynch sat down with the dignataries of the other religious bodies, and agreed to certain forms of religious exercise, and the reading of certain parts of scripture in the public schools, which more than one-half, not far from two-thirds, of the Roman Catholic children attend. We all remember the controversy that took place with regard to that. I am not now doing more than referring to the fact that this proposition could hardly be accepted by the Roman Catholics, but it still was proper and necessary that it should be made. Now, the second alternative was:

> Second, in the alternative we offer to repeal the present provisions of the School Act relating to religious exercises, and to enact in substance the following:—
> No religious exercises or teaching to take place in any public school, except as provided in the Act. Such exercises or teaching, when held, to be between half-past three and four o'clock in the afternoon.
> If authorized by resolution of the trustees, such resolution to be assented to by a majority, religious exercises and teaching to be held in any public school between 3.30 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Such religious exercise and teaching to be conducted by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person satisfactory to a majority of the trustees who may be authorized by said clergyman to act in his stead; the trustees to allot the period fixed for religious exercises or teaching for the different days of the week to the representatives of the different religious denominations to which the pupils may belong in such a way as to proportion the time allotted as nearly as possible to the number of pupils in the school of the respective denominations. Two or more denominations to have the privilege of uniting for the purpose of such religious exercise. If no duly authorized representative of any of the denominations attend, the regular school work to be carried on until four o'clock.
> No pupil to be permitted to be present at such religious exercises or teaching if the parents shall object. In such case the pupil to be dismissed at 3.30.

Now, Sir, is this not an offer which, if this minority was reasonable at all, ought to be accepted? Is this Dominion under the control of a Government which will not bring any pressure to bear upon this minority, but who hand themselves over to the minority, to make themselves the agents and abettors of this minority in all their demands? Is this Dominion to be rent in twain because a handful of people in Manitoba decline to accept either one or other of these two propositions? Is it to be supposed that the people of this province, the people of any other part of the Dominion are to support this Government in maintaining this view? The Manitoba government says: If you complain that the schools are sectarian, we propose to abolish all that part of the system which requires the teaching of religion, and to completely secularize the schools; we do it against our will, but we do it for the sake of peace. If your objection is such that you want your children taught religion by your own people, by their own religious leaders, we propose that a portion of the school day—not after school hours, but a portion of the school-day, before four o'clock, the ordinary time for the dismissal of the scholars—a proper and reasonable time for that purpose, shall be devoted to religious exercises, and that "the Christian clergymen"—to use the language of the document—"whose charge includes any portion of the school district" is to be at liberty to come in for half an hour, day in and day out, and instruct the class in the religion of their parents, and of the body to which they belong. If the section is wholly Catholic, the result will be that for the five school days of the week, the priest or curé will be at liberty to come and teach religion to the children. If the school is divided, then the very reasonable proposition is made that these half-hour periods shall be apportioned to the representatives of the different denominations, unless there is sufficient accommodation in the schoolhouse to admit of the children being sent into different rooms. I forget if that last is a condition, but it is one, no doubt, that might have been applied. But, Sir, this is rejected. Let us see what is the ground of objection. It is hard to grasp in one sentence what the ground is, because it is more an argument than a statement, and I will have to trouble the House with the reasons given by the Dominion commissioners at perhaps a greater length than I had hoped to do, because I am unable to put my finger upon any particular passage or paragraph which states the ground of those very reasonable propositions I have mentioned in a way that would do justice to the argument of the commissioners of the Government. I read now from the Manitoba document, page 7:

> A few words are necessary as to the character of our memorandum. It was put in general terms as a suggested basis upon which our future discussions might proceed with a view to a possible agreement of all parties interested. It is therefore open to some of the objections raised by you, inasmuch as it does not deal with details, and professes only to lay down broad lines upon which legislation might be drawn.
> In addition to this, we must premise that sufficient weight is not given by you to the undoubted legal position of the Roman Catholics. Under the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the remedial order they certainly have important rights in connection with separate schools, and while the Dominion Parliament may have jurisdiction to enforce some or all of those rights, it is universally acknowledged that this could be done with more advantage to all parties by the local legislature, and for this reason we are holding this conference. A discussion of the disadvantages of separate schools is therefore in our view not relevant to the present situation, and is likely to raise misleading issues. In our view much of your argument misses its mark because you have not recognized the present position of affairs and dealt with our suggestions as compared with a regular system of separate schools such as might be established under the Remedial Bill, or under the old system, but have rather confined your attention to maintaining that our position would involve some of the drawbacks of these other schools.

Now, I venture to say that this is a misconception which, from the first to the last, either the Government or some members of the Government pretend to have. The legal right of the Manitoba minority cannot be too often stated. The legal right of the Manitoba minority is not to have separate schools re-established, the legal right of Manitoba is to appeal. The power of the Governor in Council was to listen to that appeal, and grant the prayer of that petition if they thought fit, or to reject it if they deemed it inadvisable on any or all grounds. Then it comes to this Parliament, as we have it now, with full and undoubted jurisdiction, not to restore the legal rights, but to carry out as far as, in the estimation of this Parliament, we think proper to carry out the terms of the remedial order. Everything is discretionary. It is discretionary with the Governor in Council to pass the remedial order; it is discretionary with this Parliament to implement or abolish the remedial order, to go as far as we please, or not to go at all. But to speak of it as a legal right in a binding sense—the term is misleading, and if we start on that basis, of course there can be no possible agreement:

> We deeply regret that you have felt obliged to reject our proposition, and with all deference it does not appear to us that the objections, general and special, which you urge are such as to necessarily involve so serious a step. It would serve no useful purpose for us to support our view with any detailed argument, but some general considerations may be advanced as to the three objections upon principle which you mention, viz.: (1.) That our plan would divide the population into two classes, Roman Catholics and Protestants, giving the former class privileges as against the latter. (2.) That it would establish a system of state supported separate schools, and (3). That the whole school organization would be modified to an unusual extent to bring it into accord with the separate school principle. As to the first of these objections we may observe that the separation of the Roman Catholics as a class does not arise from our suggestions. It is made by the constitution and arises as to them because they happen to be a minority of the population.

There, again, is confusion of ideas on the part of the writer of this document, which no doubt leads to mischievous results. Roman Catholics and Protestants are, in a sense, divided by the Manitoba Act. The minority, whichever it might be, have the right of appeal; but it did not follow, as has been held by the Privy Council, that the legislature of Manitoba might not establish a public school system; the contrary of that has been affirmed. It is perfectly constitutional to do that, subject, of course, to the rights of the minority to appeal to the higher legislative body for the supervision of that legislation. The Manitoba commissioners go on to say:

> It is inaccurate to say that any privilege is given to them as against the rest of the population. It is only the rights conferred on the minority by the constitution that are in question. The problem presented in the school question is to secure to them their just and lawful privileges under the constitution in such a manner as to cause the minimum of interference with the public school system of Manitoba, and in that view we think our suggestion has merits.

Well, Sir, I do not doubt that if it was possible to admit the system of separate schools, the suggestions, which are acceded to, so far as I understand, by the minority, have merits. They have the merit that they are far to be preferred, in some respects, at all events, to the Remedial Bill:

> As to your second objection we may observe that the Roman Catholic population contribute their share of all taxation for schools, and in return are entitled to obtain education for their children. It is now a question of the mode of that education in view of the rights held by the minority under the constitution. The contention that the system we propose would be unduly expensive and the limitations on ordinary separate school privileges embodied in our proposition will be considered later on. In so far as there is any principle violated by the application of taxes to the support of schools in which Roman Catholic doctrines are taught, your alternative suggestion would seem to be quite as objectionable as ours.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In case the proposition of Manitoba had been accepted, does the hon. gentleman understand that that would have given any religious body, as a matter of right, the privilege of giving instruction in the subject of religion without the consent of the trustees, say in Winnipeg, or any place where the majority might have been adverse ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I certainly understand that it did, I think it can have no other meaning. I think one has only to read these suggestions to be convinced of that. The only thing I understand the trustees had any say in at all, was when a representative Christian clergyman was deputed by him to appear and represent him in the schools :

> Such religious exercise and teaching to be conducted by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person satisfactory to the majority of the trustees, and who may be authorized by said clergyman to act in his stead.

So the trustees have nothing to say except as to the representative of the clergyman. They were authorized, perhaps reasonably so, to object to one who was not in charge of any portion of the district, and who was sent there to represent the clergyman. It seems to me perfectly plain that the trustees were not in any sense to have an unlimited right. Certainly, it would not have been a very reasonable proposition.

Mr. MARTIN. What is the meaning of the first part of that paragraph "authorized by resolution of the trustees" ?

Mr. McCARTHY. "Such exercises or teaching, when held, to be between half-past three and four o'clock in the afternoon." That, I understand, means the time between the secular system and the religious system. That is the law at present. The trustees have no control to say whether there is to be a religious system or a secular system; and I recollect Mr. Sifton saying that in the Brandon school, where his own children attend, is a secular school ; and it is carrying out that part of the Manitoba Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is an alternative, the first proposition is in favour of secullar schools ; the second proposition, it seems to me, is in favour of permitting religious instruction upon condition that the trustees assent to it.

Mr. McCARTHY. That possibly may be so.

Mr. MARTIN. But once they do assent to it, then any clergyman has the right ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Take the case of Winnipeg, for instance, where three-fourths of the population are Protestant, where the entire school board might be Protestant, and where the school board might object altogether to religious instruction being given for half an hour each day.

Mr. McCARTHY. All I can say with respect to that is this : Of course, if that is the objection, it is one not suggested by the Government commissioners. I do not think there would be any difficulty, because, as I understand, the great portion of the population believes in religious exercises—they would not secularize the schools. But that is not a matter for negotiation. The matter I am dealing with, however, is the answer to the proposition made by the commissioners of this Dominion. They made their proposition ; they made some alternative propositions. I am considering now the answer made to the alternate propositions submitted by the commissioners sent by the Dominion Government. Passing to clause 3, the House will find, on page 19, that the commissioners are answering objections made by Messrs. Sifton and Cameron to the original suggestions of the commissioners. The commissioners say :

> In reply to your third objection, we beg to urge upon you that the changes we suggest are much less than what we understand to be involved ordinarily by the establishment of separate schools. We do not insist upon normal schools. As to text-books, and representation on the boards, as a matter of practice and administration we find that you raise in point of fact no objection.

That is true. I have pointed out that on the Board of Education, a position was offered to the last Archbishop.

> We do not ask that the Roman Catholics have a separate right to elect trustees or otherwise to have any special representation on the board of trustees, being content with the protection afforded by an appeal to your own department of education, and in this respect our proposals very materially limit what is always considered the privileges essential in connection with a separate school system. The proposed schools would be controlled by trustees elected by the whole body of ratepayers under the provisions of your school law. There does not seem to be any adequate foundation for your remark that the carrying into effect of our suggestion would involve a modification of school organization greater than usual in cases of separate schools. We desire to minimize such modification, and think that to some extent we succeeded.
> Your second objection in detail seems founded on a misapprehension. Our memorandum was drawn on general terms, and did not in any > sense intend to exclude the principle of election on the part of the Roman Catholics, a principle which is elementary, and which is embodied in the Remedial Bill.

> As to your third objection, we cannot agree that there would be any special disadvantage in having Roman Catholic children in a separate room as distinguished from teaching them in a separate building. It would seem to be quite as objectionable on principle to separate them for religious exercises, as one of your own suggestions would involve.

With regard to the financial objections, the reply says :

> The ground taken in your fifth objection has been touched on in the preceding remarks. As to clause two of our memorandum, your objections could be met by provisions as to detail. If desired the privilege of teaching religion could be limited to a certain time in the schools attended by Roman Catholics. The point that provision should be made for non-Catholic children is certainly well taken and is quite in accordance with our views, which were in this respect imperfectly expressed in the memorandum. Neither of the propositions which you make would, as it appears to us, remove the sense of unjust treatment existing amongst the minority, nor would they possess the elements of permanency and freedom from friction in administration which are certainly necessary for final and peaceable solution of existing difficulties.

The only reply made by the commissioners under the dictation of the minority to the proposition to secularize the schools, or to the proposition to admit religious teaching during school hours on terms that were fair to all, was that such would fail to " remove the sense of unjust treatment existing amongst the minority, nor would they possess the elements of permanency and freedom from friction in administration which are certainly necessary for a final and peaceable solution of existing difficulties." It must be borne in mind that the Secretary of State who is pushing this Bill through the House, and is himself, and I believe he is very proud of it, and perhaps deservedly so, the author of the school law of 1864 in the province of Nova Scotia, which, we are told continually, is giving perfect satisfaction to Catholics and Protestants, claimed that it has been in force for thirty odd years without friction or complaint of injustice, and that when we look at that Act, we find it is not so favourable to the rights of the religious minority of the province as the proposition contained in this correspondence with Manitoba. The Nova Scotia Act provides a simple system of public schools, in effect, abolishing, to some extent, a system of separate schools that existed up to that time. I speak subject to correction, but my information is, that up to 1864, when the Nova Scotia school law was enacted, there were voluntary schools of all denominations, and those denominational schools were supported, to some extent, by Government subsidies. So that there was in Nova Scotia, prior to 1864, a system by which Roman Catholic separate schools, and Church of England schools and other schools obtained a certain measure of support in the form of contributions to teachers' salaries made by the Nova Scotia government. That system was superseded by the hon. gentleman who now leads this House, and who is insisting with great vehemence on this House the passing the Bill now before it, and it must be remembered that the Nova Scotia law was passed against the remonstrances of some leading Roman Catholics. We have heard it stated that it was passed with the support of the Roman Catholics, that the Archbishop of that day was pleased with the law, and that it has given satisfaction ever since. I cannot find that the first statement is historically correct. We must remember that at that day the question of denominational schools, as we understand them, was not, perhaps, so fully realized in Nova Scotia. I find on reading the debate that the proposition of the Government was likened to the Massachusetts public school system, and it was pressed and urgently pressed by Mr. Miller, now a member of the Dominion Senate, who was a member of the Nova Scotia assembly, at the time, that the proposed law was unfair to the Roman Catholics, for it enacted a system of schools for which they would be called upon to pay taxes although not able to send their children to them. So I do not think the recollection of the Secretary of State with regard to that subject was very accurate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will remember that I was speaking regarding events that occurred a long time ago, and when my attention was called to the fact that Mr. Miller had taken exception to the Act, I quite admitted that such was the fact, but it had passed from my recollection. I know that, at the time, I had the support of the whole Roman Catholic representatives in the legislature of Nova Scotia, perhaps not the very warm support of Mr. Miller at that time. I had forgotten, at the time, that circumstance, and I subsequently admitted that such was the case.

Mr. McCARTHY. I remember that when the Secretary of State made that statement, the assertion was thrown out that he was not the author of the School Bill and he had not made provisions for the Roman Catholics asserted here.

What I wanted to point out—and I will be saved the necessity of doing that at any length by the admission which has now been made that that Bill was opposed by Mr. Miller upon the very ground that it was compelling Catholics to contribute to schools to which they could not send their children. Let me read an extract or two from Mr. Miller to make that perfectly plain. At page 50 of the parliamentary debates of that year, Mr. Miller said :

> Mr. Miller * * * simply wished to express his conviction that the principle enunciated in the Bill was not the sound principle upon > which the educational system of the country should rest. In his opinion the denominational system was the only correct one. * * *

Mr. Miller further on, at page 52, said :

> But on a question of so important a character it was not strange that there should exist some diversity of opinion as to what was the soundest principle upon which to rest our common school structure. This was always found to be the case in every country divided by different interests and ideas into discordant elements. * *
> He considered the usurpation of that right (i.e., the right to enforce education by compulsory enactments) by the state, a gross violation of the natural rights of the parent, and an attempt under the cover of a broad principle to exercise the spirit of tyranny and intolerance.
> He was in favour of grounding the common school system of the country on the denominational system, as the wisest and the most consistent that could be adopted. * *
> He feared that what he considered the best basis of our school system would not be favourably received by a majority of the House, and he was therefore willing to accept what might be esteemed a second best. But, in doing so, he did not wish to be looked upon as according a preference to the Hon. Provincial Secretary's Bill for views which he sincerely entertained.

Now, at page 70, the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) used the following language, and it is quite evident that the hon. gentleman has departed from his early record. He then said :

> That he had never disguised his motives and object in preparing the Bill. He had on more than one occasion said, and he repeated it now, that he approved of the compulsory assessment principle for the support of common schools, and believed it to be the most efficacious and practicable mode of establishing a proper basis of educational means in the country. He had been deterred from adopting only because of the difficulties that lay in the way of carrying it into effect at the present time.

Mr. Miller, at page 71, again says :

> 3. If the measure now before the House only compelled those who agreed to subscribe for the support of schools in any district to pay the requisite amount, he would not object to it as far as that part of it was concerned, because if people voluntarily entered into an agreement to pay for schools they could not complain if payment was executed, but he contended that it was neither fair nor just to compel the minority to enter into an arrangement agreed to by the majority. * * * * * *
> He was entirely opposed to the principle of compulsory assessment, and he could not look upon the clause they were discussing without feeling that it had one object in view, which was altogether repugnant to his feelings. He was sure such a law would create strife, turmoil and discord among the people of the province, and therefore it was that he gave it his most strenuous opposition.
> 4. His chief objection was the want of provision for a fair distribution of the funds raised among all classes. Was it the desire of the House that any body of men would be obliged to support schools in whose benefits they might not be able conscientiously to participate ?

Compare that language with the language of the petition. This was the time when the Nova Scotia school law was passing through, and the objection made by a leading Roman Catholic was that it was not fair nor right to oblige the parents of children to contribute to the support of schools, in the benefits of which they might not be able conscientiously to participate. Mr. Miller goes on to say :

> It was no matter whether his conscientious scruples were sound or unsound, it was the duty of the state to respect them. To attempt to pass judgment upon them was a tyrannical intrusion of the domain of conscience, permitted to no earthly power. The state did not inquire if one's religious views were true or false to accord to them the fullest recognition of protection. So should it be with the sincerely entertained opinion of any class on the subject of education. Wherever this doctrine was denied constitutional freedom was a mockery—religious toleration a farce. In conclusion he reiterated his belief that the House was about to introduce strife and discord where there should be unity and peace.

Now, Sir, that Nova Scotia law has been in force for thirty years, or more, and we are told, over and over again, by every representative from Nova Scotia, by the Secretary of State himself, that that law has given perfect satisfaction.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. That law has given practical satisfaction, while it makes no provision at all for religious exercises, while it permits them simply, as I understand, in practice, while it leaves religious education solely to the management of the trustees, there being but one curriculum, one set of books, one inspection, and one management, and simply such religious education as the trustees may direct. I suppose, in Protestant sections, if they are illiberal, they are not satisfactory to the Roman Catholic minority, and in Roman Catholic sections, I suppose the same thing might be said with regard to the Protestants. But, Sir, if that Nova Scotia law is satisfactory, how can the second proposition that was made by the Manitoba commissioners be rejected as unsatisfactory. In Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick—where we are told practically the same thing exists—there is no legal right to separation, there is no legal right to have religious teaching of a formal character in any school, and the enjoyment of that privilege is merely an enjoyment by common consent or courtesy, and not by right. If that is satisfactory, how can the proposition that is made by Mr. Sifton and Mr. Cameron be deemed unsatisfactory, who propose that portion of the school hours, every day, should be set apart for religious exercises, and that the religious exercises of the majority should be permitted, or if there was a difference in the school, that the religious exercises should be in proportion to the numbers attending : how, I say, can that proposition be rejected as unfair. For this reason. I submit that this House should now consider, whether at the late stage we have arrived at this session, within, now, ten days of our final dissolution, when it is absolutely impossible for us to pass this Bill ; I say, this House should consider whether we are warranted in continuing to waste the time of the House and of the country, in a vain and futile effort. I say it is absolutely impossible to pass this Bill, if it is to receive that consideration at the hands of this House which its importance demands. We have been in committee all last week, with what advantage ? Sir, the committee declined to consider this question, after the leading members of the Government, who had charge of the Bill, sought that repose which nature demanded, and from that time, up to the next day, and sometimes beyond the hour of meeting next day, nothing practical was done in advancing the Bill through committee. I am not called upon here—and perhaps I would be called to order if I ventured to express an opinion about the proceedings of the committee—but, what I do mean to say is, that is the practical result, and the country will judge by and by, when appealed to on this question, whether, in taking that course, the hon. members who took that course, were in the right or whether the course of the Government, in endeavouring to force this Bill through the House by a continuous sitting, at which it was impossible the full committee should be represented, was the better or the fairer course. But, Sir, I want to draw attention to what seems to me to be a very analogous case. I have once or twice before drawn attention to it, but I propose to do so now in a little more detail, because it seems to me it is a very fair illustration to show the time we have lost—for, practically, it has been lost—on the investigation of this Bill in committee. The Irish Home Rule Bill contained but forty clauses. This Bill contains one hundred and twelve. The Irish Home Rule Bill was opposed by the Conservative party and by the Liberal-Unionists. I do not know that it would be said—the country, at all events, has not dealt with them as if they abused their parliamentary privileges ; for the gentlemen who were then in minority of thirty or forty, were returned to Parliament, on the first occasion afforded to the people to speak, by the largest majority which has been found in the House of Commons since the days of the Reform Bill. So that their conduct, in their opposition to the Bill, and the method of their opposition, were substantially approved of by the country where parliamentary institutions are best understood. Now, Sir, as I have pointed out before, that Bill was introduced on the 13th of February, a very few days after the House met. The second reading was moved on the 2nd of April, and was carried, under the closure, on the 22nd of April. The House went into committee on the Bill on the 8th of May, and remained in committee until the 27th of July.

Mr. DAVIN. Was that from day to day ?

Mr. McCARTHY. No, not from day to day, because there was an adjournment at Easter.

Mr. DAVIN. Was there any other work between ?

Mr. McCARTHY. There was other work done, but the important work was the consideration of that Bill in committee. That occupied forty-seven nights ; and not only so, but during those forty-seven nights the closure was applied thirteen different times to the different clauses, and finally, on the 30th of June, an order of the House was made, under the closure rules, by which it was decreed that clauses from 5 to 8 should be disposed of, there being then only four clauses carried. Now, a good deal has been said of the debate on clause four of this Bill; but it took the committee of the English House of Commons twenty-six sittings to get through the first four clauses of the Irish Home Rule Bill, and during that time the closure was applied thirteen times.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How many suspensions ?

Mr. CARTHY. The hon. gentleman is confounding the Irish Home Rule Bill with the Crimes Act. There was no suspension, except of some unruly Irish member who pressed for the consideration of the Bill

Mr. McNEILL. Fifteen days were taken on the first clause.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, and after the first four clauses were disposed of, an order was made that clauses 5 to 8 should be disposed of before the 6th of July, clauses 9 to 26 before the 13th of July, and clauses 24 to 40 before the 20th of July, and the postponed clauses of the schedules before the 27th of July ; so that, when those different dates were reached, the Chairman of the committee, without debate, put the various clauses and declared them carried, as they were carried, by a majority of votes. And, as my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) reminds me, the comment of the opponents of the Bill and of the leading organ of public opinion, the "Times" newspaper, was that three-fourths of the Bill had gone through practically undiscussed. Now, it may be said that the Bill before this House is not as important a measure as the Irish Home Rule Bill was. The importance of a measure has very little to do with the purport and meaning of it. The question is this : Is this as difficult a measure for us to deal with as the Irish Home Rule Bill was for the English Parliament ? We find ourselves here with limited powers, while the powers of the Parliament at Westminster were plenary. We find ourselves here continually hampered by what the law was before 1890, what the meaning of the remedial order was as to the restoration of that law, what the effect of the new clauses in this Bill are ; and, therefore, it would be utterly impossible for us, if we give that consideration to this measure which its importance demands, in the remaining days of this House—even if we do not admit any other business—and I do not understand the Government to be introducing Bills simply for the purpose of putting them on the Order paper, if it is intended that we are not to consider them—it would be utterly impossible for us to give to this Bill that consideration which would enable it to become law. Then, we are in this position. The people of Manitoba, notwithstanding the very unfavourable conditions in which they have been approached, the hostile spirit in which they have been met from the beginning, the unfortunate misunderstanding as to the terms under which the conference was to proceed—because they understood that the proceedings on the Remedial Bill would be stayed in the meanwhile—the people of Manitoba have shown a disposition to do all they possibly could to settle this difficulty ; and it is absolutely unwise on our part to go on with this measure, which, although it cannot pass, must necessarily become the great question in the appeal soon to be made to the people. It will arouse feelings from one end of Canada to the other such as have not been aroused before. It has arrayed the Government of the whole Dominion against the government of one province, and has already been fraught with great injury to the material prosperity of that province. Under these circumstances, I say it is wise and proper, as it appears to me, that we should now pause in our course, and allow the time to elapse, which can elapse before we meet again in a new Parliament, to see whether the minority will not be more reasonable in their demands, and will not be willing to accept a proposition which, in my humble judgment, is abundantly fair. I move, Sir, seconded by Mr. O'Brien, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I was not in my place when the hon. gentleman began to address the House; so that I did not hear the first part of his argument. I came in when the hon. gentleman was stating to the House that it was idle on the part of the Government to have sent a commission to meet the representatives of the Manitoba government to discuss this question, in view of the fact that the Manitoba government, in their memorandum of December, 1895, had stated that they could not recognize state-aided separate schools. It seems to me, in view of the invitation that was extended by Mr. Greenway, as shown in the papers brought down, and the acceptance of that invitation, that Mr. Greenway and his government were just as fully aware of the position which this Government had taken as it was possible for any one to be. It seems to me that the fact that this Government had introduced this Remedial Bill, had pressed it to a second reading, and had carried that second reading, was a clear indication that it did not intend to recede from its position. And what was that position ? Simply that it should carry out to the fullest extent, the position it had originally taken with reference to the rights which the minority of Manitoba claimed to be theirs, and of which they claimed to have been deprived. Now, from the memorandum that was laid before the commissioners of the local government by the representatives of this Government, it is clear that our commissioners, while fully alive to the position which the minority claimed, were willing to recede from that position for the purpose of effecting a compromise, if a compromise could be had. Why, in the reply that was made on the 31st March, to Messrs. Sifton and Cameron, we find our commissioners say :

> It is to be further noted that the Roman Catholics earnestly desire a complete system of separate schools on which only their own money would be expended, a state of matters which would meet the observation under consideration, but which you decline to grant. Our suggestion was to relieve you from the necessity of going as far as this. It is perhaps impossible to devise a system that would be entirely unobjectionable theoretically and in the abstract. We had great hope that what we suggested would commend itself to your judgment as a practicable scheme doing reasonably substantial justice to all classes and securing that harmony and tranquility which are perhaps more than anything else to be desired in a young and growing community such as is now engaged in the task of developing the resources of Manitoba.

So that the commissioners did not press for all the rights the minority claimed they had been deprived of, but were willing to accept a compromise. What was their proposition ? Under the circumstances, it was a very proper one. They proposed :

> Legislation shall be passed at the present session of the Manitoba legislature to provide that in towns and villages where there are residents, say, twenty-five Roman Catholic children of school age, and in cities where there are, say, fifty of such children, the board of trustees shall arrange that such children shall have a school-house or school-room for their own use, where they may be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher ; and Roman Catholic parents, or guardians, say, ten in number, may appeal to the Department of Education from any decision or neglect of the board in respect of its duty under this clause, and the board shall observe and carry out all decisions and directions of the department on any such appeal.
> Provision shall be made by this legislation that schools wherein the majority of children are Catholics should be exempted from the requirements of the regulations as to religious exercises.
> That text-books be permitted in Catholic schools such as will not offend the religious views of the minority, and which from an edu> cational standpoint shall be satisfactory to the advisory board.

> Catholics to have representation on the advisory board.
> Catholics to have representation on the Board of Examiners appointed to examine teachers for certificates.
> It is also claimed that Catholics should have assistance in the maintenance of a normal school for the education of their teachers.
> The existing system of permits to non-qualified teachers in Catholic schools to be continued for, say, two years, to enable them to qualify, and then to be entirely discontinued.
> In all other respects the schools at which Catholics attend to be public schools and subject to every provision of the Education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba.
> A written agreement having been arrived at, and the necessary legislation passed, the Remedial Bill now before Parliament is to be withdrawn, and any rights and privileges which may be claimed by the minority in view of the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council shall, during the due observance of such agreement, remain in abeyance and be not further insisted upon.

Now, it seems to me that our commissioners went very far indeed to meet the position taken by the Manitoba government. It is true that by their memorandum in 1895, the Manitoba government declared that they had a mandate from the people not to establish a system of state-aided separate schools in any form. Yet, in view of the fact that Mr. Greenway had extended his invitation and his invitation had been met by our sending commissioners, it seems to me that he entered into these negotiations with the full knowledge that it would be impossible for this Government to recede from the position it had taken in forcing the Remedial Bill to a second reading. I think that the objections made by Messrs. Sifton and Cameron to the memorandum have been fully met by the reply of the 31st March. And our commissioners struck, it seems to me, the key-note of the whole position, in one of the clauses of their reply, as read by the hon. member for North Simcoe, in which they say :

> In addition to this we must premise that sufficient weight is not given by you to the undoubted legal position of the Roman Catholics.

The hon. member for North Simcoe says that their only legal position—and that is repeated in the second memorandum of the local government—is that the minority has the right to appeal. We contend that their legal position goes beyond that. We contend that they had the right to appeal, that the appeal was granted, that the remedial order was the consequence, that this House was vested by the remedial order with the power to legislate, as we are seeking to do at present, and that in all the negotiations the local government have not given that weight they should have done to the undoubted legal position of the Roman Catholics. It was not for the commissioners to recede in any particular, or to embarrass, or in any way take from the legal position which the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed under these circumstances. No negotiations could have taken place, there could have been no basis of any negotiations that would, in any way whatever, affect the legal position which the Roman Catholic minority enjoyed. I do not wish to weary the House by reading extracts from the reply of the commissioners, dated 31st March, but I will read to the House some of the statements made by the commissioners in that reply, which the hon. member for Simcoe did not read, in order that the position they have taken should be upon record. In the first instance, they say :

> It is only the rights conferred on the minority by the constitution that are in question. The problem presented in the school question is to secure to them their just and lawful privileges under the constitution in such a manner as to cause the minimum of interference with the public school system of Manitoba, and in that view we think our suggestion has merit.

Any person reading the suggestions made by the commissioners will come to the conclusion that these suggestions are made with a view to a minimum of interference with the public school system. Further, they say :

> We do not ask that the Roman Catholics have a separate right to elect trustees or otherwise to have any special representation on the board of trustees, being content with the protection afforded by an appeal to your own Department of Education, and in this respect our proposals very materially limit what is always considered the privileges essential in connection with a separate school system. The proposed schools would be controlled by trustees elected by the whole body of ratepayers under the provisions of your school law. There does not seem to be any adequate foundation for your remark that the carrying into effect of our suggestion would involve a modification of school organization greater than usual in cases of separate schools. We desire to minimize such modification, and think that to some extent we succeeded.
> As to your first objection in detail, we submit that under existing conditions there would not arise any great practical inconvenience, as in most of the localities affected the Roman Catholics are sufficiently numerous to afford all necessary facilities for grading and competition.

I would refer to this further fact, which must always be taken into account in considering this question, that the majority of the Roman Catholics live either along or east of the Red River. Prior to 1890, when the Act was passed doing away with the separate schools, there were not more than twelve separate schools west of the parishes lying along the Red River ; and the difficulties that were apprehended by Mr. Cameron and Mr. Sifton in their replies, it seems to me, could not arise outside of the city of Winnipeg, and possibly, the city of Brandon. It would be well always in discussing this question to bear in mind the fact, that, as I stated before, the Roman Catholic population is placed in such a position that there is no doubt that, with the exception of the twelve schools I mention they were practically in a large majority. The commissioners go on to say :

> In any event it must be quite clear that the standard of efficiency maintained would naturally be higher than can be reached by Roman Catholics who refuse on conscientious grounds to attend the public schools, and are therefore obliged to maintain schools from their own private means, and without the aid of the legislative grant. Considering the question of efficiency alone we think it cannot be denied that the state of affairs under the system we suggest would be very much better for the community than that which would obtain under existing conditions or under the Remedial Bill if it became law. And if this be so, even the argument from efficiency is all upon the side of bringing the Roman Catholics amicably within the public school system by some method as we suggest. * * * Your second objection in detail seems founded on a misapprehension. Our memorandum was drawn in general terms, and did not in any sense intend to exclude the principle of election on the part of the Roman Catholics, a principle which is elementary, and which is embodied in the Remedial Bill.
> As to your third objection, we cannot agree that there would be any special disadvantage in having Roman Catholic children in a separate room as distinguished from teaching them in a separate building. It would seem to be quite as objectionable on principle to separate them for religious exercises, as one of your own suggestions would involve.

Then further, on page 9 :

> We must again direct your attention to the evident advantages in point of economy of the system we propose over the old system, over school under the Remedial Bill, and particularly over the existing state of affairs where an important section of the public has to pay school taxes, and in addition feels compelled from conscientious motives to educate their children at their own expense. There would be no expenses of organization either general or local. The utmost that can be said is that it would cost the whole community the increase in expense, if any, which would necessarily be involved in the Roman Catholic children being educated together in one room, or in one building, as compared with educating them scattered amongst the rest of the school children. It is only in small mixed communities that this could be a serious item. We note your objection that this would be an offensive method of compelling one portion of the people to pay for the education and sectarian religious training of the remainder, and must again remind you that in principle your own alternative suggestion is equally objectionable, because conceivably the Roman Catholics under your system might pay a comparatively insignificant share of taxation, and yet you propose that their religion shall be taught them in the schools. We must further draw your attention to the flagrant injustice of the present system, which compels Roman Catholics to contribute to schools to which they cannot conscientiously send their children, and we beg to submit that this fact deserves due weight and consideration in this connection.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him if that last sentence is a correct statement of the case ? Their schools are very much the same in character as the public schools of the province of Ontario, and a large majority of the Roman Catholic school children in Ontario attend these public schools. How then can the statement be made that the Catholic parents in Manitoba cannot conscientiously send their children to the schools there ?

Mr. DALY. I presume the explanation is that by the law of Manitoba the choice of these religious exercises for the schools is left to the advisory board on which there is no Roman Catholic representative.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman would permit me—I do not wish to interrupt him—I understand that the bible selections in Manitoba are precisely those of what we can call the " Ross Bible " which is authorized in Ontario.

Mr. McCARTHY. And approved by Archbishop Lynch.

Mr. DALY. I cannot speak of that, nor can the hon. gentleman, I fancy, as fact. At all events we have the fact that the minority are dissatisfied. The representatives of the minority presented a petition to the leader of the Opposition when he was in Winnipeg in 1894 representing that they had conscientious objections to the religious teaching in the schools, and that is the point we have to deal with—not as it may be regarded in Ontario, in Nova Scotia and elsewhere. We have to deal with the conditions as they exist in Manitoba at the present time and to endeavour to relieve the grievances under which the minority rest. Now, the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. McCarthy) dwelt at some length upon the proposition that was made by the Manitoba commissioners in their second communication, viz. :—No religious exercises or teaching to take place in any public schools except as provided in the Act. Such religious exercises to be between 3.30 and 4 o'clock, " if authorized by resolution of the trustees, such resolution to be assented to by a majority, religious exercises and teachings to be held in any public school," and so on. I take it as a condition precedent to the right to hold these religious exercises in the schools that the same shall be assented to by a majority of the trustees. The whole matter would rest with the trustees and we might have, and no doubt should have communities in which the trustees would be opposed to any religious exercises being held, in which case it would be impossible for the Manitoba government to carry out the suggestions or the offer they make here. Then, as to the secularization of the schools, hon. members of this House are quite aware that there is a very strong opinion in Manitoba, not among Roman Catholics alone, but among the Anglicans, the Presbyterians and the Methodists, against the secularization of the schools. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) stated, as the fact is, that when his Bill was introduced it provided for no religious instruction.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I said that it was at first contemplated to frame the Act in that way.

Mr. DALY. That was the original intention, then, I suppose that that was the form of the original draft. But the hon. gentleman found that his supporters in the House were so strongly of the contrary opinion that he had to agree to the representations that were made to him by his supporters, and when the Bill was introduced these provisions had been withdrawn. It seems to me that that offer made by the Manitoba government was an idle offer, and was made by them with full knowledge of the fact that not only the Archbishop of Rupert's Land and the Rev. Dr. King, Moderator of the Presbyterian Church, but numerous other religious bodies declared against secularizing the schools. If we are to have a public school system in Manitoba, it must be with religious exercises in the schools. And that being the case, we can only come to one conclusion and that is that, notwithstanding their reiterated statements that they were desirous of coming to an arrangement with this Government, the Manitoba commissioners were not in a position to meet the reasonable offers that were made by the commissioners of this Government, and, not being able to meet these offers, did not show that disposition to remedy the condition of things they should have shown under the circumstances.

Mr. MARTIN. The first point dealt with by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) with regard to this question is that very clearly raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that the sending of commissioners to Winnipeg, intending all the time that these commissioners should insist upon the restoration of separate schools in Manitoba, was an idle thing, and utterly of no use. The Minister of the Interior thinks not, because he says Mr. Greenway's government must have known what the commissioners were bound by, what they would demand as the limit beyond which they would not go. Surely, that is no answer at all. What Mr. Greenway knew about it is of no importance to us here. We are not discussing the action of the Manitoba government, we are discussing the action of this Government, which, during the pendency of the Remedial Bill in this House, proposed a conference with the Manitoba government for the purpose of seeing whether a compromise could be reached. Now, the point taken by the member for North Simcoe is that the Government knew perfectly well from the published answers of the Manitoba government on the two different occasions, first, in the answer to the remedial order in June, 1895; and second, in the answer to the second Order in Council passed by this Government and sent to Manitoba, in December, 1895, in which that government made it perfectly plain that they were not prepared to abandon the principle of public schools, and they were not prepared to re-establish separate schools as they were prior to 1890. This Government, in sending these commissioners to Winnipeg, were aware of that, and if they then intended that the commissioners should not deparrt from the principle of separate schools as laid down in the offer of the commissioners, then, surely it was an idle proceeding, surely it was a conference from which no possible good could be expected, and from which no possible good was expected. Now, let us consider, for a moment, the circumstances under which that conference took place. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) went up to Manitoba in a semi-official capacity, at any rate, with the knowledge of the Government, and he had a long discussion with Mr. Greenway and Mr. Sifton, and other members of the Manitoba government. Can we imagine, after what Mr. Sifton and Mr. Cameron say here in this document, that they did not explain explicitly to the hon. member for Montreal West that they would not re-establish separate schools, and can we not imagine that Mr. Greenway and his government hinted to the hon. member for Montreal West that they would be prepared to take some such course as that outlined in the reply of Mr. Sifton and Mr. Cameron to the offer of the commissioners ? It must be plain to every member of the House that the first conference of which we have no report, which was private and confidential, must have been in that direction. There is no doubt at all that the hon. member for Montreal West came back from Winnipeg, knowing perfectly well that the Government there did not intend, and could not be induced, under any circumstances, to restore the system as it was, but they were prepared to make some such concessions as are contained in the first reply of Messrs. Sifton and Cameron. The member for Montreal West communicated confidentially to Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the other members of the Government here, what he had done in Manitoba, and he gave them the impression that there could be a settlement of this question. What kind of a settlement, a settlement on the lines of the offer of 28th March ? No, not in that direction. It was because the hon. member for Montreal West had been to Winnipeg and had had this preliminary conference, and because he expressed the view that there was an opportunity of settling this question, that he and the other two commissioners of this Government were sent to Winnipeg. So surely, Mr. Speaker, it follows that the Government knew beforehand that there could be, by no possibility, any result from a conference in which the commissioners were to be tied down to obtaining the re-establishment of separate schools. The next point the Minister of the Interior dealt with was the question as to what the legal position of the Manitoba minority is. It is asserted by the hon. member for North Simcoe that the legal position of the Manitoba minority is simply the right to appeal, a right to appeal which has been recognized by the Privy Council of Canada by the passing of the remedial order, and now the question is before this House as to what shall be done upon that remedial order, with no obligation whatever binding upon this House to carry out the terms of that remedial order if this House is not of the opinion that that remedial order embodies suggestions which should be crystallized into law. A different position was taken in the country by the Cabinet Ministers, namely, that there was no option, that the Government were bound by the constitution to pass remedial legislation in Manitoba in terms of the remedial order. But that position has been abandoned on the floor of this House by the Minister of Justice, in the speech which he made upon the second reading of this Bill.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

After Recess.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion of the Minister of the Interior that the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba occupy a much stronger position than that they are merely entitled to the right of appeal, is not borne out by the facts, because it was urged more or less throughout the country and in this House, that this Parliament was bound under the constitution as interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to pass the remedial order and to place on the statute-book of Canada a Remedial Bill. But that position has been entirely abandoned by the Government. The Minister of Justice stated most clearly and distinctly that the constitution did not compel Parliament to pass a Remedial Bill, that that question was entirely open to Parliament, and he urged that the circumstances of the case made it obligatory on Parliament to do so. That is now a very different issue. If we were constitutionally bound to pass an Act in the terms of the remedial order, then there should be no discussion here; no time need be occupied in considering the matter, because we would have no option. It is a very different matter when it is suggested that the circumstances are so strong that Parliament should exercise a discretion vested in it, because that is something on which the Minister of Justice may have an opinion and other hon. members may entertain a different opinion. So that the minority in Manitoba are not in the position of being able to say while engaged in the conference with the local government: If you are not prepared to restore us the separate schools we had prior to 1890, we have it in our power to compel the restoration of these schools through the action of the Dominion Parliament, because the Dominion Parliament will not re-establish those schools unless a proper case is made out by the minority to induce Parliament to restore them. So then, I say, Mr. Speaker, that if the people of Canada and the Parliament of Canada become satisfied that the people of the province of Manitoba are willing to give to the Roman Catholic minority all that the minority in fairness could ask, then the Parliament of Canada will not, if it does, be supported by the people of Canada in inflicting on that province a Remedial Bill. It is admitted that any remedy attempted to be given to the minority by this Parliament must necessarily be more or less imperfect. It was shown in the correspondence now before us, in the statement of the Dominion, that if the local legislature can be prevailed upon to act in the premises they have the power, much more effectively than this Parliament can have, of putting the matter right, if it is wrong. So that the contention that the minority of Manitoba are justified in refusing to consider the proposition of a compromise unless the Manitoba government and legislature are prepared to restore certain schools, is one which the position of the Manitoba minority is not strong enough to justify them in taking. The position of the Manitoba minority is not that they are legally and of course entitled to a restoration of what they had before 1890. They are entitled to the removal of any grievance, if any grievance is established before this Parliament, and if the Manitoba government and legislature are prepared of their own accord to remedy everything that would appear to reasonable persons to be a grievance on the part of the minority, it cannot be expected that Parliament will interfere under these circumstances. The Minister of the Interior contends that we are not to consider the Manitoba question in the same way as we would consider the question of separate schools in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but we must consider it purely from the Manitoba standpoint. Why is that? One would naturally think that a comparison of the position of the Roman Catholics in another province similar to Manitoba would be a very reasonable means of judging of the fairness of the overtures made by Manitoba in the premises. I cannot agree with the suggestion of the Minister of the Interior that we cannot consider the cases of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia and that we must consider the case of Manitoba entirely by itself. But, after all, that is really the only answer which has ever been made to the very clear and definite proposition enunciated in this House time and again, that in Nova Scotia there is no provision in the law for separate schools, and yet we find Roman Catholic members in this House standing up for Nova Scotia, and saying that that law in practice is to-day, and has been for thirty years past, entirely satisfactory to the Roman Catholics of that province. If the government of Manitoba is prepared to accord to the Roman Catholic minority there the same privileges or greater privileges than are accorded to the Roman Catholic minority in those other provinces to which I have referred, and in addition to those I might mention Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, is that not evidently the principle upon which we should consider whether the offer of the Manitoba government was a reasonable one or not? I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to urge that the offer of the Manitoba government is a reasonable proposition. Of course, I do not dispute that, but I am not going to discuss it now. What I propose to say is that the commissioners on behalf of the Dominion Government did not treat the Manitoba government in the proper spirit. They refused to consider it at all. They point out that it does not give to the Roman Catholic minority separate schools, and therefore they cannot consider it. Now, we know that the Roman Catholic minority have not separate schools in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island or British Columbia, and yet we find, not only in this Parliament, but out of this Parliament, from laymen and from ecclesiastics, that the Catholic Church is perfectly satisfied with the practice with regard to education in these four provinces. I contend that what the Dominion commissioners should have done, and what the minority in Manitoba, if it were prepared to be reasonable, should have concurred in the commissioners' doing, was to point out in what respect, if any, the proposition of the Manitoba government was not satisfactory; and in what respects, if any, it failed to remove the grievances which the Roman Catholic minority complain of in connection with the legislation of 1890. I shall briefly deal with the proposition of the Manitoba government, not so much with a view of expressing any opinion on the question, as with a view of throwing, if possible, some light upon that question from the Manitoba standpoint. This proposition, as has already been pointed out, is an alternative one. In the first place, the Manitoba government offer to advise the legislature to repeal the clause in the Act of 1890 referring to religious exercises. I may say that, so far as I am concerned, individually, I am most happy indeed to find that the Manitoba government are prepared to take this step. However, I differ from the commissioners of the Manitoba government in the expression of opinion in connection with this. They say:

> We desire it to be understood in connection with the proposition, that it is made as a compromise offer, and not as embodying the policy which the government and legislature of the province are themselves desirous of pursuing.

Of course, I cannot dispute Mr. Sifton and Mr. Cameron, representing the government and representing the legislature, as to what the policy of the government and of the legislature is. They are in a position to speak authoritatively on that point; but I do dispute them, if they desire to imply that it is not the desire of the majority of the people of Manitoba to have secular schools. I believe that if this offer had been accepted on the part of the minority, it would have required no departure from the wishes of the people of Manitoba for the legislature to have accorded to them that change in the law. However it may have been in 1890, when this Act was introduced, however the people of Manitoba may have felt at that time upon this question, the six years which have transpired since, and the full discussion of this matter, has, I am satisfied, completely changed the view of many of the majority who in 1890 were unfavourable to purely secular schools—I am satisfied to-day, so far as my observation has enabled me to speak, that in Manitoba the people would be more than satisfied with the legislature if they completely secularized the schools. Then, as regards the offer of the Manitoba government to advise a change in the law by which certain religious exercises would be allowed in the schools. Now, that offer has been criticised, inasmuch as, apparently, those religious exercises can only be carried on with the consent of the trustees. I must say that, so far as the wording of the offer is concerned, it seems to be open to that construction, although I am inclined to think that that was not the intention in making the offer. But, Mr. Speaker, if this offer was unsatisfactory to the minority, only because the trustees could intervene and refuse to allow religious exercises at all, that was a proper point for the Dominion commissioners to take. They did not refer to it, and therefore that was not the reason why the offer of the Manitoba government was not accepted. It does not follow at all that that offer should have been accepted as put. It was a mere proposition, and there was nothing final in it. So far as the proposition of the Dominion commissioners was concerned, the answer of the Manitoba government was final as to that. They said: We cannot entertain a proposition of that kind, because the people of the province have pronounced upon that; we have long ago declared our policy as to the maintenance of the public school system, and therefore we cannot consider the proposition of the Dominion commissioners; but we offer this. Suppose the Dominion commissioners had abandoned their proposition for separate schools, and had pointed out to the Manitoba government that this offer was defective, inasmuch as it did not fully redress the grievances as to which the Roman Catholic minority complained.

I do not understand the declarations we have had from the hon. Minister of Public Works to mean that the Roman Catholics must have separate schools restored in Manitoba, as they were prior to 1890. I understood the interview with the hon. gentleman, which appeared in the press last summer, to amount to this : That with the Roman Catholics it was a question of religious teaching ; that if they were allowed to have unhampered the right of religious teaching in the schools, they would be satisfied ; and it was upon the appearance of that interview in the press that I wrote the letter which has been the occasion of so much comment in regard to a phrase that appeared in it. In that letter I stated that I felt satisfied that if the hon. Minister of Public Works really represented the views of the Roman Catholic clergy in stating that they desired simply the right to have religious teaching in the schools, the Manitoba people would be prepared to meet them ; and I am glad to find that on the earliest occasion on which the government of Manitoba have had an opportunity of speaking upon that question, their action has fully borne out the promise which I ventured to make on behalf of the people of Manitoba. It will be remembered that in that letter I stated that if the Protestant majority in Manitoba insisted upon retaining the right of having in the schools religious exercises which were agreeable to Protestants, and refused at the same time to give to Roman Catholics the right to have religious exercises in schools in which they were a majority, agreeable to their ideas and their consciences, it would be rank tyranny. That has been interpreted as a statement on my part that the 1890 Act was rank tyranny, something I did not say in the letter, and something which I could not of course say of that Act, for which I am fully responsible. But I did say that if the complete withdrawal of religious exercises from the schools would satisfy the Roman Catholic minority, I was satisfied that the people of Manitoba would insist upon their legislature taking that step. I went further, and said that if allowing the Roman Catholic minority the privilege of religious teaching in their own schools—in the schools in those districts of the province in which they constituted the largest part of the population would satisfy them—I felt satisfied that the people of Manitoba would accord that privilege to them ; and I expressed the opinion that if the people of Manitoba failed to accord that to the Roman Catholics, it would be on their part, rank tyranny. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Manitoba government have justified what I said in that letter. Of course, although I have always expressed the view that allowing religious exercises, even such as those in the public schools in Manitoba at present, which are practically offensive to no one, is logically unfair to the Roman Catholic population, at the same time it was well-known to me and to every one, that the withdrawal of that clause of the Act would in no measure satisfy the Roman Catholic minority ; and it was only urged in order to satisfy the conscience of those Protestants, who did not feel right in allowing in the schools any religious exercises which were not satisfactory to all classes in the community, when the schools set out to be, and were intended to be, purely public schools, to which every individual in the province should feel entitled to send his children. But while that was so, I am very glad indeed that the Manitoba government have made it clear that they are quite willing, for the purpose of a settlement, to withdraw this clause, and also that they have gone much further ; and it does seem to me that in their second offer, they have met the position of the Roman Catholic clergy, as outlined by the hon. Minister of Public Works last summer, and more recently within the last few weeks. However, I do not know whether the hon. Minister of Public Works represents the Roman Catholic clergy upon this point. I do not undertake to say even that the offer of the Manitoba government should be entirely satisfactory to the minority ; but I do say that unless and until the Manitoba minority furnish some answer to the proposition of the Manitoba government, they stand before the bar of public opinion in the wrong—that, when the Manitoba government are prepared to make these concessions, unless and until the Roman Catholic minority, or the Government here, who are acting apparently on behalf of that minority, are prepared with the Manitoba government, are prepared to point out wherein it fails to remove the grievances of the minority, then I contend that the Roman Catholic minority stand before the bar of public opinion in the wrong, no matter how this particular Parliament may look upon this matter. It is true, a Remedial Bill, which is admitted by the Roman Catholic minority to be unsatisfactory, has passed its second reading in this House by the small majority of 18; but it is perfectly clear that that Bill cannot at the present session receive its third reading and become law. If that Remedial Bill is to receive its third reading, the people must be convinced that that is a proper step for this Parliament to take. How important it is, therefore, that just before a general election, in which this question is likely to be paramount, the minority in Manitoba should put themselves in the position of being reasonable and right in their demands. So far as that conference is concerned, the position taken by the Roman Catholic minority is this. They say : We do not ask to have separate schools restored to us because it is reasonable or right, but because we are legally entitled to their restoration. That is not the case. That is contradicted on the part of the Opposition of this House, and it is admitted not to be the case by the Government. It is clear, therefore, that they have no legal rights for the restoration of separate schools as they were, and, therefore, they are placing themselves in the position of asking as a right something which they are only entitled to, on convincing the people of Canada that what they are asking is reasonable and fair, not only to them, but to the majority in Manitoba. We hear a great deal about the rights of the minority, but I would like to ask if the Manitoba majority have no rights. Is there any difference between the Protestant majority in Manitoba and the Protestant majority of any of the other provinces ? If the Catholic minority in Manitoba are entitled to a system of separate schools in that province, are not the Catholic minorities in the other provinces equally entitled to separate schools ? And, if the Parliament of Canada should decree that separate schools should be restored to Manitoba, will we not have the Roman Catholic minority in these other provinces demanding that the Public School Act in those provinces, which differs not at all in principle from the Public School Act of the province of Manitoba, should be abrogated ? If we make a special law with regard to Manitoba, how can we resist the claim which is sure to be made by the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia ? We cannot deal with the position of Manitoba any differently than we dealt with the position of these other provinces. There was a day, not so many years ago, when the New Brunswick school question was an equally prominent question in this House. Speeches were made by representatives of the minority from New Brunswick and also from the other provinces, just as strong as any which have been made during this debate. New Brunswick, however, was allowed to work out its own salvation, and with what result ? With the result that we find Roman Catholics in that province telling us that their position there is eminently satisfactory. And I ven-to prophesy that, if the Parliament of Canada should take the same course with regard to Manitoba, and allow Manitoba to work out its own question of education for itself, we will find in due course the Roman Catholics from that province expressing themselves perfectly satisfied with their position. But, as a citizen of Manitoba, I take this position, that, if Manitoba does not do what is reasonable and fair, I am willing to join in passing through this House a remedial law for the purpose of forcing Manitoba to do its duty. I have always taken that position; but I say that, until the conference has taken place, and until the whole question has been gone into, until the Manitoba minority are prepared to be reasonable in their demands and not expect to be put in an exceptional position in this Dominion, I do not believe that the sentiment of the people of Canada, as a whole, will justify this Parliament in taking out of the hands of Manitoba a question so purely local in its nature. The discussion we have had shows how exceedingly difficult it is for this Parliament to deal with the question of education in any province. Every section of the Bill we have come to has pointed that out. We do not understand the circumstances, and it never can be possible that this Parliament, so small a proportion of it coming from the province of Manitoba, can make a workable statute upon the question. However, if the time comes when the province of Manitoba refuses to do justice, we have the warrant of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to warrant our interference. But there are two reasons why we should not interfere at the present time. The first of these is that a case has not been made out, and the second is that it is impossible for us to effectively place the minority of Manitoba in the position which they seek to occupy. And, although I prophecied in this House that, under the circumstances, no effective arrangement could be made with Manitoba, I am not sorry that this conference has taken place, because it has enabled the province of Manitoba to show that, at any rate, it is prepared to consider the question and make propositions. Before the bar of public opinion in Canada it has thrown the onus upon the Roman Catholic minority and upon the advocates of their cause, of showing wherein the proposition of the Manitoba government is defective and of suggesting modifications and alterations. And I hope that, before this Parliament takes any further step in proceeding with remedial legislation, before that Bill is reported to this House from Committee of the Whole, these negotiations will be further pursued. If this offer has defects, only one of which was alluded to to-day by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—with regard to the question of trustees—let these defects be pointed out ; and then, if the Manitoba government finally show that they are not fair and reasonable, that they are not prepared to remove the grievances of the minority, I for one will be prepared to proceed with the third reading, not of this Bill, which is an absurdity, a delusion and a snare, but with a real Remedial Bill, which will be effective in the premises.

Mr. McNEILL. I was very much gratified when I learned that it was the intention of the Government to endeavour to carry out a policy of conciliation rather than a policy of coercion, and to send this commission to interview, and, if possible, to come to an arrangement with the government of Manitoba. I would like to say that for my part I had the greatest possible confidence in the members of the commission with whom we were acquainted in this House, in the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) and the member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), both of whom, I am quite sure, went to Winnipeg with the firmest determination to do all that in them lay to arrive at a satisfactory and amicable arrangement of this unfortunate dispute. I do not wish, in making that remark, to imply for one moment that the third member of the commission was not equally desirous of securing the same result. It would seem, however, that the hands of the commissioners were tied, and that it was not left to them to do what, in their judgment, on the spot after investigation, after discussion, after conference, might appear best in the interest of Manitoba and of the Dominion of Canada. They could only do what they were permitted to do by the hard task-masters who have their hands upon the throat of the Government of the Dominion. It would seem that with whatever anxiety they may have approached the work they had in hand, with whatever desire for settlement they approached it, it was impossible for them to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. They were bound to ask for the full pound of flesh ; they were ordered to ask for what the delegates of the Manitoba government, in their reply, described as a demand which would leave neither to the Roman Catholic parents, nor to the school trustees, any option whatever. The unfortunate minority in Manitoba were to have separate schools imposed upon them whether they wanted them or not. And as the discussion on this measure has proceeded it has become more and more apparent that the desire is not to give effect to the wishes of the minority in Manitoba, but to coerce the minority into the acceptance of a system which, in many cases, at all events, they entirely disapprove. In the course of this discussion it has become abundantly clear that those who are urging upon the Government the necessity of passing this measure are themselves well aware, that in many cases the Roman Catholic minority, if left to themselves, would not agree to separate schools at all. We had an exemplification of this but very recently, when the proposal that the majority of the Roman Catholics in a district be permitted to say whether there should be a separate school in the district, was rejected, and when it was determined that five heads of families in the district should be permitted to coerce the majority of the Roman Catholics in the neighbourhood, and to force a separate school upon them contrary to their wishes. It is well that this should be distinctly understood by the people of Canada. It is well that the hollow sham of which we have heard so much, which has been paraded as if it were a reality before the people of this country, should be exposed, and that it should be distinctly understood that this is a measure as much for the coercion of the minority of Manitoba as it is a measure for the coercion of the majority of the people of that province. Now, it has been pointed out already that in the rejoinder made by the Dominion commissioners to the proposals of the government of Manitoba, these proposals of Manitoba have not really been dealt with at all, and are merely referred to to be passed by. There is no discussion of them, there is no investigation of them. And why ? Because apparently the commissioners, anxious as they were to arrive at a satisfactory arrangement of this matter, were not allowed to deal with these proposals. That is the only explanation that I think it possible to offer for these extraordinary circumstances, for this extraordinary condition of things. It is inconceivable that the gentlemen who went there, as we know they did, with their minds permeated with the idea that they should, if possible, arrive at a satisfactory arrangement of this question. I say it is impossible to suppose that those gentlemen would not have carefully considered the proposals made by the government of Manitoba had they had permission to do so. When we consider that the legislation which was inaugurated in the province of Nova Scotia some thirty years ago, has been described by the leader of this House, the hon. gentleman who introduced that legislation, and who is responsible for it, as a monument of legislation regarding schools, a monument of legislation which is well worthy of regard and well worthy to be copied by any legislature in the world, when we recollect that that legislation was so described, and when we know that the offer which is now made by the province of Manitoba goes far beyond that legislation in its liberality to Roman Catholics, and in giving them an opportunity for the teaching of religious exercises in schools, I say that when we bear that in mind it seems to me perfectly astounding to find that this proposal, which is so much more liberal than that legislation which was a monument of legislation connected with schools, and well worthy to be copied by any legislature in the world, that this proposal should be passed by with a mere reference. It is marvellous that it should not be investigated, that it should not even be discussed at all by the commissioners who were sent from Ottawa to deal with the Manitoba government on this matter, that the commissioners who were sent by the Government of which the hon. gentleman is a member, that the commissioners who were sent out of this House of which he is the leader, should not have considered at all a proposition far more liberal in its nature than the proposal which he said was a monument of successful school legislation, seems to me a most extraordinary condition of things. I do not know how it is to be explained unless it be that the lines had been laid down, and the Government of this country had got their orders from their masters, and that they were permitted to go no jot or tittle beyond the limits that had been assigned to them. Justice counts for nothing, liberality goes for nothing. It matters not at all how liberal or how just was the offer made by the province of Manitoba, it matters not at all though it goes far beyond that which has been described in glowing terms in this House as legislation that any province might be proud of, yet, the Government of this country are not permitted to deal with it, are not even to consider such a proposition, but are obliged to instruct their commissioners to pass it by without consideration. Well, Sir, we have come to a pretty pass in Canada if that is the position in which we find ourselves to-day, if a free province and a free legislature is to be dealt with in this manner, and if a free Parliament here at Ottawa is to be coerced to pass legislation, to coerce a province in a British community that has offered such liberal terms as Manitoba has offered. But apparently that is the point at which we have arrived. Now, we are told once more in this Parliament, and in the reply of the Dominion commissioners, "that under the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the remedial order, the minority have important legal rights in connection with separate schools ; and while the Dominion Parliament may have jurisdiction to enforce some of those rights, it is freely acknowledged that this could be done with more advantage to all parties by the local legislature." Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to weary the House by a further reference to the legal aspect of this case, but I do wish to say that if there be any one thing more certain than another, it is that the framers of confederation distinctly refused to make arrangement granting in perpetuity rights to state-aided separate schools. If there be one thing clearer than another it is that the rights granted in perpetuity were only those granted at the union. The English language can make it no clearer than it has been made in the constitution that those rights only were granted in perpetuity, and it is making too great a draft on our credulity to imagine that hon. gentlemen like Sir George Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin, who were present when that constitution was framed and who represented the minority at that time, were not perfectly well aware of the plain meaning of those plain English words. It is no doubt true that there was an understanding at the time of the framing of the constitution that separate schools should be granted by legislation in the province to the minority, that state-aided separate schools should be granted. But it is abundantly evident that that fact was known at the time, and the understanding at the time is proof positive that those separate schools were never intended to be granted in perpetuity. Because the fact that these schools were in the minds of the legislators at the time when the constitution was framed, and the fact that they knew the establishment of them was to be proposed in the legislature of Manitoba, coupled with the fact that the framers of the constitution refused to grant in perpetuity, any rights subsequent to the union, absolutely demonstrate that it was distinctly understood here at the time that those state-aided separate schools were not to be granted in perpetuity. That is as clear as anything can be. Therefore, when we find this reference to the legal rights that the minority had, at all events, we know that those legal rights were not rights to state-aided separate schools in perpetuity ; they did not constitute a right granted to the minority in perpetuity to schools that were to be given to them after the union. The constitution distinctly provided that perpetuity should not attach to the schools granted after the union. So, whatever the rights were, they were not rights in perpetuity, and it is simply for this House to say what they will do in connection with the restoration of these state-aided separate schools, when the question is brought up before it. The schools were given to the minority in accordance with the understanding at the time of the union, that understanding being that they were not to be given in perpetuity. They were given, and they were tried for nineteen years, and after nineteen years' trial they proved wanting, and the government of Manitoba in the interest of the province, and of this very minority whom it is now sought to coerce into the acceptance of separate schools, did away with those separate schools, and established a system of national schools. Now, we are asked to interfere, and to coerce the province into doing away with its national schools and re-establishing this system of state-aided separate schools, which the province, after giving it a trial of nineteen years, abolished. Under what plea are we asked to do this ? On the plea that the rights of the Roman Catholics are being trampled on, that violence is being done to their conscientious scruples. What evidence have we to that effect ? We have no evidence, but on the contrary, it has come out in the course of the discussion of this Bill, that those who are endeavouring to force this measure through the House, refuse to allow the majority of Roman Catholics in any district to say whether they will have schools or not. How in the face of that fact, can it be suggested for one moment that this Bill is being introduced to protect the minority in the exercise of any right they wish to possess, in the face of the fact that the provisions of this proposed legislation will not allow the majority of the minority to say whether they are in favour of separate schools or not. I understand it was distinctly stated that if the matter were left to the majority, in many cases they would refuse to have separate schools at all, and that statement was made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), the accredited representative of the minority in this House. How can this country be deluded into the belief, in the face of such a declaration, that this measure is being passed through this Dominion Parliament in the interests of the down-trodden minority of Manitoba. Why, Sir, I have always believed, though I have not had the proof which I have now, that we who are fighting for the rights of Manitoba in this matter, were fighting for the minority in the province just as well as for the majority. I believed, and I now know that the majority of the Roman Catholics in that province are just as much opposed to this proposed legislation as are Protestants, and it is a hollow sham and mockery to say that this is a measure to safeguard the rights of the Roman Catholic minority in that province.

These poor people do not want those separate schools, Mr. Speaker, and they are to be placed in such a position that they shall be obliged to send their children to schools of which they disapprove ; whereas, by the offer made by the government of the province, they would have an opportunity of attending the public schools and obtaining the best possible education there, and then have an opportunity, if they so desired, of having religious instruction at a certain hour of the day of the nature which their clergy wish the children to obtain. What more reasonable proposition could be made? It is a proposition which is not new, it is an arrangement which has already been tried and with success. It is a compromise, which was arrived at in the town of Birmingham, in England, at a time when religious animosity and strife ran very high there. Just after the disestablishment of the Irish Church, there was a very strong feeling of antagonism between religious bodies in that town. The result was that this antagonism found its way into the schools, and very serious difficulty arose there, as we have here to-day. The feeling ran so high that it was found that some compromise must be arrived at, and it is stated that through the suggestion of Mr. Chamberlain, a compromise was agreed to of the very nature which is now proposed by the Manitoba government in this case, namely, that so many hours in the day should be set aside for purely secular instruction, and that so many hours in the week should be set aside for purely religious instruction, at which hours the clergymen of any denomination, or their representatives, might instruct the children of their religion in the manner which they thought best. That compromise was put into operation with the most happy results, the fact being that all the religious rancour which had existed previous to this arrangement has died away, and that the clergymen of the various denominations meet in the school, take the children apart, and teach them in accordance with their own doctrine. In view of all the facts, in view of the fact that the legislation introduced in Nova Scotia by the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) was, as he himself says, legislation which was a monument of legislation in regard to schools, legislation that might well be copied by any legislative body in the world ; and in view of the fact that the offer of the Manitoba government is far more liberal to the Roman Catholics than that legislation was, surely we might be allowed to drop this measure, and the House might be permitted to proceed with the necessary business of the country. I have made these few observations with the desire of earnestly pressing upon the Government the propriety of dropping this unfortunate measure.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, it is just as well that the House and the country should understand exactly how this debate has arisen. The member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) naturally desired to have an opportunity of commenting upon the report of the commissioners to Winnipeg, and upon the extraordinary condition of things revealed by this correspondence. The commissioners representing the Dominion Government, or their principals at Ottawa, are fairly chargeable with something like a breach of faith in not staying the remedial legislation here while the conference was going on. The Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) to-day appealed to the hon. member (Mr. McCarthy), that as the Minister of Justice was unable to be present—owing unfortunately to illness which we all very much regret—it would be advisable to defer the debate. The member for North Simcoe declared that he was perfectly willing to do so if the leader of the House would give an assurance that the committee on this Bill would rise at a reasonable hour, the House adjourn, and an opportunity be afforded to make the observations while the Minister was in his place. The leader of the House had then an opportunity of stating whether or not he intended to pursue the course which, so disastrously for himself, he pursued last week ; but the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) left the House under the impression that he would do this week as he did last. The member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was entirely without blame in taking this course. Sir, the worst enemies of this Administration cannot desire them to pursue a course more disastrous to themselves and to their future prospects in the country than that which they had determined upon. As was said in the beginning of the debate : Those whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad. Let us review the result of last week's proceedings. Every day the leader of the House was told that if he would consent that the House should rise at a reasonable time——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is not in order in referring to what took place in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I admit my error, Sir, but I was simply pointing out the condition under which this debate was forced on the House. It cannot be too strongly pressed upon the country, that governed by some influence which we can all perfectly understand, the reasonable and fair proposals made by the Manitoba government have been refused by the Administration. It cannot be too often called to the attention of the House and the country, that these commissioners, going up at an unsuitable period at which to attain their object, would have known that they would be met by the repeated declaration of the Manitoba government, that under no circumstances would that province consent to anything like the establishment of state-supported separate schools. The Dominion commissioners knew perfectly well that the Manitoba government could not withdraw from that position. If that conference was anything more than a mere pretense, the Dominion commissioners must have known the basis upon which alone they could treat with any prospect of success. Therefore, they should have been prepared to accept the proposals which would have given to the minority practically what they wanted—a system of education carried on under the auspices and direction of the ecclesiastical authorities of that church, so far as religion and morals are concerned, and would also have secured to them a system of secular education as good as that which was enjoyed by any other portion of the community. So that, in point of fact, as has been well stated by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), the proposals of the Manitoba government were in every respect more beneficial to the minority than the proposals embodied in the Bill now under discussion possibly could be. But, as appears from the correspondence, and as was fully argued by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), this Government, instead of representing all parties to the controversy, have made themselves the adherents and exponents of the views of the minority alone; and, having done that, they have been guided, not by consideration for the general interests of the community, not even by considerations for what would have been for the best interests of the minority themselves, but by the instructions they have received from what is evidently the governing power in this matter, and have refused to accept the proposals made by the Manitoba government, and insist in the main upon the principles embodied in this Bill, although they have departed very widely even from them. They having taken that ground, the conference necessarily came to an end without any satisfactory result. Now, as I said a few moments ago, when my reference to that subject was very properly stopped by you, Mr. Speaker, we fall back upon the old proposal; and we are now called upon to pursue that without reference to the proceedings of the conference. It is needless, in discussing this question, to go into the many minute points of difference between the proposals of the commissioners on behalf of this Government and those of the commissioners representing the Manitoba government. It is sufficient for us to emphasize the fact, which cannot be too strongly emphasized, that, when they were met at the eleventh hour by a deputation from the Dominion Government, who were representing the minority, the Manitoba representatives stated that, while they could not and would not—supported, as they were, by a great majority of the people of Manitoba in that determination—adopt by legislation the system of schools to which the majority of their people were opposed, yet they were willing practically to adopt a proposal which would gain for that minority the religious advantages which they said were so essential to them, while, at the same time, they would be secured in the full enjoyment of a complete and useful system of education. I say it cannot be too strongly emphasized that, when a conference was agreed to, late as the hour was, and when a proposal was made to that conference by the representatives of Manitoba, which would have gained all the real objects in view, that proposal was refused, at the instance of the minority, or, I should say, with probably much more truth, at the instance of those who claimed the represent the minority, the ecclesiastical authorities of the Chuch of Rome. The minority were not permitted to accept what was offered; and the onus of the failure of those negotiations rests upon the gentlemen who are now trying to force this Bill through the House. Under these circumstances, I regret that the Bill is being proceeded with; I regret the circumstances under which the Bill is being proceeded with; and I am sure this House will regret that it is called upon to proceed further in a course which so far has not produced any satisfactory results. The country understands it, as it will be at the next general election, that it was in the power of this Administration, had they not been determined to pursue the course on which they had entered, from some motive which we cannot understand, or because they have been compelled to do so by some other authority, to put an end to all this difficulty by accepting a proposal which would have removed all the heart-burning and the evil results that must flow from the legislation we are now entering upon, and which would have more than obtained the object this Bill purports to pursue. Under these circumstances, I say we cannot too often or too emphatically express this view before the House and the country, and, in so doing, I believe we are doing the best thing possible to secure for that minority the rights they profess really to desire.

Motion (Mr. McCarthy) to adjourn negatived.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba).

(In the Committee.

On section 12, subsection 1.

12. In all cases of readjustment, the inspector of schools for the district, jointly with one competent person to be appointed by each board of trustees, whose district the readjustment may affect, who shall be non-residents of the said district, shall form a board of arbitration, whose duty it shall be to value the existing school-houses, school sites and other school property or assets within the territories readjusted, and ascertain the respective debts and liabilities thereof ; and the said board or a majority of its members shall thereupon adjust and settle in such a manner as they may deem just and equitable, the respective rights, claims and demands of the parties interested ; and their award in writing, including their own reasonable costs and charges, may be enforced in the county courts of the province, and which said award shall in all respects be subject to appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, the same as awards in civil matters.

Mr. MARTIN. I regret very much that section 11, which is the first part of this Bill having reference to the adjustment of school districts, was passed in its present shape. It was passed on Saturday morning, long after the time when the committee should have risen. I am sorry that the committee could not come to a better understanding of what the meaning of that clause was, because the whole thing comes up again in clause 12. Subsections 8 and 9 of section 84 give the effect upon the lands in a school district of debentures issued under the authority of this measure, but you will notice that section 11 undertakes to deal with the assets and liabilities of two school districts whose boundaries are re-adjusted. There is no provision at all for the representation of creditors of either of these districts on the board of arbitration ; and in order that we should come to some understanding of what section 12 should be, it is necessary that we should consider very carefully the effect of a school district issuing debentures, because it is important to know how far you affect the debenture holders by taking a piece of land out of one district and adding it to another. I was unable to make the committee adopt my view on Saturday night, but I venture to repeat here what seems to be the clear effect of the issue of debentures by a school district. The same thing will, of course, apply to the issue of debentures by a municipal corporation. I contend that the property of the school trustees cannot convey or render liable to creditors any property except that which is owned by the board. Therefore, when school trustees issue debentures, it is not possible for them to give the debenture holders any claim upon the lands included in that district beyond the right to those lands which the trustees themselves have. What right is that ? They do not own the fee simple. What they own is simply the right of taxing those lands for school purposes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They can mortgage the school-house.

Mr. MARTIN. I am not now alluding to property belonging to the corporation in which they have the fee simple. The debentures may be properly allowed to bind the school property. There is nothing in the constitution of things to prevent a legislature giving to the school trustees the right to mortgage their own building, but they do not usually do that, and it has been held, with regard to cities and towns, that the creditors cannot seize a fire engine for a corporation debt, because that is against public policy. But I do not wish to discuss that question now. I am discussing what the school trustees can do with that property which does not belong to them but which is liable for taxation for school purposes. All that the school district can render liable to the debenture holders is the right of taxing the lands, and section 84, bears me out. If it does not, it will be our duty, when we come to that section, to make it conformable to that view, because it would be an outrage to all the school trustees to put a mortgage upon lands belonging to individual ratepayers in that district, in the ordinary sense of the term. If by holding debentures, we have a mortgage on all the lands in the district, it follows that we can take one particular portion of land and have it sold in order that we may realize upon it. Would it be contended for a moment that the bondholders of the city of Ottawa, if the debt was not paid, could select a particular piece of property,—say the Russell House—and sell it ? That would be absurd, because the Russell House is only liable for its proportion according to its value. It can be assessed by the sheriff, and then, if the owners do not pay, it may be sold. It was argued the other night that the school debentures were a lien and charge upon all the Roman Catholic property assessed in that particular district, and that they constituted a mortgage upon that property. My answer is, if that be so, it is our duty to change it, because it would be an outrage to allow the school trustees to mortgage the property of individual persons within the district. But that is not what is meant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Suppose all the Roman Catholic settlers in the district were to sell their lands to Protestants what would there be left liable, under your contention ?

Mr. MARTIN. That is just what I am coming to. Does the hon. gentleman contend that it would be right to allow a board of school trustees to mortgage something that they do not own, so that the mortgagee can proceed against that individual property ? I say that it may be possible and proper to allow readjustment of school districts, but there must be provision to protect the bondholders. At the same time, you cannot allow them to have a mortgage on the land.

The land in a school district does not belong to the board of school trustees, just as the land in the municipality does not belong to the corporation. They have the power of taxation over it, but the protection that every property owner has is that he will never have to pay more than his own proportion of the debt. That is the difference between a lien under a debenture of this kind and under an ordinary mortgage. I don't think that what the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) suggests militates at all against my view of the law. It militates against the proposition under section 12, however, and I will deal with that in a few moments. I see, however, that section 84, which is not binding upon this committee, not having been passed, is quite in accordance with the law in the province of Ontario and in the province of Manitoba, as to the power of school trustees issuing debentures. It shows the kind of lien intended to be given, and says:

> And the amounts from time to time falling due upon such debentures and coupons (subject to any provisions for establishment of sinking funds for the requirement of any such debentures) shall be included in the amount required from time to time for school purposes for the said district——

That is quite reasonable, but that must be pro rata.

> —and shall be collected and received by and paid to the trustees.

The next section provides for the case where they fail to pay interest or principal. It provides that the bond-holders may sue the corporation, and the sheriff may levy the rate that they should have levied, and collect in the usual way. He cannot levy against any particular land, but upon the whole. The owner of any particular lot cannot be called upon to pay more than his pro rata share of that debt. Let us see what provision section 12 makes for the protection of these debenture-holders. Section 12 provides:

> In all cases of readjustment, the inspector of schools for the district, jointly with one competent person to be appointed by each board of trustees, whose district the readjustment may affect, who shall be non-residents of the said district, shall form a board of arbitration, whose duty it shall be to value the existing school-houses, school sites and other school property or assets within the territories readjusted, and ascertain the respective debts and liabilities thereof; and the said board or a majority of its members shall thereupon adjust and settle in such a manner as they may deem just and equitable, the respective rights, claims and demands of the parties interested; and their award in writing, including their own reasonable costs and charges, may be enforced in the county courts of the province, and which said award shall in all respects be subject to appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, the same as awards in civil matters.

Now, one of the parties interested, and probably the party most interested, is the debenture-holder. He has no representation upon this board of arbitration, but he is bound by the award. Does this clause mean that, if section A owes $1,000 and section B owes $2,000, and it is proposed to readjust the boundaries of sections A and B, this board of arbitration are to determine how much of this $3,000 the new section A is to pay and how much the new section B is to pay? If it does, not mean that, what does it mean? Is that award to be binding only as respects others of the creditors, and, if so, what others? In order to understand it, it seems to me, it is necessary to take into consideration section 11. It was drawn without any regard at all to the nature of the school debenture and without any regard to what is fair and equitable to debenture-holders. What does section 11 provide? We have passed that, but it is necessary, in order to understand this section, to refer back to it. I do not go into it at length, but I wish to summarize as briefly as possible. The first part of section 11 provides that, in the case of land being added to a new district and debentures being upon the new district, the land becomes liable to the debentures, although the debentures had been issued prior to the time the land came into the district. The second part provides that where a piece of land is taken out of one district and put into another, and thereby becomes liable for debentures in the other district, in case that land is called upon to pay the debentures in the district, it shall be entitled to a refund—it does say from whom, but evidently from the old district—of any sums that it has paid.

Mr. McCARTHY. It says, I think, "recoup."

Mr. MARTIN. But it means that, surely.

Mr. McCARTHY. It means they must get it from the party they paid it to.

Mr. MARTIN. I suppose it might just as well mean that as the other. I am trying to put a reasonable construction upon it, though I may be doing it in defiance of the language. But it must mean something that is reasonable. I contended that that was all wrong, for this reason—according to the law, if you take a piece of land out of the district, there is no way of reaching it for the claims of the old debentures, and it follows from the law we propose to put in force that, if you put land into a district, it becomes liable from that fact to the debentures and to hold all claims of that district. So I say that clause 11 is entirely unnecessary and legally of no meaning. But having passed clause 11, it has a very important bearing upon what clause 12 is to be. What does clause 12 mean? Is it proposed that this board of arbitration, upon which the creditors have no representation, may give a decision which shall bind the creditors? If that is not intended, let us say, "Provided, however, that no such arbitration shall have any effect upon the rights of creditors of either of the school districts."

But, if it is to have no effect upon the creditors of the school districts, what good effect is it going to have? I shall be very glad, now that we have more members of the committee here, to hear from members of the committee what their opinion is as to the effect of this section, especially read in the light of section 11 and of section 84.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would be glad if any gentleman in charge of the Bill would tell me what is meant in the last line of the fourth page:

> And the said board, or a majority of its members, shall thereupon adjust and settle in such a manner as they may deem just and equitable, the respective rights, claims and demands of the parties interested.

Now, who are the parties interested? It is important for us to know that, it seems to me it is the key to the whole clause.

Mr. OUIMET. Sections 11 and 12 are a reproduction, word for word, of sections 12 and 13 of the old Act. Section 11 was discussed the other day at great length. It provides for the readjustment of a school district, and specially as to the bearing such readjustment will have on the debentures that might have been issued previously to that readjustment. It provides that whenever to a district new lands will be attached, these new lands will be subject to the payment of the balance of the debentures that might have been issued for that district so adjusted. It also provides for the case where some of the lands that belong to that district may be taken from it and attached to another district; and, as it is easy to be understood, claims will arise as to the unequal treatment that will be the consequence of this readjustment. Supposing, for instance, that the lands that have been detached from another district, and are included in the readjusted district, have already been taxed for payment of the debentures issued the other district, disputes would naturally arise as to the results of that readjustment. It is in order to settle these disputes that this board of arbitrators is provided for in section 112.

Mr. MARTIN. I would ask if that award is binding upon creditors of either of the school districts in any way?

Mr. OUIMET. As to the effect on the debenture-holders, I think the time to discuss that will be when clause 84 is under discussion.

Mr. McCARTHY. And if we ever get there?

Mr. OUIMET. If we do not get there, why should we anticipate difficulties that may never rise?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Because it is dealt with here.

Mr. OUIMET. We are dealing with difficulties that may arise in consequence of the readjustment, and a board of arbitrators is established by this section 12 in order to adjudicate upon these difficulties. As to the effect on the debenture-holders, when section 84 comes up for discussion, it will be time to discuss that. A long discussion took place the other day as to whether a debenture covering a certain territory, or affecting the lands of a certain territory, could be decreased as to its security, by the detachment of a certain part of those lands so affected. It was admitted, according to the reasoning of the hon. member for Winnipeg, that the lands should be immediately affected for the payment of these debentures, including the interest and sinking funds, and the sheriff whenever a writ of execution is placed in his hands, must be the secretary-treasurer in the district, and have a levy on all lands situated within that district. I suppose that the part of section 11 could only be resorted to in the supposition that the lands so sold would be insufficient for the satisfaction of the writ of execution. But, as I said, according to section 84, and to that extent the hon. gentleman for Winnipeg is right, the payment of the annual interest of the debenture and the provision for the sinking fund are included in the taxes that are levied every year; and if that is done every year, there is no reason why later on the lands that have been detached from that district may not be looked after or placed under execution for the satisfaction of the claim of the debenture-holders. I venture to say that although this seems a little complicated, these people have lived twenty years under the operation of this law, and no difficulty seems to have arisen. I think we are losing our time in looking after difficulties that may never arise.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that the hon. gentleman's statement with which he has concluded his observations, did not prove anything. As I understand this section, school property that is in either of the two districts shall be regarded as assets of all those within the boundaries prior to the readjustment. Then, if one of the districts happens to be in debt, and the other owes nothing, and the one that is in debt has a portion of its territories taken from it, and added to the other district, and a certain charge of indebtedness that was due by one district will be transferred to the other in this readjustment; is that so?

Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman sees that the section 12 makes provision for that in what is deemed to be an equitable manner. I find by reference to the Public School Act of Ontario there is a similar clause for the adjustment of moneys there. But what is the use of anticipating these difficulties that have never arisen in Ontario?

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman will find no such clause as clause 11 in the Ontario Act.

Mr. WOOD. I am citing the Ontario section by analogy. Section 83 appears to meet the difficulty pointed out by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) where a portion of a new territory is added and a question of liability is raised in respect to the new part that is brought in. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has raised the question as to the position of debenture holders, as to the extent to which their claims might be a debt. I think that is a difficulty which has never been anticipated by legislation of this kind. I do not think in the Ontario Public Schools' Act there is any provision made for any such condition as covered by sections 10 and 11.

Mr. FRASER. Section 11 provides that "all lands added to the school district by such re-adjustment shall be liable to taxation in common with the remaining portion of the school district for the purpose of meeting payments of debentures." There is no need of any adjustment, because any lands added to the school section become liable like any other land.

Mr. WOOD. I was replying to the hon. member for Bothwell, and was supposing a section which had no debt added to another section on which there was debt, and I said that the clause which I referred to in the Ontario Act provided for such a case. I have pointed out that under section 11, that no adjustment is required. The arbitration clause is clause 12, and there is no sense whatever in the latter part of clause 11.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I desire to ask the Controller of Customs with respect to a matter of considerable importance, and there being a difficulty I do not see how it is met. Suppose a Catholic is tenant of a Protestant property. A school-house is built, and debentures are issued. He bears a proportion of the taxes towards the school-house. Suppose he abandons the property, and it passes to a Protestant tenant. Is it intended that that property shall be held any longer liable? Of course you cannot make it liable. How do you proceed in that case?

Mr. OUIMET. The property is no longer assessed for Catholic schools if it falls into the hands of a Protestant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then you have no definite parties liable for your debentures. Further, supposing those who are Catholic land owners sell their land and it is purchased by Protestants: do they purchase it with a lien on it?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then what security will the debenture holders have?

Mr. WOOD. The debenture holders will have security in the property assessable. I am bound to say this, that we are legislating in a manner similar to the provisions enacted in the school laws in every part of the Dominion. If there is anything in the point raised, the same objection would apply to all legislation, especially the school law of Ontario. Therefore, I think we are wasting time by doing more than merely alluding to this point, because we are anticipating objections which might be raised.

Mr. FRASER. Except as regards Nova Scotia.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Leaving aside for the moment the question of the debenture holders, I should like to ascertain what is the object of the board of arbitration. Section 11 provides for re-adjustment of school districts. Then there is to be a board of arbitration appointed to adjust the liabilities. The board has to value existing schools, school sites and school property generally within the territories readjusted and ascertain the respective debts and liabilities thereof. If they ascertain the liabilities of A and B for purposes of readjustment, what do they award, and against whom do they make an award?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the person be entitled to receive from the other section the portion of money he has contributed for the erection of the school-house?

Mr. WOOD. Possibly. The word "adjustment" means the equalization between the different sections.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I take it that it means a readjustment of the respective liabilities of the corporations of the two sections.

Mr. OUIMET. I understand it is to readjust the rates of the parties interested.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who are they?

Mr. OUIMET. If I belong to district B, and have paid my share for the debentures issued for a school-house in that district, and if I pay in district A, to which I have been transferred for other debentures, I have paid a certain amount in district B, which is proportionately more than the ratepayers in district A have already paid. This is to readjust the claim that I may have for having paid more than my share in the first district. The Board of Arbitrators will have to decide my claim against the first district.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Board of Arbitrators are to ascertain data specified in the clause, but that data does not enable them to base any award on the point the Minister suggests. I think your section is intended to adjust between the two school districts alone, and has nothing to do between the rights of individuals and debenture holders.

Mr. LANGELIER. The same difficulty presents itself in municipal affairs in Quebec, but it is provided for in a clear manner. This clause is very imperfect. Suppose a school district is divided into two, and that before its divisions it had assets and liabilities. What share of these assets and liabilities will devolve upon each of these districts. That is what the clause is intended to provide for. But there is a very important omission which shows a great deal of carelessness in drafting this Bill. Suppose a school district has liabilities of $1,000, and it is divided into two, this clause does not say to whom the creditors shall apply to be paid.

Mr. WOOD. How is it provided for in the Quebec law?

Mr. LANGELIER. If a portion of a municipality is taken away, the creditors have the right always to apply to the municipality or school district which incurred the debt.

Mr. WOOD. Is there anything more definite in that law than here?

Mr. LANGELIER. There is nothing at all here.

Mr. WOOD. You will look in vain through the public school law of Ontario, to find a more definite provision than is set out here.

Mr. LANGELIER. We are dealing with this law and not with the Ontario law, and I have pointed out that there is a very important omission in this respect in the present Bill.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman must know that all these things must be taken into consideration when the new division is asked for, and the municipal council choose to adjudicate on this readjustment. If they meet all the difficulties which the hon. gentleman suggests, it is more than likely that the readjustment will not take place until those difficulties have been removed.

Mr. FRASER. I admit that section 12, if it means anything, points to a readjustment of liabilities of sections; but section 12 can only be operative in view of section 11, where a readjustment is mentioned. Section 11 only refers to two cases, and it refers to persons, and to persons only. Consequently, section 12, if it is of any good at all, must refer to persons. You cannot read the two sections together, and you cannot put section 12 into any effect by arbitration or otherwise. The award mentioned in it merely refers to an award of one section against another. It cannot be an award against the person mentioned in section 11. I would like to see any hon. gentleman, as a judge, applying section 12 to section 11, to which alone it must be applied, and work it out.

Mr. POWELL. Why do you limit it to section 11?

Mr. FRASER. Because there is no other adjustment mentioned.

Mr. POWELL. Suppose a piece of land went over, and carried a school-house with it, what has that to do with section 11?

Mr. WOOD. Section 12 applies to cases of adjustment, leaving section 11 to go by itself. When that is done, it is quite competent to this Board of Arbitrators, under the powers conferred upon them, in making their award, to provide for the remedy. In Manitoba, as in the province of Ontario, the municipalities generally make provision as to the collection of taxes, and so forth; and I suppose that in Manitoba the municipality interested in the adjustment, would take cognizance of this award I fail to see any practical difficulty in the working out of section 12, read by itself.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It should be read by itself.

Mr. FRASER. There is no new adjustment mentioned in section 12.

Mr. LANGELIER. The clear intention of this Bill is to make of each school district, a corporation, otherwise a portion of it would be quite meaningless. For instance, section 11 provides for the issue of debentures by school districts. A school district, to issue debentures, must be a legal person—a corporation, and I do not see anything in the Bill providing for that.

Mr. OUIMET. Everything pertaining to the issue of debentures will be settled later on when we come to section 84. Why should we anticipate that? These people will have lived for 20 years under the operation of this law, and they have been satisfied.

Mr. LANGELIER. If they have not had law suits, that is well: but if we have to make a law, we must make such a law as will be able to stand the test of judicial decisions; and if a school district is to be authorized to issue debentures, I think it would be well to follow the practice in the province of Quebec, where a municipality is divided into two separate municipalities, or is annexed to a neighbouring municipality, as provided for in sections 78 and 79 of the municipal code, which provide with the greatest accuracy and in the minutest detail the way in which the creditors are to proceed to get their payments, and to whom they are to apply. Under this Bill it will be utterly impossible for the creditors of any school district, which is divided into two, or is annexed to a neighbouring district, to know to whom to apply for payment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think the best plan would be for the committee to rise and take up other business and not go on with this Bill until we get somebody in this House who understands it and can explain it.

Mr. WOOD. I am not accustomed to deal in harsh language, but I consider the remark of the hon. gentleman as uncalled for and impertinent. I was going to reply to the point that section 12 must necessarily refer to section 11. Section 11 provides for the readjustment of a school district after the issue of debentures by that district. Section 12 deals with cases of readjustment as regards the valuing of the existing school-houses, school sites and other school property or assets within the territory readjusted and ascertaining the respective debentures and liabilities thereof.

Mr. FRASER. The section merely mentions "readjustment," and that would provide for the readjustment of districts which issued debentures afterwards. No judge will incorporate any words in an Act ; and say that section 12 refers to cases that arise different from section 11. A lawyer would reply why did the legislature not provide for those cases ?

Mr. POWELL. The hon. member for Guysboro' is misapplying the words cases of re-adjustment. The cases of adjustment are not a financial adjustment under section 11, but adjustments of territory under section 10—not adjustments of bonds and liabilities.

Mr. FRASER. No court would give that interpretation without the mention of the different readjustments. I can very well understand how clause 12 was meant to apply to those cases ; but when such adjustment is not mentioned at all, you cannot incorporate it and the readjustment will refer back to section 11.

Mr. POWELL. Readjustment of what, do you mean ?

Mr. FRASER. That is what I want to put in. It can only refer to clause 11 unless you state definitely otherwise.

Mr. POWELL. Both refer back to clause 10 which changes the boundaries of districts. Section 11 applies to the matters referred to in section 11, and section 12 to matters in that section, which may be the circumstances resulting from a readjustment under section 10.

Mr. FRASER. Section 10 does not refer to any readjustment.

Mr. POWELL. Altering the boundaries is a readjustment. It is a territorial readjustment, not a financial one.

Mr. FRASER. Then what would the judgment of the arbitrators be for ?

Mr. POWELL. The better way is to take an illustration : We have two districts, A and B, which are going to readjust their bounds. That is the readjustment that is spoken of. Section A may have a school-house which is taken by section B, with the territory cut off from district B, and it is necessary to readjust the matter between them. It is necessary to value the school-house, and if the school-house is in debt, we will have to value that, and have all the matters come up as matter account between the two districts. The circumstances may be these. A may be in debt for the teacher's salary, and you are giving to B a portion of A, and that debt to the teacher has to be adjusted between A and B, and it may be the individual ratepayer. The only difficulty lies in the words "with regard to the claim and demands of the parties interested," as to whom you include in the parties interested. The language is sufficiently comprehensive to include both districts and the ratepayers in the portion of the territory transferred from the one to the other. The matters that come up for readjustment are the existing school-houses and school sites which have been bought and paid for and should count in the territory transferring them. Other things incidentally will come up, such as the debentures, because their liability is attached to the school-house.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand the Government's proposition, but it is quite impossible, from what we have heard from any hon. gentleman on the other side, to give any satisfactory explanation of the meaning of this section. No one has been able to do so. The only argument for it is that this has been the law in Manitoba for twenty years, and has worked well. I dispute that statement. It was only the law since 1881. In the law of 1881, section 10 of this Bill was section 13, section 11 was included in the same section, and section 12 was section 14. To show that they did not work satisfactorily, in 1883, by chapter 46, the whole system was changed. Then, in 1884, another change was made by chapter 37, section 2, and again in 1885, another change was made. So that they were continually changing the law with regard to the formation of school districts. In 1890 the whole three sections were wiped out and the whole system abandoned because it had worked so utterly unsatisfactorily, and the law was put on a sensible basis, as you find in section 68 of the Manitoba Act.

Mr. POWELL. You retain it in section 70. The drafting is better, but you retain the same thing.

Mr. MARTIN. We retain it, in a way, the same, but it is different, because section 70 means something.

Mr. POWELL. So does the other.

Mr. MARTIN. Perhaps it does, but we cannot find out what it means. The hon. gentleman himself cannot say what the meaning of "parties interested" is. It seems to me that that includes the debenture-holders. They must be interested in saying——

Mr. POWELL. That does not change the relation between debtor and creditor.

Mr. MARTIN. It seems to me it does. If you take a piece of land out of a school district, and there is no means of reaching any lands except that within the school district, the debenture-holders must be affected.

Mr. POWELL. It is practically a dissolution of partnership by arbitration—no more, no less.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, but you have the parties interested in the arbitration.

Mr. POWELL. Not the creditors.

Mr. MARTIN. No, because what is done with respect to partners does not affect the creditors. But take a piece of land out of one section and put it into another and say that it is to be liable for the debts of the new section, and prevent its being liable for the debts of the old section.

Mr. POWELL. It does not say so.

Mr. MARTIN. But what is the effect ? There is no way to reach the land.

Mr. POWELL. Yes, there is.

Mr. MARTIN. How ? The hon. gentleman suggested the other night that you could proceed in equity against these lands.

Mr. POWELL. It would be rather expensive.

Mr. MARTIN. But it cannot be done. You cannot proceed in equity unless you have a mortgage on the land. You have no mortgage in this case and no lien except a lien to have them taxed pro rata ; and if you get the land out of the district you cannot tax it pro rata or any other way. I am sorry the Minister of Justice is sick and not able to be here. The hon. Secretary of State suggested that that was the reason why the conference proceedings should not be discussed in this House. It seems to me a better reason why we should not attempt to pass a law which may not be amendable by us, according to the opinion of eminent lawyers.

Mr. POWELL. Who said that ?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know. But I have read that that opinion has been given.

Mr. WOOD. Better be careful about mentioning eminent lawyers.

Mr. MARTIN. I think I have read that eminent lawyers were of that opinion, but I would not like to give names for fear I might mention some who had not taken that view. But everybody knows that that opinion has been expressed time and time again in this House and out of it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Question.

Mr. MARTIN. But this is most material. One great reason why we must know what this section means is that it is contended that once we pass an Act we cannot alter it. If we cannot understand it, let us alter it to mean something. We have had the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood), the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), and several other members, discussing this clause and no two have placed the same construction upon it, or rather every gentleman has had a different understanding of what the section meant. I think it is the duty of the Government to prepare an amendment to the clause which will give it a clear and definite meaning. This is not according to the law of Ontario. The hon. Controller of Customs read the Ontario law, and it is quite different.

Mr. WOOD. I do not wish to prolong the discussion. I do not know whether it is the intention of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) to do so or not. The hon. Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Westmoreland and I have all argued alike. What is the use of the hon. gentleman saying that no two have agreed.

Mr. MARTIN. I must admit that I did not pay as close attention to the hon. Controller of Customs and the Minister of Public Works when they were speaking as to the hon. member for Westmoreland. I heard that hon. gentleman say that he did not know what "parties interested" meant. As the Controller of Customs and the Minister of Public Works argue on the same line as the member for Westmoreland, they also, it would appear, do not know what these words mean. I call upon the Government to make an amendment to this clause that will mean something. Surely a little trouble would enable us to get a clause that would be satisfactory, at any rate, that would be understood. I do not find anybody particularly opposing this clause. But the difficulty is to understand it. We can neither oppose it nor support it intelligently until we know what it means. That is the difficulty with clause 11. I am dissatisfied with what the committee did with clauses 10 and 11. While we had some difficulties with the previous clauses, we surmounted those difficulties and made such amendments as left the clauses clear. Leaving out the constitutional question raised by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) and some other hon. gentlemen, all the clauses up to clause 8—9 having been struck out—are clear and definite ; and while we do not all agree with the policy of some of them, there is no doubt of what they mean, and they are, in many respects, reasonable. But when we came to clause 10 the Government refused to consider amendments, and arbitrarily voted them down. They refused entirely to consider the most important points I raised as to the right of appeal from municipal councils in forming school districts. I urged that the appeal should be as under the Act of 1890, to the county judge, instead of to the Board of Education. I gave the strongest reason for that when I stated that that was the law of Manitoba. When we came to clause 11, everybody agreed that it was meaningless. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. McLeod) and the hon. member for Westmoreland pointed out that it was perfectly absurd.

Mr. POWELL. Not that it was meaningless.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for Westmoreland pointed out that it was perfectly absurd and meaningless, and the Minister of the Interior put his foot down and said: I will allow no amendment to this clause, because it was that way in the original Bill. Are we to pass a clause because it was in the original Bill ? I say, no. The committee have adopted the policy of making it reasonable and right. I think it is going to be unfortunate, if we are to proceed with this clause as we have with 10 and 11, and accept no amendments. Here we are on clause 12, and we find the same difficulty. I submit the Government are bound, if they have not got one here who understands the Bill, to get some one here who does. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Muskoka that the Government have not got any one here to-night who understands about this Bill. I asked the meaning of the words "parties interested," and as to whether the result of this arbitration would affect the creditors.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was unable to follow the member for Westmoreland in his argument that the words "persons interested" would extend to the school corporations in the districts whose rights are to be adjusted.

Mr. POWELL. I said it certainly includes the two school districts, and is broad enough to include the transferred territory. But I do not claim that it does not extend to the rights of creditors against the property. It is analogous, in my mind, to a dissolution of partnership.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think it goes to the extent of affecting the personal rights of any ratepayers ; it is confined to the corporate rights of the ratepayers in school districts to be adjusted. The duty of the arbitrators is to value the existing school lands, sites and other properties in the territory to be readjusted, that is, the school property of each corporation, and ascertain the respective debts and liabilities thereof. But, starting on the assumption that the section was intended to readjust the several liabilities and rights of the two corporations the limits of whose territory are readjusted, you are constituting arbitrators for the purpose of settling them. The intention, I take it, is that the labours of this arbitration are only to be called into operation in case the trustees do not agree, and an amendment seems to be required. Even though the trustees could agree among themselves, I would suggest that, after the word "readjustment," we add these words: "of any school district, in case the trustees of the school district interested are unable to agree."

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it would be well clearly to understand what this clause 12 was intended to effect. We saw that the preceding clauses are dealing with the readjustment, as it is called, of the district, namely, as my hon. friend from Westmoreland says, of the territorial changes which may be effected. Clause 11 deals with the liability of the taxpayer, and it declares that those who have been liable shall continue to be liable, and those who by that means are called upon hereafter to pay a double assessment in connection, shall have the right to recover back the second assessment which they are called upon to pay. Now, that is a declaration of rights. We have, first, this declaration in regard to an adjustment, and then we have the declaration of rights with regard to the individual ratepayer. Now we come to clause 12, and this is to enable the arbitrators to consider the rights of the taxpayers. My hon. friend who leads the committee is quite clear in his mind that it does not include the right of the individual, no matter how great his wrong may be. Now, is it not right, in the first place, that we should determine whether the taxpayer is to have a right, and, if it is not provided for, to make some provisions to enable him to obtain redress for that right ?

Mr. WOOD. I submit that the hon. gentleman is addressing himself to section 11.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, I am not ; I am pointing out that section 12 says how the provision of section 11 is to be carried into effect. It seems to me that, if these taxpayers are to have rights, we should declare by section 12 how they are to get a remedy. If this clause be as wide as the hon. member for Westmoreland seems to think it is, then the remedy is to be effected under section 12; if it is as narrow as the member for Queen's thinks it is, then there is no means by which these taxpayers are to have their rights. Suppose the case of a man who, in a school district, has been assessed for debentures to build a school-house. Supposing he has paid ten years of those debentures, and there is only ten years to pay. Then he is taken into a new section, without a school-house, and he is then called upon to contribute to building a new school-house ; is he or is he not to have any remedy for the amount he has paid during the last ten years in the old section from which he has been taken ? The committee should know whether the Government propose that a man who has paid a large sum of money for building a schoolhouse, and who, by changing the boundaries of the section, ceases to have any interest in the property in question, shall be able to recover the payment he has made.

Mr. MARTIN. The Manitoba Muncipalities Acts provides for all these matters. By sections 36 to 42, provisions are made and a number of principles laid down which must be followed by the commissioners in arriving at their decision. These are principles that could be applied to this Act, which we should make every effort to perfect, as it is held by every lawyer that it cannot be changed hereafter.

Mr. MARTIN. It appears to me that the superintendent could work out the equities of a case of readjustment.

Mr. IVES. It is perfectly evident to me that the object of this clause is to arbitrate as between the two different school districts when the change is made.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman say, then, what is the meaning of the words, "the parties interested"?

Mr. IVES. It is perfectly evident to me that the words, "parties interested" means school districts there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is my idea, too.

Mr. McCARTHY. If that is the intention of the Government it should be so stated. Then, there is no provision made for the parties who are taken out of their district.

Mr. WOOD. Is any provision made in any school law for such a contingency as the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) suggests? No doubt this Act ought to be made as perfect as possible, but, at the same time, you are anticipating a case that is not provided for in the Manitoba School Act, or in the Ontario Act.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not anticipating anything. If a man is transferred from one district to another, he certainly ought to have a remedy.

Mr. WOOD. There is no provision in the law in Ontario.

Mr. McCARTHY. If there is a defect in the Ontario law, why should we repeat it here? This shows that we should insert it in this Bill?

Mr. WOOD. It shows that this Bill has been subjected to a greater degree of criticism than was ever bestowed on any similar Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. All I want to know is, what the Government intend by this clause?

Mr. IVES. If the hon. gentleman wants to provide for the case of a person who was transferred from one district to another, he can do it by a subsequent clause.

Mr. McCARTHY. That quite meets my views.

Amendment (Mr. Davies) agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The section speaks of two boards, the board of trustees and the board of arbitration, and in line 52 it speaks of "the said board." I would suggest that that ought to be made to read, "the said board of arbitration."

Mr. McCARTHY. It seems to me that we ought, in the second line, to change the word "district" into "districts." If that means anything, it means the inspector of schools of both districts which are being readjusted. Then, what is the meaning of a "competent person"?

Mr. OUIMET. A person who knows.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think that is really confusing. What it means is a person. I would move:

> That section 12 be and is hereby amended by striking out all after the word "the" in the second line thereof, down to and including the word "district" in the fourth line thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof, the following: "Districts, together with two persons to be appointed, one by each board of trustees of the districts to be affected, who shall be non-resident of the said districts."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I move that after the word "interested" the following words be inserted: "consequent upon such readjustment, and shall have power if they see fit to take evidence on oath."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. Why should we give the county courts under this Act power to enforce this award? Our county courts are like the division courts in Ontario, and there is no pleading. Their jurisdiction is limited to a certain amount.

Mr. POWELL. I would suggest the following words: "that the award in writing shall be enforced in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. OUIMET. The section is quite right as it is.

Mr. MARTIN. It is absurd as it is.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman must remember that this Bill is copied from the old law, and it is similar to a clause that has been placed in Mr. Ewart's draft, although I do not say we are bound to follow that. Yet Mr. Ewart must have some authority as a lawyer knowing all about the law in Manitoba. The suggestions of Mr. Ewart have not been followed all through the Bill, but in this instance it is one of the clauses that have been revised by him.

Mr. MARTIN. He just copied the old law.

Mr. MARTIN. I would suggest that the words be inserted in this section: "may be enforced in, and shall be subject to any court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. MONCRIEFF. If we say it shall go to the county court for decision, we can surely give the county court jurisdiction. I think that, after the words "enforced in the county courts," we should add the words "and from the judgment or decision of the said court an appeal shall lie to the Court of Queen's Bench."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What do you want an appeal for ?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The county court is the easiest and the least expensive court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the award directs a certain thing to be done, as well as a specific sum of money to be paid, and you refer that to the county court, it has no jurisdiction to enforce specific performance.

Mr. OUIMET. But it has no jurisdiction to disturb the award. It has only to enforce the award, and if you have to take an appeal from an award, you have to go to the Court of Queen's Bench. The enforcing of the award is purely an executive power given to the county court.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). Then, you are conferring on a court that has no power to do it, an assumed power.

Mr. OUIMET. We give it the power.

Mr. McLEOD. I would suggest that the clause be made to read thus : "and their award in writing, including their own reasonable costs and charges, may be enforced, either in the Court of Queen's Bench, or in the county courts of the province, as the case may be."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That will do.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. My idea is the very reverse—to leave it to the county court to start with.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the proposition of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Mcleod) is accepted, there will be no appeal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Personally, I am opposed to the appeal, which will only leave the lawyers an opportunity to get the school districts to appeal.

Mr. McLEOD. My proposition does not affect the appeal in any way. It leaves the latter part of the section as it is. The first part of the section refers simply to the enforcing of the award, and I suggest, with regard to that, to add the Court of Queen's Bench, which may, in some cases, be the best court to enforce the award. If it is desired to have the award set aside, it remains subject to appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved that the clause be amended by striking out the words "may be enforced in the county courts of the province," and inserting the following words in lieu thereof, "shall be subject to the jurisdiction of and summarily enforced in and by either the county court or the Court of Queen's Bench of the province."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Mr. IVES moved that the section be amended by striking out all the words after province and inserting in lieu thereof the following "and an appeal shall lie from the county court to the Court of Queen's Bench."

Amendment agreed to.

On paragraph 1, section 13,

Mr. MARTIN. When this clause was in force in Manitoba there were only incorporated cities and towns, but now there are villages. I move that the word "village" should be added.

Amendment agreed to.

On paragraph 2,

Mr. MARTIN. I object to this subsection 2 altogether. I do not see why the board should have any power of altering the wards in a city or town. Why not leave it as in the Public School Act. It seems to me that it is going to complicate things to have the Board of Education divide the city into wards different from those for municipal purposes.

Mr. IVES. In working this Act, the school district must be made to suit what would be most convenient to the Roman Catholic school population. It might be found impossible to work this Act if you were to oblige the school trustees to adhere to exactly the same divisions that the municipality adheres to. The first thing you do before you elect a trustee, if I mistake not, is to create a school district.

Mr. MARTIN. No. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken.

Mr. COATSWORTH. In Toronto, where there are six wards, there may be only twenty Catholics in ward 1, while there may be a thousand in ward 2, and I think it would be better to have those words united for this purpose, than to have them separate. The municipal boundaries are settled purely with reference to municipal purposes, not with reference to the religions of the inhabitants ; and it is very desirable that those who arrange for the schools should have the power to form the districts in the most convenient way.

Mr. MARTIN. There may be something in that ; but in Ontario they do not follow that course, but they follow the municipal divisions. There is no part of Winnipeg exclusively Catholic. The Catholics are scattered all through the city in the same way as the Protestants.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Does not the hon. gentleman think that it would be much more convenient for the separate school board to adopt the existing local boundaries, unless they felt compelled by some circumstances such as I have mentioned, to adopt some other boundaries ?

Mr. MARTIN. Probably it would. But why should we have in Manitoba something that has not been found necessary in the province of Ontario ?

Mr. IVES. I do not see that any parties are interested in having the view of the hon. gentleman adopted. It is of no interest to the Protestants that the Catholics should be prevented from creating their school districts with different boundaries from those of the wards of the town. The other provisions of the Bill amply safeguard the interests of Protestants, and of Catholics who do not wish to support separate schools. It is only the separate school supporters who want this provision.

Mr. COATSWORTH. It seems to me it cannot do any possible harm, and we can readily understand a case arising where it would be important for them to have this power.

Mr. MARTIN. They had not it before, as distinguished from the Protestant board, and it was a very improper power for either of them to have. There is no reason why they should divide up the city or town into districts other than those existing for municipal purposes.

Mr. COATSWORTH. A town of 5,000 inhabitants may be divided into four wards. There may be only two or three hundred Catholics in it altogether. Under the hon. gentleman's argument he would insist on their having elections in four wards, whereas, it might be to their interest to have all four wards combined in one district ' or, they might want to divide the town into two wards, and if that was a matter of economy, why should we insist on their dividing the town into four wards instead of two ?

Mr. MACDOWALL. What amendment would the hon. member for Winnipeg propose ?

Mr. MARTIN. My amendment would be to insert the clause of the Public School Act, that is, clause 79.

Mr. COATSWORTH. What about the case of a ward where there are no Catholics at all ?

Mr. MARTIN. That is a very improbable thing. I do not think you would find any ward with no Catholic children in it.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). Outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, there is not a town in Manitoba with two hundred Roman Catholic children in all the wards.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know that it is a matter of very serious importance, but it does seem to me it is not a power we should give to this Board of Education. It will create confusion if you depart from the municipal divisions.

Mr. FLINT. I do not see any great objection to that part of this section. After the explanations of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), it seems to me it would be most convenient to leave to the board the opportunity to arrange the school districts to suit themselves. The latter part of the section seems to give the board power to form districts wherever they see fit. It seems to me a large number of words are taken to make that provision.

Mr. COATSWORTH. But this provision would be subject to the provisions of section 12.

Mr. MARTIN. This speaks of the "appointment" of the trustees. School trustees are not appointed ; they are elected. That word should be changed to "election."

Amendment agreed to, and subsection 2 of section 13 agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 13,

3. In portions of the province not organized into municipalities the Board of Education shall have authority to form and alter school districts under its authority, and the trustees of such school districts are hereby empowered to assess the same and levy and collect taxes therein for the support of their schools.

Mr. FRASER. You cannot assess a district or collect taxes in a district. The board can only assess or collect taxes from the Roman Catholic ratepayers. This must be changed, otherwise it would give this board power to assess all ratepayers.

Mr. IVES. I do not think there is any possible danger of this subsection being held to empower the Board of Education to assess or tax Protestants. The phrase "to assess the same" is not strictly correct. "To assess property in the same" would be more correct.

Mr. FRASER. In unorganized districts, all parties would be assessed.

Mr. MARTIN. The trustees in an organized school district are given, by this subsection, the power to assess and collect taxes, but no machinery is provided by which they can exercise that power. It is important to provide this, and I would suggest that sections 42, 43, 44, 45 and 46 of the Public School Act be added to the section.

Mr. IVES. If we added simply section 42, giving power to appoint an assessor, the rest would flow from the other provisions of the Bill, the case being analogous of that in which the county clerk or the municipal authority, refused to render any assistance. I move, therefore, that the following subsection be added :—

The trustees of all school districts in an organized territory, shall annually, appoint a duly qualified person to make out an assessment roll for the district.

Amendment agreed to.

TUESDAY, 14th April, 1896.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before you proceed with the next clause, considering that we have now been discussing this Bill since 3.30 p.m., and it is now 2.30 a.m., and considering the discussion has been germane to the subject, and the amendments moved by hon. gentlemen who are not in favour of the Bill have been accepted by the Government, and considering the Bill has been materially altered and improved by those amendments, it is only reasonable that the Government should allow the committee to rise. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. McLEOD. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press that motion ; we have done good work, and we have only a short time before us, and we had better go on with the Bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the Government are going to pursue the same tactics that they did last week, what are they going to gain ? They must have seen that if they had gone on steadily with the Bill during regular hours, we would have been far ahead of what we have done. The progress of the Bill would have been very much greater, if they had come down with it at the proper time of the session, as they should have done.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. member for Muskoka will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I would propose that we should go on for another hour or two, provided the Government will give us the assurance that the House will then adjourn.

Mr. McLEOD. I have never taken any time in discussing these motions, but it is undeniable that we have wasted a great deal of time. Had we gone on with the Bill, as we should have done, we would have got through with it by this. We have done some work to-night, though we spent a great deal more time over the two sections than was required. I am willing to go on until this Bill is completed.

Mr. STUBBS. Day and night ?

Mr. McLEOD. I hope the hon. gentleman will withdraw his motion, and let us go on.

Mr. EDGAR. The suggestion is most fair, and, if the Government will agree to rise at four o'clock, we will go on with the business. If they will not, it shows the clearest possible case of trying to drive the House by physical force. People are not made of iron or cast steel, but have flesh, and bone, and blood, and nerves, and they require rest. A horse would not be treated that way, nor a slave, and yet we are representing a free people. If the Government have no consideration for us, let them consider the people we represent. They are insulting the people and bulldozing them. There is no use in the Government imagining that they are either going to force members of this House like driven cattle, or that they are going to make political capital out of an attempt of this kind. The people of this country will resent such physical force coercion more than they will almost anything else. The Franchise Act is universally unpopular, and one of the reasons for its unpopularity is that an attempt was made to force it through this House. But no such attempt in the history of this Parliament ever reached the magnitude of the present one. I am perfectly satisfied that the Government are politically playing into our hands by their action ?

Mr. COATSWORTH. Why object then ?

Mr. EDGAR. Because I do not want to be compelled to remain here night after night. The longer it goes on the more will the country understand that this is an attempt of the majority to coerce the minority in this House. The coercion attempted by this Bill is nothing compared to the coercion attempted by the action of the Government. No sane legislators in the world would do a thing like this. It is the last resort of a desperate Government. What is the use of going through this farce of pretending to pass this Bill when they know it cannot be passed this session. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) must be forcing the Government to go on.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. He is in bed.

Mr. EDGAR. Yes, and how pleasant it is to see that he is forcing the Minister of Railways to do his work.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The French Ministers are all gone too.

Mr. EDGAR. Yes, and they are allowing the Minister of Railways to look after the matter for them. When the leader of the House agreed to a certain amendment the other day, the member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) jumped up and said : I object to that, and the leader of the House had to take it all back. What a pleasant thing it is to see the Cabinet under the whip of the hon. gentleman (Mr. LaRivière). I think the amendment of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) is a most reasonable one and should be agreed to.

Mr. O'BRIEN. We have been four and a half hours discussing two clauses of the Bill, and that delay has occurred because the Ministers have been unable to give explanations or deal intelligently with the question. If they will not accept the proposal to sit until four o'clock, which is in itself an unreasonable hour, I will have to press my motion.

Mr. WALLACE. It has never been heard of in any Parliament in the world, or in any free country, that men should be forced to attend to their legislative duties for twenty-four hours in the day. The people of the country do not want to see their valuable legislators killed off in this way, and such a course will not meet with their approval. When those gentlemen who support the Government in this House go back to their electors, they will have to tell them : We tried to coerce the province of Manitoba.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Not at all.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for Algoma says not at all, but if it is not coercion to try and force a Bill through against the almost unanimous verdict of the people of a province, then I want to know what the word "coercion" means. The hon. gentleman should recall to mind that both political parties in Manitoba consider that it is coercion. The people of the country, so far as I can learn, are opposed to this attempt at coercion, and they are freer in forming an opinion than we are, because they are exempt from any improper considerations which we might be subjected to here. Members of Parliament are only human, anyway. Suppose the Government were to offer one the position of a senator. Of course, there is no vacancy now, but still there might be anyway by-and-by and a Government might say : we will make you a senator if you vote with us. This Government, of course, would not be guilty of any such improper conduct, but there might be another Government which would do that. Of course, we all have consciences of the most active description, but those consciences are often weakened by offers of this kind. It may be only a humbugging offer after all, because unless we kill a senator there would be no vacancy, but the promise of a position when a vacancy occurs would have influence upon anybody except the hon. members of this House. We know it would have no effect upon the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson), because he would spurn an offer of that kind.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). The member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson) has acted within his conscience, and within his political right, and he has acted as independently as the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) ever did and he will continue to do so.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member was in Parliament before your humble servant was, and possibly he may, or possibly may not, be in Parliament after me. If he were made a Senator, he would be in Parliament right along to the day of his death. But I am not in the senatorial business. I said that the hon. member for North Leeds (Mr. Ferguson) was not open to such mercenary considerations. Every member of this House who knows him knows that he is lifted high above any such thoughts or feelings ; and whatever any one else would do, the hon. member for North Leeds would not accept a Senatorship as a barter for the betrayal of his constituents. Now, I hope I shall get the plaudits of the hon. member.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. What has that to do with the question that the committee rise ?

Mr. WALLACE. I was giving reasons why the committee should rise, when the hon. gentleman asked me questions. This put me in the position of either not replying to those questions, or dealing with them. If they had been called to order when they put these irrelevant questions, it would not be necessary for me to answer them. Now, why should this committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again ? The hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) says we should not. Well, if the hon. member goes back to his constituents I will venture to predict that if he gets the nomination of his party, which he has not got——

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). But he will get it.

Mr. WALLACE. He will not get it, he cannot get it, and he will be certain not to get it after having misrepresented his constituents.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). He has not misrepresented his constituents.

Mr. WALLACE. Then I have a letter from a gentleman who was a warm supporter of his——

Mr. McDONALD. I have a hundred letters.

Mr. WALLACE. He knows the name of the gentleman himself. He was at Regina on the 8th of this month, and he says that if the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia went back to his constituency he would require a body-guard.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). Oh, I am not afraid. I will go there alone.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member did not get the nomination of his party at any rate. Another genteman has got that.

Mr. EDGAR. Might I ask the hon. gentleman, did I not see somewhere that the hon. member for East Assiniboia made a great speech down in Quebec against this Bill ?

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). No, you did not. If you have that, trot it out.

Mr. WALLACE. The information I got on that subject was that he very cleverly straddled the fence.

An hon. MEMBER. Which side did he fall on ?

Mr. WALLACE. You remember the story about the darkey and the turkey. The darkey said, "The turkey was sitting on the fence, and he first sat on one side and then on the other side, and at last he flopped over; but he flopped over on the side where there was most corn." The hon. member for East Assiniboia sat on the fence, but he flopped over on the side where there was most corn. Of course, it is not a Senatorship in his case; he would not be induced to flop from the side of virtue by the offer of a Senatorship; but I think you will find that, like the turkey, he has flopped over on the side where there is most corn. Now, I am going to call your attention to what I consider important facts in regard to the Bill before the House, the consideration of which will, I think, decide you that we should not proceed further with this Bill at the present time. I had occasion last week to make some comparisons between the proposed separate schools in the province of Manitoba and those of the province of Quebec, and I tried to show that the Government are attempting to force upon Manitoba a system of separate schools such as have no parallel in any other province of the Dominion. Though I am not an apologist for the government of Manitoba, yet I say that all the evidence proves conclusively to my mind that that government have been conciliatory, and anxious to do what they could without sacrifice of principle. Conservative as I am, and attached to the principles of the Conservative party, I will say that the government of Manitoba——

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). You are a McCarthyite now.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not a McCarthyite, nor any other "ite." I am just what I always have been, and I have never sold my principles, as the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) has done. That hon. gentleman had told the Premier of Canada in my presence—I am stating a fact now—that he never would vote for a system of separate schools in Manitoba, that he never would vote for this Remedial Bill——

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Pardon me, that is not what I did say.

Mr. WALLACE. What did the hon. member say?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Finish your speech, and I will make my statement.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to be corrected if I have made a statement which is in any way incorrect.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I would have to make a speech in answer to the hon. gentleman to explain what I did say. At that time we were friends and confreres. I went to the leader of the Government and told him that I never could vote for the re-establishment of separate schools in Manitoba as they existed previous to 1890. The Premier told me to go and do as I pleased, and get elected. Which is entirely different from the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. WALLACE. We are told of every clause of this Bill, that it was in force previous to the Act of 1890. We are told that 106 out of the 112 clauses are precisely the same as those of the School Act previous to 1890. The hon. gentleman will have every opportunity of explaining why he did not fulfil that promise, which he made not only to the Premier, but to many of his constituents; and I promise him that he will have a large contract on his hands when he comes to explain it to his constituents. Now, I was pointing out that this law for Manitoba goes beyond the school laws of any of the other provinces. I have before me the Public School Acts and Regulations of the province of Nova Scotia, portions of which I will read to the House; and I think it will be demonstrated clearly that those gentlemen from Nova Scotia who are so anxious to impose a system of separate schools on Manitoba would not permit any such Act to be placed on the statute-books of their own province. To my mind that is very inconsistent. Why should I refuse to have a law placed on the statute-book of my own province that I am determined to place on the statute-book of another province? I know well my own province, its conditions and circumstances and necessities; but I do not know the conditions and circumstances of a province a thousand or more miles away. Yet we are asked to rush the clauses of this Bill through Parliament without proper consideration; and if we refuse to do that, we are called obstructionists. We are not obstructionists, we are patriots; we are the men who are anxious to have the business of Parliament done right, or not done at all. For my part, I am one of those who say that this legislation should not be done at all. The Government have given us no reason for it. There is no demand for it from the people interested. The demand comes from where? From the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson); from the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart); from the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Hughes); from the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell). These are the gentlemen who demand that these separate schools shall be established.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). You have no right to say that.

Mr. WALLACE. The people of Manitoba are not demanding them. It is said that petitions signed by about 5,000 people, men, women and children, were sent asking for them. Well, that is about one-fourth of the Roman Catholic population; and surely it is not contended for a moment that one-fourth represents the whole population. We had the additional evidence, stated the other day by the commissioners who met the Dominion commissioners, that outside of two municipalities 75 per cent of the separate schools are incorporated under the Public School Act, and are working satisfactorily under that Act. Why should they not ? What is to prevent those of the Roman Catholic faith adopting the public school system of Manitoba, and getting their children educated better than they were educated under the old system ? It is said that that interferes with their conscience ; but 60 per cent of the Roman Catholic people of Ontario are able to get their children educated under the public school system of the province of Ontario without any interference with their conscience. But if the doctrine those gentlemen preached to us about the Roman Catholic children of Manitoba be correct, these children are deprived of their conscientious rights. It is a matter of conscience with the children of Manitoba that they are to be taught their religion in the public schools, but it is not a matter of conscience in the province of Ontario or the city of Windsor. Well, if conscience applies in the one case, it ought in the other. There never was a more fraudulent representation than that their conscience requires religious education in the schools. Have we interfered with any civil or religious liberty ? Have we interfered with their right to worship God as they choose, to educate their children in whatever doctrine they choose ? No such thing is attempted. Every church is protected in all the rights it can demand. No church has ever yet been able to say that any right to which it was entitled has been interfered with in any degree. Where is the interference with civil or religious liberty or with conscience ? There is none. That being the case, there is no reason for the proposed legislation. We can get along without it, and can leave the province of Manitoba to manage its own affairs instead of thrusting our crude, ill-considered views upon it. And at the dictation of whom ? Who is behind all this ? I would like to ask the hon. member for North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Ferguson) whom he takes his orders from ?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). I am not under orders from anybody, not even Clarke Wallace.

Mr. WALLACE. I am quite sure he is not. I am quite sure that Clarke Wallace has never attempted to give orders——

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Nor has any other man dare even to attempt it.

Mr. WALLACE. I can say further that he is not going to give orders to anybody but himself. He regulates his own conduct and is responsible for it.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). Then he should grant the same privilege to others. He has no right to refer to me in that peculiar insinuating manner.

Mr. WALLACE. The orders have gone out, what are they ? They are that this Bill is to be pushed through at all hazards. Are the Government not aware that they are wasting the time of Parliament ? If there was a chance of the Government pushing this legislation through, there might be some excuse for its course, but every member of this House knows that is impossible. Either one or two things. The Government want to make the Roman Catholic population believe that they are doing all that mortal men can do to pass this Bill into law ; or else his Eminence the Archbishop of St. Boniface, has given his orders, and they must be obeyed. I decline to exert myself to make the Roman Catholics believe that we are doing our very best to pass this legislation. Why ? Because the Bill never came up for debate until more than two months of the most valuable time of Parliament has elapsed. Until then what were we doing ? Kicking up our heels, marking time, discussing matters in a perfunctory way, debating the Budget, which will never be reached, and which the Government have made no special effort to reach. But now, at the end of the session, they say : We will make you sit night and day until you pass this Bill. At the beginning of the session, they said : We will not make you sit at all, but we will adjourn from day to day after sitting about five minutes. That is the state of the case which they will have to explain. They will have to explain to their taskmaster, the Archbishop, at their head, how it was that after two long months, they started out on this course when they could have forced the Bill through in a legitimate constitutional way, had they submitted it at proper time. On the other hand, they will have to explain to those who are opposed to the Bill that they made us sit day after day, night after night, and nailed themselves down to the policy of this Bill, and did their best, in the last hours of the session, to make it pass. When the crack of the whip was heard, when the orders came from the old Archbishop on the hill that the Bill had to be gone on with, the Government had to obey. When Friday last came, they were asked what they were going to do. Nobody knew what course the Government would take but we are told—and of course the rumours may be true or they may not,—that a member of the Government and one not a member of the Government, two distinguished men called upon the Archbishop and got their orders.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). That is an infernal shame and you know it.

Mr. WALLACE. If it be true, it is what the hon. member for Algoma says it is, and if not true we are here wasting our time. Can any one tell us what for ?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). To pass that law.

Mr. WALLACE. We know that the law will not pass. We know that the eloquence of those opposed to the law will have such a strong effect upon the Government that the Government will yield to their views and will say : Gentlemen, as you are so earnestly desirous of the Bill not coming on, we will accede to your wishes. That is the course which the Government will probably take, and this question will be thrust into the arena of an election campaign ; and I think that when the electors are brought face to face with it, and asked whether they will submit to the dictation of gentlemen who have plainly told them in strong language that if they do not do this, they are a lot of hell-inspired hypocrites, they will resent such dictation. I shall not submit to that dictation. This being the case, we might fairly say to the Government : You had better proceed with those other questions which the country is looking with anxious solicitude to have settled. The people are looking for the fulfilment of the promise of the Government to provide for the defence of the Dominion against any foe whatever, and no matter what the consequences may be, to stand by Great Britain. The people are looking to us to enlarge our business with foreign lands and increase our productiveness at home. But instead, we have allowed three and a half months to pass without touching any of those important questions. Not one single law have we passed except some private legislation, which of course is important in its way, and we have spent a half of million dollars doing what? Dividing the nation into hostile camps on religious grounds, and embittering religious feeling among the people. The Government could not do a better thing, even to-day, than to cry a halt. Why do they attempt still further to obstruct the business of Canada ? We place upon them the responsibility of the absence of necessary legislation and the necessary passing of the Estimates. An unseen power seems to be forcing the Government upon the rocks to destruction. Is there any means of stopping them in their mad career on this question ? We are able and willing to so strongly impress our views upon this Parliament that this Bill will not become law. The Public School Act of Nova Scotia is much more stringent than the law is in Manitoba to-day, but the government of Nova Scotia say they will not change it. Yet we see that the government of Manitoba have committed themselves to certain concessions and agreed to almost everything, except establishing the principle of separate schools. And why have not the offers of the Manitoba government been accepted ? It is because of the postscript sent up to the commissioners in Manitoba after they had left here. That postscript is as follows :—

> The committee of the Privy Council on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, advise that the Order in Council of 21st March instant, be amended by the insertion after the words "the Remedial Bill (Manitoba)" in the said Order in Council, of the words "the delegation are hereby given full power to effect an arrangement with the government of Manitoba on such terms as shall be satisfactory to the said minority."

It was therefore not left to the representatives of the two governments to deal with the matter as they should deal with it, but this order meant that the consent of His Grace the Arshbishop of Manitoba must be obtained. How could they ascertain the views of the minority, except through His Grace the Archbishop. That might be right on religious matters, but on questions of education, and on questions affecting the civil rights of the people, the Archbishop should have no power to interfere. Outside of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, all over the Dominion, education has been completely divorced from the domain of the churches.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. In Manitoba they did not dare to divorce it, because the Protestants themselves were against it.

Mr. WALLACE. The decisions of the Privy Council are to the effect that the schools of Manitoba are non-sectarian in every sense. The government of Manitoba have given their pledge to enact legislation that will abolish religious teaching in the schools, and make them completely secular.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) says they won't do it, because they are afraid of the churches.

Mr. WALLACE. They have solemnly pledged themselves to do so in their offer to the commissioners.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. And that offer proves that they are not secular schools.

Mr. WALLACE. They have offered to do that if it would satisfy the minority. There is, I believe, a large and growing number of the people of Canada who are in favour of the secularization of the schools. The second offer of the Manitoba government is as follows :—

> Second, in the alternative we offer to repeal the present provisions of the School Act relating to religious exercises, and to enact in substance the following :—
> No religious exercises or teaching to take place in any public school, except as provided in the Act. Such exercises or teaching, when held, to be between half-past three and four o'clock in the afternoon.
> If authorized by resolution of the trustees, such resolution to be assented to by a majority, religious exercises and teaching to be held in any public school between 3.30 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Such religious exercise and teaching to be conducted by a Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person satisfactory to a majority of the trustees who may be authorized by said clergyman to act in his stead ; the trustees to allot the period fixed for religious exercises or teaching for the different days of the week to the representatives of the different religious denominations to which the pupils may belong in such a way as to proportion the time allotted as nearly as possible to the number of pupils in the school of the respective denominations. Two or more denominations to have the privilege of uniting for the purpose of such religious exercises. If no duly authorized representative of any of the denominations attend, the regular school work to be carried on until four o'clock.

No pupil to be permitted to be present at such religious exercises or teaching if the parents shall object. In such case the pupil to be dismissed at 3.30.

Where the school-room accommodation at the disposal of the trustees permits, instead of alloting different days of the week to different denominations, the trustees to direct that the pupils shall be separated and placed in different rooms for the purpose of religious exercises as may be convenient.

We believe that the foregoing proposals will remove any well-founded grievance.

Now, Sir, when these two proposals are presented to the people of this country, I believe they will be endorsed by the people, and that the charge that the Manitoba government are not willing to do anything to meet the wishes of the minority, will fall to the ground. Why was that offer not accepted ? It was because this Government did what no other government should do, they made pledges and promises months before, which tied their hands down. The remedial order was a drastic and tyrannical one, and one that would never have been sent to the province of Manitoba, if we had these illustrious statesmen who conducted the affairs of Canada before this present regime came into power. Look at the history of Sir John Thompson, himself a Roman Catholic, and you will see that he was for conciliating the Manitoba government. Referring again to the Nova Scotia school law, the oath taken by the teacher provides that there shall be no evasion of the regulations. Under these regulations the doctrines of no denomination are to be taught, and any devotional exercises in the schools are to be such as not to offend the religious feelings of any. If the regulations of the province of Nova Scotia are satisfactory to the Roman Catholics, as we are told they are, the regulations of the province of Manitoba are much more liberal, and must be satisfactory to the minority in that province. But if that is not sufficient, the government of Manitoba offer to grant them anything in reason short of endorsing the principle of separate schools, established and conducted under the law of the country. They say that it is not proper or right that the public money of the province should be devoted to teaching the dogmas or doctrines of any church. If the doctrines of any church are to be taught in the province of Manitoba, can any one give me a reason why the doctrine of every church should not be taught there ? Where would that lead us ? The result would be that it would be impossible to conduct half a dozen schools where the people are barely able to conduct one set of schools ; and so the education of the children would be neglected, and the country would retrograde. That would be the legitimate and logical conclusion which would follow from the adoption of the principle of separate schools. The proposals offered by the government of Manitoba the other day, if accepted, would remove every possible grievance of the minority, and would render it unnecessary to pass legislation at all. That legislation would never be attempted, only that the Government last July solemnly pledged themselves to it. The Parliament of Canada, I am satisfied, would be willing to accept the proposals of Manitoba, but the Government, whether willing or not willing to accept them, are unable to do so—why ? Because of their pledges and promises, and because the other parties to the contract demand the pound of flesh, and will accept nothing else. We are placed in this dilemma to-day. The Government have tied their hands ; they have promised to do something which they cannot do ; they have made promises which they cannot fulfil, and because they have done that, we are kept here day after day, night after night, morning after morning, expending our eloquence that should be expended in other directions for the benefit of the people of Canada, in pointing out the fallacy and the utter inadequacy of this measure.

They propose, still more, to take away any religious teaching which may be objectionable and make the schools perfectly secular. Either of those plans they have pledged themselves to introduce into the legislature in Manitoba and enact into law or else resign their position. But these offers were not accepted. Why ? Because the power behind the Throne had the pledge of the Government of Canada that they would force through to a conclusion a Remedial Bill, founded on the decision of the Privy Council of Great Britain, and the oppressive, arbitrary, tyrannical remedial order sent Manitoba. We are at the end of the sixth session of this Parliament, and shall soon be face to face with the people. Let the people decide. We never had a mandate from the people to settle this question. It is a new piece of legislation, and one which the great statesmen of the past, who built up confederation, put on the statute-book, to be used only in cases of the most urgent and extreme necessity. Every government has extensive powers. The Government of Great Britain has power to veto any law passed by the Dominion, but it does not follow that they are bound to exercise it, and they never have exercised it. They sent remonstrances on one or two occasions. They remonstrated when it was proposed to reduce the salary of the Governor General, which was an Imperial matter, because he is an Imperial officer, and the remonstrance had its desired effect, but they have never attempted to exercise their enormous power of veto. Although they were strongly opposed to our protective policy, as injurious to the motherland, they wisely refrained from interfering with it in any way. In this matter, while the Parliament of Canada has the power to legislate, it should pause before doing so. Because we have the power, it does not follow that we are compelled to legislate. The opinion of the Privy Council is not that we should re-enact the old law. They say it is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. All legitimate grounds of complaint, they say, would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions. In my opinion, the concessions offered by the legislature of Manitoba satisfy the conditions required by the Privy Council. We were told, at the beginning of the debate, by the leader of the Government, that before confederation, the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada had their hands on one another's throats, and that, owing to their division on the religious question, the continuance of the union between them was utterly impossible, and it was necessary to bring in the provinces by the sea, and establish confederation, leaving each local legislature to deal with its own local affairs, including these religious questions, and giving the central Parliament jurisdiction over matters of general interest to all provinces. The people of every province in this Dominion are fair-minded, and they have no desire to oppress the minority. The Catholics of New Brunswick told us that they never could get justice from the local legislature, but it was afterwards found that they could, and indeed it is said to-day that in some places it is the Protestants that are being oppressed in that province. Sir John Macdonald and Hon. Alexander Mackenzie said to the minority of New Brunswick : Go to your own province and they will render you justice, and if that course had been followed by this Government, everything would be satisfactory to-day. The reason that that course had not been pursued is that this Government were willing to imperil the existence of this Dominion in order to catch the Roman Catholic vote to keep them in power. Here they have wasted the whole session, which has cost the country over half a million dollars.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. That is your fault.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman says that is my fault.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Yes, you obstructed the business.

Mr. WALLACE. Can it be said that half a dozen members or even five dozen members of Parliament, can rule the majority ?

Mr. IVES. In this Parliament, but not in the next.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Trade and Commerce had better keep his predictions until after the event.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). It would not be a prediction at all then. You will be as mild as a sucking dove after the next election.

Mr. WALLACE. I tell the hon. gentleman that I shall express my free and independent feeling after the next general election, whether in Parliament or out of Parliament, as I do to-day, and I will not be dictated to by any man or by any set of men. I repudiate the assumption that I have obstructed. I would not hesitate to say that if necessity for obstruction should arise, and if it were necessary to kill such an objectionable Bill as this, I would be delighted to be an obstructionist.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. You can be delighted then.

Mr. WALLACE. The necessity for obstruction has not arisen and even if it did, the rules of a British Parliament prevents it. The people of this country will not hold the Government guiltless in this matter. They have neglected the interests of the people of Canada, and they have not accomplished anything in the direction they attempted, whether sincerely or not I will not say.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) would be most valuable to the House and to the country, as to whether the Government had sincerely attempted to accomplish this or not ?

Mr. WALLACE. It is one of the most difficult of problems to express positively an opinion as to a person's sincerity. I confess that in this case it is a difficult and intricate problem, and I shall not attempt to solve it. The Government could have brought this question before the House at an early date, and having a large majority at their back, they could have passed this measure into law, notwithstanding the protests of those who are opposed to it. The hon. gentleman asks my opinion as to the sincerity of their intentions. Well, I do not think I am called upon to express an opinion upon the sincerity of anybody's intentions, but only to judge by their acts. Now, after these few remarks, I do not think I would be justified in detaining the House any longer, as there are many other hon. members who are anxious to express their views. I do not think we should be forced to proceed with this matter at a break-neck speed. Time was made for slaves, not for free men like us. Give us our own time ; let us take our own gait. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who only spends six or eight hour a day in this House, cannot realize what it is for us who feel it our solemn duty to spend twenty-four hours every day in discussing this measure. I think you will agree, Mr. Chairman, that it is the duty of every member of Parliament to be in the House and watch the course of legislation ; and I do not think that the majority of the people of Canada will raise any objection to our course of procedure. They will say that we have not legislated hastily, but have legislated wisely and well, and their verdict will be, "well done, good and faithful servants."

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Mr. Chairman, I need not answer all the twaddle that has been talked by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat.

Mr. EDGAR. I rise to a point of order. I would like to know whether the word "twaddle" or "twiddle," or anything of that kind, is parliamentary ?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I say that when an hon. gentlemen spends hour after hour in talking nonsense, he is speaking twaddle and nothing else.

Mr. EDGAR. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). I think the hon. member used the word "twaddle" in a parliamentary sense.

Mr. EDGAR. If the hon. gentleman says so and apologizes for any personal meaning, it might pass ; but if he does not use the word in a strictly parliamentary sense, I think he should be censured and named.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I submit to hon. members that when a gentleman undertakes to speak on the subject under discussion, and wanders off to a variety of subjects which are not under discussion, to my mind it is twaddle, and nothing else. If the hon. gentleman is satisfied with that, he is welcome to it. I was going to say that this Bill has been discussed so many days that the people are tired hearing of it. It has been threshed out in this place so long that it has become nauseous in the noses of the public. I am sorry my hon. friend has gone away because I was going to say a few words about him, particularly as he brought my name into the discussion. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) discussed the question of who were going to be appointed from this side of the House to positions in return for their vote on this Bill. I wish to say this, that no offer has been made me nor have I ever solicited anything. I feel that I am doing my duty honestly and starightforwardly, as a member of the Conservative party ought to do it, in supporting the Government on this measure. I challenge the hon. gentleman to come into my constituency and fight me there after I have done my duty to the party. There is another matter that engaged the attention of the hon. gentleman, and I am sorry to have to allude to it while he is not here, in which he committed a breach of confidence by telling what took place in the Privy Council. Hon. gentlemen opposite are honest and just enough to know whether a man should commit a breach of confidence in revealing what took place in the Privy Council. It is true that I did go to my leader and say to him that I could not support any measure that was going to re-establish separate schools in Manitoba, as they existed previous to 1890, and that was the question before us at the time. My leader told me to do as I pleased, in the presence of Mr. Clarke Wallace, who was then a member of the Government at the time, and it is a low contemptible thing for a man to repeat a private conversation that took place between my leader and the hon. member for West York and myself at that time. I will state what really took place. I went to my leader and told him how I felt. The hon. member for West York was sitting there and heard the conversation. My leader told me to go and do as I pleased. What am I doing ? I am helping the Government, and intend doing it all through the piece, and he is not, although he was a member of the Government at that time and I am but a private member. I am merely repeating the conversation that took place between the leader of the Government and the hon. gentleman and myself, and when that hon. gentleman repeated the conversation, he did what is low, mean and contemptible.

Mr. EDGAR. Surely things are going a little too far, when one hon. member, no matter how strong his feelings may be, should characterize another in that way. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) was very anxious the other day to have certain words taken down. I do not know how these words could be taken down because I see no clerk here, but I am sure the hon. Minister will agree with me that such words as "low, mean and contemptible," applied to another hon. member should be either taken down or withdrawn or something should be done. They should not be allowed to pass unnoticed, more particularly as the hon. member to whom they are applied is out of the House.

An hon. MEMBER. He is here now.

Mr. EDGAR. I did not know he was here when that language was applied to him. We ought to exercise among ourselves, under your direction, Mr. Chairman, the same proper parliamentary self-respect which we would have if we were sitting in a business session of Parliament. Therefore I call on the hon. member for Algoma to withdraw those expressions.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The expressions I have made use of are perfectly correct. They occurred in a private conversation in the office of the president of the Privy Council. What I say I do not take back, and I say more than that. I found the hon. gentleman was prepared to deliver over to the great party opposite a certain majority by which the Government would be defeated. When I found that, I could be no longer a supporter of the hon. gentleman and I withdrew. Now, I judge, from what I see before me to-night, that though the obstructionists do not come so much from that side, still the hon. gentlemen are sitting there prepared to take part in the debate and keep the thing going. When I saw the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) and other hon. gentlemen,—the admiral, for instance—sitting bolt upright in the House, I come to the conclusion that there is a scheme on hand and that it is advisable for us to watch them. Therefore, I judge that the information I received was reliable, and that was that a certain number of us were to be delivered over, body and soul, to the leader of the Opposition to defeat the Government, and I say that I shall not be a party to anything of the kind.

Mr. WALLACE. There never was a more unfounded slander. Why, the hon. gentleman went up and down the corridors of this House proclaiming to everybody last year that he would never submit to this measure. He told it a hundred times in my presence, and he repeated it to dozens of his constituents whose letters I have.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). It is not true.

Mr. WALLACE. He wrote to Major Thomas Elliot, whose letters I have.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Produce the letters.

Mr. WALLACE. I shall produce them if the hon. gentleman wants them. There is another letter I have in my pocket which I received to-day from Fort William, dated——. It says :

> On Thursday March the 26th they held a meeting of the executive committee of the Fort William Liberal-Conservative Association. Fourteen out of eighteen members comprising the executive were present. The following resolution was passed :—
> That, in the opinion of the executive committee of the Fort William Liberal-Conservative Association, the so-called Remedial Bill of the Dominion Government, already passed the second reading, is contrary to the principles of Ontario Conservatives, and injurious to the best interests of the Dominion ; that our member, Mr. George Macdonell, having voted for the second reading, has forfeited our confidence in him as our member and acted contrary to the wishes and the views of the majority of his supporters throughout the riding ; that therefore we instruct our officials to call a special meeting of the general association forthwith to discuss the advisability of holding another convention.

A general meeting was called for, I think, Saturday, April 4th, at which, after endorsing the action of the executive and doing some other routine business, the following resolution was carried by an overwhelming majority, in the largest meeting ever seen at Fort William of the Conservative Associations :

> Whereas, at the time the last convention for the Dominion House in this district, in the Liberal-Conservatives interest, was held, it was generally believed that a general election was immediately pending, whereas since that time two sessions of the Dominion House have been held, in which much important legislation has been initiated and some passed ; whereas our member, at the time of such convention, showed considerable weakness as a candidate ; and whereas his action and votes since then have, in the opinion of many of his warmest supporters before the said convention, still further weakened him,—therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of the Fort William Liberal-Conservative Association, it is in the best interests of the party in this district to hold another convention.

Of course that expresses unbounded and unlimited confidence in the hon. member for Algoma by his own constituents.

Mr. IVES. How does it happen this report was sent to the hon. gentleman ?

Mr. WALLACE. There is nothing to prevent any member of that Conservative Association sending me a report of the proceedings, which, I presume, are always published in the press of the district.

Mr. IVES. From the report being made to you, it would seem you had originated the meeting.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman will not find a single ground for his insinuation. I never heard of any such meeting having been called until I recived this letter to-day, giving me this account of it. This is somewhat of a free country yet, and any gentleman in the district of Algoma is at perfect liberty to write to me telling me what proceedings have taken place in Fort William with regard to a question which is exciting more interest and attention throughout the country than those hon. gentlemen perhaps dream of. The resolution passed by the executive committee and that passed at the largest meeting of the Conservative Association ever held, show conclusively that the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) was never asked by me for his vote. I asked neither him nor any other hon. member for his vote. Why should I ? Every man is responsible to his constituency for his vote and not for me. I am responsible only for my own vote to my own constituency as every other hon. member is. Those who sent the hon. member for Algoma here, have apparently been watching closely his course, and have expressed their opinion in open meeting, first at the executive committee where out of eighteen members, fourteen of his old-time friends condemned his course, and next at the largest meeting of the Conservative Association ever held at his own door, within a few miles from where he himself resides. And then the hon. gentleman can get up and say that I have attempted to bulldoze him and deliver his vote. I denounce it as a slander that I ever attempted to influence any person's vote.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman has spoken already on the motion to adjourn and is now wandering from the subject altogether.

Mr. WELSH. The hon. member for Algoma attacked the character of my hon. friend, and my hon. friend has a perfect right to dress him down.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not pertinent to the question before the House in any manner.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). I would like to apologize for what I said with reference to the hon. member for West York. I am sorry I used the words, "low, mean and contemptible." Not on your account.

Mr. WELSH. Nobody asked you.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). If the hon. member would keep to the question more, there would be less trouble.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister makes the extraordinary proposition that because I spoke on this question in committee, I cannot speak again.

Mr. HAGGART. There is a motion that the committee rise, and I do not suppose he has a right to speak on that half a dozen times.

Mr. WALLACE. I have a right to speak on that motion as often as I please so long as I keep tolerably close to the question, and I think I have been careful in that regard.

Mr. STUBBS. I wish to make a few remarks on this difficult and troublesome question which is so intricate that few members in this House seems to understand the Bill which they are so anxious to force through the committee. This Manitoba school question has troubled some of the best legal minds in the Empire. If you trace the legal history of the question you will find that there has not been a second judgment given by the courts which corroborated the first one. When we find that, is it any wonder that many hon. members in this House should differ, and that we should pause and give this Bill careful consideration ? I wish to compare the separate school system in Ontario with the school system which we propose to force upon the province of Manitoba, and which is somewhat similar. In doing this I have the advantage of the report of the commission appointed by the Ontario Department of Education, to inquire into the charges made against the separate schools of the city of Ottawa. If there was any place in Canada where separate schools would be supposed to give satisfaction, it would be in the city of Ottawa with its large population. They have grown up along side of the public school system for years, and one would expect that they would gain some experience from that. In this report, however, the text-books used in the separate schools are condemned by Mr. White, the Inspector, who is a Roman Catholic himself, and are condemned by the commissioners, and yet these are the text-books which we propose to allow them to use in Manitoba if they see fit. (The hon. member read at length from the report referred to.)

Mr. TYRWHITT read in French from L'Histoire du Canada, par Bibeaud.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. What bearing has that upon the motion before the committee ?

Mr. TYRWHITT. I have not reached the point yet. I am not particularly aware that there is a point, but it appears to me that Bibeaud, being well versed in the history of the country, probably might have led up to the point ; but having failed to discover the point so far, I propose to deal with another subject. Now, Sir, I have in my hand a book called "A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court," by Mark Twain. (The hon. member proceeded to read from the book mentioned.) "There is no accounting for human beings." It appears to me that is a pretty good point ; there is no accounting for the action of the Government in pushing this Bill. "We make good time." I suppose that is an allusion to the way this Bill is going through committee. "Such a scene is always mournful." That, I imagine, Mr. Chairman, alludes to the scene we are now witnessing in this House when so many hon. gentlemen are lying prostrate with their forms in unsightly postures. It appears to me this has a direct bearing upon the subject.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is out of order. He says hon. members are lying about something. That is not a parliamentary expression.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot use that expression about fellow members.

Mr. WALLACE. He said they were lying under a mistake.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will have to take back that.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I was saying that they were lying down. Apparently you do not understand the dual language. "We heard it with out ears, or with our spirits." I should imagine that in mentioning spirits, probably the author meant to refer to the subject under discussion by the committee. We are certainly in very low spirits at times, when we see how little progress we are making with this Bill. It appears to me that has some bearing upon the subject.

It appears to me that I have contributed my share to the present discussion. I trust I have enligtened you, as I have endeavoured to do. In quoting from others as I have done, I feel that probably I have done my duty better than I should have done had I attempted to explain to unwilling ears the views I entertain. I only trust that this very pleasant discussion may be continued during the entire week so that each of us may have an opportunity to contribute to the literature that is going out to the country on this subject. I trust, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. Bergeron) that you will occupy your position for as many hours as possible, for the reason that you perform your duties in the chair so admirably.

Mr. BOSTON. Having voted against the second reading of the Bill, I would like to make a few remarks at this stage. I cannot be called an obstructionist, for this is the first time that I have risen to speak in this House. I come from a constituency in the west. I have been up home several times during the session and have taken means to make myself familiar with the opinions held by the people in that section of the country, and I am sure I am speaking the sentiments of my constituents when I say that they are entirely against the coercion of Manitoba. They say : These people in Manitoba are our own sons that have gone up there to make homes of their own, and we know them well enough to know that they will educate every child there and will give every child a fair start in the race of life. But they should not be coerced. The Dominion of Canada has spent large sums of money upon that great country. So far as I am concerned, I do not object to that, for I want to see that country prosperous. It costs us about $600,000 a year to keep the Mounted Police. We spent about $25,000 in establishing creameries and cheese factories. We spent $7,000 in assisting the agricultural interest there. I am not against such expenditures. Manitoba is already a great province, and our people do not want to see it coerced upon this school question. We believe that they are able to take care of their own school affairs and that in time they will give the Roman Catholics everything that is required to convince them that they are being fairly treated. During this discussion it has been made quite evident that where the people are left alone, as in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, they live happily together, and their children are as well educated as in the province of Ontario or in the province of Quebec. This is proven by the men they send here—strong-minded, broad-minded men whom we are pleased to meet. When the discussion upon the question of confederation began, I was not very old. But I was a strong confederationist : I believed in trying to build up our country and in opening up the great North-west so that we could fill it up, and I have always considered it a great help to this Dominion. I warn the Government if they take this proposed step of coercing a great province, they will do more to prevent immigration to that country, they will do more to check the progress of that country than by any other course they could pursue. I do not believe that the Government are in earnest, but if they are in earnest in trying to carry this Bill, I am glad to know that they cannot succeed. For such a Bill as this could never be forced upon the people of that country. A Bill of so complicated a nature, a Bill which even the lawyers themselves do not understand. We should try to understand the Bill we pass before attempting to force it upon an unwilling province. Nobody can deny that this Government is trying to force an obnoxious measure upon an unwilling province. Now, I have before me the report of the conference held at Winnipeg between the commissioners of this Government and the Manitoba government, from which I will take the liberty of reading some extracts. (The hon. member read the report of the conference.) I hope the Government will at once close this discussion, finish the necessary public business, and go to the country. If as a result of the general elections the Government should return with a large majority on this question, we will of course bow to the decision of the people ; but it is not in the interest of the people of Manitoba and of the people of the Dominion as a whole that this Bill should be further proceeded with at the present time.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. The Manitoba school question has agitated the country from 1890 up to the present day. It is unfortunate the Government have handled it in the way they have done. Whatever may be my views with respect to separate or secular schools, I am opposed to the principle adopted by the Government of seeking to coerce the province of Manitoba. Since the Bill of 1890 was passed it has been through the courts. Different decisions have been rendered, and a final judgment has been obtained from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It is now claimed that it would be disloyal not to endeavour to carry out that judgment. That is the excuse put forward by the Government for submitting the present Bill. In 1895, the Minister of Justice proposed to dissolve the House and go to the country on this question ; but he failed to carry out his views, because the French members wanted some pledge and did not consider the Minister was in earnest. I think the French members were correct, for I am satisfied that the Minister of Justice intended to go to the electors, pleading in one province that the Government would submit remedial legislation, and in another province telling its Protestant supporters that they did not intend to pass any Remedial Bill. This policy was the one adopted in 1890, when the Government appealed to the people on the question of reciprocity with the United States. Honest Conservatives were led to believe that the Government were in earnest and would secure reciprocity within twelve months ; but the Government's action in that case was wholly insincere. I believe the Government are not honest to-day in attempting to pass remedial legislation. After the House met in 1895, there were differences in the Cabinet, and three of the French representatives withdrew. They were out for a few days, and then two returned, no doubt some inducements having been held out to them, but the third representative, having no faith in the Government, did not return. He was the most plucky of the lot, and except for the loaves and fishes, the others would doubtless have remained out, but they returned and are working with the Government at the present time. Coming down to the events of the present session, we find there was another bolt, seven members leaving the Cabinet. But before they went on strike, the Controller of Customs resigned. He went out on principle ; I believe he was honest in his action, for he thought by remaining in the Government he was not representing the true interests of his constituents. Then, we find seven of them conspiring for the purpose—as one would think —of wrecking the Government. But it was to strengthen the Government, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), who led the House at the time. I agree that there never was a time when Canada more needed a strong Government, and I think the day is at hand when she will get it. These Ministers all came back, except one, who is replaced by a senior member of the same family. My opinion is —and I am satisfied it is the opinion of the country—that the Government is weaker now than it was then. I believe that the Government is not anything like as strong as at the time when the younger Tupper was negotiating with the French members of the Cabinet to introduce a remedial order, and go to the country on the strength of that. As they did that they probably hoped that the Manitoba government would do something to let them out of the trouble. It seems that the Government of Manitoba have made up their minds to run their own affairs, as the government of every province ought to do. I would like to see this question settled in a way satisfactory not only to the people of the other provinces but to the people of Manitoba. I think it is a great pity that we should have religious strife cropping up every now and then. I think it particularly unfortunate that at such a time, this House is kept in session as it has been, during such unreasonable hours. I do not think I can give a better reason in favour of this committee rising and reporting progress than is found in the following despatch which is published in the morning papers :

> Montreal, April 13th.—The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at the regular monthly meeting of the Protestant Ministerial Association this morning, and copies were ordered to be sent to Sir Charles Tupper, Secretary of State :
> "That we hereby put on record our sense of shame and sorrow at the disgraceful conduct of certain members of the House of Commons during the debate in committee on the Remedial Bill as reported in the public press. The presence of intoxicated members in the House, the utterance of blasphemous language, the ridicule and sarcasm with which the Word of God was treated—all speak of a depth of degradation, which crimsons with shame the cheek of every self-respecting citizen of our beloved Dominion, and fills with sorrow and humiliation the heart of every Christian.
> "That while no excuse can exonerate the individual members of the House, who have thus disgraced themselves and humiliated the people whom they represent, yet it is self-evident that the physical and mental strain inseparable from an enforced session of a week's duration without interruption, with the exception of a daily intermision of two hours for dinner, together with an open bar for the sale of intoxicants, are the aggravating causes of the unhappy occurrences which to-day hold up our young Dominion to the pity, if not the scorn, of the civilized world, and we hereby call upon the leader of the Government in the House, who is a medical doctor, and fully aware of the consequences of such a violation of natural law, to limit the daily sessions of the committee and the House to a period of time compatible with the laws of health, and with the mental conditions essential to the enactment of wise legislation."

Another reason why I should like this committe to rise and the House to adjourn is that at the next sitting I may have an opportunity of calling attention to a matter that is greatly agitating the minds of the agriculturists of this country. As I have told this House two or three times there is a serious agitation in England with respect to important branches of our export trade to that country which demand the immediate and serious attention of the Government. I am sorry that the Government have paid no attention whatever to the horse trade between this country and England. I notice in this morning's paper that a representative from a committee of the health department of Liverpool alleges that the spread of glanders among the horses of that city is due to the importation of Canadian horses. I am satisfied that, if the Government does not do something to prevent the landing of diseased horses, whether Canadian or American, in England, we may look to see our horses also scheduled. I am satisfied that nine out of ten of the diseased horses landing in England are American horses that pass through Canadian territory. But the people in England regard them as Canadian horses, and naturally so seeing they are shipped from a Canadian port. It is most important that an opportunity should be had to discuss this question. I warned the Government about a year ago that your sheep would be scheduled if steps were not taken to prevent it, and they have been. And I warn them now that inside of three months our horses will be excluded from Great Britain, unless prompt and satisfactory action is taken by this Government. I think it is a great pity that this House should not be allowed to discuss matters that are necessary to the welfare of the country instead of occupying time with a question which is before us only that it may be used to secure the seats of gentlemen opposite in the next election. I am satisfied that this Bill is nothing more or less than an election dodge, and I am sorry that any man should resort to such tactics for the sake of power. I would not support such tactics in any party for the sake of power to the neglect of the real interests of the country.

Mr. BORDEN. Surely, after a sitting of eighteen hours, there cannot be any difference of opinion among hon. gentlemen who compose this committee on the motion before you that we should rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. Is it possible that this Government intend to condemn this House and this committee to repeat this week what we passed through last week, to sit from Monday at three o'clock until Saturday at midnight ? To do so would be to make a howling farce of parliamentary government in this country. The reasonable proposition was made at two o'clock this morning—it might be called unreasonable it was so favourable to the Government—that we should sit for two hours longer and then rise and the House adjourn. Up to the time this proposal was made, the committee had made considerable progress. But to this proposal the Government would not consent. What are we to understand ? Surely the Government must know by this time that it is impossible to go on with this Bill until they are willing to limit the working of this committee to reasonable hours. We can sit for eight or ten or twelve hours, or even fourteen hours and make some progress, but if the Government insist that after three o'clock, or after four o'clock according to the proposal made this morning, we shall be kept sitting here, they must know that it is absolutely impossible for them to get on with the measure. We should be more than human to submit to any such coercion. It is nothing less than the most outrageous attempt at bulldozing Parliament that has ever been known in a country boasting free institutions. Certainly nothing like it has ever been attempted in this country. Certainly nothing like it has ever been attempted in Great Britain, and certainly nothing like it has ever been attempted in any of the British colonies that I have ever heard of. If we expect the people of Canada to have any respect for us as a Parliament, we should give up this farcical procedure and return to common sense and regular methods of carrying on the business of the House.

Mr. DALY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN. I believe that if the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) had the matter under his own control, he would not keep us here. I cannot believe that it is the desire of that hon. gentleman, or perhaps of a majority of the Cabinet that the kind of thing we have had during the past week should be continued until the end of this Parliamentary term. I would appeal to the hon. Minister and to those hon. gentlemen who, like myself, are amenable to reason, and who, unlike the gentleman who leads this House are not able to spend two-thirds of their time in bed or out side of this chamber ; I appeal to these gentlemen, who can sympathize with those of us who sit here twenty-four hours out of the twenty-four to try to bring their friends in the Cabinet to reason and induce them to return to sensible methods of carrying on the business of this House. There is only one conclusion to be drawn from the conduct of the Government. If they seriously desired to carry this law, they would not pursue the course they are pursuing. As I have said before, it is as clear as the noonday sun that the ruling spirits of the Government at any rate, those who direct its destinies—or, perhaps, its fate would be a more proper term—never had any intention of having this Bill become law, and the methods they have adopted during the last few weeks make that absolutely clear. They are taking the best means in their power to prevent the Bill becoming law. There is at the same time a certain other motive in the conduct of the Government. While they prevent the Bill from becoming law they are endeavouring to give a large section of the people of this country an idea that they are sincere and are really making an honest effort to put this Bill through. But even if you go back a few months and view the course of the Government with reference to this legislation it becomes plain that they have no desire to carry this Bill through Parliament. Had that been their desire, they would have introduced the Bill during the session of 1895, which opened some months after the remedial order was passed.

The Government boast of having carried the second reading of this Bill by a considerable majority, as the Secretary of State put it. Well, if you analyse their majority, you will find that, deducting from it the votes of several gentlemen who usually vote with the Opposition, the Bill was carried by a majority of just four Conservative members. Since that vote, one supporter of the Government has been appointed to a judgeship, one has gone back to his home in British Columbia, and another one, I regret to say, has passed away altogether from this sublunary sphere ; so that of the four Government supporters who constituted the majority on the second reading, exactly one remains. Now, Sir, when we consider the course pursued by the Government ever since they began to talk of remedial legislation, the long delay which they allowed to intervene before getting down to actual work on the Bill, and the tactics they have since adopted of aggravating the patience of the House, and of inviting obstruction, we are forced to the conclusion that the Government never had any real intention or any real desire of passing this measure into law. Their aim seems to be to deceive a section of the people of this country interested in remedial legislation, and to make them believe that they are sincerely desirous of passing the Bill; while on the contrary their whole course proves that they have no real desire to pass the Bill.

This is a measure intended to engraft upon a province laws with reference to a subject over which the provinces have exclusive right to deal. It is a law which is contrary to the expressed wish of the people of that province, expressed by an overwhelming majority. That is the proposal contained in this legislation which is now before this House, and which this Government is determined, by hook or crook, right or wrong, to force through the House.

Mr. McALISTER. You just said they did not intend to do it, that their action was a sham. How can you reconcile the two statements?

Mr. BORDEN. I say that they are doing this for the sake of effect, for the sake of making a certain section of the country believe they are in earnest in appearing to endeavour to force the measure through this House.

Mr. McALISTER. You said a large portion of the people were opposed to it; then how can the Government be seeking their favour?

Mr. BORDEN. I said they were trying to please a section. I did not say they were trying to force a law through Parliament which a majority of the people wanted; I said that only a section of the community wanted it, and the Government, by their Remedial Bill, is endeavouring to secure the favour of that section of the community, and having started out on that line, they are bound to proceed upon that line.

Mr. McALISTER. You said a moment ago that they did not want to put it through.

Mr. BORDEN. I said they are endeavouring to make the people believe they want to put it through. I would advise the Government to study the system which prevails in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where every section of the community is perfectly satisfied with the working of the educational laws in those provinces, and to see if they cannot settle the Manitoba school question on similar lines.

Mr. WELSH. The action of the Government in keeping hon. members sitting day and night is inhuman and disgraceful. It cannot be expected that independent men will submit to such dictation, and that a coercive measure can be forced through the House by such means. The majority of the people throughout the Dominion will condemn this action of the Government at the ensuing elections. In regard to this so-called Remedial Bill, I am bound to say that I have always held strong opinions on the school question, and agree with the views held by the late John Bright, of England. He was an advocate of the voluntary system. If a man pays something towards the support of church and school he takes more interest in them. People nowadays suppose they get education free, which is a mistake; but because they apparently do not pay for it they take less interest in it. Of course if I expressed these sentiments on a platform, I would stand almost alone. While I have always supported the free school system in preference to the separate school system, I adhere to my belief in a non-sectarian system. But the systems prevailing in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which are almost identical with the present Manitoba School Act, have admittedly given perfect satisfaction. The Secretary of State has declared in this House, with a flourish of trumpets, that he carried the School Act in Nova Scotia about thirty years ago, and that it has given satisfaction to Roman Catholics and Protestants. Yet that hon. gentleman now desires to go back on the system introduced by him in Nova Scotia and force a new system on Manitoba. That provincial government has offered to supplement the Manitoba Act by giving rights which the minority now enjoy by custom in the lower provinces, but they are willing to enact them by law for Manitoba. If the people were treated properly, this educational question could be settled without compulsion and coercion. Even if the present Bill were passed, it would be useless and unworkable, for it would be impossible for the Dominion Government to force the Manitoba government to carry out its provisions. Do hon. gentlemen opposite intend to raise another rebellion in Manitoba and the North-west? They should understand at once that the people would not submit to this measure of coercion, even if it became law. (The hon. gentleman then read the reply of the Manitoba commissioners to proposals submitted by the Dominion commissioners.)

Mr. COSTIGAN. Have you not a word to say about clause 14?

Mr. WELSH. I am speaking now on the motion to adjourn. It will take about four hours to give you the information you lost by being away last night. You have to depend upon the Opposition to keep you posted. In speaking the other day I spoke about the Devil's Bill. I want to explain about what I had in mind at that time. I received a letter from a very strong Conservative in Amherst, N.S., in the constituency of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey). This letter is from a very worthy man, and I have known him for many years. This is a private letter, but if I were to read the part that pitches into the Government and leave out the part that pitches into me, you would say that it was garbled. So I will read the whole :

Remedial Bill and Ship Railway. Well, to be honest, I know all about your sympathy for the latter. I do not blame you for the stand you took, but do not you think the Government of Canada is in honour bound to give the extension of subsidy, as the scheme is as profitable as it stands as it was before. As to the Remedial Bill. I believe it is one of the devil's origin to cause turmoil and trouble. I would not vote for a man or a government who would support such a bill. Let Manitoba deal with her own affairs, I say.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Name.

Mr. WELSH. I cannot see you over there. Who is speaking ?

An hon. MEMBER. McDougall, of Cape Breton.

Mr. WELSH. Oh, coal dust ! But the hon. gentleman could never see ; he was born blind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Morally or physically blind ?

Mr. WELSH. No ; politically blind. We can fight our battles here without coming to anything personal.

Mr. HUGHES. Hear, hear.

Mr. WELSH. I think that it is the man who votes two ways who is speaking How will you vote next time ? I come now to the rejoinder of the Dominion commissioners. But it is too long to read it all.

Mr. McALISTER. Read it all.

Mr. WELSH. You are fond of interrupting and taking up time, but you do not do anything else.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). Order.

Mr. WELSH. When I was aboard ship I was accustomed to get fair play and make every one do as they were told. You are the captain of the ship, just at present, Mr. Chairman, and I bow to your ruling. Now, if we are not inhuman we will give these poor little boys, the pages, a rest, and the big boys too, and will adjourn until three o'clock. Surely the Government and the hon. gentlemen at their back do not suppose for a moment that they are going to bully us into passing this Bill. If this system of day and night sitting goes on we shall have another spell at it, and we will give you many queer yarns before we are through with you. Let the Government change their course in this matter.

While the lamp holds out to burn
The vilest sinner may return.

Mr. WELSH.

Before you go to the people show that you have some repentance by forsaking your evil ways.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As a majority of the hon. gentlemen now present were not here during the night, it would be proper to give some account of what has passed since they left. Some time this morning the gentlemen who had been working faithfully on the Bill proposed that the committee should sit until four o'clock and that then an adjournment should take place. But the Government refused an adjournment. As it was felt that the members were entitled to rest, a motion that the committee rise and report progress was moved. It was not until after about twelve hours work that that motion was moved. And seven hours have passed since then. We have had now nineteen hours of continuous sitting, and I think the committee will see the necessity of rising. Because many hon. gentlemen find themselves in opposition to this Bill, and have spoken against its passage, their conduct has been denounced as bad, as outrageous, and they have been called obstructionists. Now,how will the country view this question? Had this House not given every facility for the proper consideration of this Bill ? If we find that there is not time during the existence of this Parliament, to complete it, should any blame be put upon those gentlemen who feel it their duty to see that, if the Bill is to become law, it should be made as nearly perfect as possible ? It seems to me that the blame should rather be put upon those gentlemen who, having the conduct of business in their hands, deliberately neglect, if not designedly, to introduce it until two months after the House had been in session. So far every clause that has been considered in committee, was found to be so imperfect that it had to be amended in important particulars ; and when we consider that there are 112 clauses in the Bill it becomes evident that the Government cannot expect to have it passed through the House during the few remaining days of the session, if the various clauses of it are to be considered and put into a shape that would make the measure at all workable. If that be the case, what is the use of going through with this worse than farce, asking the members to sit here day and night ? We have seen what took place during the last week and last night. When last night this motion to adjourn was placed in the hands of the Chairman, the House was nearly deserted of members, there was no one in the House belonging to the Government, who was able to explain or defend the provisions of the Bill. For hours the Minister of Railways alone was the occupant of the Treasury benches. While not wishing to say anything against the hon. gentleman's ability to do the work that he is called upon to do in his department, all will agree with me that he was in no position at all to explain the provisions of this Bill to the committee. We saw Ministers who are supposed to be in charge of this Bill, leave the chamber deliberately, and not re-enter it at all during the night and morning. The Minister of the Interior, who is supposed to be specially conversant with this Bill, who is a legal gentleman himself, and whose opinions would carry some weight—even that hon. gentleman did not arrive in the chamber until eight o'clock this morning.

Mr. DALY. Half-past seven.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When there was no one here representing the Government, who was capable of taking charge of the Bill, of course it was impossible to discuss it intelligently. Why then was the committee kept sitting ? I think that it would be in the interest of all parties that the motion for the committee to rise should prevail. The House is not in a position to deal intelligently with this Bill. In view of its extraordinary character, the combined wisdom of all the members of the House is needed in order to make it such a Bill as a Bill ought to be which goes out from this House, and when there are so few members present, I think certainly the committee should accept the motion to rise and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. SPROULE. I was informed on entering the House this morning that considerable progress had been made with the Bill, that some clauses after careful discussion and the adoption of important amendments had been adopted. After 3 o'clock this morning, however, the usual motion was moved that the committee rise and report progress. That motion was opposed by the Government. They should have had sufficient experience to have become satisfied that it is impossible to coerce independent members of this House. There are many reasons why this proposed measure should not pass. It is admittedly a Bill of great importance, it is a lengthy Bill ; we are now at a late period of the session and there is not time to do it justice ; and under these circumstances the Bill should be withdrawn, the important work of the session proceeded with and an appeal made to the people. Parliament is supposed to reflect the will of the people and to enact laws in accordance therewith. How far are we reflecting the will of the people to-day ? Is it the will of the people that this Bill should be forced through Parliament, that we should coerce Manitoba, that we should take from that province the right to control her educational affairs and interfere with her provincial rights ? Such is not the will of the people. How do we ascertain the will of the people ? First, through the public press. The majority of the newspapers to-day are against interfering with Manitoba, against the Government forcing through this so-called remedial measure and against depriving the province of its right to control education. Next, we learn the will of the people from resolutions passed at public gatherings. The unmistakable verdict of the people is against interference with Manitoba.

Mr. JONCAS. How many gatherings have been held ?

Mr. SPROULE. I should not like to take up the time of the committee by reading the reports, but gatherings might be counted by hundreds.

Mr. JONCAS. Where ?

Mr. SPROULE. There was a gathering of Presbyterians in Montreal only yesterday, a report of which the hon. gentleman will find in to-day's "Citizen." That gathering expressed itself opposed to interference with Manitoba, and against remedial legislation. I could proceed and quote from gatherings of Wesleyans at Toronto and Guelph.

Mr. GILLIES. What is your opinion of the Conservative meeting in North Bruce ?

Mr. SPROULE. I am privately informed from reliable sources that when the meeting which was represented to be a meeting of the Conservative Association of North Bruce was held at Wiarton to discuss public questions and the public policy of the Government, one of the hired men of the Government, who has been ready for the last five years to assist the Government on any question no matter what its nature so long as he was paid $10 a night, went there.

Mr. BENNETT. To whom does the hon. gentleman refer ?

Mr. SPROULE. To John George, of Port Elgin.

Mr. BENNETT. John George is quite as respectable as you are.

Mr. SPROULE. I am not speaking about his respectability. The hon. gentleman, in his anxiety to be offensive and to interfere with the right of discussion, brings that up. I repeat that I am saying nothing about his respectability, but I am saying that he has been employed by the Government. He was employed in North Ontario and in Cardwell.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I ask the hon. gentleman why he says that he was employed in North Ontario ?

Mr. SPROULE. I saw in the papers that he was down there speaking.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I employed him and paid him. How does the hon. gentleman know he was in the employ of the Government. Certainly he was not in the employ of the Government.

Mr. SPROULE. He went there and spoke for the Government and for their policy. By whom was he brought down ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. By me.

Mr. SPROULE. I was told by the committee and by Mr. Birmingham. Who took him to Cardwell ? Were the voters there not intelligent enough to attend to their own affairs ?

Mr. TISDALE. When the hon. gentleman makes the statement, which has been denied positively, that this gentleman was employed by the Government and three hon. members have declared that he was not so employed, it comes down to a simple question of fact.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Those three hon. gentlemen must take my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. SPROULE. Before I could answer the question put by the first member, the second member rose, and before I could answer him a third member rose, and I now have the fourth member, and I have not had time to answer these questions.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to say——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has the floor. When he has finished hon. members can ask him questions, but so long as he does not give way he should not be interrupted.

Mr. SPROULE. In regard to North Bruce, I said I was privately and reliably informed that at the meeting called to endorse the action of the Government on this question, they dare not discuss the school question, and there is not a word in regard to it in the resolution adopted. That is how far their policy on the school question has been endorsed. The general policy of the Government was endorsed, as I have supported it for seventeen years. I support the Government's general policy, but their action in regard to this remedial measure I believe to be wrong. Taking all the expressions of public opinion, the church gatherings are against this measure, the pulpits of the country, the political gatherings and the social gatherings are all against it. We can also judge largely the current of public opinion by conversation in social intercourse. That shows public opinion to be against the Bill. Commercial travellers from different sections of the country report that the Remedial Bill is universally unpopular, that the great majority of the people are evidently against it, and are opposed to any interference with Manitoba's rights. Hon. members of this House should endeavour to bring themselves in accord with public sentiments. Public opinion demands that the electorate should have a voice on this matter before the Bill is passed. We know that the press of the country hold it to be unwise to pass such a Bill now, and declare that the Government of the day are destroying their own popularity so as to lead in all human probability to their defeat. We, as Conservatives, do not want that result brought about, because we believe that in the main the policy of the Conservative party has been right, and we support it now, as we have done in the past. But in respect of this measure we believe that they are wrong and feel reluctantly and unwillingly to oppose this Bill. Four times in Canadian history has this question engaged public attention. The principle involved here is the question of separate schools. At confederation we accepted the contract that was entered into between Ontario and Quebec that we should have separate and dissentient schools in perpetuity, but most of us understand that it was not contemplated that that right should be extended to any other province. The effort was made to establish the right to separate schools in Prince Edward Island. A long and painful discussion took place, but the provincial legislature refused to recognize the principle of separate schools or to admit that it was intended by the Confederation Act that separate schools should be maintained in the province. Public excitement ran high, but still the principle was maintained that there should be no separate schools in Prince Edward Island. Certain slight amendments were made in the educational laws, certain concessions were made in the regulations controlling the working of schools, and the question was settled by the acceptance of the system. The children are educated in a satisfactory manner and, so far as we know, no complaint is made against the system now in existence. At another period the same discussion took place in New Brunswick, the effort being made to establish the principle of separate schools. But after an exciting discussion which aroused the religious animosities of the people to a high pitch, the question was settled by some slight amendments and the educational system of the country is being successfully and satisfactorily carried out. But this was not until after the question had been fought out in this Parliament. To-day we do not hear serious objections to the educational systems or complaints that the minority are illiberally treated. In Nova Scotia the same question came up and the matter was taken up not only in the press but in the pulpit and in social gatherings. The principle of separate schools was believed by the majority to be unsound and was not conceded. The hon. leader of this House took great credit to himself for introducing the school law which still exists in that province and which he says gives satisfaction to the people. I say that he is entitled to great credit for the wisdom he displayed in introducing and carrying through that law. And though that Act was passed, I think, in 1864, no material alteration has been made in it since confederation. The Roman Catholic and Protestant children are educated together and associate together as they ought to do. They are growing up together to be good citizens under the same system of education as the people of Manitoba seek to carry into effect in their own province. Now, for the fourth time we are face to face with this question and this agitation. Manitoba, exercising what we regard as her undoubted right, did away with a system of education which was unpopular and unsuited to the local conditions and established a system that was calculated to bring about the best results in the province. An agitation was carried on by those opposed to this system. Though that agitation attained some height in Manitoba, it did not go so far as it did in the province of Quebec, which is over a thousand miles away from Manitoba, and whose people cannot be expected to understand the local conditions as well as do the people of Manitoba. Quebec would indignantly refuse to allow the Dominion Parliament to interfere with her rights, but at the same time was willing to insist upon interference with the rights of Manitoba. We are advised that this Parliament has the constitutional right to deal with the question. Under certain limitations, I think we have the right to deal with it, but I deny that it is wise for us to deal with it, or that we are constitutionally justified in dealing with it as is proposed in the measure now before the House. The agitation failed in all these provinces—Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba. Why then should we deal with the question here? Is not the failure of this agitation in every one of these cases the best proof that we should not interfere? Having refused to interfere with the rights of these other provinces, why should we interfere with the rights of the province of Manitoba? We are now invading new territory where the condition of things is unknown to us and is unfavourable to the principle involved in this Bill. I stated in the first debate on this measure that if success attended the efforts to force separate schools on Manitoba, it would open the educational question in the whole Dominion. In view of the agitation which has started in the North-west Territories, I think I was justified in such a statement. The Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) declared that there was no logical justification for any such conclusion, nor had there been any utterances of public men to form a basis for it. I cited as my justification for that statement and as opposed to what the Minister of Finance said the statement of Archbishop Langevin with regard to educational affairs. The Minister of Finance said that if Archbishop Langevin had stated the same ten times over it would not justify me in making the statement I made. I had not the report of Archbishop Langevin's utterances at hand at the time, but I have it here. I read from the Edmonton "Bulletin" of 19th December, 1895:

> The following is a synopsis of the reply of Archbishop Langevin to the address of the Catholics of Edmonton delivered in St. Joachim's church on Sunday afternoon last:
> Archbishop Langevin, in reply, expressed his thanks for the expressions contained in the address, and for the opportunity which it gave him of stating his views. The school question was looked upon as of the very first importance by Catholics, who in their present stand on the subject were fighting for their rights, and would defend those rights, if necessary, to the death. They were not slaves. This question was not one that could be settled by synods. It must be settled by the court of highest jurisdiction, the Parliament of Canada, and unless Parliament granted Catholics their school rights, confederation could not stand. He could not understand how, when a Government does its duty, it should not be supported. This was not a question of Catholic or Protestant, but of right and justice.

Well, he assumes the thing to be a right which a great many deny to be a right.

> A commission of inquiry had been suggested. For five years we have had nothing but the school question. Every one knew about it. It was strange that the matter had been before the courts from year to year, and yet we knew nothing of it. Even the children could tell of the school question. No; we need no commission, but justice and right. A commission on this question would be an insult to the country, and every one in it. When England made her laws she did not possess all the lands she does now. And when she makes her treaties those treaties stand good even if she adds to her possessions. If Australia did not belong to England, English treaties would stand just the same. Then it should be so in the case of Canada, as in that of England. An addition to the territory of Manitoba did not abrogate the agreement regarding Manitoba. Catholics claimed their constitutional rights. They claimed that the minority in the Territories have the same constitutional rights as in Ontario.

We deny that. In Ontario and Quebec the agreement that was entered into was endorsed at confederation. There is nothing which justifies any one in saying that the same right was to be extended by the constitution to any other province that came in; but the right they had when they came into confederation was to be continued to them.

> As long as you in the Territories have not your school books, your teachers, your inspectors, your training for teachers, you have no separate schools in fact. Are your interests protected on the Council of Public Instruction by a representative without a vote? The council meets and may listen to your representative, but does as it pleases afterwards. Such a system could not be accepted.

Then, was I not justified in saying that if we give this concession to-day, we are face to face with an agitation that will end, no one knows where, or when.

> He had a direct interest in the school question in the North-west, as a part of the district of Assiniboia was included within his diocese. The Catholics of the Territories were bound in conscience to fight to obtain here what they wanted in Manitoba, and were bound to have. He was pleased to see that the laity were with the hierarchy on this question. It had been insinuated that the hierarchy held stronger views on this subject then the laity, and he was glad to have it thus proven that it was not so. The duties of the hierarchy and laity were the same. It was the duty of every Catholic to educate the children under his care according to his conscience.

That is the system of schools in the North-west Territories which the Minister of Finance told us is perfectly satisfactory. Now, the church does not say they are satisfactory : therefore, am I not justified in saying that in the future they are likely to fight for the concession which they ask in this Bill, as soon as it is granted in Manitoba, to be extended elsewhere throughout the Dominion ?

> The first right in respect of education belongs to parents, and parents were bound, as well as the clergy, to answer before God for the education of their children. As you give them food and raiment you must give them moral training. At the great tribunal you will be asked the question "did you give moral and religious training."

No one objects to that, no one objects to the religious instruction at definite times.

> Catholics as well as Protestants wanted a first-class education, and he denied that the education of the Catholics was inferior to that of the Protestants.
> Our public men can perform their duties as well as others. A Manitoba member had admitted to the speaker that the Catholic members of Parliament were superior to the Protestant members in education. We want our children to be good and then to be learned. Catholic children should receive Catholic instruction. Under the present regulations in the North-west the children had been tired with the day's work, during the last half hour religion was allowed to be brought in. This could only tend to disgust the children with religious teaching.

Well, now, the best information we have with regard to separate schools in Manitoba, justifies us in believing that they were not efficient, that they were not as good as they should be, that they were not as good as the public schools there, and therefore that the province was entitled to devise some system that would give better educational facilities to the Roman Catholic children.

> Food must be given daily. Moral training should be instilled in the minds of the pupils throughout their whole course of study.

No one objects to moral training, it is a good thing for both Protestants and Catholics.

> In conclusion he thanked his beloved people from the bottom of his heart for their address. He was sure that the Bishops of St. Albert and Athabasca-Mackenzie sided with him in the stand taken on this question, and in his gratitude for the expressions contained in the address.

Now, was I not justified in saying that if we grant this concession to-day, if we force these schools upon Manitoba to-day, will we not be obliged in the future to deal with the same question in the North-west Territories? If we force a system of separate schools on Manitoba and the North-west Territories, is it not reasonable to suppose that the same power will force the fight to have the same concession in British Columbia, and then in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island ? Now, we have the strongest evidence that Manitoba does not want this system of schools. She has said so when she passed her Act of 1890, and when she established a new educational system that was regarded as more suitable for the wants of the people. She said so when she refused to allow the principle of separate schools to be re-established. She said in answer to the request of the Dominion Government that she should amend her educational laws, and place them in harmony with the wishes of the minority. She said so when she answered the remedial order, and she said so in the last provincial elections, when her people, by an overwhelming majority, pronounced against the system of separate schools. She said then, and at various time since : We will not accept the principle of separate schools, we will not tolerate it. On every occasion she has stood unalterably upon her rights, and has asked the Government to respect those rights, and not to force the situation. She has given all-sufficient reasons why she does not want separate schools. She does not want them because, when they existed there, they were inefficient ; because they divided the children into two camps, and where the settlement was sparse, it was impossible to carry on, successfully, two classes of schools. She has cited to us the fact that there are 190 schools in that province where the average attendance of scholars is less than ten ; and if you divide up such a district and compel four or five families to build a school-house, and to support a teacher, and to pay for all the furnishings of the school, you are placing upon those poor families a burden of taxation which they will find it very hard to bear. I have here a list of school districts where there are only five children, and upwards to ten, and what folly it would be to divide these schools into two. Manitoba declares that it does not want the Remedial Bill, because it will interfere with its normal schools ; that there is no necessity for a separate Catholic normal school as all teachers can be instructed in secular education in one such school ; that this would involve additional and useless expense, and that the more the funds are distributed, the less efficient will be the results. Dominion commissioners visited Winnipeg, and the report of their negotiations has been presented to the House. Almost the first request made by these commissioners to Manitoba was that the principle of separate schools should be admitted. But it has been clearly and unmistakably refused by the people at no less than three elections that they were opposed to separate schools. The commissioners asked for Manitoba that Catholic representation be given on the advisory board. The provincial commissioners at once agreed to that request, and mentioned that representation had been voluntarily offered at a previous time. Next, it was suggested that the school rooms in the building should be divided, and the children be thus practically divided into two camps, Catholics and Protestants. The province refused this proposition. Then it was asked that religious education should be given during some portion of the day. The provincial representatives were willing to agree to that proposition, if that instruction was given during stated hours, especially from 3.30 to 4, but on the distinct understanding that Presbyterians, Methodists, Church of England, Congregationalists and Roman Catholics should each have equal rights and privileges to give such religious instruction. The Dominion Government further claimed that they were able to enforce the rights sought to be given the Roman Catholics by the Remedial Bill. Manitoba declared that the Dominion might be able to enforce some of them, but could not enforce all. The hon. gentleman read the offer made by the Manitoba commissioners. Manitoba offered either to secularize the schools, or to permit religious teaching by Catholics and Protestants alike during specified hours. It appears to me that the objection which the minority offered to the present educational system would have been removed, if the latter proposition had been accepted. Objection has been raised to children attending school where there was no religious instruction given, and under the second proposition such instruction could be given after regular school hours. We have been told repeatedly by the Secretary of State and other hon. members that the educational system of Nova Scotia is perfectly satisfactory, and that the only objection that can be raised is that the rights granted to the Catholics are given by courtesy and not by law. Manitoba has, however, offered the same rights, and has expressed its willingness to enact them by law. If the arrangement in Nova Scotia is satisfactory, it is important to know exactly what the Nova Scotia school law is. The school law, as consolidated, was passed on 20th March, 1895, and this embraces the Act of 1864 relating to education, for which the hon. the leader of this House takes great credit on account of having enacted it when in Parliament. It provides :

THE COUNCIL OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

1. The members of the Executive Council shall form a Council of Public Instruction, five of whom shall be a quorum.

2. The Governor in Council shall have power to appoint a Superintendent of Education, who shall also be Secretary of the Council of Public Instruction.

Said text-books to be used in the primary or intermediate grades shall give at least one-fourth of their space to the consideration of the nature and effects of alcoholic drinks and narcotics ; and the text-books to be used in the higher grades shall contain at least twenty pages of matter relating to this subject.

The examiners so appointed shall be paid such sums as the Council may determine, and the persons appointed to conduct the examination at each station shall be paid a sum not exceeding three dollars per diem while actually engaged in the duty.

(14.) To appoint a lecturer on agriculture in connection with the provincial normal school, and to define particularly the duties of the aforesaid lecturer with reference to the following general objects :

(17.) To divide the province into school commissioners' districts, and to appoint seven or more commissioners for each district, who shall form a board, of whom three shall be a quorum. But in case there should be no quorum at any meeting, duly called, the Council of Public Instruction shall, on the recommendation of the inspector, perform the duties of such board at the said meeting.

(18.) To determine all cases of appeal from the decisions of commissioners and trustees, and make such orders thereon as may be required.

(19.) To make any provisions, not inconsistent with this chapter, that may be necessary to meet exigencies occurring under its operation.

SUPERINTENDENT OF EDUCATION.

4. The Superintendent of Education shall receive an annual salary of two thousand dollars, and four hundred dollars for travelling expenses and contingencies of office. The superintendent's duties shall be as follows :—

(9.) To apportion, with the assistance of the inspectors, as hereinafter provided, the county fund among trustees annually, and pay the provincial grants to teachers semi-annually, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter.

DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS OF SCHOOLS.

5. In every county where there are two or more separate boards of district school commissioners, there shall hereafter be one board of commissioners instead of such separate boards, and the members of the existing boards shall be members of the new board, and any trust or property vested in existing boards shall vest in the new board ; provided, however, that such consolidation of boards shall take place only upon the joint request of the separate boards of commissioners at their annual meeting, save when ordered by the Council of Public Instruction. The Council of Public Instruction shall have power to determine the places of meeting of boards of commissioners, and each board of commissioners shall have power to re-number consecutively the school sections within its district.

6. Each board of commissioners shall meet annually on the day appointed by the Council of Public Instruction, and shall elect a chairman at each regular meeting, who shall call a special meeting when required by two members of the board, or when directed by the Council of Public Instruction. In case of a special meeting the chairman shall notify the inspector of the same, and if the inspector be unable to attend, the board shall appoint a secretary pro tempore, who shall record the proceedings of the meeting, and preserve such record for the inspector, and transact any other necessary business as directed by the board, and in case of the absence of the chairman the commissioners may appoint a chairman pro tempore.

7. Each board of commissioners shall have power :

(1.) To create new sections, either directly where none previously existed, or indirectly by the sub-division or re-division of existing sections, provided that in neither case shall such action take effect until formally ratified by the Council of Public Instruction, and to make such alterations in the existing boundaries of contiguous sections as may from time to time be deemed necessary. In all cases coming under the provisions of this section the commissioners shall have due regard to the number of children and the ability of each section to support an efficient school, and all alterations thus made shall take effect at the beginning of the next ensuing school year.

(2.) To declare, upon the inspector's report, or other reliable information, the school-house or the houses or buildings used as such, or the appurtenances or grounds thereof, unfit for school purposes ; such declaration shall be forwarded to the trustees of the section, and the condemnation shall, unless otherwise specified, take effect at the commencement of the next ensuing school year.

(3.) To appoint trustees or a trustee for any section in cases as hereinafter provided.

8. Any person may convey or devise real estate to the commissioners for any district, and duly vest in the commissioners and their successors in office the legal title thereto, in trust for the purpose of erecting and keeping in repair a school-house or houses thereon ; and the commissioners may sue and be sued in respect thereof, but shall have no control over any school-house or houses or such lands as against the trustees of the school section or the inhabitants, other than may be expressed by the conveyance or devise.

9. Each board of commissioners shall have power to appoint a committee of not less than three of their number to perform the duties imposed on them by sections 13 and 50 of this chapter, and such committee when so appointed is hereby authorized to perform such duties.

10. Each board of commissioners shall at its annual meeting determine what sections under its supervision are entitled to special aid as poor sections during the following school year, and the Superintendent of Education shall allow to the trustees of schools kept in any such section one-third more from the county fund than the allowance to other sections, and teachers employed in such poor sections shall also receive one-third more from the provincial grant. No section employing a teacher holding a license higher than that of grade D, so called, shall be entitled to receive the special aid provided for poor sections in respect to provincial grant to teachers. No county shall be entitled to receive as special provincial aid to teachers employed in poor sections more than three hundred dollars annually, and in case the special grant to such teachers in any county shall for any half year exceed one-half the above sum, namely, one hundred and fifty dollars, they shall be reduced pro rata of the amount of such excess.

11. The several boards of commissioners shall have power at the annual meeting to unite two or more school sections into one school section, on a petition addressed to the board of commissioners by a majority of the ratepayers of each section, setting forth that they have agreed among themselves as to the terms on which the existing liabilities shall be borne by the ratepayers of the several sections, and upon the report and recommendation of the inspector of the district within which such sections lie. Whenever the said several boards shall unite such sections they shall have power from time to time to make such order or orders as they may deem proper respecting the continuance and constitution of the board of school trustees, and respecting the rights, property, and liabilities of the sections affected by such union, and generally to order and direct all things which may become necessary to give effect to such union.

12. The union shall take effect on the day fixed by law for the next annual school meeting, notice of which meeting shall be issued by the inspector, and such meeting shall elect a board of three trustees for the new section.

13. When the annual meeting fails to elect three trustees, or to fill the annual vacancy occuring in the trusteeship, or vacancies from other causes then existing, the trustee or trustees may be appointed, upon the written requisition of five ratepayers in the section, accompanied by a certificate from the inspector of schools that to the best of his knowledge and belief, founded on an inspection of the minutes of the school meeting or of the copy in his possession as hereinafter provided, and if necessary on personal inquiry, that the alleged vacancy or vacancies actually exist, by the board of commissioners for the district in which the school-house is situate ; and any board of trustees thus secured shall as soon as practicable convene a meeting of the ratepayers of the section as provided for the annual meeting, and such meeting shall transact all business, except the election of trustees, required of the annual meeting, and in the same manner.

14. Each board of commissioners shall have power to exempt from the sectional school rate, either altogether or in part, persons dwelling more than two and one-quarter miles from the school-house in the section where they reside, or on islands too distant from the mainland to permit children to attend school ; and each such board shall also have power to make such arrangements as they may deem necessary to establish schools on such islands, and in sparsely-peopled places, for at least four months in the year.

TRUSTEES.

15. Subject to the provisions of the Towns' Incorporation Act of 1895, each school section shall have a board of three trustees, and no section shall have more than one board. The powers and duties exercised by and imposed upon trustees by this chapter shall in incorporated towns be enjoyed and discharged by commissioners of schools appointed for such towns except as otherwise provided in the said Act.

16. At the first annual meeting of any section under this chapter the majority of the qualified voters present shall elect three trustees ; and at the second and third annual meetings one of the trustees elected at the first meeting shall go out of office, by ballot, and at each annual meeting there after he who has served the longest shall retire from office, and each of the vacancies shall be filled by the election of a new trustee ; provided always, that he whose term of office has expired may be re-elected, with his own consent, his time of service to date from such re-election. No irregularity in the mode of electing trustees shall invalidate the election, unless formal objection be taken thereto by a qualified voter before the adjournment of the meeting ; provided that the person so elected possesses the qualifications required by law for the office of trustee.

17. A majority of the trustees shall always be qualified ratepayers of the section, but one trustee may be chosen from the poll-tax payers, authorized as hereinafter provided to vote in the election of trustees. No commissioner of schools, inspector of schools or licensed teacher employed in the section, shall be deemed eligible to the office of trustee of schools.

18. Any occasional vacancy in the board of trustees caused by death, removal from the section, continued absence for more than six months, insolvency, permanent disability for business, refusal to act, or resignation, or acceptance of official positions declared to be incompatible with the office of trustee, shall be filled at a special school meeting called by the remaining trustee or trustees. The person elected to fill an occasional vacancy shall hold office only for the unexpired term of the person whose place he is chosen to fill.

19. It shall be lawful for the trustees of any section wherein are located academic institutions other than county academies to co-operate with an equal number of persons chosen by the governing bodies of such institutions, in order that the section may secure the educational advantages supplied by such institutions ; such combined board of trustees to manage the school or schools, as the case may be, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter.

20. The trustees of any section, with the permission of the inspector of schools, may, in their discretion, admit to school privileges pupils from other sections ; and if the trustees shall deem it necessary, they may exact from such pupils a reasonable tuition fee.

21. The trustees of any section shall be a body corporate for the prosecution and defence of all actions relating to the school or its affairs, and other necessary purposes, under the title of "Trustees of School Section No. ——, in the district (or districts) of ————;" and they shall have power, when authorized by the school meeting, to borrow money for the purchase or improvement of grounds for school purposes, or for the purchase or building of school-houses ; and all such amounts shall be paid by equal yearly instalments, not exceeding twelve, to be assessed upon the section ; and the money so borrowed shall be a charge upon the school section.

22. The trustees in the several counties are authorized to effect insurances on school-houses.

23. A trustee may resign his office with the consent in writing of his co-trustees and of the inspector. Without such consent, a trustee refusing to act shall forfeit the sum of twenty dollars, to be collected by the inspector, a district school commissioner or any ratepayer in the section, such sum to be payable to the inspector or his order, and applied by the board of school commissioners of the county or district as special aid to the erection of school-houses. The following among other things shall constitute a refusing to act under the foregoing provision :—Continual refusal or failure to attend the meetings of the board of trustees when notified ; failure or refusal to issue the notices required under this chapter ; and failure or refusal generally to perform the duties or exercise the powers imposed or conferred on trustees after a written request shall have been addressed to him by his co-trustees or the inspector of schools to perform or exercise the same.

24. The duties of the trustees shall be as follows :—

(1.) To meet as soon after the annual election or appointment of trustees or a trustee as practicable, and appoint one of themselves or some other person to be secretary to the board of trustees, and to provide him with a suitable blank book, and instruct him to keep therein and carefully preserve a correct record of all the doings of the board.

(2.) To take possession of and hold as a corporation all the school property of the section which was or may be purchased for or given to it for the use or support of common or high schools ; provided always that they shall not interfere with any private rights or the rights of any religious denomination.

(3.) To lease or rent lands or buildings, if necessary, for school purposes, for a period of not less than ten months, except with the consent of the inspector.

(4.) To determine the sites of school-houses, subject to the sanction of the inspector of the district. If the owner of any land selected by any trustees for a school site, and approved by the inspector, refuses to sell the same, or demands therefor a price deemed unreasonable by the trustees of any section, the proprietor of such land and the trustees shall forthwith each select an arbitrator. The arbitrators thus chosen, together with the inspector, or any two of them, shall appraise the damages to the owner of the land. Upon the tender of payment of the amount of such damages to the owner by the school trustees, the land shall be taken and used for the purposes aforesaid. In case of a border section the inspector qualified to act shall be the inspector of the district in which the proposed school-house is to be built. In case the owner or owners of any land selected for a school site shall refuse or unduly delay to appoint the arbitrator required by this chapter, such arbitrator shall be appointed by the warden of the municipality in which said school site is situated, on the written application of the inspector of schools for the district.

(5.) To provide school privileges free of charge for all persons resident in the section five years of age and upwards who may wish to attend school ; but it shall be lawful for trustees of schools, and boards of school commissioners in the city of Halifax and in incorporated towns, with the approval of the Council of Public Instruction, to establish special departments for children under five years of age ; and, when authorized by the school meeting, improved school accommodations ; such accommodations to be provided as far as possible in accordance with the following arrangements :—

(a) For any section having fifty pupils or under, a house with comfortable sittings for the same, with one teacher.

(b) For any section having from fifty to eighty pupils, a house with comfortable sittings for the same, and a good class room, with one teacher and an assistant.

(e) For any section having from one hundred and fifty to two hundred pupils a house with three apartments for graded schools, and at least one good class room, common to the two latter, with three teachers, and if necessary an assistant ; or if necessary, separate houses may be provided for the different departments.

(f) And generally, for any section, a house or houses, with sufficient accommodations for different grades of schools, so that there may be one room for about every fifty pupils.

25. Whenever it may be deemed desirable to change the site of a school-house, or to dispose of school lands by sale or exchange, such lands may be disposed of by the trustees, who are hereby authorized to purchase or accept other lands or sites in lieu thereof, subject to the sanction of the inspector.

26. In any section having more than one department under one roof, or under separate roofs, the trustees, by the aid of the principal teacher or otherwise, shall regulate from time to time the attendance of pupils in the several departments, according to their attainments.

27. If in any section the Council of Public Instruction shall permit separate departments under the same or separate roofs for pupils of different sexes or different colours, the trustees of the section shall in this as in other cases regulate attendance on the several departments according to the attainments of the pupils.

28. It shall further be the duties of the trustees :

(1.) (2.) To notify as they may deem proper the inhabitants of the section of the opening or reopening of the school or schools, so that pupils may present themselves for classification without delay.

(3.) To furnish, in case the annual meeting shall have determined to raise money for the purchase or building of school-houses, or for the purchase or improvement of school grounds by assessment, the town clerk, or the municipal clerk for the county in which the section or a portion of it may be situate, a list of the inhabitants of the county resident in the section liable to be taxed; and the town clerk or the municipal clerk shall affix the amount of property for which each is assessed according to the county assessment roll for the year ; and the town clerk or the municipal clerk, as the case may be, shall be entitled to receive from the trustees a fee of twelve cents for every list so furnished where the number of ratepayers in the section does not exceed twelve, and of twenty-five cents where such number exceeds twelve.

(4.) To provide by assessment, as set forth in section 44, for the purchase of suitable grounds and the purchase or erection of a house or houses according to the decision of the school meeting, to select the design of building most suitable and let out the work, the amount required being levied and collected in equal portions from year to year, not exceeding twelve years, with any interest accruing, until the whole shall have been raised.

(7.) To adopt efficient measures for the preservation of the health of the school, for proper outhouses, warming, ventilation and general cleanliness.

(8.) To give proper notice of all annual and special school meetings required to be held under the provisions of this chapter.

(9.) To present at the annual school meeting a written report of the educational operations of the section for the year then ending. This report shall contain an estimate of the financial requirements of the ensuing year, and be accompanied by a detailed account, previously audited as hereinafter provided, of all school moneys received and expended since the last annual meeting.

(10.) To prepare or have prepared a true return of the state of the school according to the form drawn up for that purpose by the superintendent ; and if there is more than one department in the section, a return for each, indicating the grade of each department; and to lodge the same, duly certified by the teacher or teachers, at the office of the inspector, on or before the day fixed for the same ; and if the section be a border section, the trustees shall present a complete return to the inspector of schools of that district in which the school-house is situated, marking the same as a border section, and to the inspector of the other district a supplementary return, containing the number of enrolled pupils belonging to each district, and the total days' attendance made by the pupils of each district.

(11.) To forward to the inspector of schools, within one week after the annual school meeting of the section, a copy of the minutes of the meeting, duly signed by the chairman and secretary thereof.

Also, independent of any such requisition, the trustees shall have authority to call a special meeting for the aforementioned purpose, and generally to call special meetings for the consideration of subjects deemed of importance to the educational interests of the section, notice being given in all cases according to the mode prescribed for annual school meetings.

32. Whenever any person has obtained a judgment in the supreme or county court against the trustees of any school section in their corporate capacity, the trustees of such section shall, and they are hereby authorized to, assess on the ratepayers of said section a sufficient sum to pay such judgment, which sum shall be collected by said trustees and paid over to such judgment creditor.

SECRETARY OF TRUSTEES.

33. The secretary of the trustees shall give a bond to Her Majesty, with two sureties, in a sum at least equal to that to be raised by the section during the year, for the faithful performance of the duties of his office, and the same shall be lodged by the trustees with the inspector of schools.

34. The secretary shall be entitled to receive five per cent commission on all sums collected by him or under his direction for the support of the school or schools, including expenditure for rents, repairs, furniture, outhouses, fuel, maps, apparatus and salaries, except in cases where payment shall be voluntarily made, when he shall make a reduction to persons making such payment of two and a half per cent from his commission ; and he shall be entitled to two and a half per cent on all sums collected by him or under his direction for the purchase or erection of a new school-house or houses, and for the purchase or improvement of school-house grounds. A payment shall be considered to have been voluntarily if made within twenty days after the collector's roll is made up and posted up in at least three public places in the district. The sum or sums on which the secretary shall be entitled to receive commission under provision of this section shall be taken to mean only the moneys directly levied on the section and collected in accordance with vote of the annual or any special school meeting, and shall not include county fund apportionment or provincial grant of any kind.

35. The secretary of trustees may resign, with the consent, in writing, of the trustees and inspector.

"School days." The prescribed days.

(2.) Every child in the school section shall attend school during the regular school hours every day for at least one hundred and twenty days in each school year, unless the physical or mental condition of the child is such as to render such attendance or instruction in the subjects taught in such schools inexpedient or impracticable ; but any child over twelve years of age who shall pass a satisfactory examination in grade seven of common school work, and any other child over thirteen years of age, who shall have attended school sixty days during fourteen consecutive weeks in the preceding year, if necessity requires him or her to work, and who shall show that fact to the satisfaction of the board, and obtain the written permission of the secretary of such board for such employment, shall be exempt from the requirements of this subsection.

(3.) The board shall ascertain before the first day of each school year the names and ages of all children residing in the said section between the ages of six and sixteen years, and the names of their parents or guardians or persons having charge of them, and carefully preserve lists of the same.

(4.) The board shall have full power and authority to appoint officers and persons to make such enumeration, and to make rules and regulations for the purpose, and to prescribe the books and records to be kept under this Act and designate the persons to keep and the manner of keeping the same.

(5.) Any person refusing to give any information to the board or its officers, or the truant officer, or to any person appointed by said board or the town council to carry out the provisions of this Act, as to the name or age of any child residing or living with said person in the school section, or wilfully giving any false information in regard to the same or any matter about which information is required by this Act, shall be liable on summary conviction before tthe stipendiary magistrate to a fine of not less than one nor more than twenty dollars and costs.

(6.) The board shall ascertain as soon as possible after the close of the school for the year, how many of the children named in the lists mentioned in the third subsection have not been at school for one hundred and twenty days during the said school year, and notify the parents, guardians or persons having charge of said children of the exact number of days' attendance made by such children during said year, and that they are liable to prosecution under this Act unless they satisfy the board that there was a good reason for the failure of said children to attend for the full period prescribed.

(7.) The board shall also ascertain how many of the children of the school section between said ages have not attended school at all during the year, and shall notify the parents, guardians or persons having charge of such children, that they are liable to prosecution under this Act unless they satisfy the board that there was a good reason for such non-attendance.

(8.) Every parent, guardian, or person having charge of any child residing in the school section shall cause such child to attend some public or private day school at least one hundred and twenty days in each school year, except as exempted under section 84, subsection 2, of this Act.

(9.) Every parent, guardian, or person having charge of any child in the school section, failing to comply with the preceding subsection, shall be liable on summary conviction before the stipendiary magistrate to a fine of not less than one nor more than twenty dollars and costs for the first offence, and for every second or subsequent offence to a fine of one dollar and costs for each school day that the law is not complied with, provided, however, that the same person shall not be fined more than sixty dollars exclusive of costs in any one year.

(10.) It shall be the duty of the board to cause all parents, guardians and persons having the care of children residing in the school section, failing to comply with the law, to be summoned before the stipendiary magistrate, unless such parents, guardians, or persons satisfy the board that the physical or mental condition of the child of or under the guardianship of such person is such as to render attendance or instruction in a public school inexpedient or impracticable, or that such child is being properly educated in reading, spelling, writing, English composition, geography, and arithmetic, otherwise than in a public or approved private school, or that the failure to attend the requisite term was owing to ill-health or temporary absence from the school section, or through some domestic affliction in the family of said person, rendering it necessary or prudent, in the opinion of the board, to keep such child home, or that the parent, guardian or person summoned was by reason of poverty unable to provide such child with proper and sufficient wearing apparel for attendance at school, and that such parent, guardian or person bona fide endeavoured to procure sufficient wearing apparel for such child to attend school. For the purposes of this Act the school board shall approve a private school only when the instruction given therein includes reading, spelling, writing, English composition, geography and arithmetic, as well taught as in ordinary public schools, and when such school shall keep a register of attendance in form and manner as prescribed by the Council of Public Instruction for public schools, which register shall at all times during school hours be open to the inspection of such persons as the school board shall appoint, and shall furnish to the board such reports and returns concerning the studies and attendance of all pupils in such school between the ages of six and sixteen years as may be required for the carrying out of the provisions of this Act ; and it shall be the duty of the Superintendent of Education to supply such register and blanks for returns as may be necessary for compliance with the provisions of this section. No parent, guardian, or person having charge of any child shall be exempted from the penalties of subsection 9, on the ground that the child in question has been educated, "otherwise than in public or approved private school," unless such child present a certificate from the supervisor or principal of schools of having passed a satisfactory examination on the grade of work suitable to the child's age and previous opportunities for receiving an education ; and it shall be the duty of the supervisor or principal to examine at stated times all such children making application whose compliance with this Act is called in question. In any prosecution under this Act the age stated in the information shall be taken prima facie to be the age of the child. No other than the board or its executive committee, or person or persons appointed by them for the purpose, shall have power or authority to prosecute or institute any proceeding before the stipendiary magistrate under this Act.

(11.) Notice from the board shall not be a condition precedent to any prosecution under this Act, but the stipendiary magistrate may exempt any parent, guardian or person from any penalty under this Act on proof of any of the reasons set forth in subsection 10 of this section, and the exemptions mentioned in subsection two of said section.

(12.) All fines and pealties imposed and recovered under this Act shall be paid over to the board, and be applied by it towards enforcing and carrying out the provisions of this Act, and the magistrate may in any conviction made under this Act impose an alternative of imprisonment in the county jail for non-payment of the fine, such imprisonment not to exceed two days for each dollar of the fine imposed ; and in such case it shall not be necessary to issue any distress warrant against the goods or property of the person convicted, but such person may be forthwith committed to prison if the fine be not at once paid.

(13.) A certificate under the seal of the board, and signed by the secretary of the board, that the name of the child or the names of the children mentioned in the summons do not appear on any school register of any of the public schools in the school section, or that the child or school children named have not complied with the requirements of section 84, subsection 2, of this Act (in which case the number of days attended shall be specified), and that the party summoned has been returned on the list to the board as the parent, guardian, or person having the charge of such child or children, shall be received by the magistrate as prima facie evidence of the offence charged, without requiring any proof of the seal of said board or the signature of such secretary, or the production of any school register or list in the custody of the board, or any certified extract from the same, and shall be sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction in any case, unless the person summoned makes defence and satisfies the magistrate that he comes within one of the exemptions hereinbefore specified, or that the certificate presented by the secretary is in fact untrue, for which purpose the party summoned shall be competent to give evidence under oath in his own behalf.

(14.) The provisions of this Act shall not apply to the children of persons in the military or naval service of Great Britain during the time they continue in said service while residing in the school section, nor to the children of persons visiting the school section for business or pleasure, and not permanently residing therein.

(15.) Any child registered as attending any of the public schools, and reported by the teacher to be absent for ten or more days, not necessarily consecutive, during any school term, without excuse and without the consent of the parent, guardian or person having charge of such child, may be deemed to be and shall be dealt with as an habitual truant by the board.

(16.) Any child known to the police, truant officer or officers of the board, to be begging or wandering at large within the school section for ten or more days, not necessarily consecutive, during any school term, and found not to be attending any school or engaged in any proper employment during regular school hours, shall be deemed to be and shall be dealt with as an habitual truant.

(17.) The truant officer or any policeman may, without any warrant or process, arrest such habitual truant and convey him to school, and so from time to time as often as he shall absent himself from school without lawful excuse. Any person who shall be so arrested and conveyed to the school, and who shall thereafter violate any regulation of the school, and any person who shall be so convicted as an habitual truant three times within three months, shall, upon conviction before the stipendiary magistrate, be liable to imprisonment for such term as the stipendiary magistrate may adjudge, not exceeding one month. The magistrate may suspend the imposition of the penalty if he is satisfied that it is in the child's interest to do so.

(18.) The school board is hereby authorized and empowered to make, pass and publish all necessary by-laws and ordinances concerning habitual truants, and children between the ages of six and sixteen years who may be found wandering about the streets or public places of the section during school hours, and to prevent such children growing up in ignorance, and for the proper enforcement of all rules and regulations made by the board for more effectually carrying out the provisions and objects of this Act.

(19.) No child under the age of sixteen years shall be employed in the school section by any person to labour in any business whatever during the school hours of any school day, unless such child shall have attended some public school or some approved private school, or shall have been otherwise instructed by a teacher qualified to instruct in spelling, reading, writing, geography, English composition and arithmetic, for at least six months of the twelve months next preceding such employment, and in every year in which such child shall be employed, and shall at the time of such employment deliver to the employer a certificate signed by the secretary of the board, certifying to such attendance, or a certificate signed by the supervisor or principal that such child had passed a satisfactory examination in grade VII of the common work. Any child, however, between the ages of thirteen and sixteen years, who has attended a public school sixty full days during fourteen consecutive weeks during the preceding year, as mentioned in subsection two, and delivers to the employer the secretary's certificate of such attendance, may be employed to labour. But no child under the age of thirteen years shall at any time be employed in any mechanical, manufacturing or mercantile establishments. Any person who shall employ any child contrary to the provisions of this section shall, for each offence, be liable to a penalty of not less than ten dollars nor more than fifty dollars, with costs, on summary conviction before the stipendiary magistrate.

(20.) The board, or such officer or person as they shall appoint, shall, at the beginning of each school year, and at such other time as they may deem necessary, examine into the situation of the children employed in all manufacturing and other establishments in the school section, and ascertain whether the provisions of this Act are duly observed, and prosecute all persons violating its provisions.

(21.) On demand, on any such examination as mentioned in the preceding subsection the proprietor, superintendent or manager of such establishment or manufactory shall exhibit to the officer or person appointed or designated by the board to make any such examination, a correct list of all children under the age of fourteen years employed in such manufactory or establishment, with the said certificate of attendance at school or of instruction. Any such proprietor, superintendent or manager, who shall refuse or neglect to furnish such list, or to send such list to the office of the board when requested in writing to do so, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than ten dollars nor more than fifty dollars, with costs, on summary conviction before the stipendiary magistrate.

(22.) All fines, forfeitures and penalties imposed by this Act, or any amendment thereof, shall be prosecuted in the name of Her Majesty the Queen, and when any act or thing is directed to be done or prohibited by this Act or any amendment thereof, and no penalty is provided therefor, then and in such case the party violating said Act shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty dollars and costs, and in default of payment imprisonment in the county jail for a period not exceeding sixty days, or both, at the discretion of the stipendiary magistrate.

(23.) The provisions of the Summary Convictions Act, chapter 103, of the Revised Statutes, and all Acts passed amending the same, shall apply to all proceedings instituted under this Act, when not inconsistent with any expressed provision herein ; and the stipendiary magistrate shall amend any summons, warrant, conviction, or any document, to make it in accordance with the evidence.

85. In every incorporated town in which the foregoing section 84 has not already been adopted, it shall be the duty of the mayor, warden or presiding officer to submit, on or before the first day of July in each year, to the town council, the resolution embraced in schedule D, and whenever the resolution aforesaid shall have received the assent of a majority of the town council voting thereon, the town council and the board of school commissioners of the said town shall and are hereby required to continue to perform the duties assigned by the said section 84, unless the action adopting it shall have been repealed by a two-thirds vote of the members of the town council.

MISCELLANEOUS.

86. Members of the legislature, ministers of religion, and magistrates, and any person temporarily appointed in writing by the superintendent of education, shall be visitors of schools.

87. The superintendent, inspectors, teachers of the normal and model schools, and licensed teachers, while employed as such, shall be exempt from serving in any town office or on juries.

88. The school year shall begin on the first day of August and end on the last day of July.

89. When any section shall have been without a school for the period of two years, in consequence of the inability of its inhabitants to provide a school-house, there shall be refunded to the trustees of said section, on the recommendation of the board of school commissioners, the amount of the county municipal school rate assessed during the said two years on the inhabitants of the section. In no case shall the superintendent of education issue an order for such repayment till furnished by the inspector of schools with a certificate that a school-house is in actual course of erection.

90. Both county fund apportionment made to trustees and provincial grants to teachers shall be withheld from sections making a false return, and from sections whose school or any of whose schools have been conducted in buildings condemned by the board of school commissioners.

Any person who may have been assessed both in the city and in Dartmouth or any other school sections in the county, in respect of such property, shall be entitled to receive back the amount paid by him either in the city or in Dartmouth or other school sections as the case may be, in accordance with the foregoing construction of the law. The sum so assessed shall be paid weekly by the city treasurer to the board, as collected. 112. The provisions of this chapter, except as herein otherwise specified, shall apply to the city of Halifax, provided that this section shall not have the effect of repealing the City Compulsory School Act or any amendment thereof.

Subsection 5 of section 75 is the special section which the teachers have to regard in respect of the matter now under discussion before this committee. This is the law for them with regard to moral or religious instruction, and it is the only section in law, so far as I have been able to ascertain, that gives them imperative instructions what they shall do in respect of this matter.

That is all that is said with regard to the teaching of religion in the schools. Now, they are obliged to take an oath to do their duty in the manner provided for by this Act, which is said to be satisfactory to the minority in Nova Scotia, and which was introduced by the leader of this House, and for which he takes so much credit to-day. I think we cannot peruse this Act without coming to the conclusion that the rights asked for by the minority in Manitoba are not enjoyed by the minority in Nova Scotia, where they are said to have all the rights which they are entitled to. I can only say that if the teachers all over the country had been giving such instructions in the nature and effect of alcoholic drinks, as in subsection 7 of section 75, for the last quarter of a century, there would have been little or no difficulty in doing away with the bar in this building, which, I think, ought to be done away with and the sooner the better. Every teacher who gives sectarian instruction and takes this oath is a perjured person according to pages 7 and 8 of the comments and regulations. And yet every teacher is obliged to take this oath.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). There is nothing in the law to that effect.

Mr. SPROULE. I have learned that now, because I have read every clause of the law.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Who put that comment there?

Mr. SPROULE. I don't know; but the question is, is it true or is it false?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is false.

Mr. SPROULE. If the teacher takes a false oath, is it perjury or is it not?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It does not say so.

Mr. SPROULE. The teacher must swear that he has done his duty according to the regulations, and if he has not done his duty and takes that oath, is a perjured person. Now, I have gone over all this Act, including the regulations, and I have done so to show to this House and to the country that there is nothing in the Nova Scotia school law that provides for the teaching of any religious dogma in the schools during school hours, that there is nothing in it which prevents any child from attending these schools and receiving a proper secular education. I have gone through this Act because it has been stated by the hon. leader of the House, who has taken great credit to himself for passing such an admirable law, because it has been stated by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), by the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), that it is an admirable law, which gave sufficient latitude to carry on the educational affairs of the province in a way that is satisfactory to a large majority of the minority. I have read this because it has been said by hon. gentlemen in this House, as well as by those outside, that if the provisions of this law were extended to Manitoba, no person among the minority or the Government could have reasonable grounds for complaint, and because, on the other hand, I have said more than once before that practically the provisions of this Act, so far as it relates to religious instruction, were offered to the minority of Manitoba by the commissioners of the Manitoba government through the commissioners of this Government, who went to Winnipeg. I have read this Act to show that the latitude that is given in the province of Nova Scotia for teaching religion is to teach after or before school hours, and not during school hours. If the Bishop of Halifax is correct when he said that the provisions of the Nova Scotia School Act were admirably suited to the minority, similar provisions ought to be suitable to a similar minority in any part of the country, and conditions that at least equally favourable have been granted or offered by the Manitoba government. It has been said by hon. members that if the minority had by law a system as favourable to them as that which exists in Nova Scotia that would be acceptable to the minority. But that has already been offered and refused by the commissioners representing this Government. I believe that no further steps should be taken with regard to this Bill at this time, and that this committee should rise so as to give the House an opportunity to make progress with other necessary legislation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. Secretary of State allow me a moment to correct a statement. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to some private information he had received, which is, I doubt not, information he received from me. He said with reference to the late meeting at Wiarton, that the school Bill had not been discussed at all. That was a misapprehension on his part. The school Bill was discussed, but there is a misapprehension as to what was intended by the vote at that meeting. A resolution was moved on that occasion which approves the course of the Government, but very carefully sails around the school question. It is as follows:—

> Resolved, that the Young Men's Liberal-Conservative Club of Wiarton, proud of the traditions of the Conservative party in Canada, and believing that the prosperity of the country has been due to the wise, patriotic and statesmanlike manner in which the Conservative Administration have conducted the affairs of the country, have pleasure in expressing continued confidence in the Government at Ottawa, knowing that in their hands the country will be wisely governed and its constitution and laws faithfully maintained.

I have received a communication from two staunch Conservatives in Wiarton to this effect:

> Government's course re schools was not approved at Wiarton meeting. Government's policy of the past was approved, but not school Bill.

Now, one word with regard to my friend Mr. John George. Mr. George has always been, as long as I have known him, and I believe all his life, an ardent Conservative. He has been advocating the Government's policy in North Ontario, in Haldimand and in Cardwell. I have no information to lead me to suppose that he has been doing anything improper so far as that advocacy is concerned. I did not understand my hon. friend to mean that Mr. George had been doing anything improper.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not wish to be so understood.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. George has a perfect right to advocate his views on a public platform. But I hope it will also be conceded that those who differ from him and differ from the Conservative Government as to their policy on this question have an equal right to express their views frankly and fairly, either in Parliament or out of it.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad the hon. gentleman has corrected me, because I have no desire to put on record anything that is inaccurate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not taken up a great deal of the time of the committee because I was very anxious that nothing should emanate from the supporters of this Bill which would lend any countenance to the obstruction with which it has been met. But I feel it due myself and to the committee to draw attention to a little episode which occurred in this discussion a few nights ago. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in a somewhat strong criticism and censure of my course, charged me with two things. One was with having incurred the reprobation of the late Right Hon. Sir John Thompson, and the other was with having spoken in terms of great contempt of the Roman Catholic body in this country. I gave those statements the promptest possible denial, and I said I was prepared to show that, so far as Sir John Thompson was concerned, down to the close of his life and from its commencement, I enjoyed the esteem and confidence of the right hon. gentleman. I said that I was prepared to meet a letter which was quoted as having been written by Sir John Thompson with an extract from a letter written by himself when he was in Paris in 1893. The other statement was that I had spoken or written in terms of such profound contempt of the Roman Catholic body as to say that I had "no confidence in the breed." I met that statement, which was not new, and which, as I said, I had but a dim recollection, as it was a long time ago that the charge was made, with a flat denial.

I met that by a bold and defiant challenge to any man living to produce evidence that I ever uttered such words in my life, or had ever written such words. Subsequently, when I entered the House, I found the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) reading from the "Globe" newspaper a correspondence in which some such words were used, not as emanating from me, but as stated by me to have been spoken by Sir John A. Macdonald. I then stated that I had received a letter from Mr. John A. Macdonell, a Roman Catholic gentleman, of the firm of Foy, Tupper and Macdonell, at the time this correspondence is purported to have taken place, and that I was prepared to produce the letter from that gentleman, showing the entire falsity of the statement made in reference to myself. Now, Sir, I propose to read to the House the evidence upon which I give these two statements an emphatic denial. I will just say to the hon. gentlemen opposite that I do not think the credit of the House, the credit of the party, or the credit of the country, will be advanced by hon. gentlemen in this House adopting a policy of calumny with reference to any political opponent. I believe the good sense of this country will revolt at measures of that kind for the purpose of advancing the interests of a party, or attacking the character of any public man. I am reminded of the saying of Dusenbaum, "Whenever you would ruin a person or a government, begin by spreading calumnies to defame him." Now, I do not think it is creditable to any party, or to any member, to endeavour to sustain its fallen fortunes by adopting such a policy. I propose now to meet this charge by a statement of facts. You will remember that Shakespeare, in Henry IV., says, "Mark now how plain a tale shall put you down." I will first read extracts from a letter, dated at Paris, March 22nd, 1893, written by Sir John Thompson to Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., and copied from the original handwriting of Sir John Thompson, by Mr. Joseph Pope; and I shall be glad to show the original to any person anxious to see it:

> * * * I thank you very heartily for the regard of which you assure me, and I add very sincerely that I should esteem it a great disappointment and mortification if my recent accession to office should be followed by Canada being deprived of the services of one whose position, as a statesman, is a matter of so much pride to her, and for whom I personally have an attachment and loyalty which have grown very deep and strong in twenty years of political association.

I may say that that letter was written on an occasion when I desired to be relieved from the duties of the High Commissioner in London, and it was in consequence of the letter which I received from Sir John Thompson, containing this statement, that I was dissuaded from carrying out my intention. I may say in reference to the other statement, that I am enabled to give it an emphatic contradiction ; and I think it discreditable to any hon. gentleman in this House to rake up old correspondence of so long ago, purporting to have taken place in 1879, and bringing it before this House, when it had already been met by a complete and overwhelming refutation. There is an end of all courtesy in discussion if, when statements have been made and have been met by a complete and overwhelming denial, an hon. gentleman again undertakes to renew the charge, and entirely ignores the refutation that has been made. I will give a statement concerning the correspondence which purported to have taken place, and has been read by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), and I will now read the refutation of what appeared in the "Globe," of 5th April, 1883. The "Mail," on the 5th of April, 1883, contained this statement from its Ottawa correspondent, which was published in refutation of the statement contained in the "Globe" :

> Ottawa, April 5th.—The Grit papers are publishing a correspondence purporting to have taken place between the solicitors of the Christian Brothers and the Government of Canada relating to some property in Toronto which the Christian Brothers had purchased from the Government at auction in 1867, the consideration being $8,000, one-tenth of which was paid at the time of sale, the balance was to have been paid by instalments, with interest at six per cent. The payments were not made, and the matter remained in statu quo till 1879, when an attempt was made to secure a settlement of the outstanding liabilities in order to enable the Christian Brothers to obtain a deed. Mr. J. A. Macdonell, of Toronto, was employed to approach the Government, and he wrote a letter to Sir Charles Tupper on this subject, dated 23rd January, 1879.

And that stolen correspondence was brought to light and published in 1883 :

> But whether the letter published is that letter or not, is something no one can tell, seeing that the letter in question, the memorandum of Sir Charles Tupper, and the final answer of the Secretary of the department were stolen and have been hawked around among newspapers for some time, without the possessor finding any man so dishonourable as to purchase stolen documents which, on the face of them, indicated that they were stolen.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). May I ask the hon. gentleman whether they were stolen from his possession ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see as I proceed.

> The probability is that the man who would not hesitate to steal the documents, would not hesitate about interpolating words and sentences which were not in the original. At any rate, the Government are only responsible for their own acts, and those acts were : First, the recommendation of Sir Charles Tupper, acting Minister of Public Works, dated May 22nd, that the property should be transferred to the Christian Brothers with the payment of the accrued interest on the condition of immediate payment of the whole amount of the purchase money by the Christian Brothers ; and, second, the letter signed by F. Braun, in which the Minister of Public Works regrets that the view taken by the Government as to the necessity of carrying out the terms of the purchase (such purchase having been effected through public auction) has rendered it impossible for them to accede to the representations made by him (the Minister) on behalf of the Christian Brothers. These two documents speak for themselves. The first one shows that it was several months after the attention of the Government was called to the subject that the Minister made his report. He was in no great hurry. Matters took their usual course. There was evidently no extraordinary anxiety to conciliate the Archbishop. He was treated exactly as any other man in the country making an application to the Government : that the Government did not approve of making an attempt to wean the Archbishop from his supposed regard for the Grits by such means. The Government of Sir John Macdonald took their time, and from January to May, turned the subjects over in their minds and finally declined to accede to the wishes of the Archbishop in this matter. The facts, as presented in the Grit organs are the strongest proof that the Government were not willing to do anything prejudicial to the public interest, and were not willing to depart from the usual routine, even to conciliate an Archbishop. Passing away from the stolen documents which were published by those who knew them to be stolen documents, we come to the letter purporting to have been written May 20th, 1879, to J. A. Macdonell, and in which appears italicised words : "Sir John says he has little confidence in the breed." That letter, of course, could not be among the documents stolen, because it necessarily, if actually sent, was in the possession of Mr. Macdonell, and could not have been among the stolen documents. Either, then, the thief must have gone to Mr. Macdonell's private papers in Toronto, and hunted this particular letter out, or must have forged it. He must have determined upon adding a second theft to his first, or a second and greater crime to his first crime. On examination, it looks remarkably like a clumsily prepared forgery. In the first place, it will be observed that while all the other documents given in the statements published by one or two obscure journals are signed by the persons writing them, this document is without any signature. The concocter of the plot thought it better not to go too far. He imagined that he might save himself by the cunning device of omitting the signature. In another essential he has proved himself a clumsy fabricator. The point of the whole thing lies in the attempt to induce the public to believe that Sir John Macdonald made a statement which Sir Chas. Tupper endorsed to the effect that there was "little confidence to be placed in the whole breed," meaning thereby, says the Grit organ, that the Roman Catholic, or the hierarchy of that body were entitled to but little confidence. The clumsy forgerer makes Sir Charles Tupper write this in a most confiding way to a man who is himself one of that persuasion. The absurdity of such a concoction is only equalled by its malice. The concoctor overreached himself, like many another villain, but independent of the fact that the internal evidence is strongly indicative of forgery and that the absence of a signature to the only one of the four documents to which the slightest importance can be attached is a remarkably suspicious circumstance. I have the authority of the Minister——

The Ottawa correspondent says to the "Mail":

– to affirm in the most explicit and straightforward way possible that he knows nothing about the letter, that he never wrote it, never used such words in any form, either in writing or verbally, and that the letter from beginning to end is a forgery. The clumsily prepared forgery will probably deceive none but those who are, by strong partisan feeling, been given over to a delusion to believe a lie. At the same time, it is just as well to expose the fact that three of the documents have been obtained by theft from a public department, and not only fasten no wrong-doing on the Government, but actually show that the Government declined to purchase the support of a prominent man by declining to agree to what, on a review of all the circumstances, they thought would be prejudicial to the public interest, while the fourth, or unsigned letter of May 20th, is a downright malicious forgery, a fraud attempted to be palmed off on the public.

There is the complete refutation, and the emphatic declaration by myself at the time these letters first appeared, appears not to have been accepted, and I will assume was not known, by the hon. gentleman who made a reference to the statement. I will now read the letter of Mr. Macdonell, who, as I said before, is a Roman Catholic gentleman, and the partner of another Roman Catholic gentleman of the highest standing in this country, Mr. J. J. Foy, of Toronto. No person with a head upon his shoulders could believe for a single moment that any man could so far forget himself as to write in terms so insulting to a gentleman of a firm comprising two leading Roman Catholics in this country, whatever his opinions might be. I will now read the letter I received from Mr. Macdonell a few days ago:

Alexandria, April, 1896.

My dear Sir Charles:

I have seen with surprise that the old falsehood has been revived to the effect that you once stated that "you had no confidence in the breed," referring to those of your fellow-countrymen who professed the Catholic religion. I had thought that this had long since been disproved and abandoned. Political exigencies would appear, however, to have necessitated its resurrection, and I regret to find that no less a person than Mr. Laurier has been so far imposed upon as to give countenance and repetition to it.

As the statement was originally alleged to have been made by Sir John Macdonald and conveyed by you in a letter to myself, permit me to state very shortly the facts.

Application was made about the year 1879 by the late Archbishop Lynch through me to the Government of Canada for a small concession in respect of some interest in arrears on the purchase by a Catholic institution of the old Bank of Upper Canada building in Toronto. You were Minister of Public Works at the time, and I, acting as solicitor for the Archbishop of Toronto, wrote to you upon the subject. You were inclined to accede to our request, but consulted Sir John Macdonald with regard to it, and conveyed to me Sir John Macdonald's legal opinion that the concession could not be made without a vote of Parliament, it not being, in his view, within the legal competency of the Privy Council to remit moneys due to the Crown. I reported accordingly to my client the Archbishop, to whom I showed your letter, and although considerably disappointed at what we thought was a somewhat forced and technical reason for refusing a request amply justified bp the surrounding circumstances, we felt that nothing further was to be done in the face of Sir John's legal decision to which, of necessity, we bowed. It was a matter of public business, and you were naturally guided by Sir John's view of the law and your decision was final and was conveyed to me in the ordinary course of departmental routine. Shortly afterwards, but fortunately not before Archbishop Lynch had seen your letter, the correspondence was purloined from the office of Foy, Tupper & Macdonell, and your letter freely interpolated by some facile hand, appeared in print, with the statement that Sir John had made use of the expression with reference to Archbishop Lynch, and generally including, of course, Mr. Foy and myself.

I was astonished at the stupidity and impudence of the forgery, for such it was, the statement referred to having been forged, to a letter genuine, in other respects, and published as being an authentic document in its entirety. I was surprised that any rational being could be so stupid as to credit that a man so notoriously astute as Sir John Macdonald, would make use of so offensive a remark, which was to be conveyed to the solicitor for the Archbishop in a letter which he knew must, of necessity, be shown immediately to His Grace, in the ordinary course of business. Secondly, that it could be supposed by any one who was aware of the well-known relations of most intimate personal friendship which existed between Sir John Macdonald and myself, that Sir John would offer me so gratuitous an insult in regard to a high dignitary of the church to which I belonged, and to all who, in common with myself, professed the Catholic religion, and, thirdly, that it would be supposed to be conceivable that the father of my partner could be selected by Sir John as the medium of communicating so grave a breach of all those amenities observed among gentlemen to the son of his own former partner and life-long friend. And I was only a degree less surprised that it should be suggested that persons in our rank of life had recourse either in our conversation or correspondence with each other to such language or expressions which I have been given to understand are customary among loafers at the street corners, and the habitues of the slums.

When I discussed the matter with the Archbishop, he dismissed it with the remark that it was the first time he had seen it suggested that Sir John Macdonald was a fool, and that he was not to be caught by any such chaff as that.

Let me state, in conclusion, that Archbishop Lynch and Sir John Macdonald continued, until the death of the former, to be warmest personal friends, and I, who was then a resident of Toronto, and enjoyed the confidence of both, was frequently the intermediary between them in relation to matters of common interest. His Grace died on May 12th, 1888, and, writing to him on March 5th, 1887, shortly after the general elections of that year, Sir John concluded a somewhat lengthy letter as follows :—" And now, my dear Archbishop, let me again thank you most warmly for all that you did for us in the recent campaign. I can assure you that my colleagues and myself gratefully appreciate your kindness."

Having had something to do with the action of the Archbishop thus warmly acknowledged, and knowing that it would be gratifying to me who was then an invalid, His Grace, with great courtesy and kindness, sent me this letter and told me to keep it, and it thus happens to be in my possession. It indicates, I venture to submit, that Sir John had very much confidence, indeed, both personal and political in his friend the Archbishop, and those of his faith, and that he had very good reason therefor ; and, further that the confidence was mutual.

I have not the pleasure of Mr. Laurier's acquaintance, but I feel sure that after this statement (of which I can forward him a copy) he will not repeat a story which he has been deceived into supposing had some foundation in fact.

I am, my dear Sir Charles,
Faithfully yours,
J. A. MACDONELL.

The original of that letter is under my hand. I will now add to that, a letter by His Grace Archbishop Lynch, in his own handwriting, to Mr. Macdonell, treating with profound contempt the insinuation that he could be supposed to countenance any such statement ever having been made :

St. Michael's Palace,
Toronto, October 2nd, 1885.

My dear Mr. Macdonell :

I am sorry that you have taken so much to heart a letter written many years ago, that you say was interpolated. You are both a Catholic and a gentleman, incapable of being disrespectful to a prelate of your church. I am sure that Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper are too much gentlemen and politicians to say anything that might offend a very large portion of their constituents.

I am, dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
JOHN JOSEPH LYNCH,
Archbishop of Toronto

I am quite sure, Sir, after this refutation, I need not say a single word more than that I think it is greatly to be deprecated that any hon. gentleman lends his ear to any rumour of fact dating far back, and which, as I have already shown, was promptly refuted in the most emphatic and thorough manner in which it is possible any statement could be refuted. If, under those circumstances, questions of that kind can be revived and treated as authentic, and the circumstance ignored, that they were refuted at the time they were originally stated, there is an end of all parliamentary courtesy—I will not say courtesy, but fair-play. I do not believe the interests of any party are likely to be promoted by anything of the kind. I propose, before I sit down, to offer a few remarks, and a very few remarks, in regard to the discussion which has taken place with respect to the negotiations between the Government of the Dominion and the government of Mr. Greenway in Manitoba.

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to a point of order. That discussion took place in another debate, on a motion to adjourn the debate, and it is not competent for the hon. gentleman to speak as to what occurred in another debate. That was the time for the hon. gentleman to have made his remarks, and it was a great disappointment to the committee that he did not avail himself of that opportunity.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The point of order will not avail the hon. gentleman, and for this reason : The debate was not confined to the long speech made by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), but there was a discussion, in which the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and half a dozen other hon. members took part, and that was part of a continuous debate.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. I discussed the matter on the motion of the hon. member for North Simcoe. I have not said a word upon it since. Of course, the hon. gentleman can speak on other questions now. My point is that, in speaking on the question now, he cannot allude to any observations made on the motion moved yesterday by the hon. member for North Simcoe, that the House do now adjourn. That was not a continuous debate : it was one that was disposed of, and what was said during its progress cannot be referred to during this discussion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not necessary that I should refer specially to the speech made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy).

Mr. McMULLEN. In regard to the subject mentioned a moment ago, the hon. gentleman intimated that a correspondence had taken place between himself and Sir John Thompson with respect to his position as High Commissioner. As there may not be an opportunity to move for that correspondence by resolution, perhaps those papers, without an order being made, will be laid on the Table of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman might have taken another opportunity of raising that question, after I had concluded. But I may say that the correspondence between Sir John Thompson and myself was of a private nature, and will not be laid on the Table of the House. I have given the entire extract that bears on the statement made by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McMULLEN. I protest against the Secretary of State declining to lay on the Table of the House correspondence to which he has drawn the attention of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has ventured to make an irregular interruption, which he has no right to do. He can raise the question at another time, but I do not propose to be interrupted while I have the floor.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will the hon. gentleman tell me——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not taken up an undue portion of the time of the committee, as I think hon. members on both sides of the House will admit, and I propose to occupy a very short period at the present time; but it seems, under the circumstances, hardly respectful to the committee that I should not take some opportunity, anxious as I have been not to do anything that could possibly interrupt the proceedings on this Bill, to briefly refer to the statements made at great length and reiterated by hon. gentlemen opposite. It has been stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, throughout this debate, that the Government of this Dominion have treated the government of Manitoba as an enemy. Well, Sir, I am very glad at last that we have evidence to show how utterly unfounded that assertion is. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, after paying me the very great compliment of extending on the pages of "Hansard" the Nova Scotia School Act, which I had the honour of introducing and passing through that legislature, and all other hon. gentlemen in this House seem entirely to forget the position we occupy. They seem to imagine that this Parliament is engaged in constructing a school law, that we have carte blanche to make it as perfect and complete a school law as possible. I submit that is an entire misapprehension. That is not the position at all. If it were, the action of many hon. members on both sides of the House would be very different to the opinions they have expressed on this question in the position in which it stands, and, therefore, I wish briefly to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this very important conference which took place at Winnipeg on this question has, in my judgment, been of very great service in its consideration. The leader of the Opposition has taken the ground for a very long period that it was the duty of this Government to issue a commission to ascertain the facts, and he has spent a great deal of time and ability in endeavouring to convince the House and the country that it was impossible to deal with this question without first having a commission to ascertain the facts. That delusion has been swept to the winds.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; I say that delusion has been completely swept to the winds by the conference at Winnipeg. I am, however, anticipating a little. The position the Government finds itself in is not one of constructing a law, but of carrying out a decision given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I cannot do better, in view of the position in which we stand on this question, than to draw the attention of the committee to what the constitution of the country is with regard to the position of the Manitoba and the Dominion Government. The Manitoba Act says:

> In and for the province, the said legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:
> 1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.
> 2. An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.
> 3. In case of any provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section, is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then, and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

What were the provisions of this section? They involved the declaration that the power to legislate exclusively by the legislature of Manitoba, ceased when they undertook to legislate to take away the rights or privileges enjoyed by the minority, as they had existed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman not convinced yet that that is not so?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. I am not only convinced that it is correct, but, if there are any terms in the English language which can establish the point conclusively, they are contained here, when the Act gives to the legislature of Manitoba exclusive powers to legislate in regard to education, subject to the condition that it shall not take away rights enjoyed by the religious minority; and there is further provision that, as regards that exclusive jurisdiction, an appeal lies to the Governor General in Council as to whether those rights have been taken away, and, if it is found that they have been taken away, power is conferred on this Parliament to legislate. That is the position. What has happened ? No pretense is made in this House or country that those rights have not been taken away. It is admitted by everybody that rights and privileges enjoyed by the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba down to 1890, were taken away by the legislation of 1890. We do not require to waste time in establishing that, because, I say, it is universally admitted. We have the decision of the highest tribunal in the Empire, which declared, after the subject had been argued fully before it, that the privileges of the minority had been invaded, and that the right thereby devolved on this Parliament to restore those privileges which had thus been taken. It is idle, under the circumstances, I hold, for any hon. member to pretend for a single moment that we are in a position to make such a law as hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House would be disposed to make, if we were in the position to take up the question de novo. It is idle to waste time and discuss whether it was within our power and duty to see whether we could prepare a Bill better than the Remedial Bill. What devolved on the Government was this : When the Judicial Committee made that declaration, the Government of Canada were bound—and I do not believe any hon. gentlemen deny it—to recognize that the necessity for legislation was created and a duty imposed on this Parliament under the law and the constitution to redress the wrong. Then we must look at the question not as to what kind of a law we prefer, but what is necessary to restore to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba the rights which everybody is obliged to admit they have been deprived of and the privileges they enjoyed under the law as it existed when the law of 1890 was passed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Finance Minister stated the position differently in his speech from the Secretary of State.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Although there may be a difference in phraseology, I say, in the presence of this House, that from the hour I entered the Government of this Dominion down to this hour, there has not been a difference of opinion on the question of this Bill or the necessity that devolves on the Government to carry it through this House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Finance Minister said it was not required by the law or the constitution, but it was a matter of policy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I reply that there is no difference of opinion in the Government in the slightest degree, that all these ideas are creations of a too active imagination on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is no foundation whatever in fact, so far as I know, for an opinion that any difference of opinion in the Government has existed down to the present hour.

Mr. FRASER. Which of the two views is the view that all are agreed on ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had better spare his interrogations if they are as senseless as that one. I say there has been no doubt that the Government have been unanimous as regards the principle, while there may be a difference of opinion on minor details, while one Minister may consider the question more important than another. It is quite competent for the Minister of Finance to disagree with myself as regards the importance of this Bill, and not to hold it as important as I deem it ; but that does not touch the vital essence as to whether this Bill restoring the rights and privileges to the minority of Manitoba is a measure on which we have agreed from the time I entered the Government down to this hour, and which we were determined to press on the attention of the House so long as there was the faintest possibility that it could become law. What happened ? The remedial order was passed by the Dominion Government. I believe it was passed—I am not quite sure about the date—on 21st March. That order has been denounced by certain hon. gentlemen opposite as very unwise and very harsh and calculated to give offence to the government of Manitoba. But the House must not forget what followed. An answer was sent, after a considerable interval, by the government of Manitoba, and a second remedial order was passed showing how anxious the Dominion of Canada was that this measure should be considered, dealt with and disposed of by the government of Manitoba. The second invitation to take this subject up and dispose of it in a satisfactory manner, was declined, and the Government were compelled to fall back upon the constitution and upon this remedial measure. As to whether the Government have been treating Manitoba with due courtesy, and whether we have been disposed to adopt those mild and sunny ways that the leader of the Opposition suggested—and as to which I quite agree with him, for every means should be exhausted to bring this unhappy question to a satisfactory termination—abundant evidence is now before this committee that we have neglected nothing. My hon. friend from Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) on his own account and animated by the most lofty and patriotic desire to see this matter amicably arranged by the government of Manitoba, went there for the purpose of seeing what could be done. Some communication took place between that hon. gentleman and the government of Manitoba, after he returned. The first information that was received that the government of Manitoba would consent to negotiate with the Dominion Government was promptly availed of the moment it was received. The papers that are before the House show that the moment it was intimated on the part of Mr. Greenway that he would be disposed to respond to an official invitation to have a negotiation, this was availed of, and the Government at once sent three gentlemen who, I believed then, and believe now, were as agreeable to the Manitoba government as could have been selected for the purpose of carrying on the negotiations. They were received with the utmost courtesy by the government of Manitoba, and proceeded to take up this question. Was anything said about a commsision ? Look through these papers, and you will find that there is no suggestion that the facts were not all patent and known to everybody. Instead of saying at the very opening of the negotiations : Before we can do business, we must ascertain the facts, and there must be means taken to investigate the facts ; it was all taken for granted. That disposes, and I think it is very fortunate that it does, of the position the hon. gentleman held so long, and ultimately, in an unhappy hour, was led to abandon. It has been said over and over again, that this Government has increased the difficulty of dealing with this subject by the harsh spirit in which we approached Manitoba. Is there a single suggestion in these papers that any other mode of approach was possible ? I think we can take that part of the objection on the part of the opponents as having been swept away. These commissioners entered upon the negotiations in the kindest spirit, without any complaint being made with reference to these matters. The only ground of complaint arose on a misunderstanding as to proceedings in this House. It will be remembered that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) suggested that the Bill should not be taken up until Tuesday, and a considerable portion of the press assumed, wrongly, that that was the arrangement. "Hansard" shows verbatim what was said, and shows that Friday was the day agreed to by the hon. leader of the Opposition and myself for taking up the Bill and going into committee. Our delegates saw the statement with reference to Tuesday, and they did not see that with reference to Friday. Consequently, they assumed that nothing would be taken up until Tuesday. That was the only point on which there was the slightest complaint, and the explanation offered by our delegates was courteously received by the government of Manitoba. I refer to that to show that everything that could be done on the part of this Government has been ratified, so far as we can judge, and the imaginary objections raised by some hon. gentlemen have been swept aside by the course the delegates pursued.

But there is another and much more important point in relation to these negotiations, and that is that no person can read over the propositions of the delegates from this Government without coming to the conclusion that they were animated by the most sincere desire to have this question settled in Manitoba, and not here. I do not think that any great advantage will be gained by that attempt to show that this Government has not been anxious from the first that Manitoba should retain the exclusive right to legislate on the question of education, and that the smallest possible concession that would restore the rights and privileges of the minority should be accepted.

Exception has been taken by a number of gentlemen in this House, who speak sneeringly of the minority. They say this is a question between the Dominion Government and the Manitoba government, and suggest that any statement from any source as to what the minority think or feel in this matter should be treated with contempt. I do not so read the constitution. I understand the constitution and the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as establishing this—that, where rights and privileges are taken away, the duty of the restoring of them rests with the Government and Parliament of the Dominion. Therefore, it becomes of the most vital importance to know what rights and privileges have been taken away and how they can best be restored.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear ; that is the very point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think so—what rights, what privileges, have been taken away. A privilege may not be a right, but, under the constitution of the country, I do not gather that any broad distinction is drawn between the rights and the privileges that were enjoyed and that were taken away. Were our delegates to assume, in spite of the judgment, that they were to go on without reference to the feelings of or desires of the minority ? I think not. I think that the duty devolved upon them, knowing the decision that had been given and the terms of the instructions they had received, to deal with this matter in such a way as would, at all events, put the question in a position that the rights and privileges that had been withdrawn from the minority under the Act of 1890, should be restored. I cannot help thinking that any person, dispassionately regarding this question, will come to the conclusion that it would be impossible that they should go further than they did in reference to this matter. What were their suggestions for the settlement of this question ?

> Legislation shall be passed at the present session of the Manitoba legislature to provide that in towns and villages where there are resident, say, twenty-five Roman Catholic children of school age, and in cities where there are, say, fifty of such children, the board of trustees shall arrange that such children shall have a school-house and school-room for their own use, > where they may be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher; and Roman Catholic parents, or guardians, say, ten in number, may appeal to the Department of Education from any decision or neglect of the board in respect of its duty under this clause, and the board shall observe and carry out all decisions and directions of the department on any such appeal.

I do not know how any hon. gentleman who is willing to restore these privileges in the slightest degree, can say there is anything unreasonable in that.

> Provision shall be made by this legislation that schools wherein the majority of children are Catholics should be exempted from the requirements of the regulations as to religious exercises.

I do not think that the strongest opponent of the Bill would not say that the converse of this would be revolting. That children shall be compelled to receive religious instruction which is in antagonism to the wishes of their parents, is what no man with any sense of justice would suggest.

> That text-books be permitted in Catholic schools such as will not offend the religious views of the minority, and which from an educational standpoint shall be satisfactory to the advisory board.

In other words, they are to be first-rate schools, under the control of a body appointed by the government of Manitoba, in order to secure a high order of education and to make it certain that they shall be as efficient as the other schools of the province, but that provision shall be made that there shall be nothing in the text-book to offend the religious susceptibilities of the Roman Catholics.

> Catholics to have representation on the advisory board.

Now, Sir, I may say that the smooth working of the Educational Act of Nova Scotia is due to the reason that, without providing separate schools by law, it has yet practically met the wishes of both Catholics and Protestants in Nova Scotia, has been the fact that the Council of Public Instruction is the government of the day, and, as the Roman Catholics are always represented in that government, it is impossible to have any regulations or arrangements made that are not satisfactory both to Roman Catholics and Protestants. This simply calls for a recognition of the same principles, and that on the advisory board Roman Catholics shall have a representative. The appointment of one single Roman Catholic on this board of eight or nine members in all that would be required.

> Catholics to have representation on the board of examiners appointed to examine teachers for certificates.

I am sure that no person will for a single moment object to that.

> It is also claimed that Catholics should have assistance in the maintenance of normal schools for the education of their teachers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I do not see any reason why they should not be given the means to give their teachers just as high an education as is secured by attendance at the Protestant schools.

> The existing system of permits to non-qualified teachers in Catholic schools to be continued for, say, two years, to enable them to qualify, and then to be entirely discontinued.

That was found necessary by the circumstances of the case, in which a number of persons who, perhaps, would not be able to pass the examinations at this moment required of Catholic teachers, might continue to teach, if they complied with the other requirements of the law with reference to qualifications.

> In all other respects the schools at which Catholics attend to be public schools and subject to every provision of the Education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba.

If the privileges taken away from these people are to be restored, if their rights are to be respected at all, I cannot conceive any more moderate arrangement or one less open to any kind of objection on the part of any government here disposed to do any justice to the minority whatever.

I do not propose to go into the counter-propositions, for that is not necessary. But I will refer to one subject, and that is that one of the first proposals made by the Manitoba government was to secularize the schools. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), I believe, would be willing to have the schools secularized, to banish the Bible and every kind of religious instruction from the schools, but I doubt if there are many members on either side who would agree with him.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), the chief Government Whip, expresses that opinion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very sorry to hear that, but I am sure that the Church of England would not agree to it, I am sure that the Presbyterian body would not agree to it, I am sure that the Wesleyan body would not agree to it, and I am quite sure that the Baptist body—which may not be a very large one in that country—would not agree to it. Therefore, the proposition to secularize the schools, I believe, would run counter to the overwhelming sentiment of all denominations, whether Catholic or Protestant, in the province of Manitoba, and, therefore, I regard that as a step certainly very much in the wrong direction. What a delusion it would be, if you were to have religious instruction after the manner proposed by the Manitoba government. What would it amount to? You have the Roman Catholic Church, the Church of England, the Presbyterians, the Wesleyans, represented in each school, and they are each to take alternate days. So you would have, in practice, half an hour once a week. Will you expect that to satisfy any person, Catholic or Protestant, who wishes to have this religious instruction in the schools ? Surely not. I do not intend to prolong these remarks, because I am anxious to avoid doing anything that shall take up a single moment of the time of this committee. But we have been accused of obstructing our own Bill. Absolutely, gentlemen have been found who, in the face of what is known to every member of this committee, actually accuse us of obstructing our own Bill. It has been insinuated that there was some occult influence at work which made the Government desirous of preventing this Bill from becoming law. Well, I have in my hands a copy of the Hamilton "Evening Times," of April 13th, a strong opponent of the Government, which gives the true inwardness of the opposition to the Bill :

> Canadians who do not believe in forcing separate schools upon Manitoba, may thank the Liberals in Parliament for getting an opportunity to prevent the outrage.

They gave to the Liberals the entire credit ; they won't allow any Conservative in this House to enjoy the credit.

Mr. LAURIER. The paper is not fair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said a good deal about last week affording a record-breaking session. This paper adds :

> The result is worth all the discomfort of a six days' and five nights' sitting.

So I think proper to give to the opponents of the Government, I won't say they are all Liberals, the credit of the unparalleled obstruction which this Bill has met from the commencement. Now, we have been ardently desirous of settling this question, for reasons which I have often stated, and need not repeat to the House. My great desire has been to remove from the political arena a question of this kind that is calculated to prevent us getting a verdict upon the important political issues that separate the two parties in this country. I believe also that it is very much to be deprecated that the people should have their passions and feelings excited, as they are excited on questions of religion more than on any other question in the world. I think it is very much to be deprecated that such a question should be taken to the polls. I think it is unnecessary, because the Government, while obeying the law and the constitution in the steps that have been taken, and declared to be absolutely necessary to restore the rights and privileges of the minority in Manitoba, have shown from the first that they are anxious that nothing should be done that could be construed as a violent or extreme measure. I do not hesitate to say that the minority, in my judgment, have been most reasonable in regard to this measure. Hon. gentlemen opposite profess so great a desire to destroy this Bill that they are willing to spend days and nights over a clause which is an exact transcript from laws that have been in use in Ontario and Manitoba for many years, and have been found to work perfectly well. Now, I do not understand this pretended anxiety on the part of the opponents of this Bill to have criticised in committee. If the minority are satisfied with the Bill, imperfect as the measure may be, falling short, as the leader of the Opposition holds it does, of restoring fully the rights of the Roman Catholic minority, if the minority are satisfied with the measure, why do some hon. gentlemen object to it ? That the minority are satisfied with it, we have the highest authority for saying. Every person knows the respect that is paid by the Roman Catholic people to the views of those who are placed in charge of their religious and educational interests ; everybody knows the confidence that is placed in those who preside over them as bishops and archbishops, and who may, therefore, be held to represent the views of the people themselves. In order to show the House, in an unmistakable manner that the minority are satisfied, I propose to read a message received by myself, and a similar one was sent to the Prime Minister yesterday, by the Archbishop of St. Boniface, from Montreal, in which he says :

> In the name of the Catholic minority of Manitoba that I represent officially, I ask the House of Commons to pass the whole remedial Act as it is now amended. It will be satisfactory to the said Catholic minority, that will consider it as a substantial, workable and final settlement of the school question according to the constitution.
> (Signed) EDOUARD LANGEVIN.

I give that as a complete answer to any hon. gentleman who says this Bill is worthless, that it will not give satisfaction to the minority. After this approval of the Bill by a gentleman holding so high a position as His Grace the Archbishop, who speaks on behalf of the Manitoba minority, certainly no person can any longer say that this measure will not satisfy their claim. I deeply regret that the necessary measure was not passed by the government of Manitoba. It would be infinitely more satisfactory, and no effort has been spared by this Government to secure a settlement by the government of Manitoba. I do not hesitate to say that I believe if this Bill were put on the statute-book, it would terminate the difficulty, for I believe the Manitoba government would then be in a position to say to the people of that province who have become excited upon this subject—and I believe that is one of the difficulties of the Manitoba government—they would then be able to say to the people : Either we must meet the claims of this minority by our own legislation, or we must have under the constitution of the country a divided authority ; and that is certainly not desirable. I believe if this Bill were placed upon the statute-book, this Government would probably never find it necessary to carry out any of its provisions, because they would be promptly adopted by the government of Manitoba in order to prevent the divided authority I have mentioned; and the hands of the local government would be enormously strengthened by putting this Bill on the statute-book. Now, I wish to say a word about the obstruction of this measure. Who is obstructing?

Mr. WELSH. Do you want to coerce us by keeping us here all night and all day? You are the men who are obstructing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will tell my hon. friend, if he will allow me to call him so, that nobody is more unwilling to keep him here than I am. It has been a case of necessity, not of choice. We have felt bound to exhaust every possible means for the purpose of carrying a Bill that we believe to be only of the greatest importance that it should become law, but we believe it to be of the most vital importance that it should become law this session. The session has been called specially for the purpose of dealing with this measure, the country expected it of us, and we have felt it our duty to exhaust every means to pass it. But I want to put this question to hon. gentlemen opposite. Who is it that is obstructing this Bill? Is it the representatives in this House of the two millions of Roman Catholics? I do not believe that there is one representative among those who represent the two millions of Roman Catholics in Canada in this House, who will get up and say: I am prepared to obstruct this Bill and prevent its becoming law. Then I say if you have at the back of this Bill the Government of the Dominion, composed of both Catholics and Protestants, if you have supporting them a large number of members representing both Protestants and Roman Catholics, if you have in favour of the Bill the representatives of the two millions of Roman Catholics in this country to-day, why should it be obstructed? Sir, it is not too late yet. The Bill has been prepared with the utmost care by the law officers of the Crown.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Care!

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I do not suppose it would be in the power of human ingenuity to frame a Bill in which lawyers could not find flaws from Monday morning till Saturday night. But because they can do so, I do not hold that to be evidence that the Bill is imperfect. I say the clauses have been torn to pieces and changed and modified by hon. gentlemen opposite, in their desire, not to perfect the measure, but to mar it. I believe that the Bill as submitted to this House would have been perfectly satisfactory to the House. The law officers of the Crown had given it careful attention: and a gentleman of high standing in this country and great legal talent, Mr. Ewart, who has devoted, I may say, years of his life to the study of this question, has been devoting his great powers and his great legal talents to this measure for a long period. He has had the opportunity of crossing swords with another hon. gentleman of great legal talent, the hon. member for North Simcoe. It is said that iron sharpens iron, so I say that after this conflict of opinion on this question in all its phases, this Bill meets with the approval of the counsel retained by the minority in Manitoba. It also meets with the approval of the Minister of Justice and of the committee of the Dominion Government, composed of both Catholics and Protestants, who had charge of this Bill. As a layman, I say I would have been quite willing to take it as it stood; and I say now that the most vital and important portions of this Bill have been considered, and I believe it is the duty of his committee to allow the remaining clauses to be passed. If it is imperfect, hon. gentlemen opposite are not responsible for that; the Government of the country are responsible.

Mr. LAURIER. No, not the Government but the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will settle that a little later. I say that the Government of Canada have been upheld by a majority of 99 to 7 in this House in favour of abandoning obstruction and passing this Bill. Now, under these circumstances, I venture to make the last faint appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to let us settle this vexed question, which is the cause of so much trouble, and let the Government go to the country, responsible for all their sins, responsible for all the enormities of this measure, whatever they may be, and let them answer for their shortcomings to the people of this country. We are quite willing to take that responsibility. We believe it will be in the interest of the country, in the interest of peace and good feeling among Roman Catholics and Protestants of this country, and I trust, under these circumstances, that we may be permitted to place this Bill on the statute-book, late as the period of session is, and that we may be able to take up the other important business of the session that it is very necessary to transact before this Parliament prorogues.

Mr. LAURIER. I have been watching with some attention the trend of the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman in order to find out what conclusion he was driving at, and the conclusion which he at last enunciated was that we should pass this Bill, imperfect though it be, because the Government would be responsible for its defects. Well, Sir, I may tell the hon. gentleman at once, that if the conclusion he has just stated were true, I would not hesitate for my part to accept the appeal he has just made. If it were true that for this defective Bill the Government alone would be responsible when it is attempted to put it in force, I would not hesitate to pass it, and let the Government take the consequences. But, Sir, the statement is not true. The hon. gentleman knows, or should know, at all events, as well as anybody else, as everybody in this country does know, that the Government would not suffer the consequences of the defects in this Bill which the Government are seeking to railroad through the House. But the poor taxpayers of Manitoba would suffer the consequences, it is upon them that the results would fall. If you were to pass this Bill, imperfect as it is, the result would be litigation, and more litigation for the Catholic minority of Manitoba. Is that a prospect that we can regard with indifference ? Is that a view of the case that is to be ignored entirely ? Is that a view of the case which members of this House, responsible to their constituents, have not to take into consideration ? For the mistakes of this Government the minority of Manitoba must suffer the consequences. Sir, we have had in this very matter an example of hasty and ill-considered legislation. When the Manitoba Act was considered in this House of Commons, it is a matter of history that the intention of the legislature was to put the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba on exactly the same footing as the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario and the Protestant minority in Quebec, that is to say, that their separate schools woud be beyond the reach of the legislature of Manitoba, that they would be in such a position that the legislature of Manitoba could no more touch their schools than the legislature of Ontario could touch the separate schools of that province, or than the legislature of Quebec could touch the separate schools in that province. Therefore, through hasty legislation, through ill-considered legislation, through undigested legislation such as we have to-day, that intention of the Parliament was not carried out, with the result that the minority have been deprived of their schools. Is that not the case ? The Minister of Finance has admitted that such was the intention of a former Parliament, but the intention of Parliament was not carried out. The Privy Council, by its judgment in the Barrett case, decided that the legislature of Manitoba could deal with this question, whereas the intention of Parliament here was that it should not deal with the question. Well, in the face of this example, the hon. gentleman asks us to go on and pass this Bill ; whether it is right or wrong, whether it is ill-digested or not, he says his Government will take the consequences. Again, I say that if the consequences were alone to fall upon the Government, I would take their advice ; but it is because the consequences cannot fall upon the Government, but must fall upon the minority, that every consideration must be given to this Bill before it becomes law. Now, the hon. gentleman said a moment ago, in the course of his argument, that the conference at Winnipeg had shown conclusively that there was no necessity for investigation. Why, that is just the delusion which has been swept away by the conference. An idea long indulged in by the leader of the Opposition had been shown to be a delusion by the fact that the commissioners of the Manitoba government did not, forsooth, suggest a commission. How could they suggest a commission ? Does the hon. gentleman dare to put forward such an argument as that if they did not suggest an investigation, it was because there was no reason for it. Why, the government had no time to legislate, as the hon. gentleman well knows. We have here the statement, and it was acknowledged by the Government themselves, that the demand made by the commissioners of Manitoba that this Remedial Bill should be suspended for two or three days, while negotiations were going on, and which was a very reasonable demand, was not carried out. How could the commissioners of Manitoba expect that the Bill would be suspended while the investigation was going on ? There was not time for investigation. But the government of Manitoba, as we all understand, were ready and willing to consider the proposition which was made by the Government, to have a friendly conference over the suggestions made for a friendly settlement of this question. The commissioners of Canada went to Winnipeg and there offered certain suggestions to the Manitoba commissioners for the settlement of this question, and those suggestions were fairly and favourably considered by the Manitoba government. But the hon. gentleman is aware that from the first the government of Manitoba stated that the only way to reach a solution of this difficulty was by having an investigation into all the facts. The hon. gentleman asks, what facts are there to investigate, and he declares that all the facts have been settled by the judgment of the Privy Council. What facts have been settled, I should like to know ? What facts were investigated by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council or by any other tribunal ? The hon. gentleman knows, and he could not ignore it in a debate of this importance, that the Judicial Committee was consulted simply on assumed facts, and they gave their decision on the assumed facts being proved, and they arrived at the conclusion that, the facts being as stated, then the judgment should be as rendered by the Judicial Committee, and there was thus ground for interference by this Government. That is the case, and I cannot find words fitly to characterize the argument of the hon. Secretary of State. But it is not by repeated assertion of a fact which does not exist that he can build up an argument. It is by too much assuming facts in this way that the question has been brought to the dangerous position which it occupies to-day. Then, the hon. gentleman said that on the first intimation from the government of Manitoba, the Government of Canada sent commissioners to Winnipeg. Why, Sir, I am sorry to say, for the honour of the country and for the honour of the Government, that here again is a statement which cannot bear the light of day. The hon. gentleman is aware that the government of Manitoba were always ready, as I was aware they were always ready, and as the correspondence demonstrates, to open negotiations in order to arrive at a settlement of this question. But the hon. gentleman wants to convey the intimation that the negotiations originated with this Government, and not with the government of Manitoba, and I am sorry to say, for the name of Canada, that the correspondence laid before Parliament is a garbled correspondence, that the telegram from Mr. Greenway is garbled, that part of it is suppressed, and that the communication sent to Mr. Greenway at the outset does not appear in this parliamentary return. What is the first paper published? The first paper is an answer made by Mr. Greenway to a telegram sent by Sir Donald Smith. Why was not the telegram sent by Sir Donald Smith placed before Parliament? If the answer of Mr. Greenway to the telegram of Sir Donald Smith is placed before Parliament, it is unfair to Mr. Greenway, unfair to this Parliament, and unfair to the people of Canada, that the very communication which led to this correspondence has not been placed before this House. The explanation is found in the fact that in this matter, from first to last, there has never been candour on the part of Canada in dealing with this question. If the Government had from the first dealt fairly and squarely with the people of the Dominion and the people of Manitoba, there would have been reason to hope for, and indeed, I believe, long ere this there would have been reached, a better solution of this difficulty than is possible at the present time. But even at the very moment when it was expected to send commissioners to the government of Manitoba, this Government placed on record a distinctly hostile declaration to the Manitoba government. It was not fair towards the provincial government; but I am glad to say that, in their anxiety to deal with this question and arrive at a settlement, the Manitoba government passed over this want of candour on the part of the Dominion, and treated its commissioners fairly, generously and well, and with the greatest courtesy, as the Canadian commissioners have admitted in the reports submitted to the House. I again come back to this point, that the conference itself showed that an investigation was required. Any man who will look over the proposals made by the Canadian commissioners, and the counter-proposals of the Manitoba commissioners, and the action of the Dominion Government, must come to the conclusion that an investigation would have shed an amount of light that would have enabled a basis to be reached for a solution of this unfortunate question. What do we find in this correspondence? Any one who has read it with the intelligence which any man must possess who has given any attention to this question, must have come to the conclusion that if an investigation had been held, it would have been found that the Manitoba school question could be brought into very narrow compass, simply to the question of separate schools in the city of Winnipeg, and probably nowhere else. The grouping of the population in that part of the Dominion is such that there would be no trouble in giving the people that religious tuition which the minority demand should be given in the schools; but in Winnipeg, there being a mixed population, it is admitted there would be greater difficulty in dealing with the matter. But it seems evident, from the report made by the commissioners, that if an investigation were held, the question of education would be simplified into one probably of separate schools in Winnipeg, for everywhere else the question was one of comparatively easy settlement. That is shown already by the correspondence and the result of the negotiations before the House. I will not answer to-day, perhaps I may at some future period, the charge that the opposition to this Government, whether from the Liberal ranks or the Conservative ranks, has been obstructing this measure. There has been no disposition, I am sure, to obstruct the measure in the early stages of the Bill, and in the early hours of the day. Take what occurred yesterday. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) very properly—and his action is to-day fully vindicated by the debate at this moment and the speech of the leader of the House—brought to the attention of the House the negotiations which took place recently at Winnipeg. The debate was interesting. If it was deficient in one thing, it was in this, it was not sufficiently broad, long, full and complete. This is well illustrated by the fact that, though at the time the Secretary of State would not answer the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe, yet to-day the leader of the House decides to discuss the same subject himself. This, therefore, is a justification for the debate of yesterday. At ten o'clock we took up the consideration of the Bill, and a great deal of laborious and useful discussion was spent on it. The hon. gentleman may deprecate that discussion, but it will be apparent to every one who reads "Hansard," that the speeches were most material to the subject under debate. After two or three o'clock, close attention cannot be given to the consideration of these clauses; the hon. leader of the House is not present, and all hon. members need rest. We have even offered to sit and consider the clauses carefully until four a.m. Under such circumstances, men would be less than men if they would agree to be bullied. I am prepared to stay here until three, or even four o'clock in the morning, but men must have some rest, and after three a.m., when three-fourths or over of the Government supporters have left the House, and the Bill is left in the hands of Ministers who know nothing of the measure, any attempt to pass this Bill is a process of bullying which no man with a heart in his bosom will suffer. On this question I am ready to take the judgment of men, whether friends or foes of this Government. With respect to the question itself, it has been demonstrated that if negotiations had been opened in March or July last, if Dominion commissioners had been sent there, not hampered by time, not forced to report within three days, the Government would have had full time to investigate the whole question, and there would certainly have been by this time a settlement arrived at with the province of Manitoba, by which the Catholics would have been restored to their rights, and at the same time the rights of the majority would not have suffered.

Mr. FOSTER. I intend to make but very few remarks indeed, and that largely because the arguments addressed by the hon. leader of the Opposition are not new and have been met before, but there are one or two points which might be emphasized. The hon. gentleman made an admission which is on the line of admission made by him before, but which is none the less important, and to-day he has been more emphatic than in any similar admission he has made. He has stated, in the face of this House, to his own supporters and to the country, that it was undoubtedly the intention of the framers of the Act, and of this Parliament at the time of the framing and the passing of the Manitoba Act, which brought the province into the Dominion, to give to the religious minority, whichever it was, in Manitoba, the Catholic minority, as it turned out, an indefeasible right to the exercise of their own religious instruction, as the same was given in Quebec to the Protestant minority, and to the Catholic minority in Ontario. I want that opinion of the hon. leader of the Opposition to go to the country with all its force and all its weight. It is an answer to many of his own speeches, and to many hon. gentlemen on that side of the House who deny it. It is an answer made to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have denied it. It is the most substantial proof of the position taken by myself and by other hon. members on this side of the House, as to the duty which is laid upon this Parliament, if not a legal duty, one which is greater and more binding than a legal obligation, the obligation which comes from the intention expressed, and the intention asked to be expressed by parties to a compact in 1870, both of them settling down, one to the idea that what they requested had been granted, and the other to the idea that what had been requested had been efficiently provided for, and that in the light of what the hon. gentleman has said, is a parliamentary compact, which, in his opinion, must be binding on his followers and must have weight in this House. But he says that what was asked and intended by this Parliament to have been efficiently provided for in the Manitoba Act, by the careless work of the draughtsman, or law clerk, fell short of its mark; and to what inconsistent conclusion does the hon. gentleman come? Forsooth, because Parliament, sitting here, made a mistake in the drafting or enacting of its law, the hon. gentleman takes the position now that hereafter and for ever we shall never attempt another law for fear we might make another mistake. The hon. gentleman, instead of taking the position that right was intended in 1870, and though the position was embarrassed by the Act placed on the statute-book that fell short of being fully carried out, therefore the obligation is on us to make good so far as possible the right to-day, instead of falling back on this position and welcoming the legislation that was brought down with honest intention, he practically declares that his full opposition will be given to bring the compact of 1870 to fulfilment and fruition. The hon. gentleman has sat in this House two months with this Bill before him, and I do not wish to use too strong language, but I may be pardoned if I say that I have not seen an indication of one honest and earnest effort on his part to promote this legislation in the principle of which he believes; and hon. members will read "Hansard" in vain to find a suggestion which comes from the hon. gentleman, as regards promoting this measure within the limitations which the constitution places upon him, as well as upon the Government and Parliament. What an inconsistent position it is for an hon. gentleman to take, who rises and in his speech says in one breath that a minority is suffering under a grievance, and in the next breath, instead of aiding to remedy that grievance, proceeds to move the six months' hoist of the Bill. Indisputably, the hon. gentleman's insincerity—if that expression be allowable—is proved by his motion. And yet the hon. gentleman claims to be sincere, and to be consistent, in his action on this Bill. He says the facts should be investigated. He has said that often, and the hon. gentleman has made the remark that it is a poor way to build up an argument by the oft-repetition of a phrase. The hon. gentleman himself is the chief sinner in that respect. How often has he repeated the phrase "The facts ought to be investigated?" He made a tour through the country in 1895 with that as the main portion of his speech. But when he came to the House and sat face to face with this Remedial Bill he had not the courage to carry out that upon which he had made his campaign, he had not the courage to ask for an investigation. For reasons best known to himself he did not ask this Parliament to investigate and then legislate, but he took the extraordinary course of asking this House to give no courtesy to this Bill but to throw it out immediately, this Bill which embodied the very principle of redress to the minority which he acknowledges should be given. He dwells upon the phrase the "assumed facts." The "assumed facts" were placed before the Supreme Court and carried to the Privy Council. Yes, Sir, and they were of such a character that they were debated by learned and able counsel. The hon. gentleman talks of the "assumed facts." Will he deny that they are real? What are the facts that call for action? The fact that the minority had rights and privileges of which they have been deprived Does my hon. friend deny that? Is that an "assumed fact?" In 1870 these rights and privileges were granted. From 1870 to 1890 they were enjoyed. In 1890 they were swept away in a single enactment, and in 1891, they were removed still further. My hon. friend knows that is a fact. And these are all the facts he needs in order to make him perfectly sure that this Parliament ought to act in this matter. It is a different thing when we come to legislate, for you have to have knowledge of the case upon which you propose to legislate. But any fact that was required in addition to the fact that the grievance existed and that the power existed here to remove that grievance has been furnished by the hon. gentleman himself. He has stated that probably no other country in the world offers so easy a field for a remedy of this kind as the province of Manitoba owing to the manner in which the population is grouped. He declared to-day that the only difficulty arising would be found in the city of Winnipeg. What facts are they, which we are to investigate? Does he want to know the population? He does not need a commission to inform him that this is an easy question to settle, and that the point in which there is trouble is the little difficulty in the city of Winnipeg. The hon. gentleman is right. There is no province in the Dominion where you could settle the rights of the minority while creating less disturbance than you can in Manitoba and that, as the hon. gentleman stated from the fact that the population is so distributed as to facilitate the granting of this redress. The hon. gentleman—and it shows how hard up he is for argument—actually bases some of his complaints and of the position he takes as an obstructionist against this measure on the fact, as he alleges, that we garbled the correspondence with Mr. Greenway. The hon. gentleman knows, as every hon. member of this House knows what portion of Mr. Greenway's telegram was not first read in this House, for it was afterwards read in this House, and the hon. gentleman knows that that portion of the despatch had no possible connection with the subject matter in hand as to whether there should be a conference between this Government and the Manitoba government or not. So much for one garbling; how about the other question? He complains and says they will not go any further because they did not get one end of the telegraphic correspondence between Mr. Greenway and Sir Donald Smith while they did get the other. And he complains of want of candour. The hon. gentleman knows as well as any of us that the reason why we did not get it was that Mr. Greenway refused to allow it to be laid before the House. But what was it, anyway? Read the text of the telegram that was brought down. Does my hon. friend think that the withholding of the other telegram has in it such a hidden and important meaning that it should be the cause of preventing progress upon this Bill. These things show upon what slight foundation rests the position that he takes—a position for which the country will hold him responsible,—of gross and unfair obstruction against this Bill. His last point was that there was no disposition to obstruct, and he brings it all down to this in the last analysis —we get into the committee on the Bill at three o'clock, and we work away on this or that clause and try to make it a good clause until one o'clock, talking all over the section. If you read "Hansard" you will find what a wonderful amount of information is developed. And at two o'clock after we have done work on that clause we ask that we may be allowed to go home, and because we are not allowed to go home at two or three o'clock, we will not be bullied and we will not do anything more. Grant the soundness of all this. Will my hon. friend explain that other part of the obstructive tactics which occupied this House day after day and prevented us getting into committee on the Bill, the obstructive war being waged just as persistently before they had a single clause of it to occupy their legal abilities upon. Why day after day was taken up in the persistent fight on this line. But my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) let the secret out in an unguarded moment when, in discussing the second reading or on motion to go into committee, I have forgotten which, he made the statement that the Bill would never get to the committee. This is an exhibition which the leader of the Opposition cannot explain, either to his own satisfaction or to the satisfaction of the country. And no proposal to work two or three hours on an unimportant clause followed by a declaration that they want to go home will do. The arguments upon which my hon. friend founds his course of prevention and obstruction are well known and will be taken at their true worth.

Mr. McCARTHY. Although we are now in the middle of April, we are, so far as the discussion of this Bill is concerned, practically back again to the 3rd March, and now, on a motion that the committee rise, the Bill is being discussed by the leader of the House and by his principal follower in the Government on the lines appropriate to the second reading. It is no doubt important that this question should be kept fresh before the House and the country, but it is equally clear and appropriate that the statements and arguments—that the arguments put forward by the leader of the House and Minister of Finance should not be allowed to go unanswered. I must be permitted to differ from the leader of the Opposition when he states it as a historical truth that under the Manitoba constitution it was intended to guarantee to the minority their rights in respect of schools in the same way that the minority in Quebec and the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario had been assured of their rights by the British North America Act. I have read the history of the debate and all I could find on the subject, and I venture, with all respect, to say that there is no justification whatever for the statement of the leader of the Opposition. Let me draw attention to the provision in the British North America Act which applies to Ontario and Quebec in this respect and point out how the principal clause was omitted in the Manitoba constitution, and I venture to say, designedly omitted. The clause which guarantees the minorities in the two old provinces, is subsection 2 of section 93 of the British North America Act. This is not applicable to any of the other provinces or incoming provinces, but is confined to Upper and Lower Canada. The object was to give to the dissentient Protestants of Quebec the rights and privileges which had been granted to the Roman Catholics in Upper Canada and it had no reference to any of the other provinces. When the Manitoba Act was passed and this subsection 2 or its equivalent was deliberately omitted, as it was, while subsection 1 and subsection 3 were practically re-enacted, as well as subsection 4, is it possible to suppose that it was not done deliberately ? Not only is the historical fact not as the leader of the Opposition has stated it, but the very contrary is true. It is manifest that Parliament deliberately left to the province to determine what the school law should be and all that was done was to say whatever rights the minority or whatever rights any denominational school they had in Manitoba at the time of the union, whether a right guaranteed by law or allowed by practice, that right should be preserved. I think it important that such a statement should not go uncontradicted and, speaking for myself alone, I say that, having read the debate and the correspondence, having read the statement made by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) who states that separate schools were not thought of when he went to the Red River as a delegate, that instead of separate schools being guaranteed to the minority, the very reverse is the fact. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) was very glad to seize upon this statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition because it is the first little crumb of comfort he has had to sustain the elaborate argument he made the other day. He spoke of a compact, and I think it was clearly shown in the course of a subsequent debate that he had no foundation for this allegation of a compact. Therefore he was glad to find the hon. leader of the Opposition make this statement as it formed some kind of ground upon which he could rest his claim that the Manitoba minority should have this Remedial Bill. But let us look at the position taken by the leader of the House upon this question. I confess I was astonished when I read the public speeches of that hon. gentleman, when he was soliciting the votes of the electors of Cape Breton. I was astonished to find that he based the Government's position on the ground, which he has reasserted here to-day—that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had commanded this Parliament to restore the rights of the Roman Catholic minority which had been swept away by the Act of 1890. By the course which the legislature of Manitoba had taken, that legislature had denuded itself—I use the expression of the hon. gentleman in his opening speech on the second reading—had denuded itself of its rights in regard to education, and had handed over the power to deal with that to this Parliament. Sir, I venture to say that for that statement, which is not a statement of fact, but a statement of law, there is absolutely no warrant ; and I venture to say that there is not a lawyer in this House there is not a publicist in this country, there is not a man who has read the arguments before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, there is not a man who has given the slightest attention to this question, who can arrive at the conclusion that the leader of this House has stated over and over again ; on the contrary, they must come to the opposite conclusion. There is some excuse, perhaps, for the hon. gentleman. He has evidently not been paying much attention to this subject, and he has been pitchforked into the Government in order, by his masterful ways, of which we are having some painful experience just now—although I do not think it is going to redound to the credit of the Government—he was brought into this Government in order to exercise his masterful, dominating will, with which he has forced himself along through all his public career. I say he knows very little about the question on which he has undertaken this afternoon to enlighten this committee. Sir, will he take the opinion of Christopher Robinson on this question, which was read in this House last session ? There the opinion of the greatest lawyer in this province, on this subject, and a gentleman who is always consulted in difficult matters by this Government, a gentleman whose leaning is in favour of those who sit on the Treasury benches, a lifelong Conservative, not to say Tory of the Tories. When his opinion was asked by the Manitoba government on this matter, he gave it as follows :—

> The restoration of the privileges of Roman Catholics in Manitoba is undoubtedly left open by the judgment, in the sense that it is entirely in the discretion, both of the Governor General in Council and of the Dominion Parliament, to what extent, if at all they will act upon the appeal or upon the Order in Council, respectively, in affording a remedy.
> It cannot, I think be said that the mere fact of right of the Roman Catholic or Protestant minority in relation to education having been affected by provincial legislation, entitles them, in every case and under all circumstances, to the restoration of such right, or to any relief. Their right is to appeal, but the result of such appeal must depend, as I have said, upon the judgment of the Governor General in Council and of the Dominion Parliament, whose course would no doubt be determined by a sense of justice and right, and by a due regard to the letter and spirit of the constitution, in view of all the surrounding facts and circumstances in each particular case.

I regret that the Secretary of State is not now in his place, perhaps he does not want to know about these matters. He makes this proclamation, and then he runs away. I do not know whether this hon. gentleman has ever taken the slightest pains to investigate this subject. I suppose he makes that announcement here as the prospective leader of the party, which he expects his henchmen to take up and repeat, depending upon his statement, regardless altogether of the foundation upon which it is based. Sir, we have had the argument before the Privy Council, presented by so great a lawyer as Mr. Blake, and opinions from the judges from time to time in the course of that argument ; and every one of the judges who spoke on the subject over and over again, and it was admitted by Mr. Blake, and perhaps still more formally by Mr. Ewart, who framed the Bill which this Government now proposes to the House, that the matter was one for the discretion of the Governor General in Council, in the first place ; and it was afterwards for the discretion of this Parliament ; and there was no obligation upon us to do what we do not feel to be right and proper to be done under all the circumstances, and with regard to the condition of affairs as they exist in that province. I dislike to take up the time of this committee ; if the hon. gentleman had remained in his place, I would have read these extracts to him, some of which were given to the House last session, some of which have been mentioned during this session, and there can be no substantial doubt as to their meaning. Let me, however, just trouble the committee with one or two extracts :

> Mr. BLAKE. I do not think your lordships are. I do not like to make an absolute concession at this time.
> Lord WATSON. I rather took it from your statement that we are in a position in which we ought not to do that.
> Mr. BLAKE. I think your lordships are not bound to go further.
> Lord WATSON. I suppose we are bound to give him advice in this appeal. He has asked nothing else but advice throughout. He has not asked for a political decision which shall fetter him in any way.
> Mr. BLAKE. It could not be. The law which creates the tribunal for the purpose of giving advice, expressly states that in their political capacity they are not bound by that service.

Further on, Lord Shand stated :

> There must be a marked difference, with reference to anything interfering with what was the state of matters at the union, and anything interfering with the state of matters which had been changed by the legislature after the union. In the one case it would be bad in point of law and ultra vires, in the other you can destroy the right, but that destruction of the right is liable to appeal.
> Mr. BLAKE. That is precisely the line which I am about to adopt. ,
> Lord WATSON. It may be qualified or abrogated.
> Mr. BLAKE. The case does not rise, if there are privileges which have not been broken. I suggest that the provision of the enabling clause with subsection 1, is absolutely complete in itself.
> Lord WATSON. The power given of appeal to the Government, and upon request by the Government to the legislature of Canada, seems to be wholly discretionary in both.
> Mr. EWART. No doubt.
> Lord WATSON. Both in the government and in the legislature.
> Mr. EWART. Yes.
> * * * * * * * *
> Before closing, I would like to say a word or two as to what we are seeking. As it has been already remarked, we are not asking for any declaration as to the extent of the relief to be given by the Governor General.
> We merely ask that it should be held that he has jurisdiction to hear our prayer and to grant us some relief, if he thinks proper to do so.
> Lord WATSON. I am prepared to advise the Governor General and decide on the meaning of this clause, but I am not prepared to relieve him of the duty of considering how far he ought to interfere.
> Lord WATSON. The power given of appeal to the government, and, upon request by the government to the legislature of Canada, seems to be wholly discretionary in both

Now, I need not read more. If the hon. Secretary of State had heard this and understood it, or had ever read it and understood it, is it possible to suppose that he would get up here, after this subject has been under discussion for a month and a half, and tell this committee that the Government were merely obeying the mandate of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and as to which they had no discretion, and that they were merely doing that which, by the course the legislature of Manitoba had taken, that legislature had deprived itself of the power to do ?

But more extraordinary even than that was the statement made that we have no power to do otherwise, that we had no discretion in the matter, that we were not in a position—I took down his words—to make such a law as we would wish. Why, Sir, what are we doing ? The Government have brought down a law in some respects a slavish copy of the old law, as it stood, in other respects, and in the most important matters, new altogether, and differing from the law as it stood. Take the education code, take, for illustration, the standard of the qualification of the teachers, and you do not find that in the old law. The Government have undertaken to make a law which would be satisfactory, but differing from the old law, and yet he tells us that we are not in a position to use our discretion one way or the other, but we are compelled to re-enact the law as it was. He sits here night after night when this is under discussion, and amendments are made with the assent of the Government, others are drawn by their own hand, differing from the law as it stood, and yet we are told that we have no power to make any change, and that we have merely to re-enact the law as it stood. Sir, it does appear to me that a consideration of these matters will bring back the committee to its proper jurisdiction, and proper conception of its jurisdiction. This Parliament has, no doubt, subject to many difficulties and many limitations and restrictions, power to restore the rights which were taken away. For my part, I have never disputed it ; but the manner and extent of that restoration, subject to the legal and constitutional difficulties in our way, is within our rights and within our jurisdiction. Why then should we not consider the clauses of this Bill ? But the hon. gentleman says the Government are responsible. Sir, this Government are not responsible for this Bill. The Government were responsible for the remedial order. This House is responsible for the Bill it passes, and not the Government. The distinction is well taken in the very clause under consideration. The remedial order merely goes no further than to vest jurisdiction in the House. In itself it has no force and no effect. It is only the law of this Parliament that changes the school law of the province of Manitoba, and we would be neglectful of our duty here as representatives, if we did not give it that consideration that would put it into a shape which will be satisfactory, if in the end it ever becomes law. Now, on that subject I will not take up the time of the committee by any further elaboration. Let me, however, just draw attention to one matter which it does appear to me to be of sufficient importance to be re-stated again. The hon. gentleman denies that we have treated the province of Manitoba, the representatives of which in the Government is now sitting in this House, as an enemy. Now, let us just re-state shortly the history in regard to that. When this petition was presented in 1891, no communication took place with Manitoba. The first Manitoba heard about it was after the judgment was rendered in the Barrett case, when the law was found to be constitutional, and then a summons was issued to that province to appear here in Ottawa—that was in 1893—to appear here and show cause why the remedial order should not be passed. It will be remembered that such were the terms that the government of Manitoba were on with the Dominion Government, that they declined to make an appearance ; they treated this summons with contempt, and refused to appear ; and the Government proceeded some days ex parte without Manitoba being represented. Finally the matter stood over, from the winter of 1893, until the second judgment of the Privy Council had been rendered, and then Manitoba was called upon to come here by a telegram, requiring its immediate attendance at this bar. Now, Sir, I have given a statement of all that took place up to that time, and I challenge any fair-minded man in this House, or out of it, to deny that the treatment accorded to Manitoba was treatment which, if it had been accorded to a foreign power, would have meant nothing short of war. It was not treatment that any foreign state would have tolerated, and it was not treatment that would have been exercised towards a foreign state by any friendly power. It is true that in the month of July last, after a declaration was made in this House, after the people of Manitoba through their representatives, had answered the remedial order, after a declaration was made on the floor of Parliament binding this Government to call Parliament together by the 2nd January to pass the remedial Bill, with this threat hanging over the heads of the Manitoba government, a letter was sent praying that government to interfere and save this Government from the mess and trouble they had got into. That order was duly answered, and that answer has been duly approved. Now, Sir, I have no sympathy with the cry that this question should not be submitted to the people. Who are we in this House that we are to arrogate to ourselves to legislate with respect to the people whom we represent, and to say to our electors that they are not to consider the question, that they are blinded by passion, that they are renderend incompetent by their bigotry, that they are not fit to consider the question, and that we will take care to deal with this matter, and that opportunity shall be denied them ? Sir, I have no sympathy with that cry. I am anxious, and shall do what I can, properly and legitimately to enable the people of this country to pronounce on this question. I will do what I am able to enable the people to say whether they want Manitoba coerced, whether they want separate schools established, or whether they are content to allow Manitoba to manage its affairs as it may think best. I am not one of those who fails to consider the position of this country. But fancy the Parliament of England crying out about difficulties in connection with the disestablishment of the Irish Church, or of the proposition made a year ago to disestablish the Welsh Church. Those were religious matters, those were questions which aroused not merely religious, but also to some extent racial feelings. But the Government did not consider it its duty, after it had the mandate from the people, to delay legislation, but furnished with that mandate, Parliament proceeded to execute the will of the people, as we will be prepared to do when the people have had an opportunity of expressing their will in regard to this Bill. In regard to obstruction, let me say just a word. The hon. gentleman has in effect given up the claim, or rather the Finance Minister has given up the claim that there was obstruction committed. It is not possible to maintain the argument held by some supporters of the Government. It is not possible to say from the time this House has had an opportunity of considering this Bill that the discussion has not been perfectly fair and legitimate. But the hon. gentleman has held that obstruction occurred before the House went into committee on this Bill. What was that obstruction ? The Bill was read the second time on March 19, and on the twentieth at midnight I placed in the hands of the Speaker an amendment calling attention to the legal difficulties surrounding the Bill and suggesting that it should be submitted to the Supreme Court. The debate went on from about midnight until three in the morning, and was continued on Tuesday following, when the House adjourned, the discussion occupying one day only. Upon the second amendment, moved by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), not more than two or three speeches were delivered ; and so all the delay that occurred in going into committee did not occupy two days of the time of the House. It is easy to make charges of obstruction, but I venture to say that a fair statement of the facts will destroy the contention that there has been anything unreasonable in the debate and in the opposition to the Bill. It is quite true we have not been content with allowing the Chairman to call a clause and pronounce it carried and affix his initials thereto. We have investigated the clauses, and we have found them so contradictory, that after two hours' discussion and three Ministers present, they were unable to agree on the meaning of a clause and were ready to accept an amendment from any one, and finally we got it placed in a reasonable shape. The Government say the amendments do not make any practical changes. Then why do the Government accept amendments ? The Controller of Customs came to me with an amendment written out by himself and asked me to move it, it being in the line I have suggested. The discussion proceeded and about four o'clock, the demand was made that the committee should rise, which motion was not assented to by the Government. The people are beginning to understand this matter. All the papers west of the Ottawa River are opposed to the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a little far fetched.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let the hon. gentleman tell me of one ?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman does not know of any it is not easy to satisfy him.

Mr. McCARTHY. If I do not know, the only way is to tell me, in order that I may become enlightened. I have not heard of one that condemned the course adopted in opposing this Bill. I rose more especially, however, for the purpose of meeting the argument now being reiterated for the third time by the leader of the House, that the Government are not seeking to pass this legislation except under compulsion, owing to the decree of the Privy Council, a statement for which there is no foundation in law.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I am sure the Minister of Finance did not intend to place in my mouth a statement which I never made, that the Bill would never get into committee. If the hon. gentleman thinks I made such a statement he has been misinformed. I never said anything of the kind, because we have always been anxious to go on with the Bill. But I said in this House last week and I said elsewhere that the Government have never been willing to go on with the Bill. They have pretended to be anxious to go on in committee, but they have been very glad to see motions made and have put up speakers to speak against time. Not more than two or three days ago when the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) spoke three hours, and I asked the hon. gentleman who is now in the Chair, and who was Chairman of the committee at that time, whether that hon. member was not obstructing. I asked the Chairman twice to call him to order, and he refused to do so ; he let him speak, as hon. gentlemen opposite and the Government were anxious to have him speak. Let me give another example to show that the Government are not anxious to proceed with the Bill and have never been anxious to do so. Two or three hon. members who voted for the second reading immediately afterwards announced that they had voted in the first place to sustain the Government, and in the second place because they had the assurance that they would never be called upon to vote upon the third reading of the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Names.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I will not give names.

Mr. DALY. You cannot do it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. My word must be taken as well as the affirmation of an. hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. OUIMET. One thing the hon. members will know, and that is to keep their mouths closed when they come near you.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I will not give names, but I repeat that they said they would never be called upon to vote on the second reading. I am told on reliable authority that one hon. member, who is now far distant was given his congé. He came here from British Columbia, and was told he could return, as he would not be called back and his vote not again required. All these facts show conclusively that the Government were not anxious to go on with the Bill. I think neither the House nor the country will take much stock in the speeches delivered every few hours by the leader of the House. I accuse the Government as regards this measure of hypocrisy, of dishonesty, and of having from the beginning sought to deceive not only the Catholic minority of Manitoba, but the Protestants and the people at large. Having made these statements I will now say a few words in French.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I do not wish to delay the progress of this measure, but I avail myself of this opportunity to state before the House and the country the exact position which the Liberal members from the province of Quebec occupy with regard to this Bill. We are charged by the Conservative press with improperly obstructing the measure before the House; we are accused of keeping away from the debate that is going on. The Government have appointed spies.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Yes, Mr. Chairman, they have appointed spies to take down the very hour and minute at which the Liberal members go home, either to take their meals or to rest, or even when they go out of the House, to answer the calls of nature. Mr. Chairman, I am bound to say that the Liberal members from Quebec are willing to work, but they want to work like intelligent and rational men. We are here from ten o'clock in the morning till two or three o'clock, and when, owing to the absence of the Ministers, as happened last night, when the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) and the Postmaster General (Sir A. P. Caron) were prominent by their absence, we can no longer make any progress with the Bill, and profitably debate the matter, then we act the part of all sensible men and retire for the night. I may say that the French Liberal members evince the utmost interest in the measure, and much more so than the Conservative members who spend their time here writing for the party organs abusive editorials against the Liberal members. Let me review the Conservative members who are present, thus evincing the interest they take in the Bill under discussion. Mr. Chairman, it is but half-past four in the afternoon, and if there is a time when we can work and debate a question like sensible men, it is surely the present time. Now, where are all the Conservative members from the province of Quebec? They are all prominent by their absence. But the Liberal members from Quebec, without a solitary exception, are ready to work and to assist the Government in perfecting this Bill, as we did last night and every night since the Bill is before the committee, provided it be during reasonable hours. But where are the Conservative members from the province of Quebec? How many are there now in the House? I am going to review the list of those hon. members and see how many will answer the call. I accuse the hon. Postmaster General (Sir A. P. Caron) and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) of having absented themselves last night without any excuse or necessity, thus delaying the debate. About midnight, they had left the House and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) had to take their place. And we were treated to a truly amusing performance when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce actually proposed an amendment which the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) declared he could not accept. The two Ministers were near coming to blows. They were not in earnest, however; for, like the augurs of old, they could not help smiling and winking at each other. Such is the way our French Canadian Ministers champion the interests of the Manitoba Catholic minority, and those of Catholics throughout the country. That is the way the Postmaster General and the Minister of Public Works discharge their duty towards the minority. The hon. Minister of Public Works who styles himself the champion of Catholic interests as well as his colleague, the Postmaster General are away from the House, instead of being here to protect the interests of those whose self-constituted champions they are. I grant that they may absent themselves for a few moments, but as the French Liberal members are charged with not remaining all the time in their seats, I do not see, at all events, why the hon. gentlemen should not be the first to set the example. At this time of speaking, where is the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) who, rose in his seat the other day at five o'clock in the morning, to address the House in French, when he knew that nobody here could understand him, and denounced the French Liberal members who were not in their seats; where is he now? Where is the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Blanchard)? Where is the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont)?

I do not accuse him, because I know he was here at two o'clock this morning, but I presume that, like other sensible men, he is gone to take a rest. Where is the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Fréchette), who would fain have all the members stay here day and night to no purpose? Where is the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard), who can do nothing else but play music? Where is the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Granbois), or rather where was he last night, when he should have been here working along with the rest of us? Where was, last night the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte)?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I was here in my seat.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) You have but just come in.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) No.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Where is the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle), that great champion of Catholic interests? Where is the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière)?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) Here I am.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The hon. member has just taken his seat. He was here, last night, I grant, but where has he been since?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) I spent the night here.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) That great champion of the Catholic minority also manages to absent himself from the committee. Where is the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Leclair), and the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Lépine)?

Mr. LECLAIR. (Translation.) Here.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The hon. member for Terrebonne is here now, but he was not here last night to take part in the debate on the Bill.

Mr. LECLAIR. (Translation.) I was here up to midnight, and this morning, I was back in my seat, at half-past eight.

Mr. LANGELIER. Midnight—that is the right time for honest people to retire.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Yes, it is the proper hour for well-behaved people to retire for the night. Where is the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier), and (Mr. Pope), that representative of a Catholic constituency? Where is the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte), who spends his time putting masks on the face of his friend, the member for Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard)? Where are they all? I have said enough, Mr. Chairman, to show how unfair are those Conservative organs, who charge us with being recreant to our duty when we are away from the House, at a time when all honest people are taking their rest, at a time when you meet on the street only people whose conduct is no credit to them. I have said enough to show how unfair is the proceeding of those Government spies who take down every absence of the Liberal members in order to make political capital out of that, at the next elections. The other day, as I said a few moments ago, the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) rose in his seat at five o'clock in the morning, taking advantage of our absence, to accuse us before the House and lead the country to believe that we are recreant to our duty from the fact that we are not here night and day. Why, then, I ask, is the hon. gentleman himself away from the House at such a reasonable hour as half-past four in the afternoon? These are the very men who accuse us of keeping away from the House. What a comedy! The French Liberal members are here, ready to go on with the discussion of the Bill, while most Conservative members are away. We are willing to work like sensible and responsible men, from ten o'clock in the morning until two or even three o'clock of the following day. But we think that after a fair day's work we are entitled to take a rest. Those all-night sittings are but a political contrivance and by no means calculated to further the progress of the Bill now before the House. The best argument that can be urged in support of the contention that we are willing to help the Government in making progress with the Bill is that we want the committee to go on and do business, and that we are in our seats when the time comes for us to work. Another proof that evinces our earnestness and our desire to press the passage of this measure is this : A few days ago I gave notice to the Government that I would bring up a matter of the utmost importance for the French minority, a question involving a principle of justice and fairplay which you, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Joncas), have advocated in the paper of which you are the editor, "L'Evenement," but which you have failed to advocate in this House, a question involving the rights and privileges of the French minority in this country. I refer to the superannuation of Mr. Catellier, the Assistant Secretary of State. I intended to bring up that question before the House, in order to protect the rights and privileges of my fellow-countrymen and to secure to the French minority their rightful share in the public patronage. I intended to enter my protest against the conduct of the Government in taking from us three of the five positions of deputy ministers which we had so far held. But in order not to interfere with the progress of the Remedial Bill, and to avoid doing anything that should take up a single moment of the time of the committee, I consented, at the request of my leader and his friends, to postpone the discussion of that matter. But I avail myself of this opportunity to tell the Government that I shall bring up that matter before the House at the earliest opportunity and that I intend to call them to account for their conduct. I intend to protest against the wrong perpetrated by the Government at the very moment when they would lead us to believe that they are anxious to protect the rights and privileges of the Manitoba minority. While pretending to pose as champions of the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, they trample under foot the rights and privileges of the French Canadian minority in this country. I shall avail myself at the earliest opportunity to vindicate the rights of my French Canadian compatriots and to call their attention to the treatment they are actually receiving at the hands of the Government. At the very moment when the Government would fool us into believing that they are anxious to protect the Catholic minority in Manitoba, they deprive here our compatriots of their rightful share of the public patronage. That is the reason why I arraign the Government on the ground of insincerity; that is why I charge them with hypocrisy and double-dealing, as evinced by their own conduct.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought my memory was probably correct when I said that the hon. member for Montmagny declared that the Government would not get into committee on the Bill, and so I threw out the suggestion. I find in "Hansard," on 19th March, that several members were speaking at a certain state of the debate, among them being the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRiviere). I find the following:—

> Mr. CHOQUETTE. It will never get to committee.
> Mr. LaRIVIERE. It will unless you prevent it.
> Mr. CHOQUETTE. We are willing that it should go to committee.

The hon. gentleman has also stated that Mr. McGillivray spoke three hours, and that he was put up by the Government for the purpose of obstruction. The time the member for North Ontario spoke was one hour and fifty minutes. In the twelve hours, during which Mr. McGillivray spoke one hour and fifty minutes was occupied by him, the hon. member for Ottawa spoke ten minutes, the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) spoke seven minutes, and the leader of the House one minute. All the rest of the time was taken up by opponents of the Bill, and during the twelve hours afterwards no speech was delivered by opponents of the Bill.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I said a moment ago that I had stated that the Bill would not get into committee: but it was only in a certain sense I meant it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will accept the hon. gentleman's statement; it was in Pick-wickian sense.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The idea was, that the Government would never get into committee owing to the way they were acting. When on the following day I saw that statement in "Hansard," I went to the hon. member for Provencher and said, "you know what I said, that the Government would never go into committee from the way they are acting." At the same time I asked him when he was correcting the matter to have a correction made. He said, yes. I said, "the way the Government is acting, they will surely never get into committee, because they are not acting honestly."

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I desire to offer a word of explanation. It is true the hon. gentleman came to me next day and asked me if when I was correcting proof I would add some words; but I declined adding anything the hon. gentleman never uttered.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You promised to add them.

Mr. CHARLTON. As no reference has been made in the statement of the leader of the House to the personal remarks he referred to at the opening of his remarks, I presume, on behalf of the Opposition, that there was no intention to question the hon. gentleman's statement made to the House, and I may say for myself individually that if he had added to the testimony a copy of the letter from the letter book of the department it would have been more satisfactory. If the hon. gentleman were present I would suggest that at a future day we should bring down a copy of the letter. The hon. leader of the House indulged in a speech which was temperate in its character, but in which his conclusions were entirely wrong. The leader of the House scouted the idea that there had been any hostile feeling towards Manitoba or any want of courtesy in the action of the Government in relation to Manitoba. I cannot agree with that statement. The remedial order, although he says it was not issued with haste and was duly considered, I venture to say was issued with undue haste. The Government failed to give Manitoba an opportunity properly to present its case when the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) appeared before the Privy Council as counsel for Manitoba and made the statement that Attorney General Sifton was engaged in leading the legislature in the absence through illness of Mr. Greenway, and that the session was expected to terminate in a few days, and asked a postponement of the hearing until the Attorney General could be present. That does not prove hostility, perhaps, but it proves hasty action. And it appears from the documents, which I shall not cite, that the Government had decided that their deliverance must be promulgated before the prorogation of the Manitoba legislature, in order to give that legislature a chance to act upon it. I think it is manifest from the documents that the remedial order and its character were foregone conclusions, and that it had been decided to issue it in time for the legislature to act upon it. That was the reason why Manitoba's representatives were denied the opportunity to appear before the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman tells us that the report of his commission has scattered to the winds all the statements of the leader of the Opposition as to the necessity of a committee of investigation. That commission having failed to reconcile matters, he says that its record is proof that the statements made by the leader of the Opposition with reference to a commission are delusions. Now, this Government did not proceed to negotiate with the Manitoba government in the spirit indicated by the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman has taken the position that this matter should be proceeded with cautiously, and that we should learn the sentiments of the people of Manitoba and the facts of the case by a full inquiry into the matter; and then we should use every means of conciliation possible to effect a settlement. If remedial legislation became necessary as a last resort, that would be a matter to be considered. I would ask if the statement made by the leader of the House that the commission appointed by his Government fulfilled the requirements made by the leader of the Opposition was a correct one. In no sense was it correct. The sending on of this commission to Manitoba was a perfect parody upon the advice of the leader of the Opposition. It is perfectly correct to say that had this question been taken hold of at the outset as advised by the leader of the Opposition, it would have been settled long ago. But, instead, the Government sought to force their views upon Manitoba, and they have failed. The leader of the House now says that rights granted by law at the time of the union were violated. This statement is incorrect. The decision in the Barrett case shows that no constitutional right was violated by the Act of 1890. Prior to the union they enjoyed the right to establish denominational schools and maintain them at their own expense. That right has not been interfered with. It is true, as the leader of the House says, that this Parliament may make remedial laws, but the Government had no authority to make a remedial order until the case had been carried to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and, as I previously pointed out, the decision went, to a certain extent, by default. The minority were represented by eminent counsel, Mr. Blake and Mr. Ewart. At the eleventh hour English barristers were asked to represent the Manitoba government, and these gentlemen did not understand the local conditions or the intricacies of the law on this subject. The leader of the House to-day took the position that the mandate to remedy these grievances had been issued by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The same statement has been made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) in his tour throughout Ontario. But that statement is wholly without foundation. I shall not read again the quotations on this subject read by the hon. member for North Simcoe, but I shall read one which he did not read. Mr. Blake, at the very end of the case, made this statement:

> Mr. BLAKE. What we ask your lordships is, what the privileges were and how far they have been infringed; and then we propose to ask the Governor General to determine how far he will go. I do not ask your lordship to make any suggestion as to his action, which I conceived from the beginning is political. He is to be instructed as to the law; and then his action and the action of the Parliament will carry the thing out.

It was stated both by Mr. Ewart and Mr. Blake that the action of the Governor General in Council would be political. It was stated by the lords of the Privy Council that it would be political. Therefore the statement of the leader of the House is entirely without foundation. The Governor General in Council could proceed in any way they liked. They could dismiss the case or they could propose to investigate the matter, or they could do as they have done, act hastily and injudiciously and issue such a remedial order as has been issued. Their action has been quite constitutional, but it is not calculated to secure a settlement of the difficulty. The hon. Minister of Finance says this is a question of policy. So it is. And the policy of the Government has been so to treat the question as to make political capital out of it, and to justify their action by making statements that are unfounded, as was the case with the leader of the House and the Minister of Finance to-day. It was stated by the leader of the House that the first intimation given that Manitoba was willing to negotiate was received just before the commission was sent. That was an astounding statement. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman professes to be a well-informed man or not. I do not know whether he has read the reply of Manitoba to the remedial order or not. But that contained the following paragraph:

> We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not available then to His Excellency, full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools.
> We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order. Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

How does the leader of the House reconcile the statement he has made with this reply of the Manitoba government to the first remedial order? Here they invite investigation and negotiation, and deprecate any action until further information is in the possession of this Government. The hon. gentleman further informs us that Manitoba made no objections to either of the remedial orders. This is another astounding statement. The Manitoba government refused to obey either of the remedial orders. Is not the refusal to obey an objection? They spurned these remedial orders and declared they could not and would not obey them for the reasons they gave. As to the misunderstanding, as the hon. gentleman called it, in regard to proceeding with the Bill while the negotiation was in progress, the hon. gentleman says that the proceeding with the Bill on Friday was perfectly proper under the circumstances. It is quite evident from the report that there was a clear understanding that the Remedial Bill should not be proceeded with until Tuesday while the negotiations were in progress. Here is the position of the matter. We were represented at Winnipeg by three commissioners, in a sense ambassadors. We were bound in honour to carry out their stipulations. They made an agreement that the Remedial Bill should be held in abeyance while the negotiations were in progress. The fact that this agreement was broken was called to the attention of our commissioners. They acknowledged the agreement, and said they had apprised their Government of it, and were surprised to find that it was not carried out. This circumstance in itself was enough to prevent an amicable arrangement. It showed disregard of our obligations. It was an act of bad faith—more, it was an act of consummate stupidity. It is said that our commissioners went as far as it was possible in order to settle the question. That depends upon their instructions. I admit that they went as far as their instructions would permit. Do the negotiations in Winnipeg lead us to believe that it was hopeless to work still for the solution of this difficulty? On the contrary, I think there is every reason to go on with the negotiations. The Manitoba commissioners told us that in every city and town outside of St. Boniface and Winnipeg, Roman Catholic children were attending public schools, and that if the people were left to themselves, there would be no desire for a change in the system. This statement was made upon the authority of two members of the Manitoba government. It is fair to presume that the members of the government understand pretty well the state of public opinion in Manitoba. It is a question of fact whether the children outside of St. Boniface and Winnipeg attend the public schools. It is a question of fact whether a spirit of contentment prevails. These facts should be known. Here we are within ten days of the end of the session without time to make an investigation so as to know whether we should proceed or not. We ought to make these investigations, we ought to ascertain whether this condition of things stated here is satisfactory to the Caholic minority. Then, we should take into consideration the proposals of the Manitoba government as to religious instruction in schools. Now, it is useless to suppose that these proposals would not, and could not, have been modified. They embrace a principle, and that principle could have been applied with modifications that would have made it satisfactory. At least, we could have ascertained whether the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, the Roman Catholic population in Winnipeg and St. Boniface, would have been satisfied with the concessions the Manitoba government proposed to make with regard to the school system of that province. We are led to understand that substantially the same condition of things exists in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and the North-west Territories; and, if a condition of things is satisfactory to the Catholics in three provinces and four territories, surely the same condition of things, with modifications to suit the circumstances of the case, could be made satisfactory to the Roman Catholics of Manitoba. The First Minister tells us that he proposes to respect the wishes of the minority, to champion their cause. Well, would it not be well to ascertain what the wishes of the minority are? No man supposes that this Bill is being urged through this House solely with the object of benefiting the Manitoba minority. The Government are accused, and I think justly accused, of moving in this matter for the purpose of obtaining political advantage; the Government are accused of caring very little of what the wishes of the Manitoba minority are. I think they should have adopted the wise and statesmanlike suggestion made by the leader of the Opposition, at the outset of this matter, that an investigation should be had, that we should know the circumstances of the case, that we should see whether arrangements could be made that would be satisfactory to all classes. I say that the wisdom of that suggestion becomes more and more patent every day we proceed in the consideration of this Bill. The proposals of our commissioners were given, but the hon. gentleman did not give the answer of the Manitoba commissioners. I think, however, the hon. gentleman, in giving the proposals made by the Dominion commissioners, should have referred at greater length than he did to the proposals of the Manitoba commissioners. The Manitoba commissioners seemed at the outset to say: We cannot accept your proposal, we cannot establish separate schools in Manitoba. We have had this question referred to the people very recently at the polls, and they have returned an overwhelming verdict against the establishment of separate schools. Now, placed in the position we are in, we cannot go altogether as far as you ask ; but we propose to give you substantially what you ask ; we propose to give to the Catholics of this province religious teaching in schools upon certain conditions. It was then the duty of the Dominion commissioners to have said : Well, this proposition is not sufficient in this respect or in that respect ; it might be modified ; we will consult the minority and see what would be satisfactory to them, and we will ask you to make such modifications as will be satisfactory to them and as may be required by them. We have reason to believe that the Manitoba government would have met them in that spirit, and I believe our commissioners should certainly have made an attempt to carry those negotiations further and to see if this vexed question could not be settled. We should not have presented our ultimatum, as we did, accompanied with the threat to force through the Remedial Bill.

Now, with regard to obstruction, and with regard to the article alluded to by the leader of the House in the Hamilton " Times," I think that warrants me in referring to another article which has reference to this same matter of obstruction. I find this statement made in the Montreal " Witness " of 13th April :

> Twelve of the one hundred and ten clauses of the Remedial Bill have been passed in committee of the whole as a result of the continuous day and night sittings of the House for a whole week. Two weeks of the life of this Parliament are left in which to pass the remaining ninety-eight clauses of the Bill, give it a third reading in the House of Commons, and pass it through all its stages in the Senate, where such a Bill cannot be railroaded through. Of course, the proper passage of the Bill in the time is a sheer impossibility ; there was not time, as the Government knew well enough, to get it through when it was first introduced, after two months of the session had been wasted in waiting the Government's convenience in introducing it. The Government never intended to pass the Bill, and they took good care to introduce it to Parliament at too late a date to make its passage possible. Mr. Angers, who, although he does not bring up his own family on the principle of the Bill, having his son at a Protestant school, seems to have been sincere in his purpose of having the Bill passed, has refused to go back into the Government, because he knew that the Government would not put the Bill through. Mr. Chapleau would not join the Government, because he was satisfied that they would not pass the Bill. " Let them pass the Bill and then we will help them in the fight in this province," he is reported to have said.
> The passage of the twelve clauses in a week as a result of the all day and night sittings is claimed as a triumph for Sir Charles Tupper's leadership by the Government organs. Had the House sat during the regular hours it is probable that about twenty or thirty of the clauses would have been passed after due consideration. The triumph of Sir Charles Tupper's leadership consists therefore in obstructing the progress of the Bill, while apparently pushing it by a resort to physical endurance in order to the manufacture of political capital in this province. We doubt whether anybody has been deceived but those who wish to be deceived into supposing that the Government has used this special session after the fashion best calculated to secure the passage of the Bill, whose passage would have wrecked them even more completely than its rejection. Sir Charles Tupper's methods of leadership are raw and crude in the extreme. He resorted to physical force under conditions which enabled half a dozen determined men of his own party, reinforced by half their own number of Liberals, to wear out easily the strength of the rest of the Conservative party. What has happened ? With an open bar in the buildings some of the Conservative members, forced to sit up day and night, have become irritable and demoralized, and have brought political ruin upon themselves and further weakness to their party by shameful and quarrelsome conduct in the House. The dissensions among the Conservatives have been embittered and rendered lasting. Sir Charles himself has made the mistake of allowing his temper to run away with him, and he has assailed one day the Conservatives who obstruct the Bill, and the next day the Liberals, who, he had declared the day before, had not obstructed, and in doing this has, of course, himself obstructed and wasted the time of the House, besides provoking obstruction. If such results show a triumph of leadership Sir Charles has won laurels. He has, at all events, afforded a complete contrast to Mr. Laurier's leadership, which the House and the country has noted.

But, with regard to these day and night sittings, it is hardly necessary to say that they are to the utmost extent demoralizing, that they prevent a fair consideration of the measure, and prevent fair progress. The orgies which have resulted from men being kept up all night and day, going down to the bar, and the resulting intemperance and unparliamentary and improper conduct, are talked of from one end of the Dominion to the other. The Government are responsible for this. I have under my hand a memorial addressed to Sir Charles Tupper by the Protestant Ministerial Association of Montreal, which I will read :

> That we hereby put on record our sense of shame and sorrow at the disgraceful conduct of certain members of the House of Commons during the debate in committee on the Remedial Bill as reported in the public press. The presence of intoxicated members in the House, the utterance of blasphemous language, the ridicule and sarcasm with which the Word of God was treated—all speak of a depth of degradation, which crimsons with shame the cheek of every self-respecting citizen of our beloved Dominion, and fills with sorrow and humiliation the heart of every Christian.
> That while no excuse can exonerate the individual members of the House, who have thus disgraced themselves and humiliated the people whom they represent, yet it is self-evident that the physical and mental strain inseparable from an enforced session of a week's duration without interruption, with the exception of a daily intermission of two hours for dinner, together with an > open bar for the sale of intoxicants, are the aggravating causes of the unhappy occurrences which to-day hold up our young Dominion to the pity, if not the scorn, of the civilized world, and whereby call upon the leader of the Government in the House, who is a medical doctor, and fully aware of the consequences of such a violation of natural law, to limit the daily sessions of the committee and the House to a period of time compatible with the laws of health, and with the mental conditions essential to the enactment of wise legislation.

> That we reiterate our protest against the passage of the proposed Remedial Bill for the reasons assigned in our resolutions of March 30. And in thus strongly opposing separate schools in which the doctrines and ritual of a particular church are taught, we refuse to be stigmatized as un-Protestant, un-charitable and un-Christian." Neither do we accept the position assumed by the advocates of remedial legislation that what the Roman Catholic hierarchy of the Dominion are exacting from the Federal Government is simply the privileges guaranteed to the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. The Protestant dissentient schools of this province are absolutely unsectarian. Will any one say that the schools of the proposed Remedial Bill are unsectarian ? Should the legislature of this province enact the Manitoba law of 1890, or the offer made to the Government commissioners by the representatives of the Manitoba government, we would hail with delight such a change in our school law—a change that would bring together during the hours allotted to the studies connected with a purely secular education, the children of Protestants and Roman Catholics, and thus break down the uncharitable and un-Christian wall which now separates them and which so seriously militates against the conditions of good citizenship ; and a change that would provide for religious instruction by qualified persons and of a character agreeable to the parents of the children concerned. We would respectfully remind those persons who plead for separate schools on the ground of consicence that religious teaching is one thing, and the teaching of the tenets, ritual and usages of a particular church is another thing ; and when the Roman Catholic hierarchy refuse to allow their people to agree with Protestants on a plan of religious exercises embracing the fundamentals of Christianity, and of Christian ethics common to and accepted by Protestants and Roman Catholics alike, the appeal to conscience is not an intelligent one, but is the offspring of bigotry, which is at once uncharitable, un-Christian and unpatriotic.

Now, I read this communication for the purpose of calling the attention of the Government to the opinions that are entertained by the Christian community as to their conduct in prolonging this sesion, and leading directly to these scenes of disorder. The opinions of these clergymen with regard to separate schools, while I felt bound to read the whole communication, are something, perhaps, not pertinent to the matter ; but the portions relating to the result of the day and night sittings are pertinent to the matter, and I recommend them to the consideration of my old temperance friend the Finance Minister.

Now, the leader of the House deprecates taking this question to the polls. Sir, the proper place to take this question is to the polls. The hon. gentleman is attempting to steal a march on public opinion by forcing this Bill through a House that was never elected upon this issue. This House was elected by people who knew nothing of this issue. This is a representative body. The members of this House represent the constituencies of the Dominion, and they are here to carry out the wishes of their constituents. This is a measure of vast importance to Canada. It will have a great influence upon the future of Canada, and it should be thoroughly considered, not by this House, but by the electorate of Canada. The electorate of Canada should consider this question, and should pass an opinion upon it, and give their mandate in each constituency as to the conduct they wish their representatives to take on this question. Whenever a Parliament fresh from the people is sent here by constituencies who have considered this question, then such Parliament will be in a position to deal with this question intelligently and properly. But we are not in that position now. We are within ten days of the close of this session, and thrice ten days would not suffice for a fair consideration of the remaining 100 clauses of this Bill. It is impossible to give it a fair consideration in the time at our disposal, and it is improper to force the Bill through this House. The Government may think that they can steal a march upon the people in regard to this matter, and pluck a verdict from this House. The question is one of the greatest national importance, and should be discussed and considered by the electorate of Canada at the polls. Now, the Secretary of State read to us a telegram from Archbishop Langevin, in which that prelate says that the Remedial Bill is satisfactory to the minority of Manitoba. Well, there is an occasional voice that comes from the minority in Manitoba who does not agree with that statement. For instance, hon. members will remember that a representative of the Irish Catholics in Manitoba appeared before the Privy Council, and stated that the people were satisfied with the public school law. My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McDonald), the other day, read a letter in the House from a Catholic in Manitoba, who said that the Remedial Bill was oppressive and unjust. He said that under this Bill five families can establish a separate school in a district, it may be a district where there are ten families. It will cost $500 to build a schoolhouse, or $50 to each family, and it will cost $300 a year to maintain a school, or $30 for each family ; and he considers this would be a most burdensome taxation, and would prefer to send his children to the public schools. This committee cannot proceed with too much caution and deliberation in dealing with a measure of such vast importance. If this Bill is passed, the result is almost certain to be an increase of agitation, an increase of bitterness, and it will tend to widen the gap that already exists between the two classes. The passing of this Bill may create so great a feeling of dissatisfaction and bitterness in Manitoba as, possibly, to result in secession. We have no business to confront such a danger, we have no business to invite such a disaster. It is unstatesmanlike and unpatriotic to take action that may result in that way. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance descanted at some length upon the admission made by the leader of the Opposition, when he was illustrating the danger and impropriety of hasty legislation by saying that it was the undoubted intention of those who framed the Manitoba Act, that it should secure separate schools to the minority; and the Minister of Finance based upon that an argument in favour of pursuing the course that the Government has entered upon. It may have been the intention of the framers of the Act to do so, but the question is, what is the character of the law? We may speculate as to what the intention was, but that is not a subject on which to base action. The question is, what does the law require, what is its character, and what our course should be?

The hon. gentleman accuses the leader of the Opposition with having refrained from making any attempt to perfect the Bill, and it has also been intimated that the leader of the Opposition has not been present to engage in the discussion and make suggestions, and has not taken any interest in amending the Bill so as to make it workable. It is true the hon. gentleman has not been here twenty-four hours out of twenty-four hours, but he has been present as long as the Minister of Finance, the leader of the Government, or the Minister of Justice. He has given as much attention to the Bill in committee as any member on the Ministerial benches. My hon. friend the member for Quebec East is not called upon to perfect this crude measure; it would be inconsistent with his position. In his opinion, consideration of the Bill is premature. We have not reached, in his opinion, the stage to consider the Remedial Bill for the purpose of forcing on Manitoba a system of separate schools. His position is that we should commence de novo, and endeavour by consultation and conciliation to bring the parties together. He asserts that this measure is premature, and that no benefit can result from forcing a measure on the minority. The Minister of Finance says this legislation has been brought down by the Government in a spirit of truth and honesty. I wish I could believe that such was the fact, that such intention actuated the Privy Council of Canada when it passed the remedial order, when it gave the member for North Simcoe three or four days to send to Winnipeg and obtain the necessary documents, when the Privy Council refused an adjournment to permit the Attorney General of Manitoba to be present at the hearing, when the Privy Council adopted the remedial order, when the Government called Parliament together on 2nd January for the purpose of holding a session to pass this Remedial Bill. All these facts combine to contradict the statement of the Finance Minister that the action of the Privy Council was taken in truth and honesty. This legislation was introduced for the purpose of securing a political advantage, for the purpose of appealing to religious and racial feelings, and for the purpose of securing the support of one of the great provinces of the Dominion. The Finance Minister claimed that it was necessary that Parliament should take action, that they had a mandate from the Privy Council. On his tour through Ontario, the statement was that the Government was under the necessity of taking the matter up as a question of policy. The Finance Minister said the leader of the Opposition based his whole argument upon the alleged garbled telegram from Mr. Greenway. That is a most disgraceful transaction. If the leader of the House was not warranted in producing that telegram, he should not have done so; if he did so without consulting the sender, he should have given it entire. The telegram, as printed, was calculated to convey a false impression, and the offence was continued by its production in the same form in the correspondence published. With respect to the charge that the Opposition resorted to obstructive tactics before the Bill was introduced, it must be remembered that members on the Government side occupied more time in the Budget debate than members of the Opposition. I spoke to the whip of the Opposition party, intimating that I wished to speak on the Budget, but at his request I refrained from doing so. The Government showed no disposition to close the debate, which ran on without any attempt being made to check it, and I believe it was deliberately done in order to postpone the introduction of the Remedial Bill. The leader of the House has declared it is of great importance that the Remedial Bill should pass this session, and that it is unpatriotic to oppose it. I assert, on the contrary, that it is of great importance to Canada that the Bill shoud not become law, that this hasty legislation should not be passed through the House during the last ten days of this Parliament, that injustice would be done, and more harm than good would result. Let the people of the country express their opinion on it, and when this has been done, we can act intelligently on the question. Let us reverse our steps and ascertain whether the minority of Manitoba have any substantial grievance, what are their wishes, and what will satisfy them. Let us exhaust all methods before we arrive at the conclusion that we must coerce the province. We are doing now what should be done as a last resort. We are commencing with coercion; we have the cart before the horse. I believe this House would not be justified during these last ten days of this Parliament to push forward this Bill, that any such action would mean an attempt to steal a march on public opinion, that the Bill should be withdrawn and an appeal made to the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not rise for the purpose of answering the hon. gentleman, but to refer to one point to which I attach a great deal of importance. The hon. gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to some resolutions arrived at by the Protestant Ministerial Association of Montreal, in which they put on record this statement :

> That we hereby put on record our sense of shame and sorrow at the disgraceful conduct of certain members of the House of Commons during the debate in committee on the Remedial Bill, as reported in the public press. The presence of intoxicated members in the House, the utterance of blasphemous language, the ridicule and sarcasm with which the Word of God was treated—all speak of a depth of degradation which crimsons with shame the cheek of every self-respected citizen of our beloved Dominion, and fills with sorrow and humiliation the heart of every Christian.

That is the point to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. I say there is no one act of hon. gentlemen opposite that I think is more to be deprecated and deplored than the foundation which was given by hon. gentlemen opposite for this statement. I have had the honour of being a member of every Parliament from confederation down to the present day, and I am here to say in the face of this House and the country that I have never, during the whole period since 1867, seen the representatives of Canada in Parliament assembled more controlled by a sense of due decorum. I have never seen less of intoxication or drinking in any Parliament from confederation down to the present day than during the present session. I feel it is a gross wrong to this House, it is a gross wrong to this country and to every hon. member in this House to utter a single word that is calculated to sink the country in the eyes of people outside who do not think of us as being in a state of degradation. I say every word uttered by any hon. gentleman that is unfounded in truth, and calculated to lower the position of Canada, is a word that is to be deprecated in the strongest possible way. I had the pleasure of meeting, on the floor of this House, a distinguished stranger, a man of great ability and experience, Sir Cecil Graham, who for many years was secretary to the late Lord Carnarvon, and that gentleman told me he had visited all the capitals of Europe, and had attended the legislative assemblies ; moreover, that he had just spent three weeks in Washington attending the sittings of the Senate and House of Representatives in the United States, and he had just spent three months in Canada attending the debates in the House of Commons. He said : "I have no hesitation in saying that Canada possesses the second deliberative assembly in the world, there is no Parliament in the world, except that of the United Kingdom, that occupies the high position of the Parliament of Canada." We all deplore the fact that during this session, two hon. members, most amiable gentlemen, and probably there are no two hon. members in this House whose orderly conduct is generally greater and whose self-respect is greater than those two hon. gentlemen to whom I allude, on one or two occasions were seen in this House under the influence of intoxicating drink. But I may say with respect to one of those hon. gentlemen that he had just risen from a severe illness, and I presume a very small amount of stimulant affected him ; but that hon. gentleman, in fact, both hon. members, have been long members of this House. They have, by their conduct, entitled themselves to the respect and good feeling of every hon. member on both sides of the House, and no one can deplore more than I do that either hon. gentlemen fell into that position for a single moment. That is not one per cent of hon. members of this House, and to blacken and brand the character of this House because less than one per cent of its members on one or two occasions unfortunately took too much stimulant, is an act for which no hon. gentleman has any reason to plume himself. I say that the honour and the character of the country ought to demand that hon. gentlemen in their exertions to make party capital should not be led into making extravagant statements of this kind, that have no foundation in truth, or a foundation small and insignificant, but they are broadly stated so as to be accepted by clergymen and others who do not understand the true facts. I hold it is a gross injustice to the present Speaker of this House. The present Speaker has done more than any Speaker who has ever presided over the House of Commons of Canada to restrict within close rules the restaurant in which refreshments are obtained by hon. members. The dignity of this House has never been maintained more thoroughly than by the present Speaker, and I say that the hon. gentleman, having taken the measures he has adopted, they being more strict and effective than any adopted by his predecessors, it is a gross injustice to lead the public, who are ignorant on this subject, to imagine that there is a restaurant in this House that is the scene of disgraceful orgies. I have had occasion, especially during the late sittings, to take refreshment in the restaurant at very late hours, and I have never seen those orgies. I nave never seen a man in that restaurant under the influence of stimulants ; I have seen very little intoxicating drinks taken by any one, and, from my own personal testimony, therefore, I can vindicate the House from the gross and unfounded asperison that has been so generally and broadly cast upon it. I draw the attention of the House to this matter because it is very wrong for any person to mislead those clergymen, who, of course, have the very best possible intentions, but who, with the best possible intentions are branding their country, on false premises, with an obloquy that will extend all over the civilized world. Now, Rev. Dr. Mackay, I think it is, has made, in the pulpit, statements that I am sure he will deplore to the last hour of his life, when he finds how grossly he has been deceived and misled. He has stated that the Government of this country spent $25,000 in connection with the ball which was given recently by His Excellency. I state that the Government has not spent a dollar, but that the entire expenditure was borne by His Excellency. I had not the pleasure of being present, as many hon. gentlemen opposite were, but I am told that the ball was a model of decorum, a model of good taste, and reflected the highest credit possible upon the distinguished lady who organized that historic representation. To charge, in a matter connected with the very head of the Government and the head of society in the Dominion, that there were disgraceful scenes, that vice and immorality were perpetrated in connection, with it, I say is the most monstrous statement that it is possible to conceive. My hon. colleague the Minister of Public Works tells me that not one hour's work was performed on the Sabbath by any person connected with the Public Works Department, and yet this gentleman freely charges this Government with desecrating the Sabbath and spending $25,000 upon this ball, while my hon. friend (Mr. Ouimet) tells me that the putting in of a few planks for a floor which had been paid for by the Governor General, to support the end of the floor, and which required a few hours' work of 4 or 5 workmen, was all that was done by the Public Works Department. It is monstrous to have these false, malicious statements bandied about the country. Such things are demoralizing. Wherever they are believed, they are calculated to lower the character of Canada and Canadians all over the world. I say it is too bad to have any support given to statements that are so destitute of the truth and so calculated to deceive and mislead the people.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With one part of the hon. gentleman's remarks I quite agree, and that is in the statement which he made that, undoubtedly, it was a most unfair and improper thing to charge their Excellencies with having expended public money in the social event that recently aroused such favourable comment, or in insinuating, directly or indirectly, that any impropriety had occurred of the kind referred to. But I am not prepared to exonerate the leader of the House and the Government generally from responsibility for grave impropriety in the conduct of the affairs of this House. There is no doubt that when the Government choose to set all rules of health and reason at defiance, to keep the House for 120 hours, or more, constantly in session, they certainly offer a very considerable premium on immorality and do place very great temptation in the way of their own followers to exceed. It is true that the scenes we have witnessed in this House have not been, I am glad to say, by any means as bad as I recollect witnessing under some of the hon. gentleman's predecessors. There has been a great improvement in the sobriety of this House within the last ten, or fifteen, or twenty years. But, had the leader of the House been in his place, as we were in our places, during the long hours of last week, he would have seen that, if not carried to the extent supposed, there was still very considerable cause, on several occasions, for some of the strictures that have been made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes—very considerable cause. I myself have, on several occasions, seen hon. gentlemen in this House very much the worse for liquor. And I say that the Government of Canada, who have kept this House in session day and night for an entire week, are most justly held responsible for it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT Yes. And while I entirely acquit Mr. Speaker of any responsibility, and while I think that the warning which was given in the early part of the week, did prevent the repetition of certain scenes which took place during the long sitting of thirty nine hours which attended the second reading of this Bill, no thanks for it were due to the Government of the day. Now, there was one part of the resolution of the reverend gentlemen specially addressed to the Secretary of State. They were perfectly right in telling that hon. gentleman that, being himself a medical man, he ought to know that he has been guilty of an act which is wholly and entirely opposed to the rules of health and to the dictates of common sense. It is utterly impossible for us to conduct our business properly while we are kept here for the entire week, no opportunity being given to have this chamber ventilated or put in proper order. The hon. gentleman knows that. He knows that mischievous results are almost sure to follow. He knows that mischievous results have followed. And he talks about this being the second deliberative assembly in the British Empire. I think——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In the world.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All the more shame to us, then, for having set such an example to the rest of the world of such stupid, mischievous folly as that for which the hon. leader of the House is directly responsible. He has broken the record; he has disgraced Canada; he and his Government have shamed Canada. There is no doubt that we shall be a by-word for stupidity and folly, from one end of the civilized world to the other. And what has he gained by it ? What he hopes to gain, I suppose, is the paltry advantage of trying to hold my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) and some of his followers responsible for this Bill not having got through. But, as has been pointed out many times on the floor of this House, if the hon. leader of the House and his colleagues had had any honest desire to put the Bill through, it would have been on the Table of the House on the 2nd January ; it would have been proceeded with as soon as the Address was disposed of. And, what is more, if the hon. gentleman's colleagues—they are perhaps more responsible in this respect than he, as he did not join them until after the 2nd of January—had had any honest desire to put the measure through, they would have at once communicated with the Manitoba government in July or August last and held an autumn session. They knew perfectly well that if they attempted to put through a measure of this kind in a session which they knew—or ought to have known, because any lawyer of the slightest repute could have told them—ended on the 24th April, that it would be possible to block the Bill. But the Bill was not printed until well into the second month of the three. They did not propose the second reading until about the 3rd of March, and they did not introduce it into committee until the first week of April, or thereabouts. They knew that it was utterly impossible for such a measure to have a chance of passing. This has been pointed out again and again. But when these statements are made by hon. gentlemen, it becomes our duty to re-emphasize the point, that, under similar conditions, with a measure in the British Parliament, it is not ten or fifteen days that they devote to the Bill in committee, but a matter of forty or fifty days. They do not bring forward Bills of this magnitude, as these hon. gentlemen have done, at the eleventh hour. They lay them on the Table in printed form, at the earliest date, and they take care that they shall be presented in such time as shall allow full and ample discussion. But, suppose that the hon. gentlemen were honest in this matter, that does not in the least degree exonerate the leader of the House from the charge of bullying and bulldozing this House in attempting to force the Bill through by means which none of his predecessors, far better tacticians and strategists than himself, ever undertook. By his own act he has made it impossible to pass this Bill. If he had proceeded in a discreet and sensible manner, the Bill would have made three or four times the progress it has made. But when the hon. gentleman comes here and dares to tell the Opposition : You must pass that Bill, or you shall be kept sitting in Parliament from Monday afternoon until Saturday night, every man who has the spirit of a man at once resents the threat. Every man who is fit to sit in a free Parliament, must resent such bullying. The hon. gentleman had no right to adopt any such tone to us. The hon. gentleman has acted in the most indiscreet and foolish manner, and he has now brought himself to such a pass that it is utterly impossible for him, except by grace of the Opposition, to conduct any business to a termination. Does the hon. gentleman know that we have only six days left for Government business ? For the hon. gentleman has not got Wednesday yet ; it belongs to us, nominally.

An hon. MEMBER. He will take it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He will take it, but he will not get any good out of it. He is in the position of the dog in the manger. He cannot use the day himself, and he will not let us have it for any useful purpose. These six days, though sufficient, are barely sufficient to put through the Supplementary Estimates. And I wish to call his attention to this that, when he gets the Supplementary Estimates, he must take concurrence, and that after that he must have another day's sitting to pass the Supply Bill itself. It must be apparent to him that it is utterly impossible for him to get this Manitoba Schools Bill through, and his duty, under these circumstances, is plain and clear. His duty is to cease this absurd pretense, which can deceive nobody, that he and the Government are going to spend all the miserable remnant of time there is, for the purpose of passing this Bill. They know they can do nothing of that kind. They know that the only thing they can do is, perhaps, impede the public service, and fritter away the little time that remains, instead of devoting it to the absolutely necessary business of the House. I may remind the hon. gentleman that it is not possible for him now, under the present circumstances, to make use of Governor General's warrants, after this House rises. The Governor General's warrant can only be used, as the hon. gentleman knows, for the purpose——

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to express in the strongest manner possible my protest against the unjustifiable and unfounded aspersions which have been cast upon parliamentary institutions by certain clergymen throughout this country. Although I do not for a single moment, impugn the motives of these reverend gentlemen, although I must assume that in making the statements and remarks they did respecting scenes alleged to have taken place in this Parliament, they were actuated by proper motives and a desire to promote public morality, yet I may be pardoned if I suggest to these reverend gentlemen that truth is quite as essential to the promotion of public morality as sobriety ; and when I point out to you certain statements which have been made by those reverend gentlemen and contrast them with the facts, I think the committee will agree with me that although these gentlemen may not have wilfully misrepresented the facts, they have, at all events, made statements which are not founded on facts. I find in the newspapers during the present week the following statement alleged to have been made by the Rev. Dr. Saunders, pastor of the Dominion Methodist Church in this city, on Sunday evening last, with reference to the proceedings in this House. The reverend gentleman is reported to have said :

> Those scenes—orgies, some one has called them—which have taken place of late in the House of Commons, seemed to be the results of having a bar-room so convenient. They are a disgrace to Parliament, a disgrace to the land, and I trust this is the last session that a bar-room will be tolerated in any house of parliament in the land.

Then the Ministerial Association of Montreal, in the resolutions which they passed at their last monthly meeting, alleged that :

> An open bar for the sale of intoxicants within the precincts of this House is one of the aggravating causes of the unhappy occurrences which to-day hold up our young Dominion to the pity, if not the scorn, of the civilized world—and so on.

Then, again, the Rev. Dr. McKay, to whom reference was made by the hon. leader of this House, made this statement :

> The existence of a bar-room in our House of Commons will not be denied by any one. It is not, however, generally known that it is an unlicensed place, carried on at the expense of the country, and conducted in a way that would disgrace any ordinary bar-room in the land.

Sir, the statement that there is a bar-room in the precincts of this House, carried on at the expense of the country, is well known to every hon. member to be wholly unjustified by the facts. No such institution, if I may so call it, exists within the precincts of this House. It is quite true that there is not a licensed bar-room within the precincts of this House. I may say that some three years ago one of the license commissioners of this city suggested to me that a license should be taken out for the sale of liquor in the restaurant down-stairs, and I promptly refused to allow any such thing to take place. I did so for two reasons. In the first place, if we are to have a restaurant here at all for the accommodation, comfort and convenience of the members of this House, it must, from my point of view, be based on the club system ; that is to say, we are not to be supposed, for a single moment, to permit the sale of refreshments within the precincts of this House to any person but the members who are entitled to have access to the restaurant. And I may say that the rules and regulations, which I shall take the liberty of reading to the committee, which have been laid down for the guidance of the restaurant-keeper, are very stringent. The rules are as follows :—

* * * * * * *

> No strangers are to be admitted unless accompanied by a Member and as guests.
> No clerks in the service of the House are to be admitted except those having the rank of chief clerk.
> There is to be no bar on the premises, drinks only to be served in the various rooms fixed for that purpose, and on no consideration is wine or liquor to be given or sold to any messenger or servant in the employ of either House.

* * * * * * *

> The restaurant will be opened every day at eight o'clock a.m., and closed at midnight, provided the House does not sit until after that hour, in which case the restaurant will be closed half an hour after adjournment.
> Members of the "Hansard" staff and the Press Gallery will be admitted as heretofore. This privilege to be personal.
> Certified correct,
> HENRY R. SMITH,
> Serjeant-at-Arms.
> Ottawa, 14th April, 1896.

So that it will be seen that, under these regulations, the restaurant-keeper is absolutely debarred from selling refreshments of any kind whatsoever to any person except those entitled to have access to the restaurant. Members of the House may, if they choose, take their friends to the restaurant as their guests, but those guests are not allowed to purchase refreshments of any kind from the restaurant-keeper. For two reasons, I refused absolutely to allow the restaurant-keeper here to adopt the suggestion that was made by the license commissioner of this city. The first was that the restaurant in this House should be conducted as a club ; and in the second place, I objected strongly to the public scandal that would be created if a licensed saloon for the sale of liquors were permitted to be carried on within the precincts of this House. Therefore, I say those statements which were made—unwittingly made, no doubt—by those gentlemen are not based on fact and ought to be entirely withdrawn, now that the reverend gentlemen who made them know that the facts are not such as they have stated them to be. I have been a member of this House for twenty-two years, and during the whole of that period I have come to the conclusion that the number of gentlemen who are assembled here together, and who are subjected to the great strain which is being put upon them through long sittings and various other causes, conduct themselves quite as respectably as any assemblage of gentlemen of the same number in any part of this Dominion. I may say with regard to the present session that notwithstanding the great strain put upon members, I have not been able to detect that there has been any greater violation of the rules of sobriety during this session than there was during the previous sessions in which I have had the honour of a seat in this House. And as the gentlemen who sit here represent the people of the Dominion, any reflection that is cast upon the conduct and honour of those gentlemen is, to a very great extent indeed, a reflection upon the whole people. Those reverend gentlemen who have made these misstatements, unwittingly no doubt, still just with as great disaster to the people, whose honour is impugned and whose sobriety is impugned, as if they had been based upon a most complete set of facts, should the moment these facts are made known to them, take the earliest opportunity in their power to dissipate the misrepresentations which they have cast broadcast through the press on the people of this country with reference to the conduct of their representatives within the precincts of this House.

Mr. LAURIER. It may not be out of place that I should also refer to the remarks made by the hon. leader of the House before dinner, and I do so all the more willingly that I am disposed to agree to a large extent in his remarks and those of Mr. Speaker. I especially agree in every word that has been said with regard to the ball which was given at the opening of the session by the Governor General. Everybody who was at this ball knows that the remarks wich have been made in certain quarters, especially by certain reverend gentlemen, were most uncalled for and most unjust. Everybody who was present knows that it was a function, not only of a high aesthetic character, but one against which, from the point of view of morality and sobriety, not the slightest criticism could be offered. It is only fair and due to the character of the gentleman and lady who entertained their guests on that occasion that we should take this opportunity of denying these assertions. With regard to the character of this House, I was particularly pleased to hear that so high a character has been given to it as was given by Sir Cecil Graham. I think everybody in this House can, without undue boasting, say that he belongs to an honourable, an able and respectable body. I am glad to say that, as far as my experience goes, I have observed that the decorum maintained in this House has never been, perhaps, at a higher level than it has been this session. I have been in this House the same number of years as you, Mr. Speaker, have—twenty-two years; and those of us who were here in those former days and are here to-day can render this testimonial to the House of to-day that. without at all disparaging the House of former days, it is, in so far as decorum is concerned, as high if not at a higher level than it was when you, Mr. Speaker, and I entered the House. Concerning the remarks which have been made about the proceedings of this House, we can all agree that the usual decorum of this House was not the same standard last week as it is generally. This has to be acknowledged. I do not say that in any spirit of fault-finding, because it was unavoidable that being forced, as we have been, to sit for six long days without intermission, the decorum should be somewhat lowered from its usual tone. There are, after all, physical laws as well as moral laws, and these physical laws cannot be violated without the result being manifest at once. We have seen that, and I believe that is the utmost we have seen, but that we have seen it is unfortunately to be admitted by every one who looks at this matter impartially.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to make a few remarks in connection with this matter, because my own observation very largely agrees with those of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken. Circumstances may have happened which would not be referred to with pride, and might be referred to with some regret; but from my personal observation, I am prepared to say that many of the reports which have grown as they gained distance from the capital, circulated in the press, are greatly exaggerated. As far as my observation goes, I believe that an equal number of gentlemen cannot be gathered together in this Dominion whose average record could be exceeded for all those high rules of conduct, particularly with reference to the subject of temperance, which we look to be observed by a representative assembly. I have urged here the passage of a measure which is ultra in its character and receives the support of a considerable body in this country; and it has always been a pleasure to me to insist that the impression which some of the friends of the temperance cause seem to entertain, that the tone of the House of Commons is personally of a kind which would be very distasteful to the teetotal element of the country, are greatly exaggerated beyond what the facts would warrant. There have been some occurrences which a large number of the members have regretted, but I do not think it fair to charge upon the whole assembly as such any great responsibility for any such occurrences on the part of a very few persons. I have personally refrained from taking any part in the discussion on the propriety or impropriety of having a restaurant for the sale of liquors in this House, because I did not want it to appear that I was putting myself forward offensively in connection with that matter, owing to my having the honour of promoting a measure connected with the subject of temperance. I believe that if the matter were put fairly before the House, a large majority of the members would approve of still greater restrictions on the sale of intoxicating liquors in the restaurant of this House and would go so far as to support its abolition. If there is a shadow thrown over us as a body, that may be an additional argument for members to agree to restrict or banish altogether the sale of intoxicating liquors in our precincts. I am glad to give my personal testimony that, as far as my observation goes, the remarks made by the Ministerial Association and some clergymen have arisen from a false and exaggerated view of the actual circumstances of the case.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I have now been here nearly ten years, and I am happy to be able to say that there has been very little drinking among the members of this House during that time. I think I can safely say that probably three-fourths of the members do not touch liquor at all, and considering the strain on our physical energies to which we have been submitted and are being submitted through these continuous sittings, there is very little indulgence indeed in intoxicating liquors. I really do not wonder that those who take an occasional drink should go to a little excess under the extreme physical pressure which has been put upon them during the last two weeks. There is a wrong impression abroad that the members of Parliament are a drunken lot. I do not believe you could gather together in any section of the country 215 men, standing such physical strain, who would drink less than the members of this House. But I certainly think it would be to our credit if we would agree to abolish the restaurant altogether, and thus remove the impression abroad that there is more excess committed in the precincts of the House owing to the restaurant than really is the case. Therefore, when we meet again after the session—probably many of the present members may not be present—I think it would be well to take the matter up and abolish the restaurant altogether, rather than that we should rest under the imputation we are now under. These reverend gentlemen were sincere no doubt in passing that resolution, but they gathered the information without seeing, or knowing personally what took place, and from exaggerated accounts which appeared. I take this occasion to express my high regard for the sobriety and the good conduct of my fellow-members in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am very glad that the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) has brought this matter up. I fully endorse every single word he said with regard to the propriety and good conduct of the members of this House. For fifteen years I have had the honour of a seat here, and for thirty years of public life in county councils and other associations, I never had the pleasure of being associated with more sober and better conducted men than the members of this House of Commons. I was very sorry when I noticed the utterances of some clergymen, in the papers, on this question. I may say, on behalf of the Rev. Mr. McKay, of Woodstock, that I know him very well, and I am quite sure that he would not have made these remarks if he did not gather some data upon which he thought he was justified in using the language he did. Some person must surely have misled him, or that reverend gentleman would never have made the statement he did. I earnestly hope that this little occurrence will be a warning, not only to him, but to all others, that they should not cast reflections upon members of Parliament, without making sure, in the first place, that the information upon which they base those imputations is accurate. I can also say on behalf of the servants of this House, on behalf of the "Hansard" staff, and on behalf of the members of the Press Gallery, that they are all gentlemen who behave becomingly and properly, and that they are just entitled to the certificate of good conduct as are the members of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to the discussion of the motion now before you, I wish to ask the leader of the House if he will do me the courtesy to reply to a question that I am about to put to him. A letter which I hold in my hand has been addressed by the organizer of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario to Mr. Belyea, a friend of mine, in the North Riding of Bruce, which he has forwarded to me, and given me permission to use. I will read the letter :

Ottawa, 8th April, 1896.

Dear Sir,—As, no doubt, you will have observed in the public papers, a serious difficulty has arisen between the member for your riding and the Government, and present indications are that he will go into permanent opposition to the Administration. I will be glad, therefore, to have your views upon the matter and your opinion of the future of the Conservative party in your riding. I shall return to Toronto by the end of the week.

Mr. WALLACE. Whose signature is to that letter ?

Mr. McNEILL. It is signed by Robert Birmingham. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman who leads the House (Sir Charles Tupper) whether he approves of that letter ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no hesitation in saying to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) that I have no knowledge of any such letter having been sent. I have never given any countenance to anything of the kind, nor has it had my approval in any way whatever. I had no knowledge that anything of the kind had been done.

Mr. McNEILL. I would ask the hon. gentleman to say whether he approves of the letter ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

An hon. MEMBER. You heard enough.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has informed me that he knew nothing of it, and that it had not his approval before it was written. I want to know whether he approves of it now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I may go so far as to say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) that I think it would be extremely difficult for him to drift so far away as to join the Opposition, holding the strong views he does on the National Policy. The hon. gentleman can hardly expect me to say more than that.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman does not say that he does not approve of the letter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. EDGAR. One conclusive reason has been ureged against the passage of this Bill, and that reason has never been answered. I do not say that because this is a moribund Parliament, it cannot legislate under any circumstances. Supposing, Sir, this to be a moribund Parliament, but suppose that it still had a distinct mandate from the people to legislate in a particular way, it might be its duty to legislate in that direction, no matter how moribund it might be. But, what has been pointed out several times, and what has not been answered, is the fact that this Parliament has no mandate from the people to pass a Remedial Bill. In 1891 the reasons given for dissolution had nothing to do with remedial legislation. It was announced that Parliament had dissolved then because it was necessary to get the opinion of the people of Canada on the question of reciprocity with the United States. In the address of the Prime Minister in 1891, you do not find a single allusion, directly or indirectly, to the Manitoba school question. Remember, Sir, that the Manitoba School Act had then been passed for more than a year, and that the time for the disallowance of the Act had lapsed. It apparently was not considered a matter of sufficient importance to mention in the Prime Minister's address in 1891. Therefore, Sir, this Parliament is entirely without a mandate to deal with the question. The Secretary of State has referred to the vast importance of this measure, and it is its very importance which disqualifies this Parliament from dealing with it without a mandate from the people. I want to quote to the leader of the House, and to the Conservative party, an authority on that point, which they will not venture to dispute. In the whole of this century there is not a name in the British Empire which the Conservative party have so delighted to honour, as that of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield. In 1868 Mr. Gladstone proposed to deal with the question of the Irish Church, a question parallel to the one we are now considering, a question more or less affecting the religious feelings of a portion of the people of the Kingdom, as this affects the feelings of a portion of the people of the Dominion. In 1868, just as they were beginning to see another election looming up, Mr. Gladstone brought in resolutions on which to found the Bill for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and Mr. Disraeli then said in the English House of Commons, on the 3rd of April, 1868:

> I deny the moral competence of this House of Commons to enter on a discussion of this question with a view to its settlement. I do not—as the right hon. gentleman the other night stated—I do not resist the motion on the ground that this was what he called a moribund Parliament. Nothing of the kind. Although this might be the last session of the present Parliament, and although when an election takes place for a future Parliament, the appeal may be made to a larger constituency, I do not for a moment bring forward this circumstance as the basis of the argument, that this House was not morally competent to deal with the question. I resisted it precisely for another reason. I said that when a fundamental law of the country was called into question——

As in this case, Mr. Chairman.

> ——though technically and legally this House had a right to do anything within the sphere of the House of Commons, it was not morally competent to decide such a question, if those who elected it had not in the constitutional course of our public life, received some intimation that such a question was to come before it. That is what I said.

Then he adds:

> I appeal to the programme of the Prime Minister of the time, who recommended the dissolution of the Parliament, and explained his policy to the country. There is not the slightest allusion to the state of the Irish Church in that programme.

Now, I could paraphrase these words by saying that in the address of the Prime Minister when the preceding Parliament was dissolved, and when this Parliament was elected, there was not the slightest allusion to the Manitoba school question. I therefore quote this authority, which cannot be repudiated or denied by the Conservative party, as a sufficient reason why this House should pause in attempting to enact legislation on this vastly important point, when the question has never been submitted to the people for consideration. In fact, the contrary is the case. And, in the few elections which have been held since the Remedial Bill was threatened by this Government, Montreal Centre, Cardwell, Jacques Cartier, and even North Ontario; they have shown a distinct majority against the announced policy of this Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What about Cape Breton and Northumberland?

Mr. EDGAR. In these cases the majorities were the same as before, but in the other cases the majorities were enormously reversed.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Wait until you see the next election.

Mr. EDGAR. I admit that the Secretary of State went to Cape Breton, and with all his prestige as the coming Prime Minister, which I suppose will be realized before many days, he carried that county, but not by an increased majority.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, an increased majority.

Mr. EDGAR. I think it was less than Mr. McKeen's majority.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, larger.

Mr. LAURIER. There is not much to boast of any way.

Mr. EDGAR. In North Ontario in 1891, the majority in favour of the Government candidate, Mr. Madill, was 254, and in 1895 the Government candidate was in a minority of 337, and both of the candidates who ran against him were distinctly against the Remedial Bill. My hon. friend (Mr. McGillivray) was on the fence and if he came out in the riding the way he voted he would have been defeated.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I would like to see you up there.

Mr. EDGAR. I was there.

Mr. HUGHES. What was the majority in 1891 ?

Mr. EDGAR. 254.

Mr. HUGHES. And the majority last time was 800.

Mr. EDGAR. The two candidates opposed to the Government got a majority of the votes, although I admit it was not large enough to go around. I believe that even if the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) had two or three candidates running against him, he might have a chance of being elected next time.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Does not the hon. member (Mr. Edgar) know that the Patron candidate in North Ontario, said he would refuse to vote against the Government.

Mr. EDGAR. I know that the Patron candidate and his friend were opposed to the Remedial Bill.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. You are right in that.

Mr. HUGHES. Except when they were in Mara, and then they supported the Remedial Bill.

Mr. EDGAR. I want to say that the Roman Catholic township of Mara was stronger against the Remedial Bill than any other township in the county.

Mr. HUGHES. I suppose because they thought it was not strong enough.

Mr. EDGAR. Which side was the hon. gentleman on ?

Mr. HUGHES. On the same side that I have always been on, as you will find out if you come into that neighbourhood again.

Mr. EDGAR. I cannot help recalling a little anecdote that was told us by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) about five o'clock this morning. He applied it to another hon. member of this House, who he said, was on the fence, just as those hon. members who voted against the six months' hoist and against the second reading of the Bill. They are absolutely on the fence ; and he described what that was. He said, a big turkey had got on a fence, and he looked first on one side and then on the other, and at last he jumped down on the side where there was the most corn. That is what we find the hon. gentlemen doing.

Mr. HUGHES. According to the hon. gentleman, my proper course would be to flop on his side, because he claims that his party are going to be in the majority. But I have to tell the hon. gentleman that when he comes into that locality, he will find that people will know where I stand, and the majority will be against him there, just as it was in North Ontario.

Mr. LISTER. Where did you stand in 1883, when you headed the procession in Toronto ?

Mr. EDGAR. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman's views as to where the corn will be after the next election are not the same as ours. Then, let us take the county of Cardwell. In that county in 1891 there was a Government majority of 248, and in 1895 the Government were at least 751 behind.

Mr. HUGHES. How about your candidate ?

Mr. EDGAR. The two candidates were both against remedial legislation, and Mr. Willoughby was very like the hon. member —on the fence. There was a difference in Cardwell between the position of the Government in 1891 and the position of the Government in 1895 of 999 votes, which were reversed in that small county.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Your man lost his deposit.

Mr. EDGAR. Then, in Montreal Centre in 1891 the Government had a majority of 1,214, and in 1895 they were beaten by 336, which makes a difference of 1,550 votes in that constituency. Then in Jacques Cartier in 1891, the Government had 276 majority, and in 1895 they were behind 574, making a difference of 850 votes. In these four ridings there was a change of public opinion represented by 3,990 votes. That was about an average of 1,000 votes a riding. If there ever was a distinct and unqualified condemnation of any policy, there we have it. We have not only the want of a mandate from the people, but we have the actual evidence that the policy when discussed was hostile to the people. Therefore I say that we as a Parliament have no right or justification to proceed with this legislation this session.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak very long to-night, but I want to speak candidly and seriously. I think I may say that if the Government had taken action three months ago similar to the action they took a couple of weeks ago, an amicable settlement of this whole difficulty would have been accomplished by this time. I want to show by contrast how little difference there is at present between the two parties who are contending against each other. Before the conference took place, there was quite a wide difference on several points ; but the advantage of the conference was that in the discussion of the various questions many concessions were made on both sides, which brought the parties very nearly together, and which indicate that after all we are fighting here over a very small difference ; and I think that if the Remedial Bill were withdrawn, a little more patience exercised, and this conference continued a little longer, an amicable settlement satisfactory to both parties would be brought about. Let me show you the demands which were made by the commissioners representing the Government. They demanded first that separate schools should be established in villages, towns and cities. That, of course, the Greenway government would not grant. Then, the Federal commissioners demanded this concession :

> Provision shall be made by this legislation that schools wherein a majority of children are Catholics should be exempted from the requirements of the regulations as to religious exercises.

The commissioners representing the Manitoba government made a proposition, that would accomplish that end in its entirety, that is, that religious exercises should be conducted after half-past three in the afternoon, according to the wishes and desires of the parents of the children attending the schools. Therefore, the two parties were brought that much closer together on that point. The next point demanded by the Federal commissioners was :

> That text-books be permitted in Catholic schools, such as will not offend the religious views of the minority, and which from an educational standpoint shall be satisfactory to the advisory board.

That was a just demand. I do not believe for one moment that there should be put in any of the schools text books to which the parties taught therefrom would have any conscientious objections. Now, look at the concessions which the Greenway government, through their commissioners were willing to make :

> It will be impracticable to provide by statute that the text-books should be satisfactory to the Roman Catholic minority, but we have no doubt that if other points could be agreed upon, an arrangement could be arrived at on the text-book question which would be mutually satisfactory. We regard this part of the difficulty as comparatively easy of adjustment.

This concession on the part of the Greenway government to meet the demand made by the Dominion Government shows that the differences between the two parties were being closed up. Although the Greenway government were not willing to put it in the form of a statute, they were willing to stake their word and honour that no book should be thrust upon the Catholics contrary to their wish or in opposition to their conscientious convictions. Another demand by the commissioners of the Dominion Government was :

> Catholics to have representation on the advisory board.
> Catholics to have representation on the board of examiners appointed to examine teachers for certificates.

Now, see the concession made by the Greenway government in regard to that demand :

> We would have no objection to the Catholic people being represented upon the advisory board and the board of examiners. In point of fact His Grace the late Archbishop was offered a seat on the advisory board. But we see no practical way of embodying such a provision in the statutes. The effect of such a statutory provision would be that the boards would not be legally constituted without Catholic members, and the legal constitution of the board might be disturbed by the resignation of the Catholic members or the refusal of Catholic nominees to accept office. It would also be impossible to give a statutory privilege of representation to one religious denomination without according the same privilege to others.

They point out there the difficulties of giving a statutory provision that Catholics should be represented on the board of examiners and on the advisory board ; but they are willing to pledge their honour and good faith that there will be representation given to the Catholics on those two boards ; and therefore, the demand made by the Dominion Government is, I think, fully and reasonably met. That closes up another breach between the contending parties that existed previous to the conference. Another demand, a new demand, made by the Federal commissioners was for a privilege which the majority did not possess before—the privilege of having a normal school for the education of their teachers in the separate schools ; but the Federal commissioners afterwards agreed to withdraw that demand. Another demand made by the Federal commissioners was :

> The existing system of permits to non-qualified teachers in Catholic schools to be continued for, say, two years, to enable them to qualify, and then to be entirely discontinued.

That was a very reasonable demand, which the Manitoba commissioners saw to be right and just, and in reply they made this concession :

> As to the question of permits, the proposition in the memorandum might be agreed to by the government, to be carried out as a matter of administration.

Surely we can depend upon the Manitoba government, and upon the generosity and good faith of the Manitoba people, to carry out that proposition in the administration of the school law, instead of asking them to place it on the statute-book, thus binding them to something which is not necessary in the practical operation of the school law. Now, what remains in dispute between the two parties ? Simply the question of the establishment of separate schools in towns and cities. That point it was impossible for Mr. Greenway to yield, because, as we all know, he went to the country a few months ago on the very question of national schools as opposed to separate schools. In fact, it was known to the Government here before they sent their commissioners to Manitoba that it would be impossible for Mr. Greenway or for any commissioners he might appoint, to yield that particular point. Now, if anything else can be accomplished, it cannot be accomplished by passing this Remedial Bill, because that would be putting men upon the stubborn side of their nature. But if the Government meet them, as they ought to have done months ago, as one friend meets another, one breach after another will be closed up, the two contending parties will be brought nearer together, and a full and complete reconciliation will certainly before long be brought about. Now, this may not be too late yet. It is impossible to pass this Bill. I suppose the Government see that. They are not making sufficient progress with it to give them any hope of being able to pass it before the end of this session. Therefore I think they should continue the conference with the Manitoba government, and have a commission, if necessary, to investigate all the facts. But the Secretary of State this afternoon said that it was admitted by the action of the Greenway government that no commission was required. It is well known, however, to everybody who has paid any attention to this question, that if a commission had been appointed a year ago, when the leader of the Liberal party demanded it, the whole matter would be by this time entirely settled, and this Remedial Bill, with all its evil consequences, would never have come before Parliament. If the Government would, even at this late hour, pursue a policy of conciliation, and agree to the appointment of a commission to investigate the whole matter, I believe some compromise and settlement would be arrived at. Mr. Greenway has made a very large compromise already ; this Government and the minority may make a still further compromise. Now, the hon. Finance Minister, discussing this question a few days ago, sought to make out that this was not a question of provincial rights. Manitoba has in the past had some sad experience of interference with her provincial rights. Not many years ago that province was struggling against a great monopoly. She was trying to open up avenues of trade by which to send out the products of the country ; and when for that purpose she chartered railways, one after another of her Railway Acts were disallowed by the Federal Government. This was a direct interference with her provincial rights ; and now, when she passes a constitutional Act, establishing what she believes to be the best system of education in the interest of her people, there is another interference on the part of the Federal Government, who gives the people of that province to understand that whatever they do for the prosperity and well-being of the province, this Government seek to interfere with and thwart. Now, if the leader of this Government took the wise stand which Sir John Macdonald took in 1873, when he was asked by the minority in New Brunswick to interfere with the legislation passed in that province in 1871, establishing a national system of schools, I think the whole trouble would blow over in three months, and the minority in Manitoba would see that whatever justice they are asking for would come to them through the magnanimity of the province of Manitoba, and not through the interference of this Government. Sir John Macdonald believed in 1873 that the minority in New Brunswick were enduring a wrong and suffering under a grievance, but he said that was no ground for this Government interfering. It is not the duty of the Federal Government to interfere in provincial legislation, so long as that legislation is within the competence of the legislature that passed it. Therefore, he absolutely refused to interfere, not on the ground that we had no rights, but that it was not good policy for the federal power to interfere in provincial matters, when the local legislature was acting within its competence. Let me read the statement of Sir John Macdonald. Speaking in this House, in 1873, he said :

> It might be, and he did not hesitate to say that from his own point of view it was, in this case, that the minority, the Catholic minority in New Brunswick, suffered a wrong by this legislation, but there might be wrongs not only in questions of education or religion, but in questions of finance, of civil liberty, and in questions of every possible kind. And if the ultimate power of decision as to what is right and what is wrong was to be vested in this Parliament, where was there a vestige of the use of the power of a benefit or advantage of all our > paraphernalia of provincial governments and provincial legislatures.

That position is just as sound to-day in connection with the Manitoba question, as it was in 1873 with reference to the New Brunswick question. If the law which the Manitoba legislature passed, inflicted a grievance upon the minority, I think the minority would receive far greater consideration at the hands of the majority in that province than it ever can by passing a law here so diametrically opposed to the views and opinions of the majority in that province. Sir John Macdonald went on further to say :

> If they were to deal here authoritatively and to order the Governor-General, the representative of the Queen, to disallow such bills as they thought the local legislatures ought not to pass, they would have wiped off the slate, as with a wet sponge, the influence and authority of the local governments and legislatures, and have centered it all in the Canadian Parliament.

Sir John Macdonald was in favour of legislative union, but he was overruled by his associates who were in favour of federal union, and, speaking on this question, he said that it would be far better to have legislative union than to continually interfere with the legislative powers of the different provinces and in this way confuse the legislation which the provinces had power to pass. Let me give you still further his opinion regarding the policy of interfering with the legislation of the provinces :

> Was this House prepared to assume that new responsibility and to alter in spirit the constitution ?

Now, the spirit of the constitution is this, that certain subjects were given to the legislature of the different provinces with which the Federal Government should not interfere, at least until very serious necessity existed, and in such cases the Federal Government should act with great deliberation. Every means should be exhausted in order to settle questions outside of the federal arena. All such means have not been exhausted in connection with this Manitoba question, and, therefore, it is premature to pass this Remedial Bill and force a system upon Manitoba antagonistic to its own wishes. Sir John Macdonald, speaking further, said :

> It might be that they might keep up the sham of provincial legislatures, but what would they be but a sham if at any time the members of the other provinces, disagreeing with the policy deliberately adopted by the legislature of any one province, could alter that policy.

That principle, laid down by Sir John Macdonald in 1873, is applicable to the present situation. The hon. gentleman went on further to propound the policy upon which he based his statement :

> The provinces had their rights, and the question was not whether this House thought a local legislature was right or wrong.

> But the whole question for this House to consider, whenever such a question as this was brought up, that they should say at once that they had no right to interfere so long as the different provincial legislatures acted within the bounds of the authority which the constitution gave them.

Now, I ask, has not Manitoba acted within the bounds and the powers the constitution gave her ? The law of 1890, which swept away separate schools, has been decided to be constitutional by the highest tribunal known to the British Empire. Therefore, according to Sir John Macdonald's contention, although there is a clause in the constitution which gives an appeal to the minority in this particular case, still this Federal Government is not called upon to interfere until every means of settling the matter outside the federal arena has been exhausted. Sir John Macdonald went on further to say :

> There was the fixed principle, that every provincial legislature should feel that when it was legislating it was legislating in the reality and not in the sham.

Would not Manitoba think, if, after passing a constitutional law, that law was repealed by a Federal Act, that she was legislating in a sham and not in reality at all ? Looking at the whole question from that standpoint, I think that this Government has acted very unwisely from the beginning. Had the Government, when it received the decision of the Privy Council, instead of summoning the Manitoba government here in such a hurry, and at a time when it was impossible for that body to be represented here, as Mr. Greenway was sick, and the Attorney General, Mr. Sifton, was leading the House of Assembly—if the Government, instead of being in such a hurry that they only allowed a week's delay, within which Manitoba was forced to plead before the Governor General in Council, had taken more conciliatory means, we would not have had this question before us to-day. It is said that all the information required had already been obtained. I admit that all the legal points had been brought out before the courts, but there were many other points of which the minority in Manitoba complained, evidence on which was not brought out before the Governor General in Council. One of these was the charge that Mr. Greenway had taken over the lands belonging to the minority without giving them sufficient compensation. That fact was not investigated at all before the Governor General in Council. Another charge was that the schools established by the Act of 1890 were Protestant schools, but no evidence was submitted to the Governor General in Council to show whether that charge was true or not. The matter was hurried through in this way, instead of asking for a conference to look into the whole subject. Such a conference could have investigated the matter with a view to reconciling the differences on both sides, and coming to a friendly settlement. I believe there was far too much asked for in the remedial order. That order demanded that the schools, as they existed previous to 1890, should be restored in their entirety. It demanded that Mr. Greenway should re-establish the power of the minority to build, equip, maintain, and manage their own schools. It demanded that he should restore to the minority the right to a share in the grant for the purposes of education, according to the average attendance in their schools. It demanded also that he should restore to the minority the right to be exempted from taxation to the public schools. That was all they had previous to 1890. Then, after a lot of dillydallying, the Government sent in another remedial order, in which they offered to accept a great deal less. Now, surely it would have been much better to have put the whole business into the hands of commissioners on both sides, who would have held a conference and determined on a basis of agreement. When we look into the history of the whole question, we cannot fail to come to this conclusion. Did not Mr. Greenway's government offer to do what was right and just, when they asked to have a commission appointed to inquire into all the facts ? What objection had the Government here to appointing that commission? No objection, except that they were in possession of all the information they wanted. Well, even if they were, in order to arrive at a conciliatory settlement of this question, would it not have been better to appoint a commission and see if there was not further information that would bear upon this question ? And I believe, if that had been done, this question would not now be in this House and we would not be appealed to, night after night, to stay here for the purpose of passing a Bill, which, if passed, will neither satisfy the minority nor the majority. Then, again, after the second remedial order was sent out and the Manitoba government asked what it was willing to do in the matter of a compromise, this very crude Remedial Bill was drafted. A month or two afterwards the Greenway government again suggested the appointment of a commission, and went so far as to say that, in their opinion, that commission would obtain information with regard to the working of the old and the new law, which would furnish a basis upon which an agreement might be come to. Still this Government turned a deaf ear to those solicitations, and refused absolutely to have any conference. But when public opinion pressed that point upon them so strongly when the leader of the Liberal party pressed so strongly upon them that it was their duty to have an investigation on the question, they sent out at the eleventh hour three commissioners armed with the power of negotiating. These commissioners held a conference with representatives of the Greenway government, and concessions were suggested on both sides, and, I believe, if the conference had been continued a few days longer, and the Remedial Bill shelved while it was going on, a reconciliation would have been arrived at, satisfactory to all parties. But, as the case stands now, this question will be prominent before the people at the next general election, so prominent as to overshadow every other. And, in view of the fact that in a few days this question must come before the people, it would be very unwise to pass any remedial legislation without consulting the people. We should give the people an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it before we attempt to pass it. At the next election the issue will not be the question of protection or a revenue tariff, not economy in the administration of public affairs, but, I am sorry to say, it will be a sectarian and racial issue, arising out of a question in which we, as a Dominion, have no special interest, but which by our constitution comes under the jurisdiction of the local legislature. I hold that the Government is responsible for this. I hold them responsible for the unsettled condition of the country instead of the peace and harmony which would exist, if this question were not made a prominent one in federal matters. I believe that the Government have made a great mistake, and that they should, before it is too late, try and correct their mistake by withdrawing the Bill, by renewing the conference with Manitoba, and, if they do so, I have no doubt that an amicable settlement will be arrived at which will redound to the credit of all parties concerned, and that we will then be able to contest the next general election on the proper federal issues, and not on any provincial question.

Mr. McCARTHY. I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter of fact which has just been published in Winnipeg. It will be remembered that the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), in supporting the second reading of the Bill made a point, which I dare say appeared to some hon. members to be not without considerable force. It was this : That at the first session of the first legislature of Manitoba, composed very largely of the gentlemen who had been in council at the time of the negotiations, passed without question the separate school law which has been in force until 1890. The hon. gentleman (Sir Donald Smith) drew the conclusion that, it might reasonably be inferred from that, that those members of the first legislature of the province had understood, prior to the union of Manitoba with the Dominion, that there was to be a system of separate or denominational schools in the new province. The exact words of the hon. member (Sir Donald Smith) as quoted by the "Daily Witness," were as follows :—

> It may not be known to a great many members here that many of those who composed the legislature of Manitoba at that time, were members of this very convention, and in deciding that there should be those schools, they were looking to what had passed in this convention with it fresh in their minds.

The fact appears to be established by two affidavits which have been published in Winnipeg yesterday, that at the meeting of the first legislature of the province, two school Bills were introduced, one by Mr. Norquay who was afterwards a leading member of the government, and the other by Mr. John Sutherland who is still alive. Both these Bills according to the affidavit made by Mr. Hay, who was also in the House, and who is still alive were for the establishment of nonsectarian schools. That affidavit is corroborated by Mr. Sutherland. I read from the article which is the basis of my information. It is a despatch from Winnipeg on the 13th April, and it says:

> An affidavit by Mr. Hay, which is fully corroborated by John Sutherland's sworn statement published here to-day, gives a straight denial to Sir Donald's statements and to his reasoning. In fact it is proved beyond question that Sir Donald was quite mistaken in his facts and in his deductions. The affidavits declare that no mention was ever made of separate schools in the convention, and when the first legislature met two Acts were introduced, one by the late Mr. Norquay and the other by Mr. John Sutherland, providing for the establishment of a non-denominational system of schools. Just before the prorogation of the legislature Archbishop Taché returned from Rome and the education Bill providing for separate schools was introduced in the House and hurriedly rushed through, no explanations being given. This was the Bill of 1871 under which Catholics claim privileges for which they have fought so bitterly to show there was treachery at the bottom. Mr. Hay, who was leader of the Opposition, swears in his affidavit that on the night before the introduction of the bill he was sent for to go to Government House, and thereupon was offered a seat in the government if he would offer no opposition to the bill. He indignantly declined the offer and opposed the Bill, but it was rushed through with unseemly haste despite his opposition. The bill was never discussed nor were its merits sifted.

We have the only fact upon which any argument can be based: that there was any understanding at the time, that there was to be a system of separate schools; swept away by two gentlemen, Messrs. Sutherland and Hay, who were present at the convention and at the first meeting of the legislature, if their statement are to be relied upon. I do not know whether the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) was a member of that legislature or not.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes, he was.

Mr. McCARTHY. If so it is quite plain, that according to this, the hon. gentleman's memory was mistaken, although of course I do not impute any desire to the hon. gentleman (Sir Donald Smith) to mislead the House. I think it is important before this discussion closes, that we should have it brought to our notice, that as a matter of fact the intention of those who took part in the convention was to have an undenominational system of schools, and that the separate schools were established at the instance of the Archbishop who returned from Rome before the close of the convention, and who used his influence to bring about that result. I think it is not unimportant that we should have that matter brought to our attention. I do not propose to delay the committee by any further statement in regard to it.

WEDNESDAY, 15th April, 1896.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I hope the House will bear with me, if, while referring to the debate which occurred this afternoon, I may give an explanation somewhat personal to myself. I am in the same position as is my desk mate, the member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt), who made a statement to the House last week. He said that prior to the general elections of 1891, this question was before the people of Canada in the matter of the veto of the school law of Manitoba. He wired to his leader at Ottawa asking if he was free to pledge himself to his constituents in regard to that question, and Sir John A. Macdonald gave him permission to pledge himself. He and the late member for Cardwell (Mr. White), gave pledges at that time to their constituents, with the concurrence of their leader, in regard to the veto of that provincial law. This question also came up in 1891, in the nomination for the constituency which I have the honour to represent. I then told the convention frankly and squarely that on the school question I intended to stand by Manitoba. I have no hesitation in stating now that it was my stand and declaration at that time on this question, which got me the unanimous nomination of the whole convention, after having beaten four other candidates out.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Was the pledge given on the school question, or merely on the question of disallowance.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). On the school question generally. Those who had political foresight then, saw that the question was only beginning, and those who have political foresight now, can see that it is only beginning, unless it can be settled by withdrawing it from Parliament.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Then it was an issue in the last general elections ?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). It was an issue so far as I am concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has mentioned the late member for Cardwell (Mr. White). I think there is no doubt in the least that the late member for Cardwell had no idea in his mind, and made no pledge to his constituents, except on the mere question of disallowance.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Exactly ; that is the statement made here by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt).

Mr. CARROLL. Was this in the general election of 1891 ?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes. When the vacancy occurred in East York in 1892, the question was again up, and I was pledged in the convention to stand by Manitoba on the school question. At the last convention in the riding, a little over a year ago, I again pledged myself, and I think as a good Conservative—I still contend I am a good Conservative—I am bound to keep my pledge and to raise my voice against any coercion of Manitoba. It was argued this afternoon by the leader of the House, with a great deal of ability, that Parliament is bound to settle this question, and that Parliament must discharge the duty in this respect imposed upon them by the constitution and the decision of the courts. I do not profess to be a lawyer, but I think I have some common sense, and the statement of Mr. Christopher Robinson, and the statement of the various judges who have given decisions on the case, make it clear to me that we are not compelled to do anything in this matter, but that we must exercise our judgment in regard to what is best for the welfare of the country.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I must also take issue with my leader when he says that the Government is willing to take the responsibility of this measure. The Government must take responsibility for the remedial order which they issued and they will be held responsible for it, but this Parliament, and every individual member must take responsibility for any remedial legislation which is submitted to or passed by this House. Each individual member is responsible, and he cannot delegate his responsibility to the Government or to the Parliament itself. I must also repeat, that to me the constitution is nothing compared with the idea that we are under a system of parliamentary government or responsibility, and that is what must decide the conduct of members more than anything else. Members must make it clear to their constituents that their conduct was right and just in the general interest, and not that it was along the line of what happened to be the written constitution. I may be charged with advocating repudiation of the constitution. I cannot help that. I can only say, that all the progressive measures we know of in British history, and the bulk of the progressive measures we know of in Canadian history, did involve more or less a violation of some constitutional right that previously existed. If it is in the interest of the country generally, I have no hesitation in standing here to-day and saying, that I am in favour of what appears to be in the best interest of a great and free province like Manitoba, and not in the interest of an insignificant minority.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). If this was an issue in the general elections of 1891, as the hon. gentleman says it was, I would like to ask him if it is not quite proper for this Parliament to deal with it ?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). No. This is a question which must be sent to the people directly for settlement, and unless it is so sent it never will be settled. I tell my hon. friend that if the people, by an overwhelming majority, declare they are in favour of some kind of remedial legislation, I will be much better disposed towards it than I am at the present time.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). If they made it an issue in the election of the hon. gentleman, it must have been the same all over Canada ?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). No, not necessarily. The passing of a Bill in this House, or the refusing to pass a Bill in this House, cannot settle this question. It must be sent to the people. It will be an issue in the next election, and members will have to declare whether they voted in this House for remedial legislation or against it. And every candidate will have to declare how he will vote in any subsequent session in regard to it. We know that this question of denominational education will come up in connection with the provinces which have to be erected in the North-west. Within the next five or ten years from four to six provinces will be organized in that country, and the great issue will be, whether or not the dual system of education will be foisted on these new provinces. When that time comes, I hope my position will be that I will leave these provinces free to settle this question for themselves. If this Parliament ever attempts to put in the constitution of these new provinces, a dual system of education, the cause of progressive government will be interfered with in this country. The people see that the passing of this Bill will not settle the present issue, nor the issues yet to arise. The people of Canada must be allowed to say whether it is best in the public interest that Manitoba ought to be coerced in this matter, or that she ought not to be coerced. That will be the issue which will face every candidate in the next elections outside of the province of Quebec. I intend to take my position on that in the forthcoming elections.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I will have to take my position the other way.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). All right, sir, this is a free country and you can do so. Another reason why this question should be submitted to the people arises out of the changes which took place in the Government more than a year ago. The then Minister of Justice urged the issue of the remedial order, and as was stated in the papers, he did so intending to appeal to the country afterwards, but in this he was borne down by his colleagues. I am rather inclined now to justify his conduct. I think he was right, and that it would have been better after the issue of the remedial order that the question should be sent to the people and not brought before Parliament. I am not going to stand up here and justify obstruction. But I do say, that just as the Government are strong in their insistence in rushing this Bill through Parliament, just so much stronger will be the increase in the obstruction. It seems to be the natural law, that the stronger the insistence, the greater the obstruction. I believe, that if a more reasonable method had been taken to get this measure through, greater progress would have been made. While it is said that not a great many Conservatives from Ontario are in favour of the delay—or obstruction, if you choose to call it so—I am quite convinced that the great bulk of the Conservatives of Ontario do not wish to see this Bill go through at the present session. I think the great bulk of the Conservatives of the maritime provinces, and the great bulk of Conservatives of the North-west feel the same way, and feel that they should have an opportunity of voting on the question. The leader of the House said today that he intended to make a last appeal to us to allow the measure to go through. I hope that appeal will be respected. I will do my share to try and get the Bill into some shape, but if the leader of the House finds it to be against the feelings of the House that this Bill should be passed this session, then I trust that he will accept the situation and withdraw the measure and proceed with other public business. There is no great urgency about this matter. It has been for four years before the public, and it may be before them for years longer. There is always a chance of the question being settled outside of Parliament, and I am still hopeful that Manitoba will do something to remedy the grievance.

We have been told by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) that there is still hope of some remedy being obtained from the province of Manitoba itself. At all events, the grievance which the minority of Manitoba are suffering at the present moment is not a grievance of conscience, but simply a grievance of pocket. They will have to pay their school taxes, and will not be able to get any assistance from the school fund for their separate schools. But they are still free to have some sort of private parish or separate schools ; and only in a monetary sense will they have any substantial grievance. And the time will come to them, as it comes to every minority, if they wait for their opportunity, when they will be able to compel the legislature of Manitoba to concede to them their rights. There is a great Protestant majority in the province of Ontario ; but that majority have carefully protected the rights of the Catholics in Ontario. They have even increased their rights and privileges in connection with their schools, and have gone to a great deal of pains and trouble and spent a great deal of public money in perfecting the separate school system of the province. I believe that day will come to the minority in Manitoba. I believe the people of Manitoba are a people of generous character. I believe they have no intention of treating the minority there in an unfair and unfriendly manner ; and the manner in which Manitoba will treat the minority will depend very largely on how Manitoba is treated by this legislature. It takes time to work out these matters. You are not going to cure a trouble of this kind in a year or by mandatory legislation. You must take time and adopt other methods than those which have been attempted. I again wish to urge, what I have urged in this House before, that there are questions before the people of Canada of much greater moment than the one before us. These questions are calling for settlement. I took up one of the Toronto papers this morning, and I read in it Sir Wiliam Van Horne's opinion as to the pressing necessity of this country to-day. He said, in one word, that what we in this country want more than anything else is the settlement of the North-west—an immigration policy for Manitoba and the Territories. I agree entirely with him in that. I think the energies of this House ought to be directed to the settlement of that country. I think the Government ought to come down with a large and comprehensive measure of that kind, and if they do bring down such a measure, I shall be more than delighted to support it. But we have spent this entire session in this fruitless attempt to pass this Remedial Bill. We have discussed it in connection with the Address, on the second reading, and now in committee, and we have made no progress with it whatever. I would like to have seen this session, as I have said, devoted to the industrial development of our country. Instead of that, so far the session has been a fruitless and barren one, because undue prominence has been given to this school question, and not sufficient attention to higher and greater issues. Therefore, I again appeal to the leader of the House, if he finds that the opinion of the House and of the country is in favour of sending this question to the people, and if he finds that there is no prospect of carrying the Bill this session, that he will abandon the system of long sessions which we are now having, withdraw the measure, and send the question to the people for final settlement at the polls.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It was my intention to say a few words this afternoon when the hon. leader of the House introduced a discussion on the subject of the power of this Parliament to pass this legislation ; but the debate took another form after dinner. As my hon. friend has spoken on the whole question, I desire to supplement his remarks with a few of my own. The hon. leader of the House labours under a most extraordinary hallucination on the subject of the powers possessed by this Parliament on this matter : and perhaps that hallucination is the only excuse that can be offered for his pressing this extraordinary bantling on the House. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman is sincere in his belief, for this reason, that when he moved the second reading of the Bill, he supported it in a speech in which he took as the main ground for his proposition —reading, as he did again to-night, the sections of the Manitoba Act in support of it—that if and when the Manitoba legislature at any time legislated in the direction of taking away from the Roman Catholic minority the privileges or rights in regard to education which they had acquired through the legislature of that province, that moment, ipso facto, that legislature ceased to have exclusive powers on the subject of education, and those powers were transferred to us. Then, the hon. gentleman said, we stand here in this position, that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have determined as a matter of law that by the legislation passed in 1890 the Manitoba legislature did infringe those rights and privileges, and so the exclusive power to legislate has been transferred to us, and we are bound to exercise it. Now, that is a most extraordinary position for any hon. gentleman to take. Of course, the hon. gentleman may be pardoned, not being a legal or constitutional man, and not having, I assume, given very great attention to the subject before he introduced this Bill. But I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that although he was followed in the debate in this House by almost every lawyer of standing on either side of the House, not a man among them could be found to accept the responsibility of the legal position he took as the basis of his whole argument. Not only has he failed to find in the House any lawyer who would risk his reputation in re-asserting the position he took, but outside of the House, in the very voluminous correspondence which has taken place, from Winnipeg to Halifax, I do not think he can find a lawyer, certainly not one of standing, who would accept the responsibility of assuming that position and arguing from it. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong in his premises, and as a matter of course the conclusion he draws must be false too. From what language does the hon. gentleman argue that the exclusive power has been transferred to this legislature ? The section of the Manitoba Act is very plain. The first part of it confers on the Manitoba legislature the exclusive power of legislating in regard to education ; it adds that that exclusive power must be exercised subject to the following provisions, which he has read several times. What are the provisions which give us the power to act at all ? The section does not give us power to act in the first instance, primarily ; it does not give us a plenary power. It gives us a limited and conditional power. If Manitoba has infringed on the rights of the Catholic minority in respect to education, in so far as it has infringed on those rights, there is created a right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Their exclusive right to legislate is infringed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Their exclusive right to legislate remains ; but if they legislate to take away from the Roman Catholic minority any rights they acquired under this section, that legislation is subject to appeal to the Privy Council here.

Mr. McLEOD. The Lord Chancellor says they have the exclusive right subject to a limitation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say so—subject to the right of appeal to the Privy Council, which involves the right and duty on the part of the Privy Council to inquire into all the facts and circumstances of the case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will save time, perhaps, if I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Have we the right to legislate now ? If we have, then it follows as a matter of course that the exclusive right to legislate on the part of Manitoba has ceased.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It does not follow at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If Manitoba has the exclusive right to legislate, we have no right at all. If she has the exclusive right, as she had before she withdrew the privileges of the Roman Catholic minority —because her right to legislate exclusively on the subject of education was a right conditional on this, that she should not do as she has done, take away the rights of the minority—therefore, I say that when she did that, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared that the appeal lay, and that we had the right to restore those rights, then we had a right to legislate ; and we cannot legislate so long as Manitoba has the exclusive right. That appears to me to be a very simple, plain, straightforward proposition.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.). That is a very simple and plain proposition, but it is not the proposition which the hon. gentleman advanced at first.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg pardon. That is precisely the view I held from the first.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman stated before, and repeated to-day, that when the Manitoba legislature withdrew from the Roman Catholic minority the educational privileges previously conceded to them, by that fact the power of the Manitoba legislature was withdrawn and was vested in this Parliament. Now, the hon. gentleman asks whether this Parliament has a right to legislate. I think it may.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then the Manitoba legislature has not the exclusive right?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What has this Parliament to do? The Privy Council may grant or refuse the appeal; there is nothing compulsory upon them. They have to ascertain the facts; they have to ascertain whether there is or is not a substantial grievance which they should take steps to remedy. I am not talking of our technical power to act. I am asking whether you have laid the basis for acting. You did not do that. You made no inquiry. You assumed the statements in the petition to be true. You said: Here are certain rights given to the minority by the statute of 1871, and we find those rights taken away, and therefore we have to restore them. But you did not do the duty the law casts upon you, of inquiring into the facts to ascertain whether there was or was not a substantial grievance on the part of the minority; and if you found that there was, it became your duty to induce the Manitoba legislature to rectify it. Now, the hon. gentleman sees that although you were hearing the appeal, the power of the Manitoba legislature to legislate still existed, and it exists to-day. If the legislature of Manitoba were in session to-day, it would be perfectly competent for them to legislate on this question of education. Now, I want to show the hon. gentleman that if you determine to hear the appeal, it becomes your duty to inquire into the facts.

Mr. McLEOD. This is what the Lord Chancelleor says in his judgment, referring to section 22 of the Manitoba Act. He says it is claimed "that this is inconsistent with the power conferred on the legislature of the province to exclusively make laws in relation to education." The argument is fallacious. The power conferred is not absolute, but limited. It is exercisable only "subject to and according to the following provisions."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is no possible doubt about that. They have the exclusive power to legislate, subject to the conditions. What are the conditions? That the Roman Catholic minority have a right of appeal under the second subsection if their rights and privileges with regard to education have been infringed upon. The first condition was settled by the Privy Council. There is no possible condition of affairs that could bring the first subsection into operation at all. Now, nobody disputed that their power to legislate was subject to appeal, or that if a substantial grievance exists, there is the power on the part of this Parliament, and I would go further and say the duty, to remedy it. Did the hon. gentleman ever hear any body question that? In the few remarks I addressed to the House on the second reading of the Bill, I pointed out that the counsel for the Manitoba government admitted that in his argument before the Privy Council; every body I heard debate the question admitted that; we all admit it. Why go over these grounds? Let us keep to the points on which we differ, and thrash them out. I object to this legislation, because I say that if a wrong has been done, it can be rectified by the provincial parliament better than by this Parliament. That was disputed at one time. The hon. gentleman, in bringing down the Bill, held that the power had been transferred to this Parliament away from the local legislature. That is absolute nonsense. The power has not been transferred; it remains in the local legislature to-day, and this attempt to make the country believe that we have a duty imposed on us which the local legislature cannot carry out is a false proposition. Therefore, I say your duty was clear and distinct, to have ascertained all the facts, and then apply to the Manitoba legislature to rectify the grievance.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was what was done, and they refused.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, there was not a scintilla of inquiry made. The hon. gentleman neither sent a commission to Manitoba to take evidence nor did they hear any evidence before the Privy Council. There was no inquiry whatever. The hon. gentleman said that was done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said that the remedial order called upon them to remedy the wrong and they refused, and that then the right to legislate devolved upon this Parliament.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is anticipating. Let me bring his mind to the point I am drawing his attention to. It became the duty of the Privy Council to investigate the facts fully before they made the remedial order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There ought to be no doubt about it. If you are to pass a remedial order directing what shall be done, it is surely your duty to inquire into the facts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was all put before the Privy Council by the arguments on both sides.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The argument is nothing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The arguments were based on the facts and the Privy Council were satisfied.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If there is a point of law in dispute, an argument is a most admirable way of elucidating it. But when it is a question of fact, the argument cannot help you very much as to ascertaining what the facts are.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They had what the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided upon. Had they not the fact that the law previous to 1890 gave certain rights and privileges which the Act of 1890 took away ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided was the right of appeal on the part of the minority. That was all that was submitted to them. There is a memorandum prepared by the late Sir John Thompson, in which that hon. gentleman and learned jurist stated the doubt whether there was power on the part of the Privy Council here to hear the appeal of the minority. That was the only point which was referred to the Supreme Court: Have we the power to hear this appeal ? The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were asked : Assuming the facts to be true as stated in the petition, have the Privy Council of Canada the right to hear the appeal ? That was the only point determined by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. They were not asked to determine any facts. When they determined that this Government had the right to hear the appeal, there was only one way of hearing it, and that was to ascertain the facts--not the strict letter of the law, as it appears in the acts from 1870 to 1890, but what the practical working of these acts was and what the practical working of the Act of 1890 was, so that they might ascertain whether there was a substantial right or privilege taken away which should be restored. And I am the more confirmed in that opinion because I find that this Parliament also has to exercise this discretion. Questions of state policy may interfere and govern our determinations, and we have the right to be informed fully as to what the facts are. We have not been so informed. No such information was brought before the Privy Council here, and we are asked now to legislate without any such inquiry having been made. The Manitoba government intimated a desire to negotiate, when they first replied to the remedial order. They intimated that that order would not have been made had the Government been in possession of the facts, and invited this Government to investigate. Involved in that invitation was the expression of their readiness to discuss with this Government what remedy, if any, should be applied. They practically said : Examine into the facts, and when you have seen what they really are, we will be prepared to discuss what remedy should be applied ; but this Government scouted the invitation, and instead, they brought down to this House this crude and ill-digested measure, as to the meaning of any section of which you cannot get any two persons to agree. The hon. gentleman says there are only two things to investigate, and these are what rights were taken away and what has Manitoba restored. We have to investigate a little more than that. We have to find out what rights were taken away, and whether they were taken away in the public interest. We have to find out whether it is in the interests of the minority that these rights should be restored, and whether the minority desire that they should be restored. We hear it stated that some 32 or 33 school sections of the minority have come under the Manitoba School Act and are perfectly satisfied. We hear it stated that outside of St. Boniface and Winnipeg, the people are thoroughly satisfied. If that be true, do you want to impose a different system upon these people ? I do not know whether it is true or not, but would like an investigation to ascertain the truth, because that would have an important bearing on my mind. We have nothing definite to show on what basis these rights and privileges should be restored, but there is one thing we know and that is that this Parliament should not be asked to restore them except in the last resort, after the legislature of Manitoba has positively refused to act. One ounce of relief by Manitoba will be worth a pound of relief by this Parliament ; and I am satisfied that if the Manitoba government and legislature were properly approached and negotiations entered into with them on a proper basis, an arrangement could be easily come to, which would be satisfactory to the minority and substantially restore to them every right or privilege they ought to have. The hon. gentleman urged us to pass this Bill because the crucial principles of it have been considered. That is not my opinion. We have not touched one of the crucial principles yet. All we have done, in the first ten or twelve sections which we have passed, is to constitute the machinery for carrying out certain substantial provisions contained in the latter part of the Bill, and that machinery I contend, we have not the power to create. I do not think that the administration of the law is a matter which comes within our province at all, but one which belongs solely to the local legislature. The substantial rights which the remedial order sought to give are, first, the right to build, conduct, support and equip separate schools, involving religious teaching in the schools, and that right we have not passed a section relating to. Then there is the right of exemption from taxation for the public schools, and of appropriating their own taxes to the separate schools, and that right has not been dealt with by any of the sections we have passed so far. And lastly, their is the right to share proportionately in the public grant, which we have not yet dealt with. All our time has been taken discussing sections which provide the machinery for the administration of the law, which is a matter exclusively belonging to the Manitoba legislature. But the hon. Minister of Finance argued that the hon. leader of the Opposition has admitted that the intention of the Parliament of Canada. when it passed the Manitoba Act, has been frustrated by the act of the Manitoba legislature. and that, therefore, it becomes our duty to remedy the wrong. That is a most extraordinary proposition. The hon. gentleman knows that the leader of the Opposition had reference to the rights and privileges which it was supposed by himself and many others had been conferred upon the minority under section 1. It was the intention, no doubt, of very many who legislated in this Parliament, that certain privileges should be secured to the Roman Catholic minority by section 1. That intention has been frustrated. The Privy Council have determined that the intention must be gathered from the words of the section, and that the section in itself does not confer any right or privilege. That decision of the committee of the Privy Council is binding upon this House. That Act, which it was supposed conferred these privileges, is an Imperial statute. If the language failed to express what the Parliament of Great Britain intended to do, it cannot be argued that we have the power to supply the deficiency. The hon. gentleman is playing with the House if he asks us to believe that we have the power, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the scope of that section. The Judicial Committee has settled that matter for ever. The hon. Minister of Finance argued that there was some kind of a parliamentary compact to give to the minority of Manitoba privileges and rights which they had before the union, and that it was the intention of the Imperial Parliament to confer those rights, and he said this intention was frustrated by the language of the Imperial Act ; and because the Imperial Parliament did not use language which would confer these rights upon them, this Parliament should step in and do that now.

Mr. McLEOD. I think the argument was this. That it was fairly the intention that these rights should be secured to them, that they were subsequently secured to them by a local act of the Manitoba legislature, that the Act of 1890 took them away, and the case becomes stronger from the fact that it was intended to give these rights before the union, and they were actually given after the union.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. Finance Minister took up certain expressions which fell from the hon. leader of the Opposition to the effect that the intention of the Imperial Parliament and this Parliament, when this law was drafted, had been frustrated by the language used. I point out now that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council determined that the first section of that Act did not and could not confer any right or privilege upon the minority, and any attempt to go behind the judgment of the Privy Council and to ask this Parliament to do what the Privy Council said section 1 does not and could not do, is to ask us to make fools of ourselves. It is an attempt to deceive those who have not studied this question thoroughly and do not understand it. If we had power to do that, there might be something in the argument ; but to ask us to pass the Bill on that ground is merely deceiving the House and the country. Now, with regard to the second section, there is not a man in this House who will contend that it ever was the intention of this Parliament to declare that rights subsequently acquired in Manitoba should be secured to them under that section. The Privy Council certainly determined, contrary to the general belief, that the second section does give the right of appeal against post-union legislation. I am willing to be bound by the judgment of the Privy Council in both cases. If we are bound by it, do not ask us in exercising our powers under subsection 2 to indirectly attempt to extend or alter the provisions of subsection 1. That we have no power to do. If subsection 1 does not carry out what was intended, we have no power to amend it. To do that you must go to the Imperial Parliament. I am willing to do what the Act points out I shall do. So far as the circumstances of the case require, I am willing to legislate when it was shown to me that a substantial grievance has been inflicted on the minority by the post-union legislation of Manitoba, and when I am satisfied that the provincial government refuses to rectify that grievance. I am not at present satisfied on either point. I find controversies and denials as to the facts proceeding from those in authority on both sides. Before we pass this legislation, which, so far as we are concerned, is irrevocable, it remains for us to ascertain what the real facts are ; to satisfy our minds that a substantial grievance exists, and to be perfectly sure that the local government will not rectify it ; and, in the last resort, to do our duty. There is not a gentleman here who doubts in his mind that if that commission had gone to Manitoba six months ago, and had gone under congenial circumstances, with full powers and plenty of time, that an arrangement would not have been come to which would be satisfactory to all parties. You could have done then what it may not be possible to do now on the part of the present government, which is railroading this Bill through the House. It may be done by another Government in whom the Manitoba people have more confidence. I have not a shadow of doubt, that plenipotentiaries going in a proper time, and discussing in a proper spirit the grievances under which these people are said to labour, could come to an arrangement which will be satisfactory to the majority and the minority, and which will withdraw this question from the arena of Dominion politics into which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has improperly forced it.

Motion (Mr. O'Brien) that the committee rise, negatived.

On section 14,

Mr. WALLACE. What is the intention of the Government as to whether the voting for the election of school trustees under this Bill shall be by ballot or shall be open ?

Mr. DALY. The intention is provided for in the Bill, and is that the law shall be adhered to as it existed prior to 1890. That is, that there should be open voting.

Mr. WALLACE. We are asked to adopt this principle simply because it was in the Act that was rushed through the Manitoba legislature in 1871. We have adopted the system of voting by ballot under most circumstances throughout the Dominion, and the very best results have followed from it.

An hon. MEMBER. You have not it in Ontario, when voting for separate school trustees.

Mr. WALLACE. So much the worse for the separate schools. I know that a large number of separate school supporters in the city of Toronto are anxious to have the ballot in voting for trustees. It is a mistake that we have not it in the province of Ontario. It has been charged here in the city of Ottawa that intimidation has been practised in the election of school trustees, and that the election of Mr. Moffett and others of advanced ideas was rendered more difficult because of the system of open voting. Why should we incorporate this obsolete and discarded system of open voting into this Bill ? I would urge upon the Government to insist on providing for election by ballot for separate school trustees in Manitoba.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman has not a knowledge of the Manitoba law as it exists at the present day, because it is only in cases of elections in cities, towns and villages that the ballot is used in that province. In the case of the election of trustees in rural districts, it is done by open voting. This Bill will apply particularly to the rural districts of Manitoba, and I do not see why we should make the elections different from those of the public schools. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) took occasion to say that this was an obsolete law, which was rushed through the legislature in 1871. That shows how little knowledge he has of the question. The Bill we are now considering is taken from the consolidation of 1881, and the amendment of 1884, and all the amendments up to 1888, and not from the law of 1871. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was in the legislature from 1883 to 1888 as a member of the Opposition, and I do not know that it is upon record that he challenged the construction of any of the clauses of the Bill which have been so much criticised here.

Mr. WALLACE. The main question for us to consider here is, that we should not adopt this antiquated system of open voting for school trustees. Why does the Minister not adopt the ballot system, which experience has shown to be the correct one. Therefore, the very argument the Minister of Interior lays down, and the facts he has stated, furnish to my mind additional proof, if additional proof were required, that we should have voting by ballot in the cities, towns and villages, as we have under the public school system.

Mr. DALY. That was not a grievance complained of by the minority or a privilege of which they have been deprived, and which has to be restored. By inserting that, we would be giving them a right which they did not enjoy before, and thus affecting the legality of the Act we propose to pass.

Mr. WALLACE. We are responsible for something else than restoring rights and privileges, because the judgment of the Privy Council declares that it is not necessary that we should pass a separate school Act at all, in order to comply with their decision.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I agree with the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). We are passing this law with the intention of making it up to date, if it is passed at all. It is now well recognized that the system of open voting has passed away, and that the ballot has taken its place ; and if it is true that this Bill cannot be amended it is better for us to legislate somewhat in advance than to legislate in the past.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think too that it would be better to follow the Manitoba school law in giving the ballot, at least to the extent to which the Manitoba school law gives it,—in cities, towns and villages. If there is anything I am certain of, it is that our functions begin and end with this Act—that we will not have power to deal with the matter later on, at least in the way of amendment. Therefore if this is to be a permanent law—though I am not sure that the Manitoba legislature would not have power to amend it—we should provide for the future as well as for the present, and therefore I do not see why we should not provide the ballot as far as has been suggested. In the province of Ontario there has been a good deal of complaint of undue interference with voters ; and I do not see what objection there is to giving the ballot in this case. I would like to understand what this means in section 14 : " All school meetings after the first."

Mr. DALY. The first is provided for by section 18.

Mr. McCARTHY. What is the object of saying in section 14 that all school meetings after the first shall be called by the board of trustees, when by section 18 it is enacted that a meeting on the first Monday in February in each year shall be called by the board of trustees ?

Mr. DALY. The meeting called under section 18 is the annual meeting of the separate school supporters in rural districts, while section 14 applies to any subsequent meetings of the board of trustees after they have been elected, and it is in accordance with the old law, which worked very satisfactorily.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not see why that old law was repealed, it must have been so satisfactory. Surely we do not require to pass an Act of Parliament to authorize the board of trustees to call a meeting if the meeting be necessary. They have the power without that.

Mr. McLEOD. It may not be necessary, but I do not see that there is any objection to the clause.

Mr. McCARTHY. These two sections are contradictory. Section 18 says meetings shall be called by the trustees or the superintendent, and section 14 says by the trustees.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is worse still —section 14 prescribes that the Board of Education shall give the form of notice, and section 18 prescribes what the trustees shall put in the notice. They must frame it, not the Board of Education.

Mr. WALLACE. This all shows the utter inadequacy of the Dominion Parliament to provide this machinery. The members of the Government do not seem to have studied this matter at all. I would like to know how the trustees are to proceed under these contradictory provisions. Another important point is this. In the public school system of Manitoba it is provided that the trustees shall be able to read and write. That is not provided for here : and if the Minister cannot solve the contradiction between section 14 and section 18, how could a trustee who would not be able to read and write ?

Mr. OUIMET. I move that clause 14 be struck out of the Bill.

Amendment (Mr. Ouimet) agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I wish to call attention to the fact that we have spent a long time trying to get an explanation of this clause.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. It is struck out now.

Mr. WALLACE. We wasted a good deal of time over it because the Minister did not know anything about it.

Mr. MULOCK. We have spent several hours over this clause, and it is now condemned by the Government, who ask to have it struck out. It would save us a good deal of trouble if the Government would let us know before hand what clauses they are going to strike out. What do they propose to do with the next clause 15, for instance ?

Mr. OUIMET. We will hear your opinions about that.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to know whether aliens are to be allowed to vote without becoming naturalized British subjects ?

Mr. IVES. Yes. They want all the money for the schools they can get.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If they use the schools, they should pay for them.

Mr. OUIMET. Section 13 of the Public School Act, which provides who shall be electors, contains no provision for excluding aliens.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In section 16 you speak of " the Roman Catholic resident freeholders and householders," and in section 15 you say " the Roman Catholic freeholders and householders present." It seems to me that you should either take out the word " resident " in section 16 or put it in section 15.

Mr. OUIMET. I move that after the word " ratepayers " the words " then present, or a majority of them " be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not see why you speak of Roman Catholic freeholders and householders. I think it should be freeholders or householders.

Mr. OUIMET. I move that it be made to read freeholders or householders. Now, I will explain why all the resident freeholders should be present at the first election, perhaps a majority of the people owning real estate in the district might have objections to establishing a school district, and might come in and defeat by their vote the object sought for by the election of trustees. But after the first election, they become ratepayers by their own consent, being supporters of the separate school district.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the word " ratepayer " should be struck out, and the word " householder or freeholder " used right through, because there is a distinct meaning attached to the word " ratepayer " under the municipal law.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MULOCK. You should see that the chairman is a qualified elector like those who are present at the meeting.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. He cannot form part of the meeting unless he is one.

Mr. MULOCK. You say so, but I think he could under the wording of the clause. I presume that the chairman should have the qualification necessary, but according to this clause he need not. I propose to amend the clause by adding the words as follows :—

> And shall be a Roman Catholic ratepayer of the full age of 21 years.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. And vaccinated.

Mr. MULOCK. I could add another suggestion, but it might be unparliamentary.

Mr. LANGELIER. I would suggest that the words should be added "shall elect one of themselves."

Mr. MULOCK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman knows that in our municipal elections in Quebec it is not necessary that the chairman should be a ratepayer or a qualified elector. He may be a perfect stranger, and in a great many instances it is better he should be a disinterested person. Take the returning officer in an election ; it is not necessary that he should be an elector.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And you therefore propose under this clause to give power to the chairman, who may be not a ratepayer to give a casting vote, and thus possibly upset the vote of the meeting altogether.

Mr. SPROULE. It is quite clear from this clause that the chairman may be an outsider, and may not belong to the district at all. I think the suggestion of the member for Quebec should be adopted.

Mr. McLEOD. It seems to me to be absolutely idle to talk about men in a meeting selecting a chairman ten miles away.

Mr. STUBBS. We have some difficulty in this connection in regard to our separate schools in Ontario. This clause is something on the same lines as the law there. We find that the clergyman comes in and he acts as chairman at the meeting and he is not a resident or an elector in the district. If he is allowed to have a casting vote as is the case here, he practically controls the meeting. I would like to see that the chairman of the meeting should be a ratepayer.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Public Works says that the chairman need not be a ratepayer. You give him a casting vote in the case of the election of trustees, provided they are evenly divided, he practically determines the election by that casting vote, although he is not a ratepayer.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know of any organization where a chairman can be elected outside the body of which he is chairman. We should certainly provide in this case that the chairman should be a ratepayer.

Mr. OUIMET. I object to the amendment. Whatever may be the interpretation to be given to this clause, in my opinion the meeting should be left full liberty in regard to the election of their chairman. According to this law, the heads of five families may call for the organization of a school district. It may happen that amongst those five heads of families, not one may be qualified to be the presiding officer, and you are going to oblige them to choose one of themselves, even if they wish to choose an outsider. I think they should be left free to choose a chairman either from among themselves or an outsider, whoever would be best qualified and most available.

Mr. McCARTHY. As a matter of policy it does not seem to me right that those who have to pay for the school should be presided over by a man who has no interest in the district, and who might possibly have the casting vote. I think we should adopt the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec.

Amendment (Mr. Langelier) negatived : Yeas, 16 ; nays, with the vote of the Chairman, 17.

Mr. MULOCK. In the separate school law of Ontario it is provided that the chairman of the board of trustees must be a qualified voter.

Amendment (Mr. Mulock) negatived.

On subsection (a) of section 15 :

> 15. At every schood meeting as authorized and required to be held under this present Act, the Roman Catholic ratepayers, who are supporters of the separate schools within the district, or if it is a first meeting in a new district, then the Roman Catholic freeholders and householders present at such meeting, or a majority of them—
> (a.) Shall elect a chairman ; and the chairman of the meeting shall decide all questions of order, subject to an appeal to the meeting, and in case of equality of votes, he shall give the casting vote, but he shall have no vote as chairman, and the chairman shall take the votes in the manner desired by a majority of the electors present, unless a poll be demanded by any electors present, when he shall be the returning officer.

Mr. McCARTHY. My contention is that in cities, towns and villages, the election of trustees should be by ballot, leaving it in the rural sections to be as the ratepayers may determine. That is the law at present in Manitoba. I therefore move in amendment that the following words be added :—

> Provided always that in cities, towns and villages the election of trustees, if a poll is demanded, shall be by ballot as hereinafter provided.

Mr. OUIMET. I cannot accept that. I do not believe very much in voting by ballot. I think the old system of open voting is the best. Every man who enjóys the liberty of a citizen should exercise his franchise in such a manner that it will be known to every one. I do not see any advantage that can come of introducing the ballot in these matters, and it will only complicate the machinery.

Mr. LANGELIER. When this law was passed, there was no ballot in Canada. The ballot was only introduced in 1874, and that law was passed in 1871. As we have adopted the ballot for Dominion elections, and as it has worked well, I think we should adopt it here.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no doubt the ballot system is the best. In Ottawa a very troublesome question arose in connection with the election of trustees, and it was contended that had the voting not been open, trustees would have been elected more in harmony with the advanced views of the present day.

Mr. OUIMET. In that case the only person objected to by the clergy was elected by open voting.

Mr. SPROULE. I take my information from the "Mail and Empire." I think the ballot would be a protection against undue influence and shall therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. I am surprised that the Minister of Public Works should object to this amendment. I had supposed that the proposal would receive the unanimous and cordial approval of the committee. Twenty-four years ago, we unanimously adopted the ballot Act, when I think the Minister of Public Works was a member of the House. It is now in force for the provincial elections and municipal elections, and it has been adopted for the election of school trustees in cities, towns and villages in Manitoba. We ask that the same system be adopted for separate as for public schools in that province, and I may state that there are stronger reasons why it is necessary in the case of separate schools.

Mr. MULOCK. If we do not adopt the vote by ballot in this case we will announce to the world that we are retrograding instead of progressing in this Parliament. No one can deny that public opinion is strongly in favour of the ballot.

Mr. McLEOD. How is it in the Ontario separate schools ?

Mr. MULOCK. The Ontario School Act was passed before the ballot was introduced.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is optional there now.

Mr. MULOCK. We are making a new Act here and we should furnish it with all modern improvements. If we were passing a new Act for Ontario, no doubt we should provide the ballot. I strongly approve of the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. This illustrates very well the outrageous proposition to take out of the hands of the legislature of Manitoba the important question of education. While the Manitoba government takes a progressive view of this matter, the Parliament of Canada is urged by the Government to go back into the dark ages and insist upon open voting when the arguments are most strongly in favour of the ballot. All along I have taken the position that in non-religious questions like this, the law of the Manitoba legislature with regard to public schools should be incorporated in this Bill, if we are to have a Bill at all. Voting by ballot does not effect the question of the right to separate schools. In the province of Ontario it has been for many years one of the strong arguments of the Conservative party—of which the present Government claim to be the leaders in Canada, although that is disputed —that there should be voting by ballot in separate schools. Sir Oliver Mowat has been charged by the Conservatives as being the mere servant of the Roman Catholic hierarchy because of his refusal to give vote by ballot to the supporters of separate schools. Mr. Meredith, the late leader of the Conservatives, took the strongest ground upon that question, and it is somewhat peculiar to notice that from time to time the Conservative press demands that Mr. Meredith should be called upon to lead the Conservatives of Ontario in the Dominion Parliament. Yet, the views of that gentleman are diametrically opposed to the views of the Government upon this matter. The Conservatives of Ontario have charged that the clergy exercised undue influence on the electors in the elections of school trustees, and that has been a strong reason urged by them why vote by ballot should be introduced in that province. How is that we find the Government here differing so radically from their political allies in the province of Ontario. Strange to say, the members of this House from the province of Ontario supporting the Government, and who also support the Conservative opposition in the province of Ontario, have made that province ring with their denunciations of Sir Oliver Mowat because of his refusal to introduce the ballot into the election of separate school trustees.

Mr. OUIMET. You have approved of him.

Mr. MARTIN. I never did.

Mr. OUIMET. Your followers did then.

Mr. MARTIN. Some of them, I suppose.

Mr. OUIMET. The argument is no stronger on one side than on the other.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, the argument is stronger, because Sir Oliver Mowat makes a defence on constitutional grounds, which do not exist here. I do not agree with Sir Oliver Mowat in this matter myself. He does not say that he refuses the ballot to the Roman Catholic voters, because the ballot is not a proper thing.

Mr. HUGHES. Is he in favour of a secret ballot ? He does not give it in his provincial elections.

Mr. MARTIN. That is another point in which I differ with Sir Oliver Mowat. I have always held that the ballot in Ontario would be much better with the number done away with. What is the position of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken and others from the province of Ontario ? Will they stultify themselves because the Liberals of Ontario have done so ?

Mr. HUGHES. They are in favour of the ballot.

Mr. MARTIN. They are not showing it just now. They are supporting the government that refuses the ballot to a section of the people of Manitoba, and that Government could not stay in power one day but for the support of those hon. gentlemen. Do not the same arguments which appealed to those hon. gentlemen in favour of giving the ballot to separate school supporters in Ontario apply with equal force to Manitoba? The Conservative party in Ontario argued that the Roman Catholic clergy exercised an undue influence in the election of separate school trustees in that province. For my part, I do not need any argument of that kind. I make no such charge, so far as the province of Manitoba is concerned. I simply say that I am in favour of the broad principle of the ballot, and as it has been adopted in the case of the public schools, I think it should be also adopted in the case of separate schools ; and I do not know on what grounds the Government refuse it, as I have not been able to be here during the whole of the discussion of this Bill in committee. That is one of the unfortunate matters we have to contend with in these long sittings. Surely it is a commentary upon the farce that is being enacted in Parliament, that we have one of the most important questions which the Government are undertaking to settle at this late day of the session, and there is not one member of the Government here to defend their course, except the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is busily engaged in reading a novel.

Mr. FRASER. I rise to a point of order. I see an hon. member preparing a bed in this House. That sort of thing ought not to be permitted.

Mr. MULOCK. I remember that in the session of 1885, Sir Mackenzie Bowell occupied the seat now occupied by the hon. Minister of Finance, and at an all-night sitting he arranged a bed, as an hon. member is charged with doing now. Sir Mackenzie Bowell had pillows brought in, and his example was followed by other members. Exception was taken to the practice as a breach of decorum, and the Chairman decided that it was a breach of decorum for a member to import any furniture into the Chamber to make a couch for himself. It may not be out of place for the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) to assist in getting this Bill through, but he must not convert this Chamber into a sleeping apartment.

Mr. HUGHES. It is unfair to the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Ryckman) that this objection should be urged. The hon. gentleman, in extending his bed along here, has used nothing but the regular furniture, and I submit that although he is the inventor of the Kootenay Cure, he is entitled to take his repose reclining on his own seat.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). As to any hon. member sleeping in the House, that I suppose cannot be prevented ; but lying down in the House is another thing altogether. If any hon. member is permitted to lie down, then every one in the House of Commons would have permission to lie down, and it would not be conducive to the decorum of the House. I would ask the hon. gentleman who is now lying down to take his seat as well as he can. If he is sick, of course that is another matter.

Mr. FRASER. I find that there is a chair imported that does not belong to the Chamber at all. If the committee does not rise now, I think the hon. member should.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member has arisen.

Amendment (Mr. McCarthy) negatived : Yeas, 15 ; nays, 27.

On subsection (b),

Mr. STUBBS. I move :

That the committee rise, and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

It is quite clear to my mind that hon. gentlemen need rest and refreshment so that they may be able to consider this Bill tomorrow.

Mr. WALLACE. I have great pleasure in seconding the motion. We have been working diligently at the Bill since three o'clock Monday, and as it is now nearly four in the morning, and as daylight will soon be here, I think hon. gentlemen should be allowed to go home. That is especially the case since none of the Ministers are present. We had a discussion here on allowing the ballot to be used in elections for separate school trustees in Manitoba. Very strong arguments were used in favour of the ballot, and not one argument against it, and yet the ballot was defeated. When hon. members are too fatigued to be susceptible to argument of that kind it is time that they should go home. We should have the ballot in school trustee elections in Manitoba, because the men who coerced this Parliament into coercing Manitoba would be quite competent to coerce the supporters of the separate schools when they go to vote for separate school trustees. I wish now to refer to a matter which has not received as much attention as it should during the discussion on this measure. The member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) in the historic retrospect which he gave us, declared that there was an unwritten compact for separate schools which would have, amongst the North-west settlers of the Territories of that day, or rather the half-breeds up there, all the force of the strongest bargain that could be made. The Minister of Finance also told us there was a compact, but I deny that. Who has the power to make a compact that would be binding upon this Parliament and upon the legislature of Manitoba for all time to come. There was no power to make such a compact at that time. There was no regular form of government in that country then, and the common law of England prevailed there, and that law gives no specific privileges to the Roman Catholic Church. What right had a few half-breeds settled along the Red River to make a compact that would be binding on all future generations. It is preposterous to suppose that we should acknowledge their right to compel all future generations in Manitoba to be bound by their action. To do such a thing would be to clog the wheels of industry and progress.

(The hon. member proceeded to read bills of rights Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4.) There is nothing in the bill of rights No. 3, which is the only one that was submitted to the Governor General and the special committee of the Privy Council here, to warrant the claim that there was any compact made which gave the minority in Manitoba the right to separate schools. And the fact that Mr. Norquay, who was for years the Premier of that province, and Mr. Hay, both of whom were intimately connected with the negotiations that then took place, introduced bills into the Manitoba legislature providing, not for separate schools, but for a system of national schools, shows that they did not consider that there was any obligation on the part of the Manitoba legislature to establish a system of separate schools.

Mr. INGRAM. I remember when, in 1874, Mr. Hay made a motion to abolish the French language in the province of Manitoba, although at that time nearly all the members of that legislature spoke French and could not speak English, and although he was thoroughly aware of the compact to retain the official use of the French language, so that not much reliance can be placed on anything that Mr. Hay did. Later on in the session, he brought in a resolution, for the abolition of the Senate, which was the body specially regarded by the minority in Manitoba as the safeguard of their rights.

Mr. WALLACE. The point I was making was that two members of the legislature, Mr. Norquay, who was Premier of that province for fourteen years, a gentleman of the highest ability, who was present when that convention was held, who knew all the negotiations from start to finish, and who knew the desires of the people of Manitoba, and Mr. Hay who had equal opportunities of understanding the whole situation, brought in, each of them, a public school bill and not a bill for the establishment of separate schools. And it was not until Archbishop Taché returned from Rome, towards the close of the first session, and induced some members of the House to introduce a Separate School Bill, and through means which were not proper, according to the evidence placed before us now, carried that Bill through the House, that a separate school system was established in that province. Mr. Hay made an affidavit that he was offered a position in the Cabinet if he would work in favour of establishing separate schools in Manitoba, but he declined the offer and was not made a member of the Government. Well, a system of national schools has been established in that province to-day, and we are here protesting against the passage of any measure which will destroy that system and restore the old state of things. Bill of rights No. 3 was undoubtedly the basis of all the negotiations that took place, and it made no provision for schools of any kind. We have the evidence of Sir John Macdonald that the Governor General refused to have anything to do with bill of rights No. 4—what we call the forged bill—as it emanated from those in rebellion, and it could not possibly have been the basis for any Act of Parliament or for any binding arrangement on the Manitoba government. I have amply proven that there was no contract and no compact, and if there had been a compact it would have been monstrous to suppose that the whole future of that magnificent country was to be wrecked and destroyed by a bargain, which would prevent them enjoying the advantages of laws which would conduce to their prosperity and to the education of their people.

Mr. WELDON. At this hour of the morning, it being twenty minutes past four o'clock, I think the motion that the committee should rise, is quite in order, and I would ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce who now leads the House, if he will agree at this stage to adopt that motion.

Mr. IVES. The Government are so anxious that the Bill should be passed that I cannot consent to adjourn at the present time.

Mr. WELDON. Then I must give some reasons why, in my judgment, the motion should be adopted. The first reason is, that there are present so few members of the committee. Out of 206 members whom it would be possible to have present to-night, there are only thirty-three in the House, and it is impossible, that a Bill of this importance can be discussed by about one-seventh of the number of hon. gentlemen who might be here. (The hon. member proceeded to point out individually the members who were not present.) Now, although some 160 or 170 members of this House are not here taking part in this discussion, is there any greater reason why we should be here ? Evidence has been given that some of those who are absent are ill, and if so, it is because of the strain that has been put upon them. Hon. gentlemen call it obstruction ; but I tell them that after a good day's work was concluded on Monday by a motion to adjourn, those who opposed that motion put themselves in the wrong.

Mr. IVES. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has ever known the Railway Committee to spend a whole day passing two clauses of a Bill, and whether spending the whole of Monday in passing two clauses of this Bill was not obstruction ?

Mr. WELDON. The passing of two clauses on Monday was not obstruction. There are clauses and clauses. At this very time in the British Parliament there is on file an education Bill. That Bill was introduced by Sir John Gorst a few days ago. Last week a motion was made for private days ; this week some further proceedings are to be taken to enlarge the hours for government business ; and the statement has been freely made that the Government propose to take the four months remaining from now till the middle of August for the discussion of the Bill. Moreover, the English Bill is a very much easier Bill than ours. It has only 32 clauses, many of them shorter clauses than those in this Bill, and it has not the scope of ours. Yet in that country, where they have had very much larger experience in legislation than we have had, and where the government have not a small majority, but a powerful majority behind them, the best they expect to do is to get the Bill through by the time of the grouse shooting, that is, on the 12th of August. Most of us are jealous of the reputation of this chamber, and we will put the blame where it lies. The blame for obstruction does not lie at our doors, who after a good day's work asked leave to go home, and to whom leave was not granted, but the blame lies at the door of those who bullied this House at the end of a good day's work, to continue sitting. I would call attention to a most instructive experience of certain communities in the United States in settling what is the best way for Catholics and Protestants to reconcile their differences of opinion with regard to schools. The United States are divided by the Roman Catholic church into some twelve or thirteen ecclesiastical provinces, of one of which St Paul, Minnesota, is the centre. There are in the provinces 83 or 84 dioceses and 3,000 parochial schools, in which Catholic children are taught and of which the church has absolute control. That church has besides some 600 high schools and has colleges and universities to the extent of about one-quarter of the number of such institutions of learning in the United States. There are 730,000 Catholic children attending the parochial schools and about a million and a half attending the national schools, and the existence of this striking disparity in attendance between the two, despite the fact that for fifty years that powerful church had been enjoying its priesthood to induce parents to send their children to these parochial schools, induced the Archbishop of Minnesota to see whether some arrangement could not be made with the state whereby this million and a half of children of Catholic parents, who were attending the public schools, should have some opportunity of getting religious teaching. Many of those children are orphans and of many others the parents were not equal to their duty. Archbishop Ireland thought it would be better to make some provision whereby religion could be taught in those national schools. Stillwater was a town with about 11,000 people, and the suggestion was made that the parochial schools in Stillwater and Fairbault should be taken over by the public school authorities on certain terms and be thrown open to the public school children. The public school books were used in them, the teachers were to have the training and competence of the teachers in the public schools, some provision was made for renting the room, and in this way the parochial schools became public schools, with the provision that at certain times of the day the children should be instructed in their religon, and in the town of Stillwater, the religious pictures which had been hung on the walls of these schools were taken away, much to the annoyance of many Catholics. It is within the knowledge of those who have followed the history of this difficult question that in the year 1885, the famous Roman Catholic Council of Baltimore promulgated certain decrees, enjoining upon the clergy, the duty of urging the people, in the strictest way, to support the Catholic schools, and it was thought that Archbishop Ireland, by the proceeding I have mentioned, had put himself in conflict with the decrees of the Council of Baltimore. The conflict of opinion was so strong that it led to an appeal to Rome, which resulted in a magnificent triumph for Archbishop Ireland. The decision of the propaganda was that the church would tolerate the course adopted by Archbishop Ireland. It was not a course that the church approved of but one which it tolerated. When Cardinal Satolli visited the United States, it was stated generally in the press that one of the purposes of his mission was to strenghten Archbishop Ireland's hands in the working out of that scheme, which he espoused and into the support of which he had thrown tremendous energy. I have been unable to procure in the Library the recent letter of Pope Leo XIII., to the bishops and clergy of the Catholic Church in America, on this school question, but I find in Vol. 6 of the "Educational Review" for 1893, a summary of that letter, which I shall read to the House :

> The recent letter of Pope Leo XIII. to the bishops and clergy of the Catholic church in America is epoch-making in its effects on the attitude of that church towards education.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. This is simply an expression of opinion by an editor who is not a Catholic.

Mr. WELDON. If this is a fair summary of the letter of His Holiness Pope Leo XIII., it is very important for us to note.

> The supreme authority of the church sustain the position taken by Archbishop Satolli. Stated briefly, the Pope's declaration is, "The public school system is definitely recognized and indorsed, preference is expressed for parochial schools, and wherever it is feasible their establishment is recommended ; wherever the parochial schools can be merged in the public schools, on conditions fair to both parties, the union should be effected.

That seems to strike a fatal blow practically at the whole separate school system. No man need be more Catholic than the Pope, and no one need be more jealous to guard of the conscience of the people than that illustrious pontiff, whom I know to be a most powerful personality and I think to be the most attractive personality of Europe—one of the wisest and most gentle of the men of the old world, who is very much beloved beyond the Catholic communion. His encyclical letters on the labour question show his deep sympathy with the poor. If this is a true statement—and I wish that some hon. members of the Catholic faith would put his hands on that letter so that we might have the text and see whether this is or not a fair summary. I think it is one that should be carefully considered by the House. The editor of the "Review" goes on to say :

> What the ultimate effects of this letter, which must be regarded as expressing the settled policy of the Catholic church, may be, it is impossible to predict. One matter, however, it settles immediately, and beyond peradventure. No priest or dignitary of the church has the right to denounce spiritual pains and penalties against Catholic parents who refuse to send their children to a parochial school.

If that is true, it is important.

> This means of filling the parochial schools is no longer effective ; it is contrary to the expressed will of the head of the church. However repugnant it may be to Americans that a foreign power should undertake to decide the attitude of any American citizens towards an American institution, it is at least satisfactory to reflect that the vast power of the Pope, used as it is with dictatorial authority over the dignitaries of the Catholic Church is yet employed to promote the liberty and well-being of the Catholic laity and to restrain clerical zeal that often transcended the bounds, not only of discretion, but, as now appears, of authority.

My argument is this : If that arrangement was made in the autumn of 1891 in that prairie country lying to the south of Manitoba, where there is simply an invisible line cutting the prairie in two, north and south, —over the north the Queen's flag floats, over the south, the stars and stripes. Over the southern portion of that prairie, Archbishop Ireland rules his Catholic people, and in the northern part of the prairies rules His Grace Archbishop Langevin. I, with all courtesy and with the deepest earnestness, commend to my friends of the Roman Catholic faith, who hear me in this committee, the patient, and the sympathetic consideration, of that solution that has been worked out, and which, if my information is right, has been worked out satisfactorily to the citizens of Faribault and Stillwater. These writers say the system has a magnificent support from the public opinion of those states, and from the press, though somewhat opposed by the more extreme Protestants, and in the early stages somewhat opposed by the Catholics who thought it was not in harmony with decrees of the Baltimore Council. I commend to my friends of the Roman Catholic faith in this chamber, the consideration of that system which has the enormous advantage of being approved of by the Roman Propaganda itself. Above everything, there is that spirit of kindness and consideration, shown no where more strongly than in the utterance of Archbishop Ireland himself, and we only desire that if the Catholic people and the Protestant people of Manitoba would agree upon that settlement which has been agreed upon in the south part of the prairie. If these results had been successfully accomplished in the southern part of the prairie, the state of Minnesota, may we not hope for like results to follow a similar plan in the British province of Manitoba to the north. I make this contribution to the debate bearing in mind everything I said before on this phase of the question. Such a solution seems to me to be a hopeful one, and to be a solution the wide world over where English-speaking people are found of mingled faiths, and I do not know why the fact that the minority in Manitoba is French-speaking should materially alter the problem. We have French-speaking people in my own province, Acadian French. We have a large number in the counties of Gloucester, Kent and Madawaska ; there are a considerable number in Westmoreland, Northumberland and Restigouche, and they are doing very well. I dare say it is true, as the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has said, that the system prevailing there is capable of improvement ; but I make no suggestion in that regard. We have tens of thousands who have taken advantage of the national schools, and who are training up the young men into position of greater usefulness and greater prominence than in the old days, because they are better equipped. We have the statement made by members of the Manitoba legislature that in the old days the children of the French half-breeds made little social industrial or political progress, that they did not rise to positions of power or prominence or in the legislature or in the commercial life in cities, and that appears to show that we are authorized in making a comparison between the school systems existing in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where there are a large number of French-speaking people, and the system which has prevailed in Manitoba. I therefore urge that a fair and sympathetic consideration be given for the system which is in operation at Faribault, the Stillwater system.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. The strongest point in regard to the system which has been discussed is, that the dignitaries of the church are in favour of it and have recommended it. If such schools were in operation in Manitoba, would they be attended by the Roman Catholics ? No. The Catholics are subject to the dignitaries of the church. If Bishop Langevin gave permission to parents to send their children to such schools, the Catholics would not say a word, but would accept the situation ; but he has not said so. The church dignitaries exercise this control, and we must submit. The statement made by the hon. gentleman completely proves our case. A bishop in Canada possesses the same powers as Archbishop Ireland, who has admitted that one or two schools attended by Catholic children may be public schools. Bishop Langevin, who possesses the same authority, says : I cannot allow that, and therefore the Catholics cannot send their children to such schools.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I have been much edified by the speech delivered by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who appears to have brought to the consideration of this subject his very best energies, and has contributed much in the course of the debate to enlighten hon. members and the people of the country. (The hon. gentleman then read the correspondence between the Dominion commissioners and representatives of the Manitoba government.)

Mr. DAWSON. It is greatly to be regretted that the request made by the opponents of the Bill that the committee rise and report progress has not been accepted. We have discussed hour after hour many clauses, have amended some, and have dropped others as being utterly useless. The Government should have an opportunity to consider carefully the history of this question. I will therefore read to the committee a pamphlet prepared by themselves entitled : "A summary of the Manitoba school case," which may be found in the last Year-Book at page 317. (The hon. gentleman read the document.) I think that in issuing the remedial order the Government, made a fatal mistake. Common sense ought to have prompted them to enter into negotiations with Manitoba with a view to the settlement by the province of any grievance that might be shown to exist. Had they invited Manitoba to a conference, I am satisfied that the government of the province would have gladly assented, and would have assisted the Dominion Government in arriving at the real facts of the case, and, on the basis of these facts, would have granted such relief to the minority as would best meet the circumstances of the case. However, two days after the report of the committee and without waiting, without a suggestion to Manitoba to act, they issued their remedial order on the 21st March, 1895. That remedial order is as follows.

(The hon. gentleman read the Order in Council, also the proceedings of the Manitoba conference.)

Bullied as they were, insulted as they were, nevertheless the government of Manitoba were ready to go as far as possible in the direction of a settlement of this vexed question. Had the province been approached in a manner suggested years ago by the leader of the Opposition no doubt an arrangement would have been arrived at that would have settled the question to the satisfaction of all parties. It must be manifest that investigation is necessary in order to ascertain what the facts of the case are ; otherwise legislation upon any intelligent basis is impossible. There are many practical difficulties in the way of establishing a school system in any province, but this is especially true of Manitoba. We were told by the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) that the Roman Catholic Church only insisted upon the establishment of separate schools where it was possible to properly maintain them. But I think it can be shown that in many parts in Manitoba the maintenance of these separate schools is a practical impossibility. In proof of this let me read a brief extract from a return brought down in the Manitoba legislature.

(The hon. gentleman read the extract referred to, giving names of 196 school districts in Manitoba wherein the average number of pupils attending school in 1894 was under ten.)

I think the extract I have read abundantly proves the great difficulty of working a separate school system in the province of Manitoba. Now, can this school difficulty be settled in any way short of establishing a system of separate schools ? I do not know. I think it can be. This is a matter for investigation, to be determined by an investigation which ought to be held between the federal authorities and the authorities of Manitoba. We know this, however, that there is not a dual system in the province of Nova Scotia, or in the province of New Brunswick ; yet we have heard hon. members who support this Bill declare that the school systems in those provinces are satisfactory to the minority. There is no dual system in the colony of New Zealand, there is only one set of schools, yet that system is declared to be satisfactory to the Catholics in that colony. In a recently published interview with the Archbishop of Cashel, of Ireland, who was four years Bishop of New Zealand, he is reported to have declared that the school system of New Zealand was perfectly satisfactory to the Catholics. The conversation was touching religious tolerance in New Zealand, and he said that the greatest harmony prevailed between the Protestants and Catholics. The bishop was asked: What about the school system, which is, after all, the supreme test of toleration? The bishop said: The school question is all right; we have a national school system there, one system of schools, but it is provided by law that religious instruction shall be given in those schools from half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, and that the time shall be divided among the representatives of the different religious denominations having charges in the neighbourhood of the school. He said that this plan worked with perfect satisfaction to the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, and it ensured to the children an adequate religious instruction. Now, what can be perfectly satisfactory in New Zealand, in Nova Scotia, and in New Brunswick, can surely be made satisfactory in Manitoba. There is no question about the enormous practical difficulties of establishing the separate school system in a province so sparsely settled as Manitoba; and if a settlement could be arrived at such as has proved satisfactory in the other provinces, surely we can hope that such a settlement as will be acceptable to the minority in the province of Manitoba can also be arrived at. Mr. Chairman, it is now ten o'clock in the morning and I shall vote in favour of the motion that the committee do rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; because those of us who have been here through the weary hours of the night, are very anxious to rise in order that we may get some repose, and if repose is denied us, at least we ought to have the privilege of getting breakfast.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is not hard to find reasons why this committee should rise, and one of the reasons that I will adduce is the very extraordinary performance we had here yesterday afternoon. We had the Secretary of State, in one of his few and brief appearances in this House, a gentleman who is going to die for his country, or for his Bill, but who has taken the most effectual means of preserving his valuable life, comes in here, issues his mandate, and leaves his subordinates to fight as best they can, and retires then to private life for the remainder of the sitting. Sir, a general in the field who should conduct a campaign upon such principles, would very soon find himself at the head of a very lukewarm and disorganized force. However, if it suits hon. gentlemen to be so led, and so governed and so guided and so generalled, I do not know that we have any reason to complain. If the Secretary of State was justified by the first conclusion at which he arrived, that it was necessary to introduce and pass this Remedial Bill in consonance with the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, then he was justified in coming to the second conclusion, that this Bill should pass in its present form as restoring to the Roman Catholics the position of affairs prior to 1890. Yet amendment after amendment has been suggested by opponents of the Bill, and accepted by the Government, because they arrived at the conclusion that without such the Bill would be useless and unworkable. On one clause which was discussed in the latter part of yesterday, clause 12, there were no less than seven amendments accepted by the Government, and the Secretary of State has thanked the Opposition for suggested amendments, which he admitted greatly improved the Bill. Last night one of the clauses which was said to be necessary to the Bill was dropped altogether, and a previous clause also declared to be essential was abandoned. The Bill has been so amended that the person who drafted it would scarcely be able to recognize it. I think the committee should rise, among other reasons, because further consideration should be given to clause 10, a clause which I might characterize as the worst clause of the worst Bill ever laid before the Canadian Parliament. By that clause any five heads of families in any school district in Manitoba have power to establish a separate school district without consulting those who would be called upon to support the school were it established. If there are fifty Roman Catholic families residing within the boundaries of a school district, and of those families forty-five were in favour of maintaining the system now established and having the children attend the public schools, where they are obtaining an education that is satisfactory, and those families were unwilling further to burden themselves with the necessary expenditure for a separate school, nevertheless five families would have the power to establish a separate school simply by their own petition. So those five families would have the power to establish a school contrary to the wishes of the majority. Influences might be brought to bear on five families in a school district to lead them to petition, they might be under the control of some authority which would compel them to establish a school even if it were not to the advantage of their children. Yet clauses of this important nature have been passed in committee when only a dozen members were present. It is a mockery of legislation to consider a Bill under such conditions. This Bill is announced by the Secretary of State to be of the utmost importance, and in that view it should be considered by the whole House, and not by a wearied and worn-out portion of it. One lesson the House and the country may learn from the proceedings of last week, and those now going is that it is the worst kind of parliamentary tactics to attempt to force a Bill through this House by physical strength. When we regard the course taken by the Government we may learn a further lesson as a mere question of parliamentary tactics. Had the Government been prepared with the Bill at the beginning of the session, had it been printed and laid before the House and a week or two afforded for consideration, and then had the second reading been moved and carried, even after the length of time which elapsed in the present case, and the House gone into committee on the Bill, and sat reasonable hours and discussed the Bill clause by clause and endeavoured to confine the discussion to the merits of the particular clause under consideration, it would have been absolutely impossible for any portion of this House to have prevented the passage of this Bill during the time at the disposal of the Government. So the Government, as regards tactics, have committed two grievous errors. They allowed two months to elapse before they brought up the Bill for discussion, and then they committed the greater error of endeavouring to force it through the House under the conditions prevailing last week, and during the present portion of this week if they had pursued the course ordinarily pursued, the course which our rules prescribe, and which every consideration for health and good order and decorum would suggest, the Bill at least would have made twice the progress now recorded.

I should like to give expression for a moment or two to a matter very properly brought forward by the leader of the House yesterday, and to add my voice to what has already been said on that subject. The attacks made on hon. gentlemen and on the proceedings of this House during last week by one or two public bodies, and the opinions expressed by those bodies, and published and spread broadcast throughout the country, are of a character which every hon. member ought to resent, and I think we are justified in resenting them in the warmest and most emphatic terms. The charge has been made against members of this House that during the long sittings scenes took place of a very disreputable character, which should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of members, and were a disgrace not only to the House, but to the country. I should like to say from a pretty thorough knowledge of members of this House, and speaking from many years of parliamentary experience, that if you were to take at random 215 gentlemen out of the various classes of the community, the comparison would be in favour of the members of this House. The libel, for I must call it so, although undoubtedly it was based on premises supposed to be correct, but absolutely untrue, is one which this House is bound to refer to and reply to. I am sorry that an opportunity was not given with the Speaker in the Chair to bring up this subject as a question of privilege and allow hon. members the opportunity of expressing their sense of the grave injustice done and the calumnious nature of the statements made with respect to the House; but as no other opportunity has arisen, and as this is a calumny which ought to be refuted at the earliest possible moment, I take this opportunity of saying how bitterly I felt that this imputation should have been cast on hon. members whose conduct did not in the slightest degree warrant any such imputation. It was not to be expected that during a sitting lasting from three o'clock on Monday until twelve midnight Saturday, there should be the same dignity and decorum preserved as generally characterizes the proceedings of this House, and especially as the House was in committee, when there is always more or less latitude in discussion, and not the same strict regard for order in debate. But the libel is of such a character that speaking relatively there is absolutely no foundation for it.

There are many other reasons why the committee should rise. This is Wednesday, April 15th. According to the rules of the House this day is to be devoted to the discussion of public business, and to the consideration of public Bills. Two of these Bills should pass the House this session, if any Bills should pass. One is a Bill introduced by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), relating to conspiracies and combinations in restraint of trade. Everybody knows that we have various combinations in restraint of trade, but it is difficult to pass legislation which will really restrain such combinations. Such legislation has been before the British Parliament, in one form or another, almost constantly for the last three or four hundred years, and most stringent laws have been passed, without effecting any good. One method by which these combinations could largely be done away with is to abolish the high measure of protection which gives a few individuals control of any branch of manufacture.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. gentleman cannot discuss a Bill on the Order paper on the motion now before the Chair.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I understand you, Mr. Chairman. I presume that your ruling does not preclude the discussion of the importance of a measure as an argument in favour of the committee rising in order to discuss that measure.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). The hon. gentleman was discussing the measure itself, which was not in order.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the House would put itself in a false position if an hon. gentleman were prevented from alluding to the measures that were being delayed by reason of this committee sitting, and arguing from that that the committee should rise.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). But the hon. gentleman was going further, he was anticipating the debate on the Bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have no wish at all, Mr. Chairman, to do anything but accept your ruling. If I was about to transgress the rules, I am glad you have called me to order. I was giving reasons from the state of the Order paper in favour of the committee rising. One of the Bills awaiting discussion is in relation to combinations and in restraint of trade. I do not think legislation of the kind proposed is likely to be very effective. The only way to accomplish the object, which is one I should like the House to consider, is to do away with the high protection which is the means of bringing these combinations into existence. If the committee were to rise, and this measure were to be discussed, I think the House would come to the conclusion that the revision of the tariff is the best means of accomplishing the object in view. But, of course, as long as we are in committee on the present Bill, we are precluded from discussing matters of this kind. There is another Bill which ought to be passed this session. I shall not consider the details of it, but I think all will agree that it should be passed this session. The measure I refer to is one taking out of the hands of the executive, the power which, I think, I may safely say they have greatly abused, of holding by-elections at their own convenience. I believe that one of the divisions of the city of Quebec was unrepresented for months because the Government supporters could not agree upon a suitable candidate. Sir John Macdonald used to say that he wished to govern the country by the party for the country. Unfortunately, his good intention often failed, and he governed the country by the party for the party. But that has been done much more persistently by his successors in office, until, I think it is not too much to say the Government has departed from every real principle it professed to represent and is now managed entirely in the interests of the few gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury benches. In no way do they accomplish their object more effectively than in their method of dealing with by-elections. There are, I believe, at least four constituencies not represented in this House to-day. This is a condition of things that is discreditable to the Government because they allow it to exist, discreditable to this House because the majority support the Government, and discreditable to the country because the Government has been hitherto supported by a majority of the electors. Another Parliament ought not to be allowed to assemble without measures having been taken to prevent the executive using the powers they now possess, under which the Government candidate in a constituency practically nominates his own returning officer. I have always felt that that was a grave abuse, and was, in the long run, of very little advantage to the candidate himself, because it exposed him to imputations under which no man of high principles cared to rest. After the experience of the few elections I have run, I would rather submit to the possible partial conduct of an official appointed by a provincial authority than be subject any longer to the present system. Another Bill on the Order paper dealing with a subject which ought to be dealt with before the next election is that to give authority to deal summarily with personators. I am sure it was with surprise and regret that members of the House learned that one of the women voters lately enfranchised in Ontario had been guilty of personation. As one who has always opposed the extension of the franchise to women, I cannot but think the prospect of the appearance of the female personator as a factor in political contests is a matter which cannot be ignored by those who favour this change in our law. No doubt the crime was committed in this case through ignorance, because I do not believe that the feminine mind is so constituted that it can understand the enormity of a crime of that kind. I think that legislation should be adopted this session which will give power to deal summarily with personators. I know constituencies in this country in which personation may be carried on very easily, and I should like to see means taken to prevent it. Another reason why the committee should rise—following the example of the leader of the House and going back to first principles—is that the Bill now before the House is a vicious Bill. It is based upon false premises. The leader of the House said some days ago that he was not foolish enough to take his law from the counsel of the other side. But the hon. gentleman is not wise enough to take the advice of the lawyers even on his own side, and makes a speech in direct opposition to the opinion of those lawyers. In order to force this Bill through the House, this hon. gentleman is brought from his agreeable mansion in Cromwell Road to take up his abode in this comparatively small city of Ottawa. But it is only reasonable we should know whom we are to trust, upon this important legal question. It therefore becomes a question whether we are to trust the gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill, or whether we are to accept the legal opinions of those gentlemen by whom the Bill was drafted. This is another reason why I say this committee ought to rise and go to other business, and allow this Bill to go into the limbo of unfulfilled possibilities. If at any future time this Bill is to be proceeded with, let it be put into the hands of somebody who knows something about it; and when it comes to be discussed in committee, let us have a guarantee, in the first place, that somebody shall be on the Treasury benches who understands the Bill, and who is able to take charge of it. Another reason why the committee should rise, is that this Parliament is not competent to deal with this Bill. Within a fortnight this Parliament will cease to have any legal existence. We know that many of its members are practically no longer responsible to the people; we know that many of them have openly avowed their intention of not again contesting an election; therefore, I say they are not responsible to the people, there is no one by whom they can be called to account. An hon. gentleman sitting in this House who is going to contest a constituency at the coming election, may be held responsible, because his electors can call him to account. But an hon. gentleman sitting here and who intends, as soon as this Parliament is over, to retire from political life, is not a responsible member of Parliament, he has no right to be expressing an opinion and voting upon this Bill; and that is one of the most powerful reasons why this committee should rise and proceed no further with this Bill. Then again the Bill ought not to be proceeded with because it is based upon an unsound principle; it purports to take from a province the power of dealing with a subject which is declared to be within its jurisdiction. It is also a bad Bill, because, in regard to its details, it does not give to those whom it professes to benefit, any practical advantage. No answer whatever has been made in this House by the supporters of this Bill, to the objection which I raised and which other members have raised, that there is not a dollar provided for carrying on the machinery of this Bill. Those gentlemen who are clamorous for this Bill, before we proceed any further, ought to give us some reasonable proposal by which means may be provided for carrying the Bill into effect. They have not attempted to do so. The Bill does not provide even for the rent of a room in which the Board of Education may meet; they would have to meet at a street corner for aught that is provided in this Bill. There is no means provided for paying the services of a secretary and nothing for the payment of a superintendent. Sir, under these circumstances I trust the Government will allow this sitting to close, and let the House get into the important business that yet remains to be done before the session closes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to see the Minister of Public Works present for I want to call his attention to a matter which comes under his department, as it has reference to the ventilation of this chamber. Now, I have come in here on several occasions and have found the air in this chamber so foul and so bad that it positively produced a feeling of nausea. If the Government are determined to go on with their present extremely silly course, I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he allow this chamber to be ventilated to some extent between eight and ten o'clock in the morning, as we have it ventilated to some extent between six and eight o'clock in the evening. It can surely do the Government no harm, and may not destroy the effect they are endeavouring to produce upon certain classes of the electors by pretending to be exceedingly anxious to put through this Bill—it can do the Government no harm, I think, if two hours between eight and ten in the morning are allowed for the purpose of getting a little fresh air into this chamber. I think there should be enough sense left in the Government to allow that very small remedial measure to be adopted. Now, there is one other grave objection to these continuous sittings, and that is that whenever any important question or any important amendment is proposed, only about one-third of the House are present to hear it or consider it, and the other two-thirds are physically incapacitated from being present. Under such circumstances it becomes necessary for those arguments and discussions to be repeated for the benefit of those hon. gentlemen who were not present in the first instance. I give a case in point. Here we are discussing a matter of very grave import, the question whether there is really any evidence before this committee that the Catholic minority of Manitoba, as a whole, desires interference on our part. It will be remembered that the government of Manitoba denied that. It will also be remembered that certain persons, professing to speak for the minority, have affirmed it; but it is to be borne in mind that this is a matter in doubt, that no evidence has been given to the committee to show that the minority, speaking collectively and as a whole, do desire this Government to interfere, and there has been strong presumptive evidence to show that if the minority were left alone, the majority of the minority would be quite well content with matters as they are. I was absent from the House when section 10 came up for consideration, for I had already been in attendance fourteen or fifteen hours. Consequently, it will be my duty, if this Bill ever reaches a third reading to cause this section to be discussed before the whole House and the amendments fully debated; and it is well that hon. gentlemen opposite should understand that if they attempt to force the measure through the House in this fashion, to cause important clauses to be considered at an hour when not more than a small fraction of the members can be present, we will take good care that these sections and amendments will be discussed with the Speaker in the Chair, and discussed fully and exhaustively before they pass. That is one of the results which flow from this most ill-advised course which the Government have entered upon, of inducing this House to sit for a hundred hours or more continuously. I am informed that clause 10 was passed substantially as it stands, without amendment. I want to draw the attention of the committee to this fact. There is a very strong presumption, from the discussion which then took place, that those persons who have been alleging that the minority of Manitoba were seriously anxious for the change, are not correct. There is a very strong presumption, to say the least, from the admissions made on the floor of this House, and notably by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), that those parties who pretend to represent and speak for the minority, are endeavouring to pass a Bill through which a very large number of that minority do not want. A provision which fixes so exceedingly small a minimum as ten children of school age, living within a district of 6 miles square, because that is the effect of living within three miles of where the school site is fixed, is giving altogether unreasonable and absurd power. Ten children practically represent two, three or four families, living within thirty-six square miles, who, of course, would be utterly unable to support a school. It is foolish and absurd to suppose that in such an area you can find three or four families who will be able to support a school in a separate school district. Consider all the incidental expenses that will have to be met, and the fact that the school would not share in the legislative grant, even under this Bill, and let us ask ourselves how it is likely that such a school could be successfully carried on. That alone should be sufficient to show that there was very great cause indeed for altering and amending the whole section.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does not the hon. gentleman think the fact that the clause was in operation from 1881 to 1890, must be some argument in favour of restoring it? So far as we know, there was no complaint.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The answer to that is simply this. As the hon. gentleman must admit, practically a great many of these clauses had proved absolutely dead letters. In the second place, the legislature of Manitoba, familiar with all the geographical conditions of the country, determined to abolish it purely for that reason.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman any evidence that the legislature of Manitoba seriously objected to that provision in itself? I think it is not so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have this evidence. I have travelled personally over a very large part of Manitoba, not once or twice, but a dozen times, and I have conversed very freely with the settlers. A great many of them are from the county I formerly represented, the county of Huron, and I was perfectly well known to them, and they spoke freely of their hopes and prospects. They complained to me in the bitterest terms of the extreme difficulty they experienced in securing the proper education of their children. There is no doubt we committed almost a fatal mistake by introducing what is known as the checkerboard system of land survey in Manitoba, by which the settler gets possession of one section, and the adjoining section is sold and bought by speculators. The result of the system is that in a township six miles square, containing thirty-six square miles, there are eighteen sections occupied and eighteen vacant. That enormously increases the difficulty of obtaining good schools. That is one reason why I hold it is extremely dangerous and mischievous to allow, as under the proposal here, a very small number of heads of families, five, to be able to constitute themselves into a school district. The reason came out extremely clearly in the discussion which followed. I find the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) is reported in "Hansard" to have said:

> According to this clause, whenever five heads of families belonging to the Roman Catholic religion want to have separate schools, their first step will be to present a petition to the municipal council. If the municipal council does not act in three months, the Board of Education shall be at liberty to establish those school districts. The clause does not provide that the five heads of families shall be Roman Catholics, and consequently even Protestants or Jews may present the petition. It would be better to insert the words "Roman Catholic," so as to make it clear. But there is a much more serious objection. Suppose there were fifty heads of Roman Catholic families, and that only five of these were desirous of having separate schools. Those five heads of families would petition for the creation of a school district, and what would be the result? The forty-five other heads of families would be compelled to adopt separate schools unless they took proceedings to separate themselves from them. I do not think these five heads should be allowed to compel the rest of the minority to form part of this system of separate schools, or take steps to get out of the system. We should fix a certain proportion. The majority of the minority should petition, because otherwise they would work an injustice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member is clearly against separate schools in that argument.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, the hon. gentleman is in favour of establishing separate schools, when the majority so desire. But the hon. gentleman objected to five heads of families being allowed to establish separate schools; he objected, with very great force, to allowing an insignificant minority to bring in the others.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They could not do it, for those people could get out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are not as well informed in the law as some hon. members.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They will all know how to get rid of taxes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a totally different thing for such people to get out, because they may expose themselves to clerical censure. A much fairer way is not to compel them to come in, but to let them come in if they wish. It became very clear, as the discussion went on, that hon. gentlemen who profess to speak for the minority were exceedingly afraid to grant this power. It was clear, according to the opinions expressed by those members, that there was, in their judgment, very considerable danger that, if the minority were left to their own devices, the great bulk would prefer to stay as they are, perhaps from a desire to avoid paying heavy taxes, or perhaps because thereby they obtained a better education for their children, because the settlers complain strongly of the extreme difficulty found in getting schools established.

Mr. DALY. In regard to what years does the hon. gentleman speak ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. 1882-84-85-86. After 1886, I am not in a position to speak.

Mr. DALY. I think the hon. gentleman has reference to southern Manitoba.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not alone, by any means.

Mr. DALY. It must be remembered that the population has very largely increased in those years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was one section, but it was not by any means the only section.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman said there was nothing to inquire into.

Mr. DALY. The census will give these facts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should be glad to know that the population had increased so much. But I am afraid that, even making all allowance after the census returns, the facts are not so favourable as the hon. gentleman says. The difficulty in the way might not be so great as in 1886, and I hope it is not. But the portion of Manitoba that is south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, I think, must be about two hundred miles long by a hundred miles wide——

Mr. DALY. My constituency is 172 miles long and 72 miles wide, and covers the whole of what is ordinarily known as Southern Manitoba.

Mr. CHARLTON. It cannot be densely populated.

Mr. DALY. The population is 63,000, and there are 21,000 names on my voters' list.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You would have an average of one head of a family to every one and one-third, or one and one-half square miles. Allowing for the towns, you might say there was one head of a family for every two square miles. Even if that population is homogeneous, having one religion and no strong line of division, it is manifest that the difficulty of obtaining suitable school accommodation and good-sized schools is very great. Speaking from recollection, I think that in some of these schools the average attendance fell as low as seven or eight.

Mr. DALY. In the public schools, at certain seasons, I have no doubt it did.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We do not require to be told, as practical men, that, under these circumstances, it is difficult to keep up schools at all, and I think we should be exceedingly careful how we provide for further division or put power in the hands of a small number of people to compel the erection of separate schools. These people cannot be expected to be familiar with the cost involved in maintaining such a school until they have tried the experiment. Once they have got into the separate school system and have plunged themselves, as they might do by the issue of debentures, into considerable debt, they would find it exceedingly difficult, no matter how inefficient the school might be, to get out of it again. Under this section, it would be possible for five heads of families who may not have children to send to school, to compel all the others to take part in bearing the expenses of a separate school. More than that, the spiritual adviser might take exception to any conduct on their part looking to getting out of the separate schools, and it is not desirable to place them under such conditions. If they choose to go in of their own motion, well and good.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to point out that I gave an illustration on the same subject, following immediately after the hon. member for Quebec county. This is what I said :

> I am surprised that the hon. member for Quebec Centre should make such a suggestion. He asks that the majority of the minority should decide. But suppose there were twenty-five Catholic heads of families, and that twelve of these were in favour of separate schools, under the hon. gentleman's contention they would be deprived of their schools. The clause is much more reasonable. Under it those who do not want to form part of the separate school districts have only to notify the municipal clerk, which is a very simple matter, and they will be freed from it.

My contention was, as the hon. member had said, that five might secure the formation of a school district against the preference of the other forty-five, there was a simple way for these people to decline the responsibility. On the other hand, if it was left to the majority of the minority, as suggested by the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), the minority might have no schools, even though they applied for them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not understand my hon. friend (Mr. Langelier) to insist upon that. That was only a suggestion. I think that those who do not wish to join should be left out.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I was answering the contention of the hon. member for Quebec Centre.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes ; but the hon. member for Quebec Centre did not insist upon his suggestion, and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) did not abate his contention that the five should have this power. As I pointed out, these five might not have children.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. How could they be heads of families and not have children ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They might not have children of school age. I am bound to say, however, that the hon. gentleman's compatriots and co-religionists do not generally fail in that respect. But even in a large family it does not follow that the children will be of school age. But all this goes to show that the gentlemen who are the authorized exponents of the views of the minority, are not at all sure—and that is the point I wish specially to impress upon the committee—that the majority do want this in a great many cases. I can understand that in those cases where the people of one faith are clustered together, they should want to have, and I think they ought to have —I will say that much—reasonable facilities given them to carry on the religious instruction of their children. But that can usually be done without the passing of such a law as this. In point of fact, I understand that the Manitoba government are as anxious as we are to practically concede that. But, where the population is very much scattered or mixed, the difficulty is much greater. By this Act you are going to offer a premium for the establishment of two or three inefficient schools in place of one good one. Everybody knows that in a farm district, and particularly in such a case as this, where many of the people have been kept back by the very low prices of their products, it would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for the minority to maintain an inefficient school. In all this there is evidence that, before we proceed further with this measure, before we do what is alleged to be irrevocable, we ought to have knowledge of the facts. It is in the consideration of such a point as that now before us, that I can understand that an inquiry would be of great value. Local knowledge as to the condition and the working of the system ought to be before us. As the Minister of the Interior has said, local knowledge is imperatively necessary, in order to form an accurate conclusion, and it should be local knowledge up to date. That local knowledge we do not possess.

The accurate knowledge we have not got. There is but one way by which we could obtain it, and that is by causing a careful inquiry to be made. If that careful inquiry has been made, if these things were presented to us, and we were allowed to examine them, if we had any real authentic data to act upon, then I could understand the action of the Government, and the House would be in a position to discuss this Bill with some hope of arriving at a just and impartial decision. But as it is, I feel that we are plunged in a sea of doubt whenever any disputed question arises. We have no secure authority to go to. We have the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) saying one thing, and we have the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) saying directly the opposite. We have other members like myself, having some partial acquaintance with the subject, dealing with it according to the best of our light, but avowedly dealing with it as men who have only a partial knowledge. I submit, under these circumstances, that it is impossible for us to make any useful progress whatever with this measure; and therefore I support the motion that the committee do now rise, and sit again six weeks hence.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was surprised, in coming into the chamber this morning, to find this farce still upon the boards. We have only two Ministers in their seats, and a few moments ago neither of them were here. We are going through the mockery of considering a Bill, the farcical character of which proceeding every member fully realizes. Every member knows that it is utterly impossible to reach the final stage of this Bill. We have still 100 clauses to act upon. After these clauses are acted upon, we have the preamble to discuss, we have the third reading of the Bill, with the amendments that are sure to be moved upon the third reading, and which will provoke a long discussion ; and after all that is done, the Bill has to be taken up in the Senate.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. When the hon. gentleman calls the whole thing a farce, does he include the reading of the scriptures the other day ?

Mr. CHARLTON. The matter then under discussion was as to the character of the religious teaching in the Manitoba schools, and the character of these teachings is to be ascertained by an examination of the prayers and the scriptural selections used in the school. In order to understand their character, it was necessary to read them, and I attempted to do so. That attempt was received by jeers and sneers and cries of " Amen "; and the whole proceeding illustrated the truth of that saying in holy writ that it is not advisable to cast pearls before swine.

This is not the proper place, I am willing to admit now, to attempt to read the Holy Scriptures, or to illustrate anything by Divine truth.

Mr. DALY. It altogether depends upon who reads them.

Mr. CHARLTON. There was nothing in the reading of the selections that was not reverent and respectful; the only thing irreverent in the transaction was the manner in which these selections were received. I only read two of the selections out of the whole number. Now, Mr. Chairman, this farce consists in the determination of the Government to continue the consideration of this question in committee when it is clearly impossible to arrive at any tangible result. The failure of the Bill is foredoomed; it cannot reach its final stages in this House. So far as the Bill has been proceeded with, we discover that it is full of incongruities and crudities, that it requires the most careful consideration, that almost every clause in it requires reconstructing, and there are provisions that require to be eliminated. The whole thing is of a character which requires the most careful and earnest consideration of this House. The time is not at our disposal to give this Bill such consideration. The Government have frittered away the time that they might have employed in considering the Bill, and they are now pressing it on, within a few days of the closing of Parliament for the purpose, if possible, of impressing upon a certain section in this country that they are very earnest in this matter. But the subterfuge is too thin, and the country understands it. A very small fraction of the population of Canada will be deceived by the attitude of the Government in this respect. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, in reply to a statement made by my hon. friend the member for South Oxford, said that the impression of the member for South Oxford as to the population of Manitoba, gained by his visit in 1886, were not to be relied upon now, that the increase of population has been so rapid since then that any deductions he might draw from a visit in 1886, would be wide of the mark to-day. Take the constituency of the hon. Minister of the Interior himself. It has an area of about 8,750 square miles, and contained a population, in 1891, of 63,000, or a fraction over seven to the square mile. Now, among those seven there would be two or, at the utmost, three children of school age, and that in the constituency which the hon. gentleman represents to be the most densely populated of the rural parts of Manitoba. In many portions of the province there cannot be more than two children of school age to the square mile. Now, to get thirty children for school purposes, it would require ten sections of the province, or a block of land some seven miles square. Even in his own constituency the population is too sparse to admit of the idea of the division of this school population into two separate schools. The peculiar manner in which the territory of Manitoba and the North-west is divided, renders it very difficult to secure that degree of density of population that is necessary for the maintenance of common schools. I have here a plan of a Manitoba township, and I find that out of thirty-six sections, there are nineteen and three-quarter sections reserved for the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway purposes, and for school lands; leaving less than one-half the land, in an average township, available for homestead settlement, necessarily scattering the population, and rendering it difficult to secure a school population necessary for the maintenance of a public school within an area that would permit of the attendance of pupils upon one school. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior calls into question the correctness of the statement made by the member for South Oxford as to the average attendance at those schools, and he asserted that the average attendance might possibly be as low as ten in some school sections, in the summer season when the attendance was not up to the average; but that statement made by the hon. Minister could scarcely be accepted. Now, I have a statement here as to the average attendance at the public schools in Manitoba for the year 1894, and which gives a list of 196 schools, the average attendance at which, in each case, was less than ten for the year. It is a very striking statement, and I will read it for the information of the committee. (The hon. gentleman reads a list of schools in Manitoba with an attendance of less than ten pupils, and giving the average attendance at each.) There are 194 schools in Manitoba with an average annual attendance of less than ten pupils, going down to a fraction below five. Nothing could show more strongly the position of affairs. Surely we are warranted in saying that if any plan can be adopted that will avoid further dividing the educational system into two school systems, it is commendable.

Mr. DALY. What does the hon. gentleman intend to prove by these figures?

Mr. CHARLTON. I submit that they show that the school population in Manitoba in the school districts is sparse, and every effort should be made to prevent division of the educational system into two systems.

Mr. DALY. Of all the school districts referred to by the hon. gentleman, not one is a Roman Catholic school district or a Roman Catholic community which has come under the Public School Act.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. Minister may speak with a local knowledge of the facts, which I do not possess. The return from which I quote is dated 1894. The statement has been made that all Roman Catholics in the province of Manitoba are attending public schools, except Roman Catholics in Winnipeg and St. Boniface, and the presumption is that the Catholic children in that year were attending some of the schools to which I have referred.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be surprised to learn that there are more than twenty-five schools, other than public schools outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, which are not under the public school system at all. They are in the parishes of Lorette, Ste. Anne, LaBroquerie, St. Norbert, Ste. Agathe, St. Pierre, St. Malo, St. Jean-Baptiste and St. Joseph. There is one school in St. François-Xavier, within my own constituency, which has come within the public school system. These schools to which I have referred are private Roman Catholic schools. They cannot be called separate schools, because they are not recognized by law, and they are supported by public and private subscriptions.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose the hon. gentleman has a local knowledge of the question. His declaration, however, conflicts with the statement made by two members of the Manitoba government.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That is the report of a paid agent of the local government.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is the report of members of the local government of Manitoba, a report made on their honour as members of the government, and we have that statement offset by the declaration of the member for Provencher.

Mr. DALY. He is just as much entitled to belief as those gentlemen.

Mr. McCARTHY. The weight of evidence is two to one.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is another illustration of the truth of the statement that we should have an investigation before we proceed any further with this proposed legislation. Reference has been made to the fact that while a Catholic not desiring that his children shall attend the public schools can avoid taxation by giving due notice to an official, yet it must be remembered that if a parent desires his children to attend the public schools he is liable to incur the disapprobation of the Roman Catholic priest.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I have a far better opinion of the people I represent, and I know they will be guided by their own conscience.

Mr. CHARLTON. I should like that permission to be enjoyed by the Roman Catholics without the contingency of any unpleasantness following.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If the hon. gentleman thinks that members of our church are a flock of sheep, he is quite mistaken. We follow the doctrines and teachings of the church, and that is sufficiently satisfactory.

Mr. CHARLTON. The law should provide that Catholic laymen might send their children to public schools without incurring the disapprobation of their spiritual advisers. A little incident occurred in a city of 12,000 people near the boundary line of the United States which convinces me that Catholics do not attach so much importance to separate schools as their priests do. Among the Catholics in this city was a bank president and an Irishman, who was a leading politician. They had sons who were attending the public schools. The priest insisted they should attend the parochial schools, and summoned them as contumacious members before the bishop. The priest stated the facts of the case, and the politician then explained to the bishop that they were determined to bring up their sons for business callings and the professions, and they were anxious to have them thoroughly educated. They were therefore determined to keep them at the public schools, even though they should be excommunicated. The bishop said the explanation was quite satisfactory, and he sent the parties about their business. (The hon. gentleman then read statistics respecting the attendance at the public and separate schools in Manitoba.) These are some of the reasons assigned for the dissatisfaction in Manitoba with regard to the dual school system which prevailed in the province from 1871 to 1890. The same work devotes a few paragraphs to the changes made by the Act of 1890. (The hon. gentleman read the paragraphs referred to.) Further on the author deals with the question why the Acts of 1890 were passed. (The hon. gentleman read the paragraphs referred to.)

Mr. DALY. I wish to say a word or two in reference to the Roman Catholic school population of Manitoba, in answer to some of the remarks of the hon. gentleman. The last report I can find is printed in French, in the Journals of the legislative assembly. At page 6 of that report I find the following figures are given, showing the school population in the separate schools in the various districts. Before reading that, however, I may say for the information of the hon. member for South Oxford, that his argument as to the scattered nature of the population might apply in the case of the public schools, but not in the case of the separate schools. It is well known that our French Canadian citizens have large families ; they do not live in scattered communities the same as the English-speaking people, but they are generally found living in communities in the older parishes along the river, or on the prairies where they do not occupy, on an average, over 160 acres of land. This is the table to which I refer :

Total	4,364

Here we have a total Roman Catholic school population of 4,364. If the hon. gentleman will compare these figures with a similar number of public schools in 1888, he will find that in almost every instance there is a larger attendance of Roman Catholic children at their schools than there was of Protestant children at the public schools.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does my hon. friend not believe that the figures he has just quoted furnish a reason for demanding that before any action is taken on this matter, there should be an investigation.

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. CHARLTON. The position of the Liberal party has been that it is of the highest importance that a thorough investigation upon all these points should first be made. We had it stated by my hon. friend some time ago that there was nothing to investigate. I deny it. There is very much to investigate, and every hour this debate progresses develops some new reason why an investigation into these matters should be held.

Mr. DALY. What I said on that occasion stands good at the present time. I said all the information the hon. gentleman wanted as to facts, could be got in the Library. I got from the Library this report, which I have just read, giving just such information as the hon. gentleman wanted. He had access to it the same as any other member, but he chooses to quote from a partisan pamphlet prepared by Mr. Wade, which cost the province of Manitoba $750, and in which all matters are coloured. I am quoting from public documents published by the government of Manitoba, and the facts are incontrovertible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not disputing the hon. gentleman's facts ; but I would point out that what he is referring to now is more particularly the distribution of the French Catholic population, and I presume does not refer to the Irish Catholic population, scattered among the rest of the population, of whom, presumably, there would be a good many.

Mr. DALY. Very few, indeed. I can say that in my own constituency, from Gretna to the western boundary of the province, running from township 1 to township 6, I only know of one Irish Roman Catholic.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman says we can go to the Library and procure all the information necessary in order to arrive at a conclusion on this subject. The statement made by the hon. gentleman is preposterous. Can we in the Library verify the truth of the statement that outside Winnipeg and St. Boniface the Catholic population are willing to accept the public schools? How can we find out in the Library what is the state of feeling of the Catholic minority of Manitoba on this whole matter ? Can we find out what view they take of the public school law, whether they have become reconciled to the operation of that law after six years' experience ? There are a hundred things that we cannot find out without an investigation, and which are essential to enable us to arrive at a just decision of this question. We want to ascertain the state of public sentiment. We want to verify the assertion made by the members of the Manitoba government that the Roman Catholic population outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, are attending the public schools and are satisfied, and that they would not vote for a restoration of the separate school system.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has just said that we should not be called upon to go to the Library to get information that we are not possessed of. I must tell the hon. member that all the information that he requires, if he was open to conviction, could be found in the Library, in the official reports of the present government of Manitoba, even since the abolition of Roman Catholic schools. I have in my hand the report made Mr. A. L. Young, the inspector appointed by the Greenway government to visit the so-called French schools, that is to say, the schools that have remained in operation since the abolition of the separate schools. I will read this extract from his report:

> I beg to submit the following report of the schools visited by me during the latter part of the year 1892:—
> During the last three months I visited over fifty districts, the majority of these being in the French settlements along the Red, Assiniboine, Seine and Rat Rivers, and formerly under the jurisdiction of the Catholic section of the Board of Education.
> The seating accommodation in many of the schools is insufficient; a few are provided with patent desks, but the greater part still use the home-made desks and benches.
> As a rule the blackboards used are much too small, and in many cases of poor quality. With only two or three exceptions, all the schools visited by me were well supplied with a sufficient number of good maps.
> Five schools are claimed to be conducted according to the Public Schools Act of 1890, in regard to religious exercises. Of these, three are in charge of teachers holding first-class certificates, one is in charge of a teacher having a second-class, and one in charge of a teacher having a third-class certificate; of the total number of teachers seen by me, about 50 per cent hold first-class certificates, 20 per cent hold second-class, and 10 per cent have third-class certificates. About 20 per cent are teaching without certificates, these being young lady graduates of the various convents who have begun teaching since the closing of the St. Boniface Normal School.
> Of the schools visited by me six were in charge of male teachers. The salaries paid are in all cases very low.
> There is an average enrollment of over thirty pupils to each school, some of the larger schools having from one hundred to one hundred and fifty pupils.
> With remarkably few exceptions, English is taught in all the schools. The parents and trustees recognize the desirability of having their children study English, consequently those teachers who have a sufficient knowledge of the English language to teach it successfully are in much greater demand and receive higher wages than those who understand the French language only. As a rule the scholars read and translate English in a very creditable manner.
> In St. Anne's Convent, where through the courtesy of the Rev. Father Giroux and the Sisters in charge I was given every opportunity to examine the school work, I found the higher classes remarkably well advanced in English, their pronounciation being exceptionally good.
> In regard to French reading, there is room for considerable improvement in expression.

Mind you, this report is made by an English-speaking gentleman, and a Protestant, appointed by the local government since the abolition of our schools:

> A good share of attention is given to arithmetic; this subject, however, could be more successfully taught if the schools were provided with a more liberal supply of blackboards.
> Very creditable work is done by many of the more advanced pupils in composition, written translation from French to English, letter writing, &c. As a rule the books used for this purpose are kept extremely neat, and reflect credit on both teachers and pupils.
> In teaching geography good use is made of a liberal supply of maps with which the majority of schools are supplied.
> A noticeable feature of these schools is the very limited number of boys in the higher divisions.

An extract from Mr. Young's report for 1893 may be added:

> In all districts visited by me, I found a strong desire on the part of all concerned to make the teaching of the English language a prominent feature of the schools. In one district this idea was carried so far that the teacher was forbidden to make any use of the French language. This I consider to be a mistake.

I consider this remark of the gentleman himself, to be a mistake. Now, I would not like to cast any reflection at all on the present schools in Manitoba. But we are taunted with the inefficiency of our schools as they existed prior to their abolition; I would remark that at present our schools are conducted without any grant, and without the school authorities being able to levy taxation for their support. Nevertheless, I have shown by this report that these schools are just as good as can be expected, and, in fact, better than could be expected under the present circumstances. Now, I have extracts from reports of the inspectors of the public schools as they exist to-day. This is what Mr. McCalman, of the eastern inspectoral division, says in his report:

> The irregularity of attendance in the majority of schools is a deplorable fact.
> Of the one hundred and forty teachers of the division, nineteen held first-class certificates, seventy-five held second-class certificates, thirty-nine held third-class certificates, and seven held permits.
> Twenty-five teachers—about eighteen per cent of the total number—were without any previous experience, or professional training whatever.
> In advanced classes too little attention is given to the mechanics of reading, and indistinct articulation, and lack of clearness of enunciation are too common.
> Writing does not receive that faithful attention it demands, and results are almost uniformly poor.

In the subject of geography teachers are handicapped by the lack of reference books.

In music, notwithstanding that the subject has formed a part of the course of instruction at the provincial and local normal schools for the past two years, the teaching is somewhat spasmodic.

In Mr. S. E. Lang's report of the North-west inspectoral division there is the following :—

It would perhaps be correct to say that about two-thirds of the teachers are doing work which may be described as fair. Of the remainder about one-half are doing very good work, while the others must be classed as unmistakably poor —very poor in some cases.

The meagre results in arithmetic are probably due to a misapprehension of the nature of the science of number.

It is not surprising to find the advanced work in arithmetic poorly done in many cases when it rests on a weak foundation of elementary training.

In the subjects of history and geography the dependence of some teachers upon the text-books is still painfully apparent.

In this district there were but four teachers holding first-class certificates ; fifty-eight with second-class, and sixty-eight with third ; and eighteen without any certificates at all.

In Mr. Lang's report for 1892-93, which is not a very recent report, but it is one issued since the repeal of the law, he says :

In nearly every school in this division a test was made to discover how many of the pupils above second standard could use correctly the following words :—done, did ; seen, saw ; set, sit. It was found that about ninety per cent of the pupils "done" their exercises ; "seen" the cows ; "set" in their seats ; and were in the habit of "laying" down.

In Mr. Best's report for the south central division of the province, I find the following :—

It is to be regretted that an unfavourable report is due on the state of school yards and school environments.

The supply of apparatus for primary work is deficient, and reference books for advanced classes are not well supplied. The remedy in most cases lies in the hands of the teachers.

The teachers in charge held all grades of certificates, and represented all stages of proficiency, from the very highest standard of moral and professional excellence, down to those who had neither training, experience nor aptitude.

The reading done in the schools is largely unsatisfactory.

In Mr. Rose's report for the south-western division, I observe the following :—

There is a most regrettable indifference on the part of trustees and ratepayers in the matter of caring for school property.

Irregularity of attendance is a most discouraging feature in rural schools. Many children are actually growing up without receiving even the rudiments of a public school education. I visited one school in which there had not been a single pupil for six weeks. The teacher, who was in the habit of visiting the school each morning, was in receipt of a salary of $40 per month.

I do most earnestly trust that the time has now fully come when the practice of allowing persons without professional training, and without experience, to engage in teaching, may with safety be discontinued. * * * * *

In any case, it would be infinitely better that, in the event of a scarcity, the certificates of trained and experienced teachers should be extended, than that girls of sixteen and youths of eighteen, with neither training nor exeperience, and possessing only the scanty scholarship necessary to pass the third class non-professional examination, should be turned loose upon the public to draw their salary, and to waste the "precious morning hours" of the children who are so unfortunate as to be placed under their control. The cases are rare in which the closing of the school would not be preferable to the employment of such teachers.

There is much other information I could bring forward to show that under the pretense of improving the system that previously existed under the good care of the Board of Education, including both sections, no improvement was effected by adopting the Acts of 1890, removing from the statute-book a law that had worked so satisfactorily up to that time. When I use the word satisfactorily, I am only echoing the opinions that were expressed in the legislature, even by the author of the law that removed the old law from the statute-book. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), in very laudable terms, thanked the Board of Education for the work they had performed in directing the public schools of the province up to the date of their removal from office, and I may say at that time in the legislature there never was a word uttered against the efficiency of either the Catholic or Protestant schools of the province as being the cause of their disestablishment. The only reason, if it could be adduced as a reason, was a political one,—that it was to create an agitation in the public mind and remove some other questions from the public arena in order that the men in power, the men who passed the law, could remain in office.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is impossible that this Bill can now become law. Even if it were passed to-night I do not understand that it would pass the other branch of the legislature before Parliament died by efflux of time, more particularly as the Upper Chamber is supposed to be particularly a judicial body and where questions are discussed on their merits. It is an indignity to that House to suggest that an important measure of this character could be dealt with in two or three days. It has been hinted that obstructive tactics have been resorted to in committee. A sufficient answer to that charge has been given by the Secretary of State on more than one occasion. He has declared that only seven members are now opposed to progress being made in the Bill, and he based his calculations on a late division in committee. Seven hon. members are unable to furnish much obstruction to the Bill or retard its progress. One of those hon. gentlemen has spoken only on one occasion, for about one hour. Another hon. member is in ill-health, and is only able to attend a few hours daily. The other five members have no doubt given considerable attention to the discussion, but looking through the "Hansard," they have not taken up very many hours. So the charge hinted at that there has been obstruction to this measure is answered by the Secretary of State himself, who has proved conclusively by the vote given on a recent occasion that in his judgment only seven members were opposed to the Bill. We have, however, only reached the 14th clause, some of the clauses having been dropped and the others amended, and the Bill contains 112 clauses. So it is obvious that this Bill cannot be successfully amended and carried through during the present session. We have been told by the Secretary of State that within a short time the House will reassemble, that the Government will come here with an overwhelming majority to pass this law, and that being the case it is desirable that we should thoroughly understand its provisions in order to discuss them before the electors. Under these circumstances I should like to obtain some information of the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill. In clause 7 it is provided the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall appoint a member of the board to be superintendent of the separate schools. So it is considered that there must be a superintendent appointed. In clause 8 we have the duties of the superintendent set out as follows :

8. In addition to the duties specified in other clauses of this Act, it shall be the duty of the superintendent, and he is hereby empowered :

(a.) To call meetings of the board, and also to call any school meeting required to be held under this Act when the parties who are otherwise invested with the power to do so, either neglect or refuse to exercise it.

(b.) To have, as the executive officer of the board, the general supervision and direction of the schools, and of the inspectors that may from time to time be appointed ; and to have authority to take measures and enforce and carry into effect all the provisions of this Act and the regulations issued under its authority that relate to the schools within their respective jurisdictions.

(c.) To give such explanations of the provisions of this or any other School Act, and of the regulations and decisions of the board, as may be required and to enforce the same ; and

(d.) To prepare during the first term of the school year a report to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council upon all the schools under his supervision for the previous school year, accompanied with full statistical tables, showing among other things, the number of children of school age in each district, as shown by the census returns for that year, the number who have attended school and the average attendance as shown by the semi-annual returns of the different teachers, and such report shall also contain a statement of the receipts and expenditure of all government money furnished to the board for school purposes, a copy of such tables, statements and returns to be presented to the board and to be retained on record by the board.

These onerous duties are entrusted to the superintendent. In addition to those duties another class of business is placed on him. Under clause 84, which deals with borrowing money, his duties include the issuing of debentures, the calling of meetings of ratepayers, the keeping of minutes, preparation of statements, and other matters. All these duties and the carrying into operation of all this machinery devolves upon the superintendent, in addition to all the duties already mentioned. Then we come to clause 94, which provides even additional duties, as follows :—

94. In the case of any rural school district the trustees of which neglect or refuse to levy or ask the council to levy a special rate to meet their debenture indebtedness maturing within the school year, and in the case of any rural school district in which there is not a legally competent school board, the superintendent shall be empowered to act for such school board or school district in requiring the council or councils concerned to levy or collect the sums he shall designate as necessary to meet such indebtedness, and the council or councils shall levy and collect such sum and pay the same over to the creditors upon the order of the said superintendent. And it is further provided that upon the trustees of any rural school district becoming legally incompetent or unable to act from any cause and there not being a sufficient number of ratepayers resident in the district to form a new school board, the superintendent shall thereupon be invested with the powers of the school trustees for such district, and shall be empowered to collect and receive all moneys due the said trustees from any source, to take possession of all their school properties, secure a proper title for all properties they may be entitled to, and in his discretion to dispose of or sell the same ; provided that all moneys received by the superintendent in any way in behalf of such district shall be paid over by him to meet the liabilities of the same that may become due from time to time.

Now, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) who, no doubt, is following very closely the line of my argument, a question about this superintendent. It is quite evident, taking clause 94 in connection with clause 8 that there will be very important and very arduous duties for this superintendent to perform. In fact the organization and carrying on of this school system will depend mainly upon the superintendent. Now, I find that section 75 provides :

From any sum so appropriated to the Board of Education there shall be paid such sums as may be provided by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council for incidental expenses and salaries of superintendent.

Now, I would like to know if that is the only provision made for the payment of this superintendent ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would ask the hon. gentleman not to ask questions with regard to special clauses of the Bill until this motion for the committee to rise has been disposed of.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman will remember that this same question arose the other morning when he sought to bring me into a discussion of the clauses already passed and you, Mr. Chairman, ruled that so long as the motion was before you we could not discuss the details of the Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. Is it not competent for an hon. member to argue on the motion now before you that the measure is defective and therefore the committee ought to rise? That is what the hon. gentleman was doing, as I understand. He was pointing out that there are no ways and means in the Bill to provide for the payment of salaries, and therefore the Bill would not be workable.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That was my argument and also that it is impossible in the present state of public business to reach the section of which I ask an explanation. The Secretary of State has said that the country will give the incoming Parliament a mandate to pass this Bill. In that case we may look for a demand among the people for information with regard to the Bill. If the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) declines to give information, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who, I believe, is the father of this measure——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He repudiates it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is important that these clauses shall be understood. I leave it to yourself, Mr. Chairman, if it is likely with the progress made whether we are likely to reach clause 75.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. But why discuss that ? The motion before us is for the committee to rise.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But this must come before the people, and I want to understand it. If I cannot get information from those in charge of the Bill, I shall be obliged to turn to my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) who seem to understand it better than those in charge of the Bill. I want to know, if the superintendent upon whom the organization and carrying on of the system depends and whose whole time must be taken up must depend upon the fund referred to in clause 75 for his salary ? Have this Government power to compel the government of Manitoba to grant any money out of the public treasury of the province ? I think that that is a very pertinent question and that I am entitled to an answer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I will not allow a discussion of special clauses of the Bill. The hon. gentleman may speak about the Bill, as much as he wants to. Of course we understand that. But we must not discuss the clause until the motion to rise is disposed of.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I submit to your ruling, but I would like to reason with you a little on this point. I wish to point out that it must be evident even to the lay mind that one clause of this Bill depends upon another. The statement of the duties of the superintendent under clause 8 cannot be discussed without considering clause 75, which provides for the payment of this officer. This is always done in committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. When you are discussing the Bill—Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am discussing the Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The motion before you is to rise and report progress, but on that motion I want to discuss the Bill. I do not want to read a lot of documents that have nothing to do with the Bill, as the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRiviere) did, I want a discussion of the Bill. I have no objection to the motion carrying, but I can neither carry nor withdraw the motion, and there may be other gentlemen who want to speak and who will follow me if I sit down. But even though we cannot get this motion disposed of, we can get information that will help us at a later stage of the discussion. If we could get to understand this matter, then, if peradventure, we reach this clause, perhaps it may be disposed of almost without further discussion. I hold, with all deference to your ruling, that it is unfortunate that the progress of this Bill should be delayed——

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman may recollect that the other morning he was in a similar difficulty and I suggested a way out, which was for him to take his seat and allow other gentlemen to speak. In that way we should make progress to some extent. And the hon. gentleman accepted my suggestion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I yielded, as the hon. gentleman says, and I shall do the same now if the hon. gentleman refuses to answer my question. But will the hon. gentleman say that I am not speaking on a most important provision of this Bill.

Mr. DALY. When we reach the clause I shall be ready to discuss it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But I have pointed out that it is most unlikely we shall ever reach it, and it is impossible to discuss the matter before the electorate unless we have this information. We know that latitude is allowed in committee and many things are done by common consent which are not recognized by the strict rules of order. I believe that if the Minister would answer the questions I put that no hon. gentleman would object. Now, take another clause of this Bill which I have not been able to understand, clause 102. That clause reads as follows :—

> Any justice of the peace, assessor, constable, or other officer neglecting or refusing to discharge any duty assigned to him by the provisions of this Act shall be liable to a penalty for each offence of a sum not exceeding fifty dollars.

I would like to ask the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) or the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), does this apply to all officers ?—for instance, to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, or does it only apply to persons subordinate to him ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We cannot allow any discussion on that clause at present.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). According to my understanding, a justice of the peace, assessor or constable, being a municipal officer in the province, it was questionable if the jurisdiction of this Parliament would hold good over him. Will the hon. member for North Simcoe tell me ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No, we cannot allow that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, if no one else is allowed to answer me, then I would ask yourself, Mr. Chairman, if it be the case that there is any such jurisdiction in this Parliament, if these officers are under the jurisdiction of this Parliament and we can compel them, then I am at a loss to determine just where Dominion jurisdiction comes in and provincial or municipal jurisdiction ceases.

Mr. DALY. Wire your namesake, the Lieutenant-Governor.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then, there is another difficulty. There are five sections of this Act, from 84 to 89, dealing with the question of borrowing money, in which it is made incumbent upon the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to give his sanction before it goes into effect. But clause 90 provides that, if they do not do so, the power shall then be vested in the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to act. That seems to me to imply that we are passing an Act laying a duty upon the Lieutenant-Governor in Council in Manitoba that we have no authority to enforce at all. The serious part is that, in this matter of borrowing money for any school district throughout the province, if the Lieutenant-Governor does not see fit to introduce the matter, this Federal Government voluntarily assumes the duty themselves, voluntarily assumes the duty of administering a separate school district in Manitoba for all time to come. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that you do not allow any of the Ministers to give me light on this subject.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am sorry the ruling of the Chair will preclude me from going into the minute details of this Bill, as it deserves to be gone into at the hands of every member of this House. I am sorry that the Government, while professing such love for the minority in Manitoba, are not as mindful of the rights of minorities in other portions of the Dominion as they appear to be in reference to those in Manitoba. Now, a few days ago, Mr. Masson was appointed a senior judge in the county of Huron over the head of the junior judge. The junior judge had occupied that position for many years, he belonged to the same religion as the minority in Manitoba, and he was, so far as I can understand, well qualified for the duties of the office. Why, then, was he not permitted to be the senior judge of the county of Huron ? I would like to ask the Government to say why Judge Doyle was not promoted to be the senior judge in the county of Huron, and why was a member taken from this House and placed over his head ? Take another case ; take the county of Bruce, which runs alongside the county of Huron. Some years ago the senior judge was superannuated, after being in office twenty-five years. The junior judge had been in the office a number of years, his religion was not of the type of the minority of Manitoba, and he was promoted to be the senior judge. Now, why was this difference made in these two cases ? Is it because the Government and the Secretary of State "have no confidence in the breed ?" I would just like to ask the Government, and ask their supporters in the House, what was the reason why those judges were treated differently ? The one that belongs to the religion of the minority in Manitoba was kept down ; the other that belonged to the religion of the majoriy, was promoted. Have minorities no rights in any place in Canada except in Manitoba ? Is nothing to be done for the minority anywhere else ? Are they to be made subservient to the majority in every instance where their qualifications entitle them to just as good positions as anybody else ? Are we to be told by the Secretary of State that a man's religion in this country is a bar to his promotion ? I call upon the hon. Minister of Marine to answer me this question—Is a man's religious belief to be a barrier to his promotion ? When a man is a junior judge, and has occupied the position as junior judge for many years, and has shown himself to be well qualified for the place, is that man to be passed over on account of his religion ? These are matters that it is well to consider, these are matters that come within the range of practical politics, these are the fruits whereby you may judge the members on the Treasury benches. They are now pretending to press this Bill through the House, when it is evident that they never intended to do so. But they expect that every member of the minority will fall down on his knees and worship them because they introduced a Bill into this House that they never intended to put through the House. They will go through the country, and where the majority is dominant, they will tell them they did not intend to push this Bill; they will go where the minority is dominant, and say that they did all they could to push this Bill. Now, there is another case to which I will refer. Vice-Chancellor Blake occupied the position of Vice-Chancellor for a number of years, his promotion was passed over and he resigned his position and went back to practice at the bar. Now, that was an innovation, and why was it done? The custom is that the junior judge shall be advanced, in the case of a vacancy, to the position of senior judge. Hon. gentlemen can see the extent of the insincerity of the Government policy, the hand that is guiding this Bill. They can also judge as to what the Government tactics are. The policy of the Government is evidently one of being all things to all men, and they are striving to make the minority believe they are anxious to pass this Remedial Bill, that they are willing to sacrifice everything in order to give the Manitoba minority separate schools. Even the Secretary of State is willing to lay down his life. Let hon. members look at the census of Manitoba and they will find that in a great many townships there are only one or two families belonging to the religious minority. This is especially the case in Marquette, where there are a number of townships with under ten children of school age whose parents are Roman Catholics, and therefore they would be unable to form a school section. How are these going to be provided for? Are you going to leave them to attend godless schools? The impracticability of this measure is obvious in view of the census returns, and it will be impossible to carry it out. Even in some cases the burdens involved in maintaining separate schools would be unbearable, and the Roman Catholics would leave the townships. I am surprised that the Government should have persevered so long in this folly and farce. It is about time that the curtain fell over this Government's action, which was insincere in its conception, which was conceived in fraud, and which was brought down as a sample of policy, brought down not for the purpose of benefiting the minority, but in order to keep the party in power, if possible. It was also done for another purpose, to obscure the Government's record, to divert public attention from their acts. Hon. gentlemen opposite may think they will succeed, but I believe the judgment of the country will see through the fallacy and trickery of this measure. Since the Bill was introduced the Government appointed a commission to negotiate with Manitoba. It is difficult to understand why the commission was appointed, because hon. gentlemen opposite have declared that there was nothing to investigate and that they knew all the facts. Having appointed this commission, they engaged to withhold the Bill, but the Government violated that agreement. The Government have kept this question before the people for six years. They were supposed to take action after the last general elections, but they did nothing. They intend now to use it at the approaching elections, and if they return to power they will again keep it dangling before the eyes of the people for political purposes. The Secretary of State never intended to push this Bill through the House. It is strange that while a school law which is identical to the Manitoba Act is satisfactory to the Catholics of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, it is desired by the Government to wipe out entirely the Manitoba Act. All maritime province members are agreed that the settlement in the lower provinces is satisfactory to all concerned. Even the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has not proposed any amendment as regards either of the maritime provinces. In regard to the settlement of the Manitoba school question, concessions must come from the government of Manitoba. The Manitoba commissioners, when they met the commissioners from this Government took a long step in order to meet the views of the minority and offered them more privileges by law than are given them either in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. Had this Government taken this step of negotiating with Manitoba long ago and before passing the remedial order, the question could undoubtedly have been settled. We are prohibited by the ruling of the Chair from inquiring of the Ministers as to the details of these various clauses. It is most important that all these details should be considered with the greatest care, for this legislation is upon a subject new to this Parliament. The Government could hardly have been sincere in expecting to press through this Bill in the short time they allowed for it. Why, in England, Gladstone's Home Rule Bill, which was not on a new subject, but dealt more extensively with a subject which had previously been legislated upon, was under discussion day after day for five months. But this Bill is wholly new. Never in the history of Canada has a measure been passed in this Parliament on the subject of education for any of the provinces. Had time for discussion been allowed, some of the asperities which this Bill was intended to arouse might have been smoothed over. But that would not have suited the policy of the Government. I have studied this Bill rather carefully and I would have been glad if a discussion of the details had been allowed. I think I could have given some valuable information, and I should have been glad to receive information if the Ministers were able to give it. But the Deputy Speaker has ruled that he would not allow this information to be given. That is a type of the eternal fitness of things. For the Deputy Speaker knew that the Ministers have no information. I have no doubt that the Deputy Speaker, by this ruling, has commended himself to the favourable consideration of the Government. I should not be surprised if a remedial order were introduced for the advantage of the Deputy Speaker after his admirable ruling on that point.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Joncas). Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I hope no information will be given if it is not in order. The Deputy Speaker knew that there was no use going to a goat's house for wool or asking for information from the Ministers, who did not prepare this Bill. He felt an interest in the minority and did not want to see their cause discussed on one side only. There are many men of great ability in the Government, no doubt, if they would apply themselves. But they have very little time to give to the consideration of legislation of this kind, being too much engaged with coming events. We should understand this Bill before we pass it. The course pursued by the leader of the House, apparently with the consent of his colleagues did not commend itself to the judgment of the House or of the country. I am surprised that the hon. Secretary of State should seek to compel the members of this House to sit not only 'de die in diem,' but also 'de nocte in noctem.' There is a spirit of old Britain left in us that resents such an attempt at coercion. The hon. gentleman is very anxious for the interest of the minority in Manitoba, but he has very little consideration for the minority in this House. But the minority in this House do not ask any consideration at his hands. We can paddle our own canoe. We can stand the work of perfecting this Bill day in and day out, and night in and night out. And while the Secretary of State and nearly every member of the Government are sleeping, we are here battling for a perfect Bill for the minority in Manitoba, if it is possible to have one made. As we are not allowed to enter upon the discussion of the details of this Bill, I shall postpone my further remarks to an occasion when such discussion will be in order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I was occupying the attention of the committee a short time ago, but from physical inability to stand longer, I was obliged to cease. I hope to be able to stand this time long enough to finish the line of argument I wish to present. I was about to refer to an event in the history of the Dominion which I think has a special bearing on the question now under discussion. I refer to the debate that took place in this House in May, 1873, upon the motion of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), on going into Supply, with reference to the New Brunswick school law. This motion will be found in the Votes and Proceedings of 1873, page 312, and is as follows :—

Resolved, That doubts having arisen as to the sufficiency of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, to protect the rights, privileges and advantages which the Catholic minority of New Brunswick enjoyed as to their common schools, under the school system in operation where the said Act came into force, the House of Commons of Canada on the 30th day of May, 1872, did resolve : "That this House regrets that the School Act recently passed in New Brunswick is unsatisfactory to a portion of the inhabitants of that province, and hopes that it may be so modified during the next session of the legislature of New Brunswick, as to remove any just grounds of discontent that now exist, and this House deems it expedient that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in England, and if possible the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, should be obtained as to the right of the New Brunswick legislature to make such changes in the school law as deprived the Roman Catholics of the privileges they enjoyed at the time of the union in respect of religious education in the common schools, with a view of ascertaining whether the case comes within the terms of the 4th subsection of the 93rd clause of the British North America Act, 1867, which authorizes the Parliament of Canada to enact remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions respecting education in the said Act.

"That the law officers of the Crown in England having now in conformity with said resolution given their opinion, but that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, through the Lord President of the Council, having declined to interfere, unless the matter was judicially brought before them : it is the opinion of this House, that the parties aggrieved should have an opportunity of bringing the matter judicially before the Privy Council, and that in the meantime it is the duty of the Government to advise His Excellency the Governor General to disallow the several Acts passed during the last session of the New Brunswick legislature to legalize assessments made under the Common School Act of New Brunswick, and in amendment of the said Common School Act."

Now, I wish to read a few extracts from the debate which followed, and as the "Hansard" which contains this debate is a heavy volume, and as I cannot hold it and read standing, I will regard it as a great obligation if the committee will allow me to read it while occupying my seat.

Mr. BORDEN. I move that the hon. gentleman be allowed to sit while reading.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CHARLTON. The following is the speech of Mr. Costigan.

(The hon. gentleman read the speech referred to.)

Sir John Macdonald was the next member of the House who participated in this debate on the motion of the hon. gentleman from Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan.)

(The hon. gentleman read Sir John Macdonald's speech.)

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have read you the opinions of Sir John A. Macdonald on that occasion, in May, 1873. While expressly stating his sympathy with the minority in

New Brunswick, while expressly stating his approval of the separate school law of Ontario, and while advising the minority in New Brunswick to adopt the same persistent course which had been adopted by the minority in Ontario in order to obtain a separate school law, while expressing his sympathy, and giving this advice to them, he distinctly took the ground that this Government could not interfere with laws passed by a province which were within the limits of the constitutional jurisdiction of the province. He stated that if this course were adopted, it would open the door to the Federal Government to interfere with provincial legislation, that it would invest this Parliament with the function of a court of appeal to pass upon all laws that might be adopted in the provincial legislatures, and to annul those laws. Now, the position taken by that hon. gentleman with regard to the New Brunswick law, was based upon the fact that the law was constitutional, and had been declared to be within the rights of the province. The position is exactly parallel with the case we now have under consideration.

Mr. McALISTER. Will the hon. gentleman tell this House whether the Privy Council decided in the New Brunswick case that the minority had no grievance, that they never had any right by law or by practice previous to the passing of the school law in 1871 ?

Mr. CHARLTON. The question is not pertinent to the line of argument I am adopting. I go no further than to say that Sir John A. Macdonald took the position that whatever might have been the grievances of the minority, whatever might have been their rights, he took the position that if the law were constitutional, this Parliament had no right to interfere with it. Now, the Manitoba school law of 1890 has been declared to be a constitutional law, and therefore the circumstances of the two cases are on all fours. In 1873, Sir John Macdonald refused to interfere with a law that was declared to be within the rights of a province ; we are asked to adopt a contrary course to-day, and to interfere with a law in another province which has also been declared to be constitutional. I will now quote the words used on that occasion by my hon. friend from Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), then Mr. Langevin.

(The hon. member read the speech.)

I am entirely in accord with the views expressed in that debate by the member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin). The principle he stated was non-interference on the part of the Dominion Government with the rights of local legislatures in the matter of disallowance of laws passed by them within their constitutional powers. This Dominion is practically in the same condition to-day as it was then. Then, however, the affairs of the country were controlled by men who looked at the questions from the point of view of statesmen. Now, unfortunately, we have a class of public men who view questions from the standpoint of mere politicians, and with a view to make political capital out of them, and who fail to view them in the light of the constitutional necessities. It is admitted that this educational law passed by Manitoba was a constitutional law.

(The hon. gentleman then read the report of a speech delivered in the course of the debate by the Hon. Mr. Smith.)

It would be well if this House to-day were governed by similar views to those which controlled the Dominion Government at that time in regard to dealing with the New Brunswick school question. We have made a serious departure from the precedent established in 1873 by the leaders of the Conservative party and the fathers of confederation, and it is matter for sincere regret that we have not men capable of taking a broad-minded and constitutional view of these questions. The people of Manitoba saw good reasons for desiring to modify their school laws. The constitution gave them the right to do so. That modification has not met the approval, I will not say of the minority, but of the ecclesiastics of the Roman Catholic Church of the province, and so we have this question now under discussion. It was perfectly within the competency of this Government to dismiss the appeal made to them a year ago last March. It was distinctly stated by the Judicial Committee that this was purely a political question, and that the Privy Council of Canada would naturally deal with it in a political sense. This interference by the Dominion Government is a dangerous precedent. If they can act as they have done in the Manitoba school question, they can take similar action in regard to the educational system of the lower provinces, and interfere in questions of taxation and other alleged grievances. These are all valid reasons why the committee should rise and no longer proceed with the consideration of the Bill. It is physically impossible to pass this Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose the hon. gentleman had taken the number of hours he has used in obstructing the Bill for the purpose of perfecting it, could he not have given us very valuable aid ?

Mr. WELSH. Hon. gentlemen opposite have obstructed the Bill by keeping members here twenty-two hours out of twenty-four. This delay is all the fault of the Government.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will answer the Finance Minister. If I had been physically able, I would have devoted a longer time to the consideration of the Bill in its progress through the committee. I have, however, given to it honest, fair and thorough consideration. I have considered it in the aspect and in the light of its general purposes, influence and propriety. I have taken the course I have followed because I believe it is an unjust measure, and that other resources should have been exhausted before it was introduced. I believe the Government have acted wrongly from the beginning to the end, that they have blundered from one step to another throughout. I believe the Bill was an outrage at the start, and that the Government should have accepted the invitation of the Manitoba government to make an investigation, to compare views and endeavour to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. The Government refused that offer, and prepared this legislation. At the eleventh hour they sent a delegation to Manitoba, who had better have been kept at home, which was an evidence of weakness, and it presented an ultimatum, that if the province would not agree to legislate in a certain direction, the Government would push through this Bill. The Dominion Government was guilty of bad faith in proceeding with the consideration of this Bill when their commissioners had agreed with the government of Manitoba that its progress should be suspended during negotiations. I have, therefore, not been called upon to spend much time in perfecting the measure which should not have been introduced, and when the Government refused to adjourn at 3 a.m., the manhood in every man impelled him to resent such treatment and to wait until the proper time arrives to take into the consideration the provisions of the Bill. The management of the case by the Government is a monumental demonstration of assinine stupidity. Last week's sitting of 129 hours showed an utter incompetency to consider the Bill fairly; the Government considered they would drive the House as with a slave whip, but they did not drive it an inch. This is my answer to the taunt of the Minister of Finance, who threw out the insinuation that I had spent some time discussing this Bill and obstructing it. The Bill has not been obstructed, it cannot be obstructed, it cannot go alone, it cannot be explained by any Minister. It was drawn by somebody outside of the House, and the Ministers are at a loss to understand it. It was brought in by Ministers who do not understand it, and who, even if they did understand it, did not remain to explain it: and so the poor bantling has been left to stand alone. We have found that it was a senseless mass of crudities and absurdities, and that the greatest disaster that could have befallen the country was to pass such a measure.

Mr. DAVIN. As it is evident to me, as it must be to everybody, that there is an arrangement to go on blockading the Bill, I think it is just as well that something useful should be said. I will not say that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has not given us anything useful. He has read the speeches of two distinguished statesmen, one of whom is no longer with us, the other still here, I am happy to say, and an ornament to this House. But the speeches of Sir John Macdonald and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), while they deal with a cognate question, do not deal with the question on all fours with that now before us. If you have two problems, in one of which there is a factor which is not present in the other, then, I need hardly tell any one who knows anything of mathematics, you cannot apply any theories to one simply because they help in the solution of the other. I do not say that with the view of combatting the contention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) that it is most inconvenient to deal with this question in this House, for I have put on record in this House, and out of it, my conviction that it is almost impossible to deal with a question of this kind in this House. My hon. friend said this was a useless commission.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. DAVIN. I have the word here. He said: "It might better have been kept at home."

Mr. CHARLTON. Than to go up there and present an ultimatum—yes.

Mr. DAVIN. If the members of the House will recall the circumstances attending the second reading of the Bill—how the hon. member for Montreal West foreshadowed the commission and made an appeal to the members of this House with the view to aiding him—that we should pass the second reading unanimously, not for the purpose of carrying the Bill through the House, but for the purpose of aiding the machinery that was then being put in motion, and of which he was the principal part. The commission that was appointed made a proposition to the Manitoba government falling far short of the demands of this Bill. I have had letters from the west, from persons opposed to separate schools, who say that, if separate schools were to be brought in at all, they could not well be brought in under less objectionable circumstances than those proposed by the commission who met the commissioners of the Manitoba government. But in response we got a proposition from Mr. Sifton and Mr. Cameron, not proposing separate schools, but proposing a system that I may say, with such knowledge as I may be supposed to have of Manitoba and the North-west, that, except as regards—as suggested by the hon. leader of the Opposition—Winnipeg, and, perhaps, Brandon—would give everything, or nearly everything, that could be established under the proposition of the commissioners who went up to meet them. So the result of that conference is to bring down the difference between those who champion the interests of the minority, and those who represent the Manitoba government to something very small indeed. Under these circumstances, it is very surprising to read in a speech of the leader of the Opposition delivered at Valleyfield, in Beauharnois, a few days ago :

> There is again a division in the Cabinet on the Manitoba school question. If you read the Conservative papers you will see that I am a traitor. I know only too well those boodlers who hide their boodling under the cloak of religion. They say : Do not vote for Laurier, for he is against the Bill. Yes, I am against that insignificant Bill.

That is from the Montreal "Herald," a Liberal paper, of 13th April, and it is reported in the first person, and, apparently, verbatim. I do not think the hon. gentleman can well say that he is misrepresented by it. Now, I say, and I think I can substantiate the statement, that we have had from the hon. gentleman many indications that he does not think the Bill does enough for the minority. My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) who has just spoken, tells that he has given careful consideration to the Bill, and that he has done his best to have it carefully considered. That is one of the boldest statements I ever heard any hon. member make. Because we know that he has been one of the most powerful obstructors of the measure. I am not now considering whether he is right in obstructing ; I am only dealing with a matter of fact. He has come here and read documents which were already on record and in print.

Mr. CHARLTON. Which one ?

Mr. DAVIN. You read the whole commission.

Mr. CHARLTON. I read the documents officially laid before this House, and these had not been read by any hon. gentleman up to that time.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say they had not been read. What I said was that they were already on record, as all our printed papers are. If that is not a palpable case of obstruction, I do not know what is. In reference to the obstruction, if those who were opposed to this Bill could have prevented infallibly the passing of the measure, and yet have discussed in a bona fide manner every clause, and, if that had been done, instead of having a mass of incoherent matter piled on "Hansard," we might have had a large volume indeed, but a large volume of valuable disquisition upon the details of the Bill. Now, let me read how this has struck the country in the west. This is from a Liberal paper, and is written on 10th April :

THE NOBLE GAME OF POLITICS.

> The spectacles at Ottawa is not a pleasant one. The House has been in continuous session since three o'clock Monday afternoon, and no progress has been made with the Remedial Bill. So far the policy of obstruction has proved as effective as the bitterest enemies of the measure could wish. At three o'clock on Wednesday morning a motion was made that the committee rise and report, and at this writing it is still under discussion. It would take over two years to pass the Bill at the rate of progress so far made, and at midnight of the 24th the House expires. Whoever or whatever is responsible, the spectacle is a scandalous one, for it is bringing our system of parliamentary government into contempt.
> We think the country is quite astute enough to take in the situation. Passing through St. Paul on Wednesday, Mr. Greenway, in an interview explained the failure of the recent school conference by saying that the Dominion commissioners asked more than the province was willing to grant. Everybody fully understands that they asked less than it is proposed to provide in the Remedial Bill. In the House at Ottawa on Wednesday evening, Mr. Laurier said he "pitied his co-religionists in Manitoba if they were to get no more than they could get by the Remedial Bill." Mr. Laurier is leader of the Opposition, and the Opposition are obstructing the passage of the Remedial Bill, on the pretense that it is an outrage on the province. There is a sad lack of sincerity somewhere. We are justified in assuming from Mr. Laurier's words that if he were in power he would give the Manitoba minority more than is being offered them in the Remedial Bill. The Dominion commissioners were satisfied to take less, and the Manitoba government refused a compromise, because they asked too much. If the less of the commissioners was too much, what would the more of Mr. Laurier be ?
> The simple and disgraceful fact is that with the obstructionists at least the whole affair is a political game ; they are manœuvring for an advantage in the approaching elections. They care nothing for our school system or for our educational interests, whether pertaining to the minority or majority. They recognize that under the judgment of the Privy Council the minority are entitled to a measure of relief, and that it must be granted them by this Parliament or some other, unless in the meantime the Manitoba legislature removes the grievance. But the question is one with which men's minds can be stirred, and they are using it in that supremest of all causes, the cause of procuring votes that will turn out the ins, and put in the outs. Mr. Laurier complained on Wednesday that Sir Charles Tupper, after absolving him from the charge of obstruction, had recanted, attributing his change of front to the fear that his admission would help Mr. Laurier among the electors of Quebec. That is the secret of all their anxiety. It is not a question as to what is required under the judgment of the Privy Council, or as to what the conditions actually demand in behalf of the minority ; the whole concern is as to how the electors may be influenced.
> The Government and their followers are by no means innocent in the matter, but their position compare most favourably with that of the obstructionists. The remedial order was adopted for political effect, an early election being then thought probable. That was a mistake, for instead of passing the order, if a settlement was their object, they should first have approached the Manitoba authorities and ascertained what they were prepared to do under the altered circumstances. But no ; they were playing to the electorate gallery too, and the order was made. However, it can be said of them that they have consistently adhered to the policy of remedial legislation ever since. A sixth session of the present Parliament was called to deal with the > question, and they are engaged night and day in the endeavour to pass legislation, in obedience to the judgment of the Privy Council.

> It would be a relief to a most distressing and disgraceful situation, a gain to Manitoba, and a fitting rebuke to the reckless triflers at Ottawa, if Mr. Greenway would take advantage of his visit east, and even at this late day offer terms of settlement that would snatch the question from the rat pit in which it is now being worried. The spectacle at Ottawa is a positive pain to every moderate man in the country. It suggests doubts whether Canadians are equal to the duties and responsibilities of self-government.

Mr. LISTER. That was written by yourself.

Mr. DAVIN:

> It suggests doubts whether Canadians are equal to the duties and responsibilities of self-government.

I am glad to see hon. gentlemen think I wrote the article, because it is a great compliment to me.

Mr. McMULLEN. What paper is it in ?

Mr. DAVIN. The Winnipeg "Free Press," a Liberal paper. I may say that I never contributed a line to the "Free Press." If I were to pierce behind the veil of the anonymous, I think I have sometimes seen sitting in that corner the distinguished journalist who wrote that article. He is one of the ablest journalists in Canada, and he is a Liberal of the Liberals. Now, in regard to the alleged divisions in the Cabinet, let us suppose that the Liberal party came to power, what sort of a Cabinet would you have ? There is the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) piling up a most powerful constitutional argument in favour of remedial legislation ; he would be one Minister. Then we have my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who is strongly against remedial legislation ; he would have a portfolio too. Then you would have the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) who is against remedial legislation north by north-east ; it is impossible to say exactly where he is. Then you would have the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) who would probably be Minister of Justice ; and he has told us in the strongest terms in this House that he wanted a stronger Bill than this. But how on earth could he sit at the same Council table with the hon. member for North Norfolk ? Why, the hon. member for North Norfolk would brain him with one of his crutches. Or would they sit at the opposite side of the table looking daggers at each other ? So my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has by no means a happy family. But I must say this, that the Government is entitled to the criticism that the members of the Government seemed to have pursued their policy with remarkable unity and with remarkable unanimity. Now, I wish to say with regard to the action taken by the Government in sending a commission to Manitoba, that I consider it was most useful, and will bear the very best of fruits. I wish to call attention for a moment to the proposal made by Mr. Sifton and Mr. Cameron, what is called the alternative proposal, providing for religious instruction in the schools between half-past three and four o'clock in the afternoon, to be given by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person satisfactory to a majority of the trustees who may be authorized by said clergyman to act in his stead. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that under that proposal every possible grievance, every practicable grievance, would be swept away. When you have come so close as that, when the moderate proposals of the commissioners would really extend over a little more ground than that, I think we may fairly hope that the matter will be settled in the one place where it can be satisfactorily settled, and that is on the local ground.

Mr. WELSH. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has read an extract from a paper saying that this Parliament has put itself into a disgraceful situation. Well, if any disgrace attaches to the members of this House, I want to know to which side it belongs. I do not think the Opposition can be blamed for the two weeks time that was lost by this Government after the House first met in January. There was no Remedial Bill brought before this House until about the first week in March. We attempted to do our duty with that Bill, and then came obstruction. Now, if there has been any obstruction in this House, it is the hon. gentlemen opposite who are responsible for it, they must bear the whole blame. Now, Sir, we all know that almost every Parliament in the world has been troubled of late years by the labour question ; there is a great agitation going on to provide that eight hours a day should be sufficient for a labouring man to work. But this Government have been forcing us to discuss this Bill for twenty-two hours a day out of twenty-four. Now, I have always been in favour of remedying any grievance that may exist in any province. I want justice done to every man, and if there is a grievance existing in Manitoba or elsewhere, I will do my utmost to have it redressed. But we must be careful not to transgress provincial rights. My hon. friend from North Norfolk has read to us the opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald on the New Brunswick school case, in which he declared that it would be an infringement of provincial rights for this Parliament to interfere with the School Act passed by that province. Now, I am going to give you another example. In Prince Edward Island, prior to 1875, we had a free school system, and it worked very satisfactorily for twenty years. Then the late Bishop McIntyre, of Prince Edward Island, began to ask that the Government should establish separate schools in that province. Well, both sides of the legislature, Liberals and Conservatives, refused to abolish the system that had always existed there. However, the bishop pressed the matter, and all the Catholics in the legislature seconded him. The House was prorogued, and a general election was held on the question of free schools or separate schools, and the party in favour of free schools was returned by a majority of two or three to one. Now, let us suppose that the free school system had been overturned and a separate school system established in Prince Edward Island, would not the free school party then have had a grievance, just as the Manitoba minority have now ? Would not the free school party have had just the same right to come to this Parliament and ask for remedial legislation ? I think the logical conclusion is that they would have just as much right to come here and ask for the interference of the Federal Government. I say that when we cross the line of provincial rights, we are treading on dangerous ground. While I am in favour of remedying every grievance that exists on the part of any minority of any province of this Dominion. I am opposed to trespassing on provincial rights. Now, on this school question, let me read to you an extract from a speech delivered in the British Parliament by the Right Hon. John Bright, on 20th April, 1847.

(The hon. gentleman read the extract.)

The argument of this distinguished statesman was not as between Catholics and Protestants, but as between the Church of England and dissenting bodies ; but nevertheless the sentiment expressed should be engraved on the heart of every hon. member in this House. I hope the Government will change their tactics, and no longer obstruct the business by compelling members to sit in this chamber twenty-two hours out of twenty-four. They have run themselves into a corner, and they now find it difficult to get out. We on the Opposition side of the House are quite prepared to work twelve hours out of twenty-four. Even if we attempted to work as the Government desire, it would be beyond human endurance ; we could not pass the Bill, and even if it were pushed through the House it would be an imperfect measure and an utter farce as regards remedial legislation. I think benefit will follow the mission of the Dominion commissioners to Winnipeg, and in my opinion, the Minister of Justice was a most suitable man to be a member of that commission, and if it had been possible to secure a settlement, he would have obtained it. What I complain of is that during two years this question has been played with. The leader of the Opposition was taunted day after day with keeping silence and not announcing his policy ; notwithstanding the fact that at almost every meeting he attended he advised the appointment of a commission and policy of conciliation ; but throughout the Tory press he was called a crank. Yet at the eleventh hour, after the Remedial Bill had been laid on the Table, the Government appointed a commission to proceed to Manitoba to confer with the provincial government. When the commission went to Manitoba the position was like that of two opposing armies. A flag of truce was hung out, and it was agreed that there should be no progress made with the Remedial Bill while the negotiations were in progress ; but while the Dominion commissioners were trying to effect a compromise by conciliation and discussion, the Government of the day had the remedial knife behind their back ready to stab Manitoba at any moment. Such an act was simply disgraceful, and offended the good feeling and taste of every hon. member. I support the motion that the committee rise and report progress. We have sat now forty-eight hours, and we should adjourn until 8.30, when I am sure the Opposition would be prepared to proceed with the business of the House, whether it happened to be the Remedial Bill or the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The other day the Minister of Justice was exceedingly anxious to ascertain what was the exact clause of the Act passed by the Ontario legislature with respect to counties having 80,000 population or less. I am glad to be able to supply the hon. gentleman with the requisite information. I have here the County Courts Act of 1896, and I think that when I have read the clause to him he will perceive that there is no doubt whatever of one thing, and that is that the Ontario legislature and the Ontario executive are most decidedly of opinion that one judge is ample for the needs of every county having less than 80,000 souls. The clause in question reads :

> In the case of a county or union of counties having a poulation not exceeding 80,000 for which there are, at the ttime of the passing of this Act two judges and hereafter one of them dies, resigns his office or is removed therefrom, there shall thereafter be but one judge of the said county or union of counties, and there shall be no appointment of another judge in the place of the judge so dying.

I think that settles the question as to the intention of the legislature. I admit that it speaks of the case in which there were two judges, and, as there was only one in this county, the hon. gentleman may, if he pleases, take exception to the verbiage, but I submit that there can now be no doubt as to the intention of the legislature of Ontario. And it adds very much to the regret which I think every hon. gentleman who has considered this question must feel at the precipitate appointment which was made of Mr. Masson, of North Grey, to find that he is practically appointed in utter defiance of the legislature of the province in which he is to hold a judgeship.

Mr. FRASER. I regret very much that the duties of the Minister of Justice have been added to. I find it reported that the Minister said that he had recommended Mr. Masson to a judgeship because, after personal conversation with him he had found that gentleman was well qualified for the position. If there must be an examination, I think a board of examiners should be appointed for the purpose. I understand that the examination in this case occupied one hour, an that it was as follows :—

EXAMINATION OF MR. MASSON.

Time, 1 hour.

1. What is the meaning of the terms Plaintiff and Defendant ? Give Examples.
2. What is statute law ? Illustrate with copious references to the "Remedial Bill."
3. How would you open a court ?
4. Give the rule in Shelly's case.
5. Explain "Freebench," giving the necessary words to be used by the widow claiming dower and the necessary accompaniments.
6. Define the duties of
   (a.) A crier.
   (b.) A constable.
   (c.) A janitor.
7. If a case is not ready for trial, what would you do ?
8. Give your answer (at length) to the vile Grit slander that you voted for the Remedial Bill to obtain a judgeship. Prove you never assisted Mr. Meredith in his crusade against separate schools in Ontario.

Make a short affidavit proving that you never read or in any way approved of (a.) Facts for Catholic electors.
   (b.) Facts for Protestant electors.
   (c.) The eye opener.

9. At what precise moment does the Ontario statute affecting the fees you expect when appointed to obtain from the Surrogate Court, come into force ? How would you defeat its operations ? Translate the legal maxim "Malus usus abolandus est," and show how it could be explained if any attempt was made by the incoming Liberal Government to apply the maxim to your own case.
10. If appointed, state truthfully :
   (a.) Can we hold the riding you represent ?
   (b.) What have you done to insure it to the Government ?
   (c.) How much will you subscribe and pay for campaign funds ?
11. Will you as revising barrister see that all lists you revise will make it impossible for any Liberal to be elected under such lists ?

This has been handed me as a record of the questions asked, but I think it is too much to expect of the hon. Minister that he shall personally examine candidates. It can only be done in certain cases. We all regret that the hon. Minister has been ill. But we know the cause—that his multifarious duties have been added to by imposing upon him this work of examination of candidates. I trust that if further appointments are to be made, a board of examiners will be appointed. and thus save the health of the Minister.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not know whether we are indebted to the industry of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) for this list of questions, or whether he has been using somebody else's humour. But in reply to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I beg to say that he will be aware that I had never seen this Act before, and I would ask him if it has passed into law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am so informed.

Mr. DICKEY. I was not aware of it, and I have sent for my deputy and shall be glad to take this question up later if there is anything further to be said.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) regretted the degeneracy into which this debate had fallen, he characterized it as an assinine debate, and said he proposed to introduce some common sense into the discussion. We all may have our views as to whether the hon. gentleman is the best witness as to his own ability to introduce common sense into this discussion. But from what we know of him, we are pretty well aware that there is no gentleman who has a higher opinion of the ability of the hon. member for West Assiniboia to do this than the hon. member for West Assiniboia himself. We remember an occasion, some years ago, when the hon. gentleman found it necessary to criticise the occupants of the Treasury benches. We know that he has lucid intervals during which he is able to see imperfections in the members of the Government. But whatever speeches he may make, we know that his vote will be always on their side. We remember how on one occasion he proposed by a physiological operation—I cannot use the hon. gentleman's own language—to instil brains into the heads of the members of the Cabinet. The gem of common sense which the hon. gentleman gave us this afternoon was the proposition that, in view of the fact that a commission was being sent to confer with the Manitoba government and procure settlement of this much vexed school question, this House should have passed the second reading without a division, for the purpose of having an effect—although he did not explain what—upon the province of Manitoba, and so lead to a better result for the negotiations. This was the hon. gentleman's only effort to introduce common sense into the discussion, and I think all the members of the committee will agree that it was not eminently successful. I suppose the object in passing this Bill without a division would be to impress upon the government of Manitoba that this House was unanimously in favour of passing this measure. Nothing could have been more opposed to the facts than such an idea. We know that the second reading was carried by a very small majority, indeed, and surely it would have been improper for hon. gentlemen who were opposed to the measure to vote for it in order to influence the government of Manitoba with whom the Government were about to enter into negotiations.

The hon. gentleman read from what he said was a Liberal newspaper in the North-west with reference to the proceedings in this chamber. That was not a fair statement, because the paper from which he read, the Winnipeg "Free Press" is well known to be the organ of the minority in Manitoba, the organ of the Opposition of the Greenway administration. But I have still greater fault to find with the hon. gentleman with reference to this article. Would you believe it, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman suppressed a portion of the article of which he purported to read the whole. I will read the portion which the hon. gentleman did not read :

> The remedial order was adopted for political effect, an early election being then thought probable. That was a mistake, for instead of passing the order, if a settlement was their object, they should first have approached the Manitoba authorities, and ascertained what they were prepared to do under the altered circumstances. But, no ; they were playing to the electorate gallery too, and the order was made.

This is the very contention made on the floor of this House that the order was issued by the Government with indecent haste, and instead of issuing it at that time it was the duty of the Government to approach Manitoba and see what arrangements could be made. But the organ of the minority, the leading organ opposed to the Manitoba government states that it was a mistake to issue the remdial order, and that the reason why it was issued was that this Government were "playing to the electorate gallery, too."

I sought an opportunity to answer the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) when the question of Mr. Masson's appointment was before the House. But I failed to catch your eye, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Pictou used what is called the tu quoque, or "you're another" argument. He seemed to think that it was sufficient answer to the charge that this Government had improperly appointed Mr. Masson to a judgeship to say that Mr. Mackenzie's Government had been guilty of similar acts of wrong-doing. I deny that there ever was a case under Mr. Mackenzie's regime similar to the one under discussion. But the point to which I take special exception in the hon. member for Pictou's speech is that with reference to the Hon. Mr. Ross and the late Hon. Mr. Coffin, who were members of the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie. The hon. member for Pictou, while exonerating the Mackenzie Government from improper motives in making the other appointments, singled out these two gentlemen, Mr. Ross and Mr. Coffin, for the special charge that they had sold themselves to the Liberal Administration. Now, I think the hon. gentleman ought not to have made a charge of that kind against those two gentlemen, especially he should have hesitated to make the charge against the late Mr. Coffin, from the fact that that gentleman is dead, and is unable to defend himself against the aspersions of the hon. gentleman. I think it was unfair to the family of the late Hon. Thomas Coffin that such a charge as that should be made at this time. I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw that charge, and I believe he will do so when he is better acquainted than he seems now to be with the facts. The exact words used by the hon. member for Pictou are these :

> That reminds me that the Liberal Government of 1874-78 came into existence by trafficking in Cabinet positions. They stole from their opponents three or four members of this House. They took Mr. Ross from the Conservative ranks, and when he appeared in the Liberal ranks, he was a full-fledged Minister of the Liberal Cabinet. They dealt with Mr. Coffin in the same way.

Now, with reference to Mr. Coffin and Mr. Ross, I claim to have some knowledge.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—I understand he stated that in reading from the "Free Press," I garbled it, that I omitted a sentence. I did not omit a syllable ; you will see by the "Hansard" that I read every line.

Mr. BORDEN. Well, I was listening very closely, and I did not hear the hon. gentleman read one sentence.

Mr. DAVIN. I read every line, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BORDEN. Then I withdraw the statement, and am sorry I made it. But I did not hear the words. Now, would the hon. member for Pictou say that Sir Albert Smith and the Hon. Isaac Burpee, who were precisely in the same position as Messrs. Ross and Coffin, sold themselves to Mr. Mackenzie for Cabinet positions ? He can scarcely distinguish, I think, between these hon. gentlemen. I must remind the hon. gentleman that at the time to which he refers, the Conservative Government had been convicted of a heinous political crime, the Conservative Government of that day had been proved to have sold a railway charter in order to get funds to corrupt the electorate. That is a matter which had been proved before a royal commission ; and surely then the hon. gentleman can scarcely say, in view of that fact, that all the gentlemen who thought it was their duty, in the interest of public morality, to leave the Conservative party of that day, were men who had to be purchased in order to do that. Now, what are the facts in reference to Messrs. Ross and Coffin ? I am told by those who were here at that time, that so far from Mr. Mackenzie having selected, in the first instance, either one of those gentlemen to enter his Cabinet, there was a meeting held of the opponents of the Government from the province of Nova Scotia, at which it was agreed that Mr.

Ross and Mr. Coffin should be members of the new Cabinet to represent Nova Scotia.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman ever seen that correspondence in Nova Scotia with regard to these two gentlemen going into the Cabinet, in which it is stated that they made arrangements to share their salaries with two other gentlemen ?

Mr. BORDEN. No, I can't say that I have.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). If the hon. gentleman makes some further inquiries, he will find that two gentlemen in the House did arrange to share the salaries with Mr. Coffin and Ross.

Mr. BORDEN. I was here during those five years, and I never heard that such a thing took place. I do remember now that the hon. gentleman speaks of it, that the charge was made.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). The charge was made by the two gentlemen who were paid.

Mr. BORDEN. Who were they?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. One of them is living, Col. Ray, a former member of this House.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). The other one is dead.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that the way you manage things in Nova Scotia ?

Mr. BORDEN. As the hon. gentleman has seen fit to slander the memory of dead men, I think it is his duty now, if he has any evidence to support the statement he makes, to give us the whole of it here. I do not believe one word of the statement made by these two hon. gentlemen, that there was any corrupt bargain between Mr. Coffin and Mr. Ross and some other men, that they should share with those men the emoluments of their Cabinet positions. I do not believe it, and I shall require something stronger than the statement which has been made now, to induce me to accept that as a fact. I never heard it before as an accepted fact.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). You just said that you had heard of it before.

Mr. BORDEN. The rumour, but I never heard before that Mr. Ray was charged with receiving anything. I was intimate with all of these men, and I must say here at once that I never heard anything that would lead me to believe there was any truth in the statement, or that any serious charge of this kind was ever made. It is to be remembered that Mr. Coffin and Mr. Ross had abundant reason for leaving the Conservative party at that time, in the developments which had taken place in reference to the Pacific scandal. I say further that Mr. Mackenzie had nothing to do with it any more than to get a vote of the members supporting him from Nova Scotia, who agreed that Mr. Ross and Mr. Coffin should be Cabinet members representing Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Pictou knows that neither Mr. Ross nor Mr. Coffin were Conservatives ; those gentlemen had been Liberals.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They had been supporting a Conservative Government.

Mr. BORDEN. They supported a coalition Government. I would point out to the member for Pictou that Mr. Howe, who surely was not claimed to be a Conservative, took office under Sir John A. Macdonald sometime previously ; and with him a number of Liberals, including Mr. Coffin, and, I think, Mr. Ross, had given a certain degree of support to the Government of that day after the better terms arrangements had been made, and after Mr. Howe had gone into the Government in order to secure those better terms. They were never ranked in Nova Scotia as Conservatives, or even as Liberal-Conservatives. They appealed to the electorate on all occasions as Liberals. They were opposed to confederation, and in 1872 they were elected as Liberals. Consequently, it is not fair to slander the memory of Mr. Coffin, and to slander Mr. Ross, by such an outrageous charge as that they had sold themselves and deserted the Government for the purpose of securing positions in Mr. Mackenzie's Cabinet.

Now, a good deal has been said with reference to the sincerity of the Government in their apparent attempt to pass this remedial measure. I think it would be interesting at this moment to read to the committee some words uttered by a former member of the Cabinet, a gentleman who last July left the Cabinet on the ground that he did not believe the Government were honest in their intention of passing a Remedial Bill, and who, unlike his two companions who went out at that time and returned, has remained out ever since. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Angers. Shortly after he had severed his connection with the present Cabinet, Mr. Angers, on 11th July, 1895, in his place in the Senate said :

> I say that between this day and the day that Parliament is to meet again such an excitement will grow over the country that if Parliament hesitates to-day it will then be afraid. I believe remedial legislation has received such a blow by the action of the Government that we will never have it, and consequently I could not take upon myself the responsibility of remaining with them.

Well, Sir, these were eminently prophetic words ; every word uttered by the Hon. Mr. Angers then has been verified.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do you believe that they will ever get remedial legislation ? You say that is a correct prophecy ?

Mr. BORDEN. Well, I am not in the witness-box. I might just as well ask the hon. gentleman what he thinks.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think they will get it.

Mr. BORDEN. Let me read to the committee another statement which was made in the newspapers at that time:

> A gentleman high up in the counsels of Sir Adolphe Caron, was heard to say that he has learned from Sir Adolphe's own mouth that it is the purpose of the Government not to force the Manitoba school question to a vote this session. The introduction of a remedial measure will be delayed as long as possible and the discussion will be prolonged until the present Parliament expires. They will then go to the country telling the "Bleus" of Quebec that the obstruction of the Liberals prevented the carrying of remedial legislation, while the Tories of Ontario they will present the other face that no interference with Manitoba was ever intended.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. Might I ask him who my well-informed friend is?

Mr. BORDEN. I am not able to give the name.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. But why should the hon. gentleman say a well-informed friend of mine?

Mr. BORDEN. I am reading from a newspaper.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. What newspaper?

Mr. BORDEN. This is a telegraphic despatch from Ottawa to one of the maritime province papers, during last session of Parliament, which seems to be prophetic as well as the statement of the Hon. Mr. Angers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It may be prophetic, but it is all an invention.

Mr. BORDEN. "They will then go to the country telling the 'bleus' of Quebec that the obstruction of the Liberals prevented the carrying of remedial legislation." If not that, what are they doing?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). What paper are you reading from?

Mr. BORDEN. I am reading from the Halifax "Chronicle."

> This is how they expect to ward off any adverse vote in the House. And they will be aided by the dissatisfied Tories, who, while opposed to remedial legislation, do not want to defeat the Government.

The prophecy of the hon. gentleman's former colleague, Hon. Mr. Angers, cannot be disputed, and is entitled to consideration. Whether the telegraphic report is a matter of such consequence is a matter of opinion, but it will turn out that that report is prophetic. I do not charge the Postmaster General with want of sincerity; I would be inclined to disagree with the statement contained in that article, that he did not want the Bill to pass. But I think that the hon. gentleman has been very unfortunate in his associates, and he has been overconfident in some members of the Cabinet to which he belongs. If the hon. gentleman had remained with Mr. Angers, out of the Cabinet, and if the Minister of Public Works had remained out, those hon. gentlemen would have had a chance of passing the Remedial Bill enormously greater than they have possessed since they capitulated to the Government and returned to the Cabinet. Hon. Mr. Angers remained out. He could not conscientiously return, because he believed that the Government to which he formerly belonged had no honest intention of passing the Bill, and events have abundantly shown the foresight of that hon. gentleman.

There are many reasons why this committee should rise and report progress. If the Government had not continued to pursue this insane policy of sitting here day and night, private business would have been pushed forward to-day, this being private members' day. On the Order paper there are several important questions. There is a motion of which I gave notice a long time ago. There is a motion with respect to borings across the Strait of Northumberland with a view to affecting the approaching elections. There are a number of notices of motion which are of interest and importance. Among the Public Bills and Orders, we have "An Act respecting Interest;" "An Act concerning Drainage on the Property of Railway Companies;" "An Act to amend the Law relating to Conspiracies and Combinations formed in restraint of trade;" "An Act respecting the House of Commons;" "An Act to facilitate Voting by Employees at the Elections of Members of the House of Commons;" "An Act further to amend Chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, being the North-west Representation Act;" "An Act further to amend the Dominion Elections Act." Then, there is a notice to resume adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Jeannotte for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 21) "An Act further to amend the Bank Act." The hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) must have desired this debate to be resumed; yet we find him assisting the Government in their determination to deprive the members of their day, and their last day for pushing forward these Bills. Then, there is consideration of amendments by the Senate to Bill (No. 4) "An Act respecting the liability of Her Majesty and Public Companies for labour used in the construction of Public Works."—(Mr. McLennan.) That hon. gentleman, I regret to say, is assisting the Government in depriving private members, including himself, of this opportunity to push forward Bills. Then, there is on the paper an order for second reading of Bill (No. 13) "An Act to amend the Dairy Products Act."—(Mr. McLennan.) This is an important Bill; yet the hon. gentleman is preventing its progress by supporting the Government in their present action. Then, there is the order for resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Sproule for the second reading of Bill (No. 11) "An Act respecting Detective Corporations and Mercantile Agencies." I can make an exception in this case, because the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is endeavouring to compel the Government to come down to reasonable methods of doing business and prevent continuous sittings, day and night. Then, there is the second reading of Bill (No. 13) "An Act to determine the length of the working day for Workingmen and Labourers employed on Public Works."—(Mr. Lépine.) I am sorry there is no clause in the Bill to determine the length of the working day of a member of this House. That hon. gentleman, who claims to be the special representative of the workingmen, is assisting the Government in taking away from private members their last day for pushing forward Bills. Then, we have "An Act further to amend the North-west Territories Act;" the second reading of Bill (No. 18) "further to amend the Trade Mark and Design Act."—(Mr. Coatsworth.) No doubt, this is an important Act, demanded by the hon. gentleman's constituents; yet the hon. gentleman is engaged in supporting the Government in its coercive policy and to take away private members' day. Again, there is the second reading of Bill "to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act."—(Mr. Davin.) That hon. gentleman is interested in the development and future prosperity of the North-west and yet he is engaged in supporting the Government in depriving private members of this the only day when this and other measures can be pushed forward and become law. Then, we have the second reading of Bill (No. 24) "An Act to prohibit the importation and immigration of Foreigners and Aliens under contract of agreement to perform labour in Canada." This is a Bill introduced by Mr. Taylor, the Whip of the Conservative party. That hon. gentleman is engaged in the unholy design on the part of the Government of taking away the only day when this Bill could possibly become law. We have next the second reading of Bill (No. 46) "An Act to promote the safety of Railway Employees."—(Mr. Maclean, York.) I must excuse Mr. Maclean from any such intention as I have indicated in some other cases, because he is engaged with many other members in resisting this attempt to coerce Parliament and deprive private members of their rights. Then, there is the second reading of Bill (No. 51) "respecting Insolvency." Again, there is second reading of Bill (No. 55) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Elections Act."—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.) Then, there is "An Act respecting the Assignment and Attachment of the Salaries of Public Employees;" "An Act respecting Debentures of Loan Companies."—(Mr. Tisdale.) That hon. gentleman is engaged in supporting the Government in their course. Then, there is the order to resume adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Davin:

> That it is necessary to (1) the prosperity and progress of the North-west Territories, important to the stability and progress of the Dominion, and of great moment to the Empire that the North-west Territories shall be treated on a different footing from that of heretofore; (2) That the self-respect of the people of the North-west, not less than the material interests of those vast Territories demands that the Territories shall not be treated on a plane of inferiority; (3) That the climate, soil and conditions generally of the North-west are different from those of other parts of Canada, and a policy specially adapted to its needs and resources is called for in order that the settlers shall be rendered prosperous and immigration policies be made effective.

That is a most interesting motion to be moved by the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin); but I regret to say again that that hon. gentleman is supporting this policy of the Government to take away the only opportunity afforded of considering this important matter. So I might go on; but I do not desire to detain the House unnecessarily, as we are approaching the end of the session, and I have given the committee, I think, abundant reasons why it should rise and report progress.

Mr. STUBBS. This committee is still considering the motion I moved thirteen or fourteen hours ago that the committee rise and report progress. I submitted that motion honestly believing that hon. members were not capable of discussing the clauses of the Bill and that they needed sleep and refreshment. This being a very important Bill, as we have learned on the authority of the Secretary of State, it should be discussed with the full intelligence of the House present, and it is not reasonable that a Bill of such gigantic importance should be "railroaded" through the committee when the legal members are compelled to be absent. In moving that the committee rise, I did my duty. The committee has sat twelve or thirteen hours since I moved that resolution. I now ask the Government to allow the committee to rise. The people of this country are getting tired of this Bill being forced through the House against the wishes of the public and in the absence of leading members of the House. It must be intelligently discussed, and I am sorry to say that the hon. gentlemen in charge of the Bill absolutely refuses to give the necessary information when asked by hon. members. It is not reasonable that a new member like myself should be able to give an intelligent vote on provisions of the Bill which I do not understand. My constituents will ask me questions and explanations of the various clauses of the Bill; but I am not capable of giving them. I have failed to get the various clauses explained. When I was elected to represent Cardwell, I thought I was coming to the Dominion Parliament to associate with hon. members who would elevate me intellectually, but I am sorry to have to acknowledge the object of my life has failed to materialize. I am associated with hon. gentlemen from some of whom I expected something better, and the people will resent what I call an insult to the hon. member for Cardwell. I repeat that I have failed to get explanations from the Minister when I asked for them, and so it is impossible for me conscientiously and honestly to vote the clauses of this Bill. I would like to have things explained and I am sorry that this privilege is denied. When we know from following the debates as well as the decisions upon these various cases that the best legal talent give a confusion of opinions upon this Manitoba school question, it becomes all the more necessary that we should have a full discussion of the details of this matter, and I think those having the Bill in charge should be ready to answer questions asked of them. According to the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), the minority are crying to Heaven for justice. But when the commissioners went to Winnipeg they offered a settlement on a basis which would give the minority much less than is provided for in this Bill. They considered only the interest of the minority in cities, towns and villages. But are the minority of the minority, who are in the rural districts, not to be considered? It may have been the hot shot from my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) that brought the coon down a little. But when a commission failed, the coon has gone higher and the old demands are renewed. I think that when the people get the chance to load the gun they will bring the coon down from the highest branch, and when it does come down the "critter" will be found scarcely worth skinning. I gave the other day, as a parallel case to this the report of the commissioners from the Educational Department of Ontario to inquire into the condition of the Ottawa separate schools. That report showed that these schools were not satisfactory. If this is the case with schools like those of Ottawa under the direct control of the Education Department, how can we expect that schools will be satisfactory that are under a board of the minority's own appointment? It must not be forgotten that the complaints about the schools here were not made by Protestants but by gentlemen whose children were attending these separate schools, they were not making the progress that the parents thought desirable. Many hon. gentlemen who are now present were not in the House when I read from this report. I shall not, however, repeat what I read then, but shall proceed with another portion of the report dealing mainly with the instruction in English. The recommendation in favour of the teaching of English in these schools is one which must be endorsed by all. Our country lies alongside that inhabited by sixty or seventy millions of people, the vast majority of whom speak English. It is the duty of the people in every part of the Dominion to see that the children are taught English, that they may not be handicapped in the struggle for life.

(The hon. gentleman read from the report referred to.)

Before this Bill is read a third time, I hope the Government will see their way clear to have a clause inserted, making it compulsory upon those schools, when they are in a French settlement, to use bilingual books, and make it compulsory upon them to have the English language taught to a certain extent each day, say for an hour, or an hour and a half. (The hon. gentleman resumed reading.) I am glad that in this Remedial Bill there is a clause providing that the teacher must be able to teach the English language intelligently. If that clause was amended so as to provide that the English language should be taught an hour each day, the children would be greatly benefited by it. (The hon. gentleman resumed reading.) The committee are doubtless aware of the character of the teaching, and the results obtained, in the separate schools here in Ottawa. You would naturally expect that those who use the separate schools would take an interest in them, and would insist upon their children being well taught. But if the schools have been so neglected here in Ottawa, how can we expect that in the rural districts of Manitoba, outside of the control of any educational committee, who are responsible for the manner in which the money is spent, there will be any better system than has existed in the city of Ottawa. For this reason, I am opposed to this Bill in its present form. (The hon. gentleman resumed his reading of the report.)

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday last the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), in addressing the House, made reference to a number of Liberal-Conservative members who had not been active in giving pronounced opposition to this Bill in committee. Among others, he referred to some who had been devoting their time to writing anonymous letters to the papers, and mentioned particularly a letter that appeared in the "Mail and Empire," signed

"West York Conservative." I understand that the hon. gentleman has intimated that he referred to me as the writer of that letter, and, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask him if he referred to me.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he understood himself to be referred to.

Mr. HUGHES. The "Globe," of Monday, has the following :—

> A notable incident occurred last night when Mr. Clark Wallace was addressing the House. He was alluding to the silence of Ministers and members who support the Remedial Bill, and directed his attention to Mr. Sam Hughes, M.P., and said there was one member of the House who was afraid to make attacks on him face to face, but used the columns of the "Mail and Empire" to make his false and malicious attacks, and hid his identity by giving it the untruthful signature "West York Conservative." There was no mistaking the M. P. to whom reference was made, but no defence was forthcoming.

Now, I took the liberty of speaking to the representative of the "Globe," and he gave me distinctly to understand that I was the member referred to, and that the hon. member for West York had given him that information. I would like to know if the hon member for West York had reference to me.

Mr. WALLACE. I am still listening for the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) to make his statement. I do not know by what rules of Parliament the hon. gentleman has the authority to catechise me. If he wants any statement from me, I am quite sure I shall be ready, if the opportunity occurs, to make it.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, that is just about the size of the answer I expected. I took the liberty yesterday as soon as this matter was drawn to my attention, of telegraphing to the editor of the "Mail and Empire," not knowing but that some person had possibly used my name or taken advantage of my frank to send a letter from here ; and I have received the following answer to my telegram :—

> The letter signed "West York Conservative" was not written by you.

I may state that I am not in the habit of writing anonymous letters. I never wrote the letter, never saw it, and had no connection, direct or indirect, with it. When I have anything to say to the hon. member for West York or to any other member of this House, my policy, as he knows, is not to hit behind the back, but to come out in the open, and let him know exactly where I stand.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Where do you stand on this Bill ?

Mr. LANDERKIN. On both sides.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of knowing where I stand, possibly before I am through ; and before the elections are over, he will probably have an opportunity of knowing where he stands. Now, Mr. Chairman, no man in this House has regretted as much as I the course pursued during the past six months by the hon. member for West York. Until a few months ago, no man in the whole Dominion of Canada stood higher in my estimation than that hon. member.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That was his misfortune.

Mr. HUGHES. But when I find him in the course of this debate maligning every hon. member of this House who does not choose to follow in his tail, who does not choose to recognize him as a pope in all these matters, then I must certainly refuse to follow that hon. gentleman's lead any further. Speaking of anonymous letters, I want the hon. member to understand that I am not in the habit of writing anonymous letters. I do not recall an instance when it was ever necessary for me to write one, or when I ever wrote one ; but I will take the liberty of referring briefly to a little newspaper correspondence which will show who is possessed of the spirit to write anonymous letters, the hon. member for West York, or other hon. members of this House. Many members will recall the incident that occurred a few evenings ago—I think it was last Saturday evening—when the hon. member for West York, who stood in his place last night and said that he had not attempted, either directly or indirectly, to intimidate any one in this country, braved one of the young journalists of the press gallery in the corridor, and demanded of him why he had dared to insert some correspondence in the manner in which it was inserted. But the hon. member for West York struck a snag. The young newspaper man was not to be bullied, and would not bend to this self-constituted pope. It transpired that the trouble was about some correspondence that appeared in the Toronto "Evening Telegram," of Saturday. I do not know how the hon. gentleman got wind of it so soon, but he knew that this correspondence had appeared in that paper as coming from him. The correspondence, it seems, had been written by the hon. member for West York ; but it had been written in the third person, so as to appear in the paper as coming from the young newspaper reporter himself ; and the young newspaper reporter—who, I presume, as well as nearly all other newspaper correspondents, had been receiving frequent doses of this kind ad nauseam—declined to take the dose any longer. Now, I wish for the edification of the House, to read the correspondence furnished to this newspaper reporter by the hon. member for West York. It was written in the third person, but the reporter would not use it in that way. It was as follows :—

> Clark Wallace said this morning this significant thing in this struggle over the Remedial Bill is the success which has attended the efforts of those Conservatives who have obstructed the measure. They have stopped it in the House, and they will compel its withdrawal on the part of the Government. The Conservatives who stood up in the caucus of the party and objected to the Bill and who stood up in the House and spoke and voted against the Bill are very much on top, and those Conservatives, especially from Ontario, who voted for the Bill, or who votted against its second reading, so as to make a record for themselves, and then aided the Government directly or indirectly to get it through subsequent stages, are trying to square themselves with the public and are beginning to explain their position by speeches in the House.

This, remember, is from the pen of the hon. member for West York, but it was intended to be represented as coming from the pen of this versatile young newspaper reporter.

> The members who voted for the Bill and whose names are mentioned in connection with offices are also feeling very uncomfortable.
> The straight Conservatives who opposed the Bill throughout, and who made the big fight at the last stand, included myself, Dr. Sproule, Mr. McNeill, Mr. Maclean, Col. Tyrwhitt and Dr. Weldon. Throughout the week three or more of these six were on continuous duty in the House watching the measure. They were assisted by Mr. McCarthy, Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Stubbs.

The others were the gentlemen who made the attack, and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and his two followers assisted them.

> The other Conservatives who voted against the second reading were not active in opposing the Bill when in committee. Mr. Cockburn, Mr. Calvin, Mr. Carscallen, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Hodgins, Mr. Rosamond took no further part after voting against the second reading. Mr. Craig and Mr. Bennett voted a couple of times against the Government on the clauses.

Now comes the touch. I do not see my hon. friend from North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray here :

> As for Sam Hughes and Major McGillivray, both of whom voted against the six months' hoist and against the second reading, and who, according to Mr. Hughes, were the only genuine opponents of the Bill, they worked continuously with the Government, doing their best to get the Bill through the various stages of the committee.

These are the views of the "free and independent press" of the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which the hon. member for West York stands up and waves his hands about :

> Mr. Hughes was on the regular Conservative relay, acted practically as whip to carry the Bill, and never once opened his mouth to oppose it, though he had declared in public that if ever the measure got into the House he would fight it at every stage.
> Mr. Henderson, of Halton, voted against the second reading, but was a most active worker for the Government when the Bill was in committee.

That is the opinion of the hon. member for West York, written with his own hand.

Mr. LISTER. But it is true.

Mr. HUGHES. If it is true, let the reporters tell it ; but it is as false as the great bulk of the statements which the hon. member for West York has been making throughout the length and breadth of this country.

> The six stalwart Conservatives who fought the Bill throughout were actively and persistently supported by Mr. McCarthy and his followers, Col. O'Brien and Stubbs.

Mark you, these stalwart Conservatives were in the tail of the hon. member for West York, with the hon. member for North Simcoe and poor Stubbs following in the rear. But here is something for the hon. member for North Simcoe :

> Mr. McCarthy never was so active, never so successful in a parliamentary fight. Clarke Wallace and McCarthy were the two big champions of Manitoba, and they have earned well deserved recognition.

And now comes in a little cream for hon. gentlemen opposite :

> Of course, the Liberals, and especially the Liberals of Ontario and the maritime provinces, and "Fighting Joe Martin," of Winnipeg, a host in himself, did a lot of heavy work, and were never off duty.

That should satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sure. Now, here comes the compliment :

> In this respect Mr. Mulock, Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. Fraser, of Guysboro', were constantly in the fray.

The rest of the hon. members opposite who have sat here night after night, the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville), the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), the philosopher from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), our good friend from King's, N.S., (Mr. Borden), and other hon. gentlemen who have held the fort here time and again in the good cause, will not, I trust, feel sore. The letter concludes :

> This comparative minority, supported as they were by the great body of public opinion in all the English-speaking provinces, won the day in the greatest parliamentary struggle known to Canada. Ontario saved Manitoba this trip.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know who is thus far shown to be guilty of anonymous letter-writing. The letter to which the hon. member referred the other night signed "West York Conservative," has never yet been seen by me, nor was I directly or indirectly a party to its preparation, nor did I know of its preparation or its existence. But the hon. gentleman will not deny that he, with his own hands, furnished to the press a report which he wised to appear as that of the young officer of the "Telegram"; and when the young man refused to father it, he met him in the corridors and threatened to thrash him because he had ventured to exercise his right as a free man. Now, there are other anonymous letters. This House was called upon in the early days of this session to witness a most distressing scene. The Hon. Dr. Montague, Minister of Agriculture, was practically charged by the hon. member for West York with having been guilty of writing anonymous letters to the Prime Minister of Canada. The first letter was written about a year ago. It related to a circumstance that was known to the Prime Minister of Canada and to Dr. Montague, and Dr. Montague knew that the Prime Minister knew the fact long before he went into the Cabinet.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). I think the hon. member is going rather too far.

Mr. HUGHES. I am merely defending myself against a charge made by the hon. member for West York, and I am proving that the man who made the charge is guilty of this kind of work.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. HUGHES. The Hon. Dr. Montague, I say, was well aware that the circumstances connected with this first letter was known to the Prime Minister long before the date of the letter. Therefore, why should the Hon. Dr. Montague write to the Prime Minister about something he himself well knew that the Prime Minister knew? The thing is absurd on the face of it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). I must call the hon. member to order. That has nothing to do with the Bill before the committee.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Chairman, it has a great deal to do with the Bill, I submit. The hon. gentleman is an opponent of the Remedial Bill, and he is taking his part now in a trick of obstruction.

Mr. HUGHES. There is no motion before the Chair in regard to the Bill. The motion is that the committee rise and report progress, and I do not think I am straying very much further from the rules than any hon. gentleman who has addressed the House during the past week. I do not charge the hon. member for West York with being an accomplice in writing that letter; but I presume that it was written by some one who did not know that Dr. Montague and the Prime Minister knew the circumstance to which it referred, and that the charges made in it had been exploded. The second letter was an entirely different affair. The matter to which that letter referred had been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister some time before the date of the letter, and Dr. Montague knew that the charges it made had been disproved, and he had no necessity to write it. But the people of Canada will have an opportunity of comparing the handwriting of that second letter with the handwriting of the hon. member for West York, and I leave them to judge who was the guilty person, the Hon. Dr. Montague or another gentleman in this country. So much for anonymous letter-writing.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The point is this, that in regard to the anonymous letters the hon. member refers to, I understand, proceedings have been taken. They are, therefore, as the lawyers term it, sub judice, and are not to be spoken of by any person outside of the court. I think the point is well taken, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HUGHES. The point is well taken, and therefore I will not say anything more about those anonymous letters. But, Sir, what has been the prevailing spirit of the hon. member for West York in connection with this whole affair? It is insane hatred and jealousy of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that no dearer friend had he ever in Canada than the Hon. Dr. Montague until within these few months. When Dr. Montague was offered a seat in the Cabinet, he refused to accept it, and claimed that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) should be taken in as his senior, and that he would take a subordinate position in the Government. I do not know what the objection was to the hon. gentleman. Many of us did our best to get him taken into the Cabinet, we stuck to him like men staunch and true, but whatever the objection was, he was not taken.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is making known state secrets, and I would like to know the fountain from which he received his information?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mara). A point of order has been taken. The debate is irrelevant. It has no connection whatever with the subject before the committee. I only allowed the hon. member to go on because there appeared to be a wish on both sides to allow him to proceed, but as the point of order has been taken, I must call him to order.

Mr. HUGHES. I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and shall not dwell any further on that point. We have been charged before this House and the country—those of us who chose not to sacrifice our own judgment in connection with the Remedial Bill to the course adopted—with being improperly controlled. I have a perfect right to defend myself on the floor of this House against any such charge by saying that the source from which that charge has come is in itself corrupt, or I will not say corrupt, because that may be unparliamentary, but is not of a nature to commend itself to the people of this country. There was an election in the county of North Ontario not very long ago. My good friend, Major McGillivray, was the candidate. Let us examine the conduct of our hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) in that connection, and I shall merely speak of his public conduct. I will divulge nothing whatever of what transpired privately. In the first place, he demanded that Major McGillivray should pledge himself against remedial legislation. That, to my certain knowledge, Major McGillivray refused to do. He felt, as I felt, that the Manitoba government were honest in their professions of friendship and anxious to have a fair settlement. I believed then, and I believed until very recently, that the Manitoba government was perfectly honest in its desire to effect a settlement of this unfortunate question. Under that conviction, Major McGillivray refused to deviate from his allegiance to the Conservative party, and he fought out the elections on the lines of that party, paying no attention whatever to the attacks of our good friends of the Opposition with reference to the school question, but simply taking the lines of the old Conservative policy and platform. But the hon. member for West York spoke at Severn Bridge and Bracebridge on behalf of the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray). What was the burden of his speech ? On both occasions, as those of us who read the Toronto "Globe" will remember, his speeches were one continued attack on the hon. leader of the Opposition. He took the position then, which possibly, in the opinion of many, subsequent events have justified, of declining to accept the non-committal denial of the hon. leader of the Opposition to the statement that he had thanked God there were no Orangemen in the ranks of the Liberal party. From first to last, the hon. member for West York made that the key-note of his attacks, and conclusively proved that the hon. leader of the Opposition used the language attributed to him by the newspapers in the province of Quebec. That was the text of his speeches on those two occasions. He called upon the electors of North Ontario to support Major McGillivray in opposition to the candidate of the Opposition. Later on, the hon. member for West York resigned his seat in the Government. I shall not give the causes why he resigned his seat. He knows best, but I will say this, that the reason he resigned his seat was not the fact that the Remedial Bill was before the country. He resigned his seat the day previous to the election in North Ontario. And if ever his friends were horrified, it was when they received a telegram from the city of Toronto on the day previous to that election, stating that the hon. member for West York had resigned his seat in the Government. And the announcement thereof was being telegraphed, not to us but to our opponents, in every hustings in North Ontario. The hon. member for North Simcoe grew six inches taller that night on the platform at Bracebridge, as he read the announcement that the hon. member had resigned. He had bills printed and circulated throughout the riding giving the news. Throughout the southern portion of the riding, thousands of hand bills were distributed, saying that the hon. member for West York had resigned and calling on the electors of that county to rally to the polls the coming morning and defeat Major McGillivray. But to show that the voice and name of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) amounts to nothing in that county and that the voice and name of the hon. member for West York amounts to nothing, when separated from questions of principle, the announcement did not alter two votes in the whole riding. Why did the hon. gentleman not mail his resignation on that day, instead of wiring it to Ottawa as he did ? Why did he think it necessary to wire ? When his bosom friend, the man who had stood by him, possibly second only to myself in all Canada, as a friend, the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), was within a stone's throw of him in Toronto on that day, why did he not consult him and make to him the announcement that he had resigned from the Government. But no, he chose to wire his resignation to Ottawa, in order that it might be telegraphed throughout the length and breadth of North Ontario and defeat Major McGillivray in the struggle. And the next day, when it was announced that Major McGillivray's majority was 800, he said: although I am knocked out this time, I will get even ; and he wrote a letter congratulating Major McGillivray on his majority. Now, there was another election in the Dominion. The Liberal-Conservative party of this country deemed it expedient and proper that the High Commissioner for Canada in England should take a seat in the Cabinet. He ran an election in Nova Scotia. During that election, the heart of the present Secretary of State was gladdened by a gentleman handing him a letter to the following effect. The letter was not marked private :

> My dear Sir Charles :
> The bearer is Mr. Walsh, a staunch Roman Catholic and friend of mine who will be of great use to you down in the country.

This letter gladdened the heart of the hon. leader of this House in his campaign ; but when we find that the hon. gentleman, in another election, the election of the Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior), sent telegrams to the Orangemen of Victoria to defeat the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), and when we find that the influence of the hon. gentleman was exerted in the province of Nova Scotia among the Orangemen there, certainly not to support the Government on this question, what can we conclude to be the practice of the hon. gentleman ? Is he the man who can stand out and be in a position to charge another man with being unfair or untrue? At Severn Bridge, at Bracebridge and elsewhere, throughout the length and breadth of Ontario, our good friend has boasted of the famous speech he made in this city on the 12th of July last. I want to tell this House that the part of that speech, which he prides himself with so much gust on having delivered, was never delivered by him. It is almost equal to the Stratford speech of a certain other hon. gentleman. The speech had been prepared, I will not say how. In glancing over it, a number of his friends came to the conclusion that inasmuch as harmony and peace once more reigned among the brethren of the Cabinet, and as it was the intention to proceed along smooth and sunny ways in order to procure a settlement of the Manitoba school question, it would be possibly out of place for the hon. member for West York to use such violent language, as that down in the speech, and that it would be more becoming him and possibly more conducive to his obtaining a place in the Cabinet, if he were also to try the sunny ways of peace. Therefore the paragraph in his speech was marked out; but as the day was raining and it was clear that the rain might obliterate the pencil marks, a pen knife was brought into requisition, and the paragraph cut out so that the hon. gentleman could not possibly read it. But lo and behold you, a few minutes after I left the ground, I saw in the "Evening Journal" a report of the speech in its entirety, without the part which we had cut out being obliterated. Another copy had been furnished to the press, in which the correction was not made, and until this day that correction has not been made.

Hon. members of this House will remember the occasion, a few years ago, when we were divided on the question of a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman at Kingston on Home Rule. Who were the members that stood at his back then? Who were the men who upheld him, the Grand Master of the Orange body of Ontario, by their voice and their vote before the people of this country? They were the French Canadian Roman Catholics, standing shoulder to shoulder with the Protestant Conservatives from other parts of the Dominion, and they were led by the Postmaster General, Sir Adolphe Caron. These were the men who stood shoulder to shoulder by the hon. gentleman on that occasion. And I would like to ask who were the hon. gentlemen who hounded him down on that occasion? The hon. member for Addington (Mr. Dawson) was put up in jumping-jack style to move the resolution censuring the hon. member for West York. That resolution was supported by hon. gentlemen opposite. We can well recollect the speeches made then and on other occasions by hon. gentlemen on that side with reference to the hon. member for West York, when we stood at his back and defended him like men. We can remember the scathing terms in which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) alluded to him in this House, when he and others told the hon. gentleman that he was not fit to earn $5,000 or $500 per annum, but only fit to peddle cheap cottons across the counter in a small country store. We stood to the back of the hon. gentleman, and these are the men who are allied with him to-day in order to defeat the Liberal-Conservative party in this Dominion. There is another point to which I wish to draw attention. The speech which the hon. gentleman made in Kingston was on Home Rule. Looking back to 1882, I find it recorded in "Hansard" that the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan) moved a resolution on Home Rule, in which he asserted, among other things, that the rights of the minority in Ireland should be respected and that the dynamiters and the behind-the-hedge murderers should be liberated. The fifth clause of the resolution was this:

> We desire respectfully to suggest to Your Majesty that Canada and its inhabitants have prospered exceedingly under a Federal system, allowing to each province of the Dominion considerable powers of self-government, and we venture to express a hope that consistent with the integrity and well-being of the Empire, and of the rights and status of the minority are fully protected and secured, sure means may be found of meeting the expressed desire of so many of your Irish subjects in that regard.

The minority in that resolution is the Protestant minority. The next resolution is:

> We would further express a hope that the time has come when Your Majesty's clemency may without injury to the interests of the United Kingdom be extended to those persons, who are now imprisoned in Ireland charged with political offences only, and the inestimable blessing of personal liberty restored to them.

These resolutions will be found on page 1034 of "Hansard" of 1882. On the 20th April, the hon. member for West York spoke as follows (see page 1066 of "Hansard":—

> I have listened with great interest to the discussion which has taken place to-night on this important question. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) and of the other members who have spoken in favour of Home Rule in Ireland, and I have still to learn definitely what these hon. gentlemen mean by Home Rule for Ireland. Are powers to be granted similar to those given to the provinces of the Dominion? I do not think to-day that if Ireland got those local powers it would be any great advantage, unless she also got powers of concurrent legislation. What Ireland requires to-day is what Canada has—a protective policy. No policy could be more beneficial to Ireland than a protective policy. I disagree with the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester, when he objects to pressing the clause referring to the rights of the minority.

That is, the rights of the Protestant minority.

> That hon. gentleman was anxious a few years ago to have the rights of the minority respected in his province. By the Act of Confederation the rights of the minority of Quebec were respected, and I am very much surprised that this clause should be objected to. I am not very much in favour of those resolutions, and I believe, with the hon. member for Hastings, they were introduced for political purposes. Though I object to a certain extent to the principles contained in them, and to what I believe to be the motives of the promoters, I agree in great part with what has been said, that Ireland has great grievances, and that they ought to be redressed; and that the English Government are not taking all the steps they should to redress them. If the passage of this resolution would have the effect of inducing Mr. Gladstone to pay more attention to Irish affairs and introduce measures for the relief of Irish grievances, nobody would be more gratified than the people of Canada.

So that our hon. friend was in favour of Home Rule. He was in favour of letting every political prisoner in Ireland at that day free, and he stood up manfully for the rights of the Protestant minority in that country.

I shall not take up the attention of the House any further than to say this. My course on the Remedial Bill, I claim, has been a straightforward one. I am not making any excuse. On the contrary, let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that when they come to face their electors, it will be they who will require to make explanations as to their having voted for the six months' hoist. They voted that the Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months. I voted against reading it this day six months, because I do not want it read the second time at all, either this session or six months later. My course is perfectly consistent, and there is at all events one individual perfectly satisfied with it. I will not play the old man and his ass, but I will satisfy one man first, and I am perfectly satisfied that most of my friends will be satisfied afterwards. There are a thousand and one other reasons why we should vote against the six months' hoist, but this is not the time nor the place to discuss them. So far as the history of this Bill is concerned, it is known to my friends in the Government that for over a year I have worked persistently in the direction that the question should be settled by Manitoba. I am delighted at the stand taken by Sir Donald Smith on this question. My course was the same as his, and I advocated that the question should be settled first by the Manitoba government if they will settle it. But, in case the Manitoba government will not settle it, I would say, as I shall say to the Prime Minister of that province, if I have the honour to meet him in Ottawa: that the course of the Manitoba government undoubtedly seems as though they were playing into the hands of the Opposition in this House. I have given the Manitoba government credit for honesty, and have endeavoured to help them as much as any man could. I have, again and again, endeavoured, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) knows, and as the Minister of Finance knows, to have this matter settled by Manitoba. Let us look at the proposals made by the Manitoba government to our commissioners. I heartily endorse their offer of secular schools, but I am well enough posted to know that the great majority of the people of Canada would never consent to that proposition at the present time, although many of the best clergymen of all denominations, Archbishop Ireland, a Roman Catholic, the Rev. Dr. Chambers, a Methodist, and scores of other clergymen in Canada and the states, have come out boldly in favour of secular schools. The other alternative proposal of the Manitoba government is that the religious exercises shall be such as are provided by the statute. That may mean something or it may mean nothing. The next clause in their alternative offer is that these religious exercises shall only be utilized with the consent of the majority of the trustees. Well, Sir, if they have the right to teach religion at all, they should have the privilege of teaching it from half-past three to four o'clock, whether they are in the majority or in the minority. The other night the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) made a statement which he had the manliness to retract when he was proven wrong. But what is the course of some other hon. members? The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) made some criticism in regard to my having been offered preferment by this Government. I was never offered preferment by this Government. During the crisis, when the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) was offering to help Sir Mackenzie Bowell to elect his candidates in the various provinces of the Dominion, I did refuse to enter a Ministry—I have been told since it was a Ministry to be led by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). In fact, there were so many Ministries in the air at that time that I am not sure which one it was. Can the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) or any one else point out where in the British House of Commons any important measure such as this has been met with the six months' hoist on the second reading. The six months' hoist is used for private Bills, and for public Bills that do not threaten the existence of the Government, but the practice in the English House of Commons is to meet such a Bill as this with a motion affirming some principle in opposition to the Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. The Home Rule Bill and the Irish Church Disestablishment Bill, both important measures, were met with the six months' hoist.

Mr. HUGHES. In the whole record of English history there are very few instances in which such a Bill was met by an amendment for the six months' hoist. Above all, such a Bill as we are now considering should not have been met with that motion. I still trust that the government of Manitoba and the Dominion Government will meet and settle this important question. As the Ministers know, I have offered serious opposition to this Bill, and offered far more opposition to it than the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) did. I leave it to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of Justice, if they have not almost hated the sight of me, so often have I gone around to see them in connection with some of the provisions of this measure. But, if it was the intention of the Government to put the Bill through, I wanted to see it as perfect as possible. I have not stood up in the House and attempted to advertise myself as have some others. I have not, as a member of the Orange Society in this country, sought to influence any man in this House by improper motives or proper motives it may be. I have not written letters to them in order to influence them, and in order that they might write back to others. I have not attempted to build up a party within a party in order to try and burst the Conservative party, or to hold the balance of power, so that I might dictate to that party.

Mr. WALLACE. I shall trespass upon the time of the House for a few moments while I pay a little attention, although not very much to the statements which were made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes), to try and set himself right before his constituents and the public. He said that he had done more to oppose this Bill than had the member for West York, or any other member of the House. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that will be news to every hon. member present. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) tells us that he did not write the letter to the "Mail and Empire" signed "West York Conservative." If he denies it, I suppose we are obliged to accept his statement, but if you take the trouble to read that letter, you will find that it is exactly similar to his speech to-night. Is it not a wonderful thing how great minds sometimes run in the same channel? In order to relieve the hon. gentleman's mind about the interview that appeared in the Toronto "Telegram," and which he has asserted I wrote every line of, I may say that I did not write a single line of it. If I did I would not have made such complimentary references to myself. I have never found it necessary to do so. Not one line of it was written by me.

Mr. HUGHES. May I ask, did he (Mr. Wallace) give it to the reporter?

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is a good hand at asking questions, but it will take him all his time to answer a few questions which I propose to put to him to-night. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) started out with a great flourish of trumpets, to convict me of some wrong-doing in reference to a resolution of this House in 1882, but he did not succeed. He told the House that I was in favour of Home Rule, and in favour of freeing the political prisoners. I challenge him for the slightest tittle of evidence to prove that statement. I always favoured a system of local government in Ireland that would not interfere with the integrity of the British Empire. But I strongly opposed Gladstone's Home Rule scheme, because the open and avowed intention was to disintegrate the Empire, to separate Ireland from England, and as Mr. Parnell himself stated: to remove the last vestige of connection between the two kingdoms. I am heartily in favour of the system of county councils and local councils which they are now introducing in the British Parliament, because they give a system of local control which we have in Canada, and which has produced the most satisfactory results. Sir, I appeal to the members of the House to corroborate my refutation of the charge of the hon. member (Mr. Hughes) that I have attempted to interfere with any man's liberty in this House. I have repeatedly stated that each individual member of Parliament is responsible to his own constituents and to his own conscience, and to those alone. I am not shirking that responsibility, nor will the electors of North Victoria allow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) to shirk it. When he professes at one time to be an opponent of remedial legislation, and at another time he sits here day and night to promote it in every possible way, he will find that his constituents will size him up at his true value. I will let it go at that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) has referred to certain anonymous letters which have been mentioned in this House earlier in the session. You, Sir, ruled him out of order in that reference, and he was very glad to get out himself, because the further he went on the worse he made it appear for his bosom friends of to-day.

Mr. HUGHES. Not much.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, the hon. gentleman seems to know all about it. Now, let us look at the position of the hon. gentleman himself. He told his constituents, through his own newspaper, that he was offered a seat in the Cabinet, and that he spurned such an offer because he would not barter his independence for any office that might be given him. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) is the Ottawa correspondent and editor of the Lindsay "Warder," his own paper, and I have it now in my hand. I may say that in this one article in the Lindsay "Warder," his own name is mentioned ninety-seven times.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, it is a conspicuous example of the hon. gentleman's extreme modesty. He says:

> Mr. Hughes believes in consistency. He opposed Sir Mackenzie Bowell's policy of remedial legislation before the crisis, during the crisis and since the crisis.

Where is he now ?

> During the crisis though very strong influences were brought to bear on Mr. Hughes to induce him to give up his principles upon the school question for personal preferment, he promptly refused to listen to any such proposals.

Was it the Government that made these proposals or was it somebody else. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the Government made these proposals to him, and what were they ?

Mr. HUGHES. I shall take the liberty to answer. It was not made by the Government nor was it made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), who was very active in inducing other hon. gentlemen to enter the Cabinet at that time, and pledging them his support. It was made by a gentleman who was authorized, I believe, by the hon. member who was to select his Ontario colleagues in the Government.

Mr. WALLACE. If it were not unparliamentary, I would say : that is very like a whale. Who was the gentleman authorized to form a Government and who at the same time asked the hon. member to sacrifice his principles. It could not be any of the gentlemen who think as I do on this question, because at that time he was professing to have the same principles as we have.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) at that time was willing to assist in electing remedial legislation candidates, and I was not.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman who makes such a statement about me, says what is not true. I challenge a particle of proof to show that I ever did anything that would compromise the position I consistently have taken right through. The hon. gentleman has made that insinuation, and so has the "West York Conservative" in the "Mail and Empire," almost word for word. There is no truth in it. Now, we will again refer to Mr. Hughes. He says :

> During the crisis, though very strong influences were brought to bear on Mr. Hughes to induce him to give up his principles on the school question for personal preferment, he promptly refused to listen to any such proposals.

What has become of him now, where is he now ? Can any one tell ? Does he know himself ? Has he given up his principles and not got any preferment ? I will trouble the House with his further statement, made when he was called to time, no doubt, about this article. Some people said he was to get a position in the Militia Department, and some people that he was to get other positions, but he promptly declined all of these. Now, we will take his own statement about the matter. Here is the last issue of this Lindsay "Warder," and he says :

> During the crisis in January last when the seven Protestant Ministers left the Government, leaving Sir Mackenzie Bowell and other ultra remedial legislationists in the Cabinet, many attempts were made by anti-remedial legislationists to reconstruct the Ministry by filling the places of those resigned. In those attempts several who had been opposed to remedial legislation and are now back again against the measure, were found striving for positions in Sir Mackenzie Bowell's ultra remedial legislationist Cabinet, and for some days it seemed likely it would be reconstructed.

That is just what the "West York Conservative" said in the Toronto "Mail" :

> Every one was amazed to know that the gentleman referred to should seem capable of dropping their principles for office so easily.

Now, he has told us to-night that he was asked to step in some other Cabinet, and not that of Sir Mackenzie Bowell. I would like to have some explanation. It does not take more than an hour or two to explain why he made the statement to-night that it was some other government, or some other people who were forming a government, who asked him to go into it.

Mr. HUGHES. I will tell the hon. gentleman now. I will give it to him straight now.

Mr. WALLACE. Wait till I get through. In the Victoria "Warder" of the 10th of April, which is not yet a week old, the hon. gentleman says :

> At that time the member for North Victoria was twice approached by representative men to step into the Cabinet under Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Now, what did he tell this House a moment ago ? That it was the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell that he was asked to join ? Not a bit of it ; but another Government, which, it was supposed, was being formed at that time. The article goes on :

> And on one occasion he was assured the position of Minister of Militia would be his if he would but accept office.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this was in the beginning of January, at the time the seven members of the Government had resigned their positions, and when it was supposed that the Premier was attempting to find colleagues. He looked all around this House, and he said : "There is only one man who can bring us to victory, and I must look to him ; that is, the member for North Victoria." He asked him to accept the office of Minister of Militia ; but, Mr. Chairman, with that virtuous indignation which always characterizes that hon. gentleman, with that fine regard for principles which nobody thinks he has, but for which he always professes to be a champion, he says : "No, I cannot sacrifice my principles for office." Sir Mackenzie Bowell was, no doubt, breaking his heart at that time because the hon. gentleman would not accept office; and the reason he was breaking his heart was because just at that time, when Sir Mackenzie Bowell was dying to have the hon. member come into his Cabinet, in the Victoria "Warder" of 10th January, he spoke of Sir Mackenzie Bowell in this way:

> Whether Sir Mackenzie Bowell plays the man and the patriot and sends for Sir Charles Tupper, senior, to form a Cabinet, or performs the part of a poltroon and a coward by seeking to wreck the party, is merely a question of a day or two at the farthest.

Well, he did not do either; but you must realize, Mr. Chairman, how anxious the Premier of this country, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, was to have the hon. gentleman in his Cabinet, after he had referred to him as a poltroon and a coward, which, if he had been such, would have made him unworthy not only to be the Premier of this country, but to hold any position in the gift of the people. Therefore, when we read in the "Warder" that Sir Mackenzie Bowell was just worrying himself to death to get the hon. member for North Victoria into the Cabinet, we must realize how exact and truthful the statements made by the hon. member in the Victoria "Warder" were. That statement made in this paper I will characterize, if he will permit me, as one utterly devoid of truth; because I am sure every hon. member of this House, except the hon. member for North Victoria, will endorse what I say, that Sir Mackenzie Bowell, after reading that article, would not go to the man who called him a poltroon and a coward, and beg him to enter his Cabinet, and would not feel that the salvation of the country depended on his acquiescing; and when he refused to agree to go into the Cabinet, when he refused to save his country, why was it, Mr. Chairman? Because it was going to be at a sacrifice of principle; and yet we now find this hon. gentleman, who refused to sacrifice his principles, sitting up all night, and every night, sacrificing his principles, and getting no reward that we can see. Is there some reward awaiting the hon. member, or is that a trick, or is it simply subserviency and a desire to act as a—perhaps I had better not use the word; it would not be quite parliamentary.

Mr. HUGHES. I have done enough for you.

Mr. WALLACE. I never asked the hon. member to sacrifice a principle for me, and never will. If the hon. member can mention an instance when I asked him to sacrifice a principle for me, I ask him to do it now. He does not do it, and therefore it is a slander. Where does this wiseacre, who deals in Cabinet secrets ad libitum, who tells us what the Cabinet are pledged to do, what they are not pledged to do, and all about them—where does he get the knowledge of all this? He says the Premier all along knew this or knew that; this was the course the Government were to take here, and that was the course they were to take there. How did he know all these things? Was he a member of the Cabinet without portfolio? Was he sacrificing his principles in some way not yet disclosed to this House? It is very interesting to read the "Warder" to find out what the country is coming to—to get an accurate diagnosis of coming political events. I am sure all the daily newspapers which want to get an accurate knowledge of the political events that never happened, and never will happen, will be anxiously going over the columns of the Victoria "Warder" to get the information. He tells us some interesting things about the present condition of affairs. He tells us this:

> The controlling influences in the Cabinet are now along the right lines, and North Victoria's member feels much more honoured in being a trusted supporter of such leaders as Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., Hon. John Haggart, Hon. Geo. Foster, Hon. Dr. Montague, Hon. John F. Wood, Hon. A. R. Dickey, et cetera.

Who are the "etceteras"? I look around, and I see the smiling face of the hon. Minister of Public Works, the hon. Postmaster General, and other members of the Cabinet, to whom he refers in this rather disrespectful way. He says:

> The gentlemen named are as much opposed to separate schools per se as are any men in Canada.

Now, we must have that matter thoroughly investigated, and find out whether we are to include the "etceteras" in this sweeping charge. That is another Cabinet secret of the "Warder." Who gave authority to let that out? It is the one member of the Cabinet without portfolio who discloses Cabinet secrets. I think we shall have to have an explanation. I gave the members of the Government credit for being in favour of separate schools, for which they have introduced a Bill in this House, and have been pressing it to a conclusion pretty vigorously for the last few weeks. I gave them credit for sincerity and integrity, and on the statement of the hon. member for North Victoria, the member of the Cabinet without portfolio who divulges their secrets, I will refuse to believe that the gentlemen named here, are as much opposed to separate schools, per se, as any men in Canada. Then he says of them.

> But like the sheriff with the condemned one——

I object to such a parallel, Mr. Chairman.

> —they are merely executing the judgment of the highest court in the Empire.

I would like to ask the hon. member for North Victoria, if they are only executing the judgment of the highest court in the Empire, why he did not assist them, and come out openly and vote for the Bill? The House and the country will demand why he opposed the judgment of the highest court of the Empire, if that is a judgment, and he says it is, and he does not want to vote against it; but he did vote against it. I could take up your time reading the apologies he made to the Government for voting against them on this question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in another paragraph of this precious editorial, he says:

> As one who has firmly stood by Manitoba against his own friends and against the constitution, the member for North Victoria regrets the failure of his friends in Manitoba to act and grant a fair settlement.

Why, the hon. gentleman said that the province of Manitoba had made a fair, reasonable and proper proposal, and that their offer should have been accepted. Does he think that the province of Manitoba should have gone further in making concessions? If so, let him name the further concession he would ask them to make. Let him give this House the advantage of his opinion in that respect, because hitherto he has not done so, either in the columns of his paper or in his speeches in this House. Why, Mr. Chairman, this was said in that interview:

> Some men are busy explaining how and why they voted. Since the vote was taken on this question, at least three columns of the Victoria "Warder," of which Samuel Hughes is the editor and proprietor, have been devoted in each issue explaining how he voted and why he voted that way.

Sir, if he had voted right, he would not need to explain at all; a proper vote would explain itself. If he had voted in the way he had pledged himself to vote, and in the way his constituents understood he would vote—

Mr. HUGHES. I never pledged myself to vote any way.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the necessity for these long and laboured articles, which mean nothing? The hon. member, I will admit, used to say he was opposed to remedial legislation; but later on he became an astute statesman; he would not give things away; but he gave his friends away, apparently, and he gave himself away. He said the course of the hon. member for North Victoria was clear and straight. Of course, every one knows it was straight; it was not crooked; but he would not tell them what that course was. He left them in doubt; but like his colleague, the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray), he had a previous record, and that was that he was opposed to separate schools and remedial legislation. Now, I think the House must excuse me, though I have lots of interesting matter here about the hon. member for North Victoria. I am sure it would entertain the House for some time. We have been devoting ourselves to this abstruse Remedial Bill, and the House would enjoy a little recreation, a little alternation of treatment. But I think I have taken up time enough. However, before I sit down, I wish to refer to another matter. The hon. member has made some lengthy explanations in the "Warder" about the six months' hoist. He has one article of more than a column on "How to Attack the Principle of the Remedial Bill," and then he quotes from great authorities just as much as is necessary to answer his purpose, and leaves out the rest. For instance, he says:

> The proper course for those opposed to the principles of the Bill is clearly laid down by Dr. Bourinot and Sir Thomas Erskine May.

Well, Dr. Erskine May and the doctor who runs the Victoria "Warder," do not exactly agree, because I find that Dr. Erskine May says one thing, and the hon. member leaves it out. He says in his paper:

> The postponement of a Bill in this manner is regarded as the most courteous method of dismissing a Bill from further consideration, as the House has already ordered that the Bill shall be read a second time; and the amendment, instead of reversing that order, merely appoints a more distant day for the second reading.

That is what the hon. member quotes in his paper; but he left out the next sentence, which completely changes the position of affairs: I will read it to the House:

> The acceptance of the House of such an amendment being tantamount to the rejection of a Bill, if the session extends beyond the period of postponement, a Bill which has been ordered to be read a second time upon that day three months, is not replaced upon the notice paper of the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the motion was that the Bill get the six months' hoist from the 20th of March, six months from which date would be the 20th of September. It was known to every member of this House that the existence of this Parliament terminated not later than the 24th day of April. If the Bill were to be read six months after the 20th of March, it would not be reached by this House, and therefore never reached at all, but if it were brought up again, it would have to be brought up as a new measure in the Parliament succeeding this.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask the hon. member, in case the Bill had been defeated on the motion to read it the second time, could it have been restored to the Order paper next day?

Mr. EDGAR. The Chignecto Bill was.

Mr. WALLACE. Any Bill can be restored to the Order paper if it is defeated on the second reading. That is the rule of the House. Any member of this House, whether a member of the Government or a private member, could move to restore the Remedial Bill to the Order paper the next day, and it would be restored if the majority of the House so voted.

Mr. EDGAR. That was done this session in the case of the Chignecto Railway.

Mr. HUGHES. That was not a Government motion.

Mr. WALLACE. Any motion can be made a want of confidence motion by the Government.

An hon. MEMBER. He is only a Minister without portfolio.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister without portfolio is not yet Minister of Justice or even Minister of Militia. Somebody says he never will be. I do not think we should depress his hopes in that way. I do not see why he should not have a chance of airing himself as a prospective Minister, regardless whether he sacrifices his principles or not, because these loud-mouthed professions of principle, when heard from the hon. gentleman on the 10th July, entirely disappeared before the 10th April the same year. The rule with reference to the second reading, as laid down in May's Parliamentary Procedure, is as follows: —

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to a second reading of a Bill, to move, as an amendment to the question, a resolution embodying some principle diverse to the principle of the Bill.

Then the author goes on to give the number of ways in which amendments may be made. The hon. gentleman, in his editorial, made the statement that these are the only ways in which to kill a Bill. We are informed by the highest authority that the effective way to kill a Bill is to move the six months' hoist, or a hoist to any period later than the session.

Mr. HUGHES. The only way to attack the principle of a Bill, and the best one to kill the Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. The most effective way to attack the principle of a Bill is to kill it. I shall not take up any further time on this very interesting subject. I shall not defend myself from any of those charges which the hon. gentleman has made any further than the references I have already made. I do not find it necessary to defend myself, and I think I never shall, from the hon. member for North Victoria.

Mr. HUGHES. There is one question the hon. gentleman asked me, and then declined to allow me to answer when I accepted his challenge. It is this. The hon. gentleman who approached me with regard to this Cabinet, which was being formed at the time, told me that the hon. member for West York telegraphed the Prime Minister that he would assist him to elect his candidates in any riding of Ontario.

Mr. WALLACE. I telegraphed the First Minister that I would help him to elect his candidates. Why, I was here during the whole time. After the resignation took place, on Sunday night, I was in Ottawa on Monday morning, and did not leave Ottawa for many weeks afterwards, and therefore could not have telegraphed the First Minister, and did not telegraph.

Mr. HUGHES. Did the hon. gentleman telegraph the first Minister on Sunday from Woodbridge.

Mr. WALLACE. There is another sample question? Did I telegraph him from Woodbridge on the Sunday?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, you did.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not going to satisfy the hon. gentleman by answering the question, for this reason. I want him to make a statement, and I will tell him whether it is true or whether it is unfounded like the majority of his statements.

Mr. HUGHES. I say that the hon. gentleman telegraphed the Prime Minister from Woodbridge, and moreover that he communicated to the reporter of the Toronto "Telegram" an interview containing the statement I have just read.

Mr. WALLACE. Now the hon. gentleman starts off again. He has stated to this House at least six times that with my own hand I wrote this interview.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not say you wrote it. You dictated it. You wrote a letter to the reporter inclosing the type-written article.

Mr. WALLACE. I neither wrote nor dictated a line or a word of it, but I will say this, that outside representations made about myself I am disposed to think it was a very fair and a very accurate presentation of the case.

Mr. McNEILL. I think it is important that it should be distinctly understood what the ordinary practice is with regard to the killing of a Bill. I have not got Dr. Bourinot's work on parliamentary procedure in my hand at present, but I know that he lays it down very distinctly that the way to kill a Bill for the session is to move the six months' hoist. I have May's "Parliamentary Practice," which says:

> The ordinary practice, however, is to move an amendment to the question by leaving out the word "now" and adding "three months," "six months," or any other term beyond the probable duration of the session.

Mr. SEMPLE. I desire to offer a few remarks before this motion is carried. I was never more impressed with the truth of the adage that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones than I have been during this debate, when I heard two hon. members referring to personal matters and abusing each other. I do not think the charge of obstruction comes with good grace from the other side of the House, considering the delay which the Government took in bringing down the Bill. The hon. Secretary of State declared that this Bill was of so much importance he would lay down his life in order to carry it into law, and I was amused at the cartoon in one of the papers the other evening representing the hon. gentleman laying in his bed at ease with one hand stretched out. His mind seemed to be composed, and to an observer it would seem as if the gate of heaven was very near his soul. We do not, for one moment, wish the decease of the hon. gentleman, because it would be too great a sacrifice for so distinguished a member of this House to lay down his life for anybody. We desire that he should have a long life and that the only thing that should happen him would be to retire from the cares of office and leave them to younger and abler men. There has been no session in which less has been done in the beginning and more attempted to be done at the close. Let me call the attention of the House to some proceedings which took place in the beginning of the session, as narrated in the "Journal" newspaper, published in this city.

(The hon. gentleman read an article from the "Journal.")

Now let me read the speech of the hon. First Minister delivered in the Senate on the occasion of this trouble.

(The hon. gentleman read the speech of Sir Mackenzie Bowell in the Senate.)

The reason for the delay in bringing down this Bill is very clearly explained. The Government could not do any business until they had settled their family quarrels. Some hon. gentlemen have reflected on the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) on account of the stand he has taken on this matter. That hon. gentleman has relinquished an office of $5,000 a year. That is an example which is worthy of being copied by some other hon. members. It is an example that is sustained by British precedent. Three Cabinet Minister went on strike last summer, but the emoluments of office were more than they could relinquish, and so they went back. This session seven members of the Cabinet went on strike, but they came back rather than give up their $7,000 a year. I say that the member for West York did what was perfectly right and honourable. If any Minister cannot support the Government he should go out in an honourable way and not be wriggling and wiggling, and going against his conscience for gold and patronage. If other men in this country would follow the example of the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) this country would be better governed than it is to-day. We believe on this side of the House that the difficulty on this school question could be settled in a satisfactory way. There is no man entitled to higher respect in this country than the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), and I venture to say that had he with others been appointed as commissioners to the Manitoba government last summer, the question would have been amicably settled before this.

(The hon. gentleman read an article from the "Evening Star" of April 14th, containing the affidavit of Mr. Hay to the effect that the Separate School Act was hurriedly passed through the Manitoba legislature in 1871.)

From this statement, Mr. Chairman, we can see that the Manitoba School Act of 1871 was smuggled through the legislature and it is no wonder that it would prove unsatisfactory.

(The hon. gentleman then proceeded to read the history of the New Brunswick school law.)

This enables us to understand the state of affairs that existed at that time, and to understand the action of the Government of Sir John Macdonald. I have no doubt that a grievance did exist; but the Government did not interfere, although they had just as much right to interfere in that case as in the case of Manitoba. When we read the report of the commissioners who recently met in Winnipeg, we can see that there was very little difference between them, and that they were not far from a settlement. It appears also from an interview with Mr. Ewart, the trusted counsel of the minority, that even in sections where the people were all Roman Catholics, there would have been very little trouble in arranging matters. After all, so far as we can gather, the whole difficulty seemed to be in Winnipeg. When a settlement is so near, I think it is vain to press a measure of this kind; and if the Bill is withdrawn, and a further attempt is made, I have no doubt that an arrangement satisfactory to all parties will be arrived at. In this Dominion there should be no feeling of hostility between the people of different classes. The people of one denomination have as good a right to enjoy their religious privileges as the people of another; but the great difficulty in Manitoba is the principle of separate schools. The people of Manitoba are willing to grant almost everything demanded; but their position is equal rights to all, and special privileges to none, and they have been fortified in that position by the voice of the people in three different elections. The statement of the Manitoba commissioners says:

> At present in every city, town and village in the province, outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, the Roman Catholic children attend the public schools. Not a word of complaint is heard. Absolute contentment and satisfaction prevails. The children have the advantage of efficient instruction, and numbers of them are qualifying themselves to become teachers in the public schools. We do not hesitate to say that not only is there no desire to separate, but if left to themselves, the Roman Catholic people in the cities, towns and villages outside of Winnipeg and St. Boniface would not consent to a change in the direction indicated.

In their final reply they state:

> The point of difficulty in arriving at a basis of settlement seems to be very clearly defined. You maintain that, in the words of your Memoran> dum, the Roman Catholics "certainly have important legal rights in connection with separate schools," and that your idea of the object of the conference is to give to those rights in the most unobjectionable way, through the action of the legislature of the province.

The Government organ of the Manitoba government has said that equal rights to all denomination, special privileges to none, is the key note of the position taken by the local government commissioners during the conference ; and where that is the case, the interests of the minority can safely be left. We can safely trust this matter to the people of Manitoba, relying upon their sense of justice and fair play to right any wrongs that exist, with due respect for the feelings of the minority. The hon. leader of the Opposition has proposed a commission to inquire into all the facts, and I consider that it is more important to have a commission of inquiry on this than one upon the liquor traffic, as the operations of that traffic are well known. On that subject I must say that this House, considering the number of its members, is a very sober assembly ; and it is very sad when we see any of them transgressing the rules of courtesy. It was only on account of the unfortunate long night sittings that were held in this House that the other morning between ten and eleven o'clock one member came into the House in an improper condition, and raised his hand against another member, and used language which should not be used in any assembly —words which were heard by the reporters in the gallery and were scattered broadcast throughout the country. I am sure that we must all feel the effects of such an unfortunate occurrence, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who was guilty of it feels ashamed of it to-day, because he is often in his place, and I have not seen him there during the last few days ; so that I suppose he is on the stool of repentance.

> While the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

Mr. FLINT. Before the motion is put, I wish to make a few remarks in referring to one or two phases of this question. We have reached a stage in this measure when it does appear as if the quantity of work before the committee is so great, and the varieties of opinion so numerous that it would be almost impossible for us to consider the main sections of the Bill within the short time at our disposal. It is, therefore, fitting that we should review the course pursued by the Government. It is not necessary to attribute to the Government as a whole a deliberate intention to so arrange the debates upon this subject that the measure must necessarily fail to pass, but if we were to assume, for the sake of argument, that a large section of the Administration was anxious to hold the Government up to the world as favouring the views of a large section of the people, and yet, at the same time, not very anxious to place upon the statute-book a law which would subject them to ridicule and ignominy for all future time, as an unworkable law, considerable argument might be adduced in favour of such a view. It has been demonstrated in this House that, assuming, as most of us do, that remedial legislation is within our jurisdiction, and that there is either a technical or legal, or a substantial grievance which affects the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, and assuming that the Government are necessarily bound to remove this grievance, no one can deny that grievous blunders have been made, which can only be attributed in great degree to design. There has scarcely been any attempt on the part of the supporters of the Government to defend its course. It was known that the session was called for the express purpose of passing a measure which was bound to undergo severe criticism and try to the utmost the mental and physical energies of the House, and which was bound to meet with most vigorous opposition, and yet, in the face of this knowledge, the Government deliberately delayed the presentation of the measure to Parliament, and placed it in the power of those opposed to the principle of remedial legislation to prevent its becoming law. It is perfectly useless for hon. gentlemen opposite to complain of what they are pleased to term obstruction, and what, viewed in a proper parliamentary light, cannot be fairly open to that charge. Obstruction on the part of those who are opposed, not only to the principle of the Bill, but to all interference with the Manitoba legislature, is a course which it is perfectly justifiable for them to take. I admit it is an extreme course, but it is one which has been taken by the Parliament of Great Britain and by hon. gentlemen opposite when in opposition, and it is a course which hon. gentlemen opposite, experienced public men, ought to have foreseen as one likely to be taken, to a very great degree, by those opposed to the principle of this measure. The principle of this measure is not objected to by a very large majority of members on both sides, because it is admitted that the day might come when, the proper steps having been taken, we would all be in accord to pass a Remedial Act. That day would come when there had been a fair and reasonable opportunity given for a full consideration of the question in the light of all the circumstances of the case. The legislature and the government of every province, having full jurisdiction over educational affairs, cannot be dealt with in the same way as a private corporation may be, by the courts when that corporation transcends its legal powers. There is no lack of dignity in a court issuing to a corporation its mandamus ; but in the case of a provincial legislature, the question has to be considered from an altogether different standpoint. Let us see the position of this Parliament with reference to the judicial decision of the Privy Council. It will not be necessary for me to quote that decision, as it has been frequently quoted in this House. The question which first arose before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is this: Is the present school law of Manitoba a constitutional and valid enactment? That question was answered in the affirmative. The second question which arose, after quite a long series of appeals, was whether this Parliament had the right to pass legislation of a remedial character in order to remove the alleged grievance inflicted by this Manitoba school law of 1890, which had been declared constitutional. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided that jurisdiction lay in this Parliament, but that this Parliament was perfectly free to act only so far as the actual circumstances of the case demanded. Here arose at once a controversy between the hon. leader of the Opposition and his followers and the Government. The question was as to the circumstances under which remedial legislation should be applied and the amount of information available and required to legislate according to these circumstances. The Opposition have insisted that there should be an investigation in order to ascertain the facts and circumstances in a formal and official manner. It is true that the facts are largely available by different methods of research among a large number of different depositories of information, but even the recorded sources of information do not cover the whole ground, and there is a wide area left for investigation in the shape of personal examination of the residents of the locality, legal, lay and clerical, who may be acquainted with the facts and circumstances that do not appear in any official record. This information, if gathered together by a competent and impartial tribunal, would have been of great value to us. It would have smoothed away many of the difficulties which have beset this committee. It would have done much to enlighten the whole country as to the best means of remedying the grievance. This point of view has been presented with great ability by the leader of the Opposition and his supporters, but it was rejected by the Government, and we have been allowed to drift into this prolonged, and what is likely to prove an abortive discussion, largely in consequence of the refusal of the Government to grant this inquiry. This appears to be one of the errors of the Government which has led to the present situation. There was another preliminary mistake which has done much to place us in the position in which we now find ourselves. The power is vested in the Government of reviewing the legislation of any province, if that legislation is deemed to be unwise in the interests of the whole Dominion. If that legislation is deemed to controvert any wise principle of policy on the part of the Government, it is in the power of the Government to advise His Excellency the Governor General to disallow the Act. This power has been exercised freely since confederation, and hon. gentlemen opposite have claimed that it was more frequently exercised by the Liberal party, when in power, than by the Conservative party. Here was an opportunity for testing at once, upon the passage of the Manitoba Act of 1890, the position which the legislature of that province assumed with regard to education. It has been held, and very properly held, that if the legislation of 1890 in Manitoba was unconstitutional, it could be so declared by the courts. But if the law was constitutional, then the power of disallowance was the only way available to the Administration of the day to bring to the test the questions which arose in connection with the rights and privileges of the minority. That this question was brought to the attention of the Administration is well known, because as soon as the Bill was adopted by the Manitoba legislature, Archbishop Taché, the Archbishop of St. Boniface, drew the attention of the Government to the perilous position in which it put the minority, and the Government were asked to disallow the Act. There might have been a strong argument against disallowance had there been no provision in the constitution which invited the Dominion to interfere with reference to the subject of education in Manitoba. There was in the Manitoba Act a distinct provision that this Parliament was interested in the solution of educational difficulties in Manitoba, and this furnished a strong excuse for the Government of the day exercising the power of disallowance and bringing that question to the test of practical administration. But had this Government exercised then the power of disallowance, had the state of the case been given to the whole country, had the argument been then gone into between the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba, as to the history of education in that province, as to the various compacts and agreements, and the claims of the Roman Catholic minority, almost every hon. gentleman who has looked into the subject will agree that the question would have been settled long ago. At any rate, it would have been brought before the attention of the public, the legal and constitutional aspects of it would have been discussed between the two governments, and a modus vivendi would have been reached long since. The Government did not take that course, and that was, perhaps, the initial mistake made by it.

The next error of judgment was the procedure of this Government after the decision of the Privy Council of England. This Government, instead of negotiating amicably with Manitoba, then issued quasi judicial orders which have led up to the present unfortunate position. No one who has carefully surveyed the situation can come to any other conclusion, than that had the Dominion Government—supported, as it was, by the decision of the Privy Council and by the opinions of their lordships started at that point, in the spirit that moved the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) and appointed a commission similar to that they appointed a few days ago, when there would be no occasion for undue haste ; had they done that, there would have been such a spirit of conciliation manifested, and such an ample discussion on this question in all its phases, that long ere this, the people of Manitoba would have instructed their government to pass such remedial legislation in their own legislature as would have given to the minority all the rights which they could reasonably claim ? Had this been done, we would not now be entering on an election campaign on an issue which must be prejudicial to the best interests of the country. The cause of the failure has been, first, because of the failure of this Government to disallow the Manitoba School Act, and next, because of its failure to proceed in a proper manner when the decision of the Privy Council was known. I trust that it will be a lesson to statesmen in the future, that when questions of this gravity arise, they will not wait until the closing hours of a dying Parliament, to bring forward legislation which must arouse controversy, and must inevitably prevent the solution of a question, in the settlement of which we are all so deeply interested.

Motion (Mr. Stubbs) that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, negatived.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The question is now on paragraph 2 of clause 15. Shall this clause be adopted ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, I feel obliged, at this stage of the session, and in the face of the persistent obstruction which is offered to this measure, to move that you leave the Chair, Sir, and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. I propose, for a moment to express my very great regret that in the face of the continued obstruction to this important measure which the Government have been so sincerely anxious to bring to a conclusion—at this advanced period of the session, and in view of the very few remaining days we have at our disposal, it seems to have become absolutely necessary for us to go, to-morrow, into Supply, for the purpose of providing appropriations for the absolute necessities of the country. The short period remaining would make it very unfortunate if the consideration of the necessary supply for carrying on the public business, was not undertaken in sufficient time to enable it to be provided for. Under these circumstances, I propose that the committee should now rise, and that you should report progress and ask leave to sit again. To-morrow we must go into supply for the purpose of providing for the absolute necessities of the public service.

I need not say, Sir, how deeply I regret, that owing to the continued and persistent obstruction which has been presented to this measure—in consequence of the advantage taken of the limited character of this session—it has not been in our power to do more. I may say further, that a number of very important features of this Bill have received the sanction of the committee. The Bill itself has received the sanction of a very satisfactory majority in this House, and the efforts at obstruction have been condemned by an overwhelming majority of the members. But, as I said before, under the peculiar circumstances with which we are brought face to face this session, we have not been able to make the progress which we had reason to anticipate, and to have had the satisfaction of finding this Bill enacted into law. I do not say that we shall not be able to proceed with the Bill further, the moment that the necessary supplies have been obtained, but, in the meantime, the matter is therefore left open. I express my deep regret that we have not been able to carry this measure to its fruition, and especially that we have not been able to consider some important questions arising in connection with it, and to which the attention of the committee has, on several occasions, been drawn. I deeply regret that there has not been an opportunity of having the opinion of this Parliament taken upon some of these points. There was, for instance, the amendment put upon the notice paper by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) ; an amendment which we have not been able to reach because we are a long way from section 74 of the Bill. That amendment says that the following words should be added to the end of the 74th section :—

> If the legislature of Manitoba does not annually grant such appropriation to separate schools, the Governor General in Council shall from the net revenue accruing from the school fund realize from the sale of the school lands in Manitoba and, attributed for the support of schools and the maintenance of education in Manitoba, grant any pay to the Board of Education in each year during which such appropriation is not made to the separate schools, a proportionate sum to that voted or granted by the legislature of Manitoba to public schools or for educational purposes ; and the "Act respecting Public Lands," chapter 54 of the Revised Stutess of Canada, is hereby amended accordingly.

This is a very important principle which has been advocated by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), and one that I regret the House has not had an opportunity of passing upon, as I think it is very important it should do. I will only say now, Mr. Chairman, that under the circumstances, I will move : That the committee rise, that you, Sir, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. McCARTHY. I rise to a point of order. I submit that this motion is not in order. We have just disposed of a similar motion, and this motion cannot be put again in that way. The only motion that can be put is that you now leave the Chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There was an intermediate proceeding between this motion and the motion of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. Stubbs), which was negatived. I put the question, for the adoption of paragraph (b) of section 15, after the motion of the hon. member (Mr. Stubbs) was negatived. The motion of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is therefore perfectly in order.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very well. I did not catch that.

Mr. LAURIER. The remarks which have been just made by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) certainly call for some observations from me. The leader of the House says that he regrets very much that this Bill could not proceed further, and that the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) had not an opportunity of moving the amendment to section 74, which he has given notice of. In that amendment, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dupont) asked the Government to make an appropriation for the separate schools of the minority in Manitoba. But the leader of the House, while he expresses regret for that, failed to express what would be his opinion on that amendment. I understand, further, that he expresses no opinion at all upon it, because two members of his Cabinet have already told us that it would not be possible to accede to that amendment. Both the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Public Works, in the course of the debate, have already stated the reasons why this provision had not been made in the Bill.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) will pardon me. He is mistaken about me.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not mistaken this far. The hon. Minister stated that there was great doubt as to the constitutionality of making such a provision.

Mr. DICKEY. That, I think, had reference to our obliging the Manitoba legislature to make provision to provide for this itself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the hon. Minister prepared to say that this Government would do it ?

Mr. DICKEY. Oh, no, certainly not. I was simply meeting the mistaken statement of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps I did not put the ideas of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dickey) exactly as he put them ; but the result is the same.

Mr. DICKEY. Oh, no, absolutely different.

Mr. LAURIER. He has all along entertained the opinion, that it would not be competent for this Government to make an appropriation, at least at present. That is the view I understand the hon. getleman took a few days ago. Now, Sir, with regard to this question. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) says that for the present he withdraws the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I did not.

Mr. LAURIER. He withdraws the Bill from committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I said that I merely suspend proceeding with the Bill in order to get the necessary supplies for the absolute necessities of the public service. I leave the question open, to resume this Bill the moment supplies are obtained. We are in a position, then, to proceed with this Bill up to the last hours of the session.

Mr. LAURIER. I must take the hon. gentleman's statement as he gives it, but I certainly understand yet that this is a way of covering his retreat. At all events, I protest against the assertion of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), that if he does not proceed further with this measure at the present time, it is due to the obstruction with which this Bill has been met.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have had nine hours of persistent obstruction now.

Mr. LAURIER. You have had nine hours' talk on the motion to adjourn this committee, a motion which was made at two o'clock in the morning, and at a very reasonable time to adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. I think it was about four o'clock this morning, when the motion was made.

Mr. LAURIER. That is still worse.

An hon. MEMBER. It was three o'clock.
