The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—DEATH OF PRINCE HENRY OF BATTENBERG.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, the accompanying copy of a despatch dated 26th February, 1896, from the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in reply to the Addresses of the House of Commons to Her Majesty the Queen, and Her Royal Highness the Princess Beatrice, expressing sympathy on the death of His Royal Highness Prince Henry of Battenberg.

Government House,
Ottawa, 13th March, 1896.

Copy—Canada—No. 69.

(Mr. CHAMBERLAIN TO THE EARL OF ABERDEEN.)

Downing Street,
26th February, 1896.

My Lord,—In accordance with the request contained in your despatch, No. 38, of the 1st instant, I have the honour to inform you that the Address of sympathy from the House of Commons of Canada to Her Majesty the Queen has been laid at the foot of the Throne, and that I have forwarded to Princess Beatrice the Address which you request may be submitted to Her Royal Highness.

The purport of these Addresses was, as I had the honour to inform Your Lordship by telegraph, communicated to Her Majesty and Her Royal Highness on receipt of your telegram of the 28th ultimo.

I am now commanded to express more fully the value which Her Majesty attaches to these assurances of loyal devotion and sympathy in her affliction, from the representatives of her people in the Dominion of Canada. And Her Majesty also commands me to say how deeply touched Her Royal Highness Princess Beatrice has been by the kind feelings expressed by them for her in her bereavement.

I have, &c.,
(Sd.) J. CHAMBERLAIN.

DURATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to draw the attention of hon. members for a short time to a subject of very considerable importance to the House, and before I sit down I propose to put myself in order by a motion. It has been announced to the House that the Government has under consideration the reference of the duration of the present Parliament to the Supreme Court of Canada. I would very much like to bring before the House what seems to me to be the extraordinary nature of that suggested or contemplated reference. What, Sir, is the statutory life of this Parliament ? This Parliament has a life clearly and distinctly defined by the section of the British North America Act. Section 50 of that Act has these words :

> Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor General), and no longer.

Now, under that section, the simple question which we have to ask ourselves is : What was the day of the return of the writs? If that question can be satisfactorily answered, it seems to me it ends all controversy on the subject. Now, surely the day of the return of the writs is the day fixed by law for the return of the writs. To find what day was fixed by law for the return of the writs in 1891, we have to look at the proclamations which were issued by the Governor General, to be found in the Journals of 1891. There are four proclamations in those Journals, and to these proclamations we must go to justify the existence of the Parliament. One of these proclamations is a dissolution of the last Parliament. Another, which is also dated on the 3rd February, 1891, contains these specific words with reference to the writs :

> We have this day given orders for issuing our writs in due form for calling a Parliament in our said Dominion, which said writs are to bear date on the 4th day of February instant, to be returnable on the 25th day of April next.

That then is clear enough, surely. Another proclamation of the same day calls the new Parliament to meet on this same 25th day of April. Another proclamation contained in these Journals of a later date prorogues Parliament from the 25th of April to the 29th of April, and then to meet for the despatch of business. Now, the writs for the election of this Parliament were issued pursuant to that proclamation, and Parliament did meet on the 29th of April, pursuant to the other proclamation. Surely the statutory life of this Parliament, therefore, expires in five years from the 25th day of April, 1891, the date the writs were made returnable, and four days before this Parliament actually met and transacted business. Now, what have been the Canadian precedents in this matter? How have Parliaments been called before? How has the return date of the writs been fixed for the former Parliaments of Canada since confederation? I find that in 1867, the proclamation orders the writs returnable on the 24th September; but it goes on and says, what this proclamation of 1891 does not say: "except, however, the writs for Chicoutimi and Saguenay, which writs will be returnable on 24th October next." The House met on the 6th November. There was a special provision by proclamation for a later exceptional date for the return of a certain writ. But I find nothing of that kind in the year 1891. In 1872 there was an ordinary proclamation, fixing the writs returnable on 3rd September, except, again, for Chicoutimi and Saguenay, which were returnable on 12th October following, and that writ contained the further exception of the writs for the elections in Manitoba and British Columbia, which were also postponed, and only made returnable on 12th October. Then, in 1874, the proclamation issued making the writs returnable on the 1st February, except for Chicoutimi, Saguenay, Manitoba and British Columbia, which were made returnable on 12th March. But, in order to cover the case of Algoma, which was apparently overlooked when the issue of the proclamation in 1874 was made, on 2nd January, a special proclamation was made on 8th day of January, 1874, extending the time for the return for the Algoma election, and making the writ for that returnable on 12th March. Now, there we have proclamations giving special dates for a return of the writs in certain counties. If we were to be asked to construe the 50th section of the British North America Act in those cases, there would be a good deal of argument in favour of saying, that a date five years from the date of the return of the writs meant the date of the return of the last writs as fixed by proclamation. I suppose, that would be so. But here we have no proclamation for any writ to be returnable after 25th April. The proclamations of 1879, 1882 and 1887, as well as the proclamation of 1891, contained no exceptional provisions for the return dates of any writs, but I suppose they gave what they considered would be ample time for the return of the latest of the writs. They gave ninety days in some cases, and eighty in other cases, a great deal more than was necessary for an ordinary return; but that does not matter; they fixed the return dates of the writs. Now, why has another date for the expiration of this Parliament's life been suggested than the 25th April? Well, Sir, for this reason, that on 3rd June, 1891, while Parliament was in session, when Parliament had been in session for some thirty-nine or forty days, a return was presented by the returning officer of an election of a member for Algoma.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the date of the writ?

Mr. EDGAR. The proclamation says that all these writs shall be dated on 4th February, 1891, which I am talking of now. I understood the hon. gentleman to ask, what was the date of the issue of the writ of 1891. The proclamation says, that the date shall be 4th February.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No other writ being issued for that date.

Mr. EDGAR. I assume there was not; but I do not think it would make any difference, for, if it was not issued at that date, it was a negligence.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought my hon. friend might know.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not happen to know. If it was issued later on, it may be a nullity altogether. If it was issued, for instance, after the date of the return day of the writs ordered by proclamation, I doubt very much whether it would be a valid writ. Now, it appears that there was a neglect somewhere by an officer to have that election held according to the proclamation, and according to the writ, which recites the day of the meeting of Parliament to be 25th April. The Dominion Elections Act specially provides for a case of accident or of error. Section 15 of the Dominion Elections Act provides, that, if, from any unforeseen accident or error of the returning officer, the returning officer cannot fix the nomination day as ordered in the issue of the writs by the Government, or as fixed by himself, as in the case of Algoma, then he can extend the time, he can fix another day. But, if he does that, he has to make a special return to Parliament. In this case no special return was made; but, if it was an error of an official, as it must be, either at this end or the other end of the writ, it was an error of an officer, and not in any shape or way affecting the legal position of the life of this Parliament. Now, surely nobody can contend seriously, that any official, a returning officer, or a Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, or whoever is entrusted with the carrying out of the law laid down in that proclamation, can for one moment alter the life of this Parliament, can make another date for the writ to be returnable, and can absolutely ignore the directions of the proclamation, which, for the purposes of holding an election, are the absolute law which is to guide him. Why, if a returning officer could hold the execution of a writ back until 3rd June, 1891, instead of having sent it here by 25th April, he might hold it back for one year, for two years, or ten years, and the Parliament might last for five or ten years, at the option of that individual. If he can do it for a month and a half, he can do it for a year and a half ; therefore, the thing is absolutely absurd. I would like to know if it can be seriously contended, that the Governor General, in a case like that, where he found one of the writs on 25th April had not been returned, if he should keep on proroguing this Parliament from time to time until that writ was sent in by the returning officer. As my hon. friend suggests, if he did prorogue Parliament for more than twelve months, if he did not call a meeting of Parliament within twelve months from the meeting of the last session of the House, he would be running against another section of the British North America Act ; which would also be absurd. Now, I do not know whether the House has noticed it, but the Algoma return was not the only one which was not before this House on the date this House met ; on 29th April, the Chicoutimi return was not put in ; therefore, was the meeting of the 29th nugatory by reason of that, and was the meeting of this House all the time a mere sham, because of another returning officer's delay ?

I have seen it stated in the press that the position taken by the Ontario government on a similar question was relied upon by those who have argued that the duration of this Parliament will not expire until 3rd June. The position in that case was entirely different from the present one. In the first place, there was a special day fixed by proclamation for holding the Algoma election in August, whereas, the other elections were to be held in February. It was contended by Sir Oliver Mowat, and held by hon. members of that legislature—I think properly held that in the case like that, from the day of the return of the last writ, the life of the legislature lasted for four years under the special proclamation making the Algoma writ returnable on a certain day later than the other writs.

There is, Sir, another distinction between that case and this one. There was a special Act of the Ontario legislature passed, providing specifically that no elections should be held in Algoma at any time of the year except between May and November. That Act may, perhaps, have had the effect of extending the term of the legislature beyond four years, and if so, the provincial legislature had a perfect right to do it. We have no power to extend the life of this Parliament one day beyond the five years. The provincial legislatures have power to do so : they can alter, as we know, their constitutions in any matter except in regard to the office of Lieutenant-Governor. They can abolish the Upper House, and extend the term of the legislature, if they choose ; and so the effect of the Ontario Act coupled with the proclamation, was to do that which they had the right to do. At all events, the case of the provincial legislature is entirely different from this case. Every one in this country gives great weight to the constitutional opinions held by Sir Oliver Mowat. Only a few days ago, he was asked by a member of the Ontario legislature a question which, if answered, compelled him to give his opinion on the case now before this House, and I think I will not weary the House if I read the remarks which Sir Oliver Mowat is reported to have made on that occasion. Sir Oliver Mowat, in reply to the question asked, said :

> His hon. friend must have had in his mind the time when he would occupy a position at Ottawa similar to the one he now occupied. The question of privilege, which Mr. Whitney raised, was one affecting the present House of Commons, and not the Ontario legislature. The question of the duration of the Ontario legislature in 1879 was not the same question as that effecting the present House of Commons, but the object of Mr. Whitney was undoubtedly to get something said here and now that would be of service to his friends at Ottawa in their wish to make out that the duration of the House of Commons did not expire on the 26th of April ; but the two cases were entirely different as to the facts on which they depended. The duration of either body counted from the time of the writs being returnable, not of their being actually returned. The Ontario legislature sat within four years after the last of the writs, namely, the writ for Algoma, was returnable, and therefore within the time specified in the British North America Act. On the other hand, the Dominion writs of 1891 were all returnable at the same time, and five years from that time will expire, on the 26th of April. That was not the only thing that made the two cases different. The Dominion Parliament had no power to extend the term for which the House should endure, but the province had power to extend the term for which the assembly should endure, larger powers having been granted to the provinces than to the Dominion in that respect. There were several other material distinctions, but those mentioned showed that the precedent of 1879 afforded no argument for the House of Commons of the present year. He had taken the opportunity of stating this in answer to Mr. Whitney, but the question was not a matter of privilege in this House at the present day.

What is the practical effect of the contention that this Parliament lasts until 3rd June ? If the term does not end until 3rd June, 1896, the first session of the seventh Parliament was called into being only on 3rd June, 1891, "for it shall continue for five years and no longer." If Parliament dies on 3rd June, 1896, at the age of five years, it must have been born on 3rd June, 1891. The two hundred-odd members elected, who assembled in this chamber on 29th April, 1891, were only a mob of gentlemen. The Speaker chosen on that occasion is no Speaker of the House of Commons, though the Crown invited this body to elect a Speaker, and approved of his election after it took place. He may be a chairman, perhaps, of this assembly of gentlemen, but he is not a Speaker under the British North America Act, because the 44th section of the Act says:

> The House of Commons, on its first assembling after a general election, shall proceed with all practicable speed to elect one of its members to be Speaker.

If you, Sir, were not elected properly on 29th April, 1891, you have not been elected at all, because you have not been elected since, and I should be very sorry to think that you were not Speaker in fact, but a usurper of your place and your dignities. If you were not elected, we had no Speaker, and what becomes of the meeting of Parliament?

Mr. OUIMET. What are you speaking for?

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman is not now Speaker, and I do not suppose he will have to return any of his indemnity as salary of Mr. Speaker. The British North America Act says:

> The Speaker shall preside at all meetings of the House of Commons.

Now, Sir, if this House was not a House at all on the 25th of April, there was no Speaker and the House was not organized, and during all our meetings presided over by you, Sir, we could pass no Remedial Bill, or no legislation whatever. Now, Sir, if you were not duly elected at the proper time, what is to become of all the writs of election which were issued under your warrant? Since the 29th April, 1891, some sixty writs have been issued under your warrant, Sir. Are they all null and void; and are the members who have been elected, not elected at all? If, Sir, you were not elected by the House of Commons duly assembled on the 29th of April, 1891, then, Sir, I believe you would be bound to refund to the public treasury the six years salary which you have drawn from this country. And further, I would draw the attention of the Deputy Speaker to the fact, that if he were not duly elected as chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the 22nd of May, and if this House did not exist until the 3rd of June, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) had no right to draw his salary. I am sure the hon. gentleman will be with us in resisting anything of that kind.

Mr. BERGERON. Then who will pay me for the work I have done?

Mr. EDGAR. Of course, it would be a special hardship, considering the work the hon. gentleman has done. I appeal to the House as a whole, to rise above party, because, Sir, if this is not a Parliament, we will all have to refund our indemnities. Mr. Speaker, is not that too horrible a thing to contemplate? But, Sir, even if by some curious hair-splitting argument, which I have not heard advanced, it can be contended that since the 3rd June, 1891, this has been a valid Parliament although no Speaker was elected; then, between the 25th of April and the 3rd of June, 1891, there were any number of Bills read the first, and the second time in this House, and some were read the third time, and of course they would be invalid even if that partial contention would prevail. Now, Sir, it is said, that this question may be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, to settle. Sir, Parliament has settled the question by meeting on the 29th April, 1891. Parliament has settled that question and no Supreme Court can interfere with it. I say that this Parliament by legislating for six sessions, has proven that it is a de facto and a de jure legislature, and it cannot be interfered with. To annul the Acts of this Parliament, from the 29th of April to the present time would be a revolution. Not only has this House of Commons taken that ground by meeting and going on with its business, but the Senate met then, too, pursuant to the proclamation of the Governor General, advised by practically the present Government, who now wish to throw some doubts upon the question. The Senate also has taken part in affirming our position in this regard. Has any Governor in Council the right, the constitutional right, to submit to any outside tribunal a question like this—a great political question of the first magnitude? I say, that the Government as a committee of this House and of this Parliament, has no right to do so, and I believe, Sir, that this Parliament will never so far forget its dignity as to consent to it. I admit, that technically, under the terms of the Supreme Court Act and the amendments of 1891, the Governor in Council may submit almost anything to that court. But, supposing a reference were made of this question, would the decision of that court settle anything? No, Sir. It would unsettle everything. We know that the judgment of that court in a case of this kind is only an advisory judgment, and is not binding. Sir, what advice do we want on this subject? We have been advised on it, and we have acted too long on that advice, to ask for any one's advice now. Then again, how are the proceedings to obtain the advisory judgment going to be carried out? There is a provision in the Act that all interested parties should be notified of the hearing before the Supreme Court, and are entitled to be heard also. Why, Sir, the number of people interested in the legislation of this Parliament is infinite; coequal almost with the population of the Dominion. How, between now and the next few weeks is it possible to notify the parties interested in the hearing of this question? And then, when would it be heard? Could it be heard in time to be effective, and will the judgment be given immediately after the hearing? If we are going under the reference in the Supreme Court Act, I would like to know whether this Parliament should not have the benefit of the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council, to whom there is an appeal in such cases. Every one knows that there is no time to get a hearing before the Supreme Court and a judgment, and much less is there time to get a revisory decision of the Imperial Privy Council on the question. This House has reason to know—it has come before their notice often—that Her Majesty's Privy Council does not always, in constitutional questions, entirely agree with the views of our Supreme Court. It is perfectly clear that it never was intended by the statute that this case should be heard without leave to appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court. But, I do not think there is much fear of that; because, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly satisfied, that if a reference of that kind were made to the Supreme Court they would decline to act. And why? Because an infinite variety of private rights are involved in the validity or non-validity of the Acts of this Parliament, and litigation might arise, and would be sure to arise before the courts of this country, and the Supreme Court would have to give decisions in cases of that kind. And a case has arisen already, I understand, questioning the right of the sitting member for Algoma to sit and vote on grounds which would be involved in this proposed reference.

Then, again, all the seats, more than sixty, for which you, Mr. Speaker, issued warrants for elections might be held to have been illegally occupied; and what about the actions which might be brought against the gentlemen who are usurping seats in this Parliament under those improper warrants, if they are improper? Is there not there a case for litigation, which the Supreme Court would know of from the facts, and would expect? I find that the Supreme Court, in an infinitely more trifling case than this, has taken that ground. I find in Bourinot's book, page 685, this statement in regard to a reference to the judges of a private Bill from the Senate:

> The judges in their report on the Bill excused themselves from answering, on the ground that it affected private rights which might come before the court judicially.

I say, therefore, that it is impossible to expect the Supreme Court to entertain this reference for one moment.

But there is a simple way of settling this matter. If this House of Commons has doubts of the legality of its continuing to sit after the 25th April, 1896—and I think we all have—then the simplest way to set those doubts at rest is for this House not to sit after that date. What earthly object can the Government have in view in suggesting a reference of this question to the Supreme Court? If they did so, they would take all the risk, the serious risk, of throwing grave doubts upon our solemn Acts of Parliament. They would do that simply for the purpose of gaining a little time, if by chance they might get a technical decision in their favour, so as to put off the appeal to the people, which certainly has been long enough delayed now. Having squeezed six sessions out of a five-year Parliament, the Government would seem to raise a legal quibble in order to prolong the sixth session still further. Now, Sir, I say that no doubt whatever exists as to the day of the expiry of the life of this Parliament being the 25th of April next. I say that is the plain reading of the statute law and of the proclamations. I say that the actions of the Crown support that view, not only in the proclamations, but in the calling Parliament together, the meeting Parliament, the asking this House to elect a Speaker, the receiving that Speaker, the issuing an Address to this Parliament, and the sanctioning all the legislation of the first and every other session of this Parliament. I say that the Acts of the Crown, as well as our own Acts of Parliament and all our proceedings cannot have been idle. We are not the people to admit that they were idle and were not legal. No legislature in the world ever was asked to make such an admission against its own solemn Acts of legislation. Then I say that to raise even a doubt by such a reference would be for the responsible advisers of the Crown a politically criminal act, a most serious outrage upon the constitution of the country. And I say that the reference to the Supreme Court would be utterly nugatory, at any rate, because they have no time to determine it, because they would refuse to consider it on account of the private rights involved, because there is no time for an appeal to the Privy Council, and at least, and last, because the decision, if they gave one, would be only advisory, and would still throw upon Parliament the responsibility as to what should be done. For these reasons, I sincerely hope that this matter which the Government announce they have under consideration, will be speedily dropped, and that Parliament and the people may not be asked to approve of the proposed reference. I move, Sir, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, the subject which the hon. gentleman has raised is undoubtedly one of very great interest and also of very great importance. I do not propose, at this stage, to discuss the merits of the matter, in the way of expressing any opinion of my own upon it. It seems to me that would be quite premature, in the view I take of it. It is also quite clear, Sir, from the hon. gentleman's own argument, that the question he raises is purely a question of law; it is a question that depends upon the construction of the constitution, in view of certain facts which are undisputed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Parliamentary law.

Mr. DICKEY. It may involve parliamentary law, Sir, but it is primarily a question of the construction of the British North America Act, in view of facts which, as I say are undisputed. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says there is no doubt about the law. The hon. gentleman is a practising barrister, and I am quite sure he has engaged in very many cases in his day in which he started out with the same high hopes—nay, absolute certainty—of the law being in his favour that he holds to-day in regard to this question, but in which he found, when he got to the higher courts, that unfortunately some small point which he had overlooked, had upset his calculations, and the law which he supposed was without doubt turned out to be in the opposite direction. Nothing is more certain than the glorious uncertainty of the law; and any hon. gentleman on either side of this House must, I am sure, feel that there is great difficulty in his arriving at an absolutely unbiassed opinion upon a question like this, which is mixed up more or less with politics. I confess myself to feeling some difficulty in deciding that any judgment I might offer on the matter would be quite unbiassed. I might suggest to the hon. gentleman—not as adopting them, but by way of conveying them to him—some arguments that are put forward with reference to this matter; and I may tell him that I have knowledge of a very widespread opinion in the profession to which we both belong, as to the proper legal aspect of this question. The hon. gentleman would agree with those who hold the opposite view to this extent, that if the date of the Algoma election were mentioned in the proclamation calling Parliament together, the life of this Parliament would date from the date of that return, which, we will assume for the present, to be the 3rd of June, so that really the question at issue is not a very large one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman to suggest that if all the writs were made returnable on the 25th April, with the exception of one writ, and that, all the writs but one having been returned on the 25th April, Parliament met, but that the one not returned was made, for local reasons, returnable a month later, the period of parliamentary life would nevertheless begin to run from the return of the last writ, although Parliament had met previously.

Mr. EDGAR. I did not take into consideration in any way the question of Parliament having met or not before the return of the last writ. If Parliament had not met until after the last writ was returned, then I admit it would be a very open question, but that is not the case here at all.

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman asked me the whole question in a nutshell, and I have already declared that I have no intention of expressing an opinion myself on the merits of the case. I am simply endeavouring to present some arguments which are used, to my knowledge, by gentlemen in the profession holding views opposite to those which the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Edgar) holds. What I was proceeding to say is that I think the hon. gentleman conceded with me that the date of the return of the writ means the actual date on which the writ was returned and would mean the date on which the last writ was returned. That seems to me tolerably obvious, because it is competent for this House to make writs returnable when it chooses. It may make these writs returnable one after the other during the whole six months. It may group the counties differently. It may hold the elections according to provinces; and obviously it seems to me that whatever is the correct definition of the return of the writ, it must mean the return of the whole of the writs or the return of the last writ, as otherwise your argument would be reduced to this, that the life of Parliament should count from the date of the return of the majority of the writs.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You might take the date when the writs are returnable as the date from which to count.

Mr. DICKEY. With reference to that, it is argued that the date of the return of the writs is not equivalent to the return day of the writs—that it does mean the day upon which, as a matter of fact, the writs were returned. Now comes the question upon which the hon. gentleman raised, and that is the distinction which exists between this case and the Ontario case of 1879. In the Ontario case of 1879, the writ for Algoma was returnable by proclamation at a date subsequent to the date fixed for the return of the writs of all the rest of the counties. In the present case all the writs by proclamation were returnable by the 25th April. Now, the argument made, whatever it may be worth—and it is of such a character as to convince many gentlemen of the profession—is that section 14 of the Elections Act gives the returning officer for certain districts, Algoma amongst them, a statutory time within which to make the return; and the question is whether the Governor General, by fixing a date for the return of the writ of Algoma instead of the date within which the return might be made under the statute, can limit the discretion of the returning officer at Algoma and limit the time which the statute allows him within which to make his return. The returning officer for Algoma, when a writ is placed in his hands, has a certain time fixed by statute within which he may exercise his discretion in making the return of his writ. In the present instance, the returning officer for Algoma and the returning officer for Chicoutimi took that view of their duty in the elections of 1891, exercised their statutory right under section 14 of the Act, and made their proclamations legally, unless the Governor General's proclamation bound them to such dates as brought their return on, we will say, the 3rd June.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When were the writs issued to them ?

Mr. DICKEY. I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman the dates.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The whole point turns on that.

Mr. DICKEY. So that independent of the proclamation ordering the issue of the writs, there is no doubt the action of the returning officer in Algoma was perfectly regular and legal. Now comes the question whether the prerogative of the Crown, referred to in section 3, with regard to the fixing of the return day of the writs, is or is not a limit with regard to certain named writs in those constituencies in which the time allowed for returning may be longer than the return day of ordinary writs. The hon. gentleman said that if the returning officer could hold back a writ for a month, he could hold it back for a year. But I do not think that that contention can be successfully made because the time within which the Algoma returning officer can hold back the return of his writ is strictly fixed by the terms of section 14, which gives him certain rights. The whole question has arisen from the fact that the Algoma returning officer accepted the statutory instruction instead of the instruction under the proclamation. Now, the hon. gentleman suggests that if another instruction than that fixing the expiry of this Parliament on the 25th April were adopted it would render nugatory a large portion of the Acts which we have passed, including Mr. Speaker, your own election. It is argued, on the other hand, that that is not a necessary conclusion. The question whether Parliament can act before all the writs are in, is one which must be decided separately and according to Parliamentary law. The decision of that question would settle whether or not Parliament met legally when it met the 29th April, 1891. But the decision as to what is the day from which the five years begins to run against Parliament is another question. Supposing the British North America Act said that Parliament should continue for five years from the last date of the year in which it is elected, namely, from the 31st December of the year in which it is elected, Parliament would then last more than five years and would be capable of doing business more than five years.

Mr. EDGAR. It says five years and no longer.

Mr. DICKEY. Quite so ; but it would sit no longer than five years from the end of the calendar year. If the British North America Act said that Parliament shall continue for five years from the day it is elected and no longer, you would have a Parliament which would endure more than five years, but which would be subject to the limited statutory existence to be fixed on the proper construction of the statute. That Parliament may legally have met and transacted business before the day of the return of the last writ; but that when you come to determine the period for which the British North America Act is enacted, you must take the day of the return of the last writ, and calculate from that, five years, the legality of the Parliament before that date being settled by other considerations altogether. As I said, I do not propose, at present, to express an opinion on either branch of the case which the hon. gentleman has read. A great many in this country look upon this as a purely legal matter ; they look upon it as a question which they would like to see withdrawn from party considerations, the question they would like to see discussed somewhere upon absolutely straight legal principles, and settled upon that basis. It is for that reason that a great deal may be said in favour of referring the question for the opinion of an entirely independent court. It is quite true that the opinion of the Supreme Court would not be final, nor would it necessarily, as, of course, every hon. gentleman knows, in a case like this, be a decision which would be acted upon as a matter of course. But the question that would arise on this case, by referring to the Supreme Court, would be whether the House which is a political body should, in this case, take from its cognizance a matter which is a pure matter of law, and leave it to the courts to deal with. That would be a question that would come up if this proposition were made to the House. I do not know that, in the present aspect of the case, it is necessary for me to say any more than this : That, however strong any hon. gentleman may feel himself upon this question—and however positive he may feel that there is but one view of the law, and that the one he takes, I can assure hon. gentlemen, from my own knowledge in my own department, there are grave differences of opinion among gentlemen very high up in the legal profession throughout the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says this question should be considered entirely apart from party. I agree with that view. This is a legal question, but it is, in my opinion, purely a question of parliamentary law, and, because it is a question of parliamentary law, it is not a proper question to refer to the courts. The courts do not pretend to undertake to construe parliamentary law ; they take the construction of the law of Parliament from Parliament itself. Now, the hon. gentleman has also referred to the provisions of the statute relating to the Algoma election, and says that it is upon the construction of that statute that the returning officer acted, and not upon the proclamation. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would say this with regard to the matter the hon. gentleman has raised : It is the statute of William III. that is in force in this country with regard to elections, and that statute assumes that the writs will be issued forthwith, and that the parties who are entrusted with the issue of those writs will discharge their duty in that regard. The issue of the writs was on the 4th of February. How is it that the whole of that time elapsed, from the 4th February until 18th April, before the nominations took place ? Was that due to the action of the returning officer, or was it due to some misconduct of some other officer, or to the neglect of the Government that has divested certain officers of the functions of returning officers, and taken the law into its own hands ?

Mr. DICKEY. The hon. gentleman admits, I suppose, that it was strictly within the time allowed by the statute——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. DICKEY—setting aside the proclamation ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact—that the nomination was within the period, but the election was held on the 18th of May, and the writ itself had expired on the 25th of April.

Mr. DICKEY. Under the proclamation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Under the proclamation, the writ has no vitality and no legal life after the 25th of April, and, that being so, the hon. gentleman will see that the quotations he makes from the statute, or rather the references that he makes to the statute, are altogether inapplicable. If that writ had been issued in proper form at the proper time ; if the Government had advised the Governor General as to the advisability of appointing a returning officer, as its duty was, and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery had had made known to him at the proper time who was the returning officer, so as to issue that writ to him, it was possible to conform with the statute, and still keep within the proclamation. Why did the returning officer disregard the maximum time allowed by the proclamation ? It must have been that either the Administration, or some officer of the Administration here failed in their duty to the public with regard to this election. Then, Sir, there is more than that. I say, that being so, here was an election held, here was a return made when there was no writ authorizing it ; therefore, that return was improper and void. There can be no doubt with regard to that.

Now, let me call the attention of the House to some provisions of the law with regard to this matter. The primary provision of the law is a very ancient one, it is chapter 14 of Magna Charta, a part of which is as follows :—

> And besides, we will cause to be summoned in general by our sheriffs and bailiffs, all those who hold of us in chief, at a certain day, that is to say at the distance of forty days (before their meeting), at the least, and to a certain place ; and in all the letters of summons, we will express the cause of the summons ; and, the summons thus made, the business shall proceed on the day appointed, according to the counsel of those who shall be present, although all who have been summoned have not come.

Now, under that provision there must be an opportunity for every member to be returned. An election cannot be held, under that provision of Magna Charta, within forty days. If it is held within that time, and it has been held in England and here, it is an improper return, and the member is not entitled to sit. But if all the members do not put in an appearance, having had an opportunity of being returned within the time allowed by law, Parliament may sit. But, Sir, if there has been any election, the writ for which expired after the date at which Parliament has been called, if there has been any attempt on the part of the Crown, upon the advice of the Ministers, to call Parliament at an earlier date than the day on which the last writ is returnable, then that calling is an illegal summoning of Parliament. That was held in the case of James Monk, in February, 1820. This matter was referred to a committee of the House, and the committee reported upon it. The member had been elected within the time which the law allowed, and the committee states as follows :—

> That it is the opinion of this committee, that, according to the proclamation of His Honour the President and Administrator of the Government of this province——

That is the Province of Quebec.

> —bearing date the 9th day of February last, the representation of this province is not as yet complete, inasmuch as the day fixed by the said proclamation as the return day of the writ of election for the county of Gaspé is not yet arrived.
> Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that the writ of election for the county of Gaspé being dated 22nd February last, and returnable on the 11th of the month of April inst., is contrary to the said proclamation, and to the Provincial Act of the 42nd year of the reign of His Majesty George III., chapter 3.
> Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that, according to the enactments of the Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, of the 31st year of His Majesty George III., chapter 31, intituled : "An Act to repeal certain parts of an Act passed in the 14th year of His Majesty's reign, intituled : 'An Act for making more effectual provision for the Government of the province of Quebec, in North America, and to make further provision for the Government of the said province,' " this House is incompetent and cannot proceed to the despatch of business.

Now, there is a determination of this question by a former legislature of Quebec, that until the period of time expired fixed by the last proclamation, there can be no regular or legal meeting of Parliament. Let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to this, that it is not the period when, as a matter of fact, the last writ is returned, but the period fixed in the proclamation for the return of the writ, that determines the question. Why, it could not be otherwise. How comes this House together? By what authority does it meet? Why, it meets by authority of the Crown. This House is sitting here as a council of state for the purpose of advising the Crown. The Crown has called it together for that purpose.; the Crown fixes the time when it shall meet: it states that date in the proclamation; and that proclamation having fixed a day for the return of all the writs, the hon. gentleman cannot go behind that legal fact, that important constitutional fact, upon which the very existence of Parliament itself depends, for the purpose of determining and fixing in some other way when Parliament shall legally begin to exist. Look at the facts, Mr. Speaker, in this case. This House is the judge of its own privileges, and, as such, it decides when its life began. Now, the Crown assumes that this House legally began to exist, and that this Parliament began its legal life, on 25th April, when the writs were made returnable. When Parliament met on 29th, it met at the command of the Crown. It was summoned here for the purpose of deliberating upon such matters as the Crown chose to submit to it, and such other matters as the public interest called for. Well, I say this House is estopped from inquiring whether it had a legal existence at that moment; the Crown is estopped from making an inquiry, from the fact that the Crown called this House together for the purpose of transacting public business. Then, with these facts before us, how is it possible that the hon. gentleman can refer to some neglect of duty, some failure in the discharge of duty, either by the advisers of the Crown or by some officer of the Crown, whose misconduct is going to override the proclamation of the Governor General, and fix another date than that which the Governor General by that proclamation has fixed? Why, if he can do that, the tenure of our life would be extremely uncertain. The hon. gentleman undertakes to say, that this Parliament may exist, as a matter of law, for a longer period than five years.

Mr. DICKEY. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, then, what does his illustration mean?

Mr. DICKEY. I suggested that as an argument made by others.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He, therefore, suggested it as a legal interpretation of this clause of the British North America Act.

Mr. DICKEY. Not as my own view of it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Whether it be the hon. gentleman's view or not, he suggested it as a possible view. Now, the hon. gentleman gives, as an illustration, the fact, that the five years might have been made to begin and run, say, from 31st December. Supposing that were so, it would not be a period of five years and no longer, because the very terms the hon. gentleman has employed for the purpose of expressing a hypothetical proposition, are terms which would make the period five years, plus all that portion of the first year that had not yet expired, the year in which the election occurred. Well, that is embraced in addition to the five years, that time is embraced in the statement made by the hon. gentleman himself; and, if that were embraced in the statute, it would always be a period of more than five years, reckoning from 31st December. That would be a new provision, altogether different from the language contained in the British North America Act. Now, the British North America Act says that the life of Parliament shall begin from the period of the return of the writs. I say that expression "return of the writs," has in parliamentary law received a well known and settled interpretation: it means the time from which the last writ by the Royal proclamation is made returnable. It does not mean anything else. You do not go behind that fact. That, I say, is a well-settled principle of parliamentary law. Well, that being so, we look at the proclamation to see when these writs are returnable, and that is the time when the life of Parliament begins; and from that time Parliament, by the provision of the law, is to continue and exist for a period of five years, and no longer. There is nothing more than five years, you cannot protract it either beyond the expiry of the five years, nor can you supplement the period by adding something at the beginning. There is no provision in the statute by which that can be done; and that being so, there is nothing in the law which will permit Parliament to begin at any other period than that which is named in the proclamation. Now, formerly, before 1878, the practice had existed here of fixing different periods of time for the return of the writs from different constituencies, and, under a regulation of that sort, of course, no Parliament could exist until the last writ was made returnable, not being returned, as a matter of fact, before the last period fixed in the proclamation for the return of a writ. That fixed the period when Parliament began to exist. But you have no existence of Parliament before, and you could not call a session, you could not undertake to transact public business, nor could Parliament proceed to the election of a Speaker—none of those things which you have done in this case, could have been done until the last writ was returned or returnable under the proclamation. Now, what has been done since 1878? There has been a uniform period; you have undertaken to make a sufficiently long period between the issue of the writs and the return of the writs under the proclamation, that all these exceptional cases might be embraced. That is what you have done. You have given adequate time for the compliance of every provision of the writ to which the hon. gentleman has referred; and, if a returning officer has received a writ, and he is unable to hold a writ under the provisions of the statute before the period of the return expires, then the election cannot be held, there can be no election. The hon. gentleman will see that no other construction of that law is possible and capable of being reconciled with the settled rules and usages of Parliament. Now, I notice one or two things which show that the returns of writs have been in some cases irregular. For instance, there are a number of old statutes, which any hon. gentleman can look up for himself, that are still in force, with regard to Algoma, and with regard to Chicoutimi, Saguenay and Gaspé, where the period is made longer by statute within which the return should be made, than the period fixed by the proclamation. Now, the last proclamation was eighty-six days, and there are at least four constituencies in this country where the period is beyond eighty-six days; and, if you look at the words of the Magna Charta, and look at the two or three English cases that have arisen under that statute, the Knaresborough case, and some others, and this case of Mr. Monk, in Quebec, in 1820, you will see, that the rule recognized is, that you must observe the minimum time, and you cannot hold a valid election within the period fixed by that minimum.

At the time the elections were held in 1891 there were four or six elections held within the minimum period fixed by the law. This, Sir, only goes to show how very important it is that the Minister of Justice or some other member of the Government should immediately undertake to look at these old statutes and to reconcile the provisions of the law as it is necessary to administer it with the proclamation to be issued and the period of time fixed for the holding of these elections. But altogether apart from that phase of the subject, looking at the question raised by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), there is no doubt whatever that the period for which this Parliament was elected begun on 25th April, 1891, and will expire on 25th of April of the present year. This is not a matter on which we can afford to have any doubt. Why should this question go to the Supreme Court? It is not a question that should be referred to that court. It is not a question of common law or equity or ordinary constitutional law, it is a question relating to the constitution of Parliament itself. More than that. Suppose the Supreme Court was mistaken in the view it announced, and suppose the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was of a different opinion, what would be our position? Why should the question be raised here at all? We cannot afford to have any doubt as to the period of time at which this Parliament expires. We cannot afford to have you, Mr. Speaker, sitting in the Chair after this Parliament has expired; we cannot afford to transact public business after that time. There is no question that this period under the Act is absolutely certain; and taking the period most unfavourable to the continuance of the life of this Parliament, I say, beyond that period this Parliament should not sit, and before that period arrives this Parliament should be dissolved. That, Sir, is the principle of parliamentary law applicable to this case, and I do not think that this is a question which ought to be referred to the Supreme Court, or that where there is any doubt any action should be taken after the period mentioned has expired.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the very interesting and important question before the House, but I rise to enter my protest against any question of this kind consuming the time which belongs to private members. We have on the Notice Paper forty-six matters under Notices of Motions, nearly all of which are contentious matters, nearly all of which are matters which different private members desire to bring before the House as being matters mainly interesting to their own particular constituents, it is true. But one of the rights and duties of the members, private members, is to bring matters of this kind before the House, and it is the only way they can do so. The interesting and important question debated here this afternoon is one that should be brought up on a Government day, because it is a matter not affecting private members, but the constitution of this House. According to the views of many hon. gentlemen, the term of this Parliament will expire on 25th of April. We know the Government find it necessary every session, as the session grows older, to take private members' days for Government business. Under the most fortunate circumstances, we cannot expect to have many more private members' days, and as a member who has several matters of a very special importance to my own constituents, and to my own province and to the west generally, to bring before the House, I protest against a discussion like this, which is likely to be a long discussion, and likely to elicit the opinions of many members, taking up time when the opportunity for considering private members' business will probably not come to private members. Last Monday, unfortunately, we had a long discussion on another question. The first order on Monday was private Bills, and we had a long discussion on the motion of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) with respect to the Chignecto Marine Ship Railway. That discussion practically occupied the whole day, but as it came up regularly I cannot object to it. This, however, is a discussion which should have taken place on a Government day. At the present time the Government have four days out of five in the week, and surely enough time could be spared from the Government days to discuss such important questions without trenching on the time which should be occupied by private members in discussing important questions on the Order paper, forty-six in number, under the head of Notices of Motion.

More than that, there are no less than thirty items under the head of Public Bills and Orders, which could very well occupy the time of a Monday instead of the subject now under debate. It is most important that public Bills and orders should receive more time than they now receive. Instead of the time given to them being abridged by special subjects being brought forward for discussion on private members' day, the time should be enlarged, because some of the most valuable legislation enacted by Parliament has been carried by private members, who have introduced public Bills. Under the pressure of Government business it has become almost impossible for private members to reach the orders standing in their name. There is a public Bill standing in the name of the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and a similar Bill standing in my own name, to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act and to remove very serious defects in the law, and if these defects are to be removed before the next general election, some measure of this character must be carried through the House. For these reasons, and without desiring to occupy the time of the House, I have endeavoured briefly to state why I think it most improper for a motion of this character to be moved by a private member on private members' day, and I am very strongly impressed with the necessity of private members being allowed greater opportunity to bring forward important questions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) will take due note of the observations which have just fallen from the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), which I may say I do not quite regard in the light presented by that hon. gentleman. No doubt, this is a question of very great importance indeed, and certainly the Government entertain no objection to its being raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is not a party question in any sense of the word, but it is one in which every hon. member is interested as being desirous that the wisest and best conclusion should be arrived at. The Government will consider this matter promptly, in view of the opinions expressed by both sides of the House, and arrive at a conclusion, which they will state to the House at a very early day.

Mr. WELDON. Before the Government make up their minds, in view of the arguments addressed to the House, I will make a further argument on the question brought before our attention by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and I will have due regard to the protest entered by the hon. member for Winnipeg, because I will occupy less time in making my argument than he consumed in entering his protest. Had I not been greatly impressed by the statement made by the Minister of Justice, that his department had advised with barristers of eminence at the bars of the different provinces who expressed opinions contradictory, I would have ventured to say, Mr. Speaker, that section 50 of the British North America Act was, at all events, in the vital part of it, a very clear section. There are two parts in that section. One it seems to me, in unequivocal language declares the maximum length of Parliament. There is another part of the section not quite so clear, declaring when the parliamentary term begins. Section 50 states, however, that the maximum length of Parliament is five years and no longer. It seems to me, that it is not even arguable that Parliament can sit longer than five years. On the other part of the clause, as to when that five years term begins, there may be argument, but we are estopped in a sense by our own action. We certainly began to make laws on the 29th of April, 1891. How then possibly, can we hold that we can exercise legislative powers after the 28th day of April, 1896? On the other phase of the question, I think there is some ground for argument, although the argument seems to me to be very strongly in favour of the view taken by the hon. member (Mr. Edgar). I merely rise, Sir, to express the strong view, that this Parliament began to live on the 25th day of April, 1891, and will die by the operation of the law on the 24th day of April, 1896.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Since this question has been first bruited, I have given some consideration to it, and I frankly confess, that had it not been for the remarks made by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), I would not believe the question was capable of doubt at all. I have the greatest respect for his legal opinion, and if he had committed himself to a legal opinion adversely to the one which I entertain, I would have some doubt as to whether I was right or not. But, I watched the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dickey) very carefully, and I saw he was very careful not to identify himself in any way, with any of these unknown gentlemen who entertain a doubt on the construction of this Act. Now, the hon. gentleman of course said that which we all know: That there is a glorious uncertainty about the law. Well, that does not amount to anything. There is a glorious uncertainty about the decisions on points of law here and there, but there are many questions about which there is no doubt; and on which there cannot be any reasonable doubt. The question here is, not whether any very acute lawyer can suggest a possibility of doubt, but, whether reasonable men bringing their trained intellects to bear upon the section which govern this Act, can entertain any reasonable doubt upon the matter at all. In coming to a conclusion upon the matter, I think it well to look at two or three of the sections of the British North America Act, which more or less bear upon the subject. In the first place, from the provisions of the British North America Act we must try and evolve if we can, a correct idea of what the scheme of government is. We have it laid down in the 20th section: that there must be a session of Parliament once, at least, every year. So that, it is not in the power of the Crown, even if the Crown desires to do so, to leave the country without an existing House of Commons for any time. They must call Parliament once every twelve months at least, and the country is secured in that sense from any exercise of improper power on the part of the Crown or its representative. Now, who is to call the House together. The 38th section says:

> The Governor General shall from time to time, by an instrument under the great seal, summon and call together the House of Commons.

The House of Commons, we all know, is a constituent part of the Parliament, but the other parts of the Parliament remain, while the House of Commons comes and goes and the Governor General is to call us together. Now, when is there a House of Commons constituted? It is not necessary to have 215 members to constitute a House of Commons. There may be many reasons why 215 members cannot be got together. Magna Charta expressly provides that it shall not be necessary for all the burgesses who are summoned to attend, in order to make a legal House of Commons: but the British North America Act comes in and solves any doubt, and states the law so clearly that there can be no doubt about it. The 48th section of the Act says:

> The presence of at least 20 members of the House of Commons shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers.

So that other things being equal, and subject to some exceptions, if you have 20 members of the House of Commons appearing in answer to the proclamation of the Governor General after the return of the writs, you have a House of Commons competent to exercise all the powers which the House of Commons can exercise under the constitution; and then we come to the section which the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has just read. Now, I humbly submit this to the House, as a thing which is not open to reasonable doubt: That the British North America Act in the 50th section, did not contemplate several days for the return of the writs. It contemplated that the Governor General in exercising his statutory prerogative of issuing the writs for an election, should make one return day. It does not say that there shall be "days" for the return of the writs. It says, that the House of Commons shall continue for five years—from what? From the "day" of the return of the writs. That, to my mind, indicates that the intention of the law was: That the Governor General in issuing his proclamation for the writs, should fix a single day for them all, and as a matter of fact that is the practice. That is what he did in this case. If that construction of the law is correct, then the day for the return of the writs is a fixed period about which there can be no doubt, and the five years term runs from that period, and expires of course at a time about which there can be no possibility of doubt. It says:

> For five years and no longer.

That sets at rest the question, whether by any possibility, there can be a period of time longer than the five years during which the House of Commons could sit. Now, then, that is evidently intended to be definite. There is no doubt at all to my mind, that the draughtsman intended to fix a definite time from which the period should begin to run. I humbly and respectfully submit, that he has done so, when he declares that the five years shall run from the day of the return of the writs—plural for "writs," singular for "day." What took place, as a matter of fact? The Governor General issued his proclamation, and I find that in that proclamation dated the 3rd day of February, he says:

> I have this day given orders for issuing our writs in due form for the calling of Parliament in our said Dominion, which writs are to bear date the 4th day of February inst., and be returnable on the 25th day of April next.

So that every one of the writs for the election which was to be held in 1891, was to bear date the 4th day of February, and every one of the writs had a uniform return day, viz., the 25th of April. That is practically in conformity with the express words of the section and the spirit of the section, so that we have not only a law laying down what ought to be done, not only a law fixing the definite day from which the five years ought to run, but we have the Governor General issuing his proclamation pursuant to the statute fixing an identical day for the return of each and every of the writs. How can there be a doubt? If the Governor General had been advised to make a different return day, and if there were different return days in the writs, there might be some possibility of doubt suggested. But when the British North America Act says that the five years shall run from the day of the return of the writs, and the day of the return of the writs is fixed definitely on a particular day, and the elections are held pursuant to that, and Parliament meets on the 29th of April afterwards, where does the possibility of doubt come in ? I have never been able to see it. But, some hon. gentlemen say: Oh, well, one of the gentlemen to whom a writ was issued did not hold the election. What then? The election is void, is it not? What authorizes him to hold the election, and what gives the returning officer any power at all ? Nothing more nor less than the writ under the great seal which he receives from the Governor General.

Mr. HAZEN. The statute.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The statute does not give him any power.

Mr. HAZEN. It gives him authority.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The statute does not give him a single particle of power. Mr. A. or Mr. B. the returning officer, is unknown to the statute. The statute authorizes the Governor General to issue the writ, and the writ confers the authority, and the only authority on the returning officer. And, when the writ expires, the authority ceases, and the returning officer has no more power to act a day after the expiration of his authority, than I have. If he holds the election after the time mentioned in the writ has expired, the election is clearly void.

Mr. HAZEN. There is no time mentioned in the writ at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman says there is no time mentioned in the writ. But the hon. gentleman has not followed my argument at all, because I have pointed out that the proclamation issued by the Governor General under the statute fixed the date when the writs must be returned, and the date for the return of the writ for Algoma was the 25th day of April. Of course, that is not repeated on the face of the writ as the return day, because that was mentioned as the day Parliament was to be summoned. Now, Parliament could not be summoned until after that day.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You are assuming that the day of the return is the return day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say that the Governor General fixed the 25th of April as the day when the writs should be returnable, and after the 25th of April it was not competent for any returning offier to hold an election. If any returning officer did not hold an election until after that date, that could not prevent Parliament meeting and doing business. If twenty members were returned, under the British North America Act, it was competent for the Governor General to call them together, and they would have full power to perform all the functions of the House of Commons, and the absence of one member did not affect the power of the House of Commons to exercise its functions as such. His election, I hold, is void, if held after the 25th day of April. That is a question for him alone ; it does not affect the power of this House. Then the hon. gentleman refers to the return of the elections for the three constituencies of Algoma, Gaspé and Cariboo. I would suggest, in answer, that the discretion vested in the returning officer must be exercised within the time the writ is returnable. That time limits the exercise of his discretion. In discussing this question with my learned friends on this side, I have never had any doubt on that point. Of course, some ingenious counsel may suggest a doubt in some way or other. So far, I am pleased to see that the Minister of Justice has not committed himself in any way to the existence of a doubt.

Mr. HAZEN. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman does not attach enough weight to sections 14 and 16 of the Act respecting elections of members of the House of Commons. These sections, taken together, seem to me to make it clear that in the districts of Cariboo, Algoma and Gaspé, the returning officer can hold the election at any time he pleases, provided he holds it within eighty days of the time he receives the writ ; and it makes no difference when the other writs are returned.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My argument simply is that the discretion exercised by the returning officer there must be limited by the time fixed for the return of the writs.

Mr. HAZEN. I understand the hon. gentleman's argument ; but it seems to me that this statutory power overrides any discretion that may be vested in the Governor General. The statute clearly means that the returning officer may extend the time for the holding of the election after he receives the writ, in those districts, provided he does not extend it beyond eighty days. In the case of Algoma, the returning officer did exercise his discretion, and did not hold the election before the 25th of April, but held it on a much later date. That being the case, and taking the language of section 50 of the British North America Act, which says that " every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs." I think it is open to argument to say that that means the return of the last writ. It is not the return day of the writ, but the actual day on which the writ is returned. I do not want to give this as an opinion to the House, but it seems to me that the matter is very fairly open to legal argument. This being a question of law, it seems to me that this House is not a very satisfactory tribunal to decide it. If we can get a decision on the question from the Supreme Court, that would be much more satisfactory, because it would be a decision absolutely free from any party bias, which might not be said of the conclusion to which this Parliament might come.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The election courts have decided against that view in regard to Gaspé.

Mr. HAZEN. Will the hon. gentleman give me the case in which they have so decided?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to make a few observations on this question, because one hon. gentleman who expressed an opinion upon it, referred to those holding a different opinion as not being known—as those whose names were not before the House or the country. I have no hesitation in saying that I have a very strong opinion myself as to the settlement of one part of this question, while the other part gives me a good deal of difficulty. We may have had a right to meet on the 29th of April, 1891, as we did; but whatever the settlement of that question may be, I am not able to see how hon. gentlemen conclude that it settles the other question as to how long this Parliament lasts. The very section that seems to lead some hon. gentlemen to the conclusion at which they have arrived, leads me to an entirely different conclusion in regard to the length of the life of this Parliament. Section 50 of the British North America Act does not definitely fix the life of Parliament at five years. There is a difference between the language of the Act fixing the term of our Parliament and that of the Septennial Act in England. In the latter Act the question as to the length of the life of Parliament seems to be made absolutely and definitely clear. It is there provided that the duration of Parliament shall be seven years, "to be counted from the day on which, by the writ of summons, this Parliament hath been, or any future Parliament shall be, appointed to meet"; whereas, in our case, as the hon. Minister of Justice, I think, said, it had been contended before him, section 50, instead of saying definitely that the duration of Parliament shall be five years, says that it "shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the same.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. My difficulty is as to whether we had, in this case, any right to sit before the month of June. But that the other question is not altogether as hon. gentlemen have suggested, I am led to believe by what I understand to be the opinion of the Attorney General for Ontario, Sir Oliver Mowat, given on the occasion to which the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has referred today. In referring, not to the Ontario Act, but to the British North America Act, Sir Oliver Mowat, on January 30, 1879, said that, in his opinion, the language in section 50, "from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House," meant the return of the last writs. That hon. gentleman, of course, is an eminent authority.

Mr. EDGAR. He meant the day they were returned.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Whatever he meant, that is what he said.

Mr. EDGAR. That is not what I read today.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. This is an extract from the debates of the Ontario legislature of January 30, 1879.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That was under a different statute altogether.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all. He did refer to the Ontario statute, it is true; but when referring to this section in the British North America Act, he used the language I have attributed to him. He argued on that occasion, too, that it would be a monstrous thing if a Lieutenant-Governor should have the power of calling Parliament together when only some of the constituencies were represented. We may have done wrong. This Parliament met at a time when, according to the Attorney General of Ontario, it had no right to sit, because it had only the right to sit from the day of the return of the last writ. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) has put in my hand the British North America Act, section 85 of which provides that every legislative assembly of Ontario and Quebec shall continue for four years from the date of the return of the writs. There is a very great similarity in language.

Mr. EDGAR. It is the same exactly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. I point out the position he took, for it has had great weight with me, and has stirred up the difficulty as to the correctness of the procedure in calling Parliament together in April instead of June. He argued that if a Lieutenant-Governor had the power with regard to one constituency, he would have it with regard to another. Now, then, the construction put upon this Act by those who have advised the Governor General in days past—in 1872, for instance, when the writs for Gaspé and Chicoutimi and Saguenay were made returnable on October 12th, all the others being returnable on the 3rd September, the proclamation for Parliament to meet issued the 12th October, that being the date on which the last writ was returnable; and the question is whether there has not been departure from that correct principle in connection with this very Parliament.

Mr. EDGAR. No, the writs were all returnable on the 25th April.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I mention this case because, while I do not propose to go into a lengthy argument, I would like to say why I have reached, right-or wrong—for the present, at any rate—a very strong opinion, not shared by most of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-day. In 1874, Parliament did not meet until after the day of the return of the last writ, and in that year the Hon. Mr. Blake was Minister of Justice. That seems to be in keeping with the view that Parliament began to run from that period. I rise merely in view of the statement that there were none whose names were known who held the opinion, and to suggest for the consideration of the Government that there is this curious phase which seems to strengthen the idea thrown out for reference to the Supreme Court. Take this chamber to-day, those who argue, no doubt sincerely, inclining to the view I entertain, that this Parliament runs till June, happen to be desirous of promoting remedial legislation, and are anxious to see the Remedial Bill carried into effect. All the other gentlemen, without exception, who say they have no doubt that the life of this Parliament expires on the 24th of next April, desire to defeat that Bill. No gentleman advocating the Bill would like to see it dealt with irregularly and unconstitutionally, so as to be in the end abortive. I would like to see this Parliament live long enough to deal comprehensively with the measure, but if there is any reasonable doubt amongst legal minds as to our power, no advocate of the measure would wish to run any risk. I was going to make another suggestion. It has been suggested that we should refer this point to the Supreme Court. Well, it is answered, and with some force, that the decision of the Supreme Court could not be considered a final judgment, and it is too late to go to the court of last resort. But we have a committee, and I think that committee might be called into play to look upon these very references and precedents and make a report ; and even if the members of that committee have not the standing of judges of the Supreme Court, still I question very much whether, on a matter of this kind, after all is said and done, the report of that committee would not be as valuable to the House of Commons. The question, at any rate, would bear investigation and discussion, for we all desire that no risk should be run in connection with this legislation ; and as regards the point that Parliament may possibly have met before it had a right to meet, that point demands the consideration of this House, and that consideration, it seems to me, could be regularly obtained by references to the Committee of Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Opinions have been given from nearly every province, and I should like to quote the opinion contained in a letter from Ottawa to the "Moniteur de Lévis," which is considered the organ of the ex-Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Senator Angers. That letter, I believe, was written by the Hon. Senator Landry, formerly member of this House from Montmagny.

Mr. AMYOT. Does the hon. gentleman affirm it as a fact that the "Moniteur de Lévis is the organ of the ex-Minister of Agriculture, and also that the letter he refers to was written by Senator Landry ?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. As far as one can affirm an opinion, I do so. It is well understood in Quebec that the "Moniteur de Lévis" is the organ of the ex-Minister of Agriculture. That is well understood in Quebec. And I can affirm with certainty that the letter from which I am about to quote was written by Senator Landry. This letter goes on to quote section 50 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows :—

> Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor General), and no longer.

Here is what Senator Landry argues from that clause :

> In decreeing that the duration of Parliament must not extend beyond the period of five years (and no longer) the law shuts the door on all ulterior delays, and every Parliament which would take upon itself to exceed this extreme limit would be without authority and against authority. The constitution would be violated and the country would fall into anarchy.

I give this as the opinion of Senator Landry, because I am sure the letter was written by him, and I feel pretty certain that this is also the opinion of Senator Angers.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) seems to think that, by reason of section 14 of the Elections Act, it was within the power of the returning officer for Algoma to extend the time of the duration of Parliament beyond five years. I do not think that the hon. member will contend that an officer can do, by a side wind, what this Parliament cannot do. We cannot constitutionally pass an Act to say that the existence of this Parliament shall be five years and one day. We have no authority ; we are estopped by the British North America Act from doing it. A province can do it, but this Parliament cannot do it. How much less, then, is it possible for a returning officer, by a side wind, under a clause of a Dominion statute to do what this Parliament could not do itself. Then, with reference to the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper's) remarks, I could not quite make out how he argued that we may have the right, after meeting on the 29th April, 1891.——

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We may have been wrong.

Mr. EDGAR. Or may have been right.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I argued that we may have been wrong.

Mr. EDGAR. But there was a doubt in the hon. gentleman's mind. He seemed to think that we may have been wrong, so, he must have thought that we may have been right. He seemed to argue that even if we were right in meeting on 29th April we might have power to sit until 3rd June, or five years and 35 days. Therefore, we run our head straight against the plain simple language of our own constitution which says we may continue for five years and no longer. I cannot get over that answer to his argument. The hon. gentleman seemed to misapprehend the position that Sir Oliver Mowat took, or the grounds of his arguments of the Algoma case in the province of Ontario. Sir Oliver Mowat argued from the proclamation: he never argued that because a writ was returned on a certain day, later than the other writs, that, therefore, the day on which the writ was returned should have any effect whatever in determining the duration of Parliament. It was not necessary for him to argue that. I hold in my hand the proclamation which they were discussing. It is dated the 23rd December, 1874, and reads, in part, as follows:—

> That we have this day given orders for issuing our writs in due form for calling a new legislative assembly for our said province, which writs are to bear date of 27th December instant, and to be returnable on the 2nd day of February.

If it stopped there, as ours does, there would have been some force in what the hon. gentleman said. But it goes on:

> Except our writ for the district of Algoma, which is to be returnable on the 14th day of August next.

And Sir Oliver Mowat held that the existence of Parliament would begin and run for four years after the return of the Algoma writ. That is the whole point of the case. It is impossible for the hon. gentleman to point out a provision like that in our proclamation. For three Parliaments after confederation, there were exceptional dates fixed for the return of the writs, just as there were in the Ontario case, and Parliament never was called together till after the last date that was fixed for their being returnable. But since that, in the elections of 1878, 1882, and 1891, one date has been fixed for the return of the writs, covering the whole country, without exception. There is nothing I have heard in this debate that has changed, in any way, my opinions I had formed before I spoke. I am sure I have nothing to complain of as to the spirit in which the arguments have been presented. We would like to have heard the Minister of Justice's own idea on this important question, but we had only hypothetical quotations from hypothetical persons, and so we have lost the valuable opinions we hope to get before long from the gentleman mainly responsible in this matter.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

CANADIAN JOCKEY CLUB.

House proceeded to consider amendments made in Committee of the Whole to Bill (No. 48) respecting the Canadian Jockey Club.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Mr. MARTIN. I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any length, but I wish to register my protest in the House, as I did in the committee, against the provisions of the Bill which give twelve men permanent control of the Canadian Jockey Club, a club which is supposed to be a representative institution for the purpose of governing racing in Canada. I submit that this is bound to be very much to the detriment of this club, and very much to the detriment of any attempt to make it the guiding body of racing in Canada. There is no reason whatever why there should be any stock. And there is no reason why the possession of a certain amount of stock upon which there is only $550 paid, should entitle certain gentlemen to a representation of twelve upon the committee; in other words, to make these particular gentlemen equal, for purposes of representation, in this important association, to twelve affiliated clubs.

Amendments concurred in, and Bill read the third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 82) respecting the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Manitoba and North-west Millers' Association.—(Mr. Masson.)

MILITARY GROUND AT ESSEX.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked:

> Whether the military ground at Sussex, N.B., has been leased to any person? If so, to whom, and when, and for what length of time, and at what rent, and on what other terms?

Mr. DICKEY. By a lease dated 12th July, 1895, the Department of Militia and Defence has rented to Lieutenant Colonel Edwin B. Beer, the military ground at Sussex, N.B., for seven years, from 1st November, 1894, at the rate of $25 per annum, on condition that: The said lessee is to give his supervision to the property generally, to maintain the fences erected by the department, as permanent fences, to superintend such works and repairs as may, from time to time, be authorized to be done upon the premises, to clear such land as may be ready for stumping (not to exceed ten acres in any one year) and to crop and seed the same to grass, to perform eighteen days' work of team and two men in repairs to the river banks, or other necessary work in each and every year, and to have the land clear and ready for military camps when required. It is also stipulated that the lease may be renewed at the expiration of the said term of seven years, upon such conditions as may be agreed upon.

COURT-HOUSE AT WOLSELEY.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

When was the court-house at Wolseley completed ? How much has it cost ? How much has been paid to date since completion for caretaking and heating ? How often has court been held in it ? If no court has been held in it, why not ? When will court be held in it ?

Mr. OUIMET. 1. Completed on 28th June, 1895. 2. Cost of building, $8,349.77. 3. Caretaking, to 28th February, 1896, $202.50; heating, $195.95 ; total, $398.45.

Mr. MARTIN. How much in 1895 ?

Mr. OUIMET. Nothing. I have a note here which says : We are informed by the Department of Justice that after the official notification is given to the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories that a court house is ready for occupation, the subsequent action as to when a court is to be held, is not under the control of federal authority. Such notification was given to the judge by the Department of Justice on 25th November, 1895, and in turn given by the judge to the Lieutenant-Governor.

MANITOBA PENITENTIARY.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. How much land was bought in 1895 from Hugh Allan, J. O'Donoghue and William Fraser, respectively, for the Manitoba penitentiary ? 2. What was the price per acre in each case ? 3. What is the extent of said penitentiary lands now ?

Mr. DICKEY. 1. One hundred and sixty acres from each. 2. The Allan property, including a quarry and a brick dwelling house, cost, $2,000. The other quarter sections were purchased for $10 and $8 per acre, respectively. 3. Eight hundred acres.

POST OFFICE AT ROCKWAY VALLEY.

Mr. DEVLIN asked :

Whether the Government received a petition from Rockway Valley and vicinity, in the county of Ottawa, asking for improved mail service, and for the opening of a new office ? If so, is it the intention of the Government to comply with the prayer of the petition ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In the absence of the Postmaster General, I beg to say to the hon. member that it is the intention to comply with the prayer of the petition.

SUGAR EX-SS. "SCYNTHANIA."

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

Was a cargo of sugar landed in Canada, ex-SS. "Scynthania," or any other vessel, at or about the date of the imposition of the last increase of duty upon sugar, on which the duty has not been paid ? What quantity was in the cargo or any other cargoes that arrived on or about the said date, and what amount of duty remains unpaid, if any, or is still in dispute? Who are the importers or importer ? If any duty is still due, what steps have the Government taken to collect the sum or sums due ?

Mr. WOOD. 1. A cargo of raw sugar was landed ex-SS. "Scynthania," about the date of the imposition of the duty on raw sugar last session. 2. The quantity in the cargo was 6,667,248 pounds, upon which duty, if exigible, would amount to $33,336.24. 3. The importers were the Canada Sugar Refining Company. 4. The parties refused to pay duty inasmuch as they had tendered entry the day before the Budget speech, and asked that the department would facilitate the determination of the court of the liability of the sugar ton-duty, and the matter is now before the courts.

CEMENT FOR WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. GIBSON asked :

1. What quantity of Thorold cement was used in building and enlarging the new Welland Canal ?

2. What quantity of Thorold cement was used in building the new aqueduct on the Welland Canal at Welland, Ont. ?

3. Is the Government aware that the following engineers, viz., the late John Page, W. G. Thompson and Thomas Munro expressed the following opinions regarding the quality of Thorold cement ?

7th June, 1884.

For the past forty years the natural hydraulic cement obtained at Thorold, province of Ontario, has been used to my knowledge on various extensive public works, and in every instance the result has proved highly satisfactory. When properly burned, ground fine and used fresh from the mill, it will compare favourably with any natural or artificial cement that I know of for building or other purposes in a moist position, or for walls that have been built a few weeks before water has been let in on them. It is well adapted for concrete foundations, walls, drains, cisterns, or indeed for any hydaulic works. When properly prepared and mixed with two parts of clean, sharp sand to one of cement, the result will invariably give good satisfaction.

From W. G. Thompson, Esq., engineer in charge New Welland Canal and Sault Ste. Marie Canal :

17th April, 1884.

My tests of Thorold hydraulic cement have extended over a period of twenty-eight years, and have been on a large scale, as exemplified in the locks, bridges, culverts and other masonry on the Welland Canal and Welland Railway, and the record, which has been invariably satisfactory, is to be found in examination of the structures. The necessary tearing down of masonry and concrete, during the Welland Canal enlargement has afforded abundant evidence of the reliability of the Thorold hydraulic cement, both in masonry and in concrete, and above and under water. I desire no better cement for the class of work referred to.

From Thomas Munro, Esq., engineer in charge Soulanges Canal :

25th March, 1879.

About one million bushels of Thorold hydraulic cement have been usel in the construction of the canal works in my charge. This experience enables me to testify to the excellence of the article, especially when carefully burnt and thoroughly ground.

4. If the Thorold cement was used in building the above Government works, why is it not now used in building the "Soulanges" and "Trent Valley" Canals ?

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot state the amount of Thorold cement used in building and enlarging the new Welland Canal, neither can I say what quantity was used in the Welland Aqueduct, but the quantity, I am aware, was very large. I am not aware of the letters referred to, but the officers of the department say that Messrs. Page, Munro and Thompson did give letters of certificate as to the quality of the Thorold cement. The Thorold cement was used in building the Welland Canal, but it is not found to be so reliable and suitable for submerged work as the Portland cement, and, for this reason, the use of the Portland cement has been generally, of later years, adopted on Government canal work. Both Mr. Thompson and Mr. Munro strongly favour its use, as well as the chief engineer.

AMENDMENTS TO REMEDIAL BILL.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to accept, support and adopt the amendments to the Remedial Bill, of which the hon. member for Bagot has given notice ? Do the Government intend to accept, support and adopt all the said amendments or a part thereof only ? In the latter case, which of the said amendments do they intend to accept ?

Mr. DICKEY. In reply to the hon. member. I beg to say that any proposed amendments will be taken into consideration when they are offered. The Government cannot give any further information now.

CLAIM OF E. ST. LOUIS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to further resist the claim of E. St. Louis for labour supplied to the Curran Bridge ? Do they intend to pay the judgment given by the Supreme Court ? What is the amount of the judgment, and also the amount of the cost ?

Mr. DICKEY. That question is before the officers of the Department of Justice to determine its legal aspects. When their report is received, the policy will be detemined with regard to it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. gentleman say the amount of the claim ?

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. DICKEY. Not definitely. It is in the neighbourhood of $67,000.

FISHERMEN OF SKEENA RIVER.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

1. Has the Minister of Marine and Fisheries received a petition from the fishermen of Skeena River, in the northern part of British Columbia, a large number of whom are Christian Indians ; praying that the weekly close period for catching salmon, which now begins on Saturday at 6 a.m. and ends on Sunday at 6 p.m., shall hereafter begin on Saturday at noon and end on Sunday at midnight, thus enabling Christian Indians and others to observe the twenty-four hours of Sunday as a period of rest without reducing the number of hours in each week set apart as a close season ?

2. Will the Government grant the reasonable and proper prayer of the said petitioners, and respect their conscientious scruples against working on Sunday, by making the required change, which will not reduce the number of hours of the close season, but merely readjust them to meet the desire of Christians by embracing the twenty-four hours of Sunday in the close season of thirty-six hours in each week ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Several such petitions have been received. 2. Similar requests of this nature have been refused in respect of other rivers in British Columbia, on the grounds that the fish caught Saturday morning could not be canned the same day and the cannery cleaned, while keeping the fish over until Monday morning would involve their loss as they would spoil and would be wasted. But the department will make further inquiries into the matter with a view, if possible, to reaching some arrangement for meeting the wishes of the Indians.

SMELT FISHING.

Mr. DAVIES asked :

Has there been any extension of the close season with respect to the catching of smelts in the maritime provinces during the present winter ? If so, when, and in what localities and provinces, and for what lengths of time have such extensions been made, and for what reason ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. On representations from the different provinces in which smelt fishing is carried on, that the regulations acted unfairly in some localities, owing to differences in the dates at which the ice was sufficiently strong to permit of fishing, general instructions were issued to the fishery officers in Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to arrange that all parties should be allowed two and a half months' fishing. Thus, in localities where fishing began early, it would have to close early, and where it began late it would continue to a correspondingly later date.

IMPROVED RIFLE FOR VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Casey) asked :

1. Who has been entrusted with the choice of an improved rifle for the volunteers ?

2. Has the choice been definitely made, and if so, what rifle has been chosen?

Mr. DICKEY. The choice has been made by the Government, after obtaining the opinions of experts on both sides of the Atlantic. After mature consideration, the Government, having heard fully all the opinions given, came to the conclusion, that they would order the Lee-Enfield magazine rifle, which is practically the same as the Lee-Metford rifle, at present in the hands of the Imperial troops, but with the Enfield barrel, which, from its improved grooving, greatly prolongs the life of the rifle. This is the newest pattern known, and is the one to be given to the Imperial troops.

FISHING IN LAKE ERIE.

Mr. McMULLEN (for Mr. Casey) asked:

1. What is the total number of (1) gill-net, and (2) pound-net, licenses, granted on the north shore of Lake Erie?

2. What number are granted to an individual, and to a firm, respectively?

3. Is it a condition of such licenses that the licensees shall, themselves, conduct the fishing under them? Do they, as a matter of fact, do so? In how many cases do they not?

4. Are transfers of licenses subject to approval of the Marine and Fisheries Department?

5. Are the licensees allowed to transfer their licenses to United States citizens? Or to use nets belonging to United States citizens? Or to operate the licenses, under hire, for United States citizens?

6. Is the Department of Marine and Fisheries aware that many of these licenses are operated by Canadians in whose names the licenses are issued, who are acting merely as foremen for United States citizens?

7. Who holds and operates the pound-net license at Port Stanley, Ont., held last year by John Ellison?

8. How many licenses of each kind are granted to the Long Point Company?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The total number of licenses granted on the north shore of Lake Erie is: (1) gill-nets, 45; (2) pound-nets, 58. 2. The maximum number of pound-nets granted to individuals is 5, and the maximum quantity of gill-nets is 3,000 fathoms for a boat license, and 12,000 fathoms for a tug license. 3. It is not a condition of the licenses that the licensees must conduct the fishing themselves, and the department is not aware whether they do so or not. 4. Yes. 5. Licensees are not allowed to transfer their licenses to United States citizens, nor could they do so, as the department will not issue licenses to foreigners; consequently, licenses could not be operated under hire from United States citizens. 6. No. 7. John Ellison holds the license, and it is presumed that he operates the fishery. 8. None.

GOVERNMENT DREDGES.

Mr. McMUULEN (for Mr. Casey) asked:

When, and to whom, and at what price, has the Government dredge, long laid up at Port Stanley, Ont., been sold?

Mr. OUIMET. I am not aware that any dredge, the property of the Government, has been sold at Port Stanley.

EXPORTATION OF RICE MEAL—MOUNT ROYAL MILLING COMPANY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. McShane) asked:

1. What was the quantity and value of rice meal exported from Montreal by the Mount Royal Milling Company, for the calendar year ending 31st December, 1895?

2. What was the amount of duty refunded by the Government to the Mount Royal Milling Company, on said exportation?

3. What was the quantity and value of rice meal exported from Montreal by the Mount Royal Milling Company, from the 1st January, 1896, to the 1st March, 1896?

4. What was the amount of duty refunded by the Government to the Mount Royal Milling Company, on quantity so exported?

5. If any duty has been refunded, at what rate of duty has the same refund been calculated?

Mr. WOOD. The quantity and value of rice meal or flour exported from Montreal by the Mount Royal Milling Company, durin the calendar year 1895, was 261,240 pounds; value, $4,665. Drawback of duty, at the rate of 99 per cent of the amount paid, was allowed, namely, $775.88. The department has no record of exportations having been made between the 1st January and the 1st March, 1896. 4th and 5th answered by above.

PROPOSED CANAL FROM MONTREAL.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. McShane) asked:

Whether it is the intention of the Government to have a survey made of the proposed direct canal from Montreal to St. Johns, P.Q., a distance of about fifteen miles, which, if constructed, would shorten the distance of water carriage between Montreal and New York by about eighty miles?

Mr. HAGGART. The department is not aware of the facts stated—that a canal could be built, that it is a practical route, and that the distance saved would be as stated.

PAYMENT TO MONTREAL "GAZETTE."

Mr. YEO (for Mr. Rider) asked:

What amount has been paid yearly to the Montreal "Gazette" Printing Company, for each fiscal year during the past five years, under the following accounts, viz:—

1. For advertising?

2. For printing and lithographing?

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the hon. gentleman to put this in the form of a motion.

PUBLIC WHARF AT MAGOG.

Mr. YEO (for Mr. Rider) asked:

Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates a sum sufficient to connect the public wharf in the town of Magog with Lake Street, or to assist the town in providing some other way for reaching the wharf from Main Street ?

Mr. OUIMET. The department does not intend to place a sum in the Estimates to connect the public wharf in the town of Magog with Lake Street. It is understood, that the town is to provide the right of way to the wharf.

SCRIP FOR SCOUTS.

Mr. DAVIN moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the hon. the Minister of Militia should at once take steps to have scrip given to the scouts of Willow Bunch, Wood Mountain, Maple Creek and Moose Jaw entitled under the Act of 1886, and if any not coming within that Act should be found to have moral or equitable claims to scrip for their watchfulness and loyal services during the North-west rebellion, that the Minister should place them in a position to obtain scrip.

He said: Those for whom I mainly speak to-night, are a very interesting portion of our population in the North-west Territories. The scene of the rebellion which broke out in 1885, was, you will remember, in the north, on the Saskatchewan; but there was good reason to fear that that rebellion might extend all over the Territories. There was good reason to suppose, that the leaders of the rebellion had affinities and communications with designing men south of the international boundary, and it was of the utmost importance that intercommunication between the hostile spirits south of the line and the rebellious spirits north of it, should not take place. As a consequence, the Hon. Mr. Dewdney, who was then Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories, instructed, as I am informed, Mr. John Louis Legaré to form a corps of scouts from the Metis at Willow Branch and Wood Mountain to guard that part of the Canadian frontier, under the guidance of Mr. Legaré, who had already done good service to Canada; and, indeed, good service to the United States, by getting Sitting Bull—who was at one time, as you will remember, a famous character—across the line. Mr. Legaré formed a corps of scouts, who were most active, in which we find such men as Pascal Bonneau, Joseph Lapointe, Prudent Lapointe, Gaspard Beaupré, André Gaudré. And I may say of Mr. Bonneau and of Mr. André Gaudré, who are personally known to myself, that two more energetic men do not exist in the North-west Territories of whatever nationality. Also amongst those who did their duty on that occasion were Louis Bruyere, Louis Larocque, the two Gosselins, Louis Piché, Théophile McGillis, Abraham Beauchamp, Louis Roy, Zacharie Chartrand, and many others. The motion contemplates that the Minister of Militia (Mr. Desjardins) should have a search made through the archives of his department for papers connected with this claim. Those papers, I believe, were given originally to one of my colleagues from Manitoba, who is not in the House at present, and who has assured me that he will have them placed in the hands of the Minister of Militia if that has not already been done. There is great danger that we should overlook those persons who are settled many scores of miles south of the railway at Willow Bunch and Wood Mountain, but I who have been there, and the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) who, I believe, has been there, and the hon. Prime Minister, know that there is no more interesting class in the North-west Territories than these gentlemen who ranche and till the soil and generally develop the country, and who live some 120 miles south of the track. Now, I am sure that when the claims of these gentlemen are looked into, it will be found that they behaved well on that occasion on which they found their claim. It is true that they were not under fire, it is true that they were not at the front, but it is equally true of them what General Middleton said to one corps who wished to be sent to the front. Where you are, he said, is as much the post of honour as if you were at the front. Indeed, he said, I do not know but that the post is one in which you deserve even more credit because you are exposed to unexpected attacks, without the excitement of fighting at the front, with the eyes of the world upon you. It is under the Act of 1886 that these gentlemen, for whom I speak, make their claim; and if it shall appear, as I have no doubt it shall, that during the troubles in the North-west these gentlemen were active along the frontier, ready to intercept any aid that might come to the rebels on the Saskatchewan and to assist in stopping characters who might be escaping across the line, I have no doubt whatever that the Minister of Militia (Mr. Desjardins) or the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), or whoever shall have to adjudicate on these claims, will find that these people are as well entitled as were the other scouts to be given the scrip. I may say that when I brought the claims of the volunteers and of certain scouts before the present Mr.

Justice Sedgewick, then Deputy Minister of Justice, I did not forget those in whose behalf I am now moving; but, as I have said, the papers with regard to the Willow Bunch and Wood Mountain scouts never came into my hands, and I was unable therefore to do more than mention them to Mr. Sedgewick; and Col. Panet and the others who were going into all the claims were unable to find the documents. But I know they were placed in the hands of my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), and that hon. gentleman has promised me that they shall be forthcoming. As regards the scouts of Maple Creek and Moose Jaw, I placed their claims before Mr. Sedgewick. Their claims were not very numerous, but his decision was adverse, but not so decidedly adverse that it would not be right to review that decision; and as the claims of the Willow Bunch and Wood Mountain scouts are gone into, it would be desirable that the claims of the Maple Creek and Moose Jaw scouts should be likewise investigated. However, I build my confidence in this motion mainly on getting scrip for the Willow Bunch and Wood Mountain scouts. They were an organized body under Mr. Legaré. There cannot be the least doubt of the danger that was apprehended, at the time, from hostile Metis south of the line, friends of Louis Riel, coming up to give assistance in the rebellion; and although that rebellion did not spread and did not make a conflagration co-extensive with the Indian and Metis posts in the North-west Territories, that was not owing to the smallness of the danger or to the smallness of the probability that such might be the case, but rather to the promptness with which the Government pounced upon the fire before it spread and the success of our gallant volunteers.

Mr. DALY. Before the motion is carried, I desire to say, that it will be a matter of considerable importance to the Willow Bunch and Wood Mountain scouts if the information which the hon. gentleman has stated is in the hands of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), were placed in the hands of the Minister of Militia and Defence. There is no doubt these scouts rendered very valuable service during the rebellion of 1885. I am afraid their case has not been thoroughly considered, in view of the fact, that the information the hon. gentleman speaks of has not been in possession of the department. I have no doubt, that, if the information is laid before the Minister, he will go thoroughly into the case. I am quite agreeable to the motion passing, if it is amended. I now move that it should be, by inserting the word "if" before the word "entitled" and striking out all after "1886." The motion would then read:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the hon. the Minister of Militia should at once take steps to have scrip given to the scouts of Willow Bunch, Wood Mountain, Maple Creek and Moose Jaw, if entitled under the Act of 1886.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, when we are going to reach the end of the troubles in connection with the North-west rebellion. Every year claims are coming up. The giving away of the valuable lands of the North-west in this manner, session after session, is a thing that we should hesitate to do, unless there is a strong and well-defined claim. I do not see that it would be proper for this House to adopt unanimously a resolution of this kind. For my part, I am not prepared to concur in it. It may add greatly to the popularity of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to bring in resolutions which have the effect of giving these people donations of the public land for some services supposed to have been rendered eleven years ago. It is singular, that these things have been so long overlooked. How is it, that these claims were not attended to before? It shows considerable lack of activity on the part of the hon. member for Assiniboia to have allowed these people to have remained without this acknowledgment of their services for eleven years, and never even to have presented their claims until the approach of the general election. When a general election comes round, he becomes most active in seeking to have the valuable lands of the North-west given away in this manner. If we carry this resolution, and this donation is made, we shall hear nothing more of other claims, if the hon. gentleman is elected, for five years more; and, when the next general election comes, some Joe, or Dan, or Pat, will have a claim which will be brought before the House, and the unanimous sanction of the House asked for a grant for services rendered by them or some of their forefathers. I think we had better put a stop to this. A commission was appointed years ago to look into these claims. They took evidence on all the claims, I understand, and reported. Where were the claims the hon. gentleman has spoken of, then? For my part, I intend to record my vote against this resolution.

Mr. AMYOT. I protest against the remarks which the hon. gentleman has just made. He has no idea of what occurred in the North-west in 1885. He does not know the extent of that country. Nor does he know the bravery that was shown by hundreds of people there. The hon. gentleman complains of the value of the North-west lands, which, he says, are to be given away. But those lands seemed to be worth nothing to the hon. gentleman, when it was a question of acquiring them for the country. He has objected to any organization for the administration of those lands, and to-day, when the question comes up of recompense of those who have exposed their lives for the defence of those lands, he tries to undervalue their merits and their sacrifices. The question is not, whether these parties have been left for a long time without justice being done to them, but whether they are entitled to what they claim. Every year we have had some claims, the greater part of which have been found correct and have been allowed. No doubt, in that far prairie or in the bush near the Saskatchewan River many acts of bravery were accomplished for which some recompense should be made by this country. If two years, or ten years, or twenty years, hence, we find that there have been some acts calling for recompense, we should not hesitate to discharge that debt. Any country that has been exposed to war, has been many years in doing justice to the soldiers. To-day we see some of the soldiers of 1812 claiming from the state recognition for their services. And look at the case of the war of secession in the United States. How many claims are there still occupying the attention of the Government ? But it would take a very mean country, and it takes a very mean intelligence to deny to the soldiers of the country the recompense to which they are entitled.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. AMYOT. I know the hon. gentleman will deny the merits of all the others, the bravery of all the others, and will rest satisfied with his own personal virtue.

Mr. McMULLEN. I make an exception in your case.

Mr. AMYOT. As for my humble self, when I went with my soldiers to expose my life for my country, the hon. gentleman thought of nothing except to decry my merits, and so deny me the political recompense which he thought I might receive on account of them. I understand that, but I realize where it comes from, from a very low quarter, and I know that it does not diminish the merit of my humble sacrifice in the eyes of my fellow-countrymen. He may go on in that strain as long as he pleases; it will never move me. I know the bravery of the hon. gentleman. Last year, when I was not in the House, he attacked me for what he called my courage, and, when I asked him if he had done so, he denied it ; but I found his words in the "Hansard." If that is his bravery, if he is not willing to acknowledge the next day what he said the day before, I do not know what he would do, if called upon to resist an attack. He may deny my merits, if he likes ; I do not care for that. But, as a citizen of Canada, and one who has seen the endurance and bravery and discipline of our soldiers in the North-west, I hold that it is right that we should recompense all those who deserve recompense, and not be debarred from it because we have been long in doing justice.

These poor unfortunate soldiers very often had no way of communicating with the Government. They were not in a position to make their claim ; they do it to-day ; and the only question is whether the facts they allege are true, and whether these facts entitle them to a recompense that we should not begrudge them, and that every civilized country awards to its brave soldiers.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to make a personal explanation. The hon. gentleman charges me with having denied an attack upon him. I beg to say that the statement he makes is entirely untrue.

Mr. AMYOT. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will withdraw the word "untrue."

Mr. McMULLEN. As the word is not parliamentary, I withdraw it.

Mr. AMYOT. I shall take the first opportunity to prove that my statement is based upon "Hansard."

Mr. DALY. I understood the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was to oppose the motion as amended. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to read the motion, he would see that as amended it does not mean——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot speak a second time.

Mr. DALY. On the amendment ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member moved the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course, as amended, the motion is entirely innocuous, or ought to be, at any rate, if the Government will do their duty, and I suppose we must presume they are doing it. The motion as amended simply means that if any person remains who has not received what he is entitled to under the Act of 1886, then the Government are to give it to him. It scarcely requires a motion of this House to do that ; and I would rather gather that the very strong remarks of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) must have been directed against the Government, because my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) asked the Government to go a great deal further than that, and to give any one scrip who, by their watchfulness and loyal services during the North-west rebellion, rendered themselves entitled to it. Now, Parliament, in 1886, decided how far they were prepared to go in giving scrip to the volunteers, and the Government seems very properly to have confined the awarding of scrip to those who were entitled to it under the Act of 1886. If they were to go further than that, and now give it to persons whom they might think entitled to it for some other reasons, they would, no doubt, cut out a lot of persons who, in the meantime, would have been entitled to it, and who had left the country, or who had never heard of the change in the Act.

Amendment agreed to, and motion, as amended, agreed to.

ST. ANDREW'S RAPIDS.

Mr. MARTIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence with regard to improvements of St. Andrew's Rapids, not already brought down.

He said : The House will remember that, on one occasion at least, and I think on several occasions, I have brought this matter before their attention. They will also remember that my predecessor, as representative for Winnipeg, Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, also on one occasion, if not more, brought the matter before the House ; and I know that that gentleman brought the matter frequently to the attention of the Government outside the House. I may say that this matter has interested for a great many years the member for Winnipeg for the time being. In the interest of his constituents, he has urged upon the Government and upon this Parliament the urgent necessity for a moderate amount of public funds being devoted towards the improvement of St. Andrew's Rapids, on the Red River. The House will remember that the Red River is the principal river in the province of Manitoba ; that it rises in the United States, and drains a large part of the Dakotas and Minnesota ; that going up into Manitoba, it flows from Emerson into Lake Winnipeg, through the Red River Valley, and that the city of Winnipeg is situated upon its banks. In past days there was a great deal of navigation upon the river in flat boats from Moorhead to Winnipeg. The advent of railways has to a large extent done away with navigation. But the river is navigable, and could be used to great advantage to the people of Winnipeg and surrounding country, were it not for the fact that a few miles north of Winnipeg there exist these rapids, about six miles long, which are of such a character as practically to destroy navigation between Winnipeg and Lake Winnipeg during all but the period of very highest water. The reason that the people of Winnipeg are so much interested in this matter is that Lake Winnipeg has a number of natural resources which would be of great benefit to Winnipeg were there any cheap means of communication between the city and the lake. This is especially true in the matter of cordwood. It will be readily understood by the House that firewood is a very important item in the North-west, and the high cost of firewood, on account of the scarcity of that article in the North-west is one of the disadvantages that we labour under, coupled with the fact that coal has to be brought also from very considerable distances, and costs a great deal more in Winnipeg than it does in the eastern parts of Canada. Anything, therefore, calculated to reduce the price of firewood is a matter of very great importance to that city, and it is calculated that if we had navigation throughout the year, or throughout the season of navigation, between Winnipeg and the lake, the price of cordwood, by reason of the very large quantity of that article which is found along the shores of Lake Winnipeg, would be reduced probably $2 a cord. For that reason alone it has always been the idea of Winnipeg that they were not unreasonable in asking that Government money to a considerable extent should be expended in making the necessary improvements at St. Andrew's Rapids. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that we have had at various times very strong promises from Ministers of the Crown. We have also had very strong promises from Conservative nominees, who have always been elected to Parliament, except on the last occasion, that the Government would do its duty in this matter. The people of Winnipeg have lost no opportunity during the past ten or twelve years, when Ministers of the Crown have visited that city, to lay before them very fully the wants of the city in this matter. I have referred only to the question of cordwood, but there are many other resources in and around the lake which make it most desirable that there should be navigation between the two points. There is lumber, there are the fisheries, there are many mineral deposits around Lake Winnipeg which could be developed if we had navigation. Only a few months ago, the Minister of the Interior and the Prime Minister were up in that country, and the citizens of Winnipeg took the opportunity, as they had done on many previous occasions, of sending a representative delegation to meet those hon. gentlemen and lay this important question before them. I am very sorry to be obliged to state to the House that the delegation was received, not as it thought it should be, either by the Minister of the Interior, or the First Minister, and while the Minister of the Interior was not guilty of any direct disrespect to the deputation, the Prime Minister was, because, when the citizens of Winnipeg, a very large and influential deputation of them, as I have said, waited on those two hon. gentlemen, and brought this matter before them, and endeavoured to persuade them that they were fairly entitled to the expenditure of public money on that work, the Prime Minister said he had just returned from a long visit to the North-west, and during that visit he had been interviewed a great many times by Indians, and he noticed that every tribe of Indians wanted something, and he found when in Winnipeg they were no better—they were like the Indians in the North-west, with whom he had come in contact. It may be imagined that the people of a city possessing the ideas and prospects of Winnipeg would not be very much flattered by having such a reply made to a representative delegation urging on the Government a public work of this character. I understand that now, when the elections are not far distant, the Government are beginning to think of doing something in this matter, and the people of Winnipeg would consider an eleventh-hour repentance very much better than none at all, and if the Government are prepared to appreciate the position in which we are placed there with respect to this improvement, and are prepared to set aside a reasonable amount of money for that purpose, they will certainly obtain from those residents a very large amount of gratitude. During this session, a private company has applied to this Parliament for incorporation as "The Lake Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Canal Company," and, incidentally, that company has asked for a franchise to improve those rapids. I have, on behalf of the city of Winnipeg, opposed, and I intend to oppose the proposition that that company should receive a franchise from this Parliament in connection with those rapids, because, while it is true that if a canal were constructed from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson Bay, it would be necessary, in the interest of the canal company, to improve those locks, still, the city of Winnipeg and the surrounding country desire to have the locks constructed, and rapids improved whether the canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson Bay is ever constructed or not. We think it would be most unfortunate to hand over a franchise for the purpose of taking control of this public work, to a private company, in any event, but we certainly feel satisfied that if the Government could be induced to hand over a franchise covering a great river like the Red River, to a private company, it should be only on two conditions: 1. That the company had money in hand and were ready to proceed with the work; 2. That the tolls to be exacted for the use of those improvements should not, in any case, exceed what the parties using the navigation could fairly be expected to pay, utterly regardless of the question as to what the work cost. So it will be seen that the conditions which Winnipeg exacts make it almost equivalent to saying, as they do say, that no private company should have such a franchise handed over to them. I understand that the Government intend to restrict the powers of this company by some provision by which the Government are to be entitled to go on with the work if they see fit, but if they do not see fit, then it was to be handed over to this company. That stand is entirely unsatisfactory to the people of Winnipeg in one aspect. So far as the Government indicate that they have some idea of taking hold of the work, the people of Winnipeg are most glad to notice the fact, and would congratulate the Government if it were carried out; but the other alternative, handing this undertaking over to the company in case the Government do not intend to go on with the work, does not meet with the approval of the citizens there, and the restrictions which the Government propose to place on the company are not, in our opinion, sufficient. They say: We will reserve the power to approve the plans and allow the company to go on with the work unless we think their plans are proper. I put this case: Suppose a private company did go on with this work?

Mr. OUIMET. Mr. Speaker, is the hon. gentlemen in order in discussing a Bill which is now before the Railway Committee, stating what the conditions are, and so on?

Mr. SPEAKER. If that is what the hon. gentleman is doing, he is certainly out of order—if he is discussing a Bill which is before a committee of the House.

Mr. MARTIN. I think I am not out of order in saying that application has been made by this company to Parliament. I am not proposing to discuss their Bill, but the action of the Government.

Mr. OUIMET. The Bill is to be discussed to-morrow, and perhaps the hon. gentleman might postpone his remarks until then.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know what will be discussed at the meeting to-morrow. I do not discuss the matter except as it bears on the question as regards whether the Government should take up this work or not. It will not be satisfactory to propose, as I understand they intend to propose to this House, to hand over this work to a private company unless the conditions attached to the performance of the work by the private company were of such a nature as would benefit the people of Winnipeg and the surrounding country from the work being done by the Government of the day. I am very much delighted to find that this question is approached by the Government to-day in a very different aspect from what it was in 1894, when I first brought this question before the House. Then, all the Government could say was, that their engineers had looked into the matter, and that according to the reports of the engineers, the expense of the work was so great, that they were not in a position to recommend Parliament to vote any money for that purpose. I am glad to know that two years having elapsed since that announcement, and the elections being near at hand, the Government are inclined to look upon this question in a somewhat different light. I frankly say to them, that their course in that respect is a very proper one in their own interest, and also in the public interest. I have no doubt, that if the Government, even at the eleventh hour realize their duty in this matter, and recollect the many promises that they and their friends have made to the people up there, and do their duty in the premises by devoting public money to this work, they will certainly very much improve their political position in the city of Winnipeg. I wish to say at the same time, Mr. Speaker, that public money spent on this work, to be of any benefit to Winnipeg and to the province of Manitoba, must be voted in such a way as to really give the people there the benefit of having this work constructed at the public expense. I do not believe that any private company is likely to come with money in hand to build this work, because it is quite clear to any one who has looked into the matter, that it is not a work in connection with which private capital is likely to be reimbursed. The only inducement a company is likely to have to take up the scheme, is with the hope of getting Government aid and a Government bonus, and in some way manipulating the Government aid and Government bonus so as to get some advantage to themselves. So far as the company I have referred to is concerned, there is no question at all but that they are mere speculators. They present to Parliament a scheme for a canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson Bay, without a dollar to put into it. Their expectation is to induce capital to take hold of that work. This is public work, and we have no right to hand it over to a company whose success is dependent upon the obtaining of capital to build a canal hundreds of miles away. If the Government propose to devote public money to this purpose, the only satisfactory way in which they can do so, is to have a proper survey made. The surveys that have been made in the past have been superficial, and the Government have never sent a good engineer to devote reasonable time to the matter, and to find out what this work will probably cost. On the other hand, the city engineer of Winnipeg has devoted very considerable time to the matter, and has looked into it very carefully, and his estimate for the work is, I believe, about half the estimate of the Government engineer.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). About how much is that?

Mr. MARTIN. The Government engineer estimated the cost at $900,000 or $1,000,000, while Mr. Ruttan who is a very eminent engineer, estimates that the work could be done, if I recollect aright, for about $450,000. I would be inclined to think, that if the Government were prepared to furnish the bulk of the money for this work, a reasonable amount in addition would be furnished by the city of Winnipeg. I believe the city could afford to do that on account of the great saving that would accrue to the people on the item of firewood alone. However, I do not know that the city would give any amount, as the question has never been before the people. I impress upon the Government, that if they intend to give any public money towards this work, they should give enough to complete it. There is no use offering one, or two hundred thousand dollars. They must offer a substantial sum which will be sufficient to construct the work in a reasonable time. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if the Government want to put themselves right with the people up there, and want to do their duty, they will not only give a sufficient sum towards this work, but they will also see that when the work is completed it shall be fully and freely available to the people of the locality. I do not say that there should not be tolls charged, nor do I think there would be any objection whatever if the Government were to charge a reasonable toll; but the toll must not be of such a character as to be a burden upon navigation. It must be so reasonable, that people will be enabled to engage in the transportation of cordwood and other products, from Lake Winnipeg to the city of Winnipeg. I am satisfied that the Government can not do justice to themselves, nor justice to that portion of the province, nor justice to that public work, by allowing a private company to intervene. A private company can only come in there for the purpose of deriving a revenue for their own benefit. In this work there is no chance for any outside profits. It will take every dollar that the Minister of Public Works can afford for the purpose of improving this river, along with anything that may be had from the city of Winnipeg, to complete that improvement without allowing for any profits to a private company. I therefore view with apprehension any suggestion as to the intervention of a private company. I would be almost prepared to say, that if the Government offered an adequate sum, and offered to give that sum as a bonus to a private company, they would be treating this subject with indifference, now, as they have for so many years past, and that they were merely making a feint of doing something. I hope that it will not be so. I hope that if hon. gentlemen opposite determine to give a vote of money for this purpose, they will do it in such a way as to reflect credit upon themselves. I am quite willing that they should have any political advantage they can get from that course. I shall be very glad indeed if for that reason—or leaving out reasons of that kind altogether—they should come to the conclusion that it was in the interest of that portion of Manitoba, and in the interest of Manitoba generally, that this great river which is practically useless at the present time, should be opened up, as a means of communication with the great resources of Lake Winnipeg, and all the rest of the province, and in fact with eastern Canada as well.

Mr. OUIMET. All the papers that are in the department concerning this matter have already been brought down. I can say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), that since last year, the department has under consideration the various improvements of which he has spoken. I was very sorry not to have at my disposal last summer a sufficient amount to get a new survey made, as I find that the first survey is not satisfactory to the people of Winnipeg. The first survey showed that the improvements required would cost very nearly $1,000,000, and the Government did not feel that they could, in this present year, undertake the work if it would cost so much. I hope, in view of the estimates that have been given to us by Mr. Ruttan, that the new survey will make it clear that these improvements can be made for a smaller amount. The hon. gentleman and his constituents may rely on this that, if it is possible to make the improvements at a cost at all proportionate to the benefits that will accrue to the people of Winnipeg, the Government will certainly undertake the work as soon as the finances of the country will enable us to do so, which I hope will be very soon.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few remarks on this motion, particularly in view of the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) gratuitously cast a sneer at the Premier and myself in reference to a deputation that waited upon us in Winnipeg last September, when we were on our way east. The hon. gentleman stated that the Premier was disrespectful to the very important delegation that waited upon us in reference to this scheme, likening their request to the Indian pow-wows we held with delegations of the Indians whom we met during our trip. Now, I can say that any remark made by the Premier at that time in reference to the Indians, was made entirely in badinage, the Premier so stated, and it could not be taken seriously by any person who understands that hon. gentleman. So far as I am concerned, all I have to say is that I leave myself in the hands of the citizens of Winnipeg who were present on that occasion ; and if the applause I received on taking my seat after the few remarks I made was any indication of the feeling of those present, it seemed to me that they were well satisfied with what I had said. One would think, from the manner in which the hon. gentleman has spread himself to-night, that this was the first occasion on which this matter was brought before the House, and that he and he alone had ever advocated these improvements before the Government.

Mr. MARTIN. On the contrary, I expressly said I was not.

Mr. DALY. Instead of that, I want the hon. gentleman to understand that his predecessor, Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, and his predecessor, and other Manitoba members, brought this matter up repeatedly, session after session.

Mr. MARTIN. I so stated.

Mr. DALY. They were just as much impressed with the importance and necessity of this work as the hon. gentleman : and I have only to say to the hon. gentleman and the citizens of Winnipeg that no doubt the persistent work done by Mr. Scarth, Mr. Macdonald, and other members from Manitoba supporting the Government, will eventuate very shortly in something material being done towards carrying out the long-deferred wishes of the people of Winnipeg in reference to the improvement of the navigation of Red River. As stated by the hon. Minister of Public Works, the one thing that has kept the Government from expending the money has been the large amount that the work was estimated to cost. Every deputation that went to meet the Minister of Public Works and other members of the Government in reference to it, since 1887, was met by that one statement, that, according to the engineers of the department, the work would cost from $900,000 to $1,000,000. Since that time, as stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg, the city engineer of Winnipeg, Colonel Ruttan, has made a careful survey of the river, and he estimates the total cost of the work at $500,000. That report has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Public Works, and it is announced by him that another survey will be made by the officers of his department. I hope sincerely that the matter will receive the earnest and immediate attention of the Government, because there is no doubt that the people of Winnipeg, and the people of a large portion of the country tributary to Winnipeg, are considerably handicapped by the want of through navigation on the Red River, connecting with Lake Winnipeg, with its immense fishery resources, the great growth of timber around its shores, and its many miles of coast. The improvement of St. Andrew's Rapids, and the opening up of this communication, would mean a large increase of trade to the city of Winnipeg. I trust that it will not be long before the engineers will be on the ground, and the people of Winnipeg will realize, not because an election is near, but because the representations made through their civic bodies, and by the representatives of Manitoba supporting this Government, will induce the Government to make the necessary improvements in the navigation of Red River secure.

Mr. MARTIN. In reference to the remarks I made about the interview between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and the deputation in Winnipeg, all I can say is that no matter what the spirit the Premier put forward, his suggestion that it was another Indian pow-wow, for which they had intercepted him on his way to Ottawa, the people of that deputation certainly did not take it in that spirit. There was in the city a good deal of feeling that the Premier of Canada had not treated them in a proper way. I myself was not present at the delegation, but what I say here I have heard from a great many people who were there, notably from those who belonged to the party of the Government. They were probably more offended than the Liberals, because the Liberals, perhaps, did not expect that the Government would treat them with respect in the matter : but the Conservatives did, and I can say that they were deeply offended, not only with the language of the Premier, but with the manner in which they were met by the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. DALY. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that any of them were offended at anything I said at that meeting?

Mr. MARTIN. So I am informed.

Mr. DALY. Will the hon. gentleman give me the names of his informants?

Mr. MARTIN. If the hon. gentleman will get a report of the meeting in any of the Winnipeg newspapers— -

Mr. DALY. I have got it here—the "Winnipeg Free Press" of the 13th.

Mr. MARTIN. I think I can fairly say that if the hon. gentleman will communicate with those present at the meeting, 90 per cent of them will corroborate everything I say. On making allowance of 10 per cent for yellow dog Tories, who would say they were satisfied, if the hon. Premier and Minister of Interior (Mr. Daly) had been ten times more offensive than they were? I think I can fairly say, that 90 per cent of that delegation, largely composed of Conservatives, would endorse everything I have said to-day with regard to the treatment they received. I scarcely think, that the hon. Minister has been very fair to me, in stating, that one would gather from my remarks, that I was the only one who ever brought the subject up here, because I expressly mentioned that Mr. Hugh J. Macdonald, my predecessor, and the gentleman who preceded him, had time and time again brought this matter before the attention of Parliament and the Government. Not a word escaped from me in condemnation of any of my predecessors, who are supporters of the Government, because I believe they did all they could to forward this matter. But what I draw attention to is, that it is only now, after my poor efforts have been exerted in that direction—but, possibly, not on account of them, but rather on account of the fact, that the Government, in the meantime, had lost Winnipeg by their gross neglect in this and many other matters, and also on account of the fact, that an election is imminent—we have for the first time a declaration from the Government, that they intend to do something substantial in this matter. My hon. friend has put forward the suggestion, that Mr. Ruttan's report has brought about this conversion: but Mr. Ruttan's report was before the Government about five years ago, and, if it was sufficient to convince the Government, why did not the Government undertake the work, when that report was submitted to them and when they had one of their own supporters, the then member for Winnipeg, and other strong friends of their own, urging on them the necessity of going on with this work just as strongly as I have ever done?

Motion agreed to.

YALE AND CARIBOO ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Copy of the list of electors for the constituencies of Yale and Cariboo.

He said: Hon. gentlemen opposite are aware that in British Columbia there has been, during the last year or two, a great revival in mineral excitement and mineral discoveries, and that that has occurred perhaps more than in any other part of the province, in the Kootenay district, a portion of the constituency of my hon. friend from Yale. The House knows, that for the next election the constituency of Cariboo has been united with Yale, and that hereafter we are to have a single constituency of Yale and Cariboo. I am not very sure of the distances, but I think in that new constituency it must be about 200 miles from east to west, and three or four hundred miles from north to south. It is most natural, that the making of the voters' lists under the Dominion Franchise Act for a constituency of such magnificent distances, must be a matter of very considerable difficulty; and I think I can fairly say, that the voters' list which was made at the last revision for that constituency is a most unsatisfactory one. I believe that, in some places, the notices did not reach the people, and I know, from information I have received, that there is a large number of persons scattered all through that constituency who are fully entitled to vote, but whose names are not on the list. That is one of the things which must naturally happen under the operation of the very unfair franchise law we now have. But what I rise particularly to point out is, that on account of this mineral excitement, there is one portion of the constituency, namely the Kootenay district, which has almost entirely grown up since the revision of the lists. Towns that existed in 1891, when the lists were revised, have been very largely increased by people coming into them from other parts of British Columbia and Canada generally. In one instance, there is a new town, called Rossland, whose population at present exceeds 3,000 people, very few of whose names are on the lists, and which has no polling place at all. The polling place for Rossland is at Waneta. Now, I am told, that from Rossland to Trail, which is upon the water, is 8 miles, and that from Trail to Waneta is 12 or 14 miles water or by trail. What do you think of a law under the operation of which, when an election comes round, a town of 3,000 people has no polling place, and its people have to go 20 miles to vote? But that is not the worst. Not only are the people in Rossland obliged to go this distance to vote, but the great majority of them are not on the voters' lists at all, and cannot vote at all, unless they are able to go back to the old constituencies where they lived till 1894. Of course, I cannot say that the Government are to blame exactly in this respect. They could not have foreseen the growing up of a town of that size. I think that, in fairness, this Parliament should pass a law allowing new voters' lists to be made for a place like Rossland, in order that the people there should have a fair chance of recording their votes, because of the very special circumstances of the case. Here is a town that was not heard of, that practically was not in existence when the revising officer made his last list, and which now has a population of about 3,000, and which next summer, if the anticipations of my hon. friend's constituents are at all carried out, will have a much greater population even than now. Would it not be eminently fair that in a case of that kind the House should pass a short statute, under which the judge might hold a special meeting at Rossland and other towns that have grown so rapidly by reason of the mining excitement arising out of the discovery of gold and the development of silver mining. Some means ought to be provided by which these people would have an opportunity to vote. I do not put this forward for party reasons. I have no means of knowing whether the people of Rossland are favourable or unfavourable to the Government of the day. But I say, as a matter of fairness and as a matter of recognition of the great importance that the mineral districts of Kootenay is likely to be not only to British Columbia, but to the people of Canada at large, it would be an eminently fitting thing for Parliament to draw special attention to the great increase in population by doing something of this kind. It would be fair to the people there, and it would be advantageous to Canada at large, as I say, to draw attention in this very marked manner to the fact that though the voters' list was made in 1894, and is accepted for the rest of Canada as being a fairly recent list, the enormous increase in the population in this district had made it necessary to have a special list in order that the people there should have a chance of depositing their ballots in the coming elections.

Mr. MARA. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is quite right when he speaks of the district of Yale-Cariboo as a large one. But he has very much narrowed the bounds of the district. It extends from the summit of the Rocky Mountains to Harrison River or Agassiz, a distance of between 400 and 500 miles along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and from the settlements on the southern part of Kootenay Lake to Barkerville, a distance, by the ordinary lines of travel, of nearly 800 miles. There are some sixty odd polling divisions in the district, with a voters' list of 7,743. Mr. Justice Walkem, who was the revising officer, took great pains to get every possible name placed on the list. Being a judge of the supreme court, and having to travel on circuit, he was enabled, during the time the list was being revised, to visit nearly every polling division in the county. Therefore, he had excellent opportunities of placing every name that was given to him. That he did his work well and faithfully every resident of the district will cheerfully testify to. The hon. member for Winnipeg, I think, is wrong in one contention, and that is that the polling-place cannot be held at Rossland, the town of which he speaks, and which has grown up in eighteen months from a little hamlet of about twenty people to a busy town of about 3,000. The name Waneta is given to the polling district, and it is quite possible for the returning officer to have the poll held at any place within the district, and it will probably be held at Rossland.

Mr. MARTIN. But that will be unfair to the people of Waneta, will it not? There are not so many of them, of course.

Mr. MARA. There are only three voters living at Waneta, who are on the voters' list. Waneta is the name given to the whole district, including the town of Waneta, and in this district are the town of Trail and the town of Rossland. The difficulty the hon. gentleman refers to can largely be overcome if the Government will bring in a short Bill enabling any voter who is registered within the district to vote at the polling-place where he happens to be when the election is held. I have already called the attention of the Government to that fact, and they have the matter under consideration, and I hope they will see their way clear to make an exception of the case of the town of Rossland.

Mr. MARTIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman if I understand rightly that he proposes that a person who has now the right to vote in some other constituency should have the right to vote at Rossland, or does he simply confine it to those having the right to vote in Yale and Kootenay districts.

Mr. MARA. I would confine it to Yale, Cariboo and Kootenay. The population of Rossland is made up chiefly of Americans—I suppose that two-thirds would be a low estimate of the proportion of American citizens in the population. The others, who are British subjects and who would be entitled to vote by length of residence in the province are registered voters in other parts of Yale and Kootenay or Cariboo. So that if the Government will do what I have suggested there will be no serious grievance and the number of voters who will be disfranchised will be very trifling. That Mr. Justice Walkem did his work well, that a great many names of voters were placed upon the list, is evidenced by the fact that the provincial voters' list, made up only twelve months before for the same district, contained 3,645 names, while the Dominion list contains 7,743 names. That is pretty good evidence that the revising officer did his work well, and that very few names were left off. I shall be most happy to receive the assistance of the hon. member for Winnipeg and other members on the other side of the House in inducing the Government to bring down a short Bill, which I hope they will do, to remedy the grievance the hon. gentleman has spoken of.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I am very glad I have had the opportunity of listening to the observations that have fallen from the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) with regard to the increase in the population in British Columbia. We know that for some years past we have been led to believe in this House that population, rather than coming into Canada, was actually going out of it. Such has been the text of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It must be a source of gratification to hon. members on this side of the House to find that members of the Opposition are beginning to recognize the fact that a large population is rapidly coming into the Dominion of Canada. We know that Rossland now has a population of some 3,000 inhabitants, whereas a few years ago it contained only a few dozen people. If this is not in itself and evidence of remarkable development, I do not know what can be. Only a few days ago one of the leading members of the House of Commons in England visited the section of country, and expressed to me great astonishment in observing the remarkable growth of that section of the country, and the extent and importance of the industries that were being developed, and the outlook generally for the Pacific coast. I am pleased indeed and thankful to the hon. member for Winnipeg that he has undertaken to place this question before the House and country. He is impressed, no doubt, with the necessity in view of the coming elections, that these individuals should have their names placed on the list, because no doubt they will become voters for the Conservative party which has done so much for the development of the Pacific slope.

Mr. DALY. I was going to say that as it was his duty, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) had already brought to the attention of the Government the facts that were disclosed by the hon. member for Winnipeg; and at this present time the matter is engaging the attention of the Department of Justice in order that legislation may be prepared and introduced this session to meet the exceptional case that is now presented by the development that has taken place in this particular part in British Columbia. I have no doubt that in the course of a few days the Minister of Justice will be in a position to say whether that legislation can be drawn in such a way as to meet the requirements of the case, and to relieve the people of that district from the difficulties under which they labour.

Mr. MARTIN. I scarcely see how my hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant) is able to attribute to the National Policy the discovery of gold in the Rossland district. However, I am very glad that gold has been discovered there in such large and paying quantities, and if the financial policy of the Government can be credited with it in any way, I shall certainly have a little respect for that policy; but I must say that up to date, I have had very little respect for it. I am glad to see that the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo has had this matter in hand, and as suggested by him, I should be glad to give him any assistance I can with regard to the matter. It seems to me that if Parliament is to legislate upon the question at all, they might as well make their legislation as effective as possible. I think it would be a mistake if an Act is to be passed making a special arrangement for this constituency under the very special circumstances, that votes should be given only to those persons in Rossland and neighbourhood who were formerly residents of Yale and Cariboo; because while it is true no doubt that a very considerable number of the new inhabitants there are Americans, and would not be entitled to vote, I think there is, perhaps, a larger proportion, so I have been informed, of persons from Victoria and Vancouver and other parts of British Columbia who would lose their votes. There are objections to giving men a right to vote in polling divisions where their names do not occur, because it affords opportunities for personation, which have been found in the past to be rather unfortunate. I am informed that the Waneta list that covers this district containing this town of 3,000 inhabitants, has only 67 names upon it. That fact alone shows that there is a strong case for the Government to take action. I am also informed that applications came in to Judge Walkem from that district for perhaps 150 or 200 names, and they were too late for the judge to put them on the list, coming in after the date which he had fixed for receiving applications, and of course he was not able, under the statute, to receive them, and had to throw them out.

Mr. MARA. They were sent in not only after the date that applications should have been sent in, but after the list had been revised and sent to Ottawa.

Mr. MARTIN. I am finding no fault at all with the revising officer. I am merely pointing out the facts, probably it might be excusable on the ground that it was difficult to get the notice abroad in so large a constituency.

Mr. MARA. That is not the reason. They had the idea that the same rule prevailed as in provincial elections, and that they could send names in at any time. They thought any time previous to the elections their names could be placed on the list, and that is why they sent in the list.

Mr. MARTIN. I am finding no fault at all with the revising officer. I am pointing this out to show that something like 150 or 200 persons did really make application from that district to get their names on the list, but on account of a misapprehension on their part, were not able to do so. I believe, from all the information that I have been able to obtain, there will be a very large number unable to vote, not only in Rossland, but also in other districts whose population has been largely increased by the development of silver mines. If some legislation can be introduced which will give these people a vote—it matters nothing to me, as suggested by the hon. member for Ottawa, whether they will vote for the Government or against the Government, we have got to take our chances—at any rate it is quite clear they are entitled to vote, and it is quite clear that the circumstances are very special indeed, and are worthy the consideration of this House and Government.

Motion agreed to.

LITTLE METIS BAY HARBOUR OF REFUGE.

Order for:

Copies of all correspondence, papers, documents, telegrams, &c., from steamship and shipowners and agents, marine underwriters, manufacturers, merchants and others, of the city of Montreal and elsewhere, in the hands of the Government, in reference to a harbour of refuge in Little Metis Bay.—(Mr. McShane.)

Mr. SCRIVER. Stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. Dropped.

Mr. SCRIVER. I hope this motion will be allowed to stand, and the following motion in the name of the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane).

Mr. FOSTER. There should be some good reason given for allowing a motion to stand at this late period of the session. A month ago we made an agreement across the floor of the House that if these motions were not pressed when they were called, they were to be dropped. I think we ought to insist upon that, unless there is some very good reasons to the contrary. The fact that a member is not present when his notice of motion is called, I do not think should be taken as a sufficient reason, because we are supposed to be here when the motions are called.

Mr. MARTIN. This motion has not been reached since that agreement was made. But on the contrary, the motion of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has been reached and called three or four times since that agreement was made, and every time it has been allowed to stand for no other reason except to suit the hon. gentleman's convenience——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MARTIN. So far as we know.

Mr. SCRIVER. I think it would be unfortunate if the rule should be enforced just at this time. I suppose the hon. gentleman from Montreal Centre has been unavoidably detained from being here to-day. I had agreed to support the motion myself, but I do not like to take the responsibility of moving it in the absence of the hon. member in whose name it stands.

Mr. FOSTER. We never can get through the Order paper if we always allow the motions to stand. It has been an invariable rule, when we have arrived at a certain period in the session, that motions should be dropped unless members were ready to proceed with them. This motion can be put on again, if the hon. gentleman wishes. In reference to the motion of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill), the last time it was called the leader of the Opposition agreed that it should stand. To-day it was allowed to stand for the reason that the Secretary of State wished to speak upon it, but was not able to do so this afternoon. That is a very important motion.

Mr. SCRIVER. I hope the leader of the House will not insist upon this motion being dropped to-day. Let it stand for this time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the hon. gentleman can resist that appeal.

Mr. FOSTER. Stand.

BRITISH COLUMBIA SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council passed with regard to the British Columbia Southern Railway Company and the subsidy to the same; also, of all correspondence with said company or with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with regard to said railway company.

He said: This is a matter affecting British Columbia, and especially the constituency of Yale. There has been for a long time a very strong desire on the part of the people of British Columbia, and also on the part of the western section of the North-west Territories, the southern part of Alberta, that there should be a railway constructed from Lethbridge or Dunmore, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, through the Crow's Nest Pass, into the Kootenay district. It is suggested by those who know this country best, that the Crow's Nest Pass is a much better pass by which to cross the mountains than the Kicking Horse Pass, which was selected by the Canadian Pacific Railway. At all events, the matter has been agitated before this Parliament on more than one occasion, and up to date the Canadian Pacific Railway has been practically given a monopoly of that pass, on the assurance that they would, as soon as they could, make financial arrangements, construct a line from Lethbridge through the Crow's Nest Pass into the Kootenay mining district. That district consists of two portions—eastern and western—both of which are very rich in minerals. However, the Canadian Pacific Railway, up to date, has done nothing. Probably, there is not room in some portions of the pass for more than one railway, and, therefore, a charter in that particular part of Canada becomes practically a monopoly, because it gives the pass to one company and prevents two charters being given for lines through that pass. The great development of mining which has occurred during the past year or two years in the Kootenay district, has brought this matter especially to the attention of that portion of British Columbia, for this reason: It is most desirable that the ore in which this district is so rich should be smelted upon the spot, and for that purpose it is necessary to get coal, and it is stated, that Crow's Nest Pass through the Rockies is very rich indeed in coal. In proof of that statement, let me read from an official pamphlet issued by the Immigration Department, with the approval of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated January, 1896, in which there is the following:—

> Near Crow's Nest Pass coal beds of immense thickness (one seam thirty feet) extend a distance of about thirty miles, of superior quality, and producing coke (fifteen cannel coal seams). At the Kootenay mines coke now costs $14 per ton, but when the projected British Columbia Southern Railway is built it is expected that better coke from the Crow's Nest collieries can be supplied in the Kootenay mining district at about one-half of the present prices. The smelters at work now in the Kootenay are greatly hampered on account of the high price of coke—one at Pilot Bay is using thirty tons per day. From this smelter, which only commenced its operations 9th March, 1895, the bullion shipped to the United States up to 30th June this year amounted to 1,301 tons.

In view of that fact, it seems to me, that it is about time this Government should let it be known that the franchise for building a railway through Crow's Nest Pass is open to public competition, that is to say, that the determination expressed some years ago, that the Government were prepared to give the franchise as a matter of preference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, should be terminated. I am not particularly finding fault with the Canadian Pacific Railway on this matter. Probably, it is not so much their fault that the railway has not been built, as the dull times; it is quite probable that the company have been unable to negotiate the necessary loans to build this road, but I do not think it is of any special importance to Canada, or to that district which is more particularly interested, that the Canadian Pacific Railway should build the line. I understand, that a great deal of capital has been invested in the Kootenay district, that some of the most wealthy men in the United States have taken an interest in it; in fact, I am sorry to learn, that the development of the district has been more by means of American capital than by Canadian or old country capital. This probably arises from the fact, that the Americans understand that country better than other people, and also that there are a large number of men in the United States who understand mining and are prepared to risk their money in it, when they see they have a country that is worth developing. At all events, it is a fact, and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) will support me, that, at all events, a very large proportion of the development of the Kootenay mines has been carried out at the instance and on behalf of American capitalists. It will be evident, from the facts, as stated, and which are no doubt accurate, that it would be an immense advantage to smelting in the district if the American capitalists took hold of the road and built it, and they would probably do so were it not for the position in which the British Columbia Southern Railway has been placed since its charter was practically held up by the announcement from the Government, that they would hold the Crow's Nest Pass for a reasonable time for the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am not altogether finding fault with that determination on the part of the Government, but I desire to call their attention, and the attention of the House, to the fact, that the time has come when that reservation for the Canadian Pacific Railway should be withdrawn. The Government have bonused a portion of the line; the bonus is not given to any company particularly, but it is for a line from one point to another, extending over thirty or forty miles. I do not know if the Government are going to bonus railways again, but there is no more legitimate place to give a reasonable bonus than to a railway through Crow's Nest Pass into the Kootenay district, for the purpose of showing an interest on the part of the Government in the mining development, which is only commencing in that country, which is likely to spread very much indeed, and which is very much hampered indeed by the fact of very inadequate railway accommodation, and for the purpose of reducing the cost of coke, which is at present very great. If the cost of coke can be reduced from $14 to $7 per ton, the advantage of having ores smelted in our country, instead of sending them over to the United States, is one which the Government can very fairly take into considertion. I fancy the rest of Canada would be very glad to support a bonus to a railway for such a laudable purpose as to promote the development of the tremendous mineral resources which are believed—and believed with good foundation—to exist both in East and West Kootenay.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was speaking on a previous motion, he saw fit to twit the Government with suddenly taking an interest in the St. Andrew's Rapids near Winnipeg, and the insinuation that it was on account of the approaching elections. I would like to know what his motive is for now taking such an interest in British Columbia. He (Mr. Martin) has had several motions on the papear dealing with matters from the north of British Columbia to the south, and I perhaps might be allowed to say that possibly the proximity of the elections has something to do with that also. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) has stated very truthfully that the British Columbia Southern Railway is a road that in the interest of the country should be built and should be subsidized. The coal fields in that neighbourhood, I firmly believe, are the most valuable on the continent of America. This may be considered pretty tall talk, but it is borne out by the reports of all the engineers who have been on the ground and examined these coal beds. There are, as the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has stated, magnificent seams of semi-anthracite as well as of bituminous and cannel coal. Thirty feet, twenty feet, and six feet, and so on, lying layer upon layer, or rather in mining phraseology, seam upon seam, to the extent of 148 feet of coal. This coal is known to extend at least over 250,000 acres of land. Now, the British Columbia Southern Railway Company have a charter from the British Columbia government, from the Crows' Nest Pass to the Kootenay Lakes. That Company has, for years past, been doing their utmost to obtain capital to build that road and develop these mines. They have spent up to the present time, so I am informed, over $100,000 in surveys, and in prospecting these mines. They have had the very best brokers and financial men engaged in London and elsewhere to try and float the bonds of this company, but, owing to the great financial stress which has prevailed during the last few years, it has been found impossible for them to obtain the necessary funds to carry out this great work. The British Columbia Government, during the present session of the legislature, now sitting, has seen fit to give the company a further extension of two years to begin work, knowing full well that the company were using their utmost endeavours to get the road built. The Dominion Government has granted a subsidy for thirty-eight miles of that road, and, to the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) who said that the Government were holding that Pass so that no other road could get in there, I may say that the Minister of Railways sent an engineer to examine that Pass. There was some trouble between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the British Columbia road, but the engineer found that there was plenty of room for four railroads, in the very narrowest place in that pass. Therefore, it is not exactly right to say that the British Columbia Railway Company, or the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is keeping out other roads. There is plenty of room for three or four railroads there. Now, with regard to American capital. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I know for a fact that there has been an effort to get American capital, and that these bonds have been offered to Americans. American engineers have been in to survey the ground, and to examine the coal fields, but I am sorry to say that up to the present time, neither English capital nor American capital has been found ready to invest in that road. There is no doubt about the value of the road when it is built ; there is no doubt about the value of the coal fields when they are developed ; and above and beyond all, there is no doubt about the immense benefit the completion of that road would be to the Kootenay country. As the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has said, at the present time, the coke which is needed for the smelters—and there will be a largely increased demand soon—costs $14 per ton. If that road were built, with the immense development of coal resources and the facilities for obtaining that coal, coke could be obtained immensely cheaper. I may tell the House that this road can be run right alongside these large seams, and that the coal can be dumped out of the seam into the cars. There is no drainage needed, and little or no expense for ventilation, as these coal seams are on the hillside and run right through the mountain. I believe that the coal could be carried from the Crows' Nest Pass, or within a few miles of it, right to the heart of the gold and silver mining district of Kootenay, and the coke supplied there for $6 per ton. Hon. gentlemen can see what a tremendous advantage that would be to the smelters, and to the mining community at large. I was very glad, indeed, to hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) say that he considers that this railroad is one of the railroads in Canada that ought to be subsidized. I may say that the British Columbia members have for the last four or five years impressed upon the Government the necessity of subsidizing that road, and I am very glad to be able to say, also, that the session before last, we got a subsidy for thirty-eight miles. I am sorry, however, that the Government saw fit at that time to impose a certain condition with regard to that subsidy. That was, that if the British Columbia Southern Railway built that line, that for five years afterwards the Canadian Pacific Railway should have the chance of taking the road over at actual cost. That I did not think right, and I do not think it is right yet, because it is very hard, indeed, to get capitalists to invest money in a project when there is any condition of that sort imposed. However, if we cannot do any better than that, I am sure the people of British Columbia would be delighted to see that road built, whether it was built by the Canadian Pacific Railway or by any other company. What is wanted, is to have this road built and to get these immense coal deposits within access of the gold and silver mining districts, and thus to develop the immense mineral wealth of British Columbia. As I have said, it is amusing to me to see the tremendous interest that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has taken in British Columbia matters lately. I may tell him that there are six members from British Columbia, every one of whom is perfectly capable of taking his own part, and of promoting the interests of his district and of his province. Not only that, Sir, but I think I can prove beyond all doubt by documentary evidence, that these hon. gentlemen have looked after the interests of their province in the past. and are perfectly willing and able to do so in the future.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to inquire of the hon. gentleman who are the proprietors of these same coal fields? Do they belong to the government of British Columbia or the Government of Canada, or to private indviduals ?

Mr. PRIOR. There are about 11,000 acres of coal lands in that district, the fee simple of which is owned by a company in Victoria. The rest belongs at present to the British Columbia government. The British Columbia Southern Railway Company got a charter from the government and a large land grant, which includes all these coal lands if they build the road.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am sure the remarks which have dropped from the hon. gentleman with regard to the prospects of that country have been quite interesting to the House. But I was disappointed at the introductory portion of his address. It is surely not to be understood that the members of this House are only to look after matters concerning their own constituency or their own province. Are we to be rebuked for taking an interest in other portions of this Dominion ? Are the members of this House to be told that. when they advocate the interests of another province than their own, they are interfering with the duties of the members from that province ?

Mr. PRIOR. Not at all.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was surprised at the hon. gentleman's introductory remarks. but I was still more surprised at his closing remarks. I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg deserves a good deal of credit for the interest he has taken in this matter. But the hon. Minister says that there are six men in this House representing British Columbia, and that they are able to take care of the interests of that province themselves. That is a very peculiar position for a Minister of the Crown or any other member of this House to take. We are here to advocate the interests of the entire Dominion. Every member of this House, if he discharges his duties properly, will take an interest in every province, and it is not becoming in a Minister of the Crown to tell an hon. gentleman who gets up to discharge what he believes to be his duty, that he is intermeddling in a matter that concerns only the six members who come from that province.

Mr. BARNARD. I think the hon. member for North Wellington quite misunderstands the remarks of the hon. Minister. The hon. Minister did not rebuke the hon. member for Winnipeg for taking an interest in British Columbia matters. He merely remarked that it was strange that immediately before a general election all this interest should be displayed. I may inform the hon. gentleman that during the last six or seven years that I have sat in this House, few members of the Opposition have shown any interest in British Columbia ; and it is strange that now, immediately before a general election, so much interest should be shown by these hon. gentlemen in that province. We are all glad, however, to find them taking so much interest even now in the development of the resources of British Columbia. At the same time, I do not think the Minister is entitled to receive the strictures of the hon. member for North Wellington.

Mr. PRIOR. I do not know any hon. gentleman who can get up a show of indignation in a short time better than the hon. member for North Wellington.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is out of order in speaking a second time on the question before the House.

Mr. MARA. Mr. Speaker, I was very much pleased at the hon. member for Winnipeg evincing so much interest in this railway ; but I was astonished to find the hon. member for North Wellington also taking an interest in it. When the question of granting a subsidy to this railway was before the House, the hon. member for Winnipeg was silent ; but there was not a more bitter opponent of that subsidy than the hon. member for North Wellington, unless it was the hon. member for South Oxford. Now, in listening this evening to the expressions of liberality and charity from those two hon. gentlemen, I could not but feel that it would be a grand thing for British Columbia if the same feeling of charity and liberality permeated the whole of the Opposition. In view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg, it might not be out of place for me to read a few of the remarks made by the hon. member for South Oxford when the question of granting a subsidy to this railway was before the House. That hon. gentleman stated :

> But we do not own a scrap of this coal. Let the people who own it develop it. Why should > we be called upon to tax the ratepayers of Canada $108,000 for the development of some valuable coal mine, whether it belongs to the British Columbia government or to some private individuals ? What justification is there for helping on our overburdened people all these expenditures for enterprises of the merits of which we know nothing at all, and which, if they be one-quarter as valuable or one-tenth as valuable as they have been represented by the hon. gentleman, ought to be able to pay their own way. I object to the whole system for the matter of that, but particularly it seems to me that going into the wilderness in this fashion, on the vague statement that there are valuable coal mines, in which, even though they are as valuable as they are represented, the people of Canada have no interest, is something worse than throwing away our money.

Then, in answer to some remarks made by myself, the hon. member added :

> I am very glad to hear that very valuable coal deposits have been discovered. But the more valuable they are, in all conscience, the less need there should be for taxing our people at large. The practical result of all this is that these gentlemen whom the hon. gentleman has just named, these capitalists, as I believe some of them are, not content with having got, and probably got very cheaply, an extremely valuable deposit, must needs come to the Parliament of Canada and demand that the ratepayers be obliged to contribute $108,000 for the purpose of making their individual fortunes.

Then, again :

> We do not grudge them what is due to enterprise and energy, but what I do object to is taking public money for the purpose of assisting persons who are absolutely able, if they control a mine one-tenth part as valuable as we are given to understand this is, to raise all the money that is required for the purpose of exploiting it. That is what I complain of, and to that no answer has been made. The more valuable these things are, the more solid and substantial value there is in them, the less reason and the less justice is there in coming to us for assistance to develop them.

And a good deal more in the same strain. Now, although thankful for the assistance of the hon. member for Winnipeg, what I do object to is the inference to be drawn from his remarks, that either the Government or any corporation have blocked the way, and have prevented the British Columbia Southern Railway Company from building that line. I know nothing of the directors or shareholders of the company, except for communications I have had with the solicitor of the company. They have not been blocked by the Government or by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or any other railway company. In proof of that, let me read the remarks of the Hon. Colonel Baker, who is president of the company, and a member of the provincial government, when a private Bill was before the provincial House a short time ago for a renewal of their charter :

> Hon. Col. Baker said that as he had for many years been actively connected with this enterprise he might offer the explanation asked for. On two or three occasions the negotiations for its construction had been almost completed, though it had in each case been found impossible finally to complete them, owing largely to the difficulties in which railway enterprises everywhere had for the time being become involved. At the present time negotiations are again in progress, with every prospect that the work may be commenced this year, but only on the condition that the time for the completion of the first section of some 70 miles shall be extended beyond December next, the time now stipulated. No capitalist would put money into such a scheme without this extension, and therefore this Bill had been introduced.

It is quite evident, from these remarks, that the hands of the British Columbia Southern Railway Company have not been tied or that the company has not been blocked, either by the Government or by the Canadian Pacific Railway. A short time ago, the vice-president of the company sent, through me, an application to the Government for further assistance : and, when the time comes, I hope we will be able to rely on the practical assistance of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and that their good wishes will stand the test. Here is a copy of the application which was passed through my hands :

> In the year 1894 the Parliament of Canada provided a subsidy of $3,200 per mile for a railway between Coal Creek and the junction of the Kootenay River with Elk River in the East Kootenay district of British Columbia, a distance of 34 miles, and subsequently the British Columbia Railway Company applied to you for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of this statutory enactment.
> Very extensive metalliferous mining operations are now being carried on in the West Kootenay district where there are also large smelters in operation and in course of construction. The supply of fuel for these smelters is at present costly and for the most part from the United States. It has been frequently represented to the directors of this company by the owners of the smelters that the introduction of the coal from the Crow's Nest district would greatly cheapen their cost of production and at the same time aid in the development of the East Kootenay district which to all appearances is quite as rich in mineral wealth as the district in the west.
> Enclosed we hand you an application for an additional subsidy for the above railway over its second section, namely, from the Kootenay River to Kootenay Lake, a distance of about 100 miles.

Now, if the hon. gentleman will only assist the British Columbia members in pressing this application upon the Government and also induce the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to endorse the application, and back it up with their support, we shall indeed feel deeply grateful to them.

Mr. MARTIN. My hon. friend the Controller of Inland Revenue is quite surprised to find that I take some little interest in the province of British Columbia; and, in apology for doing so, I may say, that I visited that province in a political capacity for the first time, just prior to the meeting of this House, and it was that visit which induced me to take some little interest in the affairs of that province. I found that, while the people there knew and admitted that they have six very excellent gentlemen representing them in this House, but little was heard in this House of the grievances and wants of that province. I can say, at any rate, that during two sessions I have hardly heard a British Columbia question discussed in it. The question which has been referred to in this debate was, I believe, discussed in 1894, but the Government policy of bringing down railway subsidies at the very end of the session has always resulted in a very inadequate discussion of these matters; and the session of 1894 having lasted very long, I myself went away before the question of railway subsidies came before us, so that I had not the pleasure of hearing this question discussed. The only other question that I remember hearing discussed was the question of representation in the Cabinet for British Columbia, and I must say, that I listened to a very interesting and effective speech from the Controller of Inland Revenue on that subject. The hon. gentleman has the idea that he is in the Cabinet, but there are some grave doubts about it. He is not, at any rate, a first-class member of the Cabinet. I do not know whether he is a second or a third-class member, but there is a very decided difference between him and the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Just what the difference is, it is hard to define, but I might mention an incidental little difference of which the hon. gentleman is probably aware—a difference of $2,000 a year—but, of course, he does not care about that. I might also mention, incidentally, that the statutes of this Parliament provide that Controllers of Inland Revenue and Customs and Solicitors General are not members of the Cabinet.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is wandering from the question.

Mr. MARTIN. While my hon. friend seems to resent the idea that I should interest myself in British Columbia matters, and attributes my interest to the approaching elections, rather than to any real desire to benefit the province, I am glad, at any rate, of this, that the matters which I have brought up are really of importance to the province, and that the members representing it have not been able to say, that I am in any way opposed to its interest in those matters. It is very fortunate that this particular matter should have been discussed here to-night. I myself have received some information upon it, and I think it will really be of advantage to the future railway development of the Kootenay district, that the question was discussed here this evening. There is one respect in which my methods are different from those of the hon. gentlemen. Their method of representing their province is something on the principle of the still hunt. They are supporters of the Government, and believe that quietly, by their influence upon the Government, they can get for their province more than it could obtain by injudiciously bringing on a discussion. I take issue with them, and it is for that reason I introduced to-night this railway question of railway development. I believe that no harm can result from that. And I believe that if in bringing these questions up here for discussion the Government comes in incidentally for some criticism, and that criticism is well founded, the influence of hon. members supporting the Government is by no means hurt by such discussion. In fact, I believe that it is improved, and that when members find, as these gentlemen have found for the past five years or ten years, the Government has not given fair consideration to the wants of their province, it would have been much better if, years ago, these questions had been brought up in the House and fairly threshed out, allowing members like myself and others from the more eastern parts of the country opportunities of knowing what their province wants and judging whether the Government gives it or not.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—VOTE ON THE REMEDIAL ACT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the House adjourns, I wish to inquire of the Minister of Finance if any definite idea can be given as to when the debate on the Remedial Bill now before the House will close?

Mr. FOSTER. In the middle of the week before last I had some talk with the leader of the Opposition at which time we thought it might be possible to get a vote about the middle of the week following, that is last week. Last week, however, we came to the conclusion in talking it over that that would be pretty difficult to do. Since then the hon. gentleman has been kept out of the House by illness which we all deplore. We on this side of the House being very anxious to press the matter to a conclusion for various reasons, were of the mind that we should sit very late on Thursday night and Friday night so as to get a vote on Friday night late or Saturday morning. Talking the matter over with the whip of the Opposition side, that hon. gentleman was of the opinion that it would be rather difficult to bring about a vote on account of the number of gentlemen who wished to speak. For our part on this side, we were willing to cut our speeches—I said I for one was willing to leave out my speech —in order to get a vote. However, a proposition was made and the whip on this side went down to the hon. leader of the Opposition for confirmation of the proposition and came back with the arrangement made so far as it could be made between us, binding this side of the House most certainly, and binding, as I understand the other side of the House, and with the consent of my hon. friend who leads the third party, that we shall have a vote at the sitting commencing to-morrow afternoon. That is the understanding on this side and the members on this side, as I believe on the other, have been notified, and we propose to commence sitting to-morrow afternoon and to sit until a vote is taken.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the arrangement has been made—and I accept the hon. gentleman's word for it—I suppose there is no help for it. But it strikes me that it will be very inconvenient to members on both sides. A very large number of members desire to speak, and, as the hon. gentleman knows, there will probably be two or three very long speeches delivered to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. We will have to make up our minds to hear them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But there is reason in all things. Wednesdays and Thursdays are not Government days, and there would be no inconvenience to the hon. gentleman, though there might be to individual members if the vote was taken on Wednesday or Thursday, and it would be very much more convenient to members of the House generally. Of course, if the arrangement is made and the Government choose to sit all to-morrow evening, I suppose there is nothing more to say. But I do not see what in the world the Government have to gain by it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would remind the hon. Minister that there is some very important business to come before the Railway Committee on Wednesday.

Mr. FOSTER. That meets to-morrow.

Mr. McMULLEN. We also wanted to get a meeting of the Public Accounts Committee. We have not had a meeting for some time.

Mr. FOSTER. We are of opinion that this matter is of more importance than any meeting of the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the people throughout the country appreciate the discussions that take place in the Public Accounts Committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. Minister will consider the matter and let us know definitely to-morrow at three o'clock.

Mr. FOSTER. I will do so. But there was so hard and fast an arrangement——

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the arrangement is hard and fast, I have nothing more to say, except that it will cause a great deal of inconvenience.

Mr. FOSTER. It will, but we are prepared to face that.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 17th March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I think it would not be unadvisable to call the attention of the hon. gentleman, and of the House, to the question with regard to the duration of this debate. There is an impression that the debate is to be closed at this sitting; but I venture to suggest that perhaps it would be unwise to bind ourselves to have a vote this sitting. I think, perhaps, we had better leave the question over until to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to my hon. friend, who was not here last night, I may say that in pursuance of an arrangement made before that time, I stated that the Government were disposed to try and get to a vote during to-day's sitting, some time Afterwards, however, after some further conference with my hon. friend, and very largely because of a somewhat long, if not serious indisposition, of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who I understand has a very important speech to make, and which the House no doubt will very much like to hear, I think that we will probably get along as well if we have an understanding now that we will sit to-day as long as possible, and that to-morrow's sitting shall see the vote upon both the amendment and the second reading. That, I believe, we can compass, and with that understanding I shall be glad to accede to the hon. gentleman's proposition.

Mr. LAURIER. I can bind this side of the House so far as this amendment is concerned, but I cannot bind this side of the House as to the second reading.

Mr. FOSTER. I must say that my understanding certainly was that both sides of the House should endeavour to have the vote, both on the amendment and the second reading, at this sitting. But with that understanding, we shall have to sit it out.

Mr. LAURIER. There is no desire on the part of this side of the House to obstruct a vote on the second reading.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for second reading of Bill (No. 58), the Remedial Act (Manitoba), and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the very important question which has now for some time been before this Parliament, I venture to express the opinion that those who follow the discussion and those who are interested in a speedy settlement of this vexed question must experience gratification in observing that, exciting though the question has been, important as it is, there is less disturbance in this country or in this Parliament over it, than has occurred in the consideration hitherto of any of the great questions that have come before the Canadian people to be dealt with. For instance, I am not afraid to admit that in regard to that great proposition for a company construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the aid of enormous legislative grants, or in regard to the Jesuits' Estate Act, there was intense and dangerous excitement confined to no province in Canada. Those questions perturbed and disturbed the people of Canada generally, and in my humble judgment they were in their day far more difficult of a satisfactory and peaceful solution than the question, great as it is, important as it undoubtedly is, that is now under the consideration of this, the great council of the nation. Why was it that angry feelings and dangerous feelings on those occasions could come to the surface. I venture to say that the great reason was, as distinguished from the case with which we have now to deal, that no Government, no party, no men in the dispute could call to aid or could rally behind the judgment of the Queen's Privy Council. I believe that in the solution of this question the Government of the day enjoys a great and important advantage, because in the minds of the people, whether Catholics or Protestants, in regard to this question, which might otherwise, as I can quite conceive, and readily admit, evoke the most dangerous passions that could be aroused, they have called to their aid, and I believe they are warranted in calling to their aid, the general principle of the law, the law of the land, the law of the Empire, the judgment of the Queen's Privy Council. For that reason, I consider there has been, and I congratulate this House and this country upon the fact, no thoroughly popular agitation against the remedial legislation, no spontaneous, fervent, earnest declaration against the proposed action of the Canadian Parliament in respect to this matter.

There have been meetings, there have been large congregations of people. They have met in Toronto, in London, chiefly in Ontario; but at this late day, at this very day when we are considering what the action shall be, I delight in remembering that these agitations whether in one place or in another, have been engineered, have been promoted and have been led by two men, signally by two men who, of all those in Canada have absolutely destroyed whatever power they might otherwise have possessed of leading any independent and impartial opinion in this country. Who are those two men? One was my late colleague, the Grand Master of the Orange Association of Canada. And what is his position as a leader against the policy of this Government? I desire to call your attention to the important fact that this gentleman, one of the professed exponents of the opinion adverse to the policy of the Government, became a member of the Government, remained a member of the Government after the solemn declaration of the leader of the Government that in dealing with this question he would be guided by the judgment of the Privy Council, whether it was for or against the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba. That gentleman became his ally and associate in the Government, and remained in it, doing all he was loyally bound to do to assist and strengthen the Government while it was committed to that policy; and, after that leader's death, he continued on, he remained a member of the present Government, under the leadership of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and when that Government, not only adopted the remedial order of March last, but out of the mouth of the Prime Minister said they would, in adopting that order, take the responsibility of the policy that order indicated, that gentleman dared to remain, was willing to remain a member of that Government down to November, 1895, doing all he could, as, under the constitution he was bound to do, to strengthen and fortify the Government committed to a policy of remedial legislation. Well, Mr Speaker, that gentleman, I believe, is presiding over a meeting to-night, or he has been presiding over and attending meetings called ostensibly for the purpose of denouncing the policy of this Government. Can we, members on one side of you, Mr. Speaker, or on the other, attach any great importance to the action or movements of a gentleman of that ilk and that style? I say he represents no honest, sincere, or outspoken opinion in the country. He can explain his position, but whatever the explanation may be, whatever his ingenuity may amount to, he can never be a representative of a sentiment in this country entitled to great consideration at the hands of Parliament. Now, who is his colleague, who is his associate, who is the other grand name who is called on as against the policy of the Government in favour of remedial legislation? The paid counsel, the paid attorney, the paid adviser of the Manitoba government, forsooth. He, and none other. He who was at the throat of the other gentleman to whom I have referred. They had their little wrestle last session, they fought each other like Turks, but to-day, forsooth, they pretend to represent a popular feeling in this country. I admit the ability of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I admit that he could do much if he had the power, and if he were not trammelled as he is trammelled, according to the traditions of this Parliament, by the extraordinary and unique position which he has occupied in connection with this question. I have never hesitated, I did not hesitate last session to dwell on this question. I propose to dwell on it again, not merely for the purpose of asking the attention of hon. gentlemen here to it, but of taking that advantage which I claim I can take at the hands of my fellow-countrymen, when I point to the fact that the excitement, whatever excitement there may be against the policy of justice adopted by this Government, has been fanned, has been aroused, and has been led by the paid advocate of the Manitoba government. It has been an ephemeral, a spasmodic, a pumped-up excitement, pumped up by arguments for every one of which there has been cash paid down in advance, cash paid over the counter. There cannot be an argument advanced by the hon. member for Simcoe which has not already been given in return for the gold of Manitoba, which he has in his pocket. Am I to be influenced by arguments of that kind; and to be, in the slightest degree disturbed in my opinion as a free and independent member of Parliament? I scout that, and I deride that, and I believe that the people of this country will take the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) at his true and his proper worth. But, if hon. gentlemen think that my position is extreme, I call to my aid in denouncing, the advocacy in this independent legislature of the policy of the Manitoba government by the member for Simcoe—I call to my aid the arguments which that hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) has already advanced in this House. He knows, that his position contravenes the traditions and the teachings of Parliament. He knows that his position is inconsistent with the position of an independent member of this House, or of any British parliament, and his own opinions are on record upon that question. I will not call your attention again, Mr. Speaker, to the rules of this House, nor to the resolutions of the English Parliament, by which no member is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest; but I will refer to the fact, that your predecessor, Mr. Kirkpatrick, decided, in 1884, that these resolutions and these opinions were the law of this Parliament. I will refer to the opinion of Sir Charles Russell, now the Lord Chief Justice, when Attorney General of England. He stated in 1895:

> The object of the rule no doubt was, that a person should not advocate the same thing in this House, for which he had received fee or reward out of it.

I call your attention, Sir, to the opinion of the present Attorney General of Great Britain, who said:

> I think no member should in his capacity as a member of this House, advocate afterwards, any case in respect to which he has received fee or reward.

I call your attention, Sir, to the opinion of a former Attorney General of England, Sir Henry James, now Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who said:

> The object of the rule no doubt was, that a person should not advocate the same cause in this House, for which he received a fee out of it.

And, coming to our own Parliament, I ask you, Sir, to recollect that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who was a member of Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, had his conduct commented on by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in the year 1880. In that year, a discussion took place concerning the boundary between Ontario and the unorganized territories. What did the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) think of the position of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) then? According to our "Hansard":

> He contended that the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was biassed, and it was an unfortunate circumstance that he (Mr. Mills) happened to be the paid agent of the Ontario government, when he first received his impression on the subject.

The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) interrupted, saying:

> That recognizing that, practically he took no part in the discussion of the question, and that it was dealt with by the First Minister and the Minister of Justice.

And then my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) answered:

> If Mr. Mills was incompetent to take any part in the case as Minister of the Interior, he supposed he must be equally incompetent to take any part in the discussion in the House of Commons.

And later on, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy), representing, if you please, a helpless minority, a minority of one, in the case of the Streams Bill; he rose, after the litigation had run its course, to deal with the subject before this House, and he apologized for speaking on the subject, and stated, to use his own language:

> That he rose to reply with some hesitation as he happened to be counsel for one of the parties, Mr. Peter McLaren.

But what was his excuse for taking part in the discussion? I submit, Sir, that his excuse on that occasion places him in a deplorable position on the present occasion, for his excuse then cannot be urged now in connection with this matter under debate. The member for North Simcoe then said:

> The question is no longer of any interest to Mr. McLaren. My connection with the suit of McLaren and Caldwell has long since ceased, or at all events, ceased so far as this is concerned, because I have no personal interest, nor any interest such as I might be expected to have if my client's interests were affected.

Sir, the statement made on that occasion is a condemnation of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) all through this story. And, Sir, why do I refer to it? Is it in order to stir up ill-will between him and me? No, Mr. Speaker. I would deplore such a spirit on the part of any hon. gentleman on the floor of this House, but I am glad to know, that he has been the arch-offender in introducing a spirit of discord, both in this House and in this country, into the important question of the education of the minority in the different provinces. I am glad to know, that it has laid upon his (Mr. McCarthy's) shoulders, more than on any other in this Parliament, or out of it, to wage the war, to make the fight, and to renew the strife on this question. I congratulate myself on the opinion—I will do it until the general elections are over, at any rate—that an agitation led by him, or led by the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace), can amount to very little, after the defeat of a similar agitation raised by men like George Brown, without fee or award, but relying simply upon the intelligence of his countrymen and upon the allegiance of his party. They were beaten. Happily for the peace of this country, they were defeated; and I do not believe it will be written in history, that a lost battle, led by champions, and by independent men of the calibre of George Brown, can be won by men such as I have referred to to-day.

Now, then, Sir, coming back to the question under debate. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to remember the long speech of the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I will remind you of what he had to say in regard to the law, as he called it, relating to this question, that was laid down by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). I never was a champion of the Secretary of State in this House, when he ceased to be a member of it. I did not think, in regard to his parliamentary record and life, that it would be any compliment to him, if I attempted to make myself his champion. I have less occasion to be his champion now. The denunciation of his law by the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) I will leave to the consideration of the House. But the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) must not blame me, if I, in turn, proceed to denounce his law, and to challenge, as I propose to, any member of his profession on either side of the House, or in the third party, to rise now or subsequently in the debate, and to say, that he agreed with the interpretation of the legal decisions which are before us, as given by the hon. member for Queen's. What did that hon. gentleman say? He said:

> The Privy Council have taken the educational code to be found in the Manitoba Act, and they have on appeal determined that these alleged religious privileges and exercises and franchises, have not been interfered with directly or indirectly by the School Act of 1890.

Now, Sir, that has been absolutely determined upon by the highest tribunal of the Empire in language which cannot be misunderstood, and will any one agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies), that that is a good and sound interpretation of this question, which at times we are told, is not a question for the statesmen of this country, but a question, forsooth, for two constitutional lawyers—and we only possess two of them in this House, one on each side—a question for lawyers and members of the bar; then I will use an 'ad captandum' argument, and show the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was not long in contradicting the very bad law which he laid down. In the same speech he said, for instance:

> It is equally true and decided by the same judicial body in 1895, that the legislation of 1890 by interfering with post-union privileges granted to the minority by the legislature of Manitoba created a grievance which gave the aggrieved minority a right of appeal.

If that is not satisfactory to the member for Queen's; if he will not take himself, as against himself—for the point is an important one—I appeal to the opinion of the Privy Council itself, when they used the following language in the Brophy case:—

> The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative reply. * * * In view of this comparison it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education, which existed prior to 1890, have not been affected. * * * The appeal is given if the rights are in fact affected.

And they so decided.

Now, I pass on to the speech of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser). Mr. Speaker, it is one thing to be beaten in a fight; it is one thing to be rejected by the votes of your fellow-countrymen; but if there is ever any consolation for a beaten man, it is to find that the man who beat him, after he enters the halls of this legislature, has to repudiate all the arguments with which he met you at the polls; and the hon. member for Guysboro's position—if it is parliamentary for me to say so—is humiliating, indeed. He fought me through Antigonish from platform to platform; but on this question, which I frankly put to that Roman Catholic constituency—not, forsooth, as a Roman Catholic question altogether, but as affecting Roman Catholics in the far province of Manitoba—I told the people that a defeat of the Government candidate in that riding would be most material and most injurious to the Government that was committed to the policy of remedial legislation. I wanted to win—of course, as a party man—but, above all, whether the House will take it from me or not, for the sake of the cause that was then at stake and at issue. My position was clear and well defined ; and I was met how ? I was met by the statement that it was cowardly for me to pretend that that was an issue ; that there could be no dispute between the two parties in regard to that question ; that the Roman Catholic Laurier—if he will pardon me for using the language of the hustings—would be as true to the Roman Catholics of Manitoba as the Orangeman Bowell. And that speech of the leader of the Opposition of 1893 was read to me by the hon. member for Guysboro' to prove on that question the leader of the Opposition was as ready to do justice to the minority in Manitoba, as the leader of this Government ; and so thought the candidate himself. Then they charged me with cowardice because, as they said, I sought to get away from the real issues of scandals and trade, to capture a verdict in the county of Antigonish, on the assumption that there was any difference between the two great parties in Canada on this question. I was beaten—beaten in an old Reform constituency ; but I congratulated myself on the fact that the hon. member for Guysboro' and the man who was afterwards elected the member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), were as honestly and firmly pledged to the policy of remedial legislation as I was. Yet the other night I listened to no less than four objections from the hon. member for Guysboro' to the policy of remedial legislation. I heard with dismay and chagrin that there could be a member from the province of Nova Scotia ready to urge one, two, three or four objections to a policy of this character. Let us see what the issue was in that campaign ; let us wait to see how the hon. member for Antigonish acts or votes ; and let us remember at the same time that his assistant, the man who did more than any one else to bring him successfully through that fight, was the hon. member for Guysboro'. This was the platform I met. It is the hon. gentleman's own address at a public meeting held in Antigonish on the 6th of April, and reported in the "Morning Chronicle," the Grit paper in Halifax, on the 8th of April, 1895, shortly before the election :

> He would dismiss the Manitoba school question by the remark that the rights of the minority of Manitoba were at least as safe in the hands of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party, including Colin F. McIsaac, as in the hands of Mackenzie Bowell, ex-Grand Master of the Orange Order, and Joseph A. Chisholm.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no doubt that hon gentlemen opposite by their loud "hear, hear," desire to drown the reference to the miserable, the almost rascally appeal to the electorate against the ex-Grand Master. That might have been the excitable language of an excited individual on the hustings ; but let us take the hon. gentleman's written address to the electors. This is what the member for Antigonish wrote on April 10 to the electors of that county :

> As to the Manitoba school difficulty, I am in full sympathy with the Catholic minority. Between myself and my opponent on this question there is no difference of opinion. We both agree that full and ample justice should and must be done to our co-religionists in Manitoba. I pledge myself, if elected, to support remedial legislation.

Where is the cheer now ? Gentlemen on the opposite cheered the previous quotation ; will they deny me a cheer now ? In pity, I ask, will the member for Antigonish deny me a cheer ? But the hon. gentleman said more :

> It is not, as has been truly remarked, a question of Government and Opposition, nor of Protestant and Catholic. It is one of constitutional action and general rights. But members of the Government and their supporters in this county claim great credit for the Government's action in passing the Order in Council. The Government have, however, done only what they were bound to do under the constitution, and in obedience to the command of the highest judicial authority in the realm.

Oh, how often, Mr. Speaker, I have seen my hon. friends opposite laugh, as members on this side of the House dwelt on the importance of those words, the highest judicial authority in the realm. Here we bring them face to face with the language of one of their ardent colleagues. He goes on .

> No. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, the Minister of Justice, who admits he is opposed to separate schools, has stated that should the Manitoba Government refuse remedial legislation, then the Parliament of Canada, not the Government, will be called upon to deal with the matter. And in that Parliament, can you not as safely trust the rights and interests of the Catholic minority to Laurier, the Liberal members of Parliament, and myself, as to Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the Conservative members of Parliament, and Mr. Joseph A. Chisholm ? In his card to the electors of the county, Mr. Chisholm intimates that Laurier has failed to declare his policy on the school question. This, however, is not so. He has already declared himself in favour of the Catholic minority.

I count upon the support of the hon. member for Antigonish. In decency and in common fair-play, he must vote for remedial legislation, after winning a verdict upon that address. But I refer to him only to contrast his position with that of the hon. member for Guysboro', who is going to vote against this Bill, and who is responsible more than any other man for the presence of the hon. member for Antigonish in Parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I counted sincerely, when we came to this difficult stage of this question, on the support of the leader of the Opposition. I am glad to see him in his place to-day—glad on every account ; glad, particularly, that he has survived the attack of illness from which he has suffered from the past few days. I tell him that I counted sincerely on his support. I could not believe it possible that a man in his position, of his faith, could do anything else than support a Government, largely Protestant, led by a Protestant leader, in a measure of justice immediately affecting his co-religionists. These are subjects, perhaps, sometimes better left unsaid, but I prefer, in this debate, to say out just what I think. I am a Protestant, born a Protestant, as the hon. gentleman was born a Catholic; and I would be ashamed if, for political reasons or on account of the trammels of any association, of whatever kind, I should ever find myself relatively in the position the hon. gentleman occupies to-day. I regret it, as a Canadian, whatever I may think of it as a party man. I wrote in the public prints that I expected the hon. gentleman to vote for this measure, and I sincerely did expect it. I had every reason to believe it, not merely upon the general principle to which I have incidentally referred, but from following the hon. gentleman as best I could. I know that he is a political gymnast. I know that on straight trade questions, it is difficult to find him at any particular time, or to nail him down to any particular policy, but I thought that on this question, this question of justice—justice to the Catholics of Manitoba—he would prove himself every inch a man, a Catholic and a Canadian. Why did I believe that? I was glad to find, for instance, that in July, 1895, whatever may have gone before, when the late leader of this House, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) stated what the policy of this Government was going to be, stated plainly and above board—the hon. leader of the Opposition, using this important language. According to "Hansard," he said:

> The Government have at last taken a policy—so they say. I am not going to quarrel with them as to the character of that policy.

And, later on, in the same speech, and I take nothing from the hon. gentleman's meaning when I omit what intervenes, he said:

> Everybody hopes, everybody expects, that this controversy will be settled by the people of Manitoba themselves.

So I hoped, and, of course, so did everybody hope. Later on, again, when the hon. gentleman contemplated the possibility of our hopes being destroyed, he said:

> I do hope, for my part, that we shall be spared even the lamentable spectacle and lamentable event, which, however, I see must come if this question is brought upon the floor of this Parliament, when the lines of parties, I am afraid, will be broken from their present cleavage and reformed largely on lines dividing the Catholics and Protestants into two camps.

The Protestants of this Cabinet were committed to one line of policy—was it possible that I could imagine that a Roman Catholic would be found in what the hon. gentleman was pleased to term, the Protestant camp, as distinguished from the position of the Government? Hon. gentlemen may decline to follow me in that, but I will give them further testimony. The hon. gentleman was at Winnipeg in 1894. He spoke in the very province in which this troublous question had arisen, and what did he say in 1894 in Winnipeg?

> Prove to me that the complaint of the Roman Catholic minority is true, that their rights are outraged to this extent——

What extent?

> —that instead of sending their children to schools where there is no religious teaching, they are forced to send their children to schools where there is religious teaching—— > religious teaching not their own, and I will be prepared to go before the people of Manitoba and tell them that such legislation should not stand.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman cheers that statement. He admits the accuracy of the report, will he pretend now, or at any time in this chamber, that there is not a religious teaching being taught in the schools in Manitoba, not that of Roman Catholics?

Mr. LAURIER. This is mere child's play.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says now it is mere child's play, but in 1894 he said he would tell the people of Manitoba that that legislation could not stand. Could I have anticipated that the hon. gentleman would so speedily change his opinion? Why, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), supposed to be one of the fathers of this legislation to coerce the minority of Manitoba, put himself on record even in a stronger manner than did the leader of the Opposition. With regard to the Act of 1890, the hon. member for Winnipeg said:

> I said then, and I still think, that the clause of the 1890 Act which provides for certain religious exercises is most unjust to Roman Catholics. If the state is to recognize religion in its school legislation, such a recognition as is acceptable to Protestants only, and, in fact, only to the majority of Protestants, is to my mind rank tyranny.

Now, there was the position of the leader of the Opposition. And what, after that, did the leader of the Opposition put upon record? Last session, this House cannot have forgotten that he changed the position which he had taken in the debate in 1895. He did not raise the question of these being Protestant schools, but he did raise the question—and put it on an equal plane, of the schools being distasteful to the conscientious scruples of the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba. This was the language he used in July of last year:

> If the schools are not Protestant, they are just as offensive to the Catholics. Why? Because it is part of the Catholic doctrine that the children should have both secular and religious education. If their conscientious conviction is that their children should be taught those religious truths which they deem essential and necessary, who can object seriously ?

That, mark you, was the position of the hon. gentleman when he hoped this question would be drawn from the federal arena. Well, now, I shall give him a finding of fact, and a finding in law from a tribunal that ought at least to command his attention, if not his respect. I find, by the judgment of the last case of the Privy Council of England—the Brophy case—Lord Herschell, speaking for his colleagues, used the following language :—

> Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior to and subsequent to the Act from which they appeal. * * *
> In view of this comparison it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education which existed prior to 1890 have not been affected. * * *
> As a matter of fact, the objection of Roman Catholics to schools such as alone receive state aid under the Act of 1890 is conscientious and deeply rooted. * * * * It is notorious that there were acute differences of opinion between Catholics and Protestants on the education question prior to 1870. This is recognized and emphasized in almost every line of these enactments. There is no doubt either what the points of difference were, and it is in the light of these that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was in truth a parliamentary compact, must be read.

Well, if this is not sufficient, if the decision of the Privy Council on the very points that disturb the hon. gentleman, if the opinion of the hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), who was one of the very men who was responsible for this troublesome legislation in Manitoba, be not sufficient, what will satisfy him ? What tribunal can we appeal to that will satisfy the people of this country at large as to the exact position of affairs ? Was I altogether counting without my host in expecting the hon. leader of the Opposition to rally to the support of the Government after these utterances ? Let us see, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman inaugurated a tour in his native province, which is a Catholic province. He went to speak to the Catholic electorate 'par excellence' of the Dominion of Canada. In the month of August, only a month after Parliament had risen and after he had made these statements as to what he hoped would be done by the legislature of Manitoba, and as to what would happen should they not do it, he went to Grand River, in the county of Gaspé. And I hold in my hand a statutory declaration, made under the Act by a gentleman who heard the hon. gentleman then explain to the people of Grand River what his views were. I have sent to my hon. friend a copy of this declaration. I propose to read it to the House:

Canada,
Province of Quebec,
County and District of Gaspé.

We the undersigned citizens and parliamentary electors residing in the county of Gaspé above mentioned, solemnly declare as follows :—

That we were present at a meeting of the Gaspésian electorate held in Grand River on the 24th day of August, 1895, whereat the Hon. W. Laurier, M.P., delivered a speech on the political topics of the day.

That this meeting was attended by four or five hundred persons, of whom fully ninety per cent were Roman Catholics ; amongst whom were a large number of Roman Catholic priests then visiting Grand River.

That in his address, the Hon. Mr. Laurier gave out amongst other reasons why his hearers should not have confidence in the then Government of Canada, the fact that they would never submit to Parliament a Bill to redress the grievances of the Manitoba Catholic minority.

That the Hon. Mr. Laurier, to justify his suggestion of an inquiry into the facts connected with the Manitoba school difficulty, stated that he personally felt no need therefor, being already convinced of the righteousness and justice of the Catholic minority's demands ; but that an investigation of the kind suggested might cause others, not then convinced, to see in the Manitoba school laws of 1890 and amendments thereto, the injustice perpetrated to the detriment of the Catholic minority in that province.

That after the delivery of the Hon. Mr. Laurier's speech, an elector, Dr. Ennis, then begged leave to ask Mr. Laurier for further explanations about the position which the hon. leader of the Liberal party of Canada proposed to take with reference to this school embroglio when it would be brought up before Parliament, and that on being invited to put his question from the platform the elector asked : "Would the Hon. Mr. Laurier, as Prime Minister of Canada, be willing to assume the responsibility of submitting to Parliament for its approval, with the assent and support of his followers, a Bill to remedy the grievances of the Catholic population of Manitoba, or would the Hon. Mr. Laurier, as leader of the Liberal party in Opposition, give the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell fair and loyal support in their endeavours to do justice to the demands of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, by voting for such remedial legislation ?"

That in reply to this question the Hon. Mr. Laurier said that he would try and see such measures adopted by Parliament in the event of his being called upon to redress the grievances mentioned, as leader of a Government in Canada, and that he would vote for such a remedial law if submitted by Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Government.

That this declaration of the Hon. Mr. Laurier met with the hearty approval of his hearers.

And we make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and having the same force and effect as if made under oath, under the authority of the Canada Evidence Act of 1892.

JOHN CARBERY, Mayor of Grand River.
ANDREW BAKER, ex-Mayor Cape Cove.
JAMES JONES, ex-Mayor Patos.
L. PHILIP BEAUDIEN, Merchant.
SIMON METHOT,
FRS. GIBAUT, Agent.

Declared before me at Grand River, Gaspé county, this second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six.

JOSEPHAT BELINEAU, J.P.

So that evidently, Mr. Speaker, and I read it for the purpose of showing that—I had some reason to expect, in 1895, from statements made in this House, that the hon. leader of the Opposition proposed to be as good as his word and to make this a non-political question, and to join with the Government of the day in doing justice to the minority in Manitoba, and in voting for the Remedial Bill. I thought that at least he could emulate the example of a great Protestant leader in this country. I refer to Sir John Macdonald. Sir John Macdonald, I dare say, has said, though I do not recollect his saying it, but have heard it from others, that in Canada, perhaps, a Protestant leader could afford to do more even-handed justice to the Roman Catholics than a Roman Catholic leader. And the events to which I have been referring perhaps in some way bring up and justify that statement. But whether or not Sir John Macdonald dared to sacrifice much in the way of Protestant support by advocating the rights and standing by the privileges, not only of the French minority, but of the Roman Catholic minority at large, I have in my hand a proud boast of his on that subject on more than one occasion. Some gentlemen are impatient of these references to the statements of men who have passed away from these scenes. I certainly delight in being able to put my hand on any advice from Conservatives or Liberals in times gone by in reference to these trying subjects. This is my apology for dwelling upon some of these statements. For instance, Sir John Macdonald spoke in Cornwall on August 31st, 1878, and there he did not shirk making the boast before all Canada of what he had done in the direction of peace and conciliation among the creeds and races of this country. He said :

> He, who was a Protestant, a Presbyterian, and who had been at 18 years of age an Orangeman, had come down here to ask the electors to vote for him. He had given Catholics fair-play in the matter of public schools and had incurred a good deal of obloquy from unreasonably strong Protestants for doing so. Now the whole country acknowledge that the measure was a good one, and that we had peace and quietness in our neighbourhood since that question was settled. Dr. Ryerson, a Methodist clergyman, and a man of great influence had stated that the Separate School Bill did not injure the common school system but had widened the basis of education.

And I lived to hear him make what I consider a very proud and happy boast in the halls of this legislature. In 1890, when the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) introduced into this House his policy of discord, his attempt to incite race against race and creed against creed, he evoked the eloquent and brilliant denunciations of the leader of the Opposition. Sir John Macdonald, in resenting some insinuations of the present leader of the Opposition, made what I believe to have been the truthful boast, and one that showed him to be not merely a Protestant, not merely a Canadian, but a statesman for the Empire with Imperial purposes and Imperial instincts. He said :

> Again and again have the best and the strongest of our Conservatives been defeated at the polls simply because we would not do injustice to our French fellow-countrymen. Again and again have we been put in a minority because we declined to join in that crusade against the French Canadian, against the Catholic religion and against French institutions.

I did not know that there would be any difference among the leaders ; I did not know that it would be only for the Conservative leaders to make that boast. Why, even if I were not given ordinary intelligence in public life, it were impossible to suppose that I could have imagined that a Roman Catholic leader would be behind a Protestant leader in this House in vindicating the claims of that class and of that race to vindicate which the hon. gentleman on that occasion stood forth. But the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), who perhaps is just as orthodox, sheds some light on the awkward position of the present leader of the Opposition. In a recent letter to the press he says, if this translation is correct :

> What I did say at Berthier, and what I am also ready to repeat, is that when closing the proceedings of the conference of Liberal members from Quebec province, in which I had stated my intention of voting for the Remedial Act, Mr. Laurier said that he was the last man willing to do violence to the consciences of any of his friends, but his position as leader of the party was such that he could not accept it.

In some respects not a satisfactory one for me as a Canadian, but that accounts for the sudden change, the unfortunate change, in the position of the leader of the Opposition. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the issue before this Parliament ? There have been many definitions ; they vary from year to year ; but I like to look back a little and trace the definitions as they have come from one side or the other. We hear a great deal of coercion in 1896, coercion of a majority. The coercion of the minority, in my humble judgment, began long ago, in 1890. That, I believe to be the effect of the judgment of the Queen's Privy Council. But in 1895 we hear that the issue is one of coercion against non-coercion. In 1893—I refer again to the leader of the Opposition—he gave a very different definition. He said the question was the protection of the minority against the independence of Manitoba : and on that issue I am sure this side of the House would have no misgivings as to where they should stand, they would stand for the protection of the minority. My hon. friend the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), the counsel for the Manitoba government, has defined the issue, and I think correctly, to be a question of separate schools or no separate schools in the province of Manitoba. We cannot get away from that issue, in my humble judgment, and the question is to be decided, as I shall argue in my speech, from the statutes and from the evidence which satisfied the law lords of the Privy Council. But let us notice the strange change in regard to the discussion of this issue in this House. I remember very well that the counsel for Manitoba, the hon. member for Simcoe, just before the late election for Cardwell, very happily defined the position which obtained between the three parties—if we may dignify his party as one—at that date. This was the position :

> If a Liberal candidate comes forward without any policy except that which Mr. Stubbs supports, why should the forces be divided, and the Government candidate walk in between them? If the Liberal candidate, whoever he may be, wants further information, then you have these three positions to choose from. If you want the Government sustained in their determination to reimpose separate schools upon Manitoba, you will vote for Mr. Willoughby ; if you want further information, you will vote for the Liberal candidate ; and if you are opposed to the re-establishment of separate schools, you will vote for Mr. Stubbs.

Three issues, three positions. Where is the leader of the Opposition to-day ? Whose policy has he now put into your hands, Mr. Speaker ? Did he ever, directly or indirectly, in any province, say that he would vote for the six months' hoist of a remedial legislation Bill ? Up to the very date that he moved it, I believe he was in favour of this policy, as the member for Simcoe understood it, a policy for a commission, a policy for an investigation, a policy consistent with remedial legislation. But when the hour came that he is called upon to screw his courage up to the sticking point, the hon. leader of the Opposition, forsooth, took shelter behind no less a man, or no greater a man, than the hon. member for Simcoe, counsel for the government of Manitoba, in favour of the most drastic and cruel coercion that has ever been perpetrated in any province of Canada. But the hon. gentleman thinks he made it all right ; he moved a six months' hoist, of course ; and then he is able to say in Quebec, and he is able to say in every Roman Catholic district : Look at my speech ; it is true I adopted the policy of the member for Simcoe, it is true I went into the Equal Rights Association, and got a policy for the occasion ; but nevertheless I supported it by a splendid speech in favour of ultimate remedial legislation. Only I want an inquiry, and I want something to stand upon after the awkward circumstances of a general election have passed by. And so he adopted the straddle-back policy. What did the "Globe" say, for instance, speaking for its Protestant readers in Ontario, of the position of the leader of the Opposition :

> May's Parliamentary authority makes it clear that the six months' hoist is a complete negative, and kills the Bill, and does not postpone it ; and also proves that it is the only way of completely killing the Bill. A vote against a Bill, May says, can only be made effective by carrying the six months' hoist, because if the second reading is barely negatived, it does not dispose of the Bill except for the time, and the Bill may be proceeded with at a later stage.

Again the "Globe" says, speaking for the benefit of the ultra-Protestant readers of that paper :

> Any opponent of the Bill must, therefore, vote for Mr. Laurier's amendment, and all who vote against it must be classified as supporting the Bill. There is no other motion on which they can record hostility to such legislation.

Now, then, all we want, all we want, at any rate, as Conservatives—and certainly the vast majority of the Conservative party are true to the cause of justice to the minority in Manitoba—all we want is a straight and above-board issue. The "Globe" lays down an issue upon which I would gladly go to the country. Mr. Speaker, you have heard often times the leader of the Opposition, in eloquent tones, carried away by —I won't say vanity, but by his enthusiasm and reading of English history, boast that he was a Cobden at one time, a Peel at another, a Gladstone at another, a Liberal of the English school at another; and last year he went over the province of Ontario endeavouring to make the people believe that he was a modern Wellington, that he followed Wellington's tactics, and he had thrown up defences, and copied that general's tactics in the Peninsular campaign. Whoever thought, what enthusiastic supporter of his, ever dreamed that with these grand examplars, with these splendid campaigns before him, he would go outside the lines of Torres Vedras and scamper about before the people in the tattered remnants of the habiliments of the hon. member for Simcoe ? In 1896 he adopted the policy that last year was laughed to scorn. Last year the hon. member for Simcoe was so poor that no one would do him reverence ; he could not divide the House, he ran away from one division. I do not know what general in English history ever did that. But nevertheless that is enough to show that he has never aped the English general. But running away from one, when another opportunity came, in vain he asked you, Mr. Speaker, to divide the House, and test the sentiment of the House on the policy of the Government. He had no power, no influence : as weak as the letter "p" in the word pneumonia was the hon. member for North Simcoe in 1895, but a great and mighty man is he this session. He can lie back and let this discussion go on ; he can attend the courts of law and exhibit his great forensic ability ; he can take Parliament as one of the easiest events of life, because he has now in full cry the whole of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. They sacrificed him in 1895 ; they laughed him to scorn, they left him standing alone, and forsooth now they do his mischievous work, now they give him life and give him standing which but for them he never could have in Canadian politics or in Canadian public life. Mr. Speaker, I have to say something further about the extraordinary position in which we find the Roman Catholic leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. I have not a very good memory, but I can go back a bit in Canadian life. I can hear almost now the indignant tones with which he denounced the mischievous and horrible policy that was launched before the Canadian public by the hon. member for Simcoe in 1890; and I will go a bit behind that, in order that the public, whether they be Protestants or Catholics, shall at all events, before they pass their verdict or give their judgment at the general elections, understand what we have to say upon our side in regard to the situation as it meets us.

What was the state of affairs between 1867 and 1889, as regards the old provinces of Canada? What was the state of affairs and public opinion as regards Manitoba between 1870 and 1889? I make a challenge—I make it for the purpose of debate. There are hon. gentlemen to follow me. I say here that I challenge hon. members on your right, Mr. Speaker, or on your left, to name one single leading public man, Liberal or Conservative, or whatever political stripe, who between these dates ever suggested in regard to our constitution that when separate schools were established, either before or after confederation, they could be interfered with or finally legislated out of existence or away. I submit that is an important question. I submit that any fair-minded man will agree with me that if my challenge cannot be accepted, we are bound to look and inquire very carefully into the matter and as to the time in which the new doctrine was promulgated. I have heard it, sitting in a quasi-judicial capacity, put before me by the counsel for the minority, that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was the disturber of the Queen's peace in Canada in regard to that question. I have seen him unable to grapple with the fact successfully, though endeavouring to deny it. I have seen it clearly established in that argument, which is, I am glad to say, fully reported and at the command of members of this House, that the hon. member for North Simcoe was the man who suggested the way and the means by which we could have thrown into our arena and into our country the apple of discord that did so much trouble in days past. Fortunately, because no one took up this question so ardently as the hon. gentleman, there has been nothing since 1867 comparable to what occurred previous to that year when free and independent parliamentary men did wage a dangerous and exciting war over it. But nevertheless it is significant when we find the leader of the Opposition giving his support to this movement, and I desire the country to understand the full measure of responsibility which the leader of the Opposition has taken on this occasion. Let me take, for instance, the "Globe," and I give that paper credit for all along endeavouring to be consistent in regard to a spirit to grind down into one system of uniformity all the religious teaching that ought to be given in public schools, which, that paper being Protestant through and through, they think is the system that ought to be general, and is the one that is commendable and has been commended by the representatives of Protestant schools. But to show that this question was definitely settled in 1867 and afterwards, as regards Manitoba, in 1870, I read, without apology, from the "Globe" of November 27th, 1876, where it says:

> We noticed recently the movement in Manitoba, having for its object the reform or improvement of the public school law of that province, and referred to the efforts made in other parts of the Dominion to effect such arrangements as while securing the practicable system of education are designed to protect the rights and consult the conscientious scruples of minorities. But it must not be understood from this that in Manitoba any more than elsewhere, the rights of minorities can be overridden or ignored.
> The local legislature may of course effect any changes in the administration of the school laws and not violate existing rights and privileges, but can do more than this. The Manitoba Act, which is the constitutional charter of the province of Manitoba, contains the same provisions that are to be found in the British North America Act in regard to the rights of minorities in the other provinces in this respect.

That I say was the general opinion. That is the statement that was never controverted by a single individual on the floor of this House, though the school question was threshed out in the case of New Brunswick, and these various Acts were discussed by hon. members on each side of the House. But what happened? In 1889 the hon. member for North Simcoe appeared on the western horizon. That hon. gentleman fretted in the party chains, under that party discipline which alone can secure the success of any party under our form of government and our institutions, and he got away. First there was a grievance in regard to the Jesuits' Estates Act. He was connected primarily with the Equal Rights Association, established in 1889. I quote from an address of the provincial council of that session respecting separate schools. It is signed by Wm. Caven, Chairman; E. D. Armour, hon. Secretary, and says:

> Denounce every compact, any legislation which appropriates public funds for sectarian purposes, as separate schools in this province certainly do.

I want to point out that for nineteen years not only had peace and contentment prevailed among the citizens of that province, but it had attracted a splendid class of population from the older countries of the world, and had within that short time made itself a province and a portion of this Dominion of which all people in the eastern provinces were proud indeed. No public man, no man on any hustings, so far as I can ascertain, and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) when acting as counsel for the Manitoba government was unable to show the contrary, suggested that the separate school system worked ill among them. But, smarting in connection with the special grievance of the minority in Quebec, the Protestant minority, failing to make that a troublesome and dangerous question to the confederation, we find the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) at Portage la Prairie, in August, 1889, outlining the platform which he, to give him credit for his courage, did not delay in putting before this Parliament soon after. He said there :

> There was something for the politicians to live for. We have the power to save this country from fratricidal strife. The power to make this a British country in fact as it is in name. In order to accomplish this, other issues for the moment must give way. We have got to bend our energies and let it be understood in every constituency, that whether a man call himself Grit or Tory, Conservative or Reformer, his record is clear, his principles are sound, and no influence at Ottawa will induce him to betray his great trust. The speaker was glad to inform the meeting that the poor sleepy Protestant minority of Quebec were at last awake. He trusted before many weeks to address a meeting in Montreal, and to realize that that minority is sound to the core on this question. There is a separate school question here, and in the North-west, and there is the French school question in Ontario. We have all work to do in our various localities : let us do that work before we seek to traverse fields, before more difficulty is to become encountered, because vested rights have become solidified.

And in the year 1890, in this House, he was not ashamed to say, after our experience of our French-speaking fellow-countrymen, after he had seen the pride, and heard the boast of the Dominion of Canada and the mother country in regard to the services the French Canadians have rendered the Empire, in regard to what they have done for this country, its constitution, its laws, and its literature ; he (Mr. McCarthy) was not ashamed to say, in the face of the leader of the Opposition himself :

> Well, hon. gentlemen, remember that when this country was ceded to the British there were no more than 60,000 or 65,000 French inhabitants ; and that I think included those on the banks of Illinois. However that may be, had a different policy been pursued, had a different policy been adopted, to induce them—not by any harsh means, not by adopting an aggravating policy—to speak the English tongue ; I want to know, whether to-day, instead of having a dangerous element in our midst which was becoming more pronounced, and which is calculated to rend this Dominion in twain ; I would like to know, whether we would have these things to-day if the policy I have indicated had been pursued.

Now, how did the leader of the Opposition meet the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on that occasion ? Did he (Mr. Laurier) join forces with him (Mr. McCarthy) as he does to-day, in the most essential feature of that hon. gentleman's campaign against the French, and against the Catholics, and against the Catholic schools ? No but as well became him (Mr. Laurier) at the time, he rose in indignation, and on the floor of this House, he pointed at the member for North Simcoe, the finger of scorn. He abused the member for North Simcoe, not merely for what he was then advocating. He (Mr. Laurier) admitted that the abolition of the French language in the North-west was comparatively a small affair, but dragging to the front the utterances of the member for North Simcoe, at Barrie, the leader of the Opposition pointed out to this House just what the purpose, and just what the ultimate aim was, of that disturber of the Queen's peace. The leader of the Opposition then said that this declaration of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), when he asked that the French language be prohibited and put down in the North-west, to use his own language :

> Involved a declaration of war against the French race.

The leader of the Opposition resented the epithets that had been used by the member for North Simcoe, his present ally, against his race. I can now remember the language of the leader of the Opposition then. He resented the statement of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that the French constituted "a bastard nationality" on this continent, and he said that the member for North Simcoe dare not use the language in this House, language which I will quote, and which he (Mr. Laurier) then quoted, in regard to the race of which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) is an eloquent exponent. This was the language used by the member for North Simcoe :

> A race which begins and ends with those who profess the Roman Catholic faith, and which now threatens the dismemberment of Canada.

The leader of the Opposition then denounced the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and his comparatively harmless Bill, because he said, "It was only a preliminary skirmish, soon to be followed by a general onslaught upon the whole French race in Canada."

And, forsooth, while that Bill had to be stamped out though it was comparatively insignificant, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to-day, as he sits in his chair, rejoices and chuckles that the second great article of his programme, namely, his attack upon the separate schools, his attack on the French and the Catholics of Canada, is being supported by the leader of the Opposition, and that his horrible work is being done by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), who, in 1890, denounced the first item of his (Mr. McCarthy's) programme, as only a preliminary canter. The hon. member for North Simcoe has been outspoken. I want the leader of the Opposition to mark well the object of his leader for, after all, the member for North Simcoe is to-day the leader of the chief of the Opposition on this question. The country recognizes that. The country fully understands that, and, Sir, let the leader of the Opposition fully appreciate where he is being led by the member for North Simcoe. The "Globe," of the 20th October, 1894, reports the hon. member for North Simcoe at Walkerton, as follows :—

> Of the North-west school question Mr. McCarthy spoke at considerable length, pointing out that the Parliament at Ottawa had undertaken to say that there should be separate schools and a system of dual language. He (Mr. McCarthy) had objected to the introduction into that Territory of a dual race, which would perpetuate there the evils in Quebec and Ontario to-day by such legislation. At the conquest, the 60,000 French Canadians at that time, had grown into a million and a half.

Sir, I would be glad to see that million and a half of French Canadians trebled. I would be glad to see them increased to any extent, because I know their value to Canada. Sir, I say this, as a Protestant, and as a Canadian. The member for North Simcoe continued :

> There was a million and a half so-called British subjects whose boast it was, if trouble should arise between Britain and France, they would be found on the side of their mother country, which was not ours. They could not be both French and British, and he believed it was the determination of the people of Canada that they should remain British. Yet the laws of the country had encouraged and fostered the development of the French nationality, which was more rampant and French now, than it was one hundred years ago.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the policy of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) which the leader of the Opposition has at last put upon its legs, has been, at any rate, honestly and clearly defined by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy), who, whatever his faults may be, will not be so disingenuous or cowardly as to go back on it on this occasion, or to withdraw one single statement in regard to it. And so, Mr. Speaker, I was not surprised to find the leader of the Opposition, in his desperate position, quarrel with the statement made by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), that Canada has been happy since confederation. Perhaps the hon. gentleman's remark applies more directly to fiscal discussions, but I will refer him to the language of Sir A. T. Galt, who represented this country in Great Britain, and who, speaking at Edinburgh, in 1883, to eminent men of the mother country, said :

> That peace, tranquility and progress had followed confederation in Canada.

I believe that Sir A. T. Galt spoke words of truth when he said that. I believe, Sir, that the Hon. Edward Blake, the late leader of the Opposition, when he charmed a most distinguished audience at Edinburgh, after the celebrated Midlothian campaign, spoke the words of truth, when he told that audience of the grand things that we had done in Canada, claiming, as might be expected, a large share of credit for the Liberal party, and, when he pointed to Canada as a country that had solved many of the difficult problems that were perplexing the mother country. I have no doubt, Sir, that the Hon. Edward Blake spoke the words of truth then. And, when Sir Oliver Mowat travelled through the States, and reached Hamilton, in 1893, speaking to young Canada there represented by the Canadian Club, he told them of what Canada had done, and congratulated them on Canada's position among the nations of the world. I have no doubt that he spoke the words of truth. I have no doubt that Sir Oliver Mowat would fiercely combat the position which the leader of the Opposition, on this occasion, felt it necessary to assume. I have not forgotten what the leader of the Opposition himself told our brother Britishers from Australasia. I have not forgotten the eloquent and happy picture he drew of what Canadian confederation had accomplished in British North America, when those distinguished visitors were in the capital of this country. He spoke then with the assent of every man in this House. On the other occasion to which I have referred, he spoke with, certainly, not the hearty assent of any Canadian.

Now, some discussion has occurred—I think it not unwise to refer to it—as to the value of a decision of the Queen's Privy Council. The law is, after all, claimed to be at our back. The majority of the Conservative party—and I believe they form the majority of the people of this country—accept the argument, that, whether the policy be what they want or what they do not want, it is the policy demanded by the law. The law is respected in every portion of the British Empire in the most extraordinary way. Our old parliaments attached tremendous importance to the decisions of the law officers of the Crown in England. Every lawyer knows that it was our custom to refer great questions to them, and loyally, and without dispute, to accept their opinions. And so the great minds of the Canadian legislature, the Blakes and the Macdonalds, saw that there would be something even more satisfactory than the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, in the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Queen's Privy Council. For that reason, the leader of the Opposition could not show that any issue that had arisen in this country—and there will always be burning issues while we are a free and independent people, a vigorous Anglo-Norman race—he could not show that any issue, no matter how exciting or burning at the time, had injured the integrity of Canada up to this day ; because the most of these questions are dealt with and settled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, whether between subject and subject, or between province and province. It is our safety-valve, Mr. Speaker, and so it has been understood. I may be permitted to read here a quotation from a speech of Mr. Blake, in this House, where he says :

> But, Sir, besides the great positive gain of obtaining the best guidance, there are other, and, in my opinion, not unimportant gains besides. Ours is a popular Government and when burning questions arise inflaming the public mind, when agitation is rife as to the political action of the executive or the legislature—which action is to be based on legal questions, obviously beyond the grasp of the people at large ;—when the people are on such questions provoked by cries of creed and race, then I maintain that a great public good is attainable by the submission of such legal questions to legal tribunals, with all the customary securities for a sound judgment ; and whose decisions passionless and dignified, accepted by each of us as binding in our own affairs involving fortune, freedom, honour, life itself, are most likely to be accepted by us all in questions of public concern.

Ours is a sport-loving nation, Mr. Speaker, and we belong to a sport-loving Empire. It is this, perhaps, that accounts for the respect paid to the courts of law, not only by the people of Canada, but by the people in the mother isles themselves—that, in our games and sports, we have an appeal to the umpire. And, as the umpire's decision is law for the sporting world, so the decision of the courts is law for the creeds and races, and there are many of them, in the Empire at large. We accept the decisions of the umpire, most of us, without any feeling or dislike : and I appeal to the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), as to the value of those decisions. His position in this case has been hard to understand. His position, to my mind, is the most extraordinary of any man in this assembly. I know he is excitable. I know there are various rumours in regard to what he was willing to do, when there was a supposed crisis on hand. I have heard of those stories. I shall not go into them ; I care not to go into them. They are not pertinent here. But this I want to know : How that hon. gentleman can do otherwise than give a loyal support to the Government that is standing by the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, when he himself supported and counselled our late leader, Sir John Thompson, in the very steps that led to this result ? When the policy of the Government referring this question to the courts of law, was announced in this House, that hon. gentleman brought into the discussion all the weight that can attach to his opinion, be it great or small. He congratulated Sir John Thompson upon taking from the excitable and excited political arena a question of this kind. What did he say ? In 1893, he said this :

> The intention was on the question that arouse religious feeling, and where men cannot reason as in a white light, but have their minds perturbed by passion and feeling, that the legislature should call the statute to its help in all difficulties quasi judicial.

And Sir John Thompson dealt with this question with that candour that distinguished him in public life, holding, as he did, an admittedly awkward position in regard to it—just as awkward a position as my hon. friend opposite finds himself in to-day—he, a Roman Catholic, called upon, in a country having a Protestant majority, to deal out justice to the Roman Catholics, no matter what the Protestants might think. I have no doubt that Sir John Thompson, as a politician, lived in terror as to his ultimate position ; but, as a statesman and as a Canadian, his course on that occasion won the commendation of even the hon. member for Albert. He sought his refuge, if you like, in the judicial tribunal to which I have referred ; and he pledged himself before his fellow-countrymen, in 1893, without demur, that, as the court should decide, so he would steer his course. And, mark you, many a Protestant thought at that time, that the Catholics would come out of that court shorn, just as they did in the Barrett case. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will go with me that far. The general opinion among lawyers appeared to be, as the hon. member for North Simcoe said in this House, that that case was precluded by the Barrett decision. Nevertheless, the two parties appealed to the umpire, and were willing at that time to stand by its arbitrament. In 1893, after that statement by Sir John Thompson, the hon. member for Albert said :

> The Government had but one duty. It was happily stated by the Prime Minister at a banquet at Toronto, that one pole star should guide them in dealing with Manitoba's laws, that was, to stand by the constitution. I do not know what star could more safely guide any responsible body of Ministers in dealing with a question of admittedly great complexity, obscurity and extreme delicacy.

Now, what is the decision ? There is scope here for ingenious men, trained in the law—there is scope for ingenious men who ought to be trained in the law—there is scope for laymen who have trained minds—to discuss that decision until the day of judgment. But here is the hon. member for Albert, as I understand, day and night, opposed to the Government carrying out the judgment of the Queen's Privy Council, notwithstanding that he said, that was the correct guide. Here I find him saying, in 1895, only last session :

> There is no doubt that if Lord Herschell were a member of this House of Commons he would be in favour of a remedial law, judging from the views he has expressed.

I agree with him, that if Lord Herschell, who wrote the judgment concurred in by Lord Watson, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Shand—if he and they were here, they would be willing to vote for remedial legislation, Protestant each and every one of them, Presbyterian, some of them—Protestant, of necessity, as Lord Herschell, keeper of the Queen's conscience, is—men not only trained at the great bar of England, but trained, every one of them, I believe, with the exception of Lord Shand, in the halls of Westminster, advising year in and year out, their Protestant countrymen, as to the legislation, not only of England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland, but of the whole Empire. I say those men, removed from the exciting issues here, removed from our local prejudices, and all Protestants, would have voted for this Remedial Bill to do justice to the Catholics of Manitoba, or any part of Canada. I, as a Protestant, and a Canadian, make a small concession, when I say I am willing to go with them and do as they would do. But, oh, hon. gentlemen say, what about the bargain? what about the compact? And we have heard how important these ante-confederation compacts were. Oh, the Protestants of Quebec, forsooth, they need not be disturbed; there was a compact preceding 1867 that it would be an outrage to disturb; but in regard to those post-union rights which concern Catholics chiefly, there is no such thing as a compact. But if there was a compact, I asked the hon. member for Queen's—what then? Would he vote for remedial legislation? Not he. I asked him the question, and he said it would be a very important consideration.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will excuse me in calling his attention to the fact that we were speaking of a pre-union compact, and he asked me if there was such a thing as a pre-union compact, would I then vote for remedial legislation. I told him that our right to carry remedial legislation could in no way be dependent on a pre-union compact, but that the Privy Council decided that our right to carry remedial legislation depended upon rights given to the Roman Catholics after the union.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You may, Mr. Speaker, understand that to be an answer to the position I was taking. I do not. I say the hon. gentleman's argument amounted to nothing. I say that the time he took up was absolutely wasted if he did not distinguish between a compact before confederation, and legislation after confederation. Now, with regard to both these matters, I throw aside compact after compact outside the statutes. I go on the judgment of the Privy Council, and on the facts which led Lord Herschell and his colleagues to be of the opinion that remedial legislation is demanded and is right. They go upon the statutory compact, upon what they call this parliamentary compact, and I know, in connection with the provinces, of no compact higher than a parliamentary compact.

The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), when acting as counsel for Manitoba, himself admitted that the proceedings anterior to the Act are entirely irrelevant. He also admitted that the judgment is binding in establishing a grievance, and the leader of the Ontario government (Sir Oliver Mowat), in his resolution passed the other day, interprets the decision as establishing, to use the language of his resolution, a legitimate ground of complaint which should be removed. And, speaking afterwards in support of that amendment, the only change he made in the language I have referred to is the substitution of "ought to be" instead of "should be removed"—that it is a grievance which ought to be removed. Those opinions, I think, are of some importance. We cannot argue with men like the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). He admitted that he was subject to passion and prejudice; and, after the decision of the court, when apparently it was not given as he hoped or wished, he told us in 1895:

> What meaning do you give to section 93 of the British North America Act? Is that section not a constitutional guarantee? Yes. And would you abridge it in this way? I frankly say I will.

Now, he is against separate schools, hit or miss, every time. Compacts, parliamentary, ante-union, post-union, bargain—all those things fall to the ground. His position is easily understood, and I hope it will never be commended by any important section of the people of this country.

Now, then, I arrive at a very important aspect of this case, and I again call to my aid the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I said a little while ago that up to 1889 no man dreamed that you could interfere with these post-union compacts, these parliamentary bargains, these parliamentary compacts, because this right of appeal precluded successful interference. So the hon. gentleman from Simcoe went, under a retainer, to London, to argue the Barrett case; and there the question involved was as to whether the Act of 1890 was within the ordinary powers of the Manitoba legislature. In that case, I find that he argued, and with great ability, that this section providing for an appeal—and I think it is better to express the section this way than by its number in the Manitoba Act—was not a substantive section, that it was to be read in connection with the section preceding it, and he then contended that no ante-union rights on the part of Roman Catholics had been interfered with by the Act of 1890; and he afterwards developed that idea that there was no appeal for the minority in Manitoba. But, mark you, he went on to say that in the case of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, under the British North America Act providing for an appeal, the very fact of the right to that appeal guaranteed to the minority in those provinces a permanency of the separate school system, if, after 1867, a separate school system should be established. The very fact of that section of the British North America Act being a substantive section, providing for and contemplating an appeal, did protect the rights given after the union, and secured, of course, substantially—he used the word "absolutely"—to the minority of those provinces the right to separate schools. It became, as he said, a vested right. On pages 7 and 8 of the Brophy case, and page 74 of his argument in the Barrett case, as printed before Parliament, you will see he admits that if this appeal clause in the Manitoba Act is a substantive clause, as it is decided to be in the Brophy case, he admitted—which no lawyer, constitutional or otherwise, had ever before 1889 contradicted—that by it the rights became vested and were secured to the minority wherever the schools were established. Does any one think that a novel idea? Take the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). In 1875, in discussing the New Brunswick case, I find him stating:

> The British North America Act provides that any province having separate schools before confederation should have them for all time, and also that any province not having them at the time of the union, but conceding them at any future time, shall concede them as a right which can never be taken away.
> If the minority carried their point——

He went on to say later in his speech, if the minority once got separate schools they, to use his language exactly—

> —they would possess these rights and privileges for all time.

To show you, Mr. Speaker, how awkward it is for us to have to deal with the hon. member for North Simcoe, I wish to point out, without desire to offend him, but without fear of him or terror of his indignation, that, if he was not embarrassed with his professional connection with the government of Manitoba there is hardly a man who could have enlightened us upon this subject better than the hon. gentleman. I freely admit that. But suppose the leader of the Opposition had a retainer from Mr. Greenway. The leader of the Opposition is a distinguished member of the bar of Quebec. Suppose that he sat there having argued the case with the hon. member for Simcoe. How many men in this House would pay attention to what he said in debate? Or suppose that Mr. Blake, a late distinguished member of this House, who accepted a retainer from the Canadian Pacific Railway in regard to the award, had dared to lead the Opposition and to find fault with the Government in regard to questions arising out of that matter and to ask why that award was not promptly paid or why some other action was not taken about it, what would have been the feelings, the proper feelings, of every member of this House? To show the extraordinary position of the hon. member for Simcoe, I point out some of the inconsistent views he has expressed in regard to this question which he would not have expressed had he not been legislator and counsellor as well in regard to the same subject. He was of opinion, as shown in a very interesting article in Mr. Ewart's book, that the Barrett case precluded any right on the part of the minority to appeal. But the Brophy case decided that subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act had the same effect in their case as subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, in regard to the minorities in other province—it decided it to be a parliamentary compact. Now, then, the counsel for Manitoba, who argued in 1892 in the Barrett case, before the law lords of the Privy Council of England that, if these were substantive sections granting an appeal, they constituted on the part of an established separate school system a vested right—or in connection with the separate school system, to be more accurate—a vested right that could not be taken away—this same gentleman came before the committee of the Canadian Privy Council in 1895, and with the Brophy case staring him in the face, argued that neither the merits nor the rights of the minority were to be considered: argued that we had dealt only with the political aspect, argued that the appeal clause was practically a dead letter, and only in one extraordinary case could he conceive of its being used at all. If that does not put him out of court, it ought to put him out of Parliament, or at least prevent him having the slightest influence in Parliament in regard to this matter.

In regard to coercion, I desire to deal, in all fairness, with a statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He referred to the Manitoba Cattle Quarantine Act, the Act relating to public companies, the Act abolishing the French language and the Schools Act. The two former were disallowed, and the others were not. The hon. gentleman would not accept the challenge of the Minister of Finance and express his opinion as to whether the course of the Government in this matter was right or wrong. It was his duty either to express his own opinion or not to condemn the action of the Government in taking the course it did in regard to the matter. But let us see what is the record of the two parties in regard to everriding and annulling the Acts of the local legislatures. I find, for instance, that the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, the Mackenzie Administration, disallowed an Act to define the privileges, immunities and powers of the legislative assembly and the legislative council of Manitoba. They disallowed the Act to incorporate the Winnipeg Board of Trade. They disallowed the Act regarding the construction of the bridge over the Assiniboine River, between the city of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, and they disallowed chapter 43 of 46 Vic., known as the Half-breed Manitoba Protection Act. During the five years of their term they disallowed twenty-one provincial statutes, or an average of four and one-fifth each year, while during the twenty-four years of the Conservative regime, the Government have disallowed only fifty-three, including North-west ordinances, or an average of two and one-fifth, or about one-half the proportion of the Liberals. So that on this question of coercion, if we are so to style the exercise of the admitted powers of the Government, we are a long way behind the hon. gentlemen. What commission was appointed, what evidence was taken, what negotiations took place in connection with the exercise of these powers by the Grit government between 1874 and 1878? Did they consider the sensitiveness of the Manitoba government? Did they hold out the olive branch previous to disallowance? No. They exercised their powers under the constitution in the most ruthless manner. They did simply as the constitution required them to do.

Now, we have seen how little sympathy the leader of the Opposition has for the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba. I want to show what sympathy he had for the Protestants of Quebec, because that subject has come up. In 1893 he spoke as follows :—

> I have quoted to you the law which now prevails in Quebec—the law demanded by the Protestant population of that province, giving them a school board of their own. I have quoted to you the law whereby in 1869 two separate boards of education were organized, a Roman Catholic board and a Protestant board. The Roman Catholic board to-day is composed of seventeen members, nine Catholic laymen and all the Roman Catholic bishops of the province. Now, suppose that to-morrow the legislature of Quebec were to abolish the Protestant School Board. Then, by the effect of that law, the management of the Protestant schools would become vested in the Roman Catholic board of the Council of Education, that is to say, practically in the hands of the Roman Catholic bishops. If such legislation were to be enacted by the legislature of Quebec, is there a man to say that it would not be a most infamous act of tyranny? Sir, if to-morrow such a law were enacted, the first thing that the Protestant population would do would be to come before this Government and ask this Government, in virtue of the powers vested in it by the constitution, to abolish at once the obnoxious and tyrannical legislation. If the Protestant population were to come and represent to the Government that their schools, the Protestant schools, had been placed under the management of the Roman Catholic bishops of the province, I say that every man in this House, be he Protestant or Catholic, would at once call on the Government to abolish the law and to pass the remedial legislation to the Protestant minority.

The hon. member for North Simcoe has also spoken on the subject of minorities. I remember one occasion, when he was not feed, when he was an independent member of this Parliament. I remember his eloquence, which he has certainly never equalled, in connection with the school question, when he considered the Protestant minority of Quebec were being subjected to coercion at the hands of the provincial legislature. In 1889, he said :

> I venture, Sir, to ask the House seriously to consider the position in which we stand. The worship of what was called local autonomy which some gentlemen have become addicted to is fraught, I venture to say, with great evils to this Dominion. Our allegiance is due to the Dominion of Canada. The separation into provinces, the right of local self-government which we possess is not to make us less citizens of the Dominion, is not to make us less anxious for the promotion of the welfare of the Dominion ; and it is no argument to say that because a certain piece of legislation is within the power of a local parliament, therefore that legislation is not to be disturbed. By the same Act of Parliament, by which power is conferred upon the local legislature the duty and power—because where there is a power there is a corresponding duty—are cast upon the Governor in Council to revise and review the acts of the legislative bodies. If you are to say that because a law has been passed within the legislative authority of the province therefore it must remain, we can easily see, Sir, that before long these provinces, instead of coming nearer together, will go further and further apart. We can see that the only way of making a united Canada and building up a national life and sentiment in the Dominion is by seeing that the laws of one province are not offensive to the laws and institutions, and it may be to the feelings of another. I will go so far as to say that they must be to some extent taken into consideration.

So say we all, except the hon. member for Simcoe, in this case. He was the champion of a minority on another occasion, and he was not feed. The minority in that case was the minority in Ireland, and I recollect, in 1886, the hon. gentleman waxing eloquent in their interest, when he said :

> While I am in favour of a fair and reasonable scheme for Home Rule which shall secure the rights of the minority as well as of the majority of the people of Ireland, I am not in favour, and I do not believe that the majority of the people of Canada are in favour, of handing the minority over to the majority.

That is in Ireland, with which he has nothing to do. But we have here a minority with which he has everything to do, as a Canadian, towards which he has a duty to perform, and yet he insists that they sha'll be handed over to the majority. There was another case in which he acted for a minority, and for which he was paid. It was the case of the Streams Bill, and the minority consisted of only one. There, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman raised his voice loud and long in this House on behalf of federal interference, of coercion, and everything else, so long as it would be to the advantage of his client. I have no doubt he was right on that occasion but still it looks odd to see him linked with the leader of the Opposition now, insisting that interference with the majority is coercion, even if the interference be to prevent the oppression of the minority by that majority. Now, the leader of the Opposition says, that before interference, which he calls coercion—that is the latest term—there must be a full inquiry, all means of conciliation must be exhausted, and it must be a last resort. Well, Sir, from 1890 to 1896 the minority have rested quiet. They have been knocking at these doors for justice and action. When does the hon. gentleman propose to act ? Is there nothing definite ? Are hon. gentlemen opposite to go into the next campaign with no limit of time as to his policy ? Take his fiscal policy on the trade question. The leader of the Opposition says, that within forty years he proposes to bring it about. That is definite. When does he propose to bring about the rectification of the position of the minority, and give them justice ? In the one case it is a matter of time, in the other of eternity ; forty years in the case of free trade, but an absolutely indefinite time in regard to justice to the minority in Manitoba, except that it is to be after the general elections. Inquiry ? What inquiry does the hon. gentleman seriously ask for ? Does he ask, that we shall ascertain by evidence on oath what the prejudices of Roman Catholics are in regard to this question of religion ? Did the judges of the Privy Council prove false to their trust and make a great error in what they laid down, without equivocation, as an absolute certainty, which was well known and of common notoriety, in regard to these prejudices ? Why, Sir, if we have erred at all, it has been in connection with the careful inquiry, and the careful investigation, and the constant threshing out this case has undergone. If we have erred at all, it is because the delay has been too long. I say, that the position of the minority is in a sense splendid ; they have suffered, suffered grievously, and yet all they are asking is, that the law of the land, as interpreted by the highest judicial authority in the Empire, be enforced in the regular and proper manner. Let me run through a chronological statement of the question, a large part of it taken from the book of Mr. Ewart, which will shorten the time. For instance, in July, 1892, the decision in the Barrett case was given. In November, petitions of the Catholic minority to the Governor General were presented In 1893, on 22nd January, argument was fixed. The Manitoba government refused to appear, and only the representative of the minority addressed the Governor in Council. On 22nd February, the Dominion Order in Council was adopted, and this was a part of it :

> The committee therefore advise that a case be prepared on this subject, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, 54-55 Vic., chapter 25, and they recommend that if this report be approved a copy thereof be transmitted by telegraph to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, and to John S. Ewart, counsel for the petitioners, in order that if they be so disposed the government of Manitoba, and the said counsel, may offer suggestions as to the preparation of such a case, and as to the questions which shuld be embraced therein.

On 8th July, 1893, no reply having been received from the Manitoba government, and no suggestions as to the form of the case to be referred, having been made on its behalf, the draft case was approved :

> The Minister recommends that the case as amended, copy of which is herewith submitted, be approved by Your Excellency, and that copies thereof be submitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, and to Mr. Ewart, with the information that the same is the case which it is proposed to refer to the Supreme Court of Canada touching the statutes and memorials above referred to.

In October, the case was argued before the Supreme Court at Ottawa. Mr. Wade appeared as counsel on behalf of the province of Manitoba, but declined to argue the case; and the court requested Mr. Christopher Robinson, Q.C., to argue in the interest of Manitoba. Now, I call particularly the attention of the House to a document that has already been alluded to, but which I venture now to put on record, and that is the Order in Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General, dated 26th July, 1894. It is a communication to the Manitoba government from the Dominion Government on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba, complaining of the law of 1890, and praying for relief. That Order in Council set out with considerable fulness the grievances complained of by the minority, and it was communicated, along with a copy of the memorial itself, by the authorities at Ottawa to those of Manitoba. From the concluding paragraph of that order, I quote the following extract :—

> The statements contained in this memorial are matters of the deepest concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and to religious belief and practice, and the committee, therefore, humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hope that the legislature of Manitoba may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment, the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among the Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

That I call an order of conciliation, that I call a request as cordial and kindly as could be made by one government to another, to give full, ample and fair consideration to those representations. How was that treated ? We are continually charged with acting harshly ; but that document was never, I believe, to this day laid by the government of Manitoba before the legislature of that province, or has never been brought before them properly. Now, what further? On 20th January, 1895, the Privy Council's second decision was given. On 14th February, the Manitoba legislature met. The Dominion Government's communication was never laid before the legislature. The Lieutenant-Governor's speech at the opening of the legislature contained this clause:

> Whether or not a demand will be made by the Federal Government that that Act shall be modified. * * * * It is not the intention of my government in any way to recede from its determination to uphold the present system.

That was in 1895, as late as 14th February: and the resolution carried in that legislature was:

> That this House will, by all constitutional means, and to the utmost extent of its power, resist any steps which may be taken to attack the school system established by the Public School Act of 1890.

That was definite enough, perhaps, but the counsel for Manitoba, the hon. member for Simcoe, came before the Privy Council on 4th March for a further hearing of the case of the minority, and there told us, in unmistakable language, that he was appearing, practically, out of politeness, to convince us that we ought not to pass an order, but admitting, that, if we did do it, no attention would be paid to it, that it would not have any effect. If that statement is challenged, I will give the hon. gentleman's language: if it is not, I will pass it by, but I think that is a fair statement of his position. There was an adjournment made, mark you, Mr. Speaker, on that occasion, to suit the counsel's convenience so far as we could possibly do it. In concluding his argument, the hon. member for Simcoe, the counsel for the government of Manitoba, said:

> In conclusion I beg to thank the Council for your patient and attentive hearing. I certainly cannot complain of any want of attention and of respect for the gentlemen whom I represent—and I shall take care so to report to them; and whatever effect may be given to my arguments, they have had at the hands of this Council a most attentive hearing, and I thank you for your kindness in that regard.

It is a little late to get up this supposed grievance on the part of the government of Manitoba as to the manner in which they were treated. No one can look over the record without seeing that if they had evidence of facts they desired to present, there was abundant opportunity to present them, or that having asked directly or through counsel that certain facts should be submitted, the tribunal called on to investigate them ever made a refusal. I was a member of that board, and I think the board was prepared to sit as long as the counsel for Manitoba desired in order to hear testimony and argument. The hon. gentleman went upon the statutes of 1871 and the subsequent statutes up to 1890, and including 1890, and on those I am prepared to go, and on those I stand to-day.

Then we had the remedial order. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), counsel for Manitoba, stated that if we adopted the remedial order we were bound to do what we are doing now, to bring down legislation, and press it through. The remedial order was adopted in March, and in June the reply of the Manitoba government was received, which, among other things, stated:

> We are therefore compelled to respectfully state to Your Excellency in Council that we cannot accept the responsibility of carrying into effect the terms of the remedial order.

We took another step. The leader of the Opposition ought to have been gallant and generous enough in a crisis of this kind to have given us full credit for it, for we risked the confidence of our party at the by-elections, when for the sake of peace, harmony and a settlement, we went further on the lines of conciliation, and adopted a further order in last July to remove any impression what we wanted the Manitoba legislature to carry out, on hard and fast lines, in cast-iron terms or to the letter and word of the remedial order. The conciliatory despatch sent to the Manitoba government in July, 1895, concludes:

> It by no means follows that it is the duty of the Federal Government to insist that provincial legislation, to be mutually satisfactory, should follow the exact lines of this order,—that is the remedial order. It is hoped, however, that a middle course will commend itself to the local authorities, that federal action may become unnecessary.

That document was sent 27th July, 1895, and when was it answered? The Manitoba government knew we were bound, as honourable men, to call Parliament not later than the 2nd January, 1896, that our minds must be made up before that time, that the only period in which negotiations could possibly be carried out was from July until December, but not one line, not one scratch of the pen, not a hint or a word came from the government of Manitoba in answer to that despatch of conciliation until two days before Parliament met.

Mr. MULOCK. When did their legislature meet?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I care not when they met, for the purpose of my argument.

Mr. MULOCK. Of course not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I care not when it met. The government could have called the legislature together, if they were in earnest they could have done something exceptional, as we are doing now, for we are doing something without precedent, of which we are not ashamed, and for which we take full responsibility. We desire to settle this question locally if we can, but if not, we are prepared to settle it on the floor of this Parliament, where the jurisdiction now exists. That reply from the Manitoba government, dated 21st December, reached here two days before the meeting of this House—and that fact will answer the hon. gentleman who interrupted me as to when their legislature met. It is to this effect :

> It is therefore recommended that, so far as the government of Manitoba is concerned, the proposal to establish a system of separate schools, in any form, be positively and definitely rejected.

Mr. MULOCK. Read all the answer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is enough for me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is enough for any man who is not a quibbler, it is enough for any man who understands the Queen's English—that a separate school system in any form would not be acceptable to them. I am not a member of the Government now, but as a member of the Government then, and as a member of Parliament now, this, to my mind, was definite and conclusive. It barred the door to further negotiations. I do not say anything as regards what has happened since. There never has been a disinclination to meet the Manitoba government half way, but when we are told that legislation based on the remedial order should not be passed, we must recall the lines laid down by the fathers of confederation and by the able leaders who guided the destinies of the Reform and Conservative parties in this House down to the present day.

I deny that this is a Roman Catholic question. I have visited the Orange county of Cardwell, the Catholic constituency of Antigonish ; I have spoken in open day. I have canvassed this issue on the public platform, and my argument in each and every place was the same. I represent as strong a Protestant county as exists in Canada at the present moment, but I have never considered this is a question which appeals only to Roman Catholic sympathies and feelings. Directly the appeal comes from them, for the Catholics happen to be in the gap at the present time, they happen to be oppressed, to be coerced, to be standing begging for their rights that have been decided upon by the highest tribunal in the Empire. But the question to my mind, involves, as the leader of the Opposition has pointed out in past years, the rights of the Protestants of the province of Quebec. In 1893, in far more terse language than I can command, the hon. gentleman traced the history of the appellate clause in the Canadian constitution, and showed that this clause was to protect not the ante-union rights of the province, not merely the ante-union rights of the Protestants of the province of Quebec, but, as he pointed out, the very valuable and important post-union rights of the province of Quebec, obtained not merely in 1869, as some people think, but under later statutes. The hon. gentleman traced the history of that clause, and for what purpose ? Let hon. members read the hon. gentleman's speech, delivered in 1893, and they will see that there was much in the conclusion which the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) stated in Antigonish, that no man could read that speech without coming to the conclusion that the sympathies of the leader of the Opposition were with the Catholic minority. The Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba have had sympathy from 1890 to 1896, and now they want action. They want it in the same direction that I would be willing to go as regards the Protestants of Quebec : and I could make it absolutely clear that the interests of the Protestants of Quebec are materially involved in this issue. I am unable to understand the position taken by those who are opposed to this proposed remedial legislation, and who are yet jealous of the rights of the Protestant minority in Quebec. How do they act ? They say to the Protestants of Quebec : You need not be alarmed. If we deny the so-called rights to Manitoba, it is a Catholic claim, it is a half-breed claim, and involves rights belonging to small portions of the population. You in Quebec need not be afraid—a solemn compact has been made with you, the minority in Quebec ; the Act of 1867 is a splendid protection to your rights ; but the minority in Manitoba cannot get the protection of the courts, and we propose that they shall not get the protection of this Parliament. I think that argument is unworthy of hon. gentlemen who used it. It has been applied by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and by other hon. members opposed to the proposed legislation, but their arguments are answered by the declaration of their leader in 1893, who dwelt upon the rights that had been acquired since 1869, rights respecting the proper distribution of the government grants for the Protestant schools, and rights under which a Protestant board is constituted for the management of the public schools. And, if further testimony be required—and I do not go to the minuter history, although I should like to refer to the Protestant teachers' petition and to Sir Alexander Galt's position, of which mention has been made in this debate—yet it is brought out, that Sir A. Galt was asking for this protection, not for the Protestant population merely, but for what he was pleased to call the British population of the province of Quebec. I will refer briefly to the "Manual of the School Law and Regulations of the province of Quebec, together with an Outline of School Organization for the use of Candidates for Teachers' Diplomas, under the Regulation of the Protestant Committee;" prepared by Rev. E. I. Rexford, Rector of the High School, Montreal, and formerly secretary of the Department of Public Instruction. I will show from that how much is involved to the Protestants of Quebec, and how happily it is, that we can get on a broader plane than that of acting for one sect or the other, and that we can stand up, as I believe we are standing up, for minorities of all the provinces, whether that minority be Protestant, or whether it be Catholic. In this Manual Mr. Rexford says:

> Since confederation a number of important amendments have been made to our educational law. * * *
> In 1869 a law concerning education was passed by the new legislature of Quebec, which contained several important provisions. These were adopted after numerous consultations between leading representatives of the Protestant minority and the Government of the day. Among other things it provided that the Council of Public Instruction should be composed of fourteen Roman Catholics and seven Protestants, and that these two sections should be committees of the Council for the consideration of matters pertaining to schools of their own faith. These committees could not take any formal action, however, except through the Council. It also provided that grants for superior education should be divided between the Roman Catholic and Protestant institutions according to the Roman Catholic and Protestant population of the province. The law of 1869 also extended the privileges of dissentients in several respects, and established the present system of the division of school taxes upon incorporated companies between the minority and the majority in a municipality in proportion to the number of children attending their respective schools.* *
> In 1876 another important educational measure was passed by the legislature. This Act provided (1) that the Roman Catholic bishops of the province should be ex-officio members of the Council of Public Instruction; (2) that one-third of the Council should be Protestant; and (3) that each of the two committees of the Council should have the power of separate and independent action in reference to all matters which concern the educational work under their respective control. This was a most important provision. Under it, each committee appoints its own chairman and secretary, and conducts its business as an independent council. Upon the recommendation of Roman Catholic or Protestant committee, as the case may be, professors of normal schools, school inspectors, members of the Board of Examiners, and the secretaries of the Department of Public Instruction, are appointed by the Government. By placing the choice of these officers for Protestant institutions in the hands of the Protestant committee, an important guarantee has been given that these appointments will be made in a manner acceptable to the Protestant minority. And although it is not stated in the law that one of the two secretaries of the Department of Public Instruction shall be a Protestant, this is practically secured by the method of appointment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him, whether he contends that such a board is a right or a privilege, within the meaning of the Act?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I certainly think so, but whatever I may think is not of so much importance in the matter. That has been threshed out in the debate; but I call to my aid this—and I do it for the sake of saving considerable time. The leader of the Opposition, coming from Quebec, a Catholic; and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives), coming from Quebec, a Protestant—they both attach the greatest importance to these safeguards that have been given to the Protestants of Quebec since 1867. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to remember, and I ask, through you, this House to remember, the words of wisdom that fell from the lips of the old Liberal-Conservative chieftain, words which, certainly, with the majority of his countrymen, did obtain sufficiently to make acceptable this compromise with the Catholic population of Canada, this arrangement in regard to separate schools. Early in his days, when he had to fight on this question in the Protestant province of Ontario battles a good deal hotter than we have to fight now, his great justification for leaving the law as it is, for even improving it in the line of separate schools, was: That, while he would have preferred a system of general schools, yet it was one thing to give a right, or a franchise to the people, and another thing to take it away. That is the principle, I believe, that was at the bottom of this clause, which indicates to Manitoba, and indicates to all the provinces, which indicates, certainly, to Nova Scotia, according to public opinion there, that, where they once establish a separate school system there by law, there was a real and substantial undertaking, under the Confederation Act, that they should not repeal it. That induces, I believe, the Protestant majority in my province to work out harmoniously, as they are working out, their provincial school system, without an amendment to the Act. If it were not for that, they would many a time, I believe, have amended the Act, but the fact, that it is to stand there for all time, has induced them to proceed in what I consider a policy that is not only commendable, but which reflects credit on the intelligence and on the spirit of toleration of the people of my native province. As was so eloquently and brilliantly described by the Minister of Finance, that, after all, is the policy that has made the British Empire what she is to-day. That, for instance, has induced these people in the Transvaal to submit to what some of my friends opposite will not submit to—the judicial tribunals of the United Kingdom. It is not merely a spirit of toleration and a spirit of justice, that is inculcated in all quarters and in all portions of the Empire, but it is the fact of recognizing, as the great council of the British Empire never now ceases to recognize, that they control and have in their hands the destinies and the welfare of multitudes of races and of creeds ; governing India, Africa, America, and the hosts of possessions that are proud to acknowledge themselves under British sway. Toleration is the very secret of success, and the secret of the greatness of the Empire ; and toleration increases as the years go by. A few years ago it would have been impossible for the Lord Chief Justice to be a Roman Catholic, and sit as Lord Chief Justice in the United Kingdom. He is there to-day by virtue, not only of the growth of that spirit of toleration, but by the very experience that England has had in empire governing. A member of the late Government in England, one of the most distinguished members of the Liberal Administration, was a Roman Catholic, and before that he was Governor General of the Empire of India. All this indicates plainly and unmistakably to us, that the fathers of confederation were wise in their generation. We, in Canada, have led even public opinion in England, in regard to reforms and advancements, as Mr. Blake accurately pointed out in 1885, when speaking in Edinburgh. I pray God, that we may lead them even in the settlement of this question. I hope that we will deal with it, not merely as Canadians, but as British subjects, brought up, as most of our fellow-subjects have been, with the greatest respect and reverence for the decisions of our judicial tribunals. Little did I think, Mr. Speaker, when reading, as I have often read, the language of one of the men who did so much for Canada, and whose life was so unfortunately cut short : little did I think, that his language could be used in regard to the Roman Catholic leader of a political party in this country, and, least of all, did I think that the words of this great man would apply to the present leader of the Opposition. Thomas D'Arcy McGee, having before him this constitution of ours, and speaking in a Protestant centre of Ontario, used the following language, which will fittingly conclude the observations which I have ventured to address to this House :—

> When United British America will start on its race with 4,000,000 of a free people in religion they will be about 55 per cent Protestant to 45 per cent Catholics ; in some localities the religious minority may be small, and many apprehend local oppression, but the two great masses will be too nearly balanced to suffer any oppression to be long inflicted on the co-religionists of either. Our near equality will be the best guarantee of our mutual tolerance. With one half of the constituent power against him, it is evident that no fanatic, no bigot, troubler of other men's consciences, no insulter of other men's creeds can ever rise to the dimensions of a statesman in British America. The minorities east and west have really nothing to fear beyond what always existed, local irritations produced by ill-disposed individuals. The strong arm and the long arm of the confederate power will be extended over them all, and woe be to the wretch on whom that arm shall have to descend in anger for any violation of the federal compact.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, I would be paying the hon. gentleman who resumed his seat just before recess a very poor compliment if I did not take some notice of the personal attack with which he opened his speech, and which ran, more or less, through his whole address, from beginning to end. I confess, Sir, that, remembering that this same subject was brought up by that hon. gentleman when this question was under discussion in July last, and, remembering, also, that if he did not know what parliamentary practice was before that discussion, he ought afterwards to have realized what it was—if, indeed, he is capable of understanding anything—I was somewhat surprised to find that in the very laboured harangue which we had the pleasure of listening to this afternoon, he made that the burden of his song. Now, Sir, I either am, or am not, violating a rule of this House ; I either am or am not entitled to address to you and to all the members of this House such arguments as appear to me to be relevant to the question under discussion ; and as I think that, according to our rules, I am not out of order, and as the hon. member does not press the matter so far as to complain that I am out of order, I am unable quite to grasp the importance he attaches to the position I hold. If, indeed, he means to say that I now believe Manitoba should not be coerced because of the position I have occupied as counsel for that province on two different occasions, I can understand his argument. If he does not mean to say that, I fail to appreciate its force. On this personal matter, let me just recapitulate, briefly, the position which I have held, and which I still hold, with reference to this and kindred questions. I am blamed, Sir, because, in 1889, in a speech which I made at Portage la Prairie, I ventured to say that I thought separate schools in the province of Manitoba should be abolished. I thought so then ; I think so still ; but if I said so in 1889, and if that was my conviction then, I do not know how the fact that in the year 1892 I held a brief for the province of Manitoba in the argument of the legal question before the Privy Council could affect, or has, in any way, affected my opinion. I am bound, Sir, as a professional man, to accept a brief when I am offered it. I have no choice ; I am bound by my oath, when a brief is offered to me, to accept it ; and if the province of Manitoba thought fit—and that was the first time, in 1892, that I was consulted on this matter—to trust me as one of their counsel with the conduct of the argument before the Judicial Committee, can it be honestly said by any member of this House, or by any person outside of this House, that my position has been changed in the slightest degree by the fact that I held that brief? Well, Sir, I continued, I think, consistently, in the course that I had mapped out for myself in 1889, from that time onward; and in 1895 I was suddenly called on by telegram from the Attorney General of Manitoba to appear for him at the investigation, or the so-called investigation, which took place here in Ottawa before the Committee of the Canadian Privy Council. At the time Mr. Sifton, who was the Superintendent of Education in Manitoba, was engaged in leading the House, which was then in session, the Premier, Mr. Greenway, being ill in bed. Mr. Sifton urged me to come here and appear for the province, and to do the best I could in opposing the application that was made on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority for the remedial order. I did so. I did it openly and above board. I did not pretend that I was not acting as counsel for the province of Manitoba. I appeared as counsel, I spoke as counsel, and there was no pretense on my part that I was appearing in any other sense or quality than in my professional capacity. Now, if, owing to these circumstances, I have been obliged to give more attention to the subject and to master the details more thoroughly than I otherwise would, I do not know that that disqualifies me in any way from taking part in this discussion. I am not here to defend myself. After twenty years of public life, I do not require to come here to defend my character, in either the one way or the other. If my position is not as good as that of the hon. gentleman or any of his family who have assailed me, then I must occupy, according to my understanding, a low position, indeed, in the public life of Canada. I am quite content that my fellow-countrymen in all parts of the Dominion, who have had full opportunity of understanding my conduct, should place such value upon it and form such an opinion of it as they think fit; and I am quite willing to leave to their judgment the attacks which the hon. gentleman thought fit to make on me this afternoon.

The law of Parliament is quite well settled, and I shall give you an instance to show that I have not violated the law of Parliament, or even committed any impropriety. It will be in the recollection of the members of this House that in the year 1888 or 1889, a special commission was appointed to investigate the charges made against Mr. Parnell and his associates. That commission took evidence and was attended by counsel, leading counsel of England, on both sides. That commission reported to the Imperial Parliament; and upon the report of the commission, a motion was made and a resolution adopted, passing upon the findings. Well, Sir, if I am wrong in venturing to speak on the subject of the Manitoba school question, so, indeed, must have been Sir Charles Russell, the present Chief Justice of England, the Attorney General, Sir Richard Webster, and, in fact, every leading counsel of the bar in England, because every one of those gentlemen, notwithstanding they were employed and acted as counsel on either one side or the other, took part in the discussion on the motion in the House of Commons upon the report of that special commission. That was not deemed improper in England; that was not deemed a violation of any rule; and it is not a violation of any rule of Parliament. I do not deny that the hon. gentleman was perfectly within his right and privilege in drawing attention to the fact that I occupied the position of counsel for Manitoba with reference to this and other matters. And, so far as that circumstance should appear to detract from any statement or observation I have to make, or any argument I propose to offer, this House is quite at liberty to bear it in mind and be guided in the weight they ought to attach to my statement and argument, anything they think proper on that account. So much for that matter.

It occurred repeatedly, it was the alpha and omega of the hon. gentleman's address. If you leave out the attack on the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the introductory attack on the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), I doubt if there is anything to be found in the harangue, laboured and tiresome as that was, to which we listened this afternoon.

May I say a word on behalf of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), who is not in his place now, and who was not in his place when the attack was made on him. The position which he and I occupy now does not differ in any regard, so far as I know, from that which we held here in July last. I was one of those who drew attention to the fact that I thought the position of the hon. member for West York in the Cabinet or in the Government of the day was, under the circumstances, unusual, extraordinary, and called for observation. And the hon. gentleman who assailed the hon. member for West York in unmeasured terms to-night was then the Minister of the Crown and the Minister who rose to his feet to defend the propriety of the position which the hon. member for West York took.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was all right up to that date.

Mr. McCARTHY. All right up to that date. If you will allow me, I will read what the hon. member for West York said up to that date, and before that date, openly and above board, and what the hon. gentleman must have known if he kept himself cognizant of what was occurring in public life. The hon. member for West York said, in his address as Grand Sovereign of the Orange Order:

> As you are well aware, the present political situation has become of grave concern by reason of the Manitoba school question. I need not tell you how anxiously I have watched this matter since the day it first arose. My opinions on the subject have never been concealed. In all my addresses to the Orange Association, in my capacity of Grand Sovereign, as well as my utterances from political platforms, I have taken the ground that the education of our children should be attained through the medium of public schools, and I was pleased when in the important province of Manitoba and in our North-west Territories—soon, we all fervently hope, to become populous and prospreous parts of our great Dominion—legislation was carried looking to the establishment of a common school system free from sectarianism.

The hon. member for West York then went on to make some observations about the letter of Bishop Gravelle, which, not being pertinent to the present matter, I pass over, but he concluded in this way :

> Without dwelling longer upon this incident, continued the speaker, let me state to you briefly the attitude that I take under the present circumstances on this question. The Government after the last decision of the Judicial Committee referred the question to Manitoba, as provided by the constitution, ordering the authorities of that province to restore the separate school system in existence prior to 1890. The Manitoba government, with the concurrence of the legislature of that province, has declined to do so, but at the same time has intimated that if any real grievances exist on the part of the minority they will be removed, although still insisting upon the maintenance unimpaired of the public school system. The Dominion Government as a consequence has pledged itself before Parliament and the country to accept the offer of Manitoba to consider a basis of settlement before the next meeting of Parliament, and in the event of failure, to introduce legislation at the next session of Parliament. Now, for my own part——

I draw the attention of the House to this :

> —and I speak under full sense of the responsibility of my utterances I have to say frankly but firmly that I favour the maintenance of a non-sectarian school system in Manitoba and that if our constitution permitted, I would advocate with the same fervour a similar system throughout the Dominion. (Applause.) I propose, however, to await events, rather than to anticipate those which may never occur. Nor do I intend to be led or entrapped into precipitate action upon the subject by any device, no matter from what quarter it may come. Our duty, it seems to me, is to adhere resolutely to the main principles—to keep them always in view, swerving neither to the right nor to the left—and in this position I trust that I shall have not only the approbation of yourselves but the support of the great majority of the people of Canada.

I think that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) did not, in the slightest degree, conceal that he was opposed, and determinedly opposed, to the remedial policy of the Government ; and yet, Sir, that hon. gentleman was permitted to remain a member of that Government, and the hon. member who thought proper this afternoon to assail him in unmeasured terms, was the Minister who, at that time, rose to his feet to defend and justify that position. Surely if the hon. member for West York was wrong, as, in my humble opinion, he was, in not withdrawing from the Government, when announcing that his policy in this important matter was diametrically opposed to that of the Government, it does not lie in the mouths of his colleagues—who then approved of his remaining in the Cabinet, and endeavoured, no doubt, to have him remain there as long as possible—to denounce him here in the language meted out to him this afternoon.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman tell me wherein I assailed the hon. member for West York for his conduct, until November, 1895 ? I have no recollection of it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am beginning to fear, Sir, that the hon. gentleman is hopeless. He occupied for some little time the position of Minister of Justice of this country. He is the author, I believe, of this famous remedial order, this absolutely hopeless and indefensible remedial order, and I am beginning to think, the more I see and hear of him, that he is actually incapable of appreciating the difference between right and wrong. He says he did not assail the hon. member for West York until November last. He had not a word to say against the hon. member for West York when that gentleman was denouncing the policy of the Government of which he was a member, speaking on public platforms against it, doing all he could to destroy it. But when the hon. gentleman consistently retired from office—which is certainly a virtue the hon. member for Pictou cannot claim, except when he brought about the re-entrance of his ancient and venerable parent into public life—then he assails him, and I really am unable to understand the hon. gentleman's principles. If the hon. member for West York was sincere, as, no doubt, he was, I think he erred only in resigning too late rather than in resigning at all. He sacrificed his constituency for the time, and I dare say he feels it and knows it now, in order to avoid sacrificing his party, in order to avoid a split in the party ranks and injury to his friends. But the hon. member for Pictou assails my hon. friend from West York for having resigned his position and deciding to do what the great body of men on this side of the House would do if they stood by their convictions—vote against the policy and the legislation that we have before us this evening.

My hon. friend for Albert (Mr. Weldon) is here and can speak for himself. He also underwent a castigation, if it can be called so, from the hon. gentleman who formerly occupied a position which gave him some standing in this House, which I am afraid he cannot hold upon his own merits. I shall leave the hon. member for Albert to defend himself from the attack, such as it was.

which was launched at him by the hon. member for Pictou.

Now, I really have taken up more time than the subject warranted in this preliminary statement. We are engaged here in a much more serious matter than in considering the question of the position which I have held or the position which my hon. friend from West York, or the position my hon. friend from Albert has held. Let me, if I can, draw the House back to a consideration of the important measure before us. I confess, Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the speech of the hon. member who addressed us this afternoon. I have failed to find a consecutive argument in it from beginning to end. Denunciation there was, abuse there was : but I defy any hon. member of this House to say, having listened to that tirade for two hours, that it contained one solitary argument—although it contained many statements, which, I suppose, the hon. gentleman mistook for arguments. He attacked the hon. leader of the Opposition as a Catholic. He wound up his speech by saying that this was a question that was not either Catholic or Protestant, it was not to be treated as a question pertaining to the Catholic religion—and in that I agree with him—but the burden of his attack was that he (Mr. Laurier), a Catholic and a French Canadian, was opposed to a Remedial Bill which was proposed on behalf of his co-religionists and compatriots. These positions can hardly be reconciled, nor can they be treated as consistent.

What is our position here to-night ? No person in the course of this debate has pretended to say that this Parliament is not clothed with jurisdiction to pass a Remedial Bill. I do not wish to be understood as saying that we have jurisdiction to pass the Bill which has been submitted to us—that is a vastly different thing. But that we have a right to pass a Remedial Bill in the terms of the remedial order and in fulfilment of the remedial order, no person who understands the subject will for a moment deny. But how comes it that we have that right ? The subject of education is not one that belongs to this Parliament—not primarily, at all events. The subject of education has, very properly, been committed to the local legislatures, and that subject is one which is to be dealt with, and properly dealt with, by these provincial assemblies. That they do deal with it, under certain restrictions and certain limitations, is undoubted. That under certain circumstances and on certain events happening—which have happened in this case—this Parliament has power to intervene, is also unquestioned. But what we have to remember is that primarily the duty and responsibility with reference to the subject of education belongs to the local legislature of the province of Manitoba, and before we interfere we have to be satisfied that that duty and that responsibility has not been properly discharged, has been wantonly disregarded. Otherwise, there is no fitting occasion for our interfering against the province itself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) who addressed us on Friday afternoon, and who, if he will permit me to say—I do not wish to make him blush—has made the only speech worthy of the occasion which has been made from his side of the House, certainly presented the case in a way which, if the facts and the circumstances stated by him can be relied upon, would lead to the conclusion which he asked the House to draw ; but he will pardon me if I am unable to accept these facts, and he will excuse me if I point out how he erred. And I think that his own good sense and fair-mindedness would lead him to say that if he had known how far he had been led astray with regard to the facts and the history of the case, he would not have been found addressing the House in the language he used on Friday afternoon. He told us that separate schools had nothing to do with the case. The hon. gentleman, the youthful member who addressed us this afternoon told us that that was the only subject before us. He accepted my statement before the committee. I said that that was the primary question, that first we must consider whether or not we ought to adopt and impose a system of separate schools. The more astute leader brushed that aside and told us that it was a side issue. His opening remarks were to the effect : We have nothing to do with separate schools ; that was settled long since ; settled at confederation, settled when Manitoba entered the union ; it is embedded in bed-rock of the constitution, and we have nothing to do with it. Now, after the character attributed to the speech of this afternoon, I cannot ask the House to accept the statement of the hon. member for Pictou as completely destroying the argument of the hon. Minister of Finance. It would be a simple matter for me to put one speech against the other, and point out how both cannot stand and ask the House to accept the latter. But I feel it would be trifling with the House, under all circumstances, if I did not give some reason for saying that, in that particular, at all events, the gentleman who last addressed us was right, and the hon. Minister of Finance was wrong. We are told, Sir, that the reason of this was that there were compacts—compacts at confederation, or rather a compact at confederation and a compact when the Manitoba constitution was passed. A compact at confederation—a compact, we are told, entered into on behalf of the Protestants of the province of Quebec, a compact without which confederation would have been impossible, a compact, to use his own language, which was the sine qua non of the scheme of confederation. Has the hon. gentleman dived no deeper than Mr. Ewart's little pamphlet in making these statements ? I find that every quotation he made, every statement he made, was to be found in this little document of Mr. Ewart's, written in answer to Mr. Wade's pamphlet. He is a Minister of the Crown leading this House, or was leading this House a little while ago ; but the source of his information is this skit of Mr. Ewart's in answer to a pamphlet put forth by Mr. Wade on behalf of the Manitoba school system. Not one solitary quotation, not one solitary statement, did the hon. gentleman favour the House with that was not to be found, and is not now to be read, in the pamphlet to which I refer, issued by Mr. Ewart in reply to Mr. Wade. No wonder, under these circumstances, that the hon. gentleman has gone very far afield, no wonder that his asserted facts and circumstances are not reliable, no wonder that the statements upon which he based his argument are not statements which we can trust. But let me point out the reason why. He commenced by telling us that it was a great mistake to suppose that the Catholics, at the time of confederation, had insisted on these clauses in the Confederation Act. It was a delusion that we had all been labouring under. We, who had lived through confederation, who ought to have known something about it, were told that that statement was utterly unreliable, and that in point of fact these limitations on the power of provinces in reference to education, had been insisted upon by the Protestants of the province of Quebec. I do not think I misrepresent the hon. gentleman, I think I am fairly repeating the arguments and the statements that he made. Well, Sir, nothing could be further from the truth ; and let me prove it to him, let me show to him that, if it makes the slightest difference, he was making a very grave error. Sir, when this question of confederation was dealt with, as we all know, it first came up at a conference held in the city of Quebec. At that conference there were representatives from the old Canadas, from the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and the colony of Newfoundland. Certain resolutions were agreed to at that conference, and amongst them a resolution on the subject of education. Let us see what it was. It fell to Mr. Mowat to move as follows :—

> That it shall be competent for the local legislature to make laws respecting first, agriculture ; second, education.

Mr. D'Arcy McGee, whom, perhaps, the hon. Minister of Finance had not heard of, but who really was not a Protestant, nor was he a representative from the province of Ontario, moved, and it was adopted :

> Saving the rights and privileges which the the Protestant or Catholic minority in both Canadas may possess as to denominational schools at the time when the constitutional Act comes into operation.

Now, we know perfectly well the history of the Separate School Act in the province of Ontario. In 1863 when the Sandfield-Macdonald Government, I think the Macdonald-Sicotte Government, was in power, an amendment had been made which practically gave the Roman Catholics the separate schools system as they have it to-day. That law was carried by a majority of the province of Quebec ; and in one year afterwards Mr. D'Arcy McGee a leading Roman Catholic, not representing Ontario, but then representing one of the divisions of the city of Montreal, if my information is correct, who was present in the conference, in order that this law should not be changed, in order that this law which has been imposed upon the province against its will, should not be repealed, introduced a stipulation insisting, not on behalf of the Protestants but on behalf of the Roman Catholics of the province of Ontario, that the provincial legislature then about to be created under the Confederation Act, should have power over education, "saving the rights and privileges which the Protestant or Catholic minorities in both Canadas may possess as to denominational schools at the time when the constitutional Act comes into operation." The hon. Minister of Finance was therefore wrong when he told us that it was in the interest of the Protestants, and not of the Catholics, that this legislation was imposed. The hon. gentleman erred there. I think he will admit, he had not gone deep enough, had not quite mastered his subject ; because I am quite certain the hon. Minister is incapable of misrepresenting a thing to us here, or that he knew he was making a statement which was not in accordance with the facts. Well, Sir, what happened ? Why, it was pictured to us that John Sandfield Macdonald, a Catholic, had insisted, against the will of the Protestants of the province of Quebec, in expunging the guarantee and the provision which the Protestants insisted upon ; and the resolution of Mr. Sandfield Macdonald was actually read in support of that. Sir, it is hardly credible, it is hard to understand, that a gentleman occupying the distinguished position of Finance Minister should have either wantonly or carelessly—I won't suggest anything else—have made such a misrepresentation to us of the position of affairs at that time. Why, Sir, the resolutions as they were submitted to Parliament, were the Quebec resolutions. The Quebec resolutions contained a clause with regard to education, as I have mentioned it to you, with the saving clause introduced by Mr. D'Arcy McGee. These resolutions came before the Canadian Parliament ; these resolutions were adopted, and at the time they were adopted, the clauses upon which the question turns here this evening, and upon which we have to determine with regard to the rights of Manitoba, are not to be found, had not been thought of, and were not introduced. What Mr. Sandfield Macdonald said, and what I think we will all agree with, was this: As a Roman Catholic I do not want any limitation upon the powers of my province. I am willing as a Roman Catholic to allow the province from which I come, and to which I belong, to have full and complete authority in the matter of education, as in every other respect: and I warn the House—and, Sir, his words are prophetic, and if there was anything required to bear testimony to the foresight of that distinguished statesman, you find it in the passage which I am about, with your permission, to read on this very question. He said:

> I need only mention that I have no desire that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada shall be abridged, nor that the rights and privileges of any other denomination should be interfered with in any respect; but I wish hon. members to bear in mind that the experience we have had in this country, not to allude to that of the neighbouring states, proves, that a denial of the right of the majority to legislate on any given matter, has always led to grave consequences. I need only mention the Clergy Reserve question. This, it must be recollected, was forbidden to be legislated upon by the Union Act; yet it was the cause of fierce strife and legislation for many years. The original constitution of the United States prohibited the question of slavery from being interfered with by Congress; yet an agitation for its suppression was early commenced, and has at last terminated in civil war. The agitation of the Clergy Reserve question produced a rebellion in Upper Canada. I say, that by making a constitutional restriction in respect to the schools of the minority, we are sowing the seeds from which will in the end arise a serious conflict, unless the constitution be amended. The minority will be quite safe on a question relating to their faith and their education in a colony under the sway of the British Crown; but if you expressly withdraw that question from the control of the majority, the rights of the minority will not be safe in either section of the province if you distrust the action of the majority.

And so on. Then he moved, that the following words be added to the original motion:—

> And that it be an instruction to the said committee to consider whether any constitutional restriction which shall exclude from the local legislature of Upper Canada the entire control and direction of education, subject only to the approval or disproval of the general Parliament is not calculated to create widespread dissatisfaction, and tend to foster and create jealousy and strife between the various religious bodies in that section of the province.

That is what John Sandfield Macdonald was doing: he was expunging the clause which D'Arcy McGee had inserted, which he had inserted for the protection, not of the Protestants of the province of Quebec, but of the Roman Catholic minority in Ontario; and Mr. Mackenzie, whose speech was also referred to, opposed this resolution; and why? He said: You, Sandfield Macdonald, are the very man who, in 1863, to the great injury of your party, caused the separate school law to be enacted, and you are now embarrassing your party friends by bringing up this question here: and, although I am not in favour of a separate school system and of limitation on the part of the provinces, yet I prefer to adopt that sooner than the scheme of confederation should come to an end. What he said was in these words:

> If the hon. member for Cornwall (Hon. J. S. Macdonald) had shown the same zeal against the separate school system when he had the power to prevent legislation on that subject, he would have saved himself and the party which kept him in power some trouble. It seems curious that he who was so anxious to promote the separate school system then should now be anxious in quite another direction.

Further on, he said:

> I formerly stated that I thought the separate school system would not prove very disastrous if it went no further. I do not now think they will do much harm if they remain in the same position as at present, and therefore, though I am against the separate school system, I am willing to accept this confederation even though it perpetuates a small number of separate schools.

Mr. Brown was also referred to. Let us see what Mr. Brown said on the same subject. He was taunted with having consented to the separate school limitation. What was the hon. gentleman's answer:

> I admit that, from my point of view, this is a blot on the scheme before the House; it is, confessedly, one of the concessions from our side that had to be made to secure this great measure of reform. But assuredly, I, for one, have not the slightest hesitation in accepting it as a necessary condition of the scheme of union, and doubly acceptable must it be in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, who were the authors of the Bill of 1863.

So we have the statement here, that, whatever may be the effect of it—and I refer to it, not because, in my judgment, it can have any bearing on the interpretation of the Act, but because I want it to be understood, that these statements, made on the floor of this House, statements calculated to create prejudice and influence people's judgment, are not corroborated by the true historical account we have of the proceedings prior to confederation in 1867. Sir, will it be believed, that, although it has been pleaded, that this was a sine qua non as regards confederation, it was hardly referred to by the great leaders on either side of the House. Sir John Macdonald, in introducing these resolutions, never refers to the educational question. Why, we know what the trouble was. We know that there had been an attempt made under the constitution of 1841 to govern the Old Canadas on the principle of equal representation for Upper and Lower Canada. We know—and I happen to be old enough to remember it—I was not in public life at the time, but I perfectly well remember it, and, no doubt, there are other hon. members whose memory will go as far back as the date prior to 1867—the difficulty was this, that the whole people of Upper Canada insisted that there should be representation according to population, and I remember, when that was granted, we found that Upper Canada was entitled to 82 representatives, as compared with 65 for Lower Canada, and Lower Canada equally insisted that, according to the bargain made in 1840, at the time of the union of the Canadas, the representation was to be equal, no matter what change of population should occur. Practically a deadlock had been reached—but it was not with respect to the separate school question. Do not malign the country. We were not fighting and tearing each other's eyes out on sectarian issues; but we, in the upper province, were insisting, with practical unanimity, that we should have representation according to population, while the people in Quebec were insisting that no change should be made in the Act of Union by which the two Canadas were brought together. So government fell, and government was reconstructed, and government again fell, and it was impossible to carry on the affairs of the country. Public affairs had come to a deadlock, not on account of the school question at all, but on account of the difficulties occurring in carrying on public affairs from the large majority in the province of Ontario holding one view, and the large majority in the other province determinedly holding the other view.

Well, Sir, we will pass on. We come now to the next stage. A great mistake has been made by the Finance Minister; he has mixed up dates and places, and it is well that we should keep them apart. We have the resolutions of Quebec, adopted in the fall or winter of 1864. We have the endorsement of those resolutions by the Canadian Parliament in February, 1865. The resolutions, so far as we are concerned with them as affecting the question of schools, are just as I have read them, they simply saved the rights of the Catholic and Protestant minorities in the Canadas at the time of the union, whenever the union should come into force.

The next step with respect to confederation took place, when? Parliament again met in August, 1866. Difficulties had arisen in the maritime provinces. No difficulty had occurred here. We had agreed to confederation on the terms of the Quebec resolutions, that is to say, the province of Lower Canada and the province of Upper Canada, and there was not one word of guarantee of the right of appeal which we find now in the Confederation Act. In the Parliament of 1866, which met mainly for the purpose of defining the constitution of the local Houses, an attempt was made, at the instance of the Protestants of the province of Quebec, to improve the school system in that province, to give the Protestants what they had been long demanding, and what they had not been able to obtain, notwithstanding that the united parliament represented the province of Ontario, as well as the province of Quebec; and, in fulfilment of the promises which were made, not, however, as part of the confederation scheme at all, a Bill was introduced by the hon. member for Three Rivers, who was then Solicitor General in the Government, to carry out the promises which had been made during the confederation debate in favour of the Protestant minority of that province. What became of that Bill? Why, Sir, it was withdrawn. After some discussion, it was withdrawn, and some of the statements with respect to the terms of its withdrawal I should like to have an opportunity to read to the House Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, I am endeavouring in this statement to show how utterly fallacious was the argument made by the Finance Minister. Remember, the gravamen of this argument, the point of the whole discussion, was, that those clauses were insisted upon, those limitations on the powers as regards education were insisted on in the interest and on behalf of the Protestant minority, and that we here, a majority of Protestants, because it is the Roman Catholic minority which appeals to us, are refusing to give effect to the very conditions on which our forefathers insisted at the time of confederation. Now, Sir, the Bill was withdrawn, and what statements were made? Sir John Macdonald, in announcing the withdrawal of the Government Lower Canada Education Act, said:

> The minority in each section would have to throw themselves on the justice and generosity of the majority.

Mr. Cauchon, a leading gentleman at that time, having very great influence in the province of Quebec, said:

> At the time of the adoption of the confederation scheme it was understood that the separate school law of Upper Canada was not to be interfered with, and that the Lower Canada law was to be changed in some particulars, but the Protestants of Lower Canada now demand privileges that they should not have asked.

Mr. Dunkin, a Protestant from the Eastern Townships, said:

> As the case now stood the Protestants of Lower Canada would have to take their chance, and that chance has firmly believed would be a good one.

The Hon. Mr. Brown:

> Congratulated the Lower Canadians that they were to be relieved from the obnoxious school law which the Government designed to impose upon them. * * * * * * He contended that the rights of the minority would always be better protected when left to the justice of the majority.

Hon. T. D. McGee said:

> We were sending the minorities east and west adrift with a feeling of insecurity as to their future which this House could have removed by frankly dealing with the case. Since that cannot be done the best that could be would be to leave them to work out their own case in each section.

Mr. M. C. Cameron, since Chief Justice Cameron, spoke in the strain of being satisfied.

So, we find as late as 1866, no guarantee for the Protestant minority, no sine quo non for confederation, the resolutions of 1865 adopted, the subsequent resolutions of 1866 embodied, and delegates appointed to go to England for the purpose of carrying out the Confederation Act. In England, Sir, notwithstanding the promise that had been made here in this Parliament, notwithstanding the promise that no change would be made in these resolutions without submitting them either to Parliament or to the people; in England, they met at the Westminster Palace Hotel in the month of December, and they recast a new scheme of confederation. It is perfectly true, that in that scheme of confederation as finally changed and adopted at the Westminster Palace conference, Sir A. T. Galt did move, and it was accepted, the clause which we have heard so much about here. Now, Sir A. T. Galt was in a sense the representative not merely of the Protestants, but of the British speaking people in the province of Quebec. They had been agitating unquestionably. Notwithstanding the generosity which we always hear so much about—the generosity of the majority who are never tired it seems of heaping favours upon the Protestant minority in this province of Quebec. That Protestant minority of Quebec mistrusted their masters, and they were agitating and insisting that some protection and some guarantee should be given them, prior to the Confederation Act going into effect. They had been promised an amendment to the school law, but that amendment to the school law had been defeated and withdrawn, and they were bound and compelled to assert and to protect themselves. And so, we find that the clause was introduced in England—I refer now to Mr. Pope's compilation of those matters—the question was introduced in England apparently at the instance of the Colonial Secretary, Lord Carnarvon. It is not to be found in or based upon anything that took place in the conference itself, yet, we get another limitation upon the legislative power of the province. Let me draw attention to that clause. It appears as clause 42, on page 107:

> All the powers, privileges and duties conferred and imposed upon Catholic separate schools and school trustees in Upper Canada, shall be extended to the Protestant and Catholic dissentient schools in Lower Canada.

Now, Sir, that was not by virtue of any agreement made at Quebec. It is not to be found in the resolutions that were passed by the Parliaments of United Canada. It is not to be found anywhere until you get to the conference that took place at the Westmister Palace Hotel, and you look in vain through the minutes and the resolutions at the meetings of that conference, to find why this clause was introduced. Its history, so far as I can gather is this: That the Protestant Protective Teachers Association petitioned Her Majesty the Queen, and the petition is to be found at the end of this book, as follows:—

> That notwithstanding the legislative union of Upper and Lower Canada there exists in each portion of the united provinces a distinct educational system.
> That under the educational law of Lower Canada, and in consequence of the denominational character of the schools of the Roman Catholic minority, Your Majesty's subjects, professing the Protestant faith, are subjected to serious disadvantages: first, in being deprived of the benefits of a general system of education similar to that enjoyed by their fellow subjects in Upper Canada; secondly, in their liability to be taxed for the support of the Roman Catholic schools; and thirdly, in the difficulties which they experience in establishing non-denominational or seprate schools and seminaries of higher education for themselves.
> That, though the injury thus inflicted on education, has been the subject of frequent complaints on the part of the Protestant population, and as your petitioners believe, has tended to discourage the settlement of Protestants in this province, and has caused many families to leave this country for others in which they might avoid such inconveniences, no remedy has hitherto been granted by the legislature.
> That, in prospect of the confederation of the province, under the constitution adopted at the Quebec conference, by which it was proposed that education should be under the control of the local legislatures, the Protestants of Lower Canada became alarmed lest they should continue to labour under these disadvantages, and to allay the feelings thus generally existing, solemn pledges were made by the members of the Government, that the grievances complained of should be redressed by parliamentary action before confederation.
> That, though a Bill for this purpose was introduced by the government in the last session of the legislature, it was almost immediately withdrawn; and unless provisions to this end can be introduced into the Imperial Act of Confederation, your memorialists fear that their educational rights will be left to the control of the majority in the local legislatures without any guarantee whatever.

So that, the Protestants were looking after themselves, and they were petitioning and did petition Her Majesty, and asked that the Imperial Government—faith having been broken with them, faith having been broken with them here in the withdrawal of the Bill of 1866—they petitioned the Imperial Government to see that provision was made to protect their rights in the Imperial Act of confederation. And so, we have this clause. And what is this clause? We have already the clause which prevents the local Parliament of Ontario from interfering with Catholic schools or separate schools. We have now a law declaring—and that will be found as a part of the code of education—declaring, that whatever rights the Catholics had at the time of the union, these rights should belong to the Protestants. And then, we have Sir A. T. Galt's provision, in order to protect the Protestant minority, in order to protect them so far as they could be protected, and because of the failure to pass the law in 1866, we had the clause of Sir A. T. Galt, which is found now as a part of the Confederation Act, and which was subsequently embodied in the Manitoba Act.

Now, Sir, I think we had better interpret this statute without these historical references. It is useless to talk about compacts. This is undoubtedly a Federal Parliament. This is a federal constitution. We are guided by the powers conferred upon us by the constitution, and our powers are limited and restricted by the same charter. There is no difficulty whatever in finding a meaning to the language of the constitution; and by the constitution I am as willing to stand and be bound as even the enthusiastic young gentleman who addressed us this afternoon. Although I am not a young Canadian, I am not going to say, as that young gentleman said, that I am prepared to die for the constitution. It is unnecessary. It is far better that we should live up to the Canadian constitution, than that we should attempt to sacrifice our precious lives when that is not called for by any exigencies that arise.

Now, assume it to be a fact that a bargain was made between Upper and Lower Canada, and that that bargain was, on behalf of Lower Canada, that it would not go into confederation unless the school law of 1863 in Upper Canada should remain a fixture; and that at the same time, on behalf of Upper Canada—although Upper Canada does not appear in the matter at all—or rather, on behalf of the Protestant minority of Quebec, it was said, that they would not be parties to the scheme of confederation. Remember, as far back as 1865, by a majority of 85 to 20 they had been committed to this scheme of confederation and all its terms, and they had prayed Her Majesty to pass an Imperial Act in pursuance of those terms. Remember all that; but let us assume for the sake of argument that Upper and Lower Canada made this bargain with regard to their own peculiar circumstances;—what has that to do with Manitoba? What has that to do with British Columbia? What has that to do with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? Surely we shall be keeping faith with every person who spoke with reference to confederation if we keep the bargain between Upper and Lower Canada. There was no trouble in New Brunswick. There was no trouble in Nova Scotia. They were not seeking any limiting powers to be imposed on the local legislatures. They had rather scorned that than otherwise. They had full power with regard to education up to 1867; and in joining confederation they did not wish to tie the hands of the local legislatures. So that if we are keeping the bargain between Upper and Lower Canada, if we in Upper Canada are not seeking to destroy the separate schools there, and if the Lower Canadians are not trying to destroy the rights of the Protestant minority in Lower Canada, then are we not doing all that we bargained to do at the time of confederation? And why are we having this brought forward as an argument with regard to the province of Manitoba? What has it to do with the province of Manitoba? Manitoba was not a part of the Dominion at the time. We had not acquired the territory out of which the province of Manitoba was carved; and when the Minister of Finance spoke of two compacts, he forgot—although a member of the Council of this country should be supposed to understand the subject when he agreed to pass the remedial order—that the Privy Council distinctly stated, in answer to the question, that the British North America Act had nothing at all to do with the province of Manitoba. Does the hon. gentleman want to have that pointed out to him at this time of day? Does he want to know that one of the questions submitted to the Privy Council, was, has the British North America Act anything to do with this question of the Manitoba schools? and the answer, the emphatic answer, was, "No." What have we to do with that, or with the matters that led up to confederation? I am astonished, Sir. The case must be bad indeed when arguments such as this have to be used in order to bolster it up. Let us meet it, Sir. Let us examine the constitution as we find it; but let us not be led away by the statement that there was not only one compact, but two compacts.

Mr. FOSTER. So there were two.

Mr. McCARTHY. No. What record is there of two?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman when he is making an argument; and it is impossible for me to interrupt him in the trend of his argument without almost making a speech myself. I am quite willing to allow what I actually said to be placed before the House and the country side by side with what the hon. gentleman has said, and he will be the first to acknowledge that he has pushed the argument, for the purpose of refuting what I said, far beyond what I did myself. On this last point, for instance, I said that there were two compacts. Will the hon. gentleman deny it? I did not say that the first compact, as a matter of law or as a matter of words, had its bearing directly on the Manitoba question. The second or Manitoba compact has that. But my argument was this, legitimately pushed, fairly pushed, that the spirit of the first compact was followed out by the spirit of the second compact.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am delighted at the explanation of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I am very glad to afford you pleasure.

Mr. McCARTHY. And I think it would require a good deal of ingenuity for any person who has listened to the hon. gentleman's speech—and I confess to have read it—to derive from it any such conclusion as the hon. gentleman states to have been his meaning. However, I accept his meaning. He now withdraws his statement, and says there were not two compacts.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not. My hon. friend has shown his utter incapacity by that very statement to argue fairly and rightly.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman has not withdrawn the statement that there were two compacts ?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. I put it any way the hon. gentleman pleases.

Mr. FOSTER. I dare say——

Mr. McCARTHY. Now, surely I have allowed the hon. gentleman to make a speech, and he should not talk while I am talking. The hon. gentleman says there were two compacts.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. McCARTHY. He said the first had nothing to do with the second except as infusing a spirit into the second. Is that right ?

Mr. FOSTER. Not quite. It is as near as you can get it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, we will try to keep as near to it as the hon. gentleman was. Now, Sir, as a matter of law, at all events, the hon. gentleman has admitted that the first compact had nothing to do with it. Then, if the first compact, as a matter of law—and we are living under a federal constitution—had nothing to do with it, why all that story ? Why all that tissue of misrepresentation, either designed or uttered in ignorance ?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McCARTHY. I said either designed or uttered in ignorance.

Mr. FOSTER. You said a tissue of misrepresentations.

Mr. McCARTHY. So it is. It is a complete tissue of misrepresentations.

Mr. FOSTER. I object to that remark. The ignorant part I do not care about ; but to the other part I do object.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very well. Take your choice about it. I am not going to say it was not ignorance. I will accept the hon. gentleman's statement. But, Sir, if it was through ignorance, it is rather too much for us to be told that we must vote for a Remedial Bill based on statements which are founded in ignorance, and which really are a tissue of misrepresentations.

Mr. FOSTER. It is your own assertion that it was founded in ignorance.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, I cannot please the hon. gentleman. Whether I blow hot or blow cold, it does not matter, he is not satisfied. So I will not attempt to satisfy him. I will go on with the discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. That is right.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, now we come to the Manitoba compact. That was a compact also, it seems. What value does the hon. gentleman attach, what meaning does he attach to the word compact, may I ask ? Does it make the word mean more or less ? Are you to read the Manitoba Act differently from what these words express in plain and simple language ? They are not difficult of interpretation, because we are told it is a compact. What is a compact ? Sir, I have to congratulate the House on one thing in this debate—that no man, even the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) himself, has had the hardihood to get up and contend that there was a fourth bill of rights in this discussion. That was threshed out here last July, and the only thing that we gained by the discussion in the dog days was that that fourth bill of rights has not been heard of this session. Then, where was the compact ? That a certain portion of the people of the Red River were in rebellion, that we sent delegates to these rebels, that they sent, on our invitation, delegates down here, that we had a conference with these delegates, and that the result of that conference was the Manitoba Act, no person disputes. But what we always have disputed, what we have the right to dispute, and our contention is now practically admitted, is that there was no claim or demand on the part of the people of the Red River settlement for separate schools, and that if we found a clause recognizing separate schools in the constitution, it was not put there at the instance of the settlers or the people of the Red River, but was inserted here at the instigation of some influences with which we are not, perhaps, altogether unacquainted, as designing and fixing the legislation of this Parliament. Then, I would like to know why that should be called a compact. I give it all the meaning that is attached to it. I wish to give it full and absolute meaning, the broadest signification, the most liberal interpretation. I am willing to treat it upon the broad lines which the Minister of Finance laid down as proper to guide us in a question of this kind, and I am willing and anxious that the question should be discussed in that way. What does it say ? Let me summarize it, without troubling the House with reading these clauses which have been read so often, and I shall summarize it fairly. The province has unlimited power in the matter of education. The attempt to restrict that power by the first clause in the Manitoba constitution was found, upon investigation by the Judicial Committee, to be meaningless. The clause was found to be meaningless, and the consequence is that the Manitoba legislature has absolute power to deal with the subject of education, just as if there was no limitation there at all. Mark you. I will not pretend that is not subject to our review. I am speaking of it in the first instance. The legislature of Manitoba has the power to deal with education under the terms of the Manitoba Act:

> In and for the province, the said legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions.

The first provision was bound to be a meaningless provision. There were no facts and circumstances upon which it could act.

> Nothing in any such law, says the first provision, shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

Neither by law, if there was any law, nor by practice. Has the Privy Council determined that there is any class of persons who had any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools at the time? The consequence is you cannot draw any conclusion from that clause, so far as the province of Manitoba is concerned. But the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) has told us that we are to interpret this law, not according to what it says, but as to what it was intended to say. Is there any principle upon which laws are interpreted that way? Can we bind the people of Manitoba by what the Minister of Justice says was intended by that law? Intended?—why it is perfectly plain. They desired to put the people of the Red River exactly in the same position as that in which the people of the other provinces have been placed, and therefore used the words "by practice"; and exactly as that clause has no application in Nova Scotia nor in New Brunswick, nor in Prince Edward Island, where, although they had law, there was no law by which denominational schools had any rights or privileges, so it has no application in Manitoba, where they had not such school, either by law or practice. So, in this Red River country the word "practice" did not add anything, because, on investigation of the facts of the case, there was found to be neither law nor practice by which denominational schools had any privilege or advantage. If this part of the Dominion was to be placed on an equal footing with the settled parts, it was only fair to introduce the words "by practice," as there could possibly be no law. And when we pass from that, then we find that this province was within its right, as the courts of law determined, when it abolished the separate school law by the statute of 1890. Absolutely within its rights.

Now, if it was within its rights, if the province of Manitoba was right in abolishing separate schools, and if here we have the right to sit in review of that, I ask in what spirit should we approach it? Are you to give credit for good faith on the part of the province? Are you to assume that the province has acted wantonly or that the province and the legislature of that province has desired to do the duty that it owed to its citizens, which was to see to their education? Why, when the state assumes the education of the child, when the state takes from the parent that which belongs to the parent, and sees to the education of his child, it does so for the public good. It does so because in a democracy such as ours, it is important that the citizens should be educated, it is important that they should grow up fit to fulfil and perform the duties of citizens. And the province has the responsibility of undertaking to see that the children of the people are educated, I would like to know what evidence there is here to show that the province did not properly discharge that duty when they passed the law of 1890. Are you going to say, simply because separate schools were established in 1871, with 12,000 people—the size of a township, with twenty-four representatives, it is true, and a senate, and a Lieutenant-Governor, and all the rest of it, a township, a handful of uneducated people—are you going to say that because that was done in 1871, the enlightened people of Manitoba had no right to review the situation in 1890? Are you going to say, without evidence, without accusation, without the pretense that in what they did in that respect they did not act with the full sense of responsibility, and with the desire to carry out in the very fullest manner the duties and responsibilities that were cast upon them—are you going to say that in so acting they were unwarranted and inflicted a grievance on any section of the people? Or how are we to look at it? The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), whom I see leaving the chamber, and others, told us that it was the law, that the Privy Council was behind them, and that the law-abiding people of Canada were going to obey the law, no matter how the law might fall. I suppose the hon. gentleman believes that; we are bound to accept his statement that he does. But, Sir, I do pity this country that had such a legal luminary as Minister of Justice, if that is his idea of the law.

Mr. FOSTER. Don't waste your pity.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is too late to waste my pity, the hon. Minister of Finance suggests——

Mr. FOSTER. I said, don't waste it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Therefore, I won't mind doing it. The law demanded this, we are told. That was a ridiculous statement when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) here from Gananoque made it; but, Sir, in him it was excusable. But to have a gentleman who calls himself a lawyer, who has actually been at the head of the law in this country, who has had the power of life and death and other very important powers—to have him come on the floor of Parliament and tell us that the Privy Council had determined that we were to pass this law, is ridiculous. Why, even the Minister of Finance could not tackle that. He is equal to most things, but he was not equal to that. Now, what did the law say? Listening to the hon. Minister of Finance, as I did the other evening, one could not but wonder what had been the cause of all the delay. Here was compact No. 1, compact No. 2—the matter was so clear that I wondered why, in the name of fortune, this unforunate minority had not had their rights restored to them four years ago. But it did not seem to the distinguished Minister of Justice of that day quite so simple a matter. Take the chronology of this case—let us recall it for a moment. It was hastily given to us this afternoon, but let me re-state some of the dates. Remember that it was in 1892 that the law was found to be a constitutional law. Remember that it was in the fall of that year that the minority petitioned for redress under the clause that we are now considering. And remember that a committee of the Privy Council was appointed, with Sir John Thompson at the head of it, and that that committee actually laid down the questions which were to be considered, and that it actually heard one day's argument on the question and then broke up, finding that the problem was too difficult for it to solve. What was it they wanted to know? They did not ask the Privy Council in England what to do, but they did ask the Supreme Court, whether, under the circumstances, and assuming the circumstances to be true which were stated in the petition—as was very properly pointed out by the hon. leader of the Opposition—there was a case that gave the minority the right to appeal and gave the Governor General in Council jurisdiction to pass the remedial order. And the Supreme Court of Canada was called upon to determine that simple question of law. The Supreme Court, as we know, said that no case had arisen. The same law which gave the Supreme Court jurisdiction gave the right of appeal from the Supreme Court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That appeal was made, not because it is Her Majesty's Judicial Committee, but because there is a right of appeal under the law from the judgment given by the Supreme Court in answer to the questions that our Government then submitted to that tribunal; and the judgment of the Judicial Committee is, in fact, the answers which the Supreme Court, in their opinion, ought to have given. And what are the answers? The answers are, in effect, that there is a jurisdiction under the circumstances that have arisen; that the British North America Act has nothing at all to do with it; that the whole question rests upon the Manitoba Constitutional Act; and that, under these circumstances, the Governor in Council has power to pass a remedial order.

Now, Sir, if I might, without wearying the House, I would like to call attention to the conduct of the Government at that time. And, while I do not go with the leader of the Opposition in requiring any further investigation, while from the investigation I have made I am perfectly satisfied that there is no possible case for interference. I ask the attention of the House and the country to the conduct shown and the course taken by the Government of Canada after this appeal was made. I care not whether you call it an appeal or whether you call it a complaint. What the laws said was that if separate schools are established in a province, or if separate schools exist in a province, when it is brought into the union, and if these separate schools are abolished or interfered with, although it is perfectly competent for the local legislature to do that, nevertheless, the minority may come to the central power and ask that the whole subject may be reconsidered. Well, Sir, the minority came as they had a right to do. The Government, after much difficulty, ascertained what the meaning of the clause was. It was found that the minority had a case which gave the Governor General power to hear them and to pass an order. What ought to have been the conduct of the Government with a province, one of its own provinces? There was not a war with Manitoba raging at that time. Manitoba was one of the provinces of this Dominion which had passed a law within its constitutional rights. Surely the proper course would have been, even as between friendly states, to communicate with the government of Manitoba; to say to that government: Here is a minority who have enjoyed what, to them, is a privilege, and what they claim as a right, from 1871 to 1890, and you have passed a law and swept that right away, and they have come to us and complained, and we ask why and wherefore this has been done. Not a word of it. They were treated as a hostile people. A summons, an order, was issued for them to appear—not, remember, in 1895, for the first time, but in the winter of 1893, without a word of warning, without the courtesy of a communication. They were treated as wrong-doers and were summoned here to the bar of the central power to answer for themselves, to defend their rights and justify their proceedings. I challenge any hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches—and they are all mixed up in this, more or less, we do not know how much or how little, but they are all responsible—I challenge them to point out in the history of the civilized world a case in which a friendly power—not a part of our own political system as the province is, but a friendly power—has been treated as Manitoba has been treated in this case. Was that the way to conciliate the province? Was that the way to ascertain whether a wrong had been done? Was that the way to do, if you wanted to get for the minority a restoration of what they call their rights? You summoned them, then you paused, you became alarmed, you took subterfuge in the courts, and you prayed God that the Supreme Court would say you had no jurisdiction, and you were bitterly disappointed when the Judicial Committee overturned the decision of the tribunal here, and cast upon you the jurisdiction. You wanted to hold yourselves forth as the defenders of the minority to the people of the province of Quebec, who are so much interested in this matter, and to avoid the responsibility to your friends in the province of Ontario, who are very much opposed to it; and you have wriggled and twisted from that day to this. And even now you are not done with it, for we are going through the solemn farce of meeting here for four months, a Bill being introduced in the middle of February, and brought to a second reading on 17th March, and we are told, that negotiations are then to be commenced, and the matter is to be hung up. The principle is to be established, you are to force your followers to eat dirt, if you can, and many of them will do it for a consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for North Simcoe will realize, that that is not a proper expression.

Mr. McCARTHY. I bow to the Speaker's ruling. He says that the followers of the Government will not eat dirt.

Mr. SPEAKER. I refer to the hon. member's statement, that the supporters of the Government would do certain things for a consideration. That, I think, is not parliamentary, and the hon. member ought to withdraw it.

Mr. McCARTHY. As to the latter part of the statement, it seems I am out of order, and I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, and at once withdraw the expression. The rumours, we see, are all fiction. We read the newspapers so frequently that we get imbued, perhaps, with the statements they make. I apologize for that statement. It is not true, Sir, I am quite certain, that there are a great number of members now hanging on to the skirts of the Government, demanding compensation for their vote, in the shape of office.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not true: I say it is not true. I could give you the names; but it is not true, and I am bound not to do it.

An hon. MEMBER. What are you talking about, then?

Mr. McCARTHY. What am I talking about? I am taking it back.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is competent for an hon. gentleman to shelter himself by a subterfuge and a side wind, and at the same time to utter a gross libel upon the members of this House.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask you to rule, whether the leader of the House is in order in the language he has just used.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the House is getting into a state of disorder. The member for Simcoe certainly did use an unparliamentary expression, in saying that hon. members of this House would be influenced to do certain things, to vote for a Bill, for a consideration: and I understood the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perfectly correct.

Mr. SPEAKER. Since that time I have not understood him to make any unparliamentary statement.

Mr. EDGAR. I rise to a point of order, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether you consider that the leader of the House was in order, when he characterized the language of the member for Simcoe as a subterfuge and a libel?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The statement I made was this, that the hon. gentleman had uttered a gross libel upon members of this House, and he has been obliged to withdraw that. What I objected to was, that by any subterfuge he should endeavour to repeat it, and to fix it upon members of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is not in order in using the word "subterfuge."

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call your attention to this point of order, to a statement made——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member proposes to raise another point of order, he is quite in order in doing so. But the hon. member must either accept the ruling of the Chair on the point already raised, or appeal to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. The point of order I wish to raise is this: The hon. gentleman went on to state, that it is not true that there are members in this House who will vote for a compensation.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman himself is out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I have a right to state the point of order I am making. The member for Simcoe went on to state further: "It is not true that there are several gentlemen who are willing to do that. I could give the names of those gentlemen, but it is not true." Now, that phrase, "I could give the names of those gentlemen," taken in connection with the hon. gentleman's previous statement, it seems to me, constitutes a direct imputation, and he cannot cover that up by saying just afterwards, "It is not true." That is the point I take.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not quite understand the member for Simcoe to be casting a further imputation on the members of the House. What I did understand him to say was, that, although the newspapers had made these statements with regard to members of Parliament, he did not believe them to be true.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, if you will allow me, he said——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order. Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. I am discussing the question. I do not question the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. Finance Minister is entirely in order.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not understand the Speaker to have ruled decisively upon the point of order I raised, and I appeal now to my hon. friend who used the words, whether I am correct in my understanding of what he said, and whether he did not say: "I could give the names of those hon. gentlemen, but it is not true, and, therefore, I am not going on to give the names." That is the point of order to which I rose, and I think my hon. friend will admit that he did put in that parenthesis in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member for Simcoe meant to continue the imputation that he first uttered, by his subsequent remarks, these latter are out of order.

Mr. McCARTHY. Honours being easy, I do not think we will pursue this matter any further. I do not wonder that the leader of the House has got libel on the brain at the present moment.

Mr. EDGAR. The point of order I raised, I understood, was ruled by you to a large extent in my favour. But we have not heard any expression of regret from the Secretary of State.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the House to understand, that the leader of the House does not submit to the ruling of the Chair, that he is out of order in using the words "subterfuge and libel?"

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am satisfied I was strictly in order in calling attention to the fact, which your subsequent ruling has established, that the hon. member, by putting his language in that hypothetical way, was continuing to impute the charge he made at first, and which charge, I repeat, is the grossest libel that an hon. gentleman in this House can utter. I say, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly in order, and I am in the judgment of the Chair, and of the House, when I say, that the language of the hon. gentleman is the grossest libel that one member of this House can utter against another, that is, to charge him with being influenced in his vote by the promise of office. Taking it on that ground, your subsequent ruling, Mr. Speaker, entirely justified me in calling attention to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think perhaps the leader of the House did not quite apprehend what my ruling was with respect to the statement which he made. What I ruled was, that the word subterfuge as applied to an expression used by an hon. member of this House is not, in my opinion, in order, and it is a word which the leader of the House should withdraw.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection to substitute the word device for subterfuge.

Mr. LAURIER. I ask your ruling again, Mr. Speaker. I ask whether that is such language as the leader of the House, who should set an example in debate, should use.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sure the House will agree with me that the incident which has just taken place is one that had better have been entirely omitted. While, of course, I have no power to do anything further than express my own opinion in regard to matters that occur, and rule according to the best of my judgment, I am sure the House will credit me with having ruled according to the best of my judgment in giving expression to the opinion that the word subterfuge was not a parliamentary term, and that it is one which the leader of the House, I am quite sure, will withdraw.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have withdrawn it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. FOSTER. He has already withdrawn it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is not unnatural that the leader of the House should claim exemption from the rule that governs the rest of us. It is in the nature of a resurrection, we must remember. Under the circumstances, I, for my part, am not going to enforce or insist on the hon. gentleman doing what perhaps a humbler member, guided by the ordinary principles which regulate man and man, whether as members of the House or of any other assembly, would feel impelled to do without the dictation of the Chair.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We will not take any further proceedings against him.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will proceed with my argument, and I trust, at all events, not to offend again the proprieties of the House. I was dealing, Sir, at the moment with the consideration that we ought to attach to the Manitoba constitution. It will be perhaps in the memory of the House that the Minister of Finance, with whose address I am mainly dealing, in no way or other gave the House to understand that although there had been no bill of rights, which he declined, in point of fact, to argue in support of, nevertheless from the terms of the Queen's proclamation, from the language conveyed in the construction given to the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), who was a commissioner at that time, the people of Manitoba, to whom these delegations were sent, and as to whom this proclamation was issued, had a right to assume, and could naturally assume, that they would be dealt with in this Parliament on the most favourable terms. For my part, Sir, I do not think it is necessary to labour that argument, for while I have here the blue-book containing the proclamation of Her Majesty and letter of instructions to the hon. member for Montreal West, as well as to his co-delegates, I think it will be perfectly clear that there was nothing more said either in the proclamation or in the instructions to the delegates than that the civil and religious liberties of the people of Red River would be respected and that they would have the rights of British subjects. The quotations that were given by the Minister of Finance do not put the matter any further than that, and it is unnecessary for me to criticise or to point out that the argument which was founded on that statement was certainly not warranted by anything contained in the text. Then, if that be not so, we are driven back to the document itself.

I yield to no man in the House in the broad and liberal interpretation which I am prepared to give to this remedial clause. I worship the constitution, if it is not idolatry, almost to the extent that it is worshipped by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. But I want to know whether the constitution is only in force in Ottawa; I want to know whether no respect is to be paid to the constitution at Winnipeg. By the very same terms of the constitution, by the very code we have with respect to education, the duty and responsibility are first cast upon the provinces, and it is only when complaint is made here and when certain events happen, all of which have happened, that we are called upon in any sense to interfere. Ought we not first to assume—I am speaking to reasonable men, I am speaking as a reasonable man—that the legislative body charged with this duty at Winnipeg discharged that duty according to their sense of right and wrong. Are we to assume without evidence, without a charge, that this legislative body, consisting of forty of the chosen representatives of the people, passed this law in 1890 wantonly, without cause, without consideration, without justification ? They have since, we know, adopted that law, and ratified that law, at two elections. I am perhaps more familiar with the practice of courts than I am with dealing with a question of this kind in an assembly of this nature ; but a rule of the courts, which I venture to say is a proper rule for our guidance, is this, that where a question is a proper question to be submitted to a jury, and a jury has determined that question, without the imputation of improper motives being passed, no matter whether you accept the verdict or not, no matter whether it is a correct verdict or not, the highest court of the land would sustain the finding of the tribunal to which the law of the land has committed the responsibility. Surely the solemn verdict of the legislature of Manitoba is as much entitled to respect as is the verdict, or conclusion of a petty jury of twelve men. But, Sir, what are the accusations that are made ? I have gone through the petitions that were presented to His Excellency the Governor General in Council. These petitions emanated from the province, and from a body there called the National Congress, and in the petitions the allegation that is made is this :

> The Roman Catholics regard such schools (namely the schools that had been established in 1890) as unfit for the purpose of education, and the children of Roman Catholic parents cannot and will not attend to any such schools. Rather than countenance such schools, Roman Catholics will revert to the voluntary system in operation previous to the Manitoba Act, and will at their own private expense, establish, support and maintain schools in accordance with their principles and their faith, although by doing so, they will have in addition thereto, to contribute to the expense of the so-called public schools.

They also allege :

> That the Public School Act requires all members of the community, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, to contribute by taxation to the support of what are called public schools, but are in reality a continuation of the Protestant schools.

In addition to these causes, which are all the complaints that are made by the petitions, the Conservative League, which appears to be an organization in Montreal, dating their petition from Montreal on the 3rd of November, 1892, stated that there was a treaty in 1870 between the Government of Canada and the people of Manitoba, in which it was agreed that their separate schools should be preserved to them. It also refers to the Treaty of Paris of 1763, and it impugns the judgment of the Privy Council. Now, the whole complaint made by the petitioners, if we take the last document first, is that there was a treaty in 1870, founded, no doubt, upon the exploded fourth bill of rights, and that there was a Treaty of Paris, which no person here has ventured to refer to as having anything in the least to do with the subject. And, we come back, then, Sir, to the charges that were made in the petition emanating from the province itself, and these charges are: That these schools were Protestant schools, and the statement is made that these schools are unfit for Roman Catholics to attend. Now, Sir, with regard to these schools being Protestant schools, I can only say as has been said more than once in this discussion, that that charge has been completely disposed of, and that that charge is answered and decided by the first decision of the Privy Council. The Act of 1890 itself says that they are to be non-sectarian. If the schools are non-sectarian, according to the Act, then they are not Protestant, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council considered that very question, and if I may trouble the House with an extract from their judgment upon that point, I think it must dispose of it so far, at all events, as it is possible for a court of law to dispose of the question. I read, Sir, with your permission, an extract from that judgment:

> Notwithstanding the Public Schools Act, 1890, Roman Catholics and members of every other religious body in Manitoba are free to establish schools throughout the province; they are free to maintain their schools by school fees or voluntary subscriptions; they are free to conduct their schools according to their own religious tenets without molestation or interference. No child is compelled to attend a public school. No special advantage other than the advantage of a free education in schools conducted under public management is held out to those who do attend. But then, it is said that it is impossible for Roman Catholics, or for members of the Church of England (if their views are correctly represented by the Bishop of Rupert's Land, who has given evidence in Logan's case), to send their children to public schools where the education is not superintended and directed by the authorities of the church, and that, therefore, Roman Catholics and members of the Church of England who are taxed for public schools, and at the same time feel themselves compelled to support their own schools, are in a less favourable position than those who can take advantage of the free education provided by the Act of 1890. That may be so. But what right or privilege is violated or prejudicially affected by the law? It is not the law that is in fault; it is owing to religious convictions, which everybody must respect, and to the teachings of their church, that Roman Catholics and the members of the Church of England find themselves unable to partake of advantages which the law offers to all alike. Their lordships are sensible of the weight which must attach to the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court. They have anxiously considered the able and elaborate judgments by which that decision has been supported. But, they are unable to agree with the opinion which the learned judges of the Supreme Court have expressed as to the rights and privileges of Roman Catholics in Manitoba at the time of the union. They doubt whether it is permissible to refer to the course of legislation between 1871 and 1890, as a means of throwing light on the previous practice or on the construction of the saving clause in the Manitoba Act. They cannot assent to the view, which seems to be indicated by one of the members of the Supreme Court, that public schools under the Act of 1890 are in reality Protestant schools. The legislature has declared in so many words that the public schools shall be entirely unsectarian, and that principle is carried out throughout the Act.

If then, Sir, the schools are not Protestant, and if the schools are non-sectarian, we come back to the one remaining charge, and that is, that these schools are unfit—to use the language of the petition—for Catholics to attend. Now, I apprehend, Sir, that the gentleman who penned that probably wrote it in French, and that the words I have quoted are a translation. I do not think that if he had penned it in English that we would find the charge made, that these schools are unfit for children to attend. But what is the fact, Sir? The fact is, that these schools are the ordinary public schools, common to all the rest of the Dominion. I do not mean to say that they are exactly the same, but I do mean to say that there is no substantial difference between the public schools of this province of Ontario and those of Manitoba. And, so far as I know, there is no substantial difference between the public schools of the other provinces and the schools of the province of Manitoba. Nay, Sir, I will go further. If I am properly informed, the schools of the minority of the province of Quebec are of the same character; schools that are, and can be attended by Roman Catholis, even there. And, Sir, what is the fact in our own province? The fact in our own province, proved by statistics, is, that notwithstanding the right to separate schools, notwithstanding the power to have them, more than half—some say nearly two-thirds—certainly more than half of the children of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Ontario are actually attending the public schools of that province.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). They will if they are fairly treated.

Mr. McCARTHY. They always will if they are fairly treated, says my hon. friend, and I hope they always will be fairly treated, and I certainly should be very sorry to see any attempt to proselytize or interfere with any child, Roman Catholic or otherwise, in any of our public schools. But, Sir, if they are fit for the Roman Catholics of Ontario to attend, and fit for the Roman Catholics of the province of Quebec to attend—I am speaking of the British-speaking children—and fit for the Roman Catholic children of the province from which the hon. gentleman who interrupted me comes from, I would like to know how it can be said they are unfit to use in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It depends on the books they are to use.

Mr. McCARTHY. The books are the same as they are in our province—substantially the same.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No, not the same at all—far different altogether from what they are in Nova Scotia.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not speaking about Nova Scotia ; I am speaking about Manitoba. They are substantially the same. And in the argument which took place before the Committee of the Privy Council here, with the curriculum and the course of studies spread out, the only objection which Mr. Ewart, on behalf of the minority, made to the books used was a history called "Buckley's History," and it turned out, on investigation, that "Buckley's History" was being used in the convent schools in the city of Winnipeg. So that the petition here does not give any ground for interference. I ask this Parliament—if they will look at this matter as business men, apart from political influences, and as the council of this country ought to have looked at it when this petition was presented, and an inquiry was made—what conclusion could His Excellency the Governor General arrive at other than that the grounds set forth in the petitions did not entitle the petitioners to any relief ? Why, Sir—let me give it as a typical instance—in the North-west Territories, where separate schools are established by law, there is but one course of studies for separate schools and for Protestant schools—one curriculum and one set of books. The only distinction is that in some sections there are Catholic school trustees and a Catholic teacher. But the course of studies is the same in both ; and when the Roman Catholic bishops appealed here against that state of things, and asked that that law should be vetoed, what did the Government do ? Why, they refused to interfere. The Government that now insists that Manitoba, an independent province, must restore the separate school system as it existed in 1890—that same Government, when appealed to against the ordinance of the North-west assembly, when appealed to against the ordinance of the North-west assembly, which established practically but one set of schools, although allowing separate schools, so far as the election of officers and the appointment of teachers were concerned, permitted that law to go into effect—depriving the bishops of the control and of the right to say what books should be used, other than those who were on the Council of Public Instruction. That law was allowed to remain on the statute-book as not inflicting any injustice on the Catholics of the North-west. Then, why ought we to interfere with Manitoba, if we take the grounds put forward ? The order has been made. The Bill is before us. I ask every man in this House, can he conscientiously say that he ought to interfere with a free legislature which has thought fit to abolish separate schools, even on the showing of the petitioners themselves ?

Mr. AMYOT. Rank tyranny.

Mr. McCARTHY. I ask whether, upon the showing of the petitions themselves, any fair and reasonable man would interfere. Remember, we are not legislating. Remember, it is not our jurisdiction. Remember, we are here to supervise. Remember, we are here to undo what we think has been improperly done. That is our course, that is our power, and that alone. Under these circumstances, I want to know whether it would be proper and right to interfere ?

But, Sir, I will not stop there. I do not want to treat this thing technically. I will come to Mr. Ewart's argument. Mr. Ewart was not tied down by the petition. He came before the Council, representing the minority, and he spread his grievances before them. And what were the grievances ? He divided his argument into six heads. Three of those, you will remember, were founded on affidavits, and he withdrew them. We may therefore dismiss them, as he thought proper to dismiss them. He cannot surely ask the Governor General to pass a remedial order upon certain grounds which he withdrew, and afterwards ask Parliament to implement the order of the Governor General, based upon those grounds. And what was left ? There was left, Sir, the argument based on the fourth bill of rights, about which we hear no more, and the argument in favour of separate schools, without anything to support it beyond the statement that separate schools are preferable to public schools.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The affidavit about the bill of rights was withdrawn, also.

Mr. McCARTHY. It was, but still it was treated as historical, and I was quite willing that it should be so treated. But we have never yet had the truth with regard to that so-called bill of rights. It was said to be in the office of the Minister of Justice, and I asked for it at the time. I asked if the statement with regard to Lepine was true, to have the whole statement brought down. On two occasions returns brought down to this House were based on that document as if it was genuine, while we all know that it was a spurious document. So we have all the charges made by Mr. Ewart withdrawn, and only the statement remaining with regard to separate schools being preferable to public schools.

But there is another side to this question. Did the legislature of Manitoba wantonly do away with this system of schools ? Did they do so simply out of bigotry ? Nay, Sir, am I the author of all this discord that has arisen ? Did those few words which I uttered in Portage la Prairie in the summer of 1889 really stir up the government and the people of that province so much as to induce them to abolish the separate schools and establsh the public school system ? It is a pity to destroy my own credit, but I cannot help doing so, having regard to the facts. The truth is that at that time, before I reached Manitoba at all, the government had announced their determination to do away with the dual system. On the very day that I reached Winnipeg I saw in the morning paper the statement that at a place called Clearwater, one of the Ministers of the Greenway government had announced as the policy of that government that the dual system of schools was to be abolished. I read that statement—I misread it I dare say—understanding that the separate school system was to be done away. In that I appear to have been mistaken. It was yet a matter for consideration whether, in abolishing the dual system, which entailed double expense on the province, they would also abolish the separate schools. Ultimately, it was determined that the separate schools should go with the dual system, and they went accordingly.

Now, it has been said with a good deal of force, why were those separate schools not reformed ? Their inefficiency has been challenged. Has any man disputed it ? They were not fulfilling the purpose for which they were designed. The children in the settlements where separate schools existed were growing up in ignoranc—ignorance which, to use Mr. Sifton's words, was a disgrace to any civilized community. Did not that call for an inquiry ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Has the hon. gentleman any evidence of that ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes. Was the legislature which was spending the money of the people in the attempt to educate their children not bound to inquire and investigate, when that money was not being properly used—at any rate, was not achieving the design for which it was intended ? The hon. gentleman asks me if I have any evidence. I ask him to appeal to his friends. What is the Bill they have given you ? Why, the Bill, on the face of it, admits the inefficiency of the schools. It says that you are not fit to be trusted with the management of the schools, with the examination of the teachers, or with the choice of the books.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Do you call that evidence ?

Mr. McCARTHY. If that is not sufficient for the hon. gentleman, then I would like to know what further evidence he wants ? Why did the Government, why did your own friends, after ordering the province to restore the system as it was, deprive you of this control ?

An hon. MEMBER. Not as it was.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, the remedial order if I understand the English language, said as it was—as it was A, B and C, and in every respect. Then, have not the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches been going from stump to stump telling us how they were going to make the schools efficient. They never denied that the schools, as they existed, were inefficient. On the contrary, everybody knows they were inefficient. The public money voted for the schools was improperly expended, and in saying this I speak from evidence which ought to be accepted by this House. Remember how the money was used. A certain sum was granted by the province, and that sum was divided, according to school population. Acensus was taken by the trustees themselves, and the money was handed over, one portion to the Protestant and the other portion to the Catholic section of management ; and the Attorney General of Manitoba has not hesitated publicly to say that that money, so obtained, from the province was obtained dishonestly and unfairly, and that there was no ground and no pretense for the sums which the Roman Catholics exacted from the public treasury. Now, that is Mr. Sifton's own statement, which I will trouble the House by reading.

Mr. DUPONT. The statement of Mr. Sifton is not proof.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman says it is not proof. Well, the public must judge between the Attorney General of the province and the hon. gentleman. All I can say is that I have the statement which was deliberately made, and in which that charge is deliberately stated. Here are the words of Mr. Sifton :

> It was found that the school population which had been returned by the Catholic section of the Board of Education was palpably inaccurate.
> Again there were grave abuses in connection with the distribution of money. We have never been able to ascertain how the Catholic section worked the matter out. But I will give you one result of the distribution of the public money. They so managed that while the Protestant school districts received $197 each, the Catholic districts got $347 each ; that while for each Protestant teacher there was paid $121.76, for each Roman Catholic teacher there was paid $195.05.

That does not stand quite on Mr. Sifton's statement alone. Let me give you the statistics :

> The Roman Catholic population between 1885 and 1891 was 13½ per cent; the school population in 1889 was 23,214.

Of course, it is not definite or positive, but relatively. The school population of the Catholics, according to that proportion, 13½ per cent, should have been 3,017, whereas they actually drew on a population of 4,364 or 19 per cent.

Mr. GILLIES. How could that be ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Because they made the census themselves.

Mr. GILLIES. That is improbable.

Mr. HAZEN. Was it the provincial census ?

Mr. McCARTHY. The school law required them to make a census every year, and the distribution was based on that census.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Is the hon. gentleman aware that these census returns were duly sworn ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I suppose so ; but if so, that does not make the matter much better.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman's observations are an attack on the board of management.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes ; before we overturn, before we overrule, before we undo what was done by the Manitoba legislature, I want, if I can, to possess the House of the facts which were before the legislature, and upon which that body arrived upon the conclusion that it ought to abolish the separate schools of 1870 or 1871. It was not only that, but, as I have said before, illiteracy prevailed. Now, I give Mr. Sifton's evidence on that point, also :

> The separate schools, as conducted prior to 1890, were simply indefensible from an educational standpoint. The public money was in fact used to support the church. The schools were conducted in a manner that would be a disgrace to any civilized country. It was found that in the districts where the separate schools were in existence, they were conducted in a manner that would be a disgrace to any civilized country. * * * * * It was found throughout the districts where the separate schools were in existence that the priests and the members of the Roman Catholic clergy of one kind and another connected with the various orders which they have in that church * * that these gentlemen were teachers of the schools in a large majority of cases and yet they were actually the parish priests. That while they were conducting the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church they were at the same time the teachers of the Roman Catholic schools. It was found to be a common thing that while these gentlemen were drawing money as Catholic school teachers that in their districts school would be kept open for a week or two weeks or three weeks or that the school would be open for only two days in the week. It was found that actually the system of education which was followed in separate schools was no system at all.

What was the result ? It was what we might naturally expect, absolute illiteracy, public money wasted, large sums of public money taken from the people themselves by a direct tax, large sums taken from the Government grant, and all with this unfortunate result. These instances are given :

> Petition re change in Boundaries of Elm River municipality. Twenty-eight names on petition (4 English, 24 French or half-breeds.) English all sign their names. Eighteen French or half-breeds sign by mark.
> Petition for bridge over Turtle River. Fifty-four names on petition (French and half-breeds). Twenty-four out of 27 half-breeds sign by mark.
> Add to these the well authenticated case of a petition presented to the legislature by the reeve and councillors of a municipality, one of whom signed his name, while five signed by mark.
> Petition from municipality of Montcalm re destruction of diseased animals. Seven names on petition (all French). Three sign by mark.
> Petition of residents in St. Vital re placing certain river lots in municipality of Cartier. Twenty-two names on petition (all French or half-breeds). Ten sign by mark.
> Petition asking that Grande Point Settlement be declared part of the municipality of Taché. Twelve names on petition (all French or half-breeds). Five sign by mark.

Mr. AMYOT. Has the hon. gentleman the age of those who made their mark ?

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman asks me if I have their age. The province, I think, was about nineteen years old when this system had been established, and we had been told—or else I have misread history altogether—that prior to that there had been efficient Catholic schools kept up by voluntary system. We have been told this gave the right to this separate school system after confederation, so that I do not know it would help us very much to know the age of these men who made their mark. Now, these were some of the results. Well, they inquired also into the system of education. Remember, it was all in the hands of this school board. And the head of the school board was the Archbishop, and the different priests were members—it was wholly in clerical hands. All teachers were ecclesiastics or members of some order connected with the church. And the result of the teaching at these schools may be given in a few words. In the 2nd, 3rd and 4th divisions, the history taught was confined to Old and New Testament. In the 5th division—there were seven divisions in all—the history of Canada under the French regime. In the 6th and 7th, British and British-Canadian. And I may just give you the following, as an example of British history :—

> As to English history, instruction in that branch, seems to have been regarded as a farce. A perusal of the examination papers set for first-class certificates will show that the questions set in history were exactly the same in 1880, 1881 and 1882. Those of 1884 were the same as those of 1883. The only question asked > in English history as distinct from Canadian history, for first-class certificates in 1880, 1881 and 1882 was : " Relate the conquest of England by William of Normandy." The only question relating to English history in 1883 and 1884 was : " Describe the establishment of Christianity in England." The questions in 1885 sufficiently indicate the bent of the examiners :

> " Who was St. Thomas Becket ? What difficulty had he with Henry II. ? How did he die ? What was the fate of Mary Stuart ?"
> In 1887 the candidates are again asked to explain the conquest of England by the Normans. They are also to describe the causes of the schism in England and to give their views on " the reign of Elizabeth and the role of Cromwell."

Then, decorum formed another subject. And the points in decorum were how to address a letter to a prelate or a priest, how to conclude such letters, how to behave in a holy place, what titles to employ in conversation:

> Reading constituted a fifth division, and it is only necessary to open the prescribed text books, to find such extracts as the following, about Saint Helen :—
> Our Lord then showed His love for her, by letting her find the true Cross on which He had shed His blood. The sick were cured when they touched the cross.
> Saint Helen had a large church built, and in it she placed the cross. (Sadlier's Dominion Catholic First Reader, Part II., p. 58) ; or this from Wilfrid's journey with the Angel :

I do not know whether any reference is made here to the hon. leader of the Opposition.

> Other lands were dotted with ancient Christian churches, but without proper altars ; and with no Blessed Sacrament, no Mass, no pictures of the Mother of Jesus ; and Wilfrid thought, but he was not sure, that the angel was more sorrowful over these lands, than over those without churches. (Sadlier's Dom. Third Reader.)

Now, an example from the grammar. In one instance, they were called upon to correct a sentence describing the colour of silk stockings, worn by cardinals. The subjects in composition included a letter to his parent from a child who is preparing for his first communion ; and the following interesting subject :—

> The priesthood show the grandeur of the priest and the benefits which he confers.

Now, there are subjects, and we have the results.

Mr. BERGERON. Before the hon. gentleman leaves that subject, will he allow me to ask him one question ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Certainly.

Mr. BERGERON. Taking all this for granted, could not the provincial government have remedied it without abolishing entirely the separate school system ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has asked me that question. I intended to come to it before I sat down, and, if the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will finish this branch of the subject before dealing with it. There was another matter that engaged their attention, and that was, that these schools were absolutely French schools. Now, whether the province was right, or whether it was wrong, the task the province set itself was to have a homogeneous people. They had Icelanders, they had Mennonites. And I would refer you, as I do not think I should be justified in taking up your time by reading it, to Dr. Bryce's statement with regard to that. Dr. Bryce was a member of the Council of Public Instruction. He has made an affidavit in the Barrett case. He found, that, while the system of separate schools existed, they could not prevail upon the Mennonites to come in and submit themselves to any school system. They found that the same was true of the Icelanders. The desire of the province was not to have Icelanders speaking Icelandic, to have Mennonites speaking their own language, but to make them all British subjects, speaking the English tongue. They desired the French Canadian half-breeds and the French from the province of Quebec to grow up in the same way. And, instead of their being so, the schools, so far as the French Canadians were concerned, were actually conducted as if the district of Provencher were in the province of Quebec :

> The teachers were in the main, not only Roman Catholic but French. The inspectors, as their names indicate, were nearly all French. French was the language of the schools. English was practically a langue étrangère—a foreign tongue. Under the regulations of August 10, 1879, it was provided that the language spoken by the majority of the ratepayers of a school district should be that taught in the school, and that teachers should have a right to an increase of salary when required to teach une autre langue. No teacher in a French school could be required to teach English, and no teacher in an English school could be required to teach French unless the children were furnished with the books prescribed by the Roman Catholic section, nor unless they were able to read in the language of the district when that language is their mother tongue. In any case the trustees were required to communicate with the council before introducing into a school une langue étrangère to the majority of the ratepayers of the district. (Minute Book No. 1, p. p. 78 and 80.)

Now, that does not rest merely upon the statement made in this document from which I am quoting. In the last report, the report of 1894, which was brought down to the Manitoba legislature about a year ago, there is this statement about the Icelandic schools. It is Mr. McCalman's report :

> The teachers conduct all classes in English and address them in Icelandic only on the rare occasions that a question as put in English is not clearly understood. In this respect the Icelandic schools present a marked contrast to any French schools I visited. In the latter English was used only during the English lesson from the English reader, a lesson occupying not more than an average of 15 minutes, the questions even on this lesson being asked and answered in French. In the light of the above it is almost superfluous to add that the Icelandic children in but three or four years have attained a proficiency in the English language that the French have not in a very much longer period.

Mr. Ewart's report about the Mennonite schools is to the same effect:

> Progress has been made particularly in English, arithmetic and geography. German being the vernacular of the Mennonites is in nearly all schools the medium of instruction, yet where the teacher has sufficient command of English the most important branches on the programme are taught in English.

Now I come to the question asked me by the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron).

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Before the hon. gentleman answers that, may I ask him a question? He has given the authority for the last two reports. Will he give the authority for the former charges?

Mr. McCARTHY. The statement upon which these are based, is Mr. Wade's pamphlet.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Which the government paid him to write.

Mr. McCARTHY. As to the others, they will be found in the official reports presented in the year 1895. Now, Sir, the very natural question was asked: Why did not the government seek to reform, instead of abolishing these schools? That question presented itself to the Manitoba government, and the Manitoba legislature. What is the answer? Mr. Sifton says:

> When we came to the point that we should abolish the double management of the schools the question came up as to whether we should have separate schools or not; and it is often stated that if we had stated to the Catholic Church that we wanted to regulate these schools and see that they were efficient the Roman Catholic Church would have concurred in the proposal. There is no truth whatever in any suggestion of the kind. From the first moment of the declaration that we were going to do away with the abuses of the system we met with the most uncompromising opposition from the Catholic Church. It was declared that they would fight the new system to the bitter end, and they are fighting it to the bitter end.

Now, I think we may look for support to that statement of Mr. Sifton in a petition against the North-west schools, to which I referred a little while ago. From every Catholic bishop in Canada there is a protest couched in the most violent language against the reform of the schools in the North-west. Now, a member of the Government tells us that when the question was under consideration as to whether they should abolish the schools or simply abolish the dual system, they found they were antagonized by the Roman Catholic hierarchy to the same extent to the one proposed scheme as to the other. And now, having come to the end of my statement. I appeal to this House to know upon what ground we are called upon to interefere. We have now the power to interfere, we have no duty to interfere. We have got legislative authority to interfere. We are in the position exactly of the higher and central body, who, under the circumstances that have happened in this case, have authority to review and reconsider, and if we choose, to abolish and annul what has been done in the province. But before we do that, we have investigated the charges they have made. I have shown that the charge they made, and the arguments they submitted by their counsel to the committee are absolutely unfounded; and I have given to you what has not appeared before, what it was not necessary to put forward in self-defence and on behalf of the province; I have given to you the grounds which moved the legislature to act in the way they did on that occasion. Under these circumstances, there cannot be any ground for interference except one; that ground the hon. gentleman who addressed us this afternoon (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said he adopted, and that is that there ought to be separate schools. It won't do, therefore, for the Minister of Finance to tell us that this is a side issue. It is the only question. You are asking us to pass a Bill by which separate schools shall be restored; you are asking us, in so far as that goes, to repeal the School Act of 1890, and you are asking us to do that on no ground whatever unless it is good ground to say that separate schools should be established in Manitoba instead of the public school system. And the gentlemen who come from the provinces all about—in no province is there separate schools except Ontario, and only in Ontario because we are not able to do away with them—the gentlemen from these other provinces who won't have separate schools in their own province, are now going on insist that Manitoba should have separate schools. That is the simple, plain fact. Separate schools they won't have for themselves.

Mr. PRIOR. We virtually have them.

Mr. McCARTHY. You virtually have them. If so, let the people of Manitoba virtually have them by practice. Why should we go and pass a law and say: You must have them. I ask you to take warning from the words of John Sandfield Macdonald. I ask you to remember that Manitoba occupies a position in which we will find it very difficult to impose a law upon her against her will. She has now a population of 200,000, and she is adding greatly to the wealth and importance of this Dominion. If our exports exceed our imports, if our exports increase, we owe it to Manitoba. But you are going to sow the seeds of discord there; you are going to coerce the province—coerce is the proper word, no other word will fit the case. You say it is coercion when they interfere in their proper sphere and in their proper right with the school system as it existed. It is nothing of the kind. It was the exercise of a legislative power, and the province has deliberately adopted that system, that has ratified and confirmed it with a popular approval constantly increasing—that province is to be told here by a paramount power that the law is wrong, that her proceedings are all wrong; and this law is to be placed on our statute-book as if it was passed by the free people of Manitoba themselves. Sir, I do not know that I am justified in occupying the time of the House much longer; but I have not dealt with the question to which I devoted a good deal of time, and that is the question of the minority in Quebec. If I have been at all successful in the statement I have made, I think I must have satisfied every reasonable mind that there ought to be no interference with the school system of Manitoba, so far as that province is concerned. But we are implored here on behalf of the Protestant minority of Quebec, not to deny a right to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba. If you do, says the Minister of Trade and Commerce, can you doubt that our action will be followed by reprisals from the majority of Quebec? The Postmaster General had anticipated that argument, and said that the generous French people would never interfere with the rights of the minority: and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), who followed the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, spoke in the same strain. But, Sir, I have yet to know when the Protestants of that province are not calling upon us, or not insisting on our staying our hands in Manitoba, why we should do an injustice to Manitoba for fear of a possible contingency which we are told can never happen, in the province of Quebec. What is the word that comes from the province of Quebec? The Minister of Trade and Commerce, the representative of the Protestants, stands up here and implores us on behalf of the Protestants whom he represents, forsooth, in this House, to pass this separate school law, and to impose separate schools on the province of Manitoba. What was the petition presented here the other day? Was that in the same strain? Was that in the language of a politician, or from a body competent and capable of speaking on the subject? And what did they say? A petition was received and read from the Quebec Branch of the British Evangelical Alliance, protesting against the introduction and passing of a Remedial Bill in Parliament. The reasons set forth are:

> That the Bill seems an arbitrary and unusual interference with the delegated rights of the individual provinces, and calculated injuriously to affect the good relations now subsisting amongst the various provinces of the Dominion. Also, that it would practically be the endowment by the state out of the public treasury of one particular church to the exclusion of all other churches, and this would necessarily excite religious jealousies and rivalries injurious to peace and prosperity. Also, that it would seriously injure the cause of public education by dividing the financial resources for promoting it, and would waste these resources by providing two or more teachers for small groups of children, who could all meet together under the care of one teacher. Also, that it would be forcibly re-introducing a system of separate schools in Manitoba under clerical control, which are now happily disappearing from all civilized and progressive countries in Europe and America. Therefore, while disclaiming any desire to promote the interests of any political party, or unjustly to interfere with the interests of any church, the petitioners pray that the Bill may not become law.

That is not the only voice we have from that province. What does the "Presbyterian Record" say, speaking on behalf of the Presbyterians, I believe the official organ, and copied in the Montreal "Witness" with approval? Does it ask us to restore separate schools, or to pass a Remedial Bill? On the contrary, it says:

> If the present order of things is reversed and separate schools are re-established there will not be fair-play. The Roman Catholics will then have Government-aided schools with their own catechism as a text book, while the Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, or Baptists, will have no such liberty.
> In Quebec, other denominations have not the same privileges that the Roman Catholics have. Presbyterians cannot use their catechism in the separate schools, nor can Episcopalians or others use theirs. These other denominations have to make some sacrifice, to unite on some common ground, in order to get the benefits of an education, and under such a separate school system there is not fair-play.
> Fair-play demands that the present order of things in Manitoba be maintained. To go back to the former position is to give the Romanists an advantage that others are not allowed, and every lover of freedom and of his country should stand for fair-play to all and favours to none.
> 2. A second error in many minds is that the Roman Catholic people feel it to be a great grievance not to have the separate schools, with their catechism as a text book.
> If this were the case there would be more of sympathy with the claim for the old schools, even though the claim be unjust. But such is not the fact.
> The Roman Catholic people are realizing that the schools as controlled by the church are utterly inefficient; that the children coming out of such schools from the average country district, with little education beyond their knowledge of the catechism and church observances, are sadly wanting in equipment for the work of life.
> It is an open secret that a great body of the Roman Catholic people, both in Manitoba and Quebec, would prefer national schools, and if there were a free expression of the opinion of the intelligent Roman Catholics of Canada, there is little doubt that it would be largely in favour of public national schools apart from the control of the clergy.

Mr. McALISTER. When was that published ?

Mr. McCARTHY. About ten days ago. It continues :

> The agitation to restore separate schools in Manitoba is not kept up by the Roman Catholic people of Manitoba or of those of Quebec. The grievance is the grievance of the Roman Catholic clergy, the agitation is the work of the clrgy, who seek to keep control of the education of the young, and who are exerting their utmost efforts to that end.

Let me now give the House an extract from a letter written to the Prime Minister by Mr. Sellar, who is living in Huntingdon, a journalist, and a man who has spent his life there, knows what he is speaking about. What does he say ?

> Sir, the non-Catholics of Quebec have had no rights or privileges granted them by the majority and are ignorant of any favours received from that majority, they have simply been left in the enjoyment of what is their inherent right, the non-sectarian schools designed by the old legislature of the united provinces. You say the minority of Manitoba is entitled to the same rights and privileges as have been granted to the minority of Quebec. Let me enumerate to you a few of these privileges. When the non-Catholics are not numerous enough to maintain a school of their own, they are taxed to keep up a school it is impossible for them to send their children to, when a non-Catholic becomes a stockholder in a factory, he pays taxes to support Catholic schools, when the non-Catholic looks into the blue-books he learns that the legislature pays yearly out of the public treasury, in the name of education, subsidies to 200 convents and a score of colleges, among the latter being the institutions of the Jesuits.
> The non-Catholics of Quebec have no fear for themselves should Manitoba remain true to the stand it has taken in favour of secular schools, for to speak of the majority retaliating upon them is absurd.
> I would the people of Canada realized the significance of what its Government is proposing to do. A stroke of the pen by George III. would have prevented those struggles between church and state which have made the government of Canada at all times difficult and twice in our history brought it to a standstill. The remedial order, looked upon by some as a small matter, is going to decide whether our North-west is to be free from the strife that has afflicted the provinces by the St. Lawrence or to be subject to it. Force upon the North-west separate schools, and the point of the wedge is entered which will involve the west in the troubles and difficulties that perplex Quebec.

So we get from every independent source a protest from the Protestants of Quebec not to allow their position to sway us in the slightest degree in considering what we shall do in the case of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker, I did desire to say a word about the so-called privileges of the Protestant minority. I have examined that question, and I venture to say that when it is examined and thoroughly understood, it will be found that the Protestants have nothing to thank the majority for. But it is beside this question. I have been irritated by the claim that has been made time and again to us in this House to do this, that or the other, in consideration of the generosity bestowed on the minority by the majority in that province, and when the proper time and occasion arrive, I think I shall be able to show that the minority have nothing to thank the majority for. One thing I may mention. One grievance of long-standing, often complained of, never redressed, is that while all commercial companies, certainly nine-tenths of the commercial companies in the province are English, the tax derived from that property is distributed according to population, and is not allowed to go to support their own system of schools. We do not claim great generosity in our province. But what is our law ? Our law is that of the tax on the corporations, not less than the proportion belonging to the Roman Catholic shareholders is to go to the Roman Catholic schools, and as much more as the directors of the company think fit to bestow. The law in the other province is this : Taking the great city of Montreal, I am within the judgment of hon. members as to whether I am not right in saying that nine-tenths of the commercial companies are English, and day by day men are forming companies, even storekeeping is being conducted by joint stock companies, and the tax from these corporations does not go to the support of the dissentient schools to which the children of the shareholders are sent, but it is distributed according to population, which stands as four or five Catholics to one Protestant in that province.

But I must draw my remarks to a close, and I do so thanking the House very much for the indulgent hearing I have received. The subject is a large one and a wide one, but, after all, the whole matter lies in a nutshell. There have been legal difficulties, they have been all cleared up. The matter now is so plain and simple that no man and almost no child can fail to comprehend and understand it. It is in a word, that the province of Manitoba had the power to pass the law of 1890 ; that if we leave that law alone it remains a perfectly valid and constitutional law ; that we have the power, under the circumstances which have occurred, to implement the order of the Governor General, and to pass a good Remedial Bill. Whether we should pass that Bill or not is a matter, like every other question that comes before Parliament, that is one not merely of justice, but, if I might put it in a few words, it is one as to whether it is just, politic, and wise for us to interfere. Justice alone is too narrow a term. Justice may mean to one man who looks at the question, one thing, and to another man another thing. If we sat here as a court of law merely, to administer the positive rules of law, I can understand that there would be no difficulty in its administration. We would expound the law, we would give effect to the law, and justice would be the fulfilment of the law. But we are here occupying a sovereign position, with powers looking to all the considerations, looking mainly and chiefly, as we ought to look, at the benefit of the province for which we are legislating. The law does not extend beyond the boundaries of Manitoba, if we pass it, and our consideration ought to be with respect to the welfare of that province, and with respect to that alone.

Sir, when we talk about justice, let us look back at our history. When we secularized the clergy reserves, when we dispossessed the churches to whom the King had granted lands for their support, can that action be justified on the ground of justice? Those lands were actually set aside for that purpose, they were dedicated for that use, we had to apply to the Imperial Parliament to deal with them—I do not say that it was not wise and politic, but if you talk about justice and justice alone, it is difficult to justify that action. Take the seigniorial tenure. Take the Irish land law, when Parliament stepped in and made contracts between landlord and tenant. Could that be justified on the ground of what we call justice—altering contracts, saying that what people agreed to openly and above board should be set aside and abrogated? No. But it was just, politic and wise all the same. So here we have to consider this question from that point of view. We have to remember the province for which we are legislating. We have to remember that this Bill proposes that where there are ten children in a school district, and the school district may be five miles in diameter—not ten families, but ten children of school age—a school district may be appointed, a teacher employed, a school-house built and taxes which would have otherwise gone to support the public school be devoted to support a separate school. Remember that in the 700 schools which exist in that province, according to the return brought down, there are more than 100 where the average attendance is not seven; my hon. friend tells me that there are 192 schools where the average attendance is not seven. Remember, that Mr. Sifton has had in contemplation the introduction of a Bill to deprive schools where the average attendance is not seven of any share in the public grant, and I find that nearly one-third of all the schools would thereby be disbanded and destroyed. This is the province in which it is desired to implant this demon of dualism. You split up this system of public schools in order to dissipate the public money and to waste it, and in order to make inefficiency where there may be, and we trust before long there will be, efficiency. And you admit, on the face of the Bill, that you cannot do it. You acknowledge you cannot touch the public grant. You put in an empty declaration, which is untrue in law and in fact, that the Privy Council has determined that the separate schools are entitled to a share of the public grants—an empty 'brutem fulmen' of no value, not worth the paper it is written on. And you leave your separate schools to what? You leave them to the tender mercies of all they can raise in the matter of taxation. I examined the question, to see what really was the benefit of these so-called separate schools. I find, Sir, that this is the result. In the old days, the Catholics got, of the legislative school grant, after deducting the charges of management, $226.44. They taxed themselves $242. The average cost of the Roman Catholic schools was $469. Where is that to come from, under this precious Bill? Not out of the legislative school grant, for you cannot touch it. You leave, therefore, $242 to do the work of $469, and yet you ask us to believe that this is a practical measure. We are told that the Archbishop is satisfied with it, and that we, therefore, have got to bow, and to assume that it is perfectly right. But, Sir, I venture to say, if his Grace the Archbishop is satisfied with it, it is because there is some understanding which is yet to be carried out, and for which this reserved power in the last section is intended. Is it possible to imagine, that these people can support their schools without the assistance of a government grant? Is it possible to imagine, that the sum of money which formerly went to their administration and came to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $5,000 or $6,000, and for which there is no provision whatever made, can be dispensed with? How are they to be carried on? Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us. Perhaps the hon. gentleman in the Senate, Mr. Bernier, who was the superintendent of schools, and who had charge of this administration, whose salaries, and etceteras consumed about $5,000 or $6,000 of money for which there is no provision in this Bill; perhaps he can tell us, how is that system to be administered? Why, it is a delusion, a delusion and a snare, calculated to destroy and disturb, but not calculated to produce any beneficial result to anybody.

And, if I were to venture to criticize this Bill, I would say, that it rests, not merely under the construction put upon it by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), in not going far enough, but I would point out, that it goes, in many respects, altogether too far. What right have we here to do more than to restore the system, as it existed? One-half of this Bill is made up of new clauses, and, when we come to committee—if we are ever to get there, and it is not going to be in this Parliament, it is quite certain—it will be found out that more than one-half of this long Bill has been concocted or stolen, probably, from the Public School Act of 1890, and is now to be found in the Act which the province of Manitoba is ordered to restore. So, whatever way you look at it, whatever view you take of it, it will be found that the Bill is unworkable. The scheme is not intended to do anything more than to satisfy the sentiment which has been raised in its favour, and to gratify the longing of those who think there ought to be a declaration on the floor of this Parliament in favour of separate schools. I think I might add, Sir,—and then I am done—one further statement. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) is not here; but the ex-Minister of Justice might, perhaps, communicate my question to him. Will that distinguished luminary of the law tell me, by what authority this Parliament ventures to delegate the taxing power of Manitoba to the separate school trustees? Will he tell me, by what authority this Parliament dares to interfere with the authority of the local legislature, which says that everybody shall contribute to the public schools? The appeal to us is under the educational section. The appeal is not under that clause of the constitution which empowers the province to tax. The right to tax given to the trustees, is a delegated power conferred by the province, which the Dominion cannot interfere with, which the Dominion cannot touch. And, while they have baulked at laying violent hands on the legislative school grant, they would have been better advised, if they also paused and hesitated, before they attempted to legislate with respect to the taxing power of the province. So, Sir, for all these reasons; for all the reasons which I have endeavoured feebly to give, I shall vote with pleasure for the six months' hoist —not that I want an inquiry, not for the reasons which have induced the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) who moved it—but because I am satisfied, that no pretense of case has been established to justify the interference of this Parliament, and that His Excellency the Governor General would have been better advised, if he had said he would not interfere. These are the reasons which have induced me to arrive at this conclusion, and, while others may think, that, as Manitoba has called for an inquiry, an inquiry should be made, and, while I do not pretend to say there is not great force in that, when the province demands and challenges investigation, still, Sir, for my part, I am quite willing to accept all the responsibility of saying that this Bill, as it stands, should never receive the assent of this House, and should now receive the six months' hoist.

Mr. HAGGART. At this late hour, Mr. Speaker, I may be pardoned, if I occupy the time of the House for some time in the discussion of this very important question. The hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. McCarthy) prefaced his remarks by an attack upon my hon. friend the member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), in reference to the manner in which he made the statement of this case before the House. He ridiculed the idea of a young man like my hon. friend occupying the proud position of Minister of Justice, and he regretted the manner in which that hon. gentleman addressed the House on this question. I ask you to contrast the speech of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) with the speeches of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) and of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), and to draw your own conclusions from them. I will not enter into the discussion, as to whether the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was a paid advocate, or not. That branch of the question I shall not touch. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) accused my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) of copying largely from a pamphlet which Mr. Ewart issued on the school question. I may be pardoned, Sir, because I will plead guilty, to some extent, to quoting from Mr. Ewart's pamphlet on this question. There was nothing adduced by the ex-Minister of Justice in defence of the Bill before the House, but what can be found in the pamphlet issued by Mr. Ewart; and for chronological reasons, if none other, it was advantageous for every person arguing the question to make use of that pamphlet. The hon. gentleman says, why should a man who has been Minister of Justice descend to the use of a pamphlet which Mr. Ewart has had published? Mr. Ewart's pamphlet is simply a chronological summary of the different events of this school question. When the hon. gentleman was criticizing the action of my hon. friend from Pictou in regard to that, he fell into the same mistake, because he used the pamphlet of Mr. Wade nearly all the time he spoke.

The hon. gentleman found fault with the statement of the hon. member for Pictou that the question of education was embodied in the British North America Act, and said that there was no compact made with the people of Quebec prior to confederation. He read the debates which took place at the meeting in Prince Edward Island to show that the question of education did not at all enter into the discussion there. The hon. gentleman forgot to state that Mr. Galt was not satisfied because there was not embodied in the British North America Act the provisions he claimed should be inserted in it for the protection of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. He forgot to tell us that Sir John Macdonald has left us evidence that the question of education was a subject of the debates that led up to confederation. I will take the opportunity of reading what Sir John Macdonald said in a letter to Lord Monck on June 22nd, 1866:

> My dear Lord Monck,—The proceedings have arrived at such a stage that success is certain and it is now not a question ever of strategy. It is merely one of tactics. Galt, the representative of the British race in Lower Canada, has taken the best step possible for settling the > educational question, for that section of the province. He has asked Judge Day, one of the ablest men and best judges that ever sat on the Lower Canada Bench, to frame a measure for the protection of the British and Protestant minority. Mr. Day, although a Protestant, has the confidence of the French Canadians. He is now here on this duty, and I do not doubt that he will produce a satisfactory measure.

And every person acquainted with the history of the matter knows that Mr. Galt resigned from the ministry because a measure was not passed which in his opinion afforded sufficient protection to the Protestant minority of Quebec. An arrangement was made, however, that he should go to London and meet the conference there. It was arranged before he started, that a clause would be embodied in the British North America Act which would protect the Protestant minority of Quebec, and that clause was embodied in the British North America Act, and it was one of the principal clauses which caused discussion on that Act in the House. The whole debate shows what was the intention of the legislature at that time. From beginning to end it shows that the principal clause discussed in the House was the clause for the protection of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. How long is it since this hon. gentleman has got it into his head that minorities should not be protected ? I have been in this House for some time, and I was astonished to hear his statements in reference to the minority of Manitoba. Could it have been possible that my ears mistook the sound of his voice, when I heard him on other occasion in this House, uttering entirely different sentiments. Let me quote some of them to show how the hon. gentleman has changed his opinions since then. In 1889, as hon. gentlemen who are members of this House must remember, there was a debate here in reference to the Jesuits' Estates Act. You know what part the hon. gentleman took in reference to that question. Was there any question about the protection of minorities then ? Was there any question in the mind of the hon. gentleman as to the right of appeal to the Governor General in Council for the protection of the minority concerned in that case ? What was the statement made by the Equal Rights Association, by its president, Principal Caven, in Toronto ? A fundamental ground on which that Equal Rights Association was formed was that the right of appeal by the minority to the Parliament of Canada must be maintained. Did not the hon. gentleman at that time state in every part of the country that it was one of the sacred bulwarks of the constitution that that right, above all others, must be maintained—the right of appeal by a minority alleged to be oppressed on educational matters, to the Parliament of Canada ? Let me read some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman in this House in the debate on that question :

> Is it because this is a particular church ? If it is a right in the province of Quebec to grant money to the Church of Rome. It would be equally right in the province of Ontario to grant money for the maintenance of the Methodists or the Episcopalian body or Scotch body ; and, if we did that, there would be no hesitation—and properly so—in bringing before the House the complaint of the minority whose money would be spent in that way and for that purpose. The legislatures are not to be at liberty to run in different directions, to promote in one province one nationality and one church, and in another province another nationality and another church, or in any other way to run counter, because such courses must inevitably bring about the dissolution of confederation. It is not because a province is kept in check, it is not because its legislation is vetoed, that there is danger to our system.
> But if the other system is set up, if the alternative presented by my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby), is to be adopted ; if you are to say that because a law has been passed within the legislative authority of the province, therefore it must remain ; we can easily see, Sir, that before long these provinces, instead of coming nearer together, will go further and further apart.

These were the opinions held by the hon. gentleman in 1889. He was not arguing on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority, but on behalf of the Protestant minority of Quebec, and insisting that that clause in the British North America Act gave them the right of appeal to the Governor General in Council and the Parliament of Canada for redress. But the case is entirely different now.

Then the hon. gentleman attacked my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and asked did he not know that the judgment of the Privy Council held that the Manitoba Act took the place of the clauses in the British North America Act ? Well, the hon. gentleman knew it just as well as did the hon. member for North Simcoe. He was not arguing on those lines at all, but on the lines laid down by the Privy Council of England. He knew what the judgment of the Privy Council was, but I believe in the opinion of many lawyers in this country—perhaps the majority—that the British North America Act was to be supplemented by these sections in the Manitoba Act. The Privy Council held differently, but my hon. friend was proceeding in the very words of the judgment of the Privy Council, from which I shall quote :

> In their lordships' opinion, therefore, it is the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act which has to be construed in the present case, though it is, of course, legitimate to consider the terms of the earlier Act, and to take advantage of any assistance they may afford in the construction of enactments with which they so closely correspond and which have been substituted for them.

My hon. friend was proceeding in that line, but he is not the constitutional lawyer that the hon. gentleman is. He is not the keeper of the Protestant conscience throughout this country, and the hon. gentleman in his excathedra style, gets up and states: Oh, the merest tyro of a logician, the veriest fool who has any knowledge of law, would not use the argument my hon. friend did. My hon. friend uses his argument correctly; following the judgment of the Privy Council in England, who said that it was perfectly legitimate to consider the two Acts as taken together for the purpose of understanding the clauses in the Manitoba Act.

The hon. gentleman states primarily that the jurisdiction is vested in the province of Manitoba. It is true that it is so vested, but did he not know, when he was making that statement, that that clause in the Manitoba Act which allows the power of appeal to the Governor General in Council and to this Parliament, the judges of the English Privy Council say has to be read as part of the constitution of this country. They say that it is perfectly easily understood. The whole question of separate jurisdiction in reference to education was discussed before the Privy Council, and they decided that the two Acts should be read together, and that jurisdiction in certain cases was vested in the Dominion.

We hear about coercing Manitoba. No one but a demagogue—I care not who he may be—could use any such language as that? The constitution imposes the obligation on the people of this country, and it gives them the power to legislate in the matter. That power is vested in the Parliament of Canada, and we have the right to legislate in the manner and direction we think proper. The hon. gentleman admits that we have the power to pass a Remedial Bill. He raises no question as to the law in the matter. But he asks is it judicious to do so? The question of jurisdiction then is decided. It was decided by the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman was careful to dwell very little on the decision of the Privy Council. You notice that he did not say a word about section 6 which was submitted to the Privy Council—that is the question of fact. The whole facts were before the Privy Council, and they decided, upon the facts of the case, that the minority in Manitoba had a grievance and they described what that grievance was. The hon. gentleman talks in a very decided way about wiping out one of the clauses altogether in the Manitoba Act. That clause reads:

> Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the time of the union.

The hon. gentleman says that the decision of the Privy Council virtually wipes that out, that there was no use talking upon it now, that the Privy Council had decided it had no effect whatever. The hon. gentleman, I remember well, in his argument here a year ago, discussed very fully whether there was a parliamentary compact or not. He discussed at length clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4, and he said that notwithstanding any mistake which might have been made in the Act or legislation, if there was a parliamentary compact, then even at this day he would see that it was carried out. What is the meaning of the words "by law or practice." What was the intention of the legislature? The judgment of the Privy Council in the Barrett case decided that beyond doubt. The Privy Council decided that the minority of the province of Manitoba expected that their educational rights had been secured to them and that the duty of the Privy Council was simply to decide upon the meaning of the words; and if it did not get the meaning of the words expressed correctly in the clause of the Act, it was not their duty to decide what was the meaning of that clause. I mention this merely to show that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said that if there was a parliamentary compact at the time they would, even at this late hour, give the minority in Manitoba the justice which they demand. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) can tell them whether separate schools were promised or not. He was one of the delegates at the time. The whole question has been gone into thoroughly and ably by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), who showed, that the parliamentary pact and agreement at that time was intended to give the minority the right to their denominational teaching through their schools. If that is so, why does not the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), why does not the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), why does not the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), following out the line of argument of last year, grant this simple demand at once. No man of sense who has read the correspondence, who has read the bill of rights, who has read the telegrams in reference to the whole matter—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Which bill of rights?

Mr. HAGGART. There are different ones. Under the first bill of rights and the second, schools were provided for. A certain sum of money was to be given each year for the purpose of assisting the schools. There were none but the denominational schools at that time, the Presbyterian, the Roman Catholic and the English Church schools. Does the hon. gentleman think, that, where these two bills of rights mention schools, they mean public schools? Does he think, that the Roman Catholics, who were making that parliamentary pact and agreement, intended that the money should be given to the public schools, and that they should keep up their denominational schools themselves? As to whether Father Ritchot forged the fourth bill, or altered the terms of it, or whether Archbishop Taché was a party to it or not, on reading of all the correspondence, and taking into account all the circumstances in regard to it, I have not the slighest doubt, that the commissioners who came down here, whether they set aside the directions which they got from the legislature or not, negotiated upon the principle of having separate schools for the province of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman says it was not a parliamentary compact, it was a concession which was made to them by this Parliament. A pretty concession, that they would have the right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons had by law or practice at the time of the union. The decision of the Privy Council showed that they had no rights whatever. What was the intention of the words that were put there? It is true, that the words might not bear the meaning, but one of the hon. gentlemen, I forget whether it was the hon. member for Queen's or the hon. member for Albert, says that he thinks, perhaps, the Privy Council gave a wrong decision, and that, if he had been sitting as a judge, he would have decided, that they were entitled to denominational schools, and that the words were intended to cover that right. There is no doubt, that these poor delegates went away believing that they had secured separate schools. The speeches in the House, the declarations of Mr. Mackenzie, the declarations of Mr. Brown, the statements and admissions of others who spoke upon the subject, show that they thought the same. But now we are told by some hon. gentlemen opposite, that this was not a parliamentary pact, but it was a concession made by this Dominion, and they are not willing to carry out what was intended by that concession because the Privy Council have decided that the minority are not entitled to it by law. But the only purpose of raising that argument is to give greater weight to the idea that the decision of the Privy Council was not a direction for the Governor in Council or the Parliament in Canada, but that our action has to be decided as a matter of policy. But, if the understanding at the time was clear, and if it is known what the concession was intended to be, then, as a matter of policy, how can they deny these people the schools that they require?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to ask the hon. gentleman a question for information. Did I understand him to say that the bill of rights No. 2 referred in express terms to the schools?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will he kindly tell me what section?

Mr. POWELL. Is there a section that——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not ask such a trite question as that. I asked what section. The hon. member for Westmoreland is a little too smart.

Mr. POWELL. I beg pardon.

Mr. HAGGART. I think I am perfectly correct in my facts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was not casting doubt on the hon. gentleman's statement, but I have the bill of rights in my hand, and I cannot find the statement he refers to.

Mr. HAGGART. In bill No. 1, or No. 2, $25,000 is provided for the schools. If you will read Archbishop Taché's letter in the matter, he draws attention to this particular clause in bill of rights No. 1 and No. 2, and makes a comparison of them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman. I have the bill of rights here, and I do not see any reference to it.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no reference to it in bill of rights No. 3. The argument of the hon. member for Simcoe is founded on the contention that the negotiations were conducted on bill of rights No. 3.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there was an express reference to it in No. 1 and No. 2.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. STUBBS. Are separate schools mentioned in the bill of rights?

Mr. HAGGART. No; in bill No. 1 and bill No. 2, the reference is to schools. In No. 4, separate schools are distinctly mentioned.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman got the paragraph?

Mr. HAGGART. I had it here, but cannot find it at the moment. I thought every member of the House knew the facts. My argument is, that negotiations on the bills of rights and the correspondence show conclusively, that the people of that section of the country thought that they had got, whether by a concession or by a parliamentary pact, the guarantee of this Parliament of the separate schools in Manitoba. As the hon. member for Simcoe states, the law is decided by the Privy Council, which, in the case of Barrett vs. Winnipeg, and Logan vs. Winnipeg, said, that they had not these schools by law, and they had not them by practice, because "practice" means a legal practice. I have heard since, that, if there was a reappeal of the case, with evidence which has been discovered since that time, the position of the minority would be fully established, and it would be shown that the separate schools existed by legal practice. The case may again go before the Privy Council in England, because, I believe, documents are in existence which it was impossible to find at that time, proving that these schools received grants from the legislature of the province of Manitoba. If that was the case, it would be ultra vires for the province of Manitoba to deprive them of their schools, and there would be no necessity for a Bill in this Parliament to rectify their wrongs. Now, what is the Order in Council of which the hon. gentleman spoke? It is simply a copy of the judgment of the Privy Council. The harsh Order in Council, we never hear a word of it now. There is not a single criticism on the Order in Council now except that it takes the province of Manitoba by the throat and orders them to answer it at once. If the Order in Council was less than the judgment of the Privy Council, we would not have heard the criticism in this House that it was impossible to pass a Remedial Bill because the powers granted to us by that judgment were not sufficiently extensive. The Order in Council is simply a vesting order. The inquiry by the committee of the Privy Council for the purpose of issuing that order was a judicial inquiry. It was so declared by our own Order in Council, which Sir John Thompson made out and supported before the judges of the Privy Council. It is true that Mr. Blake, in his argument, said that the first inquiry should be a political one; and Mr. Ewart did the same. The judgment of the Privy Council followed the law as laid down in the Order in Council by Sir John Thompson, who was a party to drawing it up, that our first inquiry into the facts should be a judicial one. It was a judicial one, and what complaint has the province of Manitoba in reference to our proceedings in that case? The Privy Council decided in 1892 that the Manitoba School Act was valid; then in November of that year we have a petition from the Catholic minority to the Governor General, presented by Mr. Ewart. That petition was forwarded to the province of Manitoba. We waited for months for suggestions in reference to altering it, we waited for months for an answer. We did not get an answer, and then we proceeded to act in the form and manner approved by the hon. gentlemen opposite when Mr. Blake introduced his resolution providing for taking the opinion of the Supreme Court. Sir John Thompson acted upon that resolution, and obtained the decision of the Supreme Court, and subsequently the Privy Council gave a decision in reference to the Manitoba School Act. In 1890, the suit of Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg had commenced; and Sir John Thompson mentioned in his remarks that it was for the purpose of making the legislature come to a decision in reference to the question which had been decided by a judicial tribunal. The case was sent to the Supreme Court, and the judgment of the Supreme Court was appealed to the Privy Council, and on the Privy Council's declaration of the law, we proceeded to act. The hon. member for Simcoe states that the decision of the English Privy Council was not at all binding upon this country, that in fact it was not a judgment of the court. What is the distinction between the judgment of the court and the decision of the highest court in the land deciding what the law is? They tell you what the law is; are you not obliged to follow it? Could it be supposed that a small province would not have carried out the Queen's command, as embodied in the judgment of the highest court in the land? And could it be supposed for one instant, that when they were told what the law was, they would not obey it? Now, I would like to show the House how inconsistent the hon. leader of the Opposition has been in his course upon this question. Let me read, for the edification of the House, some of his opinions in the past.

In "Hansard" of 1893, page 1882, we find these words in reference to the school question:

> The question after all is a simple one. In 1890 the legislature of Manitoba passed a law which the Roman Catholic minority deemed oppressive; that minority appealed to the Government against that law; their prayer has to be denied or has to be granted; this is the simple issue.

Further on, he says:

> The question is a difficult one—I admit that it is surrounded with difficulties—because it is surrounded with passions, passions religious and national.

In 1893, on page 2004 of "Hansard," he says:

> I blame the Government even now for not having done sooner what they should have done. I blame them for these long delays * * * for procrastination, after long delays shifting of expedients, subterfuge, at last the Government will have to pronounce a decision.

How does that tally with the hon. gentleman's statement, repeated from one end of the country to the other, that the Government should appoint a commission of inquiry. Then, again, in 1894, we find he said:

> The longer this question is kept before the public, the worse it is for the good of Canada. It is a question on which there should be an immediate and speedy answer.

Nothing about a commission of inquiry then. Again, in 1895, "Hansard," page 4503:

> Something must be done and done at once, because this policy of delay, this policy of vacillation is not only paralyzing, but it is fast disintegrating the national life; fast disintegrating national life, I say, because it is arraying creed against creed and race against race; something must be done and done at once.

Then he spoke as follows at Toronto, on February 5th, 1895, according to the "Globe" report:

> The question is a legal one that is before the Government to answer to-day. I do not desire at the present time to say anything or do anything to make their position more difficult than it is. It is a difficult question. For my part, I must tell you frankly that I see in the question but a question of fact. I never saw any question of law or interpretation of the constitution. I think it was a question of fact and nothing else.

And again :

> This is not a political question at the present time. * * * * To-day it is purely a judicial question.

The hon. gentleman sneered at some of my remarks a while ago, but here he says it is a judicial question. Then, at Morrisburg we find him saying :

> The first thing they must do is to investigate that question. * * * Tell the Government to do this and appoint a commission, and I will support them.

Then at Prescott :

> He asked his fellow-countrymen to divest themselves for the moment of party and religious differences, and appealed to them if they did not think that the better way of dealing with this question was by such investigation, upon the result of which the Government could act.

Then, in the House of Commons, on the 19th April, 1895 :

> The Order in Council is termed a decision. I do not understand that term exately. As I read it, and I read it pretty carefully, it can hardly be called a decision. It is simply an invitation to the government of Manitoba to deal with that question, and to leave them to apply the remedy to the evil which has been created by their own legislation and invitation, I say, though I am sorry to say it, couched in most unfortunate language.

It is couched in the very language, in the ipsissima verba of the judgment of the Privy Council. Then, the hon. gentleman in this House on 15th July, 1895 :

> We had an Order passed by the Government commanding the province of Manitoba to restore the schools of the minority, commanding it to do so under threat that if it failed to obey, this Parliament would force schools upon them.

Then, at Brockville, on 10th October, 1895, according to the "Globe" report

> The course taken by the Government was to prepare a drastic Order in Council calling upon the Manitoba government to restore the separate schools, or failing it, they would do it by the supreme authority of Parliament. Could a more impudent course be taken ?

Then, again, at Morrisburg :

> The first thing they might do is to investigate this question. I tell the Government to do this and appoint a commission, and I will support them.

How the hon. gentleman has changed within a few months ! At one time he says there is nothing to investigate, that the Government should act at once upon the matter, and not be dilly-dallying with this question. The hon. gentleman supported a resolution in this House moved by Sir John Thompson, which outlined the action the Government should take in this matter ; and yet the hon. gentleman complained of it. Why did not the hon. gentleman complain when that Act was passed ? It was passed with respect to this particular question, as was stated by Mr. Blake, and it was passed with the intention that the question should be dealt with in the manner in which it has been dealt with. At Prescott, I find Mr. Laurier said :

> He asked his fellow-countrymen to divest themselves for the moment of party and religious differences, and appealed to them if they did not think that the better way of dealing with this question was by such an investigation upon the result of which the Government could act.

Even the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) laughs at the idea of an investigation. It was an insult to him as a lawyer, as counsel who represented the Manitoba government before the Committee of the Privy Council, to say to him : You did not perform your duty ; you did not introduce the evidence required to prove your case ; you did not show that the schools were mismanaged Does not the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) know how to manage a case, does he not know what his duty is, does he not know that if certain evidence is valuable it should be brought before the tribunal ? The hon. gentleman is fully aware of the absurdity of the proposition made by the leader of the Opposition, and his position was distinctly proved the other day. Fancy a leader of the Opposition when a question comes up on a Bill which affirms a principle, moving, not an amendment which would add to or subtract from the Bill, but moving the six months' hoist. Does not the hon. gentleman know what the parliamentary practice is ; does he not know that by that amendment he disapproves of the principle of separate schools ? Does he not know that that principle is affirmed in the Bill ? If it is not in accordance with the order of the Privy Council of England or of our own remedial order, why did he not set that out in an amendment, but instead of doing so, he places himself on record as being opposed in principle to any remedial legislation whatever. I suppose he will justify himself in some such manner as was adopted by an hon. gentleman behind him, who, addressing this House the other day, said he was not opposed to the principle of separate schools, but he was opposed to the Bill altogether. In three years from the present date there will not be a separate school in Manitoba, said that hon. gentleman ; it will be impossible to amend or change the Bill, but no doubt if the hon. leader of the Opposition came into power, he would introduce a Bill which would be satisfactory at all events to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba. What would the hon. member for East York (Mr. McLean) say to that ? What would the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), or the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) think of a resolution which was supported by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House on the principle that while it would do away with separate schools, it held out the inducement that when the leader of the Opposition got into power he would introduce a satisfactory measure for separate schools? Mr. Laurier said in the House of Commons, April, 19th, "Hansard," page 1998:

> If there is such an outrageous state of things prevailing in Manitoba, not a moment is to be lost in coming to the rescue of the oppressed minority.

Mr. Laurier at Morrisburg, October 9th, 1895, "Globe" report, said:

> These facts are clear to you and to all who believe in a system of separate schools.

Again at the same place, he said:

> The question cannot be settled until there has been such an investigation to see what are the rights and pretensions of the case. If I were in power and if I had the responsibility, I would try the sunny way. I would approach this man Greenway with the sunny way of patriotism.

"Le Cultivateur" Mr. Tarte's paper, writing a meeting at Chicoutimi, September, 1895, said:

> Mr. Laurier reiterated amidst indescribable enthusiasm, his solemn engagement to re-establish the Catholic schools on his arrival in power.

Mr. Laurier at Sorel, August, 1895, "Globe" report, said:

> He knew those Conservative papers well. They would be delighted, it would seem, if he said a word about the school question. In Quebec these pious Conservative newspapers were Catholics; in Ontario they were Protestants. In Quebec the saintly "Minerve," Sir Adolphe Caron, Mr. Ouimet and the Ultramontanes were listening to him with clubs in their hands ready to down him if he said a single word about the school question, and in Ontario, Mr. Clarke Wallace, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the Tory and Orange organs were watching him with another club ready to strike if he dared to say a word on the same question.

Mr. Wallace and the hon. gentleman are in company at the present moment. At Sorel, Mr. Laurier in August, 1895, "Globe's" report, said:

> Now he had expressed his views on the school question on many occasions and in many parts of the Dominion. He had said over and over again that it was a question of fact, and that the Federal Government had a right to interfere, but it had never yet interfered. It had shuffled and dallied with the question all along.

I heard it stated by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) the other day, that he had travelled with the hon. gentleman from one end of the country to the other, and he must say that in Quebec and in Ontario the same statement was made by him to the electors in every place, and on every platform. "L'Electeur," referring to Mr. Laurier's speech in the House of Commons, April, 1895, said:

> Mr. Laurier has pronounced himself boldly for the re-establishment of the separate schools in Manitoba, and has vigorously reproached the Government for not having interfered more promptly.

I will not trouble the House with any more extracts from speeches made by the hon. leader of the Opposition. The House can see in what direction they all lead. If there is any hon. gentleman who has endeavoured to follow a course north by south it is the hon. gentleman. But the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite on the school question is exactly such a policy as we would expect, judging from their policy on the trade question. It is a wonderful spectacle for the people of this country to see the leader of the Opposition, who declared in the province of Ontario that he was in favour of separate schools, move the six months' hoist to a Bill which he says cannot be altered or amended, and thus give a direct negative to the principle of separate schools involved therein. He did it for the purpose of catching certain votes on this side of the House, and by relying on his personal popularity in his province, and by communicating some mental reservations to his Quebec friends that he would make it right for them at some time or another, he tries to get their votes also. Is he not posted from one end of this country to the other, as the champion of liberty? Do his friends not state in Ontario, that he is opposed to the priests, that he is in favour of the autonomy of the province, and that he is in favour of the government of Manitoba doing what they like on educational matters? But, Sir, does he pose in that light before the people of the province of Quebec, and before his followers from that province. Does not every one in this country know that his supporters from Quebec must have an understanding with him, that if he gets into power, he will restore separate schools to the Manitoba minority? Does not every one know that at one time, he is saying one thing to catch votes on this side of the House, and at another time he is leading his friends and followers from Quebec to believe another thing? What kind of statesmanship is that? Why, Sir, in any other assembly in the world, if the leader of a party made so many contradictory statements as the leader of the Opposition makes in this House, no reliance would be placed upon his opinion with reference to any public question. It is the proud boast of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), that his personal popularity amongst his Quebec followers is such that he can induce them to deny the principles upon which they have set their hearts. We all know the compact that was entered into with the provinces when they united in confederation. Lord Herschell referred particularly to it in delivering his judgment in the Privy Council. Is it not laid down there, that one of the main conditions of these provinces entering into confederation was that parents should be allowed to educate their children in the religion in which they thought proper. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) says: Leave that to the provinces; what did I do in Prince Edward Island when I was bandied from one end of the country to the other: what have they done in Nova Scotia? Although it is not in the law there, separate schools are allowed in practice. Sir, if separate schools are allowed in practice in these provinces, what is the objection to putting it in the law with regard to Manitoba? Again, Sir, we are told that we are interfering with the autonomy of the province. Sir, if some day in the province of New Brunswick or in Prince Edward Island, a majority of the people should hold the sentiments of the member for York (Mr. Wallace) and the member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), and many other members in this House who are opposed to the principle of separate schools; if the majority holding such views in these provinces should put their opinions into active operation and sweep away separate schools, what, then would occur? If they have the majority, and the majority has the right to do it, is it not possible they may do it some day or other? Is it not possible that they may sweep away these rights secured to the people when they entered into confederation, believing that they could give their children that religious training which they thought proper. Sir, the principle of allowing minorities to educate their children as they wish, is breathed in every section of the British North America Act. Before confederation, that guarantee was announced on every occasion, from one end of the country to the other, and that was one of the principal conditions of the confederation. But the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) sneers at the argument of the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and he says that that compact cannot apply to Manitoba, because Manitoba was not thought of at that time. But does not the British North America Act contemplate the admission of Manitoba into confederation? Does not the British North America Act say:

> And whereas it is expedient for the eventual admission into Canada of other parts of British North America.

Was not the admission of Manitoba into confederation contemplated under this express language of the British North America Act? Sir, look at the judgment of the Privy Council, as you will, or interpret it as you will, let me ask: What was the duty of the Government, and what is the duty of the Parliament of Canada in reference to this matter? Was it not their duty to carry out the compact which the Lords of the Privy Council have stated was breathed in every clause of the British North America Act? Must not every man of intelligence who reads that first clause of the Manitoba Act interpret it to mean, as providing a safeguard for the minority? The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) read from Mr. Wade's pamphlet to show the deplorable state of the separate schools in Manitoba. He said that there were a hundred schools with not more than seventy-five pupils in attendance at those schools. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) forgot to tell the House that not one of these hundred schools were Catholic schools. He led us to believe that these one hundred schools were Catholic schools. Sir, such is not the case. Do we impose, by this Bill, a system of education any worse than the public school system of Manitoba? No, Sir, we do not. We give to the Catholics an education co-equal with the education given to others in the province, and we leave the decision of that question to the provincial authorities, if they like to undertake it. Before they can have a separate school, one of the conditions is, that the system of education, as to the mode of teaching, as to the qualification of the teachers, and as to the matter taught in the separate schools, shall be equal in all respects to that of the public schools. Do we then propose to restore the inefficient schools which existed before 1890? The hon. gentleman, who has read the Bill, knows that it is not so. He knows that the proposition of the Government is simply to allow in the schools in which the Roman Catholics preponderate, the teaching of their religion; and that in the teaching of all other subjects and in the qualification of teachers they must be equal to the public schools of the province. But the hon. gentleman and those who agree with him say that that will destroy the efficiency of the schools, that if separate schools are allowed in some sections of the country, the Roman Catholics will be unable to educate their children on account of the paucity of their numbers and the sparseness of their population. But, as has been stated by the hon. Finance Minister, the Catholics number only 20,000 in 200,000 people, or one-tenth of the population of the whole province; and every one knows that the Catholics are congregated together, and it will be unnecessary to have two sets of schools in the same parish, except in the city of Winnipeg, and, perhaps, in the town of Brandon. That argument fails entirely on account of the paucity of the numbers of the Roman Catholics, and the sparseness of the population.

The fact is this, and we may as well put it plainly and publicly before the people of this country: These gentlemen object on principle to separate schools being granted to the minority in Manitoba; and the reason they object, as is well known to every man in the province of Ontario, is that most of them believe that the teachings of the Roman Catholic church are subversive of the liberties of the people of this country. Most of them believe in their hearts that the morals taught by the Roman Catholic church ought not to be taught to the people of this country. They have not enough charity or enough of the common religion of mankind to believe, with the great mass of the people of this country, that morality and religion are as well taught by the Roman Catholic clergy as by the Protestant clergy of this country. We may as well call a spade a spade, and say that the opposition to this measure is aimed solely at the Roman Catholic religion in the province. But was it not one of the conditions of confederation that religious privileges should be guaranteed to all in this country? Though it might not be written in the statutes, yet every word of those statutes breathes the understanding that the Roman Catholic minority in this country should have the right of teaching their children morals and religion in their own schools. As the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) says that was a right implanted in their consciences. And the hon. member for North Simcoe, though he may have a different opinion to-day, some time ago stated in this House, if I did not misunderstand him, that he was in favour of denominational schools. I may be mistaken, but I think I have heard that statement from him

Mr. FOSTER. As compared with secular schools.

Mr. HAGGART. He is in favour of denominational schools.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, as compared with secular schools.

Mr. HAGGART. Then the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says, why cannot all the children be educated together, and be brought up together, without these religious bickerings? He is in favour of a secular system of education, or else he is in favour of some religious exercises in which all can agree. The hon. gentleman may be perfectly correct in that: but his view is entirely different from that of all the leaders of public opinion in the Empire. He is completely at variance with the view of Lord Salisbury, Mr. Gladstone and every other important public man in England who has spoken on this subject, because they are all in favour of denominational teaching. I quote from Lord Salisbury, as reported in the book to which the hon. member for North Simcoe objects:

> Numbers of persons have invented what I may call a patent compressible religion, which can be forced into all consciences with a very little squeezing; and they wish to insist that this should be the only religion taught throughout the schools of the nation. What I want to impress upon you is, that, if you admit this conception you are entering upon a religious war of which you will not see the end. There is only one sound principle in religious education to which you should cling, which you should relentlessly enforce against all the conveniences and experiences of official men, and that is, that a parent, unless he has forfeited the right by criminal acts, has the inalienable right to determine the teaching which the child shall receive upon the holiest and most momentous of subjects. This is a right which no expediency can negative, which no State necessity ought to allow you to sweep away; and, therefore, I ask you to give your attention to this question of denominational education. It is full of danger and of difficulty, but you will only meet the danger by marching straight up to it, and declaring that the prerogative of the parent, unless he be convicted of criminality, must not be taken away by the State.

The leaders on both sides of politics in England are in favour of denominational teaching. But when we propose to give a denominational system to a small minority in the province of Manitoba, we are told that we attack the autonomy of the province, and interfere with its sacred rights. Do these gentlemen not know that this Parliament legislates for the people of Canada as well as the parliament of Manitoba legislates for the people of Manitoba? Cannot we look to the greater Parliament? Was it not contemplated in our constitution that no small section of the country should interfere with the security of the whole by enacting laws prejudicial to the state at large? That is the doctrine which was laid down by the hon. member for North Simcoe. That is the doctrine which the present Government ask the Parliament of Canada to carry out. That is the doctrine which the people of this country will sustain at the polls; and the hon. gentleman's insult to the supporters of the Government in this House, accusing them of being bought to vote for the Bill, stamps the lawyer who never uttered a sentiment in his life without feeling the guineas jingling in his pocket. The last man in this country who ought to accuse a fellow-member of this House of anything of that kind is the hon. member for North Simcoe. His profession teaches it to him. It is part of his nature to feel that even the men he has associated with during his whole lifetime are voting for the purpose of getting money into their pockets.

The accusation which he made against you, gentlemen, he might very well take to himself. He was a man who had been the associate for a number of years of the gentlemen I see around me. He was a friend of the whole of them, but, on account of his prejudices, he deserted his party, and is now seeking to induce us not to carry out a solemn obligation imposed upon the people of this country, simply on the grounds of bigotry and prejudice; and on these grounds he has accused many of his fellow-members of eating dirt or altering their opinions through mercenary motives. The people of this country will know how to appreciate the man who makes a statement of that kind. They will take his statement for what it is worth. I have been in this House for a great many years, and I have never yet heard of any member of it being approached in any way for the purpose of inducing him to sell his vote in this Parliament, be he on the one side or on the other; and I know of no gentleman in this House who would not resent to the utmost an imputation of the kind. I have never met a man in the Parliament of Canada so debased as this man who would get up and make groundless accusations of that kind against his fellow-members.

Now, I wish to say a few words with reference to the argument of the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies), to whose remarks I gave most careful attention the other night, when he was laying down the law on this subject. I may be wrong in my law. I may not have the constitutional knowledge which these gentlemen suppose they are possessed of, but every man who has been a member of this House, every young man brought up in this country, after all, understands the constitution of his country, and knows as well as most lawyers what that constitution is, and what the effect of an Act of Parliament is. The hon. gentleman from Queen's, in a lengthy document, which he took a great deal of pains to draw up, volunteered his opinion, that there were three propositions in the remedial order, and that, if we legislate outside of them, the Act would be ultra vires, and he claimed, that every lawyer in the House would agree with him. He claimed, that the power to legislate in this matter is given by the remedial order, and that, if we go outside of that, we shall be going beyond our jurisdiction. He said further that, if we pass an Act of Parliament to remedy this grievance, we could afterwards neither amend it, nor alter it, nor rescind it. I will venture the opinion—and the question may come before the courts of law—that we can amend, alter and rescind.

The hon. gentleman talked about the local legislature having the power to alter and amend any Act which we may pass, if the jurisdiction over education is vested in the provincial authorities. Well, I would again venture the opinion, that, if we pass an Act within our powers, any Act of a provincial legislature amending it will be of no effect whatever. The hon. gentleman must remember the decision of the courts, that wherever there is concurrent jurisdiction between the provinces and the Dominion, the paramount power always lies with the Dominion. Where we have powers conferred on us by the constitution, although the concurrent power may be with one of the provinces, the paramount power lies with us. The hon. gentleman said, why not withdraw that remedial order? Sir, the remedial order is issued, and there is no power in the Dominion could withdraw it. Those powers which are remitted to the Parliament of Canada are perpetually vested in this Parliament. We cannot divest ourselves of them. We can delegate the powers back again to the provinces for the purpose of legislating upon the subject, but the power exercised under the Order in Council, I maintain, is perpetually vested in this Parliament, and there is no power, except the Imperial Parliament, which can reinvest the province with it. We can delegate it, we can rescind the delegation, but the power over that subject, from the moment of the issuing of that order, is perpetually vested in the Dominion.

Then, the hon. gentleman complained about the issuing of the order. Well, Sir, look at the chronological statement of facts. First, there was the petition which came to the Governor General in Council for a remedy. We sent the petition back to the province of Manitoba, and asked them to suggest any alteration they might desire, or make any suggestion they thought fit. We never got a reply. The question then was submitted to the Supreme Court, and we asked the provincial authorities to furnish us with all the facts. We took the facts, as set forth in the Barrett case vs. Winnipeg, because we supposed, that where there was a contested case, all the facts would be produced in that case. We submitted the question to the Supreme Court of Canada, and from that court it went to the Privy Council. Before the judgment of the Privy Council was given in 1894, we sent a request to the Manitoba government to submit, themselves, legislation in this matter to the legislature of that province. They never complied with our request. That legislature was in session after the judgment of the Privy Council in England was given, and even then the Manitoba government did not lay that judgment before their legislature, or take any action. We then issued the remedial order, embodying the very words of the Privy Council, and we asked the Manitoba government what they proposed to do in the premises, and were careful to tell them that they were not obliged to carry out, in the strict sense, the remedial order. We said to them: What you are asked to do is, not to rescind the Act of 1890, but simply to restore to the Catholic minority their rights, which you can do by a few short clauses added to the provisions of the Act of 1890. The Manitoba government have never answered our communication to this day. Afterwards, we sent them a fresh communication, requesting them to state what they were prepared to do, and we waited again and again for a long time for a reply; but in vain. But the hon. gentleman from Queen's said: If it was a judgment of the court, you had no right to wait this long time; your judgment should have been expeditious. The hon. member for Simcoe said: You are taking the province by the throat and compelling it to come before your bar for the purpose of answering the question. So that we can set the one complaint against the other. Then, we sent a communication up to the Manitoba government, with a polite request to carry out this judgment of the Privy Council. The members of the Manitoba government knew of the judgment of the Privy Council as soon as did the members of this Government.

They knew what the decision of the court was. They knew that they had a right to appear and prove their case, if there was any reason why we should not make the order. They had every opportunity and plenty of time. And we are yet willing, if the provincial authorities think proper, to pass a legislative enactment satisfying the minority of Manitoba and redressing the grievances they complain of. These are the facts of the case. The hon. member states in a threatening manner to the supporters of the Government from Ontario: If you vote for this Bill you will never be returned to this House again. I know the people of Ontario perfectly well. I know that they are as intelligent as any other people on the face of the globe. If you have an honest case you have only to state it before them to win their approval. Those who have listened to this debate and those who understand this question know perfectly well that the opponents of the remedial legislation have not a leg to stand upon. The hon. member for North Simcoe himself admits that we have a right to pass the Bill. If we have the power to pass the Bill, surely we must, some time or other, exercise that power. If these people have a grievance—and that has been decided by the Privy Council in England—that grievance must be remedied. Take a legal view of the case, and one that would be upheld by any judge in the country. Where you have the power to do justice to an oppressed minority, that minority have a right to expect you to exercise that power. The Minister of Finance has stated that there is no power which can compel an unwilling legislature to do what it is unwilling to do. There is no power, as the Minister of Justice has stated, to compel a magistrate, except in one or two cases, such as the writ of habeas corpus, where there is a fine attached. But where you have the power, the duty goes with that power. If the case came 'ab initio,' what is our duty? Knowing the conditions under which confederation was formed, is it not the clear duty of this House, independent of every other consideration, to see to it that the minorities of the different provinces are accorded the rights they became entitled to on entering confederation? The case seems perfectly clear to me. I require no argument in favour of denominational teaching, because I was taught from my youth upwards to believe that morality should be taught in the public schools. I was always opposed to schools where a system of teaching in morality or religious training was not given. The majority of the Protestant electors in Ontario believe that there should be religious exercises in the public schools. Why, then, should the people who hold this opinion object to a few Frenchmen on the banks of the Red River having schools for their children in accordance with their conscientious principles? I stated in another place that I did not believe that, when the facts were laid before the people of Ontario, before my countrymen, that even a moiety of them would refuse to believe in the justice of the proposal. What interest is it to them to refuse religious training to Roman Catholics? No; this agitation is got up, not because of any objection to religious education in Manitoba, but because a few disappointed parties have not got the influence or precedence in the Conservative party which they think their abilities entitle them to. They desire to advance their own interest even at the price of stirring up strife in the community. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the people of my province will, when the facts are before them, give a practically unanimous verdict in favour of the Government and of the policy they have adopted of giving this moiety of justice to the minority in Manitoba.

Mr. McISAAC. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) this afternoon in the course of his speech made some allusions to myself and the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), and the election which took place in Antigonish last year. I desire to refer to that at the outset. A little less than a year ago a contest took place in the county which I have the honour to represent in this House. During that contest the hon. member for Pictou conducted the campaign on behalf of the Government. He was then Minister of Justice, and claimed credit because the Government had passed the remedial order. He made the Manitoba school question the paramount issue before the electors of Antigonish on that occasion. The hon. gentleman stated this afternoon that the hon. member for Guysboro', in his presence and in my presence, while the three of us were on the public platform, promised that he would in this House support the policy of remedial legislation. I am here, Sir, to give a most emphatic denial to that statement of the hon. member for Pictou. I tell him, and I tell you and the members of this House, that the hon. member for Guysboro' did not on that occasion make such a pledge. If he refers to the meeting which took place in the court-house in Antigonish on the 6th April, 1895—and that is the only occasion on which the hon. member for Pictou, the hon. member for Guysboro' and I addressed a meeting together during the whole campaign, so that he cannot have reference to any other—I tell this House that not only did the hon. member for Guysboro' not pledge himself in favour of remedial legislation, but the hon. Minister of Justice did not say then that he would vote for it himself. Further, I say, and I am going to prove it, that the hon. member for Pictou on that occasion did not dare to state, though I challenged him to do so before the electors of Antigonish, that the policy of this Government was to introduce remedial legislation and place it before Parliament, Manitoba failing to comply with the remedial order. The Minister of Justice was in the county for two weeks, and for the first week, though addressing some six or seven meetings, including the one I have referred to, he did not dare to tell the electors of Antigonish that the Government would introduce remedial legislation as their policy if Manitoba failed to comply with the remedial order. I am not here to explain why he was so slow in doing it. I do not know whether it was or was not the policy of the Government at that time, but I can state as a matter of fact, that it was one week after he came into the county before he declared the position of the Government. It may have been that it was because of the fact that in Haldimand, at the same time, an election was going on, a member of this Government running for election and claiming credit in the county because the Government were standing by the constitution, and although they were compelled to issue the remedial order, they were not bound to go further, and that it was not necessarily the policy of the Government to introduce remedial legislation in this House. But I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I am going to prove it, that at this meeting in which the hon. ex-Minister of Justice states that the hon. member for Guysboro' said he would pledge himself to vote in this House for remedial legislation the hon. gentleman himself did not, although challenged two or three times, say that it was the settled policy of the Government to introduce remedial legislation, Manitoba failing to comply. I am going to put on the stand to prove my statement a witness the hon. member for Pictou will not dare to discredit, one of his best friends and one who did more to reduce my majority in Antigonish, aye, ten times more than the hon. member, though he was there two weeks.

The witness to which I refer is the Antigonish "Casket," published in the town of Antigonish. It is a Catholic paper, professing to be non-partisan in politics. That paper supported the Government candidate and opposed me, at least, during the latter portion of the campaign.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is not true.

Mr. McISAAC. What is not true ?

Mr. McDOUGALL. The editor is not a Conservative.

Mr. McISAAC. Who is talking about the editor ?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am talking now about the editor.

Mr. McISAAC. I never said a word about the editor. I am talking about the paper. I know what I am talking about, and the hon. gentleman need not interrupt me, as I would like to put a question to the hon. member for Pictou. Perhaps the member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) may be able to answer it for him. Does he mean that the statements published by the "Casket" in reference to that campaign are or are not true ? Did the "Casket" tell the truth in relation to the Antigonish election ?

Mr. McDOUGALL. What is the question ?

Mr. McISAAC. Is the "Casket" a truthful paper ? Now, remember I stated that the ex-Minister was a whole week in the county holding meetings before he declared what the policy of the Government was. I said I would put on the witness stand the "Casket" to substantiate my assertions. That paper is one they will not dare to discredit. It opposed me during the last campaign. This is what the editor, Mr. Wall, says, over his own signature :

> When doubt was thrown on the question as to whether the Government was on constitutional principles bound by its action in issuing the remedial order, to introduce remedial legislation in Parliament as a Government measure in the event of Manitoba's failure to comply with that order, I saw the reasonableness of that doubt and promptly notified the readers of "The Casket" of its existence, as I had previously made the statement absolutely that they were so bound.
> When Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, Minister of Justice, visited the county, I watched his public utterances for an authoritative statement that remedial legislation, Manitoba failing to grant it, would be introduced and carried forward as a Government measure. I noted with some dissatisfaction that in his first public speech in the town he made no such statement. I refused, until such authoritative statement should have been made by the Minister, to advise "The Casket's" readers to support the Government candidate ; and, knowing the ease with which a careful weigher of words can appear to make a declaration without actually doing so, I further refused to take the statement of any person that anything tantamount to such a declaration was made by him in any of the outlying districts. Finally, on the evening of April 10, at the court-house in Antigonish, Sir Charles set all doubts as to the Government's intentions at rest by declaring, as unequivocally as the most skeptical could desire, that they had adopted remedial legislation as their policy and would stand or fall by it.

Sir, what did that mean ? That it took the Minister until the 10th April before he stated exactly that remedial legislation was the settled policy of the Government ; yet he this afternoon stated that the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) had pledged himself to support remedial legislation on the 6th. Why, that was not the question at all ; and yet he says the member for Guysboro' pledged himself. Now, Mr. Speaker, I tell you that the question in Antigonish was, not whether the Remedial Bill to be introduced by this Government would contain the exact provisions of the remedial order ; but the question was for a time whether they would introduce the Bill. On 10th

April, the Minister of Justice for the first time declared that remedial legislation was the policy of the Government. I may say that I was not present at this meeting of the 10th April. From that time forward the Government received the support of that paper, and I received its opposition. But then remember it was a whole week before it was understood in the country that that was the settled policy of the Government. The ex-Minister read from my card an extract showing that I agreed with him on the point of law, namely, that the Government were bound to take the action, the passing of the remedial order, in obedience to the command of the highest court in the realm. The Minister of Justice read that from my card, and I see that hon. gentlemen opposite applauded him because they found I agreed with him on that opinion. I assumed that a man occupying the high position of Minister of Justice in this country would be a high authority on a point of law, and I assumed that the Minister of Justice, who was the father of this famous remedial order, and who went down and declared that the Government was bound by law to issue this remedial order—I assumed that he was good authority, and I adopted his opinion as to the legal point. I am sorry to find that although his opinion and mine then agreed, they have carried very little weight in this country. This view is expressly rejected by the present Minister of Justice as far as that card is concerned.

An hon. MEMBER. An election card.

Mr. GILLIES. What is the date of the card ?

Mr. McISAAC. 10th April. The ex-Minister of Justice tried to impose on the House an impression, which was especially unfair to the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), and I want to read to the House what the hon. gentleman stated in that county since that time. He went down to Antigonish, when the Conservatives held a convention last November and, according to the report of the "Colonial Standard" stated :

> I have been a member of the Canadian House of Commons for a considerable period of time, and having fought under leaders that do not now exist, I can safely affirm that I never knew a period, when the party was more united to win than I found that party before the last session had ended. All these infamous stories and falsehoods which fall from the Grit press from day to day, are born in desperation. Their miserable jibes, their horrible slanders and their infamous falsehoods in respect to the manner in which fifteen gentlemen conduct themselves and the public business around the table of the Privy Council of Canada, are put before the public because these men are destitute of proper political capital.

That statement was made in face of the fact that at the very time he was giving utterance to such words as terrible slanders, infamous jibes, he knew that within the Council Chamber there had occurred something which, probably, never happened in any government in the civilized world—ministers accusing each other of committing forgery and committing almost all the crimes in the calendar. Let hon. gentlemen read the statement made by the leader of the House not very many days ago, when he stated that he and his colleagues went into the Government and stayed there, but it was very difficult to do so, because they had for leader a man who was not fit to be leader ; and one of the seven bolters was the hon. gentleman. In the face of these facts, I ask if the statement of the ex-Minister is to be relied on ?

In regard to my own position, to which the hon. gentleman referred, I am not afraid here, or elsewhere, to state what my position is, and what my pledge was. I pledged myself to vote with the Government on this question without any reservation or condition whatever, and I intend to keep my pledge, and vote for the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McISAAC. Mr. Speaker, I stated over and over again during the contest that I believed that the school question was at least as safe in my leader's hands and his supporters as in the hands of the present Premier and his supporters, and having watched the halting and bolting course of the Government ever since, I say to-night, that I am stronger in that conviction than I ever was before. I want to point out to this House, that, while I am redeeming my pledge, made to the electors of Antigonish—and it is one that I never intended to violate—the Government have not carried out the pledges they made through the Minister of Justice to the electors.

An hon. MEMBER. What was the pledge?

Mr. McISAAC. The Bill before the House is only a shadow of the remedial order, although we were promised a Bill to embody the provisions of the remedial order, namely:

> (a) To construct, maintain, manage and conduct Roman Catholic schools ; (b) to receive a proportionate share of every subsidy granted from the public funds for educational purposes ; (c) exemption for the Catholics from the payment of taxes imposed for the maintenance of public schools.

These are the promises that were made. That was the character of the Bill which the Minister of Justice on that occasion pledged the Government would introduce and pass through this House. I am here to say, that the Bill now before the House does not contain the provisions, but omits the principal and most material one of the three sub-clauses of the remedial order. The Minister of Finance, on 8th July of last year, at the time when there was a bolt in the Cabinet, and when three Quebec Ministers went out of the Government, because the Government failed to carry out their promises, made the following statement, with a view to satisfy the members of the party :—

> A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If by that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared, at the next session of Parliament, to be called as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895.

These were the assurances given by the Finance Minister in July, 1895, at the time when his friends and supporters from the province of Quebec were dissatisfied, when he could only bring back one of the bolting Ministers, and when a great many of the bolting supporters were still wavering. He stated that legislation would be on the lines of the remedial order and of the judgment of the Privy Council. That statement did not satisfy some of the hon. gentleman's friends, and he was obliged, on 15th July, to make another statement, in order to make his position clear, and that statement is as follows :—

> I am here to state, and to state it on behalf of the Government, that so far as a policy can be decided on unanimously and unitedly, this policy is : That so far as it can be enunciated clearly, and so far as this Government is concerned, it intends to adhere to that policy, word for word, line for line, and letter for letter.

The first statement he made did not seem to satisfy his friends, and so he made another statement of a more certain character, and stated that the remedial order would be carried out line by line, word for word, and letter for letter. The Bill introduced does not contain the provisions of the remedial order word for word, letter for letter, line for line, not even paragraph for paragraph, because it omits clause (a), which, I have pointed out, is one of the most important. What was the statement made by the Finance Minister last Friday ? The hon. gentleman made a most eloquent and able speech, as he always does in this House. He spoke about almost everything else at length, but he said very little about the Bill. After spending two hours in discussing bills and other subjects, he screwed up courage to come to the Bill under consideration, and state what was its nature. He said :

> The principle of remedial legislation is in that Bill as the gold is in the nugget.
> Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very refractory gold.
> Mr. FOSTER. It may be so, Sir. But the man who wants to get pure gold does not simply kick aside the nugget with his rough encasement, but he says : Let me have that and, with the help of others, I can refine it into pure gold.

Compare that statement with the statement made by him on 15th July, which said it is not the nugget you are going to get, it is the pure gold you are going to get, word for word, line for line, and letter for letter. But, Sir, on this occasion, it is the nugget he is giving us, and he tells us that there is gold in the principle of the Bill, and that we can put it through the process of refining. That means, that when the Bill goes to the committee of this House, the committee, according to his way of putting it, is a parliamentary refining mill, the motive power of which is the Dominion Government. Well, Sir, the engine of this motive power got very badly out of order last July, when three bolters from the province of Quebec went out, because they had not only no gold, but they had not even the nugget. The whole engine got out of repair then, and when they had not even nuggets to offer their friends from the province of Quebec, all they could do was to enter into a contract by which the machine was to be put into repair, and be ready for operation on the 2nd of January so as to begin the process of refining. Sir, the 2nd of January came, and the mill was there, and the mill hands were there, but what happened ? Where was the nugget, and where was the gold ? Instead of these fourteen Cabinet Ministers going to work as they agreed to, why, seven of them bolted, and left the foreman, because, as they said, he was not able to run the machine. Although they had promised to begin work on the 2nd of January, the process of refining had to be delayed, and two months elapsed before they could get the machine into repair, and on the 3rd of March they moved the 2nd reading of this Bill.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). And yet you cannot get in.

Mr. McISAAC. And yet you cannot get in, says the hon. member. I have heard that statement during four elections at which I got in by a large majority, and I will get in again by a large majority. Sir, the only consolation the Minister of Finance gives us is that when the Bill goes into committee, the gold will there be separated from the nugget. That might be all right if all the members of the committee were anxious to improve it, but I am sorry to say that such is not the complexion of the committee of this House. They will be divided upon this, as upon all other questions. Some members will pull in one direction and some in another, but so far as I am concerned, I will give my hearty support to any motion which is calculated to improve this Bill, and to get out of it all that we can. Sir, we listended the other evening to a speech from the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) who is the Government whip in this House. When I heard his declarations on this Bill, and when I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) say that the Bill would be trusted to a committee composed of such men as the Government whip, then, Sir, I thought to myself that there is very little hope for getting much. Here is what the Government whip (Mr. Taylor) said :

> For myself, I think the requirements of the constitution and the decision of the Queen's Privy Council would be fully met, if, when the Bill gets into committee, it is amended in this way : That in the province of Manitoba there shall be one national school system, that there shall be one school, and that in that school no religion shall be taught that will be offensive to the parents of any child. That would be my view ; that, I believe, would settle the constitutional grievance, because it would place the whole of the community on the same footing. That is the view I shall take, when we get into committee on the Bill. But, I presume, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would oppose that view, because he says, that he prefers separate schools to secular schools ; and I believe there are others in this House who take a similar view. But, in my opinion, the requirements of the constitution would be met, if this Parliament passed a Bill of that nature ; because, if the Christians in that country, Catholic and Protestant, cannot agree on a form of religion that will not be offensive to any man's child, then, let them wipe out the whole thing from the schools, and let the religious training be given in the churches and Sabbath schools. Sir, I think it is a reflection on the pious fathers and mothers, on the clergymen of all denominations alike, and on the Sabbath school teachers of all denominations, if the religious training of our children has to depend on twenty or thirty minutes daily of state-aided religion taught in the schools.

And further on he said :

> * * * The hope of the leader of the Opposition, in moving this amendment, is, that, if carried, it would put him in power, and then he will settle the question by a still stronger Bill. Does he promise, either in his speech or in his amendment, that, if he were in power, and the government of Manitoba refused to settle this question, he would not come to this Parliament and ask us to pass a stronger Bill, a Bill that will restore the schools as they existed previous to 1890 ? No, Mr. Speaker, he says just the contrary ; he says, and his supporters from Quebec who have thus far spoken on the subject also say, that this Bill is no good, that it is not strong enough ; and they will support his motion with the object, that, when he gets into power, he will bring in a stronger Bill. They can go back to their constituents and say, we did not vote against the Bill, we voted to put the Government out and to put the leader of the Opposition in and he will give us a better Bill.

And again :

> * * * If the leader of the Opposition wants to settle the question for all time to come, and remove it from this House, not to remain as a question, as the hon. gentleman has often said, out of which political capital could be made, then let him withdraw his amendment and substitute a motion reading like this : That this House is of the opinion that this Bill or any other Bill dealing with this question be not read now or six months hence or at any future time, but the whole question be left to the province of Manitoba to deal with it as it may deem best. Let the hon. gentleman move such a motion, and he will satisfy the House that if the question is not settled now, we at all events will not deal with it, and it will be left to the province of Manitoba. If the leader of the Opposition should move a motion like that, he might reasonably expect the support of hon. members in this House who are opposed to the re-establishment of separate schools as they were prior to 1890. But the hon. gentleman cannot expect that hon. members entertaining such opinions will support a motion for the six months' hoist preceded by a speech to the effect that the grievances in Manitoba must be removed, and that the claim of the minority that separate schools be established must be conceded and attended to. This being the case, I cannot support the amendment. I cannot do so in view of the statement made by the leader of the Opposition and repeated by his followers, that the only object they have in view is to defeat the present Bill with the hope of being able to pass a stronger Bill.

Sir, if there are many in this House like the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) I see very little hope for the Bill being made any better in committee than it is now. The Government all along have maintained the position, and it has been asserted again to-night by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) that they cannot expect anything from Mr. Greenway and the government of Manitoba; that, in fact, the Manitoba government had sent notice through Mr. McCarthy, while they were hearing the case last spring, that no matter what order the Privy Council would pass, or no matter what Bill this House would pass, the government of Manitoba would not obey it. Well, Sir, if the Government believe that, and I assume they did, then I say, Sir, that this Bill before the House is a Bill which puts in the hands of the Manitoba government the full control of its administration. If this Government had at heart the interests of the minority, as they profess, and if they believe as they asserted over and over again, that the Manitoba government was hostile, then, Sir, it is not only inconsistent, but it is heartless and cruel, to hand over to the tender mercies of the oppressors, the downtrodden oppressed.

Now, let me say a word or two about some sections of the Bill. The first section gives the appointment of the school board to the government of Manitoba. If they undertake to put into operation the provisions of the Bill, they would naturally select Catholics who are opposed to separate schools. And to show this House that I am not alone in holding that view, I will read another extract from the Antigonish "Casket," which, to say the least, has all along been strongly in favour of the position of the Government on this question. It says with regard to this section of the Bill :

> We cannot, however, in view of the attitude of intense hostility to Catholic educational rights taken by the government of Manitoba, but anticipate grave difficulties from the placing of the administration of the proposed schools almost en> tirely in the hands of that government. The probability is that Mr. John O'Donoghue will be the first member of the new board—or perhaps the first Superintendent of Catholic schools for Manitoba. Then in the matter of the provincial grant to Catholic schools, there is absolutely no warrant that we can see for the assumption that the province will make this grant voluntarily. If, then, there is authority under the constitution to provide for the sharing of this grant, it would seem to us to be a wise policy to settle this vexed question once for all.

The Bill provides three modes of assessment. Section 23 says that each school section shall be assessed, and have to pay and collect $20 a month for each month a teacher is employed in the section ; beside that, an additional tax of $5 will be collected ; and, besides, there is the provision that the trustees can hold a meeting and make a further assessment in order to carry on a separate school successfully. This would entail a burden upon five families, which is the minimum number who can establish a separate school, a tax of between $25 and $40 a month without any legislative grant whatever. Then, by section 37, subsections "h" and "i," the trustees are required to receive and provide accommodation for the children of parents who are not Catholics, and for those of Catholic parents who have given notice that they will not be separate school supporters ; and they can collect not more than 50 cents per month for each child. This is placing such a burden on the people of every school section as will prevent their carrying out this law. By section 28, a person who gives notice that he is not a separate school supporter is not bound to contribute towards the support of the school ; so that whenever any trouble arises in a school section—and everybody knows that there is nothing more likely to cause irritation than the small matters that arise in school sections, regarding the location of school sites, the employment of teachers, and similar questions—then, every dissatisfied ratepayer, no matter what the cause of his dissatisfaction may be can, under this section, leave the school section and escape taxation, and those who remain may be utterly unable to maintain a separate school in the district. Section 74 is the section which omits clause "b" of the remedial order which declares that the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba are and shall be entitled to their share of the legislative grant for education. This section is therefore so much waste paper ; it amounts to nothing, and will, I have no doubt, render all the other sections of the Bill unconstitutional. Nearly every lawyer in this House takes that view. I am not going to give my opinion at all. But the view of eminent lawyers in this House is that this and other omissions from the Bill rendered the whole Bill unconstitutional. I will read from "La Vérité," which is a leading Catholic paper in the province of Quebec, and I am told is called a clerical organ, referring to this Bill :

> The parliamentary correspondence of the "Trifluvien" considers that the present time is not well chosen for discussing the merits of the Remedial Bill.
> We believe it is infinitively better worth our while to examine this Bill now when it is at least theoretically possible to modify it, than to pass it first and then to estimate its shortcomings.
> It will be said "If there are defects they will be removed by subsequent legislation." Let no one create this illusion for himself. As the Act is when passed, so it will remain. Never can Parliament be held to legislate twice on the question.
> It is enough to remember what is going on at Ottawa to convince one of this.
> If the Bill is not modified so as to make it conform entirely to the remedial order of last March it can be attacked as unconstitutional. In effect the Federal Parliament has no right to legislate on the school question, except in so far as the Manitoba legislature has refused to legislate itself.
> Now the remedial order of March 21st, 1895, declared that the minority had a right to three things, viz. : (a) To construct, maintain, manage and conduct Roman Catholic schools ; (b) to receive a proportionate share of every subsidy granted from the public funds for educational purposes ; (c) finally, exemption for the Catholics from taxes imposed for the maintenance of public schools. It is a, b, c which the Federal Government ordered the legislature to do. It is, therefore, a, b, c which the Manitoba legislature has refused to do. It is, therefore, a, b, and c which the Federal Parliament has the right to do in virtue of the constitution.
> But by the Bill actually before the public the Government only invites Parliament to do (a) and (c) ; for no matter what we may say, clause 74 does not do (b), that is to say, it does not give the minority a proportionate part of every grant made for educational purposes out of public funds.
> Winnipeg may then say : "I have refused to do a, b and c, but I have not refused to do a and c alone. You have, therefore, the right to legislate on a, b and c, because of my refusal, but you have not the right to legislate on a and c, because you have not, in the first place, given me notice to legislate myself on a and c alone.
> It is useless to do like the ostrich, to hide one's head in the sand and believe one's self under shelter. If clause 74 is not modified so as to do c, the Act will probably be declared unconstitutional.
> Let us now cast a glance over some of the clauses of the Bill which, according to us, require to be altered.
> To begin with, the first section of the Bill appears to us as exposing the minority to a grave danger. This section says that "the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and constitute the Separate School Board of Education for the province of Manitoba, a certain number of persons, not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics." It is hardly probable, we know, that the Manitoba government would carry this clause into effect and constitute the Separate School Board, but it may do so, and if it should take into its head to carry out this disposition of the Bill it would certainly do it in such a way as to frustrate the whole law. For that purpose all it would have to do would be to appoint as members of the new board a certain number of persons regarded as Catholics by law, but deeply opposed to separate schools.

By section 2 the Dominion Government reserves the right to constitute and renew this board if the Manitoa government neglects to do so. Prudence demands, it seems to us, that the Dominion Government should reserve this right to itself absolutely. Otherwise, it opens the door to grave complications. For, we repeat it, if the provincial government takes appointing members of the Separate School Board it will only be for the purpose of obstruction.

The third section seems to us still more dangerous, because it insures, so to speak, the hostile intervention of the Manitoba government. In fact this section says that "the Department of Education for the province of Manitoba may make such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools."

Now, the Department of Education for Manitoba is nothing else in reality than the government. So, then, the separate schools will be subject, for their general organization, to the government that has just abolished them ! No need of dwelling upon this.

Besides, this section 3 is as useless as it is dangerous. Section 4 gives to the Separate School Board the right of making regulations for the schools. There will then be concurrent jurisdiction. Both the Department of Education for public schools and the Separate School Board will have the right to make regulations on the same matter—the separate schools. Therefore, the two sections 3 and 4 constitute a breeding nest of endless conflicts.

Section 4 gives the board the right of choosing the books to be used in the separate schools, but limits the choice to the books in use in the public schools in Manitoba and in the separate schools of Ontario. This limitation seems to us arbitrary and dangerous. A loyal gentleman said to us on this subject : "I think, for my part, that the Dominion Government has not the right to impose any restrictions as to the choice of books, if such restrictions did not exist in the school laws of Manitoba before 1890." Owing to this restriction it will be very difficult, we believe, to establish French schools ; that is to say, schools where the teaching is done in French where the ordinary language is French ; for the separate schools of Ontario are, above all, English. To a certain extent the teaching of French is allowed, but even in the French districts, if we are not mistaken, the English is the official language of the separate school as well as of the public school. The school books must necessarily be of the same nature as the schools ; that is to say, they must be mainly English.

Moreover, one knows what a dreadful war is being carried on in Ontario against the separate schools. Should a party opposed to these schools come into power in Ontario they could very substantially modify the separate school books. Grant that to-day these books be proper ; they may cease to be acceptable to-morrow. Why should the law subordinate the existence of the separate schools in Manitoba to the vicissitudes through which the separate schools may have to pass in Ontario ?

The famous section 74 reads textually as follows :—"The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of public funds for the purposes of education having been decided to be, and being now, one of the rights and privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba, any sum granted by the legislature of Manitoba and appropriated for the separate schools shall be placed to the credit of the Board of Education in accounts to be opened in the books of the Treasury Department and in the Audit Office."

In plain language, the meaning of the above is this : As the Catholic minority have the right to a proportionate share of all grants voted by the legislature for the purposes of education, they may accept whatever the legislature may grant them. As the reader will see, this is not terrorizing.

But the Ministerial papers will say the Government cannot go further than that ; they cannot touch the funds belonging to the province to give a part thereof to the Catholics. All they can do is to declare that the Catholics have a right to a proportionate share of the sums voted for education.

No doubt the Federal Parliament could not appropriate any part of the funds of a province to any use whatever. But the Bill could go much further than it goes. It could provide, for instance, that, as the minority have a right to a proportionate share of the sums voted by the legislature for educational purposes, there will rest with this minority a right of action against the province of Manitoba if such a proportionate share be not voted to it. The clause would then have a sanction. What is the use of solemnly proclaiming the right of the minority to a share of the legislative grants if no means be given it to have this right respected ?

The law might say also that in the case of the Manitoba legislature failing to vote to the minority the sums to which this minority is entitled, then the Governor General in Council shall take out of the proceeds of the sale of lands reserved for the support of schools a sum proportionate to the number of the Catholics and apply it to the separate schools. There is nothing like that in the Bill.

This section 74 is therefore clearly intended to humbug the minority in Manitoba, as is also section 112. But we are told that the minority are satisfied and that therefore we should not object. Now, I have heard this, but I am not satisfied that they are.

Mr. GILLIES. You had better vote against the Bill.

Mr. McISAAC. Are you satisfied with the Bill as it is ?

Mr. GILLIES. Certainly.

Mr. McISAAC. Without any amendment ?

Mr. GILLIES. I am satisfied with the principle of the Bill, and that is what we are discussing now. Are you satisfied ?

Mr. McISAAC. I tell you that I am not.

Mr. GILLIES. Then you had better vote against the Bill.

Mr. McISAAC. I say that if I could believe that the minority in Manitoba are satisfied with the Bill, as it is now, I would be compelled to say that the grievance of that minority, as they were represented to me and to the people of the country, must have been grossly magnified. I do not believe that the minority are satisfied with it, except perhaps on this condition, that promises have been made to gentlemen representing the minority in Manitoba, that although this Bill practically provides but very little, still in the future, they will get something more, and under this belief they may have given their assent to the Bill. I want no stronger proof of this than what occurred the other night, when the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) put the question across the floor to the hon. Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron). I shall read from the speech of the hon. member for Quebec on that occasion. He said :

> By the last clause of the Bill an attempt is made to humbug the minority and induce it to accept the Bill. The friends of the Government say to them : it is true that this Bill gives you nothing, but it lays down the principle, and once that principle is accepted, we shall pass a good Bill that will give you all what you ask for. The Ministers would not dare to speak in that way in this House, but that is what their friends say out of it. Is the Postmaster General prepared to state that this is only the beginning, and that the law will be completed later on ? If he makes such a declaration I am ready to vote for the Bill. Is the Postmaster General prepared to declare that this is only the beginning, and that the Bill will be completed at another session ? Let him answer immediately. Every one knows why he does not answer. He will not answer, but his friends will go on deceiving the minority by making it believe that this is only the commencement of the justice which the Government is determined to grant to it. They say that this Bill is but the acknowledgment of the principle of interference, and that the law will be completed later on.

But, though the hon. member for Quebec Centre threw this challenge across the floor of this House, the Postmaster General remained as dumb as an oyster, and even yet no answer has come from him or any other member of the Government. Therefore, Sir, I am satisfied that this section is put in for the purpose of humbugging and deceiving the minority in Manitoba. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speeches delivered on both sides of this debate. Of all those I have heard speak, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) convinced me most strongly of two things—first, that he was more strongly in favour of this Bill than any other member of the House, and, second, that he brought forward some of the strongest arguments against the Bill that have been brought forward by any member. He said :

> Can we pass legislation to force Mr. Greenway or the Manitoba government ? What power have we ? The only thing we can do is to pass a declaratory law, and the Bill contains that declaration. It says that it is decided that such is the right of the minority. Mr. Speaker, when the government of Manitoba will be led by men who are friends of the minorities as well as of the majorities, when the government of Manitoba will be led by friends of justice, then the Manitoba government will find in the law such declaration, and will give justice to the minority. But, Sir, so long as the Manitoba government will be led by friends of the Liberal party in this House, unless we go there with an army, unless we go there with force, unless we go there as a nation equipped for war in order to obtain that justice which the constitution says is ours, I do not see any human way of forcing Manitoba to give us justice. We might, perhaps, say in this Bill that a certain amount, yearly, should be given to the separate schools out of the lands which the Federal Government own in that province. Well, Sir, it will be easy to pass such a law later on. It might be, perhaps, possible to insert such a clause even in this Bill, but that I do not discuss now.

Later on in his speech he said :

> But, Sir, the Conservative party of Manitoba, which, in Manitoba, as everywhere else, is the upholder of liberty, is not a very small minority in that province. If you take the returns of the last election for the Manitoba legislature, you find that out of a total of 25,507 votes, giving thirty-two government supporters, the government supporters have received 11,178 votes, whereas the Conservative candidates received 10,719 votes, the Patrons 2,680 votes, and the Independent received 930 votes. * * * * * * You will see, also, Sir, when party passion is over, when the present Bill will be the law of the land, when it will be understood and interpreted, when the sentiment of justice which exists in the heart of every Canadian is awakened, you will see then, Sir, that the Conservative party will be in power in Manitoba. Then the Conservative party will get back the majority in Manitoba, and you will have a friendly administration at the head of affairs there. Then this law will be the safety of the minority, will bring back peace to the Dominion, and will allow us to work harmoniously together for the development and the welfare of the country. That is what this law is likely to do.

Mr. AMYOT. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one remark ? The hon. gentleman quotes my speech, but does not say that that part refers especially to the clause providing for the share for the minority from the education fund. He should have the fairness to state that. He quotes this as if I were speaking of the whole Bill, whereas I was speaking of clause 74.

Mr. McISAAC. I think I have been fair to the hon. gentleman. I have read lengthy extracts from his speech, and in those extracts I find the strongest condemnation of this Bill. Pass this Bill, he says, and when the Conservative party come into power they will carry out its provisions. It means that until the Conservative party come into power this Bill is not worth a snap.

Mr. AMYOT. That only refers to clause 74.

Mr. McISAAC. That is the effect of the hon. gentleman's speech, as any one can gather. This is an admission that until the hon. gentleman's friends get into power this Bill will remain a dead letter. This is in effect an admission that the Bill is so defective that it will not offer any remedy or remove any grievance. Sir, if justice is to be denied until the Conservative party come into power, then do not pass this Bill, because, when his party come into power they will be tied down to the provisions of this

Bill, and will have to apply themselves to the doubtful process of doing justice to the minority through the instrumentality of this Bill. He stated that justice will be denied until his friends get into power in Manitoba. Sir, would it not be far better for his friends to pass a Bill in the legislature of Manitoba itself. Does not everybody know that a Bill passed in that legislature is worth ten times more to the minority of that province than a Bill passed in this House ? Therefore, assuming his statement to be correct, I say if justice is to be denied the minority until his friends get into power in Manitoba, then it will be infinitely better that his friends should introduce a Bill into the legislature of Manitoba. But the hon. gentleman has gone further, he has stated that the Conservative party in the province of Manitoba, as elsewhere, were the champions of toleration, of liberty, and I suppose I may include, separate schools. Why, has the hon. gentleman been asleep for the last fifteen years ? Has he read the political events of this country for these years ? Does he not know that for fifteen years a struggle has been going on in the province of Ontario on this very question ? And what is the record of his friends in Ontario on that question, and what is the record of the Liberal party ? Do the political events in that province prove the statements of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) that the Conservative party in Manitoba and elsewhere are the champions of religious liberty and toleration all over this country ? Does he not know that during the last fifteen years the Liberal party, led by Sir Oliver Mowat, have stood by the separate schools and the cause of the Catholic minority in that province ? And does he not know that during those fifteen years his political associates in that province have hounded Sir Oliver Mowat and the Liberals from pillar to post, because forsooth they would not lay their hands upon the separate schools and destroy them. Sir, I will go further, and I will examine the political situation in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman would have this House believe that his friends in Manitoba are the friends of separate schools, are the friends of the minority in that province. On that point I take issue with him, and I will proceed to give the proof. In the election which took place in Manitoba in 1892, the Conservative party, at a convention held on 13th May, at Winnipeg, adopted a platform, the sixth plank of which related to schools, and reads as follows :—

> The Opposition hereby declare :
> 1. That they are in favour of one uniform system of public schools for the province.
> 2. That they are ready and willing to loyally carry out the present Act should it be held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain to be within the legislative power of the province.
> 3. That in the event of such School Act being held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain to be beyond the legislative powers of the province, they will endeavour to secure such amendments to the "British North America Act" and the "Manitoba Act" as will place educational matters wholly within the legislative power of the provicne of Manitoba, without appeal to the Governor in Council or the Parliament of Canada.

That is the platform of his friends in 1892. But did the last election afford the hon. member a crumb of comfort in that respect ? An election was held within a few weeks in that province. I will give the hon. gentleman the platform of his friends, those who in the future are to give justice to his co-religionists in that province. Here is the platform of the Conservative party, here is the appeal which they made to the people of Manitoba a few weeks ago when the provincial election was held. It was published in the "Nor-Wester," the chief Conservative organ in that province, and I will read it :

> DECEPTION.
> Electors of Manitoba.
> The Greenway Government is Deceiving You.
> Mr. Laurier said at Montreal, in the late contest there, speaking as to the Manitoba school question :
> I have no hesitation in telling you that I want to have the minority in Manitoba restored to the same privileges which are freely granted in Quebec to the Protestant minority, and to the Catholic minority in Ontario.
> The Brandon "Sun" (the organ of the Greenway party), in its issue of 26th December last, said :
> Let it be shown that the Manitoba School Act attacks the conscientious convictions of Catholics, and we will join in demanding its amendment or correction.
> The Hon. Mr. Sifton, in his speech at Douglas, on the 31st December last, as reported by the Winnipeg "Daily Tribune" (the Government organ), said :
> We are prepared to consider any changes in method that will make it acceptable to the Roman Catholics. We will do anything in reason, anything that will not compromise principle ; and again, anything in reason, if we can settle this matter without compromising principle, then we will do it, but not otherwise. If there is any change that can be made in the religious exercises that will make them acceptable to all parties, if any change can be made in the time they are held, or other like changes, we are prepared to consider them.
> What does all this mean ? Is the present School Act going to be modified to meet the grievances of the Roman Catholics, by the Greenway party, if returned to power ? Why are these doubtful and qualified expressions uttered and published at the present time if no understanding has been come to ? The evidence is clear, and the inference is clear. The Greenway party are coming before you on a false issue. They are deceiving you on this school question, and hope by means of it to cover the numerous shortcomings of their administration.
> You may depend upon it that, if returned to power, they will so change and amend the present School Act that the conscientious convic> tions of the Roman Catholics will no longer be attacked by it, and, though they will not have separate schools in name, they will have them in fact.

> Remember Greenway's withholding of maximum letter as to freight rates.
> Remember Sifton's concealment of Dalton McCarthy's opinon re Ryan & Heney claim.
> Remember Greenway's deception towards the Roman Catholics in passing the School Act, and he will deceive the whole province.
> ELECTORS, DON'T TRUST THEM ! ! !

What does that mean ? This is the leading Conservative paper in that province, this is the platform of the Conservative party, and this is the appeal made by the Conservative party to the electors of Manitoba a few weeks ago. That paper asks the electors to reject the Greenway government because that government would be prepared to extend relief to the Roman Catholic minority ; whereas the other party were pledged, if they got into power, never to give them any relief. Is there any comfort for the hon. member for Bellechasse in that ? If so, he is welcome to take it. But I have not exhausted the hon. gentleman's arguments yet. It is reasonably clear from these arguments that this Bill will afford no remedy, but the hon. member for Bellechasse has another argument, and I will give it to the House. He says it is useless to try and enforce this Bill while Mr. Greenway is in power, unless we go there with an army. Now, let us see how the hon. member would succeed if he went there with an army. He went out there once before. He admitted that we cannot enforce this law while Greenway is in power, and the only means of enforcing it is by waging war upon Manitoba, and I suppose the hon. gentleman would be willing to undertake it himself. Well, let us suppose that he has made a serious argument, and let us see how much there is in it. Let us suppose that the gallant member for Bellechasse leads an army on to Manitoba, and takes in his caravan the Remedial Bill for the purpose of enforcing it, and ramming it down the throats of Greenway and his government. What would be the result ? Against whom would he direct his first attack ? And who would return the volley first ? Would he be joined by the loyal Conservatives of Manitoba in making an attack upon the Grits of that province ? No ; I fear not. I am afraid he is doomed to disappointment here again. The only man in Manitoba I ever heard of who declared he was ready for war, was a gentleman belonging to his political faith in the parliament of Manitoba. His name is Mr. Mulvey, member for the county of Morris.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. And a supporter of Greenway.

Mr. McISAAC. On this question.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. No, all through.

Mr. McGREGOR. I know him, he is a Conservative of old.

Mr. McISAAC. Of course, he would support Greenway on this school question. I want to ask what the result of the hon. member's attack upon Manitoba is likely to be ? This is what Mr. Mulvey said :

> He was a strong advocate of national schools. Was he a man who knew naught of liberty and freedom to submit to such a constitution as that drafted in 1870 at Fort Garry, at the point of the bayonet ? Were his children to be submitted to such a galling yoke ? No, Sir ! Four times already in his past career had he shouldered the musket in defence of the will of the majority and he would now say on the floor of this House, and without fear, that a fifth time would he take up his rifle to fight for the liberties of the majority.

Fancy a fight carried on one side by the gallant member for Bellechasse, and on the other side by the bellicose member for Morris, and each fighting for the constitution.

Mr. AMYOT. I want to know if it is to my personal bravery that the hon. gentleman makes allusion in his observations ?

Mr. McISAAC. Not at all. I am saying that he is the only brave man I ever heard of in this House, or in this part of the Dominion, who has suggested war, and the only other brave man in Manitoba who suggests war against him is Mr. Mulvey.

Mr. AMYOT. I never suggested war. I said that was the only possible way to enforce the Bill, judging from our experience in 1874

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think I have a right to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I want to know in regard to Major Mulvey—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to ask the hon. member who is in possession of the floor a question, unless he chooses to give way.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I want to ask——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac) is not disposed to give way to answer a question.

Mr. McDOUGALL. He does not want to answer it. He is afraid to answer it.

Mr. McISAAC. Let us see how enforcement by an army would work. The gallant member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) would lead an army into Manitoba, and he would be met there no doubt by the bellicose member for Morris, Major Mulvey. What would the result be ? In order to ascertain the probable result, let us examine the past military records of both and judge. The member for Morris has four times already shouldered his rifle in defence of the majority, and he is ready to do so again for the fifth time.

Mr. McDOUGALL. He is Greenway's seconder.

Mr. McISAAC. History records that the hon. member for Bellechasse went to the North-west during the rebellion——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should state what relevancy the conduct of the hon. member for Bellechasse in the North-west has to the Bill now before the House.

Mr. McISAAC. I was proceeding to reply to the remark made by that hon. gentleman. That hon. gentleman has insisted that this is the only way to enforce this Bill.

Mr. AMYOT. Not this Bill, the remedial order.

Mr. McISAAC. I am meeting that argument, and I think, Mr. Speaker, I am in order. If we are to judge as to the probable result of the conflict, we must consider these records. I have already told you the military exploits of the hon. member for Morris.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the military exploits of the hon. member for Bellechasse are not before the House.

Mr. McISAAC. I will now proceed to quote a few extracts from the "Mail and Empire," the leading Conservative organ in Ontario, to show the opinions it holds in regard to this Bill. On March 4th the "Mail and Empire," said :

> Sir Charles Tupper's motion for the second reading of the Remedial Bill elicited from Mr. Laurier this afternoon in amendment, the proposition that the measure be considered this day six months. There is no mistaking the ground on which the Liberal leader asks the House to acquiesce in the six months' hoist. To his mind the Bill is weak and faint-hearted, and, what is worse, does not take from Mr. Greenway the control of the education of the Catholics of Manitoba. It is significant that the two leading speakers who dealt with the subject today were forced to opposite conclusions by reasons that are very much alike. Sir Charles Tupper points out that, impelled by a sense of constitutional duty, the Government has reluctantly taken hold of the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. I point out to the hon. gentleman that he is now violating a rule by reading extracts from newspapers relating to debates that have taken place in this House. Any editorial or any newspaper comment on a matter before this House cannot be referred to or read in the House.

Mr. McISAAC. If that ruling had been given some days ago we might have had the second reading over now. I suppose it is not a very great loss to the House to abstain from reading anything in the "Mail."

This Bill is inefficient and unworkable, and in the opinion of the leading lawyers who spoke, unconstitutional. The Minister of Justice who discussed this as he does all questions in a spirit of justice and moderation never touched this phase of the discussion at all, and the ex-Minister of Justice, who is usually bold if not rash and aggressive, did not even dare to offer an opinion on the point. It is a Bill which ostensibly professes to remedy the grievances of the minority without giving effectual relief, and as has been well said, while creating a vast and obnoxious machinery, provides no motive power either to start it or keep it moving. It is what one might expect from the Government that issued a remedial order containing in strong terms declarations in favour of separate schools for the minority, but without the intention of carrying it out.

Mr. AMYOT. I rise to a point of order. I draw attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman, who has indulged in personal abuse, is now reading his speech. I object to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is contrary to the rules, as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. McISAAC. I am merely using notes, and the hon. gentleman knows it. It is the result of a forced compromise between the two wings of the Government, one of which desired to carry out the order "word for word, line for line, and letter for letter," and the other, the stronger wing determined not to carry it into effect. It is a Bill of 112 sections, one of which declares that the minority shall have separate schools and nearly every other one of the remaining 111 sections blocking the way, and in effect declaring that the minority shall not have separate schools. It really offers but a dry and lifeless skeleton to the Manitoba minority. It is truly offering a stone to those who asked for and were promised bread. I cannot see any means whereby this skeleton can be vivified and given initial existence unless the Manitoba government will undertake the process of incubating it into life, and there seems but faint hope for that to happen, while the two governments maintain towards each other their present attitude.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Speaker, although this debate has been carried on in a very stirring manner for the past fortnight, and although the debate has been upon a question that intimately concerns me and those of the religious denomination to which I happen to belong, yet, it was my fixed purpose and set determination not to take any part whatever in the discussion, and I would have adhered to this purpose, were it not for the very extraordinary exhibition made of himself by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McIsaac), and who, I am very sorry to say, happens to come from my province. Now, Mr. Speaker, I never saw, to my mind, any gentleman in a more unenviable position than the hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac). He has denounced a Bill that he is going to vote for. His vocabulary was profuse enough to denounce this Bill in the terms that he desired, yet he is going back upon his leader, he is going back upon his speech, and he is going to vote for this Bill. That hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac) went down to Cape Breton some few weeks ago to take part in an election campaign there. What was his attitude upon this question then? He went into every Catholic district in which he could find an abiding place, and he told the people that the policy of his leader was that of an investigation. He told them, that the Government would not dare bring down a Remedial Bill, but that the matter was safe in the hands of his leader, the Catholic (Mr. Laurier), and that immediately the House met, his policy would be carried out, and that policy was not delay, but immediate action in the way of investigation. Where is the investigation now, Mr. Speaker. Where is the policy of the leader of the Opposition now? In 1893 that hon gentleman took a very strong stand against the procrastination, as he called it, of the Government. He denounced them very violently indeed for not giving immediate relief, to what was then to him, a suffering minority. Well, Sir, the Government took the proper method to deal with this question. They went from court to court, and had the question threshed out in all its aspects, and before submitting this legislation to Parliament, they wished to be sure that they were proceeding on a solid basis. The very moment that the decision was given by the highest court of the Empire, they issued the remedial order. Let me say here, Sir, that, if it is my lot, or the lot of any hon. gentleman in this House, to listen in the future to such attenuated and half-starved statements as the member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) made to-night. I do hope that such statements will not come from a man from my province. Sir, in the few observations that I intend making upon this subject, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a misstatement made by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), in connection with Mr. Mulvey of Manitoba. He (Mr. McIsaac) was animadverting upon my friend, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), and he said that Mr. Mulvey was a political friend of that hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, a grosser misstatement than that was never made on the floor of this House. What are the facts? Mr. Mulvey was the Greenway candidate in opposition to the Conservative candidate in Morris county, and he was returned by the influence of the Greenway Government, and so closely does he stand in with that Government, that he either moved or seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Manitoba legislature. That statement made by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) is so wide from the truth, that the other statements that he has made may be judged accordingly. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac) referred to the campaign in Antigonish in which my hon. friend, the late Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) took so active a part. If there is one fault to find with the hon. the ex-Minister of Justice, it is that he possesses indomitable courage. Every person who knows my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will admit that. I could hardly believe my ears, when I heard the member for Antigonish say to-night, that the ex-Minister of Justice would not dare make such-and-such a statement in his presence. Sir, on every platform on which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) appeared during the Antigonish campaign, I venture to say that he proclaimed readily, and expressly, and definitely the course that the Government would pursue on this question. At the very first meeting we had in the town of Antigonish, I myself heard the ex-Minister of Justice make as definite a statement on that question as ever fell from the lips of man. But, what was the position of the hon. gentleman from Antigonish on this Bill? It was written by himself, and I happen to have it here to-night, and for the edification and instruction of the House I will read a few lines from it. Here is what he said:

> As to the Manitoba school difficulty, I am in full sympathy with the Catholic minority.

I suppose he is so now, too, when he is going to vote for the Bill.

> Between myself and my opponent on this question there is no difference of opinion. We both agree that full and ample justice should and must be done to our co-religionists in Manitoba. I pledge myself, if elected, to support remedial legislation.

Well, Sir, he is trying to excuse himself to-night for the action he is taking. He denounces the Bill, but he is voting for it, because he wants to do justice to his co-religionists in Manitoba. If the Bill is bad as he contends, why in the name of common sense is he voting for it? But the Bill is effective, gives the relief asked for, is satisfactory to the minority and is therefore good and sound legislation, but the hon. gentleman is not honest enough to admit this. There may be another reason which actuates and compels the hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac) to take this course; a reason that he has not given to the House, and that reason is, that he probably thinks that this course is more likely to ensure his return to this House than if he voted against the Bill.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. His speech will kill him.

Mr. GILLIES. Yes. It ought and will. Again, the hon. member for Antigonish goes on to say:

> Members of the Government, and their supporters in this county, claim great credit for the Government's action in passing the Order in Council. The Government have, however, done only what they are bound to do under the constitution and in obedience to the demand of the highest judicial authority in the realm.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. McIsaac) is quite correct in that, and I am glad to have his opinion in regard to that matter. But, I would like to know, how his friend the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) likes that, and I would like to know how his friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) likes that. I would like to know how the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) or the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) or his friend the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) or the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) or the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) likes that. They have all been shouting that the Government did wrong in issuing this remedial order, but the hon. gentleman says they only did their duty. Who is right? The hon. gentleman or his political associates above named, all of whom are the friends of his bosom? If they are a happy family in this connection, that is something the outside world does not know. The hon. gentleman goes on further to say:

> In his card to the electors of the county, Mr. Chisholm intimates that Laurier has failed to declare his policy on the school question. This, however, is not so. He has already declared himself in favour of the Catholic minority.

Now, Sir, the only way a member of this House can declare himself is to place himself on record; and what is the record of the hon. leader of the Opposition in this connection? Does he wish relief to be given to the Catholic minority of Manitoba? And if he holds this Bill to be inadequate in that direction, his duty is to move an amendment that will give them more relief than this Bill provides. But he does not move in that direction; he simply moves the six months' hoist, which puts this question away in the indefinite, dim and distant future. Another paragraph of this celebrated card, and I am done with it:

> In conclusion, let me add, that should the Manitoba government fail to do justice in the matter, the question of remedial legislation will be submitted to the Parliament of Canada, where the fair and tolerant spirit of men of both political parties will assert itself, as it did in the settlement of the Jesuits' Estate Act.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the Manitoba government did fail to do justice in the matter, but is the fair and tolerant spirit of men of both political parties asserting itself in carrying out this legislation? Where are the friends of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken? Are they coming to the assistance of the Government in granting a measure of relief to the suffering minority in Manitoba? I will leave the hon. gentleman and his friends to sleep over that question, and to settle it among themselves.

Now, Sir, I desire to make a few observations on the question itself, and in doing so I shall be very brief; because the question has been fully and ably dealt with by gentlemen on both sides of the House, each according to his lights, and I hope all according to their convictions, except the member who speaks against the Bill and is going to vote for it. With that sort of personage I have no patience. Great fault has been found with the Government for not giving sufficient notice to the government of Manitoba, that unless they introduced legislation themselves, providing to remedy the grievance, legislation would be introduced here. Let us go back for a moment, and look at the record. We find that as long ago as the 26th of July, 1894, an Order in Council was sent from this Government to the government of Manitoba. That order was of a most conciliatory character. It was couched in such langauge as I think the most supersensitive person could not take exception to. What does it say:

> The statements which are contained in this memorial are matter of deep concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and that it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and religious belief and practice; and the committee, therefore, humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hope that the legislature of Manitoba and the North-west Territories respectively, may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

There is not in that minute of Council a single objectionable word. What was the answer to that made by the government of Manitoba? It was this:

> It has been made clear that there is no grievance. Under these circumstances the executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislature to alter the principles of the legislation complained of.

Now, how can it be alleged that the government of Manitoba were approached in a summary or coercive manner by this Government, in view of the Order in Council which I have read as having been sent to the Greenway government in July, 1894, and the answer to it, which was a direct negative. Then, there was the remedial order as long ago as March, 1895. That order was of course in more forcible terms than the first minute of Council. It expressely ordered the government of Manitoba to restore to the minority their rights. It was an intimation of what would happen unless that were done. But nothing was done. Then, in July last the statement was made in this House of Commons by the leader of the House, and in the Senate by the Premier, that unless the legislature of Manitoba would grant such relief as would be reasonably satisfactory to the minority, steps would be taken by this Parliament on a day not later than the 2nd of January to enact such legislation as would give relief to the minority. That was notice number three. After that, on the 22nd of July, an Order in Council was sent from here to the government of Manitoba in these words:

> The sub-committee have, therefore, the honour to recommend that Your Excellency will be pleased to cause communication to be had through the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba with the government of that province, in order to ascertain on what lines the local authorities of Manitoba will be prepared to promote amendments to the Acts respecting education in schools in that province, and whether any arrangement is possible with the Manitoba government, which will render action by the Federal Parliament, in this connection, unnecessary.

Could anything be more conciliatory than that? Could anything be framed in milder terms than that? Well, that went up to Manitoba last July, and only a few days before this House met, the answer of the Manitoba government was transmitted to this Government. How does it read? This is the main paragraph in it:

> It is, therefore, recommended, that, so far as the government of Manitoba is concerned, the proposal to establish a system of separate schools in any form be positively and definitely rejected, and that the principle of a uniform non-sectarian public school system be adhered to.

That is a most distinct and emphatic refusal, and I think that that answer of the Manitoba government effectually disposes of the allegation made so frequently that the federal authorities are attempting to take it by the throat, and that it is no wonder it should have resented it in the way it did. But when we come to look at the facts, the Order in Council of July, 1894, the remedial order of March, 1895, the statement of the hon. leader of the House of Commons that a remedial Act would be passed unless the Manitoba government would take such action as was necessary in Manitoba itself, and then taking the final Order in Council of the Federal Government of July last, which I have just read, and the distinct expressed negative given by the legislature of Manitoba, I cannot see for the life of me how any person can say that coercion was used in the slightest way by the federal authorities against the local authorities of Manitoba. Now, I am almost afraid to approach the question of a grievance. That has been so fully discussed, far better than I can hope to discuss it, that I am almost afraid to take it up; but in justice to myself, I hope the House will permit me to refer to it very briefly. That the minority are suffering from a grievance, I do not think any reasonable man can doubt. We have it on the authority of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and on Mr. McCarthy's own admission. When the question was argued before the Privy Council at Ottawa, he admitted, as you will find on page 34 of the proceedings before the Canadian Privy Council, that he was precluded from denying there was a grievance by the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Queen's Privy Council. Mr. Martin, the putatative and actual father of the Manitoba Act, wrote the following letter to the Ottawa "Citizen," July last:

> When I introduced the School Bill of 1890 I pointed out that in so far as it provided for religious exercises in the schools it was, in my opinion, defective. I am one of those who deny the right of the state to interfere in any way with matters of religion. I said then, and I still think, that the clause of the 1890 Act which provides for certain religious exercises is most unjust to Roman Catholics. If the state is to recognize religion in its school legislation, such a recognition as is acceptable to Protestants only, and in fact only to a majority of Protestants, is, to my mind, rank tyranny.

No one is more familiar with the Act than the gentleman who introduced it, who is now a member of this House, and he admits that a gross injustice has been done, and that in fact the whole Act was rank tyranny.

Then, the sixth question, which is really the important one which was referred to the Supreme Court and decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, is as follows:—

> (6) Did the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to the session of 1890, confer on or continue to the minority "a right or privilege in relation to education" within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, or establish a system of separate or dissentient schools, within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867; if said section 93 be found applicable to Manitoba; and if so, did the two Acts of 1890 complained of, or either of them, affect any right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council?

Let me read the answer of the Judicial Committee on that point. What do they say:

> With the policy of these Acts their lordships are not concerned, nor with the reasons which led to their enactment. It may be that as the population of the province became more largely Protestant, it was found increasingly difficult, especially in sparsely populated districts, to work the system inaugurated in 1871, even with the modifications introduced in later years. But whether this be so or not is immaterial. The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890 ? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character.

That distinctly, emphatically and unequivocally declares that there is a grievance. I think it will appeal to any parent, whether he be Protestant or Catholic, in the keenest and most tangible manner, that he would resent by every power at his command if any body of men or any man would try to compel him to send his son to a school to which he was conscientiously opposed. There is no doubt about that. I do not care whether a person be Protestant, Catholic, Jew or Mahommedan, he has a perfect right to see that his son shall not go to any school he cannot conscientiously attend. That is exactly the position of affairs in Manitoba. In this connection, I would ask permission of the House to quote Lord Salisbury's opinion :

> Numbers of persons have invented what I may call a patent compressible religion, which can be forced into all consciences with a very little squeezing ; and they wish to insist that this should be the only religion taught throughout the schools of the nation. What I want to impress upon you is, that if you admit this conception, you are entering upon a religious war of which you will not see the end. There is only one sound principle in religious education to which you should cling, which you should relentlessly enforce against all the conveniences and experiences of official men, and that is, that a parent, unless he has forfeited the right by criminal acts, has the inalienable right to determine the teaching which the child shall receive upon the holiest and most momentous of subjects. This is a right which no expediency can negative, which no state necessity ought to allow you to sweep away ; and, therefore, I ask you to give your attention to this question of denominational education. It is full of danger and of difficulty ; but you will only meet the danger by marching straight up to it and declaring that the prerogative of the parent, unless he be convicted of criminality, must not be taken away by the state.

This is the opinion of an eminent Protestant and one of the leading thinkers of the day, and is precisely in line with the views held by the authorities of the church to which I belong. Into what fact can any commission investigate, if the proposal of the hon. leader of the Opposition is agreed to ?

Mr. McMULLEN. You do not know anything of the schools there.

Mr. GILLIES. Yes, I do. Mr. Martin himself, the author of the Act, tells us in the letter that I have just read that the religious exercises prescribed by the Act are most unjust to Roman Catholics, and then the highest court of the Empire has decided that this Act is an abrogation of the rights of the minority in Manitoba ; but you do not want any change there. You will have to settle that with the hon. member for Antigonish. One other point I will touch upon and then I will conclude. I have heard it contended that the position of affairs in Quebec was not analogous to that in Manitoba. I have heard even some lawyers contend that. I may be allowed to take issue with that statement and I will give authority for the position I hold. I think it will be freely admitted that very few people ever lived that better understood the genius of the Canadian constitution than the late Sir Alexander T. Galt. In 1876 he wrote a pamphlet which may be found in the library, entitled "Church and State." In that pamphlet he says :

> The educational rights of Protestants as respects much of the principle and mode of taxation, separate management and other important points, are not secured by the Act of Confederation ; but rest upon a provincial statute of Quebec that is subject to repeal if not prevented by the veto power.

Now, we all know that separate schools were established in the two provinces of Canada prior to confederation—about the year 1863, I think. The bare right to have separate schools was established, and, of course, innures for all time to these two provinces under the Act of Confederation. But the separate school system in the province of Quebec was really unworkable until the legislation of 1869 was adopted. That Act gave effect to and made operative the separate school Act in the province of Quebec, which is the Act that Sir A. T. Galt refers to in the pamphlet which I have just read, when he says it may be repealed at any time by that province. If it is repealed, the Separate School Act of the province becomes really unworkable. Suppose then, and I put this very seriously to gentlemen on both sides, both Catholic and Protestant —and I do not like using these terms, for no one is more liberal minded than I am, and I think that any one who knows me will agree with that statement, and I hate to bandy these names "Catholic " and "Protestant" in this House, but it seems inevitable in this discussion—suppose that the legislature of Quebec in its wisdom or in its anger undertook to repeal the Act of 1869. The Protestant minority would have a grievance. What, then, would be done? The Federal authority could veto the Act, but according to the doctrine of hon. gentlemen opposite, that would be an undue interference with provincial autonomy. Would not their course be to come to the Governor in Council, as the minority in Manitoba has done, and seek the relief the statute provides? If I am right in that, the hon. gentlemen who oppose relief being given to the minority in Manitoba would have to raise the cry "Hands off Quebec" and declare that no relief could be given to the Protestant minority there. That is a position to which, as a Roman Catholic, I could not agree nor subscribe. I would stand up in defence of the rights and privileges of my Protestant fellow-brethren, and in doing so every Catholic clergyman would endorse and bless my action because it would be right. If such an Act were passed by the local legislature of Quebec denying or abridging by one iota the rights conferred upon the Protestant minority of that province and this Government would not interfere and give relief, I would leave them that moment and vote for remedial legislation, even though I never saw the inside of Parliament again. That is the stand I take, so strongly do I feel upon the matter. And if I, as a Roman Catholic, am ready to stand up for relief of the Protestant minority of Quebec if their rights are interfered with, why should not my Protestant friends meet me in the same way?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). So they will.

Mr. GILLIES. So they will. I have every faith in the determination of the majority of this House to do what is right to stand by the constitution and to give fair play. Before I sit down I must briefly refer to the way in which superior education is provided for in the province of Quebec. I have looked through the Education Act of that province very carefully. I find that section 2204 of the Act, under the head of superior education, provides as follows:—

> The total aid to universities, classical colleges, academies and model schools, granted under the provisions of this title, shall be divided between the totality of the Roman Catholic and Protestant institutions respectively, in the relative proportion of the respective Roman Catholic and Protestant populations of the province according to the last census.

Now, I think that is a most equitable division. It also provides:

> Such grants, so made out of the income fund, shall be for the year only and are not permanent.

Suppose that at the end of the year the legislature, as it would have the right to do, should depart from its usual course and should cut off the public grants to the Protestant minority. That would create a grievance that we should have the right to inquire into, and for which a remedy would have to be found by this Parliament. And I am sure that not a single Catholic in this House would vote against that remedy. Now, the Council of Public Instruction in the province of Quebec is composed of Roman Catholic and Protestant members, as follows:—

> 1. The bishops, ordinaries or administrators of the Roman Catholic dioceses and apostolic vicariates, situated either in whole or in part in the province, who are members ex-officio.
> 2. An equal number of Roman Catholic laymen appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.
> 3. A number of Protestant members equal to the number of Roman Catholic members appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, who are appointed in the same manner.

The Council of Public Instruction is divided into two committees, the one consisting of the Roman Catholic and the other of the Protestant members thereof, each having its own secretary. So complete is the machinery provided by the Act that the whole thing runs on without a jar. And, as I say, if one of those committees was interfered with, if, for instance, the Protestant committee were interfered with, the Protestant minority, who are one to seven of the population, would have a grievance. And if the objectionable Act were vetoed, it would be, according to gentlemen opposite, and I am not disposed to quarrel with them on that ground, an undue interference with provincial rights and autonomy. Then these people, in order to obtain a remedy, would have to apply to the Governor in Council just the same as the minority in Manitoba are doing now; and if they did that, I and my co-religionists in this House would support them. There is little further for me to say upon this question. In taking this attitude I contend that I stand upon the rock of the law, the basis of all justice and all rights. Sir, I appeal to my fellow-members of both religions in this House to settle this question in such a way as to allow us to live amicably together in this Dominion, and go on developing its enormous resources. Let us live side by side in peace and harmony, and let this question be settled constitutionally and be forever thereafter buried in oblivion.

Mr. FLINT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Go on.

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier) wishes to speak.

Mr. FLINT. I will withdraw my motion with the consent of the House, and move it again at the conclusion of the speech of the hon. member for Laprairie.

Motion to adjourn the debate withdrawn.

Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) At this advanced stage of the debate, Sir, I do not rise to participate at any length in the discussion that is now in progress. I shall confine my remarks to certain points of special interest upon which I wish to call the attention of the House. It is beyond the realm of doubt, Sir, that the right of the Manitoba minority to their separate schools had been asked for in express terms in the seventh clause of the bill of rights presented to the Federal Government in 1890 by the Red River delegates, Judge Black, Alfred Scott and Rev. Father Ritchot, and further, that such right was guaranteed and sanctioned first by a federal statute, which is now the Manitoba Act, and that it was later or ratified in behalf of the people by the legislative assembly of the new confederated province. So it came to pass that for nearly twenty years the minority in that province were enabled to enjoy the rights and privileges of the separate school system. The Conservative government were in power during that period and they never interfered with that right of the minority. It was only after the coming into power of the Liberals in Manitoba that the new Liberal administration dared to infringe the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority, through the obnoxious law which they passed in 1890, doing away with the separate school system and imposing upon the Catholic minority a so-called system of public schools, which are in reality but Protestant schools. But granting that they were public and unsectarian schools, they would even, in that case, prove unacceptable to the Catholic minority who have a right to their separate schools, a right which they have been all along claiming and petitioning for. According to the tenets of the Catholic church, instruction in the secular branches and religious or moral teaching should go hand in hand, and should never be divorced ; for the human soul is indivisible and the heart and mind ought to be trained together under the guidance and inspiration of the church. It is a matter of regret, to my mind, that, during the course of this debate, some anti-remedialist members should have, with a view to strengthening a bad cause, brought forward the argument that the Catholic educational system of the province of Quebec was defective and below the standard. That is a libel upon our province which is easily answered. In referring to the records of our educational system and of our institutions of learning we could find ample grounds for patriotic outbursts of patriotic faith, hope and love, inasmuch as those records evince what a large and liberal quota of men renowned for their abilities, their high intellectual gifts, their learning and their virtues, the province of Quebec has supplied at different periods of our history. Now, Sir, I venture to say, beyond fear of contradiction that in the province of Quebec, none of the Catholic majority have ever attempted abridging or encroaching upon the rights and privileges of the Protestant minority in connection with the control of their own schools. And here I appeal to the English-speaking members who come from the province of Quebec, who would fain testify to the spirit of toleration, to the loyalty and liberality of their French Canadian constituents. In a country like ours, composed of different creeds and races, is not that spirit of toleration, of loyalty and fair-play an all-important factor in the building up of the country, and in the work of educating the people ? Why, then, I ask, should they begrudge to the minorities in the other provinces of confederation the privileges and blessings of that genial liberty which the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec so bountifully enjoy ? Should not reciprocity in freedom and justice prevail everywhere in our midst ? As I said, under the statute of 1890, the Liberal government of Manitoba swept away, the separate schools, and imposed upon the minority schools which were repugnant and unacceptable to them. The minority forthwith rose in protest against the flagrant wrong-doing and injustice perpetrated upon them. Now the anti-remedialists raise an objection and find fault with the Government for their having failed to disallow the tyrannical law of 1890. Had the law been vetoed on the ground that it prejudically affected the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority, the Manitoba government might perhaps thereby have been induced to re-enact a public school Act only applicable to the Protestant majority who were satisfied with that law, and leaving the Catholic minority in the enjoyment of the separate school system that had obtained from 1870. But two serious objections were urged against disallowance. (1) The vetoed statute could have been re-enacted by the Manitoba government, as often as it was disallowed, and such a state of things might have created an agitation fraught with the greatest dangers, intensified the conflict and kindled ill-feeling between race and race, neighbour and neighbour, province and province. (2) The law, if disallowed, would have been void and inoperative, and the exercise of the power of disallowance, under the circumstances, would have created a constitutional grievance on the part of the majority who stood by that law and had a right not to be deprived of the system of national schools established under that statute. As a matter of fact, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held that the present educational statutes of Manitoba are constitutionally valid, and that they must be regarded as within the powers of the legislature of Manitoba. Still, there was left to the persecuted minority an appeal to the Governor General in Council, under the clause providing that such appeal would lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of a provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of a minority. The case was referred to the Supreme Court, and then taken to the Imperial Privy Council, who decided in favour of the appellants. Later on came the remedial order, which the Manitoba government, after a protracted delay, declined to obey; new efforts were made to prevail upon the Greenway government to bring about a peaceful solution of the question, but the local government again declined meting out justice to the minority; and finally, in last resort, came the remedial law now under discussion. And strange to say, the hon. leader of the Opposition with his friends who have been arraigning the Government during several years for dilly-dallying and for their policy of postponement with reference to the school question, now pretend that the Government are too hasty, too precipitate in their action. During the past years, the hon. leader of the Opposition with his friends and his organs found fault with the Government for not issuing a more drastic remedial order, while now they pretend that it is too draconian, too coercive. After six long years of waiting have elapsed, after negotiations and repeated solicitations from the Federal Government, from the press, from the interested parties and the whole Catholic clergy, and after more and more hostile replies have been returned by the Greenway government to the prayer of the minority and of all friends of concord and fair-play, after all that, I say, can it be that human patience having been exhausted, the time has not yet come for action and for justice to prevail? What can be expected from the Greenway government and from all those hon. members in this House who have nothing better to offer than to stand up here and propose the six months' hoist, while may be seen siding with them all the irreconcilables, all the most bitter and inveterate enemies of our Catholic schools? The hon. leader of the Opposition has spoken at great length about the investigation and inquiry into the facts of the case, but he did not propose anything in that direction, to supersede the Bill. Besides, of what use would such an investigation prove, now that we are in full possession of all the material facts in connection with the wrong perpetrated and the means of redressing it, at a time when we have at our disposal to guide us in that work of redress, the constitutional finding of the highest tribunal in the Empire? We are told that the Conservative party is under the rule of Orangemen and that no confidence can be relied in it. Now, the hon. Premier, Sir Mackenzie Bowell has received at the hands of the leader of the Opposition and of his friends the highest encomiums for the pluck, the sense of justice and fair-play which he has displayed of late in connection with the school question, at a time of crisis, and the course of the minority, under those critical circumstances, had no abler, no more zealous and devoted champion than Sir Mackenzie Bowell. Can any hon. member lack the sense of justice and fair-play to the point of forgetting so soon the action of the Premier? Better serve under an Orangeman who acts right than under either a Catholic or a Protestant who conspires to do wrong. The hon. member for Napierville said the other day:

> Does that Remedial Bill secure interference in favour of the Manitoba minority? What redress does it give? And first, what are the grievances which the Manitoba Catholics complained about? They complained in their petition that they had been robbed of their rights and privileges through the School Act of 1890. They did not complain of having lost their separate schools, of having been deprived of the control exercised over those schools by the hierarchy, but only of the fact that they no longer received their share of the legislative grant. That is the grievance complained of by the Manitoba Catholics.

I now understand why the hon. member for Napierville does not take very much to heart the Remedial Bill, and how his conscience is perfectly at rest about it, as he contends that there is nothing or hardly anything to redress, and that the Manitoba minority lie on a bed of roses. The trouble is that those who are conversant with the state of affairs in that province and who care to speak out, find that there are serious and well-founded grievances. Thus, for instance, the minority had been enjoying for over twenty years a separate school system guaranteed by the constitution. The Greenway government, notwithstanding their plighted faith, have robbed the minority of their rights and privileges in that connection, and they decline to redress the wrong perpetrated by them, although they have been requested to do so. Nay, more, under the Greenway Acts, Catholics as well as Protestants are forced to pay taxes for the support of public schools, although the Catholic minority cannot conscientiously send their children to such schools. Moreover, under the same law, if Catholics want to have their separate schools, they are forced to pay taxes to support them. The Remedial Bill provides for the redress of those grievances. As to the legislative grant, that principle is involved in the Bill, and I believe that in the Committee of the Whole, after the second reading of the Bill, we will be enabled to discuss it clause by clause and amend it as we think best. Notice has already been given to the House that important amendments will be proposed. But if the Bill be killed on the second reading and previous to its going into the Committee of the Whole where it can be discussed and amended, what will there be left for the Manitoba minority? There will be absolutely nothing left actually and no hope will be held out for the future. Still, that remedial law is asked for by the Manitoba minority and accepted by them as operative.

effective and satisfactory. In order to substantiate that important fact, I need only refer to a despatch sent by Archbishop Langevin to Rev. Father Lacombe, on the 22nd February, 1896, which reads as follows :—

> Law applicable, operative and satisfactory. I approve of it. All the bishops and all true Catholics should approve of it. That law is our safeguard.

The hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) when he read that despatch in the House the other day, made the remark that the Bill did not exist at the time the despatch was sent. Thereupon, I sent another despatch to Archbishop Langevin, who sent the following telegram :—

> Winnipeg, Man., 13th March, 1896.
> A. L. C. Pelletier, M.P.,
> House of Commons, Ottawa.
> See despatch to Father Lacombe. Can a brother kill his brother ?
> ARCHBISHOP LANGEVIN.

In view of such facts, and in the face of the statements made by those who contend that the Remedial Bill will be inoperative and that it will not give redress, but is a bogus law, there is no room left for doubt as to the hypocrisy and duplicity of these men. The anti-remedialists among the Catholic Liberals look upon the Remedial Bill from three different standpoints, from a national, political and religious view. Now, Sir, could not the Opposition policy be styled a doubled-faced or even a three-faced policy, as under it we see flocking together the hon. members for Winnipeg, North Simcoe and Muskoka who are of opinion that the law is too strong, because it restores separate schools, and the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier), the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) and for Napierville (Mr. Monet) and other gentlemen of the same ilk, who find that the law is too mild and does not go far enough. It was with no small surprise that I heard, a little while ago, the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) declare that the Bill was unacceptable. The hon. gentleman has indulged in very lengthy remarks about the Bill, and he has fought its passage with such peculiar arguments that he finally satisfied himself—and he so stated in his speech—that he would vote for the second reading of the Bill. This reminds me of a story. One day a professor was explaining to his pupils the saying that "force or power is strengthened by union," and he was illustrating in many ways his proposition, when one of his pupils ventured to ask a question. Yesterday, said he, I saw somebody filling a glass with liquor and with double the amount of water ; in that case, was force or power strengthened by union ? No, replied the professor, because, in that case, there was no union but only a mixture. Could we not, Sir, apply the professor's position to the sad mixture which the Opposition as it stands offers us ? On what grounds can the hon. gentlemen rest their opposition to a Bill, which has been approved of by the political leaders of the Manitoba minority, by the most eminent members of the clergy of that province, who agree in stating that the Bill is operative and satisfactory ; when, I say, we find among the champions of that Bill the pioneers of civilization and progress, the prelates and missionaries in the North-west, and among others, the Rev. Father Lacombe who is the prototype of the missionary, a man universally revered and enjoying the esteem of Protestants and Catholics alike ? As representatives of the French race in America, we want equal rights for all, and we want all classes to enjoy their full share of justice. To whatever nationality we may belong, all, Englishmen, Irishmen or Frenchmen alike should be proud of the nations they spring from. Under the British flag, there is enough freedom for every one to share equally in its benefits. Let us all concert our efforts in order to build up a great nation here. But meanwhile, let us not forget that there is one absolutely necessary requisite, namely, respect for the constitution and for plighted faith. Let respect for our plighted faith be our watchword, our political creed ; on that condition alone, will we be able to agree and to further the progress, the freedom of the country, and our march onward in the glorious path of order, justice and union, which are the main elements of our political and national strength.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 18th March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to rise to a question of privilege. An address of a most unique and extraordinary character, was delivered in this House last night, continuing for an hour and a half, and I observe that it has been credited to me in the press. The "Citizen" of the 18th says :

Mr. McGillivray, committed to support the Bill by the speech of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, evinced his distaste of the situation by attacking the measure before the House, while admitting it to be his bounded duty to support it.

I never yet announced my intention to support the Bill, and I repudiate the statement.

RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. MULOCK. I desire to inquire of the Minister of Railways whether he is prepared to answer the inquiry I made across the floor of the House a few days ago, in regard to the classification of freight rates on the principal trunk lines in Canada for live stock for breeding purposes? The season is advancing, and I have received more than one communication on the subject since I spoke to the Minister. It is important that an announcement should be made at an early date.

Mr. HAGGART. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that I ordered inquiries to be made by the department to ascertain whether the statement made by the hon. gentleman was correct or not. I got no information from the railway companies in regard to it; but I see by the changed classification which they have filed in the department that it evidently was their intention, if the classification had been approved by the Government, to make the change indicated in the papers and in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. There has been no change in the classification approved as yet by the Government. When my attention was directed to the matter, I called the attention of the railway companies to it in order to see that that particular change would not be made.

Mr. MULOCK. It is understood, then, that there has been no tariff classification approved by the department, which authorizes railways to classify at 4,000 pounds live weight young stock of six months' and under twelve months of age. There has been no authority given by Governor General in Council?

Mr. HAGGART. There is no authority for the change.

Mr. MULOCK. I want this public announcement made so that shippers may be governed by it.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to inquire of the Minister of Finance when the Supplementary Estimates for the current year are likely to be brought down. They have been promised for a considerable time.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is having more out of the pleasure of anticipation than usual. The Supplementary Estimates are being prepared, and I am happy to say they are now in a somewhat forward state. I hope to bring them down in a very little while now.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to ask the Minister of Railways when I may expect to obtain a return ordered in regard to damages done by shipping on the new Welland Canal?

Mr. HAGGART. The return is ready. It was ordered before the hon. gentleman's motion was made; I ordered the papers to be prepared, and I will send them to the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I call the attention of the Finance Minister to a return ordered, setting out the full amount of our debt. I desire that it be brought down as soon as convenient.

Mr. COLTER. I desire to ask the Minister of Public Works when I may expect the return ordered on 10th February last. I have asked for it two or three times, and it has been promised, but I have not yet obtained it.

Mr. OUIMET. What is the subject-matter of the order?

Mr. COLTER. The expenditure of money on the River St. John.

CATTLE SHIPMENTS TO ENGLAND.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is the Minister of Finance prepared to-day to make any statement concerning the negotiations regarding cattle shipments to England, and the progress of the negotiations in reference to this important matter? I should also like to know if the Government have succeeded in preventing the passage of the Bill introduced in the Imperial Parliament to prevent our cattle being landed in the United Kingdom?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no further information to give to the House, further than this, that the whole matter is under the consideration of the Colonial Minister, and the resolution is being considered by my own department.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for second reading of Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba), and the proposed motion (six months' hoist) of Mr. Laurier in amendment thereto.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, this has become a question of very great constitutional importance to the legislature and government of Manitoba and to the Parliament and people of Canada. It is so because of the manner with which it has been dealt, and because when settled, it ought to be settled in conformity with the principles of constitutional law involved, and in obedience to the rules of public ethics applicable to the case. Yet looking at the character of the discussion which has taken place, and at the spirit in which it has been conducted, I fear there is very grave danger that other and less defensible considerations may be allowed to influence the judgments of men both in and out of Parliament.

There are in the life of every state periods when people apprehend dangers without adequate cause, when passions are easily aroused and difficult to allay. Concessions which at one time are thought just and reasonable, and which are made with the acquiescence of men of every shade of political opinion, are regarded at another time as an evidence of sleepless ambition which cannot be satisfied and ought not to be tolerated, and which it is the duty of every independent, patriotic man to pitilessly stamp out. This is the spirit which finds expression in a few newspaper articles and in occasional speeches, and which shows that the country is in the midst of one of those disorders which spring from religious differences and which fasten themselves upon whatever political question lies nearest the boundary which was once the subject of contention, and which it was hoped had been permanently settled. Who is there today who can read of the judicial murders of Lord Stafford and Langhorne, and of others, caused by the purjured testimony of Oates, Bedloe, Dangerfield and Tuberville, without a feeling of profound pity for the victims, and of indignation for the heartless scoundrels who testified against them, and the base time-servers who presided at their trials. Who is there that has studied with care the origin and consequences of the Lord George Gordon riots, and the diabolical passions let loose under the pretense of upholding religion; of the property destroyed, of the innocent men and women who perished, without indignation and shame. When men's energies have spent their force, when their passions are allayed, and when they see the ruin that they have wrought, then and then only do they begin imperfectly to realize the calamitous character and the gross injustice of the course which they have taken. A spring is touched, and

> " On sudden open fly
> With impetuous recoil and jarring sound,
> The infernal doors and on their hinges grate
> Harsh thunder."

The worst passions of men are left without rational restraint, and they become fiercely hostile to each other. This was the case in England immediately after Catholic emancipation. No action of any kind had been taken to give any special privilege to the newly emancipated section of the King's subjects. It was, nevertheless, assumed that Protestantism was in danger and that the Duke of Wellington was aspiring to the throne, and so, throughout the kingdom, secret societies were organized to set aside William IV. and Her present Majesty, as heirs to the crown, and to raise to the throne the Duke of Cumberland, as the only one of the Royal family competent to protect the religious majority of the nation. One of the most widespread conspiracies known since the revolution had its origin in the religious prejudices of a section of the population. Not because any right or privilege was taken from them, but because the fetters which bound a section of the King's subjects had been removed, and they had been allowed to stand disenthralled—the peers in this regard of the other freemen of the United Kingdom. I am sure there are some members in this House who can recall, as I can, the excitement which prevailed in Great Britain over the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. I remember that event very well. A great majority of the people favoured this Bill. That the Pope should create a Roman Catholic bishop in England, with a territorial title, was regarded as an act of insulting aggression, and this Bill was passed to resent that affront. There was, however, a select few in the House of Commons who opposed the Bill. In their minds there was no confusion of thought upon the subject. They were the greatest statesmen of the United Kingdom. Gladstone and Graham, Cobden and Bright, Palmer and Gibson, and a few others, stood like rocks, unmoved, amidst the storm which raged so violently throughout Great Britain. Roundell Palmer pointed out that the founders of the Free Church of Scotland had not come to Parliament for any Act to confer upon them the power to divide Scotland into parishes, nor had the Wesleyan Conference asked leave of Parliament to divide England into circuits. These were matters which they had assumed, and which they had rightly assumed, stood outside the domain of legislation and government. If they were so left to one religious community, they ought to be so left to every other to which Her Majesty's subjects might belong, if they were to stand upon a footing of equality. This measure remained upon the statute-book for eighteen years, and was repealed by Mr. Gladstone's Government without any protest having been made to that proceeding. No doubt there is, not infrequently, in every country, questions which lie along the border of the jurisdiction of the church and state, respectively, out of which controversies arise. I am not, in this case, going to question the jurisdiction of the state; I am ready to defend it as I find it; but when a compact is made which has become part of the political constitution, I shall interpret it by the aid, not of conflicting parties who claim to derive their authority from a kingdom not of this world, but by the aid of the great luminaries of the law. The jurisdiction which is explicitly confided to Cæsar I shall endeavour to see is maintained in his keeping, although claims may be made to that jurisdiction from another quarter: but in saying this I do not at all question the propriety of maintaining a modus vivendi where such has been once found and acted upon.

I never knew a question brought before Parliament or before the public, in respect to which the course of action called for was more clearly marked out by the principles of political ethics and the rules of Constitutional Law, than this one. I have never known one in which greater facilities were afforded for misleading the public mind, and for confusing the public judgment. I have never known a question which required to be approached with more tact, good sense, and patience, in considering the difficulties which lie in the way of the other party, and in which all these qualities were more manifestly wanting. I affirm that, from the hour of the last judgment delivered by the Judicial Committee to this hour, the path of hon. gentlemen has been strewn with half-formed projects, as the thoroughfare of some eastern pilgrimage is with the bones of its devotees. For myself, I am sincerely anxious that the people should understand this matter fully and to the end, that the country may not become a party to any wrongful act, and that faith may be kept with the sanction of the whole Canadian people. When I consider how easy it is, upon such questions, to inflame the passions of men and to retard the progress of the country, and to plant the seeds of rancour and bitterness in the human heart, when I consider how hard they are to eradicate, and how sure they are to grow and to choke out all those generous sentiments of mutual trust and confidence, upon which the peace and prosperity of the country so greatly depends, it is impossible not to be impressed with the importance of endeavouring to put the whole case before the Canadian people, that each one may be disposed to do to the minority, what, were the case his own, he would like the majority to do towards him. It is in our interest that the discussion of this question should be approached as Milton approached the theme of his greatest poem:

> " What in me is dark,
> Illumine ; what is low, raise and support,
> That to the height of this great argument,"

I may honestly uphold the constitution, that I may assert the principles of truth and justice to the end, that the people of Canada may continue in that path in which an honest desire for the common good, and a proper regard for the public honour, requires that they should walk. Let me say that a right judgment on the part of the people and a proper knowledge on the part of this House necessitates a very careful inquiry as well as a very full and exhaustive discussion of the subject, so that an accurate knowledge both of the facts and of the law may temper and control the prejudices which may have been enlisted on the one side or upon the other.

Before I enter upon the discussion of the policy of the Government or the consideration of the course which they have hitherto pursued, I desire with some fulness to discuss the law involved in the case, in order that the whole question may be accurately apprehended. To this end I think we are bound to consider fully, and with care, the provisions of our constitution on the subject of education. We must ask ourselves, and we must decide honestly, what matters are legally before us. We must ascertain whether by the letter and spirit of the instrument this question was properly brought before the Governor General in Council: for what purpose, and to what end, His Excellency was called upon to entertain the subject, and whether, in any event, it can be submitted to the Parliament of Canada, and if so, whether it can be submitted as an ordinary question of public policy, or as a specific question involving the fulfilment of a constitutional duty. It is important to ascertain whether Parliament, if called upon to deal with the subject is, in doing so, invading a provincial right. We must consider how far Parliament has jurisdiction in respect to education. With what constitutional intent, and for what constitutional purpose, this jurisdiction has been bestowed. We must consider the nature of the investigation which the Governor General in Council is authorized to make, and the character of the communications to be had with the provincial government and legislature, before the question can be legally or constitutionally brought before this House.

A power may be given to Parliament in the public interest generally, and the use of the constitutional authority and discretion so conferred is, in that event, governed by present considerations as to what the public interest demands. A power may be given in the constitution or in a statute for a specific purpose and with no other discretion than to determine how that purpose can be best accomplished. Where this is the case the power must be confined to the specific purpose for which it is granted, and the parliamentary discretion is exercised in determining the most suitable means to attain that end. This limitation, under a written constitution is as applicable to a legislature, as it is to an administrative officer, or to a court of justice. The power may be, as in this case, contingent upon the happening of certain events. It may arise when the compact is broken and faith has been violated. Where the contingency has not arisen the power is dormant and cannot be employed. To me it seems to be a misuse of terms to speak of a constitutional provision, such as the one invoked by the minority of Manitoba, as a provision conferring upon the Federal Parliament an ordinary legislative discretion, as if the policy of deciding whether there should or should not be separate schools was vested here. This is not so. Our discretion is of another kind. It may be found, when the matter complained of is inquired into, that it is too trivial to call for action. It may be found that the majority of those on whose behalf these rights and privileges were created do not want them continued, or have become indifferent in regard to them. If so, it would be very important that the evidence establishing that fact should be laid before the House. There may be other reasons why no action should be taken; for it must not be forgotten that the political department of government has far greater freedom of action than a court of justice. But all the contingencies I have mentioned admit the duty of action, subject always to adequate reasons of state for permitting that duty to remain in abeyance.

The policy of the country in respect to separate schools is already decided. That decision is incorporated in the constitution; as much so as the principle of representation between the provinces in the House of Commons. It is only because of this that the question can come before Parliament at all. The law grants to the minority whose rights and privileges can be affected, an appeal to the Governor General in Council, not to decide whether it is good or bad policy to have separate schools—the constitution settles that—but for the purpose of ascertaining whether a right or privilege in a Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects, in relation to education, has been affected by any provincial law, or any provincial authority. Parliament is not called upon to decide whether as a matter of policy separate schools ought or ought not to exist. If they have not been created in the province, no matter how favourable the opinion of this House might be to them, it cannot create them; and if they do exist, no matter how hostile its opinion may be, it cannot abolish them. These two facts stand like walls of adamant, on either side of the narrow way which is open to us, of that narrow field of jurisdiction under our control. And if the minority are heard, the power of the Federal Parliament does not at once attach. Another duty devolves upon the Government after hearing them and after having found that a case has been made out. Their business is to enter into negotiations and discussion of the question with the local authorities and to press upon the local authorities the propriety of restoring any right that can be shown to exist under the compact. But, in dealing with the other parties they are not dealing with an inferior body or with a body that they have a right to treat contemptuously. They are bound to deal with the local legislature and government in this matter precisely as one state would deal with another. The whole of this proceeding from beginning to end is diplomatic in its character, and there is a mode of procedure marked out in the law and each step must be taken in its turn. And it is only when it is clearly established that the right of the minority is set at defiance and that the local government will not remedy the wrong that the Federal Government have a right to come to Parliament at all. They must prove affirmatively that every step has been properly taken before we can have jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction rests upon the propriety and regularity of the course the Government has taken. The primary duty of the Governor General in Council is not to ascertain how the system works or whether as a matter of policy these schools should be restored or not. That question was once before the local legislature. The duty of the Governor General in Council is to ascertain "whether any rights or privileges of a Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects, in relation to education, is affected by any act or decision of any provincial authority." Something very much more than that may be required to ascertain, in case there is a grievance, the extent of that grievance and to ascertain how that grievance can be best met with a remedy. There is a duty of some one to grant remedial legislation, once it is clearly established that a substantial grievance exists. But that question cannot come here in the first instance; it can only come here in a last resort. And, Sir, it is a very grave matter indeed to bring that question here at all. Now, Sir, there are some things connected with the proceeding in this case that I have been anxious to hear discussed, and unless by the Finance Minister whose speech I did not hear, they have not been dealt with at all. The Federal Government summoned the local government before them. There was so much urgency in the matter that they summoned the local government even when the local legislature was in session—a most extraordinary procedure it seemed to me. Now, for what purpose were the local government and the representatives of the minority summoned before the Government? The judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had already been given tending to show that rights and privileges which once existed had been taken away. This having been established by legal proceeding, for what purpose were these parties summoned here? Was it for the purpose of investigating facts, and, if so, why were those facts not investigated? Why did the Government not undertake to establish the facts, if they deemed it necessary clearly to make out, that there was a grievance? Now, this much is obvious, that the simple repeal of the law, comparing one statute with another, shows what the legal possibilities were. Under the earlier statute, the legal possibilities were taken away. They do not show to the House, nor did they show to the Government, to what extent the parties who possessed these franchises under these earlier statutes had availed themselves of them. Now, this much, I think, is plain, that at the time these earlier statutes were adopted, they were for a population living along the Red River and the Assiniboia, that were a comparatively dense settlement. You enlarged the province of Manitoba, you altered the plans of survey, you furnished facilities for a population spreading over the entire province. Now, I have taken the trouble to go over the census to see how this population was distributed; and, while I see, that in several districts it would be possible to have separate schools, and no doubt efficient schools, there are very considerable areas where the population is too sparse to carry out such a system. I do not see that this Bill makes any provision in this regard; I do not see that this Bill takes any care whatever to avoid interference with the rights and functions that belong to the local government, as having absolute and exclusive jurisdiction over the secular education of the entire population.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say, that it is also a well settled rule, that, where there is a right by law in the suppliant to seek for relief, there is a corresponding duty to hear his complaint, and, if a substantial right or privilege be injuriously affected, or destroyed, to redress the grievance, and restore the privilege taken away. This legal and constitutional obligation rests upon every state functionary, from the sovereign down to the humblest officer to whom any portion of state authority is entrusted.

Our constitution, like the English constitution, is made up of precedents, customs treaties, quasi-treaties, compacts and statutes. The Acts uniting England and Scotland, and the Acts uniting Great Britain and Ireland, embrace treaties between sovereign states. These treaties, when they bring two sovereign states together to settle the terms of union between them, are treaties in international law, and, when that union is accomplished, the provisions of such treaties become a part of the constitutional law of the new state. In the case of the union between England and Scotland, those treaty provisions have no other guarantee than the honour of Parliament. Thus, by article 18, it is provided:

> That the laws concerning the regulation of trade and commerce and such excises to which Scotland is, by virtue of this treaty, to be liable, be the same in Scotland, from and after the union, as in England; and that all the laws in use within the Kingdom of Scotland do after the union and notwithstanding thereof remain in the same force as before, excepting such as are contrary to or inconsistent with this treaty, but alterable by the Parliament of Great Britain; with this difference betwixt laws concerning public rights, policy and civil government, and those which concern private right, that the laws which concern public right, policy and government may be the same throughout the whole United Kingdom, but that no alteration be made in laws which concern private right except for the evident utility of the subjects within Scotland.

Now, under the provisions of the article, the Roman civil law, which is the common law of Scotland, has been preserved; the Parliament of the United Kingdom could, at any moment, abolish it, and make the civil law of Scotland the same as that of England. The union has existed for one hundred and ninety years, and this has not been done. The compact, it will be seen, is not an absolute compact, yet it has been preserved, and the Scotch members still are under these provisions regarded as the sole judges of the rights of this minority of the United Kingdom. Lord Campbell says, that an Act of Parliament in violation of these terms of union would, undoubtedly, be valid, but, if not assented to by a majority of the representatives of Scotland, would be a gross breach of public faith. Now, what I ask the attention of the House to is this, that that provision which reserves to the Scotch their civil law, notwithstanding the fact, that it is alterable by the Parliament of England, that Parliament has felt itself so far bound that for one hundred and ninety years it has allowed it to remain just as it was before. I am pointing out how the compacts that are embraced in the constitution of England are treated by the Parliament of the United Kingdom; and, Sir, in so far as we have compacts in this country, or treaty obligations, they stand on exactly the same footing. The same rules of law, the same principles of constitutional law apply in the one case as in the other.

> "Compacts," says M. Boutmy, "in the English constitution are the great charter, the bill of rights and the Act of Settlement. The compacts are like statutes, the common work of the three branches of parliament, that is, of the king and the two Houses. But what is peculiar to the compacts and what distinguishes them from the statutes is that in the compacts the king does not appear as the integral part of one and the same legislative power as the Lords and Commons, but as a real contracting party, in opposition to whom the nation seems to stand up as a distinct and independent power. There is no concerted action of the three constitutional powers in its ordinary and regular form, there is only a reconciliation between two powers. These two powers begin by observing and distrusting each other. From time to time struggles take place between them and at last they entered into a treaty with mutual safeguards. This distinction will be made clear by a rapid survey of the circumstances which produced these three great compacts."

Now, a compact in the English constitutional law differs from a treaty in this: a treaty is an agreement between two bodies that were sovereign and separate communities: a compact is simply between two of the elements which go to constitute the community, here the king, on the one side, and the two Houses on the other: and these compacts, although put in the form of a statute, are intended to bind the two governments, and to regulate the conduct of the sovereign himself. The importance of these compacts as part of the English constitution is shown by some of their special provisions. Thus, Magna Charta provides, that, if the king disregards the compacts into which he has entered, the barons may make war upon him and lay siege to his castles. And when Dr. Sacheverel preached in favour of the divine right of kings and against the lawfulness of resistance under any circumstances, he was brought to the bar of the House of Commons and censured for his attack upon the compacts of the constitution. I have made this quotation to show the character of the constitutional provisions which are described as treaties and as compacts in the discussion of questions of constitutional law. Lord Carnarvon calls the British North America Act a treaty between the provinces, and so it is, for although the provinces were not sovereign powers, they were authorized by the sovereign to agree upon the terms of union, and those terms of union are embodied in the Act of the Imperial Parliament, and have impressed upon them the same treaty-like character which belongs to the Act of union between England and Scotland. Compacts in our constitution are compacts, not between provinces, but between what are the religious majorities and minorities of the provinces, sanctioned by the representatives of the provinces and confirmed by an Imperial statute. Their lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in discussing the Manitoba school case under the statutes of 1890, say :

> It is notorious that there were acute differences of opinion between Catholics and Protestants in the educational question prior to 1870. This is recognized in almost every line of these enactments. There is no doubt either what the points of difference were, and it is in the light of this that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was in truth a parliamentary compact, must be read.

Here the expression "compact" is used in that specific and technical sense which it has acquired in English constitutional law. Now, the rule to be observed in respect to compacts between peoples, is a very ancient one. We are told in the story of the conquest of Canaan that Joshua made peace with the Gibeonites, and made a league with them, to let them live. And that the chiefs bound themselves according to ancient custom. The Gibeonites were supposed to reside far away from the scene of Joshua's military operations. In three days thereafter, Joshua was in the midst of their country. It was within the area which had been marked out by him for conquest, and the Israelites murmured because of the treaty which Joshua and the chiefs had made. But the answer was : we have made a compact ; we may not touch them ; we are bound to its observance. And from that day to this compacts between persons and compacts between states, whether weak or powerful, are held in the eye of the law, and in the moral sense of mankind, to be inviolable, according to their true intent and meaning.

Sir, it was argued in this House a year ago that there is no constitutional duty imposed upon Parliament in the last resort to grant redress. It is said that the power vested in Parliament was a mere enabling power to be employed, not for the benefit of the minority, but, if at all, in the general interests of the whole public. I shall examine this contention later, but I will say at this point, that where an enabling power is bestowed for a specific and named purpose, the constitutional presumption is that obedience to the law is in the public interest, and this judgment as to the public welfare was exercised under all ordinary circumstances, once for all, when the system of separate schools was introduced by the province under the provisions of the constitution.

The hon. member for Albert said, last year :

> It is clear that we have the power. But the statute does not use any word that indicates compulsion ; it does not say we must or shall make remedial laws and I base a great deal on this clear word "may" of the Act, seeing we have no case to guide us.

Now, these words show, I think, that the hon. member has misunderstood and misapplied a very important rule of construction. Words of compulsion are never applied, either to the sovereign or to a sovereign body. "The sovereign," says Sir George Bowyer, "cannot be commanded, and so, words of command are not respectful, as they are, in effect, a denial of sovereignty." Our constitution, like that of England, imputes the intention both to the sovereign and to Parliament to keep faith and to perform all the duties falling within their respective jurisdictions. The law does not impute to either, in any event, bad faith. There is no authority over either to enforce the performance of any duty which the law imposes either upon the one or upon the other, and so words of compulsion are regarded as improper.

The sovereign, at her coronation, takes an oath to govern according to law, and we must assume that every duty by law imposed upon the sovereign will be faithfully performed. Every legislative body with us is sovereign within the sphere of its authority, and there is no power anywhere to order it to act, and any words of compulsion applied to it would be out of place. But the constitution assumes that although only words of mere permission are allowable, that the sovereign or sovereign bodies will act wherever action on their part is called for. In the case of the Queen vs. the Secretary of State for War, 1891, Mr. Justice Charles says :

> There are no doubt cases where the servants of the crown have been constituted, by statute, agents to perform particular acts. But it is also beyond question that a mandamus cannot be directed against the Crown or any servant of the Crown simply acting in his capacity of servant.

And in the case of the Queen vs. the Lords of the Treasury, Chief Justice Cockburn says :

> We must start with the unquestioned principle that where a duty has to be performed by the Crown this court cannot claim, even in appearance, to have any power to command the Crown. The thing is out of the question. Over the sovereign we have no power.
> In like manner where the parties are acting as servants of the Crown and are amenable to the Crown whose servants they are, they are not amenable to us in the exercise of our prerogative jurisdiction.

So the hon. member for Albert will see that from the use of the word " may " it does not at all follow that no duty is imposed, because words of compulsion are never used in such a case, and the use of mere enabling words does not touch the question as to whether what has been authorized implies a duty or a mere discretion. It has again and again been decided that mere enabling words do impose a duty in certain cases. In the case of McDougall vs. Patterson, Chief Justice Jarvis, in referring to mere enabling words, says :

> The general rule derived from the cases is that where the statute confers the authority to do a judicial act in a certain case, it is imperative upon those so authorized to exercise the authority when the case arises, and when its exercise is duly applied for by the party interested, and having the right to make the application.

In the Queen vs. the Tithe Commissioners, Mr. Justice Coleridge, in discussing the meaning of the words " shall be empowered to confer," says :

> The words are undoubtedly only empowering, but it has been so often decided as to have become an axiom that in public statutes, words only directory, permissory, or enabling, may have compulsory force where the thing to be done is for the public benefit or in the advancement of public justice.

The principle set out in these cases is, perhaps, put with more philosophical accuracy by Lords Selborne and Blackburn, in their judgments in the case of Julius vs. the Bishop of Oxford. In discussing the force and meaning of the permissive words " it shall be lawful," Lord Selborne observed :

> The meaning of such words is the same whether there is or is not a duty imposed or an obligation to use the power which they confer. Whether a judge or a public officer to whom power is given by such words is bound to use it upon a particular occasion or in a particular manner must be held aliunde and in general it is to be solved from the context, or from the particular provisions, or from the general scope and object of the enactment conferring the power.

And Lord Blackburn said .

> If the object for which power is conferred is for the purpose of enforcing a right there may be a duty cast upon the donee of the power to exercise it, for the benefit of those who have the right when required on that behalf.

So the hon. member will see that because the word " may " is used it does not, by any means, follow that the power which is bestowed is a mere discretionary power, but it may import a constitutional duty, as certainly as if a compulsory word had been employed. But the case of most interest here is that of James Baggs, in 11 Coke, and which is still good law. There it is laid down that :

> Where rights, franchises and liberties are conferred, they are regulated and protected by the rules of law and not by considerations of public policy.

This rule is one that on many occasions has been invoked to protect such franchises and liberties against hostile attack, and many instances will readily occur to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. When Lord Grey's Reform Bill was under discussion those who had become proprietors of decayed boroughs, undertook to protect them against the proposed reform, by setting up the principle contained in this case. They maintained that they had a property in the franchise for returning a member to Parliament, but the answer to this contention was that they had a right to vote for the return of a member and not a right to return a member under their franchise, and that, by the extension of the constituency, this right remained untouched so long as the right of voting continued. These cases show that we must look away from mere permissive or enabling words to the purpose and object of the provision of law in which they are in order to decide whether they are words implying a mere discretion or whether they go further, and impose a duty of action. The words in respect to the appeals to the Governor General in Council are as strong as it is legislatively possible to make them. They are, " an appeal shall lie." Here a right is given to a dissatisfied party, and there is an implied duty imposed upon the executive authority, to make that hearing effective : but there is no legal command, because none could be given. No mandamus can issue to the Governor General in Council, for no court of law is superior to its mistress. The Queen can do no wrong is the maxim, and " let right be done" is the rule which springs from it. Mr. Speaker, before passing away from this point, let me refer to sections 19, 20 and 86 of the British North America Act, where the word " shall " is employed in respect to the calling of Parliament, which some might take to be contrary to the rule which I have stated—that words of command are never used towards the sovereign, or towards Parliament. These words are part of an ancient compact between the sovereign and the nation by which the right of a certain party to exercise royal authority was recognized upon the conditions stated, for it is the law which made the king and by which his title is confirmed, and as used in our statute, and in the English statutes, they are repeated from 5th Edward II., where "it is ordained that the king shall hold a Parliament every year."

Sir, I shall not, at this moment, pursue this part of my argument further. I shall begin at the beginning. The germ of section 93 of the British North America Act and of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is to be found in the Separate School Act of Upper Canada, 1863. That Act was intended by its promoters to contain, to their full extent, the rights and privileges claimed, not that the law might not require amendment from time to time to meet the altered circumstances of the population ; but so far as the extent of their rights went, this law was sufficient. When the union was resolved on and the subject of education was about to be assigned to the provinces, the Protestant population of Lower Canada began to consider their future situation ; and so, during the confederation debates, many of the Protestant members of Quebec referred to the subject as one that awakened not a little apprehension in the minds of Protestants. We find Hon. Mr. Holton and others question upon the subject, the promoters of the scheme of union. In reply to Mr. Holton, the Attorney General West, Mr. Macdonald, afterwards Sir John Macdonald, said :

> There was a good deal of apprehension in Lower Canada on the part of the minority there as to the possible effect of confederation on their rights on the subject of education and it was the intention of the Government, if Parliament approved of the scheme of confederation, to lay before this House this session certain amendments of the school law to operate as a sort of guarantee against any infringements of the rights of the minority in this matter.

Here it is said that the proposed legislation was to operate as a guarantee against any infringement by the majority of the rights of the minority, and we may fairly conclude that this aim, which was had in view before the plan of accomplishing it was divulged to the House, was not, during the final preparation of the scheme, abandoned. Mr. Dorion, who then led the Quebec Opposition, said :

> I think it but just that the Protestant minority should be protected in its rights in everything that is dear to it as a distinct nationality, and it should not lie in the discretion of the majority in this respect, and for this reason I am ready to extend to my Protestant fellow-citizens of Lower Canada of British origin the fullest justice in all things, and I wish to see their interests as a minority guaranteed or protected in every scheme which may be adopted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My hon. friend the leader of the House cries "Hear, hear." I am sorry that, while the Government accept the principle, they have departed so widely from the intention of the statute in the course they have taken. The House will see that Mr. Dorion declared that the continuance of the rights should not lie in the discretion of the majority, and that the interests of the minority should be guaranteed or protected. Let me ask, has this object been attained ? Have the rights of the minority been guaranteed or protected ? If there is a compact and by it a constitutional duty imposed, the answer is, yes. If there is no compact but a mere enabling power the exercise of which rests upon public policy, the answer must be, no. Hon. Mr. Rose declared that for the first time in the history of the country there was serious apprehension aroused amongst the Protestant population in regard to the elementary education of their children, and he called upon Hon. Mr. Cartier to state if the rights which were to be conceded to them were to be guaranteed. But the proposed school law of Lower Canada failed for reasons which it is not necessary now to discuss. Before the session closed, Mr. Cartier said :

> I now give you my pledge that when confederation is formed, and Quebec has a Parliament of its own, one of its first actions will be to put upon the statute-book the law which we cannot get upon our statute-book to-day.

And in the legislative council the Premier, Sir E. P. Taché, declared that "if the majority in Quebec were wicked enough to commit so flagrant an act of injustice against the English minority, they would be checked by the Federal Legislature and Government." If he had simply said by the Federal Government, one might have supposed that he contemplated simply the employment of the power of disallowance, but he has mentioned the legislature as well. And so you see that at that time, when the Protestants of Quebec were nervously anxious about their future in respect to education, the method of protection and redress in respect to the rights and privileges of the minorities had been considered. These expressions and apprehensions, with the assurances which are given show very clearly that from the outset the intention was to give to the concessions made the character of permanency and to prevent, by a solemn compact, resting upon federal guarantee, any effectual violation of the rights and privileges so conceded. The framers of the constitution did not permit the concession to rest solely with the legislature of Quebec. The school law of Lower Canada was not amended prior to the union : and so the delegates in London, by subsection 2 and by the other subsections which follow, provided for carrying out their design in fulfilment of the promises made to the Protestant and Roman Catholic minorities ; and they also, by subsections 3 and 4, provided for cases of minorities from provinces which might subsequently enter the union or which, subsequent to the union, might concede the liberty of separate schools. Subsection 2 declares :

> That all the powers, privileges and duties, at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be, and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

Upper Canada, a province existing before the union, Quebec, a province which is first known by that name at the union, are here mentioned, and it is provided, that a condition of things existing in the one province before the union, shall exist, as of right, in another province after the union is established. The power of Quebec to legislate upon the subject of education is only limited by the superintending legislative jurisdiction imposed here. If Quebec disregarded this provision, the redress of the aggrieved parties must be by legislative and not by judicial proceedings. When the union was consummated, it at once became the duty of the legislature of Quebec, under the compact, to bestow upon the Protestant and Roman Catholic minorities all the powers, privileges and duties conferred and imposed upon the Roman Catholic schools and trustees before the union in Upper Canada. Subsection 2 does not transfer the whole body of the school law of Upper Canada to Quebec. It merely creates certain substantive rights. The administrative law by which these rights are made operative rests with the legislature of Quebec after the union. Had the legislature failed to give effect to this provision under the constitution, there would have arisen a grievance which would have given to the Protestant minority, under subsection 3, the right of appeal to the Governor General in Council, whose duty it would have been to have heard that appeal and to have decided in favour of action, if it was unable to secure local legislation, and to have ultimately ordered action in conformity with the facts, and, if that order was not carried out by the legislature of Quebec, upon the fact being reported here, it would have imposed upon Parliament the duty of legislation in kind and in degree exactly the same as that which, in the first place, rested solely on the legislature of Quebec. To have discovered what it was the duty of the Quebec legislature to do, Parliament would have been obliged to have looked to the law of Upper Canada, as it stood at the time of the union, and it would have been called upon to force upon the people of Quebec, against the will of its legislature, the school system of another province. The duty of Parliament would have been, not simply to restore a right or privilege taken away, but, under the compact, to have created for the first time the right under the authority of the words for the due execution of the provisions of this section. It is true, Parliament could not have been compelled to act. Parliament is a sovereign body, and cannot be coerced, but what I am pointing out is, that the constitution does not merely confer the power, it imposes the duty, and I take the case of initial legislation in Quebec to establish very clearly the fact, that, had Quebec refused to legislate, that, not only the power, but the duty, of legislation would have arisen here. The 3rd and 4th subsections of section 93, no doubt, were suggested and grew out of the provisions of the Upper Canada Separate School Act, which read as follows :—

> In the event of any disagreement between trustees of the Roman Catholic separate schools, superintendent of common schools or other municipal authority, the case shall be referred to the equitable arbitrament of the chief superintendent of education in Upper Canada, subject, nevertheless, to an appeal to the Governor General in Council, whose award shall be final in all cases.

This section relates solely to administrative acts, and, if it had been intended to confine it would have been more appropriate to have made it to the Lieutenant-Governor and his advisers ; but, in the words of Lord Carnarvon, "These school clauses were framed after long and anxious controversy, in which all parties were represented, and on conditions to which all gave their consent ;" and, as the schools of the different provinces were not constituted in the same way, this provision of the Act was made much more comprehensive than that found in the Upper Canada statute, and was to give to minorities protection, not only against the officers administering the law in every province, but against hostile conduct on the part of the provincial legislature itself, for which no protection could have been given prior to the union except by an appeal to Imperial authority. That some protection was contemplated by the promoters of the union is shown by the statements made during the debates of the last session of the old Parliament of Canada, which I have already quoted. There may be some dispute over the meaning of the phrase "provincial authority," from which an appeal is given to the Governor General in Council. The Judicial Committee say : "Their lordships must express their dissent from the argument that the insertion of the words 'of the legislature of the province' in the Manitoba Act show that in the British North America Act it could not have been intended to comprehend the legislature under the words "provincial authority.'" Their lordships, of course, have not decided that the phrase "provincial authority" in the British North America Act includes the provincial legislature, but the opinion incidentally expressed points in that direction, and I shall hereafter endeavour to show that it is the only view which makes the provisions of the two sections consistent with each other, and that it is the proper meaning to give to these words. I readily concede a state of things may arise of such a character that the law on this question will not be the only thing to consider. There may be reasons of state which cannot, under the circumstances, be left out of view, but the law is the foremost question to master. Our federal constitution, like the constitution of England, consists of usages, statutes, conventions, compacts and treaties, which are in part embraced and derive their authority from the great Act of Union. This Act is the authority above all legislative bodies created to act under it. This feature of our constitution is not found in that of the United Kingdom. Parliament is there sovereign in all things, and whenever a law is passed, no matter how much at variance with the spirit and principles of the constitution as it was before, it may be it is, nevertheless, valid.

So far as the courts found any difficulty in tracing the boundary between provincial and Dominion authority, it may, in most instances, be ascribed to the imperfect acquaintance with surrounding circumstances, and perhaps in no case is this made more clearly to appear than in the arguments, reasoned judgments and decisions relating to the school clauses of the constitution. When we read them we must bear in mind there is much still remaining to be decided before we have a full elucidation of these sections. It is only by slow degrees, by the acquisition of a knowledge of the facts in the one case which were not possessed, and not, therefore, considered in the case which preceded, that a full and consistent interpretation can be ultimately put upon the whole text. But so far as the interpretation of this provision of the constitution has gone, it throws not a little light on what remains to be construed. No notion has been more industriously propagated than this, that any legislation by the Parliament of Canada would be in violation of provincial rights. That, I think, is not the case. I listened to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), last evening, and I do not think that in a single instance did he pretend to say that legislation here would in any way interfere with a provincial right. I desire to preserve the field of provincial rights unimpaired. But what are these rights ? Where are they set out ? We must look at the Constitutional Act and to our previous history to ascertain the full measure of these rights. I have heretofore endeavoured to explain them, so that the people might understand them, and so that they might be protected against encroachments. But let me say that I am also a federalist. There is a union of the British North American provinces, and the Parliament of Canada has also, under the terms of union, its exclusive functions. The Federal Parliament and the Federal Administration have their rights, duties and responsibilities under the constitution. These have been bestowed for general and for special purposes, for the peace, order and good government of the whole country, and are not less entitled to be respected than those which, by the same instrument, are conferred upon the provinces.

What is meant by the doctrine of provincial rights in its true constitutional sense ? Not rights beyond the law, but rights in conformity to the law, fairly and properly interpreted. It is this—that within the sphere of legislation and government assigned to the exclusive jurisdiction of the province the principle of parliamentary government shall be preserved, and the responsibility of the provincial ministry to the legislature, and of the legislature to the electorate of the province, shall not be interfered with. Within its own exclusive sphere it shall be sovereign. This is what I understand by provincial rights, and it is a constitutional doctrine of great importance in our federal system, for upon this doctrine rests the security of the provincial legislatures and government against federal encroachments.

We must bear in mind that Parliament has no power to interfere with a provincial right. There is no point at which it can come in contact with such a right. The power by which provincial rights may be interfered with is the power of disallowance. But this power rests with the Governor General in Council, and is restrained by the conventions of the constitution. The Parliament of Canada can pass no measure invading any provincial right or encroaching upon any provincial privilege. Every legislative measure passed by Parliament beyond the limit of its own express authority or which enters within the exclusive domain of any province is ultra vires and void. The Parliament of Canada cannot legislate on the subject of education at all unless the province disregards the compact to which it has become a party, and goes beyond the limitations which the constitution intends it shall not exceed without the sanction of those whose rights and privileges are thereby affected. The power of Parliament arises from the unconstitutional legislation of the province. It arises for the purpose of seeing that the compact is observed, and that the rights and privileges of which it is the surety are not impaired or destroyed. We must never forget that, if it be once admitted that the circumstances have arisen which will make it possible for Parliament to enact a valid law, circumstances have arisen in which the compact for the protection of the minority is broken, and if unredressed by the provincial legislature, in contemplation of law, calls for action by federal authority. The federal executive may encroach upon a provincial right. In a few instances it has done so. The Governor General in Council can, within a year, disallow every provincial Act. No doubt, such a proceeding would be grossly unconstitutional, but it would be strictly legal. So we must bear in mind that under our constitutional system you have not carried a contention beyond question simply by showing that a statute passed, or a deed done was not illegal ; you must go further, and show that it is not unconstitutional. A desire to do what is just and wise, added to experience and good sense, have established certain conventions and restraints upon the royal prerogative relating to disallowance, and has settled the circumstances under which this power may be properly exercised. Now, the exercise of authority in conformity with settled usage, is not an invasion of a provincial right, but the fulfilment of a royal trust, and the provincial legislature goes beyond the right when it enters into a region committed by the supreme law to the protection and care of another authority. Provincial rights are not a species of squatter sovereignty. A province cannot acquire exclusive authority over a subject by usurpation. It cannot make its jurisdiction absolute where it is limited by the constitution and subordinated to some other authority. It is not dealing honestly with the people to parade such an authority as a provincial right further than law makes it such. So there is no interference with provincial rights if we act within the spirit of our authority. It is only when we undertake to act beyond the sphere of our authority that there may be an abortive attempt on the part of Parliament to interfere with its rights. Now, if we undertake to legislate here in violation of provincial rights, all our Acts are ultra vires. It is the power of the executive government that may interfere with provincial rights ; it is the power of disallowance, and the power of legislation that interferes with provincial rights ; and in some cases there have been interference with provincial rights by undertaking to disallow Acts which, in my opinion, are altogether outside the jurisdiction and policy of the Parliament of Canada. Lord Carnarvon, in supporting the British North America Act in the House of Lords, said :

> In this Bill a division of powers has been effected mainly by a distinct classification. That classification is four-fold. First, those subjects of legislation which are attributed to the central Parliament exclusively. Second, those which belong to the provincial legislatures exclusively. Third, those which are the subjects of concurrent legislation ; and fourth, a particular question which is dealt with exceptionally.

The first of these embraces the legislative jurisdiction of Parliament. The second embraces the absolute legislative rights of the provinces. In the third group the powers of legislation are concurrent, but the powers of the provinces are subordinated to the powers of the Dominion, the powers of which are discretionary and in their exercise the legislative bodies to whom they are entrusted are governed by ordinary considerations of public policy. The fourth division consists of the constitutional provisions in relation to education. In this the powers are normally with the provinces, subject to certain conditions. If these conditions are disregarded a corrective power arises here. To use the words of Lord Watson :

> The power of Parliament is a qualification of their exclusive power. It is simply to correct something that has been wrongly done, not to legislate themselves upon the subject one hair-breadth further than to set right what has been wrongly done.

Whether the thing has or has not been wrongly done, is simply a question of fact. If the framers of the constitution had intended to confer upon Parliament an ordinary, but limited power to be governed by considerations of public policy, this section would have been differently worded. It would, in its construction, have been similar to the section which immediately follows it. But it is not. Its form and the surrounding circumstances show that it confers not an ordinary limited legislative discretion, but it imposes a constitutional duty to see that certain rights and privileges which have been conferred upon the minority are not taken away, if that minority desires to retain them. Now, look at the words of this section. If you are giving an ordinary enabling power, all you intend to do is to see that the Parliament of Canada may, upon any local legislature repealing any right or privilege relating to separate schools, if it sees proper, legislate on the subject. It does not say so ; it does not enable us to deal with the subject in that way. We cannot on our own motion touch the matter at all. No hon. gentleman on this side of the House, or on that side of the House, can come to the rescue of a local minority unless the minority asks for relief. They must go to the executive government, they must establish a grievance ; there must be communication between the executive government and the government of the province, there must be an earnest and honest attempt to secure the restoration of the right from the province ; and all those efforts must fail before there can be a right to act here at all. Then I say, is it not clear that it is an ordinary discretionary power ? It is a remedial proceeding from beginning to end. It is to some extent, in its form, like a proceeding in a court of justice, but it is an attempt to give a political redress for an act instead of giving a judicial redress. But it does not permit this House to take the initiative ; it does not permit this House to take a single step towards the correction of any complaint, the redress of any grievance, unless the minority themselves proceed. It stands exactly on the same footing as a court of justice, that cannot take the initiative to redress the wrongs of a party until the party makes application himself to the court. It is, then, from all surrounding circumstances that we learn that this power is not an ordinary and limited legislative discretion. but it is a power imposing a constitutional duty for the purpose of fulfilling a compact when that compact is violated. and when there is adequate evidence. and when the regular proceedings have been taken for the purpose of bringing about that result. Lord Carnarvon, speaking of this section. said :

> Lastly. in the 93rd clause. which contains the exceptional provisions to which I have referred. your lordships will observe some rather complicated arrangements in reference to education. I need hardly say that this great question gives rise to nearly as much earnestness and division of opinion on that as on this side of the Atlantic. This clause has been framed after long and anxious controversy in which all parties have been represented and on conditions to which all have given their consent. It is an understanding. which. as it only concerns the local interests affected. is not one the Parliament will be willing to disturb. even if, in the opinion of Parliament, it was susceptible of amendment ; but I am bound to add as an expression of my opinion. that the terms of the agreement appear to me to be equable and judicious. For the object of the clause is to secure to the religious minority of one province the same rights. privileges and protection which the religious minority of another province may enjoy. The Roman Catholic minority of Upper Canada. the Protestant minority of Quebec and the Roman Catholic minority of the lower provinces will thus stand upon a footing of entire equality. But in the event of any wrong at the hand of the local majority. the minority have the right of appeal to the Governor General in Council and may claim the application of any remedial law that may be necessary from the central Parliament of confederation.

Let us for a moment consider the meaning of this. Is it a mere enabling power ? What does the right of appeal mean ? and what the claim to remedial law ? A claim means not a request. but a demand resulting upon a right. Let the House mark the significance of the whole paragraph. This provision was the subject of long and anxious discussion that Parliament would not alter if it were susceptible of amendment because it sets out an agreement at which the parties have arrived. It was to secure to the religious minority of each province certain rights and privileges which it assuredly would not do if the limited power entrusted to Parliament was a mere enabling power imposing no duty whatever. There is a right of appeal admitted and there is a claim to its enforcement conceded. A claim would be no claim if it were a mere appeal asking that a discretionary power should be used. It means much more than this. It implies that those who make it have a right. and that they are invoking the aid of the party to whom the law has committed the power of redress. A mere discretion is not consistent with a compact. It is assumed that there is a compact which is. by the law. adequately protected against successful violation by the power conferred. and by the constitutional duty imposed.

The appeal bestowed is not based on the superior wisdom and superior capacity of Parliament. On the contrary the provisions of the law show that the Parliament of Canada is assumed to be less qualified, less fitted, to deal with the subject than the legislature of a province. The appellate power is not based, then. on the superior fitness to deal with the subject of education. but it is a simple trust to guard the rights and privileges bestowed upon the minority against encroachment and to restore them if they have been impaired or taken away.

The provincial legislature has no legal grounds for making its jurisdiction absolute where it is limited by the constitution. It cannot maintain its authority as exclusive where. by the supreme law. it is subject to certain conditions. Under section 95 it is provided that any provincial law relative to agriculture or immigration shall have effect in the province so long and so far only as it is not repugnant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada. Could it be said that this Parliament is restrained by the doctrine of provincial rights from legislation on these subjects, because the provinces have also the power to legislate ? If the legislation is conflicting. ours is paramount. Now. the exercise of federal authority is not an invasion in these matters of provincial right because the provincial right remains to the full extent of the authority granted and upon the conditions which the law contemplates. The legislature of the provinces has no more legal right to disregard the restrictions which the superior law imposes than has any subject of the Queen to disregard the restraints which are intended to regulate his conduct in his intercourse with other members of the community. It is essential to the due execution of the federal system of government that we should recognize throughout the regulative authority of the supreme law. This applies equally to Parliament and to every provincial legislature. Each of them must look to the constitution as the source from which its authority is derived ; and when a Parliament exercises a power granted under the constitution for the very purpose for which it is given. no legislature. no provincial government. can have any legal or constitutional cause to complain. If the results are not satisfactory the fault is with the supreme law and not necessarily with those who are called upon to administer it. It is preposterous to argue that when special circumstances arise which were contemplated by the framers of the constitution and which call for the exercise of the power bestowed. that it is not to be employed. The responsibility of those entrusted with the authority is confined to the mode of proceeding. and to the manner in which the duty is discharged. and cannot extend to the question of the propriety of its being undertaken at all. I do not pretend to argue that parts of our constitutional system may not become obsolete, but this is a condition which seldom applies to a compact until the protected parties become indifferent to its maintenance. Where the power is one relating solely to policy the parties entrusted with the authority are responsible to the province or to the Dominion as the case may be, for the use made of it. But where it is a trust bestowed for the protection or preservation of some right or franchise, the responsibility is confined to the proper fulfilment of the duty imposed and does not, nor can it, relate, under the statute, to the propriety of continuing the right, privilege or franchise itself. The propriety of bestowing such a privilege was before the framers of the constitution. It is not before the Governor General in Council, nor can it ever come before Parliament. This Parliament, as I have said, has a limited jurisdiction conferred by positive law. That jurisdiction is not bestowed to settle any question of policy, but solely as an additional security for the continuance to the minority that the rights and privileges granted to them shall not be taken away. And the importance of keeping faith with the minority in the estimation of the founders of the union is shown by the fact that to Parliament, in the last resort, is confided the power of restoring the right. This federal power is for the purpose of securing the due observance of the compact, and for no other can an appeal be granted. I say, then, that neither the Governor General in Council nor Parliament is made a judge of the wisdom or of the propriety of the law in any province which has created a separate school system. The duty of Parliament in the last resort, when it is called to legislate is to ascertain the nature of the grievance and the remedy called for, and the extent of its discretion is to determine the kind of legislation required to produce the best results to the parties complaining not inconsistent with the compact which they are asked to have observed. The Governor General in Council has to ascertain whether the minority has appealed: whether the rights and privileges of that minority have been impaired or destroyed by any provincial authority, and, if so, then there rests on him, not only the power, but the constitutional duty to urge redress in the way that the constitution itself provides. The power vested then in the Parliament of Canada is extremely limited, and it is exceeded at some points by the Bill before us. It exists but as an appellate power which can be called into life only by some wrongful act on the part of some provincial authority. When the wrong is once done by the provincial legislature, there is a disregard of the restriction imposed upon provincial authority and that it has not legislated subject to the restrictions so placed. The complaint must be made by the aggrieved party to the Governor General in Council: the facts must be found to establish a grievance; the decision of the Governor General in Council must be communicated to the provincial government for the information of the provincial legislature; there must be a refusal or a failure amounting to a refusal, to grant redress, before redress can be looked for elsewhere and before any decision upon the question can be properly communicated to Parliament, and before Parliament can be clothed with any legal authority to deal with the question at all. Has this procedure been followed? Did Ministers make any effort to secure a redress from the local legislature and government before coming here? Did they admit the contrary by further negotiations? Where is the evidence submitted to Parliament, showing that any serious effort was ever made to secure provincial action? Is not the return made to this House conclusive evidence to the contrary? Where is the evidence before us that the minority have appealed? Where is the evidence that the proceedings that have taken place, have the sympathy and support of that minority? Where is the evidence that puts before this House such information with regard to the local circumstances of the population as to enable us, if we were called upon to legislate, to do so intelligibly? If it is in the possession of the Government, it is time that it was placed in the hands of members of the House. Sir, I say, that this House requires a very great deal of information that it does not possess. I have in my hand a statement which I have made up from the census, and I find, that, taking the ordinary school population in the sections, that there could be, in Manitoba—assuming the school section to be three miles square, four sections to a township in which there is a school population—I find, that there could be 88 efficient schools organized. There could be 36 more fairly efficient, and there would be 220 that would be very inefficient, if it were possible for them to exist at all. How are you to deal with the population in those 220 sections? Then, Mr. Speaker, there is another question, which, to me, is a question of very great importance. The hon. gentlemen, in the Bill, deal with the qualification of teachers. They say, that the qualification of teachers in those separate schools shall be exactly the same as that of the teachers in the public schools. They wish to show you, that there is no diminution of the standard of attainments. Now, Sir, a very large number of these 88 schools, where the population is dense, I apprehend, are schools for the half-breed population. These half-breeds speak the French language, and not the English language. They have yet to learn English. I have a few letters from these people, and most of them express themselves somewhat alarmed lest we put an end to the policy of instructing their children in the English language, as well. In order that any man may teach one of these schools efficiently, and impart to the children in these schools the knowledge of the English tongue, he must be fairly well acquainted with both English and French. I want to know, what evidence the Government have in their hands, and what evidence they have submitted to this House, for the purpose of showing, that there are persons competent to take a high standard of examination in all the subjects that are taught in an ordinary efficient school, and at the same time possess a sufficient knowledge of both languages in order to become efficient teachers of these schools ? You want to know what is the material available in these institutions before you can undertake to lay down any rule as to their examination. In my younger days, Sir, I was inspector of schools for the county of Kent, and we had a number of French schools in that county, and we always had to take into consideration the circumstances of these schools, when we were determining whether the teacher was qualified or not ; and, if a man had a fair knowledge of both English and French, we gave him a certificate, even though he was not quite up to the mark in other respects : because, if we did not do so, we would practically close these schools altogether. I mention these matters incidentally, but there are others which go to point out the importance of the amount of information on the subject that ought to be in our possession before we can deal with the subject at all.

I do not dispute the fact, that this House has the power, when a case is properly before it, to deal with it. I can further say, that by law, apart from reasons of state, that there is a constitutional duty resting upon this House, in the last resort, to use its power. The power is unquestionably for the protection of the privileges of the minority, if the minority desire their continuance. The determination is with them, under the law, and not with us. So long as the province keeps within the prescribed limits, we have no jurisdiction at all, or, if it acts beyond them at the instance or by the acquiescence of the minority, then there is no power to interfere ; and it is because this is the case, that it is essential to the exercise of the powers here vested, to have it made perfectly clear to us, that this action is taken at the instance of a majority, at least, of that minority, and not simply on their behalf. The minority are dealt with in the constitution as a community, and its will can only be voiced by a majority of that community. When it has so spoken, the Governor General in Council is entitled to approach the local government to negotiate with them, to point out the kind of remedy that the nature of the grievance calls for, and then, if there is a determination on the part of the local authorities that no redress shall be given and no relief had, then, so far as the law on this question is concerned, this Parliament would have jurisdiction, on the matter being regularly submitted to them. Both in its origin and in its purpose this remedial power stands by itself, a special and peculiar power in our constitutional system. In saying this, I do not intend to convey the impression, that the rules which are to govern in its use are not perfectly clear and capable of precise statement.

I ask the forbearance of the House, Mr. Speaker, while I trace the judicial interpretation of the school sections of these two statutes. The first controversy in respect to the Roman Catholic claims to separate schools was in the province of New Brunswick. That controversy first received judicial consideration in the Renaud case. In that case, it appears, that, by the Parish School Act of 1858, certain schools were constituted in Roman Catholic settlements, and taught by Roman Catholic teachers, and at which the children of Roman Catholics attended and received religious instruction, their parents desired and their church deemed essential to proper elementary education. These practices had no legal sanction, though they had been long acquiesced in. They were put an end to by the Parish School Act of 1871. The Roman Catholics of New Brunswick protested against the abolition of the privilege, and, in the end, contested its validity in the courts of justice. The Renaud case came before the Supreme Court of the province, and there it was held, that no separate schools had been created in New Brunswick by the Parish School Act of 1858, nor were any rights acquired under that Act. The court held, that the Act clearly contemplated the establishment throughout the province of public common schools for the inhabitants generally, and the mere fact, that, in exceptional cases, certain schools, under the Parish School Act, drawing provincial aid and having been made for the time being, with or without the knowledge and sanction of the Board of Education, denominational, by reason of the teacher instructing the children exclusively in the doctrine of a particular denomination, cannot confer on any class of persons with respect to denominational schools, or give to the denomination whose tenets are so taught any rights or privileges other than those possessed by the other inhabitants of that section. It is not by looking at what the inspectors, trustees or other persons may have allowed, but what the law itself at the union authorized, that the rights and privileges of parties under the law are to be ascertained.

The Supreme Court of New Brunswick were of the opinion, that subsections 2, 3 and 4 fully provided for the separate schools in Ontario and the dissentient schools in Quebec, and, by way of confirming the conclusions at which the court had arrived, they undertook to show what schools existed at the union which were judicially protected as denominational schools, under subsection 1. Denominational schools are not a genus of which separate schools are a species.

They are a distinct class of schools, created for a different purpose and protected in a different way. I affirm, that the schools mentioned in subsection 1 of section 93 are not separate or dissentient schools at all. These, wherever they are established, are, in fact, a part and parcel of the public school system, and must, of necessity, be subject to the progressive legislation, if they are to remain efficient, as much so as the public schools which are established for the majority.

I believe I am correct in saying, that subsection 1 was suggested at the London conference by Mr. Fisher, one of the New Brunswick delegates. It was proposed to meet the case of a class of schools, numerous in the province of New Brunswick, which were created by Acts of Parliament or by royal charters, and in which the religious views of different denominations were taught, and which were under denominational control. Such Acts of incorporation were held by the Supreme Court of the United States, under their constitution, to be contracts, which the state or local legislature could not impair, and Mr. Fisher had in his mind, so he informed me, the decision of that court in the Dartmouth College case, when he proposed this subsection. He wanted to have the same principle applied to institutions created by private benefaction here. Because no one would found such institutions, if he believed that the Act of incorporation, or the charter, gave no permanency to its character, and, if the will of the legislature, and not the will of the donor, was to govern, and so that charity might flow in a wholly different channel from that which the founder had marked out for it.

It will be seen, from this statement, what class of institutions was in the minds of the framers of our constitution, which they had suggested to them this subsection by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dartmouth College case. If this view is correct, it is clear, that, in deciding what the law is in respect to separate or dissentient schools, it is necessary to leave entirely out of consideration the first subsection. Let me, with more fulness, invite your attention to that class of institutions which are called denominational schools, and which are protected by this subsection 1 of section 93 of the Act. Though they are protected in a manner wholly different from that protection which is extended to separate and dissentient schools that existed at the union or which are thereafter established. In the Renaud case, the Chief Justice says :

> At the time what may be fairly and legitimately called the common school system of the province was carried on under the 21st Vic.,Chap. 9, entitled " An Act relating to Parish Schools," there were no doubt in existence at the same time in addition to the schools established under the Parish School Act, schools of unquestionably denominational character under the immediate government and control of the Board of Education and in which there may be no doubt, or it may reasonably be inferred, the peculiar doctrine and tenets of the denominations to which they respectively belonged were exclusively taught and there had what may be rightly assumed all the characteristics of denominational schools pure and simple.

The Chief Justice, after describing a number of these schools, says :

> Thus, in the year 1867, but before the first day of July, the day of the union, it will be seen by the Journals of the House of Assembly, page 45, that in addition to the amount authorized by law the following schools among others received a further grant, namely : the Madras School, the Wesleyan Academy, the Presbyterian Seminary, the Roman Catholic School, Fredericton, the Presbyterian School, St. Stephens, the Roman Catholic School, St. John, the Roman Catholic School, Milltown, the Roman Catholic School, St. Andrews, the Roman Catholic Schools, Carleton, Woodstock, Portland and Bathurst, the Presbyterian School, the Roman Catholic School, Newcastle, and the Sackville Academy ; and in the Journals for 1871, the year the Common School law passed, are to be found special provisions for the above schools, so that it is obvious that there were in existence at the time of the union, and have been ever since, in this province, apart from the schools established by the Parish School Act, denominational schools recognized by the legislature and aided by the public revenues.

In the same case, Mr. Justice Fisher shows, that the schools which are protected under subsection 1 of section 93, are not any of the parish schools, for, if the Board of Education had failed in its duty in respect to any right acquired in such schools, the case would have been one to which subsection 4 of section 93 applies. He then says :

> A denominational right or privilege, if any such existed, would not alone make the Common School Act unconstitutional. It must be a right or privilege in respect to the denominational schools which a class of persons had by law at the time of the union, which is prejudicially affected by this Act to render it unconstitutional. It appears to me the first inquiry is, what is a denominational school ? In my opinion it is a school under the exclusive government of some one denomination of Christians and where the tenets of that denomination are taught. There were denominational schools at the union, such as Varley School at St. John, the Sackville Academy, the Madras School, and the like, but they are not touched by the Common School Act of 1871. They remain in the enjoyment of all the rights they had at the union.

This case went to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the report says :

> It was argued for the appellants by Messrs. Brown and Duff, and a discussion arose on denominational schools in New Brunswick. Lord Justice James, after conferring with other members of the committee, gave judgment without calling upon the respondents, their lordships concur in the opinion of the court below and would advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

It will be observed from these extracts that the Supreme Court of New Brunswick held that there were no separate or dissentient schools in New Brunswick, but that there were denominational schools, which were schools under the exclusive control of some denomination of Christians, and that these had not been prejudicially affected by the Parish School legislation. The difference between denominational and separate and dissentient schools is very marked. The denominational schools are private schools, while separate schools are as much public schools as those which are established for the children of the majority. When you look at the Barrett case you see that the Judicial Committee held that the schools existing in Manitoba at the union were private schools, and that the franchises which their supporters possessed did not differ from that of the supporters of other denominational schools. These two decisions go to establish that subsection 1 of section 93 of the one Act, and subsection 1 of section 22 of the other, have no reference whatever to separate and dissentient schools, but refer to institutions which any class of persons whether they are of the majority or minority, enjoyed by law at the union, whether under royal charter or by private Acts of incorporation. The separate and dissentient schools are schools of minority, always. They are public schools, and as such, are protected in a different way, and when you are considering the rights and privileges of separate schools, you must leave subsection 1 out of view altogether.

The basis of the public school system is this, that the state has its interests to guard, and it is essential to this end that it should look after the character and attainments of its people. To secure peace, order and good government, it establishes schools, it examines teachers in respect to their knowledge of those subjects, which concern it, and which knowledge contributes, in the estimation of the state, to its self-preservation. The state licenses whom it finds qualified. It determines the constitution of such schools, the manner of their support, and the adequacy and kind of supervision required to maintain their efficiency. It is the right and it is the duty of the state to keep itself constantly informed as to the degree of efficiency. Although separate and dissentient schools, under the constitutional compact, have conceded to the minority certain rights and privileges, these are not in derogation of its own exclusive rights, but rather supplementary to them. The work of the state is distinct from that which is performed under the rights and privileges conceded. The state has an undoubted right to see that what it aims to do through the ordinary public school is also accomplished by the separate schools. Separate and dissentient schools are public schools, and in this respect the constitution provides that the provincial legislature may, at any time, legislate for them, so long as it does not impair the right to give the religious instruction which the supporters of such schools think their children ought to receive, and which, under this provision of the constitution, they are entitled to have given. These schools, which are in fact and in law public schools, are dealt with under subsections 2, 3 and 4 of section 93. It is of very great consequence to distinguish between private schools that have individual Acts of incorporation, or existing by practice, subsequently sanctioned by law, and public schools in which denominational instruction is given, because, until this distinction is clearly seen, this section of the British North America Act is liable to be both misunderstood and misconstrued. Subsection 1 deals with denominational schools which are private, and with their management, and with the instruction there imparted the state has nothing to do. Separate and dissentient schools are state institutions performing the functions called for by the state in like manner as other public schools, but, in addition to the work which the state requires, the parents of the children, as a matter of conscience, have had guaranteed to them the privilege of affording to the children that religious instruction which they deem to be an essential part of a common school education. If I have given a correct construction to this section, and I have carefully followed the decisions of the courts so far as I have gone, there is a clear distinction between schools protected under subsection 1 and those protected under the other subsections. The denominational schools existing at the union are protected by the courts of law, the separate and dissentient schools, whether they existed at the union, or were thereafter established, are protected by an appeal to the Governor General in Council, and, if necessary, to Parliament. This appeal is not based on superior wisdom or superior capacity here. The provision in respect to education shows that it is bestowed as a trust to guard ultimately, the rights and privileges of the minority, and to preserve them unimpaired. The aim is to reconcile permanence, if the minority desire permanency, with the changes in the law which the provincial legislature might, from time to time, find required by the progress of the country, and by the altered condition of its population.

The interpretation which I am putting on subsection 1 enables us to give a clear and definite meaning to every word and phrase in the education sections of both Acts, and no other construction does—at all events, no other does so equally well. If you attempt to apply subsection 1 to separate schools existing at the union, you make the beginning of subsection 3 meaningless, as that subsection gives an appeal to the Governor General in Council where, in any province a system of separate schools exists at the union and where they are prejudicially affected. This provision would be wholly inoperative if such legislation was ultra vires under subsection 1. The only way of giving effect to this introductory part of subsection 3 would be by defining the appeal to administrative Acts, and not extending it to legislative Acts at all, a construction which the express words of the Manitoba Act forbid. Subsection 1 reads: "Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege in respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union." The privilege is one which appertains to a class of persons whether they are of the majority or of the minority, created by law, and existing at the union. It is not a privilege in the subject-matter taught, but it is a right or privilege in the institution itself. It may relate to the management, to the endowment, or to the instruction. Prejudicial legislation is ultra vires. But subsection 3 reads "where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education." Here you have not a right or privilege given relating to the institution, but in relation to education. It is not a right of any class of persons, but of a certain minority of the Queen's subjects. It relates to the character of the instruction imparted upon the subject of religion. The persons protected are different, the rights and privileges secured are essentially different, and there is a marked difference in the mode of their protection. Can any one seriously argue that the schools of any class of persons against which prejudicial legislation is made ultra vires under subsection 1 are the same schools as those existing at the union, in which a minority have given rights and privileges and in respect to which an appeal is given to the Governor General in Council under subsection 3. I do not think this can be so. The words of subsection 3 could only apply if at all to post-union concessions to preunion schools, which would be a very forced construction to put on the words employed. I think, then, in determining the rights and privileges of minorities in separate schools, subsection 1 must be left out of view altogether. In considering the subject of separate and dissentient schools we must look solely at the remaining subsections which apply to minorities. In subsection 3 you have a plan for protecting the minority, by the political department of the Government, and not by the courts.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TISDALE. I move that the following clause be added :—

6. Upon delivery to the Bank of Hamilton of the debentures of the city of Hamilton, granted under their by-law No. 755, and on the Bank of Hamilton agreeing to accept the same as the purchasers thereof from the said railway company, the city corporation first receiving so much of the proceeds thereof from the said purchasers as the corporation may deem proper to hold as security for all expenses payable by the company to the said corporation, under the terms of the said by-law, and for claims against the said company for compensation for damage to real property taken or injuriously affected by the exercise within the city of Hamilton of any of the powers granted for the railway or against the said corporation for compensation, damages or costs by reason or on account of the construction of the railway within the said city, the corporation having the right to pay any of such claims and costs when agreed upon or legally ascertained, and to use so much of said proceeds as may be necessary for that purpose, accounting to the said railway company for the whole amount of said security, the said bank shall hold and apply the sum of $85,000 portion of the said purchase money as the deposit provided for by this Act, and subject thereto, repay and retain to themselves their advance of $75,000 on the purchase of the said debentures and account to the said railway company for the balance of the said purchase money.

Bill (No. 63) to amend the Act incorporating the International Radial Railway Company.—(Mr. Masson.)

REMEDIAL BILL (MANITOBA).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When the House rose at six o'clock, I was pointing out the difference between denominational schools mentioned in subsection 1 of section 92 of the Manitoba Act, and subsection 1 of section 93 of the British North America Act, and that they referred, not to separate or dissentient schools, but to denominational schools, which are a distinct class of schools from those designated separate or dissentient. I was pointing out that separate and dissentient schools are public schools, under public provision, differing from other public schools in that the course of instruction given in them is supplemented by religious instruction of the denomination to whom that right or privilege is conferred. Denominational schools which are private and which existed in a province at the union, are given judicial protection, but separate and dissentient schools, being public, it is assumed may require to be modified by legislation which is amended from time to time, the same as any other of the public schools. Trifling things are not intended to stand in the way of change, and as the rights and privileges associated with them are left to the protection of the legislature which will not be hampered by some of the considerations which a judicial body could not ignore. The proper consideration of this section cannot, however, be considered wholly apart from subsection 1. We must look at the phrase "provincial authority." Does it embrace the legislature of the province? I think it does. If it were not so, an appeal in the first instance would have been to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and not to the Governor General in Council. Their lordships of the Judicial Committee say:

> That it is unnecessary to determine the point, but they must express their dissent from the argument that the insertion of the words "of the legislature of the province" in the Manitoba Act shows that in the British North America Act it could not have been intended to comprehend the legislature under the words "any provincial authority."

I do not press this opinion further than it goes, but their lordships' observation points to the wider view, which, in my opinion, is the correct interpretation of the phrase. If you embrace the legislature of a province in the words "provincial authority," then, of course, in no case, can subsection 1 include the separate schools, because subsections 3 and 4 provide a system of procedure of granting redress both against legislative and administrative acts, against the separate schools, whether such schools are created before or after the union. This provision in respect to legislation would be wholly inoperative as to schools existing at the union if subsection 1 applied, but the appeal is given as well in respect to them as in respect to those that are thereafter established. This being so, such schools are not embraced under the protection of the first subsection, but are under the protection of subsections 3 and 4, which are specifically named. The appeal is made as extensive in the one class as in the other.

On the 1st July, 1867, the substantive law of Quebec in respect of dissentient schools was made the same as the separate school law of Upper Canada, but the adjective law was wholly wanting and without the adjective law the substantive law must remain a dead letter. The framers of the constitution did not leave the fulfilment of the legal obligation wholly to the good faith of the province. Between sovereign states such a course might prevail because if faith is not kept force in the end may be resorted to, but in a sovereign federation the observance of solemn compacts is secured by law and not by force; so, as a further security to the minority and with a view to keep faith subsection 4 provides:

> In case any such provincial law as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not fully executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section and of any decisions of the Governor General in Council under this section.

If Quebec had not legislated to give effect to subsection 2, and either minority of the province had petitioned for the enforcement of the rights and privileges as extended to it, and if the province refused to act, Parliament might have been called upon to legislate upon the authority conferred under this subsection 4, which authorizes it to legislate, among other things, for the due execution of subsection 2. The compact under this subsection set out, imposed upon Quebec the duty of legislation because legislation is necessary to its due fulfilment. Let us suppose that after the union Quebec had refused to legislate; that the representatives of the province and its press were opposed to legislation, and that they argued then, as some argue now, that legislation in respect to the minority is a mere question of public policy; that the power to legislate implies a discretion; that the power having been bestowed the legislature in every case is authorized to judge as to the propriety of exercising this power, that the legislature is not compelled to act and is not obliged to carry out intentions previously expressed, and so it has a right to decline to legislate. Does any one believe we would have heard of provincial rights being extended into regions from which by the express terms of union they are excluded? Would any one have heard the cry that Quebec must be left alone: that she must not be interfered with, that if she refuses to carry out the compact with the Protestant minority, she has a right to do so, that she may change her policy, and that she ought to be allowed to take her own course, and that the duty imposed on Parliament by the supreme law, must not be discharged? That in its conduct, Parliament, too, must be governed by considerations of public policy and not by any theory of constitutional duty the same as if no compact existed; that the power conferred by way of guarantee really imposes no duty, and that it may be treated as an ordinary power? I am sure no such contention would ever have been put forward had the appeal come here from the Protestants of Quebec had that province failed to carry out the provisions of the constitution after the union, and if the Protestant minority had come to the Federal Parliament for redress. Would it have been said that there must be no interference? That Quebec must be left alone? That the remedial power expressly given for the protection of the minority, and for no other purpose, is never to be invoked? Not at all. It would have been said that this union is based on compacts and that an honest observance of them is necessary to its continuance. These compacts must be kept. Where they are deliberately disregarded the remedial power reposed in Federal hands is rightly invoked. The use of this power by Parliament does not invade the exclusive dominion of the offending province, but is only asserting an authority within its jurisdiction for the very purpose for which that authority is bestowed, and with the sanction of the only class of persons to be affected by that interference. If the legislature of Quebec had refused to carry out the compact to which it is a party and had refused to provide by law so as to give effect to the powers, privileges and duties bestowed upon the minority, could the Governor General in Council have refused constitutionally to consider that appeal? Would Parliament, if the case had regularly reached it, have refused to afford the legislative remedy which the constitution authorized? I do not think so. This power is granted for a purpose and that purpose is to maintain certain privileges unimpaired. It is an incentive in addition to a strong sense of public duty to honestly observe the agreement between the parties. It is a perpetual monition to every province not to disregard the obligations which primarily rest upon it and not to permit its legislative history to be sullied by broken faith. Parliament is given a superintending authority, so far as such is necessary to fulfil its trust. It is given solely for that purpose. Beyond this it cannot go. In no case is it made a judge of different systems. This is the function of the local legislature, and not of Parliament. What Parliament is authorized to do is to see that where a compact exists, and complaint is made of its violation, that its terms are observed if the minority desire its continuance, for the words are:

> As far as the circumstances of each case require the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section.

Due execution is one adequate to the maintenance of the right or privilege. I have already pointed out that if you embrace separate and dissentient schools under the protection of subsection 1, you must hold that the legislature is not included in the words "provincial authority" and you must hold that pre-union and post-union schools, although exactly the same in the constitution, are so essentially different that they are differently protected. But when you read subsection 3 you find that the same appeal exists for both and that it is given for the same purpose. If the Acts of the legislature affecting separate schools existing at the union were ultra vires, there would be no propriety in giving an appeal to the Governor General in Council. This consideration would leave the legislature free to repeal all post-union legislation, both as to pre-union and post-union schools. But in the Manitoba Act the legislature is included in express words, and so there can be no doubt in this case that there are appeals from the Acts of the legislature. The rule is certainly the same, both for Ontario and Quebec. Such a construction is the most natural one, and best fits in with the condition of things for which it was intended to provide. It was the intention of the framers of the constitution that the protection to separate schools in every province in which they were established should rest ultimately with the Federal Parliament, and not with the courts of justice. This plan was no doubt adopted because it was the most elastic and made the security of the privilege conform to that legislative readjustment which, from time to time, the progress of the people might render necessary. The separate and dissentient schools have a national as well as a religious and denominational side. On the side of the state they are supported in the public interest to secure the personal qualification for citizenship so as to afford a more secure basis for popular institutions. The state says, in effect, to the parents and guardians who are the supporters of separate schools, the privilege of giving religious instruction to which you attach special importance is conceded to you, and the right and privilege of making certain public schools separate, the better to meet your convictions, are allowed. We concede to you the right to impart religious instruction which you deem of lasting importance to the religious and moral well-being of your children. But it is not for the purpose of giving this instruction that the state has embraced the subject of education within its jurisdiction. The state, in conceding separate schools, does not abandon its functions in respect to such schools: it does not place separate schools outside of its own jurisdiction, quite beyond the pale of state institutions. In this regard, separate schools are essentially different from those institutions with which the state has no concern and which are no part of the system which the state provides for the general education of the people. The state, on its own behalf, deals with that kind of public instruction which it deems necessary to good citizenship in the life that now is. The principles and domgas of religion remain much the same from generation to generation, but for secular instruction you must place the state schools with in the reach of the progressive legislation of the state. In the separate schools, the sphere of instruction is divided. The religious instruction is under the direction of parents and guardians but the secular side is, and must remain, under the jurisdiction of the state. The words of the statute are: "The province may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject to the following provisions." These limiting provisions being made for religious instruction, the special claims of rights and privileges are fully met, and these schools stand to the state with regard to everything else, precisely in the same way as any other public schools, as to the state instruction. The legislature may alter and amend the law by which such schools are governed, and bring into conformity with the altered requirements of the community and the higher standard of attainment which, from time to time, may be called for in the interest of the state. If it deems it necessary to raise the common standard of attainment it may do so in respect to separate schools, no less than in regard to those public schools which are the schools of the majority. If experience shows that the existing mode of inspection in these schools is defective on the side of the state, the state may decide on some other mode, and no one would have any right to complain of any interference with any right or privilege which he can claim under the provisions of the constitution. The rights and privileges are mainly outside of the work which the state does on its own behalf. To ascertain the extent of the rights and privileges we must look to the sphere of the special work done and which the parents of the children had in view in seeking the concession. These rights and privileges lie in a special field, and are not, nor was it intended that they should be, embraced within those subject-matters of which the state has taken charge, and of which, under the constitution, it cannot primarily divest itself. Let it then be borne in mind that the legislature of a province has a general grant of power which is exclusive in respect to education conferred upon it, and which is not within any right or privilege. The possession by the state of this exclusive jurisdiction extends to separate schools as well as to the nonsectarian public schools of the majority, and it is perfectly consistent with the rights and privileges of the minority in respect to which the provincial authority is restrained that this jurisdiction should remain to the lgislature. It is quite true that a legislature may, in an administrative law, place part of its exclusive jurisdiction under a denominational body, but in doing so it does not confer upon such body any right or privilege. The power so granted as a matter of judgment or convenience, may again be withdrawn because it cannot be regarded as in any degree touching those matters by reason of which separate or dissentient schools have been called into existence. There is a notion abroad that separate schools in Ontario and dissentient schools in Quebec stand upon a different footing from those which existed in Manitoba. I do not think this is the case. I do not find anything in the constitution to warrant that opinion. Prior to the union, the school system of Upper Canada had been made acceptable to the Roman Catholics by that province, like privileges were to have been extended to the Protestants of Quebec. This was not done prior to the union, and when the British North America Act was framed you have special provisions made to enable Parliament to carry into effect this part of the compact should Quebec refuse to do so. For both provinces an appeal is made to the political department of Government. The Ontario law was carried before the union, and the Quebec law after the union, and in affording protection equally available to both, you have a remedial provision introduced with the words: "where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools existed at the union"—which is the case of Ontario, "or is thereafter established"—which meets the case of Quebec—"an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council." This provision contemplates legislative redress, and so we find there is no difference between Manitoba and the two provinces which I have mentioned in this regard, and Ministers ought to keep this fact in view when they are endeavouring to awaken throughout the country feelings which it will be far easier to call up than to allay.

An attempt was made in the discussion last year by the hon. member for Albert, who undertook to distinguish between the position of separate schools existing before and separate schools created after the union. The hon. member declared the policy unwise and that the guarantee to such schools established after the union would be a most reckless provision. He said:

> If a legislature by any hasty or snap judgment made an absurd law and the sober second thought of the people led them to repent, there would be no way of repealing that preposterous law, and to suppose that any Parliament looking into the future would have any local legislature the dangerous power of making perpetual laws as to rights which were in the womb of the future, as to franchises not yet known, was to assume that Parliament in passing such legislation was acting without proper discretion.

This is an argument rather against any compact, whether before or after the union—in fact an argument against a written constitution altogether. This is an argument in no degree aiding in the consideration of that which is too plain to require it. The hon. gentleman further ignored the facts which I have stated and which are indisputable, that the separate school law of Ontario was settled before the union, and that of Quebec was enacted after, and the clear intention was to put them both on precisely the same footing. Nor can I see with the hon. member that it would be a more reckless proceeding in one case than in the other. The intention of the law was that there should be legislation from time to time. The changes in the school system and in the mode of supporting them may in half a century be so great as to leave scarcely anything remaining that was in force at the time of the union, and to say that what is obsolete shall be inviolable and that what is modern and efficient is to be wholly unprotected is a species of wisdom which I am unable to appreciate. The objection, so far as it can have any force, is equally applicable to pre-union and to post-union compacts, for they are in the law put upon precisely the same footing, nor do I see any reason for making any difference between them. In the case of both, expensive buildings may be erected and private benefactions liberally bestowed; in both cases the generations represented by the men who made these compacts may, when a change is attempted, be in their graves. Why should the one be differently protected from the other? The doctrine of the hon. member for Albert is not found in any part of the constitution. The words are:

> Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists at the union or is thereafter established.

There is no distinction made. The privileges of the minority have precisely the same security in the one case as in the other; and they are the same in the three provinces in which the right or privilege was conceded. The hon. member suggested that an understanding might be had between the minority and a Government whose tenure of office was uncertain by which a system of separate or dissentient schools might be established by a corrupt or moribund legislature. The province could not become so bound. Fraud vitiates any compact, and fraud can no more bind a legislature than it can a private party. But contracts cannot be vitiated because fraud is possible, but because fraud has been practised, and the burden of proof is upon him who charges it. But where a system has existed for many years, where it has been altered and amended by successive governments after successive elections, it can scarcely be denied that while it was in operation that it rested upon popular sanction. It is by the act of the province itself alone that such a right or privilege is called into existence, and where this is the case and the right or privilege is construed as I understand it, it imposes indeed a very limited restraint upon a majority, and leaves them free in every other regard to mould the institutions of the province according to their own ideas of what is best in the public interest.

Let us examine more closely the Manitoba case and see how the question stands. I pass by the so-called bills of rights. It matters very little in this discussion whether the bill of rights No. 4 was genuine or whether it was spurious. Those who insist that there was a fourth bill were those who had the best opportunity of knowing; and so I can see no reason for disputing the correctness of the statement so explicitly made by one of the parties. What is the object of denying the existence of this fourth bill? It is because in the third bill presented separate schools are not mentioned, and it is assumed that if the fourth bill is spurious there is no compact in respect to schools. No line of argument could be well more preposterous. One might as well argue that nothing contained in the treaty could be regarded as part of the treaty unless it were disclosed in the diplomatic correspondence which preceded the negotiations. No matter in which way we decide the question in relation to the genuineness of bill of rights No. 4, it does not in any way affect the interpretation of the section, which is all that we can authoritatively look to. Their lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council say:

> The terms upon which Manitoba was to become a province of the Dominion were matters of negotiation between representatives of the inhabitants of Manitoba and of the Dominion Government. The terms agreed upon, so far as education was concerned, must be taken to be embodied in the 22nd section of the Act of 1870.

Of course, one must accept this as an authoritative determination of the educational provision found in the Manitoba Act. It is a determination of one of several preliminary matters upon which the decision of the question submitted rests. The Imperial Government took an interest in the subject at the time, and sent Sir Clinton Murdoch to this country to see that the terms of union were such as to satisfy the Red River inhabitants. Lord Granville, on the 22nd March, telegraphed the Governor General:

> That troops should not be employed in forcing the sovereignty of Canada on the population of Red River should they refuse to admit it.

On the 23rd of April, he further informed the Governor General:

> That the Imperial Government was to finally decide all differences in respect to settlers' rights.

On the 3rd of May, the Governor General cabled Lord Granville:

> Negotiations with the delegates had closed satisfactorily.

And on the 18th of May, Lord Granville replied, expressing his satisfaction:

> That the Canadian Government and the delegates have come to an understanding as to the terms on which the settlements on Red River should be admitted into the union.

Here are delegates, negotiations, terms of admission, and a final agreement. How, then, can any one maintain that that did not constitute a compact? The terms as to education are found in section 22. Everything embraced there forms part of the compact, and nothing proposed on either side which is not found in this section does, and nothing so omitted can be urged as a basis of any right or privilege.

The first subsection of this section is the same as subsection 1 of section 93 in the British North America Act, except that the words "by practice" occur after the word "law," and was given the same construction in the Barrett case as the latter received in the Renaud case. In the Barrett case, their lordships say:

> There were no schools, public schools, in the sense of state schools. The members of the Roman Catholic Church supported the schools of their own church for the benefit of their own children and were not under obligation and did not contribute to the support of any other schools. Now, if the state of things which the Archbishop describes as existing before the union had been established by law, what would have been the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholics with respect to denominational schools? They would have had by law the right to establish schools at their own expense, to maintain their schools by school fees or by voluntary contributions and to conduct them in accordance with their religious tenets.

That is, they were private schools, having just the same franchise at law after the union that they had by practice before the union. In the judgment of the Privy Council, in Brophy vs. the Attorney General of Manitoba, their lordships again return to the subject, and say, in defence of their former judgment, that, in the Barrett case:

> The sole question raised was whether the Public School Act of 1890 prejudicially affected any right or privilege which Roman Catholics had by law or practice in the province at the union. Their lordships arrived at the conclusion that this question must be answered in the negative. The only right or privilege which the Roman Catholics then possessed, either by law or practice, was the right or privilege of establishing or maintaining for the use of members of their own church such schools as they pleased. It appeared to their lordships that this right or privilege remained untouched, and, therefore, could not be said to be affected by the legislation of 1890.

And they further vindicate their decision in the Barrett case in these words:

> Its duty is to interpret, not to enact. It is true that the construction put by this board upon the first subsection reduced within very narrow limits the protection afforded by their subsection in respect to denominational schools. It may be that those who are acting on behalf of the Roman Catholic community of Manitoba and those who either framed or assented to the wording of that enactment were under the impression that the scope was wider and that it afforded protection greater than their lordships held to be the case. But such considerations cannot properly influence the judgment of those who have judicially to interpret the statute. The question is not what may be supposed to have been intended but what has been said. More complete effect might in some cases have been given to the intention of the legislature if violation were done to the language in which their legislation has taken shape. But such a course would, on the whole, be quite as likely to defeat as to further the object which was in view. Whilst, however, it is not necessary to resist any temptation to depart from sound rules of construction in the hope of more completely satisfying the intention of the legislature, it is quite legitimate, where more than one construction of the statute is possible, to select that one which will best carry out what appears from the general scope of legislation under the surrounding circumstances to have been its intention.

The impression became widely disseminated, that the judgment in the Barrett case disposed of the whole question. Of course, this was a mistake. It dealt with the rights of the parties, as supporters of denominational schools at the union under subsection 1 of section 22. It did not touch the rights thereafter established under subsections 2 and 3. The impression has, nevertheless, gone abroad, that the second judgment is inconsistent with the first, and that their lordships expressed opinions on questions not before them, for the purpose of unduly favouring the minority. This impression is without a particle of foundation. It is, indeed, most improper to awaken suspicions calculated to weaken the authority and respect which ought to be had for any judgment of the greatest tribunal of the Empire. In my opinion, the matters dealt with in this decision, were considered throughout with the greatest care, and there is no statement made, from the beginning to the end of that judgment, which does not serve to illustrate the law involved in the instances submitted, and which could with propriety have been omitted. Much has been written and said for the purpose of derogating from the authority of this judgment, and, especially, by setting up propositions of constitutional law which are not such, and which have never been recognized to be such by any one having even a moderate acquaintance with the subject. I must sincerely deprecate attacks made upon this great judicial tribunal of the ablest jurists and lawyers of the Empire. One section have criticised the Judicial Committee because of their first judgment, and another class have done so because of this second judgment. These attacks are equally unwarranted. It would have been a mark of more modesty and, certainly, not of less wisdom, had an earnest effort been made to understand their bearing, rather than to criticise their contents. The words which are introductory to subsection 3 of the British North America Act, are omitted from subsection 2 of the Manitoba Act. In the provisions relating to one specific province they were unnecessary. Their lordships have decided, that the right or privilege protected in this subsection of the Manitoba Act, is a right or privilege existing at the time the Act complained of came into operation, and could not be of any consequence when it was called into existence. They see no justification in putting a limitation on language that is unlimited. There is nothing in the surrounding circumstances, or in the apparent intention of the legislature, to warrant such limitation.

The right or privilege, whether existing at the union or subsequently established by the legislature of the province, if thereafter attacked by hostile legislation is protected by the constitution in the same way and by the same instrumentality mentioned in this subsection. The compact found in section 22 was entered into to be observed, not pedantically, but from the point of an enlightened friend who paid heed to the spirit rather than to the letter and who did not desire to hamper or hinder the legislature in respect to those matters falling within its exclusive jurisdiction. I have observed in respect to the subject a great deal of discussion in relation to the nature of the remedy afforded. Looking to the department of government from which redress is sought the remedy is undoubtedly political and the responsibility of granting or withholding redress rests with the Ministry or with Parliament, but when this much is granted you have not in the slightest degree contributed to settle the question as to the relation in which Ministers of the Crown or Parliament stand to the question itself. This House may have before it a question of tariff reform, it may be a question of an annual payment of a subsidy already pledged to a foreign state. They are both political questions. There may be reasons of state for the rejection of both, but ordinarily this cannot be the case in respect to the subsidy. Though both are political they do not both fall within the same class. The one imports an ordinary political discretion and the other the performance of a subsisting public obligation. There is a legislative remedy given. It might have been a judicial one, and the primary considerations which arise under this provision of the constitution and which present themselves to the legislature and by which, apart from external considerations, the action of the legislature should be governed, are essentially judicial. There are rights and privileges given, there is a protection afforded for a wrong done. A complaint is made by the aggrieved minority. There is an inquiry and an ascertainment of the facts. There is a mode of redress provided. The power is conferred for a purpose. It is not because Parliament possesses superior wisdom, it is not to enable it to exercise a superintending care, but to see that the compact for the protection of the minority is duly observed.

The legislature of every province in which separate schools have been established by law has imposed upon it by the constitution certain restraints; subject to those restraints its powers are exclusive. How is it that this authority in the province of Manitoba has not continued exclusive? Why is it that the Judicial Committee have said the Governor General in Council may hear the appeal, assuming the facts to be as alleged? How it is that the Parliament of Canada may, if all the steps were properly taken to bring the matter here, have power to legislate? It is because the limitations which the constitution has imposed upon the provincial legislature have been disregarded. The law which creates the union and under which the minority have secured to them certain rights and privileges, of which rights and privileges Parliament is made the ultimate protector, has been disregarded, and the faith of which Parliament is the guardian, has been broken. Parliament has no power to legislate at all as long as the boundary beyond which the privileges lie has not been crossed. But when a provincial legislature enters within the protected enclosure, then the protecting power of the Governor General in Council may be invoked and for adequate cause exercised. It has been contended that the power of Parliament to deal with a subject in respect to separate schools when properly before them is a discretionary power, and for this reason it is constitutionally right and proper to consider the policy and propriety of the legislation which may be sought for the purpose of restoring the privilege which the local legislature has impaired or abolished. In other words, the contention is that our position in respect to the question is exactly the same as that of the legislature of Nova Scotia or British Columbia, if either had this subject before it for the first time. I do not think that such is our position. The legislature of a province that has not conceded the rights and privileges to separate schools is at the point where the roads part. It exercises a judgment as to the policy of introducing the system or of refraining from doing so, but we are in precisely the same position as the province of Manitoba itself, once, in consequence of her refusal to act, the question is regularly before us. In one sense every prerogative of the Crown and every power committed to Parliament is a discretionary power. The power to vote the Estimates for each year is so. Yet no one would expect that a Parliament would make up its mind to withhold the Estimates altogether, nor could it claim that it was exercising a constitutional right by doing so, although it might be acting strictly within its legal authority. It would, therefore, be trifling with the common sense of the House of Commons to deny ordinarily its constitutional duty in this regard. The English constitutional system rests, on its political side, not on legal compulsion, but on moral duty. It says, "this is the way, walk ye in it." In a case of this kind, there is a constitutional discretion, because there is no power of compulsion, and because there may be higher reasons of state which would justify the legislature in refusing to act. I do not, at this moment, admit that a discretion would be constitutionally exercised, supposing that every step previously called for by the statute had been taken, and every function prudently and zealously discharged unless it was found as a fact that no substantial right or privilege had been affected, unless outside of the statute, and outside of the duties that it imposes, it was found that there was such a state of public opinion from some other cause existing that the evil springing from the discharge of this duty would be greater than those springing from its present neglect.

If I were asked by one of the minority for advice upon a question of this kind, with a view to his taking such action as the statute warrants, my first duty would be to ascertain what was the precise character of the rights and privileges that existed. Next, in what regard and to what extent they had been affected by administrative Acts, or by subsequent legislation. Having gone this far, my next duty would be to ascertain if there was a general disposition on the part of the minority to claim those rights and privileges, because if there were but a few persons out of that minority who were seeking for this restoration, my duty would be to say that as the law cares not for little things, that a fraction of the minority could not avail themselves of the provisions of the law. For if the minority acquiesced in what a local legislature did, Parliament would not at all be warranted in undertaking to restore what had been abolished. The next step is to appeal to the Governor General in Council. If I were asked whether the appeal must be heard, my answer would be that as the law confers the right to appeal, there is, impliedly, a corresponding duty to hear and to determine according to the facts and the law, and although the Crown cannot be compelled to hear, the law will not impute to the Crown a wrong, and so by the conventions of this constitution, his duty of hearing will certainly be discharged. But this does not finally determine the question. If the wrong is found to be of an unsubstantial character the Governor General in Council may properly refuse to proceed further, but if it is a substantial grievance, and where the whole rights and privileges have disappeared, it cannot be regarded in law as otherwise than substantial, the provincial government must be first called upon to rectify the wrong and to restore substantially the rights and privileges taken away, and it must refuse or fail to do so after full discussion and opportunity, before the matter can be legally or constitutionally brought before Parliament. As the redress is political, those considerations which are recognized by public law in sovereign states in their intercourse with each other are the rules applicable to this case. There ought to be a full discussion, both with regard to any question of law, and any question of duty, and any question of fact which may be in issue. If there are questions of fact in dispute, they should be investigated and the facts ascertained. If there are questions of law, they ought to be exhaustively threshed out, and if the government and legislature of the province does not act, not because it is wholly unwilling, but because of the state of public opinion, and time is required to bring the opinion of the province into line with its duty, it is an abuse of authority to press for an immediate settlement.

The question as to the propriety or impropriety, the wisdom or the folly of separate schools is not before this Parliament. It cannot come here. It was before the framers of the constitution, and it was before the Manitoba legislature in 1871, but it does not arise in this appeal. It is no part of the inquiry in the ascertainment of the grievance, though it might, in a limited degree, present itself, either before the legislature or before Parliament, in providing a remedy, under existing circumstances. The principle of action here is the same as in all compacts, and in all treaty obligations where Parliament becomes necessary to their due fulfilment. The same thing may be said with regard to the prerogatives of the Crown. The Crown may pardon every convict now confined in the penitentiaries. It may pardon no convict. It has the legal discretion to take either course. But an observance of the conventions of the constitution prevents it taking either. Certain rules have grown up founded on natural justice and human experience which effectually settle the question when a conviction shall not be interfered with, when an offender shall have a sentence mitigated and when he ought to be wholly pardoned. These rules are known and are as much a part of the criminal law of the country as are the statutory provisions under which the accused was tried and convicted. All these conventions, although they are within the discretion of the royal prerogative, are upheld upon constitutional principles and reasons that are as well understood and as certain in their application as they would be were they reduced to statutory form. They are exercised by the political department of the Government. They are matters of royal discretion for the exercise of which Ministers are responsible, but the reasons which guide, the principles which govern, are, for the most part, judicial in their nature, and are not ordinarily less certain nor less binding upon the sovereign's advisers than they would be upon a court of justice were these conventions converted into law. No doubt at times circumstances arise outside the ordinary conventions which a political body is bound to recognize, and which a judicial body could not. Such a distinction might impose itself upon our consideration in a case of this kind.

I confess I am surprised to find such erroneous views entertained in respect to our constitutional system which we are daily called to put into practice. A prize court is a part of the executive government of a sovereign state. Its judgments are conclusions of law for the information of the executive department, and the judgment rendered is not made effective till it meets with executive approval. It is then binding upon the owner of the ship and cargo, but it does not relieve the government from responsibility to the neutral state of which the owner is subject. So the House will see that judicial considerations may govern, and often do, in the discharge of legislative and executive functions. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is a council of state, and not an ordinary court of justice. It advises the sovereign as to questions of law, and in appeals as to what Her Majesty's decision ought to be. She acts upon its report, upon the advice of her political council, who are constitutionally responsible for the order made, as much so as if it were a declaration of war. But what would be the degree of responsibility in the first instance? Next to nothing. So the responsibility of the Queen's advisers may vary all the way from zero to high crimes and misdemeanours. The establishment of the constitutional duty in such a case on the part of the Ministry does not determine the nature of the considerations which govern in its discharge. There is responsibility whether the considerations involved are legal or purely political, but the degree and kind of responsibility may not be the same in the one case as in the other. In one case you must decide whether the case which the law contemplates has arisen, in the other case, the propriety of dealing with the question at all is always before you. You cannot decide whether a question is one of policy or one of compact by looking at the department which deals with it. The duties of the Committee of Privileges and Elections are legal. The duties of former committees for the trial of election petitions were legal. The proceedings of Private Bills Committees are generally legal. So, too, may be the consideration relating to payments under treaty stipulations. The proceedings in a divorce case involve purely judicial considerations when you proceed by Bill in Parliament, as much so as if you proceeded to judgment in a court of justice. It is, of course, in the power of every sovereign body to act or to refuse to act, because a sovereign cannot be commanded. But the question is not, what are its powers, but what are its duties under the circumstances ? What did the framers of the constitution intend? Was it not intended, where the facts fell within the mischief contemplated, that redress should be given, unless, indeed, there are graver reasons of state which, under the conventions of the constitution, would justify a government or legislature in leaving the duty, for the time being, in abeyance ?

I think where the law speaks of rights and privileges invaded and a means of redress is provided, the intention must be that means shall be made available, not capriciously, but as to the law itself, certainly. It is a remedy ordinarily to be made available, and not to be withheld. Our whole system of government is founded upon forbearance, and it is most successfully administered when some regard is shown to the opinions, the circumstances, and the difficulties of others. If a spirit of moderation and consideration for the rights of communities and a conscientious regard for intention is important when but the ordinary affairs of government are involved, it must be still more important where a specific right is created and a special duty is imposed. A discretion under our law is never arbitrary. It is always constitutional, and it is bounded by the authority which the law assigns, and by the facts found. Parliament has no authority in any degree to impair or lessen the authority of a provincial legislature, nor is it made a judge of the relative merits of different systems of education. Our jurisdiction does not extend to the majority in any event, although it would not be an abuse of our power to consider in redressing the grievance of a minority how this duty could be discharged with the least inconvenience and the least disturbance to a majority. Our powers are, as I have said, not originating, but remedial. They are to redress wrongs, and are not intended to be employed or made effective for any other purpose. The power to legislate is exclusively in the province, but subject to certain conditions which imply restraint.

Parliament may enter into a treaty to pay certain sums of money yearly : it may, if it chooses, discuss the propriety of such payment on every appropriation Bill. This certainly would be a rather unusual course. It is supposed to settle the wisdom or propriety of the treaty provision when the question is first before it, and, while it is in its power, on any subsequent year, to withhold the grant, it would be a violation of a treaty engagement which imposes upon it a constitutional duty. Such a course is open to it. The legal restraint upon a province is external. The Parliament of Canada may refuse to use the power with which it is clothed, and to withhold from the minority the protection which the supreme law intended to afford. It is legally open to the legislature of Quebec to repeal the Dissentient School Act, and to tax the minority for the support of her general schools, and say of this provision of the constitution that it shall in no case become law. In that event, the law as to Manitoba and the law as to Quebec would read as though the power of the local legislature was exclusive.

But this is not the compact. This is not the section as it stands, and as Lord Carnarvon explained it. This would be a declaration that the protection to which Parliament stands pledged is a condition of union that shall, in no case, be observed.

Let me notice one argument addressed to the House last year by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), calculated to belittle the judgment of the Judicial Committee in respect to the question now before us. The hon. member said that it was a moot point in England when the House of Lords asked the opinion of the judges of the Superior Courts on any question of great public importance, whether they were not bound by the opinion which the judges gave, and whether such opinion ought not to govern the House of Lords. He admits that it does not, and the inference he draws is—no more ought the opinion of the Judicial Committee to govern this House. The cases are not at all parallel. The judges do not stand to the House of Lords in the same relation as the Judicial Committee stands to this House. The House of Lords is the final court of appeal in the United Kingdom, for all common law and equity cases. The judges are summoned to Parliament, not as a court of last resort, but as assessors to aid in legal questions of great difficulty which have not been exhaustively discussed in the arguments and reasoned judgments of the inferior courts. Their duties are to aid the lower lords in the final interpretation of the law, not to finally interpret the law for them. It would, indeed, be a novel rule which would require the superior judicial authority in the United Kingdom to be bound by the opinion of courts inferior to itself. They examine them with care, but they are only bound by their own precedence. But these consultations do not refer to questions of public policy at all. They relate solely to questions of law. No such relation exists between the Government and Parliament of Canada on the one side, and the Judicial Committee on the other. The Judicial Committee is the final interpreter of the law for us, and it is also the final interpreter of the law for the executive government of the Empire. In no case are they simply assessors to us. They are not consulted on questions of public policy, but of law, and the executive department of government accepts the law from them without question. This does not relieve the officers of the Crown from responsibility. That responsibility still exists. It may be much; it may be little; but when policy is substituted for law, and when the authoritative interpretation of the constitution is brushed away on a question, eminently legal, as of no weight, we have passed from the normal field of constitutional government into the abnormal field of revolution. It is sometimes argued that if separate schools may be in any province abolished legally, they cannot be in that province protected under the constitution. There is no inhibitive limit to the power of the legislature to alter and to amend or to abolish such schools if the minority desire their abolition. It would be constitutional as well as legal, and no compact would be broken. But, so far as the legal power to repeal is concerned, there is no difference between that of the legislature of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba. They all stand upon precisely the same footing. What has been done in the one province, can be done with equal certainty in the other two. The privilege conceded in each is protected in the same way. The right or privilege is politically, not legally, secured. Every sovereign state may repudiate its obligations. The Congress of the United States may refuse to compensate the Canadian sealers. The Government of the United Kingdom might have repudiated the Geneva award. But this failure of duty does not in the slightest lessen its binding character. If you put the constitutional provision on the lowest ground, that of a simple declaration of intention to maintain some privilege promised, but not actually consummated, on the one side, nor abandoned on the other, how would the matter stand? When Ireland entered the union, Mr. Pitt authorized Lord Cornwallis to agree to a measure of emancipation. Lord Cornwallis did so in two written documents. Mr. Pitt had not seen either of them, and they went further than he would have knowingly sanctioned. The King's hostility made it impossible for Mr. Pitt to keep his promise, and he declared, that it was impossible for him to remain with honour in the situation in whch he then stood. Suppose the pledge given by Mr. Pitt had been given by the two Houses of Parliament, would they have been less bound in honour to press for the fulfilment of these promises than was Mr. Pitt? There is no doubt whatever, that Parliament can undo this year what it did last. It can refuse to keep its engagements. But there is no doubt of this, that it is in the power of Parliament, through the executive government, to enter into an engagement. The Parliaments of England and Scotland did so, when they made the treaties of union, and, although those provisions of the existing Act of Union could be repealed by a majority of Parliament, no member has, for one hundred and fifty years, suggested that such a course could be honourably taken. The possession of power to break faith does not, in the slightest degree, release a body from the moral and constitutional obligations to which it stands pledged.

I now pass to the consideration of the conduct of the Government in dealing with this question. You have now in this country, for the first time since the union, a tendency to form other than ordinary political parties, and Ministers are responsible for their existence. You see in this country parties forming on lines of religion, and I can conceive of no greater calamity to a country than that this movement should go on to consummation. You hear the mutterings of the coming storm. It is the product of those political incantations in which Ministers have been engaged, and with which they seem too much occupied to seriously consider the results. Every step taken since the last decision of the Judicial Committee marks some fresh blunder. If there is one man more than another responsible for this very dangerous condition of things, that man is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet). The overbearing tone of that hon. gentleman towards the province of Manitoba, the assumption that he had not performed an act of public duty, but an act of grace of extraordinary merit, and one which entitled him to an extraordinary reward, has been of no little effect. The hon. Minister of Public Works has, in effect, said, that this has been with him a work of supererogation, and that he was entitled to the whole representation of the province of Quebec from the clergy for what he had accomplished. His overbearing tone, the absence of all forbearance towards the province of Manitoba and its government has kindled a flame which may be easily made to burn more fiercely, but which it will be very difficult to extinguish. What defence has been made by the hon. gentleman? Why, that his party might not suffer in the province of Quebec. He has, in fact, maintained, that his friends in that province would not trust his colleagues, if they did not at once bulldoze Manitoba, and so, although the Manitoba government asked for time in dealing with the question, because of the state of public opinion in that province, that forbearance has been refused to enable the Minister of Public Works to appear as a conqueror of Manitoba before the electors of his own province. When the hon. Minister returned from the North-west rebellion, the people of Quebec did not scatter garlands in his path, and did not sing the praises of a conquering hero. The garlands which the hon. gentleman did not win in war, he has striven to gain in a field where the personal danger is less, but where the possible public mischiefs are very much greater.

Mr. OUIMET. Less danger than by staying at home, like you.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentle- followed the rule that

He who fights and runs away
May live to fight another day.

Mr. OUIMET. That is very funny.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman, I say, could have approached the government of Manitoba. The government of Manitoba invited him to do so. The opportunity was open to him to discharge a public duty with great advantage to the country; what use has he made of it? Has he allayed public discontent? Has he restored quiet? Has he enlisted public sympathy on the side of a peaceful and quiet settlement? Not he. What was a purely local question he has made a national one; and why? Because he thought only of his own standing in one province while he was dealing with the affairs of another province. He believed that the hon. leader of the Opposition, were he called in, could secure an early and satisfactory settlement of the question without bringing it to this Parliament at all. Too arrogant to approach the local government, too anxious to gratify his feeling of triumph over them, he would neither by consultation seek a settlement nor was he willing that that duty should be discharged by any other. The course taken by the Minister is one calculated to make this country a seat of political disorder, of one in which the wildest passions will be let loose, passions that emit no light, but carry the country into regions of greater disorder and fiercer storms, because he prefers official position to the interests of the country. Let me turn away from the Minister of Public Works to the course taken by the whole Government. Now, when we look at these education sections of the constitution we find there the skeleton of a method of procedure to be followed in dealing with questions like the one we have now before us. What does this skeleton make this question mainly? It makes it one of diplomacy. Where, let me ask, is the diplomatic part of this question? It is wholly wanting. Here is a remedial order, stiff and formal enough, beyond all doubt. It has no more resemblance to an ordinary diplomatic correspondence than the wooden Indian at a cigar store has to the living native savage. How was it, when the statute of 1890 was received at the Department of the Secretary of State, that the contents of these sections which invaded the rights and privileges of the minority were not made the subject of discussion between the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General of Manitoba? How came it that the local government was not informed that unless those objectionable sections, which were a violation of the agreement upon which Manitoba came into the union were not repealed within a year, that the Act itself must be disallowed? We were told, I think, some time ago that it was because the Department of Justice were in doubt as to whether the statutes of Manitoba, out of which these rights and privileges arose, were within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province or not, and it was for this reason that you went to the Supreme Court, and then to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and so the law was, in some respects at least, settled. When that was determined, did you require further information and further knowledge of the facts? If all that it was necessary you should know was to be derived from the statutes, what reason had you to summon the provincial government before you ? The minority deemed it necessary to submit further information. The local government desired to do the same thing. You would not permit them, and sooner than agree to such a procedure you permitted the counsel for the minority to withdraw the evidence which they had submitted and against which objection was taken by the counsel for the local government. Why did you hold this semblance of a court ? What was the further information that you required ? What was there in your mind about which you had not the material to come to a conclusion that led to such a procedure ? Did you set out with the notion that your functions were political and not judicial, and that you were to ascertain the facts and that you were to give judgment ? If not, did not the question remain within the political functions of government ? It had, I admit, certain legal and judicial features. Every question of treaty, every question of the construction and interpretation of a treaty, every question relating to the violation of a treaty, has features of this kind, but they are always dealt with according to the rules of diplomacy, by correspondence, by despatches, by personal conferences of persons appointed to represent such government. The facts which you required the minority were entitled to present on their own behalf, and it was the undoubted right of the local government to contradict or to combat them by evidence not submitted to you as a court of justice, but evidence communicated from them or by them in the same way that one sovereign state would communicate the evidence upon which it relied to defend its course against an opposing government. What justification, then, was there for passing a remedial order before all those informal proceedings were taken which one state always takes in its dealings with another before an ultimatum is presented ? What reason was there for assuming at the outset that the local government would not make its legislation conform to the judgment of the Judicial Committee ? When the judgment and the Queen's order were received they should have been inclosed under the cover of a despatch in which the Government here ought to have assumed that the provincial ministers would modify their legislation in the way required by that judgment, so as to render any further federal action wholly unnecessary. The Ministry here were seized of the question. Further action was not required to enable them to obtain that jurisdiction which the law gave, and so formal action ought to have awaited the results of negotiations with the government of Manitoba.

I have not, up to this hour, heard any hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches tell us why this Government summoned the Manitoba government, in the midst of a session, to appear before them. In the first place, this Government had no right to summon them. It was an act of discourtesy to do so. That is not the way one sovereign body ought to approach another sovereign body ; and they are a sovereign body, acting within their limited sphere, as much as you are, acting within another and different sphere. Why, Sir, a court of justice could not call a member out of this House to appear as a witness in a case ; and was it a simple thing to summon the government of Manitoba away from the legislature of which they are the head, to meet the Government here and answer for their conduct ? Why did you want to have a meeting ? Why did you summon the government at all ? You told us that the decision of the Judicial Committee was enough. Did you want more evidence ? If so, why did you not continue your sitting, and give the government of Manitoba an opportunity of producing their evidence ? But you refused them that opportunity. You dealt with them as the Sultan of Turkey might deal with an Armenian. You could not have treated the government of Manitoba with more discourtesy than you have done.

Every phase of this question, legal or political, ought to have been disclosed in the correspondence between the Government of Canada and the government of Manitoba. That correspondence ought to have been such as not only to have made manifest the differences in the interpretation of the law between the Manitoba ministry and the Ministry here, but it ought to have shown upon what grounds the Government here rested the authority which, in the first instance, they claimed to exercise and upon what grounds they rested the authority of Parliament. The correspondence between the Government of Canada and the government of Manitoba ought to have made known to the country the whole merits and demerits of this controversy. It is upon the force and validity of the arguments presented in such correspondence that the public judgment should rest. It is by that correspondence that the public should have been informed. Where is it ? Of what does it consist ? You may look through the diplomatic annals of the world and you will find nothing like this. In the partition of Poland the despoilers made up their minds to subjugate and to divide and diplomacy could give them no aid in such an enterprise. But the Government of Canada professed that they wanted the local authorities to deal with the question. How have they shown their desire ? By a remedial order that is a species of ultimatum and should only have been made in case the Government, after full discussion and after full personal conference, had failed. But it was adopted without any conference, without any negotiations. It was based upon the assumption, that the local government and legislature, which, under the constitution, are entrusted with sovereign authority, have no standing and no rights which the Federal Government are not bound to respect. Last session Ministers felt that they had blundered. There had been no discussion, and yet Parliament had been informed by the Speech from the Throne, that remedial legislation would be submitted. When that promise was made, no Minister knew whether Manitoba would legislate or not. It was felt by every supporter of the Government who was not too infatuated to exercise his rational faculties, that they had no legal or constitutional right to come here at all unless they were able to show Parliament conclusively, that the government and legislature of Manitoba would do nothing. The hon. gentlemen opposite felt, that that was not the case, and so legislation was postponed. A second opportunity came to them for full and frank discussion. Has any Minister ventured to tell this House what was done with that opportunity ? Where is the evidence of an earnest effort at negotiation and settlement ? Where is the evidence, that Ministers endeavoured to secure through the only instrumentality fully capable of dealing with the entire question, the local authorities in Manitoba, a full and satisfactory settlement of the whole question? The second opportunity was as useless to them as the first. Nothing was done. It came to them, and was thrown away. No argument, no despatches, by which public opinion was to be guided, made their appearance. Public opinion was left to drift. Those who had commercial interests to serve by appealing to prejudice on the one side or the other, were given full swing, and so the feeling was intensified, without any rational information having been imparted.

The official proceedings since the second judgment of the Privy Council have been harsh, arrogant and offensive. They have been calculated to repel the local government and to prevent any frank interchange of opinion. Every consideration of public duty has been subordinated to the one desire to make political capital against the leader of the Opposition in the province of Quebec. Ministers have assumed the air of victors, and they have been expecting the local government to come forward to make submission and to lay down their arms. Have they forgotten that the government of Manitoba had behind it a strong public opinion, which was, possibly, a source of embarrassment and a cause of reticence. If the law had not been in doubt, in the minds of Ministers, there was a duty of disallowance, unless the Act was modified and made to conform to the compact within a year. Why did the Ministers shrink from this course ? Was it because they were in doubt as to the law ? If so, why have they insisted upon a legal knowledge on the part of the local government which they did not themselves possess, and have not ventured to claim ? The excuse, the justification for six years' delay was their ignorance of the law. Their inability to satisfy themselves of the true construction of the statute. If they expect the House and the country to accept this defence, is it not as good for the local government as for them ? No doubt, the ministry and legislature of Manitoba supposed the law was on their side. It is not reasonable to suppose, that they would have legislated in the way they did in 1890 on any other supposition. Why, then, was it not assumed, that, in so far as the law was settled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the local legislation would be modified and adjusted to meet the views there expressed ? Why was not a diplomatic discussion carried on to aid in moulding public opinion, to aid in enlightening the public judgment, in dispelling erroneous views and in allaying public excitement ? The Minister of Justice informed the House, that the provisions of the law required that the proceedings should be judicial in form. I am unable to take that view. I see no reason for it. The inquiry, in its nature, was exactly the same as that of a dispute between two independent states, and those methods of procedure the merits of which are upheld by their universal use, are the methods of procedure that ought, in this case, to have been followed.

Patience in international law means peace, and the principles of diplomacy furnish the rules for the guidance of the two governments in this case. The people of Manitoba ought to have been informed of the legal contentions of this Government. The minority, no less than the majority, owe a duty to the state : and so, without further information, no one here can say, that the exclusive jurisdiction of the province will not be, in respect to education, seriously interfered with by what the Government proposes. There was, Sir, also, a great blunder in fixing a time within which action must be taken. No negotiations have anywhere, in modern times, been carried on upon such conditions. A barbarous state has sometimes been given a few hours to decide between submitting to bombardment and making some reparation for an outrage committed. But it is a novel thing, in a civilized community, that such methods should have been had recourse to for the settlement of a question that more than any other should have followed in the lines of those peaceful and friendly methods which modern states have in so large a degree recourse to. Why has this course not been taken ? Was it because one section of the Ministry refused to trust another section ? Was it because that impatience might generate wrath ? But had not the government of Manitoba its difficulties also ? I say to the Ministry, through you, Sir, that you ought to have remembered, that the government of this country is carried on under popular sanctions, that Ministers in the full possession of their senses do not usually act in defiance of public opinion. On the contrary, they are supposed to rest their conduct upon the support which public opinion gives, and, when a question of public faith is raised, it is indeed a grave matter to adopt such methods as to force the public into sympathy against its observance. This is not likely to happen when there is moderation, and fairness, and patience, and care taken to properly inform the public mind, and in this way to rest your demands upon popular approbation.

The difficulties in the way of the local government are shown by a paragraph in their communication in reply to the remedial order. They say :

> We deem it proper also to call attention to the fact that it is only a few months since the latest decision upon the subject was given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Previous to that time a majority of the legislative assembly of Manitoba had either expressly or impliedly given pledges to their constituents which they feel loyally in honour bound to fulfil.

This, Sir, was most assuredly an admission that the law, as it then stood, was not in conformity with that decision. It was a declaration, that the public policy which the government had pursued and to which a majority of the members stood pledged, had been based on a wholly different interpretation and construction of the law, and that time would be required to enable the government and the legislature to bring the provincial law into harmony with that judgment. Now, you gave no heed to this very plain hint. You insisted on immediate action, when you were informed that immediate action was impossble, or, at all events, precarious. You pressed on as if the government and legislature of Manitoba were as absolute and as unrestrained in their public conduct as the government of St. Petersburg. When two states are dealing with each other, is no heed given, no account taken by the one of the difficulties which the other is experiencing in taking a certain course ? Was not the paragraph which I have just read a plea for consideration and for delay ? Surely, it was. And, if one civilized government had made such a communication to another, the matter would have for the time been allowed to remain in abeyance. This answer was indeed a very different thing from a refusal to give redress. It shows in a most marked way how highly improper it was for the Government to bind itself, that remedial legislation must be given within a certain short period of time. In ordinary diplomacy unless one state is seeking a pretext for conflict with another, a communication such as the one I have read would have been followed by an action. The facts do not show that Manitoba will not legislate. They show that at the time you commanded her she felt that she could not. She invited you to inquire. She asked you to investigate ; to assist her in moulding public opinion, which was as important to Parliament as it was to the local legislature ; but you absolutely declined to do so. You insisted upon an immediate answer of yes or no, and you forced her into a general election to make clear to your comprehension the obstacle in the way of the government and legislature. Had you negotiated, they would have legislated themselves, and the question would never have been dragged into this Parliament at all.

There is, let me say, a very serious question growing out of your unusual proceedings. This is a right secured to the minority. That minority must speak for themselves. They can no more speak by delegation than they can give their votes at an election in the same way. I do not care how influential those may be who speak in their behalf. The law requires that they should speak for themselves. This is eminently a legal proceeding taken by the political department of Government, under a compact, to secure its fulfilment. Thus, neither the Government nor the Parliament is authorized to take the initiative. Where an ordinary discretion is being exercised, it matters not how limited it may be, if it does not relate to some money appropriation, it may be taken up by any member of this House ; but can any one undertake to deal with this question ? Can the Government, without an appeal, without an ascertainment of the facts, without settling in their own minds that there is a grievance, that rights or privileges have been impaired or taken away, consider the matter at all ? Can this House without such proceedings and without such affirmative findings by the Government, and without a refusal by the local legislature, deal with the matter at all ? All these facts show, that this is not a mere limited discretionary power. It is a public trust to be discharged in the last resort legislatively. The words of the statute would, were it a limited discretion, be :

> That the Parliament of Canada may, in case any right or privilege granted by the local legislature of any province to the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in that province be taken away by such legislature, restore the same.

But the Parliament of Canada can do nothing except to deal with the matter submitted to it by the Governor General in Council, and based upon information obtained in conformity with the provisions of the statute.

The right of the minority is a collective right and there is no evidence that could be recognized in any court of justice which shows that there was any authority even for taking the initiative. The judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is based upon the assumption that the facts submitted to it, hypothetically, for the opinion, are true. They did not pass upon the adequacy of the actual facts. They remain to be ascertained. They were not. Up to this hour neither Ministers nor Parliament have in their possession as a basis of action the complaint that the law calls for. The very first step, then, taken, was taken with extreme carelessness. Surely it was in the power of the Ministers to say that if the minority desire to appeal let the trustees call a meeting of the inhabitants in each section. Let them state their desires. Let the determination of the meeting be signed by the chairman and certified by the trustees with the seal of the corporation. It may be, it is quite probable, that the majority of the minority desire the restoration of the right, but surely a mere guess ought not to be the basis of so important a proceeding. There ought to have been unquestionable evidence from the parents and guardians, the parties whom the law recognizes and with whom the law alone deals, before Government and before Parliament. The manner in which the Ministers representing Quebec have dealt with this question has indeed been an extraordinary one. These hon. gentleman have not left the matter to the only parties that the law knows and can know, the minority in the province of Manitoba. They have invited action all over the country as if in the fulfilment of a compact some extraordinary pressure were required. They have asked the hierarchy of Quebec to recognize their meritorious services in that province, beginning with the election of Verchères. Could there have been a more unwise, a more foolish course taken on the part of the Government ? The boast of triumph over the government of the province has been regarded as a gauntlet thrown down, not to Manitoba alone, but to the whole Protestant population of the Dominion. Could there have been a greater act of folly ? Knowing how easy it is to arouse conflict and how difficult when once aroused it is to allay. The Minister of Public Works has taken every step with a view to party influence and his conduct has been guided solely by party considerations. An attempt has been made to overawe and bulldoze the provincial authorities in Manitoba solely with a view to political effect in the province of Quebec. You have ostentatiously invoked the aid of parties who ought not to have been drawn into a public controversy at all. Prudence required this, and the nature of the proceedings and the character of the question called for it. Had there been greater forbearance, had there been earnest effort at settlement, had the Government shown readiness to aid the local government to escape from the unconstitutional though not illegal position in which they were placed, there would have been no discussion on a Remedial Bill here to-day. The claims of the minority would have been fairly met and no section of the Manitoba population would have been found ranged on the side of legislation that impaired privileges which the constitution intended should continue if the minority desired to retain them.

We are here the judges of circumstances. We have the right to determine for ourselves whether this question is fairly before us and whether there are reasons of state why it should for the present remain in abeyance. I entirely concur in the observations addressed to the local legislature by Sir Oliver Mowat. There is no right whatever given here without full, frank and earnest effort made to secure legislation from the only body that can effectively deal with the subject. That effort has not been made. Those moral and constitutional considerations which alone can give us jurisdiction are wholly wanting. We have not the necessary information and when you have worked the public mind up into a state of intense religious excitement, and are fast dividing the country into two hostile camps on other lines than those which secular questions make, you have a condition of things from which at present the evils that are likely to spring are far greater than those which are endured by the minority even if everything called for to give you jurisdiction existed. You have by the Bill bestowed, or attempted to bestow, outside of rights and privileges powers which you cannot give. If your Bill were carried you give to the minority nothing beyond a lawsuit to every supporter of a separate school. You do not secure to any one by your measure exemption from taxation, nor do you, nor can you, secure to any one of the minority the restoration of the school property which formerly was held by them for school purposes. The chief effect of your measure will be that thirty-five school sections composed of Roman Catholics that are now receiving aid from the local treasury and are giving the religious instruction, by forbearance, which was before given in separate schools, will be deprived of the aid which they at present receive! I confess myself that I am unable to legislate upon the information which I now have. There are many facts which are of very great importance, and it does seem to me that where you can ascertain by inquiry under what circumstances a school is possible in that country and under what circumstances they are not, that such information ought to be in the possession of this House even if it were proper to legislate at the present time. That information you do not possess and you have no right to interfere with the exclusive jurisdiction of the state in securing proper secular education in all schools that receive public aid whether they be wholly secular or whether they be separate. The province representing in this regard the state is entitled to the jurisdiction which the law intended to give it for its own security and on its own behalf, as much so at least as the minority are to give that religious instruction which constitutes their rights, privileges and liberties under the compact. Then, as I have already stated, that in many of these sections there is a very considerable population that does not speak the English language. You have declared that the attainments of the teachers in these separate schools shall be the same as the attainments of the teachers in the ordinary public schools. You have submitted to this House no information upon the subject whether teachers conversant with both languages, English and French, and they certainly require to know both, to give English instruction to French children, can be had, possessing in other regards all the qualifications which are demanded by the ordinary teacher which only require to know English. Now, in this respect you are bound to deal with the material which you have and you cannot make the qualifications other than that material will enable you to establish as a standard. What evidence have you submitted to this House, what information have you given to us, that we may know in this respect that you are not calling upon us to take a leap in the dark? It has been argued several times in Parliament that the effect of our legislation will be that once we legislate here we oust the province of its jurisdiction over the subject. The subject is not wholly free from doubt, but I do not think there is anything in the law to warrant this opinion. The section does not transfer the power from the local legislature to this Parliament. There is power given us as a remedial power only and for a specific and very limited purpose. There is no provision in this section, as there is in that which follows, that if this Parliament exercises jurisdiction and legislates that the power to legislate is thereafter vested here. There is not a word in the section to indicate that there was any intention whatever to interfere with the exclusive jurisdiction of the local legislature over the subject except as a matter of remedy, and once the remedy is effected the local legislature stands to the whole subject of legislation just as it stood before. Our law is rather a local than a Dominion statute and the local legislature may modify or amend or repeal it, as much so and in the same way as if such a statute had been enacted by themselves. The only way that the Dominion legislation can be protected against local amendment or change is by the exercise of the power of veto. By the constitution it is vested in the local legislature, under the constitution it there continues. The schools are where the law puts them, not under our jurisdiction, but under that of the provincial authorities and this Parliament cannot extend its authority by any declaration of its own. Its powers are defined under subsections 2 and 3, and when the power there bestowed is once exercised, being a remedial power and for the discharge of a trust, it is exhausted. There must be a new application on the part of the aggrieved parties in order to create jurisdiction again. The power is made provincial by the constitution and it does not cease to be provincial on account of any remedial action on our part. I regret that the matter has been brought here at all. I do so the more because I know, and know right well, that it was altogether unnecessary. We have in this country differences of race, differences of creeds, and there must be both forbearance and mutual toleration if anything like unity is to be maintained in the country at all. What is now proposed to be done will permanently stand in the way of an enduring and satisfactory settlement, and I earnestly implore Ministers not to attempt to employ the power that the constitution gives them for the purpose of gratifying their hostility, political or personal, towards the government or people of a particular province. To do so is indeed to play a very ignoble part. Let them abandon their Bill, let them master the facts, let them enter upon an earnest and honest effort to negotiate. Let them recognize the condition of things in the province, and they will, if patient, be enabled to secure a settlement of the question which will remove it altogether from the sphere of federal politics. Such a course is the one called for in the interests of a permanent union of these provinces. It is the one called for by all those considerations of public policy which can contribute to the establishment of a British nationality and to the material progress of the Dominion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sure the House has listened with very great attention and interest to the elaborate discussion to which we have been treated by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mills). I was deeply impressed by the careful study and investigation which he gave to this question, the result of which he has laid before us to-day. I listened with great interest and great pleasure to that hon. gentleman, as he took up this question, point by point, and dealt with all the legal and constitutional aspects of it. And, Sir, I had the better opportunity of listening to him because he was not interrupted by deafening cheers from the gentlemen who sit behind him. Those gentlemen had the pleasure of listening, as we had on this side, to a statement which, in every point, every question of constitutional law, every result of that elaborate investigation which the hon. gentleman has made into this subject was given, not in favour of his friends on the other side, but in support of the position we have taken. These gentlemen were obliged to listen to a long, an able, and unanswerable argument maintaining every position we have taken and controverting, in the clearest and most unmistakable manner, the arguments that have been addressed in opposition to ours from that side of the House. He dealt with the long and laboured argument of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and he scattered to the winds the reasoning which that hon. gentleman offered this House. He showed how utterly fallacious were the views and opinions presented by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Why, Sir, there is not a single point in controversy between the two sides of this House which the hon. gentleman has not given in the clearest and most unmistakable manner as evidence and as authority on this important question.

He says that this is not a question of separate schools. In opposition to the contention of the hon. member for North Simcoe, and other hon. gentlemen, he maintained the position that I took at the outset, and that is that the question of separate schools is not an issue at all, and that the efforts which have been made to show that this is a question of whether we should have separate schools in this country or not, are aside and beyond the mark altogether—that, in fact, it is a question, not whether separate schools should be introduced or maintained or changed, but whether the law and the constitution, as expounded by the highest authority in the Empire, is to prevail. It is a purely constitutional question, and not a question touching separate schools at all. The law is plain and unmistakable. The question of separate schools was settled in the Confederation Act. The question of separate schools touching Manitoba is settled in the Manitoba Act; and, having been decided by the highest judicial authority in the Empire, the Judicial Committee of the Queen's Privy Council, no gentleman—unless he was prepared to do, as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat said an hon. member on this side was prepared to do, namely, treat with contempt the highest judicial authority in the Empire—could pretend there was a question of separate schools in this matter. But that is not all. The hon. gentleman said that the law, as expounded by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, creates and imposes a duty. to carry out the terms of those Acts. Why, it sweeps away the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite, and shows that by the Confederation Act and the Manitoba Act, the duty is created and imposed upon the Government and Parliament of this Dominion to carry out the terms of those Acts. Why, it sweeps away the contention that hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to raise. The whole contention of the Opposition is swept away at one fell swoop by the hon. gentleman when he declares, and declares rightly, that this is not a question of the autonomy of the provinces at all. He shows that, under the Manitoba Act, in the clearest, most distinct, and most emphatic terms, the power of the province to legislate in reference to the question of education has its limitation. What is the limitation? Every province has exclusive power to legislate on this question of education, subject to the condition that it does not take away any privilege, any benefit enjoyed by any denominational schools that existed at the time of the union, or subsequently. That is the position, Sir; and in that way he has swept away by another fell stroke the entire story of the coercion of Manitoba or the interference in the slightest degree with the autonomy of that province. Sir, I listened as I say, not only with interest but with profound admiration as, step by step, laying down the law and giving the authorities in the most clear and conclusive manner, he cut the ground from under the feet of gentlemen opposite until he left them nothing upon which to stand. And then came the time when the hon. gentleman feeling that he must furnish himself and those who are acting with him with some excuse for the position they have taken on this question, turned around and, abandoning the law, abandoning the constitution, abandoning every principle which he had for three mortal hours held up for the approval of this House —he spoke of the political side of the question. Sir, he elicited cheers from the gentlemen behind him, when they found that he was ready, notwithstanding his law, notwithstanding the unanswerable arguments with which he had sustained the views of the Government, to find excuses for himself and those around him for voting down the law and the constitution for which he had asked our approval. The hon. gentleman shows that we are bound by the law and the constitution to take the course we have taken. He swept away the charge that it is the slightest interference with the province, showing that the province instead of having its autonomy interfered with by us affected its autonomy by its own Act, divested itself of it by striking down the privileges of the minority as they existed in Manitoba and as guaranteed by the constitution, and, as I have stated, in opening this discussion and moving this Bill they placed themselves in a position that compelled the Government and the Parliament of Canada, in vindication of the constitution to discharge the duty which they themselves had imposed upon us, instead of us imposing anything upon them. That, Sir, is the position in which that question has been placed in the clearest and most emphatic light possible by the three hours' speech to which we have all listened with pleasure to-day. I trust a verbatim report of that speech will be sent broadcast throughout Canada. I am sure that it will carry conviction, that it will establish unanswerably the soundness of the course the Government has pursued and which has been forced upon them by the violation of treaty rights by the legislature of Manitoba. That, Sir, is the position, and I am not afraid to have it go side by side with the flimsy political argument with which he endeavoured to furnish some standing ground for himself and his associates to vote down this measure that he himself says it is the duty of the Government to propose and of Parliament to pass in order to redress the grievances of the minority of Manitoba.

Now, Sir, I did not intend to do more than glance at this subject for the reason that I wish every word that the hon. gentleman said down to the time when he was seeking some excuse for his action, to sink deep into the minds and hearts of all who are present to-night.

Mr. LISTER. But you want to leave out that part.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No: the last part will only throw into bolder relief the truth of the former part. The last part is devoted to the political part of this question, and it shows how little reasoning gentlemen opposite require to have furnished them in vindication of their action. Now, the hon. gentleman said that the disallowance of a provincial Act is the strongest form of interference with provincial rights. What does the hon. leader of the Opposition say to that? The hon. gentleman was a member of a government that disallowed two provincial Acts for every one disallowed in an equally long period by the Liberal-Conservative Government. Why, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition is convicted out of the mouth of his supporter of having in the strongest and most emphatic form interfered with provincial rights. I do not say the hon. gentleman did wrong, but I say that if that is the strongest form of interference with provincial rights, then the hon. gentleman will see that when his advice—well, not his advice, because he did not venture to tender it, but his suggestion—that the Government of the country have done wrong in not disallowing the Manitoba School Act of 1890, he has the answer from his own supporter the hon. member from Bothwell that the disallowance of the provincial statute is the strongest and the clearest interference with provincial rights. And while I am upon that subject, I may mention that the hon. leader of the Opposition taunted the Government with having disallowed the Quarantine Act and the Act relating to public companies, while they did not disallow the Manitoba School Act which deprived the Catholic minority of the rights and privileges that they had enjoyed. The answer is plain, and it is, that in the one case there was a clear and unmistakable infringement of the power of the Federal Government by the local legislature, just as there was in cases in which the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member disallowed certain provincial Acts. The Manitoba School Act of 1890 was not disallowed because of the doubt that existed as to the authority of the local legislature to pass such an Act, a doubt which was justified by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Queen's Privy Council in England.

I did not rise for the purpose of replying in any measure to the hon. member for Bothwell. But I felt that I could hardly allow this debate to close without a word from me, that it was hardly respectful to the leader of the Opposition for me to allow the speech with which he moved his vote of want of confidence in the Government of Canada, this six months' hoist of a Bill on which this Government has staked its existence, to pass without a few observations. I may say, that I am a great admirer of eloquence, and no person can listen to the leader of the Opposition without being charmed by those eloquently rounded periods that, whatever may have gone before them, naturally evoked the cheers and enthusiastic support of his followers. But, Sir, I never felt, I never recognized on any former occasion the overwhelming power of eloquence so strongly as I did when I heard the leader of the Opposition deliver that speech; and I will tell you why. Any person who will take the trouble to read that speech from beginning to end will find a mass of contradictions and inconsistencies that, probably, were scarcely ever before crowded into the same space. The hon. gentleman propounded statements to this House which called forth a burst of enthusiastic applause from those who listened to his eloquent words; but a few minutes afterwards we found that hon. gentleman taking back, in fact contradicting, in the most emphatic terms that the English language would permit, the very statements, the very sentiments which just before had been cheered; and the contradiction was cheered in the same enthusiastic manner. Now, Sir, I say, that I recognize the transcendent power the hon. gentleman possesses, and one which I frankly admit I greatly envy; but I trust that, even if I possessed that power, I would never use it for purposes for which the hon. gentleman used it, in order to conceal from those around him the inconsistencies through which he was floundering on that occasion. Sir, I will undertake to show the House, that scarcely a single sentence was propounded by the hon. gentleman, that, before he sat down, he did not take back, that he did not contradict, that he did not answer, and answer more ably, probably, than any hon. gentleman in this House could have done. But I admit, Sir, that on that occasion he had an excuse that hon. gentlemen seldom have on such occasions. No person can read that speech—a speech, I venture to say, that the hon. gentleman himself will read with a deeper regret than any gentleman ever felt in reading a speech which he had delivered in the Parliament of his country—I say, no gentleman can read that speech without being able to discover, between the lines, the unfortunate position in which he was placed on that occasion. Why, Sir, he had made a speech in support of the policy which he had propounded and supported all over the country, from one end to the other; the hon. gentleman had made a speech in favour of a commission of inquiry, for the purpose of ascertaining whether those wrongs had been inflicted upon the Manitoba Roman Catholic minority, which they claimed they had suffered. Sir, I believe if the hon. gentleman had had twenty-four hours in which to reflect, he would never have committed himself to such a mass of contradictory statements as those: but, within a few hours, a change of base occurred, the hon. gentleman's hand was forced by gentlemen around him, and he was compelled to adopt a new and desperate policy. With what object ? Why, Sir, with the object of obtaining the alliance of the hon. member for North Simcoe, and bringing to his aid and to his support in this vote gentlemen whom he had denounced, with his eloquent tongue, as men who were unworthy of the confidence of any honest and intelligent citizens of the country. Sir, the hon. gentleman had forgotten, when he was trying to draw to his support the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and his small band of three adherents in this House, the eloquent terms in which he had denounced that gentleman for having sown seeds of discord, for having used his powers—and his legal powers are very considerable—in order to strike down and trample under foot the men of his own race and his own religion. Sir, are any terms of obloquy stronger than those that the hon. member for North Simcoe has showered upon the head of the leader of the Opposition and his compatriots of the same race and religion ? The hon. gentleman knows the peace, the happiness and the contentment which had heretofore prevailed among the people of this country, and the brilliant position which Canada has attained under those conditions ; but he lost sight of the fact, that we had continued a happy and united family from the date of confederation, until, in an evil hour, the hon. member for North Simcoe appeared upon the scene as an agitator. I will not undertake to trace his reasons, I will not undertake to discover what animated the hon. gentleman, whether it was a wild ambition to obtain a position that he had never been able to attain, whether it was wounded feelings, or whether it was because he found that his great talents had not been appreciated by his own party : I will not undertake to fathom the cause that led him to take the course he did ; but I say, that, for whatever reason, in an evil hour for himself and for his country, he used all the powers that he possessed to stir up an agitation on a question that had been buried for twenty years, or from the date of confederation down to a very recent period ; to stir up the fires of discord, to array race against race, and religion against religion, in this country. And, Sir, I may say, that when I witnessed, from across the sea, the futile efforts of that hon. gentleman, and the small results that he was able to accomplish, I felt proud of my country ; I was proud that Protestants and Catholics alike frowned down this desperate, this unworthy attempt to light up the fires of discord in our happy and united country, and to set race against race and religion against religion. But, Sir, I was astonished, I did not believe it possible, that I should ever live to see the time when the leader of the Opposition, forgetting what was due to his race, forgetting what was due to his religion, and, what was more important, forgetting even what was due to our common country, he framed a policy that would draw himself and the member for Simcoe into a close alliance. Sir, it reminds one of the old adage, that misfortunes sometimes makes us acquainted with strange bedfellows. I can understand, that, after eighteen years of incessant and useless struggle to attain power, at last the desire to obtain a majority at his back became so great as to make him forget, that which few men are able to forget, and that is the language and the efforts of the hon. member for Simcoe, in times past, to trample under foot, so far as he was able, the race and the religion to which the hon. leader of the Opposition belongs. I say, Sir, that, in my judgment, when the hon. gentleman was induced, for such a purpose, to change his base for the little support that in that way he might obtain, he took a step which I do not hesitate to say, down to the last hour of his life, he will regret having taken, a step which inflicts a stain on his character that it had never sustained before. There is one statement in the hon. gentleman's speech which he did not take back, there is one statement he allowed to stand, and one statement he did not contradict, I believe the only one, and I propose to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I deal with that statement on the present occasion.

The hon. gentleman came out in the character of an historian. When I was pointing out in my feeble way to hon. gentlemen opposite the condition which Canada occupied before confederation, when I was pointing out the condition to which race and religious antagonism had lowered and sunk Canada, and to the fact that the confederation of the British North American provinces under one Government and into one united country had resulted in wiping out all that trouble and enabled the people of this country, freed from that discord, that antagonism of race and religion which had all but ruined and destroyed Canada, and had brought it into a frightful condition, its trade ruined, its commerce broken down, its revenue destroyed, its credit gone, in fact, brought to a position of a most desperate character—when even the men who had been engaged in that unholy work felt the time had come when they were compelled to take a new and different course, and by the confederation of the British North American provinces free Canada from those desperate evils that had brought it into such a deplorable position. The hon. gentleman said there was a passage in the history of confederation that I had forgotten and he undertook to supply it. But I tell the hon. gentleman that if a historian wishes to obtain consideration from his country or from anybody, there are two qualifications that are absolutely essential. One is knowledge, and the other is an honest desire to do justice to all. I think I will show to the hon. gentleman—I do not say he was intentionally dishonest—that if he ever did a public man an injustice in his life, if ever an unjust statement was made with respect to a public man, the statement the hon. gentleman made in painting this black page of the history of confederation, was that statement. What did he say? It was something much worse than "subterfuge." The hon. gentleman used this language with reference to myself:

> But the hon. gentleman knows that the bitterness of the initiation of confederation, the feeling against the coercion then practised, has never been removed, and never will entirely disappear until it is buried in the grave of the last man of that generation, whose manhood was outraged by the arbitrary proceeding which trampled under foot the dignity and manhood of a proud people.

The hon. gentleman handed that down to history. The hon. gentleman himself will admit that with such a charge as that against me, it is not wrong that I should take up the time of the House for a few moments in vindicating myself as best I can against this charge, which I am certain the hon. gentleman will himself abandon when I have placed the facts before him. That hon. gentleman was no participator in the events of that day. He is of a later period, and that is perhaps the ground for his having been misled by improper information. But, Sir, I will give him the facts. In 1860, when I had the honour to lead the Opposition in the legislature in Nova Scotia, I was invited to deliver an opening lecture at the Mechanics' Institute in St. John, N.B. I chose for my subject on that occasion, "The Political Condition of British North America." I pointed out to the best of my ability the great difficulties under which in the then condition of British North America we laboured, and I suggested and propounded as the remedy for those evils a confederation of the British North American provinces, such as exists to-day. But what more. Hon. Joseph Howe was the leader of the Nova Scotia government at that time, and, in 1861, a year afterwards, he moved in that capacity a resolution in favour of federal union, or otherwise, of British North America. His motion was as follows—I only read the main clause:—

> And whereas, while many advantages may be secured by such a union, either of all these provinces, or any portion of them, many and serious obstacles are presented, which can only be overcome by mutual consultation of the leading men of the colonies and by free communication with the Imperial Government.

When I tell the hon. gentleman that I seconded that resolution, and it was passed unanimously by the legislature of Nova Scotia in 1861, I think he will absolve me from the charge of having pressed a union of the British North American provinces, and brought Nova Scotia into it on terms that would warrant my actions being characterized as the hon. gentleman has characterized them. But what was the action taken? I moved in the legislature of Nova Scotia on 10th April, 1861, my resolution. The general elections took place two years afterwards. Mr. Howe and myself were committed, in the face of the legislature and the country to a policy of the union of the British North American provinces, which proposition received the unanimous assent of the legislature. The elections took place two years afterwards, with the result that I was brought into power at the head of the largest majority that any leader of the Nova Scotia government had had at its back in the history of the country. I was elected, and an overwhelming majority of the members were elected to support me, in the face of my public declaration made in 1860 in favour of a union of the provinces of British North America, and in the face of the fact that I seconded the motion moved by Mr. Howe in 1861 in favour of the like policy. I think the hon. leader of the Opposition could hardly have been aware of those facts when he used the strong expression he did use. That resolution, which I moved in 1866, authorizing the government to send a delegation to the conference at the Westminster Palace Hotel in London for the purpose of arranging the confederation with the other provinces of Canada and New Brunswick, was carried by a majority of no less than 31 to 19 in the House, and in the legislative council it was carried by 13 to 5.

Now, Sir, who has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) denounced? Not me alone, for his denunciation must apply to all the men of high position in Nova Scotia, who aided and abetted me in what I did. Gentlemen holding high and influential position in the province of Nova Scotia were alike deserving of the strong language used by the leader of the Opposition. I recall to his attention once more the words he used:

> Whose manhood was outraged by the arbitrary proceeding which trampled under foot the dignity and manhood of a proud people.

Whom has he branded as being guilty of that outrage? Sir, he has branded the then Roman Catholic Archbishop of Halifax, the venerable and universally-respected Archbishop Connolly.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen opposite may find it convenient to endeavour to stifle this statement, by which I am convicting the leader of the Opposition of having committed an outrage, and not myself, as he alleges.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. These hon. gentlemen opposite may find it convenient by unseemly laughter, to endeavour to stifle these statements of mine, but, Sir, I tell them they will laugh upon the other side of their mouths before I get through. I hold in my hand a letter addressed to me by Archbishop Connolly, when that battle was over, and when I alone stood returned as the representative from Nova Scotia, in favour of the union. The venerable Archbishop says:

> St. Mary's, Halifax,
> 2nd Sept., 1867.
> Dear Doctor:
> I hope it is not too soon to congratulate you from the bottom of my heart for the glorious triumph of yourself and the Government, as in every battle we have to mourn over the unnecessary casualties unavoidable on so extensive a battlefield. Yet, on the whole, I think the dead and wounded are not so numerous as you and I had reason to apprehend. Mr. McKeagney deserves well of our side. I call it "ours" for will it or will it not, I am for weal or for woe indissolubly bound up with you.
> Hon. Dr. Tupper.

The Mr. McKeagney referred to in that letter, was one of the Irish Catholics in the legislature of Nova Scotia, a gentleman who had supported me strongly in carrying this measure of confederation. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the men whom the leader of the Opposition brands as having committed an outrage on an independent people, include among their number, no less a person than a prelate who was universally respected in the province of Nova Scotia, and who was one of my strongest and most fervent supporters in the policy I then advocated. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) is not only branding the Archbishop, but he is branding every Roman Catholic member in the province of Nova Scotia. Irish, French and Scotch, the name of every Roman Catholic member in that province at the time, will be found recorded on the Journals of the legislature of Nova Scotia, as being guilty, in common with myself, of what the leader of the Opposition says was an outrage upon the manhood of a proud people. Sir, I can give the hon. gentleman their names. John Tobin, Mr. Robichau, the French member for Digby, the Hon. John McKinnon, a brother of Bishop McKinnon, Samuel McDonnell, the Hon. William Miller, at present a Senator, the Hon. Peter Smith, and the Hon. Sir Edward Kenny, who all alike supported me in this effort to bring about that confederation of British North America which every man of every stripe of politics in this country admits saved Canada, rescued her from the humiliating position she occupied up to the time of confederation, and raised this country to that high position, of which every Canadian feels proud. Now, Sir, I have something more to say. Did I violate any constitutional principle in carrying confederation in a legislature elected, with the whole province aware of my views, and the views of the legislature of Nova Scotia, shown by the vote of 1861, previous to the election? Sir, I have to tell the leader of the Opposition that he has not only branded the Archbishop of Nova Scotia, that he has not only branded every man of his own faith who was in the legislature of Nova Scotia, either in the Upper or Lower House, then, but he has branded the leaders of his own party in the province of Canada. He has branded George Brown, Sir Oliver Mowat, the Hon. William Macdougall, the Hon. William Howland; he has branded all these leaders of the Liberals, who were parties to the conference that met in Quebec in 1864, and at which were laid the foundations of this great confederation. And, what did they do at that conference? Why, Sir, in putting this question to the legislature of Nova Scotia I was carrying out the pledge which this conference had exacted from me in relation to this matter. I will give you the evidence of the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald to prove that. This question came up in the Canadian House, and Sir John A. Macdonald was asked, whether it was the intention to refer this question to the people—the same question with reference to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) makes this bold, and as he now sees, unfounded statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, Sir, if it is not an unfounded statement, if he says that he knew the legislature and the people of Nova Scotia were improperly advised on this question, then I say, Sir, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) is guilty to a degree that I should not have thought of holding him responsible for. Sir John Macdonald was asked:

> Do you intend to refer this to the people before you carry confederation out?

And Sir John Macdonald's reply was:

> No. It would be obviously absurd to submit the complicated details of such a measure to the people. It is not proposed to seek their sanction before asking the Imperial Government to introduce a Bill in the British Parliament.

Then, Sir John Macdonald says, in a letter to Sir Leonard Tilley, which will be found in Pope's Life of Sir John Macdonald. The letter is dated October 8th, 1866, and I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) to mark this well. Sir John Macdonald, in that letter, says:

> It was agreed at Quebec that the resolutions then agreed to should be submitted by the several governments to their respective legislatures at the next session, and, if possible, carried en bloc and without alteration, lest any change should create the necessity for a new conference.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) sees that in putting this question to the existing legislature of Nova Scotia, and in carrying it there without an appeal to the people, I was carrying out a pledge exacted from me by Brown, and Howlan and Sir Oliver Mowat, who were parties to that conference.

Then, Sir, I have another authority to give to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier). He occasionally tells the country that he is a Liberal of the Liberals, and that he is a Liberal of the English school. Well, Sir, where will he find in the records of the great Empire to which we belong; where will he find in the records of the British Parliament, which we take as our great exemplar in all these questions; where will he find there any authority for the accusation he has made against me.

What did Mr. Cardwell, afterwards Lord Cardwell, Secretary of State for the Colonies, say? You must refer this question to the people before the Imperial Parliament can carry it? Not at all. In his despatch to Lord Monck, the Governor General of Canada, dated 3rd of December, 1861, he says:

> It appears to Her Majesty's Government, therefore, that you should now take immediate measures, in concert with the Lieutenant-Governors of the several provinces, for submitting——

To the people? Not at all.

> —for submitting to the respective legislatures this project of the conference; and if, as I hope, you are able to report that these legislatures sanction and adopt the scheme, Her Majesty's Government will render you all the assistance in their power for carrying it into effect.

Now, what has the hon. gentleman to say? I was not only bound by my pledge to the leaders of the great Liberal party of Canada—I was not only bound by the solemn resolve of that council, of which all those men were members, to submit the project to the existing legislature—but I had the mandate of a Liberal Colonial Minister, one of the most eminent statesmen who have ever filled that high office, Lord Cardwell, who is long now deceased; and I say, in honour of his memory, that Canada will never know to the extent to which, probably, I know, the deep debt of gratitude she owes to that eminent Liberal Colonial Minister for the wise, judicious and steady support he gave to this great project of the confederation of Canada. I give that to the hon. gentleman as the ground for the course I pursued.

Now, Sir, I propose to carry the war into Africa. I have shown that I am not open to the charge. I have given the most unmistakable evidence that a man can have, of the constitutionality of the position I took. But I will show the hon. gentleman what took place in the Parliament of Canada; and he will find that if my character is to be blackened by his black-wash for what took place on that occasion, he is at the same time besmirching the characters of many of the most prominent leaders of the Liberal party in the old Parliament of Canada. When it was proposed to carry out the confederation in the House without an appeal to the people, as suggested by Sir John Macdonald, on the ground that it would be obviously absurd to throw down before the people at a general election, a measure with such details, Hilliard Cameron moved, as will be found in the confederation debates, page 962:

> * * * Will be pleased to direct that a constitutional appeal shall be made to the people before these resolutions are submitted for final action thereon to the consideration of the Imperial Parliament.

Yet the hon. gentleman takes the position that I outraged the manhood of a proud people because I did not throw down that measure before the people, although it had been placed before the country in the most thoroughly constitutional manner before it was taken up. What was said by George Brown, the great light of the Liberal party of that day? He was a great man, probably the most notable and brilliant man in the Liberal party in Canada has ever known; and his indefatigable industry was as great as his ability. But let me say to the hon. gentleman opposite that he made one mistake, the most fatal mistake that any man in any country can make, of devoting his great powers and his great talents to exciting that antagonism of race and religion that brought Canada down into the very dust; and although he lived to repent it, and to retrieve it to some extent, by uniting with his opponents in endeavouring to carry confederation, his memory, which otherwise would have been a great memory, will be marred by that fact: and I say it to hon. gentlemen opposite, on his tombstone may be read the fate of all men in this free, enlightened and intelligent Canada of ours, who attempt to advance party or personal interests by the same means. Well, Sir, what did George Brown say in reference to Hilliard Cameron?

> He protests that on the fate of this measure some of the most vital interests of the province depend, and yet he will not have it until months of valuable time have been lost, until the country has been forced to pass through all the turmoil and confusion and uncertainty of a general election, and until a new Parliament has been summoned and given its sanction to the measure. What would be the verdict of the people may be judged from what has been the vote of their representatives here who are responsible to them?

Now, who does the hon. gentleman suppose voted down this unconstitutional proposal—this proposal to violate the compact made at Quebec, that it should be referred to the existing legislatures? Whose character does he suppose he is blackening when he attempts to blacken mine on the like grounds? Sir, he will be somewhat surprised to find one a little nearer to him than he supposed when he accused me of having outraged the manhood of a proud people in a free province. He will find the names of Brown, Macdougall, Mackenzie, Howland, and Cartwright. I want to know what he has to say of the action of a former colleague in the Government of this country who voted to prevent this constitutional measure from being carried out?

Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman—and I thank him for it—passed a handsome eulogium upon the characters of some of Nova Scotia's great men. But why did he omit the name of one of the greatest leaders that the Liberal party and the Liberal government ever had in the province of Nova Scotia—the Hon. Sir William Young, the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia? Why was his name omitted from the list?

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think it was omitted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not find it in the hon. gentleman's speech. I would suggest that he should still have it put into the revised edition. The only ground on which I can suppose that his name was omitted was that he was an ardent supporter of this confederation, and supported me in carrying it, though he was one of the ablest and most distinguished Liberals in that province. But the hon. gentleman singles out one man as the noblest Roman of them all, that is, Howe. Well, Sir, I am not disposed to dispute that. I say that the Hon. Joseph Howe, in my judgment, was the most eloquent as well as the ablest man that Nova Scotia has ever known, and I agree with the hon. gentleman in saying that his memory will live in the hearts of the people. But great as that hon. gentleman was, he made serious mistakes in his life. He made two of the gravest mistakes that probably any public man in Canada has ever committed, and I will tell the hon. gentleman what they were. In 1857 he adopted the policy which seems to have a wonderful attraction for the hon. leader of the Opposition,—the policy of going in for the majority. There was a great body of Roman Catholics, Irish, French and Scotch, in the province of Nova Scotia, but there was a still greater body of Protestants; and the Hon. Joseph Howe made the fatal mistake of his life when he adopted the policy of assailing the race and religion of the Roman Catholics of that province. And the hon. gentleman probably knows who stood in the breach on that occasion. He probably knows that I——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can quite understand why these gentlemen do not wish to have the truth put before them. If anything could bring a blush to the face of a man in the party, it is the statement I will make here to-night, repelling the slanders with which I have been assailed and the language which the hon. gentleman ventured to use with respect to this measure. I am in a position to tell him that although a young man, I took my life in my hands on that occasion. I then represented the county of Cumberland, which I have had the honour of representing for over thirty years, the county in which I was born and bred, and one of the most Protestant counties to be found in Nova Scotia. Almost immediately on my entering the legislature of Nova Scotia, I was entrusted with the important duty of reconstructing and leading the Conservative party. Well, what did I do at that time? I unfurled my banner to the breeze, and on that banner was emblazoned equal rights and equal justice to all, without respect to race or creed. Sir, under that banner I stand to-day; under that banner I have stood from that day nearly forty years ago down to the present hour. From that principle I have never swerved—that cardinal principle which is the very life blood and the very existence of any great country or any great people. I say that the man, I care not who he is, who adopts a different policy, who believes that it is a worthy effort to obtain power by trampling down that principle, who believes that the country can be made great and prosperous by setting race against race, and creed against creed, deludes himself with a belief that will lead him to irretrievable ruin. The Hon. George Brown took that course, and the time came when even he, with all his ability, standing at the head of a great party, was obliged to confess that he had become a governmental impossibility. I commend that to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I say that although the Protestants may outnumber the Catholics, the man who is willing, for any purpose, to engage in an unholy effort to advance his own interests or the interests of his party, forgetting that in a great country men must stand in the eyes of the law on equal terms, regardless of race or creed, is sure to lose his influence in the end. Well, Sir, I fought the battle, and in 1859 we were defeated by a small majority. I think it was two. The country was excited on this question of anti-Catholicism, and we lost our majority; but we stood to our guns, we maintained our principles. And if the hon. gentleman doubts what the principles of the Liberal party were I will give him the proof. I hold in my hand an editorial which appeared in the "Morning Chronicle," of Halifax, then and now the organ of the Liberal party of Nova Scotia, and I will let the hon. gentleman see what the owner and proprietor and editor of that paper said, and then he will see in what position were the men of his faith in the province of Nova Scotia at that time.

Mr. CASEY. Take it as read.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman would like to take it as read; but I intend to meet the hon. gentleman's—I was going to say unmanly attack—but I will say mistaken attack for I believe the hon. gentleman's statements were made in profoundest ignorance. But the time has come, when, assailed and branded in that manner all over the country by the words of the hon. gentleman. I should make my public vindication and let it go side by side with his attack. In the "Morning Chronicle," after the election of 1859, when we were defeated by an anti-Catholic party by a small majority, in a speech after the election of 1859, which the "Morning Chronicle" published, Mr. Amand who was the proprietor of that paper, declared the policy of his party—the Liberal party of Nova Scotia. Let me invite your attention to the policy of that party; and while doing so, let me also invite your attention to the policy which the hon. member for North Simcoe has put forth as that for which he is fighting to-day. Let me draw your attention to what Mr. Amand, the owner and proprietor of the "Morning Chronicle," said:

> Desirous of maintaining the purity of those constitutional privileges so well understood in this country, it is clear that a Roman Catholic cannot be allowed to hold a seat in the Government. Suppose such an event to happen, who would be sitting in the councils of the country? Would it be John Tobin or Peter Smythe? No; it would be some Popish priest or prelate; and herein would be the danger of admitting to our confidence an insidious and determined foe. The men themselves would not be feared; it would rather be the priestly influence that surrounds them.

That was the policy of the party that opposed confederation and the party that I encountered on that occasion? Let me tell you what was the result of that policy, and I point this out to the hon. gentleman and to other hon. gentlemen in this House, who may think that fundamental principles may be trifled with, under the pressure of temporary excitement in their constituencies. I point them to this important fact, that although struck down by a bare majority, we did not fall until we had planted firmly on the ramparts of our country the flag of equal rights and justice to all. In 1863, three short years later, we were again brought into power by the most overwhelming majority ever known in Nova Scotia. Sir, the Hon. Joseph Howe and the members of his administration were driven out of public life, almost every one of them.

Mr. BORDEN. How about 1867?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will come to that in a moment, if you will indulge me, and I think you will find that you have not much to congratulate yourselves upon in the condition of affairs in 1867. Well, Sir, I have stated that the sober second thought of the country sustained us and that we came back, as the great Liberal-Conservative party in this House will come back, triumphant. Standing upon the same principles, the same noble and undying principles, the only principles that can ever be upheld in any country if it is to attain to anything except the contempt of surrounding countries, the principles of equal rights and justice to all. Now, Sir, Mr. Howe made another mistake. In an evil hour he was induced to turn—and I am afraid the hon. leader of the Opposition has, to a certain extent, adopted his policy—he was induced to turn from the principle which he had propounded and which he had nobly advocated up to that time, and to oppose the confederation of British North America. Well, Sir, he succeeded, and, in 1867, as the hon. member for King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden) has reminded me, Mr. Howe found himself at the head of a powerful party and sustained by eighteen out of nineteen members from the province of Nova Scotia. That was not very encouraging, was it? But, Sir, the union party of Nova Scotia was not dismayed. They believed that in the principles of British North America union, they were committed to sound views that would commend themselves to the judgment of the people. Mr. Howe was trimphant, and with what result? Why, with this result, that he came up to this House—and I call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to it, unpleasant as it may be to them to listen to it, and I ask the hon. leader of the Opposition to explain the very remarkable circumstance—when he came up to this House, the enemy of confederation, fresh from the battle-field in Nova Scotia, where he has been denouncing Canada and the Canadians with all the eloquence he possessed, he was received with open arms by gentlemen opposite. But Hon. Joseph Howe, though misled for a time, was a patriot at heart. He was a man who had done more to obtain responsible government for Nova Scotia, and so, indirectly for Canada, than any other man who ever lived, and his memory, had he done nothing else for this country, would live in the affections of his countrymen. The Hon. Joseph Howe laid down his arms when he felt that to contend longer against this united confederation of British North America would be the ruin of his own province, and an injury to the entire country—he laid down his arms and adopted our policy. He said: I am unable to change this; I will enter the Government of Canada and will give all the powers that remain to work out this great project of British North America confederation. What happened then? Why, the Liberal party, these men who were ready then as they are now to take to their bosom and cherish in every possible way every man who endeavoured to defeat and prevent this great confederation, not only turned their backs upon the noble patriot who they say now is to live for ever in the hearts of the people, but down in Nova Scotia their party hounded him to an untimely grave. When he went for his election in the county of Hants as Secretary of State, what happened? Why, they flooded the country with the men who called themselves Liberals, but who were unworthy the name, and when, broken down in the struggle, his exhausted powers failed him and he fell upon the platform, they stood over his prostrate body for hours until his life had nearly fled and his constitution was broken.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh. oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. members laugh at that. I have no doubt that if a similar occurrence were to happen somebody else who is not a thousand miles away. the hon. gentleman would laugh again. When a man laughs at such a tragic circumstance, I pity him for the heart he has in his bosom and the brain. if he has any. in his head. I have the evidence in my hand that this confederation was a matter of life or death to Canada. I will give them the evidence of the Hon. William Macdougall. one of the fathers of confederation. the right hand man of the Hon. George Brown. and one whom he took into the Government with him when he formed the coalition government, a man then in the prime of life, and one of the most able advocates of confederation that ever stood on a platform in Canada.

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to a point of order. Mr. Speaker. I submit that the hon. gentleman has no right——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. order.

Mr. MARTIN. I will wait until you get ready to permit me to speak. I submit that the hon. gentleman has no right to go into all the circumstances of confederation. simply because a statement was made as to what he did in Nova Scotia. If he desires to answer that, he has a right to do so. but I submit that these general references to confederation are entirely apart from the question before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I am laying the basis of an appeal that I previously made to the House upon this question, which appeal I intend to reiterate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the remarks of the hon. member are relevant to the question. The history of the question from confederation has been discussed throughout the whole of this debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What did Hon. William Macdougall say ? In a letter to Sir John Macdonald. dated 1865, which will be found in the "Life of Sir John." he said :

> My firm conviction is that if we don't carry confederation——

And I invite the attention of hon. members except the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) to this.

> —it will not be seen by this generation.

That is the point which I wish hon. gentlemen opposite to understand. You have the evidence here that but for the course taken in Nova Scotia, which is denounced, we should be without confederation down to the present hour. and Canada would still be wallowing in the mire of discontent created by the antagonism of race and creed that had existed within its borders. I will only read that single sentence, but I will give you additional authority and that is the Hon. George Brown, who said :

> We cannot go on as we are——

That is, old Canada.

> —it is quite impossible that the state of things which has existed in Canada can continue, there must be a change, and I conceive that what is proposed by this measure is a most desirable change.

That was confederation.

> We have but one of two alternatives, the dissolution of the union or the adoption of the federal principle, and for my part I consider that the dissolution of the union is the last thing to be adopted. and that the federal system is the best remedy that can be applied under our particular circumstances.

Well, the union was carried. and we have the evidence of two of the great leaders of the Liberal party. that the union was necessary, and that there was not an hour to be lost ; that. if it was not obtained at that time and under the circumstances that then existed. it would be a fatal thing. and the greatest misfortune that could happen to Canada. Now. Sir. I appeal to this House. I appeal to every fair-minded man in this country : Is it to be a ground of attack, is it to be a ground of obloquy. against a man. that he played a conspicuous part in accomplishing this great confederation of British North America. at a time when these leaders of the Liberal party in Canada. and every other intelligent man. declared. that it was vital to save Canada from the condition in which she had sunk ? I want those hon. gentlemen to explain to me. why it is. that, from that hour down to the present. they pursue with unqualified and unmitigated hostility the man to whom they owe this confederation—because it could not have been accomplished but for the course which I pursued on that occasion ; and why they embrace with cordiality and warmth every man who fought against it. the very men who went through the province of Nova Scotia, as the hon. member for King's knows, vilifying and traducing Canada and Canadians of every race and of every creed ? Now. the hon. gentleman joins issue with me on the comparative merits of the constitution of the United States and Canada. I understood the hon. gentleman to take exception to the statement I made, that it was a matter of the utmost importance to Canada. that. while we had not copied the American system, by which the sovereign states yielded up a portion of their power to the central government, we. on the other hand. had given to the local governments definite written powers, which they could not exceed, while everything else belonged to the central government. But I said there was another advantage, and that was, that, while they had a Supreme Court of high standing and great character, they had not the advantage Canada possessed of having the highest, the most impartial, the grandest tribunal that is to be found in the civilized world, to whom every issue between province and province, or between province and central government, could be carried, and where they could expect a verdict which would inspire the utmost confidence. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman asks us to look at the difficulties we have had, see the hot water we have been in; and he enumerates a number of those questions. It is true, we have had all these difficulties, we have had all these struggles between province and central government. It was impossible, in the nature of things, that we could have a confederation arranged by an Act of the Imperial Parliament that would guarantee us against all difficulties and differences between local governments and the central power. But what has happened? Why, Sir, they have all been disposed of. How? By reference to a tribunal respected alike by the provinces and by the central government. Sometimes the verdict, as the hon. gentleman knows, has been in favour of the central government, but more frequently, it has been in favour of the provinces; but, whether for the one or the other, that verdict, given by this grand tribunal, has been accepted, and the questions have absolutely been buried in oblivion. I have under my hand the opinion of Mr. Brown on that point, but it is not necessary that I should read it. It was mentioned by the hon. member for Pictou, that Sir Alexander Galt declared in Edinburgh, in 1883, that the condition of Canada before confederation was practically the condition of the United Kingdom and Ireland. Could a more frightful picture than that be drawn of the condition of Canada? Sir, he accompanied that statement by a still more important statement, that, under this confederation of British North America, all that had been changed, and we now enjoyed peace and harmony where there were disunion and ill-feeling before, and we had a united country, progressing as fast and on a basis as solid as any country in the world, and with a condition of national life of which every Canadian might justly be proud. Now, Sir, I said in my opening address, and I repeat it to-night, that in this country, where we have two great nationalities, where we have a great body of Protestants, and where we have a great body of French Catholics, it is absolutely necessary that these two great races should harmonize, should blend, and should co-operate, as they did co-operate down to the unfortunate hour when the member for North Simcoe lighted the torch of discord and carried it flaming through the country to set race against race and religion against religion. Sir, what does so great a man as Lord Beaconsfield say on this point? Why, he says, and I agree with him:

> The resources of Canada are great and various. It has had the advantages of having been colonized, during a number of centuries, by two of the most distinguished nations of Europe. Canada is, in fact, a reflex of those two powerful races, differing in their manners and even in their religious opinions; and has many of those diverse elements, which tend to change a mere colonial into a national character.

These are the distinguished sentiments of Lord Beaconsfield, an acute observer of men and manners, and of the growth of nations. I believe he was right, when he said, that this Canada of ours has no reason to regret that it is composed of two great races, even though they differ on the important question of religion. Sir, the hon. member for North Simcoe has not only referred in terms of the bitterest obloquy and contempt to the French race in this country, but he has endeavoured to inflame the public mind; I believe he has even gone so far as to say that their existence in Canada was a curse. Now, Sir, let me call his attention to this fact. The burthen of his onslaught throughout Canada has been opposition to the French language and the Roman Catholic religion. Am I right in making that statement? The leader of the Opposition knows that I am right, and yet what is the fact? Why, Sir, the fact is that Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, a distinguished French Canadian, stated, at a public banquet in the city of London, that the last gun that would be fired in British North America in defence of British interests, would be fired by a French Canadian. Sir, I believe it. I believe, that, instead of that race and religion being inimical to the best interests and to the progress of Canada, the very reverse is true. Why, Sir, what is it that causes that feeling, what is it that induces every French Canadian to be ready to sacrifice even life itself in defence of British institutions, for that is the position? Sir, it is the Quebec Act, that guarantee of the Imperial Parliament for the preservation of their laws, their language and their religion, that guarantee which has rendered Canada secure, which has brought all races and parties into a position in which they can stand shoulder to shoulded in defence of British institutions and of their common country. That loyalty rests upon the British Act which gave, on the first acquisition of this country from the French, that solemn guarantee, and the man who would strike it down or take it away, I hold to be the bitterest foe Canada holds within its borders. It is with pride and satisfaction I have found that instead of being able to rally the people of this country to his standard, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) occupies a position of the most complete impotence, and furnishes an illustration of impotency in his efforts to arouse that antagonism of race and religion which is so destructive to the best interests of the country.

Under these circumstances, I think I have a right to complain when the leader of Her Majesty's Opposition, the leader of the great Liberal party, in his search for power and in his vain efforts to strike down this Government and break down the Liberal-Conservative party, was ready to embrace within his fold and act with him, an hon. gentleman whose only reputation outside of the courts of law, is as the leader of a party that is organized to incite race against race and religion against religion in this country. The fact of his impotent effort being conspicuous to the whole world is one of the best evidences that Canada is determined she will not part with that magnificent heritage she enjoys under the Act of confederation, the great prosperity that has extended our bounds from sea to sea and enabled us to present ourselves as the owners of half a continent, not less valuable and important than the other half of the continent occupied by the American Republic to the south of us, this country which we intend to develop; and every Canadian knows that we have only to pursue the path of united harmony and co-operation, it matters little whether it is under a Liberal Administration or under a Liberal-Conservative Administration, if there is the union of hearts and sentiment which has characterized the people up to the present hour.

I intended to go through the speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition seriatim, and to contrast sentence by sentence the various statements it contained. I wanted to point out that in one breath the hon. gentleman denounced this Bill before the House as a wrench of the constitution, as an outrageous violation of the constitution, and in another sentence said that under the law as it existed there was a perfect right on the part of the minority to claim the restitution of their schools. But I will briefly summarize these statements in the following manner. He starts off (p. 2819) by saying that the Bill involves "a most violent wrench of the constitution which has been outrageously misinterpreted by the Government in this matter." Yet, a little farther on (p. 2824) he admits that, in regard to this very subject of education, Parliament has full power to interfere and substitute laws for those of the provincial legislature in relation to education; and again, he seeks to explain how it comes that these "extraordinary powers" were "imported into our constitution." Again, after implicitly denying and explicitly affirming the absolute constitutionality of the Government's course, he proceeds to question the propriety of their ever exercising their paramount authority in a vague sentence which may mean anything at all. Then he goes on to say (p. 2825), "experience has taught us that this remedy of interference with local legislation has never been applied, and probably never can be applied, without friction, disturbance and discontent, that you cannot apply that remedy without causing as much dissatisfaction as satisfaction.

Well, Sir, I admit that his appeal to experience is natural. Disallowance of provincial legislation is surely "interference" in its most extreme form. What says the record on this head? During the five years the Liberal Government, of which Mr. Laurier was a member, was in power, they disallowed twenty-one statutes, or an average per year of four and one-fifth. During the twenty-four years the Conservatives have been in power they have vetoed only fifty-three, including the North-west ordinances, or an average per year of two and one-fifth; that is, the Liberal Government, of which Mr. Laurier was a member, disallowed in its short term of office two statutes for every one vetoed by the Conservative Government in an equal period.

Led by the recollection of his own experience in this regard, he passes naturally to indicate his specific for the redress of the grievances of the Manitoba minority. "Why," he insinuates what he has not the courage to say openly, "why did not they disallow the School Act of 1890. They disallowed a Cattle Quarantine Act and a Companies Act, yet they suffered the Schools Act to go into operation." Why? I have only to quote his own words, spoken a few moments before in order to tell him why. Because this remedy of interference must be granted or denied "according as the circumstances of each case require." Because it should not be applied "mechanically." Because it should be applied "after all other means of conciliation have been exhausted, and only as a last resort." Because, in short, each case must be judged by its merits. In the cases of the Quarantine Act and the Companies Act, to which the leader of the Opposition has referred, the power of disallowance was exercised because they were clear invasions of the federal jurisdiction in matters essentially united. They deal with subjects which do not appeal to sentiment, to prejudice or to passion, and which could not be perverted by any demagogue, however skilled in the art of deceiving the people. In short, to use the hon. gentleman's own words (p. 2825), because the natura lremedy could be applied without "friction, disturbance and discontent." There is nothing in common between Acts of this class and a measure such as the Manitoba School Act, devised for the very purpose of causing "friction," and arousing "disturbance and discontent."

And so in the latter case the Government deemed it wiser to refrain from exercising the power of disallowance, and sought by precisely those methods which Mr. Laurier commends to avoid any interference with the provincial legislature.

The speech of the hon. gentleman, while undoubtedly brilliant as an oratorical performance, is a mass of contradictions and inconsistency throughout. There is not a single position taken by him that he does not himself controvert. His leading idea seems to be that only proof of the grievance is wanting to call for the immediate application of remedial legislation, to which his motion, by the way, is a complete 'non sequitur,' for by it he invites the House to refuse the remedy altogether, irrespective of any facts. But he starts with many professions of what he would do should the complaint of the minority be well-founded. He discourses in graceful and well-rounded sentences about "sacred rights" and heaven's immutable laws of justice," etc. (p. 2828), and how right should be done at all hazards. Sir, is there any immutable law of justice known to heaven more sacred than the rights of the Roman Catholic majority of Manitoba ? If the hon. gentleman wants to select a case in which what he calls heaven's immutable law of justice is not impressed on its face, it is a law that compels a man to pay out of his money taxes to support schools to which in his heart and conscience he is unable to send his children. It is a law, that not only compels a man to pay his money for the support of schools which his religious convictions cause him to avoid sending his children to, but, at the same time it taxes him for the support of those schools, while his children are left in ignorance and without that education to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) attaches so much importance. Now, as to grievances. They have been formulated and marshalled by the counsel for the minority, and form in the hon. gentleman's opinion "a strong and powerful argument," if they were well founded. His whole argument rests on that little word "if." "If" Mr. Ewart's presentation of the minority's wrongs is sound, these poor people are deserving of our assistance and support. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) wanted evidence about this in the first instance, but he now admits, that a strong and powerful argument has been made in support of the privileges which have been denied the people of his own race and creed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) seems disposed to repeal the evidence, and the affidavits which Mr. Ewart supplied. He seems disposed to treat them as nought, and to take from the counsel of the government of Manitoba, his opinion as to whether the proof has been furnished or not. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) may tell me that I am not a lawyer. Sir, if being a lawyer narrows a man's mind down to these nice technicalities, when the heart and the conscience is at stake, narrows a man's mind down to the conclusion that it was improper to publish these affidavits when they were withdrawn in order to avoid delay, in doing justice ; if that is the result of legal training and legal knowledge, I am glad, Sir, that I am only a layman. Will it be believed, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) on the very next page of the "Hansard," after he made the last assertion which I have quoted, himself admits that "Mr. Ewart supported his contention with proof and affidavit." Yes, Sir, proofs and affidavits which it may be said have been public property for months, and have never been controverted nor seriously denied. He (Mr. Laurier) admits "that the minority have a right to their own schools," yet he pretends not to know, whether these schools have been taken away from them or not, though the fact is notorious. With one breath he condemns us for employing "drastic," and "violent" remedies, and "wrenching the constitution" in our endeavour to restore those schools, by what, in the next breath he styles, "a half hearted and faint measure of compromise and nothing else." How can we be at one and at the same time, "half hearted" and "faint," and "drastic" and "violent." I leave that to the hon. gentleman himself to make out. Sir, what has blinded the perception of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) ? What prevents him from seeing the naked truth, as plain unsophisticated men can see it ? Sir, it is this idea which occupies the hon. gentleman's mind and thought ; it is the idea that he wants to have a majority in this House ? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) appeals to his French Canadian friends in Quebec, and he points out to them the reason why he is compelled to leave a suffering, weak, French Roman Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba bereft of their privileges and stripped of their rights, which under the law and the constitution of the country they were entitled to enjoy, and which the compact between Manitoba and the Parliament of Canada pledged itself they should enjoy. When he sees these poor and suffering people bereft of their rights, and compelled, either to send their children to schools, against their conscience, or to leave these children grovelling in ignorance for the want of the means which they have been robbed of, dishonestly robbed of, by the law passed by the Manitoba government which takes their money and applies it to the support of Protestant schools ; what does the hon. gentleman do ? What has rendered the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) incapable of seeing that, which every fair-minded, and honest, and intelligent man in this country cannot fail to see. He turns to his French followers from Quebec and says : You must not forget that my position is a very trying one. I am not here an independent man. I am lifted into a position of grandeur and of great power. I am placed at the head of the great Liberal party, and counting noses, I find that after all, there is a majority of Protestants in Canada. He says further to his followers : If I leave my compatriots, if I leave those of my own race and religion stripped of their privileges, with their wrongs unredressed, with their wrongs crying to Heaven for redress, if I leave my compatriots in that pitiable plight, you must forgive me, because I am after a "majority," and I cannot get that, unless I can rope in even the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) who, as you know, is the last man in this country I would like to be associated with. Sir, there is the Liberal party opposite, united in the unholy effort—I do not hesitate to say—of striking a most fatal blow at the progress and prosperity of our country, that it is possible to conceive. There is that Liberal party, teaching nearly half, about 42 per cent of the population of Canada, teaching the Catholics of Canada that this Confederation Act, that for more than a quarter of a century has given equal rights and equal privileges without respect to race or creed, is no longer to be the guiding star of the people of this country. There, is the Liberal party, united in striking a blow at the constitution, and advancing the principle that the Roman Catholic people of the Dominion may cry aloud to Heaven in vain, for the redress of their wrongs, because forsooth there is a Protestant majority in this country to be reckoned with. I tell these hon. gentlemen opposite, I tell the Liberals in this House, that they are doing the greatest injustice to the Protestants of this country if they think that the Protestants of Canada will be a party to such a breach of the constitution, and to the perpetuation of such an injustice on their Catholic fellow-countrymen. In times of excitement, people may be misled to form hasty opinions. But, Sir, these hon. gentlemen opposite do a most profound injustice to the intelligence of the great body of the Protestant people of Canada, if they suppose, that anything can induce them, to long forget, so great, so sacred an obligation as that of rendering justice to every minority, no matter where it may be found in this Dominion.

Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) wants proof. How many years does he want these people in Manitoba to suffer injustice before he has proof enough to satisfy him.

Mr. LAURIER. Whose fault is it ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. For six long years, since 1890, the hon. gentleman has used all the powers that he possessed, to embarrass and obstruct, and make it difficult to obtain a settlement of this question. Does he not know that from 1871 to 1890, the laws, and the constitution of this country, gave the Catholic minority of Manitoba the same rights as others enjoy. Does he not know, that they were deprived of these rights by the government of Manitoba, and that for six long years they have been starving, and crying out against this injustice. What proof does the hon. gentleman want ? I think he suggested that there should be a commission to ascertain what the views of Roman Catholics really were, and he pointed to some English precedent, about a hundred years old, where such a course had been taken in a similar case. Sir, there is no such ignorance in this country as the hon. gentleman seems to suppose. Every man knows, and hon. members have heard from the lips of the great philosopher of Bothwell (Mr. Mills) himself to-night, the important announcement, that this is not a question of separate schools ; and he is right. That is the delusion at this moment pervading the minds of the people of the country. That is the sole cause of the disturbance in the Protestant constituencies of this country. They are misled into the opinion, that this is a question whether separate schools shall be brought into Manitoba. Sir, the sage of Bothwell has put on record—and it will go to the country to-morrow—quite the contrary, as the result of years of study ; for he must have spent, I imagine, the last five years in preparing that admirable lecture. I am glad he took so much time to it, because he has done the work admirably. He will tell them, that it is not a question of separate schools, and not a question of the coercion of Manitoba. He will tell them, that, under the law and the constitution, which he has expounded in the clearest and most emphatic manner, the whole difficulty has been caused by Manitoba's losing the right to the exclusive control of legislation in regard to education by invading the rights which the constitution guaranteed to the minority in that province. Sir, I do not appeal to the French Catholics, or the Catholics of any description. I appeal to the people of Canada. I appeal to this House, independent of race or religion. I appeal to the most ardent Protestants that can be found in this House, not to put themselves to-night on a record—which will be handed down to their children, and which their children and their children's children will blush to read—that they seized the opportunity to refuse to support the Government, at a time when the Government of Canada, compelled by a sense of absolute duty to their country, came forward with this remedial legislation. Because the hon. member for Bothwell, in the admirable lecture to which you have just listened, declares, that this Act is an actual duty imposed on the Government of Canada ; and all he has to say, in excuse for voting against the measure, is, that there has not been quite enough 'suaviter in modo' in dealing with the government of Manitoba. Why, Sir, everybody knows, that the legslation in Manitoba was conceived with the idea of obtaining what the hon. gentleman opposite is looking for, a majority, in order to keep the government in power in Manitoba by trampling down the rights, the most sacred and solemn rights of a small and weak minority.

I regret, Sir, having kept the House so long, but one feels it difficult to leave a question of this kind. I am obliged to differ with my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Foster). You will remember, that he began his remarks by expressing his doubt as to the soundness of the view, that this was a question of overwhelming importance. I said in my previous remarks, and I repeat it now, that, having been for over forty years in public life—and it is nearer forty-one years than forty, since I entered the legislature of my province—during the whole of that period I have never stood face to face with a question to which I attached the deep, vital and overwhelming importance that I do to this question. Not that this handful of suffering people are specially important. It is the principle underlying this question that is important. It is the fact, that, in this great Parliament, this independent council of the nation, any one should be found to say, that the majority should use the powers they possess, and seek to obtain their end by trampling on the rights of a minority, however small or weak.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the hon. gentleman sits down, I would like to ask him a question. I would like to know, was he not Premier of Nova Scotia in 1864 ? Was he not Secretary of State at that time ? Was it not he himself who introduced into the legislature of Nova Scotia the Bill establishing a national school system in that province, that resulted in wiping out the separate school system then enjoyed by the Catholics of that province ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, Sir ; the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. When I introduced the measure for the support of free schools by taxation in Nova Scotia, the provisions in that Bill were of such an admirable character, guaranteeing, as it did, the rights of the Roman Catholic minority, that I had the support of his Grace the Archbishop and every Roman Catholic member in the legislature ; and that legislation stands to-day, a monument of legislation in regard to schools that is worthy of being recognized and copied by any legislature in the world. Under that School Bill, the Roman Catholic population of the province of Nova Scotia enjoyed the most complete system of schools, in which the tenets of their faith are taught, that is to be found in any part of the world. Now, Sir, I want to say to the hon. gentleman, in conclusion, that I would a thousand times rather fall in defence of the admitted rights of a weak minority of a race and religion not my own, than ride rough-shod into power over the ruins of the constitution of my country and the denial of the just claims of a minority of my own race and faith at the behest of a majority who were trampling their dearest rights under their feet.

THURSDAY, 19th March, 1896.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, I had not the pleasure, last night, of hearing my hon. friend the Minister of Railways ; but I learned from those who heard him that he explained the large secession from the ranks of the Liberal-Conservative members by suggesting, that we, who are not prepared to vote for the Bill now before the House, were animated by a spirit of hostility to the Roman Catholics of this country. The hon. member for Cape Breton says, "Quite right." He speaks hastily ; but, if that was a true charge against us, the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State to-night will certainly convince this House, that it is not a true charge against our leader in this House. I have listened with great interest to the spirited reply which the leader of the House made to the very strong charge brought against him by the leader of the Opposition, with reference to the way in which the scheme of confederation had been carried through the Nova Scotia legislature ; but I could not quite discover the motive of the leader of the House in carrying the discussion away back and beyond that to a discussion of that most disreputable page in the history of Nova Scotia, the incident of the Gourley Shanty Riots, of which both Catholic and Protestant people should be most heartily ashamed. What possible connection that has with any charge against the hon. leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) or with the question before this House, or what possible object the hon. leader of the House had, except to show that he was, at all events, and had been, from the very first days of his history, the champion of the Catholic cause, I have been unable to discover. So I must ask, if I myself am to be taunted as actuated by Protestant bigotry, that there will be imputed to me for righteousness something of that tolerance and fondness for the Catholics which pertains to the leader of this House. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) asked the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) a question concerning the introduction of the present Nova Scotia free school system. I would ask to be allowed to recite to this House a story—I cannot call it more than a legend. It is very like a part of what the Germans call that aftergrowth of legend which gathers quickly around the record of a great man, when he has passed from the active scenes of public affairs. But I have heard this legend, told me by warm and personal friends of the leader of the House, as far back as 1867, for the truth of which I cannot vouch, but which I am sure the House will find interesting and listen to with pleasure. The story runs that the hon. Secretary of State, who was the leader of his party, had pursued, in Nova Scotia, a different course from that which Sir Leonard Tilley—then Mr. Tilley—had pursued in

New Brunswick, and that the Nova Scotian electors, finding that they had not been treated with the same consideration as their neighbours across the Missiquash River, burst forth into a storm of anger, which was given expression to by that great tribune of the people, and unrivalled orator, Joseph Howe, and when the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) found the rising tide of public anger becoming too strong, the rumour goes that that prelate, who was so much beloved and honoured by both Protestants and Catholics, and who is spoken of with great tenderness to this day in Halifax and throughout Nova Scotia—the rumour runs that Archbishop Connolly, knowing the danger that threatened the political fortune of his old comrade in arms, whispered to him or sent him a message to this effect : Your election will be sure in Halifax, if you will make terms on that School Bill, and give my people separate schools. If you will secure that amendment to the Bill, the chances are you will win your election in Halifax ; but it looks improbable that you will win it in Cumberland. The story runs that a letter containing that suggestion was sent to the Halifax Club, and that Sir Charles Tupper received that letter and read it. He was then thirty years younger. He was never, first or last, the man to be bulldozed by any man on earth, and the legend says that he gave a practical reply to the archbishop by taking the earliest train to Truro, that no dicker was made on the School Bill, that no separate schools were allowed to be grafted on the Bill, and that from 1864 to 1896, Nova Scotia has had a system of public free, non-sectarian schools. If I am wrong in this, I can only say I have received that story from very warm admirers and personal friends of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LAURIER. By whom was that School Bill introduced ?

Mr. WELDON. I understand it was drafted by Mr. Johnston, and carried through the legislature by Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether there is a single provision in the school law of Nova Scotia, which was carried through the legislature by the hon. gentleman who leads this House, which gives any special right to any minority or any religious body in Nova Scotia?

Mr. WELDON. In answer to the hon. member for Queen's, I must say that to the best of my knowledge there is in the law not one single word indicating any such privilege.

Mr. TARTE. Is this possible ?

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the hon. member for Albert whether the Roman Catholics have not by law, under the statute of 1890, in Manitoba, just as much rights as they have by law under the statute of 1864, introduced and passed through the Nova Scotia legislature by the hon. Secretary of State.

Mr. WELDON. I could not answer that question with prefect accuracy. I have read carefully the statute of Manitoba, but I am not really so acquainted with it as I am with the statute of the province where I live. However, I am satisfied that, substantially, the two statutes are alike. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) gave this House very great pleasure by what the leader of the House called his learned essay or lecture with reference to this Manitoba school question, though, for my part, I regret that by the clock he seems to have taken three hours and twenty minutes before addressing his first remark to the Manitoba school question particularly. I believe that in a quiet way I am a little to blame for the hon. gentleman's long discourse. In a spirit of badinage, I taunted the hon. member in this chamber last session with his singular silence, I called him Kathleen Mavourneen, and asked him why he was so silent. Little did I dream that when that musical bird would break the silence, he would sing for so many hours, and it will be a long time before I will throw any such taunt again against the hon. member for Bothwell.

We Liberal-Conservatives who oppose this Remedial Bill are called by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) with his customary grace and tact, " irreconcilables,—" bolters " by some of the papers which are giving very close and ardent support to the Administration, and, I think, they are very poor specimens of the mind of the Liberal-Conservative party throughout this country—by the Minister of Finance, " deserters." I am not sure he applied the offensive term deserters to us, though he could well apply it to himself and some of his colleagues who had been running away from the citadel. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals said that we were " sore-heads," and attributed our want of support of the Administration to the fact that we had not been able to persuade our successive Prime Ministers, during the last three or four years, to take the same estimate of our ability that we ourselves had. I cannot speak for the others, but only for myself, and I do not think it necessary to answer that taunt.

We are reminded by the words which fell from the leader of the House a moment ago that this question is one of overwhelming importance, and in that estimate he said he differed from the Minister of Finance. I have to take back myself some such remark as the Minister of Finance made, which I made last session, namely, that while this was a question of great magnitude, it was not one of colossal magnitude. If I may be allowed to change my mind in twelve months, I will take the view of the hon. Secretary of State that this is a question of colossal magnitude. We have some proof that it is a larger question than I thought ; we have had some remarkable instances since last session. There was the first of these three different volcanic eruptions which have given a new character to the hill on which the Parliament buildings stand. The ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) had been in one of those volcanic eruptions, thrown out through the crater, and after being in the air a few days he came back to his customary place. But that was not very serious. In the summer, another explosion took place, and out went three French Ministers into the upper ether. One disappeared to practice in Montreal his profession as a barrister. But the other two came down and fell back into the very hole out of which they had been shot. But the reason why I have changed my mind is not due to these explosions, because I knew of them when I spoke last summer in the chamber. Having witnessed this tremendous earthquake which occurred in January last, when seven Protestant English-speaking Ministers, after a tremendous upheaval such as this age has hardly witnessed, were thrown so far up that they took thirteen days going up and coming down again. The fallen angels only took nine days in their memorable descent, but these Cabinet Ministers took three or four more. But here is the part that turns from tragedy to pathos. Of these victims, six tumbled down head over heels and fell into the very mouth of the same crater, and more is the pity, they found standing by an aged statesman who had come from the British Isles, across the wide sea through wintry weather, innocently standing by the mouth of the crater, and they pulled him into the hole with them. And he turns up as a member of the Cabinet and Secretary of State. In view of these facts, I take the liberty to say that I have changed my mind and have come to the conclusion that a question that could cause that third tremendous volcanic upheaval cannot be described otherwise than as of colossal magnitude. Besides these preliminary remarks, I may be allowed, before entering upon a consideration of the question before the House, one word for my old and good friend the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). In his speech he referred to me, but the papers reported him so imperfectly that I confess that I could not quite understand the drift of his argument. But he had been hunting up old speeches of mine and with what, perhaps he will permit me to say, is not one of his virtues, but one of his vices—that is the habit of "Hansard"-mongering and proving that he has the right to say "I told you so," proving that a man said differently last year from what he does this year. If I say differently now from what I did in 1893 or 1894, anybody is welcome to prove it. I take the liberty of keeping my mind open and of altering my opinions as I learn more. The only complaint I make against my old and good friend, the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is that he made me, in self-defence, read over two of my old speeches, and that is a burden I would not have laid upon my worst enemy.

Now, on the merits of the question, let me address the House and try not to overtax its patience. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy said last night that, in his opinion, the one able speech made on the Government side was that made by the Minister of Finance. I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman that the Minister of Finance made a speech of great eloquence and great ability. But, in my judgment, the most effective speech made by any who championed the Bill now before the House was made by the present Minister of Justice, and the best proof of that is found when you come to answer them. Let me touch briefly upon the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance. Its eloquence, its power, I cannot claim to equal. But that speech was, in my opinion, based entirely upon a proposition which cannot be found in the law, which is not founded upon history, which is not founded on fact. And if in my own quiet way, I can tear down the foundation upon which the hon. Minister's whole argument rested, his argument must fall with it. Grant him what he assumed and what he started to prove, and his speech was, in the main, unanswerable. I concede that. But I deny, I controvert, that which he assumed. I say that the law does not contain the proposition he laid down, that history does not contain the statements which he says are there, that the debates of Parliament will not support the view he took of the questions of that time. The true evidence is against him, and the evidence he relied upon is secondary and less worth. These are strong statements; I ask the patience of the House while I strive to prove them.

The Minister of Finance quoted at considerable length—I noticed that by the clock he occupied forty minutes with that part of his argument—from despatches written by the British Minister, Lord Granville, by the Governor General of Canada, by Sir John Macdonald, by Sir George Cartier and others, some addressed to the Government's representative, Sir Donald Smith, others to the Governor of the Hudson Bay Territory, others to the late Archbishop of St. Boniface, who, I believe, at the beginning of the difficulties was at the Ecumenical Council at Rome, all going to show that the Imperial authorities and the Governor General here and his advisers, regarded very seriously these three gentlemen, the Rev. Father Ritchot and Messrs. Scott and Black, who came here from the Red River settlement to treat with the Ministers. That seems to be true. But he founded on that an argument that these letters, these cablegrams, these despatches, seemed to give some emphasis to this view that the people in Winnipeg had asked for, and they in London and at Ottawa had agreed to some arrangement with regard to the separate schools; and, while the hon. Minister did not say so, that was the fallacy to which he led, and which was kicked over as you would kick over a house of cards by a single question by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), who asked him if the statement of claim laid before the advisers of Her Majesty at Ottawa contained anything about separate schools. The hon. member for Winnipeg knew, what the rest of us know, that unless you can establish the fourth bill of rights the whole claim of the Minister of Finance falls to the ground. And at that point it broke down. The hon. Minister of Finance tried to base an argument upon it. The Minister of Justice was wiser. He threw overboard the argument based upon the treaty. You cannot sustain that argument. It is unhistorical. Therefore, all that is founded upon that part of the contention will have to be abandoned. The thing taken for granted by the hon. Minister of Finance was this—that above all things you must make good to the minority the rights guaranteed to them by the constitution. I agree absolutely with that, absolutely, without reservation. The hon. Minister went further, and said that one great right guaranteed to them is this right that if the legislature in that prairie province granted to these people separate schools, there is no power on this side of the sea that can abolish them, that if the local legislature does abolish them, we must restore them, which means that there is no power except the Imperial power that can really repeal the law establishing separate schools. He says that that was the constitutional right guaranteed to the minority in Manitoba, and upon that he bases an appeal to justice, an appeal to honour, an appeal to good faith, which, if it had been founded in fact, would have had more influence with me than, as a matter of fact, it did have.

Once separate schools, always separate schools—that is his argument. We argued that question last session, and I must not weary the House by making a long speech upon the subject to-night. That is not the meaning of the constitution. And you can not find, in reading the law records or the law periodicals during the years of that discussion one non-political professional opinion in favour of that view. The overwhelming weight of non-political opinion is that there is no arrangement for perpetuity of separate schools in this clause. We are dealing with the powers of Parliament, we are not dealing with the powers of the courts. We have nothing to do with clause 1 of the school section of the constitution. That was dealt with by the august tribunal under the hill here—the Supreme Court: and by that still more august tribunal that holds its sittings in Downing Street. We have to do with that other clause, the second clause, which gives to this Parliament a remedial power. And when you come to that clause you cannot find in it support for any such doctrine as that separate schools once established are established for ever. What a monstrous proposition if this Parliament had ever made such an arrangement. What a stupendous act of folly, how unworthy of the Parliament of Great Britain to pass such an improvident and profligate rule and embodied it in the constitution of any country, and embed it in the constitution of any community. It means what? Was it a proper arrangement that 12,000 people on the Red River, farmers and trappers, French half-breeds many of them, Scotch and English half-breeds, others, light-hearted, merry and worthy people, but not the people who would be chosen as competent to establish wisely and truly the constitution of a great state—was it a proper and common sense arrangement that these people, numbering altogether about as many as the population of an ordinary township of the province of Ontario should settle the question of the educational policy for all time for a commonwealth which may grow from these 12,000 to the present population of our greatest province. Mr. Speaker, it would be a standing and a burning reproach to the English Parliament that ratified the Act, it would be a standing and burning reproach to this Parliament to pass an Act, with such an improvident and dangerous provision, by putting in the hands of any small community of people, had they been much more intelligent and much better lettered than the people along those rivers and prairies, such a preposterous provision: but I say that provision is not there. I did not hear my hon. friend from Bothwell, in his nice argument, in his nice array of principles, and "mays," and "wills," and "shalls," and all that, touch upon this question. But I would like to have heard him balancing his clauses and threading his way through them, make out that there was such a grant. What tricks he played with his intellect in the conclusion he came to, is a puzzle to me. The words of that Act have often been read to us. Am I trespassing upon the patience of the House when I read that clause again, which gives this Parliament power? The words are not many: let us use our own common sense and reason in interpreting them:

> An appeal shall lie to the Governor in Council from any act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects.

If this Parliament in creating that constitutional enactment, had meant to say that the new legislature should have power to pass these laws, but should have no power to repeal them, or that if they were repealed; they must be restored, why not have drawn the first section wider so as to cover both the rights which the Catholics had before the creation of the province, and the rights which the Catholics acquired after the creation of the province? Simply striking out a few words would have made it perfectly clear that the Catholics had those rights under the first clause drafted; by simply striking out those words "had at the time of the union." The technical argument founded on these words, it seems to me, conclusively shews that no such ground was given, no such purpose was contemplated.

The Minster of Finance pressed another argument, that there were unwritten understandings, and that although they were not happily expressed in the original law, yet if, as men of honour, we find those understandings existed, that the half-breeds so understood them, and that their masters who formed the new province, so understood them, that our Ottawa Ministers so understood them, that all those understandings when reduced to writing were imperfectly reduced to writing, still we ought to correct the writings, and carry out the implied understandings. But we are confined now altogether to clause 2 of this constitution: we have nothing to do with clause 1. It is the courts that rectify any wrong done under clause 1; it is Parliament that rectifies any wrong done under clause 2. The whole argument of the Minister of Finance, in which he quoted members of the House, was as to clause 1. He could have quoted me, for I have frequently stated what he argued as to the import of the decision in the Barrett case; but he goes back to clause 1, which has nothing to do with the action of Parliament. He challenges the interpretation of clause 1; but it has not the slightest connection with my argument. He is simply confusing the minds of the House—I do not say he did it intentionally, but it is confusing the minds of the House, and harking back to a clause of the Act with which this Parliament has nothing to do: and he based conclusions upon views that might be taken by this gentleman or that gentleman, by this barrister or that barrister, as to what is a true and fair reading of clause 1. With reference to clause 2, I argued last lear, and although it is tiresome to repeat the same argument, I apprehend I would be the only one who would remember what I argued last year as to clause 2. If you look at the records of the times, at the debates in Parliament you will find that they will not bear the construction the Minister of Finance sought to put on them, namely, that they contained a guarantee that separate schools once given, should be given in perpetuity. The hour is so late, the debate has lasted so long, the House is so impatient, and I have so many other matters of moment to deal with, that I do not take pleasure in taking you again over the details of this question. But I have in my hand the debates with reference to the Manitoba Act. I have gone over them page by page, and I find that on the first reading, on the second reading, and in committee, the reports of this debate cover 142 pages. And how much of the whole 142 pages, think you, are given to a discussion of the educational clause of the Act? Absolutely not one: about four-fifths of one page not including the names of the division. I went carefully through the speeches of Sir John A. Macdonald, I think I have a record of them here; the speeches of Sir George E. Cartier, and the speeches of Alexander Mackenzie, and these are my conclusions, if I have taken them correctly. In the debate in the first reading, which was on 2nd May, the report of the speech of Sir John A. Macdonald covers eight pages, and there is not one single sentence about the school question. On the second reading, the report of his speech covers six pages, and there is not a whisper of schools. In the debate on the Oliver amendment, he seems to have been silent, but I notice that the present Prime Minister was voting with the Grits; so that I may say to the leaders of the House, and to the members that support the administration, to the Ottawa "Citizen," and the other papers who call us bolters, that if we are bolting, we are bolting as did a man who occupies the highest position in our party, and we are bolting in good company. Coming to Mr. Mackenzie, the report of his speech covers three pages in the first reading, two pages in the second reading, with a brief sentence in committee; and as this is the only speech in the whole record in which I find a single reference, except the short debate on the Oliver amendment, to the school question. I will read that one clause. Mr. Mackenzie is reported to have said:

> These clauses were of too general a character, he would prefer to leave them to be decided by the people of the Territory.

That is, he did not want any constitutional provision. So, you see what importance was attached to this question by these men who were talking about it, who were thinking about it. In our day, however, we see hon. gentlemen setting up this doctrine of a treaty, as if it was something that people were fighting for when this Act was passed, when the whole record shows that the minds of the men and of the people were turned to other questions altogether, to the boundary, to the question whether the province should be more or less French than it was, to language, and other questions. But the very slightest consideration was then given to this school question, that has been discussed in this country the last five years. We have committed the blunder of thinking that it was always exciting as it is to-night, always forgetting that it has only been talked of since 1890. Some hon. gentlemen quote against me, Mr. William Macdougall. Mr. William Macdougall was a distinguished member of this House years ago: but I think the hon. gentleman's memory is somewhat defective, for he is attributing words that are found in the first subsection of the Manitoba educational clause, these words "or practice," to an event that occurred three years afterwards in spite of all the explanations that were made the other night by some hon. gentleman in this House. The statement made the other night was that Mr. King introduced his New Brunswick School Bill in 1869. At that time the Catholic people took alarm, and were afraid that the words "by law" contained in the British North America Act were not wide enough; and so when the Manitoba Act was drafted, they put in the words "or practice." I have made the best inquiries I can. I have gone through the records available to me, and I must throw the burden of proof on the other side. I believe that the theory which refers the words "or practice" to the New Brunswick school difficulty, to be mere fudge. I believe that point was first taken in 1873, in the case of ex-parte Renaud, decided by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, when they suggested that in the New Brunswick statute, which is like the Manitoba statute, the words "or practice" would have covered the Catholics' claim. But the old Act, the British North America Act, on which the New Brunswick Catholics were claiming, contains simply the words "by law," and this did not redress the grievance which they claimed, that the School Bill, or, rather, Palmer's rider to that Bill, caused. I, therefore, submit, that the theory is a fictitious theory, and is not supported by history and by the fact, and, if I am wrong, I am entitled to ask those gentlemen who claim to put me in the wrong, to explain their position. The Minister of Finance said, that this Government is bound to do its duty to the minority. So I say, and I say it as fully as he does. I cannot say it as eloquently as he did; but I say with him, that whatever the constitution grants to those people in Manitoba in this year of grace 1896, I feel bound to secure for them to the letter, without any mental reservation whatever. The truth, Mr. Speaker, seems to be this, that the position of the province of Manitoba in respect to education, when she entered confederation, is exactly the same as the educational position of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, afterwards Prince Edward Island, afterwards British Columbia, and not at all the position of the province of Quebec. Against my theory the words "in practice" are quoted. But the explanation is clearly given in the Privy Council judgment in the last case and in the judgment of Chief Justice Taylor in the Barrett case, and the explanation is this, which commends itself to common sense, that no constitution had been acquired by Manitoba, that it had no legislature and no laws, and the statement in a general Act, that such rights as they have "by law" would be preserved, would be of no value to them, as they have no rights by law, for they had no laws, and, therefore, the words "in practice" were inserted to put the settlers on the Red River on exactly the same level with settlers in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia. Why should they be otherwise? There were French people on the Red River; there were French in New Brunswick; there were French Catholics on the Red River, and there were French Catholics on the Memramcook and on the Baie des Chaleurs, and on the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Why should those men on the prairies of the west be more carefully protected in their rights of conscience than the men of the same race and faith, the French Catholics of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and afterwards of Prince Edward Island? My argument, therefore, is, that Manitoba's position is identical with that of New Brunswick, and that the question which is Manitoba's to-day, may be, as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) said the other night, New Brunswick's question to-morrow. If a minister belonging to one of the political parties should give to the province of New Brunswick separate schools, and the people should rise again, as the people of Manitoba rose years ago, and asked to have separate schools abolished, we would have in New Brunswick precisely the same situation as prevails in Manitoba to-day. And I take the responsibility—and it is a great one for any one who is in politics to take—of placing on record, with the prospect of having to face the statement subsequently, my opinion, and I do it after having considered the subject carefully and with a due sense of responsibility, that, if that event should happen, the position of the people of New Brunswick would be precisely the position of the people of Manitoba to-day.

Mr. Speaker, the following is a fair statement of the distinction between the authority of the province and the authority of the Dominion on the question of education, that any question of free schools, as against schools supported by parents' fees, or of a national system of schools, as against what I call a double-barrelled system, with a public and a separate school contiguous—these are questions of great public polity. Surely, it is common sense to say, that, as regards such questions the province should have the power. When you come to the Dominion power, it is to protect the rights of conscience. There is a tendency for the people to divide into two religious camps. If, therefore, there is an aggrieved minority in Manitoba, if to-day the Catholics come forward and say, that for nineteen years, from 1871 to 1890, we had religion taught in the schools to our children during so many hours in the week, and, if they say, that in many of the homes the mothers are not sufficiently educated and are not capable of doing all that mothers should do in an enlightened home, to be able to teach their children rules of conduct and principles of religion, and, if that duty were thrown upon the schools in a degree, and they asked, that, during certain hours, without interfering with regular instruction, the children should be taught religion and morals, then, for my part, bigoted Protestant though an hon. gentleman has termed me—and I believe he will withdraw that opinion before I conclude my remarks—I would feel it to be my duty to use my influence, if it can be done in Winnipeg, it is best done there, but, if it cannot be done there, it must be done here, to have that concession made, for we possess the federal power to redress wrongs of conscience and must, as a last resort, exercise it. For my part, I am prepared to go on record as saying, and I will take the responsibility of going before my constituents on my position—that, unless the local authorities shall very promptly make provision for teaching, during convenient hours, by such persons as the different churches asking that privilege, may choose to send, be they Catholic, Anglicans, or Kirk churches which feel strongly in that regard, though many of us do not feel strongly, without interfering with secular instruction, these representatives of the different churches may go into the schoolhouse and teach so many hours each week, I would support a federal measure to grant that law.

An hon. MEMBER. Why do you not do that now ?

Mr. WELDON. I will come to a consideration of that very question in a few minutes. I now leave that part of the subject. The Minister of Justice, the Minister of Railways, and, in fact, all hon. members seem to agree, that there is no legal duty embodied in the Acts of Parliament. We must, therefore, say there is no clause in the constitution setting forth that the minority, whether Catholic or Protestant, was to have guaranteed to it in perpetuity separate schools, and I stake my whole case and argument on the soundness of that contention. If that fails, I admit I am wrong, and the Finance Minister is right. Then, hon. gentlemen may ask me, although not bound to restore state-aided separate schools, why not restore them ? Hon. George W. Ross says it is the best solution in a mixed community that has been thought of. Hon. David Mills is quoted as making a similar statement. I understood the Minister of Finance also to make that statement, though I should like him to correct me if I am wrong, because I have not had the opportunity of verifying his statement in "Hansard." That is a most unfortunate statement. Against that statement with all my might and main I protest. That is not the experience of the most enlightened communities in the world. In spite of what hon. gentlemen say, this and this alone is the real question before the House. You can drape it with all the cobwebs that spiders will spin in a night, but, when you tear them away, you find the question before the House in regard to this Bill is : are we in favour of separate schools, or are we opposed to them ? I say, on many grounds, I am opposed to separate schools. They destroy national unity. They create discord among our children. They destroy the effectiveness of the minority schools. They impair the strength of the public schools existing. They weaken the energy of the province, which has not too much energy to devote to such ends. A province carved out of a new country has to deal with many undertakings. It has none too much money for education, even if it is all spent on one system of schools, and, therefore, I say, that, on general principles, I am opposed to separate schools. Those who say, that this is a question as between Catholics and Protestants, are wrong. By no manner of means are Catholics all united in favour of separate schools, and by no manner of means are Protestants unitedly opposed to separate schools. I believe most of the Roman Catholics are in favour of separate schools and most of the Protestants are opposed to separate schools, but I know a large section of the Protestants, especially the clergymen of a certain wing of the Church of England are almost universally in favour of separate schools. And a good many clergymen like the Rev. Principle Grant, clergymen of the old Kirk, favour separate schools. They are fond of an established church. These men, sincere men, no doubt—and I will not challenge their sincerity for one moment—have ideas for this new land, different from those we entertain. They believe in an established church. But the people whom I represent, who are almost all Baptists, have the strongest possible opinions the other way and they do not believe in the propagation of religious opinion by the use of state money. They do not believe that religious teachings were ever better than in those early days, when our Divine Master, with his twelve Apostles, knowing nothing of an established and endowed church, went to and fro through the Galilean fields teaching the new faith. Sir, though I am not a member of the Baptist communion, I heartily share their views in that regard, and I am fully persuaded that I represent, on this question, the views of the people of both political parties in the county of Albert. They see, as I see, that this is purely a question of separate schools. They are opposed to separate schools, because they are opposed, root and branch, to the idea of anything that looks like the giving of state aid, or state money, for the propagation of religious opinion. The late Archbishop of St. Boniface spoke frankly and fairly in this matter, when he stated that, in his mind, the school was a " church for children," and, therefore, a subsidy to the school was a subsidy to the church. That is an idea which we can all understand, and which we can all respect, even though we cannot share in it. But we must be forgiven, and there must not be imputed to us the spirit of malice and the spirit of uncharitableness, if we still take liberty to adhere to our own ideas of what is best for the state, while we, at the same time, say that we, in a degree, quite well understand and sympathize with the views of those who think differently from us. In my judgment, Sir, an endowed, or an established church in this country, whether for children or for adults, is a mistake.

Now, Sir, I may be permitted to answer, for a few moments, my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies) who asked from me an expression of my views and reasons for opposing this Bill. Over and above all that I have said, my argument carries me this length: That the constitution does not bind me to restore separate schools in Manitoba. Nothing of the kind was promised in the constitution, nor was it promised in the understandings that are said to have taken place outside of the constitution. Over and above what I say, with reference to the folly of separate schools, I say that I am opposed to this Bill, for the reason that it is offensive to the people of Manitoba. I do not know why this Parliament should give so much of its energy, and why this Administration for many years should give so much of its time to crippling, and quarrelling with, and browbeating the province of Manitoba. Take the matter of the trouble over the railway charters. She passed her laws and we disallowed them, and she renewed her laws and we disallowed them again. Who came on top in that quarrel? Sir, the province of Manitoba did. We backed down and beat an ignominious retreat. We fought a losing fight. I understand, Sir, that the people of Manitoba must feel irritable over those past quarrels. That province, that little child of our own, the one province that this Parliament created, why should we worry, and tease, and irritate her, with this perpetual policy of disallowing her statutes and thwarting her will? I think I see something of the results of that policy in the difficulty we find in dealing with this new school case, which has come to us in later years. If Manitoba is misbehaving, I am sorry, and I do not think that her behaviour has been at all what I would like in this matter, especially during the earlier stages of the dispute. For that I am sorry, but let the past be past.

It is within the memory of the members of this House, who were here during the last Parliament, that we had up here from the legislature of Quebec, a question which caused a great deal of irritation in this House. I refer to what was known as the Jesuits' Estate Act. I was not one of the memorable thirteen who voted to condemn the Government for refusing to disallow that Bill: but I frankly confess that I had the strongest feeling of sympathy with the thirteen members who took that position.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friends need not laugh. Let them wait a moment. I had the strongest feeling of sympathy for the thirteen members who took that position, because that Bill came from the legislature of Quebec, contained recitals which were calculated to wound the pride of every Protestant in Canada. It contained recitals which were not British law. It seemed to put other potentates higher than our own Queen. It seemed to affirm that there could be no valid transfer of property in this country, without the consent of a power which our constitution does not recognize. We swallowed these recitals, which an hon. member (Mr. Colby), a Protestant coming from the province of Quebec, described as "a very bitter pill." We swallowed them in this House, because of the principle that we would let the provinces alone. I say now: Treat Manitoba as you treated Quebec. Give Manitoba fair-play. It was one sect who complained yesterday; it is the other sect who complain to-day. Stand on that basis, stand by that principle, and the people of the country can better understand the course we are taking. In trying to remove a grievance complained of in the province of Manitoba, it is a stupendous folly to create a greater grievance by picking a quarrel with a province that is powerful to-day, and which, before many years, undoubtedly will be one of the greatest provinces in Canada. I heard the pathetic words of the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) when he referred to the Manitoba minority as "crying to heaven for justice." With that magnificent denunciation of which he is so consummate a master, he denounced that gross injustice. He spoke of these people as starving for six long years, and it occurred to me to ask him why it was, that the people were groaning under the burdens of that Greenway law imposed in 1890. Well, Sir, I can answer that. When the constitution gave to his colleagues the power of killing, in five minutes, the power of striking down as swift as lightning, the law that caused that hardship to the minority, his colleagues never used that power conferred on them. There was section 90 in the constitution just as much as section 93. There is an iron hammer which the constitution puts in the hands of honest men who wish to destroy that thing which was distressing this aggrieved minority in Manitoba. Why did not the Cabinet take that iron hammer and smash that Bill, within twelve months of the day that it was received from the Manitoba government by the Secretary of State. What answer did the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) give to that? What answer did my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) give to that? He gave no answer at all. He said that the Bill was not ultra vires of the province, but, Sir, that has nothing whatever to do with the duty of disallowance. The Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) thanked God that he was not a lawyer, and I regretted that he was not a lawyer, for if he had been a lawyer, he could not have taken the position that he has taken with reference to the power of disallowance. The question of ultra vires is the last question to consider, in the exercise of the power of disallowance. To say that we will disallow every law that we think is ultra vires, is to say, for instance, that the Minister of Justice is a better lawyer than the Attorney General of the province of Ontario. He may be, but he may not be, and there is the arrogant assumption—arrogant always between two men in the profession —that one is right and that the other is wrong. The solution of the dispute, as to ultra vires and intra vires is to let the matter go to an impartial tribunal to settle it, and not to leave it to political departments, either in the Parliament buildings of Toronto, or in the Eastern Block in Ottawa. The Secretary of State has been out of this country for twelve years. He has forgotten how much constitutional law has grown during these twelve years. We are settling down, Mr. Speaker, to a very clear rule about this policy of disallowance. That rule is that we will not attempt to disallow Bills because they are ultra vires, nor will we disallow Bills because we think they are bad for the province, but we will disallow Bills which we conclude may do harm to the whole country, or may create mischief beyond the province, and create mischief in other parts of the Empire. That is a good reason, and it is the best reason that could be advanced for disallowance. And, Sir, if ever there was a case for disallowance, on the part of men who believed as these gentlemen now say they do believe—and I give them credit for sincerity in their statement of that—namely, that the constitution gives to the aggrieved minority a right which the Greenway Bill ruthlessly struck down, then, Sir, this was a case in which they were bound to disallow that Bill. Sir, these gentlemen cannot ride both horses. They must come down from the one or the other. The late Sir John Thompson—and I speak his name with becoming reverence, and I think the House felt honoured by being led by a man who was so consummate a constitutional lawyer—I speak as a Liberal-Conservative, and I say, that from the day this difficulty began until the day that death struck him down, in my judgment, not one single material mistake was made, legal or political, in dealing with this Manitoba school question. Many may not agree with me in this, but I have expressed that view in this House before, and I express it again now. I do not make that remark in order that it may be thought offensive to his successor, Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, but, Sir, I think that our party interests, as well as the best interests of this country, have been somewhat imperilled by the change from one lawyer to the other in the Department of Justice; deeply as I regret to have that to say. It is the only unkind remark, if it be unkind, that I shall make with reference to the late Minister of Justice. No one has more clearly or more frequently than Sir John Thompson set forth in this House the doctrine which I am setting forth to-night; and therefore I listened without becoming regard and becoming obedience to the leader of this House when he propounded his theory under which disallowance should be exercised.

I am opposed to this Bill because it is unjust to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WELDON. Those who laugh last laugh the most wisely. I want to address some arguments to the French Catholic members of my own party, which I hope they will receive in soberness. Is this Bill a final Bill? I will take the opportunity of sitting down for a moment after. I ask the Minister of Justice whether section 74 is final, or whether, if the teachers do not get their salaries out of provincial funds, he proposes to supplement this Bill by a further measure at another session for the purpose of supplying those teachers with their fair share of the public money of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. Minister does not make the statement that such is his intention. I regret that the leader of the House is not here, because I would like to ask him the same question. I will ask the Minister of Finance whether in the event of the expectation held out in section 74 not being fulfilled by the province of Manitoba, that is to say, whether, if the Roman Catholics do not get their share from the provincial treasury, it is the intention of the Government here to implement this Bill by giving them their share of Canadian money.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall take my own time and my own place to answer.

Mr. WELDON. I think that is a perfectly fair question; and we have a right, Mr. Speaker, on the eve of a general election to know whether this is a final Bill or only a partial Bill. Above all the French Catholic members of this House, who undoubtedly feel more keenly—and I honour them the more for that—the desire to stand by the men of their own faith and race in Manitoba, have a right to know whether this measure is all there is of it. I do not think my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Dupont) will support this Bill if there is evidence that it is a complete measure. He is too strong and clear-headed a man not to have read it for himself, and he knows, if this is to be the last of it, that, in the way of giving relief to the Catholics of Manitoba, it is as empty as last year's birds' nests.

Mr. TISDALE. Will you support the Bill if it is made strong enough ?

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman's question is a plain one, and I will give him a plain answer: I would not support the Bill. But I am making a perfectly fair argument. I say there are two systems of public schools, known in different countries, each carried on with more or less success,—one, the national system, the other, the double-barrelled system. If you choose the latter, in the name of common sense, give the Catholic people fair-play. I do not like the system ; but if you start with it, put it on a common-sense basis, and provide the money necessary to support it, and to make the schools work when they are once begun ; and it is to me a tremendous puzzle how my hon. friends around me who are French Catholics can accept this Bill as a final and satisfactory settlement—how can they be satisfied to see the Protestant teacher in one district get his $150 a year from the provincial treasury, and the Catholic teacher in the neighbouring district, who has as much right to it, get none. If there are ten school-going children in a district, it can have a separate school. If the families there are as large as ours in the east, three or four families would be sufficient to obtain a school. How can three or four families build a school-house, equip it with furniture, and hire a teacher without getting their quota of provincial money ? They cannot do it. It will starve to death : and it is not fair-play to those people to put this Bill forward as a final settlement. I appeal to my French Catholic fellow-members whether in common fairness that is treating those people properly. What I would like to see is the Catholic teachers of Manitoba, like those of Nova Scotia, getting the same pay as the Protestant teachers of the same grade. And why should they not ? Have not the Catholics as much right to their share of public money ? And why has not this Bill given them their right ? Is it because this Parliament has not power to do so ? This Parliament surely has as much right to go to the legislature of Manitoba in reference to that as it has to go to the municipalities for similar purposes. I say that it has power to go to neither. This simply shows how absolutely useless this Bill is—how unworthy it is of able men and of lawyers.

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this Bill from beginning to end is beyond the powers of this Parliament. There is clause 2, which provides that the Governor General shall make certain appointments to the separate school board, if the Lieutenant-Governor does not make them, which is surely ultra vires to this Parliament. There is clause 10, which provides that if the municipal council does not do so and so, this Catholic school board shall be empowered to confirm or annul. What in the name of reason has this Parliament to do with municipal institutions, which, under section 92 of our constitution, are assigned to the local legislatures ? I think this is germane to the discussion of this Bill, because if it is unconstitutional, this House is simply wasting its time in dealing with it, and doing itself discredit as well as discrediting its Department of Justice—not the present Minister, who is only technically responsible, but the earlier officers of the department. Then, there is section 23, subsection 7, which provides that it shall be the duty of the council of each municipality to collect by assessment on the whole real and personal property of the Roman Catholics, so much money. What right have we to address that mandate to any section of people in the province of Manitoba ? Has it not been decided by the Privy Council, that by section 92 of the British North America Act, that power belongs exclusively to the provincial legislature, and that we cannot interfere with it ? These are the vital clauses of the Act, and there are some others equally bad. There is clause 2 of section 28, which says that no Roman Catholic shall be bound to pay taxes to the public schools. The province of Manitoba had addressed a mandate ordering them to pay taxes to support the public schools. Will not these people pay attention rather to the mandates of the province which is their own master, which created these schools and can amend or take away, than to the mandate of this House. How can any man seriously argue that this clause, which is the vital clause, can be worked out?

Clause 64 is another one which seems of very doubtful legality, and so is clause 65.

Then take clause 74. There the draughtsman of this Bill acknowledges that his hand is powerless. He acknowledges that he cannot reach his hand out from Ottawa to the treasury at Winnipeg and draw from that treasury money for the separate schools. He asks the people of Manitoba to do it. Does he believe that they will ? Does he not know that unless an amicable settlement be reached, they will do nothing of the kind. Then, if hon. gentlemen will insist on establishing separate schools, why not come down like men and give a grant of Canadian money to the Catholics of Manitoba to support their schools ? I put that question to the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin), and I would like to hear him answer it.

Mr. DEVLIN. I think there is an amendment of which notice has been given to that effect, and I have already stated, in the speech I made, that I did not consider the Bill perfect, and that it was my intention to support such a measure.

Mr. WELDON. Perfect is a very extravagant word to apply to a Bill as empty as this.

Mr. DEVLIN. Bad as it is, it is much better than you would give.

Mr. WELDON. I tell my hon. friend what I would give if I had the power. I will put myself on record and say what I would give. I would put the Catholic minority in Manitoba in as good a position as that in which the minority in my province, where we live in peace and happiness and good-will, and where we have made progress the last twenty-five years.

I shall not dwell on a canvass that I heard addressed to members myself, for I am ashamed of it. I have heard this canvas addressed. Let them alone, give them separate schools, and the result will be that these little half-breed children of Indian mothers will simply be for all time hewers of wood and drawers of water.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. WELDON. I am not speaking of members of Parliament, and I shall not give the names.

Mr. FOSTER. If I understand that the hon. gentleman does not state that such a canvas has been used by any member of Parliament, the disclaimer is quite adequate.

Mr. WELDON. I am not saying it was not made by members of Parliament, but I make no affirmation in that regard. But that argument has been pressed on me time and again, and I say that it is an argument which is most disreputable to Protestants. I am not the only member of this House who has heard that argument made. I say that these little half-breed children, the children of Indian mothers, have as good a right as the children of the wealthiest of this land to the best that the commonwealth can give them. The best is not too good for them. They have no better friends than we are, who are voting against this Bill, and trying to give them something that is better than this Bill.

Mr. GILLIES. What do you give them ?

Mr. WELDON. I have answered my hon. friend.

Mr. GILLIES. I would like to ask the hon. member for Albert how could he propose to put the minority in Manitoba on the same footing as in New Brunswick ?

Mr. WELDON. I would certainly try to do it, if the legislature of Winnipeg will not very promptly do it. You would have to revise your proceedings, but it is a thing which could very quickly be done by this Parliament. You would have to deal with the question of your petition all over again, the question of your hearing before the Governor General in Council, the question of a new hearing on which you could found your legislation, and all that. I may be wrong, but with the assistance of the hon. gentleman himself, who is a very good lawyer, I think we could work it out quickly and promptly.

Mr. GILLIES. My hon. friend said he would put them on the same footing as the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and I would like to know by what method he would put them in that position, unless by remedial legislation ?

Mr. WELDON. Quite so, and I declare myself most unmistakably in favour of remedial legislation.

Some hon. MEMBRS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WELDON. There is remedial legislation and remedial legislation. I do not declare myself in favour of separate schools in any shape or form. Let us use clear words. I am opposed——

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me——

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend will get his chance to speak again. If he likes, I will move an amendment that will give him a chance again, but I would ask to be allowed to go on, as time is running more rapidly than I am. I meant to dwell upon this important fact a moment ago, and that was that every important English-speaking community in that large circle of young commonwealths that has girded this globe, remaining under the English flag, have the system of national schools. I meant to refer to the fact that in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and the Cape—that group of young colonies, nations many of them will be by and by, who stand around the English throne like strong sons around their mother, have all had the problem to deal with that we have, have all mixed populations, in some of which there are Catholics in very considerable proportions, and in every one of them except the province of Ontario, the solution they have worked out and steadily adhered to is national schools. I appeal to the common sense of the House and my Catholic friends if it is not fair to accept the solution arrived at in the eastern provinces of Canada, and the far-away provinces I have mentioned, as the quieter and more reasonable one—not the one that the Catholic or Protestant people best like, but the one that stands a compromise between the extreme views on either side. Is it not better to set our face on that as a final solution ? I do not know the politics of Upper and Lower Canada as well as the men from these provinces, but I heard the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) say last night that the settlement of 1863, which I think a disastrous settlement—I differ in that from the Hon. Mr. Ross—an unwise settlement, has not given the same public peace, the same good will, between Catholic and Protestant, the same kindly relations between the different communities that has been reached in the provinces by the sea and these Australian provinces.

I may give what we, Protestants, regard as the true solution of the school question. We think it is the duty of fathers and mothers, primarily, to teach their children religion. We supplement that by the Sunday school—to which many of us do not attach very much value—and by the beautiful books and papers that the publishing houses throw in such large numbers into our homes. We take the children with us to church on Sunday, and sometimes to other religious meetings. That is the Protestant idea, in those communions that do not believe in a state church. We know perfectly well that is not the Roman Catholic idea. Now, Mr. Speaker, must I again be charged with being a Protestant bigot and taking an extreme and bigoted view, when I say, that the happiest solution of the school question would be for the party to agree upon some such common ground as soon as we can, and get this unfortunate question out of politics? Our heart goes out in sympathy and pity, when we are reminded that there are children without mothers, and that some mothers are not fit to train them thus, mothers who have not the intelligence or other qualities to enable them to perform the duties properly devolving upon them in the training of their children. We feel heartily for these and are desirous that means should be adopted for their training.

With this broken line of argument I must conclude my remarks very quickly. I do not take a despondent view of the future of Canada. I think that sometimes in this chamber we speak without sufficient candour, Protestant and Catholic, French and English. It will make many of my own personal friends laugh heartily, when "Hansard" goes down to them, and they find that I am charged with being a Protestant bigot. I have dear and intimate friends, Catholics of my own province, whose homes are as open to me as that of my own brother, and I am sure that they, at all events, will laugh —those who know me better than some members of this House seem to.

I do not take a despondent view of the future of this country. Common sense and quiet counsels prevail more widely than many of us are inclined to think. I do not like to pay compliments to the leader of the party opposed to me, but I listened with admiration to the speech with which that distinguished public man, the leader of the Opposition, opened the discussion of this question for his side, and, like the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I read hope and promise in what followed. I do not think, that he will thank me for this reference to him. But let me say, also, that I, at all events, have been reading history too long not to know the records of the race from which he and his compatriots spring. It seems no mere mutual admiration, it seems no idle boast to say that the two foremost races in the world to-day are the Norman French from which the hon. gentleman and his people come, and the Anglo-Saxon from which we and our people come. And, if you go back to that point to which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) would carry us in the argument of any question, if you go back to the dawn of history tracing these two branches of mankind, you find that they are simply branches of the same stock, that came from one strip of seacoast, rovers, single men, one branch striking westward to marry Celtic women in England, and the other occupying the country further south and marry Celtic women in France. The latter came first into contact with Roman civilization and developed the French tongue. The latter came later in contact with civilization and Christianity and held to their original Anglo-Saxon speech. They are too much alike, they are too near together to be disrespectful to each other. And though the French people in Canada were overshadowed in the early part of our history by the political conquest of the eighteenth century, and though they have been impoverished by the removal of many of their best families who naturally returned to France, we must remember that, forming perhaps no more than one-third of our population, they have enriched our literature and strengthened our national life, enriched the debates of this Parliament to a degree that we in our own province often speak of. Is it not true that the foremost orator in Canada to-day is a French Canadian? Is is not true that the most accomplished man of letters now living in Canada is a French Canadian? Is it not true that the most accomplished writer on the history of Canada is a French Canadian? I believe that all these things are true. Is it not true that in the records of the Royal Society it is shown that the French Canadians give far more than their quota to the valuable transactions of that body. These things we all know. I may be forgiven for saying that for the last two or three weeks I have been reading Matthew Arnold's letters. He was one who knew better and appreciated more highly the thought and feelings of the French than the vast majority of Englishmen do. So highly did he speak of them that it was an old taunt thrown at him that he was not a patriotic Englishman, that he preferred the French to his own countrymen. And I was very much struck with his suggestion, what a calamity it would be in this British Empire if we were all of one race—and it must not be forgotten that he was the brother-in-law of Foster, that very able public man, who was the founder of the Imperial Federation League, a man who grew out of the Little England school and gained wide imperial views. Why cannot we be charitable and forbearing towards each other as "children of the same dear God and heirs of some six feet of sod," who need not distress each other, who need not hate each other, but who can see much in each other to approve. At meetings in my own province where there was not a single French Canadian or a single French Acadian present I have heard the hall ring with applause when the praises of Sir George Cartier were sounded. I know that tears were in the brightest eyes in the city in which I live when the news came of his death, and that those who most deeply mourned were those who well knew his service to the state. The English people are not what many of you French people think us. I hope that more of you will come down to our provinces and see us and learn more of us. We have seen the leader of the Opposition there, the Deputy Speaker has been there, the Minister of Public Works has come amongst us. But more should come to the lower provinces. All who come will get a hearty lower-province welcome, and will surely learn what we English people are not what many of them think us. It is not worthy of the two races in this country to stand as if we were Christians and Saracens. The Protestants and the Catholics have more points of similarity than of contrast, and we make too little of the points in which we are alike. Had I not spoken so long, I would have said a few words about our own party and about the position of myself and others. As to myself, I was born into my politics as much as I was born into my religious faith. I take from my father as much of one as I do the other. I have always held staunchly by my party except for three or four years, the Pacific Scandal, and I am free to say that I was sick and tired of the revelations in the matter. When I heard the hon. member for West Assiniboia say the other day that we belonged to a party which had the instinct and tradition of government, I thought he spoke words of magnificent eloquence and absolute truth. I still believe that the Liberal-Conservative party, with its powerful press, in spite of the follies of a paper here and there, and its enthusiastic young men, has educated its people to large ideas and made them capable of sustaining an Administration of large achievements. I profoundly regret that the Administration of to-day has taken a course on the school question which I cannot follow. I believe they are not reflecting the views of anything like one-half of the electors of the Liberal-Conservative party. That may seem a strange thing to say when I shall see not as many as I would like of the members of this House, rise, as I shall rise, and vote against this Bill. Nevertheless I confidently believe that; and while it will give me no great personal pain to be drummed out of my county, if that event were to happen, or to be drummed out of this House, I shall still remember with pride that I had this night made this speech in favour of national schools.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not propose to trespass on your time and on the patience of the House at any great length. I was somewhat struck by the picture drawn by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Weldon) in connection with certain facts which transpired and which he painted in vivid colours, as to the difficulties that occurred amongst the members of the present Government, and his closing scene where they disappeared down a vortex, the last to descend being the Secretary of State. Sir, I have always admired the ability of the hon. gentleman; although I might not be able to appreciate, but that would be my fault, his great constitutional powers, his grasp of mind, his broadness of view, and the liberality that he expressed here to-night. These must have charmed every man who listened to him. What constitutes the broad, liberal principles of the hon. gentleman? When he was asked what remedy he proposed for the little minority in Manitoba, why, he says, with a glow of charity on his face, with every apparent evidence of good nature,—why, he says, we put them exactly in the position of the minority in New Brunswick. And he was cheered by hon. gentlemen who, not many years ago, betrayed the minority of New Brunswick. They cheer again. Why? Because they see their political party, as they saw it then, likely to gain advantage, and that was the reason of their betrayal on that occasion. The hon. gentleman thinks that he will be generous to the minority of Manitoba if he places them in the position of the minority in New Brunswick. I have sat here and heard the story oft repeated of the peace and harmony that reigned in New Brunswick, in my own province, on account of the peaceful and happy solution of the school question there. What is the solution? The position of the minority in New Brunswick is this: peace has been restored. Yes, and why? Their rights have been taken away as ruthlessly as the rights were taken away from the minority in Manitoba. Peace is restored. Why? Because the Roman Catholic minority in New Brunswick recognized the circumstances, and they have consented to suffer in silence. We are told that in New Brunswick the system of separate schools is recognized. They are suffered in parts of New Brunswick; their privilege is given as a matter of grace; the Catholics are grateful for that concession to the Government of the day that gave them, and may sweep them away to-morrow. But is that the way to deal with a question of right? The difference between the two cases is simply this. We are prohibited from making any movement to redress our wrongs, to restore the rights that we believe were guaranteed to us honestly, as the same rights were guaranteed to Quebec and Ontario; because the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have decided that in the interpretation of the Confederation Act, inasmuch as there was no special law establishing those separate schools in that province, they had not equal rights, not constitutional rights, and we were therefore thrown out of court. What is the difference between the two cases ? It is this : the minority in Manitoba are relying upon a guarantee more explicit than ours, more clearly defined than ours, still subject to the fatal doubt that may be raised by these giants of constitutional law. The first judgment shows that even the great Parliament of Canada, with the well known intention of guaranteeing the rights of the minority, failed to pass an Act capable of being so interpreted by the highest tribunal of the land. But I will put against the authority of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, the authority that he has so complimented and admired, and which I have listened to with such satisfaction to-day, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The hon. member for Bothwell not only swept away every argument that has been made from the beginning by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and lightly brushed aside the objections raised by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon); but he did more, he backed up every argument that was made in favour of the position that we have taken ; and though we have had some able speeches on that question from this side of the House, I must say that I was pleased to find that every argument that was advanced from this side of the House in favour of this Bill, was made stronger, and if possible, clearer, by the logical conclusions drawn by that sound authority upon constitutianal law. Sir, I do not want to hear any more of the generosity, this mercy for the little minority in Manitoba, if you are going to give them just exactly what you gave the minority in New Brunswick, and made them so happy. You betrayed the minority in New Brunswick ; their rights were taken away. A pledge was made to restore to them those rights, but that pledge was not kept. There is no means of redress. They have to live, and accept whatever measure of liberality is doled out by the Government of the day. The time came when the government of New Brunswick, feeling that they required to maintain their power, abolished their rights and raised a religious cry in the province, which was the policy of the present Government in Manitoba, and the secret, I believe, of their school legislation. Who in this country believes that the hon. member who sits for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), or the hon. gentleman who leads the Government in Manitoba to-day, were so devoted to the question of education itself, had such high ideas about it, that they made that the principal plank in their platform in the interests of education when seeking election ? Those who know what took place in that province then will believe me when I say, and I have good reasons for saying it, that they adopted the school policy at a time when they were so discounted throughout the province that they dare not face the electors on an ordinary issue, and so they adopted the policy of dividing the people of that province by raising this issue on the school question. They succeeded, and the minority there paid the penalty. I returned to the beautiful painting which the hon. gentleman presented of my colleagues, no doubt including myself—I was not paying particular attention at the time, but I have no reason to believe that I was excluded from the scene—going down the vortex. The hon. gentleman referred to the Secretary of State, but I have no doubt he included the whole Government. I am glad some were saved. But it struck me at the time that, recognizing the artistic hand, the hon. gentleman himself must have been very close to it at a certain time. Did the hon. gentleman draw back from the vortex in time, or did he hold that if some other course were pursued there would be no vortex.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman and the Prime Minister were present when the first negotiations took place, and the hon. gentleman knows as much about it as any person in the country.

Mr. TARTE. Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Some hon. member says "Hear, hear."

Mr. TARTE. I think I have a right to say hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Certainly. I do not know how far I would be justified in referring to any conversation that took place between the hon. gentleman and the Prime Minister while I was present. It may be a matter that he wishes to be private.

Mr. WELDON. I do not. A number of rumors were afloat, which I am sure the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is too fair-minded a gentleman to have repeated, and therefore I think it is proper to give him a chance to make a statement. I had two interviews with the Prime Minister in regard to entering the Cabinet. The hon. gentleman knows more than any one else, and he is bound to take my word for it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am in a difficulty yet. I do not wish to be offensive to the hon. gentleman ; but I see some difficulty in knowing exactly what position he thinks I ought to hold. He says that I know more than anybody else. About what ? He has referred to certain rumours. I have not made any reference to rumours, and I do not wish to do so. I simply said about the vortex and the picture. I do not feel at liberty to mention what took place during the very short time I was present when a conversation took place between the hon. gentleman and the Prime Minister. If the hon. gentleman and the Prime Minister agree that a statement should be made, I shall not have the slightest objection to make it, but I will not make it without consent. The hon. gentleman says I know so much, but I know nothing very important that I can reveal. I have not circulated rumours. The hon. gentleman can reconcile his own dealings with the majority of his colleagues in New Brunswick. I do not know how far he will be successful in satisfying them.

Mr. WELDON. The Prime Minister gave me his sanction.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will not allude any further to personal matters. I have given my opinion of the value of the deep sympathy expressed for the minority in Manitoba through the remedy proposed by the hon. gentleman, for which he was cheered so heartily by his friends on this side and on the other side of the House, who would be very pleased to see the Government if not in the vortex depicted by the hon. gentleman, in some vortex that would be equally agreeable and favourable to their aspirations. I am not going to enter into the constitutional features of this question, for I am not capable of doing so, and if I were a lawyer, I might do what has already been done, I might add to the confusion. We have had this matter so thoroughly threshed out from the constitutional point of view that laymen are beginning to wonder what is constitutional law as interpreted in this Parliament. We have very different interpretations given of a very simple Act. I cannot conceive how hon. gentlemen belonging to the legal profession can differ so widely with each other. But one thing strikes me as most remarkable, and that is that while the cry has been raised against the Government and hon. gentlemen who support the Government in passing the Remedial Bill on the ground that it is a coercion Act and is even calculated to create rebellion in the North-west, the same hon. gentlemen in the next breath declare that it is perfectly powerless, and on that account is utterly worthless and harmless. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) whose argument all the way through was able, clear and logical and convincing up to the end of the constitutional argument, said, when he began the political part of his speech, that this was a threat against the Protestants of the country. I am sorry he used that expression; there was no call for it, there was no justification for it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have repeated ever since the Bill was introduced that this was a coercive measure and was taking Manitoba by the throat, and in the next sentence they declared to the French Catholics that they should not accept the Bill because there was nothing in it. At the same time hon. gentlemen opposite seek to defeat the Government, and they declare that the passing of a Bill which is so obnoxious and objectionable will create a division in the Conservative party, and will lead to the defeat of the Conservative Government and the Conservative party. But what do those hon. gentlemen say when they seek to condemn us, and at the same time assert that their action is taken in the interest of peace. They affirm that we had an opportunity to arrive at a peaceable solution of the difficulty in 1891, if after the passing of the Manitoba Act we had exercised the power of disallowance and had disallowed that Act. That would have been a peaceable solution.

Mr. WELDON. You could have done it if you had wanted to do it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman may be strong on constitutional law, but he is weak in practical common-sense. It would have been in the opinion of some hon. gentlemen, a peaceable solution if we had with that sledge hammer destroyed that law which we know the highest tribunal has pronounced constitutional, and thus destroy the whole public schools of Manitoba and wiped them out. But if you pass this, after doing everything that the constitution requires the Government to do; if you pass this measure of relief to the minority, there is a clause of rebellion.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman must not put words in my mouth. I did not use the words peaceable solution—some one else must have said that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Perhaps you did not use the words "peaceable solution." "Sledge-hammer" I think was the word you used. Possibly the words "peaceable solution" were used by somebody else.

Mr. WELDON. You have no right to say that. The hon. gentleman should withdraw it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Oh, yes; I withdraw the words "peaceable solution."

Mr. WELDON. I did not use the words "peaceable solution" at all.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am admitting that. I am saying you used the words "sledge-hammer." Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as this argument is concerned, I do not think it has much force, and it ought have no force at all in this Parliament.

Now, Sir, what have we within our own practical knowledge. We know from experience, that conflicts have arisen between the central power and the provincial powers on many occasions. I think from memory, that something like fifty or sixty Bills from different provinces have been disallowed. Without the exercise of the power of disallowance, other issues have arisen by a reference to the courts with regard to these questions, as to whether the power lay in the provincial legislatures or in the Federal Parliament. In some cases, out of the fifty odd cases of disallowance I have referred to, if you will look back you will find that in some cases the Bill was re-enacted in a modified form. You will find in others, that the provinces yielded, and submitted to the decision which recognized the propriety of the exercise of the veto power. You will find again in other cases that it was contested and referred to the courts. But, one thing you will find in every instance that ever occurred in our Canadian history, and that is, that whatever the decision was, whether in favour of the central power or in favour of the provincial power, it was recognized by both, and loyally acted upon. And, Sir, in this one case only, has the authority of the highest judicial tribunal of the land been disputed, and sought to be misinterpreted by hon. gentlemen who ought to know better.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman has no right to make those offensive remarks.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Weldon) must not think that he is meant, every time I refer to a member of this House. I speak in general terms. I do not mean to insinuate that he is the sole constitutional authority within the walls of this Chamber. I did not mention the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) at all.

Mr. WELDON. That is personally very offensive.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that I am offensive.

Mr. WELDON. I do.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not at all mean to be offensive to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WELDON. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) says, that a fellow-member is lacking in common sense, I would like to take your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as to whether that is a Parliamentary term?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I will take my seat, as I would like to hear your ruling on that important point.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid that I can hardly be called upon to determine whether hon. members are lacking in common sense or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. We need not challenge your decision on that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I was waiting, Mr. Speaker, to see what you would decide upon that serious point of order, because I wished to shape my course according to your ruling. But, as you have given no ruling, and I am consequently unable to rely upon your authority, I will let the matter drop. Sir, one feature of the case has been repeatedly referred to by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House—what I mean by both sides of the House, is, those hon. gentlemen who are in favour of and those who are opposed to this Bill—they have referred to the "peaceable solution" that might have been obtained, compared with this revolutionary means that has been taken to restore, moderately, the constitutional rights to the minority in Manitoba. I still hold to the view that the policy of the late Sir John Thompson has proved wise. I am sorry to gather from the speeches made by some hon. gentlemen in this House, that I may see now, rising to oppose the second reading of this measure, gentlemen who have supported, and endorsed, and applauded the policy laid down by the late Sir John Thompson, both on the floor of this House and on the public platform of this country These gentlemen will not now support this Bill which is the outcome of the constitutional law laid down on the question by the late Right Hon. Sir John Thompson. Sir, the policy which the Government has pursued is the policy foreshadowed by our late Premier. This Government has kept faith with the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite are uneasy because this Government has undertaken to carry out its pledges: and in order to restore good nature to my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) who appeared to be somewhat offended—I trust without reason—I may repeat a little anecdote which I think is applicable just now. A gentleman travelling, called at an inn, one night. Tired and looking forward to a comfortable night's rest, he retired early, but was not long in bed when he heard tramp, tramp, overhead. A gentleman occupied the room above him, and the noise continued, until eventually the weary traveller mounted the stairs and rapped at the door of the disturber's room. He said to him: My friend, I am awfully fatigued and expected a good night's rest, but I cannot sleep if you continue tramping up and down. The man replied: I cannot sleep. I am in misery. And, the traveller having asked him what was wrong, he replied: Well, I signed a note for $5,000, and got one of my best friends to endorse it. It is due to-morrow, and I cannot meet it. My friend is able to, but it will ruin him and embarrass him, and I wish to know from you, is not that enough to keep me awake. Oh, said the traveller, go and lie down, and let the other fellow do the walking about for a little while.

Well, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite have taunted this side of the House with divisions and dissensions, and during all this session they have gloried in that. It has already been stated, that in a party as old as the Conservative party, as broad as the Conservative party, as numerous and as strong as the Conservative party, it is not to be wondered at, that on some great question there would be found differences of opinion. Not such a difference as would divide the strong Conservative party into two hostile camps, but such, that some few of its members might be unable to follow the party policy on this question. Sir, that was not the trouble with gentlemen on the other side of the House. The division amongst them was more serious. The division amongst us was one that was pretty well understood, and we know, I hope, the extent of it. We know the gentlemen who will support the policy of the Government, and we know the gentlemen that feel that they cannot conscientiously go for the measure that the Government proposes. But the hon. gentlemen opposite are in this position, that it is almost impossible for them, though not entirely, to obey the mandate of the hon. member for North Simcoe ; but there is a higher power, the Toronto "Globe," which is placing them in this position. The Toronto "Globe" has given its command. It has put them in such a position that they are bound to walk around a little while ; and when their walk will end I cannot foretell. Another argument has been used, not in this House, except by one or two speakers, but in the country—that this question of separate schools is so vexatious a question in the eyes of a large portion of the people, that they will not accept any measure which will force these upon Manitoba. It is very well understood by those gentlemen who wish to understand it, that this is not a question of separate schools in principle. That has been made clear as noon-day by the hon. member for Bothwell. He says that if it were a question of separate schools, as against common or national schools, that would be a question of policy, and we would select a system of schools for Manitoba, and would have a right to do so, after discussing the merits of both. But under our constitution we have no right to touch the merits of the question at all, as to whether one system is better than another. But the hon. gentleman said more : if you want to obey the constitution though you may be strongly opposed to separate schools, if the compact shows that separate schools were guaranteed to the minority, you will, if you want to discharge your duty as an honest public man, restore those schools. I heard the argument to-night for the first time from the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), that this Parliament was deciding as a matter of principle the question of separate schools. I deny it emphatically, and I wonder where his inspiration for such an argument came from. I have never heard that hon. gentleman take that ground before. It is not a question of separate schools in principle. We have no right to decide or discuss what kind of schools they shall have in Manitoba. The only question is that involved in the decision of the Privy Council that certain rights and privileges were taken away, and that they should be restored. If you call them separate schools, or whatever kind of schools they were that were taken from these people, they should be restored.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman show me where the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council made the statement that the rights which were taken away must be restored ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I cannot turn it up just now.

Mr. McNEILL. You cannot do it, because it is not there.

Mr. GILLIES. They said a right had been taken away.

Mr. McNEILL. It did not require the Privy Council to tell us that. We all knew that.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am not a lawyer, but I tell the hon. gentleman that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council did decide that there were grievances, and laid down exactly what privileges the Catholics had enjoyed before 1890, such as the right to give religious instruction and to manage their own schools ; and those were among the rights which were taken away and which should be restored. They did not say those rights shall be restored ; but the hon. member for Bothwell made the matter as clear as it can be made to those who wish to see it. Another remark I want to make is this. The hon. member for Albert says that there is a strong feeling in the country against separate schools. He says the Catholics of this country as a body are not in favour of separate schools.

Mr. WELDON. I said not all the Catholics were in favour of separate schools. I meant most of the Catholics were, but some were not.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is what I am saying. He said that the Protestants of the country are largely opposed to separate schools. I know the reason of that—because an agitation was excited many years ago against the very name of Catholic schools. There are men in Canada who oppose Catholic schools, but who would not be able to tell you what a Catholic school meant—who have never been inside of one and do not know the rules observed there, but who are prejudiced against them, by the information conveyed to them, and who honestly believe that those schools are wrong. But if you take the Catholics and the Protestants of this country from Vancouver to Cape Breton, and poll their votes, I am satisfied that you will find at least five-eighths of our whole population will say give us religious instruction in our schools, instead of banishing God from them. What is the great difficulty in settling this question if, as some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have said, the Manitoba government have been on their knees begging for a settlement ? We all know what their attitude has been on this question. It has been just the same as that of hon. gentlemen opposite. They could not work more in line with the Opposition in this House than they have been doing if they were occupying benches on the opposite side of this chamber. My impression, arrived at long ago, has always been that if an effort had been made by the leaders of the party opposite, a solution of the difficulty could have been found and would have been found in the provincial legislature itself; and we would not have had the question here. But having been unable to reach that solution, we are obliged to deal with the question here. An effort has been made to create a prejudice against the system of separate schools by the statement that they are controlled by the Catholic clergy. The impression has been created that the Catholic hierarchy desire to control the education of its people for the purpose of keeping them in ignorance, in order that it may govern them the more easily. That is the doctrine preached in many parts of this country, not before intelligent audiences, but in many places, to create prejudice against our people, our schools and our clergy. I say that there is no more dishonest argument, there is no argument which is so utterly at variance with the facts of history, than the argument that the Catholic Church and Catholic influence has ever been hostile to education or averse to affording the greatest amount of facilities for education. Such a statement cannot be made with any effect before any intelligent audience. The history of the past shows that the Catholic church and its clergy have been the strongest advocates of not only the common education but the higher education as well for its people. While the Catholic church is anxious that its people should receive religious instruction, it does not consider its duty finished until they are fitted for the battle of life by means of the higher education. It has done more to place education within the reach of the poor than any other institution. It has done more than the State itself, and if I did not fear to trespass on the time of the House at this hour, I would give statistics to show that it is entitled to the gratitude of the world for what it has done in the past and what it is doing now for the advancement of education in every country. And to-day, where the education is carried on by means of the resources of the Catholic church, that church does more in proportion, makes greater sacrifices and accomplishes more than any other institution. Hon. gentlemen, perhaps, will not blame me if I just read a few extracts to establish that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you mean in British speaking countries?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes. Take the record of Catholic universities established in Europe before the Reformation:—

France	20
Italy	15
Germany	15
Spain	7
Austria	2
Scotland	3
Switzerland	2
England	2
Portugal	1
Poland	1
Belgium	1
Hungary	1
Sweden	1
Denmark	1
Total	72

Then take Catholic universities established in Europe since the Reformation:

France	8
Italy	8
Spain	6
Austria	4
Germany	9
Hungary	3
Belgium	3
Alsace	2
Portugal	1
Ireland	1
Polish Russia	1
	118 in all.)

Then take universities established by Protestants since the Reformation:

Germany	12
Switzerland	4
Holland	4
England	3
Sweden	3
Scotland	2
Ireland	1
Norway	1
Finland	1
Total	31

Take the universities having over 1,000 students:

Protestant universities, old and new	21
Catholic	29

Then if you look at it from the point of view of the highest percentage of university education. Mulhall says:

> The number of university students compared with population is much greater in Spain and Belgium than in other European countries.
> In 1889, England with its population of 27,826,798, had 8,802 students in her universities, while Spain with a population of 16,945,786 had 15,787 students in her universities.

Belgium, with a population of 6,000,000 reports 4,252 strictly university students, and has attending the schools of fine arts the following numbers:—

Students in the universities	4,252
Royal Academy of Fine Arts, Antwerp	1,315
Schools of Design	14,565
Royal Conservatories and other schools of music	14,869
	35,001

This is a pretty good showing for Catholic Belgium with its 6,000,000 population—35,001 students receiving a higher education not to tire the House with a multiplication of examples strengthening the proof of the superiority of Catholic nations in this respect, I will content myself with one other:

	Population.	Univer-sities.	Students.
Catholic Italy.....	28,000,000	21	16,922
Protestant Prussia	29,000,000	11	13,483

Then take the universities with both Protestant and Catholic faculties, in Germany. Bonn, Breslau, Tubingen—these universities had 3,640 students. On the other hand, if we take the universities with Catholic faculties, we find they number 71, with 78,251 students, as compared with universities with Protestant faculties, numbering 36, with 45,885 students. This needs no comment, and I commend it to the careful inspection of every fair-minded person. Take the United States. Out of 316 colleges and universities under religious control, 51 have been established and maintained by Roman Catholics, and no one has pretended that these 51 institutions are not quite equal in every respect to any other 51 Protestant institutions of the same kind. It must be remarked, also, that while the Catholic population, according to the census report, is one-ninth of the whole, yet despite their many disadvantages in comparison with Protestants, they have succeeded in establishing one-eighth of all these higher institutions of learning. I could quote the opinions of many eminent authorities to show that the policy of the Catholic church has been in favour of higher education for the masses as well as religious instruction. I said on a former occasion that it was unfair for the hon. member for North Simcoe to charge Catholics of this country with the responsibility of this agitation. I declared that charge to be unjust and unreasonable, because Catholics are not responsible for the guarantees that are found in our constitution. That was denied, but as it has been proved since very thoroughly by the hon. members for Quebec, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives), and as it has been pretty well borne out by the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I shall not refer to it any further. But I shall refer to this part of the hon. member for Simcoe's argument. He said that we were using this argument for the sake of creating prejudice. Well, my only reason for using that argument was not to create prejudice, but to ask for sympathy on grounds on which we are entitled to expect it from every right thinking and proper minded man. No fair-minded man would attribute such a motive to me as that attributed by the hon. member for North Simcoe. The hon. gentleman said shortly afterwards that he was sick and tired of hearing references to the generosity of the people of Quebec towards the minority of the people of Quebec. And he said that there was nothing in this, that there was none of this generosity we heard of. Well, Mr. Speaker, that the Protestants of Quebec have been dealt with in a spirit of generosity and fair-play on all occasions by the Catholic majority cannot be denied, at any rate in the province of Quebec. I have never heard an exception ever mentioned to the uniform kindness and generous treatment which the minority in that province have received at the hands of the majority. But I can understand why the hon. member for North Simcoe is perhaps a little sick and a little tired of hearing these statements and these references to the peace and harmony that exist in the province of Quebec, because that condition of things does not suit the line he has taken. He would rather be able to stand up here and say: Look at my Protestant fellow-citizens in the province of Quebec. See how they are ground down by the Catholic majority. But, thank God, he cannot do this. He, perhaps, is the only gentleman in this Parliament who would take that same line and say he was sick and tired of hearing references made—to what? To the best feelings of humanity, to the fact that in the province of Quebec there is a condition of things which it would be well for this country if it existed in every other portion of it. Then we have been told that we should not interfere at all. And if I had not the authority of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I should feel rather weak and helpless against these great constitutional lights who tell us: You have the power, but you are not obliged to act. Well, I think I can quote the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) himself on that point and that when he was talking of provincial rights. In 1889 he said:

> The worship of what is called local autonomy, which some gentlemen have become addicted to, is fraught, I venture to say, with great evil to this Dominion. Our allegiance is due to the Dominion of Canada. The separation into provinces, the right of local self-government which we possess, is not to make us less citizens of the Dominion, is not to make us less anxious for the promotion of the welfare of the Dominion; and it is no argument to say that because a certain piece of legislation is within the power of a local Parliament, therefore that legislation is not to be disturbed.

So that even where the Acts are admitted to be within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, the hon. gentleman wanted this Parliament to interfere. But in this case, although the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council says that rights which previously existed have been taken away, he says that we must not interfere at all. Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken a stand upon this question that it is difficult for me to understand. At first they did their best to educate the people, especially in the province of Quebec to the belief that the Government were not sincere and that there would be no legislation.

Mr. LISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. But we have now introduced that legislation.

Mr. LISTER. You don't intend to go on with it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. These hon. gentlemen called upon us to bring down our Bill. They wanted the Bill at once. And when it was announced that the Bill would be down in a few days, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) became anxious. He indicated that he would be forced to vote for the Bill. He left it to be understood that it would draw the lines sharply between Quebec and Ontario. I did not think at the time that that would necessarily follow. It is not likely to follow now, judging from the statements of the hon. gentleman. Then again we have been accused of keeping this question before the country for political purposes. No accusation could be made against a party with less foundation than this. No charge could be so wholly wanting in fair-play—I do not speak of justice, but of common fair-play. The Conservative party has done more to build up this country and establish harmony among its different elements than the Liberal party ever did or could do. The hon. gentlemen have done a great deal in the other direction. The Toronto "Globe" seeks to get back to its old ground of a quarter of a century ago, in order to take followers from the other side. But its former experience will be renewed, an experience fatal to any party. Speaking of the hon. member for L'Islet who speaks now of the Liberal party being the friends of peace and unity, I can only say that he did not always entertain that opinion. I have here a quotation from a newspaper in the province of Quebec dealing with the Prime Minister of the province of that day. It reads as follows, as nearly as can be translated :

FATAL DEMAGOGY.

> The imprudence and political indiscretion of Mr. Mercier have already brought many troubles on our province and our race. It was he who provoked the agitation under which French institutions have succumbed in Manitoba, and which has endangered Catholic schools in Ontario. He knows this, and yet, yesterday again, we have him uttering shouts of defiance, appealing to passion and prejudice, and stupidly charging his adversaries with having gone over to the Protestants, and of being in sympathy with Mr. McCarthy, &c.
> It is Mr. Mercier's own political friends who are persecuting our co-religionists in Manitoba. It is Mr. Greenway's Liberal Cabinet which has decreed the destruction of our schools and the abolition of our language.
> All the fanatics in Canada can find in the First Minister's speech arms wherewith to strike us and reasons for denouncing us.
> Within the last two years, through his aggressive and uncalled-for course, we have lost in the Dominion the fruits of the struggles and efforts of a quarter of a century. And now he is beginning his system of provocation over again, in the hope of directing public attention from the gross blunders he has committed in administering the affairs of the country.
> We enter our protest against this dangerous and unpatriotic policy.
> We call upon all who do not want to see every other race in the country set in battle array against us to put down this demagogy so fraught with the spirit of faction, and leading to fatal consequences.

That paper was "Le Canadien" of May, 1890, J. Israel Tarte, proprietor and editor.

I am sorry to have trespassed upon the time of the House so long at this late hour and I must conclude. I say this, and I say it honestly and I hope that my words will not cause offence to any gentleman in this House or out of it. It has been fairly said that this is a question of the rights of minorities. It happens to be the case of a Roman Catholic minority. To-morrow it may be the case of a Protestant minority. And I repeat that I wish it were a Protestant minority in this case, for I and my fellow Catholics in this House would then feel more enthusiasm and less delicacy in supporting their rights than we do in supporting those of our people of our own faith. I am a Roman Catholic. I have been brought up in that persuasion.

I have been brought up as a Roman Catholic, with a view as broad as our own Dominion, and as boundless as far as true Liberalism is concerned. I despise tyranny, bigotry and prejudice, and because I despise them, I would despise myself if I were capable of distrusting my fellow-men for holding an opposite faith to myself. I believe that a man is not perfect in the eyes of God if he is not able to meet his brother man as God intended he should. I believe when a man allows himself to be swayed by prejudice or narrow-minded views, he shrinks from the full position of manhood. I am a Roman Catholic, and I have stood on the stump side by side with Protestant Canadians, fighting political battles, and I fought as truly for them and the principles we both shared, as if they knelt at the same alter. I am an Irish Catholic, and I have stood on the platform, not only with Protestants, but with gentlemen who belonged to the Orange association. For this I was denounced, but I never made an apology for it. I stood with them, not because they were Orangemen, but because they were Canadians, advocating a Canadian policy. I stood with them because the platform upon which I have always stood is broad enough for every man in Canada, let him be Catholic or Protestant. There is only one line I draw. We have to govern this country by party Government. One of two parties ought to govern this country, one party must be more acceptable to the country than the other, and share to a larger extent its confidence. That is the party that ought to govern the country, and within that party, in this country, there must be Protestants and Catholics, there must be Frenchmen and Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen, and men of all nationalities who dwell in this country. The only dividing line that I recognize in the halls of Parliament, aye, and if justice were done, the interests of this country were to be studied, the only dividing line which any of us should recognize, is that which divides the two great parties of this country in their general policy of administration. Therefore, I hope, that we shall never reach a time when any other line shall be drawn than this one. Now, if that condition of things should be broken into, if it should be strained, it will be from efforts of men misguided in their judgment. I hope, but the breaking in, or the straining, will not sunder the political lines that are laid down strongly, and upon which the future of this country depends. If the day should come that we should depart from these lines, it would be a misfortune. I hope that in my day I will stand in public life, or in private life, on the same lines where I have always stood, side by side with Canadians who agree with me on the public questions of the day, without asking in what church they worship, or to what nationality they belong. But in this school question which has been discussed by speaker after speaker, whether on its constitutional aspect or otherwise, when you wipe away the cobweb, what do you find ? There is a grievance, not a doubt about that. No man dares to say there is not a grievance. There is a power vested in this Parliament to remedy grievances of that nature a power provided by the constitution ; no man has dared to dispute that. The grievance exists to a little minority. We are a powerful Parliament, a powerful people, boasting of our broad views, boasting of our generosity, all extolling the glowing future we look forward to for this country ; and are we to be guided by these giant intellects, these constitutional—I will not use the words I might use, as you might correct me, Mr. Speaker, —I will say, debaters, who split hairs, not with a view of coming to the relief of the minority who plead for protection and generous treatment ; but who split hairs and say : The minority is right, we sympathize with them, but that t never was crossed, the i in that section never was dotted. Let them suffer constitutionally, we must stand by our interpretation of the constitution. In my opinion the interpretation of the constitution is that which has been given by the highest court in the Empire, and it is an interpretation which accords with natural rights. The hon. member for Bothwell has shown that the tribunal to which we have appealed is not a Canadian tribunal it is not even the tribunal for England ; it is the tribunal for Great Britain, for Ireland, for Canada and for every British colony in the world. Its decision has been binding heretofore, and this is the only case in which I have ever heard its decision called in question. Therefore I may fairly ask every hon. gentleman in this House : Why should we not be generous ? I do not ask you to sacrifice one letter of the constitution. But while I would feel justified in asking you for that sacrifice, if it were necessary to do so, with how much more reason have I a right to ask my fellow-members in this House to pass a Bill that does not destroy, or effect or endanger the public schools of Manitoba one iota, but restores to the minority, so far as Parliament can do so, the rights that were taken away, and that we are clothed with the power to restore. I hope the Bill will get that consideration which it is entitled to, which the country will give it when the country is called upon to pronounce ; and when the cobwebs that have been thrown around this question have been swept away, when the people are educated to know what the real facts are, we will be surprised to see how little opposition there is to it, after all.

Mr. EDWARDS. In the discussion of the matter before the House, we have listened to many long and able speeches. Of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Costigan) I will say this, that I thoroughly believe in the sentiments he expressed in his closing remarks. I believe he is a man of broad gauge. I have always respected him, and I hope I always shall respect him. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who opened this debate, the Secretary of State, also made his closing speech to-day, and what did we expect on such an occasion ? We expected some summary of the debate, some argument, and some broad discussion of the question. But after eulogizing the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), he devoted himself to the leader of the Opposition, and what did he say ? He said that his speech was eloquent, and he very properly congratulated him on the eloquence of his great speech ; but he said at the same time that it was nothing more or less than a bundle of contradictions from beginning to end. Did he take up that speech, and show wherein the leader of the Opposition was chargeable with one single contradiction ? No, Sir, not at all. He devoted himself to an exultation of his own acts. He also greatly deplored the discord which this debate would create in this country as the result of turning nationalities and creeds against each other. Was there ever a speech delivered in this House more calculated to turn class and creed against each other than the speech of the hon. gentleman ? He is the great I am. According to his own statement, he made in Nova Scotia ; after he made Nova Scotia, he created the Dominion, he is always engaged in the unification of the Empire, and when he has completed that work he is going to tackle the universe. The hon. gentleman claims that in a lecture he delivered as a youth he laid the foundations of confederation. I have always understood that the Hon. Joseph Howe and Sir Alexander Galt were the first men who introduced that question they being followed by Hon. George Brown, and to Mr. Brown more than to any other man confederation is due. I have stated that the speech of the Secretary of State was calculated more than any speech to which I have ever listened to turn creed against creed and nationality against nationality. He has done a great wrong to the country in that regard. But there is a party in this House to whom the country owes a gratitude for the manly position they have taken, I refer to the French Liberals of the province of Quebec. But for them we might have a war of races; owing to their noble conduct, however, they have averted such a disaster. What did the hon. Secretary of State do? He took position after position to show how the Liberal party had been unjust from confederation forward to the Roman Catholic minority. Is the hon. gentleman aware that there is a Conservative party in Ontario? What has been the conduct of that party for many years past? Is that not the party which has attempted to wreck the constitution, to destroy separate schools in that province, to put down the French language. Three successive elections have been run on those lines in Ontario, and the chief of the party who ran the elections in the interest of the Conservatives has received his reward, and is now Chief Justice of the province. From whom has he received his reward? From the very men who are now claiming that they are defending the rights of the Catholic minority. So far as the rights of the Catholic minority are concerned their defence is more largely to be credited to the Liberal party than to any other party in the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have asserted that the leader of the Opposition was making a great bid for power. The Minister of Finance said the other day that my hon. friend was playing a bold game, he even referred to cards up his sleeves, but the hon. Minister knows more about matters of that kind than I do. The Conservative party to-day, driven into a corner, are making a desperate bid for the entire Roman Catholic vote of the Dominion. But they are not going to obtain it, for the Roman Catholics well know that the present Government have made this school question a political one throughout. They have simply deceived the Roman Catholics, and they in turn do not trust the Government. The Liberal party are a party that will not do more for Roman Catholics than for Protestants, but will mete out equal-handed justice to all. As regards the question before the House I am not afraid, as I have never been afraid, to state my own views and position upon it. My views no doubt differ to a considerable extent from those held by some hon. gentlemen who will vote as I will vote upon this question. From the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance a few days ago, it was evident that a great change had come over the position of certain parties in this country. I was highly amused to hear a Conservative argue exactly on the same lines so far as the rights of the minorities are concerned as we in Ontario have been arguing for many years past. As I understand the question, separate schools are guaranteed to the province of Ontario under confederation; dissentient schools in Quebec are in exactly the same position. I have always understood that the separate school system originated at the instance of the Protestants of Qeubec. I know this from an acquaintance with dissentient schools in Quebec, that the Protestants of that province will not be willing to surrender them; and I further believe that the Roman Catholics in that province have done even-handed justice to the Protestants and will continue to do so. So far as Ontario is concerned, I believe the same conditions will prevail, and to my mind it is not a question as to whether we like separate schools or not, but the question is what has been guaranteed under the constitution to the minorities in those two provinces in that respect. Those conditions we are bound to maintain. So far as I am concerned public schools will satisfy me and I want nothing more; but I am not disposed to ask other men to take my medicine. As I understand it, the only difference between Protestant and Catholic on this question is one of degree. In Quebec, the Protestants want separate schools, and in Ontario the Catholics want separate schools. It is true the Protestants are satisfied with a less degree of religion in their schools, I believe, than the Roman Catholics are, and it is only in this respect that they differ.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my views on this question are as follows: In so far as the maritime provinces are concerned, I do not think that the Dominion Government would have any right at all to interfere. These provinces had their legislatures before confederation, and no change was made at that time. I believe, that in so far as these provinces are concerned, it is within their own jurisdiction to continue their school affairs as they please. In so far as the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are concerned, we have the separate schools as a fixture, and I do not believe that they will, or can be, changed. Now, then, in so far as Manitoba is concerned, and in so far as any provinces that may in the future come into confederation are concerned, I believe that the same rights should be extended to these new provinces as exist in the province of Ontario and Quebec. In so far as the minority in the province of Manitoba are concerned, I am perfectly willing that they should have well regulated separate schools. I believe that a grievance exists, and I believe that that grievance should be remedied. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to vote for a law that coerces Manitoba. I believe that that question can be settled in a far quicker way than by a resort to such means. I believe in the proposition of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

An hon. MEMBER. Of course you do.

Mr. EDWARDS. Some hon. gentleman says "of course you do." Well, whether my leader propounded that doctrine or not, I would certainly believe in it. I have said, Sir, that a grievance exists, and that that grievance should be remedied. But, Mr. Speaker, I further believe, that the Government have been playing with this question for the last six years. I am not a lawyer, and I do not pretend to know anything about constitutional law, but there is one thing which appears very strange indeed to me, and that is, that this very Government which allowed the Manitoba School Act to become law, asks us to-day to wipe out that Act by legislation in this House. Why did they ever allow the Act to go into force, when they could exercise the veto power. So far as I am concerned, their course seems to me to be devoid of reason and common sense. It seems to me perfectly absurd, that this Government which allowed the Act to go into force, and who put themselves under the shadow of the courts of the land, until finally they are driven into a corner on the question, should come and ask this Parliament to restore the school laws of Manitoba which existed before 1890, and which they themselves allowed to be abolished. Although I do not believe in disallowance generally, I do believe that this Act of 1890 should have been disallowed. Strongly as I believe in restoring their rights to the minority of Manitoba, I am not prepared to vote to-day for this Bill, because I believe that a joint commission appointed by this Government and by the Manitoba government, would arrive at a solution of the question, and would settle it in a manner far more satisfactory to the country than by making it a political question as has been done. Mr. Speaker, I will not delay the House any longer. There are several other gentlemen who wish to speak. I have expressed my views upon the subject and I have nothing more to say.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, with the very excellent sentiments expressed by the Minister of Marine in the closing passages of his speech, I think we must all agree. He referred to the spirit in which a question of this kind should be approached, and I am certain that no one could take any exception to his language in that regard. We all agree, that in connection with a matter of such far-reaching importance, a matter which affects so profoundly the feelings of almost all the people of Canada, every hon. gentleman in this House should approach such a question with a calm, impartial and open mind. But, I think, even on the part of the hon. gentleman to whose speech I have referred, there has been a disposition to depart from his own rule of action. I could see from his observations, from the manner in which he introduced the name of the Toronto "Globe," and from the manner in which he alluded to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in connection with the leader of the Opposition, that there was an absence of that very laudable spirit which he professed a desire to encourage. I think furthermore, that in the allusion the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) made to the circumstances under which the Manitoba School Act of 1890 was passed, he showed a partisan feeling which is not entirely commendable. His attack was not solely upon the spirit which he deemed to have actuated those who passed the Act of 1890, but his attack was upon the Liberal party of the province of Manitoba, as the instigators and promoters of bad legislation. Now, Sir, I think that a reference of this kind was not called for, nor was it justified by the history of this case. It is known to be a matter of record, that as regards the school legislation of Manitoba, the Conservatives of that province were as thoroughly devoted to its principles as were their Liberal opponents. In fact, Sir, if ever the people and public men of Manitoba were united upon any one question, they are and have been united upon this question, as to the best means of administering and legislating as to education. The hon. Minister of Marine, referring to the exercise of the power of disallowance, and to the various pretexts given by different administrations for exercising that power, said that this was the only case in which the authority of the highest tribunal in the Empire had been disputed. Now, I meet that statement by asking gentlemen to look back through the whole course of this very important, very able and very interesting debate, and they will find that every gentleman who has spoken on either side of the House has referred to the decision of the Imperial Privy Council with the greatest respect and deference. This discussion has shown us to be united in accord with the decision of the judges of the Imperial Privy Council, in showing the greatest respect to their judgment, according to it the highest possible authority. In fact, we are all appealing to the constitution. When one side of the House undertake to represent that they alone are the champions of the constitution, and that those who dispute with them as to the details of this measure, or as to the best methods of dealing with it, are antagonistic to any part of the constitution, they are making statements that are not warranted by any remarks that have been made during this discussion. This debate, Sir, is no doubt, destined to be historical, not only on account of the importance and interest of the questions that have been discussed, but on account of the large number of experienced and able public men who have participated in it. One incident of great interest, and not without some dramatic force, was that of the hon. leader of the Government (Sir Charles Tupper) addressing himself a second time to such features of this question as appeared to him important. With the exception of a few days ago, when the hon. gentleman entered this House, the last time that I had the privilege of seeing or hearing him, although we come from the same province,and not a large province in area either. was no less than thirty years ago. The hon. gentleman was then in the prime of manhood. and in the full exercise of his great physical and mental powers. I had the privilege as one of a group of young men of attending a meeting at the county seat of the county of Cumberland. With a great deal of curiosity and the natural interest pertaining to youth. we listened to the speech of the then leader of the Nova Scotia government. Although that was thirty years ago. I had not the pleasure of again hearing that distinguished gentleman until he entered this House as leader of the Government here. I can well recollect the vigour and the fervour of the sentiments of the speech delivered by that gentleman on that occasion. The burden of that speech. which I greatly admired. and which. so far as the local politics of Nova Scotia was concerned. was one of great value. was the advantages of the public school law which through his efforts had been placed on the statute-book of the province. He very properly won my regard. as the champion of a system of school legislation. which is almost precisely similar to the legislation in the province of Manitoba which to-day he has so vigorously denounced. The claim which the hon. gentleman then made to fame. and to the support and esteem of the people of Nova Scotia. was that he had the courage to join with his political opponents and had swept out of existence the old system of public school education. and had established in its place the admirable system which up to the present day we enjoy. There is no doubt as a historical fact that the action in the school matters taken by the Nova Scotia government of 1864 was not favoured by the Roman Catholic citizens of that province : and when the hon. gentleman undertakes to tell this House that his action did meet with the favour and support of the Roman Catholic citizens of Nova Scotia, I think he is not fairly representing the history of that question. The purport of the observations made by the hon. gentleman at that time was that the school reform had been eminently successful : that he was surprised and gratified ; that. notwithstanding the prejudices which had been evoked by that attempt at school reform and notwithstanding the evidences of feeling in certain quarters, he was pleased to observe that. in the main throughout the province of Nova Scotia the change from the old system of denominational schools. separate schools and voluntary schools. assisted by the state in various ways. to the free school system we at present enjoy. had met with a very large measure of support and encouragement. And he indicated further the quarters from which he had still met some little opposition. The quarter from which he had most opposition was the county of Antigonish. and we know. as a matter of fact, that the Roman Catholic people disapproved, to a very large degree. the sweeping nature of that reform. and did endeavour. properly and reasonably considering their views on the subject of education. to have a modification made in the school law of 1864. At any rate. that measure has been eminently successful. and although from the first time I attempted to exercise any political influence. down to this hour, I have been politically opposed to the hon. Secretary of State. I do give him a large amount of my respect for his share in establishing the school law of the province of Nova Scotia. I am not inclined, nor are the people of Nova Scotia generally inclined, to attribute to the hon. gentleman the full amount of praise which he claims for himself. but we do admit that he deserves credit for having taken up this question and settling it with the assistance of those politically opposed to him. As showing the feeling of the Roman Catholic people of Nova Scotia towards the Conservative party generally. I will read a short extract from a letter. under the signature of a gentleman who subsequently became very prominent in the public life of this country. The Conservative party to-day claim to be the special and peculiar friends of the Roman Catholic people. and while I make no charges against them. yet I do think that the signs are apparent everywhere, throughout the speeches of the Secretary of State and of other hon. gentlemen on that side, that they do intend to pose as the special champion of our Roman Catholic friends. In the province of Nova Scotia, about the year 1877. a certain able gentleman in the city of Halifax was solicited to enter political life for one of the most important counties of Nova Scotia. It was the seat of an Episcopal See, it contained a large number of the most intelligent Roman Catholic citizens in the Dominion. and this gentleman expressed to one of the leading persons who were endeavouring to induce him to enter on the career in which he afterwards became highly distinguished. his opinion as to the feeling of the Roman Catholic people towards the Conservative party in these terms :

Halifax, 29th Oct., 1877.

My Dear Sir,

Your letter of the 23rd has just been received, and is very gratifying indeed. The arguments contained in yours of the 18th were quite convincing, and since my telegram, I have not modified my resolution to go ahead. let the consequences be what they may. Your last letter removed all apprehensions of defeat, but even if defeat were certain, I am quite ready for the contest, if my friends and the party think (as they do) that I should go ahead. The future movements I leave entirely in the hands of his lordship and yourself, and my other friends, holding myself in readiness to obey at any time. If you have any suggestions to make, I will be glad to have them ; until they come, I presume, I am to remain passive.

If this matter should result in my getting into public life, I sincerely hope that I shall be able to prove to Bishop Cameron that his trust has not been misplaced, although his opinion of my capacity may have been too high. You are aware that nearly all the difficulties with which Catholics have had to contend in matters of local legislation, (education, for example), have come from members of our party. That is the great cause of our being unable to carry sufficient Catholic support to make the seats in Halifax secure. I flatter myself if I obtain a seat in the House I can effect a considerable change in that respect, and the obligation to do so, I shall regard as more sacred than any other. The promises of a candidate do not count for much, but if I get the opportunity, I will make mine good.

With renewed thanks to Bishop Cameron and yourself.

I remain, yours, etc.,
(Sd.) JNO. S. D. THOMPSON.

The Hon'ble W. Miller.

Now, that letter is a fair, moderate and candid statement of the actual situation. And I think that it does not come with very good grace from the hon. Secretary of State to demand that that whole question should be opened up in this House, and that there should be an effort made to controvert the notion which he desires to spread abroad, that he is and always has been, peculiarly, and above all other public men from the province of Nova Scotia and in the Dominion of Canada, the friend and the champion of the Roman Catholics. The insinuation is not correct. There is not the slightest foundation for it. In fact it has been the interest of all public men of Nova Scotia, as it is the interest of every public man in the Dominion, to stand well and be popular with his fellow-Canadians of the Roman Catholic faith. And we are perfectly aware that any man who is so narrow, one-sided and apparently hostile to the feelings of interest of that class of people deservedly does not receive that amount of support which he otherwise would and ought to receive. Consequently I think that the length to which the Secretary of State dragged this question into debate was certainly uncalled for by anything in the Nova Scotian portion of his career. He took up a great deal of time in an indignant repudiation of the remarks made by the hon. leader of the Opposition with reference to his conduct and the negotiations which led to the bringing of Nova Scotia into this union. I do not propose to follow that hon. gentleman through his defence. I think that every hon. gentleman in this House must agree with me that the extent of his defence and the long historical references he made to all the public men of that day, and the indignant warmth with which he undertook to repudiate the few remarks of the leader of the Opposition, were entirely uncalled for. I might quote from the debates of the province of Nova Scotia in 1864, a speech which is a perfect transcript of that which the hon. gentleman delivered to-night. He commenced with the lecture on confederation which he delivered at St. John, when a young medical student, and went into a long and elaborate defence of his conduct. I am willing to admit that, as a mere quotation of legislative resolutions, the hon. gentleman made out a fairly good case. It is only when we go behind the official record to ascertain the facts that we know that the charge made by the leader of the Opposition is correct, and that the elaborate defence of the hon. gentleman, although perhaps in some particulars historically accurate, does not fairly represent the true conditions of the case. The point made by the leader of the Opposition was this—that though your powers may be exercised legally and constitutionally, they may be so exercised that the worst effects may follow. The constitutionality of the manner in which Nova Scotia was brought into the union has never been seriously disputed, but that the manner of it impaired the usefulness of confederation so far as Nova Scotia was concerned for many years, the fact that it led many patriotic and devoted Nova Scotians to entertain a feeling, if not of antagonism, of less warm affection for the Dominion of Canada, is indisputable. The hon. Secretary of State, though he may have proceeded constitutionally, though he may show that he was attempting to carry out the pledges made to Hon. George Brown and Sir John Macdonald, and though he may have been backed by the Secretary of State in England, still the people whom he should have asked to back him, and to whom he should have given pledges, and who would have backed him had he left the question to them as Tilley did in New Brunswick, objected to his treatment of them and, as he admitted this afternoon, swept his party out of existence for the time being. When the Secretary of State brings in names of a number of prominent and reverèd Roman Catholic bishops, clergymen, and citizens and insinuates that the leader of the Opposition by making the charge he did was reflecting upon these gentlemen, we all can see the purpose for which he makes that insinuation. A man may have honestly supported the hon. Secretary of State in the course he took, as many did, but the feelings roused in Nova Scotia by his course was one of indignation in which men of all political parties joined. The hon. gentleman's whole speech seemed to me devoted to two things—first, a long and painfully elaborate defence of himself against this charge, in which he did not succeed as well as his friends must have desired, and second, a carefully planned and systematic effort to arouse racial and religious prejudices. It is much to be deprecated that a gentleman of his eminence and political experience should join together the names of the leader of the Opposition and the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to show that the Opposition leader was playing a second to the hon. gentleman from Simcoe and should, without the slightest particle of evidence and, in fact, against the evidence actually insinuates that the motion of the leader of the Opposition was inspired by the hon. member for Simcoe after conference between the two. That was characteristic of the hon. gentleman. Then, Sir, when he thought of the feelings of the minority, the English language seemed to be too weak to express his bursting indignation. The man who carried successfully the school law of Nova Scotia ruthlessly striking at the prejudices of Roman Catholics and who boasted of it for many years afterwards, stands in this House to-day wringing his hands and almost wailing because the rights of the minority in Manitoba have been taken away by precisely similar legislation. Not content with exaggerating the extent of the grievance, he lengthens out the time of the minority's suffering, and charges the whole of it to the Opposition in the House of Commons who have had nothing to say in these negotiations and no control over legislation, and who have had nothing to do with this question until it became of such an acute character that they were called upon to take part in the discussion. It is another case of the wolf and the lamb. Hon. gentlemen opposite have roused these prejudices, they have mismanaged and bungled this question, and now they are laying the blame for their difficulties upon the leader of the Opposition and those who support him. Do hon. gentlemen suppose that the people are so ignorant of the history of this question, so illogical in forming conclusions as not to know where the blame lies and understand who are responsible for its proper solution? The hon. Secretary of State was charged with the introduction of this Bill into the House. And we certainly expected from him a far different speech from that he delivered on the 3rd March. From the fact that he was not a lawyer and from the further fact that he had come into the discussion at a time when it was comparatively late in its history, he would be open to censure for attempting to introduce a measure which he himself declared was of the most transcendent importance with the small degree of knowledge and the small degree of preparation which he seems to have given it. We certainly learn nothing new in the historical account which he gave of the inception of the confederation scheme, and the part played in the settlement of the terms of that contract, by the school question in the province of Quebec and Ontario. The hon. gentleman's whole argument was that had not that precise agreement been made, had not that compromise been made between Ontario and Quebec with regard to the school question, we would have had no confederation of these British American colonies. Why, Sir, the same might be said of any other question which was settled in the London or Quebec conference. I fancy that, that if the delegates had not been able to agree upon financial arrangements which were satisfactory to the provinces, the confederation scheme would have failed: I fancy that if the delegates had disagreed as to the proper distribution of local and federal powers, there would have been no confederation. But the fact that they did agree upon all these questions, is after all, entirely beside the question, because the Ontario and Quebec school compromise has nothing whatever to do with the Manitoba school question. This has been solemnly decided by the Privy Council, to which decision we all bow, and from which we all quote. A great deal has been said by the Secretary of State and by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in commendation of the very able address made to us to-day by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). When that address is published, I have no doubt that the students of this question will read it with great interest and benefit. But, Sir, substantially we have all agreed on the principles laid down by him, and although we have not all been able to reach that conclusion as the results of the same depth of research, as a result of the same wealth of illustration, as a result of the same amount of legal and constitutional knowledge, yet the general consensus of opinion on both sides of the House is substantially the same as that of the hon. member for Bothwell; and his able address will tend to crystallize and strengthen the opinions which have, perhaps, been more hastily formed by others. After all, what does his address substantially amount to? That the powers of legislation upon this question was, under certain circumstances, thrown upon this Parliament, and that in consequence of the decision of the Privy Council, in consequence of the remedial order, and in consequence of the declination of the Manitoba government to obey that order as literally as it was given to them, this Parliament was vested with jurisdiction. But when the hon. gentleman reached the real question at issue, when he came to the question on which we were longing to obtain his advice, did he not fully support the stand taken by the Liberal leader in this House, and did he not oppose the whole proceedings of the hon. gentlemen who are endeavouring to force this Bill upon Manitoba? His contention was that although the power and the jurisdiction lay here, although a constitutional duty was thrown upon us to act in the premises, yet that the Government, by the manner in which they had done their part, had not placed this House in proper position to legislate intelligently upon one of the most important subjects ever committed to our trust. Now, Sir, during this whole discussion, we must have noticed a disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, from the Finance Minister down to his less experienced supporters and colleagues, to drag in and utilize the very spirit they profess so loudly to condemn. We know that the public men in Ontario are divided into more than one camp in regard to their treatment of the school question, and in regard to questions which concern our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens. We know that some of those public men have built up their political position largely upon agitations of this kind. We know that one political party has utilized to an unwarranted degree, a certain prejudice in Ontario, in order to support and uphold their political opinions and certain men, on account of their great talents and their extensive popularity, have achieved an eminence in the province of Ontario which have rendered them very unpopular in the neighbouring province of Quebec. No one questions their patriotism, nor their ability, but owing to the stand they have taken, no doubt conscientiously, they have created prejudices against them among the public men and the public spirited people of the province of Quebec, who have not sympathized with their views in regard to the designs, the policy, and the objects of the Roman Catholic Church. But utilizing that feeling, there has been shown by the occupants of the treasury benches and their supporters, a studied artifice to connect the names of prominent leaders of the Liberal party with the name of the grand sovereign of the Orange Order, and the name of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). They have utilized religious prejudices in order to enlist the feeling of the people in one portion of the country against the action which the leader of the Opposition may take. And they showed with great glee and with a large pretense of humour the apparent inconsistency of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and some hon. gentlemen on the other side who seemed to be united in supporting the six months' hoist of the Remedial Bill. The Minister of Finance indulged very largely in this style of discussion. He sneeringly intimated that there was something passing strange in the temporary union of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the leader of the Orange Order with the leader of the Opposition and many of the French Liberal representatives, utterly oblivious of the fact that there was the same inconsistency as regards hon. gentlemen opposite supporting this measure. For example, there are such men as the leading whip of the Conservative party, and the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin), and the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) supporting and joining, as they probably will in a short time, with prominent members of the so-called Protestant party of Ontario to oppose the six months' hoist. But there is nothing logical or reasonable in that line of argument. It has the appearance of plausibility, it tends to create prejudice, but it is utterly illogical as a self-contained argument. Let us assume, as we have a right to assume, that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) is opposed to this measure because it is utterly inadequate to effect the remedy called for. Let us suppose that the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne), one of the most eminent lawyers in the province of Quebec, and the hon. member for Quebec Centre would oppose this Bill because they believe it to be utterly unconstitutional. Let us suppose that other hon. members on this side of the House would oppose it because it is too weak to be of any value, and they desire to strengthen it if it can possibly be done. Let us suppose that one hon. member opposes the Bill because he is opposed to separate schools altogether, another because he does not believe in interfering with Manitoba, another because he does not believe any substantial grievance exists in the province of Manitoba, it is not an argument against the Bill to oppose it, because one hon. member is opposed to interfering with Manitoba, another is opposed to separate schools, another thinks the grievance amounts to nothing, another the Bill is utterly inadequate, another because the Bill is unconstitutional and unworkable. It is consistent and logical to oppose the Bill on the particular ground which strikes his judgment as proper. The insinuation is utterly absurd and fallacious, and I am surprised to find hon. gentlemen who pretend to be public men undertaking to pursue such a line of argument. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) in a very moderate speech in opposition to the Bill, speaking as a strong Conservative regretted very much to part with his political associates on this question, concluded by giving four reasons why he opposed the Bill. These reasons were: 1. He did not deem the grievance one calling for intervention; 2. he thought there would be great difficulty in enforcing the Bill; 3. there would be no real benefit accruing to the minority; 4. because being a true Conservative, he thought it was not Conservative politics to undertake the line of legislation which the Government have pursued. If it is perfectly consistent and logical for one fair-minded and intellectual gentleman to oppose the Bill on these four grounds, certainly it is logical, consistent and proper that twenty, thirty or forty or more members should combine to oppose the Bill on grounds on which they might differ individually, but upon which they could combine as an active body to destroy that which they consider unwise and disastrous. The Minister of Finance has made a speech which I think has received more encomiums than it legitimately deserves. We are all aware the hon. gentleman possesses the gift of language, that he has a very fluent expression, a supple intellect and is distinguished among his fellow-members for facility of expression and the order and sequence in the arrangement of his thoughts which make him a very pleasing and interesting debater on any question he chooses to discuss. But when we listened to him the other day, and we subsequently analyse carefully the speech he addressed to the House, I think the feeling will be that "all was false and hollow." The hon. gentleman could just as easily have given the House an able and eloquent speech on the other side of the question if he had seen fit, and if it had suited his political or personal interests to do so. His harangue reminded me of a story told of a gentleman residing in the county of Carleton, N.B., who, speaking at a religious meeting on one occasion, describing the circumstances of his conversion to Christianity. He said: "Dear friends, I was converted under the preaching of the Reverend Jonathan Smith. Ah! he was a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal." I think his Conservative colleagues who were converted by the speech of the Finance Minister might say that he was truly a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal. The hon. gentleman after stating that he disagreed with the Secretary of State as to this being an important and difficult question, and remarking that it is not an important and difficult question, but a very plain and simple one, took two hours and a half in showing the House how plain and simple it was. After claiming that all side issues should be excluded, that separate schools should not be considered, that the term Catholic and Protestant should not enter into the discussion, that provincial rights had no place in it, he proceeded to occupy the time of the House by discussing all these points at great length and quoting from a vast number of authorities. He went through the whole history of the Quebec and Ontario school question; he went through the whole history of the question in Manitoba at the time the provincial Senate was abolished there, and he led up to the Manitoba Act of 1870, the meaning of a clause of which is the only question before the House. He said: that this question was not raised by the Conservative party, but raised by a segment of a hostile party. He told us that it was the Liberal party that unchained the demon of discord in this country, utterly ignoring the fact, that it was not the Liberal party in Manitoba, but a combination of the Liberal and Conservative party there which had passed this Act. He seemed to be oblivious of the fact that the great obstacle in the way of the Premier and the government of Manitoba dealing with this question, is, that they are faced by a Conservative opposition in the legislature, and by the Conservative minority among the people of that province, who will be the first to jump upon them if they make a move to comply with the demand of the Conservative Government at Ottawa. I do not accuse the Conservatives of Manitoba of playing a part, but if any persons are playing a part in this matter, they are Conservatives at Ottawa, who while pressing upon the Liberals of Manitoba to move back upon a policy which is common to Conservatives and Liberals alike have not one word of censure for their Conservative friends there. I believe, Sir, that the observations made against the Liberal Premier and government of Manitoba, should have been reserved for their Conservative opponents who are supporting them upon this school measure. I believe that some of the severe language from hon. gentlemen opposite should just as well be applied to the Conservatives as to the Liberals of that province. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) then spoke of good faith, and after quoting the constitution, and the alleged compacts, and referring to bills of rights, he pleaded in eloquent language for the observance of good faith. That came with very ill grace from one, whose career has not been eminently identified with good faith, who at any rate has been complained of, for his want of good faith, in many of the transactions of his somewhat checkered political career. The hon. gentleman did not keep as good faith with the prohibition element in this country, as they would like him to do. He admits that it was in a moment of weakness he departed from the straight line he had taken, in his callow days of enthusiastic and heartfelt sympathy for the struggling part of our population, who are endeavouring to remedy the evils which this country labours under in the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The hon. gentleman has not been conspicuous for observing good faith in connection with the leader of the Government, or in connection with his colleagues in the Administration. It is upon the records of this House that he entered the Administration with many misgivings; that although he took the oath of fealty to the Prime Minister with misgivings, that during the whole period up to the first day of January, 1896, these misgivings and these feelings of want of confidence continued to grow, and yet, he remained in the Administration. He left himself open to the observation of the Prime Minister: that he was one of a nest of traitors who were conspiring to cut the throat of their leader. I think, Sir, that this dwelling upon the question of good faith, on the part of that hon. gentleman, was singularly ill-timed. Yet, Sir, upon this very question before the House, I think it can be easily shown that he and some of his colleagues have not kept good faith with the Catholic people, whom they are now so noisily pretending to champion. I have the opinion of the late hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Angers), as to the faith which this hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), and some of his colleagues have kept with him, and with his Catholic fellow members in the Cabinet. I think, Sir, you will find, that Mr. Angers' opinion is, that had it not been for circumstances over which some of these hon. gentlemen had no control, they would have been only too happy to have this whole question shelved for all time to come. I will read what the Hon. Mr. Angers said of his colleagues in the Cabinet, and we will see what his opinion must have been of the good faith of some of the members of the Cabinet who are now violently championing this remedial legislation :

Mr. Angers on the Situation.

> Quebec, Dec. 11.—The Cartier-Macdonald Club held a general meeting on Monday night at which the Hon. A. R. Angers was present and at which an address was presented to him by the president, which is extremely significant of the attitude of this important Conservative club towards the present Ottawa Government, one paragraph of the document distinctly stating that the members of the organization firmly believed that the whole province was with him in the stand that he had taken in the Manitoba school question, which they heartily approved. In his reply Mr. Angers declared, among other things, that he hoped to be mistaken, but he saw, unfortunately, nothing which presaged that the rights of the Manitoba minority were likely to be more protected now than they were when he left the Government ; that there was still an utter lack of unanimity in the Cabinet on the head of remedial legislation as evidenced by recent speeches in the Ontario by-elections. In this connection he also remarked how singular it was to see those who were honestly in favour of remedial legislation go out of the Cabinet, while those who were opposed to it remained.

This is the opinion of a gentleman who knew what was going on in the Cabinet, who knew the sentiments of the gentlemen who went out and of those who stayed in. He (Mr. Angers) tells us, and confirms the impression which had gone abroad from all the collateral circumstances of this case : that the section of the Cabinet of which the hon. Finance Minister was one, was opposed to remedial legislation, while another section, of which he was a member, was strongly in favour of remedial legislation. So, we know that this war which has now spread through the country, was going on within the Cabinet, and that the gentlemen who are championing the British constitution, the men who are pleading for good faith now, were fighting in the Cabinet in order to keep this remedial legislation out of Parliament, if possible. I think, Sir, that we must agree that those who call upon us to observe good faith, should at least be conspicuous examples of the same virtue. But, Sir, as another illustration of the strong feeling that hon. gentlemen opposite entertain as to the compelling character, upon them of the decision of the Privy Council, as to the fact that they are bound loyally to uphold the constitution, and by their oaths of office bound to carry this remedial legislation through this Parliament ; let us consider the situation as developed in the attitude and conduct of the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). It is no secret whatever that his plan was to pass the remedial order, and then to go at once to the country. It is no secret, that that plan met the approval—perhaps not of a majority of the Cabinet, but of a large number of the Cabinet ; and that in so far as remedial legislation was concerned, the suffering minority of Manitoba could go to the winds for all they cared. They were going to pass the remedial order, dissolve the House, and go to the country. Upon what ? Upon remedial legislation ? No, Sir, but upon the false and hollow declarations of the remedial order. While one section of the Cabinet could take that order in their hands in the province of Quebec, and in counties like Antigonish, and holding it up as the policy of the Government to demand votes of their Catholic fellow-citizens, another section of the Cabinet, with the same remedial order in their hands, could say in another part of the country : "This remedial order is a matter of no consequence ; it is a mere official declaration of the decision of the Privy Council, which we pass on to the Manitoba government to deal with as they see fit." Thus we see the champions of the constitution, these champions of good faith and of the suffering minority, doing all that lay in their power to prevent that minority obtaining any redress. A great point made by the hon. Minister of Finance, by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies), and by other hon. gentlemen, has been that this Government have done all that could be reasonably asked of them in the way of attempts at conciliation. They point out the various steps taken towards bringing this matter before Parliament to be dealt with legislatively ; and they say they have carried out to the fullest extent the policy laid down by the leader of the Opposition in that respect. Let us examine a little into this, because a great many persons have felt that it was a legitimate argument, and that the utmost efforts at conciliating the province of Manitoba should be made, not so much to give this Parliament jurisdiction as to give us a moral claim to act on that jurisdiction, and to challenge public support upon that action. And here comes in the force of the observations of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). It is as important, nay, more important, in a freely-governed country like this, that you should convince people at large, that you should have their good-will for any important measure, than that you should have the jurisdiction over that measure. Has it not been urged here, on the temperance question, as well as on other questions that although you can make a clear and logical argument on the question, though you may have jurisdiction, you must have, as a fundamental preliminary to legislation, a large, overwhelming popular sentiment in favour of it. What steps have the Government or their supporters taken in connection with this embarrassing, difficult and painful question, to conquer public sentiment throughout Canada or throughout Manitoba, and to obtain popular endorsement of the action of Parliament, in undertaking to pass a coercive Bill. In one case the Government have acted as a court, in the other case as a sheriff's officer. In no case have they acted with a due regard to the sentiments of the people who are chiefly concerned in the settlement of this question. Can they suppose that by any order or declarations of theirs, or by any legislation they may obtain in this House, they can within a few weeks or a few months change the feelings and the policy of the people of a large province—an intelligent people and a young and progressive province in this Dominion—or that they can change the sentiments of the people throughout the whole Dominion ? It cannot be successfully denied, in regard to the last communications, that passed between the Dominion Government and the government of Manitoba, that there were conciliatory replies from the government of Manitoba ; and hon. gentlemen opposite have been forced to go back to what they call their conciliatory order of July 26th, 1894, in order to find a pretext for demanding legislation now. The Manitoba government have certainly intimated that they might look into this matter : they have agreed that an inquiry would be of some value and have promised cheerfully to assist in such an inquiry. That cannot be denied, because it is a part of the record But hon. gentlemen go back to July, 1894, and say : "The Dominion Government sent a communication to the government of Manitoba, which was treated with contempt ; it was not laid before the legislature : and therefore are we not justified in taking hold of them with a firm hand, and acting up to the full of our jurisdiction." Now, let us see what this pretended offer of conciliation was, and the circumstances under which it was issued. The Order in Council of July, 26th, 1894, was passed in consequence of a petition to the Government of Canada by the bishops and clergy, asking them to disallow the Act of Manitoba of 1394, and to make such provisions and give such relief to the Roman Catholics as the Government might see fit, and to communicate with the Lieutenant-Governor, in order that, by amendments, redress should be given to the Catholics. This was a petition to the Government to disallow a certain Act of Manitoba and to make provision for the relief of the Catholics. The Government then issued their conciliation Order in Council. They did not accede to the prayer of the petition, which asked for disallowance. These men, who saw the suffering, struggling, starving minority, and had received this initial petition, transmitted the petition and the order to the authorities in Manitoba. They simply made a rough copy or analysis of the petition, and passed it on to the government of Manitoba, with some goody-goody observations as to the benefits of fair legislation. I would like to say that this order did not make any request to Manitoba at all. It was simply an Order in Council which was transmitted to the province of Manitoba. There was no request to the people of Manitoba to do anything to remedy the grievance of the minority. This is all they said :

> The committee beg to observe to Your Excellency that the statements which are contained in this memorial are matter of deep concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and that it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and religious belief and practice : and the committee therefore humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hope that the legislatures of Manitoba and of the North-west Territories respectively, may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

It was simply a general statement without any special request or argument. What did the government of Manitoba do with that request ? They ignored the uncourteous manner in which it was sent to them, and courteously replied to it by a lengthy argument, in which, in the first place, they made flat denials of the alleged fact stated in the order, and then entered into a lengthy argument to controvert the intimations contained in that so-called conciliatory communication. They did not refuse to carry out the recommendations made in the order, because there were none of a definite nature made. They combatted the statement of facts, and defended their position in a very clear and able manner. What was the situation of the question when this pretended letter of conciliation was sent to Manitoba? At that time the whole question was sub judice. After the Privy Council had decided that the Act of 1890 was perfectly constitutional and did not infringe on any legal right of any persons in Manitoba, there was a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada to the effect that no appeal lay from the Manitoba Act. That decision was afterwards reversed by the Privy Council of England, but at the time this conciliatory order, upon which so much emphasis was laid, was sent to Manitoba, all the decisions of the courts were in favour of the government of Manitoba. Was that the time to demand of the people of a free province, to demand of a free legislature, that they should reverse a law which had been held legally binding and justifiable, and from which the Supreme Court of Canada had decided that no appeal lay. The Privy Council of England had not yet given its decision. The conciliatory letter was sent before the argument was had in London, and the reply of the Manitoba government was in the hands of the Ottawa Government before the judgment of the Privy Council was rendered. Consequently, I contend, that the so-called attempt at conciliation number one was a piece of pure impertinence on the part of the Dominion Government. It had no call whatever at that time, to demand the legislature of Manitoba to reverse its action. The contention, therefore, that Manitoba refused to do anything conciliatory falls to the ground, because the Government had no right or standing to send any such request to the Manitoba legislature. It was only after the decision of the Privy Council was given, reversing the decision of the Supreme Court, that this Government had any locus standi to approach the Government of Manitoba.

We have the dates at which these various transactions took place. The judgment was rendered the end of January, 1894. The Privy Council held its session here, I believe, before a final copy of the judgment had reached Ottawa. Manitoba was summoned on the 19th of February, 1895, to the bar of the Privy Council at Ottawa—a sovereign province summoned in that manner, at that time, with its legislature in session, to the Bar at Ottawa. Scarcely any delay was allowed their counsel to make due preparation for argument. The affidavits of the minority, on which the argument might have been based, were withdrawn on the ground that there was not time for the proper answers to be made to them, and the Government proceeded, after hearing the argument, to render this remedial order number one. If that was rendered solely for the purpose of obtaining jurisdiction, there might possibly have been some excuse for it, but the whole course taken by the Government immediately upon the issuing of the order, shows an ulterior design. At any rate when the members of the Government from Quebec had thwarted the conspiracy by which their wishes were to be overruled, when they had brought the Government to time and prevented a dissolution which would have wiped out their chances of obtaining remedial legislation, then the Government began to negotiate more in earnest. After issuing this drastic order, they issued a modified order telling Manitoba it need not mind the remedial order, but that a very small concession would satisfy. To this the Manitoba government made a reply, which has frequently been quoted here, and which was courteous and conciliatory. It expressed the desire for a reasonable inquiry into the facts. Then, at a subsequent period, we have the declaration made in this House that if Manitoba did not come to time within a certain period, remedial legislation would be introduced. The consequences of that conduct were pointed out to the Manitoba government. A threat was held over the legislature and government of Manitoba under this pretended effort at conciliation. They were told of the fearful consequences that would ensue if the Parliament had to take action. They were told, quite correctly, according to the opinion of many legal gentleman in this House, that the legislation passed would probably be a fixture and could not be repealed or amended. Throughout the whole of these negotiations the Government of Manitoba has displayed great ability, and has shown a conciliatory disposition which ought to have been received with greater gratitude and greater appreciation by this Government and their supporters. The crisis has at last arrived. The Government, refusing the reasonable offers of Manitoba to look into the grievances, overlooking their declaration that they only wanted investigation and would cheerfully remedy any grievance that could be pointed out, has introduced this measure and is insisting upon Parliament adopting it. And this brings us to the consideration which many hon. gentlemen occupy in regard to it. If hon. gentlemen opposite find inconsistencies among gentlemen on this side who for various motives join in opposing the Bill and in voting for the six months' hoist, I think there are worse exhibitions on the other side. As typical of these I consider the position taken by a representative gentleman, a representative of the Orangemen of the province of Ontario and of the political views of hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). He is the party whip. He represents the sentiments of a large number of gentlemen who belong to the Orange organization. Not long since I looked up the "Mail" of 19th March, 1895. I had some curiosity to find how the hon. gentleman had declared himself in regard to this question at that time before his fellow Orangemen. There was a meeting of the Orange organization in the town in which he resides. There was a banquet at which were other distinguished gentlemen now on the other side of the House. A part of his speech is as follows:—

> If the Government interfered with Manitoba, he would feel it his duty to oppose them on that question. The subject was for Manitoba to settle.

That was the opinion of that hon. gentleman one short year ago to-day. He said also that:

> He had notified his leaders that he could not support them if they introduced legislation to override Manitoba.

Speaking in this House he said that it was the duty of every Orangeman, it was the duty of every member of the House, to uphold the constitution. He insisted that he was no constitution breaker, and asserted that it was his duty to stand by the constitution. And this is how he proposes to stand by the constitution and remedy the grievance which the decision of the Privy Council shows exists in the province of Manitoba. He thinks the requirements of the constitution would be met if the Bill is read a second time, and then, in committee, is amended so as to destroy separate schools altogether. He reiterated this statement over and over again in various ways. He said he was going to vote for the Bill so as to stand by the constitution and by Her Majesty's Order, and when it got into committee, hang the constitution, hang the decision of the Privy Council—he would do his utmost to destroy the Bill and render it inoperative. If poetry might be applied to the hon. gentleman, it would surely be something like this :

> For ways that are dark and tricks that are vain
> The heathen Chinee is peculiar.

The hon. member for South Leeds differs from the hon. Minister of Finance. The hon. Minister says that the man who wants the refined gold will not kick the nugget aside but will take it and, with the help of the refiner try to get the pure gold out of it. And he adds :

> The man who is in favour of remedial legislation accepts that Bill and does his best in committee to make it as effective as he can according to his views. * * * * If you are against remedial legislation say so and show it by your vote. If you are honestly in favour of remedial legislation, adopt the principle of this Bill and then go to work and make it as effective as possible.

There is reason in the declaration of the Minister of Finance, but it is a severe rebuke to his supporter from Gananoque (Mr. Taylor). He says that he is going to vote for the Remedial Bill, but that he believes it is the very worst thing that can be put upon the statute-book. The hon. Minister says : If you are in favour of remedial legislation adopt the Bill, and go to work and make it effective ; but the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) says he is opposed to the Bill, but still he will vote for it, and when it gets into committee, he is going to despise the advice of the Minister of Finance, and do all he can to wreck the Bill, and destroy the chances of the minority. Then the hon. gentleman congratulates himself that he is not a Conservative bigot. There are Conservative bigots, he intimates, but he is not one of them. He reminds me of a story told of a townsman of mine, who, like a great many people in the world, while at home in a temperance community, was a very stout teetotaller. But when abroad, on one occasion, he was seen to be partaking of the social glass, and he remarked to a friend that he was a teetotaller, but he was not a bigoted one. I think the hon. gentleman from Leeds, when he says he is not a bigot, reflects rather severely upon such hon. gentlemen as the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the member for York (Mr. Maclean), and many other hon. members who take a different view of their duty on this question than he does. Now, there was a declaration made by another hon. gentleman on that side whom I have reason to suspect will not carry out the promises he made. I think he will take the attitude assumed by the other hon. gentleman to whom I have just referred, but that he will not stand firmly where he told the people of Gananoque, on March 18th, 1895, he stood. At an Orange banquet at Gananoque I read that Mr. Hughes, M.P., was present, and he is reported in the "Mail and Empire" as having said that if legislation was introduced to interfere with Manitoba, he would not hesitate a second to vote against the Government. The position of the member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) is that of the member for Leeds. The former gentleman has placed upon the Order Paper a notice of motion which will carry out his view if the Government gets this Bill into committee ; for he is going to propose a motion which will kill the bill. When we consider the positions of these two gentlemen, we feel satisfied that there are some men who keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope, but there are other gentlemen who will not only make the promise to the ear, but will keep it when the time for action arrives. This, Sir, is a critical moment for many hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House, particularly for those who have done so much for the last ten or fifteen years to arouse that sentiment in Ontario which is antagonistic to the remedy which the Government pretend they are desirous of applying. Those hon. gentlemen are now brought face to face with their declarations of a lifetime, and I hope they will not disappoint the people who have trusted them, but that they will vote with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who believe the Bill to be worthless, a mockery and a snare, an unconstitutional piece of legislation, and that, though acting from different motives, they will combine with us for the purpose of dsetroying it. Sir, we have two policies here contrasting, and we have very soon to decide upon which we shall adopt. The policy laid down by the eloquent leader from Quebec has been rejected by the Government, but there are indications that even at this late hour the Government are inclined to adopt that policy, although for the sake of preserving a false dignity, they may desire to carry the second reading of the Bill.

But they have thrown out an intimation that they are willing to meet the Government of Manitoba and talk this question over, and are ready to assume the position they should have assumed a long time ago. Now, I have this advice to give them. There is talk in the papers, I do not know what foundation there is for it, that they would invite the government of Manitoba to a conference, and intimations have been given that for the sake of destroying the party aspect of this question, the leader of the Opposition in this House might be invited to that conference. So far so good. But let me say this to them: If you are going to have a conference, if you are going to invite the leader of the Opposition to that conference you should also invite the Conservative party of Manitoba to send a representative to that conference. You have no right to draw the Liberal party of Manitoba into this compromise and leave the Conservative party in Manitoba free to stab the Liberal government in the back, and use their powerful influence to destroy any result which might be achieved by such a conference. If we are to have a compromise, which I certainly advocate, if there is to be a sincere effort towards conciliation, let all parties be represented. Let the Manitoba Conservatives be represented, let the Manitoba government be represented, and if the Government wishes, and I see nothing unreasonable in it, to have the Opposition in this House represented by their able, patriotic and eloquent leader, then I think we may hope for some peaceful and satisfactory solution of this question. Let us not have a war of litigation, a war of bad feeling, going on between the people of Manitoba and of the rest of the Dominion. You are only at the threshold of the trouble after you pass this Bill. Every hon. gentleman in this House knows that the Bill is not worth the paper it is written on; that if you adopt this legislation you have only begun a career of litigation, an era of bad feeling, which, if it does not rend this country into fragments, at any rate will create passions and intensify antagonisms, which will have a very disastrous effect upon the welfare of this country. I think if we look back upon the record of the leader of the Opposition on this question from the beginning, we shall find that he has never failed to strike a true note from the first time he spoke on it until now. Take his speech in 1893, and you will find that he then adopted the very policy which he now advocates in this House. He then advocated a settlement of this question by Manitoba upon broad and conciliatory lines. He is a representative man, a representative of a great province, of a noble race, and of a great party; and I think that when the people of this country sum up his attitude on this question, and sum up his character as a public man, they will be inclined to adopt the eulogy which was made of another great statesman in the motherland:

Statesman yet friend to truth, of soul sincere,
In action faithful and in honour clear,
Who broke no promise, served no private end,
Who gained no title and who lost no friend.

And who, as a result of his patriotism and ability:

Will live to clutch the golden keys,
To mould a mighty state's decrees,
And shape the whisper of the Throne.

If my hon. friend had been in power with the spirit with which he has approached this question, we would have had no Manitoba school question to-day to agitate this country from one end to the other. It would have been settled long ago upon lines consonant with the dignity and honour and prosperity of the province of Manitoba, and consonant with due regard for the constitution of our country and regard for the truest welfare of the people of this whole Dominion.

Mr. COCKBURN. I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the propriety or impropriety of separate schools, or their comparative advantages or disadvantages: that is not exactly the question now before this House. What we are called upon to determine, I take it to be, is whether we are constitutionally and in honour bound, after having heard the appeal of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, to practically restore to them certain educational rights or privileges of which they claim they have been unjustly deprived. No one in this House denies that the legislative assembly of Manitoba was acting strictly within its powers, when it abolished the separate school system, and substituted therefor the public school system as now established since 1890. But it is held that there was a compact made between the Roman Catholics of Manitoba and the Crown of England, as represented by the Government of Canada, in reference to their schools, and that under this compact, embodied in the constitution of Manitoba, relying upon its provisions, that province consented to become part of the Dominion.

I confess that after a fair investigation of the facts, I am unable to see that any such compact was entered into. It is held that though the action of the Manitoba government in the abolition of these schools may be strictly legal, yet that we, the supreme power, the ultimate court of appeal, are in honour bound to interfere and remedy the alleged grievances. Many hon. members seem to argue that because under the constitution, the appeal of the minority must be heard, therefore the terms proposed by such an appeal must be granted. It is a very serious matter, however, to interfere with the principle of provincial autonomy, and it becomes all the more so when such interference is in matters pertaining to religion or education. In such cases religious and racial animosities are readily excited, and it becomes correspondingly difficult to bring a fair, calm, and dispassionate judgment to bear on the question.

Now, this is not a question that appertains peculiarly to the principles of the Liberal-Conservative party. It is a question which chance has forced upon them, or upon their consideration. They did not incorporate it as a plank in their political platform, as they did the National Policy. They are not enamoured of it. They are ready to transfer it to our friends in Manitoba.

Now, what are the facts of the case ? The province of Manitoba after 19 years' experience of the separate school system abolished it and substituted for it a public school system, a system declared by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest court in the empire, to be strictly nonsectarian, a system which during 6 years' experience has been twice ratified by overwhelming majorities. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council tells us, after a most careful investigation, that the legislation of 1890 was quite within the powers of the Manitoba parliament. But it seems that such action created a legal grievance in the abolition of a privilege enjoyed for nineteen years, and that the minority had a constitutional right to be heard before the Governor in Council. They have been so heard, but surely no one will maintain that because a man has a grievance and has the right to have it laid before the Governor in Council, therefore the request contained therein must be granted. We have, it is said, a certain remedial power to so far restore these rights or privileges to the Roman Catholic minority, and by such a Bill as that before us to legislate accordingly, but, surely it does not follow that because we have such powers that we are either constitutionally or in honour bound to do so. There is no such obligation. We must be careful to follow the words of the Manitoba Act, which are that the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws as far only as the circumstances of each case may require. I can readily understand that in a young and rapidly growing country like Manitoba, the term of twenty years is virtually equivalent to, perhaps, a couple of generations in older and more settled countries where civilization is now hoary with age, and precedents handed down from generation to generation. It needs no prophetic eye to look into the future of our great western inheritance, and to call up before our delighted vision, thousands and tens of thousands of acres, smiling beneath the weight of the golden harvest—the rich reward of the toil of the hardy husbandman. We can conjure up many a stately city, fit rivals to Montreal, Toronto, Halifax or St. John, studding that smiling land, and we can picture it to ourselves as the happy home of millions yet unborn, but who, like ourselves, must tread the world's stage and play their part therein. When I pass such a vision before my inward eye, I feel assured that any attempt to bind such a people with an iron hand must result in failure. Why, Sir, the sons of Manitoba are our own children, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, and they would be unworthy of their sires, unworthy of the blood that courses in their veins, if they allowed an agreement made with a few ignorant half-breeds and hunters, and a government, self-constituted, and established in rebellion, a government established without the sanction of our Most Gracious Queen, to dictate for ever regardless of circumstances, the political or educational policy of untold millions of men, as good, as brave, as fearless, as religious and as intelligent as ourselves.

No, Mr. Speaker, in dealing with Manitoba do not let us forget that we are really dealing with the young, vigorous, independent offspring of the great proivnce of Ontario, and that if we try to force upon an unwilling majority, constituting 90 per cent of the entire population, this piece of legislation, we shall foment and keep up bitter religious and racial animosities, and we shall enter upon a struggle, which will certainly alienate from us that young giant province, a struggle too of which no man can see the end, and which all prudent and moderate men will carefully avoid. Sir, it is not the future of Manitoba only that is concerned. The Manitobans and the men of Ontario realize that the question now before us is the future of the great North-west —from Winnipeg to Vancouver, the future of a mighty continent. I am ready to admit the right of an appeal by the minority, be it Protestant or Catholic ; but I say that the country is so far developed, as already to have necessitated the action taken in 1890 by the Manitoba government, even had a constitutional compact existed. The Manitoba constitution is founded as is the constitution of this Dominion, on that of England. Men, in a country, are not made for the constitution, but the constitution is made for them, and if they find that the constitution is a serious hindrance to the national development, if they find that the national welfare, the peace, safety and prosperity of the people demand a change in the constitution, or a part of it to be left, temporarily or permanently, in abeyance, then their wishes must ultimately be obeyed. The supreme law in every country is the safety, peace and prosperity of the people—ultima lex, suprema salus republicæ. It is in obebedience to this principle that, as the member for East York (Mr. Maclean) ably expressed it the other evening, the privileges, though embodied in the constitution, enjoyed by the nobles, the clergy, the guilds, the great universities, and other corporations, were gradually abolished, though each of these parties had a legitimate grievance and right of appeal. Why, Sir, when the union between England and Ireland was effected in 1801, the Church of England was solemnly declared by the constitution to have been established "in full force, to be an essential and fundamental part of the union for ever"—in secula seculorum—but when the welfare and peace of that island seemed to require the abolition of the state church, it was abolished ; so too in the United States, where there was a written constitution, slavery had been solemnly engrafted on the constitution, but with the growth of freedom and the enlargement of our ideas as to human rights, that system was ruthlessly swept out of existence, with no Remedial Bill to make amends for the loss sustained, even by those slave states which had remained faithful to the union, and had shed their blood freely in its behalf. So also, in the case of the Land Act in Ireland, and of our own Clergy Reserves and Seigniorial Tenure Act, we see so many illustrations of the fact that the constitution is ever widening and expanding, and that it must be constantly modified and adapted to the necessities and growth of the age in which we live. Privileges and rights established and embodied in the constitution must cease to be held, when they paralyze the energies and development of the people endangering their peace and happiness.

Even if it were the desire of the Parliament of Canada to redress the alleged grievance of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, such redress might have been found otherwise than by the passage of a Bill which establishes separate schools and proclaims such a system to be a plank in the platform of the great Liberal-Conservative party. The redress might have been based on the system successfully pursued in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, in which this House, though hard pressed, refused to interfere.

Then, too, I greatly fear that if this plank of separate schools is once adopted by the Liberal-Conservative party, we shall bring a sea of troubles upon our heads, and cause an agitation to spring up, not only in our North-west Territories, as they each blossom into separate provinces, but even in the province of British Columbia, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We know not the day nor the hour when religious fanaticism may be aroused and a feeble government may in its hour of trial and peril, in a moment of weakness, so to say, be induced to grant special religious, educational privileges, which once granted cannot be recalled. I hope such a contingency may never occur, but it is our duty not to shut our eyes to the possibilty of it. We must do nothing to facilitate or invite it.

Mr. Speaker, let us leave the settlement of this question to Manitoba, she alone can satisfactorily deal with it. We cannot in truth enforce the provisions of this Bill. We can safely leave the settlement of this question to the good sense and good feeling of our brethren in Manitoba. They are the sons of fathers, who, both in Ontario and Quebec, have proved by their liberality of sentiment, that they know how to deal fairly with minorities. It has been admitted on the floor of this House by the representatives of the Protestant minorities in Quebec and of the Catholic minorities in Ontario, that these minorities have been fairly treated and the same admission has been made by the representatives of the maritime provinces. We have thus the guarantee that the Protestant majority will deal in a fair and liberal spirit with this question, if it is left entirely to them, but if we attempt to use coercion in any way, such a spirit of opposition will be aroused, that our Catholic brethren will not only not secure the privileges they ask for, but perhaps amid the turmoil of civil, religious and racial strife, they may endanger the very liberties they now possess.

Sir, the people of Manitoba, as they tell us, labour under great and peculiar difficulties in maintaining an efficient system of primary education, and the school taxes bear heavily upon them, however willing they may be to make the sacrifice. The large amount of land which is free from school taxes, and the great extent of territory over which the small population is spread present no mean obstacles to efficiency and progress. I fear, greatly, that separate schools in such a poor and sparsely settled population, labouring under these special disadvantages, would prove a most disastrous boon to the Catholic or any minority, and would practically condemn them to hopeless illiteracy, especially too, in view of the important fact that no share in the legislative school grants can be made to them by us, and no part of the public funds of the province can be made available for the support of separate schools, unless by the voluntary act of the legislature of Manitoba.

I question also the right of any man to withdraw his educational contributions from the common school fund, and to devote it to the separate education of his own children. I have no children to educate, but in view of the fact that illiteracy is dangerous, especially to a people where the franchise is all but universal, I am willing and ready to contribute my quota of taxation for educational purposes ; but if I do so, I have the right to demand that that contribution of mine shall be used to the best advantage, and that no one be allowed practically to nulify it by withdrawing or withholding his proportion, especially when by so doing, in a sparsely settled country like Manitoba, he may by his act really starve and close the public school in my district. It would certainly be no compensation to me to feel that under such circumstances both Catholic and Protestant children would grow up hopelessly illiterate.

Then, too, this Bill is not even offered as a final settlement, nor is it so regarded by the supporters of the minority themselves: for already in the Order Paper of this House, notices have been given by them of their intention to extend the provisions of the Bill, and in this Bill itself the final clause reserves to the Parliament of Canada the power to make such further and other remedial laws as the provision of section 22, c. 3, 1870, and the decision of the Governor in Council may require.

I fail to see any necessity for further investigation and information. Nothing is to be gained by such a course, but on the contrary it is attended by very grave danger. I desire to see the question settled now and for ever, and I think, like men, we should now assume the responsibility of our action before our constituents. I re-affirm my statement of last session that I am opposed to the proposed settlement, based as it is, on the remedial order. I admit that the minority had the right to appeal and to lay their case fully before the Governor in Council, who is in duty bound to hear it, but I emphatically deny that they had thereby established any right to have their appeal granted. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council determined merely the question of law, viz., whether the Governor General had the power under the circumstances to interfere, not whether he should interfere. That, Sir, is a question of public policy, and if the Government thought the circumstances warranted relief, then it had the power to advise relief, but we members of this House occupy precisely the same position and must determine whether or not to grant it, and in so doing we must be guided by the paramount consideration as to whether the public welfare, peace and prosperity demand such relief. The highest court of the realm did not remit a policy to the Government, only an opinion on a point of law. We all agree that the people in Manitoba themselves are in the best position to settle this question, and if after nineteen years' experience of a system of separate schools, they calmly determined in 1890 to abolish it in the public interest, and if since that time they have twice reaffirmed that decision by overwhelming majorities, I am not prepared to ruthlessly over-ride their decision, which after all, said and done, still leaves the minority the right to educate their children as they see fit, but only does not allow them to withdraw their contribution to the public schools, and thus to emasculate, weaken, and in many cases destroy them, and that too, in the face of the solemn declaration of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that these public schools are not Protestant but purely non-sectarian.

I shall therefore vote against the Bill: Firstly, because I am opposed to one institution of separate schools in Manitoba; Secondly, because the alleged grievance does not call for out interference, and it would be difficult, nay impossible, to enforce the provisions of this Bill. Lastly, because I believe that no real injustice has been done to our Catholic brethren, and that no benefit would accrue to them from the passage of this Bill, but that in the futile hope of appeasing a small minority of ten per cent of our population, it would create greater grievances to the vast majority, and would stir up strife and endless litigation between the Dominion and Manitoba, and that too at a time when all the provinces should be united, peaceful, and ready to aid in the defence of the Dominion and of the motherland, to which we are all deeply attached. Let us be done with this Bill, and let us proceed with the business of the country, which, apart from this Bill, is, I feel confident, heart and soul with the great Liberal-Conservative party, which in the past 18 years has done so much for its welfare, and which in the next 18 years will do still more.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I shall not undertake to discuss the questions raised by the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn). I shall not for the moment go into the details of the Remedial Bill now before the House, which the hon. gentleman has dealt with, and I may venture to say, that I call in question, more or less, his sincerity in the position which he has taken. I may remind the hon. gentleman that he was one of those who heaped the most abuse upon the late Mr. Mercier, and who put forth the greatest exertions to stir up public opinion against that political man. Later on, we understood the reason why the hon. member had shown himself so rabid in his attacks against that political man; we understood, I say, the grounds upon which he had displayed so much ill-feeling, when we saw him appointed by the Federal Government one of the Canadian Commissioners at the World's Fair in Chicago. We understood the animus he had displayed, when we learnt the amount of his expenses, which may be said to have been in quite a princely style, so much so that he did not stop even at drawing from the public treasury twenty-five cents for his boot-black.

Mr. SPEAKER. Surely the hon. gentleman must know that he is out of order in speaking of the expenses of the Chicago Exhibition.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Possibly I may be out of order, Sir, but I cannot help calling the attention of the House to the fact that it was the hon. member for Toronto Centre who most outrageously attacked the Hon. Mr. Mercier. We understand now and appreciate the motives by which he was actuated under those circumstances, and we are thereby enabled to have an insight into the reasons by which he is now actuated. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff), when replying the other day to the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), who had addressed the House in the French language, stated that he had never realized so fully the necessity either that the French language should be abolished or that he should understand the sweet language of "la belle France." The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff), as many other out and out Tories, fails to see in the Remedial Bill which is now before the House a separate school question, but only a question of constitutional law. Let him allow me to draw his attention to the fact that the right of using the French language in this House is inscribed on the very frontispiece of our constitution, and that had not that right been formally recognized by the constitution of 1791, and subsequently been re-affirmed, after its subsequent abolition under the constitution of 1840, never would the province of Quebec have agreed to enter confederation. The hon. member may as well forsake that empty hope and make up his mind to follow in the footsteps of scientists in Europe, and learn the language of Racine and Victor Hugo, in order the better to understand our national aspirations.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) I think, in justice to the hon. member for East Lambton, the hon. member for Richelieu ought to read the last portion of the hon. member's remarks bearing upon the French language.

Mr. GUAY. (Translation.) Read them yourself.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) The hon. member for East Lambton said that never before had he so well realized the necessity either that the French language should be abolished or that he should understand it. The last portion of his speech puts on his words a construction altogether different from that given them by the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I would be very happy that the hon. member for East Lambton should learn the French language ; and if I gave his words a construction foreign to them, I beg to apologize to the hon. member. Let the hon. member take a lesson from us ; for, previous to my coming into this House I had never spoken a word of English, and I have since taken the trouble to learn it. The hon. Secretary of State and the hon. member for Three Rivers have reviewed the circumstances under which confederation took place. Both the hon. gentlemen have overlooked one of the most important pages of our history. In 1865, the French Canadians, being uneasy and apprehensive less the establishment of confederation should result into disastrous consequences for their religious and political rights, the Conservative chieftains at the time, Sir George E. Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin said :

> The province of Quebec will remain French ; and being situated in the centre and in the very heart of confederation, she will be in a position to protect the French inhabitants scattered through the length and breadth of the land, and if ever one of her own race were persecuted in the remotest corner of the country, she will be able to make her powerful voice heard and to crush down the oppressor.

Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion and the Hon. Mr. Joly contended that through the establishment of confederation, French Canadians would be placed in a dilemma, and that the English majority in the country would wield an enormous power. Both these political men, as also many other French Canadians, thus pointed out the dangers lurking in the confederation. They said : We French Canadians will be a nonentity in confederation, wielding no influence, and should the English wish to annihilate us, they could do so, because they have representation by population. What answer did they offer to that objection ? Here is the answer, fallen from the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Perreault), which will be found on page 629 of the Debates on Confederation :

> We are told the French Canadian section would resign should the Federal Executive choose to commit any injustice to the prejudice of its fellow-countrymen. Well, Sir, I am quite willing to suppose that it would resign, and that it would not find any successors (which is still more improbable) ; but I should like to know where such resignation would lead us to and what kind of remedy that would bring to our humiliating position ?

Now, the position defined by Mr. Perreault in 1867 was exactly that taken by our French Canadian Ministers in 1895. As they were unable to secure for the Manitoba minority the rights and privileges enjoyed by them up to 1890, they actually resigned their portfolios, as foreshadowed in 1867 ; but, after three days spent in the cold, understanding that other French Canadian members were ready to succeed them, they came back to the fold.

The French Canadians were told that they had no other alternative left but to follow Sir George Cartier. Mr. Perreault, member for Richelieu, a constituency which I have the honour to represent here, then asked, as I do now, that his fellow-countrymen and co-religionists should be fairly and justly dealt with. To-day, as member for Richelieu, I stand up in this House and do ask that justice be meted out to the Catholic minority, and that their grievances be redressed. But I am apprehensive lest I should not succeed any more than Mr. Perreault did in 1867, in safeguarding the rights of his fellow-countrymen. I rise to-night before this House, and before the province of Quebec ; I freely stand up here, and as one of the youngest members of this House, I say that had I lived in 1867, never would I, as a French Canadian and as a Catholic, have adhered to the scheme of confederation. Had I lived in 1867, I would have with might and main opposed the French Canadian people being swallowed up, as they are now, in confederation. I say further, Sir, that I would have opposed the scheme of confederation upon the very grounds alleged by Sir A. A. Dorion, that distinguished Liberal chieftain, because justice had not been meted out to our nationality under the federal constitution. If there is one thing more than another which evinces the false position which the French Canadians and the Catholics occupy in confederation, it is the fact that we are now under the necessity of discussing the Manitoba school question in this House. We now realize how well-grounded and warranted were the fears entertained by the Liberal party in 1867. From the very fact that we are called upon to debate a Bill like the one now before the House, a Bill, the object of which is to protect our compatriots in Manitoba, but which does not actually secure to them a single atom of the rights, pledges and privileges taken away from them : from such a fact, I say, does it not follow that the fears and apprehensions given expression to by the French Liberal party in 1868 were well grounded ?

From 1867, the framers of the federal compact had foreseen the entrance of the province of Manitoba into the confederation, since it was enacted that it should be lawful for Canada to admit other provinces into the union, particularly that of Manitoba. It was subsequently to a rebellion which had thrown the population into a violent agitation, stirred up creed and racial prejudices, and resulted into great disorders, that the Federal Government interfered and gave a constitution to Manitoba, in order to restore peace and concord in the country. Under section 146 of the British North America Act, the Federal Government, as I said, could admit other provinces or colonies into the union, and particularly Rupert's Land, now Manitoba. If you read together the clauses of the constitution of Manitoba, particularly section 22 of chapter 3, with clause 93 of the British North America Act, it will clearly be seen that the intent of the legislators at the time was evidently to grant to Manitoba as to the other provinces, a system of separate schools. The bill of rights laid before Parliament in 1870 by the delegates from Manitoba, the speeches delivered before the House by the hon. Messrs. Chauveau, McDougall and Cartier, corroborate this opinion. Such action was truly a wise one, because at that time the Catholic and Protestant population was almost evenly divided. Such a course was so much the more statesmanlike as the contests on educational matters in Upper Canada had just been brought to an end, as all the hon. gentlemen know, the result of those troubles having been the passage of the School Act of 1863, through which peace and harmony were restored. That view is still more strengthened from the fact that, for a period of twenty years, the separate schools in Manitoba remained in operation, up to 1890, when the government, under the School Act of 1890, wiped away the Catholic Board of Education and the office of Superintendent of the Catholic schools. One might be led to think that in the face of such an outrageous infringement of a solemn compact, the Federal Government should forthwith have stood by the downtrodden minority ; and that the central power which was to be, in the words of the Conservative chieftains of 1867, the jealous guardian, the unflinching protector of oppressed minorities, should have interfered, in order to redress the wrong inflicted upon the minority. But, their utter forsaking of the rights of the New Brunswick Catholics in 1873 should have caused the Manitoba Catholics to open their eyes, in 1890. Instead of interfering, and applying a remedy, either by imposing their veto or otherwise, the Tory Government advised the Catholic minority to appeal to the judicial tribunals, in order to have their wrongs redressed and their rights recognized. The law of 1890 was declared 'intra vires' by the judgment of the Imperial Privy Council, and the Manitoba Catholics again wended their way towards Ottawa. They had well-defined grievances, formulated by men in authority. But instead of listening to their complaints, the Government politely showed them to the door, with the promise of the Order in Council of the 21st March, 1891, and referred to the courts the case, whether the Government, under the constitution, had jurisdiction to hear the minority, to adjudge upon their grievances and to take action in their behalf. Contrary to the expectation of the Government, who were relying upon the first judgment of the Privy Council, the latter tribunal decided in the last resort ; however, not that they should but that they could interfere, and redress the wrongs of the minority. The appeal had been taken to the Privy Council of Canada, without there being any evidence produced as to the grievances of the Catholic minority. On the 21st March, 1895, on the eve of four by-elections, three of which were held in constituencies the overwhelming majority of which are Catholic, the Government passed an Order in Council enjoining the Manitoba government to restore to the Manitoba Catholics their rights, as follows :—

> (a.) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.
> (b.) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.
> (c.) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

Eminent jurists, actuated by a single desire to do justice to the Catholic minority of Manitoba, contend, on plausible grounds, that the present Bill, receding from the terms of the remedial order of March last, is utterly invalid. The reasons given in support of their opinion are set forth in the following editorial from "La Vérité," a Quebec clerical organ, which, beyond any doubt, reflects the views of the majority of the secular and regular clergy of the province of Quebec. This article appeared in the issue of the "Vérité" of the 7th March, 1896, and runs as follows:—

> The parliamentary correspondent of the "Trifluvien" is of opinion that this is not the proper time to discuss the merits of the Remedial Bill. We think it far better to scrutinize the Bill now, when it can, in theory at least, be modified, rather than wait till it be carried, only to find out its defects when it is too late. If the Bill be defective, we are told it may be subsequently amended by legislation. Let us beware of illusions. As the law is passed, so it will remain. Never will Parliament be prevailed upon twice to legislate upon that question. If one pays attention to what is going on now at Ottawa, one will be satisfied that the position we take here is right.
> If the law be not modified so as to make it absolutely similar to the remedial order of March last, it may be impugned as invalid. For, the Dominion Parliament has the right to legislate upon the school question only in as much as the Manitoba legislature have declined to do so. Now, the remedial order of March, 1895, stated that the minority had (a) the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools; (b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for educational purposes; (c) The right to exemption of such Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools. It was those rights (a, b, c,) that the Government ordered the legislature to restore; and it was those same rights (a, b, c,) which the Manitoba legislature declined to restore. It is therefore a, b, c, which the Dominion Government, under the constitution, have a right to restore. But under the Bill now before the House, the Government invites Parliament to grant only a and c; for, say what you like, clause 74 is not the same as b, that is to say, it does not give the minority the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for educational purposes. Winnipeg might then say: I have declined to grant a, b, c, but I did not refuse to grant a, c. You have therefore the right to legislate on a, b, c, by reason of my refusal; but you have no right to legislate on a, c, because you have not beforehand, called upon me to legislate on a, c, only.
> It is no use doing like the ostrich which hides its head in the sand believing itself safe. If clause 74 is not modified so as to grant also b, the law shall probably be declared invalid.
> A parting word now, in reply to the "Courier du Canada." Our contemporary ought to understand that there is infinitely less danger for the Manitoba Catholics to have the law enforced by the Ottawa Government than to leave it to the tender mercies of the Winnipeg government. Mr. McCarthy, our confrere adds, might come into power at Ottawa. That may be. But what is certain is that Greenway is in power in Manitoba. We thus incur a certain risk to avoid a probable danger. Is there any wisdom in such a course?

That opinion is equally shared in by the "Moniteur de Lévis," edited by the Hon. Mr. Landry, and which is looked upon as the Hon. Mr. Anger's organ. I may further say that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) fully endorses that view of the question, and it will easily be seen thereby what serious dangers, if we pass the Remedial Bill as it stands, the Manitoba Catholic minority would incur. Now, one would be inclined to think that the Bill has been framed with a view to having the minority incur the "alea" of protracted and costly trials and all the chances of a series of endless litigations. Let me, in addition to the previous opinion, quote that of a distinguished Catholic member of the Senate, the Hon. Mr. Powell, who, in a pamphlet that has just been issued, delivers himself as follows on that question of overwhelming importance:

> By the Bill, an attempt is made to restore (a). The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Catholic schools is not in itself a very valuable one, and could be exercised without any remedial legislation; and the Bill, while it attempts to restore this right as it existed before the passing of the Provincial Acts of 1890, as a matter of fact, fails to do so.
> No serious effort is made to restore (b); and as to that most important right, the Catholic minority will, should the Bill become law, be practically in the same condition as they are in at present, where they do not work under the existing law of the province.
> An ineffectual attempt is made to restore (c); but if successful at all, it would succeed only after a prolonged and harassing struggle in the courts.

From the above extracts, I think I am entitled to draw the inference that, if the Bill as it stands were turned into law, the Manitoba minority would incur the risk of protracted and costly proceedings before the courts, for, it is likely, and it may certainly be assumed, that the Manitoba government will test the validity of the Bill before the courts. Let us now suppose that the investigation proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and suggested by Archbishop Taché in 1894—for, beyond all doubt, and no hon. member in this House will gainsay it, Archbishop Taché was in favour of an investigation——

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) Would the hon. member give his authority for making that statement?

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Certainly. It was previous to the Privy Council judgment, but Archbishop Taché's position was this: We, the French-speaking Catholics, did enter into a compact with the English-speaking Protestants. Let an investigation be held on the matter and it will be shown that I am perfectly right. Such was Archbishop's Taché's contention, and as the hon. member for Provencher calls in question the truth of my statement, I am going to produce my evidence and refer to the pamphlet itself.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) I do not call in question the statement made by the hon. gentleman, but I merely put the question to elicit information.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Very well. I am going to quote from the pamphlet published by Archbishop Taché in 1894. But rather let me refer him to the speech of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), who quoted the passage in question. The Conservative papers in the province of Quebec have been anxious to know what are the facts into which an inquiry ought to be made. Supposing the investigation suggested by the hon. leader of the Opposition to be the proper parliamentary proceeding, and the hon. member for Provencher belongs to the legal profession——

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) Thanks be to God, I am no lawyer.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member for Provencher has no right to thank Heaven that he is no lawyer. I do not know what profession he belongs to, but I may say that our greatest men belong to that profession.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) I do not pretend to be classed among the great men of the country.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) That champion of the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, for such is the title the hon. gentleman assumes——

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) I never asked for that title.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member, who does not belong to the legal profession, has proved a traitor to the interests of the Catholic minority, just as the Conservatives of the province of Quebec.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) I call upon the hon. gentleman to show how I have been a traitor to the Catholic interests, and if he cannot substantiate his statements, to withdraw it.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I suppose now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) The hon. member has no right to say that an hon. member of this House has betrayed either the interests of his constituents or of his country. I hope he will withdraw his statement.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I am quite ready to admit that, and to say that the hon. member for Provencher always championed the Catholic interests in this House. On the other hand, I cannot help saying that he has not invariably followed a course calculated to protect the Catholic interests and the interests of the country.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) I do not know that I am called upon to protect, more than any hon. gentleman in this House, the Catholic interests. I fail to see what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member for Provencher has many a time sought to elicit the approval of the House, by stating that Archbishop Taché and Archbishop Langevin favoured his views on the matter. The hon. gentleman may now, if he likes, put himself under cover and resort to denials; he may flinch and quail, but the province of Quebec will say that the hon. member for Provencher does not represent nor reflect the views of Archbishop Taché or Archbishop Langevin. I was then about saying, Sir, before the hon. member interrupted me, that the law under discussion is not in the terms of the remedial order of the 21st March, that it is utterly at variance with that Order in Council, in the opinion of Senator Landry, as published in "Le Moniteur de Lévis," and according to the views expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). Supposing that the Government had neglected to make an inquiry into the complaints of the Catholic minority, as they were bound to do, and as suggested by Archbishop Taché himself, previous to rendering their decision ; supposing the Government did not follow the strict parliamentary proceedings, does it not occur to the hon. gentlemen that the judicial tribunals would see in such a course a real abuse, an outrageous wrong perpetrated upon the Manitoba majority ? Does it not occur to the hon. gentleman that that would be an additional reason for the courts to declare the course followed by the Government "ultra vires," and to have the remedial order annulled ? I submit, with all due deference, that view of the case to my hon. colleagues in this House, and I call the attention of my Catholic colleagues to it. In my opinion, Sir, it would have been better that the law had not been liable to such a construction. The Government should also not only have enacted the law, but reserved to themselves the right to enforce it, instead of leaving its enforcement in the hands of the Manitoba government. We are invested with such a power. That is, in my view, one of the capital deficiencies of the law, because we entirely leave the minority to the tender mercies of a hostile government, and of still more hostile municipalities. What is the position occupied by the hon. members of the Quebec wing of the Conservative party, who support that law ? What, I ask, is now the position occupied by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) and by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) ? Now, what do the hon. gentlemen opposite say ? They support a Bill which does not give an adequate measure of relief to the Catholics of Manitoba. But they deny it ; does the hon. member for Chicoutimi deny that ? I may remind him of what he said, last session : He did not want to grant the Government six months' delay, he would not allow them to go on bended knees to Winnipeg. But to-day, the hon. gentleman echoes the opinion of such papers as "Le Temps" and "Le Canada," and approves of the scheme of a conference or a commission of arbitration proposed by the Government, in order to come to an understanding with the Manitoba legislature in connection with the Remedial Bill. The hon. member for Chicoutimi gives a dissenting nod. Wherefore then are we called upon now to legislate instead of the Manitoba legislature? We were told the other day by the hon. members for Mégantic (Mr. Fréchette) and for Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard), that we were called upon now to legislate, because the Manitoba government had declined passing a law in favour of the Catholic minority, in compliance with the Privy Council judgment. But, Sir, it is that very government that are going to be intrusted with the charge of enforcing and sanctioning the Bill now before the House. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) may laugh, but before long he will find out that this is no laughing matter; for, within a few weeks, events will show that I am right, and he will find out that the Orange Tory Government that he now supports, lack sincerity in their declarations. The hon. gentlemen say further that the Manitoba government, having declined to pass a remedial law, we are bound to enact a Bill here. Where is that Bill? We have no Bill as yet; for, to use the words fallen from the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. Minister of Finance, we are now merely inviting the Manitoba government to take action and pass a law. Such are the means resorted to in order to sweep the Liberal party out of existence in the province of Quebec, under the pretense that we are voting against the principle of federal interference, while Sir Charles Tupper himself has all along been telling the House that it is not proposed that the Government of Canada should take action under even this Bill. Let us hear what the hon. leader of the House says:

> I may say that in framing this Bill the Government, while doing substantial justice to the rights of the minority, have been careful to encroach as little as possible upon the local government. No person can read this Bill without seeing on the very face of it that it is not proposed that the Government of Canada should take action under even this Bill, by the appointment of a board, the appointment of the superintendents, the guarantee that the schools shall be of the same high character as that of the other schools in Manitoba, for, before all that is done, this Bill provides, first, to invite the government of the province of Manitoba to take action.

Thus, the Bill merely invites the Manitoba government to take action; it is, therefore, according to Sir Charles Tupper, only a demand in due form of law, or, in other words, the Bill is only a compromise, and not a Remedial Bill. Some hon. gentlemen laugh. We are here face to face, but I would like the hon. members to face the great council of the nation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No! no!

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) You say, "No, no." The hon. gentleman for Chicoutimi ought to be ashamed, for he is ready to approve the Government in their negotiations with the Manitoba government, while six months ago he was ready to condemn them. The hon. gentleman may laugh, but his sneers will fall back upon his own nose.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) That is too low.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Yes, I think so; because your sentiments are as low as your nose. Gentlemen, let us see the record of the hon. gentlemen who interrupt me; the record of men, Sir, like the hon. member for Chicoutimi, who voted last year against the Government, because they postponed their legislation six months, and on the ground that it would never pass this House, as another session would have to be held in order to amend the School Lands Act and provide for a subsidy in favour of separate schools. They may talk of their record, men like the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier), who voted against the reference of the case to the judicial tribunals in 1892 by the Government; men like the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), who is ever ready to interrupt, but never able to give a plausible answer when called to reply to those whom he interrupts. These gentlemen, who voted with us in 1893 and 1895, are going to vote against us to-morrow, I shall not say against their conscience, but in opposition to their past utterances in this House, and to the votes they have given.

The first objection urged against the Bill is that it is ultra vires; the second is that it does not involve a direct, positive and peremptory interference, but, to use the words fallen from the hon. Secretary of State: "The Bill provides, first, to invite the Government of the province of Manitoba to take action." To put it in other words, the Bill is a compromise, and not a remedial law.

Supposing that all patriotic men in this House should support the Remedial Bill as it stands. I may say, Sir, I, for one, that on national and religious issues I never make any concession. The hon. members for Ottawa (Mr. Robillard) and for St. Maurice (Mr. Desaulniers) seem to call in question the sincerity of my statement; but I may tell them that I have been brought up in quite a different school from theirs, that I have been brought up in the great Liberal school which admits of no compromise when the national or religious rights of our compatriots are at stake. Should I have to struggle for twenty, thirty years, like our fellow-countrymen did previous to 1837, to secure the redress of their grievances which were later on redressed through the constitution, I shall never give up fighting the good fight in favour of the rights of our Manitoba co-religionists, and I will endeavour by all the means in my power to restore to them the rights they enjoyed previous to 1890. I quite understand that the hon. member for Ottawa——

Mr. ROBILLARD. (Translation.) Oh, yes, we know you are a great fighter.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I am a fighter; but I know perfectly well that the hon. member for Ottawa is no fighter. He has not been brought up in the Liberal school of patriotism. The hon. gentleman is no fighter and his record is pretty well known. He is no fighter, and he will never be one. He is and always will be a bolter.

Before passing to another point, Sir, I will tackle another question. But I must confess that I allow myself to be carried away by a religious and national spirit, in debating those creed and racial issues, but I never allow myself to be swayed by party spirit. On the other hand, as far as the hon. member for Ottawa is concerned it may be taken for granted that with him party spirit overrides everything else.

The Bill which is now before us is so bulky and of such overwhelming importance, that it would be next to impossible to review one by one all the clauses. I shall merely content myself with giving the grounds on which I rest my determination to vote against the measure now under consideration. Mr. Speaker, through my professional career as a lawyer, these ten years past, never have I met with such a flagrant and manifest contradiction as that evinced by the course pursued by the hon. French Canadian-Conservative and Catholic members of this House, who are going to support this so-called Remedial Bill. Under the Bill now under discussion, it is provided that the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba is entrusted with its enforcement. Is the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) ready to disclaim the position I take? Are the hon. members for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belly) and for Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier) ready to disprove that? I repeat it, the enforcement of the Bill remains with the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. That is a glaring contradiction, a strange illusion on the part of the French Canadian members who contend that the law should pass on the ground that the Manitoba government decline to do justice to our co-religionists and who, meanwhile, entrust to the same government the enforcement of the same Bill. All the hon. members admit that the Manitoba government are hostile to our interests, labouring under prejudices and determined beforehand not to mete out justice, and yet that is the very government to whom you want to entrust the enforcement of the Bill which we are about to pass, should the wishes of the hon. gentlemen become a reality. Is that true or not? The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) has not got the spirit to stand up and protest against such a legislation.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) I am not as low-minded as the hon. gentleman. I ask that the hon. gentleman be called to order.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I may be out of order and I am going to withdraw the word "spirit." But the hon. gentleman should also withdraw the unfortunate expression he has used. I agree, Sir, that this subject shoud be approached in a spirit of conciliation, which I am ready to do. The Conservative party or rather the hon. gentlemen who support the Government have so roundly abused those hon. members who are unwilling to vote with them that we could not help feeling keenly the insults heaped upon us in the public sheets in general and those of the province of Quebec in particular. We have been branded as traitors to the Catholic interests; we have been charged with being hostile to those interests. While we point out to the hon. gentlemen that they are in flagrant contradiction, and inconsistent with themselves, they rise and give us the lie. When we show them that we are not false Catholics, traitors to our creed, to our nationality and that, on the contrary, it is the members of the Government who, through their whole course, have evinced a lack of sincerity, they remain mum. The hon. Ministers of Justice and of Finance who are now in their seats, do not understand the French language, but the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Fisheries understand it, and reply nothing to the arguments urged against the Bill. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who spoke for two hours and who could well afford to speak for weeks, has not adduced any solid reasons in support of their measure. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has particularly insisted upon the ill-will displayed by the Manitoba government, in order to show how necessary it was to vote in favour of the Remedial Bill under consideration, and he told us that the Dominion Government were bound to protect the interests of the Manitoba minority and to interfere in their favour, a course which they failed to pursue, as I am going to show, Sir, from the speeches of the hon. Ministers on the question at issue. The Government claim the right and the power to pass a Remedial Bill. That right and that power the hon. Secretary of State has fully admitted their existence in his speech of the 3rd March instant, but at the same time, in order not to frighten his Ontario followers, he took care to add that the Government had not yet made use of that power, that they did not take action under the present Bill, that the measure was but a demand in due form of law made upon Manitoba. Those statements are involved in the following extracts from his speech:

> As the Act itself provides, the Manitoba legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—
> Nothing in such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational > schools, which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

> An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Catholic Roman minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.
> In case of any such provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section, is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council, on any appeal under this section, is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.
> I think it would be impossible to find any terms in the English language that would more thoroughly establish the position that the right exclusively of the province of Quebec, or the province of Ontario, or the province of Manitoba to legislate in reference to education is not confined to the case in which they have not taken away any of the rights enjoyed by any one of these provinces at the time they entered confederation: that is to say, that if it can be shown that any right enjoyed by any province at the time it entered confederation has been infringed upon, if it be shown that the privileges that were enjoyed under that right, whether by Roman Catholics or Protestants, have been interfered with and removed, the moment that took place, under the Imperial Act of Confederation, uner the law as it stands upon the statute-book, the right is transferred 'ipso facto' from the local legislature, because the local legislature hold that exclusive right, subject to the fact that they shall not invade the privileges of the minority, to the Parliament of the Dominion. And holding that under these circumstances, the moment it can be shown that the provincial legislature have invaded that right and have used the power entrusted to them contrary to the spirit of the Act of Union, the Imperial Act of 1867, and to the law under which Manitoba came into the confederation—the moment it can be shown that the rights and privileges enjoyed have been infringed, that moment their power to legislate exclusively in regard to the question ceases and is transferred 'ipso facto' to the Parliament of Canada.

He further said :

> And no man, I hold, whether legal or layman, can read therein the emphatic statements made by the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council without arriving at the conclusion that the responsibility and the duty were transferred from the legislature and government of Manitoba and imposed on the central Government of the Dominion and on the Parliament of the Dominion to legislate in respect to this case.

And further :

> I may say that in framing this Bill the Government, while doing substantial justice to the rights of the minority, have been careful to encroach as little as possible upon the local government. No person can read this Bill without seeing on the very face of it that it is not proposed that the Government of Canada should take action under even this Bill, by the appointment of a board, the appointment of the superintendents, the guarantee that the schools shall be of the same high character as that of the other schools in Manitoba, for, before all that is done, this Bill provides, first, to invite the government of the province of Manitoba to take action; and it is only when they refuse, and when the unpleasant and disagreeable duty is forced by the Act of the Imperial Parliament upon the Dominion of Canada, that this Government proposes, in the least degree, to interfere with this matter.

That, I think, shows pretty conclusively that I was right in stating that this Bill is but a demand in due form of law. Hon gentlemen would be mistaken if they thought that the defects of the Bill had nothing to do with the present debate. They are so numerous and of such overwhelming importance that I cannot help minutely pointing them out to the attention of this House. The first objection urged against this Bill is that, as I just said, the enforcement of the Bill is left with the local government. Yet, strange to say, and it evinces a very sad illusion on the part of our Catholic Conservative colleagues—all admit that the local government are unfriendly to our cause, prejudiced and determined at any cost to override this Bill; and that is the very government to whom is entrusted the enforcement of the law. So far, all the Ministers and the Conservative members have insisted upon the facts evincing the ill-will of the Manitoba government. Let me quote a few extracts from their speeches, and let us first hear the statement made by the Minister of Justice :

> In July, 1894, this Government had approached the Manitoba government in regard to this matter; and I will read the last section of the Order in Council then adopted :
> The committee beg to observe to Your Excellency that the statements which are contained in this memorial are matter of deep concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and that it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and religious belief and practice; and the committee, therefore, humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hopes that the legislatures of Manitoba and the North-west Territories respectively, may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.
> To that the Manitoba government made a reply, categorically refusing to recognize any grievance at all. In their reply, made in October, 1894, they say :
> The questions which are raised by the report now under consideration have been the subject of most voluminous discussion in the legislature of Manitoba during the past four years All of the statements made in the memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, and many others, have been repeatedly made to and considered by the legislature. That body has advisedly enacted educational legislation which gives to every citizen equal rights and equal privileges, and makes no distinction respecting nationality and religion. After a harassing legal contest, the highest court in the British dominions has decided that the legislature, in enacting the law of 1890, was within its constitutional powers, and that the subject of education is one committed to the charge of the provincial legislature. Under these circumstances, the executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislature to alter the principles of the legislation complained of. It has been made clear that there is no grievance, except it be a grievance that the legislature refuses to subsidize particular creeds out of the public funds, and the legislature can hardly be held to be responsible for the fact that their refusal to violate what seems to be a sound and just principle of government creates, in the words of the report, dissatisfaction amongst Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada.

And further on, he said :

So that it seems to me that the Manitoba government entirely misread the order which was sent to them, when they insisted that it meant re-enacting the old law or re-establishing the old system in toto. It is perfectly true that to take the a, b, c paragraphs, adjudicating the rights, there is some foundation for that contention.

The hon. Postmaster General, Sir A. P. Caron, who represents the French race and the Catholic religion in the bad Government of the day, spoke in the English language, and in very creditable English, too, as follows :—

But I hope to be able to show before I resume my seat, that every thing that could be done by this Government to induce the Manitoba legislature to take into its own hands the application of that remedy, was done by this Government. I hope also before I resume my seat to be able to show by an analysis of the Orders in Council which were passed, that if to-day we have before this Parliament a debate the most important and the most momentous which has ever been heard within the walls of this House since confederation, it is because the legislature of Manitoba would not hearken to the voice of those of her citizens, within her jurisdiction, who were asking her to remedy the evils from which they were suffering, and to restore to them the rights which the Privy Council of England had declared should not have been taken away from them.

An hon. MEMBER. That is it.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member says : "That is it." He probably does not understand French, for if he understood it, he would understand the flagrant contradiction existing between the statement made by the Postmaster General and the present Bill. He would make out the difference between the Government saying : We are bound to interfere, and the leader of the House stating : We do not take action. Allow me, Sir, to quote in the same connection the eloquent and burning words fallen from the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) :

But, Sir, so long as the Manitoba government will be led by friends of the Liberal party in this House, unless we go there with an army, unless we go there with force, unless we go there as a nation equipped for war in order to obtain that justice, which the constitution says is ours, I do not see any human way of forcing Manitoba to give us justice.

The hon. member for Bellechasse could hardly be more indignant and more explicit than he has been ; still he fails to see the difference between his words and the vote he is about to give on that question. If, as the hon. member for Bellechasse puts it, the Government are obliged to send an army to Manitoba to have the law obeyed, I would advise them, in the interest of our fellow-countrymen, to entrust the command of the expedition to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) and the hon. member for Bellechasse could take charge of the provisions, while the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte), whose record is still vivid within our recollection, would no doubt undertake with great pleasure to supply the Canadian army with provisions. But let us return to our study of the deficiencies of the Bill. Let my hon. Conservative friends rest assured that I do not intend to have them drain the cup of humiliation to the very last dregs. Then, whenever they will be tempted to call us traitors to our race and creed, they will remember that the traitors are on their side, as they have been too mean to secure to our compatriots their rights and privileges as they existed prior to 1890. As to the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) who now occupies the seat of the Orange Grand Master, and as to the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) whom I see in his seat, I may tell those hon. gentlemen that they ought to admit, that the Bill does not render justice to the Manitoba minority. They may rest as much as they like upon Archbishop Langevin's testimony ; for my part, I rose in my seat, to say this : Here is a law, the validity of which is justly called in question. I am as good a judge of the merits of the Bill, if not a better judge than Archbishop Langevin is. I respect the Archbishop's opinion, but in matters of this kind, I am perfectly entitled to differ of opinion from him. Before leaving that part of my subject, I may tell the hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin) who now belongs to the Conservative party, a party, which has speculated upon religion for over twenty years in the province of Quebec, what are my views and those of the Liberal party in connection with the Bill. I am now going to review the clauses of the Bill against which Catholic members from the province of Quebec are not only free to urge objection, but are in duty bound to do so :

1. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and constitute the Separate School Board of Education for the province of Manitoba, a certain number of persons not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics.

Subsection 2 of the same clause enacts :

2. Three of such members, recorded at the foot of the list of the members of the board as entered in the minute book of the Executive council of the province of Manitoba, shall retire and cease to hold office at the end of each year, which for the purposes of this Act shall be held and taken to be the second day of October annually, and the names of the members appointed in their stead shall be placed at the head of the list, and the three members so retiring in rotation and annually may be eligible for reappointment.

The above power conferred upon the Manitoba government by section 1 of the Bill may render it illusory and inoperative. Suppose now that the Manitoba government should actually appoint five Catholic members opposed to the separate school system ; for, it is no use disguising the fact that there are in the province of Manitoba Catholics, like Mr. O'Donohue, who are opposed to the separate school system, and, judging from my own experience, I may say that the same state of things prevails in the province of Ontario, as also in the United States, where Catholics will be found opposed to the separate school system ; supposing then that the Manitoba government, who are adverse to us, should appoint as members of the board, Catholics who are opposed to the separate schools. I call upon the hon. members for Ottawa (Mr. Robillard), of Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard), of Laprairie (Mr. Pelletier), to tell me whether the system set up by this Bill could be operative, the more so as there is no provision in the Bill making it binding upon the local government to take action, in case they should decline to comply with the Bill, or even try to violate the intent of the law. I challenge the hon. gentlemen to stand up and give reply to the question I have put to them. Wherefore then entrust to the Manitoba government the appointment of the members of the Board of Public Instruction ? I repeat it again : the enforcement of the law being entrusted to the local government, I fail to see in it any guarantee for the Manitoba Catholics. Nay, more, I see dangers and rocks ahead, if that principle were going to prevail. Clause 3, subsection 2, says :

> 2. The Department of Education may also make from time to time such regulations as they may think fit for the general organization of the separate schools.

Mr. LECLAIR. (Translation.) Why do you not read clause 2 of the Bill ? You do not understand what you are reading.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member for Terrebonne evidently does not understand my argument. Clause 2, mentioned by the hon. member, provides that if the Manitoba government does not within three months make appointments to the Separate School Board, the Federal Government shall make them. That is out of the question for the present. Supposing, Sir, that the local government should appoint to the board five members in hostility to the separate schools, what would be the outcome ? We should not forget that the board is composed of nine members in all, and that five, therefore, constitute a majority. Let me remark, by the way, that the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), who represents a constituency next to the one I represent here, and who took away from the county of Richelieu the parish of St. Marcel, has also robbed me of an amendment, and among the amendments which he proposes to move, is to be found one relating to subsection 2 of clause 3. Why does the hon. member propose to have that subsection struck out ? For the very reason which I adduced previously : Because the Department of Public Instruction, the members of which are appointed by the local government, should not have, in the opinion of my hon. friend, the right entrusted to them under that subsection. From a council composed of a majority of members adverse to the separate school system, you cannot expect to secure any proper regulations for the organization of separate schools. That is to my mind a serious objection. The Bill which is now before us contains another clause which is perhaps the most important of all, clause 23. I do not wish to take the time of the House, in quoting in full that clause, which is a very lengthy one. I will only sum it up. That clause provides for the school assessments. Here are the remarks it elicited from Senator Power :

> Clause 23 deals with the annual school assessment on each municipality, and provides how the Catholic supporters of separate schools shall be assessed for what is known as the municipal levy. The clause is a somewhat complicated one, consisting of seven sub-clauses, and would probably give rise to difficulty and litigation in case an attempt were made to operate it. For example, the first six sub-clauses assume, what is most unlikely, that the municipal authorities will help to carry out the separate school law : while the seventh undertakes to provide for the case of their neglect or refusal. This seventh sub-clause does provide for the assessment and collection of the tax, but makes no provision for the disposal and apportionment of the moneys thus realized, and does not substitute any authority for the council or local inspector to whom important duties are assigned by the preceding sub-clauses. Clause 24, which deals with the district tax, is perhaps less open to serious objection than clause 23, but yet is liable to cause complications and litigation when an attempt is made to work under it.

As I have mentioned Senator Power's name, I may be allowed, Sir, to say that the hon. Senator is a Catholic whom the church ought to feel proud of. He is as good a Catholic as either the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), or the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Robillard), and the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Girouard). I may further add, Sir, that Senator Power is a Catholic who receives Holy Communion every morning. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) is merry upon the matter. When will the hon. gentleman stop making merry with religious matters ? Does he not belong to that Conservative party, which claims to be the champion and the only upholder of religion ? Hon. Senator Power is not one of those easy-going Catholics, whose conduct is at variance with their public professions. I take now clause 28, one of those which are open to the most serious objections. Whether that clause is consistent with the law as it stood previous to 1890, is more than I can say. But one thing is certain, and it is that, Archbishop

Langevin declared, from the pulpit of Notre Dame church in Montreal, that he was asking for nothing more than the rights of the Catholic minority, as they existed previous to 1890, and that he would not be satisfied with picking up the crumbs from the table, when the Protestant majority were seated at the banquet table. I would like to know whether, under the law, as it stood previous to 1890, religious, benevolent and educational corporations were liable to be assessed for the support of separate schools, as enacted under the present Bill ? In the province of Quebec, where more justice prevails, we do not tax religious or benevolent corporations for school purposes. Let us now see how that clause 28 reads :

> 28. The Roman Catholic ratepayers of a school district, including religious, benevolent and educational corporations, shall be liable to be assessed for the support of the separate schools in the district.
> 2. No Roman Catholic who is assessed for the support of a separate school shall be liable to be assessed, taxed or required in any way to contribute for the erection, maintenance or support of any other school, whether by provincial law or otherwise ; nor shall any of his property in respect of which he shall have been so assessed be so liable.
> 3. But any Roman Catholic who is possessed of property liable to assessment, within a separate school district, which is also within the limits of some public school district, established by or under the provisions of the legislature of the province of Manitoba, may at his option, require that such property shall not be levied upon for support of separate schools, by giving to the secretary-treasurer of the separate school district and the clerk of the municipality a written notice to that effect at any time prior to the completion of the assessment roll, and thereafter such property shall be liable to be assessed for the support of said public schools until such option be withdrawn which may be done by written notice of such withdrawal given by said Roman Catholic owner to the officials before mentioned. No such notice whether of an option to support public schools or of withdrawal from such support shall in any way affect the liability of the persons giving the notice or of the property for any amount assessed or levied thereupon previously to such notice for the support either of separate or public schools, as the case may be. Such person, while his property is not levied upon for support of separate schools as aforesaid, shall not enjoy any of the privileges, nor shall he be eligible to vote, or liable to perform any of the duties provided by this Act.

The objection urged against subsection 2 arises from the fact as to whether such provision is constitutional. The Manitoba government contend that it is not. Possibly it may be "intra vires," but there is one thing certain, and it is that it will be necessary to refer the case again to the courts, to ascertain whether it is legal or valid. There is no mistaking it. The Manitoba government, in their reply to the Order in Council, say :

> It may be held that the power to collect taxes for school purposes conferred upon school boards by our former educational statutes was conferred by virtue of the provisions of subsection (2) of section 92 of the British North American Act, and not by virtue of the provisions of section 22 of the Manitoba Act. If this view be well founded, then that portion of the Act of 1890 which abolished the said right to collect taxes is not subject to appeal to Your Excellency in Council, and the Remedial Order and any subsequent legislative act of the Parliament of Canada (in so far as they may purport to restore the said right) will be ultra vires.

Again, in the reply of the provincial government of the 21st December last, we read :

> It has been held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that the present educational statutes of Manitoba are constitutionally valid. The more recent decision of the same court, in no way weakens or impairs the force of the former decision which stands as an authoritative declaration that the said statutes which abolished separate schools, are constitutional, and therefore that such separate schools are not guaranteed to the minority by the constitution.
> The legislative assembly of the province has repeatedly declared itself to be resolute in its determination to maintain the principle of the present educational law.
> The people of the province, in the general election held during the year 1892, were expressly asked to pronounce upon the same principle, with the result that all parties joined in declarations of their determination to uphold it.

Under subsection 2, our fellow-countrymen will be placed in a state of inferiority, because they will be under the necessity of bearing the cost of further litigation as to whether such provision is constitutional or not.

Under subsection 3, Roman Catholics are given the option between separate schools and public schools. I do not believe, for my part, that the hierarchy will accept such a doctrine. Quite the contrary. And the "Minerve" of March 10th foreseeing the objection that would be urged against that subsection, admitted that it was well-founded, endeavouring meanwhile, through a false comparison which it institutes between the present law and the educational laws of Ontario and Quebec, to impair the strength and the scope of the objection. Here is the editorial in question :

> An Objection.
> Under the third subsection of the 28th clause of the Remedial Bill, it is enacted that any Roman Catholic ratepayer may, at his option, support the schools of the majority and that his property may be assessed or levied upon for the support of such schools. Under a much more prolix phraseology, the framers of the Bill evidently had the intention to copy section 47 of the Ontario Separate School Law, which enacts that :
> "Any Roman Catholic who wishes to withdraw his support from a separate school shall give notice of it to the clerk of the municipality, previous to the second Friday of January in each year, in default of which he will be deemed to still adhere to such separate school."
> Article 1996 (Revised Statutes) of the Act concerning public instruction in the province of Quebec enacts that :
> Any person belonging to the religious minority may at any time become a dissentient, and any dissentient may, in like manner, declare his > intention of ceasing to be a dissentient, subject, however, in either case to the restrictions of Article 1988.

> The receipt by the chairman of the commissioners and the trustees of the declaration made, in either of the above-mentioned cases, is sufficient to place the persons so making the said declaration under the control of the commissioners or trustees, as the case may be. Need we add that the wording of that section is the only one that we approve of from a Catholic standpoint.
> But, as the Ontario Separate School Law was framed by a Protestant majority in favour of a Catholic minority, so likewise the Remedial Bill, while it restores to the Manitoba Catholic minority their material rights, is far from being perfect, in certain respects.
> Therefore, its acceptance by Catholics is subject to certain necessary restrictions which they are bound to offer, in order to reconcile the prerogatives of the state with their conscientious obligations. Shall our friends have it in their power to perfect the Bill and make it stronger, is more than we can say. That problem is both a question of prudence and one of law, and is not one of the less intricate problems which Parliament will be called upon to solve.

Under section 69 of the Bill, which has been styled on good ground "a hoax," it is enacted :

> 69. The Board of Education shall have power to appoint inspectors subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council (who may within one month after the notification of the appointment disapprove it, whereupon the office shall become vacant) who shall hold office subject to such disapproval, during the pleasure of the board and of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, to define their duties and to provide for their remuneration ; and such inspectors shall visit the schools and report thereon at least twice a year.

And should the Lieutenant-Governor disapprove of or delay such appointments, what will happen ? There is no sanction to that clause. And, I ask, shall not the judicial tribunals declare that law ultra vires on the very ground that it lacks sanction ? With such a law, the main deficiencies of which I have pointed out, the Catholics of Manitoba, I dare say, will have cause to thank the government for the crumbs they are allowed to pick up, while, to use Archbishop Langevin's words, the Protestants are seated at the festive board. There is a capital defect in this Bill, and it is to be found in clause 74 which reads as follows :—

> "74. The right to share proportionately, in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education having been decided to be and being now one of the rights and privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba, any sum granted by the legislature of Manitoba and appropriated for the separate schools shall be placed to the credit of the Board of Education in accounts to be opened in the books of the Treasury Department and in the Audit Office."

I could hardly be brought to believe that the above clause has not received from our Catholic representatives in the Cabinet the proper attention. That clause does not recognize that the local government are bound to grant a subsidy to support schools, and you could not find within the four corners of that clause a basis upon which to reckon the share in the public grant to which the Catholic minority are entitled. One sure thing about which are all agreed is that the Manitoba government will vote no grant of money to Catholic schools ; and in case of neglect or refusal on the part of that government to do so, no provision is made to force them to comply with that enactment. And yet, while the public schools are subsidized by the State, and Catholic schools are not, the latter, under subsection 6 of clause 75 shall not be deemed entitled to receive their share of the legislative grant, if they are not conducted on as good and efficient a basis as the public schools. Can there be found a more drastic clause than this enactment is, with respect to the minority ? I do not see the hon. Minister of Public Works in his seat, but the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is here, and the hon. gentleman, who is a Catholic like me, also understands the French language. He has constituted himself the champion of the Manitoba Catholics. Why did not the hon. gentleman protect the interests of the minority and insist upon a more favourable clause being framed, in connection with the legislative grants ? I am going to keep the hon. gentleman on hot coals and show him that he did not, as he was bound to do, uphold the interests of those whose self-constituted champion he is. I see the hon. Minister of Public Works is back in his seat, and I ask him also to tell the House why he did not protect the interests of the Catholic minority and insist upon a better wording of clause 74 ? I charge the hon. gentlemen with having lacked energy in not insisting, as they ought to have done, upon the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba being recognized in this respect. Should the Manitoba legislature decline to make an appropriation for the separate schools, there is no provision made in the Bill to force them to appropriate any sum of money for the support and maintenance of those schools. More than that, not only does the vice I have mentioned exist in the Bill, but, as we were told by the hon. Minister of Justice, on the 11th of February last, we have nothing to expect from the Federal Government. Here are the very words fallen from the hon. Minister :

> The subject of a legislative grant was one of very grave difficulty, and the constitutionality of the provisions relating to that will, I have no doubt, be the subject of discussion in the House. But, so far as the Bill is concerned, the attempt that was made by the Government was this. There were two aspects of the question. The sharing of the legislative grant was one of the rights adjudged particularly to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba in the Privy Council decisions in England and Canada. That, therefore, was one of the rights to which they were particularly > entitled. On the other hand, it was felt that for this Parliament to attempt to interfere directly with supply granted by the province of Manitoba would lead to enormous practical difficulty, besides being of a very highly offensive character, if I may use that term—to the local authorities. The government did not feel that this House had any constitutional authority to deal practically with the question of the legislative grant, and, so far as the difficulty was considered possible of solution, it is solved in the Bill which I propose to introduce, by adjudicating that the right to share in the legislative grant be one of the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba, taking it for granted—as I think later discussion will show, we have a right to do—that the province of Manitoba itself, will after the system is established, supply that fund to the separate schools. That, of course, will be a matter of discussion later on. I do not know that I can say anything further just now as to the financial aspect of the case.

So, the hon. Minister declares that the Bill cannot be altered in the direction of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont). In view of those facts, Sir, I feel it my duty to stand up and arraign the Ministers before the House and the country and to tell them : "Gentlemen, you are fooling, humbugging the country ; your Bill is not worth the parchment it is written on. You were to give us a law framed on the lines of the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, which was passed on the eve of four by-elections which were to be held in four constituencies, in three of which there was an overwhelming Catholic majority, Verchères, Antigonish and Quebec West. You have pledged your word that you would give us a law framed on the lines of the remedial order, and you did not keep your word. During those by-elections, you declared, gentlemen, that the Federal Government would interfere to settle this school trouble, and mete out justice to our co-religionists. Those were the statements which you made in the Catholic constituencies, but in Haldimand, a Protestant and Orange county, you stated the very contrary. In the columns of the salaried and hide-bound partisan press of the province of Quebec, Catholics were told : Vote for the Government candidates, if you want justice to be dealt to the Manitoba minority : and meanwhile, the Orangemen were told : Never fear, we will never interfere with Manitoba. I repeat it, you are a lot of humbugs ! Now, Sir, I may say that I have scrutinized all the sections of the Bill now before the House, and I have no hesitation in stating that it fails to redeem the pledges given to the Manitoba Catholics ; you cannot help agreeing with me on that point, and the hon. member for l'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), who is interrupting me, dare not gainsay my statements. Could there be found, I ask, anything more unjust than such a legislation ? It gives nothing, absolutely nothing, not even a cent to the Catholic schools, while something like five hundred dollars is given to each public school. And yet, the hon. member for Provencher will stand up and tell us that he is ready to endorse such a legislation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame, shame !

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Yes, shame on the hon. gentlemen who make their duty, and their patriotism, subservient to the interests of a corrupt Government like the one we have now. The financial question was the main claim put forth by Archbishop Taché and by the Manitoba Catholics in 1892. They wanted to have their share in the public grant ; they insisted upon having the same grant as they had previous to 1890, and they were certainly right. Allow me, Sir, to read an extract from a Conservative paper, which reflected the views of the whole Conservative press at that time. In its issue of 5th December, 1892, "Le Sorellois" said :

> The public school law, passed by the Manitoba legislature in 1890 having been declared constitutional by the highest judicial tribunal in the Empire, and such decision being irrevocable and final, we have no other sheet-anchor left but interference by the Federal Government, provided for by subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North American Act.

It is, therefore, to the maintenance, by federal interference, of the Manitoba separate schools, that is to say, to the redress of the wrong perpetrated by the Greenway government to the prejudice of such schools, through depriving them of their legitimate share of the legislative grant, that all our efforts should be directed. Now, to all the objections which are being urged, the only reply made is that given in section 112 of the Bill, which I am going to read. But the Government forgot to tell us that it is doubtful whether they have the right to amend the present Bill, should it ever get through the House and be turned into law. The Government themselves granted that such was the case, in their report on the remedial order :

> 112. Power is hereby reserved to the Parliament of Canada to make such further and other remedial laws as the provisions of the said section twenty-two, of chapter three, of the statutes of 1870, and of the decision of the Governor in Council thereunder may require.

What can be expected from the Government in the future ? After five long years of waiting, after all the delays, and the dilly-dallying and the references to the courts that took place, Catholics ought to be on their guard. In presence of defections of members of the Cabinet, in presence of the opposition offered to the Bill by friends of the Government, what confidence, I ask, can we rely in a Government composed of all the groups of extremists in religious matters ? For over twenty years the Government is Orange-Protestant in Ontario and Catholic in Quebec. The Government is like the god of war, the two-faced Janus, with one face turned to the east and the other face to the west—one looking towards peace, and the other towards war. Such is the Government to whom are entrusted the destinies of the country. But granting that the Government should decide that the Bill now before us can be amended, may we possibly, I ask, in the presence of the opposition offered to the measure by their own friends, rely any confidence in their policy ? The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) who stands in no need of eulogium from me, has very well pointed out the other day, that the late Archbishop Taché was in favour of an investigation about the facts alleged in his petitions. The hon. member for Provencher cannot dispute the accuracy of my statement. Relying on the strength of his position, the venerable archbishop entertained no apprehension as to the result or the outcome of such an inquiry. And had the Government lent a favourable ear to his prayers —for it is a well-known fact that during five years the Government turned a deaf ear to his petitions—this vexed question would have been settled long ago. Allow me, Sir, to quote another extract from " La Presse " of the 25th February last, in order to show what were the facts to be investigated :

> If you eliminate all intricacies from the question, there is but one issue left : have the Government in 1869, given their pledge to Archbishop Taché, on behalf of the Queen, to grant separate schools to the Manitoba Catholics, should that province agree to enter confederation ? The statute evinces that that agreement was discussed and decided upon ; but, if the wording of the statute is not clear enough, let the eye-witnesses be questioned and examined. They are not all dead. Sir Hector Langevin, the Hon. Messrs. Mitchell and Howland are still full of life and able to state whether that was the exact intent of the clause, which Sir A. T. Galt framed himself and wrote out with his own hand.
> Once that basis is well laid, there will be nothing left to loyal citizens but to have the pledge of their sovereign respected. The men who will not respect that pledge will then be looked upon as demagogues.

If the Government in 1869 gave a pledge to Archbishop Taché, to grant separate schools to the Manitoba Catholics ; if the province of Manitoba entered confederation under that guarantee, are we not bound, says " La Presse " to have that pledge respected ? I have run over all the books and pamphlets which have been published on the Manitoba school question. I am a lawyer and I have given the question as much care and attention as the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) bestowed upon it, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to tell me in what book or pamphlet is to be found the inquiry made by the Government? On the grounds which I have just mentioned, I shall be glad to vote for the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition. But, Sir, there are other motives which impel me to cast my vote in favour of that amendment, and it is that the Government, at the last minute, have simply adopted the policy pursued by the leader of the Opposition. Less you should have forgotten what happened on the 11th July last, I shall refresh your memory, Sir, and refer to the magnificent speeches delivered on that occasion by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), and by the hon. member for Provencher and Gaspé. I shall also refer not to the stirring address of the hon. member for L'Assomption, but simply to the speech of that hon. gentleman. In referring to these speeches, it will easily be seen that the hon. gentleman kicked against the Government on the plea that the latter had decided to grant a delay of six months to Manitoba to settle the question herself. Those hon. gentlemen, as also the hon. member for Laprairie, all belonging to the Conservative party, voted with the Opposition, on the 11th July last, and covered their face because the Government had declared that they would further negotiate with the Greenway Cabinet. Now, however, if any credit is to be given to the rumours, they are willing to support the Government who propose to open further negotiations. The hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay endorses the scheme of a conference between the Federal Government and the Greenway Cabinet. The hon. members for Ottawa, for Gaspé and all the Conservative members endorse the Government's action in opening further negotiations, and crawling on all fours to Winnipeg. How inconsistent, forsooth, is the course pursued by the hon. gentlemen. How can we possibly take any stock in the sincerity of the hon. gentlemen, when their hypocrisy is evident by such acts as those which I have just mentioned ? Allow me now, Sir, to quote an extract from a Conservative journal, the Montreal " Presse " to show in what light he considered the contemplated conference with Mr. Greenway. In its issue of February 21st, it said :

> As could easily be foreseen, Sir Donald Smith's mission was a complete failure. The old knight has lost his time and money, and Mr. Bowell has met with another rebuff. The course pursued by the Government is not unlike that of those unlucky lovers who, after having been shown the door over twenty times by a fickle-hearted belle, always hope against all hope, to obtain another sweet smile as the price of further obsessions ; but there is a limit to human endurance and we hope that this action of the Government is the last one taken in that direction.

On the 22nd of February, the " Presse " said again :

> Sir Donald Smith, after having found out the utter impossibility of bringing about a rapproachement between the wolves and the lambs, is on his way back to Ottawa. Some newspapers try to deny that such was the object of his mission, but people are not so credulous and cannot be fooled into believing that such was not his mission ; for, on what other ground, would an old man like Sir Donald Smith, have undertaken such a journey, at this season of the year ? Wherefore should he have invited to dinner together Mr. Greenway and Archbishop Langevin, who usually do not see much of each other ? No, it is better to speak the truth. Sir Donald Smith has made a last and final attempt, previous to the introduction of the Remedial Bill in the House of Commons and tried to prevail upon the local government to amend their own law and bring it within the provisions of the constitution, according to the construction put upon it by the Imperial Privy Council.

Sir Donald Smith never had the least chance of succeeding in his mission, but should he have had any, the ill-timed letter of Father Lacombe would have been enough to annihilate all hope of success.

On the 29th of February the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) happened to be in Montreal. I may remark, by the way, that the hon. gentleman is not the demi-god we fancied he was. We, the younger members of this House, were awe-struck by the fame of the hon. gentleman, which had preceded his return to the country, so that I fancied that the war-horse of Cumberland would fall upon Parliament as a thunderbolt. But, for the last two months I have grown familiar with his face, and I do not now fear him at all, and the hon. leader of the Opposition is still less afraid of him. Dealing with the remedial law, here is what the hon. Secretary of State said to a correspondent of "La Presse" :

> Sir Charles is of opinion that the debate will be of short duration.
> As to the rumours concerning Mr. Greenway's coming to Ottawa, the Secretary of State states that they are utterly groundless.
> Besides, the Government have made no proposal to him. Sir Donald Smith had no mission from the Federal Government, when visiting Winnipeg, of late.
> Should Mr. Greenway wish to spare us the trouble of legislating in his stead, he need only say so and introduce in the Manitoba assembly now sitting, a law similar to that which is now before Parliament.
> Let him, of his own accord, render justice to the minority, and the House of Commons will be only too glad not to interfere with Manitoba.
> Sir Charles Tupper further said this : It is Mr. Greenway's turn now to come to Ottawa, and not ours to go to Winnipeg.

I was told that the Secretary of State was a bold and reckless man, and I see a proof of it in the statements made to-day before the House by the hon. gentleman. On the 29th February, he said : "It is Mr. Greenway's turn to come to Ottawa, and it is Sir Charles Tupper who will go to Winnipeg." When I see the Government pursuing such a double-faced policy on the school question, I have a right to ask whether I should, as a Frenchman and a Catholic, vote in favour of the Bill now before the House. I cannot conscientiously do so. That is the reason why I shall vote with pleasure for the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition. Moreover, the hon. Postmaster General should not delude himself. It seems that, for some days past, the hon. gentleman and his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, have kicked a good deal. They are adverse to any further proposal of negotiations with Greenway. I may tell the hon. Postmaster General that his best friends in the province of Quebec are abandoning him. It is not the Liberals now who are the traitors, but men of the hon. Minister's stamp, because they are in favour of further negotiations being entered into with the Greenway government. Allow me, Sir, to quote an extract from a non-Liberal source. The "Moniteur de Lévis," in its issue of the 14th March instant, said :

> Any compromise, under the circumstances, would be rank treason. It is important that this should be well understood, and we rise in protest against the obnoxious doctrine advocated by Mr. Joncas in "L'Evénement," when he states that "all those conversant with that vexed question are of opinion that it would be better that justice should be done to the Manitoba minority through the action of the legislature."
> That is a position unsound as it is fraught with danger. And we invite all the interested parties to be on their guard against any possible compromise. Why in the world should we call everything in question, compromise everything, while reconstituting for the Greenway government a new jurisdiction which would enable them to demolish to-morrow the structure which is is sought now to be raised upon the lines of a compromise.

And further on :

> It is quite evident that it is not Mr. Joncas who is at the helm of the Ministerial ship. Not only does he not sit at the helm, but he is humbugged by the men who steer the ship. The rumour was afloat for two or three weeks that, yielding to the entreaties of Sir Donald Smith, the Government was about to invite Mr. Greenway to Ottawa, to try a compromise. The member for Gaspé was puzzled by those rumours which were assuming some consistence and spreading alarm in the public mind. He now states, on what seems to be reliable authority, that the Government have made no such attempt at compromising matters.
> The very same day on which that information was elicited, Sir Charles Tupper declared that Mr. Greenway was coming to Ottawa, at the request of the Government, and that the latter were trying to bring about an understanding with the former.

Now, after relating Mr. Greenway's arrival in Ottawa, the "Moniteur" adds : "We freely confess that all that smacks of comedy." Such are the views given expression to by Mr. Landry's and Mr. Angers' organ. Allow me, Sir, to quote from another paper, "La Vérité," which is another Conservative organ, which is subscribed to by all the parish priests in the province of Quebec, and which may be looked upon as the organ of the hierarchy. In the issue of that journal, of the 14th February, 1896, I find an editorial under the heading "Treason," in which appear the following comments in connection with the scheme of a contemplated conference between the Federal Government and the Manitoba Cabinet :

> The Government organs charge Mr. Laurier with betraying the cause of the Catholic schools. The position taken by the leader of the Opposition is no doubt a deplorable one ; but as Mr. Laurier never pretended to champion that cause, he cannot be charged with betraying it.
> But the Government have constituted themselves the champions of the Manitoba minority, and they are just taking steps to betray that minority. For some weeks past, Sir Donald Smith has been moving heaven and earth to prevail upon the Federal Government to enter into further negotiations with the Greenway government, with a view to coming to a compromise. He has at last succeeded.

Here, the "Vérité" quotes a telegram from Mr. Greenway, and the statement made by the Secretary of State, coupled with the following remarks :

> The Government, therefore, yield to the threats made by the "World," and by Messrs. Wallace, McCarthy, Sproule, Craig and other foes to the Manitoba minority. They accept a compromise with Mr. Greenway. Now, such a conference would be a huge joke, were it not the gravity of the question at issue. In this case, it is nothing less than a treason that is in progress.
> Should the conference result in bringing about a compromise, the Manitoba Catholics will get but a bit of justice ; they will fall under the hostile jurisdiction of Mr. Greenway who, next year, will take away from them the pittance which he makes a show of granting them.
> Should the governments reach no agreement, then a precious time will have been lost and the fate of the Remedial Bill will probably have been hopelessly compromised.
> The future, therefore, is more ominous than ever. Recent events but too fully justify Hon. Mr. Angers's fears.

How then could I, a simple member of the Opposition, place any confidence in a Government who are ready to betray us at any moment ? Now, What did the hon. member for Chicoutimi, for Bagot, for Provencher, for Gaspé and for Berthier say ? Let us for one moment turn our attention to these hon. gentlemen and busy ourselves with their utterances in this House, at the time of the crisis of the 11th July, 1896. You no doubt remember, Sir, that the hon. member for Bagot at that time, charged the Government with crawling on all fours before the Greenway government. To-day the Government are prostrate to the ground before the same government, and the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joneas), and all the Conservative members on the other side, shout themselves hoarse singing the praises of the present Administration. I may be allowed now, Sir, to invite attention to the utterances of the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), on the 11th July, 1895, which are to be found on page 4200 of "Hansard" :

> I say further that, after receiving from the Manitoba government such a reply as the one they received, there is no other path open to them, with a view to bringing any further negotiations to a successful issue, but to crawl from Ottawa to Winnipeg, and beg on their knees from the Greenway government to rid them of this legislation.
> Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I am sorry to see at the head of this procession my hon. friends the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General. I say, Sir, that it is below the dignity of this Government to be under the necessity of crawling on all fours to Winnipeg, after having met with so flat a denial as the one they have received.

That was on the 11th July, 1895 ; the Government were allowed by the House a delay of six months, in order to frame a Remedial Bill, should the Greenway government meanwhile, take no action. Parliament was to be called together, as it actually was, on the 2nd of January last, in order to pass that legislation. But instead of being brought in at the outset of the session, that Bill was brought forward only on the 11th February and put off for its second reading until the 3rd March. After such a delay, I may say, in the words of my hon. colleague from Bagot (Mr. Dupont) that I see with regret that the hon. Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General endorse the proposition of opening further negotiations with the Greenway government. If the Government are in earnest in proposing such a scheme, why call a division on the second reading of a Bill which, to-morrow, may be a dead letter ? If the Government are not in earnest, wherefore have they called together here the members, drawing them away from their business, for over three months, to pass a Remedial Bill in favour of our fellow-countrymen ? The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) thus delivered himself upon that occasion, as follows :—

> Now, they want to enter into negotiations with the Manitoba government ; with a political body which has no right to refuse and therefore to give jurisdiction to this Parliament. What right has the Manitoba government to say to the Government at Ottawa that it will settle the school question with the Catholics ? The question is as to the removal of an unjust law. The Manitoba government has no such right ; it exclusively belongs to the legislature. Propositions in view of a settlement may be made to it, but not to the Manitoba government. It is stated in the Ministerial declaration that a communication will be addressed to the Manitoba government, not to the legislature, in order to try to come to an amicable settlement. But if our Ministers make new propositions, they renounce thereby to the remedial order. When making new propositions, I presume the intention will be to receive either an approval or a refusal. To do that, the Manitoba legislature will have to be called together. Now, it can only be called on the advice of the Ministers of Manitoba, and as they are opposed to any arrangement, one has only to read the speeches delivered in the course of the debate which ended by a refusal to be satisfied in this respect—they will not call the House together.

Later on, on the 15th of July, the hon. member spoke as follows :—

> And, Sir, what will be, in the future, the outcome of this unsettled policy of the Government ?

> The consequence will be to make it impossible for this House to enact such legislation as would afford a full measure of relief to the minority, in case such a legislation should be introduced at the next session of Parliament. This legislation, Mr. Speaker, would be incomplete and could afford inadequate relief and redress ; and that is the reason why I say the Government should have introduced this very session, their legislation, so as to press it to a conclusion and perfect it at the next session of Parliament, to be called in January next. The Government themselves must agree that the legislation which is to be introduced at the next session cannot be but incomplete and inadequate ; because the Bill then introduced will contain no special enactment as to the proportionate shares of provincial moneys to be granted by the Manitoba legislature for the support of separate schools. I hold that the Manitoba government will give no share of the provincial grants to the Catholic minority. The Bill in contemplation ought therefore to contain an enactment providing the means of reaching that end, in case the Manitoba legislature should decline granting any share of the provincial moneys to the minority. I give utterance to that view now, and I have no hesitation in saying that there lurks a very serious danger in that direction. I hold that the legislation to be introduced at the next session should contain an enactment governing those legislative grants ; and hence follows the necessity of another session being held, in order to perfect that legislation by adding to it the provision I have just referred to, an enactment which I look upon as necessary in order to secure for the minority the rights guaranteed to it by the constitution.

Now, you will see how the hon. member is going to vote. He is going to vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill, and give the lie to his declarations of the 11h July last. But the hon. member cares very little about that, as he is sure to be defeated at the polls at the next elections. Why then should the Government re-open further negotiations with the Greenway government ? The hon. member for Chicoutimi was satisfied last year that it was a dangerous action to take, from a Catholic standpoint. If he were still of the same mind, wherefore is the hon. member ready to vote for the second reading of the Bill, approving meanwhile of the scheme of a conference ? As will be seen from the extracts which I have quoted, the hon. member for Chicoutimi stated last year that, in order that this Parliament should be authorized to interfere, it was necessary beforehand for the Greenway government to have declined to comply with the remedial order. I might equally quote the utterances of the hon. members for Gaspé and L'Assomption under those circumstances made memorable by the resignation of the three French Ministers. But let me refer to the authority of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) :

> He said to the voters of that province that should Manitoba refuse to act, this Parliament would give relief to the wronged minority. On the other hand—and I am referring now to what I know—I have seen and heard the hon. the Minister of Public Works going in the county of Verchères, from church door to church door, from one parish to another, stating that the Government had taken measures for the relief of the Catholic minority, and that should Manitoba refuse to comply to the remedial order, the Federal Parliament would do its duty. On nomination day, the hon. Minister stated, in the presence of Mr. Geoffrion and of thousands of voters, that the Government would propose a remedial legislation at the next session, legislation based upon, and drafted in the very terms of, the remedial order they had just passed.

Did the hon. Minister of Public Works redeem his pledge to the effect that the Catholics would be granted whatever was involved in the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895 ? None of the hon. members will dare answer yes, because I might then throw to their face clause 74 of the Bill. Alas for the false pledge and the policy of deception ! The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was not there, but later on he visited the province of Quebec and spoke to my fellow-countrymen in the same strain. The hon. gentleman was at Lachine, during the electoral contest in Jacques Cartier, and he declared there that, at the present session of Parliament, the Government would pass a Bill framed on the lines and in the very terms of the remedial order. The hon. Minister of Public Works stated last year, in Verchères, that such a law would be introduced. The hon. member for Berthier made a similar statement, in his speech before the House, and this year he is going to vote with the majority, under the plea that the law renders justice to the minority. Let me refer again to the speech of the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), of the 11th July, 1895 :

> In my humble opinion, the Government are trying to slip out of their promises made to Parliament. They have not now, nor ever had, the intention of introducing a remedial legislation. Finding themselves driven into a corner, they are now looking for a back door, and as the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) so nicely put it, the other day, in his paper, the delay now asked for is but a subterfuge, or means devised to escape ministerial responsibility, and to gain time, in order to get rid of Parliament.

The Conservative papers, with the bad faith and the barefacedness which characterize them, stated that it was Mr. Greenway himself who had caused the Federal Government to invite him to enter into negotiations. I need scarcely add that the facts before the House give the lie to such a statement, and that it was the corrupt and moribund Government of the day who were seeking for some back door to escape from their own responsibility. They cause the Bill to go through its second reading, in order to be able to tell the electors in Quebec : "We voted for the principle of interference in favour of the separate schools ;" and to the Ontario Protestants : "We did not pass the law, and we shall never pass it." The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, just like the Postmaster General, is going to resort to that manoeuvre, and why so? First, because before all, the party must be kept in power. It affords me a genuine pleasure to quote another extract from the speech of the hon. member for Berthier, for whom the hon. members opposite have been so lavish of their praises and encomiums, these few days past. Here are his very words:

> And when those hon. gentlemen will be closeted in the Privy Council chamber, whether the hon. Minister of Public Works or the hon. Postmaster General be willing or not, the majority of their Protestant colleagues will readily find out a pretext for dissolving Parliament and holding a general election, without calling another session.

There is only one word to be changed in the above extract for the prediction of the hon. gentleman to be fulfilled: it would then read thus: On the 25th April next, let the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General be willing or not, the majority of their colleagues will find a pretext for proroguing Parliament and bringing on the general elections without giving a sanction to the school law.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) But we have that sanction; it is the Bill itself.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) says that we have the sanction in the Bill itself. Does the hon. gentleman remember having stood up in this House, a few days ago, and having told us that it would require an army to have justice meted out to our Manitoba fellow-countrymen?

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) If the hon. member allows me, I will tell him that we have now a Remedial Bill which gives justice to the minority, and that the anti-remedialists are found among the hon. gentlemen opposite. You have been wasting the time of the House these three hours past, and we will let your electors know.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) is not in earnest. If the hon. gentleman wishes to meet me in my constituency, I am ready to meet him: I invite him to come. I am the representative here of an electoral division, the population of which is overwhelmingly French Canadian and Catholic. I represent here 20,000 French Canadians, and I say before Parliament that this Remedial Bill is not worth the parchment it is written on. I know that what I say now is not relished by hon. gentlemen opposite; but, as we say in common parlance, it is better to take the bull by the horns, and so I speak out what I think. The hon. member for Bellechasse ought to be ashamed, under the circumstances, to come here and try to show that the traitors are to be found in the ranks of the French Liberal party, when those traitors are actually found among the French Conservatives, if we view this Bill from a Catholic and French standpoint. It is the hon. gentlemen opposite who have for several years past, and the more so since 1895, sacrificed the rights of our fellow-countrymen in Manitoba, allowing them to run the gauntlet of the tribunals, instead of coming to their relief at a time when, under the constitution, they had authority to interfere. Do you want to know where the traitors are? The traitors are those people who, like the hon. member for Bellechasse and his friends, are satisfied with picking up the crumbs fallen from the table, when in the province of Quebec, the English are seated at the festive board.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) The hon. member ought to know that this is out of order, when applying the word "traitor" to an hon. colleague.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The hon. member is giving the reply to the member for Bellechasse.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I may be out of order, and I am ready to obey your ruling, Sir, for I do not want to depart from the rules of parliamentary etiquette. If, however, I have departed from those rules, I have only followed in the footsteps of the Conservative members. Therefore, in order to set a good example, and teach a lesson to the Secretary of State, who declined to take back a word, I withdraw the word "traitor" which I applied to the hon. member, and I hope we won't be worse friends for all that. But while I am dealing with this topic, let me remind the hon. gentleman that his acts are inconsistent with his utterances. He told us that he was going to vote for the second reading of the Bill in order to have justice meted out to our compatriots by the Greenway government, but that if the latter refused to comply with the law, it would then be time for the Government to send a whole army to secure the enforcement of the law. If it were requisite to send battalions to Winnipeg to have justice done to our fellow-countrymen, how is it that the hon. member is ready to entrust the enforcement of the Bill to that very government who are adverse to us and unwilling to obey the law? Let the Minister of Militia here allow me to give him a piece of advice. If ever it became necessary to send an army to Manitoba, I would suggest, as I said, to entrust the command of that army to the hon. Minister of Public Works, and the hon. member for Bellechasse could have charge of the provisions, while the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte) could supply the army with the necessary provisions.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Go on, go on; you are a credit to your nationality.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) I heard the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) offer to the House in 1896 an opinion which he advocated in 1895. For a few days past, the hon. member for Berthier has become the standard-bearer of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, or, rather the hon. member for Berthier has been spoken of in the province of Quebec as a man of genius. When one reflects that the former editor of the "Bien Public," Cléophas Beausoleil, has been praised by the "Minerve!" But when I find the "Minerve" singing the praises of the member for Berthier I am tempted to exclaim: "Timeo Danaos, et dona ferentes." It is a well-known fact that the hon. member said that he would abandon the Liberal party on the school question, because the hon. leader of the Opposition had never defined his policy on the matter. He said that the leader of the Opposition had declared that the school question was not a party question. Let the Government, he said, introduce a Bill to settle the question, and I am ready to support such a measure, if it be just and operative. To my mind it is a matter of opinion: I do not believe the Bill to be just and operative. I would like to know now what stand the hon. Minister of Public Works takes on the question at issue. Is he in favour of the Remedial Bill or of a conference with Mr. Greenway? Are the two propositions equally good? The hon. Minister does not vouchsafe any reply: he is afraid to commit himself. If he were to speak out, it might elicit a reply which he did not like. Poor Minister, how hounded how persecuted he has been from the day when he made himself the champion, the standard-bearer of religion outraged by the Liberals. I am French to the very core: I am a Catholic, not because my father was a Catholic, but because of the training which I have received: and when I see the Orange-Tory Government trying to make use of religion against our national and political convictions, I say: You are a lot of humbugs and comedians, and no matter what appeals you make to the race and creed prejudices of my fellow-countrymen, when I return in their midst, I shall say to them: Here are the men who have traduced you, who have betrayed our Manitoba brothers: here are the men who have voted for the second reading of the Bill, but who have not had the necessary pluck to carry it through the third reading: and the French and Catholic voters in the province of Quebec will follow the example set last year by Montreal Centre, Jacques Cartier and Charlevoix.

Dealing with the projected conference, the "Presse," in its issue of yesterday, said: "To our mind, that scheme does not bode well to us." I was bound to give to the country and to my constituents the grounds on which I rest my determination to vote against the Bill. Allow me now, Sir, to give you the objections raised, because we vote against the Bill. We are told: you are voting against the separate school principle. Such an objection is absolutely groundless. I am in favour of separate schools, and so is the leader of the Opposition. It is not right to say that we vote against the principle of separate schools, and that on the following grounds: because, first, the Liberal party in Ontario passed the Act of 1863 granting separate schools to the Catholic minority; because, further, that same Liberal party—and the hon. Minister of Public Works cannot gainsay it—has constituted itself, for these ten years past, the champion of the constitution and of separate schools in the province of Ontario against the rabid attacks of the Conservative party under the leadership of Mr. Meredith. No, Sir, we are not opposed to the principle of separate schools, but, unlike the Minister of Public Works, we want a complete law, a law that will be operative and that will give full satisfaction to the Catholic minority in Manitoba. I repeat it again, so that the stand I take on the question may be clearly understood: I am in favour of separate schools. Had I lived previous to 1837, I would have insisted upon Great Britain fully recognizing in all their integrity the rights of French Canadians. Now we have to deal with the Catholic minority in Manitoba, and I wish to secure for that minority the full recognition of their constitutional rights. But, if the hon. gentlemen opposite are in earnest, how is it that they vote with people who contend that the Bill does not deal with separate schools, but is simply a question as to whether the constitution will be obeyed or not. It follows, therefore, that in voting against this Bill, we do not vote against the principle of separate schools. In the second place we are told by the Conservative members and the Conservative press: your duty is to interfere, in order to bring about the triumph of French and Catholic influence on this continent. It is very strange that French Conservative members opposite cannot better agree among themselves. Among the Government followers opposite, some are in favour of interference, others are adverse to it. The hon. Minister of Public Works cannot gainsay the fact: if he attempted to contradict my statement, I could quote the words fallen from the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), as also the statements made by several other members on the other side. If the hon. leader of the Opposition came into power, he could give to that school question a much better solution than that now proposed. We are not opposed to federal interference, but we disapprove of the manner in which the Govment propose to interfere. We oppose with might and main this Bill because it does not involve a single provision calculated to deal full justice to our fellow-countrymen out west. The hon. Minister of Public Works is probably going to pay us a visit in Richelieu during the coming campaign, and I cordially invite him. He well knows what a cordial reception we always extend to him. He will probably tell my electors that we are opposed to federal interference, that the French Liberal party did not uphold the Catholic interests and have taken a stand against intervention. But we are not opposed to intervention, in voting against this Bill, since, according to the leader of the House, no such principle is involved in the Bill. We insist upon an investigation being made, and if our fellow-countrymen and co-religionists in Manitoba are right, they have no reason to fear the results of the inquiry. On the contrary, they must insist upon it, in order to silence the voice of the Orangemen who, although they support the present Government, are constantly denouncing Catholics and stating that they have no grievances. I for one, am in favour of an investigation, in order to fully vindicate the claims of Archbishop Taché who, in 1869, contended that the Red River inhabitants had obtained securities in connection with the maintenance of their separate schools in the province. Another reason which the Conservative party will not fail to urge is that the interested parties accept this Bill, that Archbishop Langevin accepts it. That argument will be largely resorted to in the next electoral campaign in the province of Quebec. For over twenty years, the Conservative party have always tried to speculate upon the Catholic religion for the benefit of a tortuous and bad policy. Those hypocrites, now driven to their last entrenchment, and threatened from every quarter because of the robberies which have signalized their administration of public affairs, now will try to intrench themselves behind the wall of religion, in order to hide their turpitude and their wrong-doing.

Mr. TURCOTTE. (Translation.) Just like Mr. Mercier.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) My electors know that I always disapproved of the course followed by Mr. Mercier when pandering to the clergy, for the benefit of his policy. I regret, as a French Canadian and a Catholic, to see the French Ministers trying to take advantage of the clergy, for the benefit of their obnoxious policy. I respect Archbishop Langevin's opinion. I respect the opinion of our priests, but I contend that, when we are called upon to judge as to the validity of a law, of its operativeness, of its construction, my opinion is worth that of Bishop Langevin's or of any other priest. Now, it was the bishops themselves, who, in 1872, at the time of the debate on the New Brunswick school question, established that doctrine. I am French and Catholic, and if the hierarchy had told me that I could not conscientiously vote in favour of the Bill now before the House, I would have bowed down with respect, but I received no letter, I am not aware of any pastoral having been issued on the matter, and I am satisfied that, in voting against the second reading of the Bill, I am going to do a good office to my fellow-countrymen. I certainly respect the opinions of those Liberals and Conservatives who are going to cast their vote in favour of the Bill: but I claim the same respect for the opinion which I entertain. The hon. members for Berthier and for Ottawa do not abandon the Liberal party, from the fact that they are going to vote against the amendment and for the second reading of the Bill. It is quite possible that the Government are throwing dust in the eyes of the hon. gentlemen and deluding them—they have deluded so many others—but, for my part, all the dust they could throw in my eyes would not blind me to the defects of their Remedial Bill. The Government cannot be in earnest, and their whole course in this matter evinces it. They referred the question to the tribunals, in order to escape responsibility; so much so, that the hon. members for Laprairie, for Montcalm and for L'Assomption voted against the Government in 1893, on the ground that the Government referred the matter to the tribunals. For all that the Government did not read those four members out of the party. I ask of the Liberal party to adopt the same policy towards their own followers. The Government are not in earnest. I want no other proof of it than their novel attitude, in asking the Greenway government to settle themselves the school difficulty; in declining to answer the question put by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre who inquired, the other day, whether that Bill was a beginning of justice and whether they were going to perfect it, they also refused to answer the question which I put yesterday in relation to the amendments of which the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) has given notice. At any rate, we shall never have the third reading of this Bill. I may, however, tell the hon. Minister of Public Works who is now in his seat, that if the Bill be amended so as to eliminate from it the abuses and injustices which I have pointed out, I shall vote with pleasure, not only for the amendments but for the law itself. One word more and I am done. The hon. member for Berthier, whose desertion, or rather whose attitude on the school question I regret more than any one else, told us that the leader of the Opposition had never made a party question of it; that at the time of the great Liberal convention held in Ottawa in 1893, the school question had not been included in the programme, and that hence we were free to act as we thought best. I beg the hon. member for Berthier to remember that the following resolution was passed at that convention, and was published in the issue of the "Canada" of the 26th July, 1893. At that time, that journal had not yet been sold to the Government:

> We were of opinion that the convention ought to pronounce upon the school question. Our opinion prevailed. Could the Liberal party more outspokenly declare themselves in favour of our fellow-countrymen in Manitoba, than by ratifying the statement made by their own leader? Decidedly not.

> A resolution was therefore framed to that effect, and was carried in the midst of the greatest enthusiasm. Here it is :
> That this convention desires to express its entire confidence in the leadership of the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, and its admiration of his brilliant eloquence, his endearing personal qualities, and his broad and statesmanlike utterances upon the public questions of the day.
> Here is the irrefutable proof that the Liberal party, without being entrusted with the responsibility of power, without one dissentient voice, ratified the statement made by their leader in relation to the school question.

I was one of those who attended the convention with the delegates from the county of Richelieu. I applauded that resolution. The hon. member for Berthier was also in attendance. There is therefore a striking contradiction between the course followed to-day by the hon. member and the statement made in the resolution which he himself endorsed and voted for. I respect all opinions, but I believe that the hon. members for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), and for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) allow themselves to be blinded by the declarations of the Government, who are not in earnest. On the 11th July last, the member for Berthier thus delivered himself :

> I hope the result of the popular verdict which is to be rendered at the next election will be the consolidation and not the disruption of confederation. I hope, then, we shall have seen the last of the race and creed wrangles, of that war of races, and that far from being intensified, our dissentions will gradually die away ; if not, then, we must forego all hopes of ever becoming a great and prosperous people. It is still within our power, as I said, to escape those evils which would precipitate the ruin of confederation, if we only make up our minds to get rid of the clique that now governs the country and in putting the reins of government in the hands of men to whom the people repose confidence.

I hope my hon. friend from Berthier will not be offended, if I have called up to his recollection the eloquent utterances I have just quoted. In concluding my remarks, Sir, I declare that I shall vote against the Bill, because I believe it to be ultra vires ; because it would prove to be a source of litigation for the Catholic minority ; because it is incomplete and does not render justice to our fellow-countrymen, but causes them to lose the rights which they enjoyed previous to 1890 ; because admittedly it is not a direct interference by this Parliament ; because it is inoperative in its main provisions ; the sanction being left to a hostile government, because, with a view to a settlement of this question, I have more confidence in the patriotic and wise course pursued by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I must state to the House that I do not intend to answer at this hour of the night the incoherent nonsense of the speech which we have just heard. If I am to judge by the debate which has now been going on for several days, it is useless to deceive oneself as to the seriousness of the situation which results from the Manitoba school question. The Government is, perhaps, to-day risking the heaviest stake of its long and creditable career, while the Opposition think they can reach power in this hour of trouble and anxiety by strewing the course with all sorts of obstacles. And in the Conservative party, on the one hand, and in the Liberal party on the other, we vainly look for such unity of action as makes the strength of a government party, or gives a constitutional opposition its raison d'être, public utility. Factions in the Liberal party, factions in the Conservative party, an almost complete breaking of the old ties—such is, Mr. Speaker, the strange and painful spectacle offered by this House. And, in the meanwhile, the country in rankling with intestine broils. Where is the evil, and who will remedy it ? If your arm is diseased your whole body suffers. Medicine and common sense teach us that, in such a case, what you must treat and cure is the suffering limb, in order to bring back health to the rest of the body. Well, allow me to say that if our confederation is convulsed by a political and social crisis, it is because one of its limbs is diseased, and the trouble will only cease when the malady is cured. The nation's ailments always come from the violation of some great principle of freedom and justice. Give back to the minority the rights of which it was despoiled, give it back its freedom and justice, then the disease will be cured, and in the whole country we may then enjoy rest, peace and harmony. For five years we have been agitating this question of the Manitoba schools. An appeal was taken under the constitution of the province. The Government, in view of the difficulties which were to result from the law of 1890, thought it was prudent to obtain the opinion of the highest tribunal of the Empire on the question of whether the Parliament of this country has a right to legislate on the matter. By its decision the Privy Council recognized our jurisdiction, after having declared that the rights and privileges of the minority had been violated by the law of 1890. What are the rights and privileges which were violated and which are claimed by the minority ? The first and principal—I might say the only one, for the others are only auxiliary—is their right to separate schools. This right is the object of the Catholics' appeal, such as set forth in their petition presented to the Governor General in Council. This petition is contained in the sessional papers of 1891, and is found again quoted in 1892 by the counsel for the minority. The principal points of the petition are found in paragraphs 9, 10 and 11. The other paragraphs are but a preliminary statement of the question and a statement of a right, the recognition of which is sought. Let us see what is the purport of these paragraphs 9, 10 and 11. I read :

> 9. Ever since the said legislation and until the last session of the legislative assembly, no attempt was made to encroach upon the rights of the Roman Catholics so confirmed to them as above mentioned, but during said session statutes were passed (53 Vic., caps. 37 and 38), the effect of which was to deprive the Roman Catholics altogether of their separate condition in regard to education; to merge their schools with those of the Protestant denominations, and to require all members of the community whether Roman Catholic or Protestant to contribute through taxation to the support of what are therein called public schools, but which are in reality a continuation of the Protestant schools.
> 10. There is a provision in the said Act for the appointment and election of an Advisory Board and also for the election in each municipality of school trustees. There is also a provision that the said Advisory Board may prescribe religious exercises for use in schools and that the said school trustees may, if they think fit, direct such religious exercises to be adopted in the schools in their respective districts. No further or other provision is made with reference to religious exercises, and there is none with reference to religious training.
> 11. Roman Catholics regard such schools as unfit for the purposes of education, and the children of Roman Catholic parents cannot and will not attend any such schools. Rather than countenance such schools, Roman Catholics will revert to the voluntary system in operation previous to the Manitoba Act, and will, at their own private expense establish, support and maintain schools in accordance with their principles and their faith, although by so doing they will have in addition thereto to contribute to the expense of the so-called public schools.

As will be seen, paragraph 9 of this petition, which embodies the appeal, and in which originates the jurisdiction of this Parliament, is not, of course, the statement of a fact as a ground for the conclusions of the petition, it is rather the setting forth of the law complained of. The statements containing the facts on which the minority take their stand are contained in paragraphs 10 and 11. Paragraph 10 complains of the provisions for the appointment of an advisory board and for the election of school trustees. Under the law of 1890, the advisory board may be composed altogether of Protestants; it is appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, the university board and the teachers of the province. No guarantee is given that the choice of the minority will be respected, or that there will be any representatives of the minority on this board. It is evident that this board may be exclusively Protestant. The advisory board has also the choice of the books, and shall regulate the religious exercises to be practised in the schools. Now, if the advisory board may be exclusively Protestant, the religious exercises, as well as the school books, may also be exclusively Protestant. No guarantee is, therefore, given to the Catholics. Paragraph 11 of the petition states that the schools are unfit for Catholic children. It is clear that if the advisory board has the right to prescribe the religious exercises, as it has the right to choose the books to be used, the teaching and the religious exercises must necessarily be Protestant, and, consequently, contrary to the Catholic doctrine; and it is clear also that the Catholic children cannot attend such schools. To justify the conclusion of the petition it is enough to show that the advisory board is under the law, and not as a matter of fact, entirely Protestant. I say that there is no necessity to establish that this board is entirely Protestant in fact. I will call the attention to the fact that the appeal in question is not taken on the ground of the operation of the law, but on the ground of the law itself. That is to say, we have not to wait, before interposing, that the law be put in operation. In fact, what does the constitution of Manitoba say on the question of appeal? Section 22 reads as follows:—

> An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

The constitution does not say that an appeal will lie from the operation of an Act, but from the Act itself. Then, this undeniable principle being laid, it must follow that the moment the law is unjust there lies an appeal as a protection for the minority. Is the law just or unjust; that is the question. It will be unjust if it changes the provisions of the former law; if it changes or curtails the guarantees given the minorities by the Act of 1871. Does it change the former laws so as to deprive the Catholics of rights and guarantees which they enjoyed before? It will be enough to read the Act of 1890 to see that it does change the dispositions of the former laws and take away from the Catholics guarantees which they had before. What does the Act of 1890 say? It says that the advisory board may be exclusively Protestant, while the former laws gave the Catholics the right of having Catholics on the board of education by which the school books were chosen. This control is now entirely in the hands of the Protestants. Consequently, the schools must necessarily undergo a Protestant direction. It seems to me, therefore, that the facts of the petition are sufficiently established, and that the object of the complaint is well grounded, as the appeal lies from the Act and not from its application. Why should an appeal lie from the Act simply? It is not to be believed that this has been put in the constitution without an object in view. Evidently the rights of the minority were intended to be protected. The authors of the constitution have wanted an appeal to lie from the law itself, in order to give the minority a means of protecting themselves, and even forestall the evil, if possible. This remedy would, therefore, be delusive and absurd if, before appealing from an unjust school law, the Catholics were obliged to wait till this law be put in operation, and that the injustice be consummated. Now, is a commission necessary, that we may know these facts ? Is a commission necessary that we may know what are the powers of the advisory board under the Act of 1890, and what were the guarantees enjoyed by the Catholics before 1890 ? A commission is no more necessary to establish these facts, than one would be to show the difference existing between the British North America Act and the Act of Union of 1840. It is sufficient to open one's eyes and compare the provisions of the Act of 1890 with those of the law formally in existence in relation to education. Who are those who are asking to-day for a commission ? They are the very ones who for the last five years have been denouncing the Government for what they called their cowardice in not interfering in the matter of the Manitoba schools. They are the ones who pretend that the Bill does not go far enough. Well, I will say this to these gentlemen. They either know the facts or do not know them. If they know them, they need no inquiry ; if they do not know them, they show poor sense when they pretend that the Bill is not full enough. Among those whose eyes are most clouded, the one who shows the greatest need of an inquiry by a commission is certainly the hon. leader of the Opposition. A few days ago, he said in his speech :

> What I would investigate is precisely what is alleged in the petition of the Roman Catholic minority. Among the things that are alleged in this petition are these : first, that there was a compact made between the Roman Catholics of Manitoba and the Crown of England, as represented by the Government of Canada, whereby their schools were guaranteed to them ; second, that the system of common schools is repugnant to their consciences ; third, that the schools established in Manitoba, though nominally public schools, are in reality Protestant schools.

The hon. leader of the Opposition, according to the excerpt which I have just read from his speech, wants that the allegations on which the Catholic minority have based their appeal, be proved before interposing. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us examine the first proposition, that relating to a compact made between the Catholics of Manitoba and the Crown, as represented by the Government of Canada. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in the statement of this proposition, falls into a gross error of facts. The Catholic minority have never alleged in their petition the existence of this compact as a ground for its appeal to the Government for relief. I ask the hon. members of this House to examine the petition of the Catholics, and I defy them to prove that the compact in question was alleged in that petition as a ground for intervention. There is nothing like it. I do not say that such a fact has not its importance ; on the contrary, I contend that it constitutes a powerful argument, which we should set forth in this House, but, I repeat it, as an argument only. The Catholics had no need of alleging the existence of this fact to justify their appeal. They claimed federal intervention, not on account of this compact, but of rights which were conferred upon them by legislation in 1871, and maintained until 1890. Such also is the statement of the Judiciary Committee of the Privy Council of England. It is, consequently, evident that it is not essential to prove the existence of such a compact between the Crown and the Catholic minority of Manitoba, in order to justify the appeal and obtain the intervention of the federal power.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) If the hon. member will allow me I will refer him to the petition of the Catholics. This petition does mention the existence of that compact.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I do not deny it, but I say that the petition of the Catholics does not state it as one of the facts on which they rest their appeal.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Mgr. Taché's petition, dated May 5th, 1890, asked for the disallowance, and alleged the existence of the compact.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) But this does not refute my statement. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) should know that the petition of appeal is not from Mgr. Taché alone. It was signed by the Catholics of Manitoba to the number of 4,250 and more. The hon. member, before interrupting me in the consideration of a subject so important as that now before us, should learn the facts. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in committing this gross error, laid himself open to the charge of having made an unpardonable mistake. In a matter of such scope, of such keen import, as this, I believe that a man, occupying the position he occupies, should avoid such a mistake. If the hon. member for Lotbinière wants to learn the facts, and it is his duty to be informed, I will refer him to the sessional papers of 1891, concerning the question of the abolition of the separate schools in Manitoba. The hon. leader of the Opposition says next in his speech : The system of common schools is repugnant to the conscience of the Catholics. Now, there is no such allegation in the petition. It is not stated there that in itself the system of common schools is repugnant to their conscience. Here are the very words of paragraph 11 of the petition : "The Catholics regard such schools as unfit for the purposes of education, and children of Roman Catholic parents can not and will not attend any such schools." It is not stated that the system of common schools is repugnant to the conscience of the minority. The petition does not speak of the system of common schools. It only complains of the particular schools created by the law of 1890, and it declares them unfit for the education of the Catholic children. The hon. leader of the Opposition speaks of the abstract principle of common schools. His proposition is too vague and does not go far enough. The system of common schools in itself is not absolutely bad. The Catholics may in conscience attend common schools when nothing contrary to the doctrine of their religion is taught there. The danger of such schools does not absolutely come from the system itself, but from circumstances of places and persons which almost always accompany the operation of such schools. If such schools are established in a Catholic country, the danger is not great ; but it is quite otherwise if such schools are established in a Protestant country. In such a case the control becomes Protestant and the direction given the schools is entirely Protestant. Such is the case in Manitoba. We do not complain of the Act of 1890, on account of its being based on the common school system, but we complain that the law puts in the hands of Protestants the absolute control and the external and internal administration of the schools. Who needs a commission to find out that the control exists in the law itself ? What Catholic will need a commission to find out that under such a control the schools are unfit for the education of the children ? The Protestants need no commission either, no more than they would need one to judge that, if their schools were controlled by Catholics, the faith of their children would be in great danger. The third point which the hon. leader of the Opposition would investigate is : Are the public schools in reality Protestant schools ? If such a fact needed to be proved, it seems to me that the task of proving it would not be a hard one. I would only need to refer to the evidence given by Mgr. Taché, Mr. Ewart, and the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) himself. Whatever be the importance of this fact to justify our intervention, I say that it is not in issue, and need not be proved. I say that we do not even need to prove that these schools are Protestant to justify our intervention. The appeal lies from the Act itself, and not from the operation of the law. When it is contended that the schools are Protestant, it is the operation of the law which is arraigned. So, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. leader of the Opposition states his third proposition as a matter essential to justify our intervention, I say that he puts aside all the principles which are to guide us in this matter.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) Will the hon. member allow me to put him a question. He stated a moment ago that the establishment of common schools, in the abstract, is not condemned by the church. Would he tell us whether he has on this point the opinion of any theologian, or whether he is simply giving us his personal opinion ?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I will tell the hon. member for Napierville that he is putting the facts under a false light. I did not say that this doctrine was condemned by the church.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) I am asking you if, when you state that it is not condemned by the Church, you state the opinion of any theologian on the subject ?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I do not have the opinion of a theologian. The opinion might be wrong and not be condemned by the church. I speak of the principle, and I say that it is not absolutely to be condemned. Now, the facts are absolutely established. We have proved by the very provisions of the statute that the Catholics had the control of their schools before 1890. We find that at that date they lost this control. The duty of the Government was, therefore, plain ; it was to hear the appeal of the Catholics, and to demand that the Manitoba Government impair the injustice committed. The Manitoba authorities refused to do so. They have thereby renounced their exclusive right to legislate in the matter. They have thereby handed over to us the right and duty to pass the present Bill. Therefore, let us do it. We are told : Are we bound to interpose ? There is no power which forces us to interfere. I am mistaken. There is one power which commands intervention, the power of our conscience, our duty to do what is right. What was the power that forced the English Parliament to pass the Bill for the emancipation of the Catholics ? What forced the United States to abolish slavery ? Will it be contended that the English Parliament or the government of the United States were forced to interfere ? No, there was nothing but the public conscience to force them to do so. Well, it is the same power which impels us to-day. Injustice exists in Manitoba ; the government of that province refuse to remove it in spite of public opinion, in spite of the hon. leader of the Opposition himself, it seems. Who must make reparation, then, if not Parliament, which alone has the right and duty to do so. Shall we leave any longer the yoke of persecution weigh upon the shoulders of the Manitoba minority ? I do not believe so. In past years, in order to protect the freedom of the Roman citizen, Roman armies were sent to the world's confines. Well, the British people is as jealous of the freedom of the British subject, and it is not deterred from protecting it by the sacrifices which that entails. We all remember the fact recalled by Mr. Chauncey M. Depew before the American congress. A British subject having been outraged, an expedition of several thousand soldiers was sent to his rescue. This expedition in far off lands cost the life of several British subjects and hundreds of thousands of pounds, but freedom and honour were safe. There is in Manitoba an oppressed minority. Will this Parliament have the courage and energy of raising its hand and oppose strength to persecution and outrage ? I prefer to believe that it will. But we are told : If you interfere there will be agitation in the country. Well, if we do not interfere, do you think that there will be no agitation ? In the former case you will at least have rendered justice ; you will have caused the constitution to be respected, and maintained the bonds of confederation ; in the latter, the agitation will be all the more intense and lasting as you will have been afraid of doing justice. The nation then will have the feeling that the minorities can no longer depend upon the guarantees which have been given them, and from this feeling a movement of disintegration will be borne which will unavoidably bring about the ruin of the confederation. We are preached conciliation ! What is there in the Bill which is anything but conciliation ? Those who contend that the Bill does not go far enough, contend thereby that it is too conciliatory. Why, trouble, uneasiness have invaded all the classes of society ! Here is a province for which we have spent millions and millions, for which we have opened our very veins, and which revolts, or threatens to revolt, against the authority of the law, which tramples under foot the most solemn engagements, the most elementary principles of freedom, of justice, of Christian charity ; and we, the Parliament of this country, who have the right and the power to put an end to this, we would remain dumb in face of such a state of things ! I do not understand the aberration of certain men who council conciliation, when all the conciliatory means have been exhausted ; who advise us to wait a little while longer before rendering justice, to keep quiet, not to hurt the feelings of the persecutors ; in a word, who wantonly advise us to abandon the only means that remains to succour the oppressed, which is federal intervention. I repeat it, I cannot conceive such aberration. No, this policy of conciliation is a policy of dupery, of cheat, of falsehood, intended to capture the vote, and then relegate the question to the background.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) It seems to me that I have the right to qualify the policy of the Liberal party as it deserves to be. Your policy of conciliation means capitulation ; it is the cowardly abandonment of the cause of the minority ; it is the guilty weakness of the central power in the face of outrage and revolt ; it is the ignominious admission that the Parliament of this country is not equal to the enforcing of respect for the constitution of which it is the supreme guardian. It is pusillanimity ; it is the policy of cowards, of poltroons. I reject this your policy, because I deem it humiliating and dangerous ; humiliating, because it lowers the authority of this Parliament to the level of the violators of the law : dangerous, because it is the negation of the right which this Parliament has, to make the laws which peace and justice demand. Certain members of the Opposition, who intend to vote against the principle of this Bill, have evoked the question of disallowance. Thus, the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), and of Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), have invoked this pretext to save themselves from doing justice to the Manitoba minority, and to vote against federal intervention, as consecrated by the second reading of this Bill. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what has this question of disallowance to do here ? The exercise of the right of disallowance has absolutely nothing to do with this Bill. If we were to discuss to-day this question of disallowance, it could only be as a matter of historical interest ; for the time for disallowance has long since passed. Suppose it could be proved that the Government was wrong, or right, in not disallowing the law of 1890, what would that have to do with the Bill now before the House ? The time for exercising this right of disallowance has passed, and discussion over this point could bring no practical result. If the hon. members I have referred to are convinced that the disallowance should have been exercised, as they contend to-day, and if they were so convinced in 1891 and 1892, why did they not say so then ? Never, to my knowledge, did we hear the hon. members for Lotbinière and Quebec Centre, move a vote of censure against the Government, and proclaim that they were wrong in not disallowing the Manitoba school law of 1890. Why did they not do so then ? Why did they not, as to-day, charge the Government with weakness for not having disallowed the Greenway law ? On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, the Opposition was very careful not to do so, and these two hon. gentlemen likewise. Never did the Opposition ask this House to vote non-confidence in the Government in connection with disallowance. Look over the debates of all the sessions since 1891, and, Mr. Speaker, nothing of the kind will be found. Why did they not do so ? Why did they not rise in this House and censure the Government ? They argue that disallowance was the only remedy to meet the injustice of the Greenway law, and yet for five years, for five consecutive sessions, no one among these gentlemen of the Opposition had the courage to bring the question before the House. They are always very lavish of motions of censure against the Government, but it is astonishing to see with what prudence and reserve they have acted upon this question of disallowance, while it was so easy for them to publicly censure the Government for not having done what it should have done, according to them. They remained dumb as the dog in the gospel. Such is the truth, and nothing can destroy it. But, Mr.

Speaker, I will go further, and say that these gentlemen of the Opposition were opposed to the exercise of the right of disallowance. Indeed, let us recall the events and the dates. It was in 1891, in the month of March, that the delay for disallowance expired. Now, in 1887, the Liberal party had held a grand conference in Quebec, and at this conference, where all the strong minds of the party were gathered, the question of disallowance had been discussed. And what conclusion had been reached ? The conclusion that the exercise of disallowance was an infringement upon provincial liberties. The Liberals in this House have approved this decision of the interprovincial conference of 1887, and they are responsible for what took place there. They are responsible for the speeches delivered there by Hon. Mr. Mercier, by Hon. Mr. Gagnon, and other Liberal chiefs. All vied in the contention that the exercise of that right was the most odious offence that could be committed against the constitutional liberties of the provincial legislatures. These gentlemen who censure the abstention of the Federal Government, who to-day arraign the Government for not having disallowed the School Law of 1890, applauded then the violent denunciations of the opponents of federal disallowance, and I do not know that they have changed their minds since. The hon. leader of the Opposition himself, who to-day speaks of disallowance, never censured the Government for not having exercised it, either in 1891 or 1892. He never moved a vote of non-confidence, as he couuld have done, to secure the sense of the House in the matter. He never asked this House to declare that the Government had been in fault in not disallowing the school law of 1890. All these very brave fellows have remained dumb ; none of them have arisen to denounce the Government. Then can they be regarded as sincere to-day, when they arraign the Government for not disallowing this law ? Besides, what are these attacks worth to-day, when it is known now that disallowance would not have been a remedy for the evils complained of, and that the interested parties themselves have not asked for it ?

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) On the contrary, Mgr. Taché has asked for the disallowance.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Yes, but he waived it afterwards.

Mr. BRODEUR. (Translation.) All the bishops asked for the disallowance of the law of 1894.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I am not referring to that law. But I will go further and examine the question on its merits. I say that it was good policy not to disallow the law, for if the law of 1890 really did injustice to the minority, it was just for nineteen-twentieths of the population. It is still just for the immense majority of the population of Manitoba. I do not fear to say that, had there been no other means than disallowance, to wipe out the existing injustice, the Federal Government should not have hesitated a single moment to apply it. But granting that the law was just for the nineteen-twentieths of the population, would it have been reasonable to set the whole law at naught, for the Protestants as well as the Catholics, when there was another way to remedy the grievances ? Surely no. I understand that the process of appeal was slower, but it was also wiser, more in accordance with the doctrine of provincial autonomy, and withal more conciliatory, which should please the hon. gentlemen on the left. This fuss over the disallowance, is but the veil under which a cowardly abandonment of the Catholic cause strives to hide itself. But the veil is not thick enough. All can see the odious role which is now being played by the Liberal party in this House. All will understand it, as it was understood by several hon. members on the left, who have thought proper to abandon the hon. leader of the Opposition on this question. I understand that the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet) read them out of the party ; for instance, the members for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil), and for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin), whom he chased out through a hole. He said that it would not be the passage of these gentlemen which would make the hole bigger.

Mr. MONET. (Translation.) I have noted, it is true, that these two gentlemen have detached themselves from the Liberal party on that question. I have noted the thing, and regretted to see it.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) That is what I understand. The hon. member has chased them out through what he called a hole, and said that their passage would make the hole no larger. I agree with him. The passage of these gentlemen has made the hole no larger, because it was already large, so large that other members will follow without widening it. Other members also will go through the hole, for the hon. member for Napierville has forgotten to plug it. But at the next election the hon. member will, perhaps, find himself in another kind of a hole. And while I am giving my attention to the hon. member for Napierville, who, as I have just said, has turned out two of the principal, two of the strongest members of his party, I must add that I did not think that in his majesty he would read a lecture to all the bishops in the province of Quebec. He spoke to us of the religious spirit which should exist in the schools. He taught us, poor mortals, how to follow the bishops, to be good Catholics. The bishops, according to him, do not lead in the right direction. But he does. Will the House be obliged to follow ? It is possible that in a few years he may wear the mitre. Then it will be said of him : -Dominique Monet, bishop, it partibus infidelium. These are the remarks that I wished to offer the House. They are the expression of profound convictions, the token of my attachment to the institutions of the country. I have for a long time believed that on this school question all good citizens would unite their voice and their efforts in a movement of patriotic fervour, to resist the lawless, as one resists a national danger. I have for a long time believed that upon this question, Parliament, at a given moment, would rise, without distinction of party, creed or race, and offer to the weak and oppressed the succour of its strength and its authority. Vain delusion all this. This grand constitutional question has now degenerated, for the Opposition, into a mean party question, and, in order to give back to the minority the privileges of which it has been despoiled, the Government and the Conservative party must depend upon their own forces, upon the independence of certain Liberal members, and on the good sense of the people of Canada.

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I believe that the reverses which the Government met with in the constituencies of Jacques Cartier, Montreal Centre and elsewhere had made them diffident. The electors evinced by far too much fierceness to the taste of the hon. gentlemen, against the candidates who were shouldering the responsibility of the transgressions of the men in power for seventeen years past. After a great deal of vacillation and wavering, they had to face the music and to go through the ordeal of holding an election at Charlevoix. But it was thought prudent to change tactics. The Government candidate put on the disguise of a Liberal candidate, and to the last day of the contest, my opponent strongly condemned the fiscal and administrative policy of the present Government. And it was truly an amusing and comical spectacle to see the Ottawa and the Quebec governments concentrating and putting forth all their strength to bring about the return of their candidate, a so-called opponent of the Government. In order to put public opinion on the wrong scent, they endeavoured to concentrate the attention of the electors upon a single question—the Manitoba school question. My antagonist was to be the saviour, and I was the enemy. Still, my platform was quite acceptable. I told the electors this, and I did not fail to substantiate my statements : the Government will not do us justice, but if, against all appearances, a Bill were introduced fully doing us justice, I shall support it. I further told the voters that, in my opinion, the only man who could bring about a fair settlement of the question was the hon. leader of the Opposition. The Bishop of Chicoutimi, who laboured under the false impression that my programme was adverse to the restoration of separate schools, sent a telegram, three days before polling day, to all the parish priests in my constituency, directing them to warn the electors that they were in duty bound to give their support to none but candidates who would formally and positively pledge themselves to support, at the present session, a remedial law as approved of by the hierarchy. It was therefore a matter of regret to me, Sir, to be unable, under the circumstances, to comply with that peremptory and tardy injunction. I was wholly devoted to the cause of the Catholic minority, but it hardly seemed fair to me, that I should beforehand pledge myself to support a law which I might perhaps personally disapprove. The majority of the electors were of opinion that, although I was not so lavish in promises as my adversary, still I could better protect the interests of the minority and I was returned as member for Charlevoix. I now come to the question under discussion. And, at the outset, I must declare that, in my opinion, the Manitoba government, when they abolished the separate schools in 1890, perpetrated an injustice and an act of oppression prejudicial to the interests of the country. I said an injustice and an act of oppression, because thereby the Manitoba Catholics were deprived of their right to their separate schools, in opposition to the spirit if not to the letter of the compact passed in 1870 ; because it imposed upon the minority, in contradiction with the pledges and the guarantees given, a system of public schools practically Protestant, which were entirely repugnant to the conscience of Catholics. I said further : prejudicial to the interests of the country, because that infringement of the given pledge has stirred up to the highest degree racial and creed prejudices ; it has proved the fruitful source of profitless strife and occasioned the waste of a valuable time which could have been better devoted to promote the general interests of the country. Now, the course pursued by the government of Manitoba is still more open to censure, when we get an insight into the real grounds of their action. For, through such a course, they aimed at nothing less but applying the anti-French and anti-Catholic programme defined by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) at Barrie and at Portage la Prairie, as early as 1889, when he said : That the French language and the denominational schools were a drawback and a danger to the future of Canada. Next, they aimed at rousing creed and racial antipathies and thereby securing a majority which might enable the Greenway government to remain in power, which they had obtained with the help of the Catholic voters to whom they had promised to maintain their separate schools. I am aware that, in formulating his programme, the hon. member for North Simcoe contends that the denominational schools should be unsectarian and that as such unobjectionable to Catholics. The hon. member either forgets or ignores that Catholics cannot divorce secular teaching from religious teaching, for, in their eyes, this is not merely a matter of tradition, but a positive law. They cannot approve of an educational system divorced from the Catholic faith and emancipated from all church control, and whose main object is the imparting of purely secular sciences. Religious and secular teaching must go hand in hand, the former tending to form the conscience and the heart of the child, and the latter, its intelligence ; and that joint action results into securing an adequate education. Now, in order to justify an opposition to godless schools, we may invoke the authority of past centuries ; and with that end in view, let us hear what a writer says on the matter :

> The object of education, says Plato, is to give the body the necessary strength, and the soul the perfection it is capable of. Plato does not confine himself to define the object of education ; he also gives the grounds for it, and he insists that children should be, as soon as possible, initiated to the knowledge of the Divinity by means of " fables, tragedy, odes and epic poetry." The popular feeling asserts itself with a lugubrious and heart-rending intensity in the cruel death of Socrates. On the mere suspicion that he had attacked in his lessons the gods of the land, his fellow-countrymen sentenced him to death. Plutarch says : A good education is the main spring and the root of a righteous life. If the schools, says Quintillian, while imparting education, were to corrupt morals, I have no hesitation in saying that righteousness ought to be preferred to science. " In the teaching of those masters of pagan science are reflected the morals and the ideas of their times." Pythagoras and Xenophon, Zoraster and Boudha, the Phœnicians and the Egyptians, the Persians and the Hindoos, all deify virtue and the main objects of education. Give man everything except virtue, cries out Plato, and you will have done nothing for his happiness. From the first periods of Roman history, men were so much impressed with the necessity of divine intervention in all the acts of the young, that, in the popular belief, two goddesses accompanied the child, when going out of his home, and two others when he came in. Sparta wished to recede from these traditions, but Plato upbraided her as follows : Your young men are like a herd of colts who are taken to pasture together in the prairie under a common guardian.

Sir, I could multiply those extracts in order the more fully to point out the error which certain advocates of modern theories about education labour under, who would banish religious teaching from the school. I could, for instance, adduce the testimony of Protestants, like Guizot, Jules Simon and many others. As I am under the impression that their opinion may carry greater weight with the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), should he do me the honour of reading my speech, I shall confine myself to quoting the opinion of Lord Salisbury :

> Numbers of persons have invented what I may call a patent compressible religion, which can be forced into all consciences with a very little squeezing ; and they wish to insist that this should be the only religion taught throughout the schools of the nation. What I want to impress upon you is, that, if you admit this conception, you are entering upon a religious war of which you will not see the end. There is only one sound principle in religious education to which you should cling, which you should relentlessly enforce against all the conveniences and experiences of official men, and that is, that a parent, unless he has forfeited the right by criminal acts, has the inalienable right to determine the teaching which the child shall receive upon the holiest and most momentous of subjects. That is a right which no expediency can negative, which no state necessity ought to allow you to sweep away ; and, therefore, I ask you to give your attention to this question of denominational education. It is full of danger and of difficulty ; but you will only meet the danger by marching straight up to it and declaring that the prerogative of the parent, unless he be convicted of criminality, must not be taken away by the state.

And Lord Derby :

> Public education should be considered as inseparable with religion.

Mr. Gladstone :

> Every system which places religious education in the background is pernicious.

The Hon. Edward Blake, in the House of Commons, May 29th, 1872, said :

> Although the system of denominational schools was not actually established by law, still denominational teaching in the public schools was practically acknowledged ; and he (Mr. Blake) deeply regretted the course pursued by the legislature of New Brunswick, in inserting in the new school Act a clause providing that every school under that Act shall be non sectarian ...
> The change in the law as it operated upon Roman Catholics was a harsh change, and was not necessary to satisfy the scruples of Protestants.

The Hon. Mr. Laurier, in the House of Commons, July 17th, 1895, ("Hansard," p. 1701) said :

> If the schools are Protestant, every Protestant will say the Government should interfere by all means and stop the outrage. If the schools are not Protestant, but are common, they are still offensive to the Catholics. Why? Because it is part of the Catholic doctrine that the children should have both secular and religious education. It may be said that it is prejudice ; that it should not be considered : that Catholics should be satisfied to have secular education in the schools—the teaching of reading, of history, of geography, and so on. But if their conscientious conviction is that their children should be taught those religious truths which they deem essential and necessary who can object so seriously ?

His Lordship the Archbishop of Rupert's Land, in his address to the Synod, in 1889, previous to the abolition of the separate schools in Manitoba, thus expressed himself :

> Under proper restrictions, I see a measure of justice, and no injustice, in separate schools, and I do not think that it should be easy to do away with them. However, the Roman Catholic authorities may approve of the subjects of religious teaching that Protestants would agree upon, they will accept no teachers but their own. The great majority of Roman Catholic children will therefore, be sent to their own private schools, however inferior, rather than to state schools not under Roman Catholic instructors, whether there > be religious teaching or not. If there is no religious teaching there will be but the stronger expression of dislike. The day will come when one, if not both political parties, will discover that it is undesirable for the state to have this inferior secular instruction, and unjust to the Roman Catholic section of the community, that while getting no state aid for its private schools, it should have to contribute to the support of the state schools. And the separate schools will reappear—possibly in an objectionable form.

Mr. Somerset, superintendent of Protestant schools, in 1888, under the Greenway government, said :

> In connection with its working during the last seventeen years, it may be pointed out that the schools of the province have been managed without a particle of the denominational friction that has caused disturbance and bitterness in other Provinces of the Dominion. . . . . The past history of the province encourages the hope that perfect justice to each interest shall result in a continuance of the harmony that now exists.

Dr. Goldwin Smith, in his letter to the Winnipeg "Tribune," August 22nd, 1894, wrote as follows :—

> It is every man's duty to provide education, as well as food and clothing, for the children whom by his own act he brings into the world. It is every man's right and duty to have his own children educated in the way that he conscientiously deems best. These seem two plain propositions. But our system of public schools, in pursuit of what its framers and advocates deem a higher policy, sets them both aside; and hence the present troubles arise.
> You may say, let the man who conscientiously dissents from our system set up a voluntary school for himself. But then you could hardly justify yourself in compelling him also to pay the school tax. By forcing him to pay the tax, you take from him the means of obtaining his voluntary school, besides doing violence to his principles by making him support an educational system which he disapproves. If the Roman Catholic tells us that he desires the education of his children to have a moral basis, is he unreasonable? If he tells us that our public school system lacks a moral basis, can we easily prove that he is wrong?

The hon. member for North Simcoe will admit, therefore, that from a Catholic standpoint, the very fact of endeavouring to impose upon the Catholics neutral schools, constitues an intolerable grievance. I heard, the other day, the hon. member exclaiming, while addressing the House : where are the grievances ? The grievances, Sir, I find them in the very fact of depriving a Catholic population of the schools to which they are entitled, in the fact that their children are obliged to attend schools where religious teaching is either Protestant or neutral. Moreover, the Lords of the Privy Council have declared that those grievances were well founded, when they said :

> It is true that the religious exercises prescribed for public schools are not to be distinctly Protestant, for they are to be "non-sectarian," and any parent may withdraw his child from them. There may be many, too, who share the view expressed in one of the affidavits in Barrett's case, that there should not be any conscientious objections on the part of Roman Catholics to attend such schools, if adequate means be provided elsewhere of giving such moral and religious training as may be desired. But all this is to no purpose. As a matter of fact, the objection of Roman Catholics to schools such as alone receive state aid under the Act of 1890 is conscientious and deep-rooted.

I am glad to be able to point out to the hon. member for North Simcoe, through those numerous authorities, that his theories stand condemned, as unsound and unjust not only by the ancients but by the modern authors and even by the Protestant Judges of the Privy Council. Now, in the hope of bringing back, the hon. member through interested motives perhaps, to move tolerant views, which he ought never to have forsaken, I may here put on record the opinion of Sir John Macdonald, whom he admires and wishes to imitate in his role of great leader of men :

> At no time in his career, says Mr. Pope had he any sympathy with that fierce intolerance of anything French or Roman Catholic which at the present time is abroad in the province of Ontario.

Were the hon. member for North Simcoe to adopt the tactics of Sir John A. Macdonald in that respect, that would evince on the part of the hon. member a breadth of views more worthy of a statesman, and better calculated to enable him to realize those hopes which have been disappointed so far, but which are probably still living in his breast. It seems to me, Sir, that, when reviewing this school question, it is important to inquire, at the outset, as to whether, in the framing of the Manitoba Act and in the preliminary negotiations, the intent was to give Catholics a guarantee as to their separate schools. It cannot be denied that previous to 1870, the Catholics enjoyed their own separate schools and that delegates insisted upon preserving them. And in support of my contention, let me refer to the reasoned opinion formulated by the Hon. Justice Fournier, in the Supreme Court, on the case of appeal to the Governor General in Council :

> What was the existing state of things in the territory then being formed into the province of Manitoba ? A rebellion, as I have already stated in the case of Barrett vs. Winnipeg, had thrown the people into a strong and fierce agitation, inflamed religious and national passions, caused the greatest disorder, which rendered necessary the intervention of the federal government.
> As matters then stood, on the 2nd March, 1870, the government of Assiniboia, in order to pacify the inhabitants, appointed the Rev. Mr. Ritchot and Messrs. Black and Scott as joint delegates to confer with the Government at Ottawa and negotiate the terms and conditions upon which the inhabitants of Assiniboia would consent to enter confederation with the provinces of Canada.
> Mr. Ritchot was instructed to immediately leave with Messrs. Black and Scott for Ottawa in view of opening negotiations on the subject of their mission with the Government at Ottawa.

When they arrived at Ottawa, the three delegates, Messrs. Ritchot, Black and Scott received, on the 25th April, 1870, from the Hon. Mr. Howe, the then Secretary of State for the Dominion of Canada, a letter informing them that the Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Cartier had been authorized by the Government of Canada to confer with them on the subject of their mission, and that they were ready to meet them.

The Rev. Mr. Ritchot was the bearer of the conditions upon which they were authorized to consent for the inhabitants of Assiniboia to enter confederation as a separate province. These facts appear in exhibit L, Sessional Papers of Canada, 1893, 33d, and in exhibit N of the same Sessional Paper, we see that the following conditions, articles 5 and 7, read as follows :

5. That all properties, all rights and privileges be respected, and the establishing and settlement of the customs, usages and privileges to be left to the sole decision of the local legislature.

7. That the schools shall be separate, and that the moneys for schools shall be divided between the several denominations "pro rata" of their respective populations.

Now, after negotiations had been going on, and despatches and instructions from the Imperial Government to the Government of Canada on the subject of the entrance of the province of Manitoba into the confederation had been received, the Manitoba Constitutional Act was prepared and section 22 inserted as a satisfactory guarantee for their rights and privileges in relation to matters of education as claimed by the above articles 5 and 7. And, until 1890, the inhabitants of the province of Manitoba enjoyed these rights and privileges under the authority of this section and local statutes passed in conformity therewith.

Now, from the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg, it would appear that, although the North-west delegates and the Parliament of Canada were under the impression that the inhabitants of Assiniboia enjoyed, previous to the union, certain rights and privileges as to their separate schools,—as, under subsection 1 of section 22, it is expressly enacted that "nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have, by law or practice, in the province at the union,"—still, as a matter of fact, those inhabitants had, by law or practice, in the matter of denominational schools, no such right or privilege, and, therefore, that subsection is, so to say, blotted out of the charter of Manitoba, by judicial authority. Section 22 of the Manitoba Act enacts as follows :

Section 22.—In and for the province the said legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions :

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have, by law or practice, in the province at the union.

2. An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

I abstain from going into any further details in connection with the evidence and facts alleged by several hon. members who spoke before me, in support of the construction of the statute to which I adhere. I will only add this : that public opinion was, at that time, stirred up by the New Brunswick school question, and that the rights of Catholics were imperilled, owing to the fact that in 1867, the separate schools in that province existed only de facto, and that the Confederation Act safeguarded only the rights or privileges which they had by law at the union. It seems, therefore, most probable that, in the light of the difference which had just arisen, it was intended to protect and guarantee such Catholic and Protestant schools as existed by practice in Manitoba, by adding to the words : "by law, or by practice." I may quote in that connection, from "Hansard" an extract of the debate upon the Manitoba Act in Parliament, as reported in the "Globe"

Mr. Oliver moved that the education clause be struck out.

Hon. Mr. Chauveau moved the amendment would not be carried. It was desirable to protect the minority in Manitoba from the great evil of religious dissentions on education. Their could be no better model to follow in that case than the Union Act, which gave full protection to minorities. It was impossible to say who would form a majority there, Protestant or Catholic. If the population were to come from over the seas, then the Protestants would be in a majority. If, as had been asserted, Manitoba was to be a French preserve, then the Catholics would be in a majority. He did not care which, because he desired only to see the new province freed from discussion, which had done so much injury to the old province of Canada. They presented a problem to the whole world, and the question was, could two Christian bodies, almost equally balanced, be held together under the British constitution. He believed that problem could be worked out successfully.

Hon. Mr. McDougall said the effect of the clause, if not struck out, would be to fix laws which the local legislature could not alter in future, and that it would be better to leave the matter to local authorities to decide as in the other provinces. He quite agreed with his hon. friend in giving the same powers to this province as the others, and it was for that reason that he desired to strike out the clause.

Sir George Etienne Cartier referred to the manner in which the Red River country had been settled, and grants of lands which had been made to the clergy for the purpose of education.

Mr. Mackenzie was prepared to leave the matter to be settled exclusively by the local legislature. The British North America Act gave all the protection necessary for minorities : and local authorities understood their own local wants better than the general legislature. It was his earnest desire to avoid introducing into the new province those detrimental discussions which had operated so unhappily on their own country, and he therefore hoped the amendment would be carried.

After a long discussion a division was taken on the amendment—Yeas, 30 ; Nays, 81.

Evidently, therefore, the intent of the legislators, agreeably to the agreement entered into between the Red River delegates and the representatives of the Dominion Government, was that a satisfactory guarantee should be given as to the maintenance of the separate schools. And further to substantiate my statement that such was the construction generally put upon the provisions of the Manitoba Act, I may refer to an article that appeared in the "New Nation," a paper published at Fort Garry, in its issue of 10th January, 1870:

> The Act constituting the new province has been created.

And reviewing the various sections of the Act, it goes on to say:

> It is specially enacted that no law shall be passed by the provincial legislature, injuriously affecting in any way denominational schools, either Protestant or Catholic. An appeal against any Educational Act, that infringes upon this proviso, will be to the Governor General in Council, and if powers are required to enforce his decisions the Parliament of Canada may be invoked to compel due compliance by an Act for the purpose.

On the 24th June, 1870, the Manitoba legislature relying upon the pledges given, agreed to enter confederation. Finally, the Imperial Privy Council of England, through the Lord Chancellor, declared that such was the intention of the legislators. The Lord Chancellor said:

> It was not doubted that the object of the first subsection of section 22 was to afford protection to denominational schools, or that it was proper to have regard to the intent of the legislature and the surrounding circumstances in interpreting the enactment.

Still, that judgment does nothing less than abrogating, by judicial authority, subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, which the noble Lords would not have done, had they understood that the words "separate schools," beyond the shadow of a doubt, mean in practise, in fact and in the intent of the legislator, denominational schools. It seems to me, Sir, that all those circumstances, when gathered, form a group of absolutely convincing proofs and presumptions. Many men have been sent to the scaffold, with less convincing and less concordant proofs of their crime. I am quite aware, that from a strictly legal standpoint, the constitutionality of the laws of 1880 must be admitted; the judgment of the Privy Council is final. But if those laws of 1890 were declared valid only through a faulty wording of the Manitoba Act or through an error in the construction of the statute by the judicial authority, the cry of Manitoba about interference with provincial autonomy rests only upon an apparent constitutionality. And the injustice perpetrated ought to elicit even from extreme advocates of provincial autonomy, an entire sympathy for Manitoba. The party who, by sticking to the letter of a contract, but contrary to its plain spirit, attempted to gain an unjust advantage, would incur contempt. Why should a government deserve more indulgence? Besides, supposing the laws of 1890 to have been equitably declared valid, the intervention claimed by the minority, would in no way interfere with provincial autonomy. The principles which underlie that autonomy are to be found, Sir, in the Confederation Act; and in the same Act you will find that provision enacted in article 22 of the Manitoba Act, under which the central power is authorized to interfere, in order to restore to the minority the privileges acquired under the law of 1871. But we are told by those who wish to extenuate the wrongdoing of the Manitoba government, that such a reform was necessary as a matter of public policy; on the ground that the Catholic schools were below the standard. It is not to be wondered at, Sir, if in a new country with limited resources, with a population scattered over an immense territory, those schools were not on an excellent footing. All the same, there has been considerable exaggeration and I am going to adduce evidence of it. I find it in Mr. Ewart's pamphlet, in answer to Mr. Wade:

> (1) In 1883 (seven years before the Act abolishing the separate schools), at an exhibition held at Portage la Prairie, the Catholics obtained very marked approbation of the excellence of their school work, and were awarded both prizes and diplomas.
> (2) In 1886, at the Indian and Colonial Exhibition, held at London, England, the Catholics again displayed the results of their labours, and the excellence of their work received high praise. The Canadian Gazette (4th Nov., 1886) said that the provincial exhibit denoted that "there exists a school system which, although respecting the faith and religious convictions of the population, offers to every one an education capable of fitting for the highest rank in society, the child who is placed under its care."

The Hon. Senator Bernier, who was superintendent of Catholic schools in Manitoba, said in the Senate, on the 25th of June, 1895:

> Never, before the Manitoba government had announced its policy on this matter in 1889, never was any remark made to us about the alleged inefficiency of our schools; never was a suggestion thrown out to us; never was blame cast upon us; never was a hint given us as to any drawback that was supposed to exist, or as to any improvement that could have been desired.

Mr. Morrison, an Orangeman, who was for some time inspector of Protestant schools in Manitoba, makes the following statement:—

> Throughout all these years, from 1871 to 1888, no complaint was ever made with the workings of the separate school system.

Now, last but not least comes a testimony which is in no degree open to suspicion, that of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), the Attorney General in the Manitoba government, who, when introducing in the legislature the Bill doing away with the separate schools, said:

> The government considers that they are under a very great deal of obligation to those gentlemen who had from time to time for many years past assisted in controlling and shaping the educational affairs, as members of the Board of Education. Their labours, thus willingly given, had resulted in great good. The government's action had not been determined because they were dissatisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the department are conducted under the system, but because they are dissatisfied with the system itself. (Free Press, 5th March, 1890.)

Let us now contrast the Catholic schools, maintained in 1872 by poor ratepayers paying two taxes, with the common schools which were to make such rapid strides in the way of progress and which were so generously subsidized by the state. In 1892, the Greenway government appointed Mr. A. L. Young inspector of Catholic schools. His report was looked upon by Catholics as very unfair: and undoubtedly, it did not favour them. Here are a few extracts from Mr. Young's pamphlet:

I beg to submit the following report of the schools visited by me during the latter part of the year 1892:—

During the past three months I visited over fifty districts, the majority of these being in the French settlements along the Red, Assiniboine, Seine and Rat Rivers, and formerly under the jurisdiction of the Catholic section of the Board of Education.

The seating accommodation in many of the schools is insufficient; a few are provided with patent desks, but the greater part still use the home-made desks and benches.

As a rule the blackboards used are much too small, and in many cases of poor quality. With only two or three exceptions, all the schools visited by me were well supplied with a sufficient number of good maps.

Five schools are claimed to be conducted according to the Public Schools Act of 1890, in regard to religious exercises. Of these, three are in charge of teachers holding first-class certificates, one is in charge of a teacher having a second-class, and one in charge of a teacher having a third-class certificate; of the total number of teachers seen by me, about fifty per cent hold first-class certificates, twenty per cent hold second-class, and ten per cent have third-class certificates. About twenty per cent are teaching without certificates, these being young lady graduates of the various convents who have begun teaching since the closing of the St. Boniface Normal School.

Of the schools visited by me six were in charge of male teachers. The salaries paid are in all cases very low.

There is an average enrolment of over thirty pupils to each school, some of the larger schools having from one hundred to one hundred and fifty pupils."

With remarkably few exceptions, English is taught in all the schools. The parents and trustees recognize the desirability of having their children study English, consequently those teachers who have sufficient knowledge of the English language to teach it successfully are in much greater demand and receive higher wages than those who understand the French language only. As a rule the scholars read and translate English in a very creditable manner.

In St. Anne's Convent, where through the courtesy of the Rev. Father Giroux and the Sisters in charge I was given every opportunity to examine the school work, I found the higher classes remarkably well advanced in English, their pronunciation being exceptionally good.

In regard to French reading, there is room for considerable improvement in expression.

A good share of attention is given to arithmetic; this subject, however, could be more successfully taught if the schools were provided with a more liberal supply of blackboards.

Very creditable work is done by many of the more advanced pupils in composition, written translations from French to English, letter writing, &c. As a rule the books used for this purpose are kept extremely neat, and reflect credit on both teachers and pupils.

In teaching geography good use is made of a liberal supply of maps with which the majority of the schools are supplied.

A noticeable feature of these schools is the very limited number of boys in the higher divisions.

Now, let us see the reports of the inspectors of public schools for 1894. I take Mr. McCalman's reports, from which I quote the following extract:—

The irregularity of attendance in the majority of schools is a deplorable fact.

Of the one hundred and forty teachers of the division, nineteen held first-class certificates, seventy-five held second-class certificates, thirty-nine held third-class certificates, and seven held permits.

Twenty-five teachers—about eighteen per cent of the total number—were without any previous experience, or professional training whatever.

In advanced classes too little attention is given to the mechanics of reading, and indistinct articulation, and lack of clearness of enunciation are too common.

Writing does not receive that faithful attention it demands, and results are almost uniformly poor.

In the subject of geography teachers are handicapped by the lack of reference books.

In music, notwithstanding that the subject has formed the part of the course of instruction at the provincial and local normal schools for the past two years, the teaching is somewhat spasmodic.

From the report of Mr. S. E. Lang, inspector for the North-west section, I gather the following:—

It would perhaps be correct to say that about two-thirds of the teachers are doing work which may be described as fair. Of the remainder about one-half are doing very good work, while the others must be classed as unmistakably poor—very poor in some cases.

The meagre results in arithmetic are probably due to a misapprehension of the nature of the science of number.

It is not surprising to find the advanced work in arithmetic poorly done in many cases when it rests on a weak foundation of elementary training.

In the subjects of history and geography the dependence of some teachers upon the text books is still painfully apparent.

In this district there were but four teachers holding first-class certificates; fifty-eight with second-class, and sixty-eight with third; and eighteen without any certificates at all.

From the report of 1893, from the same Mr. Lang, I quote the following:

In nearly every school in this division a test was made to discover how many of the pupils above second standard could use correctly the following words:—done, did; seen, saw; set, sit. It was found that about ninety per cent of the pupils "done" their exercises; "seen" the cows; "set" in their seats; and were in the habit of "laying" down.

Mr. Best, inspector for the south district, makes the following statement:

It is to be regretted that an unfavourable report is due on the state of school yards and school environments.

The supply of apparatus for primary work is deficient, and reference books for advanced classes are > not well supplied. The remedy in most cases lies in the hands of the teachers.

> The teachers in charge held all grades of certificates, and represented all stages of proficiency, from the very highest standard of moral and professional excellence, down to those who had neither training, experience nor aptitude."
> The reading done in the schools is largely unsatisfactory.

Mr. Rose, inspector for the south-west district, says:

> There is a most regrettable indifference on the part of trustees and ratepayers in the matter of caring for school property. Irregularity of attendance is a most discouraging feature in rural schools. Many children are actually growing up without receiving even the rudiments of a public school education. I visited one school in which there had not been a single pupil for six weeks. The teacher who was in the habit of visiting the school each morning, was in receipt of a salary of $40 per month. I do most earnestly trust that the time has now fully come when the practice of allowing persons without professional training, and without experience, to engage in teaching, may with safety be discontinued. . . In any case, it would be infinitely better that, in the event of a scarcity, the certificates of trained and experienced teachers should be extended, than that girls of sixteen and youths of eighteen, with neither training nor experience, and possessing only the scanty scholarship necessary to pass the third class non-professional examination, should be turned loose upon the public to draw their salary, and to waste the "precious morning hours" of the children who are so unfortunate as to be placed under their control. The cases are rare in which the closing of the school would not be preferable to the employment of such teachers.

I fear I have trespassed upon the indulgence of the House in quoting so many extracts bearing upon that point: my only excuse is a desire to vindicate the character of those schools, which, after they had been abolished were said to be so inefficient. These quotations seem to me timely, from the fact that I heard several members stating in the House that the maintenance of public or common schools would result in securing for children a much better education. Now, I ask, was it worth the trouble to perpetrate so crying an injustice, to stir up prejudices, to imperil national peace and harmony throughout Canada, in order to reach such meagre results? And with a view to show that it is not enough to banish religious teaching from the schools, to insure their success, allow me to refer to what happened in France, where, I regret to say, they have succeeded in secularizing education. The statistics which I am going to quote are taken from a Protestant journal, "The Church Review," which, in 1890, said:

> Out of 339 pupils who were awarded medals of honour at the Paris Exposition in 1878, 242 were pupils of the Christian Brothers.
> From 1847 to 1877 the Christian Brothers came out ahead in 11,145 expositions, out of 14,447. However, the pupils from the public schools were more numerous, and those schools were state-aided, the yearly subsidy being 40,000,000 francs.

Before leaving that part of my subject, I think it my duty to vindicate the character of the schools of my province, which an hon. member has deemed fit to attack.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) What is the name of that member?

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) I know that teaching in our schools is far from being perfect, and that there is room yet for a good deal of progress, but I think it is but fair that we should make allowance for the difficult and unpromising circumstances in the midst of which the province of Quebec had to develop itself. The emigration of so many professional men, provoked by the cession of the country to England, all the struggles which we had to go through in order to escape being absorbed into the English nationality, and to obtain responsible government; the impediments placed in our way by a hostile government, in order to block our progress; the absence of any efficient school organization up to 1842: the lack of capital, such are the causes which might account for a still less enviable situation. Allowance must also be made for the apathy which prevails in many rural centres in educational matters, but which tends to die away. The best evidence that we have made headway is found in the census of 1871, 1881 and 1891. It is the province of Quebec which is making the most headway. From 1871 to 1891, we have made a progress of 6·29 per cent in the number of persons able to read and write, whilst Ontario gained only 0·85 per cent; Nova Scotia, 3·03 per cent, and New Brunswick lost 0·54 per cent. In 1891 the proportion of children under 10 years of age, unable to read and to write, was 71·64 per cent for Ontario; 80·11 per cent for Quebec; 78·38 per cent for Nova Scotia. Our educational system was attacked here by an hon. member. I differ in opinion from that gentleman. I say that the system, as a whole, is good and needs only to be somewhat modified. I may be allowed to say a few words about the success scored by our schools at the World's Fair at Chicago. I notice that the 55 yearly reports of the Superintendent of Public Instruction have been awarded a prize, as containing most useful information. On the 22nd August, 1893, Mr. Serrurier, the representative of the French government at the exhibition, wrote to the President of the section of Public Instruction of the province of Quebec:

> I am bound to express to you the great satisfaction I felt when visiting your school display. * * * Your books are the only ones, I think, that are headed in a full, definite and clear way with indications showing the name of the school, the class, the number and age of pupils, etc. Your methods are ours, so much so that, at first, I thought I was in France.

The correspondent of the "Daily Sun," a journal published in St. John, N.B., in its issue of the 29th August, paid us the same eulogy:

> As to drawing, penmanship, as regards the tuition of the blind and of the deaf and dumb, and in general all that concerns the progress of a country in educational matters, the Quebec schools now stand second to none.

Let us now come to the opinion of Mr. Morton, who was charged with the whole department of education of Canada by the Dominion Government:

> It is the general opinion here that the province of Quebec made a very good display, especially as regards the every-day practical work in the classes. The exhibits of the Brothers' schools, particularly in penmanship, drawing and in the commercial branch, are much admired. The display of the Sisters' schools attracts a great many admirers, men and women. All the educationalists who visited this section are never tired with praising the exhibits they saw. The province of Quebec has good ground to be proud of her exhibits.

The "Catholic Journal," of Chicago, made the following remarks:—

> The province of Quebec has a fine display, thanks to her private and separate schools. Beyond all dispute, the Catholic schools have the lion's share. Their contributions are not only numerous but varied, and in many cases very creditable. In the exhibits from the convents, we would recommend for neatness and accuracy the Quebec Ursulines' Convent; for style and variety, the Stanstead Convent, whilst for highly finished work we would give the palm to the Notre-Dame Congregation of Montreal. A truly characteristic display is that of the Deaf and Dumb Girls' Institute, under the management of the Sisters of Charity, near Montreal. It contains several samples of intellectual and manual work taught in the various departments.

Further on, the same journal said:

> The Canadian provinces have very remarkable exhibits in each one of the great industrial palaces, but none show to better advantage the progress made by the people than their educational system.

And the "Civilta Catholica," in its issue of November, 1893:

> One of the characteristical features noticeable in the department of the province of Quebec are the pupils' exercises with corrections made by the teachers. Several tables were covered with those interesting productions. The Montreal Catholic school trustees exhibited in that way the exercises of the whole academic year. The Polytechnical School of the same city had done the same, as well as the Sherbrooke College, which is under the direction of secular priests, and the small seminary of the same town. The Quebec Normal, Quebec, holds the place of honour. Tuition in that institution is entrusted to lay professors under the high supervision of a priest who bears the title of principal; the female pupils are under the direction of the Ursuline Nuns, and they also attend the classes of the Normal School teachers. The exhibits of the Christian Brothers lack neither variety nor merit, chiefly in penmanship, in ornamental characters for diplomas and in designs for engineers and book-keeping. The display made by the Brothers of the Holy Cross, the Brothers of the Patronage of St. Vincent de Paul, of Quebec, the Marist Brothers, the Brothers of St. Gabriel, the Brothers of the Sacred Heart, strike us with astonishment by the wonderful multiplicity of their graduated exhibits and productions, which evince an abundance of pedagogic power, only equalled by the inexhaustible catalogue of the convents' exhibits.
> I may say, further, that the Catholic schools of Canada have taken the palm over all our schools of the United States for industrial exhibits.

I might quote other extracts, in addition to the above quotations, but it would be useless. It seems to me, that, after all those eulogistic and disinterested testimonials, it would be most unfair to contend that the educational system of the province of Quebec is backward and unprogressive. In 1850, in England, a wealthy and so-called progressive country, there was fifty per cent of the population who were unable to read and to write, and the following table shows that there is still plenty of room for progress. The following statistics are taken from the British Cyclopœdia, Vol. VIII., page 711:—

Country.	Catholics.	Protestants.	Pupils per 1,000 inhabitants
Switzerland	1,084,400	1,577.700	155
German Empire.....	14,867.500	25,630,700	152
Luxembourg	197,000	400	142
Norway	350	1.704.800	138
Sweden	600	4,203.800	138
Holland	1.313.000	2.198,000	136
Denmark	1.900	1.865.000	135
France	35,388.000	610.800	131
Belgium	4,980.000	15.000	123
Austria	27.904.300	3.571.000	100
Great Britain.......	5.500.000	25,900,000	83
Spain	16.500.000	....	82
Italy	26.750,000	35,000	70

It is noteworthy that Switzerland, with a mixed population like that of Canada, heads the list, and that Luxembourg, France and Belgium, which are Catholic countries, are far ahead of England. The Act of 1890, having been declared ultra vires, the minority had no other resource left but to appeal to the Governor General in Council, in pursuance of subsection 2 of the Manitoba Act, to have their rights and privileges restored to them. The hon. Ministers deemed it their duty to impose upon the Catholic minority the delay of an appeal to the Privy Council, in order to have that rights of appeal determined. Finally, the appeal was heard, and on the 21st March, 1895, a remedial order was enacted. It reads as follows:—

> His Excellency the Governor in Council was pleased to adjudge and declare, and it is hereby adjudged and declared that by the two Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba, on the first day of May, 1890, intituled respectively "An Act respeceting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province in relation to education, prior to the first day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following > rights and privileges which, previous to and until the first day of May, 1890, such minority had, viz. :—

> (a.) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.
> (b.) The right to share proportionally in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.
> (c.) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.
> And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, as is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.
> Whereof the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Manitoba for the time being, and the legislature of the said province, and all persons whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

The remedial order was passed on to the Manitoba government. But before proceeding any further, I have several grievances to formulate against the Government. I hold them responsible for the deep agitation which has prevailed in the country, and to a large extent, for the wrong inflicted upon the Manitoba minority, as I am going to show. In 1870, the Catholics were a majority in Manitoba, and all the friends of the French Canadian element cherished the reasonable hope that the province would remain French in character. Why have those hopes been frustrated ? For a very obvious reason. To the anti-Canadian and improvident policy of the Government must be ascribed that misfortune. Instead of directing towards the new province so full of promise, the French Canadians, who were leaving by thousands the province of Quebec, and encouraging them by proper inducements to settle in Manitoba, the Government have spent over $3,000,000 within the twelve last years to help the Mennonites and others to migrate to that province, which was to remain French in character. And I may further state that a great many of those immigrants after availing themselves of the premiums and advantages offered crossed over to the United States. The Government, moreover, unjustly declined to yield to the urgent prayers of the Catholic minority, by exercising their power of disallowance. Disallowance was a peremptory means of redressing the wrongs complained of : wherefore did they not exercise that right ? Was it through fear of creating an agitation in the country ? Why, they did not hesitate, in order to protect the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to bring the province within an inch of revolution, by twice disallowing the Bill concerning the Red River Valley Railway. Four Bills were passed at the session of the Manitoba legislature in 1890 : the school law under discussion, a Bill unjustly and illegally doing away with the official use of the French language, a Bill establishing quarantine regulations for cattle, and a Bill concerning corporations. Two of those Bills, not to mention the outrageous wrong which they entailed upon the minority, could, through the principle involved in them, jeopardize the peace of the country and the very existence of confederation. Of course, it was but fair to presume that the Government, with a view to the protection of a weak minority, would have vetoed the two former Bills. But far from it, it was the two latter which they disallowed, evincing thereby that they cared more for the cattle of the North-west than for Catholics. It is but right to think that, had the Canadian Pacific Railway Company asked for disallowance, it would have been unmercifully exercised. Beyond the shadow of a doubt, the Government did commit an egregious mistake, by not exercising their right of disallowance. Supposing even that a Remedial Bill could be passed, would thereby all the rights taken away from the minority be restored to them ? Certainly not. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) said, a little while ago, that the Government were perfectly justifiable in not having disallowed the school law of 1890, on the ground that it was beneficial to nine-tenths of the population. I believe that the hon. member, in perfect good faith, has exaggerated the proportion of those who are benefited by the law ; but whether those statistics be correct or not, the fact remains that the hon. member has resorted to a very poor argument. The question at issue is this : Was anybody wronged by the law? If so, then an injustice has been done, and how beneficial the law may be to the majority. In equity, the Government were bound to redress the wrong complained of. It is also contended that a motion was made by Mr. Blake, suggesting the passage of a law enabling the Government to refer certain questions of law or fact to the Supreme Court, in educational matters. That motion simply aimed at creating an enabling power, but it cannot be said that reference to the court is binding upon the Government. But, let us take the position such as represented by the Government supporters, presuming that the Government were warranted in referring the question to the court before disallowing the law, the Ministers should not have lost sight that the minority were suffering, that a solemn compact had been infringed ; and, acting upon Mr. Blake's suggestion, if it were deemed sound and wise, they ought to have forthwith passed a law enabling them to refer the case to the judicial tribunals, in order to be ready to take action before the delay fixed for disallowance had expired, in March, 1891. I say that there was enough time left during the session of 1890 to enable the Government to pass a law authorizing them to refer the question to the Supreme Court. I say that the course pursued by the Government, under the circumstances, evinces culpable neglect. And I say further, that the Government are open to censure for their negligence, so much the more so as they are now bringing in a Bill which, to say the least, is decidedly inefficient. Now, we are warranted in telling the Ministers: You are responsible for the actual state of things, which you say you cannot any longer control, and for which we will arraign you before the electors. The ground of that neglect is that they relegated justice into the background. The party interests, such was their policy; no matter whether the minority were groaning under the yoke of oppression, if only the Government could come out victorious from the electoral contest. And they hurried on the elections of 1891, before the time for disallowance had expired, thus killing two birds with one stone, through those desperate tactics, snatching the Catholic vote, by extending the hope of disallowance to Catholic voters, and the Protestant vote, by the assurance given of non-interference. Once they had come out victorious at the polls, the Remedial Bill was promised as a panacea. But, previous to the Privy Council rendering their judgment, by which the right of appeal to the Governor General in Council was recognized, the Government once more evinced their settled determination not to provide any remedy to the grievances of the minority by their refusal to disallow the laws of 1891, in spite of so many petitions and requests. However, disallowance could be evoked upon two special grounds. The Privy Council had, contrary to all expectation, declared valid the law of 1890, and it was then open to serious doubt whether the law of 1894, not mentioned in the appeal before the Governor General in Council, could be nullified by a remedial law. As the Greenway government persistently declined taking action upon the remedial order, a session was called together in July last, and strong differences of opinion prevailed in the Cabinet, as some members were opposed to the Remedial Bill. The Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General, in sheer disgust, threw up their portfolios to the winds. Three days later, the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General came back to the Cabinet, stating that they had received additional pledges. For my part, I believe that those additional guarantees have since been taken away. The Hon. Mr. Angers, being satisfied that there was no more justice to expect, and prompted by motives of disinterestedness which are highly creditable to him, declined to resume his seat in the Cabinet. And from that day, many friends of the minority realized that the element in the Cabinet adverse to the rights of that minority, had it all their way in the Cabinet. However, the hon. Minister of Finance stated on behalf of the Government: "That a session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January," and further: "That the Dominion Government will be prepared to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895. By that declaration, the honour of the Crown and of the Cabinet was pledged anew. On the 2nd January, the Speech from the Throne was read, and the Remedial Bill was again promised. On the proposition of the Government, the House was adjourned to the 7th January. Then it was that broke out in all its violence the opposition to the policy in favour of redressing the wrongs of the minority. Seven Ministers, bent upon politically killing their leader, and giving the finishing blow to remedial legislation, resigned their portfolios. The Premier, without exaggeration, qualified his colleagues as traitors to their oath of office and to their duty. The "Moniteur de Lévis," whose chief editor is a prominent member of the other House, and which is considered as faithfully reflecting the opinions of the Hon. Mr. Angers, stated that the Conservative party in the province of Quebec was betrayed by those who had been its allies for over forty years, and that the rights of the minority were being sacrificed. In its issue of the 18th January, 1896, under the heading "Our Allies," that paper said:

> The desertion of Messrs. Foster, Haggart, Montague and their colleagues is too important a fact for us to allow to pass by without adding a word to what our parliamentary correspondent says on the matter. The fact is that we are confronted by a very serious state of things. Through the treason of the Ontario Tory party, the Quebec Conservatives are left without any allies in the House. Our friends of forty years standing forsake us at the very moment when we stand in need of their help to have the constitution respected and to secure the triumph of the rights of the minority. They desert us and their desertion assumes the features of a cowardly treason. We did not desert them, but they are the very men who break asunder the ties that bound us to them. Shall history repeat itself? We know not. But we know this, that the Conservative party has been shamefully deserted, outrageously betrayed by its allies from the other provinces.

A few days later, the love of power proved stronger in them than their regard for parliamentary etiquette or even the rules of decorum, and they came back to the Cabinet and resumed their seats on the Treasury benches. Their return to the fold was not by any means calculated to reassure the friends of the Catholic minority. The electoral contest in my constituency was then in full swing, and I had the opportunity of relating before the electors several circumstances connected with the facts which I have just mentioned. I noticed that those honest and straightforward men, little acquainted with the tricks of politics, and with the degrading alliance of interest and fanaticism, evinced their utter surprise at the return of our Ministers to the fold and were little inclined to think that all that scheming would result favourably to the Catholic interests. Finally, Sir, after two months of session utterly lost as far as the school question is concerned, that often promised and long-expected Remedial Bill was introduced. Owing to the evolution brought about by some unknown influence, the Ministers who were ready to do justice and those opposed to it were reconciled. As to the law itself, I do not want to speak of it with too much severity. Born in the midst of so much wrangling and wavering and being the offspring of so many alarms, it is not quite so bad as some would lead us into believing, and much less perfect than its framers would have us think it is. To tell you the truth, if the hon. Ministers were anxious, as they have so emphatically professed to be, to see the Catholics reinstated in their rights, they cannot be entirely satisfied with the Bill which they have framed. Procreated under the empire of fear,—the dread of the electorate—that Bill awards justice so stingily that it renders it inoperative and exposes it to the risk of being declared invalid. Without going into all the details and the weak points of the measure, which may later on be done in committee, I will merely draw attention to the fact that the remedial order contained three distinct pledges, and that those pledges were renewed in July last by the hon. Minister of Finance, speaking on behalf of the Crown and the Government. And yet, there are only two pledges redeemed by the Remedial Bill ; although the remedial order recognizes "the rights of the minority to have their proportionate share in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education." Such an omission is so much the more extraordinary as it involves a serious injustice and an invalidity. I say an invalidity, because the remedial law must be in the very terms of the remedial order ; and I said an injustice, because it does not grant to the Catholic minority that share of the public moneys to which they are entitled, and which they were promised. The Bill does not even declare that they will be entitled to have their proportionate share in any grant made by the Manitoba legislature, for educational purposes. Section 74 of the Bill simply means this : Should the Manitoba government make an appropriation for separate schools, the Catholics may accept it and carry it to the credit of the educational board. That is an exceedingly important omission, a fatal gap. I believe that the Government were bound, by their pledges, to provide for that grant, and such an omission can hardly be accounted for. Such an omission is so much the more to be regretted as the clause of the Bill allowing the Catholics, merely by giving notice of their option, to withdraw their support from separate schools, may kill the Bill. Such option, allowing them to escape the payment of onerous taxes may soon prove a cause of temptation which will drive them towards the public schools. Therefore, section 74 ought to be amended so as to secure to Catholics, out of the proceeds of the sale of school lands, their proportionate share for their schools, in case the Manitoba government should persist in their refusal. Such an amendment offers no difficulty, as the interest on the proceeds of the sale of those school lands is yearly paid by the Dominion to the Manitoba government. An hon. member has given notice to the House that he will move such an amendment. The hon. Ministers should not object to such an amendment, any more than they should oppose those which may be deemed necessary in order to make the Bill as effective as possible. I am aware that the hon. Ministers who are in favour of a fair settlement of the school question will accept those amendments, but what about the other hon. gentlemen, who, scarcely two months ago, did not stop at an infamy : shall they accept it ? For several days past, the hon. gentlemen have been singing, with a pathetic harmony, a pæan to justice. Emphatic statements are not sufficient, when a minority is being made a holocaust to the fanaticism of a few individuals. Shall we redress the wrong perpetrated as fully as the constitution enables us to do ? The amendments which will be moved by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) will supply the hon. gentleman with an excellent opportunity of evincing their earnestness. If not, we will be quite warranted in believing, with some hon. gentlemen, that we are being treated to a mere theatrical performance, a dismal comedy which will have cost the country in the neighbourhood of $600,000. And if it were shown that all this performance is but a farce, we would be warranted in the belief that their denial of justice was coupled with the most profound hypocrisy. The hon. Minister of Finance with an air of satisfaction, queried, the other day : "Does the Bill not involve a principle ?" It does surely, Sir ; but in order to draw from that principle the practical applications which it involves, you must supply what is wanting to the Bill—money. For my part, however, I am going to give credit to the Ministers until I am satisfied that I was wrong in relying confidence in their statements. I may perhaps be told that by virtue of clause 112, the deficiencies of the Bill may later on be remedied, in case Manitoba should not yield assent. That objection does not hold good. When the law is passed, Parliament will no longer have any jurisdiction, and the minority will have to resort again to an appeal, and to agitate again, without being sure whether the refusal of Manitoba to grant a subsidy will be a further grievance, calling for federal interference. And supposing, which God forbid, that the hon. gentlemen were given another lease of power for five years, many of them, the danger being over, would perhaps overlook the principles of justice which they now so eloquently advocate. For my part, Sir, fully reserving my right to judge the Bill on its merits on the third reading, I declare that I shall vote that the Bill be now read a second time, on the following grounds : I shall vote for the Bill, because I pledged myself before my constituents to support a Remedial Bill, and I believe that my course would imply contradiction, were I to reject from the committee where it may be perfected, a Bill which, however incomplete it may be, does not the less involve the principle of federal interference, beneficial in some respects to Catholics. I vote for the Bill on the further ground that I endorse the move of interference through a remedial legislation, provided it may be completed and made operative. A further ground for my voting in favour of the second reading is that later on we may force the Government to redeem their pledge and agree to the amendments necessary to complete the law. Another reason why I vote for the Bill is that, by bringing about the passage of a good Remedial Bill, we will teach a good and useful lesson to the Manitoba government, so overbearing, autocratic and unjust in their conduct. The last ground for voting in favour of the Bill is that it is important that this vexed question should be settled and removed as soon as possible from the arena of active politics. The hon. Minister of Finance in concluding his remarks, said : "Let us do justice to that weak and patient minority." Yes, let us do justice, but let that justice be complete, and bountiful so as to show that the fact of confederation is no snare, that the minorities may find shelter and protection, and fair-play under the Canadian flag ; let not that justice merely be "the gold in the nugget," in the words of the hon. Minister, which may perhaps give indication of the secret wishes of several hon. members. I am truly sorry to be under the necessity of withdrawing my support from the leader of the Opposition, under the circumstances and of differing in opinion from most of my political friends. But I realize that this school question is no political issue, that it forms no plank of the Liberal platform. But, my confidence in my leader is not impaired for all that, and I willingly pay homage to the uprightness of his intentions, and to his devotion to the interests of the Manitoba minority. I know that the position taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition, in connection with a Bill which he thinks will prove inefficient and practically inoperative, is severely commented upon by many. But it is only fair to say here, that as the leader of a great political party, the hon. gentleman would perhaps have committed a fault, to the detriment of Catholic interests, by giving his support to a Remedial Bill which our allies, the English Liberals look upon as premature, the more so as those allies have for a long time been the devoted champions of Catholic interests and may still be so in the future. It is a matter of regret that the hon. leader of the Opposition has not been at the head of affairs since 1890, for I am confident that he would have better understood the interests of the Catholic minority, he would have better adapted himself to this extraordinary emergency, and with the fair play which distinguishes him, as even his opponents admit, he would have better realized the exigencies of the situation and the importance of diplomacy and conciliation, from the outset. Now, should the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches, decline to do justice ; should they neglect to pass a remedial law with the proper amendments ; should the interests of the Catholic minority be entrusted to the hon. leader of the Opposition, called upon to take the reins of power, then I say, Sir, that I would think of the future with confidence, being satisfied that the hon. gentleman would, with the support of his party, protect the Catholic interests. In bringing to a close these lengthy remarks, allow me, Sir, to thank the hon. gentlemen for their kind attention and their indulgence in hearing me throughout with so much patience.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, taking into consideration the fact that this debate has been going on for several weeks, and taking also into view the fact that we have been continuously sitting since yesterday, and that the hon. members are tired and long to reach a vote on the question at issue, I do not intend to inflict upon the House any lengthened speech, and I merely wish to confine myself to a few remarks which I will make as short as possible. I may say, Sir, that I listened with intense interest to the many speeches which have been delivered in connection with the question before the House, and I noticed with pleasure that, for the most part, the hon. gentlemen who rose to participate in this debate have vied with each other in championing the rights of the Manitoba Catholic minority, and in evincing their feelings of goodwill towards the same. In presence of that almost unanimous concert, it seems to me that the remedying of the grievances complained of by the minority should prove an easy task. The Government followers have displayed considerable zeal in the matter, but they have taken precious good care not to expatiate upon the merits of the Bill and the efficaciousness of the remedy which is offered to the aggrieved minority. The hon. ministers have kept silent on the Bill which their organs would lead the country into accepting as a masterpiece of legislation. The same remark applies to the supporters of the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, far from a solution being brought to the question, which has been agitating the country ever since they declined to apply the proper remedy, that is disallowance, the Government are actually confronted by much more serious difficulties than what we have so far seen. And if we take into consideration all the evils which the exercise of the right of disallowance by the Government would have saved the country, we cannot but come to the conclusion that the Government cannot be too severely arraigned and condemned at the hands of the people for neglecting to apply such a remedy in the proper time. It cannot be urged that the Catholics did not ask for disallowance, for we all know that the Catholics, in 1890, through Archbishop Taché, the Hon. Senators Bernier and Girard, and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) urged the Government to disallow the law which infringed upon the rights of the Catholic minority. But, as remarked by the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, the Government, having made up their minds not to do justice, hurried on the elections in 1891, before the delay for the exercise of the power of disallowance had expired. The Government followers were thus enabled to tell the Catholic voters that the delay for the exercise of the power of disallowance had not yet expired. I know, from my personal experience during the electoral contest that this objection was urged by our adversaries. I was satisfied that the Government were betraying the interests of the Catholic minority. I urged that this remedy would not be applied, and I was met with this invariable answer: You have no right to complain, because there is still time left for disallowance. That argument was plausible enough. But they acted with cunning under the circumstances; so, the Catholic voters were told that disallowance would be applied, and the opponents of separate schools were assured that the Government would not interfere. It was with such promises that the Catholic population were fooled into supporting the Government; and when the law of 1894 was passed by the Manitoba legislature, the Federal Government were again urged to disallow that law. The plea for disallowance was still stronger and more peremptory. I venture to say that on no previous occasion was there ever placed in the hands of the Executive so weighty and important a document as the one which was then sent to the Ministers. We then actually saw all the bishops of Canada, without a single dissentient voice, beseeching on their knees the men who occupy the Treasury benches to afford protection to the minority, and to disallow the recent legislation which so harshly interfered with the rights of the minority. And no action was taken. More than that, Sir, petitions were circulated throughout the breadth and length of the province of Quebec, from parish to parish, petitions which all Catholics were requested to sign, and they were asked to join with the hierarchy of the Dominion in asking the Government to disallow the recent law passed to the detriment of the Manitoba minority; they were asked, I say, to join with the bishops, in order to give greater strength to their petition, so as to secure a more favourable hearing and a readier application of the remedy best calculated to redress the grievances complained of: and, I ask, what became of all those petitions? Those petitions, signed both by the bishops and by thousands of Catholics, were thrown into the waste-basket, practically at least. I cannot let this opportunity pass by without reaffirming before the House my disapproval of the course pursued by the Government under those circumstances. They would now lead us into believing that, when they allowed that robbery to be perpetrated, when they allowed the property of Catholics to be confiscated, they intended to remedy later on the evil. Prevention is always the better cure, and the Government have now to shoulder part of the responsibility for the evils which have befallen the Manitoba Catholics. I arraign now the Government, as I have done previously, under the circumstances. I charge them, before the country with being responsible for all the wrong-doing which has been perpetrated since that law was passed. They are responsible for the litigation which has taken place, and for the fact that the minority have run the gauntlet of the judicial tribunals, from our Canadian courts to the highest judicial tribunal in the Empire. They are responsible for all the wrangling and disputes which are the inevitable result of such a state of things. They are responsible for the sufferings entailed upon the Catholic minority. They are responsible for the creed and racial hatreds which have assumed in this country such frightful proportions. They are further responsible for another matter which, to the eyes of many, may seem of secondary importance, but which is still worthy of consideration; they are responsible, I say, for the fact that we are now holding a sixth session of this Parliament, an extraordinary session simply called for the purpose of passing a remedial Bill, and which will entail upon the country an expenditure approximately of $500,000. Is it possible, I ask, for us not to remember who is responsible for that expenditure, for all the above enumerated facts, in presence of the Bill now under discussion in this House? In the judgment of the most competent men in the matter, the enforcement of this Bill is utterly impracticable. This Bill, which is probably ultra vires in several of its provisions, does not restore to the persecuted minority the rights which have been taken away from them. This Bill now before us, should it be turned into law—a contingency, the accomplishment of which, I think is very remote, as the validity of the Bill is open to doubt—this Bill, I say, will result into bringing about further litigation and will constitute the denouement of the comedy which has been going on these five years past, a comedy which has been acted at the cost of the Catholic minority of Manitoba. Under this Bill, the whole management of the schools is indirectly placed in the hands of the local government, who are openly proclaiming their hostility to separate schools ; and certain rights of the minority are handed over to that hostile government, among others, the right to appoint members of the Board of Education. The local government are thus enabled to appoint men adverse to the separate school system, as such men are to be found among Catholics. Supposing that the Manitoba government, prompted by their hostility, should make appointments under the first section of the Bill, and select opponents of those schools, would not the separate school system thereby be made inoperative ? And supposing again that in opposition to the wishes of the great majority of the Catholic population, such men were selected, what benefit would accrue to the Manitoba minority from this Remedial Bill ? A closer study of the Bill evinces the fact that the Manitoba government are invested with the power of making appointments, through the Educational Department and of making regulations for the organization of separate schools. Wherefore does the Bill give to the local authorities the right to make regulations for the organization of separate schools ? If you leave in the hands of the local government the management of those schools, what is the use of passing this Bill ? Is not the fact another evidence of the impracticable character of this Bill, and the further proof that it is nothing but a child's play, devised to divert public opinion ? Under clause 7, it is enacted that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall appoint one of the members of the Separate School Board of Education to the charge of superintendent for the separate schools. We know perfectly well, Sir, that the superintendent is an important officer in the machinery of those schools. Now, under clause 7, the government are free to appoint that officer. But in default by the local government to appoint a superintendent, the same clause provides that he shall be appointed by the board. But should the local government neglect to appoint him, and should the board also decline to make the appointment, nobody can force them to act. In that case, there would be no superintendent, although the machinery of the Bill is to a large extent set in motion by that officer. In both cases, therefore, the superintendent, should there be one appointed, will be appointed either by the provincial government or by their tools. The local government will have most to do with the appointment of that officer, and that provision alone suffices to make the law illusory. More than that, Sir, there is no provision made for its practical enforcement, and no funds are provided for, out of which may be defrayed the cost of the working of the Bill. While provision is made for the appointment of the indispensible officers, the fact has been overlooked that those functionaries are public officers, and as such must be paid by the state. Who will pay the superintendent ? Who will pay the travelling expenses of the members of the separate school board ? Who will supply the premises or the office where are to be held the meetings of the board ? For it is not to be presumed that they will hold their sittings in the streets of Winnipeg. As the hon. members know, Sir, the cold is very sharp on certain days of the winter in Winnipeg ; and how will those members of the board manage to brave the rigours of the season ? As I said, there is no provision made for the necessary funds to face that expenditure. I may also here remark that the schools of the Catholic minority were only indirectly abolished, as under the law the Catholics are free to have their own schools, provided that they pay for their maintenance. There is nothing in the law of 1890 precluding Catholics from having their own schools. All they have to do is to levy the necessary taxes for their maintenance, and the government cannot forbid Catholic children to attend those schools. Those schools have no longer any share in the legislative grant ; such is the primary reason why they were practically abolished ; but with the Bill now under discussion, there is not the least atom of chance left the Catholics to have their share in the legislative grant, and, therfore, the schools which may be established under the present Bill without any money being appropriated to that purpose, will not work any better than those which were abolished. That conclusion is self-evident, and it cannot possibly have escaped the attention of the Ministers, and, therefore, they cannot be said to have provided for the means of remedying the evil. Then, the remedy offered by the Bill is quite insufficient, and, should any attempt be made to apply it, would prove inoperative. The only redeeming feature of the Bill is the exemption of Catholics from paying any taxes for the support of public schools. I do not deny that relief is given Catholics to that small extent. But, if I may use the words fallen from a high dignitary of the church, I would say with Archbishop Langevin : We do not want to pick up the crumbs fallen from the table. What the Government give the Catholics here is only a crumb, and a partial exemption from taxation. For it is an actual fact that, every year, the Manitoba government appropriate large sums of money for educational purposes. Now Catholics contribute their share to the moneys voted for public schools. Therefore, the statement that under this Bill Catholics are exempted from contributing towards the support of public schools is at variance with the facts. This Bill contains many other provisions which are obnoxious to the minority whom it intends to protect. But it is easy to understand that the Government have no intention to perfect this Bill. Evidently that Bill was brought to light in the midst of great travail and much wrangling among the Ministers. Mutual concessions were made, so that it might be said that a Remedial Bill would be introduced. Even if this Bill were amended in the direction of the amendments of which the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) gave notice, there would still be left most serious drawbacks, and its validity would still be open to serious doubts. Several hon. members, and among others the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier) put a question the other day to one of the French ministers. He asked him whether it was the intention of the Government to make any changes in the law. He even went to the length of stating that he would vote in favour of the Bill if the Minister were willing to state that such changes would be made. The Minister declined to give any answer. Well, I put again the same question, and I directly appeal to the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan), who, as a Catholic, must have at heart the interests of the Catholic minority, to tell us whether it is the intention of the Government to amend clause 74 so as to make provision for the funds wherewith the separate schools may be maintained. Should the hon. Minister declare that the Government are willing to accept the amendments of the hon. member for Bagot, I declare that I shall vote for the Bill under discussion. I wish for an answer. The leader of the House is in his seat. Several ministers, those from the province of Quebec, are before me, and if I am not given an answer, I will conclude positively that such is not the intention of the Government. I will conclude that their contention is to deceive the House and to deceive the public. For the last five years we have been daily deceived on this school question. For the last five years, the ministers, lacking the necessary qualification of firmness and ability to sail the ship of state, seek on the one hand to capture the confidence of the Catholics by alluring promises, while on the other hand they similarly endeavour to gain the votes of the opponents of separate schools by promises quite the reverse. I say that there can be no mistake on the present situation. The time for promises must have come to an end, and what is happening around us at this moment is of a nature to force upon us the conviction that the Government is still trying, by the means of a tangent, to escape the terrible responsibility which they have assumed in the course of the last few years. I think I need not state that I am in favour of separate schools where they can possibly be maintained; but above all I want schools. However, I must say, that the Bill, as it is before us, and as I understand it, is the best way to prevent the establishment of separate schools for the minority, when children will grow up, too many of them, in complete ignorance. The Government, feeling, I have no doubt, the falseness of their position, are trying now to end where they ought to have begun, I believe that the Manitoba minority is placed under such conditions in certain localities that it is impossible to give them an efficient system of separate schools. The only means to reach a solution of the difficulty which would be satisfactory to those, interested, is conciliation, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay (Mr. Belley) said about it. Conciliation is the broad way to success in the matter, and no other way as safe and advantageous could be taken. And now that the Conservative members and ministers have derided this policy, we see them trying to regain the confidence of the public by would-be attempts at conciliation.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) You are the ones who talk of conciliation.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) I do not intend to blame the Government for trying, in the interest of justice, to do now what they should have done years ago. But the hon. member knows that the suggestion made by the hon. leader of the Opposition has now been adopted by the Government. As long as that policy was solely that of the Opposition, the supporters of the Government found no reason or practicability in it, but now they accept it because the ministers wish to try their hands at carrying it out. No later than yesterday, they were telling us that it was useless to appeal to the provincial government of Manitoba, as that government wanted to do nothing for the Catholic minority, and to-day they cheer over the project of a conference. By the means of conciliation we can hope for an understanding with the Manitoba government, and I hope that it may lead to justice being rendered to the Manitoba minority. I say that such a policy will be productive of the greatest good of the country in general and of the minority in particular. It is desirable that this minority should come to an understanding with the provincial authorities. But I say, moreover, that it is in the general interest of the Dominion of Canada that the hon. leader of the Opposition should attain power and become the Prime Minister of the country, for he alone, in my opinion, can bring about the most advantageous understanding that every one wishes in the interest of the minority. I have heard several hon. members friendly to the Bill now before us admit that it will bring no relief to the Catholic minority ; but they invoke the question of principles, they say that in voting for the second reading of the Bill they proclaim the principle of separate schools. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the principle of separate schools has been recognized and proclaimed by the highest tribunal of the Empire, and nobody can deny this principle, which is binding to all. But what is wanted now ? It is the application of this principle that is wanted, and your legislation does not apply it at all. The hon. ministers will give you no hope. They will not say if their intention is to amend the Bill so as to give it an efficiency which it has not now. The ministers make sport of the House. For my part, I repeat it again, if the members of the Government will declare that it is their intention to accept the amendments that have been offered by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), or if they will declare that they are ready to take any other means to make the law efficient, I am ready to state that I will vote for the Bill, whatever be its present defects. But if they refuse to do so, if they do not clearly express their opinion, I will believe it my duty to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition. We are told that the Bill may be amended in Committee of the Whole ; but this is only an excuse to allow the Government to shirk its responsibility. Driven to the wall, and obliged to make some show of sincerity, the Government presented this Bill, which was announced last spring. This session was to take place to pass a Remedial Bill, and what happened, Mr. Speaker? Instead of having a Bill ready to be presented to the House at the beginning of the session, nothing was done. The hon. gentlemen knew that they had to prepare their measure, and consequently it should have been ready for the House, when they called Parliament for that object. Instead of introducing their remedial measure, what did we see the ministers do? On this occasion, again, the Government gave us a new proof of its weakness, of its lack of the unity necessary to efficiently carry on the business of the country. The ministers quarrelled together. Was it purposely to delay the introduction of the Bill ? I do not know. I cannot make out what their intention was. However that may be, their broils made us lose those two long months. Parliament, which had been called together to pass a remedial law, only saw it brought forth about two months after the meeting of the Houses. Now we are about on the eve of the inevitable end of the life of the present Parliament, and the measure for the passage of which we were convened will probably not have time to be passed. If I am to believe rumours and statements, confirmed by some friends of the ministers, by gentlemen close to the members of the Government, rumours and assertions which are positively confirmed by statements from other sources, it would seem that the remedial law is not intended to be ultimately adopted by this Parliament. What statements do we find in Conservative newspapers, in the most authorized organs of the Cabinet, in the Montreal "Gazette" for instance ? We are told by these papers that the Remedial Bill will never become law, and that nothing will be done after the second reading. This means, Mr. Speaker, that we have been convened here, at the expense of the country, to help in the consummation of the comedy, of the farce, which has been played for the last five years. I will not say more about this, as I have made known my views on the question. I call this Bill a fraudulent comedy. In the mind of its authors it is to be an election trap, and they want Parliament to endorse this sham. I again ask the Ministers, who by this time must know what they intend to do, to state to the House whether they will accept the amendments offered by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), or other amendments to the same effect. I see the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) in his seat. He speaks French as well as I do, and consequently he understands what I am saying at this moment in that language. I am ready to take my seat in order to allow him to answer my question. Let him tell me whether the Government is ready to amend this Bill in Committee of the Whole, and to render it satisfactory, by securing for the schools of the minority the share of money grants, without which they can neither be established nor maintained.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) He does not answer.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) The Government refuse to promise to accept these amendments or any other to the same effect. Let them say that they will amend this Bill, and I will vote for its second reading. Otherwise, I will find it my duty to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. STUBBS. If we are to disbelieve the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) and acquiesce in the views of the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), this is a Bill of the greatest importance. This question was the only one at issue in Cardwell during the contest in that constituency some three months ago ; and as I was elected in that constituency on this question alone, I feel it is my duty, on this occasion, to express, not only my own views, but those of the constituency I have the honour to represent. Now, I have always been a Conservative, I have been identified with the Conservative party in Cardwell ever since I gave my first vote. Ever since then I have been closely connected with and worked in the interests of that party ; and during my early education in political matters, I was taught that no great measure could be passed except through the influence and medium of party opinion and party organization and that our country could only be governed through the same medium. Now, while I still maintain that I am a Conservative, yet I claim that even in party politics there is room for independent action, and for the exercise of a calm unbiassed judgment, lifted above the atmosphere of political passion. I believe that extremes can be avoided, that extravagance on either side can be checked, and that the bent of controversy can be somewhat moderated and harmony made to exist between the representatives of various opinions, rather by not giving a slavish submission to those influences than by abjectly yielding to them. I was very well pleased the other day to hear the remarks that fell from the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who truly stated that the Conservative party in Ontario were not willing to be dragged through the mire by the present leaders of the Parliament in this House. He also truly stated that the great Conservative press throughout the province of Ontario, with the exception of that subsidized opinion given expression to by the "Mail and Empire," condemned the leaders of the Government for their action on the Manitoba school question. I cordially agree with him; and as evidence of the accuracy of his opinion and mine, I will take the liberty of reading the views of a Conservative organ which fairly expresses the opinions of Conservatives throughout the province of Ontario, so far as I am aware of them. The first article I propose to read is taken from the Toronto "Star," dated 31st January :

> The seventh Parliament of Canada has been an extraordinary one.
> During its existence, four Premiers have been at the head of the Government, and before it closes we are likely to have a fifth. It is now in its sixth session, and it was stated the other day in the House of Commons that it is the only Parliament under the British constitution that has ever held that many sessions.
> The constitution, precedents and everything else connected with parliamentary government have been strained to the utmost limit.
> The disorganized Government, with its fourth Premier, who has barely escaped political assassination at the hands of his colleagues, at the end of the sixth session, which never should have been called, are preparing to do the most extraordinary thing in the history of this extraordinary Parliament.
> At the last general elections Sir John Macdonald was Premier. The main, if not the only, point at issue was the trade policy. The Conservative party was united and triumphant ; the leader of the Government was a dictator, wise and experienced, as well as the idol of his party.
> Since then Sir John Macdonald and two of his successors have been buried. Times have changed ; the electorate has largely changed ; according to the by-elections the desires of the people have changed ; the policy of the Government has changed ; the fiscal policy is no longer the main issue ; remedial legislation overshadows everything else.
> Yet the electors have not been consulted either in a general election or a convention of the supporters of the Government.
> Yet this dying Parliament, which should have been dead months ago, having been long estranged from the people, with a Premier who is politically dying, and would have been officially dead weeks ago, if his Cabinet could have killed him off, is about to coerce one of the seven provinces of the Dominion, though the electors of that province have almost unanimously refused even to consider, let alone accept, the coercive Bill.
> Such legislation as is proposed is not of the ordinary, but of the most extraordinary sort. It is not the class of legislation for which Parliaments ordinarily meet, and if this seventh Parliament had just come from the electors, the majority thoroughly instructed to make such a law as is proposed, it might well pause and consider whether, for once, the people had not been wrong.
> A dying Parliament has no business to consider extraordinary legislation, no matter whether it is good or bad. Beaconsfield declared such conduct to be politically immoral and refused to legislate on a very much less important matter without first consulting the people.
> The seventh Parliament of Canada is pursuing the opposite course. It is holding an extra session around its own death-bed, with a deliberate intention of violating the wishes of the electors that it dare not face.
> Its conduct is not only indecent and dishonest, but it is tyrannical, scandalous and strikes at the very root of constitutional government.
> This is not responsible government. Since Sir John A. Macdonald died the Government has been degenerating, until it no longer has even the semblance of pretending to care for the people or to follow constitutional usage.
> Unhindered by any fear, except the rebellion of his mercenary Ministers, the Premier of Canada, who is not the choice of the electors, but the accident of a funeral, is a dictator holding the life, property and liberties of the Canadian people as completely in his hand as if he had the powers of the Czar of Russia.
> Though Canadians are being treated as if they were serfs, when an opportunity occurs they will show the present Government, if it persists in its course, that the people of this country are too well educated and too long accustomed to the rights of British subjects to tolerate any such tyranny.

In another article the same paper states :

> Ontario members are very much mistaken if they imagine this province will accept any alleged excellence in detail as an excuse for their support of a Bill which is wrong in principle.
> What Canada wants is not the modification, but the annihilation, of the Remedial Bill. If the measure is not to be annihilated, it should not be modified.
> Let it be as drastic as possible. Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the Ministers associated with him are trafficking in the liberties of Manitoba in order to win the support of the bishops. His hypocritical pretenses of respect for the constitution deceives nobody. His respect for the constitution is as strong as his love for Protestant principles. He loved Orange principles for votes, and he respects the constitution for the same reason.

> Make the Bill sweeping and strong. The worse its provisions the greater will be Ontario's reason to punish the men who try to fasten such an iniquity upon a free province.
> So far as Manitoba is concerned it can take care of itself. If that province thinks it worth while, it can defy the law. And there is no public opinion in Canada strong enough to coerce a province out of its resistance to such a law. The struggle is not to protect Manitoba, but to protect Canada. Manitoba seems better able to defend herself against the effects of remedial legislation, than Canada is able to protect herself against the disgrace which the Dominion Parliament is ready to bring upon the country.

Now, I will admit that these articles fairly represent the views of the people throughout Ontario; and if the Government of the day think that I am not honestly reflecting the views of the people, I will refer them to a little incident that took place not very long ago. I shall not ask to carry them any further than the county of Cardwell, which is the oldest Tory county in Ontario, and which gives 400 of a solid Conservative majority in any election on a straight vote. We know that the election in that county to which I refer was a by-election, we know that the Government covered that county with assistance from all points of Ontario and outside of it almost, and that despite those advantages which work in favour of the Government, the independent electors of Cardwell defeated that Government by a handsome majority. Now, when the Government come to think that the old historic county of Cardwell, which, on every former occasion, elected an ardent supporter of the Conservative leaders, took this independent action, that should teach them a lesson which should make them pause, and cause them to reflect. When we think that the Conservative county of Cardwell which, on so many occasions, sent men of ability and note to adorn this chamber and support the Government, sent, at the last election there, for the first time, one of its own sons to represent it in the legislative halls of the nation, one who has the courage of his convictions, and is not afraid to express them, and the opinions of his constituency on the floor of this House, it is not necessary for me to carry them back any further, because I am satisfied that the salutary lesson taught them on the 24th December last, is sufficient to convince the most sceptical. Now, I can easily understand the difficulty that some members of this House feel in voting against their party. I can understand the difficulty which besets a man, who has been associated with the party for years, and supported it in every measure brought before this House, when called upon to give an independent vote in this matter. I can understand how hard it is for them to rise above the allurement of friendship and party attachment, when measures of truth and justice are involved, and I care not whether that hon. gentleman is the hon. member for North Simcoe or East Grey, or any other hon. gentleman in this House. The man who takes that stand on honour and principle establishes a reputation for the most courageous honesty. Now, is cannot be denied that in parts of this Dominion there has been a strong feeling in reference to the general policy of this country. There has been a movement which might well be called the McCarthy movement, which has assumed considerable proportions. There is another movement which, I am sorry to say, is assuming vast proportions and that is a feeling that there is a power behind the Throne which threatens to override the sovereign will of the people. I am sorry to have that to say, but it is a fact. And I believe that feeling does not exist without some cause. Let me read an extract from the letter of Archbishop Cameron during the campaign in Cape Breton:

LETTER OF BISHOP CAMERON, OF ANTIGONISH, DURING CAPE BRETON ELECTION.

> And yet we meet the appalling spectacle of multitudes of men who are loud in their praise of liberty and justice and religion arrayed against remedial legislation, the only available means under the constitution of redressing that wrong, and then doing all they can to perpetuate the monster evil, subversive of religion, justice and liberty, in order to attain their own selfish ends. In defiance of God and to our shame, among these hell-inspired hypocrites, Catholics are to be found, not a few, who will vote against justice being done to their sorely oppressed co-religionists, and who, to add insult to injury, will move for a commission of investigation instead of remedial legislation, a commission pronounced to be the hollowest sham by the most competent of living judges on the subject.

I will also read a letter that was written by another clerical gentleman, Father Lacombe, to the hon. leader of the Opposition:

> Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, M.P.,
> Ottawa.
> My dear Sir,—In this critical time for the question of the Manitoba schools, permit an aged missionary, to-day representing the bishops of our country in this cause, which concerns us all, permit me to say, to appeal to your faith, to your patriotism, and to your spirit of justice, to entreat you to accede to our request. It is in the name of our bishops, of the hierarchy and of Canadian Catholics, that we ask your party, of which you are the so-worthy chief, to assist us in settling this famous question, and to do so by voting with the Government on the Remedial Bill. We do not ask you to vote for the Government, but for the Bill, which will render us our rights; which Bill will be presented to the House in a few days.
> I consider, or rather we all consider, that such an act of courage, good-will and sincerity on your part, and from those who follow your policy, will be greatly in the interests of your party, especially in the general elections. I must tell you that we cannot accept your commission of inquiry for any reason and we will do the best to fight it.

> If, which may God not grant, you do not believe it to be your duty to accede to our just demands, and that the Government, which is anxious to give us the promised law, be beaten and overthrown, while keeping firm to the end of the struggle, I inform you with regret that the episcopacy like one man, united to the clergy, will rise to support those who may have fallen to defend us.
> Please pardon my frankness which leads me to speak thus. Though I am not your intimate friend, still I may say that we have been on good terms. Always I have deemed you a gentleman, a respectable citizen and a man well able to be at the head of a political party. May Divine Providence keep up your courage and your energy for the good of our common country.
> I remain, sincerely and respectfully, honourable sir, your most humble and devoted servant.
> (Signed) A. LACOMBE, O.M.I.

I said before I started to read these articles that there is some reason for the prevalence in the country of the opinion I spoke of. I hold that it is the Government's duty to relieve the minds of the people of this suspicion, and they will do it not so much by what they say as by what they do. I hold the only way that they can relieve the minds of the people of that suspicion is to withdraw the Remedial Bill. I would like to ask some of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches how the Rev. Father Lacombe knew the contents of this Bill some time before the representatives of the people were favoured with copies ? They can answer that, and while they are answering the country is listening.

Now, what is the position of the hon. leader of the Opposition ? Surely his position is unique. Of French extraction, a firm believer in the Roman Catholic Church, intimidated, as he was—or as was attempted—with political extinction, what could he do ? The leader of a great party in this country and a statesman, as he proved himself to be, he thought his first duty was to his country, and he so declared. And I hope his second duty was to his family, his home and his church. For the stand this hon. gentleman has taken, I claim that he is entitled to the undivided admiration of every honest man in this country. Now when Parliament was called together in January, we found that there was some confusion and consequent delay, and an adjournment for some time was necessary. When Parliament reassembled on the 7th January, what state of affairs did we find ? We found that the oxen had turned the yoke, and after an attempt at readjustment, which occupied some time and occasioned considerable expense to this country, and some dishonour, I claim, to the parties who bolted, we find that the off ox is still on the nigh side, and in this attitude they are unsuccessfully trying to pull the load built by their own hands and out of their own creation. I would advise these gentlemen to somewhat lighten this burden, and I would recommend them particularly to pull off this Remedial Bill. Even then they will find the load sufficiently weighty, because at best the travelling is not very good. The hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) asks us to pass this Remedial Bill, and thus refuse to countenance a war of races and creeds. I wonder if he is conscientiously honest in that opinion. Does he mean to tell this House that if this Remedial Bill is passed it is going to allay this demon of discontent, which we are told so eloquently by the Finance Minister was rampant in this land? Does he mean to tell this House that if this Bill is passed by a majority, which is not very creditable to this House, and forces it upon an unwilling people in Manitoba, that this demon of discontent will disappear from our midst ? I claim it will not, but I fear that the storm you saw on the surface at the by-elections will stir the very depths of the ocean in the general elections, and I would ask the Government not to provoke the wrath of the people. It is our duty to vote conscientiously, and in the interest of peace and harmony in this country. If we shrink from that duty, we may have reason to regret it. I was pleased—you know we are thankful for even small favours in this House—to see that the views of the constitution expressed by these gentlemen have changed somewhat. I find they are not so arbitrary in their views of this remedial order or of the duty that was forced upon them. During the campaign in Cardwell, which is not so very long ago—and a few of the Ministers of the Crown took an active part in that campaign—it was preached from the housetops that this was the demand upon the House, not only from the highest courts of the realm, but it was a demand from our Sovereign Queen Victoria, and those who failed to obey it were traitors to the country and rebels against the constitution. I see now that that view is somewhat changed. I find one hon. gentleman, on the Treasury benches, to whom I must give credit for honesty. I mean the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey). What does he say about the state of affairs ?

> Now, I have no doubt at all, as a lawyer, that this House has ample discretion to act or not to act. I have not the slightest doubt that this House is perfectly competent to reject this Bill, and to refuse absolutely to interfere at all in the affairs of Manitoba. I will go further than that, and I will say that there is no obligation whatever for this House to do anything at any time ; that you could not by any conceivable means bind this House, or bind any future Parliament.

Again he says :

> It is certainly not binding upon us. Legally, we are not bound to accept the opinion of the Privy Council of England. There is no doubt about that at all.

That is an honest opinion. I believe it agrees with the intention of the Act which gives this Parliament power to appeal to the Supreme Court. Sir John A. Macdonald, who was then the leader of the Government, asked Mr. Blake about this point, when the latter brought in the resolution :

> Of course my hon. friend in his resolution has guarded against the suspicion that such a decision is binding upon the executive.

The reply was :

> Such a decision is only for the information of the Government, the executive is not relieved from its responsibility. The answer of the tribunal will be simply for the information of the Government. The Government may dissent from that position.

I fail to find anything in the constitution that gives this Parliament power to conduct any system of education in a province in this Dominion. That being the case, the Government should be very careful before they introduce and force this Remedial Bill on an unwilling people. It is the duty of the provinces to provide for the education of the children, to see to it that the young are properly educated and grow up to be useful and intelligent citizens. Over that subject this Parliament has no control whatever, and it is not justified in passing this Bill. I also claim that the present grievance is not sufficient to warrant this Government in forcing this Remedial Bill on Manitoba at the present time. It was argued throughout the constituency of Cardwell that the Manitoba government had had six years in which to settle the question, and had failed to do so. I deny the truth of that statement. During all this time we know the matters have been in litigation. Only about a year ago the Manitoba Act was declared ultra vires by the courts. Under these circumstances what right had Manitoba to act and remedy a grievance before that time. Since the decision of the Queen's Privy Council it is true Manitoba has had an opportunity to act. What is the fact ? Almost immediately after the official document was sent over from London to Ottawa, Manitoba was summoned to the Bar like a criminal, and the remedial order was forced on the province. Since that time there has been no justification for Manitoba acting, and there is no justification to-day until the remedial order has been withdrawn, and Manitoba is perfectly justified in not acting, because it cannot act along the lines of the grievances covered by the remedial order. What will this Remedial Bill accomplish even if it does pass in this House and is forced on Manitoba ? Why, Mr. Speaker, this Bill is a parody on a legal enactment. I would advise hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House to have each a copy of the Bill engrossed to be handed down to posterity and kept as an heirloom in the family. The future political historian in this country will not have to ransack the archives to find out the pedigree of our grandfathers and greatgrandfathers, for he will only have to look at the Bill, and he will turn from it in disgust as he thinks of men adopting such a measure pretending to legislate in the interests of the country to which they belong. Instead of this being a measure for the advancement of education in Manitoba, it will be a measure of retrogression as regards educational progress. It cannot assist the educational process in Manitoba, because it is not workable, and yet it will interfere with the public school system, so that children will be compelled to grow up in comparative ignorance while Manitoba and the Dominion are quarrelling over the Remedial Act. I also claim that this House as at present constituted should not under present circumstances deal with this Remedial Bill. Hon. members have no mandate from their constituents to deal with it. I believe I am the only member from Ontario who has a mandate from his constituents on this question. I therefore can speak with authority, and I can tell hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches that if they force this Bill through the House and enforce it on Manitoba, they will be almost politically wiped out. In 1891 the Government dissolved Parliament before its full time had expired on the excuse that they wanted to consult the people in regard to a reciprocity treaty with the United States. That was a small matter compared with this remedial order. I consider this dispute between Manitoba and the Dominion is of far more importance than the question of reciprocity with the United States. If it was necessary to dissolve this Parliament and consult the people on a question of such small importance as that, surely it is necessary to consult the people over this remedial order and this proposed remedial legislation. But it appears that this Government are not willing to consult the people. Have they consulted anybody except themselves ? They surely have not consulted the people, and I am told they have not consulted their friends. Whom have they consulted ? I am unable to say, except Father Lacombe and Bishop Cameron. I do not want to see a measure of so much importance passed by this House as it is politically constituted. I believe the general feeling pervading the country is that we cannot rely on the political aspect of the House as now constituted. I believe many hon. members are going to vote for this Remedial Bill, who will vote contrary to the wishes of their constituents, and who, if they vote for this Remedial Bill, can bid good-bye to political life, though they may get a softer snap in the future. The strong arm of the people is needed to assert its influence in this House, in order that justice may be done not only to the minority in Manitoba but to the majority as well. Then why should we not keep this question to Manitoba, to which it properly belongs, for it never should have been brought up in the Federal Parliament. We once had an enactment in this country, known as the Clergy Reserves Act, which caused considerable irritation and nearly caused rebellion before it was repealed. It was drafted on our constitution.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. STUBBS. At all events that law was at length repealed, and we thought he had divorced church and state when that Act was repealed. We find, however, that if the Government force this remedial legislation through Parliament and re-establish separate schools, it will again bring about a union of church and state, and I protest against this Bill on the ground, because in a fair democratic country like this, with the history of the world before us, in this the latter part of the nineteenth century, we do not want a union of church and state in this country. The tendency in all nations is to take education out of the hands of the churches, out of denomination hands, and place it in the hands of the state. We have an illustration of that in France. Not very long ago, well within the memory of every member of this House, at the beginning of the Franco-Prussian war, the education of the French nation was in the hands of the church. The result of that was, that France got pretty well drubbed in that fight.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. STUBBS. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and to tell this House, that brains have got to be considered in warfare as well as muscle, and to show you that I am speaking facts, immediately after the war, the French saw their weak point, and for the first time, in my memory at least, they took the control of education out of the hands of the religious bodies, and placed it under a Minister of Education. They have had the advantage of that system of education for some time, and if ever France and Germany come together again, Mr. German will have to look out. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry this measure was ever introduced into this House. However, we have it introduced, and simply because it is introduced, we find men who call themselves statesmen, trying to force this measure through the House, and to force it on an unwilling people. Sir, they do that, giving as their motive what is misnamed honour and patriotism. To continue what was wrong in the commencement, through a motive of selfishness, pride or of party exigencies, is a course of procedure repugnant to reason, and reprobated alike by intelligence and common sense. Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to vote for the six months' hoist amendment introduced by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I feel it my duty to oppose this Bill at all and every stage as it comes before this House, and by doing so, I am voicing the opinions of my constituents.

Sir JAMES GRANT. Mr. Speaker, the question at present before this House is probably one of the most important in the history of our country. It strikes at the very root of the constitution, and it is the keynote of our future happiness. I sat in this chamber at the commencement of confederation, and looking around this hall now, I find that here are very few present who took part at that time in the deliberation of the affairs of this country. Having come in contact with the fathers of confederation, and having personally heard their views expressed, I was pleased beyond measure to know the broad and comprehensive, and liberal opinions, which these gentlemen held on all questions connected with religious matters. At that time, some of the ablest men who ever lived in the Dominion of Canada, were met in this House. Need I mention the late Hon. Joseph Howe, who frequently spoke from the opposite side of the chamber, displaying a pure eloquence, and a political erudition such as any man might well feel proud of. Associated with him, was the late Thomas D'Arcy McGee, a man who inherited the intellectual power and genius of many of his predecessors who sprung from that great Emerald Isle, and we had also, Sir George Cartier and Sir John A. Macdonald. These two are names well known in the history of this country. They were men who by their energy, their perseverance, and their ability, contributed in so great a degree to promote the best interests of this Dominion. We have to-day the monuments of these two great Canadians, standing almost side by side in the cool air of the surrounding atmosphere. But, their memories are warm in the hearts of the people of Canada. And why? It is because on every occasion they accorded equal rights and equal privileges to all classes of the community. I am pleased beyond measure to see one of the illustrious fathers of confederation present here with us to-day. Sir Charles Tupper was then on the floor of this House, and although many years have passed over his head, he still appears to maintain the same intellectual activity and physical power that he did in the days of old. I say, Sir, that an honour has been conferred upon him in selecting him as leader of this House; the highest and most distinguished position that can be conferred upon any man, because he has been called to it by the voice of the people of Canada, the voice of the members of this House, and the voice of the Government of the day. I have heard some rather severe criticism on my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) within the last week or two. I am surprised beyond measure that those who should have the good of the country at heart, take such small, microscopic views of matters which are occasionally presented to this House. Sir Charles Tupper has been in parliamentary life for over forty years. In his own province he established a name and a reputation for the advancement of public affairs, and since he came in to the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, are we not aware, that many of the great questions upon which the happiness the welfare and the prosperity of our people rests, emanated from him, and from the genius of those with whom he was associated. Not only in Canada has the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) taken an active part in guiding the best interests of this country, but representing us in Great Britain he has come in contact with many of the leading men of the present day, and so energetically and so ably has he represented the cause of our country before them, that to-day, Canada stands in a higher position in the eyes of the world than ever she did before. In making a slight review of the great question of confederation, which has been presented to this House so succinctly by that hon. gentleman, I have no desire to go over the ground again. We know what confederation has accomplished for Canada. It has done much for our people; it has united us into a homogeneous whole, it has brought us together from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and to-day we enjoy cherished privileges under the benign influence of confederation. It is not necessary for me to refer to the political issues connected with confederation. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) a few days ago, wished to go back to some of the little difficulties that sprung up, from what I would call, a mere provincialism which attacked the basis upon which confederation was to rest, merely for some local object and for some local purpose. But, Sir, I am happy to say to-day, that confederation has emerged entirely out of that small sphere of operation, and it is now known everywhere, that through the progressive action of our public men, through the co-operation of our citizens, through the assistance of the leading minds of this portion of the North American continent, we have here, law and order, and we have the extension of those civil rights and civil privileges which have been referred to so ably on this instructive occasion.

The question which we now more particularly have to deal with, has been dwelt upon at length by several of the gentlemen who have spoken, especially by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), by the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), whom the late Sir John Macdonald called the Erskine May of this House. I am glad, indeed, to pay that hon. gentleman a compliment, because I know well that to-day there are few men in Canada who understand the laws of this country, and the laws of the world generally, better than he does. He has an associate here in the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who is also a law-giver. Yet I was surprised and amazed, Mr. Speaker, to find with all the information they possess, profound as they are, with all the legal acquirements they enjoy, advocating on the floor of this House a course contrary to their own principles, and contrary to their own minds; because, if they are possessed of the ideas of progress, they could not go against a measure like this. I read in a late number of the Ottawa "Citizen" this whole question in a nutshell:

> The question before the country is this: The Manitoba government having refused to modify its legislation so as to permit Roman Catholics to have schools of their own, should the Federal Government interfere? It is trifling with the intelligence of the public to answer by saying: "I am in favour of conciliation!" Every one is in favour of conciliation; but suppose your conciliation does not work. What then? For six years this matter has been the source of a dangerous agitation, but the Greenway government has done nothing to remove the cause of strife.
> In May, 1894, the Cardinal, Archbishops and Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church petitioned the Governor General in Council to disallow the Manitoba School Act of 1894. By Order in Council of 26th July, 1894, the Privy Council recommended that the petition should be transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, and expressed the hope that the legislature of that province should take steps to remove the grievances complained of in the petition.
> Again, by Order in Council of July 27th, 1895, the Dominion Government invited the Manitoba government to enter into friendly negotiations in order to ascertain how far the latter were prepared to go in meeting the wishes of the minority, so that the Dominion might, if possible, be relieved from the duty of intervening. The provincial authorities paid no attention to the invitation, and it was publicly and triumphantly declared that they had no intention of helping the Federal Government out of a difficulty.

I need not go over all the ground that has been already traversed so well on this important question. There it is in a nutshell; and what are we to do now? This is a question for which the constitution of our country is responsible. We have a confederation by mutual consent. Where is the leader of the Opposition, to-day, with his motion for the six months' hoist? He is precisely in the same position that he has been in with his trade policy. For the last few years he has been wandering about, trying to formulate the principles of a trade policy; and, just like the kaleidoscope, every turn presented a new view, and that was grasped in the hope that something would come out of it. The people of this country are possessed of common sense; they have fixed in their minds the principles of trade and commerce; they know thoroughly what will result from certain lines of policy: they know that that hon. gentleman, in a short space of time, has propounded no less than three distinct lines of trade policy; and what have the public to say? That hon. gentleman has failed to grasp the exact position. Can we go upon one line of trade to-day, and change it to-morrow? Far from it. Who would, under such circumstances, invest in the trade of this country? We must have a definite policy in our trade, such as is carried out by the Liberal-Conservative party; and if the Liberal-Conservative party has achieved success, has built up a name and reputation for itself, and is recognized as one of the great progressive parties on this North American continent, it is because it has eliminated the best policy that could be produced by the master-minds of that great party; and to-day Canada's trade policy stands on a permanent and sure foundation.

Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition, in taking hold of this Manitoba school question, commenced some time ago by telling the Government that they were delaying in bringing it to a final issue. Why were they delaying? He wanted it immediately settled. For whom did he want it settled? He wanted it settled for those whom he was representing; and who it is his pride and privilege to represent to-day. He represents one of the great factors in the prosperity of this country—that great French nationality that, along with the Anglo-Saxons of this country, have built up the name and reputation of Canada—that French nationality, whose history has been written by Garneau and Ferland, who have given us a noble record of the French ancestry—of men, who, in the days of Champlain, managed to paddle their own canoes on the majestic waters of this country, and assisted in laying those foundations of peace, comfort and prosperity that the people of Canada are enjoying to-day. Gentlemen, you have reason to feel proud of your French nationality. In art, in literature and in science it has made a worthy reputation, as was pointed out yesterday by the learned professor from Albert. I was pleased beyond measure to listen to that portion of his able and exhaustive address; but when I considered the other lines of argument he adopted, I came to the conclusion that there was a smallness of idea—a contracted provincial idea, governing his mind. In connection with this great question of the Remedial Bill now before the House, we know what this French nationality has done. We know what Sir George Cartier, Lafontaine, and many other men of that nationality I could name have done for this country. I see on the other side of this Chamber Mr. Bourassa and Sir Hector Langevin, two of those who were present here with me at confederation. Long may they live to enjoy those privileges that have been extended to them. I am sure that if they revert to that time, and think of those men, who by their magnificent intellectual power, their sagacity and their ability to see through the great problems of national life, they will at once say with me that the men who had the distinguished privilege of occupying seats on the floor of this House at the initial stage of confederation, enjoyed a privilege which has been the opportunity of but a few. And if those great men have passed away, they have left a noble record behind them. I might say, with the illustrious poet of the past, that man who now slumbers among the great dead of the American continent:

> Lives of great men all remind us
> We can make our lives sublime,
> And, departing, leave behind us
> Footprints on the sands of time.

I expect that in the discussion of this question, the representatives of that great nationality will leave behind them such a record that the great church that assists them in all the affairs of life, will say to each of them: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant": I am pleased beyond measure that you have adopted the advice and are following the example of the member for Ottawa County (Mr. Devlin). And rely upon it that the brilliancy of intellect is there just as bright as the coruscations of the galvanic battery. He gave this House, only a few days ago, an evidence of his genius, his common sense and his desire to promote what will give prosperity to that great Catholic community from one end of the Dominion to the other.

A great legal light in the province of Quebec has said that he will vote against this Bill because it is not sufficient to meet our demands. Now, that is a remarkable assertion. Have we not got the very highest authority in the country acquiescing in what is done in this Bill? Have we not that Bill endorsed by their letters and telegrams? And yet, although our fathers are pleased, forsooth the sons of judges, who know more than their fathers ever knew, are willing to remain in the background and vote against a measure which gives equal rights and justice to all. Is that the way to maintain their provincial or Dominion influence?

I shall treat the subject now very briefly, because I am very well aware of the fact that it has been discussed so frequently and thoroughly on the floor of this House that there is very little new that I can present to you. But besides having been present at the forming of confederation, I find myself in a somewhat unique position. Therefore, I desire on this interesting occasion to express my views, and I trust you will excuse any egotism of which I may be guilty in presenting them to you. I am at present almost the senior trustee of the chief Protestant university of Ontario, Queen's College, Kingston. And yet, notwithstanding that fact, I have been elected the representative of the chief Catholic University of Ontario, the University of Ottawa, in the councils of Ontario, besides being president of the Catholic Hospital. These are evidences of the liberality and generosity of my Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, and during the forty years that I have been associated with these people, by night and by day. I have never yet seen anything in our relations that was not worthy of the highest possible commendation.

This is a country in which there must be a spirit of toleration. I know very well, that we have a great Orange body in this country, but, if we have, in that body we have men of liberality and generosity. The present Premier of the Dominion (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) is a well-known Orangeman, who has reason to feel proud of the distinguished position he now occupies, as head of this country, and, although he is an Orangeman, we know perfectly well, that on every public or private occasion, whenever the opportunity was afforded him, he has guarded well the rights of Catholics and Protestants in a manner of which any Catholic or Protestant might well be proud. This is the broad spirit of toleration that I wish to see exercised by this House. In the opposition brought against this Remedial Bill, in the various attempts that have been made to thwart the efforts of the Government to carry it to a final and successful issue, I have failed to see exercised that great and grand principle of toleration that ought to exist in the minds of the leaders in the Reform ranks to-day.

I know perfectly well, that Canada has reason to feel proud of her sons. I do not for one moment fancy, that we have all the ability on our side. Very far from it. What did the Hon. Edward Blake, when he occupied a prominent position in this country, say with reference to this subject ? Was he not impressed with its importance ? Did he not seize the first opportunity of formulating his ideas and putting them before this country in a tangible form ? Here is an abstract of the observations he made :

> I suggest that for the peace and good government of Canada, you should take power in the House of Parliament to refer to an impartial and high judicial tribunal the solution of questions which would otherwise tend to the disintegration and confusion of the Canadian people.

Such an expression of opinion from a gentleman who not only held one of the first positions in Canada on account of his great legal ability, but who to-day holds in the councils of Great Britain a distinguished position, and is looked up to as a man who, I am proud to say, has done great credit, by his forensic ability, to this Dominion of ours—should have great weight with us.

The late Sir John Macdonald, when this statement was made by the Hon. Mr. Blake, at once formulated a Bill and presented it to Parliament ; and, as a result, we have this Act of Parliament, by virtue of which this very school question came before our own courts and subsequently went before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England.

In 1893, the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) concluded that the Government was advocating a policy of delay, and uncertainty, which he considered extremely prejudicial to our national light. What about the powerful agitation that was waged against the Government, if the line of argument that was advocated, not only by the late Sir John Thompson, but also by the present Premier, was not carried out ? Has there been any great agitation in the Dominion since this question came before Parliament ? We had a large meeting in Toronto the other day ; and the very important measure which emanated from this House, and was sent up to the important individuals assembled at that meeting—and, no doubt, they are very important—was merely summed up in a word or two. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) bore a message to those present from his leader at Ottawa. He told this important meeting, that the hon. leader of the Opposition was in favour of conciliation, rather than coercion.

Mr. MULOCK. What paper are you quoting from ?

Sir JAMES GRANT. The Ottawa "Citizen," which copied the article from the Toronto "Globe," and that, you know, is almost the Bible of Ontario.

Mr. EDGAR. Not copied.

Sir JAMES GRANT. What does this conciliation mean ? Is it a commission ? Is conciliation a six months' hoist—a six months' hoist ! That six months' hoist is, probably one of the most ridiculous propositions ever submitted to this House. The very clergy are told, forsooth, by the leader of the Opposition, that he is not going to give them what they want. He says to them : You must take a back seat ; I know more than you do. It is high time the clergy should learn that I am not going to be dictated to by them. Sir, their opinions are worth listening to. They are men possessed of ability, they have largely contributed to the advancement of the material interests of this country ; and to-day the clergy of Quebec, both Protestant and Catholic, and the clergy of Ontario, occupy positions side by side, agreeing with each other, united with each other, coalescing with each other in the advancement of great measures for the welfare of the people of this country. Now, in 1894, what was the opinion of the leader of the Opposition, who now asks for the six months' hoist ?

> The longer this question is kept before the public, the worse it is for the people of Canada. It is a question upon which there should be an immediate and speedy answer.

Now, this is just what we advocate to-day. The leader of the Opposition is not settled in his ideas, he does not know what to ask for. He cannot agree with the people ; he cannot agree with his church. He does not know what is necessary to maintain the religion and peace of the people of this country any more than he knows how to retain our trade and commerce. A short time ago he contended that this commission was only a subterfuge; yet when he spoke in Montreal it was the chief plank in his platform. Let me say, Sir, that we do not require the cathode rays to see through the chief plank in the plank of the Liberal-Conservative party. Our plank on this school question is transparent, we can see it at first glance. Sir, I look around this chamber and observe the members who come from the province of Ontario, that great province which has contributed largely to the reputation of Canada, a province which has produced magnificent institutions, a province which has turned out great men, and let me say that we have a faithful phalanx in this House to-day, we have got men of integrity, of uprightness, who are able to see correctly through this great problem. No doubt they have considered this question well, and when the time comes for them to give a vote on it, I trust they will consider well what they are doing, and that they will not be content to leave this life without making an excellent record. Sir, the man who is afraid of local interests, who thinks he will not gain his election if he votes for this Bill, is afraid of doing his duty in the interests of this great country, and in the interest of the maintenance of its institutions. Sir, a short time ago, the leader of the Opposition, when he was accompanied by his man Friday, the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), asked what was the policy of the Liberal-Corservative party upon this Manitoba school question, he said: Our position is defined and placed beyond doubt. But where is the leader of the Opposition to-day, with his amendment for the six months' hoist? He says the Conservative party have asked him to give them some information, to formulate a policy for them. What an absurd idea. Did the Conservative Government ever ask the Reformers to formulate a policy for them? No, Sir, far from it. They did not even consult him in drawing up the Remedial Bill, nor did they consult him in some other great measures they have placed before this country. The leader of the Opposition says he wants justice for his countrymen and for the minority in the province of Quebec. I should like to know if the minority in the province of Quebec are not asking to-day for justice to the minority in Manitoba, through the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who represents the Protestant minority of Quebec in this Government? Their interests have been protected by confederation, and in the course they are taking on this question, they are protecting their interests in the future. But is the course of the Reform party on this question likely to benefit the Protestant minority in Quebec? No, they are sowing the seeds of dissension, they are spreading ideas which, if acted upon, will sap the very foundations of confederation, which the fathers of that measure worked so hard to accomplish. The leader of the Opposition says there must be no coercion for Manitoba. Sir, let us consider this question, and reflect upon where it originated, in Manitoba, that new province, which requires all the assistance we can possibly give it in order to promote that prosperity that it is now enjoying: let us remember that it was the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was one of the prime actors in destroying separate schools, and that the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was one of the prime actors in destroying the dual language in that province. When Lord Dufferin was in Canada, some twenty years ago, and when he visited Winnipeg on his way to the Pacific coast, he used these words:

> Manitoba, from its geographical position and its peculiar characteristics may be regarded as the keystone of that mighty arch of sister provinces which spans the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

And to think that this mighty arch is to have the key-stone knocked out of it by the promotion of measures that tend to sap the very fidelity of the people who live in that portion of the Dominion. I am glad to know that they are so well represented as they are by the hon. member of French nationality who sits on the other side of the House (Mr. LaRivière), who has championed so strenuously and ably the cause of education that, rely upon it, so long as he is here looking after their interests they suffer nothing from want of advocacy of their case.

I am embarrassed, not with the meagreness, but with the richness and fulness of this subject. I should like to dwell at greater length upon it, but the ground has been gone over so thoroughly, I have no desire to detain you at any greater length. When I listened to the bright and laconic observations of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), I was pleased beyond measure to observe the broad and statesman-like views he advocated. I would recommend every one, whether in the House or out of it, to read and ponder carefully every line of that admirable address, which is a credit to this chamber and a credit to the public life of Canada, showing that we have growing up in this country a class of men whose attainments mark a progressive development in intellectual capacity which would be a credit to any country. In material progress we have something to show, and we trust to have more. Mixed up and divided as we are, I say it is extremely desirable that all differences of creed and nationality should be put on one side. For it is only by thorough agreement that we can promote those great principles that we inherited when the great principles of confederation were carried out. I feel confident that no country could possibly have a brighter future before it than Canada. Edmund Burke declared that he did not govern himself by abstractions, and maintained that "the possible best is the absolute best." I now feel that the possible best for us, for Canada to-day is peace and good-will, and that peace and good-will is only to be maintained by carrying out the comprehensive measure that is before this House, and that was so thoroughly explained in the able address of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey). Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks let me say that I look forward with great interest to the young men of Canada who are now supporting so ably the Conservative party of this country. They know perfectly well that the principles upon which their associations have been based are those that have been laid down by the fathers of confederation. We have a great country, we have a prosperous people, we have a future before us that any nation in the world might look forward to with hope. Let us close up the phalanx ; let there be no blanks. When the vote is taken, as it will be in a few hours, I trust that every Conservative will be able to say : I have done my duty to my people and to my country in demanding that the law propounded by this Government shall be carried out, in order to maintain the peace and happiness of the people who live so prosperously in this Dominion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I shall not detain the House at any length, desiring to offer only a few arguments in reference to this subject. The constitutional question has been very ably discussed by those who are more competent to deal with it than I am. I think it has been made abundantly plain that this Parliament is at perfect liberty to adopt remedial legislation or not as it may see fit. The question for us to consider, then, is whether it is the wisest and best that we should do so at the present time and under the present circumstances. This Bill was introduced by the leader of the House, the hon. Secretary of State, in a speech of considerable length. We had the speech referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, who immediately followed. We have had for days a lengthened discussion, participated in by the ablest lawyers in the House. The hon. leader of the House thought it necessary last night that he should speak again in order to make a reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition. To the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition he took great exception. He praised the hon. gentleman for his eloquence, but said that he was unable to praise him for anything else. If I remember his words aright, he said that the speech was a mass of contradictions. And at the end of his own address he read from a written or printed document, which I could not help thinking had been prepared by some one else, what were considered these apparent contradictions. These were sentences torn from their connections, but even then I could not see that they were so very contradictory. For my own part, I am willing that the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition should go to the country side by side with that of the hon. leader of the House. The speech of the leader of the Opposition has been scattered throughout the country by the thousands, by the tens of thousands, aye, running up, I believe, over a hundred thousand, not a forced circulation, but one caused by the demand coming from all quarters ; and, though that speech has been read in all sections of the country and by all classes of the community, so far as I am aware, the hon. leader of the House is the first gentleman who has anything but words of the highest praise for it. Contrast it with the speech of the hon. leader of the House. That, Sir, I think, was a reprehensible speech. Now is a time in the history of Canada, if ever, when, instead of endeavouring to incite prejudices and inflame passions, we should do all in our power to promote calmness and deliberation. But I am within the judgment of this House, and of every hon. gentleman who listened to the hon. leader of this House, when I say that while he professed in words to deprecate anything like arousing sectarian or racial strife in this country, his speech, in the greater part, was a deliberate attempt to stir up strife and to bring to his aid, if possible, one of the great religious bodies of this country as a body. Sir, what else did it mean when he was alluding to the illustration that was made use of by the leader of the Opposition, taking that as an excuse for going away back to pre-confederation days and the part he took in the admission of Nova Scotia ? What was his object ? Well, perhaps, partly because, as we observe, since his return to this country he dwells in the past. But he had another reason, as I detected, because when he was bringing in others to share with him the responsibility for the way in which his province had been coerced into this Dominion, whose names did he cite ? Did he cite the names of men who were in active political life ? Why did he go out of his way to mention the name of a distinguished prelate who was not in political life at all in that province ? Why did he single out other distinguished men, and state that they were Roman Catholics ? Why, Sir, he was speaking to arouse national prejudices, and to secure political support from one class of the people. He spoke about the unholy effort to stir up strife and division in this country. He appealed to the leader of the Opposition and reproached him because he, a French Canadian and a Catholic, when the minority in Manitoba were of his nationality and of his faith, refused to grant them relief until he had inquired into all the circumstances, in order to proceed in such a manner as would create the less ill-feeling and disturbance. The Secretary of State denounced him as false to his faith and his nationality, and would give him no credit because, as that leader himself stated, he stood upon a higher plane; and while he earnestly desired that any grievance under which his fellow-countrymen and co-religionists laboured in Manitoba should be removed; he wished that grievance should first be fully investigated, and when that was done, expressed his entire confidence that the spirit of fair-play in the people of Manitoba would cause them to rectify whatever wrong had been done. He spoke about the feeling in the province of Nova Scotia when dealing with the circumstances attending the admission of that province into the union; and in order to justify his own course, he pointed to the fact that the Hon. Joseph Howe had made a great mistake when he opposed the entry of Nova Scotia into the confederation. But, said the Secretary of State, he saw his mistake, and joined the Government, but when he went back for re-election, he found his old Liberal friends opposing him to such an extent that on one occasion, when worn out and fatigued, his Liberal friends allowed him to lie for hours and hours on a railway platform, and none of them came forward to care for him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him. He did not lie upon a railway platform, but on a platform at a public meeting where he was being opposed by a Liberal friend.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I spoke from memory, and am glad the hon. gentleman has stated that it was on a public platform, where, by those who had been his friends for a lifetime, he was left alone and uncared for. Sir, we remember that the hon. gentleman took exception to a statement made by the leader of the Opposition in pointing out the danger of coercing Manitoba, saying that it might excite feelings that it would take a generation to wipe out, and he instanced the hon. gentleman's own action in Nova Scotia and the feeling that was aroused in that province. Sir, were the words of the leader of the Opposition that the hon. gentleman attempted to refute, true, or were they not true?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They were not true, and for this reason: that in 1872 I came back here with every member from the province of Nova Scotia standing at my back as a member of the Government.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I want no better proof of the point I am making as to the danger of coercing a province, when I remember that this great man Joseph Howe, the leader of the Liberal party, a man that was almost idolized by the Liberal party in Nova Scotia, the man with whom they had fought the battle of constitutional liberty, what must have been the feeling aroused in the minds of the people of that province by that coercive act of the hon. gentleman, when they allowed their former idol to lay uncared for upon a public platform for hours? Sir, I give you no further answer than that, the hon. gentleman has furnished it out of his own mouth. A province and a party must have suffered indeed when they could forget their former love and friendship to their leader to such an extent as to desert him in that way. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman soght to secure favour for himself from a large section in this community by saying that he passed an Educational Act under which his native province enjoyed peace and harmony. He was asked the question whether, in the enactment of that law, he did not do away with any distinction that had existed in the schools, and whether it was not now one uniform system of schools, and the hon. gentleman rose and deliberately stated that such was not the case, but that he had virtually given separate schools to the province of Nova Scotia; and claiming credit for himself, he said they had planted on the ramparts the flag of equal rights and justice to all classes. Well, Sir, he was succeeded by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), a gentleman learned in the law, an eminent educationalist, and a professor in a college in Nova Scotia; and he was asked the question whether the Act that had been introduced by the Secretary of State into the Nova Scotia legislature had secured separate schools to the people of that province, and so far as I remember his answer, he said: Not a single one. I place his testimony against the testimony of the leader of the House. When he was asked another question by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), whether the Act that was passed by the hon. gentleman in Nova Scotia was not the same as the Act that was passed by the Greenway government in Manitoba, his reply was: I am not as conversant with that Manitoba Act as I am with the other; but I have studied it somewhat and looked it over, and I venture to say that substantially they are the same. So this hon. gentleman who introduced this law into Nova Scotia under which he said the people are living in peace and harmony, will be obliged to confess that the Act was substantially on the lines of the law introduced by the Greenway government into Manitoba, and which law the Government are now seeking, without investigation into the facts, and in opposition to the almost unanimous will of the people, to destroy. This is the gentleman who now, without investigation, seeks to pass a Bill of a coercive nature. I think the answer he gave himself as to the peace and harmony that had prevailed under a statute when the people were anxious to administer it in the interest of peace and good-fellowship, is sufficient. Withdraw your Bill, withdraw your remedial order, investigate the matter, approach the local government in a friendly spirit, who state that they are prepared to remedy what is wrong ; and as the people of Nova Scotia made everything right, so no doubt in Manitoba a similar result would be secured.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Does the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) contend that by passing that Act in Nova Scotia, any rights or privileges held by the Roman Catholics were wiped out ?

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, I understand from Nova Scotia gentlemen that such was the case, for they had separate schools in Halifax.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. PATERSON. I have the Act here, and it is provided that they may appropriate moneys in the city of Halifax for schools, with the proviso that they should all be free schools.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Allow me to say, as this is a matter of some moment, that the Free School Act passed by me when head of the government in Nova Scotia, was an Act which had the support of every Roman Catholic member in the House of Assembly and the support of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Nova Scotia.

Mr. FLINT. I wish to ask the hon. Secretary of State a question. I looked over the debate cursorily last night, and I saw that Mr. Miller, the present member of the Senate, and a Roman Catholic, strongly opposed the Bill on the very ground put forward by the hon. member for Brant.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was speaking from memory, on events which occurred a long time ago, but if there was a single instance of a gentleman opposing the Government on that Bill, it is contrary to my recollection of the fact.

Mr. MULOCK. Allow me to read one subsection of the Act. Subsection 14 of section 18 of the Act, speaking of the powers and duties of certain officers to carry out the Act, provides, among other things, as follows :—

> Their power shall be to aid the superintendent in carrying out and enforcing a uniform system of education, and generally in giving effect to the Act according to the Council of Public Instruction.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman will have to make another speech, I am afraid.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say this, and it must not be forgotten, that the ground on which I had the support of the Roman Catholic body of Nova Scotia, and the most eminent leader of the hierarchy at that time, was, that under that Act, the Council of Public Instruction in Nova Scotia was the executive government, and the executive government contained more than one Roman Catholic member, which was a guarantee to the Roman Catholics that in the administration of that Act they would enjoy every right and privilege which they desired ; and under the administration of the law, which is continued down to the present time, the present Liberal leader in Nova Scotia declared recently on the platform in Montreal that most perfect satisfaction was given both the Catholics and Protestants in the province.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, the leader of the provincial government does take that ground. As the hon. Secretary of State has quoted the opinion of that gentleman, who must be very conversant with these provincial matters, I will quote from a recent speech made by Premier Fielding. He said:

> It is deplorable to find Sir Charles Tupper figuring as he does in this matter. It is sometimes charged against Sir Charles that he is disposed to claim too much credit for himself in his references to the various public matters with which he has been connected. Too often the part taken by others in the creation of our public school system has received little notice. The great work of Dr. Forrester in promoting educational interests, the stand taken by the Liberals of Nova Scotia, by Howe, and Young, and Archibald, and Annand and others, who refused to make the school question one of party, but were ready to join hands with Sir Charles Tupper in support of the principle of free common schools—these do not always receive as much recognition as they should. But making all allowance for this, there was still due to Sir Charles Tupper a large measure of credit, for he was the Premier of the government which assumed the responsibility of passing our public school law. For no act in his public life has he received more credit,—for no act in his public life was he entitled to more credit. Let us recognize this to-day. But how are the mighty fallen ! What can we say of the position of that gentleman to-day, who, instead of standing up as the champion of a free school system, and resisting those who attack it, scrambles into Parliament through the unfair influence of the Roman Catholic pulpit of the county of Cape Breton, and is now devoting the evening of his life to the work of destroying the free school system of Manitoba and forcing upon that province a system which he would not dare to attempt to force upon the province of Nova Scotia.

I do not know the details of all these matters that have occurred in Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman has alluded to Mr. Fielding, and I have quoted what Mr. Fielding said on this subject, and I presume his statement on that point is correct. I find the words "uniform system of schools" in the Act introduced by the Secretary of State, but that is beside the question, because I say that if, under a Free School Act, it is possible to secure peace and harmony in Nova Scotia, it is certain that a similar result can be secured in Manitoba. I find that under the religious clause in the Manitoba Act, there are religious exercises, but only at the close of school hours, and children are not required to attend unless their parents desire them to attend. In the Act introduced by the Secretary of State I think the scope is broader than that. Under the heading "duty of teachers," subsection 5 of section 74, it provides for "the inculcation, by precept and example, of respect for religion and for principles of Christian morality." What that would cover, I am not prepared to say; but I say that it goes as far in that direction, as does the Manitoba Act, which does not require any child to remain for religious exercises if the parent does not wish it. In addition, the children are to be taught to cultivate the highest regard for truth, justice, love of country, loyalty, humanity, benevolence, sobriety, chastity, temperance and all the other virtues. The hon. gentleman was, of course, far beyond the period of school days when he passed that Nova Scotian Act, but one of the virtues which it points out should be cultivated is one worthy of the attention of all hon. members—and I could not fail to think so last night when the hon. gentleman received a direct negative to his positive affirmative—regard for truth. The hon. gentleman seemed troubled and annoyed because the leader of the Opposition had moved the six months' hoist. The hon. gentleman who last spoke (Sir James Grant) treated the amendment with ridicule. The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in an almost violent speech, referred to it. Why should not the leader of the Opposition move the six months' hoist? What is there inconsistent on his part in following up his speech by moving the six months' hoist? What ground does he take? He takes the ground that the Manitoba government, which is one of the parties to this controversy, as much as the minority are, says to the Government here: You have not been informed of all the circumstances of the case, you have gone to work hastily, you summoned us down to Ottawa when our premier was sick and when the legislature was in session; you would not give us delay; you have gone through a little inquiry so hastily that you could not give us time to prepare rebuttal evidence, so that affidavits put in by the other side have been withdrawn; gentlemen, you are improperly informed. And so the Manitoba government, representing the great province, have asked twice, in the most courteous manner, that evidence be taken on this question. They point out to us, that their legislation has been endorsed as constitutional by the highest court of the British Empire, and they ask for fair-play. And, Sir, the leader of the Opposition says: It is right that their requests should be complied with before we go any further, and he believes, that, if full inquiry is had, and a conference arranged, a solution of this difficulty will be found which will be of more value to the minority in that province than any benefit accruing to them from such a Remedial Bill as we have before us. The hon. the leader of the Opposition moved the six months' hoist, because he recognizes, as every one does, that, in order to effect conciliation, and in order to restore the rights and privileges of the minority, if they have been taken away, there should be peace and harmony between the two Governments. The hon. the leader of the Opposition has said to the Government, time and again: Withdraw your remedial order; withdraw your Bill; start anew where you ought to have commenced; have an investigation and a conference with these people in the proper spirit, and a solution will be found that will be of benefit to the minority, and of benefit to the whole province of Manitoba, and which will remove this question that threatens to cause strife amongst us. Sir, exception has been taken because gentlemen on this side of the House and gentlemen on the opposite side of the House are opposed to this Bill for different reasons. I do not hesitate to say here, that you have a Bill that cannot possibly give to the minority anything like the consideration that they might expect to result from investigation and a friendly conference between the two Governments, after this Bill and after this remedial order has been withdrawn. Sir, if there be any gentleman present who ought to vote for that six months' hoist, it is the introducer (Sir Charles Tupper) of this Bill, a gentleman who has told us, that, as soon as it has passed its second reading, he is going, at long last, to seek for a conference with the Manitoba government. According to the statement of that gentleman, we are just on the eve of this conference—if his word may be taken in that respect, and I trust it may, though it may have been shaken by some statements which he has previously made—and, if this be the case, I ask him, if he really desires for the well-being of the minority and the settlement of this question; I ask him, why he has, in such violent terms, denounced the Manitoba government, as cruel, as perfidious, and as guilty of everything that is contrary to what is just and right, in its dealings with the minority of that province? I leave the answer of that question to himself. If he wants a conference, let him withdraw his words, let him make an apology to Manitoba, let him withdraw his remedial order, let him vote for the six months' hoist, and then go and meet the Manitoba government in the same frank and friendly spirit that they have shown, when they have asked for inquiry. Sir, I believe that, by doing that, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) can better secure whatever is due to the suffering minority of that province, and that he can better secure peace and contentment and the uniting of all interests.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the proceedings, and, I might add, at this 22nd hour of our sitting, I may be allowed to say a few words on a question in which I, perhaps, take a deeper interest than most of the members of this honourable House can, on account of the peculiar position that I occupy, being the representative of the largest portion of the minority interested in the question now before this House. I shall be as brief, Sir, as I can afford to be, because this question has been pretty well threshed out during the nine or ten days that we have had it under our consideration, and quite a large number of arguments have been brought forward, in order to defend the views of the respective members who have spoken. It is needless for me to say, Sir, the view that I intend to defend, on account of my being, as I said before, the representative of those who are mostly interested in the matter.

You are all aware, that this question has arisen from the fact, that before Manitoba became a part of the Dominion of Canada, before the colony of Assiniboia on the banks of the Red River entered our Canadian confederation, there existed certain customs, and the people who inhabited that country were enjoying certain privileges, which, when they entered confederation, they expected would be perpetuated to them. I am not going, Sir, to take up the question of the negotiations that took place at the time of the entrance of the province into the Canadian confederation. There are very little differences of opinion as to the merits of the compact that took place on that occasion. It is an admitted fact, by most of those who look upon that question with impartiality, that there was a compact, and that under that compact the minority, whatever that minority might be, in the province of Manitoba, felt secure that the privileges which they enjoyed with regard to education would be protected by the Manitoba Act. The fact of the matter is, that I do not believe, that we should on this occasion go that far back. We have a constitution, and that constitution is the Manitoba Act. We have also a constitution as a province, which is embodied in the British North America Act, and, therefore, I may say, that even if no negotiations had ever taken place, and even if there had been no such compact as the one we claim existed, we have our constitution, and the rights and privileges that are guaranteed to us by that constitution; and it should be sufficient for us to claim the due execution of all that is authorized in that constitution. What interpretation has been given to that constitution? We have had it given by the judges of the several courts to which this question has been submitted. While, on the one hand, the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously decided that the rights and privileges guaranteed to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba protected them against the provisions of the Educational Acts that were passed by the local legislature in 1890, and that therefore those Acts were ultra vires, the result of the appeal to the highest tribunal in England, notwithstanding the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of Canada was that that court decided that the Acts passed by the local legislature in 1890 were intra vires, in so far as they were not considered as affecting the rights and privileges enjoyed by that minority prior to the union.

But, Sir, those rights were protected under another clause of our constitution. The British North America Act says that "whenever, in a province, a system of separate schools as existed prior to the entrance of that province into confederation, or should thereafter be established such rights," &c., &c., ; that is to say, such rights were to be protected. In our case, however, it was decided by the Privy Council that the schools we practically had before our entrance into the Canadian confederation were not protected by the Manitoba Act. I may say that any one who has read the last judgment of the Privy Council on the appeal case, will be struck with the idea that the judges of that high tribunal laboured very hard to reinstate the minority of Manitoba in their rights, of which they had been deprived by their former judgment, and they have decided that we have grievances. If we have grievances, we must have rights. If we have rights, we have the right to come before this Parliament and say: It has been established by the Privy Council that we have grievances, and as those grievances rest upon rights, we ask you to reinstate us in those rights of which we have been deprived."

I shall not deal any further with what may be called the constitutional aspect of the question upon which we have already had very able speeches in this debate. I will now follow some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I was not only surprised, but astonished at the stand taken by the hon. leader of the Opposition on this question. Ever since 1890, it is true, whenever I have brought this question before this House, session after session, I have never heard from that hon. gentleman any word of comfort for the minority of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman was very noncommittal on every occasion he took to speak on the question. When the time was passing within which it was in the power of the Government to disallow the two Acts of 1890, and when I would have willingly accepted such disallowance, I remember the hon. leader of the Opposition denouncing the Government for taking no action, but, at the same time, remarking that he was not prepared to blame them if they did not take that action. That is to say, if he had been a Minister of the Crown, he would not have done any more than was done by the Government. I say I would have willingly accepted a disallowance of those Acts—not because I believed that would have settled the question. No, Sir, a disallowance does not settle the question, because it does not prevent the legislature that has passed an Act that has been disallowed from re-enacting the same law.

Mr. LANGELIER. It can be disallowed again.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It can de disallowed again ; but I remember that the hon. gentleman, speaking in this House the other day, contended that Acts that were intra vires should not be disallowed, and that Acts that were ultra vires did not need to be disallowed, because the courts would set them aside.

Mr. LANGELIER. I did not say that ; quite the contrary. The hon. gentleman will not find one word in my speech to that effect. I challenge him to quote it from my speech.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Well, I will deal with the hon. gentleman later on. The leader of the Opposition, in opening his speech on this question a few days ago, said :

> In the name of the constitution, so outrageously misinterpreted by the Government, in the name of peace and harmony in this land, in the name of the minority which this Bill seeks or pretends to help, in the name of this young nation on which so many hopes are centered, I rise to ask this Parliament not to proceed any further with this Bill.

Well, Sir, I cannot understand how the hon. gentleman, speaking in the name of so many people and so many things, could arrive at this conclusion. As I said before, if there is a grievance, there must be a right of redress. The fact that a grievance has been established implies that the right exists to remedy that grievance, and therefore the grievance must be remedied. We know very well that, under the constitution, the only remedy, in case that right is not re-established by the power that has taken it away, is legislation emanating from this Parliament. Now, the contention of the hon. leader of the Opposition is that by passing this legislation, we would exercise coercion. It would be, he said, coercion on Manitoba.

Then, leaving this subject, the hon. gentleman passed to the question of disallowance, and he exclaimed : Why did not the Government disallow those Acts as they disallowed the two other Acts that were passed during the same session ? Well, if these Acts had been disallowed, would not that have been coercion, and coercion under what circumstances ? Under the circumstances that the very Acts disallowed would perhaps have been declared intra vires by the same tribunal as that to which they were referred, and which declared them to be intra vires, and the Government would have appeared to the public of Canada as having disallowed Acts which were perfectly within the jurisdiction of the province. I may say for myself that while I admit the force and the significance of the judgment that was rendered by the Privy Council declaring these Acts intra vires, I do not believe that it was the correct judgment which should have been rendered ; and I know that there are several members opposed to it ; both members who have had nothing to do with that question to this day and members who have had a good deal to do with it, in court and out of court,—who are of the opinion that the first judgment rendered by the Privy Council was a mistake.

The hon. gentleman, after having blamed the Federal Government for not having disallowed the two school Acts as they did the other Acts passed in the same session, went on to say :

> They passed a drastic Order in Council which they sent to Manitoba, and now they ask us, in the name of the minority, to pass this Bill. Though no investigation has ever taken place, they say that, in the name of the minority, they are bound to pass it. I take issue with them, and in the name of the minority of Manitoba I say that their course to-day is unconstitutional, weak and dangerous. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) told us a moment ago that the Government is bound to act mechanically in this matter. Now, I ask Parliament this question : Are we, upon the complaint of the minority, unsupported by evidence, without having made an investigation, to be told that the law of the majority is to be set aside ? Sir, if you tell me this, then I say it was a mere mockery to give to the province of Manitoba the right to legislate upon this question.

Well, this is the most astonishing declaration that I have ever heard, and particularly coming from a gentleman who has always pretended to be the friend of the poor minority in Manitoba, who, on every occasion, when speaking in the province of Quebec, or even when speaking in the province of Manitoba, in the French district, always pretended to be the friend of the poor minority who are oppressed by the majority. And yet that gentleman says in this House :

> Are we, upon the complaint of the minority, unsupported by evidence, without having made any investigation, to be told that the law of the majority is to be set aside. Sir, if you tell me this, then I say it was a mere mockery to give to the province of Manitoba the right to legislate upon this question.

What does the hon. gentleman want to investigate ? He gives it in his speech. He wants to investigate :

> First, whether there was a compact made between the Roman Catholics of Manitoba and the Crown of England, as represented by the Government of Canada, whereby their schools were granted to them ; second, whether the system of common schools is repugnant to their consciences ; third, whether the schools established in Manitoba, though nominally public schools, are in reality Protestant schools. These are the things upon which the Roman Catholic minority have all along been resting their claim.

Well, I tell the hon. gentleman that he is altogether mistaken. Our claim rests upon the words of the constitution.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Our claim rests upon the law. No matter whether there was or was not any compact, our claim rests upon the law, as it is in the statute, and as it has been interpreted by the Privy Council of England. There is our claim. We do not claim any privileges, we do not claim any special favours, but we claim a right which has been established by the law, as interpreted by the Privy Council.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman goes on to say that the system of common schools is repugnant to the conscience of the minority. This, Mr. Speaker, is beside the question altogether. The complaint of the minority of Manitoba has nothing to do with the public schools or the common schools that exist in that province, but it is that they had schools of their own and that those schools have been taken away from them. That is their complaint. They had their own schools, which they controlled and conducted according to the tenets of their church, and those schools have been taken away from them, and all they have now is the offer to attend schools which they cannot accept as their own schools, and which are not their own schools. The minority of Manitoba want the schools which they had before to be restored to them because the schools have been taken away from them. They complain that their property, whether it be a real property or a moral property, the vested right that they have, the title and the right that they have to their schools, has been taken away, and they want those schools restored.

The third matter to be investigated falls to the ground after the explanations I have given that the schools in Manitoba, although nominally public schools, are in reality Protestant schools. These we have nothing to do with. Make these schools whatever you like, so long as you do not compel the minority to send their children to attend the teaching and the religious teaching given in these schools. Whether there be any religious teaching, or whether these schools be left as the schools of free-thinkers or godless schools, is immaterial to us, so long as you give us the schools that have been taken away from us. We should be very sorry if they abolished religious teaching in these schools, because of the effect upon the welfare of our fellow-citizens ; but if they wish to have their schools of that character we have no business to interfere, no more business with their schools than we claim they have business to interfere with ours. These are the points that the leader of the Opposition and his followers wish to investigate. Sir, I say there is nothing to investigate. The hon. gentleman has often and often repeated in this House that this was merely a question of fact which could be made clear to the minds of those investigating them. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a question of fact, and the facts are as I have already stated them. The facts are that we had schools of our own, that these schools have been taken away from us, that the constitution protects our rights in respect of these schools as decided by the Privy Council ; and, our rights having been unlawfully taken away from us, we ask you to restore them. Now, what is the next complaint of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and upon whose behalf is it made ? The complaint is on behalf of the Manitoba government, which government the hon. gentleman seems to have taken under his protection. He says :

> The government of Manitoba never was approached in a proper spirit upon this point. It was approached with threatening hands.

Is it possible that such an accusation should be hurled at the Government of the day and at those who have so far taken an interest in this question ? What are the facts ? During the session of 1890 petition after petition came before the local legislature, signed by the representatives of the minority, signed by their school trustees, signed by Roman Catholic parents, begging the legislature not to interfere with the vested rights of the minority in their schools. Day after day petitions of that character were read. And what was their fate? They were thrown into the basket, and, regardless of their prayers, the minority were deprived of their rights. The minority were deprived of their schools, and, I may say, of their school property, because, under a provision of the Act, all school property vested in the Roman Catholic minority was transferred and handed over to the Protestant school trustees who were in the same district. Was that the only step that was taken by the interested parties ? No. The legislature was drawing to an end. On the 28th March, 1890, three days before prorogation, three days before these iniquitous Acts were sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor, a memorial was placed in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor. That memorial was signed by Roman Catholic members and representatives of the Roman Catholic minority of the province protesting against the passing of these Acts. And, Sir, what was that document ? :

> Legislative Assembly of the Province
> Winnipeg, 28th March, 1890.
> Sir,—On behalf of the members for Carillon, Cartier, La Verandrye, Morris and St. Boniface, as well as in my own name, I beg to represent respectfully to your Honour, that the legislative assembly has passed during its present session, amongst others, two Bills, respectively intituled "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," and to submit most humbly that the said Bills are ultra vires for reasons more fully set forth in the memorandum herewith enclosed.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
JAMES E. P. PRENDERGAST,
M.P.P. for Woodlands.

His Honour the Hon. John Schultz,
Lieutenant-Governor, &c., &c., Government House, Winnipeg.

Then, Sir, this memorial sets forth the following reasons why this Bill should not be assented to by his Honour:

(1) They each had their denominational schools, there being in fact then no other schools than denominational schools in the country.

(2) Each denomination (whether by their clergy, laymen, or otherwise) had the privilege of determining the curriculum of the course of the studies to be followed in their respective schools so that the convictions and consciences of the parents were not violated by their children.

(3) The practice, the general practice, was that each denomination supported its own schools.

In spite of this protest, these Acts were assented to on 21st March, 1890. This Bill, according to one of the memorials that was presented at that time by the Hon. Mr. Prendergast, had been voted by the House on the 5th, the 18th and 19th March. There were three votes taken. The first vote on 5th March:

The Order of the Day being read for the House to resume the adjourned debate on the question which was on Tuesday last proposed, that the Bill (No. 12) respecting the Department of Education, be now read a second time, and the question being again proposed the House resumed the said adjourned debate. * * * Then the main question being put, the House divided, and the names being called for they were taken down as follows :—In favour of the Bill : Messrs. Campbell (Souris), Campbell (South Winnipeg), Colcleugh, Crawford, Dickson, Fisher, Graham, Greenway, Harrower, Hettle, Jackson, Jones, Lawrence, McKenzie, McLean, McMillan, Martin (Portage la Prairie), Mickle, Morton, Sifton, Smart, Smith, Thomson (Emerson), Thompson (Norfolk), Winkler, Young.—26.

The nays were : Messrs. Gelley, Gillies, Jerome, Marion, Martin (Morris), Norquay, O'Malley, Prendergast, Roblin, Wood.—10.

All the Liberals voted in favour of the Bill, and all the Conservative members in the House voted against it. Protestants, as well as Roman Catholic Conservatives voted together.

On Tuesday, 18th March, 1890, at the sitting, 7.30 p.m.:

The Hon. Mr. Martin moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Greenway, and the question being proposed, That the rules of the House be suspended and the Bill (No. 13) respecting Public Schools be now read a third time, and a debate arising thereupon, and the House having continued to sit till after 12 of the clock on Wednesday morning, 19th March, 1890, the main question being put, the House divided, and the names being called for they were taken down as follows :—

That was on the third reading of that Bill.

Yeas : Messrs. Campbell (Souris), Campbell (South Winnipeg), Colcleugh, Crawford, Dickson, Graham, Greenway, Harrower, Hettle, Jackson, Jones, Lawrence, McKenzie, McLean, McMillan, Martin (Portage la Prairie), Mickle, Morton, Sifton, Smart, Smith, Thomson (Emerson) Thompson (Norfolk), Winkler, Young.—25.

All the Liberals supported the Greenway government.

Nays : Messrs. Gelley, Gillies, Jerome, Lagimovière, Marion, Martin (Morris), Norquay, O'Malley, Prendergast, Roblin, Wood.—11.

Six Roman Catholic and five Protestants, all Conservatives. Well, Sir, another memorial was sent in on 12th April, 1890, by his Grace the late lamented Archbishop Taché, of St. Boniface, which memorial he addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, and in that memorial, which is in the form of a petition, his Grace prayed:

I therefore most respectfully and most earnestly pray that Your Excellency, as the representative of our most beloved Queen, should take such steps that in your wisdom would seem the best remedy against the evils that the above mentioned and recently enacted laws are preparing in this part of Her Majesty's domain.

With most profound respect and fully confident,

I remain,
Your Excellency's humble and obedient servant,
ALEX., Arch. of St. Boniface.

St. Boniface, 12th April, 1890.

Two days afterwards another memorial was forwarded, which was signed by several members of the local legislature, the conclusion of which was as follows :—

That the said Bills violate the sacred and constant rights of Her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects of the province of Manitoba in relation to education ; and that for reasons more fully set forth in Appendix D hereto attached, the said Bills are ultra vires, and have been passed in defiance of the Imperial Parliament under whose sanction the British North America Act, 1867, and the British North America Act, 1871 (34-35 Vic., Chap. 28) were enacted.

Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that Your Excellency may be pleased to take such action and grant such relief and remedy as to Your Excellency may seem meet and just. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray. Thomas Gelley, M.P.P. for Cartier ; William Lagimovière, M.P.P. for La Verandrye ; Ernest J. Wood, M.P.P., for Cypress ; Roger Marion, M.P.P. for St. Boniface ; James Prendergast, M.P.P. for Woodlands ; R. E. O'Malley, M.P.P., for Lorne ; Martin Jerome, M.P.P., for Carillon ; A. F. Martin, M.P.P..for Morris.

This petition was supported by the following persons, under date of April 14th, 1890:—

The undersigned respectively members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada fully endorse the contents of the present memorial and earnestly join in the prayer therein containd.

A. A. C. LaRIVIERE, M.P. for Provencher.
M. A. GIRARD, Senator.

In August, 1890, another petition was sent in by his Grace the late Archbishop of St. Boniface, and signed by over 4,000 names.

That petition had the following prayer attached to it :—

> That Your Excellency the Governor General in Council may entertain the said appeal and may consider the same, and may make such provisions and give such directions for the hearing and consideration of the said appeal as may be thought proper.
> That it may be declared that such provincial law does prejudicially affect the rights and privileges with regard to denominational schools which Roman Catholics had by law or practice in the province at the union.
> That such directions may be given and provisions made for the relief of the Roman Catholics of the province of Manitoba as to Your Excellency in Council may seem fit.

After the presentation of that petition, came the Order in Council with respect to the recommendation of the late Sir John Thompson, then Minister of Justice. This petition, the prayer of which I have just read, is the subject-matter of this Order in Council. The conclusions of the report of the Minister of Justice are as follows :—

> An appeal has been asserted, and the case is now before the Supreme Court of Canada, where it will in all probability, be heard in the course of next month.
> If the appeal should be successful, these Acts will be annulled by judicial decision ; the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba will receive protection and redress. The Acts purporting to be repealed by a majority of the legislature will remain in operation, and those whose views have been represented by a majority of the legislature, cannot but recognize that the matter has been disposed of with due regard to the constitutional rights of the province.
> If the legal controversy should result in the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench being sustained, the time will come for Your Excellency to consider the petitions which have been presented by and on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba for redress under subsections 2 and 3 of section 22 of the " Manitoba Act," quoted in the early part of this report, and which are analogous to the provisions made by the British North America Act, in relation to the other provinces.
> Those subsections contain, in effect, the provisions which have been made as to all the provinces, and are obviously those under which the constitution intended that the Government of the Dominion should proceed, if it should at any time become necessary that the federal powers should be resorted to for the protection of a Protestant or Roman Catholic minority, against any act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority affecting any " right or privilege " of any such minority " in relation to education."
> Respectfully submitted,
> JOHN S. D. THOMPSON,
> Minister of Justice.

Well, Sir, this report was followed by a petition, dated 25th December, 1892, from the National Congress, a society which had been organized in St. Boniface just after this trouble arose on the school question. The National Congress, after hearing the result of the decision of the Privy Council in the first case, that is Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg, sent a petition. After reciting the petition of August, 1890, the Order in Council of 4th April, 1891, this last petition concludes as follows :—

> That a recent decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England having sustained the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba, upholding the validity of the Acts aforesaid, your petitioners most respectfully represent that, as intimated in said report of the hon. the Minister of Justice, the time has now come for Your Excellency to consider the petitions which have been presented by and on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba for redress, under subsections 2 and 3 of section 22 of the " Manitoba Act."
> That your petitioners, notwithstanding such decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, still believe that their rights and privileges in relation to education have been prejudicially affected by said Acts of the provincial legislature.
> Therefore, your petitioners most respectfully and most earnestly pray that it may please Your Excellency in Council to take into consideration the petitions above referred to, and to grant the conclusions of said petitions and the relief and protection sought by the same.
> And your petitioners will ever pray.

On 22nd December, 1892, another petition was forwarded, after the judgment of the Privy Council had been rendered. It was a petition from his Grace the Archbishop, embodying the conclusions of the Order in Council of the 4th April, 1891. The prayer of the petition was as follows :—

> 1. That Your Excellency the Governor General in Council may entertain the appeal of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba, and may consider the same, and may make such provisions and give such directions for the hearing and consideration of the said appeal as may be thought proper.
> 2. That such directions may be given and provisions made for the relief of the Roman Catholics of the province of Manitoba as to Your Excellency in Council may seem fit.

In November, 1892, another appeal was made to His Excellency the Governor General in Council by his Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface. That petition contained the following prayer :—

> 1. That Your Excellency the Governor General in Council may entertain the said appeal, and may consider the same, and may make such provisions and give such directions for the hearing and consideration of the said appeal as may be thought proper.

2. That it may be declared that such provincial law does prejudicially affect the rights and privileges with regard to denominational schools which Roman Catholics had by law or practice in the province at the union.

3. That such directions may be given and provisions made for the relief of the Roman Catholics of the province of Manitoba as to Your Excellency in Council may seem fit.

Well, Sir, was that all ? No, Sir. In May, 1894, a petition, signed by no less important personage than His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau, of Quebec, and all, or nearly all of the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Canada, was sent to the Governor General in Council, asking him once more to consider the grievances of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba. This petition was forwarded by the Governor General to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba for the information of the local government of that province. No action was ever taken by the government of Manitoba on that petition. But I may be told, that all these, or nearly all these, were communications that were forwarded directly to the Governor General in Council, and that, therefore, the government of Manitoba, while they did not ignore all that was going on, still were not bound to take cognizance of those several documents. But, Sir, they had been apprised of the feeling of the Roman Catholic minority in the province by the several petitions that had been forwarded to the legislature during the passing of those obnoxious Acts that are complained of. I have just mentioned the petition of the head of the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church of Canada. Moreover, on the 11th of September, 1894, a deputation, composed of over 500 people, representatives of the Roman Catholic minority, coming from every parish in the province, assembled in the city of Winnipeg, and walked in procession from one of the Roman Catholic school buildings to the government building ; and then and there a petition was presented by the deputation, signed by over 5,000 names ; and what did those people say ? They asked the Hon. Mr. Greenway and his colleagues to consider the following petition :—

To the Honourable the Premier and Members of the Government of Manitoba :

We the undersigned Catholics of the province of Manitoba do respectfully represent :

1st. That we are unable from motives of conscientious convictions, to participate in or derive any benefit from the system of education as now carried on under the Public School Act of 1890 and amendments thereto.

2nd. That the heavy pecuniary sacrifices with which Catholics throughout the province have been burdened in consequence of said laws for the last four years, even through the stringency of the present time, must remove any doubt as to the earnestness of their feelings, and convince your government of the gravity of their grievances.

3rd. That without sharing your petitioners' convictions that the taxation of Catholics for schools, acceptable only to Protestants, is most oppressive and unfair, your government must feel that they could not any longer in their eyes and conscience, legitimately carry on that system, the result of which is injustice and oppression.

4th. Therefore, your petitioners as free-born British subjects wish to enter their firm and solemn protest against this unfair treatment at your hands, and do respectfully and earnestly pray your government to take into serious consideration the grievances of the Catholics of this province and to pass such legislation as may be necessary to remedy such grievances to their full extent and to assure to the said population the full respect of their rights and conscientious feelings, the use of their school taxes, of their legitimate share of the public money voted for educational purposes in this province.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

What was the result ? Those people came without any ostentation, without making any fuss or noise. They walked through the streets of Winnipeg to the parliament building, and were received there in the legislative chamber. After they had sat down, this petition was read to the Premier, and the Premier said :

After having been informed that nothing else was to be said, he assured the deputation that he appreciated the importance of the matter ; but, as the question was one involving the policy of the Government, he thought that it better, in order that any misapprehension might be avoided, instead of giving a verbal reply, to communicate the answer of the Government in writing. He promised that there would be an early meeting of the Government and that he would lay the memorial before them, and give the deputation their reply.

Sir, here are 500 people, representing about fifty settlements in the province of Manitoba, walking through the streets of Winnipeg, and coming down almost on their knees to the Hon. Mr. Greenway and his fellow cabinet ministers, and asking those gentlemen to take their case into consideration : to restore the schools that have been taken away from them, to relieve them of the burden of dual taxation to support public schools from which they derived no benefit, while they have, at the same time, to support their own schools, which, on conscientious grounds, they feel they are bound to support.

And, Sir, what was the first answer from the Manitoba government ? The answer was : that it was a question involving the policy of the government. That is to say, that instead of looking into this matter from a just and judicial, and I will add, a judicious standpoint, these gentlemen would look upon the claim of the minority of Manitoba, not from the standpoint that that minority should enjoy rights which had been wrested from them, but from the standpoint of the policy of the local government. They made it a political question. If it was in the interest of the government of Manitoba to keep up this agitation for their own welfare ; if it was in the interest of that government to keep that question before the public in order to save their seats and their portfolios ; then the policy of the Manitoba government, being opposed to the restoration of the rights of the minority, that policy would first be taken into consideration, and the claim of the poor Roman Catholics of Manitoba would be thrown to the winds. That is what the Manitoba government replied, but that is not all. On the 3rd October, 1894, a reporter of a newspaper put this question to the Hon. Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General of Manitoba :

> What has become of that petition signed by 5,000 Roman Catholics and carried over to the legislative building by a deputation composed of 500 people from all parts of the province ?

And the Attorney General replied to the reporter :

> The petition did not call for any action on the part of the Government at present. What they desire is a change in the School Act, and the petition amounts to this : The matter will probably be brought before the House in session again this fall.

As a matter of fact, it was never brought before the legislature of Manitoba, no more than was the petition signed by the Roman Catholic episcopate of Canada.

Well, Sir, we have heard a great deal during this debate about the remedial order. What a sensation has been caused by this remedial order, which, after all, is nothing but the outcome of the judgment of the Privy Council. We are told that that remedial order was drastic, and that it was a command to the province of Manitoba. But, Sir, was it unexpected by Manitoba ? Is it for one moment to be supposed that the government of Manitoba did not expect that the remedial order would some day or other fall upon their heads. They were acting exactly in the direction to provoke the issuing of that order. Sir, in the session of 1895, before the issue of that so-called drastic remedial order, what was done by the government of Manitoba ?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Carried.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes, the Bill will be carried against the wish of my hon. friend (Mr. Choquette). In 1895, the government of Manitoba actually put in the mouth of the Lieutenant-Governor of that province the following words, in the speech at the opening of the session :—

> Whether or not a demand will be made by the Federal Government that that Act should be modified, is not yet known to my government, but it is not the intention of my government in any way, to recede from its determination to uphold the present public school system.

Who was it that made the threat there ? Who was taken by the throat there ? Sir, before the issue of that order which was the natural and legal consequence of all the proceedings that had been conducted in the courts : an order which was provided for by the constitution ; before the issue of that order, the local government dares defy the Federal Government to issue such an order, because, they say : Whether you issue it or not it is immaterial, for we shall not obey it. Yet, Sir, we are told that we have taken the province of Manitoba by the throat, and that we are coercing the province of Manitoba. Sir, if there is any coercion it is coercion by the Manitoba government of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of that province. Forsooth, because we ask a remedy for that grievance, we are accused of wanting to coerce the province of Manitoba.

Sir, I have so far shown that the government and the legislature and the people of Manitoba were fully aware of what was going on through the courts of justice, and therefore nothing else could be done in order to warn them, in order to coax them, or to use the expressions of some hon. gentlemen here, in order to induce them to do justice to this Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba. And, Sir, while the Federal Government is accused of having issued a drastic order, let me call your attention to some of the utterances of some of the members of the local Cabinet in the province of Manitoba. Before the first judgment of the Privy Council was rendered in the school question, and when it was anticipated that the Roman Catholic minority would win their case, what did we see expressed in some of the local papers of that province ? These papers said that whether the judgment would be in favour of the Roman Catholic minority or not, the local legislature would not recede from the position that they had taken. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the judgment which was rendered by the Privy Council was not anticipated. On the contrary, the reverse was expected : so clearly was it in the minds of everybody that we had rights, so clearly was a judgment in our favour expected. But as soon as the judgment was rendered, we saw printed in large letters in the local papers the words : Hands off Manitoba, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has decided that the province is right, and there must be no more appeal and no more petitions. Not only the newspapers of our province, but in a good many of the leading newspapers of the province of Ontario, leading papers of both political parties took that position on that occasion. After the judgment which was rendered in the second case, and which reversed in fact the first decision because though it maintained that the schools established by the Act of 1890 were legally established, still it directed this Parliament to pass such legislation as would subtract the majority from the affects of the Act of 1890, and restore its rights and privileges which had been taken away by that Act—after that judgment was rendered what were the statements made by members of the local Cabinet ? Mr. Sifton is reported in one of the Winnipeg newspapers as having said :

> If the Dominion Government undertake to interfere in any way, shape or form, there will be a deadlock.

These people knew very well that the Dominion Government had the right to interfere. They knew that the Dominion Government would sooner or later interfere, they knew that this Parliament would sooner or later interfere : but before waiting the action of the central power, they said : "If the Dominion Government interferes in any way, shape or form, there will be a deadlock." That was a threat, Sir, and a threat which is worse than coercion, because the threat was against the decision of the highest tribunal of the Empire, it was a threat to resist the law and the authority, whereas coercion in this case—if coercion there be—would be only the exercise of a right that is undoubted and admitted by every member of this House to appertain to this Parliament. Now, on another occasion the same Mr. Sifton—who is, in his own opinion, the only legal light that we have in the province of Manitoba—made the following statement :—

> The decision makes no difference to us, the Manitoba government care little whether the Dominion proposes remedial legislation or not, as they have taken their stand, and it was a constitutional one, and they will maintain it.

Another threat. Mr. Speaker, we are told by the leader of the Opposition that those men should have been approached in a mild way, in the sunny ways of patriotism ; we are told that they should have been invited to come here and treat in a mild and friendly way with us ; and yet before this Dominion Government ever made a move, before this Government ever arrived at a decision or uttered a word as to what its future course would be, it was met by declarations from the local government of Manitoba which were nothing else than threats. Those declarations were to the effect : We admit that you have the right to interfere, but we dare you to interfere on your peril.

Another member of that very liberal government of Manitoba made the following statement :—

> The decision does not affect us in the least, the people of Manitoba know what kind of a school system they want.

I suppose he meant the majority of them, because he could not speak in the name of the minority, nor did he speak for all the majortiy.

> The people of Manitoba know what kind of a school system they want, and any attempt on behalf of the Dominion——

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Not the Government this time, but the whole Dominion of Canada.

> —any attempt on the part of the Dominion to override their wishes in the matter of remedial legislation will be so much time thrown away.

Again, another threat—another notice that if this Parliament should ever dare to interfere, then they would be throwing much time away. That is to say, that the government of Manitoba would not obey the laws which we might enact, that they would refuse to obey, not only the decision of the central power, but even the decision of the Parliament of Canada. And yet, Sir, we are told that if these people had been approached in a mild way, if an investigation had been held,—into what ? Into their threats, I suppose, into the warnings they gave us not to interfere,—an amicable settlement would have been arrived at. But in the face of all those protests, in the face of those threats that were made by the local government and by their members, could the Government here have acted otherwise than they did, under the circumstances ? Could they have done otherwise than fulfil their duty as indicated in the constitution, and as indicated more definitely and in a more authoritative manner by the judgment of the Privy Council. I have made notes of some of the utterances of members of the House during the present debate. But I do not wish to prolong this debate, more especially after the tiresome sitting we have had for the last twenty-four hours, and I shall pass over most of these, and touch but lightly upon the others. There was an exceedingly astonishing statement made by the new member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) to the effect that the Bill before us could not be amended and that we had to accept it as it is, or vote for the six months' hoist. Sir, I have yet to learn that any Bill brought before this House cannot be dealt with so as to improve it and adapt it for the purpose for which it is designed.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. The Government have refused to say they will amend it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. But the Government has never said that the Bill is not to be amended.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. They will not accept any amendments.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. They refused to accept any suggestions from the hon. member (Mr. Choquette), perhaps.

Mr. MARTIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman if this is not the Bill prepared by Mr. Ewart on behalf of the minority ? I understand that this is the Bill offered by Mr. Ewart, and, therefore, so far as the minority is concerned, it does not require any amendment.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I will agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) that a Bill was prepared by Mr. Ewart and submitted to the Government. But I would say also that the present Bill is not exactly a copy of that Bill prepared by Mr. Ewart. And I will add that the Bill, in its present shape, has been accepted and approved of by Mr. Ewart as the counsel for the minority in Manitoba.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman say in what respect it ought to be amended, if it is satisfactory to the minority ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That is all right, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has a right to put that question. And I will give the hon. gentleman the information he asks for when the Bill is in committee.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. It will never get to committee.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. It will unless you prevent it.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. We are willing that it should go to committee.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes ; we know the extent of your willingness. I was rather amused in listening to the speech of the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar). That hon. gentleman has taken under his protection a so-called Catholic living in the city of Winnipeg. We have heard something with regard to that gentleman before. This is a gentleman named O'Donohue, a cattle dealer, a man whose profession gives him high attainment for the direction of the school system. The hon. member for West Ontario said the Catholics in Manitoba are not a unit on this question. And the reason is because this gentleman, by the name of O'Donohue, who claims to be a Catholic, and who, perhaps, thinks he is one, does not agree with the rest of us. We have been told, again and again, that there were a number who did not agree with the rest, but on every occasion, when we asked for the names, we hear the name of Mr. O'Donohue. Who is this Mr. O'Donohue ?

Mr. McGREGOR. He is a Tory.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. No, Sir.

Mr. McGREGOR. He was a Tory.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes, but like all bad Tories, he became a Grit This Mr. O'Donohue has managed to be elected school trustee for the public schools for the northern portion of Winnipeg, where all the Jews in the city live.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. He sits for Ward 3, that is along Portage avenue. There are a great many Icelanders in that ward.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The Icelanders are nice people. They are good voters. They always vote Grit, I am sorry to say. This Mr. O'Donohue has managed to be elected to the public school board in Winnipeg. The schools to which the Roman Catholics are so kindly invited with the assurance that they will not see anything in those schools that will hurt their conscientious scruples. This Mr. O'Donohue, on the occasion of the inauguration of one of the public schools in Winnipeg suggested that the ceremony should be presided over by the members of one of the lodges, not of Orangemen, but of Freemasons. I do not make any objection to those of my friends who may belong to that order. That is their business. But, in my church, we see in the same light, all secret societies, and, therefore, it could not be expected of us to be pleased to see what is supposed to be a non-sectarian school opened by a lot of gentlemen wearing aprons and having trowels in their hands. We are not used to that kind of a demonstration on such occasions.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. These are very useful things.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Yes, we can handle mortar with them. But, Sir, that is not all. This Mr. O'Donohue evidently wants to see his name kept before the public. He takes a great deal of interest in the welfare of the great men of Canada, and, lately, when no less an eminent statesman than the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) left the Government, Mr. O'Donohue thought it proper for him to send the hon. gentleman a telegram of congratulation. I suppose, that after seeing this telegram, my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) will not pretend that Mr. O'Donohue is a Tory. This telegram was acknowledged by the hon. member in the following letter :—

> Dear Sir :
> I hope you will pardon me for not replying to your congratulatory telegram. I am much pleased to-day to hear that the government of Manitoba are determined to stand by the public school system of that province.
> I am, dear Sir,
> Faithfully yours,
> N. CLARKE WALLACE.

The two make a pair. Well, Sir, I am exceedingly sorry not to see my good friend the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in his seat at the present moment, because we have had so many occasions each session during the last five years to exchange amenities, and perhaps, sometimes, compliments, that I waited several hours in this House to listen to his speech the other day, with the intention of giving him my own reflections on the subject that he treated on that occasion. As the rules of the House do not preclude us from referring, in his absence, to what has been said or done by a member, as I do not intend to be personal about it, I shall speak as I intended to do, were he present. The hon. member for North Simcoe said he was not animated with any ill-feeling towards the French or towards the Catholics of this Dominion, but that he was opposed that they should enjoy any special privileges that were not enjoyed by other nationalities or denominations. But, Sir, while he protested his good-will towards the French Canadians and the Roman Catholics, at the same time, as we see, he objected to their enjoying any privileges not also enjoyed by other nationalities and other creeds. I say, these words ill-become an hon. member who, as has been said by several speakers already in this debate, is himself the principal author of the agitation that has brought this House into its present situation. He himself was the first man to raise the standard of Protestantism, as against Catholicism, of English as against French. I will not venture an idea as to what the hon. gentleman's ambition may have been, because the only result that could follow to him from such an agitation was to be branded with the name of an agitator. That is the only benefit, I believe, that he has derived from his course. But, Sir, what were his motives? Was it revenge? I do not wish to ascribe that spirit to him. I wish only to examine the work that the hon. gentleman has performed, and which I shall criticise. We had a visit from that hon. gentleman in the province of Manitoba. It is a well-known fact, that he attended a meeting at Portage la Prairie, where he met the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), who was then Attorney General for that province. Sir, on that occasion he is reported to have said:

> He was glad to notice that at last the Protestant minority of Quebec had waked up, and at an early date he hoped to have the pleasure of addresing them in Montreal on the question. They all had their hands full. In Ontario they would have to contend with the question of French teaching in the schools. In Manitoba they had the dual language to deal with, and in the North-west they had the same question. As soon as the work had been accomplished, they would then be in a position to master the same difficulties in the province of Quebec.

And, Sir, later on, speaking before a meeting of the Equal Rights Association, in the city of Ottawa, the hon. gentleman said:

> We have a record for eight months, Mr. Chairman—I mean the Equal Rights Association—which no political party would boast of in a decade of years, and if there are men among us now who want to go back to their old political alliance, I say, shame on them! They ought to be satisfied with what we have accomplished in so short a time. What have we accomplished? Go to the province of Manitoba, and what do we see there? Why, that government is going to deal, not only with the dual language question and the iniquitous act which would fasten it upon them, but with separate schools. I had the honour to stand on the same platform at Portage la Prairie with the Attorney General of the province (Mr. Joseph Martin) when he announced his intention, in anticipation of the action of his government, that he would cease to sign the official cheque for the publication of the statutes in the dual language, or cease to be Attorney General. Do you tell me that the Equal Rights Association had nothing to do with that? Of course, the feeling was there, the grievance existed. People's mind had only to be directed to it, and the moment attention was drawn to it, the province of Manitoba rose to a man and said ' We want no dual language, and away with separate schools as well. Let me prove what I say is correct. There ought to be no sympathy between Attorney General Martin and myself, according to old political doctrines. He is a Reformer and I a Conservative; therefore, we should be sworn foes.

We see that on this occasion the sworn foes have united to oppose the restoration of separate schools, which were abolished in the province of Manitoba. I observe the smiling face of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I regret that he was not in his seat when I had occasion to address him. After the quotations I have given from the utterances of the hon. member for North Simcoe, I suppose it will not surprise the House if, after such a campaign, we saw in Manitoba and the North-west Territories the result of the agitation that was carried on. It will surprise, however, some hon. members when I read a statement published in one of the local papers there with respect to this question. The Moosomin "Courier," published in Moosomin, which is a nice town near the western boundary of the province of Manitoba, in the district of Eastern Assiniboia, on 5th September, 1889, just when this kettle which has been placed on the fire by the hon. member for North Simcoe, was boiling, published the following:—

> Are they (the Roman Catholics) a superior kind of people from Protestants that they hold themselves aloof, by having separate schools?
> To private schools, no one can object, but we must emphatically protest against separate schools being maintained by the Government, for any denomination other than Protestants. Our motto is: One People, One Country, One Religion!

That is the exact programme of the hon. member for North Simcoe—one people, one country, one religion. Of course, we must understand that one people does not mean the French people. As regards the sentiment of one country, we all agree with it. As to one religion, perhaps it was the Roman Catholic religion to which he was referring, but I do not believe so. That hon. gentleman has made reference to Roman Catholic schools, the schools of the minority, schools in which both English and French were taught, and in some of them only the English language, schools that the hon. gentleman contended were inadequate to the wants and requirements of the country, that were so inferior that no good could be expected from them, that were perfectly useless, that no education of any sort or kind was given in them, that, in fact, some of them were inoperative and during half the year were not kept open for the children who should attend them. I was surprised when I heard all these charges made against the system of schools which was abolished six years ago. On hearing those charges from the mouth of the hon. gentleman, I asked who his informant was, what authority he had for making such a statement in regard to those schools which existed prior to 1890, and the hon. gentleman informed me that his information was taken from a pamphlet published by S. C. Wade, a young barrister of Winnipeg, who was entrusted by the provincial government, not to investigate the school question, but to ascertain what might be charged against the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba in regard to the rights we possessed under the law which was abolished by the Manitoba government. I tell the hon. gentleman that all the accusations contained in that pamphlet are groundless and untrue. I will not undertake at this period of the debate to occupy the time of the House by taking up the accusations, item by item, but I refer any one who wishes to look up this question to a very able answer made to that pamphlet by Mr. Ewart, the counsel for the minority in Manitoba, who, by the by, I admit is a member of the same Christian body as my hon. friend, but does not partake of the same views on this question. There is one fact, however, which I do not desire to allow to pass unnoticed. The hon. gentleman has stated that these Roman Catholic schools were receiving, proportionately, more money than the Protestant schools. It is a fact that they receive more money. But what was the cause of it? It is known by every one who visited the province of Manitoba that the Roman Catholics, who chiefly belong to the French population, are settled around their churches more densely than in the townships, where the new-comers have settled. These districts are most sparsely settled, and, therefore, while they have schools having their needs, they have greater needs than others, and a smaller attendance in the schools. They have multiplied the number of schools in order to provide for the children of school age the education which they require. I repeat that in the Catholic parishes the population are more dense, you see schools there that are attended by a larger number than 150 pupils, a thing that you do not see in any of the other settlements. In the parishes along the Red River and the Assiniboine, as the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) will bear me out, in these parishes settled by the old settlers, the Catholic population, where the population is dense, they have large schools, attended by a large number of children. Therefore, while the trustees of these schools were receiving a larger amount of money than the others, yet they were not receiving anything out of proportion, because they had more pupils than the amount they were receiving compensation for. Therefore, when it appeared that the Roman Catholic schools were receiving a little larger grant than the other schools, the fact was that the proportion of attendance at the Catholic schools was about twice as large as at the Protestant schools, and the number of the schools being fewer, I therefore hold that they were receiving less in proportion than was the other class of schools.

Now, Sir, I wish to take exception to a statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) in regard to my friend Senator Bernier, who was superintendent of the Roman Catholic schools of Manitoba at the time of their abolition. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) has conveyed the idea that my friend Senator Bernier had $5,000 or $6,000 a year put into his hands to spend or squander as he thought fit. In fact, the inference from the words of the hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) is that Senator Bernier was putting that money into his pockets. Sir, what are the facts? Not a cent was paid on behalf of the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education unless the same had been approved of by the auditor of the local government. Every year the Superintendent of Education had to send an estimate of the probable expense for the then current year, and an appropriation would be made for that object, and on the certificate of the Superintendent of Education, the amounts would be paid by the government. All the money expended was expended under the supervision of the auditor of the province. Sir, the only amount that the Superintendent of Education in these days received was the sum of $1,500 a year, and he had to devote the whole of his time to that work. All the payments paid to the schools were controlled by the local government, and if there was anything wrong—which I deny—it is not the Roman Catholic Board of Education, it is not the superintendent of that board that could be accused of wrong-doing, but it is the officials of the government. Sir, I say there was nothing wrong about that expenditure, and I say that everything was perfectly correct. It has been reiterated by Mr. Sifton, and after Mr. Sifton by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that Mr. Wade, in his pamphlet, has stated that after an examination of all the papers in connection with the schools that had existed prior to 1890—because I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Wade never saw the schools of Manitoba, and never inspected them, and it was five years afterwards that he was entrusted with the preparation of the report on the condition of these schools that had been abolished five years previously—it was reiterated that Mr. Wade had stated, after an examination of the reports and the curriculum and the programme of studies, that to his amazement these schools were conducted by Roman Catholic priests. He was shocked at the idea that these children would be taught the doctrines of the church, and he was shocked at the sight of a crucifix in the school-room of a Roman Catholic school. There was a great deal to do about that, if you please, and Mr. Wade writes about it in his pamphlet. But the hon. member for North Simcoe had the decency not to attach any importance to that discovery. But, Sir, there was something still worse in the eyes of Mr. Wade. He actually found that priests were teaching in some of the schools. Well, I will admit that out of the hundred schools, on two or three exceptional occasions, and in out of the way districts where the people were too poor to pay for a teacher, the priest would sometimes step into the school-room and devote himself to the education of these poor children. That was only on two or three occasions, and when I mention this fact I speak of what I know. Prior to my entering into the cabinet of the local government, I was for four years Superintendent of the Roman Catholic schools in Manitoba, and I know in what condition these schools were. I say, Sir, that the standard of these schools was equal, if not superior, to that of the Protestant schools of the province. And, Sir, when this statement was denied by some members in this House, a quotation was given from the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), who, when introducing the School Act of 1890, stated that the schools had been well conducted, that he thanked the members of the Roman Catholic Board of Education for keeping up the standard of those schools, and for giving their time towards the maintenance of that standard. There was no question about the inefficiency of these schools when they were abolished; not in the least. It was only five years afterwards that the government of Manitoba, for the sake of making a case, one day thought that that point might be investigated. But there was no reason for investigating it. Supposing for the sake of argument, that the schools had been inefficient, some of them, was that a reason for abolishing them ? Is it a reason for abolishing anything, that it is not satisfactory ? Should you kill your child because he is not of the frame of mind you would like him to be ? Because he does not answer your desire, will you kill him, or will you not try to correct him and bring him up according to your desire ? There was no reason at all ; in fact, no reason was ever adduced for abolishing those schools.

Now, my hon. friends from Ontario are very proud, and, I believe, rightly so, of the standard of the schools in their own province, some of them thinking that nothing is good unless it comes from the province of Ontario. Well, Sir, there is a public school system in the province of Ontario, and I ask, have we ever investigated into the efficiency of the schools under that system ? Some people have ; and, as a result of that investigation, I will read an extract from an article published in the "Week," of the city of Toronto, on 2nd September, 1892, as follows :—

DOES OUR EDUCATION EDUCATE ?

The recent controversy concerning the Ontario examination for teachers and others will have accomplished some good if it is a means of directing attention to the practical results of our present system of education. We are in the habit of congratulating ourselves that we have in Canada a very excellent system of education, and in some respects we undoubtedly have. But is it, as a matter of fact, doing all that it should accomplish ? A recent experience has caused me to wonder whether, after all, our educational methods do not fail in really educating, whether they do not result in turning out a large number of pupils and teachers possessed, perhaps, of a certain amount of book knowledge, but destitute of nearly all the other attributes of true education. It also serves to demonstrate that our official means of testing the educational qualifications of pupils and teachers must be sadly deficient ; that is, in the words of the "Week," that "examination by writing is unreliable as the sole test of the results of a prolonged course of study or of the mental acquirements of a given student."

The experience I have referred to was not, by any means, an unique one. It was merely looking through the applications of a number of teachers for vacant teacherships. The positions applied for were the head mastership of the high school and the principalship of the common school in the largest and most important town in the North-west. For these positions there were over sixty applicants. All the applicants possessed at least second-class certificates, a large number were university graduates, the great majority of them had secured their qualifications in Ontario, and, for the most part, they had been actively engaged in the teaching profession. The positions and the salaries attached were such as should have secured applications from the highest class of teachers, and I have no reason for supposing that the large number of applicants who offered their services did not represent a fair average of the teachers who considered themselves able to fill and hold the necessary government qualifications to occupy the higher positions in their profession.

In such a class one would naturally look for some of the best results of our higher education. It would be taken as a matter of course that those competent to take charge of the education of our youth should at least be able to write, to spell, and to use the Queen's English correctly ; and it would not unreasonably be expected that they should exhibit some evidence of that good sense, sound judgment, culture and refinement which the best education is expected to produce and which, unless possessed by himself, a teacher cannot impart to those placed under his control. In these qualities, however, as well as in the elementary attainments first mentioned, the applications in question showed a large number of the applicants to be lamentably deficient. Full seventy-five per cent of them could be passed over without a second reading—many of them without being read through at all —and of the remainder it did not take long to discard all but half a dozen.

In the first place, the writing of most of the applications was bad ; and the badness was not of that order which, because of its character, is often condoned in the writing of scholars and geniuses. A number were written in those large, irregular and clumsy characters which one is accustomed to find in the exercise books of young scholars. A still larger number were written in a prim, copy-book hand, some fairly good of its kind, some rather shaky, particularly in the flourishes, but all quite characterless so much so that it was generally impossible to distinguish the sex of the applicant until the end of the letter was reached. The spelling was somewhat better than the writing, but mistakes in that were numerous. One applicant, for instance, announces that she is a "gold medalist" of some educational institution. Another, who states he holds both Ontario and North-west Territory second-class certificates, spells the capital of the Territories "Reginna," not once but several times. One makes "through" a word of two syllables and divides it thus, "throu—gh"; one divides "reasons" into two syllables thus, "re—asons"; another divides "application" "applicat—ion"; another "furthering" in this way, "furtheri—ng." The applications containing these latter mistakes were not type-written, or one might be inclined to excuse the errors, nor do the mistakes appear to have been rendered imperative by great lack of space at the end of a line. The Queen's English suffers rather severely at the hands of these its guardians. One who holds an Ontario first-class professional certificate and states he has "taught English with good success," write thus: "Having noticed your advertisement for a principal to take charge of your public school, I wish to apply for the same." This gentleman's specialty, according to his own statement, is mathematics, but it does not appear that his study of the exact sciences has taught him to avoid ambiguity of expression. It is not clear whether he is applying for an "advertisement," a "principal," or a "public school." An awkward arrangement of words such as the following is by no means infrequent:—"Sir, Would be pleased to accept the situation you advertise as principal of the common school at a salary, &c." It is not uncommon for an applicant to state he encloses a "recommend," and tautological expressions such as "gave good satisfaction," "taught with good success" abound, not only in the applications themselves, but also in the "recommend" of school inspectors and others. Punctuation is apparently considered to be of very little importance.

Besides defects such as the foregoing, one finds in connection with a considerable proportion of the applications some gaucherie giving evidence of boorishness and lack of judgment which it is difficult to imagine a highly-educated person being guilty of. One sends his application written on a big sheet of thick blue paper (10 in. x 14 in.), ruled in blue and red, evidently torn from some register, dirty withal, and folded fearfully and wonderfully. Another young man uses small sheets of thin, sea-green tinted paper, very suitable perhaps for billets d'amour to some village Amanda, but hardly calculated to win the favour of an urban school board. One begins with the confidential "My dear Sir," and concludes with he ulra-formal "I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant," and some original souls, scorning conventionalities, place their "Dear Sir" at the extreme right instead of at the left of their note paper. An individual may lack wordly wisdom and yet be a genius; but the genius who prefaces his application by censuring his would-be employers for having dismissed their previous principal, courts the treatment genius is but too often accorded by its contemporaries. The country domine who thought it an important point to submit the information that on one occasion he was presented with a "costly ink-stand, graced with the antlered head of a reindeer, a fancy China cup and saucer and elegant fountain pen, a box of finely tinted paper and envelopes and some other articles, accompanied by an address" is no doubt even yet wondering why he failed to secure the desired position. A similar feeling may perhaps be entertained by one who wrote "Should your board, Sir, be pleased to accept my application they may depend upon it that they will not regret their choice." But the serene self-confidence which inspired the following is probably superior to disappointment. "I feel confident should you honour me with the appointment, I shall be able to afford you every satisfaction, and achieve for your school distinguished success." The philosopher whose lengthy application is chiefly a disquisition on the advantages of "experimental psychology," concerning which he has made an "exhaustive study" and some "unique experiments," would appear either to have omitted from his investigations one important class of humanity, viz., practical business men, or to have profited but little from his experiments. And the gentleman who seeks to impress the trustees with the splendour of his intellectual attainments by informing them that he is a "graduate of the American Institute of Phrenology" has apparently not a very high estimate of western intelligences. Many of the applicants think—and, it may be, rightly—that to be a Methodist, or a Presbyterian, or a member of some other denomination, is a very important recommendation; but one appears to base his claims almost entirely on the following qualifications:—"I am a member of the Methodist Church, the Christian Endeavour, and the Royal Templars of temperance, have never used tobacco in any form, and can supply references from those who know me showing my character to be blameless." It is indeed sad to think one so excessively immaculate should have to content himself with the reflection that virtue is its own—and often is only—reward. The lack of intelligence shown by some applicants in submitting "recommends" and testimonials is indeed surprising. One is not impressed favourably with an applicant's past experience by looking through a dirty, greasy package of letters, some in red ink, some in violet ink, some in black ink and some in pencil, execrably written and spelled, certifying to the opinion held by the school trustees of some obscure township as to the holder's abilities. I cannot forbear quoting one of this class of testimonials. "We the undersigned trustees for——— school district, do hereby certify that they have known for a number of years in the capacity as school teacher and that he is thoroughly competent to teach a graded school according to the laws of the School Act for the Dominion of Canada, and we take great pleasure in recommending him to any community in want of a teacher. Yours very truly." Unless assured that the applicant who relied on a testimonial such as this held a second-class teachers' certificate, one would not suspect that his intelligence had been expanded and elevated by high education. One cannot but tremble for the interests of education in a community where such trustees have the management of school affairs. Some of the applicants send printed copies of their testimonials, but apparently they do not realize that this creates the inference either that they are so often applying for situations as to render copying their recommendations in each case too great an undertaking, or that they are displaying vanity and bad taste. One individual has not only his testimonials printed, but prints even his application itself, blanks being left for dates, salary, &c., the whole being surrounded with a very fancy border; and he evidently intends to make use of the application elsewhere if unsuccessful, for he concludes: "Return this pamphlet (sic) if my application is rejected."

It is, of course, not possible to cite every instance of lack of knowledge, culture and intelligence, but enough has been said to indicate what a large proportion of the sixty applications in question gave evidence of these defects in the applicants. And it must be remembered in making an application for a situation the applicant naturally endeavours to present himself in every way in the most favourable light. When so much is gathered from merely letters of application, what would be the result of a more complete and searching examination into the applicant's abilities and characters? As I have said, these teachers are, or should be, the best results of our advanced education, and it is they who are conducting the education of the rising generation. Under the circumstances a doubt as to the practical results of our educational methods cannot but arise. I do not at present attempt to assign a cause for what I can only regard as a failure somewhere or to suggest a remedy. I merely call attention to the serious fact.

F. H. TURNOCH.

I am sorry to have occupied the time of the House by reading this document, but I thought it was an apt commentary on some of the criticisms we have heard in this debate. Here are the comments of the same newspaper, the "Week," on this correspondence:

The facts given in the article under the heading "Does our education educate?" in our last number, challenge the thoughtful consideration of every intelligent Canadian. Let no one suppose that Mr. Turnoch's experience is exceptional. We have no doubt that almost every solecism he instances could be paralleled by many of those among our readers who may at any time have had a similar duty to perform. Mr. Turnoch has done a service in putting the facts so well before the public. No attitude of mind is more inimical to true progress than self-complacency. Our much bepraised educational system is not yet producing, nor is it at present capable of producing anything like ideal results. We are not sure that we may not have in that well-worn word "system" itself a hint of one fruitful cause of such disappointing facts as those unveiled by our correspondent. The very rididly of the system tends to make such failures possible, if not inevitable. In saying this we are not decrying "system" or denying that rigidity may be to a certain extent necessary. It may be the less of two evils. But how can the system have the effect indicated? In various ways. In the first place, it tends to destroy individuality and spontaneity in the profession, and to foster dull, mechanical uniformity. This is, we think, too evident to need illustration or argument. In the second place it tends to shut out of the professions a class of men and women of culture and refinement—just the kind of teachers whose influence would do much to counteract the lack of good taste and perception of what is proper and appropriate which was so strikingly displayed in some of the documents described. There are, we dare say, many of this class, of both sexes who would be glad to teach, and would have been eligible under former conditions, who are now barred out. They would fail to solve the mathematical and other puzzles which from time to time appear in the examination papers. One result of the system has been to replace all such with a class of teachers who have been trained for the profession, or rather who have been helped into it by the shortest possible cut, by dint of special cramming for the examinations, but who are necessarily destitute of the culture possessed by many to whom these examinations would prove an insuperable barrier. Of course, mere general culture cannot supply the place of accurate and specific scholarship any more than text-book acquaintance with algebra and Euclid can atone for the lack of literary culture. What is needed is some means by which a fair admixture of both may be secured. Can any one think the culture less essential than the scholarship in the training of young minds?

Closely connected with the subject of the preceding paragraph are other causes incident to a young country and colonial conditions. Every one knows that the social environment in childhood and youth is a most potent factor in determining educational results. Not one in ten of Canadian teachers, it is safe to say, has had the great advantage of being brought up amidst people of education and refinement. The great majority have thus been deprived of that unconscious training which is by no means the least important element in education. This means much more than a merely negative loss. It means the formation of faulty habits of manner, thought and speech, which the utmost diligence in after life can never wholly eradicate. Then, the young men and women who enter the teaching profession under such disadvantages are not, as a rule, translated into social circles which afford them the best opportunities for overcoming these deficiencies. In many cases they do not even become conscious of them, and so continue to lack the essential condition of all successful effort in self-improvement. They may rarely have occasion to use the pen—perhaps the most potent of all educational instruments—to the extent of writing even a business letter. Hence the stiff penmanship and glaring defects in form and style. In this respect they fail to receive a valuable species of training which is enjoyed even by the clerk in a business house. Add to all this the fact that the level of the profession is prevented from rising so rapidly as it otherwise might, by the constant loss, through a kind of natural selection, of many of its most promising members, who are drafted off into other professions.

Notwithstanding these facts, we are glad to believe that a marked improvement is taking place in the quality of teachers and teaching in Ontario. In one respect, at least, the standard of preparation and qualification has been very materially advanced within the last few years. The reading of English literature has been given a much more prominent place than hitherto. This is a change which cannot fail to have a most salutory effect, not only upon the students in training, but upon the teachers who have to oversee this reading. But there is room for still further improvement in this di> rection. The goal should be a state of things in which the pupil, from the day he enters the primary department until the very end of his school career, be that in high school or college, shall be brought into acquaintance with good literature so continuously and under such conditions in respect to its intelligent study, that he or she can hardly fail to become possessed of some genuine taste for it, even before the third-class teacher stage is reached. Need we doubt that this is quite possible of attainment, under right conditions and influences ? This of itself would go far to make such productions as Mr. Turnoch describes impossible. Again, it surely is not too much to say that the Education Department should be able to prevent the giving of certificates to candidates so lacking in cultivated good sense and in knowledge of English as most of the candidates whose applications are described must have been. Why should it not, for instance, be made an invariable condition of the granting of even a third-class license, to say nothing of seconds and first and university degrees that the candidate must prove himself able to write a letter and an essay on a given theme, with substantial correctness in form and some modern degree of merit in style and thought. We have no doubt that this test faithfully applied would be far more valuable from the most practical point of view, than any degree of readiness in solving problems or reproducing text-book facts. As for the rest it is clear that parents and the public have duties to perform which cannot be delegated even to teachers, before we can hope to see the profession approximate to any ideal standard. Largely increased remuneration and more cordial social recognition are among the most potent of influences to this end.

In quoting this, I do not wish to make any reflection on the school system of the province of Ontario, because that is a matter which concerns alone that province ; but I wished merely to point out, that, if—which is a contention I do not admit—the schools of the minority in the province of Manitoba were properly abolished on the ground of inefficiency—which likewise I do not admit—I would ask my Ontario friends, whether the Ontario legislature is going to abolish their public school system because it produced such results as those shown by this correspondent, and because the system of education adopted in those schools does not educate. As I have said, I did not intend any reflection on these schools, but merely desired to give an illustration to show, that, if one wants to criticise even a system which is considered to be one of the highest standard and character—and I believe that there is a good system of education in Ontario, as far as common schools are concerned, just as good as it can be made—one can always find ample scope for criticism. I also merely desired to point out, that, when the Manitoba government appointed a barrister of the city of Winnipeg, who has never seen the schools which were abolished five years previous to his appointment—when the Manitoba government appointed him for the express purpose of depreciating schools of which he never had a knowledge, they can hardly lay claim to have acted in any spirit of fairness and with any desire for the public good.

There are several other matters which I intended to treat of in my remarks, but I shall confine myself to the arguments that I have made ; and I repeat, that the minority of Manitoba never for a moment wished to interfere with the public school system of the province of Manitoba, inasmuch as that system may continue to exist, and would not necessarily be interfered with by the minority being given back their own separate schools, which were taken away from them. It is mentioned occasionally, that the present system of public schools in Manitoba are not acceptable by the minority of that province because they are in reality Protestant schools, and this was put in some of the documents that were presented. It does not appear in any one of the petitions, but in some of the other documents, and it is only mentioned to show one of the results of the change. We do not want to interfere with that. But we say, if you close our schools, those other schools are the only ones left to us, and are not acceptable, because of the condition in which they are, but we do not want you to infer, that we have any objection to their remaining as they are. All we ask is, that we be given back our own schools, which you have taken away. Is an investigation required to find that out ? The hon. leader of the Opposition would like us to investigate as to whether these other schools are Protestant or schools in which no religious teaching is given. But we do not require any such investigation. I repeat again, that our claim is just restricted to this fact, that we had schools of our own, that we enjoyed them nineteen years, under a statute of the province of Manitoba, and that that statute has been repealed, in violation of the provisions of the constitution, as contained in the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act, that that statute has been repealed against the provision of the constitutional Act of the Dominion and the province, that the Privy Council has decided that our appeal was to be received by the Federal Government, that our complaint being justifiable as we had a grievance. But, Sir, I will repeat once more then if we have a grievance, we must have rights. The right we have is the right to have our own schools, to conduct them according to the tenets of our church, those schools being no part of the business of the rest of the community, except that when we receive provincial grants for our schools we admit that the Government may call upon us to maintain a standard in these schools at least equal to that of the public schools. I am ready to promise and to bind the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba, that if our schools are restored to us, in no case will the standard in any of those schools thus re-established be lower than that of the public schools. Year after year ever since this question has come before the House I have stated that the question for members to decide is not whether they favour or oppose a separate school system. We have heard much, especially from our Quebec friends on your left, about the liberality of Sir Oliver Mowat in maintaining separate schools in Ontario. There is something in that, except that helped on by his friend Mr. Laurier, he has on that subject come down a little. But I call attention to the fact that every time the question of separate schools has been discussed in the legislature Sir Oliver Mowat has come forward and said : I am opposed to separate schools on principle. but the constitution guarantees the Roman Catholic minority certain immunities with regard to these schools, and I respect the constitution. Sir Oliver Mowat is right. He obeys the constitution, and, in that respect gives us an example that we ought to follow. Are we, the highest and most important body of this Dominion to take a lesson in liberality from the Premier of the province of Ontario ? What are we asking for ? We, the small Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba are asking nothing but justice, nothing but what we are entitled to under the constitution as interpreted by the Privy Council. But, Sir, these gentlemen on both sides say : The Privy Council have declared that you have a grievance, they define some means whereby the Parliament of Canada can remedy that grievance. But there is no order from them that we shall remedy that grievance, there is no order that we shall render justice, we are perfectly at liberty to act or not to act. I ask, Mr. Speaker, is that justice ? It is admitted by those who favour the Bill as well as those who favour the six months' hoist that the judgment of the Privy Council declares that we have a grievance, but, because there is no order from Her Majesty the Queen to this Parliament to act and remove this grievance, we are not to act. Sir, I have too much faith in the liberality and large-mindedness of the majority of this House to believe that such a view will prevail. I believe that before we part we shall have restored to the twenty thousand Roman Catholics of Manitoba the schools that have been taken away from them, that we shall have restored to them their property, that we shall have so acted as to meet their conscientious scruples and render justice to them. And if that is the result, as it will be, the majority of this House, no matter from which side it may come, will have deserved the gratitude of the minority in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. PRIOR. Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the debate I will only ask the House to listen to me for a few minutes. I rise with no idea that it is in my power to shed new light on the subject before the House or that any argument that I may make use of will change one single vote in the House. Nor is it necessary for me to talk to "Hansard," because the electors in my district know my views on this question. I rise simply because I am one of the few members of this House who, since this question came prominently before the public, have had to face their constituents and ask for re-election. Now, Sir, when I came before the electors of the city I have the honour to represent, my opponents saw fit to make this Manitoba school question almost the only issue of that campaign. They were not willing to cross swords on the two trade policies of the two parties, or rather I should say, of the trade policy of the Conservative party, and the half dozen or so-called policies of the Opposition ; but they made up their minds that the Manitoba school question was the only one on which they would fight it out. I may say that they used every means in their power, both fair and unfair, to inflame the minds of the electorate, to place the Government in false positions before them. Although I knew a little about the question, still, neither I nor my friends were in the position that we are today. The hon. leader of the Opposition, speaking in the beginning of this debate, said that the demon of discord was abroad in the land, and that the winds of strife were blowing from one corner of this Dominion to the other. He said, also, that the policy of the present Government was the cause of this discord. Now, I think there is great divergence of opinion on that matter in this House. But let us see, for a moment, what the state of public feeling was in British Columbia. When, eighteen months ago, the leader of the Opposition and some of his lieutenants visited that province, I find that in a speech he made at a settlement called Saanich, in Victoria, in speaking to the electorate, he said .

> Now, Sir, I have seen many things to admire in British Columbia, your unique scenery, your resources in minerals, fisheries and lumber, as well as your great possibilities in agriculture, but there is one thing that is most to be admired in this province of British Columbia, and that is the perfect state of religious tolerance which you have reached. I have been all over Canada now, from the shores of the Atlantic to the shores of the Pacific—I have visited every province, and I am proud to tell you that there is not another province in the Dominion of Canada where religious tolerance is better understood and practised than it is in British Columbia.

Again, at Westminster, he said :

> * * * * Yes, in the most westerly province I find more freedom from bigotry and intolerance than in any other province * * No man looks how his fellow worships so long as he discharges his duty to his Creator and his neighbour, and if he fulfils his obligations as a good citizen no other questions are asked. When I return to the eastern provinces I shall be able to point with pride to the good example of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, you have heard the opinion the hon. gentleman had of British Columbia in regard to religious matters, and it is quite true. But what were the consequences of that hon. gentleman's presence in that province? Did he and his friends do their best to see that that state of affairs continued? It is true that the people of British Columbia were not living in Arcadian simplicity, but they certainly were, as the leader of the Opposition said they were, tolerant to the very last degree, and cared not what a man's religious opinions were so long as he was a good citizen. Well, when they found that they could make no impression upon the electors, that their free trade as they have it in England policy was not attractive, when they found that their promises of subsidies and the expenditures they would make when they got into power —because one of the chief points they made was that the province of British Columbia was not getting a sufficient expenditure of money—when they found that they could make no impression, their followers commenced at once to bring up this question as a principal issue, and to deride the idea of there being two races or two creeds in the Dominion, and to set brother against brother, and friend against friend, hoping that in that manner they could beat the Conservative candidate in the election. Now, as I said before, the people of British Columbia had never taken any great interest in this Manitoba school question, because they considered that it was not a question that affected them very much. They considered it was a question for Manitoba, if they considered it at all; and if not for Manitoba, it was a question for the Federal Government. British Columbia had no part in it, and needed not to take any trouble about it, because, under the terms of the union by which she entered confederation, there was no such clause as there is in the Manitoba Act, and the federal power has no control whatever, under any circumstances, over her educational system. As I have said, neither I nor my friends had studied this question, and we were pretty hard put to it at first to rebut the statement made by the Opposition. But, Sir, after reading the evidence given by the Supreme Court of this country, and the evidence given before the Privy Council in England, after reading Mr. Ewart's and Mr. Wade's pamphlet, Mr. Fisher's papers and letters, and everything else we could get, we felt that the Government were right, and were doing only what was just and right in bringing down this Bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, I listened with great attention ever since the 3rd of this month, to the speeches that have been delivered by the ablest men in this House, on both sides, in regard to this question, and I may be allowed to say that I do not believe that in any debate that ever took place within these walls, were there finer speeches made than we have heard made on this Manitoba school question. And if I had any misgivings, if my mind was not thoroughly at rest before I heard those speeches, I may say that I am now perfectly satisfied, and have no misgivings whatever. The eloquent and grand vindication of the Government made by the hon. Minister of Finance, and the able speeches made by the Minister of Justice, the ex-Minister of Justice, and several other gentlemen on this side, must, I think, have carried conviction to everybody, both in this House and in the country, who were not dyed-in-the-wool Liberals, or were not very bigoted on this question. Sir, during my election, I made a statement on several hustings that whatever Bill the Government saw fit to bring before this House, I would support. The Opposition tried to make a great deal of capital out of that statement, because, they said, I did not know what the Bill was going to be. However, I stuck to my statement, for I had the utmost confidence that whatever this Government did they would be able to justify it. I also knew at the same time, that if I was elected I should have a voice in framing that Bill. I had no vioce in forming the policy of the Government in bringing that Bill down, but I have had some voice in framing it before it was laid on the Table, and I am willing to take the responsibility of that myself. Now, that Bill is before the House, that Bill has been read by every hon. member present; and I must say that I believe that Bill is a fair Bill, a just Bill, and a moderate Bill. I think the best evidence of that is the fact that some of the minority claim that not sufficient has been done for them, while some of the majority say that it goes too far. Well, I can only say that when these speeches that have been made in this House have been sent to my constituents, and I shall see that they are sent to every elector, if, after they have read these speeches and digested them, they see fit to defeat me at the coming election, I shall retire into private life with the full knowledge and confidence that I have fearlessly done my duty to my country. Now, Mr. Speaker, nobody can look across the House and see the desperate efforts that the leader of the Opposition has been making lately to keep his followers together, without feeling somewhat sorry for a large majority of those gentlemen.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. There has been a good deal of trouble on that side.

Mr. PRIOR. There has been, certainly. If they vote for the amendment, many of them will do so simply because they feel that it is their last ray of hope, that, perhaps, this will enable them to ride into power. If they vote against it, I cannot help saying, that I firmly believe they will outrage the very best and holiest principles in their consciences. I cannot see how any hon. gentleman can vote against this Bill, unless he diametrically opposes what his conscience indicates to be right and just. There are a few hon. members on both sides of the House who will vote against the Government on conscientious principles, and, although I do not agree with them, I certainly have the greatest sympathy for them. They are totally opposed to separate schools in any manner, shape or form. Whether the minority in Manitoba has them bound by a solemn contract or not, they firmly believe it is not for the good of the Dominion of Canada that separate schools should exist. I have the greatest respect for their opinion, the same as I had for the members of the Orange body in my own constituency, who saw fit to vote against me at the last election for the very same reason. In that connection, I might say, it seemed extraordinary to find that an hon. gentleman who sits in this House and still calls himself a Conservative, who still says he belongs to the Conservative party, although he is not in accord with the Government on this question, saw fit to telegraph to the Orange lodges in Victoria, stating, that on no consideration could they vote for me, but they must vote for the Opposition candidate, who was a free trader and a supporter of the leader of the Opposition. What does the leader of the Opposition and most of his followers say ? Can any hon. gentleman point to a single speech the leader has made, in which he has stated that he was opposed to separate schools ? I never have seen such a statement. I should like to see such a statement, if I could, and yet we find him in company with and supporting the hon. member for North Simcoe. Any more incongruous position was never found in the annals of politics. Everywhere in the province of Quebec the hon. gentleman has stated, most emphatically, that he is in favour of separate schools. He has condemned the Government in one place for not pushing forward legislation to give the minority separate schools, and in another place he has condemned them for taking any action, pleading that they should give more time for conciliatory measures to be brought forward and evidence adduced. Sir, the hon. gentleman has, I know, the respect of everybody in Canada, myself included ; but I must say that the quibblings we have seen on the hon. gentleman's part on this question are on a par with his quibblings on the trade policy. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, he must know perfectly well, that the minority in Manitoba have the right of appeal to this Parliament, and, having that right of appeal, the Government is doing right to give them what they ask. He knows, also, that those rights, which were taken away from them, should be restored, and that it is not only a question for them, but it is a question for other minorities as well. The hon. gentleman also knows, that, if, through this trouble, he should, unfortunately come into power, the very first act he would be obliged to do would be to take up this question and give the minority their rights. But, because he is not in power, because he and the leader of the Manitoba government pretend that more evidence is necessary, although five years or more have elapsed since the Act was passed taking away those rights, although the hon. gentleman has abused the Government all over this Dominion for the action they have taken and for the action they have not taken, still, we see him here to-day, moving nothing more than the six months' hoist. I think his action in that matter is most extraordinary, to say the least of it. When the leader of the Opposition was in British Columbia, he stated, in a speech he made after looking into this question, as follows :—

> Now, why should I express an opinion on the Bill ? The Government has the responsibility, I have none ; I am not in power. When I am, I will not shirk my duty as they are doing.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. PRIOR. The hon. member for Wellington says, "Hear, hear." That, to my mind, is a most extraordinary course for any hon. gentleman to take. It seems to me, that the leader of a large party in Canada must be responsible for anything that comes before this House. Surely, no hon. gentleman sits here without having responsibility. Is he not responsible for the Bill, whether it is put through this House or not ? Would it not be much better, if the leader of the Opposition would try and assist the Government, and not wait till they bring in a measure which he thinks would arouse the worst passions in the breasts of the electors of a district or province ? Why does he attack this attitude of the Government ? Simply for one reason, and for what hon. gentlemen opposite consider to be a good reason. They hope, that by the bitter feeelings which have been engendered—and, no doubt, bitter feelings have been engendered—to overcome the Government and cross over to the Treasury benches. I firmly believe, that hon. gentlemen are mistaken in their ideas. I believe the electors of Canada sufficiently love what is right and just, that, although they may be carried away at the present time for a little while by prejudice and want of knowledge of the facts of the case, so soon as they read the speeches delivered on both sides of the House, they will see matters in a very different light, and, when they do that, I think the opinion of the electorate can be trusted. Every day we see that the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition is—I was going to say a subterfuge, but I saw last night that the word "subterfuge" is not allowed. But, if we want peace and harmony in Canada, this question must be settled, and settled immediately, one way or the other. The Government are a unit on this policy. They are fearless, and have been fearless in the expression of this opinion, and they have been, and are at the present time, unflagging in pressing for the passing of this Bill. If the Bill does not pass, I take it, that the responsibility lies as much on the Opposition as it does on the third party. Whilst the Government have always been most anxious to see, that Manitoba receives justice, and that at the hands of the province of Manitoba, and although they are still anxious that justice should be done to the minority by the province itself, and thus save this Government from the uncongenial task of interfering, yet they have made up their minds that they will, as a last resort, give the minority that justice which they have a right to obtain. My opponents tried, during the late election, to make the electors in my province believe that their case might be the same as that of Manitoba. There is no danger that this question will ever come up in British Columbia, unless the British Columbians send men to their own legislature who will legislate on the educational question. There is nothing in the terms of the union which gives this Government the right to interfere. Now, Sir, only one word more, for I have promised not to detain the House. I am a Protestant, I am the son of a Church of England clergyman, and was always brought up to believe that the Protestant faith was the true faith. But I was brought up also to believe, that there were good people who believed differently from what I do, and that I should revere and respect their religion. I am also proud to say, that I am, and have been for some time past, a member of that grand and patriotic order, the Sons of England. This society, as some hon. gentlemen know, is composed entirely of Protestants. No Roman Catholic, nor the husband of a Roman Catholic wife, is allowed to be a member of that society. Many of the very best men in Canada, merchants, manufacturers, professional men, are members of that association; but, the great number of members is composed of the honest and industrious mechanics and labourers of this country. Sir, that association is bound to be in a short time, a power in this land. A more sturdy and a more independent lot of men, you cannot find, than the men who meet in these lodges. Yet, although they are Protestants to the backbone, and although they have naturally no love for the Roman Catholic church, or the tenets of the same; still, such a keen sense of justice have these men, such a sturdy English love have they for what is right, and for fair-play, that between my nomination and my election, after I had declared my intention of supporting the Government on this Bill, when I had explained this Bill as well as it lay in my humble power to do, they saw fit to pass a resolution unanimously, in Alexandria Lodge, containing a vote of confidence in me, and they pledged themselves to support me at the coming election, as I verily believe they did support me.

Now, Sir, that shows, that although we may have differences of opinion, there is a large body of men, a large body of Protestants in this country, who are tolerant enough and fair enough to believe that the minority in Manitoba should have their just rights. I say, Sir, that while we have plenty of men like that, who can look such a grave question in the face, and bring to bear upon it unbiassed minds; there is no danger in this country for us to fear, either from traitors within or without our gates.

Sir, I am aware that I have added nothing of importance to this debate. I have carefully kept from putting forward any arguments on the legal aspects of this question, because I am not qualified to do so. I am perfectly willing to act on the advice of the Minister of Justice, and of the other legal gentlemen whom I have heard. I simply wanted to place on record my belief, that the Government has acted justly and honestly in bringing this Bill down. I believe they have acted in the interests of the country, and I believe also, that in recording my vote in favour of that Bill—although many of my friends may differ from me, and think my course is wrong—I believe that those friends will live to see the day, when they will acknowledge that my voice was raised, and that my vote was given, in the interest of the peace, harmony, and prosperity of the country we all love so well.

Sir DONALD SMITH. Mr. Speaker, after the many able and eloquent addresses to which you and this House have listened for these many days back, and after the exhaustive discussion which has taken place, it would be entirely out of place for me to suppose that anything I could say, would change one single vote of those who are about to pronounce upon the question now at issue. My friend, the member of the Cabinet, who has just taken his seat (Mr. Prior), has spoken to the same effect, and much more would it be the case with me, a private member of the House.

But, as representing one of the foremost—I might say the foremost constituency of the Dominion—as having some twenty-five years ago this month, taken my seat as the first member from that new country of Manitoba, as having also been a member of the first legislature of Manitoba, and further, as having been intimately connected for many years with that vast and important region of Rupert's Land, before it became a portion of the Dominion, it being my privilege in my capacity as resident governor of the Hudson's Bay Company to officially hand over the territory to Canada; I am sure that hon. gentlemen will indulge me, even at this very late period of the debate, while I say a few words. I do not for a moment propose to enter into the details of the Bill before the House. These have been discussed, and ably discussed, on both sides of the House, but I think I may point to the circumstances under which, as commissioner from the Dominion, I went to the North-west at a very critical period of this country's history.

What were the circumstances of the country, and what were the relations of England and Canada, to the neighbouring republic at that time ? We all know that there was anything but a friendly feeling, indeed that there was a very bitter feeling between the two countries, for the Alabama difficulty had not yet been disposed of, and the Joint High Commission had not sat as it did one or two years afterwards to dispose of those very important points relating to the two countries which grew out of the civil war in the United States. At that time, unhappily too, we had not the same feeling of cordiality on the part of the mother country towards the colonies, that we have to-day.

The change is indeed a happy one, but as showing the position of the North-west, showing on what the people of the Red River in a great measure depended, namely, the sympathy of those in the neighbouring states of America, when they rose in insurrection against the mother country and against Canada, I may be permitted to read an authority on that point. I have in my hand a newspaper, which will be taken as good authority, I have no doubt, for it is the official organ of the provisional government of that day. It is called " The New Nation." In it we have the following headings :—

> " Consolidation," " The Future of the American Continent," One Flag ! One Empire ! Natural Lines Must Prevail."

And it goes on to say :

> Again we present our readers with the views of the outside world on the Red River struggle for freedom. As the direct result of that struggle, we hear once more, but in louder and more determined tones, an enunciation of that great doctrine of which some of the most illustrious men in this world have been the expounders.
> That over all this broad continent—from ocean to ocean—but one flag shall wave—but one Empire be dominant. It is a vision of a grand consolidation of peoples and interests, such as can be paralleled nowhere else among all the kingdoms of the earth. It is a vision the realization of which has always been regarded but as a matter of time, and which is now, we believe, nearer to fulfilment than many suppose. It will be seen that we in Red River are credited with having largely aided in the movement to bring about this golden future ; and that sympathy and best wishes for our success, are ours, from many quarters. At the beginning of the uprising in this colony, it was said,—and truthfully said—that many who saw the beginning of the movement then inaugurated, could not see the end. That end—it will be our business, from time to time, to show our readers—will be the extension of liberty on this continent,—a breaking down of the artificial barriers of diverse nationalities which divide and estrange the dwellers in the new world,—and the creation of a magnificent power, whose influence on the rest of the world shall herald a brighter and better day.
> That Red River, the keystone of the confederacy projected by England, will never go under the authority of the Dominion, is now apparent. The keystone having given way, the rest of the fabric will topple speedily ; and in its place, we repeat, will be upreared an unbroken, undivided Empire, such as nature seems to have prepared the way for on this continent. Bearing this in mind, we ask a consideration for the subjoined views.

The first of these subjoined views is the following, from the New York " Sun " :—

> The tendency of events of this North American continent is plainly towards the consolidation of all the people dwelling upon it into one great nation, around the present United States as a nucleus. From the Polar Sea to the Isthmus of Darien there will in time be but one government and one national power. Canada, Rupert's Land, Victoria, Mexico will have but one flag and eventually Cuba and her sister islands will join us. Thus united, we can defy the world and offer a boundless asylum to the oppressed of every clime and country. Who among us can say that ours is not a glorious destiny, or reflect without exultation that he is an American citizen ?

The following is also given from the " Pall Mall Gazette " :—

> The Red River outbreak is one which would be calculated to excite but little interest in this country were it not for the circumstance, that Canada will have to deal with it as best it may. The Red River is (practically) all but inaccessible from Canada. On the other hand, it is very accessible indeed from the contiguous part of the States, and existing railways alone will suffice to connect it, with but little expenditure of time and labour, with the whole of them. Enthusiastic people of the colonial party see no difficulty in all this : Canada has only, in their view, to make a railroad from Lake Superior to Red River, thence across the Rocky Mountains to the Fraser River, and the work is accomplished, and British America bound together with a girdle of iron. To such reasoners as these, distance, climate, and physical obstacles present no embarrassments at all. Those who have reflected a little more on the subject know what speculative patriotism ignores : That there is no forcing colonization or commerce to follow artificial routes, by land or by sea, even if countless millions be devoted to making them. The natural lines must prevail ; Minnesota will always be close to Red River, Canada far from it. Even now, if the Dominion were forced to employ military force against these rough people—a contingency which we conceive to be extremely improbable, but which must needs be borne in mind, Canada, it is said, would have to ask the States for permission to send that force through their territory. And this must be true, unless the two or three hundred roadless miles between Lake Superior and Red River traverses a much more penetrable region than it is commonly represented. It is of no use to shut our eyes to the unpleasant side of questions like this, or to call those unpatriotic who present it to us. Admit the difficulty, and try if courage and ingenuity will find a solution.

It may be thought somewhat out of place for me to refer to these matters ; for it has been said that any promises given to a small people such as those of the North-west at that time, ought not to have an effect on that country, which would be lasting. At that time, as must be known to many, of the 11,000 people settled along the Red River, 6,000, or a majority of 1,000 were Roman Catholics. The Roman Catholics were principally responsible for the insurrection. They were different from the English. They were martial in their habits. They had been disciplined, and had borne arms from their earliest youth; they had been accustomed to go into the prairies for the annual buffalo hunt; and, for their own protection, they had to band themselves together, and to have their commandant, captains and other officers. On the other hand, the English were chiefly farmers—not wanting in courage, but not hunters like the others. Consequently, when this trouble on the Red River commenced, the French-speaking people, or a very large portion of them, took possession of the only fort there at the time—Fort Garry. They had some 700 men under arms, while there were no police, no body of troops, no government force of any kind to cope with them. Under these circumstances, Mr. Macdougall, failing to get entrance into the country, the Government sent up commissioners, one of whom happened to be myself. When we got there we found that it was, indeed, a difficult task we had before us—to explain to those people what was intended for them by the Dominion Government. The Dominion Government had, as I think, very unwisely, sent up some people in advance of the time at which the country was to be given up to Canada, to survey the country, to make roads, to interfere, in short, with the government of the country as it then existed. There can be no doubt that an impression prevailed in the minds of the settlers, not only the French, but the English as well, that they were to be overridden by what were called the new-comers; and they had consequently some justification for the opposition they entertained to Canada. However, as commissioner I did meet the settlers of the Red River in convention, and an explanation was made to them with regard to the intended action of Canada. They were assured that their rights, their privileges, everything they then had, would be retained to them, and that justice would be done in every way. I will not weary you by reading either the proclamation of the Governor General or the commission to myself on that occasion. As the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), then a member of the Government, knows, I was appointed a special commissioner, with powers beyond those of my colleagues. But I think I may be permitted to read one portion of the letter of instructions which I received from the Government, and which was really a commission:

> Also to explain to the inhabitants the principles on which the Government of Canada intends to govern the country, and to remove any misapprehension that may exist on the subject. And also to take such steps, in concert with Mr. McDougall and Governor Mactavish, as may seem most proper for effecting the peaceable transfer of the country and Government from the Hudson Bay authorities to the Government of the Dominion. You will consider this communication as your letter of appointment as Government commissioner.

Then, after referring to some inclosed letters, the instructions say:

> These will enable you to speak authoritatively on the subject of your mission.

Then let me read one more clause:

> As the information received by the Government here is necessarily imperfect and as the circumstances of the Red River are continually changing, it is not considered expedient to hamper you with more specific instructions. You will, therefore, act according to the best of your instructions in concert with Mr. McDougall, and you will keep me fully informed by every mail of the progress of events.

I should say that I had only one opportunity of conferring with Mr. McDougall, but that was some 140 or 150 miles away from the Red River, when he was on his way back from his abortive mission, and that consequently I had to deal with these matters myself. There is also a letter from the Governor General, in his capacity as representating Her Majesty here:

> I learn with satisfaction that you have placed your services at the disposal of the Canadian Government, and that you are proceeding to Red River to give the parties that are at variance the benefit of your experience, influence and mediation.
> In my capacity as Her Majesty's representative in the British North America possessions, I have addressed letters to Governor Mactavish, the Protestant Bishop of Rupert's Land, and the Vicar General, who acts in lieu of the Roman Catholic Bishop during his presence in Rome. I have sent them copies of the message received by telegraph from Her Majesty's Secretary of State, which forms the staple of the proclamation addressed to Her subjects in the North-west Territories. You will observe it calls upon all who have any complains to make, or wishes to express, to address themselves to me as Her Majesty's representative. And you may state with the utmost confidence that the Imperial Government has no intention of acting otherwise—or permitting to act otherwise—than in perfect good faith towards the inhabitants of the Red River district of the North-west.
> The people may rely upon it that respect and protection will be extended to the different religious persuasions—that titles to every description of property will be perfectly guarded, and that all the franchises which existed, and which the people may prove themselves qualified to exercise, shall be duly continued or liberally conferred.
> In declaring the desire and determination of Her Majesty's Cabinet, you may very safely use the terms of the ancient formula, that "right shall be done in all cases."
> Wishing you a prosperous journey, and all success in your mission of peace and good will.

There was a letter to the same effect sent to Governor Mactavish, who was then Governor of Assiniboia. I have said that there were great misgivings on the part of the people of the North-west with regard to the treatment they would receive from the Canadian Government, and that they apprehended going into confederation with Canada. But they came together in an open-door meeting on the 19th and 20th January, 1870—very cold days they were, too, with the thermometer twenty-five degrees below zero, rather cold to be standing out for six or eight hours in the open air. But the people of both races, the English and the French, were there in great force. After the explanations given, such as I have read here and others, they determined to form a convention ; and perhaps I will be permitted to read a few lines here in which Mr. Riel, who then assumed the title of President of the Provisional Government, and Mr. Donahoe, his right-hand man, spoke of the proceedings at that meeting. Mr. Riel and Mr. Donahoe both exclaimed : We accept the commission as genuine, and are merely to consider what is to be done under it. And then Mr. Riel said :

> Before the assembly breaks up, I cannot but express my feelings, however briefly. I came here with fear, we are not yet enemies, but we came very nearly being so. As soon as we understood each other, we joined in demanding what our English fellow-subjects, in common with us, believed to be our just rights. I am not afraid to say our rights, for we all have rights. We claim no half rights, mind you, but all the rights we are entitled to. The rights will be set forth by our representatives, and what is more, gentlemen, we will get them.

Following on this, there was a convention of the delegates appointed from all parts of the settlement. There were twenty-four, an equal number from both sides, French and English. They met on January 25th, 1870, and continued in session for fifteen days ; and they brought up, in the first instance, a bill of rights, which had been drawn up by Mr. Riel and his friends. But that was objected to and was not accepted by the convention. Then it was decided that another bill of rights should be framed. This was done by the convention, and I have here an authentic paper showing what it was. It is true that in that bill of rights there was nothing said about separate schools. The only mention that was made of schools at all is this :

> That while the North-west remains a territory, the sum of $25,000 a year be appropriated for schools, roads and bridges.

I may mention, however, that at that time the schools were voluntary, or separate schools—that is, the Roman Catholics had their own schools and the Protestants had theirs, and there were certain grants of money given to each. The Hudson Bay Company, then the governing body, made a grant to the Roman Catholic bishop, the late lamented and reverend Archbishop Taché, and I will say of that prelate—that very great man—that he was revered equally in those days by the English Protestants as he was by his own co-religionists, and well did he deserve it. There was a grant given to the one and to the other—a money grant as well as a grant of land—for school purposes. It is true that not much was said about schools at that time, but it was distinctly understood by the people there, and the promise was made to those people that they would have every privilege, on joining Canada, which they possessed at that time. And such promise I gave as a special commissioner from the Dominion of Canada. That was implemented by Canada. And to show that what was done at that time was approved, I may be permitted to read a few lines, although somewhat personal to myself. This is a letter from the Secretary of State of the Dominion, addressed to myself :

> Sir,—The events which led to your appointment in December, 1869, as a special commissioner for the North-west, are now matter of history. But the Governor General feels that the important services which in that capacity you rendered to the country have not yet received that official recognition to which they are justly entitled.
> His Excellency, therefore, now commands me to convey to you the expression of his appreciation of the patriotism with which on that occasion, you placed your services at the disposal of the Government, and at an inclement season of the year cheerfully undertook a long and fatiguing journey to Fort Garry to aid, by your presence and influence, in the repression of the unlooked-for disturbance which had unhappily broken out in the North-west.
> In selecting you for the delicate and important mission thus confided to you, His Excellency was influenced by the conviction that your thorough knowledge of the people, and the high estimation in which you were held by all classes there, eminently qualified you to act with effect in disabusing the minds of the misguided people of the settlement of the erroneous opinions they had been led to form of the feelings and intentions of the Government of the Dominion in reference to their country.
> Subsequent events have, in His Excellency's opinion, fully justified the wisdom of his selection of a commissioner. For if the serious dangers which then threatened the settlement were happily averted, and law and order peacefully re-established at Fort Garry, His Excellency feels that the result was in no small degree due to the ability, discretion and firmness with which you executed your commission, and to the judicious use of the influence which your character and standing enabled you to exercise over all classes of the community at Red River.
> I have the honour to be,
> Your obedient servant,
> JOSEPH HOWE,
> Secretary of State for the provinces.

Mr. MULOCK. What was the date of that letter ?

Sir DONALD SMITH. It is dated the 22nd February, 1872. So that there was plenty of time to reflect.

Mr. MULOCK. And to forget.

Sir DONALD SMITH. I mentioned this to show that the Government accepted what had been done by myself and the promises made by me as being in the right direction, and within the scope of my instructions. I am sorry that I have some difficulty in speaking at this moment, being far from well, but I shall endeavour, during the few minutes I occupy, to make myself clear. The answer to that request in the bill of rights for a grant of a specific amount for schools and roads was given by me in these words :

> In respect to this article, it may be better that I should not speak——

That is with regard to the schools.

> —as to any particular sum ; but I feel quite certain that an amount even exceeding that mentioned, will be appropriated for the purposes referred to. I can give an assurance that this will be done.

Well, I have just said that the Roman Catholics had their own schools, and that the Protestants had their schools, and each body had a grant from the Government of the country at that time. If the convention did not enter minutely and particularly into the description of the separate schools, it was because they thought it all together unnecessary. Any contention about separate schools was never dreamt of by them. As was said by the hon. Minister of Finance in his able address, in the course of this debate, they were a simple-minded people. To show that they really were so and that they went very much on good faith, I may mention how properties were conveyed from one to another. There were no long or written contracts. All that was necessary was that the parties interested should go to the officer of the Hudson Bay Company, who kept the land register, and mention verbally to him that it was desired to make over such and such property to a particular person. That showed, I think, that they were simple-minded, and that they had an idea, a belief, that when word was pledged, it was as good as all the deeds that could be written. So it was with regard to the promises that were made to them at that time. They knew that they had their schools, and they believed that the promises made would be well and faithfully kept, and they did not deem it necessary to have anything of a more binding character with regard to them.

After giving the answers and promises for the Dominion Government with regard to the bill of rights, the commissioner, that is myself addressing the convention, said :

> Having gone through the articles, may I now be permitted to say a few words ? Two hours is but a short time to consider a document which has occupied the time of this convention for a fortnight. Your list is not only long but it contains many things of great importance. In coming here first I had no idea of it, nor had the Canadian Government. However, I am authorized by them, as commissioner, to do what, in my judgment, might appear best in the state of public affairs here. It was thought at the same time that there might be some points raised that I really could not deal with personally with any satisfaction to the people of the country. This being the case I have now, on the part of the Dominion Government, and as authorized by them, to invite a delegation of the residents of Red River to meet and confer with them at Ottawa, a delegation of two or more residents of Red River, as they may think best, the delegation to confer with the Government and legislature and explain the wants and wishes of the Red River people, as well as to discuss and arrange for the representation of the country in Parliament. I felt that this being the case, it was less necessary for me to deal very particularly with these matters. On the part of the Government I am authorized to offer a very cordial reception to the delegates who may be sent from this country to Canada.

Which was received with hearty applause.

> I myself feel very confident that the result will be such as will be entirely satisfactory to the people of the North-west. It is, I know, the desire of the Canadian Government that it should be so.

And to show the spirit in which these remarks were received by the assembly, I will read what Mr. Riel himself said :

> Since we have been met, this may be said, in a certain measure, to be the first work we have accomplished. And it would be too bad to leave it to stand alone, when so much ought really to follow from it. I did not wish to interrupt Mr. Smith, but there was plenty of room for discussing what he had been saying. There is a great deal to be done yet, and I hope the convention will not tire until everything has been done which ought to be done. I cannot but look on the commissioners with great respect, especially on Mr. Smith, who came pretty near to our desires, and has invited a delegation to go to Canada, with the assurance that they would be cordially received, and that they could make a final arrangement when they went there. A great part of our own work, let me again remind you, has to be performed and that is, the establishment of order, peace and security in the country.

I may add, Mr. Speaker, that the invitation to send delegates to Ottawa was accepted, and three gentlemen, Judge Black, Rev. Mr. Ritchot and Mr. Alfred H. Scott were appointed as such.

Now, while very little, indeed, was said here about schools, the people unquestionably had them in their minds, and thought they would enjoy the privilege of having their schools, as before. This is apparent, I think, from what took place in the legislature of Manitoba in 1871, when the school law was passed. It may not be known to a great many of the members here, that many of those who composed the legislature of Manitoba at that time, were members of this very convention, and in deciding that there should be separate schools, they were looking to what had passed in this convention, with it fresh in their minds. Therefore, I certainly think that the people of Red River, then the majority, now the minority, are entitled to all the privileges that are given to the majority at the present day. I think that in one way or another we should insist that they shall have full justice, and that whether in the form of separate schools, or in some other way, still, that substantial justice shall be done, and that faith shall be kept with those people. As

I have said, there were only about 11,000 people there at that time, and many of us at the present day have very little notion of the then circumstances of the country. There was a very great danger at that time—unquestionably it was so—there was an imminent danger of the country being absorbed in the United States. That fact was brought to my recollection, although I had not forgotten it, by a gentleman of high position in Minnesota, whom I met the other day as I passed through that country, who stated that they were ready to place a very large sum of money at the disposal of Mr. Riel and his friends, upwards of half a million dollars, with the view of having the country annexed to the United States. We should also remember that at that time there was much ill-feeling and much bitterness between England and the United States, that without railways, with a trackless wilderness, and some 500 miles to traverse, it was impossible, in less a time than ten months, to send a single soldier to that country, with all the power of Great Britain and Canada; that while the insurrection commenced in October, and Fort Garry was taken possession of in November, it was not until the latter part of August following that it was possible for Field Marshal Wolseley, then Colonel Wolseley, to bring his forces up to Red River. These facts show the great difficulty in which Canada was at that time, and England as well, and should be another inducement for us to do justice to the minority in Manitoba. There was, then, a promise made, made, it is true, to a few thousands of people who have been spoken of here as poor half-breeds, but who, on the whole, I can assure you, were very intelligent men.

Mr. MARTIN. I understood the hon. gentleman to read the bill of rights, and the different articles of the bill of rights, and an account of the convention generally, from some newspaper published at that time. Will the hon. gentleman kindly mention the name of the paper and the date.

Sir DONALD SMITH. The paper is the "New Nation." I have the whole file of the paper, and I brought a portion of it here. The account of the convention began in the issue of February 18th, 1870, and concluded in the issue of February 25th.

Mr. MARTIN. Then I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the account given in the "New Nation" is an account of what really occurred, and sets out the bill of rights, and that the hon. gentleman knows it to be very accurate?

Sir DONALD SMITH. Yes, I believe it to be substantially accurate. The reporter was one of the ablest stenographers of the day. Mr. Caldwell, a man very well known also in Ontario, and a most reliable man. Mr. Speaker, without further dwelling upon the events of that period, in which it was my privilege to have taken a somewhat leading part, I may, without egotism, I hope, be permitted to say that nothing in the course of a long and somewhat busy life, has afforded me greater satisfaction than the reflection that I have rendered some substantial service to the State in bringing about the peaceful union of Rupert's Land with Canada, and so aided in consolidating in our Dominion the various provinces of Great Britain on this continent.

I do not wish to weary the House, but I think I should go on now, again being somewhat personal, and state the circumstances of my second visit to the Red River on a matter of importance apart from my ordinary business, when in February last—and it may be thought to have been presumptuous on my part—I went to Red River with the view of seeing Mr. Greenway and his colleagues. This visit has been discussed a good deal on one side and the other, but I wish to say very distinctly that I did not go at the instance of the Government. It is true that I had the privilege of communicating with His Excellency the Governor General, not so much as Her Majesty's representative here, but as one who, as we all know, has taken a very warm and deep interest in everything that is for the benefit of Canada. Having incidentally had an opportunity of speaking of this very important matter of the Manitoba school question. His Excellency was good enough to express to me his very great desire that it should be satisfactorily settled in one way or the other so as to be agreeable not only to the people of that province, but also to the people of the Dominion as a whole, desiring it should be disposed of outside altogether of party politics, for we know that the Governor General never allows himself to become a partisan, and that he is here as the representative of Her Majesty, to look equally at all sides, and to discriminate against none. I certainly had the privilege of communicating with the Governor General. I myself was greatly impressed with the view that were it possible to dispose of this matter outside of Parliament, it would be for the general good; and I consequently determined to go to Manitoba with the view of seeing Mr. Greenway and some of his colleagues, and of endeavouring to ascertain if there could not be found a satisfactory way out of the difficulty. I may mention that had it not been for the fact that, owing to serious illness, I was unable to leave my house for three or four months, I certainly would have visited Manitoba some time before; but it is never too late to attempt to do what ought to be done, and I must say I was met by Mr. Greenway and his colleagues in a manner that led me to believe they had an honest desire to do what was right in the matter. Of course I am not here to give any particular conversation that passed between us, but it is only justice to those gentlemen to say that they to me appeared to be most anxious to have the matter settled so as to do substantial justice to the minority as well as to the majority. I was permitted to confidentially represent this to the Government here, and I hope, indeed feel very sure that it is their most earnest desire to exhaust all means within their power to have justice done in the way in which I believe it can best be done, and that is through the local government. True, it is within the power of this Parliament to pass a Remedial Bill, and if there is no other way of attaining the end which we are all of opinion ought to be accomplished, that of having equal justice done to the majorty and to the minority, if after every means of obtaining that from what I may be permitted to call the legitimate source, is exhausted, and it is found impossible to get justice for the minority, then I consider that the responsibility rests with this Parliament and that this Parliament ought to apply a remedy. I trust, and I have every confidence, hon. gentlemen opposite will all feel that it is their duty as well as the duty of those on this side of the House to assist in every possible way to bring about a settlement. I cannot see myself that there is any necessity for a commission to inquire into well known facts and circumstances, but I do trust and desire that there may be, at any rate, a personal coming together of the two Governments, that there shall be a conference. I am afraid, while I am sure many efforts in the right direction have been made by the Ministry to effect what they believe would be a satisfactory solution of this matter, they have not personally come together in such a way as to be able to exchange each other's views, wishes and ideas, and so have an opportunity of deciding in that way what can best be done under the circumstances. I will say to the leader of the Opposition—I am sorry he is not in his place at this time, and I regret very much the cause, that he is unwell—I must say to the leader of the Opposition, and I would say to every hon. gentleman on both sides of this House, that I trust they will join heartily and cordially together, and that each will, if possible, endeavour to outdo the other in his desire and in his determination to do justice to all classes in Manitoba, and to do it in the best way. I trust, Sir, that this question shall be taken out altogether from the arena of party politics. I trust, that we all shall look only to the best interests of the country, in the matter. With the assistance of the hon. gentlemen in opposition, I am sure that it could be done in this way, and I think they will agree with the members on this side of the House, that if in the end it is found that justice—a proper measure of justice—cannot be obtained from the province of Manitoba, it will then be the right and ought to be the duty of this House to intervene.

I heard a much-respected prelate of the Episcopal Church, one of the highest authorities in that church, say, that, while his own people were, perhaps, in favour of separate schools, still, he did not desire to see these schools administered by a dual government, and he would desire and wish, above all things, that such arrangements were made, that the schools of the Catholics and of the Protestants should be under the jurisdiction of the local government. Mr. Speaker, I fear, that I have enlarged very much on this subject that I have taken up too much of the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No ; go on.

Sir DONALD SMITH. If I have done so, it is solely from my earnest wish and solicitude, that there shall be no religious feuds in this country, that neighbours shall be neighbours indeed, and that they shall feel, that they will do to others as they desire should be done to themselves. That is the Golden Rule.

It has been said here, that some gentlemen, in the votes they are to cast, may be influenced by certain improper considerations. I believe, however, that that language was withdrawn. I do not for a moment suppose, that the gentleman who spoke to that effect, had reference to myself, personally. But I have seen in some newspapers which have been put into my hands, the insinuation that, if I did go to Manitoba, ostensibly for the purpose of aiding in settling this vexed question, that it was no philanthropic idea I had in my head, but that it was for the advantage of a certain corporation with which I happen to be connected, namely, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It was said, that there was a question coming up of a demand on the Government, a request to the Government, or the instigation, or the hope, that a very large sum of money would be got by that railway company from the Government, in exchange for a certain portion of their land. I believe it is said, that the sum was twenty or twenty-four millions. It really does not matter for a few millions nowadays. A few millions, a dozen millions, more or less, does not matter, I suppose, and so it was said, that the Canadian Pacific Railway had approached the Government with a view of selling to them their lands. I will say, and I say it without hesitation, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not approached and have no thought of approaching the Government with any idea of selling any of their land, and it is a rumour entirely without foundation in truth.

Once more, Mr. Speaker and hon. gentlemen, I would express the earnest hope that this school question may be settled, and settled to the satisfaction, not only of this House, but of the whole country. I should like, Sir, to see this Remedial Bill pass to its second reading by acclamation. But I do not look upon it. Mr. Speaker, I do not look upon it, that by voting for the second reading of this Bill, gentlemen are necessarily committed to vote for the third reading of the Bill. If there should be a conference in the meantime—and I trust that there may be a conference—I am so hopeful of the result of that conference, that I do trust that there will be no Remedial Bill required from this House.

Mr. MULOCK. Why proceed at all, if you are satisfied that there can be a settlement ?

Sir DONALD SMITH. I think myself, at any rate, having gone so far, it is well that the principle of the Bill shall be affirmed : and it will be for us to determine, upon further consideration afterwards, the subsequent steps to be taken, as circumstances may require. Mr. Speaker, I have to apologize for having detained the House so long, and for having spoken so imperfectly as I have done.

Mr. METCALFE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the time of the House at any great length with a discussion upon this most important question, which is now, not only agitating this Parliament, but all portions of the Dominion. I, Sir, have always had the opinion, since the first passage of the iniquitous Manitoba Act of 1890 by the Greenway government, that it would have finally to be settled in this Parliament. Now, Sir, when we find any great wrong perpetrated on a community, whether it is on a minority or on a majority, there must be some arch-conspirator at work with regard to that wrong. Sir, if we put the microscopic test of common sense to this matter, and look around and try to find the gentleman who perpetrated this wrong upon the minority of Manitoba, it is my humble opinion—and I have no ill-feeling against that gentleman—it is my humble opinion, that the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is the big toad in the puddle with regard to it. Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, one ounce of fact is worth a thousand pounds of declarations and declamations on behalf of those gentlemen who have brought this turmoil upon this Dominion. Look at how we have been agitated and annoyed, and how the members of this House and their families have been annoyed in so many ways about this matter. When an evil is perpetrated upon a community, the ramifications of the trouble are so great and so strong, that we cannot tell whether it will even end now, I believe it will end in the satisfaction of seeing the gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and his friends in Manitoba coming into the political soup. Mr. Speaker, we find that the representative of Winnipeg made all the trouble and racket he could up there, and then got elected to come down here. How is he acting since elected ? He is not filled with the mighty love that the great Teacher of Christian doctrine on this earth was possessed of. He does not possess that radiant smile that would captivate a little child on the street, just as the great Teacher would captivate it. He has not in his nature that overmastering power of love and affection which wins the heart of a man, such as characterized men like Sir John Thompson or Sir John Macdonald. He was not sent down here on account of his mighty intellect, for no phrenological professor, from O. S. Fowler down to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin)—who is quite a phrenologist—could in him find any traces of it. In fact, if you look over that cranium of the individual who represents Winnipeg in this House, you can not see that great benevolence sticking out of his forehead which characterizes a man who possesses that beautiful characteristic of heavenly development. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want for a moment to draw the attention of this House and the country to the first cause of all this trouble. That is what you want to get at—the first cause. There is a first cause for anything. There is a first cause for the sun rising in the morning. There is a first cause for this Parliament sitting here. There is a first cause for this trouble that is upon this Parliament ; and I claim that beyond any other individual, the hon. gentleman who represents Winnipeg is the man who has the greatest sin to answer for, in connection with this trouble. I say it boldly, and I think the history of Manitoba and the history of Canada will bear me out in the assertion I make. When he comes down here, how is he received ? Do his Reform friends run away from him, saying, "You have made quite a record for us, you are getting us into trouble ?" No ; but they think this thing is going to get the Conservative Government into trouble ; so they take him into their bosoms and fold their arms around him, and say, "Oh, you are a second Sir Oliver Mowat." I said on the floor of the Ontario legislature that if a man wishes to become eminently great or truly pious, he must be willing to remain ignorant of many things that would hurt him politically. The hon. gentleman who has come out of Torres Vedras, and who leads the Opposition in this House, did not look upon him as a dangerous character. He looked upon him as one who had brought the Conservative party into trouble and disrepute in the province of Manitoba. And what did we find when he came here ? He was introduced to this House by the leader of the Opposition. If the hon. gentleman could have looked into the future with a prophetic eye, he would have been sick that day, and would have permitted some of his followers to perform that duty which he was so delighted to perform at the time. Now, Sir, bring this question down to first principles, and what do you find ? You find that this Government are called upon to do justice to a minority. Are they doing it because it is a pleasure for them to do it ? They are doing it, not because it is a pleasure to them, but because it is just and right, and because it is the duty of a Government to protect the smallest portion of the community in any part of the Dominion. Why, Mr. Speaker, away back in the 17th century, when an obscure individual was persecuted and wronged, the Habeas Corpus Act, which we now prize as a charter second of England's liberties, was originated ; and I say it without any malice in my heart, that the member for Winnipeg has brought more trouble upon his Reform friends in the House and in the country than any other representative man I know of in this Dominion. Now, we may look at the gossamer thread of transcendent legal lore as spun by the hon. member for Albert. We may then hop across the House and get the legal lore of the sage from Bothwell. Then may skip back again to the other side of the House and get the wisdom of the hon. member for Centre Toronto with his mighty intellect. And then we may come to that gentleman from Grey who can talk more in five minutes than any other man in Canada. I mean the gentleman who, when he gets talking, can talk at a rapider gait than any horse ever trotted or ran in Canada or in the United States. Take all of them, either on this side or on that, and where do you find one good solid argument why the minority should not get their rights restored ? I was glad to hear the leader of this House say that he thanked God that he was not a lawyer ; and I thank God that I am not a lawyer, if I have to come down to all the little subterfuges and narrow, small ways——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. METCALFE. I am not making any personal references to gentlemen who have spoken : I am only speaking about their utterances. As I have said, one ounce of fact is worth a ton of declamation. The leader of the Opposition has been in 199 spots in and out of Torres Vedras since this thing happened ; he has been at one spot in Spain at one time, and at another spot at another time ; and where is he going to land ? He is going to land where the member for Winnipeg and all men like him will land—in the political soup, Mr. Speaker. Now, if the member for Winnipeg and all the men who were with him were actuated by the great principles of Christian charity—that is, love—they would act differently. That is what you gentlemen, many of you, have not got. You want more love in this country. You want more love taught in the schools. You want more love in Parliament. What is the cause of all the racket in Parliament and out of it ? Want of love. What brought this iniquitous law in Manitoba into force ? Want of love. A while ago I read a short poem written by a little girl only twelve years old down in Hampden, Massachusetts, which is worth more, for its broad spirit of humanity, than anything that has been said in this House during the present debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Give it to us.

Mr. METCALFE. I will. It is on " Faith, Hope and Love," and this is it :

Faith, Hope, and Love ; these three :
  But the greatest of these is love ;
For Faith and Hope will pass away
  When we reach the land above.

When time becomes eternity ;
  For Faith we'll have no need ;
What now we see by Faith alone ;
  We then shall see indeed.

When Hope becomes reality,
  Then Hope will fade away ;
But Love's an attribute divine ;
  And Love must always stay.

God has no need of Faith and Hope,
  But even God must Love,
For life is Love and Heaven is Love ;
  And Love is God above.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you may get up fine sentences ; the Minister of Justice may prepare a learned speech ; the mosaic of the Minister of Finance may be delivered here in the finest eloquence, made up either at the moment or by the oil of the midnight lamp, and given in the best architectural style, but without love they are worthless. Now, Mr. Speaker, study history, and go right back to Adam. Let us get to first principles, Mr. Speaker. Why was Adam put out of the garden of Eden ? If he had loved the woman right and she had loved him right, you would have had a better country than you have, and the race would have been so perfected in human form that you would not be able to find anywhere a man in the shape of the representative for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). It was the obliteration of love from the human heart, when they were turned out of the garden of Eden, that has been lowering the human race. Sometimes human beings will breed on and you will get good ones from a noble heredity, but they do not have that true development. They are like the queen bees in a hive. Now, love is what is wanting. You want to change and bring in love. I believe that the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Sir Donald Smith) has lots of love in his heart. He went up to Winnipeg out of pure kindness of heart. He went up out of love, to kill the venom that was bred by the Greenway government, and fostered by his Attorney General, to enable him to hide a railway transaction in which he was implicated. We find that the great men of this world have had large love. Why was Sir John Macdonald greater than other men ? They will tell you : Oh, he was a trickster, look out for old John A., he will fool you. But he was greater than other men because he had more love. And to illustrate to you more forcibly that doctrine, I have a selection here which I hope will impress this House with the truth of it. I want this House to hear it, and this country to read it. Now, you must pay attention, or you will lose some of these valuable sentiments. It is this, Mr. Speaker :

> To be a king in the most absolute sense, was to be a ruler over the heart ; to be a ruler over the heart, it was first necessary that the sovereign should be a subject. He who would win the love of others, must first be dominated by the love of others ; captivity must precede captivation. Inspired by this deep principle of morality, the Master conceived the grand design of establishing a kingdom that could never be moved—a kingdom, not based upon the physical power which was perishable, nor even on the intellectual Platonic power, which could only exist through the ignorance of the many, but on a power whose foundation was the noblest element of humanity itself—the capacity for love. He proposed to conquer the heart of the world, and to conquer it by the exhibition of his own heart. The founders of previous kingdoms had sought to rule by placing in the foreground the display of their personal superiority ; the founder of Christianity resolved to subjugate mankind by the sacrifice of himself. The kings of former times had fought their way to empire by shedding the blood of their enemies ; the aspirant to this new kingdom determined to secure dominion by shedding his own.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. METCALFE. I was about to remark before recess that the Catholic schools of Manitoba, prior to the Bill which took away the rights of the minority, were not inefficient schools as they are charged with having been. I have a report here from Mr. Young on these French schools. In 1892, Mr. Greenway appointed Mr. Young to make an inspection of the Catholic schools. His report is thought by Catholics to be very unfair to them, but, nevertheless, I shall read it, so that the House may see what is the worst that can be said by a gentleman appointed to find fault. Mr. Young's report says :

> I beg to submit the following report of the schools visited by me during the latter part of the year 1892 :
> " During the past three months I visited over fifty districts, the majority of these being in the French settlements along the Red, Assiniboine, Seine and Rat Rivers, and formerly under the jurisdiction of the Catholic section of the Board of Education.
> " The seating accommodation in many of the schools is insufficient ; a few are provided with patent desks, but the greater part still use the home-made desks and benches.
> " As a rule the blackboards used are much too small, and in many cases of poor quality. With only two or three exceptions, all the schools visited by me were well supplied with a sufficient number of good maps.
> " Five schools are claimed to be conducted according to the Public Schools Act of 1890, in regard to religious exercises. Of these three are in charge of teachers holding first-class certificates, one is in charge of a teacher having a second-class, and one in charge of a teacher having a third-class certificate ; of the total number of teachers seen by me, about fifty per cent hold first-class certificates, twenty per cent hold second-class, and ten per cent have third class certificates. About twenty per cent are teaching without certificates, these being young lady graduates of the various convents who have begun teaching since the closing of the St. Boniface Normal School.
> " Of the schools visited by me six were in charge of male teachers. The salaries paid are in all cases very low.
> " There is an average enrollment of over thirty pupils to each school, some of the larger schools having from 100 to 150 pupils.
> " With remarkably few exceptions, English is taught in all the schools. The parents and trustees recognize the desirability of having their children study English, consequently those teachers who have a sufficient knowledge of the English language to teach it successfully are in much greater demand and receive higher wages than those who understand the French language only. As a rule the scholars read and translate English in a very creditable manner.
> " In Ste. Anne's Convent, where, through the courtesy of the Rev. Father Giroux and the sisters in charge, I was given every opportunity to examine the school work, I found the higher classes remarkably well advanced in English, their pronunciation being exceptionally good.
> " In regard to French reading, there is room for considerable improvement in expression.
> " A good share of attention is given to arithmetic ; this subject, however, could be more successfully taught if the schools were provided with a more liberal supply of blackboards.
> " Very creditable work is done by many of the more advanced pupils in composition, written translations from French to English, letter writing, &c. As a rule the books used for this purpose are kept extremely neat, and reflect credit on both teachers and pupils.
> " In teaching geography good use is made of a liberal supply of maps with which the majority of the schools are supplied.
> " A noticeable feature of these schools is the very limited number of boys in the higher divisions."

An extract from Mr. Young's report for 1893 may be added, because of the complete answer it gives to Mr. Wade's " anti-British " statements :

> " In all districts visited by me, I found a strong desire on the part of all concerned to make the teaching of the English language a prominent feature of the schools. In one district this idea was carried so far that the teacher was forbidden to make any use of the French language. This I consider to be a mistake."

Mr. Young's reports commenced two years after the Catholic schools had been deprived of the government grant ; and they struggling with financial difficulties, and when it had become important to condemn the Catholic schools. How far does it justify the statement that education in these schools " was farcical to the last degree, a wretched travesty of what education ought to be, and a disgrace to the province of Manitoba." Let me compare the report just quoted with some extracts from reports of the schools for the year 1894—schools under the present system, schools in full enjoyment of public favour and support.

In Mr. McCallum's Report of the Eastern Inspectoral Division, I find the following :—

"The irregularity of attendance in the majority of schools is a deplorable fact."

"Of the one hundred and forty teachers of the division, nineteen held first-class certificates, seventy-five held second-class certificates, thirty-nine held third-class certificates, and seven held permits."

"Twenty-five teachers—about eighteen per cent of the total number—were without any previous experience, or professional training whatever."

"In advanced classes too little attention is given to the mechanics of reading, and indistinct articulation, and lack of clearness of enunciation are too common."

"Writing does not receive that faithful attention it demands, and results are almost uniformly poor."

"In the subject of geography teachers are handicapped by the lack of reference books."

"In music, notwithstanding that the subject has formed a part of the course of instruction at the provincial and local normal schools for the past two years, the teaching is somewhat spasmodic."

In Mr. S. E. Lang's Report of the North-west Inspectoral Division, there is the following :—

"It would perhaps be correct to say that about two-thirds of the teachers are doing work which may be described as fair. Of the remainder about one-half are doing very good work. while the others must be classed as unmistakably poor —very poor in some cases."

"The meagre results in arithmetic are probably due to a misapprehension of the nature of the science of number."

"It is not surprising to find the advanced work in arthmetic poorly done in many cases when it rests on a weak foundation of elementary training."

"In the subjects of history and geography the dependence of some teachers upon the text books is still painfully apparent."

"In this district there were but four teachers holding first-class certificates ; fifty-eight with second-class. and sixty-eight with third ; and eighteen without any certificates at all."

In Mr. Lang's report for 1893 is the following :—

"In nearly every school in this division a test was made to discover how many of the pupils above second standard could use correctly the following words :—'done, did ; seen, saw ; set, sit.' It was found that about ninety per cent of the pupils 'done' their exercises ; 'seen' the cows ; 'set' in their seats ; and were in the habit of 'laying' down.

In Mr. E. E. Best's report of the South Central Division, there is the following :—

"It is to be regretted that an unfavourable report is due on the state of school yards and school environments."

"The supply of apparatus for primary work is deficient, and reference books for advanced classes are not well supplied. The remedy in most cases lies in the hands of the teachers."

"The teachers in charge held all grades of certificates, and represented all stages of proficiency. from the very highest standard of moral and professional excellence. down to those who had neither training, experience nor aptitude."

"The reading done in the schools is largely unsatisfactory."

In Mr. A. S. Rose's report of the South-west Inspectoral Division, there is the following :—

"There is a most regrettable indifference on the part of trustees and ratepayers in the matter of caring for school property."

"Irregularity of attendance is a most discouraging feature in rural schools. Many children are actually growing up without receiving even the rudiments of a public school education. I visited one school in which there had not been a single pupil for six weeks. The teacher, who was in the habit of visiting the school each morning, was in receipt of a salary of $40 per month."

"I do most earnestly trust that the time has now fully come when the practice of allowing persons without professional training, and without experience, to engage in teaching, may with safety be discontinued. * * * In any case, it would be infinitely better that, in the event of a scarcity, the certificates of trained and experienced teachers should be extended, than that girls of sixteen and youths of eighteen, with neither training nor experience, and possessing only the scanty scholarship necessary to pass the third-class non-professional examination, should be turned loose upon the public to draw their salary, and to waste the 'precious morning hours' of the children who are so unfortunate as to be placed under their control. The cases are rare in which the closing of the school would not be preferable to the employment of such teachers."

We find that the last state of that arrangement regarding the schools was worse than the first. I may say, that I had the pleasure of visiting several of the schools prior to 1890, and I found those schools in many cases quite as good as the schools of Ontario. I visited one school, the Academy of the Immaculate Conception, in June, 1889. That was prior to the enactment of Greenway's law, when he took away the rights of the minority. The Academy of the Immaculate Conception was one of the best conducted I ever visited in my life. I examined a class in grammar, in parsing and in other branches of grammar, and found the scholars to be very well informed. I examined a class in arithmetic, and found children from eight to thirteen years of age quite as far advanced as I have seen them in Ontario, and I have visited the public schools in most of the large cities of that province. And will say this—that in the subject of geography, you would not find one school in a dozen in Ontario where the children were so well up. And, as to map-drawing, I asked for one of the maps drawn by one of the little girls. I have it here, Mr. Speaker, and you can look at it, and the members of this House can look at it. There is an object possessing these grumblers and growlers against the efficiency of the schools in Manitoba prior to 1890. I have already stated, that the school I have referred to was one of the best conducted schools I have ever visited. And, Mr. Speaker, I have had the pleasure of teaching a fairly good school in Ontario myself, and know something about it. I never was one of these high-flown teachers who could teach everything, from a spade to a steam-engine, but I turned out boys so that they became useful, when they went out into the world. Most of them were Conservative. I did not turn them loose upon the world to vote Grit, if I could help it, though I did not talk to them about politics in school. I represent the city that is called the Derry of Canada. That is where the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) went, when I told him to be as wise as a serpent and as harmless as a dove. You know how harmless or how wise he was. He did not learn the lesson I endeavoured to teach him. How many letters have I received to say: Metcalfe, don't you vote for that iniquitous Bill? I received one solitary letter. And was it written by a man digging in a ditch, or sawing wood, or working in a factory, or carrying on a store? No. The writer was a minister of the gospel. And what did he say? Did he give me any reasons for voting against the Bill? No; he simply said: Vote against the Bill. Stand to your guns. Well, I intend to stand to my guns. I answered him back in this way, saying: There is a golden rule enunciated by the great Teacher whom you represent, and if all the Scriptures, new and old, were lost, you would still have the essence, and pith, and kernel, of those gospels in these words: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them, for this is the law and the prophets." Now Mr. Speaker, this is brimful of love, too. But acting on the principles of kindness and good-nature, I will say this, that the Bill before the House is a good Bill. I think the Bill relieves an oppressed minority. I believe that every word uttered by the leader of this House, was uttered with a good, kind heart, with the intention of doing good. Mr. Speaker, our leader is a good teacher of political economy. He has been a useful man to this Dominion, both on this continent and in the motherland. He, Sir, was the right arm of the great chieftain, Sir John A. Macdonald, and as he lies in Cataraqui, beyond the city which I represent, his right arm is here to-day in the person of that right hon. gentleman. I have stood beside Sir John A. Macdonald when men reviled him in the most miserable epithets that could be hurled against any public man, and who are to-day stating that he was the greatest statesman Canada ever produced. And when the right hon. gentleman who leads the House to-day, shall have been taken away from things terrestrial to things celestial, these very gentlemen will say: Oh, he was a noble man, he was a lovely man. But what is the use of throwing a rope to a man when he is drowning, after he swims to a rock and clings to it himself? He don't ask anything from those gentlemen, he don't want anything from them. The more they belittle him, the more the people of Canada will think of him. It is the greatest encomium that can be passed on a public man in the Conservative party to be derided by these gentlemen. What have they done for Canada? Look at what the right hon. gentleman has done. When an hon. member told him that he should be at home in England, thrusting his arm down into the lungs of cattle, he quite well knew that he looked after all those things when he was there, and put them right, and is ready now to come here and put his knife into the liver of the Grit party. Sir, if I had no text, if I had nothing to talk about, I could talk about the leader of the Government in this House, and against those who deride him, and could make a speech that would keep you here until the cocks crow in the morning. Sir, I know my right hon. friend does not need my poor, weak support, but I can tell the House that if he needs my services in the coming election, I tender them to him to-night. They will hurl at me the charge that I am eating dirt. I do not have to eat dirt. I am going back to my constituency, and can appeal on this Bill to the broad and liberal-minded people, both Catholic and Protestant, in that city. I have been accused of being against Catholics in times past when I was supporting W. R. Meredith in the local house; but I went back to my constituency and appealed to the Roman Catholics on the ground of fair-play, against the influence of priests and bishop, and secured a large majority of the Catholic people of the city of Kingston. If I go back to the city again as a supporter of this Bill, I will come back here to support the hon. gentleman Sir Charles Tupper, when there will be a still smaller Opposition than there is to-day. This question has to be settled, and let us settle it right. You have got to go to first principles. There are some Protestant popes, and I speak this advisedly—Protestant popes—because there is more than the Pope of Rome, there are Protestant popes as well as Roman Catholic popes. Now, Mr. Speaker, Bishop Faber, a distinguished prelate, in speaking of doing right, said:

> Thrice blest is he to whom is given
> The instinct that can tell
> That God is on the field,
> When He is most invisible.
> Blest too is he who can discern
> Where real right doth lie:
> And dares to take the course
> That seems wrong to man's outward eye.
> For right is right since God is God,
> And right the day must win.
> To doubt would be disloyalty,
> To falter would be sin.

Mr. Speaker, I would call upon men on both sides of this House not to falter, not to be afraid, but to go on and vote for that which their hearts will tell them is right. Be led by no long ago, antiquated philosophers, who will put you on the wrong track, like the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), or like the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), or like other gentlemen who have been leading you through the intricate mazes of interminable logic which no ordinary man can understand. Mr. Speaker, this question has to be settled, and when it is settled, let us settle it right. I hope it will be settled right. As Ella Wheeler Wilcox said :

However the battle is ended,
Though proudly the victor comes
With fluttering flags and prancing nags
And echoing roll of drums,
Still truth proclaims this motto
In letters of living light—
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is the time for this House to settle it right.

Though the heel of the strong oppressor
May grind the weak in the dust
And the voices of fame with one acclaim
May call him great and just,
Let those who applaud take warning
And keep this motto in sight—
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Let those who have failed take courage,
Though the enemy seemed to have won,
Though his ranks are strong, if he be in the wrong,
The battle is not yet done,
For, sure as the morning follows
The darkest hour of the night,
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

O man bowed down with labour,
O woman young, yet old,
O heart oppressed in the toiler's breast
And crushed by the power of gold,
Keep on with your weary battle Against triumphant might,
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Sir, I cannot find any argument, I have not heard any argument, that has been adduced by any member in this House, in any speech that has been made, or in any paper I have read—and I have read both for and against this Bill—which strikes me forcibly enough to make me vote against this Bill. I believe this Bill is a righteous measure, a measure calculated to promote the peace and prosperity of this Dominion ; and I hope that when the cloud of prejudice and bigotry shall have rolled away, when the vote that will be taken to-night shall make this matter as nearly law as the second reading can make it, it will have the effect of producing peace and harmony in this Dominion, and settle this vexed question.

Mr. McNEILL. I ought really to apologize to this House for proposing to take up any more of its time, or proposing to say one word more in reference to a subject which has been discussed at such great length. But one or two statements have been made in respect to this matter in the course of this discussion which I do not feel at liberty to allow to pass unchallenged, and, therefore, while I would pay all respect to the wishes of an hon. gentleman who suggests that I should sit down because he has been out of bed so long, as we all have been, and although I shall endeavour to be as brief in my observations as possible, yet I venture to ask hon. gentlemen for their attention for a few moments. I entirely agree with what has last fallen from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Metcalfe), who has just addressed the House, and I give him the fullest credit for the most firm and absolute belief that the course he is about to adopt is right. I believe that as he says nothing can be settled unless it is settled right, and it is just because I believe nothing can be truly settled unless it is settled right, that I for my part, feel it to be my duty to raise my voice in humble protest against the course which is being pursued by the Government in respect to this matter. I do not think it right for this Parliament, which is a dying Parliament, which has no mandate from the people to deal with this question, to take advantage of the accidental circumstance that we are holding a sixth session of this Parliament to force a Bill through this House and thereby to deprive the people of this country of the constitutional right they have to be consulted with respect to this question, to force through this House a measure such as this, a measure fraught with such peril to this great Dominion, which we all love so much. It is because I do not think it right that I raise my voice and protest against this course, and I hope hon. gentlemen who sit around me, hon. gentlemen who have acted with me in this House, some of them for fourteen years past, will give me credit at least for the same degree of honesty in the course I take as they would wish to have accorded to themselves. I must say, Mr. Speaker, as I have been drawn aside to make that remark, that I regret some observations which have fallen from hon. members of this House, who, from the position they occupy, would be expected and ought to set a different example in that regard.

Mr. TISDALE. No reflections.

Mr. McNEILL. I say when an hon. gentleman interrupts me by calling out " no reflections," that is just the very matter I am referring to, and I am saying that there should be no reflections on the motives of supporters of the Government in this House, who happen to differ from them, honestly and conscientiously, in the course they have taken, and who regretfully pursue a different course

Mr. TISDALE. I rise to a point of order. I have not heard any reflection cast on any hon. gentleman in this House, either the hon. gentleman or any one else. If the hon. gentleman refers to matters outside the House, they are not pertinent. I object to the statement that reflections have been made on hon. members.

Mr. CHARLTON. Reflections have been made.

Mr. McNEILL. I am somewhat surprised at the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me. If he did not hear the remarks made——

Mr. TISDALE. Reflections, I said.

Mr. McNEILL. Are not reflections remarks ? If he did not hear the remarks made, I am surprised, and certainly if he had read his "Hansard" he would have found them there. If he will read the report of the speech delivered by the Minister of Railways and Canals he will see if there are any reflections, when that hon. gentleman suggested that members of this party who differ from the Government in regard to the course they have pursued were actuated by motives of this kind, that they thought they had not attained that position in the ranks of the party to which their abilities entitled them, that they had not received that consideration at the hands of the party to which their abilities entitled them, and that that was the reason why they had pursued the course which they felt it to be their duty to pursue. If the hon. gentleman does not think that is an improper reflection, then I can only say I am sorry for the hon. gentleman. I consider it an improper reflection, and I am in the judgment of hon. members on both sides of the House as to whether it be an improper reflection or not. I hope when the hon. gentleman interrupts me in the course of my remarks he will, in future, do so with an interruption a little more relevant.

I was about to say when I was interrupted that we who oppose the Government of the party of which we are members, do so with the most extreme regret. It must always be a matter of extreme regret to any member of a great party, who believes in the principles of that party, who believes that the success of that party is of the utmost importance so far as the well-being and prosperity of the country is concerned, when he feels himself obliged to oppose the leaders of the party on their policy respecting some matter of considerable moment. I wish to say for myself that I consider I am just as sound a Conservative as the hon. gentleman who interrupted me, and I think those hon. members who, like myself, regret to feel obliged to oppose the Government in regard to this matter are just as good Conservatives as the hon. gentleman, or any other hon. member in this House who holds the views he holds. I say, Mr. Speaker, if I have been drawn into making observations perhaps with a somewhat greater degree of heat than they ought to have been made,—because I remember very well the speech addressed to the House by the hon. member for Montreal West just before you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock,—I attribute it largely to the fact that we have been kept here without rest and without sleep in order to force this measure through the House, in my judgment, in a most improper manner.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. I think, at all events, I have a right to express my opinion without being interrupted. I say I attribute it largely to the fact that we have been kept in session here since three o'clock of yesterday, without intermission, and it is not unlikely under all the circumstances, that hon. members may not feel as well able to discuss a question of this kind with that degree of calmness they would be able to show under more favourable circumstances. I am regretfully obliged to oppose the Government on this question. I think their course has been, up to very recently, a most unfortunate course. It has been a course, as I have ventured to say in this House before, not such as we would expect to be adopted by men who were guided by British precedents, but it has been a course of force and coercion rather than a course of conciliation and compromise, and, for my part, I am delighted to learn that more reasonable counsels have prevailed, and that now there seems to be some hope of our succeeding in removing this most dangerous question from the arena of Dominion politics. I say, Sir, that no one who listened to the speech that we heard before Six o'clock, no one who heard the broad-minded, statesmanlike utterances of the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith), could fail to have been struck with this fact, that, had such a policy as the policy which is now being adopted, been adopted in regard to this matter at an earlier day, the probability is, that all this trouble, that all this difficulty, and all this danger to the Dominion would have been avoided. And, Sir, I wish to say, further, in regard to that hon. gentleman, and I think I will receive the support and the sympathy of every hon. member in this House, and of the people of this country outside of this House, when I say, that the thanks of this Dominion are due to that hon. gentleman (Sir Donald A. Smith) for the course that he has pursued in regard to this matter, and for the energy that he has displayed. And I will go further, and I will say, that, taking into consideration the condition of the hon. gentleman's health, at the time when he undertook his journey to Manitoba, the thanks of the country are due that hon. gentleman for the heroism he has displayed in endeavouring to bring about such a settlement of this question as would redound to the best interests of this Dominion.

Now Sir, for my part, I will say this : that I have never said—and I do not wish to be misunderstood—I have never said, that such a condition of things might not arise as would justify the interference of this Parliament in matters relating to provincial educational legislation. I have never said so, because I do not think so. I think circumstances might arise which would justify the interference of this Parliament in that regard. But I say, that, as a rule, the wise course to pursue is, not to exercise the powers vested in this Parliament by the constitution ; but on the contrary, to leave the matter to the broad-minded liberality which lies at the hearts and is to be found in the sober second thought of the people of Canada, as has been proven in regard to the province of New Brunswick, in regard to the province of Nova Scotia, and in regard to the province of Prince Edward Island. I say, Sir, that only circumstances of an extreme nature would justify us, would justify this Parliament in putting its hands upon any province in this Dominion, and endeavouring to coerce that province and the legislature of that province in the manner proposed by this Act. I say, further, that, so far as this particular matter is concerned, I have the fullest faith and the fullest belief, that, if the Government of this country had dealt with the province of Manitoba in a different manner, if this matter had been left to the good feeling of the people of Manitoba, there would be no need whatever for the interference of this Parliament in connection with the demands of the minority of the province of Manitoba. I believe they would receive the same justice, the same fair-play, the same broad-minded toleration as the Catholics in other parts of this Dominion have received. I think, Sir, it is something more than unfair to the province of Manitoba to assume, gratuitously, that that province would not be willing to deal as fairly with the minority there as any other province of the Dominion would be.

Now, Sir, I wish to call attention to the main argument, and the only argument, really, on which the Government founded their excuse for the course they have pursued. The only argument upon which they base an excuse for their conduct is the argument, that they are compelled by the constitution to do what they have done. And, if this House will excuse me for a moment—weary as it must be in regard to this matter—if the House will have patience with me for a moment, I desire to endeavour to make plain to hon. members present, at least, the reasons which led me to believe, and led me to the firm conclusion, that there is no excuse of that kind which can be fairly urged for the course of the Government.

Now, the only matter which we have to consider, in regard to this alleged compulsion by the constitution, is the construction of one section of the Manitoba Act. That section is divided into two parts, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have told us, that it is only the second of those sections that we have got to consider. Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, for one moment, just to call the attention of the House to that subsection, and, in order to consider this subsection, I will have to call attention to the first subsection. The first subsection of this clause says that :

> Nothing shall prejudicially affect certain rights.

Now, what are these rights ? Are they all rights that the minority have as to education ? No. If they were all rights, then, it would be fair to say, that these rights, which were granted after the union, were protected and preserved by this constitution, so that the Government of this country would be obliged to preserve them. But that clause does not say, "all the rights." That clause is specially limited. Why was it limited ? Why were the limiting words introduced ? Why is the clause specially limited to "rights which belong to any class of persons at the union ?" If it was intended that these schools which were granted after the union, were to be protected in the way in which it is suggested, and that we were bound to restore them, why were these words "at the union" introduced, guarding the rights which were in existence at the union ?

> Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have, by law or practice, in the province at the union.

Why were those words "at the union" put in ? Why did it not read "nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice" ?

Mr. GILLIES. Why were the words "by practice" inserted ?

Mr. McNEILL. The words "by practice" were put in to secure those rights which by practice they had at the union. But the words "at the union" were put in simply because the framers of the constitution, when they framed that clause, had deliberately made up their minds that it should not apply to rights and privileges that came into existence after the union. What other interpretation can be given to them ? Now, if those separate schools which were granted after the union could be shown to be protected by that clause, it would be perfectly right and fair to say that we would be obliged to put them back again, or rather that they could not have been taken away. But the framers of the constitution deliberately refused to say that; and what did they do? They drew another clause, and they divided the rights which were in existence at the union from the rights that came into existence after the union. With regard to the latter, they provided a perfectly different kind of protection, and why? Because they knew nothing as to what those rights would be. How could they possibly say that rights that were unborn rights, as to the nature of which they could know nothing, rights which might be obtained by a mere snap vote of the legislature, were to be hung about the neck of the province for all time? They did not so stultify themselves. On the contrary, they provided a perfectly different kind of remedy in case of interference for those rights; and what was that remedy? It was this, with regard to those rights: "An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education." In place of saying, as they had said with regard to the first class of rights, that those rights which come into existence after the union cannot be affected, they contemplate their being affected; and they say, If they are affected, we will provide a tribunal specially to deal with them. And what was that tribunal? That tribunal was composed of the successors of those who framed the constitution—in other words, the Parliament of Canada. This Parliament of Canada was the tribunal which was to deal with those rights—to deal with them as a Parliament—not upon technical considerations of law, but as a Parliament, upon the broadest principles of public polity. Now, Sir, it is endeavoured to be argued that under this section this Parliament is obliged to give these rights back again. It is endeavoured to be shown that the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared that we were obliged to give them back again. What do the judges say in regard to that? Lord Watson says, in as many words, that the Parliament of Canada is certainly under no legal compulsion to act—that they can either act or not as they please. And when it is said that the judges have decided that this Parliament is obliged to act with regard to this matter—when it is said that they have given an opinon as to what we should do in regard to this matter—I wish to call your attention to what the judges really did say in regard to it. The Lord Chancellor says, at page 62:

> There is a case for the jurisdiction of the Governor General, and that is all we have to decide.

At page 38, the Lord Chancellor says:

> All we have to see is what we think the jurisdiction of the Governor General is.
> Mr. Blake—The question whether upon the whole, acting in their political capacity, the Privy Council believes that they ought not to act, or to act in what we may consider a lame and half-hearted way, or to go the whole length of our demand, is no part of the question I have to submit to your lordships.

And again, at page 121, Lord Watson says:

> I am prepared to advise the Governor General, and decide on the meaning of this clause, but I am not prepared to relieve him of the duty of considering how far he ought to interfere.
> Mr. Haldane—That may be.
> Lord Watson—That would be trenching upon very dangerous ground.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after the judges of the highest tribunal in the Empire have in these explicit terms set bounds to their jurisdiction in regard to this case, after they have said in the most explicit terms, "We have a certain question to decide, and to go beyond that would be to trench on very dangerous grounds." I want to know how it can be said with any degree of fairness, and without a blush, that these judges of the highest tribunal in the Empire have deliberately overstepped the bounds which they themselves have laid down, and decided a matter which they themselves said it was not in their jurisdiction to decide.

We are told, that they have overstepped these bounds. We are told, that, in a sentence of their judgment, which, I say, is wrested from its natural meaning, they have told us what we ought to do in order to redress this grievance. And we are told—you have heard it said right and left by speaker after speaker on the Government side—that we are under compulsion, by reason of the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to redress this grievance. Is that so, or is it not? Has it not been stated, ad nauseum, during this debate? If the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, if judge after judge on that committee have themselves said, that that question was not before them at all, is it to be supposed, that they overstepped the bounds which they themselves say are their limit? In the judgment I find that their lordships declare, that they are not concerned with the policy of these Acts, nor with the reasons which led to their enactment. Now, just listen to this sentence:

> It may be that the population of the province became in proportion more largely Protestant, it was found difficult, especially in sparsely populated districts, to work the system inaugurated in 1871, even with the modifications introduced in later years.

It may be true, that it was found an increasing difficulty—and the difficulty might become an impossibility after a time—to work this system inaugurated in 1871, which was swept away, even with the modifications introduced in latter years. What did the Privy Council say with regard to that? They said: "But whether this be so or not, is immaterial." They were not to consider whether this was a wise, a politic act, a necessary act at all. As they say, in the next sentence :

> The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890.

They were simply considering the question, whether that right had been affected or not. If it had, then the Governor General had jurisdiction, and that was all. But they say : With the policy of the Manitoba government, whether those Acts were wise, or just, or necessary, they had nothing to do. It is entirely immaterial. Why ? Because they were simply a court of law, deciding a pure question of law, submitted to them, namely, have we a right to deal with this question at all ? That is what the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council amounts to, and that only.

That being the case, it is open to us to deal with this question in accordance with the decision of the Judicial Committee. How ? As a Parliament, on the broadest grounds of morality, on the broadest ground of public policy. On those grounds it will consider the interests of the minority in Manitoba, the interests of the majority in Manitoba, the interests of the province of Manitoba, and the interests of this whole Dominion. These are the grounds on which we have to consider this question. And, when you are told, that you are forced in any way whatever by the decision of the Privy Council to take one course or the other, you are simply being asked to believe, that the judges of the highest court of the Empire transcended the bounds which they themselves said were their limits, and proceeded to deal with a matter which was not before them at all, proceeded to interfere with the local politics of the Dominion, proceeded to interfere with our jurisdiction as a Parliament in reference to the local politics of the Dominion. Now, I think that any one who has at heart, as we all ought to have, the interests of this Dominion, and the interests of this Empire, ought to be very careful indeed how he throws a slur of that kind upon the judges of this august tribunal. And I, for my part, repudiate here, with all the strength at my command, the imputation which is cast upon the highest tribunal of the Empire by this statement. I say, that these judges were too wise, too able, too experienced, to do what it is alleged they have done. I say, that, for my part, if we had a great Imperial chamber at Westminster composed of representatives drawn from Canada the various parts of this great Empire, and dealing with Imperial affairs—and whether we shall or shall not have such a chamber some day, is something I should hesitate very much to pronounce upon, one way or the other—I say, if we had such an Imperial chamber, I should feel very much aggrieved if that chamber were to interfere with our local affairs in Canada, because the local affairs of the Dominion ought to be left to the Dominion, and no scheme of Imperial union has ever contemplated anything else, than that local parliaments should be supreme in local affairs. If I would resent the interference of the Imperial chamber in our local affairs, how much more would I and would the people of the country have the right to resent the interference of four judges in Westminster in our local affairs, and their adjudication and advice with regard to our local affairs, which were not before them at all ?

Therefore, I say, that we have to consider this question, not from the point of view in which it is placed before you by many of the speakers who have addressed this House on that subject, not from the point of view that the constitution compels you to do one thing or the other with regard to this. The only decision you have with regard to the constitution, is the decision the judges themselves said they were giving, namely, whether you have jurisdiction to deal with the matter at all ; and it is left to this Parliament to deal with it in the way it thinks best. And the question we have to decide is, whether it is best, in the interests of Manitoba, that separate schools should be established there. The proposal is to re-establish separate schools, and it is for this House to say whether it considers, in its wisdom, that it is good or ill to do so. I think, after the argument we heard here the other night, and with the experience we have to-day in reference to separate schools in this Dominion—our experience, that, when separate schools do not exist, there is peace, harmony, good feeling, and good fellowship, and, where they do exist, we have bitterness, and strife, and distrust—that experience alone ought to be sufficient to decide us as to what is the wisest course for us to pursue with reference to this matter. It is said that this is unjust to the minority, because there was an agreement that they should have separate schools. Now, I listened with the very greatest interest to the statement of my hon. friend from Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith). I was very much impressed by what he said. But there was nothing that I heard him say which would lead me to suppose that any arrangement was ever made with the minority in Manitoba to the effect that the kind of separate schools that they got after the union were to be preserved to them in perpetuity. On the contrary, as I have already pointed out, the very words of the constitution show that it was not the intention of the framers of the constitution to preserve such rights in perpetuity. For the constitution provides that appeals on violation of these post-union rights shall be referred to this Parliament, while the pre-union rights shall be preserved in perpetuity. Well, after the union an Act was passed establishing separate schools. For nineteen years that system of separate schools was tried and then it was found to be in the interests of the majority, in the interests of the minority, in the interests of the province, that these separate schools should be done away with and a system of national schools established. And we are asked here to-day, with a strong hand to destroy this system of national schools and to set up again this system of separate schools, which, after nineteen years of fair trial were found to be a failure. We are asked to do that, why ? I grant that an arrangement was made before the union with regard to a different kind of separate schools altogether which were in existence before the union, and which are safeguarded by the first clause under which the minority have the right to support their own separate schools, as they did before the union with whatever assistance they had before the union. When we are told that there was a bill of rights guaranteeing in perpetuity these separate schools which came into existence after the union, then, I say, that bill of rights is in direct conflict with the constitution. It could not have been the intention to preserve these separate schools that came into existence after the union, because the second clause distinctly provides a different mode of dealing with them than with the others, and the first clause distinctly precludes the idea that rights coming into existence after the union shall be preserved in perpetuity by limiting the rights to be preserved in perpetuity to those existing at the union. But it is said that the Barrett case, which is the case under which it was decided that only the rights existing at the union were to be preserved was badly decided. Well, now, it does seem to me curious argument in the mouths of gentlemen who are crying out the "constitution" to say : We are not going to be bound by the decision in Barrett's case, because we think that case was badly decided.

Mr. GILLIES. Who ever said that ?

Mr. McNEILL. I have heard it very often said ; I have heard it in this House. An attempt is made to create a certain sympathy in regard to this matter by saying that this was a hard decision, that it was scarcely broad enough.

Mr. GILLIES. It stands there and we are bound by it.

Mr. McNEILL. And, furthermore, I wish to point out that it was in reality a very broad decision. Attention has not been called to this matter as it ought to have been. This appeal in Barrett's case was a very clever and very subtle attempt to get rid of the provisions of the constitution. Now, the constitution, as we have seen, and as I am very glad the Finance Minister in his able speech himself declared, distinctly provides that questions relating to post-union rights shall be brought before Parliament and shall not go to a court of law. Therefore, all such questions are to be decided upon grounds of policy, upon grounds such as may be presented and considered by a legislative assembly. But in Barrett's case, the rights with regard to which appeal was made were not the rights which were sought to be established at all. The right which were sought to be established was the right to post-union separate schools. But, in place of bringing this appeal to this House, as required by the constitution, they got round the constitution by appealing with regard to a right as to which they had very little regard, namely, the right which they possessed to support these pre-union separate schools with their own money. By appealing under the first subsection, they took the case to the courts of law. What they wanted was to get their post-union separate schools re-established. In place of appealing about that which would have brought them to this House, they appealed with regard to the pre-union schools, as to which they cared very little, in order to take the matter to the courts of law, and in order thereby to strike down the legislation of the province 'en bloc.' If the case had been brought to this House, if there had been any provision in the statute which we considered unjust, we could have dealt with it, and we could have ordered the province to restore the right. But by taking it to the courts of law, they asked that the whole Act should be declared ultra vires, and that the whole Act should be struck down, with all it provisions, whether they were just or not. And why ? Because they did not wish to bring this case with regard to the interference of the rights of a province before this House ; they did not wish to bring an appeal to this House, for, on a former occasion, when the same thing had been done with reference to the New Brunswick schools, the House refused to interfere. Therefore, by this side wind—if I may so express it, without desiring to use an offensive term—it was endeavoured to get beyond the provision of the constitution, which declared that the case should come to this House, and to take it into the courts of law, and thus to strike down the legislation of the province altogether. The decision in the Barrett case said, in effect, that courts of law were not the proper tribunal in effect, the decision in the Barrett case said that that appeal was not well founded ; and therefore, broadly speaking, justice was done to the province of Manitoba, because it was thus enabled to have its legislation dealt with by this House in the manner provided by the constitution. Now, Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate, I do not feel inclined to weary the House with any lengthy remarks. I think I have talked on this matter of the constitution, probably, too much already. I wish to say, however, that when the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) appealed to the hon. members of this House to vote for the second reading of this Bill, appealed in those most eloquent words which he employed, and in that most patriotic spirit in which he addressed this House, I think he asked hon. members who are conscientiously opposed to separate schools, to do rather more than it is possible for them to do. I cannot vote for the second reading of this Bill, because, by dong so, I would accept the principle of the Bill, and the principle of this Bill is that this House shall coerce the province of Manitoba to the extent of forcing separate schools upon that province.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

Mr. McNEILL. If any hon. gentleman says no, I should be very glad to be enlightened by him. I know it is not easy to enlighten us—we poor irreconcilables. We were told the other day that it was very difficult indeed to enlighten us, or to give us any information that would be of any service to us. I will see if I can find the words, for I should be sorry, for my part, by any poor paraphrase of mine, to do an injustice to the elegance and the dignity of the diction. I do not wish to do that, and if I have done so, I apologize to this House. But I think I have the words here

> The irreconcilables in this House do not want any information, because if you were to pump information into them for a hundred years, they would still be opposed to separate schools, and would not want anything done.

Well, now, Mr. Speaker, the author of these words is the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. The expression, when I come to look at it, seems to be rather a remarkable one—"because if you were to pump information into them for a hundred years." Well, that is a curious expression, I think, a curious simile for the hon. gentleman to employ, likening his speaking to the action of a pump. It seems to me a curious simile. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Cockburn) suggests that it may have been a dry pump. Well, I do not know; it may have been a force pump. It may have been intended to force some of the recalcitrant irreconcilables back into line. Or it may have been an exhaust pump; that is a kind of implement with which we are not altogether unfamiliar in this House. Or, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it was the common ordinary pump that was referred to. I do not know whether it was or not. If it was, it is not the first occasion on which a great statesman has been compared to a pump, or rather a pump has been compared to a great statesman. In this case, the modesty of the statesman was such that he did not compare the pump to himself, but compared himself to the pump. But I recollect that on a former occasion a writer of some little note in the early part of this century, did compare a pump to a statesman. The comparison is brought back to my mind. Tom Moore asked: "Why is a pump like Viscount Castlereigh"? and he answered it in this way:

> Because it is a feeble thing of wood,
> That up and down its awkward arm doeth sway,
> And cooly spout, and spout, and spout away,
> In one weak, washy, everlasting flood.

Well, Sir, if that is the kind of implement that was to be employed in an effort to impart information to the irreconcilables, probably it would not have had any very considerable effect upon them. I may, perhaps, be excused for being drawn away to make that remark. I will conclude by saying that if there was any argument required to convince me of the utter indefensibility of the measure which is before this House, if there was any one consideration required to prove to me that I would be most criminal, in my opinion and judgment, if I were to support the second reading of this measure, it is the consideration and the argument that I heard the hon. gentleman who leads this House employ last night, when he told us in terms of glowing eloquence that the Catholic population in the province of Nova Scotia, his own province, enjoyed the fullest liberty of conscience in reference to education; that on all sides it was conceded that no better Act could well be devised than the legislative Act in reference to education which was in operation in his own province and gave there such complete satisfaction; and this further consideration, that that Act is, to all intents and purposes, equivalent to the Act which we are now asked to destroy. If that Act be a good Act in Nova Scotia, if it has worked well for all those years, and is still found to be an Act which can be described in the eloquent terms used by the hon. gentleman last night as being all it ought to be, then I ask what possible justification would there be for me if I deliberately attempted to coerce the province of Manitoba by forcing it to deprive the people of the benefit of such an Act as the one so admirably described only twenty-four hours ago? If any further consideration were necessary to induce me to oppose this measure, that would be sufficient. So far as I am concerned, I will do, as I said in the early part of this session I would do, oppose this measure on every occasion it comes before the House when I have an opportunity of doing so. I believe it to be my duty to do so, and I will do so. There is just one other remark I desire to make, and it is a remark which I had almost overlooked. It is this, that I regret very much the terms in which the ex-Minister of Justice referred to a certain class of the population in this country. We may differ, we do differ, and differ widely in our views; but so far as I am concerned. I give the fullest credit to those who differ from me for honest belief and honest conviction, and I think that at least those who agree with me should have the same consideration, and when I find that the class represented by the ex-Controller of Customs in this House was described as one that could represent no honest opinion in this country, I very much regret that such an expression was made use of. I very much regret that terms of that kind were applied to a class of people in this country who are honest in their convictions, who are just as good and true citizens, who are just as loyal and as valuable inhabitants of this Dominion as any other class of people in the community, and I especially regret that such words should have fallen from the lips of any leader of the Conservative party, because it is very well known that, at all events, in the province from which I come, the Conservative party has had a staunch, a loyal, a strong and solid support from that class of the community for many a long year past.

Mr. DAVIN. This debate, Sir, is remarkable, perhaps in my experience, unique. It is unique in this. As it proceeded light was so cast upon the issue that new standpoints presented themselves, and the question here to-day is wholly different from that which has troubled the mind of the country for something like twelve months. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. McNeill) paid a just tribute to a body of men that, whether in Ireland or here, however strong they may hold opinions have yet within their breasts true hearts, and though the brain may be perfervid at times, truer friends to individuals or to party cannot be found, or more loyal citizens. Those gentlemen, and others taking different views, and still others have, in respect to this question up to the time it was brought before Parliament, been able to look at it simply whether legislation on the lines of the remedial order was or was not desirable. The moment this Bill was placed on the Table the question was no longer whether a Bill strictly on the lines of the remedial order was or was not desirable; that question was ipso facto decided in the negative so far as practical politics goes: and when my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, instead of proposing the motion we all expected, a motion that all the words after "that" should be omitted, and it be resolved that this Bill be not now read the second time, but that a commission be appointed to inquire into certain facts with a view to legislation, placed in your hands the six months' hoist, a wholly different issue and a more complexed issue was presented to the people of Canada, and directly to the members of this House. The issue presented to the members of this House, for judgment and action is this, shall we, especially those of us who are Conservatives, support the Government in their treatment of the question of remedial legislation, or shall we support the leader of the Opposition and his friends in their course? Before we came to this House some of us thought, and I thought myself, that I should here find myself taking part in a battle where two forces would be arranged on either side, one remedial legislators, the other anti-remedial legislators. But what we have now in this House is a large, an overwhelming, number of remedial legislators, differing only in this, as to how and when; and then in a corner of the field there are a few anti-remedial legislators. Therefore, the issue is a very different one. I cannot myself any longer look on the policy of the Government from the simple standpoint I have been accustomed to regard it. I have to consider this in the first place: what advantage, from the standpoint of anti-remedial legislators would be gained if the Government were beaten, and if by voting for the six months' hoist, we were to transfer the leader of the Opposition to this side of the House? What advantage would we gain? Clearly none whatever. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier) the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), the great bulk of the Liberal party, are just as much committed to remedial legislation as Sir Mackenzie Bowell or the Secretary of State. We should pay court, pay deference, bow to the high regard for demeanour of certain hon. gentlemen, because any one who goes over—and you have sat with great patience in your seat, Mr Speaker—this long debate will see this, that the question of questions between the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Government, between the Opposition in this House and the Conservative party who are supporting the leader of the Government, is simply one of—etiquette.

An hon. MEMBER. Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. I will explain. The charge made is—and it was well put by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), last night, in his eloquent and exhaustive speech—that the Government did not go through the proper formula, that they did not go through the negotiations with sufficient courtliness; that, to use the language of the leader of the Opposition, they did not adopt methods sufficiently sunny. Well, Sir, suppose that to be the case, is that a sufficient reason for saying, that I will go against those men with whom I agree on four or five other questions of great importance? That is the question one has to consider. If you only had to deal with this question simply, you would still have, in all fairness, to ask, if that would be sufficient reason to go against them on this point. And I will tell you why. This, after all, is the exercise of a new power. The Government that issued that remedial order in March, had no precedent to go on, and it was much easier for those of us who had to criticise their conduct after the remedial order was issued to decide, that we might have taken this course or the other, than it was for them, using a power for the first time. Now, Sir, the difference between the leader of the Opposition and the Government is merely one of etiquette. Therefore surely there was another course to take than that he took. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) referred to a precedent, and he said, that Dr. Doyle was examined before committees of the Lords and Commons, and that the evidence he gave had been found most useful. Sir, the evidence which Dr. Doyle gave was of a character to show, what it was monstrous at any time within the last 200 years should have to be shown to noble lords and hon. gentlemen, namely, that a man might profess the Catholic religion, and yet be a true citizen of Her Majesty the Queen. That was the gist of all the evidence of Dr. Doyle. But, Sir, there was a precedent that the leader of the Opposition might, with more fruitfulness, have referred to. If I may borrow a feather from the plume of the hon. leader of the House, he referred, not, I think, without justice, to the tendency of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to pose at certain times as a great admirer of the Liberal leaders in England. The leader of the Opposition sometimes refers to Gladstone, and he is an admirer of Gladstone. I sat in the gallery of the Imperial House of Commons, as a journalist, in 1867, when Mr. Disraeli was Chancellor of the Exchequer ; and he determined to bring in a Reform Bill, and he said that he was going to bring the measure forward by resolutions, and, if these resolutions were carried by the House, he would adopt the principle of each and embody it in a Bill. What example did Mr. Gladstone give to my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, on that occasion ? Sir, he took a course very different from that of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) says, he has not the least doubt that this Parliament has jurisdiction in the present case ; he has not the least doubt that there is a grievance, that that grievance has to be remedied, and that every wrong has to be righted, and that heaven-born and heaven-descended justice is to be invoked, and not invoked in vain for every wrong. The leader of the Opposition agrees in all respects with the Government, except in procedure. Why did he not take the precedent of Mr. Gladstone, and, when the hon. baronet brought forward this measure, why did he not rise and say : I agree with you in principle. I will not oppose the principle of this measure, but I will make certain suggestions to you, and, if you are ready to meet me half way, we will settle this matter. That was the only logical course for my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) to have taken. Instead of that, what did he do ? He did not give us the motion that we might have expected, seeing that he looks for inquiry. But he adopted a motion that would properly belong to my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and he proposed the six months' hoist, which is a denial of the principle that he says he agrees with.

Now, what is the character of the question now ? I do not care how strongly one may have held to the view of anti-remedialism, the question to-day is in such a position in this House and in the country, that no one can any longer practically hold an attitude of uncompromising opposition to the remedial legislation for the minority. I will tell you why. All the leading men, with one or two exceptions, found in both political camps, all the constitutional lawyers, with one or two exceptions, declare, that this House has jurisdiction, that the matter is properly before this House, that there is a grievance, and that the grievance has to be dealt with. But, Sir, however eloquently hon. gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House may have expounded this doctrine, I will say this—and it is not often I can give such invidious praise to the opposite side of the House—I think they have been outdone by the emphasis and the eloquence with which hon. gentlemen on the Reform side of the House have declared that there is jurisdiction, that there is an undoubted grievance, and that the principle of the Bill they oppose is correct, although they differ with the Government because they think the bows to Manitoba were not sufficiently profound. That is, Sir, as though on certain sublime occasions, when the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod comes here, if he did not bow with sufficient grace to you, Mr. Speaker, when he invited you to the other House, then, because the bows had not been sufficiently at right angles, you should decline to follow him to the Senate chamber. Sir, since I have weighed the arguments in this debate, I may tell you—and I will take you frankly into my confidence—that I have changed my opinion as to the course I ought to take. I changed my opinion, so as to be decisive as to the action and the course to which duty pointed, only after I had heard the speech of my hon. friend for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and it is, I think, not a weak compliment to pay that hon. gentleman. The speech that I heard from the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), clinched whatever influences were at work on my mind, and made it impossible for me to take the course I had determined to take, of resolute opposition at every turn to the policy of the Government in regard to this question. There is the strictly practical question : What is the use of voting against one set of men proposing remedial legislation to let in another set to propose remedial legislation ? And there is the question of principle, on which my judgment has been, I say frankly, greatly influenced by the speech of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Now, Sir, I want to call the attention of the House to the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. In that opening sentence, which has been rendered immortal by the correspondent of the "Globe," the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) made certain statements. Sir, we have many brilliant correspondents in that press gallery, but, I think, that for laborious eloquence and for pertinacious geniality the correspondent of the "Globe" surpasses any correspondent that we have. He immortalized the opening sentence of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I think he said it contained some thirty or forty lines, that it was one of the longest sentences on record--but he evidently had not read Hazlitt, who could write a sentence of five, or six, or ten pages. However, he said that it was a very long sentence, that it contained all the speech, and above all, in the conclusion, that the leader of the Opposition focussed everything where he said :

> In the name of the constitution, so outrageously misinterpreted by the Government, in the name of peace and harmony in this land, in the name of the minority which this Bill seeks or pretends to help, in the name of this young nation on which so many hopes are centered.

That we were told contained all the speech. Now, what is in all that ? "In the name of the constitution so outrageously misinterpreted by the Government." How is it outrageously misinterpreted, or misinterpreted at all, from the standpoint of the hon. leader of the Opposition ? On the contrary, the leader of the Opposition says, in this very speech, that this House is seized of the question, that it has jurisdiction, that there is an undoubted grievance, that there is a wrong to be righted ; and there is the heaven-born justice that must always be invoked, and that is never invoked in vain. "In the name of peace and harmony in this land." Well, Sir, seeing what the hon. gentleman's own opinions are, seeing that he is a remedial legislator just like the Government, I think myself that peace and harmony would be promoted if he had acted on the principles on which Mr. Gladstone acted, and for the same reason. Mr. Gladstone said that the reason he acted as he did, and waived his dislike of the method of Mr. Disraeli, was to get rid of discord and the blocking of legislation, which had done so much harm. Mr. Gladstone said :

> We cannot afford to go on in this country as we are going. It is time that this discord between classes,—this tendency to discord—this incipient discord—this tendency to separate interests, from indications of which I must say the speech of the right hon. gentleman, in that portion of it in which he referred to the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, was not altogether free—it is time that all this should cease ; and not till this question of reform has disappeared from among the subjects of controversy can we hope to see the people of England what they once were, and what we ought to be desirous they should continue to be—a united people.

He therefore says : "I will not oppose the method brought forward by the right hon. gentleman, although I am greatly opposed to it, and greatly doubt its utility." And Mr. Gladstone took this course in regard to a question that was in a sense properly his to settle. Now, Sir, the hon. leader of the Opposition, at page 2825 of "Hansard," declares :

> Sir, the power is there, and being there, the aid of the Dominion Government will be sought by the minority.

And he goes on to say how this power is to be exercised :

> But it is not to be exercised until after all means of conciliation have been exhausted, and only as a last resort.

In page 2828, he tells us :

> Are we, upon the complaint of the minority, unsupported by evidence, without having made any investigation—are we to be told that the law of the majority is to be set aside ? Sir, if you tell me this, then I say it was a mere mockery to give to the province of Manitoba the right to legislate upon this question.

He goes on still further to say :

> That the minority of Manitoba alleges and proves a wrong such as the hon. gentleman has described, a wrong which appeals to the heart and mind of every man.

Well, Sir, if the minority prove a wrong which appeals to the heart and mind of every man, the sooner one finds a remedy for it the better. Again, he says, at page 2835 : "The minority have a right to have their own schools, that I admit," and on page 2836 : "The facts are notorious," and a few sentences afterwards he says this is "a half-hearted and faint measure." And so on, from page to page, the hon. gentleman declares that there is a wrong, that there is a remedy, and that this Parliament can apply the remedy. So that no opponent of remedial legislation can exchange leaders with advantage—indeed, it could not be done without disadvantage, because the member for Quebec West (Mr. Laurier) says this Bill does no go far enough. But, Sir, after all, a stronger if coarser personality influenced me in this matter, and that was the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). The hon. member for Winnipeg was the author of the legislation, and what did he say ? I will only make one quotation from his speech, which has four or five sentences of the same spirit. Now, mark the sentence which I am about to quote :

> I believe that if that Bill be withdrawn, and the remedial order of the 21st of March be rescinded, the people of Manitoba, being law-abiding, and understanding the position in which they have been placed by the second decision of > the Privy Council, will be prepared to do justice in the premises. I am not bound to rely upon my own knowledge of the people of Manitoba in making that statement, because we have it from the government and the legislature of Manitoba, that they recognize their position, that they do not propose to fight the constitution, that their objection to the remedial order and to the Remedial Bill is not that this Government and this Parliament have no jurisdiction in the premises, but that the jurisdiction conferred upon the Governor General in Council, and upon this Parliament, has not been exercised in a manner calculated to bring about a settlement of this question—in a manner calculated to really aid the minority, on whose behalf it is suggested we should pass this law.

In another place he says :

> But I have no hesitation in saying that if the people of Manitoba put themselves in the wrong upon this question, which they have not done——

That is to say, if they put themselves in the wrong by not remedying whatever wrong is there. He declares again and again that if once the legislature of Manitoba puts itself in the wrong, then we in this Parliament have nothing to do but to apply a remedy. Now, how can the legislature put itself in the wrong ? By not legislating so as to redress the grievances of the majority. Therefore, from a practical point of view, there is nothing to be gained in the end by those opposed to remedial legislation, taking the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) rather than the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) as a guide. Sir, I say that I cannot look at this questoin now in the same way that I looked at it in the North-west. When I said that before, some of my hon. friends cheered ; I think they cheered ironically. But, Sir, if I were tonight to make a violent speech in this House against this Bill I should probably strengthen myself in my constituency. But, Sir, I hold, as I hope most of us hold—and if the sentiment were latent, it could not but have been waked into life and power by the splendid utterance we heard this afternoon from my hon. friend from Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith)—the sentiment I am trying to express, that once I had come to the conclusion to which I had come, that there was a wholly different issue, and that a remedy for grievance was due, there was but one course before an honourable man. Here you have all the most leading men, the most authoritative men in Canada on both sides, declaring that this remedy must if necessary be applied. Therefore, when there is no ground for the anti-remedial legislator to stand on for practical, successful action, a man holding with the general policy of the Government would be false to every instinct of patriotism if he did not express himself at whatever cost, as I have expressed myself here. I know my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) and my hon. friend who lately spoke (Mr. McNeill)—two men whom I honour as I have seldom honoured any of my acquaintances, and who are distinguished ornaments of this House, and I know how hard they find it acting on the same motives which impel me—one port aimed at and one compass guiding us though we plough different seas—they will echo what I am about to say—quoting a man who was one of the truest men produced by the republic south of the line :

> Life may be given,

Aye, more than life—the ambitions of life—

> Life may be given in many ways,
> And loyalty to truth be sealed
> As well within this Chamber as on the field,
> So bountiful is fate.

But is there not more even than the practical bearing ? Has there not been new light shed on the core and centre of this disturbing question ? Let me say one word with reference to the speech of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). My hon. friend's speech was one of the closest, one of the best sustained arguments I ever listened to in my life. Every flaw that was in any of the previous arguments on the same side of the controversy my hon. friend fully supplied. Until he came to the last few minutes, that magnificent argument seemed built up for the purpose of leading him to say, and I expected him to say it : " I regret that I cannot go with my hon. friend from Quebec, who is my leader, in this matter, and I will have to support the Government." But he did not say that. He built up an argument lengthy, grandiose, ably sustained, which seemed to lead to that conclusion ; but instead, he concluded by saying, in a few words, that he disapproved, for some reason, the course taken by the Government. But the conclusion did not hang together with the argument ; and as he is fond of classical allusions and comparisons, and as he is a man of erudition, he will appreciate the compliment, I am sure, when I tell him that the major part of his speech was like a great Corinthian portico, pillar after pillar, crowned with ornate capitals, rising and stretching beautifully away in graceful perspective and stately grandeur, and all ending in—a rat hole.

We have heard this House frequently spoken of, with regard to this matter, as a court. One hon. gentleman, who is not a lawyer, declared that we were sitting here as a court. I do not think we are sitting here as a court, but we may gather an illustration from the procedure of courts, and now, borrowing the language of the courts, what is the burden of the argument of those hon. gentlemen who would persuade me to vote in favour of the six months' hoist ? It is all against the procedure. It is the procedure that annoyed my hon. friend from Winnipeg. It is the procedure only that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition objects to. It is altogether a question of procedure. Now, ever since the passing of the Common Law

Procedure Act in England or here, if an error creeps into the record or procedure, you can move to amend ; and surely there is nothing to prevent us here, if everything is right but the procedure, moving to amend it, and so get rid of this thing which I, for one, never want to see brought here again. I do not want to see session after session wasted, to use the words which Mr. Gladstone applied to the Reform Bill, and which made him give his support to the leader of the Government in the House of Commons, a great personal enemy of his, and who had not a majority in the House at the time. Disraeli had not a majority in the House of Commons in 1867, yet Mr. Gladstone gave him his support to carry the Reform Bill, in order to get that question out of the way of useful legislation and restore harmony once more to the people of England. I say we will take a lesson from the courts, and remove that. I want to say one thing. One of the cries out with us in the west—and I confess I have known good lawyers to make that cry—I myself was educated as a lawyer, ate my terms in the Middle Temple, and paid my fees to a great pleader, and studied law, nevertheless, I myself have felt the charm, power and suggestion, and what is more the practical value of the cry—"provincial rights." Now, one of the most admirable parts of the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell last night was when he pointed out that there could be no question whatever of provincial rights. That was the most striking and useful part of my hon. friend's speech, where he pointed out that as long as the province acts within its provincial powers, it stands unimpairable and impregnable, and can laugh at and defy all Dominion action, and that it is only when it goes outside that—in other words, when it becomes a trespasser—that this Parliament can interfere. Therefore, that cry of provincial rights is done away with.

Another important contribution which my hon. friend has given this discussion in Parliament is this. Alluding to the fear that the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) expressed, and the fear that I may say pervades the North-west Territories—the fear that if this legislation were to go into operation, somehow or other it might be made un point d'appui, a coign of vantage for certain persons to carry out plans they may have with regard to the North-west—my hon. friend from Bothwell—and I am ready to sit at the feet of that Gamaliel—pointed out clearly and conclusively that no advantage can be taken as against the North-west, of any legislation of this sort. I will be perfectly frank and admit that the moment I read the remedial order, I at once gave my opinion that the only legislature which can fruitfully deal with the question of education in the province is the local legislature. That now is not denied by anyone. I have no doubt whatever that when my hon. friends who then composed the Government issued the remedial order, they thought, as they might well have thought, that it would be much easier for them to frame a Bill than they found it when they attempted to frame it. Anybody who has any knowledge of drafting, and any imagination to picture the future, would know at a glance that the attempt to make into a complete Act the provisions of the remedial order, would prove one of the most arduous that any man could undertake, because, at every turn he would be confronted with corners of ultra vires. And when this Government came to offer us a Bill carrying out the remedial order, they found that, and what had they to do? They had themselves to have recourse to the local legislature.

One other point that the member for Bothwell set in a more emphatic light. He showed that the minority in Quebec are precisely in the same position before the constitution as the minority in Manitoba.

Sir, I look forward with the greatest possible hope to the conference that is to take place, and I honour the Government for taking care that such a conference should take place, and I have the utmost confidence in Mr. Greenway and his colleagues, now that they themselves have said that there cannot be the least doubt whatever that, under the constitution, this remedy exists, and now that they have the statement of their friends and especially of the author of the Act, and of the first men in the country that the remedy for any wrongs the minority may suffer from is a remedy that can be put into operation, and that it is their duty to prevent any remedy coming from here—I have the greatest confidence that Mr. Greenway and his colleagues will deal with the matter, and that we shall never see it here again.

Let me say a word with regard to the question that has several times been raised, but by none more frequently than the leader of the Opposition, the question of the facts. Why, Sir, the facts are known. The state of things in Manitoba is notorious. My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) quoted reports and census returns indicating the low culture of those attending the schools. I could easily show him that that was misleading. It was a notorious state of things that existed in Manitoba. In 1890 my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) secured the passage of legislation that we are now familiar with. And, as a fact, what was done was this—all the inspectors, the teachers, the officers who belonged to what were called the Protestant schools, but misleadingly called Protestant schools because no distinctive teaching of Protestantism was taught in them, were allowed to remain, whereas in the Catholic schools which, in some cases were in the same districts, all the Catholic inspectors, teachers and trustees disappeared. Now, what should have been done is this—all should have disappeared and new elections should have taken place, and——

Mr. MARTIN. That is what was done.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend (Mr. Martin), though he was the author of the Act, is not now as well informed on that subject as I am ; I know that that is not what occurred, and I could prove it to the hon. gentleman. I have the proof here under my hand. What should have been done is what I have indicated, and then the trustees of each school should have been allowed to provide religious teaching for, say, an hour after the regular secular teaching ; then a fair inspectorship should have been inaugurated—in fact such a system as we have in the North-west Territories. If such a thing as that had been done there would have been very little cause for complaint. But the facts are known. There is nothing in the cry for facts that should make us pause. And, although I am of course in favour—it would be impossible to exaggerate my determination to lean in that direction—of the local legislatures dealing with matters of education, there is no advantage in appointing certain persons to get information where all the facts are "notorious."

Amongst the incidents of this debate was one which I wish to notice in passing. Invective, as Disraeli said, is a great ornament to debate. But sometimes it may be carried a little too far. And I confess when I heard the hon. member for North Simcoe make the reference he did to the entrance into this chamber of the distinguished man who now leads it, I thought that considerations of the services that had been rendered by that man to this country and the time that he had been in this House, and the fact that they had once been colleagues in a way, and fought side by side, ought to have bridled his tongue when that flippant remark rose to it. But, Sir, I was not sorry that the hon. member for Simcoe was betrayed into that flippancy, because of the result. We had in his old form the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), with all his old force and fire, his spirit still capable of drinking delight of battle with his peers, and, as I heard him, I was reminded of the closing lines of Tennyson's "Ulysses" :

We are not now that strength which in old days
Moved earth and heaven ; that which we are, we are ;
One equal temper of heroic hearts,
Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

Now, let me say one word with regard to those gentlemen who are called irreconcilables, or, by some, kickers. It is to the credit of any party that men can be part and parcel of the organization and yet think out their honest thoughts and express them. It was, in my opinion, one of the great virtues of Sir John Macdonald, that, though he was a man of imperious will, yet, it was always possible for men of independent mind to work with him. It is well known, I think, that I try to think independently myself ; and I have never found it impossible to do that in the Conservative party. I do not say that it is impossible to do it in the Liberal party. But in the Conservative party there must be always men of strong convictions and independence of thought. A book has been written by Mr. Galton, on Hereditary Genius, and in it is a chapter that should be pondered by all who aspire to be leaders of men and by every citizen of a free country and above all by party managers—a chapter in which he points out that the Inquisition and the tyrannical governments of Europe, by banishing the men of independent thought and energetic brain, although only a few hundreds were sent away every year, demoralized and degraded France and Spain and Italy. Anything in a country or in a party or in a legislature or in a church that in any way tends to suppress mental independence cannot but be injurious in the end. A sieve is formed by which small men and small men only are strained into great places. For myself, I always look upon a man who takes an independent view with a great deal of sympathy.

Referring again to the speech of my hon. friend from Bothwell, there was one very important part in which he showed that separate schools have nothing to do with this question, that this is simply a question of certain rights that were affected by the action of the Manitoba legislature. That is most important because it removes from this controversy one of the inflammable strands that would make it that flaming torch of which the hon. leader of the Opposition spoke. The truth is that when you come to look at this question there is absolutely nothing that should inflame feeling on the part of either Catholic or Protestant. And I repeat that my hon. friend from Bothwell, in his exhaustive speech, by clearing away, by throwing on one side and on the other what was not relevant has done great service to Parliament and to the country, and also, whether he designed it or not, to the Conservative Government. My hon. friend from Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) made a noble appeal to this House. He appealed to the House that when they came to the question whether we should read the Bill or not, we should read it the second time unanimously with a view not to passing the Bill, but to so affecting future negotiations that these negotiations should be rendered more effective and successful.

For my own part, if I found that my friends on the Reform side were ready to consider it, and to do it, I would certainly be ready to consider taking the same course with them ; and if it led to an effective arrangement by those who will conduct the negotiations, negotiations which it is an honour to the Government to have brought about, it would reflect honour upon the members of the Conservative party and members of the Reform party alike; and it would show that this great council of the Canadian people was able, on occasions, to rise patriotically above party dissensions and party passions; and that in regard to a subject which is calculated to excite religious and racial hatreds and to cause grave difficulties in this Dominion, the leader of the Opposition is able to rise patriotically above partizanship, and to take the honourable course which will not fail of its reward. Sir, that speech of my hon. friend will long remain in my memory; it must have affected other gentlemen as well; and I for one will be most ready to accept his lead in that direction, hoping it may conduct us to such a settlement as he intended. Mr. Speaker, I rose for the purpose of pointing out what I consider is a complete change in the position of this question before the country. The question at the present moment before the country is wholly different from what it was when introduced into this House; it is to the credit of the men who compose this assembly, that by their contributions to the debate from both sides, they have set it in such a light that it now is in a wholly different position from what it occupied when the House met. Sir, let me close as I began. No man can regard it now when we come to vote either on the first or second question, and especially on the question for the six months' hoist—no man can say now that he is voting as to whether he shall be in the battalion fighting against remedial legislation or fighting for it. The question now is between two bodies of men both in favour of remedial legislation, differing as to when and how; one going at it practically with a measure in their hands, whether they are approved by others or not, but who have taken measures already, and who are on the road to settle it; and others wanting an investigation into facts which, to use their own language, are notorious, and which, if notorious, they do not need an inquiry to investigate. Let us rise for once above the mere question of using the great subjects of legislation that come to us here as weapons of partisan warfare, and vote on this question as patriots, determined to do our best for Canada.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, because of the stand taken by me in the month of July last with regard to the Government and because of the crisis which the Canadian people is now undergoing, I feel myself obliged to make certain remarks to this House. A Liberal Government in a Liberal province has taken upon itself to outrage the spirit of the constitution and of our institutions by attacking the rights and privileges of the small French and Catholic minority in Manitoba. In the month of July last I thought it was my duty to separate myself from my friends, and I believe that the events which have since supervened justify the stand taken at that time by myself and some other friends of mine. We thought that it was better to go alone, a little band, in the right road, than to march with the great number in that way which brought the Government and the country to within a hairs-breadth of destruction. I do not wish to weary the House by very lengthy statements, knowing that all arguments have already been brought for or against the support of the Ministerial legislation submitted to our consideration. But I wish to call the attention of my colleagues in this House and above all of my Opposition friends who incessantly reproach the Federal Government with having rudely treated that of the province of Manitoba, which latter has persecuted the small French minority of that province. I wish, I say, to recall here certain historic events. When a Conservative chief, Sir George Etienne Cartier, offered for the deliberation of this House the Constitutional Act which should make Manitoba a province prosperous as she is to-day and an integral part of the Dominion of Canada, he was far from expecting that his political heirs would have to repress the persecutions of the local government in regard to his compatriots and his co-religionists; he was far from expecting that that government would not accord to the Catholic population of Manitoba the liberty which citizens enjoy in the other provinces of confederation. Nevertheless, a Liberal government, as I said a moment ago, has put the Catholic minority in this unfortunate position. I must here repeat to the Liberal French Canadian leaders in this House that they are supporting the policy of him who persecutes our compatriots in the province of Manitoba. I reply immediately to that Opposition argument which would fain pretend that the Federal Administration has exercised with regard to the government of Manitoba draconian measures, by recalling here the facts of the case. Do we not recall any more all the steps taken by the Canadian Government in relation to the government of Manitoba? Do people no longer remember the demands of the entire Catholic hierarchy of the Dominion of Canada, presented in the form of petitions wherein were set forth the grievances of the minority in relation to the school law passed in 1890 by the legislature of Manitoba? This prayer of the Catholic episcopate was forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General in Council and received the attention of the Government of Canada. An Order in Council was made by the Government of Canada and transmitted to that of Manitoba with the humble petitions to redress the legitimate grievances of the Catholic minority. I shall quote, Mr. Speaker, this Order in Council, couched in so kindly a spirit, forwarded by the Government of Canada to the Greenway Cabinet.

These are the conclusions drawn in this Order in Council :

> The committee beg to observe to Your Excellency that the statements which are contained in this memorial are matter of deep concern and solicitude in the interests of the Dominion at large, and that it is a matter of the utmost importance to the people of Canada that the laws which prevail in any portion of the Dominion should not be such as to occasion complaint of oppression or injustice to any class or portion of the people, but should be recognized as establishing perfect freedom and equality, especially in all matters relating to religion and religious belief and practice ; and the committee, therefore, humbly advise that Your Excellency may join with them in expressing the most earnest hopes that the legislatures of Manitoba and the North-west Territories respectively, may take into consideration at the earliest possible moment the complaints which are set forth in this petition, and which are said to create dissatisfaction among Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada, and may take speedy measures to give redress in all the matters in relation to which any well-founded complaint or grievance be ascertained to exist.

I do not see that the reproach made by the hon. leader of the Opposition has any foundation whatsoever, when he says that the Canadian Government all at once fell foul of the government and legislature of Manitoba, and by a draconian remedial order commanded that administration to do justice to the Catholic minority. No, it was a humble petition which was addressed to the government of Manitoba, founded on the prayer of the Catholic clergy of the Dominion of Canada, representing over two millions of Her Majesty's subjects. You shall see, Mr. Speaker, the courteous reply made by the protégé of the hon. leader of the Opposition. Then the Greenway government did not say that the Government of Canada should make an investigation, and that at the close of such an investigation the two governments would together decide if the minority had a just cause of grievance. Mr. Greenway and his government, his legislature as well, do not speak of a commission of inquiry to the Government of Canada, but they make an insolent rejoinder to the humble supplications of the Federal Government and of the bishops of the Dominion. This is the conclusion of the reply made by Manitoba government :

> The questions which are raised by the report now under consideration have been the subject of most voluminous discussion in the legislature of Manitoba during the past four years. All of the statements made in the memorial addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, and many others, have been repeatedly made to and condsidered by the legislature. That body has advisedly enacted educational legislation which gives to every citizen equal rights and equal privileges, and makes no distinction respecting nationality and religion. After a harassing legal contest, the highest court in the British dominions has decided that the legislature, in enacting the law of 1890, was within its constitutional powers, and that the subject of education is one committed to the charge of the provincial legislature. Under these circumstances, the executive of the province see no reason for recommending the legislature to alter the principles of the legislation complained of. It has been made clear that there is no grievance, except it be a grievance that the legislature refuses to subsidize particular creeds out of the public funds, and the legislature can hardly be held to be responsible for the fact that their refusal to violate what seems to be a sound and just principle of government creates, in the words of the report, dissatisfaction amongst Roman Catholics, not only in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but likewise throughout Canada.

Not only Mr. Greenway says in his reply to the Federal Government and to the prayer of the bishops, that he is long since cognizant of these very grievances, but he says also : these grievances have been discussed time and time again, and we are not going to trouble ourselves with them any more. We have had these matters in evidence before the courts, we have gained our suit on every point, and in these circumstances I will not submit even the complaint of the bishops nor your Order in Council to the legislature. I do not want to be troubled with that sort of thing at all. We shall not make any more ado over it, because we have already deliberated too often altogether about this whole affair. In the interval the Catholics who had appealed again to Her Majesty's Privy Council gained their suit. It was decided that the Catholics had grievances ; moreover, that the rights which they enjoyed prior to 1890 were the result of a covenant solemnly concluded between the delegates of the province of Manitoba and the Government of the Dominion of Canada. No doubt at all on that point. Here are the remarks made in this connection by the members of the Privy Council :

> Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only toward the support of the Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the State. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which State aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain laible to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character.

> In view of this comparison, it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education, which existed prior to 1890, have not been affected.

And further on :

> As a matter of fact, the objection of Roman Catholics to schools such as alone receive State aid under the Act of 1890 is conscientious and deeply rooted. If this had not been so, if there had been a system of public education acceptable to Catholics and Protestants alike, the elaborate enactments which have been the subjects of so much controversy and consideration would have been unnecessary. It is notorious that there were acute differences of opinion between Catholics and Protestants on the education question prior to 1870. This is recognized and emphasized in almost every line of those enactments. There is no doubt either what the points of difference were, and it is in the light of these that the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act of 1870, which was in truth a parliamentary compact, must be read.

The Government, after the appeal of the minority to the Privy Council of England, heard the parties to the suit and the remedial order, as everybody knows, was made by the Governor in Council and transmitted to the government and the legislature of Manitoba, then in session. The Government of Canada had the right to couch the terms of the remedial order in those strictly legal forms which are allowed, because, in the course of the pleading, the counsel of the Manitoba government had brought forward declarations and documents attesting that the government of Manitoba had no idea of abating one jot or tittle of its pretensions, and that it was determined to let the minority lie under the incubus of the law which itself had imposed. In fact, at page 85 of the blue-book about the school question, I find that the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), representing the government of Manitoba, replied to the members of the Privy Council of Canada as follows :

> Mr. McCARTHY.—I understand that the position of the Manitoba Government is that they will resist by every constitutional means in their power the passage of any remedial order and that they will not obey the order, which is something that they have a perfect right to do.

This is the declaration made by the counsel of the Greenway government before the Privy Council of Canada. Is this not turning into mockery the authority of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada ? And in the face of that there are people who have just told us that the Government of Canada behaved with overmuch severity to the Manitoba administration. This is what Mr. McCarthy, counsel for the Greenway government, added :

> Mr. McCARTHY.—I have the Queen's speech. It says :
> "Whether or not a demand will be made by the Federal Government that that act shall be modified is not yet known to my Government. But it is not the intention of my Government in any way to recede from its determination to uphold the present public school system, which, if left to its own operation, would in all probability soon become universal throughout the province."

Thus we see, Mr. Speaker, even before the Canadian Government had passed the remedial order, that Mr. Greenway threatened, in the name of the province of Manitoba, that if the Federal Government passed such a remedial order, the government and the legislature of Manitoba would never obey such an order emanating from the Federal authority. In such circumstances, forsooth, the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends turn around towards the Federal Government, saying : You it is who have threatened the government of Manitoba, and had you not done so, you would not now be in the position in which you find yourselves. Had you not made these threats, the school question would have been amicably settled, and the Catholic minority of Manitoba would have obtained the redress of its grievances. I did give my cordial and loyal support to the leader of the Canadian government in all this affair, but later events which arose forced me to a change of attitude. After the remedial order had been sent to the Manitoba government, this latter replied with insolence still greater than it had shown to the Order in Council of 1894, and to the petition of the bishops of Canada, praying that the complaints of the Catholics should be taken into consideration. This is the reply of the provincial government to the remedial order :

> We are therefore compelled to respectfully state to Your Excellency in Council that we cannot accept the responsibility of carrying into effect the terms of the remedial order.

And further on :

> We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not available then to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools.
> We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order.
> Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject.

Thus, the legislature of Manitoba simply invites the Governor in Council to reflect and to take anew into his consideration the conclusions of the remedial order. They even go to the length of saying that when the Canadian Government made that Order in Council, it was done in ignorance of the facts of the case. At the beginning of this session I was astounded to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition say to the Canadian Government : You have made an unjust and draconian remedial order. How ? In what sense draconian ? Why, the language used was exactly the language of all documents of a like nature : the language used was, in fact, rather more moderate than that of Her Majesty's Privy Council. Indeed, they had copied, as far as might be, the very wording of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But the hon. leader of the Opposition does not qualify as insolent the reply of the Manitoba government to the prayer of the hierarchy and of the Federal Administration. The hon. leader of the Opposition has indeed forgotten the violent language of the reply made by the representatives of the Manitoba government before the Privy Council of Canada, when they had the hardihood to say: make an Order in Council if you will, but we laugh at you and never shall we obey that order: the hon. leader of the Opposition, forgetting even the speech put into the mouth of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, at the opening of the provincial legislature, accuses the Federal Government saying: you have passed a severe and draconian remedial order, but he does not say that the Manitoba government flouted the Federal Government and the remedial order and that the provincial government continues its persecutions against the French and Catholic minority in that province. I know not wherefore, but these words of the leader of the Opposition and of his colleagues in this House produced on the Government and on the leader of this House an effect which they certainly did not produce in me. The hon. leader of the Opposition in those circumstances allowed himself to give a piece of advice to the Canadian Government and to say that really it should deal with more politeness and more urbanity in its doings with the government of Manitoba than this latter had evinced in its conduct towards the Catholic minority. In the session of 1895 that state of affairs disquieted the friends of the persecuted minority. We did not see the advent of the promised remedial legislation, and for some months we waited in vain, when the rumour reached us that there were dissensions in the very bosom of the Government on the subject of the remedial law. The counsel of the hon. leader of the Opposition had cast division among the members of the Canadian Government. I still recollect, Mr. Speaker, and indeed it seems as if I saw to-day before me the laughing face of Sir John Macdonald and his gibing air when he rose one day to tell the leader of the Opposition, who had taken it on himself to tender some advice: "If I followed your advice," said he, "my duty would be to get ready to abandon my seat and go into opposition, yielding you my place: but the Treasury benches are so comfortable that at my age I prefer not to leave them. You will have them later on." That is the language which the leader of the House should have held in response to the counsel of the leader of the Opposition. The Federal Government, forgetting this so sagacious observation of the veteran of the Conservative party, of that old Canadian statesman, of that so clever politician, suffered itself perhaps to be influenced by the violent statements made in its regard by the leader of the Opposition. All at once, at a given moment, we find out that there is no Remedial Bill in sight and that three Ministers have resigned from the Cabinet. Some days go by, two of the Ministers who had resigned return to the Government, and one remains outside. This last said at the time that if they did not pass a remedial law, the situation would not improve, but that, on the contrary, the further on we went the more it would be difficult to bring about the adoption of such a law, and that he had no hope of a settlement by resuming negotiations with the government of Manitoba. The Government went on and the Remedial Bill was not presented. The Government addressed itself a second time to Manitoba. What sort of reply did it then receive? A stern reply, but I think this time one that was deserved. Here it is. Having enumerated the second Order in Council of the 27th July last, this is what, in conclusion, Greenway says to the Government of Canada, to be quite sure of being no longer importuned:—

> It is, therefore, recommended that so far as the government of Manitoba is concerned, the proposal to establish a system of separate schools in any form be positively and definitely rejected, and that the principle of a uniform non-sectarian public school system be adhered to.

Positively rejected and set aside! There is the affront which the Federal Government brought on itself by re-opening negotiations with Manitoba. And I believe that in such circumstances, instead of gaining prestige, the Government lost it before the country. Mr. Speaker, the ways of history are strewn with the wrecks of constitutions and of governments, and if you ask historians how these disasters happened to nations, they will tell you that when the time to do justice came, governments hesitated and that is what caused their undoing. They will tell you that governments wavered between the plain duty imposed on them and their threatened popularity. Oh! that popularity, that fickle goddess, wicked and faithless, who demands that a sacrifice should be made on the altars of the justice which is due to one's fellow citizens! Whether to court this popularity, or for any other consideration, a certain number of Ministers hesitated before their duty and we know what the consequence was. To reckon from that retreat, the people of this country lost confidence in the Government, and the Government, under the Empire of its own dissensions which lorded over it,—although they cried to the outside world that they were all in perfect harmony,—was even as a man stricken with paralysis who has lost his mental and bodily strength. We have seen the Government opening counties, naming to positions in the public service members of this House, trying to let it be understood that its attitude was sanctioned by the electorate. We know all the disasters which accompanied elections made in these conditions. The Government, as a Government, received the chastisement due to its hardihood and its recoil. Terrified at the vanishing of its popularity, the Ministry seemed to lose its head. Here I should say that there are in the Government a certain number of Ministers who are friends of justice and of the rights of the minority. But the division in a Government paralyses it and a government paralysed is quite the same as a person paralysed. In such circumstances the Government had no business to brave public opinion, inasmuch as it had the intention, inasmuch as it even had made an engagement upon its honour to cause the passage of a remedial law the following session; it should have conserved all the forces which it had in this House, in order to be able to fulfil and to safeguard its own honour and reputation. However, the Government, always like a paralytic who has lost the use of his faculties, made insensate appointments which drew on it the reprobation of the electorate. On this subject I have a statement to make in the name of my compatriots of the province of Quebec. It has been pretended that the French and Catholic electorate was not anxious to have a remedial law. The ministerial organs have told us that if the people of the province of Quebec had been in favour of this law, they would have supported the Government candidates. But it is exactly because they had not confidence in the Government that they did not support the Government candidates: it is precisely because they doubted the sincerity of the Government that they defeated its candidates, who in other circumstances would have been elected. How do they make out that the Government should have had the confidence of the electorate, when precisely while it had to fulfil an engagement contracted upon its honour to cause the adoption of a remedial law, it opened counties, and so exposed itself to the danger of losing control of the House. Going back to the month of January last, the Speech from the Throne was made by His Excellency. This Speech had been, according to the usage in that regard, written by the Canadian Government. A few days afterwards, seven Ministers resigned their position in the Government, without even giving themselves the trouble to get as a preliminary the reply of both Houses to the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General, into whose mouth they had put the words which we all know on the subject of remedial legislation. The hon. First Minister himself was discouraged, and one cannot but admit that there was enough in the situation to discourage no matter what Prime Minister. However that may be, without the great energy that he manifested when more than half of his Government refused to follow his policy, and when they launched murderous thrusts at his very breast, Sir Mackenzie Bowell thought it his duty to, in his turn, offer his resignation. But His Excellency the Governor General did not wish to accept the resignation of his First Minister, for if he had accepted it, he would not only have betrayed the honour of the Government, but the very honour of the Crown itself, which had been pledged to Parliament. That is why His Excellency refused to accept the resignation of the first Minister. Seeing which the seven Ministers who had resigned thought it their duty to enter again into the Government, and now we are told, with emphasis, that we have a remedial Government. Yes, we have a remedial Government, but it is the same as in the comedy of the physician despite himself, this is a remedial Government despite itself, and, thanks to His Excellency the Governor General, who forced the Cabinet to keep the word pledged by the Government to the country. Without that we should not have remedial legislation before Parliament. Events continued to unfold themselves. An important change was made in the personnel of the Ministry, and the Secretary of State was called to a place in the Cabinet, and became the leader of this House. I believe that one can say in all sincerity that if the hon. Secretary of State had been in the country in the month of July last, with the energy which is characteristic of him, the minority would have seen its prayers granted and the remedial law submitted to the Houses last session. On account of all the complications which I have just mentioned, due to the fact that in July last the Government had not done its duty, the Catholic minority was obliged to wait still longer. I sincerely believe that if the hon. baronet had been in the country at that time—and I consider that it was a public calamity that he was not in the midst of us at the time of that crisis—the minority would have obtained justice, Mr. Speaker, with the weight of his authority and of his prestige, he would have secured the triumph of the rights of the Manitoba minority. The hon. Secretary of State, aided by the support of the hon. Mr. Angers, and of his colleagues favourable to remedial legislation, would have caused the adoption of the same last July, and the country would have been saved from the constitutional crisis which it is going through at this moment. I listened to the magnificent speech of the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan), and of the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster). Above all I remarked the eloquent peroration of the hon. Minister of Finance. He made us behold the dangers which our institutions run at the sight of the demon of discord who walks abroad in the country, and kindles everywhere the fires of national and religious passions. Now, I ask the hon. Minister who put into the hands of the demon of discord the lighted torch which he uses to spread the conflagration everywhere and to enkindle the fire of baleful passions in the Dominion of Canada ? It is the Government of Canada itself which so equipped him on that day when it refused to act, when its duty commanded it to act. If now the torch of the incendiary makes among us ravages so deplorable, it is his old colleague the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) who is responsible for that. Behold the man who has cast the spark and lighted the torch which the demon of discord makes use of to ravage our country. This demon makes use of other instruments : he has at his service the hon. leader of the Opposition, and his lieutenant the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). The ex-Controller of Customs and several of his friends, as well as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), form the phalanx in the service of this demon of discord. The hon. Minister of Finance knew all that, Mr. Speaker, when he refused to act last summer. He was warned that the demon of discord and national hatreds would sow in the path of the Government obstacles which could not, perhaps, be surmounted, or, at all events, which would light up a conflagration that would put in jeopardy our constitutional institutions. I am ready to pardon everything to the Government, but on one single condition : it is that the remedial Bill now before the House be passed during the present session. The Government cannot pretend that it is impossible to secure the passage of this legislation in the session that now is. I will not believe that the Government will willingly lend an ear to the counsels given to it by the Opposition. I hope that those who say that the Government will never do justice to the minority are deceived. I have heard it said by learned jurisconsults, members of the other side of the House, that this Bill, being amended, may become a passable law. It is true that other jurisconsults on this side of the House, distinguished barristers, have pretended that it was not possible to make this Bill acceptable to the minority. There are at the most ten clauses in this Bill which should be re-touched, and it seems to me that it is possible for those who belong to the legal profession to come to an understanding to amend those clauses in a suitable manner. I am not a jurisconsult, but let them give me the Bill to improve, and I say that in less than a day I will make it constitutional. I will make it a law the most perfect and the most acceptable to the minority. Let not the members of the Opposition imagine that they are going to impose upon the people of the province of Quebec by saying that this law cannot be amended. Let them bring forward as much as they please certificates of incapacity and of nullity, the people will not believe them. If this law is not passed, it is because Parliament will not pass it ; that there will be bad faith on its part. The Parliament of Canada will be discredited in the eyes of the people, and the members who will make obstructions or who will seek to hinder the Government from improving the law will be declared guilty of treason towards the small Manitoba minority which they have trampled under foot for the past six years. This is the accusation which all the ingenuity of the Opposition will not be able to refute, when it shall appear before the people its judge. There must be good sense. Meanwhile, there are about ten clauses of the Bill which demand amendments a little bit serious. There are, so to speak, only two clauses which require really serious amendments, and the hon. members of the Opposition seek to create a belief in the country that it is not possible to make this law perfect. I will say to these gentlemen, vote for the principle of the law, and after that you will be able to accuse the Government if it does not wish to improve the law and to make it perfect. Every man of good faith cannot see the matter under any other aspect than this one. Let them not seek to impress the people with the belief that this law is an abomination, that it is worse than no law at all ; that this Bill, if it is carried, will for ever ruin the hopes of the minority as the hon. leader of the Opposition said. I will not delay over the details of the arguments of the hon. members who opposed the Bill save only on two principal points. The hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends who have spoken on this Bill have told us : Why, it is an abomination ; you wish to exercise revolting coercion upon the province of Manitoba. And they even go so far as to say to us : if we were in Manitoba, we would do as the Manitobans, we would resist the law imposed by the Federal Government. At the second step they take in their arguments, they say to us : this law is nothing at all ; it is not worth the paper on which it is written ; it is not even the shadow of a law, as the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll) said the other day ; and five minutes before he had said that it was a law, the most tyrannical, the most odious that could be passed by the Government to do justice to the minority. So it is that the speeches of the hon. members of the Opposition contain precisely a dilemma which destroys from top to bottom the stand which they have taken and which far from justifying the withdrawal of the law will rather bring down on their heads the reprobation of their compatriots. I should avow, Mr. Speaker, that the Government has an irresistible tendency to follow the counsel which drives it to again enter into negotiations with the Government of Manitoba, despite all the proof of bad will which this latter has given. I cannot blame the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) for the steps which he has taken to bring about an amicable arrangement between the contending parties which will restore to the Manitoba minority that to which it is entitled, its separate schools.

There is no equivalent for the separate schools, for an equivalent could be taken away later, and the minority would fall back into a position worse than that which it occupied previously. It is the separate schools which the government of Manitoba should restore to the minority, and it is upon this principle that a compromise should be made. Still it would be necessary that this law be passed without delay to justify the Government of Canada in making a like compromise. For the minority cannot rely any longer on the government of Manitoba. It is no longer disposed to accept the frivolous promises of the Greenway government which have been already made to it to gain power, and then having attained its end, that government was pleased to inflict on the minority all kinds of bad treatment. It has applied the exorbitant laws passed by it in a fashion the most brutal. This brutality has been attested even here by the ex-member for Winnipeg (Mr. Macdonald). For the minority to consent to-day to accept these promises, it would be necessary that they should be immediately followed by legislation doing it justice. Mr. Speaker, our compatriots of Manitoba have suffered a great wrong and that was to abolish their legislative council.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) That has been on the part of our compatriots an almost irreparable error. Without giving up the higher chamber, the French minority of Manitoba would not perhaps have been at the mercy of the majority of the legislative assembly. To entrust all the legislative power to a single chamber is always dangerous, and in support of this opinion I will permit myself to quote a professor of Comparative Constitutional Law, Dr. Laboulaye, of the College of France :

> The omnipotence of the legislative power, that is the French principle. I do not hesitate to say that America is right in not admitting it. Whether it is a question of a prince or of an assembly, a people should not abdicate its sovereignty into the hands of anybody. The mandatory should always have a determined mandate. To entrust to anybody whatsoever the liberties which should belong to the country is always to run the risk of having them attacked by an assembly. Whether there are a hundred heads or only one, despotism is always sure to be reprobated.

Mr. Laboulaye in the course of the same work continues his observations on single chambers and gives us still another opinion. He says :

> A single assembly is necessarily a power without counterpoise and without responsibility, if is a despotism of the worst kind, with all the entanglements, all the passions, and all the weaknesses of bad government. A single chamber is a hydra with several heads, a power at once very violent and very feeble. In history there is no record of a single chamber which has not brought the country to revolution, anarchy and despotism, which last is the usual heir of anarchy.

That is an argument which the most ingenious pleasantry cannot shake. In another part of the same work, Mr. Laboulaye adds :

> In every free country a second chamber is necessary. Why ? We have already said why, namely, because a single chamber is a power without limit, and a power without limit is a despotism. It is, generally speaking, an anarchical and unsteady power, a power which is always without any inspiration but its own, and which subordinates the interests of the country to its own interests. There is nothing more unstable than a single chamber, which often goes to the country for re-election. The change of men brings change of opinion, and perpetual changing of the laws. A single chamber is always in a fever, and gives that fever to the country.

The hon. leader of the Opposition who speaks incessantly about conciliation with regard to the government of Manitoba has not employed the same argument with regard to the minority. My hon. friend the member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) has noted for him the unjust conduct of the Manitoba government with regard to this minority. The Protestant majority of the province of Manitoba did not bring so many precautions nor any spirit of conciliation when it despoiled the Catholic minority of its rights and of its privileges. All that we are enacting now is legislation supplementing the school law of Manitoba, and that to restore to the French minority the rights which have been snatched away by the legislative assembly of that province. There is no coercion on our part, we wish simply to protect the oppressed minority. It is a remedial law that we enact and not a law of coercion. We wish to cause the disappearance of the coercion practised by the local government on this feeble minority. The hon. leader of the Opposition brings to bear at this moment on his French compatriots who are in this House all the influence at his disposal to hinder them from voting in favour of the Remedial Bill. The other day we heard the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Monet), assuming the role of high executioner, launching himself against the hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) and attacking him with an extraordinary fury. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) asked with reason if the hon. member for Napierville had a mission to read them out of the Liberal party. By what right can the hon. member for Napierville exclude from the ranks of the Liberal party these two gentlemen because they did not shrink before their duty ? I know, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Ottawa is not a Conservative. I know also that my hon. friend from Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) is not a Conservative any more than the other ; I know also that among our political adversaries there are no more vigorous fighters than these two. The hon. member for Napierville has accused my friend the member for Ottawa with yielding to the fear of his constituents. He said that if my hon. friend voted for the Remedial

Bill, it is because he knew that without that vote he would not be re-elected. Together with the hon. member for Berthier he went out by the same hole, he said. In making this sarcasm of very doubtful worth the hon. gentleman is mistaken. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these two gentlemen have gone out quite easily through the large breach made in the walls of the Liberal fortress. The spirit of party by which the hon. member for Napierville is animated has alone hindered him from seeing this large breach in the ramparts of the Liberal party. To let us see how comfortable to justice is the position taken by the hon. members for Ottawa and for Berthier and those who share their opinion. I will read an extract from an author, professor of history in the University of Oxford. I speak of Mr. Froude. This is what that distinguished man writes :

> The idolators of power, whether they are in power, or whether they desire to obtain it, are never defenders of justice nor friends of liberty. They wish for justice and for liberty, but on condition that their idol does not suffer thereby. Power must live first. Liberty and justice, if they jeojard the government, can no longer be tolerated. The idol of power and the advantages resulting from it haunt their imagination and slay their patriotism. Egoism, the son of the idolatry of power, is the ruin and the curse of peoples.

Mr. Speaker, it is already late and I am going to conclude my remarks, although this subject is almost inexhaustible and demands very lengthy statements. I will say, before stopping, a word on the subject of the value of separate schools. I have heard in this House praises made of public schools or those without religious teaching. I have heard it said that these schools were very superior to denominational schools wherein is taught the religion of the parents of the children who attend them. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Angers) has cited for us numerous extracts tending to show that what was put forward by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) in the English province of Ontario with regard to the educational institutions of the province of Quebec is an unadulterated calumny launched against these institutions. Now, to judge of the value of the public or non-denominational schools, I shall quote the opinion of a philosopher and of a statesman who knows about it just as broadly as the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) and as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on denominational schools or on public schools without religious teaching. Jules Simon, who has been in France one of the apostles of secularization, and who at the French tribune uttered against the religion of his compatriots this blasphemous cry : "I demand for the tribune the right of outraging all religions !" Well, he has seen the working of his system imposed on France. You shall see how he has changed his mind since, and that he finds that the public schools are far from being perfection. He speaks of the lay non-denominational schools :

> The programmes constituting a very extended training, result only in giving an insufficient instruction. Since they began to teach everything in the schools the pupils learn but little. It is a misfortune, from the intellectual and moral point of view, for these ignoramuses are as puffed up with all these fines branches of knowledge which have been taught to them as if they had retained some portion of it ! They wish to be thenceforth treated as persons of consequence. Manual labour being quite below their dignity, society must keep their idleness gratis, or else run the great risk of relying on them for the direction of the different branches of its service. Take care that it is not this very system of education, ostentatious and empty, which has infested Russian society with its Nihilists. It is strange to see a people eager to turn its secondary schools into workshops of people out of their sphere. We do not insist on the blue stockings whom they wish to give us for wives. All this wealth impoverishes us. Far better the modest school which proportions its curriculum to the capacity and to the needs of the pupil, teaching him well the little which it undertook to teach him, and put him in the position of continuing his education all by himself.
> This evil, we must hope, will not be lasting. It comes from the inexperience of new departures. The tree is too luxuriant ; we must lop off the parasitic branches. For that, rely not on members of the legislature nor on learned men, but on the fathers, and above all on the mothers of families.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian statesmen in the negotiations which they are going to enter into with the government of Manitoba, will not avail of the pretext of these negotiations to interrupt here the course of the remedial law for which this session has been called. I hope that the Federal Government will do its duty to the end, and that if the government of Manitoba does not wish to be reasonable in these conditions, when the commissioners return from Manitoba we shall have a remedial law all ready to be applied. If the Government of Canada does not cause the adoption this session by the two Houses of Parliament of a remedial law, or if it does not obtain from the government of Manitoba itself the redress of the grievances of the minority, it will be considered by the French majority of the province of Quebec as a traitor to the interests of the Catholic minority of Manitoba. Mr. Speaker, the fortress is betrayed to the enemy not only by openly giving it up but also it is betrayed, after the fashion of Bazaine, who held parley with the Prussian army when he should have been fighting it. The Government goes parleying to Manitoba ; but let it all the time push on this law so as to be able to say to the country when this Parliament lapses, we have not spent half a million in sheer loss, but we have redressed the grievances of the Manitoba minority. The lawyers in this House appear to multiply the obstaces to the remedial law. They seem to delight in finding imaginary difficulties and in believing that it is impossible for this Parliament to make a complete law. I remember several years ago when Thornton was in the United States War Department, under Grant's administration, they brought from the American west delegates from the Indian tribes with which the government was at war, to treat of peace. The principal chief of the tribe, who was called Red Cloud, was accompanied by two other Indians. When they were come to Washington, the war of secession was just over, and they thought it would be a good thing, in order to frighten them, to make these savages visit all the war material accumulated in the Capitol. They showed them the huge pieces of cannon, the great artillery, the mitrailleuses, the guns of every kind. At every engine of war which they showed the Sioux chiefs these latter gave a cry of wonder. When they had made the round of the American arsenals, one of the two asked Thornton, through his interpreter, if that was all ? "Yes," replied the American minister, "that is all we have in Washington, in point of fact, in the way of war material." "Well," said the savage chief, "my brother has shown me that he has many ways of killing men ; now I should like him to show me the means he has of doing justice." Mr. Speaker, the lawyers of this House have shown the people of Manitoba what they have in their arsenals of subtleties, and of means almost inexhaustible to hinder all remedial legislation. That has been going on a long time. To-day the Manitoba minority turns to the jurisconsults of the House of Commons and asks them what are the means at their disposal for the doing of justice. ?

FRIDAY, 20th March, 1896.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will not trespass on the time of the House at any length ; but the importance of the question, perhaps, warrants me in making a few remarks upon it. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), true to his character as a member of this House, told us that he came here with one opinion, and that he had abandoned that opinion, and now intended to vote, not as he found the sentiment of his constituency, not as he found the sentiment in the west, but in deference, amongst other influences, to the argument of the member for Bothwell. We do not know what those influences here may be. He attributes his conversion to the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). But remembering his record, remembering that he always speaks one way and votes another, I am afraid his conversion is rather due to his weakness than to convictions of any kind. We have seen him leaving the fold, we have seen him leaving the household of his political godfathers, and returning again. It is the old story. If every time this prodigal returns a fatted calf is killed for him, what must it cost to keep him as a good son ? Mr. Speaker, he favoured us with an extraordinary view of the issue before the House. He said he had found now that the only issue between the parties was one of etiquette, one of procedure. Why, Sir, what is the issue ? What are we called to vote upon to-night ? We are called upon to record our opinions for or against the second reading of this coercion Bill. Is it a mere matter of form ? Is it a substantial measure ? Will the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), who has just spoken, admit that we are only going through a form now ? I venture to say that were the Government to announce that, they would lose his support on a division. The member for West Assiniboia says it is a mere procedure. Is it a mere procedure whether this measure is to be dealt with by a coercion Bill at Ottawa, or to be left to the decision of the people of Manitoba ? Sir, was it a mere procedure when the British Government and Parliament, over a hundred years ago, insisted upon forcing their will on the people of the then New England states ? The people of the New England states contended that their will ought to prevail in regard to taxation. The hon. member thinks it was a mere matter of procedure in that the British Government insisted that the legislation should take place in England. Sir, it is no matter of procedure. There is a substantial issue before this House to-night. The issue is whether this Remedial Bill ought to be read a second time, I presume, not as a matter of form, but as a step towards putting that Bill upon the statute-book. Here I might ask the Government, Is it an idle form that we are going through ? Is there anything to be done with this Bill after we read it a second time ? Is it to be thrown on the Table ? Is the Bill to be abandoned, or is it to be proceeded with ? Are we to do with it as the member for Bagot said, proceed with it de die in diem, and have the Bill reported for a third reading, so that in the event of negotiations with Manitoba not turning out sufficiently satisfactory, this Bill shall be ready to be put into law, and in the meantime like the sword of Damocles hang over the head of the negotiators in order to decapitate Manitoba should Manitoba not volunteer to decapitate herself. Sir, the Finance Minister indulged in an extraordinary argument in order to rally his forces in support of this measure. He treated it as a matter of no great importance, except that unless his followers supported the Government the Government might be placed out of office. Why, Sir, the country has come to the conclusion that it is a matter of very considerable importance. There is evidence all around, inside this House and without, as to the importance of the measure. A year ago a member of the Government, who at last has got outside the Government, left the Government, we are told, because of this measure. We are told that the Government halted in the middle of a general election because of this question.

We know that in July three members of the Administration resigned, one permanently and two temporarily, because of this question. Two months ago, seven members of the Cabinet went out, intending to throw this question overboard. They returned to their allegiance only when they learned, that, unless they took that step, the Conservative Government would resign. Is it a matter of no importance, that from one end of this country to the other, the people are excited, as they have been excited on no other question for many years? Is it not true, that this is a matter of great importance and far-reaching consequence, when party lines in this House are destroyed by it? What does it mean, that speech after speech is delivered by faithful followers of the Administration, standing up to-day and yesterday, declaring, that this measure was one of such importance, destroying party lines, that they felt it their duty to place country before party and vote against the Government? Do not those circumstances establish, that this is a question for the moment of immense importance, and, in the light of the past, is calculated if not wisely dealt with, to have far-reaching and disastrous consequences to Canada? There is an issue here that cannot be underestimated, and if the Finance Minister, or any other member of the Government, takes the view, that it is an immaterial issue to-day, he fails to realize the importance of this measure. A quarter of a century ago, at the commencement of confederation, what was the leading influence that caused all the statesmen and all the people of Canada to assent to the distribution of powers under the Confederation Act, as we have it to-day? It has been stated, and stated correctly, by previous speakers, that in the old province of Canada legislation had broken down and that an era of anarchy was at hand, and that, among other causes, education, being a subject to be dealt with by the representatives of the two provinces, had become a disintegrating influence among the people. It had aroused class against class, creed against creed, race against race; and by this new scheme of confederation the subject of education was relegated, as far as possible, to the local legislatures. And yet we have it again, finding its way again into the Parliament of Canada. There are seven provinces in this Dominion, there is territory out of which to carve many more. There is a minority in every province. Shall we to-day, hastily, thoughtlessly and without due consideration, without first exhausting every other means of settlement, legislate as is proposed by this Bill, and place upon our statute-book a statutory invitation to the minority in every province now existing, and every province that may hereafter be carved out of our territory, to appeal to the people's representatives in this Parliament to settle questions that might be better settled, under the spirit of the Confederation Act, by the provinces in which those questions arise? We have been six years dealing with this one issue, six long years, and we are only at the threshold of it yet. Should we place this Act on the statute-book, is there any one gifted with foresight enough to tell us to what end it is going to lead the people of Canada? Is there any one who will venture to state, that it is the ending of serious conflicts on this question, even until it may end in the destruction of Canada itself? I regard the question, at all events, of such importance that it cannot be lightly dealt with, and it should not be dealt with in a narrow, a partisan, or a party spirit, but with one object, and one object only, what is the best, the most wise, way whereby to deal with the question, in the interest of the whole people of Canada. I deplore the speech delivered by the leader of the House, in introducing this measure, not only the manner, but the leading arguments. He told us, that he helped to form confederation. He did. He pointed out the natural advantages of our country, our Imperial connection, our political institutions, and he said, that, with these, he proposed to build a great people. Sir, I would ask the leader of the House: Will mere confederation make a great people here? I value confederation; but confederation itself will not create a great people. I acknowledge that Providence has been bountiful to Canada. Our country is rich in natural resources; but natural resources will not make a great country. I am proud of our Imperial connection; but Imperial connection alone will not make a great country. None of these things alone will make a great people in this country; and, whilst we may differ as to our prospective national greatness, I am within the mark, when I say, that no country can be great unless, in addition to other advantages, it possesses a united people and he who would throw the apple of discord among us, and appeal, like a demagogue, to the prejudices of the people, that man is the worst enemy of Canada. Sir, the country will deplore the speech made by the Secretary of State last night. Already, I doubt not, he regrets those rash, harsh, unpatriotic words that came from his lips yesterday. He, professing to desire a settlement, professing to be negotiating for peace, professing to have had overtures which were about to lead to the desirable end, inaugurates the era of negotiation which he says was big with promise for good, by charging the government of Manitoba, within twenty-four hours from the time I am speaking now, with having committed a robbery of money for a section of the people of the province. Sir, when these words, when that speech is read at the conference, what an ill-timed utterance it will sound, and, if the representatives of the people of Manitoba can, as I trust they will, prove superior to party questions, be superior to the hon. gentleman, and rise equal to the occasion, I trust they will overlook the unfortunate shortcoming of the gentleman leading the House to-day, and, overlooking and forgiving Canada for her temporary misfortune, will, with hearty good will, as I believe they will, seek to solve this problem in the best interests of all. Mr. Speaker, what did the Secretary of State tell us, and this utterance of his gives us the key-note of the whole conduct of the Government since the decision of the Privy Council. For brevity's sake, I will epitomize his remarks, but if I misinterpret them I will read the exact language. The Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) gave his notion of the law, and it was this : That the very moment Manitoba had interfered with any of the privileges of the minority, that moment she forfeited her right to legislate and the duty of legislation was transferred at once to this Parliament, and adding to that the decision of the Privy Council this Government was at once, without any other recourse, bound to introduce legislation and press it to a conclusion. Now, Sir, if that was their view of the law, I ask the Secretary of State now, if they believed that they had to press this Bill to a conclusion, how do they get the law which entitles them to suspend operations in order to try the efficacy of a conference ? Does the Secretary of State still persist in the opinion that the Government had no option except to proceed at once, without any delay of any kind, on the decision of the Privy Council. If that was the obligation on the Government, how comes it that they have delayed a year to carry out the law ? Sir, I do not wish to impart any harshness into the discussion, but I must say that all that has transpired since the judgment of the Privy Council goes to prove that the Government has either unwisely—I do not like to use an undignified word by saying stupidly, and I will not use that word—but may I say, that the Government have wantonly and blindly pursued a course which is calculated, in the judgment of all reasonable men, to be the most unlikely to attain the end that ought to be sought for. When this Government got a judgment of the Privy Council, instead of treating the Manitoba Government as a friendly government, and recognizing the supremacy of the people of Manitoba, or their equality as a friendly people, they issued a peremptory order calling upon the Manitoba government to surrender. What was the answer of the Manitoba government ? In the hope that the statement made to-night by the member for West Montreal (Sir Donald A. Smith) was well founded, I will trouble the House with a short review of the reply of the Greenway government in answer to the imperative order issued by this Government a year ago last March. Instead of the Greenway government replying to that violent and extreme and ill-considered order in language of a like character, they replied as follows:--

> Nothing could be more unfortunate from the standpoint of the Roman Catholic people themselves than any hasty or peremptory action on the part of the Parliament of Canada, because such action would probably produce strained relations, and tend to prevent the possibility of restoring harmony. We respectfully suggest to Your Excellency in Council that all of the above considerations call most strongly for full and careful deliberation and for such a course of action as will avoid irritating complications.
> We deem it also proper to call attention to the fact that it is only a few months since the latest decision upon the subject was given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Previous to that time the majority of the members of the legislative assembly of Manitoba had expressly or impliedly given pledges to their constituents which they feel in honour bound loyally to fulfil. We understand that it has been lately suggested that private funds of the Roman Catholic Church and people have been invested in school buildings and land that are now appropriated for public school purposes. No evidence of such fact has ever been laid before us, so far as we can ascertain, but we profess ourselves willing, if any injustice can be established, to make full and fair compensation therefor.

And in another place, in that same reply, the government of Manitoba, overlooking the character of the order from this government, begged of this Government, before taking such a rash step, to open negotiations for friendly adjustment. Well, Sir, the Government received this reply from the legislature of Manitoba that I have read, and then, instead of sheathing this sword, instead of cancelling the remedial order, they sent out another message to Manitoba. It is true it suspended action for a few months, but it suspended it with a threat. They called on Manitoba again, and Manitoba sent a reply and in discussing the wisdom of the action of this Government, they said:

> The remedy sought to be applied——

That is the coercion procedure.

> —the remedy sought to be applied is fraught with great danger to the principle of provincial autonomy. An independent consideration of the subject, as well as the recognized constitutional practice in analogous cases, clearly indicate that it should only be made use of as a last resort and after the clearest possible case had been made out.

Is there anybody in this assembly to-night who will controvert that statement. It seems to be conceded to-day on all hands that that is a correct statement of the position. How unfortunate that the Government did not make that discovery in time. The communication adds :

> It is obvious that so drastic a proceeding as the coercion of a province in order to impose upon it a policy repugnant to the declared wishes of > its people can only be justified by clear and unmistakable proof of flagrant wrong-doing on the part of the provincial authorities.

Does the Government controvert the accuracy of that statement ? What was their reply ? Did they ever point out any fallacy in that reasoning ? No, Sir, none that we know of. Further on Manitoba proceeds as follows :—

> It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the Legislative Assemby to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as before stated the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is with all difference submitted that such a course seems to be quite incapable of reasonable justification, and must create the conviction that the educational interests of the people of Manitoba are to be dealt with hostile and peremptory way by a tribunal in whose members have not approached the subject in a judicial spirit or taken the proceedings necessary to enable them to form a proper opinion upon the merits of the question. The inquiry asked for by the reply of the legislature of the remedial order should, in the opinion of the undersigned, be again earnestly invited, and in the event of the invitation being accepted the scope of the inquiry should be sufficiently wide to embrace all available facts relating to the past or present school system.

And further on, the legislature of Manitoba proceeds to say :

> In amending the law from time to time and in administrating the system it is the earnest desire to remedy every well-formed grievance and to remove every appearance of inequality or injustice that may be brought to notice. With the view of so doing the government and the legislature will always be ready to consider any complaint that may be made in a spirit of fairness and conciliation.
> It seems therefore most reasonable to conclude that by leaving the question to be so dealt with the truest interest of the minority would be better served than by attempting to establish a system of separate schools by coercive legislation.

Twice Manitoba sent this message of peace ; and can it be credited that from that day to this the Government have not taken the first step towards a satisfactory and friendly settlement by means of friendly negotiations ? We have it to-day, on the statement of the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) that at last he had to intervene—not because he was asked by the Government. They gave him no authority. They did not seem to desire that mode of settlement. But at last, so far as we can see, he passed by the Administration and ignored them, as His Excellency had to do. The hon. member for Montreal West volunteered his services to His Excellency, and he proceeded to do, self-appointed what the Government, the paid servants of the people, ought to have done months before. Now, Sir, I would like to know whether the course suggested by the hon. member for Montreal West is not the wiser one. We have had references made already to the working of the public school system in other provinces ; and it was a pleasing circumstance to hear the junior member for Halifax from his place in the House two days ago, tell us that the public school system of Nova Scotia is absolutely satisfactory to the minority as to the majority. There are many of the people of Nova Scotia engaged in administering the law in the province of Manitoba. Manitoba is largely made up of people from the maritime provinces and the other older provinces, and the same spirit that has helped to solve this problem in Prince Edward Island, in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia, each of which provinces has to-day a public school system and a public school system only—the same spirit will be found in Manitoba if the proper means are taken to evoke it. I was surprised, in view of the record of the Secretary of State, to hear him last night posing as the great, practically the only, friend of the Roman Catholic minority in this province. Why, Sir, only a few short years ago he was a member of this Parliament when the question of the New Brunswick school law came up. What was his attitude then ? For several years the minority of New Brunswick applied to this Parliament for relief. Their separate schools had been abolished. They asked Parliament, first, to veto the law. Then resolutions were sought to be passed asking this Parliament to use its influence with the Home authorities, and with the legislature of New Brunswick to grant relief to the minority. The Secretary of State was here then. Does he remember what his action was at that time ? Never once did he raise his voice on behalf of the minority of the province of New Brunswick. Day after day and year after year that question was debated in this House, and yet I cannot find in the record that he ever once opened his lips here on behalf of that minority. What is more, Sir, vote after vote, division after division, was taken, and never once did he record his vote in favour of the minority. Yet, Sir, he tells us that from his early youth until now he has been the champion of the suffering minority. He told us last night that he had placed on the statute-book of Nova Scotia a law so wisely framed, so different in substance from that which is now in force in Manitoba, that it gave entire satisfaction to the minority in Nova Scotia ; and that if the Manitoba Act was as good, he would not be introducing this Bill. He was asked a moment afterwards if he could explain the difference. I ask him now, is there any substantial difference between the two laws. Each of these laws establishes a public school system, common and uniform, and under the control of the people. It is immaterial whether it is under the control of the Government or of a council chosen by the Government. In either case, the machinery is the machinery of the whole people. How then can he say that he is satisfied not to interfere with the Nova Scotia law and yet he will interfere with a like law in another part of this Dominion. I would like to know from him or from any other member of this House, what possible good can come of the Bill now before the House ? Will it accomplish any benefit to the minority ? It will bring nothing but untold trouble on the minority as well as on the majority. I deplore, therefore, that the Government have apparently failed to appreciate the importance of this question or the gravity of the situation, and are apparently seeking to blind the people to their record for the moment by creating a new issue, in the hope that by demagogic appeals to passion, they may, perhaps, secure a temporary verdict at the hands of the people. It cannot be conceived in the interests of the minority alone, because the government of Manitoba have candidly and frankly assured the people that if the matter is left in their hands they will deal with it satisfactorily. No, Mr. Speaker, the unfortunate position is that we are warranted in drawing the conclusion, from what has taken place, that the Administration is not in the interests of the minority, not in the interests of Canada, but in the interests of those who occupy the Treasury benches to-day, are endeavouring to make political capital out of this question for their own private advantage. Sir, a more unworthy object than that could not animate men entrusted with power. And if such be not their object, why can they not now, in the face of the statement by the hon. member for West Montreal (Sir Donald Smith), declare : We abandon our false position, we recede from the position which we should never have assumed, and we propose now to commence where we ought to have commenced the moment the Privy Council delivered its judgment. What did the hon. member for Montreal West tell us a few hours ago ? He said he had been to Manitoba and had interviewed the government. Did he find the government of Manitoba manifesting that cruel spirit which has been attributed to it in connection with this question ? Sir, we all know the cautious character of the hon. member for Montreal West. We know that what he says he believes, and we know that, he being an observant man, a man of great judgment, a man who can read character, a man who has had great experience, political and otherwise, we are entitled to assume that the judgment he has formed as to the good intentions and worthy objects and high aims of the Manitoba government, and their desire to deal with this matter in a fair and satisfactory way, is well founded. What did he tell us ? He said that he had been met by Mr. Greenway in a spirit which showed that the Greenway government had an honest desire to do justice. If they have that honest desire, should not this Government give them the opportunity of putting it into effect ? Did they only develop that desire at that interview ? The communications from which I have read show that that has been their attitude from the beginning. The hon. member for Montreal West went on to say that the government of Manitoba was most anxious to have the matter settled, so as to do substantial justice to the minority, as well as to the majority, that the matter could be best settled by the local government, in the manner and friendly spirit offered by the Manitoba legislature a year ago, and which, in every communication since, that legislature has pressed upon the attention of this Government. Therefore, I think we are entitled to know now whether the Government intend to act upon the advice of the hon. member for Montreal West, and take the Manitoba government at their word. The Manitoba government have manifested an honest desire to deal with this matter in such a way as to do substantial justice to the minority and majority. Then I would like to know what warrant there is for this Government to longer imperil the success of those negotiations by maintaining their hostile attitude and holding over the heads of Manitoba this offensive weapon, the remedial order and coercive Bill. It is the duty now of the Government not to take formal or other votes, but to stand up and declare that they intend to recede from their position and to commence negotiations in a way that gives promise of success. If they do not, then we can have but little confidence in the sincerity of their professions, and if the negotiations fail, the responsibility must fall upon them. Sir, negotiators for peace do not negotiate with weapons in their hands and amid the roar of cannon. For a time, at least, when the flag of truce is shown, hostilities temporarily cease, and if we hope to promote a satisfactory solution of this troublesome question, should we not imitate negotiators on perhaps even more important occasions than the present one, and manifest an earnest desire to meet the other party in a conciliatory spirit. I trust that the Government will, before it is too late, act upon the advice given them by their own colleague from Montreal West and accede to the request, oft repeated, of the Manitoba legislature, and begin these negotiations, as they should have begun them, by the conference suggested by the hon. member for Montreal West ; and if so, I venture to say that success will crown their efforts.

Mr. BECHARD. I think the Manitoba school embroglio can properly be regarded as a most deplorable episode of our political history. Never since the inauguration of confederation has this country been the theatre of an agitation of so dangerous a character as that which has been prevailing during the last few years with regard to this question. I am sure that all good citizens deeply regret this agitation, for in a country like Canada, with a population composed of two distinct nationalities, speaking two different languages, professing divers religious creeds, its prosperity, its progress, its stability require that all men who pretend to love their country ought to endeavour, by all means in their power, to promote the growth of a feeling of reciprocal respect and mutual sympathy between the diverse sections of our population. Sir, at this stage of the question, I have no desire to recriminate against anybody, but, viewing things as they appear to me, I think it is not too much to say that the principle source of this troublous situation is the government and legislature of Manitoba who, by enacting their school law of 1890, ungenerously, not to say unscrupulously, disregarded the rights of the minority. However, I believe that the agitation which followed could have been averted, had the Canadian Government assumed at the outset a firm, resolute and well-defined attitude. But by their policy of delay they contributel to a considerable extent to give rise to that agitation. Sir, after the judgment of the Privy Council declaring that by the enactment of the Manitoba school law of 1890 the minority had been aggrieved, and that the Government and Parliament of Canada had the right to interfere in order to redress their grievance Ministers of the Crown—at least one of them—went to the province of Ontario, and there, in public gatherings declared that the Government of Canada would never interfere, whilst, at the same time, other Ministers went to the province of Quebec, and there, in the most formal terms, declared, that the Government were determined to interfere in order to do justice to the minority. Well, Sir, these double-faced tactics in irritating public feeling considerably contributed to aggravate the situation.

I share the opinion of those who believe, that the Manitoba school law of 1890 ought to have been disallowed. That legislation, in suppressing the separate schools which existed in that province by virtue of provincial legislation enacted in the year 1871, and in accordance with the Manitoba Act of 1870, was a manifest violation of the rights of the minority, and that violation of the rights of the minority, it seems to me, was sufficient reason to justify the disallowance of that legislation. Sir, in my opinion, no man was placed in a better position to advise His Excellency to disallow that law than the late Sir John A. Macdonald, who was then at the head of the Government. He was well acquainted with the circumstances and the facts relating to the subject. He knew perfectly well, that the delegates of the Red River Territory who represented both the Catholic and Protestant elements, in their negotiations with the Government in 1870, made an agreement with that Government, one of the conditions of which was, that the separate schools which then existed in the Red River Territory, should be maintained, and that the maintenance of these schools should be secured by legislation. He knew, also, that in 1870, when Parliament was invited to pass the Manitoba Act, it was its manifest intention that the clause relating to education, should have the effect of securing to the newly organized province of Manitoba the existence of separate schools. I had then the honour, which I have been enjoying ever since, of being a member of Parliament. While the delegates of the Red River Territory were here—and they were here quite a long time—I had opportunities of conversing with them on several occasions, and I distinctly recollect, that, whenever I spoke to them on that subject, they always told me, that the maintenance of the separate schools which then existed in the territory, was one of the conditions of agreement between them and the Government of Canada. Besides, Sir, it was a current report amongst members of Parliament, that such was the case. I see my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Costigan) in his seat. He was also at that time a member of Parliament, and he can state, that I have correctly reported the facts which I just referred to. It was the current report among members of Parliament, at that time, that one clause of the agreement was the maintenance of separate schools in the newly-organized province of Manitoba, and I never heard that this statement had been denied by anybody. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in the course of his very able speech the other night, said, that the first clause in the Manitoba Act with regard to education was found to be meaningless. That may be. But the fact, that it is in the statute is an indication that it was intended to mean something. It is an indication that Parliament knew that separate schools existed by practice in the Red River Territory, and also an indication of the manifest intention of Parliament that the system of separate schools should be secured to Manitoba by legislation. To support my contention, I may mention the fact, that an amendment was moved, when the Bill had reached the third reading, by the late Mr. Oliver. I have the amendment here, but I will not trouble the House with the reading of it. It was to the effect, that the Bill be recommitted to a committee of the Whole House, in order that the clause relating to instruction should be struck out. Surely, Sir, if that clause had not been intended to mean that the existence of separate schools in Manitoba should be secured by legislation, there would have been no reason to move that amendment. Now, besides the knowledge of these facts and circumstances, the late Sir John A. Macdonald possessed great personal advantages to fortify his position, had he been inclined to advise the disallowance of the Manitoba School Act of 1890. His life-long experience in the politics of Canada, his great reputation for statesmanship, his immense personal prestige, the great influence he exercised with the people of this country, gave him all the moral power that he could need in order to assume the responsibility of advising His Excellency to disallow that law. Had that been done, I sincerely believe it would have settled the question at once, and created a precedent full of beneficial teachings for the future. But instead of adopting that resolute and straightforward course, the Government of Canada preferred to resort to the faint-hearted policy of temporization, which has contributed in a large measure to the agitation which is now prevailing, and has led to the present embarrassing situation. I know it is objected that if the power of disallowance had been made use of in that case, it would have been of no avail, because the legislature of Manitoba would have re-enacted the same law, at its following session. Well, Sir, all I can say is that, if after disallowance had taken place, the legislature of Manitoba had had the audacity to re-enact the same legislation, the Government of Canada had power, and it should have had sufficient courage, to disallow it again. Sir, such a course in preventing this iniquitous law from going into operation would have soon compelled the government and legislature of Manitoba to seek some friendly way of having the difficulty settled. Now, I would like to know why, when this power of disallowance is made use of with regard to minor matters, it is to remain an idle instrument when the question to be dealt with is involving interests of the most vital importance. I had always thought that this power of disallowance had been given to the Governor General in Council to protect the constitution of which they are the official guardians, and also the rights of minorities against encroachments on the part of provincial legislatures. Mr. Speaker, after the judgment of the Privy Council, declaring that the minority of Manitoba had a grievance, that they had an appeal to the Governor General in Council, and that the Government and Parliament of Canada had the right to interfere ; after that judgment was rendered, it would have been wise policy on the part of the Government to resort to conciliation. I think that the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) has indicated to-day the very best mode in which this question can be settled in a satisfactory way. The Government of Canada ought to have invited the government of Manitoba to a joint conference in order to discuss that question from beginning to end, and to ascertain whether, and on what conditions, an arrangement satisfactory to all parties concerned could be arrived at. From the attitude assumed by the Manitoba government after judgment of the Privy Council had declared their school law "intra vires," it ought to have been obvious to everybody that whilst they might yield to persuasion, they would remain deaf to any communication bearing the character of an order, or the lightest shade of a threat. It is admitted to-day that on all occasions when a question arising is involving conflicting interests of a grave nature, diplomatic and conciliatory means are the most proper to lead to a satisfactory solution of the existing difficulty and had the Government followed such a course, I believe that this question would have been settled some time ago. But after the Canadian Government had issued their remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, it seems that a spirit of antagonism took possession of the two governments, and rendered impossible any amicable settlement of the question between them. Now, Sir, we have before us a Bill which is called a Remedial Bill, and which purports to redress the grievance of the minority in Manitoba. Will it be an adequate remedy to the wrongs of the minority ? I do not believe it. Sir, the more I study that Bill, the more I am convinced that it is insufficient, incomplete, and that it will not do justice to the minority of Manitoba. I find in this Bill the machinery for the establishment of a system of separate school in that province, but I fail to find the power whereby this machine can be set in motion. In that Bill, the Manitoba government is invested with power to put it into operation. Well, Sir, when we know, as we know beyond possibility of doubt, that the Manitoba government is hostile to this legislation, I think it would be childish on the part of members of this House to believe that they will accept this Bill and put it in operation. The dispositions of the Bill which say that the Manitoba government shall nominate the members of the Board of Education and the school inspectors, that they will give to the minority their due share of all money grants which might be voted by the legislature for school purposes, are, in my humble opinion, entirely misleading. We know perfectly well that the Manitoba government will pay no attention to this Bill, except, perhaps, with the view of fettering its operation as much as they find it in their power to do so. Sir, I find in that Bill that if the Manitoba government do not nominate members of the Board of Education, after three months have elapsed, those nominations shall be made by the Federal Government ; but I fail to find, in case the Manitoba government do not yield to the minority their due share of all money grants voted by the legislature for school purposes, in what manner this deficiency shall be supplied. Is this Government prepared to declare that they will accept the amendment of which my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Dupont), has given notice ? Are they prepared to declare that they will accept at least his amendment relating to clause 74 of this Bill, and which provides that if the Manitoba government do not give to the minority any grants of money, this deficiency shall be supplied by the Federal Government. If the Government are prepared to declare before taking the second reading that they will adopt this amendment, which will make the Bill a workable and acceptable Bill, I am prepared to support it; and without being authorized to speak for any one but myself, I venture to say that the Bill would then be supported by nearly all the Liberal members from the province of Quebec. But, Sir, I do not believe the Government can make such a declaration because the Bill is a compromise. Our eyes are not closed to the fact that within the last six or seven months we have had two ministerial crises with respect to this question, and that the Ministers who resigned on both occasions, in resuming their portfolios must have come to some arrangement with their colleagues, to some compromise, the result of which is this Bill. They cannot accept any amendment, because the acceptance of an amendment would be a breach of the compromise. I find only one commendable feature in the Bill, it is its principle. I like the principle of this Bill, but I tell the Government that when by introducing it they invite Parliament to intervene to protect the rights of the minority in Manitoba, they should have provoked that intervention by a Bill involving by its completeness and efficiency the full application of the principle embodied therein. Since the beginning of the session, I told every one with whom I had an opportunity to converse about this question that I was in favour of remedial legislation. But when I first saw the Bill I met with a deception. However, I thought that after studying it a little more closely, I might perhaps be able to vote for it, but after thoroughly examining it, giving particular attention to its details, I found it was so incomplete and inefficient, and would impose so heavy burdens on the Manitoba minority to raise a revenue for the purpose of paying a superintendent, school inspectors, collectors, teachers, secretary-treasurers and other expenses that would be incurred by the operation of the Bill; and, finding all these expenses would have to be defrayed by taxation on the people, without the assistance of any money grants from the government, I came to the conclusion that this Bill had been derisively called a Remedial Bill and ought to be rejected.

But it is said that the leaders of the minority in Manitoba accept this Bill; that His Grace Archbishop Langevin accepts it. Such is the case, at least apparently. After the language spoken at different places by Archbishop Langevin from the pulpit in the province of Quebec during the last summer, his reported action may cause surprise, for he then stated that he would accept nothing less than the complete restoration of the rights of the minority. However, I can conceive how he is willing to accept this Bill. He accepts it, but as a last resource; he accepts it because he has been persuaded by parties in whom he has confidence that he cannot get anything better. He accepts the Bill, but as the drowning man who, in the last convulsion of despair catches at any floating straw, in the hope it might save him from destruction which threatens him. For my part, I have good reason to believe that better conditions than what is provided for in this Bill can be obtained for the minority, and for these reasons I cannot support it. It has been stated by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) that the government of Manitoba, which deprived the minority of their rights, is a Liberal government. Well, Sir, whilst I am prepared to vote against this Bill on account of its inefficiency, I do not wish to create the impression that I am hostile to separate schools and to the maintenance of the rights of the minority, or that I have any sympathy with the action of the so-called Liberal government of Manitoba. Mr. Speaker, I am a Liberal, but I can have no sympathy for the deeds of any government, be it Liberal or Conservative, when I am convinced that they have committed a grievous wrong and an unpardonable injustice. I am a Liberal in every fibre of my being, but at the same time, I have much respect and reverence for the eternal principles of justice and equity. I am a Liberal, not of yesterday, but of old date, counting more than twenty-eight years standing, as a member of this House, and all the time in the ranks of the Liberal party, but I believe I understand Liberalism, otherwise than the Manitoba government. Liberalism, as I understand it, is something which is inaccessible to the baneful suggestions of bigotry and intolerance. As I understand it, it is the noble expression of voluntary, wise and rational toleration. Liberalism, as I understand it, recognizes the natural right of the parent to determine what education his children shall receive. Liberalism, as I understand it will not impose on a part of the community under the form of taxation useless sacrifices, practically resulting in the exclusive benefit of the other part. Sir, true Liberalism respects the rights of minorities, whilst bigotry and intolerance absorb and annihilate them. True liberalism has in view the respect of man and of his inherent rights, whilst intolerance, in all its aspects, is the contempt of the rights of others carried to its highest degree. Sir, I can understand Liberalism, as generally practiced in the province of Quebec, but I confess I cannot understand it, as it is presently practiced in Manitoba. My sympathies therefore are not for the strong, but for the weak, not for the oppressor but for the oppressed. There exists such a thing in this country as the rights of minorities. These rights have been acknowledged by our best statesmen in both political parties, as being as sacred, and as much entitled to the respect and the consideration of all men, as those of majorities. Such were the liberal views of the statesmen who framed the constitution which rules this country and who are called to-day the fathers of confederation. Amongst those rights which are called the rights of minorities is the right for any minority to procure for their children, under the protection of the law, an education in accordance with their wishes, their wants, and the dictates of their conscience. That, after all, Sir, is nothing more than the natural right of the parent to determine what sort of education his children shall receive. That right of the parent I hold to be as sacred and as unalienable as the right to his own existence, and, although the state may have the legal power, it has not the moral right to take it away from him. Sir, if there is a right dearer than another to the heart of any man, it is that which leaves him the full enjoyment of his liberty in matters affecting his conscience, and the least attempt to restrict that right will be bitterly resented by those, who are effected thereby and provoke, on their part a disposition to resistance. Sir, to coerce a people, as the minority of Manitoba have been coerced for the last six years, to compel a people to pay taxes for the support of schools to which they cannot send their children, because the education given in these schools is not at all the education which parents feel in conscience bound to procure for their children, is, in my humble opinion, one of the most odious forms which tyranny can assume. It is an act of not mere injustice, but of odious oppression which is dishonouring the character of free British institutions. Is it not most deplorable, at this period of our history, when education and knowledge are spreading through the different classes of our people, that we, in Parliament, have to confront a piece of legislation which, by its oppressive character on a part of the community, threatens to array race against race, creed against creed, and to convulse this country, from one end of it to the other ? Sir it is obvious, that my opposition to this Bill is for reasons quite different from those which have been urged by certain members of this House. From what has been said, since the beginning of this debate, I think, that the opponents of this Bill can be classified in three categories : First, those gentlemen who, like myself, oppose this Bill because they find it incomplete, inefficient, and unworkable. Second, those members of the House who would not suppress separate schools, who tolerate them, but are reluctant at the interference of Parliament, because they regard such interference as an act of coercion against the province and as an invasion of provincial rights. Third, those gentlemen who are opposed entirely to the existence of separate schools, and who pretend that we should have only one system of schools, a system of public schools with merely secular teaching and free from all religious influence. Sir, I cannot, for my part, regard the interference of Parliament as an act of coercion against the province of Manitoba. Common sense tells me, that it would be simply the exercise by Parliament of a constitutional right, not to coerce any one, but to relieve the minority from the coercion to which they have been subjected for some time. Nor can I think that such legislation is an interference with provincial rights, because our provinces exercise only delegated rights, and they exercise no rights as being inherent to sovereignty, for they are not sovereign. They exercise certain delegated rights within certain prescribed limits, which they cannot exceed. Amongst the rights which have been delegated to provincial legislatures, is the right to legislate with regard to education, but that right, it is well known, has been delegated only with certain restrictions which act like bulwarks and like safeguards protecting the rights of minorities against any encroachment on the part of majorities.

Now, passing to another aspect of the question, I call the attention of the House to the fact that the minority in Manitoba number about 20,000 souls, and of that number, more than 11,000 are French Canadians. It has been said that if separate schools were granted to the Catholic minority, the Icelanders and Mennonites would be entitled to the same privilege. I would like to remind hon. gentlemen that French Canadians are not strangers in Canada. They are not immigrants who have come from foreign countries to settle on our lands. Their ancestors were the discoverers of this country from one end of it to the other. They were the first pioneers who, led by their devoted and intrepid missionaries, went into the wilderness and there sowed the first seeds of civilization. French Canadians have inherent rights, which have been guaranteed by treaty and legislation, and which cannot be ignored. They claim no favour, no privilege, but they claim the right to stand in their country, with regard to the exercise of certain franchises and rights, on a footing of equality with the other subjects of Her Majesty. There could not be found any where on this vast globe, a more intelligent, industrious, peaceable and hospitable people. They love their country very dearly, and they are loyal in the full acceptation of the word. No man could have any reason to suspect their loyalty, which they have proved as nobly and as efficiently as the people of any other part of the colonial empire of Great Britain. I need not refer to those two memorable occasions when temptations being in their way, they firmly resisted its allurements and remained faithful to duty. They courageously shed their blood to preserve this country to the British Crown, to which they clung with something more than filial devotion. Now, Sir, I am convinced that my words will receive at least the tacit assent of this House when I say that for their unshaken and persevering fidelity, for the great services which they rendered to this country, the French Canadians deserve better reward than the unfriendly treatment whereby their brethren in Manitoba have been placed, with regard to the exercise of certain rights, in a position of inferiority. Inferiority means inequality, and, in the eloquent language of Mr. Gladstone, the stamp of inequality is the brand of degradation. Mr. Speaker, my main reason for opposing the Bill now before the House is that it leaves the minority in Manitoba branded with the stamp of inferiority.

There are gentlemen in this House who oppose this Bill because they are entirely opposed to separate schools—because they contend that a system of public schools, with purely secular teaching, is the best system. There are no doubt a large number of people who prefer that system to any other. But, it must be borne in mind that there are also a very large number of persons, not only Catholics but Protestants also, who do not like that system, and who prefer that the education of their children be somewhat immersed in religion. They prefer that their children should receive an education which would develop in their young minds and hearts the love of religion, and of those principles of morality which may have an influence upon their future life. A couple of those gentlemen have referred to the fact that some European countries have done away entirely with religious education, and have secularized the teaching in the schools. But I believe it cannot be doubted that there are to-day in those countries a very large number of persons who, after having been favourable to that system have come to regret it, when they contemplate the numerous subversive doctrines that prevail in some European societies, and which are feeders of socialism. Sir, let me quote the words of a celebrated French writer, Mr. Jules Simon, who has been, all his life, a free thinker. In an article which he published about a year ago, I do not remember in what review, he uttered these words :

> When I was Minister of Public Instruction more than twenty years ago, I did all that I could to secularize the teaching in the schools. I did not succeed, I thank God for it. Others who came after me have succeeded. I regret it ; it is a misfortune. I regret it, since I saw boys twenty years old throwing dynamite bombs on the heads of our representatives in Parliament.

Sir, the men who would establish in this country a system of public schools, with mere secular teaching, are the men who say openly that minorities have no rights other than those which they enjoy in common with the rest of their countrymen. They are the men who told us no longer than a couple of days ago, by the mouth of their most illustrious leader, that they do not want to disturb the separate schools in Ontario. Then, they must be repentant sinners, for they are the same men who, during the last two electoral campaigns in Ontario, for the election of members to the legislature of that province, did not hesitate to proclaim, as the first article in their programme, the suppression of separate schools, and who, on that ground, assaulted the position so gloriously defended by one of Canada's best statesmen and most illustrious sons, Sir Oliver Mowat. I say, honour—honour to the veteran statesman who, on those two occasions, fought for the constitution of his country, for the maintenance of the rights of the minority, and triumphantly succeeded in hurling back the wave of bigotry and intolerance which threatened to overflow his province. Those gentlemen to whom I have been referring, have a policy of their own. It is offered to the acceptance of the people of this country under the captious name of equal rights. It is a new platform erected in our political field. Since confederation, I had never heard of it until a few years ago, when it first attempted to take ground in our political domain. Possibly, the doctrine of equal rights is not altogether new in Canada ; but I believe, that the name under which it is now travelling in Ontario and Manitoba, is of recent coinage. However that may be, the most important thing is to know its real meaning. So far as I could understand it, such as expounded in speeches delivered within the last few years at different places in Ontario, it consists in the suppression of the separate schools and the official use of the French language, wherever they exist in this Dominion, except, perhaps, in the province of Quebec. That policy can be resumed in the following formula : One school, one language. Sir, I say, that, in a country like Canada, with a population composed of two distinct elements, speaking two different languages, professing divers religious creeds, such a policy, must, of necessity, be unsound and impracticable. It is a policy calculated to throw a ferment of discord among the citizens of this country ; it is a policy which is bound to lead to strife, disturbance and disunion. By far wiser and more patriotic is the policy which was adopted by the fathers of confederation, who, in framing our federal constitution, embodied in it the great principle of equality of rights before the law, but the law so understood and framed on such a wide basis that it could meet the views, wishes and wants of all the elements composing our population. Sir, it is the equal right for each element, each race and creed, to enjoy certain franchises and rights, in the enjoyment of which the law will protect them. It is for them the right to exercise those franchises and rights to the best advantage, for their own benefit and advancement, limited, however, by the requirement that they must not infringe on the rights of others. This, I believe, to be sound doctrine for a country like Canada. I believe the observance of that doctrine would make

Canadians a united people. It is a doctrine of peace and concord. It is a doctrine which will promote harmony between the different classes of our people. I believe it to be eminently social and, at the same time, eminently Christian. I venture to say, that it is in perfect accord with the precepts of the Divine Law-giver, when he said: Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. Surely, everybody admires the sublimity of the doctrine contained in that scriptural quotation. It is the most perfect teaching ever given to mankind. It is preaching the great principle of toleration, and, I dare say, is underlying true Liberalism. It is a doctrine of peace, of charity, and of fraternity amongst men, preaching equality of rights for all, and which was brought on earth from heaven for the guidance and benefit of all men of good will. Let that doctrine prevail, and it will produce such beneficial results and such blessings as can possibly be bestowed upon a nation. These gentlemen who believe in public schools with merely secular teaching, do not find, apparently, that the Manitoba government and legislature committed an injustice to the minority, when they deprived them of their separate schools; but, if it is just, if it is fair and right for the majority in Manitoba to deprive the minority of the official use of their language and of their separate schools, does it not occur to you, that it would be equally fair, right and just for the majority in Quebec to do the same thing? Sir, I cannot see the difference between the two cases, so far as the moral right to perpetrate such an injustice is concerned. Suppose for a moment, that some day the majority in Quebec would become so ill-advised, so misguided, as to deprive the minority of the official use of their language and of their separate schools, both of which are institutions they prize very dearly, what do you suppose would occur? Every gentleman in this House can see, at this very moment, what would occur. A burst of indignation and anger would suddenly resound from one end of the country to the other, the wildest appeals would be made to popular passions and prejudice, popular masses would be roused, a legion of agitators, fulminating their most terrible anathemas against the majority in Quebec would be seen swarming in every direction, and, to complete this picture, you would see the champions of equal rights taking the lead, holding indignation meetings here and there, principally in Ontario and Manitoba—and proposing what? Nothing less extreme, nothing less extravagant, than the conquest of the province of Quebec by the Ontario boys, and the complete extermination of the French Canadians. Sir, I could not better illustrate the peculiar taste of the champions of equal rights for the French Canadian people than by indulging for a moment in an historical reminiscence. In pursuing the history of the old Roman empire, one finds that Emperor Caligula, who reigned towards the middle of the first century of the Christian era, was often heard to exclaim in the midst of the horrible cruelties whereby he was constantly overawing the world: Oh, that the Roman people had but one head that I might cut it off with a single blow. Far be it from me, Sir, to attribute to any member of this House, or to any man in Canada, the brutal and bloodthirsty instincts which animated that historical monster; but I cannot refrain from thinking that if the French Canadians had only one head, or if all the heads of the French Canadians could be placed upon a single neck, every one of the equal rightists would be seriously exposed to yield to the temptation to get rid of the whole race by a single stroke of his hand. Thank God, Sir, no mortal man shall ever be exposed to such temptation. The French Canadians have more than one head. They count to-day nearly two millions of heads, and they multiply, to the deep chagrin of the equal rightists, with wonderful rapidity. At all events, the French Canadians, notwithstanding the illtreatment inflicted upon their brethren in Manitoba, notwithstanding that their nationality, their language, their schools, their religious institutions have been the object within the last few years of the violent attacks of a certain press and a few public speakers, they do not dream of vengeance either by retaliation or in any other manner whatsoever. They are determined to defend their rights, but they will do so with the calmness, the dignity and the moderation becoming the defence of a good cause. They will appeal not to violence, but to legal means. They will not appeal to popular passions, but they will appeal to the fairness, to the justice, to the honour, to the generosity of their English-speaking fellow-citizens, convinced that in doing so they will be met with fairness, justice and generosity. Mr. Speaker, the majority in Quebec will never become so ill-advised, so ungenerous, so insane as to ever dream of striking a fratricidal blow at their brethren of the minority, by depriving them of their just and equitable rights which they enjoy with the fullest freedom. In Quebec, we believe the minority have as much right to use their language in our municipal councils, in our courts of justice, and in our legislature, as the majority. We believe the minority have as much right as the majority to give to their children an education in accordance with their views, their wishes, and the dictates of their consciences, and any attempt to disturb that state of things by any man, however distinguished he might be, would be frowned down and discouraged by the majority. Sir, in Quebec it is no discredit for any one to be either an English Canadian or a French Canadian, to be either a Protestant or a Catholic. We all respect one another's nationality and creed and do not lose our time in idle discussions about a matter which, in our province, has received a satisfactory solution. Therefore, you may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that no association having the motives and professing the principles which are attributed to the P. P. A. could ever take root in Quebec. Thank God, philanthrophy in our province knows further limits than those which are assigned to that unpatriotic association. Sir, in the province of Quebec we believe in the great Liberal principle of toleration which permeates the education of our people. Under its influence the two elements of our population are animated by feelings of reciprocal respect and esteem and maintain relations of the most friendly character. To prove the accuracy of my statement, I could do no better than point out the fact that there are some gentlemen in this House who, notwithstanding the fact that they are of English extraction, and belong to the Protestant faith, represent counties where the French Catholic element is in the large majority. The hon. member for North Simcoe told us the other day that the minority in the province of Quebec had no reason to thank the majority for their generosity. Well, Sir, I answer that hon. gentleman : Show the same measure of unprejudiced feeling, the same measure of impartiality, the same measure of generosity in Ontario, Manitoba and elsewhere in this Dominion, and depend upon it, the concord and harmony which ought to prevail amongst the diverse sections of our people will never be disturbed. Sir, the upholding of the great principle of toleration has been most beneficial to Quebec, and does the greatest honour to the people in that noble province by showing the wholesome character of their education, as its results seem to contrast favourably to-day with what is taking place in some other parts of this country. Sir, I am proud to be a citizen of the province of Quebec ; when I find that she can point with pride to the manner in which she has given a satisfactory solution to a question which seems to be an almost insoluble problem in other parts of this Dominion. But, Sir, I would like to know for what reason, what is right and just for Quebec, could not be equally right and just in Manitoba, in the North-west Territories, and everywhere else within the boundaries of this confederation. Let the great principle of tolerance, which has contributed so much to the development of modern civilization, prevail. Let every man of education, every public speaker, every man having any influence, preach the observance of that principle to his friends ; let no politician, no newspaper writer, appeal to popular passions ; let the people alone about those vexed questions of language and education, or rather, appeal to their generous instincts, and you will soon see a feeling of harmony, of brotherhood, spreading throughout the different sections of this country. If there exists to-day complaints, criminations, violent discussions, if there exists agitation and discontent, it is because the great principle of toleration has been overlooked and disregarded by some, whilst it should have been respected and honoured by all. When the founders of confederation undertook the task of erecting that great work, they resolved to make the principle of toleration one of its corner stones. After much discussion and deliberation, considering the peculiar conditions in which stood some of the provinces to be confederated, they came to the conclusion that that great principle should be embodied in our constitution. When, a few years afterwards, in 1870, the Manitoba Act was adopted, the same principle was embodied in that Act ; and when, in 1875, under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie, the North-west Territories were organized, again the same course was adopted, and the same principle of toleration in regard to language and education, was embodied in the organic Act. Sir, when those statesmen were thus working together to complete and consolidate the edifice of confederation, when they were working with care and solicitude to shelter that great edifice from the reach of political strife, I am sure they little suspected that a quarter of century would hardly elapse before there would be found men who would not hesitate to lay a ruthless hand upon that great political structure, which they considered as the proudest monument of their lives. Most of these statesmen have now passed away, but their names will live for ever in the hearts of every Canadian. They have passed away, but they have left numerous friends in both political parties, who will consider it their duty to devote all their efforts to the maintenance of that great political edifice, and to uphold that great principle of toleration which underlies confederation.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a point of order, on a question rather pertaining to the internal economy of this House, and, if necessary, I will follow what a few words I have to say, with the motion that is always in order. This House has now been in session thirty-five consecutive hours ; the "Hansard" staff have been thirty-five hours without rest. They have reached the verge of collapse, both physically and mentally.

Mr. SPEAKER. Has the hon. member spoken on this question ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I have.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member has spoken on this question, he is out of order in speaking again.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move, then, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot move the adjournment after having spoken to the question.

Mr. LISTER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to say in reference to this motion that the course adopted by the Government in requiring this House to sit for thirty-five consecutive hours, is one that ought not to receive the approval of a member of this House. The question we are discussing is one of sufficient importance to have warranted a demand on the part of this House that the Government should have allowed ample time for its discussion. I consider the treatment of the "Hansard" staff is one that is not justifiable, and I think it would be a disaster to the House if that staff were to break down, or if any number of its members were to break down. The members of this House can take a rest, we can absent ourselves from our seat and take a rest, but these men——

Mr. SPEAKER. I am of the opinion that on a motion to adjourn, the hon. member cannot pursue that line of observations.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am about to come to the point.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must point out to the hon. member that when there is a motion to adjourn before the House, the discussion must have relation to the motion before the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I submit that the reasons I am assigning for the propriety of the adjournment, on account of the injury and injustice done to the "Hansard" staff, is a sufficient reason for my remarks. If not, I will forbear.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. At this early hour in the morning it is not my purpose to take up much time or attention of the House. Indeed, Sir, I would have taken somewhat less had it not been for the extraordinary speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, coupled with the addresses made previously by the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) and the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). Before going on with my remarks on this question, let me say that I do not believe that such charges as bigotry and fanaticism should ever be applied to any part of the province of Ontario. I have taken part in the discussion of the public questions of the day in that province for many years, and I tell the hon. member for Antigonish that he does not know what he is talking about when he says that there was ever an attempt on the part of the Conservative party in that province to destroy separate schools. Perhaps the hon. member for Antigonish could be excused in part, but how the hon. member for Russell could be excused, I cannot understand. He lives in the province, and he knows that there never was such a cry raised in the province of Ontario by the Liberal-Conservative party, as has been charged to-night on the floor of the House.

Mr. LISTER. Where were you in the Ontario election ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Sir, I will tell the hon. member where I was.

Mr. LISTER. With Margaret L. Sheppard.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. That may amuse hon. gentlemen, but the man who says that I ever met Margaret L. Sheppard on a platform, says what is untrue.

Mr. LISTER. On a platform ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Or anywhere else. An hon. member who makes use of such language is beneath my notice. That woman's name should not be mentioned in this Parliament at all in this connection. But I will tell the hon. gentleman where I was. I was on many platforms in the province of Ontario, and in nearly every constituency, and I never made use of the language such as has been charged here to-night, nor did I ever hear it used by others. What was the position of the Liberal-Conservative party in those contests. Was it an attempt to destroy the separate schools of the province ?

Mr. LISTER. Yes.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman says "yes," but he knows better. He knows fully what the object was. It was to bring these schools to a level with the other schools of the province, to have them inspected by the same inspectors, to have the same class of school books common to both, not to have any person placed on the high school boards because of his religion, and to allow Catholics the ballot at their elections of separate school trustees. That was the platform of the Liberal-Conservative party at the election, and prior elections. I could excuse any one of the three but the hon. member for Russell for such a statement seeing that they are non-residents of the province. The latter followed up his assertions with an attempt to censure the Government of Sir John Thompson for having appointed our leader, the Hon. Mr. Meredith, to a place upon the Bench, where, as a matter of fact, no purer man ever lived. A man among men, a prince of men, is the Chief Justice of Ontario ; yet we heard last night language of a most unjustifiable character applied to that judge. I do not propose to take up any more time in answering the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard). The greatest part of his address was not pertinent to the issue in this debate. What I wish to give the House is an explanation of my own position, for which I have been asked by almost every Liberal newspaper during the last three months, and I now inform them, that it is just the same as it was in the local campaign, twelve, eight and four years ago. We have heard tonight Sir Oliver Mowat spoken of in the highest language, and I am not here to detract one iota from the credit due to that gentleman, but, although I am a young man, yet I can remember the time well when Sir Oliver Mowat appealed to the people upon race and religious lines in a manner never heard of at the present day. He told the Orangemen, that he would vote for the Orange Bill until it became law, and his election notices and posters were printed in orange and blue. "No popery" was the cry of him and his party then. When I hear such charges hurled against hon. members on this side of the House as have been made to-night, it appears strange and stranger still, that hon. gentlemen's memories should be so frail and so short. What was my position in the late contest in North Ontario? I have been misrepresented by the hon. member for East Grey. The other night, the hon. gentleman in this connection did the Government great injustice. In the course of his speech, he said:

> Why, they have scarcely gone upon a single platform and dared to say that in the end they were bound to pass remedial legislation, and asked the electorate of this country to endorse it, and where the electorate have endorsed it.

Mr. LISTER. Did you not give a pledge?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman is entitled to an answer, and I tell him here and now, that I did not give a pledge to members of the Government, or to any one else. I am here to-night an unpledged man, and I will vote as I see fit.

Mr. McMULLEN. You will not vote wrong, I think.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman further said:

> When they went into North Ontario and put up their candidate, what were they obliged to do? They were obliged to have their candidate keep from the knowledge of the electorate their intention of passing remedial legislation, as they knew, otherwise, that he could not receive the support of the people.

Mr. SPROULE. That is correct.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. That is as incorrect as anything could be, for the Government had nothing to do with my attitude on the question in that contest. I took my position myself, and I kept it all through, and that too contrary to the strongly expressed claim of the Government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What was it?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman asks, what was my attitude. I was appealing to men who had known me a lifetime, they knew they could trust me, and I believe they can, and I further believe they will be satisfied with the vote I shall give on this question. I simply asked them to trust me. That is all I said. I have seen the Bill, and, when hon. gentlemen are ready to poll their votes, yea or nay upon the Bill I shall be found voting, too. I had made up my mind before I left the confines of North Ontario, as to how I would vote on the proposed amendment of the leader of the Opposition, but, when I got here, I found his proposed amendment was no longer thought of.

Mr. FOSTER. He changed too quickly for you.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I will tell the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) how I am going to vote, and I will explain it to him. I am going to vote against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is hardly necessary to tell us that.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is right.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Why should I vote against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. McMULLEN. Because you are a Tory.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition is the six months' hoist. So far as I am concerned, I am going to give those words their true literal meaning. I care not what construction hon. gentlemen opposite put on them, what their parliamentry meaning may be, as construed by them, because I say here that the parliamentary meaning of the words is cast aside by the leader of the Opposition. He has ruthlessly cast aside the parliamentary meaning of words, and I am going to act as he has done on that matter, but I am going to vote differently. Listen to the hon. gentleman's address the other day. The hon. gentleman told us, that he was in favour of the principle of the Bill, that there was an evil which had to be remedied, and yet the hon. gentleman wound up by moving the six months' hoist, which means a vote of want of confidence in the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. You will get a twelve months' hoist.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman says I will get a twelve months' hoist. He makes an interruption and then he claps his hands, so he works both with his mouth and hands. Now, Mr. Speaker, these are the very words the hon. gentleman would make use of, if he were assailing the Government upon any other great question. It was simply a want of confidence motion, and, in order to move it he has to do violence to the principles that he ought to enunciate by that very motion. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are other reasons why I should vote against that amendment. Member after member on the Liberal side of the House have gotten up and given their reasons for opposing the Bill. Now, is it enough for me when I see the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) voting for this amendment of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier). No, Mr. Speaker, I had the assistance of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) in my riding, in part, and in part I had not. Is it sufficient for me to see the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) voting for that motion. No, Mr. Speaker, because I know the large difference there is between the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) upon nearly every question. I can hardly understand them supporting that amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) together. Is it sufficient reason for me to know, that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), is the seconder of that amendment? Is it sufficient reason for me to know that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is a supporter of that amendment, and I a Conservative ? Sir, the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) spoke the other night of the Liberal-Conservative party being raked and torn asunder. Who is doing the attempt at raking and tearing it asunder ? If at any stage of this Bill I may have to vote against friends of mine, I shall do it with regret, because I am in the main in harmony with the principles enunciated by the Liberal-Conservative Governments for the past 25 years. I shall do it with regret, Sir, and not with joy, while the attitude of some members of the party would lead one to think they did oppose their party with feelings of rejoicing. I will give you another reason why I am not going to vote for that amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I quote the language of the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll), who is one of his leading supporters from Quebec. Listen to what he says :

> We on this side of the House support the principle of remedial legislation, a principle which ought to be put into practice.

And, again, he says:

> I am against the measure because it is not coercive enough to be really beneficial and advantageous to the minority.

And then he goes on to say :

> We are a united party and failing a settlement we want to intervene in this Parliament.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Carroll) is followed in language such as that, by the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) by the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Brodeur) and by other hon. members on that side of the House. Mr. Speaker, they want something better or worse than this Bill, whichever you like to call it, but that is not going to appeal to me as a reason why I should support the leader of the Opposition. Now, there is another reason. This matter has been before the people of this country for six years, as was called attention to by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) to-night. I think, Sir, that it is about time that this question was settled, one way or the other. The six months' hoist would mean to throw it upon the political surface of the country for, possibly, another six years, in my judgment. But we will settle the question here and now, by a yea or nay vote, before we close this Parliament, and then we will settle it, I hope, for all time to come.

Mr. LISTER. Do you think this Parliament will last longer than six months ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Mr. Speaker, the Government of this country is getting a good deal of talking done now by making use of the night as well as the day, and, I presume, that if they are sincere in this matter, as I have no doubt they are, we will get the work done. I do not think it would require that the House should last six months in order to get that work done.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. All right.

Mr. MULOCK. If I understand the hon. gentleman aright, he proposes to vote against the resolution for the six months' hoist and also against the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. member did not hear me say anything of the kind. It is time enough when I come to a second reading to tell him about that.

Mr. MULOCK. Did not the hon. member say that ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. An hon. member has no right to interrupt another hon. member in possession of the floor.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member allowed me to ask the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say to the House, that at this stage of the debate, these interruptions are not seemly.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I have not said, Mr. Speaker, how I am to vote on the second reading, and it will be time enough for me to say that when the motion is put. I do not propose, Sir, taking up any further the time of this House to-night. Let me say in conclusion, Sir, that our French fellow-members, such as the last who spoke (Mr. Bechard), have no right to hurl such names and epithets as they do at us in the province of Ontario. In every contest for the last twelve years in that province, we have endeavoured, instead of destroying the separate schools, to make them better. Speaking for myself, I would rather have a national school system in its largest and broadest sense. I do not endorse the language of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) when he says he would rather have separate than secular schools. I would rather have the secular than the separate schools. That is my opinion, at least. Why, Sir, in the province of Ontario, before we were disturbed by the two classes of schools, we were all educated in the one school. I am old enough now to carry my mind back to that day, when, in the public schools of the country there was no religious strife. No little Catholic said an unkind thing to a little Protestant, nor a Protestant to a Catholic. We were raised together, and in our own little school in one of the townships in the county in which I now live, we have there the well-known Bishop O'Connor, and there too we had the Rev. Father McBrady, one of the most talented priests of the city of Toronto. We got on well, and I believe our children would still get on in the same way, were the conditions the same. I do not think, that because we Conservatives in the province of Ontario have endeavoured to bring the two classes of schools as nearly together as possible, that we should be spoken of in this House, as we have been, and as the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) suggested I deserved to be spoken of, in an observation made here to-night. At any rate, Sir, I propose voting against the amendment of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the vote to be taken upon this measure without drawing the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice and of this House to an irregularity in procedure which I consider as serious. This question has now ceased to have in my mind the importance it had up to yesterday, because of the statements which were made to the House in the early part of the present protracted sitting. What took place today convinced me that what we are doing now is nothing but a legislative play. I think it my duty, before the second reading of this Bill, to raise a purely technical point. The jurisdiction of this House covers only a particular and altogether special case. We cannot extend our jurisdiction by a single jot. The jurisdiction which allows us to legislate in this matter, is given us by section 22 of the constitution of Manitoba, which, I think, is very clear, by the way, I may say that I do not see what need there was for the Government to have this clause interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. Our jurisdiction is dependent upon an Order in Council summoning the Manitoba government to do a thing which it be in their power to do, and which they refuse to do. Now, I submit to this House as a constitutional point, that there was no Order in Council summoning the Manitoba government to do a thing which it was in its power to do, and consequently, I contend that we cannot have any jurisdiction, and that we very uselessly for the last three months spent our time in shouting abuse at each other. For the last three months this House has been working at a Bill which has no significance. This may seem strong language, but I think it is justified. Let us see first the preamble of the Bill:

> Whereas the Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba, appealed to His Excellency the Governor General in Council under the provisions of section twenty-two of chapter three of the Statutes of 1870, intituled: "An Act to amend and continue the Acts thirty-two and thirty-three Victoria, chapter three, and to establish and provide for the government of the province of Manitoba," from certain Acts of the legislature of the province of Manitoba, passed in the fifty-third year of Her Majesty's reign, chapters thirty-seven and thirty-eight- —

I particularly draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice and of the former Minister of Justice to this description of the Acts, 53 Victoria, chapters 37 and 38:

> ——affecting the rights or privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority in relation to education, namely: "An Act respecting the Department of Education" and "An Act respecting Public Schools," and whereas such appeal having been duly heard and decided by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, such provincial law as seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of the said section twenty-two of the first mentioned Act has not been made and the circumstances of the case require that the Parliament of Canada should make a remedial law as hereinafter enacted for the due execution of the provisions of the aforesaid section twenty-two.

Referring now to the Order in Council of March 21st, 1895, upon which our jurisdiction depends, I find the laws in question described in exactly the same terms. First, the petition is recited forming the preamble of the remedial order, as follows:—

> That subsequently in the 53rd year of Her Majesty's reign, two statutes were passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba relating to education, which statutes came into force on the first day of May, 1890, and are entitled respectively "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," and that the effect of the two last mentioned statutes was to repeal the previous Acts of the province of Manitoba in relation to education, and to deprive the Roman Catholic minority of the rights and privileges which it had acquired under such previous statutes.

Then comes the enactment, the essential part of the Order in Council:

> And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to adjudge and declare, and it is hereby adjudged and declared, that by the two Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba, on the first day of May, 1890, intituled respectively: "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province have been affected.
> His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial act or acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890 so far as may be necessary.

If I refer now to the petition of the Catholic minority presented to the Governor General in Council on November 26th, 1892, I again find the Acts with which we are supposed to deal, described in the same terms, viz., the Acts 53 Victoria, chapters 37 and 38. Now, Mr. Speaker, these Acts, 53 Victoria, chapters 37 and 38, at the time the petition of November 26th was presented, had ceased to exist. This assertion will probably be a matter of surprise for the members of this House. It is indeed astonishing enough that such an error should have found its way in bona fide proceedings, and I have frequently asked myself whether really this was not a voluntary blunder. I stated, Mr. Speaker, that on November 26th, 1892, the two Acts, 53 Victoria, chapters 37 and 38, had no existence. Here is the proof. I read in the Manitoba Act, 55 Victoria, chapter 41, section 2 :

> On, from and after the coming into force of this Act, the Acts and parts of Acts set out in the schedule styled schedule A * * * shall be and the same are hereby respectively repealed to the extent set out in the said third column of said schedule.

Now, looking up this schedule A, I read the following :—

> Title of Acts : 53 V., 1890—ch. 37 ; An Act respecting the Department of Education. Extent of repeal : the whole. Ch. 38, The Public Schools Act. Extent of repeal : the whole.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried, carried.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) You will say carried when I am through with my argument, but not before. The Manitoba Act which I just mentioned, 55 Victoria, chapter 41, was sanctioned on April 20th, 1892. Was I right in saying that, on November 26th, 1892, the date on which the petition was presented, complaining of the Acts 53 Victoria, chapters 37 and 38, and on March 21st, 1895, the date of the remedial order calling upon Manitoba to repeal, amend and supplement in any manner, the Acts 53 Victoria, chapter 37 and 38, these Acts were no more in existence and had been repealed ? I would be curious to know what answer can be made to this. As I said a moment ago, our jurisdiction is under the authority of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, and we cannot go beyond. If there be no Order in Council obliging the province of Manitoba to act, if the province has not refused to do so, we have no jurisdiction and we cannot contend that the province of Manitoba has refused or neglected to amend, repeal or supplement in any manner, the statutes complained of. The Order in Council cited in the preamble does not mention the educational laws or those concerning the Department of Education, but the statutes 53 Victoria, chapters 37 and 38. These statutes having been repealed before the appeal of the minority, the Manitoba government could not be called upon to repeal or amend them. I say that under the circumstances, we have not the shadow of jurisdiction. I see the hon. Minister of Justice wishing to tell me that this law, which was repealed on April 26th, 1892, was re-enacted. But, Mr. Speaker, the law passed on April 26th, 1892, does not bear the same title. The remedial order does not speak of the statutes in any particular way, but mentions the title which I have given, and governs the procedure as far as the appeal is concerned. The statutes upon which the appeal was based not being in operation at the time the appeal was heard before the Governor General in Council, subsequent to which the remedial order was passed, it follows that the appeal as well as the Order in Council passed in consequence are worth nothing. The only Acts existing at that time were chapter 47 and chapter 127 of the Revised Statutes of Manitoba. These were, I repeat it, the only educational laws in force at the time the appeal was taken. Consequently we can only claim jurisdiction after an appeal from these laws and after an Order in Council rendered upon an appeal from laws in force on November 26th, 1892.

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) It does not matter.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) I hear an hon. member say it does not matter. He probably agrees with those who say that there is no question of passing a bona fide law, but purely and simply of asserting a principle. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), after having told us that the Bill before the House is not the true constitutional way to a settlement of the question, but that we should rather use the conciliatory means recommended by the hon. leader of the Opposition, concluded his speech by saying : Let us pass the second reading of the Bill in order to sanction its principle. I ask myself what principle we can sanction by debating for three months over a Bill which we have no jurisdiction to deal with. At all events, a paramount principle of any Bill should be its genuineness and its being intended to become a statute. And we are told that what we are debating over now is not meant to become a law ; but that what is wanted, is that we should assert a principle ? What principle ? Is it the principle that the Federal Government has the right to intervene in this question ? Surely no, since this principle is stated in plain letters in the constitution of Manitoba, section 22. And besides, this right of intervention has been clearly declared to exist by the highest tribunal of the Empire. Surely then it cannot be to assert this principle of the right of intervention, that we can be asked to vote the second reading of this Bill. Well, I ask what other principle can be in the Bill. I can see no other. In my opinion this Bill can only be but a wretched Pandora's box, full of all imaginable evils, but at the bottom of which hope even is not to be found. No ; it is but a wretched rag.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) Call me to order if you please ; this contempt is not for a law that has been adopted ; it applies to a measure under discussion, to a miserable rag of paper, which has been dragged over the land from one bishop's palace to another, begging for a blessing. I can add that the blessing has not yet been given ; and it will not likely be for a while, after the statements made before this House. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that in raising the point I now submit to the House, my position will not be interpreted as showing ill-will on my part towards the Manitoba minority, or as meaning a refusal to render justice to them. I do not deem it necessary, under the circumstances, having to deal with this unconstitutional measure, to make any declaration of sympathies in this relation. However, I may say that if I can by my vote, my influence or my words, help in the slightest way, the Manitoba minority to be reintegrated into its rights I will always be happy to do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CHARBONNEAU. (Translation.) My professions are fully worth those of the hon. members who shout oh, oh, on the other side of the House. I will not undertake to show how inefficient, how impracticable and how injurious to the French Canadian minority in Manitoba this Bill is. I only wish to explain the particular reason which prevents me from voting in favour of the Bill now before us. In order to give the hon. Minister of Justice and the Government the opportunity to consider the point which I have just submitted to the House, I move seconded by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. McInnes) that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER. I must oppose the adjournment of the debate. The leaders on both sides know why this debate ought not to be adjourned. An understanding was arrived at between them, that this sitting should end this debate. I simply leave the matter to the good sense of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made a motion to adjourn the debate to enable the Government to consider a point of law. I am not myself familiar with the details of the understanding alluded to by the Minister of Finance, but I am under the impression, that that arrangement had in view the conclusion of the debate at this sitting, and, therefore, I quite agree with him, that, unless by common consent, it might not be regarded as a strict adherence to that arrangement, if the motion were pressed. But the making of the motion enables the members, at all events, to discuss the point of law raised by the hon. member ; and, if there is anything in that point, the opportunity should be given for its discussion. However, with regard to the point made by the Minister of Finance, if it were seriously pressed, I think that even at this late hour, the arrangement should be cancelled. Circumstances have arisen which, I think, would warrant all parties in acquiescing in that proposition. I do not see the whip of our side present, but I am informed that, when the arrangement to conclude the debate at Wednesday's sitting was arrived at, a list of the speakers on the Government side was submitted, and, on the expectation that that list was a complete list, the arrangement was arrived at. Immediately thereafter, members on the Government side, whose names were not on that list, at great length addressed the House. Is that correct ?

Mr. FOSTER. No, it is not correct, as you state it.

Mr. MULOCK. I have not any knowledge of the matter myself, but I understand from our own whip, that that is the case. However, the point taken by the hon. member is one worthy of consideration.

Mr. DICKEY. Would the hon. gentleman state it.

Mr. MULOCK. As I understand the point, it is this. The Manitoba Act allows an appeal to this House, on certain formulas being complied with, namely, where a minority complains of having a grievance, the Government can issue a remedial order, calling upon the provincial legislature to legislate in a certain way, and, in default, jurisdiction accrues to this Parliament. It appears that the Act complained of was a statute of 1890. That Act, the hon. gentleman says, was repealed by the legislature of Manitoba ; the petition on which the Government issued the remedial order was not presented to the Government until the 26th of November, 1892 ; and you have issued a remedial order, calling upon the Manitoba government to reinstate a repealed Act, instead of amending something on the statute-book. Your remedial order, he contends, is a nullity, and, being a nullity, no legislation can be founded upon it. Of course, any mistake in a Bill is amendable, but, if the order itself is a nullity, there can be no legislation, and there cannot be jurisdiction in this House unless there is a valid remedial order. That is the point raised by the hon. gentleman on the motion to adjourn, and the motion of adjournment is, I presume, made to enable gentlemen to address themselves to this point, not to depart from the agreement arrived at.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. LISTER. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to call "question," but the point raised by the hon. gentleman is a very important one, and goes to the very foundation of the right of this House to interfere with the legislation of Manitoba. It is a point which, I think, should receive proper consideration at the hands of the Minister of Justice. Of course, if the intention of the Government is, as we all suppose, a mere pretense, then, it does not make much difference whether the House votes on this Bill or not; but, if the House intends seriously to legislate upon this grievance of the Manitoba minority, then, the objection raised by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, is a matter of very considerable moment.

Mr. MULOCK. The Act would be no good.

Mr. LISTER. The Act, as my hon. friend says, would be no good. What do we propose to do ? The remedial order is directed to the statutes of 1890 of the province of Manitoba. It is to remove grievances created by the statute of 1890. The statute of 1890 has been repealed by the Act of 1891. So that the remedial order is a nullity, because there is no statute for it to act upon. That seems perfectly clear ; and that being the case, you have asked the legislature of Manitoba to repeal a statute that is not in existence at all : and, if this legislation is to be valid and forceful, it is necessary that Manitoba should be requested to repeal the legislation of which the minority complain, which is not the legislation of 1890, at all, and, as my hon. friend suggests, there is no complaint against the other statute. So that, as a matter of fact, there is nothing in the province of Manitoba for this House to act upon. That is the position of the matter, and I think, that, before this House is asked to do anything with regard to the Bill now under consideration, the Minister of Justice should investigate the objection taken by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and satisfy himself that the objection is baseless before we proceed with the Act. Or if he find that there is something in it, that something prevents our going on at all, and it seems useless and profitless work to go on here voting and discussing a question when the whole work has to be done over again. While I am upon my feet,—I will take occasion to advert very briefly to the argument of my hon. friend and the statement he thought proper to make—the statement that the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) made in the speech he delivered a few moments ago. My hon. friend in most vigorous, if not violent terms——

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Not violent.

Mr. LISTER. Vigorous certainly, denied that during the local elections for the present Parliament of Ontario there was any assault made upon the separate school system of that province.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I said to destroy the separate school system.

Mr. LISTER. Yes ; to destroy the separate school system of that province. I take issue with my hon. friend, and I say to him that from his leader down, and it was not Mr. Chief Justice Meredith but Mr. Marter, who was the leader when the assault was made upon the separate school system of Ontario.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is misstating the facts. At the time of the general elections, the Chief Justice of Ontario was our leader and Mr. Marter was not. Now take that back.

Mr. LISTER. It does not make any difference whether it was Chief Justice Meredith or not. I believe Chief Justice Meredith was the leader of the party then, because Mr. Marter succeeded him, and in the by-elections Mr. Marter was the leader. Well, the leader of the party did not go as far as that, but his followers went from one end of the country to the other, and made an assault on the separate schools system and called for its total abolition.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. That is not so.

Mr. LISTER. They urged that if the province had control over legislation, the province could repeal it. In other words, that the power which created the Ontario system of education could repeal it. The people were told that they were the source of all power, and that if it was their wish, that legislation could be repealed.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Does the hon. gentleman say that was the position of the leader of the hon. leader of the Opposition ?

Mr. LISTER. I say it was.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. It was not or of the party either.

Mr. LISTER. I say, moreover, that never in the history of Ontario was a more bitter fight made by the Conservative party of Ontario than that fight, and that fight was an assault against the Roman Catholic people of Ontario.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. No.

Mr. LISTER. You brought in to the county the notorious Margaret L. Sheppard.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. That is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not see what connection that has with the question before the House.

Mr. LISTER. It is a question of adjourning the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already ruled that in such a case, the discussion must be relevant to the discussion before the House on which the adjournment of the debate is asked.

Mr. LISTER. If you hold it is not relevant, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot discover what Mrs. Sheppard has to do with the Bill before the House.

Mr. LISTER. As objection is taken to the fact of Mrs. Sheppard being in North Ontario——

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. She never was.

Mr. LISTER. She was not ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. No.

Mr. LISTER. We will see. Mr. Speaker has ruled that any reference to her is out of order. Then I say that the battle waged at the last elections was the battle of intolerance and bigotry against the Roman Catholic population of Ontario. Every body knows that. Take the speeches delivered from one end of the country to the other, and it becomes perfectly apparent that the Protestant portion of the people of Ontario were excited to a degree that I cannot exaggerate upon the school question —upon what they were pleased to term the so-called Ross Bible and against the Roman Catholic church generally. That was the sole question at the elections. The elections were fought out on that, and for three elections the question of separate schools and the Ross Bible were the questions before the electorate for their consideration. On three occasions were the elections fought out upon those grounds, but the Mowat government was returned to power because there was not and could not be any serious charge against its general administration. My hon. friend says that the grounds upon which the Conservatives of Ontario attacked the Government was that they were not making the schools as good as the public schools of the country.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. gentleman mistakes me there too. What I said was that the effect of the Conservative party in that campaign was to give them the same school books, the same inspection and the same class of teachers.

Mr. LISTER. That is the first time we have ever heard of it. Probably the hon. gentleman's constituents in North Ontario will remember whether the statement which he makes now is an accurate statement of the facts. Sir, the legislation which the Mowat government had given, was to make the schools more efficient, and the cry upon the platform was, you have no right to improve these, leave them bad, and by leaving them bad, they will necessarily die. What did Mr. Mowat do ? He improved the separate schools by giving the right to borrow money which other school sections enjoyed. That is the Bill of Mr. Mowat which was complained of and to which Mr. Meredith agreed.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. It was never complained of.

Mr. LISTER. Another was as to who should be separate school supporters, and Mr. Meredith agreed with that Bill when it came before the local parliament. Yet the hon. gentleman went from one end of the country to the other denouncing the local legislature on those two questions when, as a matter of fact, the leader of the Conservative party was a consenting party to it.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. It has been changed to our aspect since.

Mr. LISTER. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is wriggling. He was nominated as a supporter of the present administration, and, although the question of the Manitoba schools was discussed upon the platform——

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is in order to take up the discussion of the main question upon this motion to adjourn the debate ? It strikes me that the hon. gentleman was in a position which would not have allowed him very much freedom of discussion upon the main question. The motion is now made to adjourn the debate, and the hon. gentleman takes up the main question and discusses it. If he is in order, I must ask the attention of the House to this, as it certainly appears to me to be a motion for shoving off the main question, which we were supposed to have discussed and finished at this sitting of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) is in order in discussing the main question. But my own opinion is that he is wandering very widely from the question before the House in taking up a discussion pertaining to matters confined to the province of Ontario altogether. The hon. member has a right to speak to the question now before the House, but he must confine himself to that question.

Mr. LISTER. It must not be forgotten that the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) discussed everything from confedration, and even many years prior to confederation, down to the present time. I think I am not very far afield in answering the hon. gentleman from North Ontario on the statements he has made in connection with the local elections in that province. However, as you, Mr. Speaker, seem to think it is not strictly within the lines, I shall desist from dealing with the statements of my hon. friend as to what took place during that election. There is no doubt that the hon. gentleman is wriggling. He was nominated as the Conservative candidate for North Ontario. Everybody who remembers that election knows that the Manitoba school question was of engrossing interest to the people of North Ontario, as well as to the people of Cardwell and other constituencies in which by-elections were held. The Government was at that time pledged to introduce remedial legislation, and when the hon. gentleman says that the Bill we are considering was not an issue in that contest he is making a statement which one must be very credulous to accept. The hon. gentleman had six or seven Ministers of the Crown in the county speaking in the small schoolhouses and discussing this question. My hon. friend was asked what his views were upon the question, and, with a simplicity which does the hon. gentleman infinite credit and really makes one believe that he has always lived in the back-woods of North Ontario, that he could not tell them what his views were upon that question until he had seen the Bill.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. He would not tell them.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has been in the House for two months, and he has never told us what his peculiar views are upon this Bill, although he has seen it. I ask the hon. gentleman whether he did not tell his electorate that they knew what he was and they could trust him ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Hear, hear.

Mr. LISTER. And did he not tell others the same thing ? He was so well known in that county as an opponent of separate schools that it was unnecessary to tell them where he stood. It was only necessary to give them the wink and say : Don't you know me ? The hon. gentleman has squirmed and twisted and has worked his brain for all it is worth to find a hole to crawl out of. And, with the knowledge of parliamentary practice that does him great credit, he now says he will vote against the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition, but does not tell us whether he will vote for or against the Bill.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. You will find that out in time.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman is very secretive. Does not he know that by opposing this amendment he is voting for the Bill? Does not he know that the six months' hoist is an amendment against the further prosecution of the Bill this session, and that if he votes against it he affirms its principle? If he does not know that, he must be exceedingly ignorant or innocent. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Macdonald) says that the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) had a pledge from the hon. gentleman that he would not support the remedial order.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Mr. Speaker, I say that is untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. LISTER. I have nothing to take back. I only stated what my hon. friend behind me told me. The hon. gentleman denies it—very well. He says the ex-Controller of Customs backs him up—very well. Then there is nothing at all in the rumour afloat that he had given such a promise to the ex-Controller of Customs.

Mr. WALLACE. The ex-Controller of Customs does not back him up in that statement.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I did not hear what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. LISTER. He does not back you up in that statement.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I guess he will not say anything different.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior) addressed the House to-day upon this question, and deplored that these animosities should be aroused by reason of the introduction of a question of this kind before Parliament, and intimated that the leader of the Opposition in moving his amendment was acting in the interests of the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Does he not know that the amendment which was proposed by the leader of the Opposition, if carried out, would give effect to the policy which the leader of the Opposition has enunciated for months and years, and which this Government to-day has adopted ? Does he not know that this is the effect of the motion : Don't go on with this Bill now, but do as I have suggested ; have a conference with the Manitoba government, or issue a commission for the purpose of ascertaining whether the differences between these two legislatures cannot be settled in an amicable way, so as to leave no heart-burning, and no feeling of unfair treatment on the part of the minority or majority in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman deplores these sectarian differences, these religious animosities. The Minister of Finance, in his own eloquent way, deplores them to. The gentlemen who surround him, and who have spoken on the question, also deplore them. Why, Sir, these are the men who are responsible for the whole thing. If these men were honest in the pretense they make today, if they were honest in wishing to avoid all religious troubles, why was it that in 1891 they did not disallow the Manitoba Act ? There they were acting within their constitutional powers, they had a right to disallow it ; and if they were so tender, if they were so considerate as to the rights of the minority, it was the duty of the Government five years ago to have disallowed the Act of 1890, and kept to the minority the right which they had acquired under the Separate School Act of 1872. These men have trifled with the question. Because they were on the eve of an election they were afraid to disallow that Act. They cowardly declined to do it, and they left it to the courts, feeling reasonably satisfied that the Supreme Court would say that the law was within the power of the Manitoba legislature. That court did so decide, to the gratification of the hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches ; and they believed that when the case was sent to the Privy Council the judgment of the Supreme Court would be sustained; but they were mistaken. Now, what did these men do? They did everything that men could do who wished to antagonize and incur the resentment of the people of Manitoba. They issued a remedial order, and summoned that province to appear before the Privy Council of Canada before the judgment of the Privy Council had reached this country. They issued the so-called remedial order, after a hearing which took place before the Privy Council, in terms of the most offensive character, in terms which they now admit they cannot and do not propose to follow. There is no doubt that it was then the intention of the Government to go to the people, but for some reason they did not go to the people. Times were bad, the Government did not see its way clear to succeed at the election. Parliament was called together, and three Ministers of the Crown resigned their portfolios because the Government was not prepared to force through at that session, a Remedial Act. The Government were in a panic, they were ready to do anything to hold office, as they have always been. They coaxed the deserting Ministers, and the upshot was that upon the promise of the Government to call a special session for the purpose of passing remedial legislation, two of the Ministers returned to their portfolios. After the remedial order was issued last year, elections took place in Haldimand. The Government candidate said: We are bound to issue the remedial order, because it is in accordance with the judgment of the Privy Council, but it goes no further. In Verchères the Minister of Public Works called his Maker to witness that the Remedial Act would be passed at the following session. In Antigonish the Minister of Justice would not say for a week whether the legislation was to take place or not, as he knew that the election was going on in Haldimand, and he did not want to prejudice the statement made by the then Secretary of State in the county of Haldimand, and so he postponed a statement as to whether the Government would introduce remedial legislation. Well, Sir, the Secretary of State, in the long speech he made last night, said that the Hon. Joseph Howe had made two mistakes. Joseph Howe made three mistakes, and the last one was in allying himself with the hon. gentleman. From that moment he was a ruined public man. Sir, the Secretary of State would have made an excellent novelist, he is so full of fiction. If you take his speeches and take out the fiction portion of them, there is very little left. The hon. gentleman stated, and repeated what had been stated by gentlemen who had preceded him in this discussion that he deplored a war of race and creed. The speech of the hon. Secretary of State was a deliberate effort to renew intolerance and bigotry and war of race and creed. It was a deliberate bid on his part to get what he considered would be the support of an important body of the electors. The whole question so far as the Government and the Opposition are concerned is not as to the right of appeal, as to the power of this Parliament to afford a remedy, but it is one of policy, as to how and what should be done before Parliament undertakes to exercise the power which the statute gives it. The Opposition claim it was the duty of the Government before they passed this remedial order and undertook to legislate to have conferred with the government of Manitoba. The Opposition claim that the action of this Government has been ill-advised, and the natural result has been to antagonize the people of Manitoba and injuriously affect the rights of the minority in that province. The wisdom of the policy of the leader of the Opposition has been apparent in what has occurred within the last few days. This Government, which passed this extraordinary remedial order and brought down the Remedial Bill, are now adopting the policy advocated by the leader of the Opposition, a policy of conference and of conciliation. We are already told that notwithstanding the pledge made by the Government that they will pass this Remedial Bill, it is now proposed to hang it up after giving it a second reading and a conference between the Governments of Manitoba and the Dominion with a view if possible to end the difficulty. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries waxed eloquent in the direction of keeping down intolerance. He told the House that the Conservative party had ever been the party to keep down intolerance and make the Canadian people one people in order that they may become a nation. He attacked the Liberal party as a party fermenting discord. The Liberal party is not, however, the party that ferments religious strife. During fifteen years the "Globe" has used its great power for the purpose of suppressing religious bigotry and intolerance. The Liberal party does not proclaim that the province of Manitoba is not suffering from a grievance which should be remedied. The Conservative party avows that there is a grievance and that it should be remedied. So practically both parties are agreed on the question of a grievance and the necessity of remedying it. But the difference between the parties is as to how the remedy should be applied. The Conservative party declare that they will force Manitoba without conference or conciliation. The Opposition may say that as there is a grievance and in order that relief may be applied a policy of conference and conciliation should be pursued. That is the difference between the two parties. It is a matter of which the Liberal party may feel proud, that after all the boasting, and after all the extraordinary conduct of this Government, after their threats to the province of Manitoba, and after the cavalier manner in which they treated that province, it is a matter of congratulation to the Liberal party of this country, that the Government has been compelled at last to adopt the policy of the Liberal party, and to apply conciliation rather than force and violence. To show how unreasonable this Government has acted in regard to this question, I would call to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that the judgment of the Privy Council was rendered on the 13th December, 1894, transmitted on the 19th February, 1895, and the proceedings before the Canadian Privy Council began on the 26th February, 1895, before it was possible for the judgment of the English Privy Council to reach Canada. The covering order was on the 19th March. The remedial order was dated on the 21st day of March, and it is perfectly plain that the object of the Government was, that the remedial order should exercise an influence on the elections which they then believed were to take place. No dissolution did take place, but the Government having promised to pass legislation based on the remedial order, they are now compelled to carry out the promises which they have given to their French supporters. I do not believe the Government have any intention of making this Act the law of the land. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) tells us to-day, that he went to the province of Manitoba at the instance of the Governor General, not at the instance of the Government nor with the knowledge of the Government, for the purpose of seeing if some settlement of this question could not be come to. Although he was not an emissary of the Government of Canada, we find that telegrams passed between him and the Government with reference to the negotiations about which he went to Winnipeg, and we found that the Government in its distress, without the consent of the member for Montreal West, and without the consent of Mr. Greenway the sender of the message, suppressed the most important part of that telegram in reading it to Parliament, the part which said that it was not the fault of the Manitoba government that a redress of the grievances did not take place. We have the extraordinary spectacle, of a private member of this House stating here that he has taken the settlement of this question out of the hands of the Government, stating what the policy of the Government is, and stating that after its second reading a conference will take place, and it is possible a settlement of the difficulties will be accomplished. I chanllenge hon. gentlemen to say, if they ever saw a more lamentable spectacle than that of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) getting up in this House and reading a mutilated telegram bearing on a serious national question. The Government seems to be ready for any expedient for the purpose of getting through their difficulties and retaining their offices and their salaries. They are ready that a conference should take place with Manitoba now, but that conference should have taken place before the remedial order was ever issued. If Mr. Greenway is now willing to meet these hon. gentlemen in conference, he is much more considerate than he has a right to be, taking into consideration the conduct of the Government towards him. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the amendment of the leader of the Opposition, because I believe that the policy announced by him is the right policy, and the policy of a statesman. I firmly believe that if his policy had been adopted long ago this question would not be now agitating the people of Canada from one end to the other.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like the Minister of Justice to say whether he conceives there is anything in the serious objection taken to the proposed legislation by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Charbonneau. If I understood him correctly, the hon. gentleman objects that the jurisdiction of this Parliament is based entirely on the terms of the remedial order, and the remedial order contemplates a grievance as having been inflicted on the minority in Manitoba by the statutes passed by the province in the year 1890; and he states, if I understood him correctly, that those statutes have been repealed. As my hon. friend stated the point in French, I think it fair that it should be stated in English; because it does appear to me at first blush to be a point of great and grave importance. The remedial order, after reciting the Acts of 1870 and 1871, goes on to say that subsequently two statutes relating to education were passed in the fifty-third year of Her Majesty's reign, which statutes came into force on the first day of May, 1890, and the effect of the two last-named statutes was to repeal certain privileges of the Roman Catholic minority which they had theretofore enjoyed. It goes on further to recite that the said Acts do affect rights and privileges of the minority; and further adjudges and declares that the legislation made by the two Acts of 1890 should be supplemented in a certain way. The whole remedial order is based on the supposition that the two Acts passed in 1890 did in themselves infringe on certain rights and privileges of the minority, and that these two Acts were in existence at the time the remedial order was passed. My hon. friend alleges that that supposition is incorrect—that those Acts were not in existence at the time at all, that they had in themselves been repealed, though the grievance might exist all the same. Whether it does or not, it is not for us to say; but the Acts which caused the grievance were repealed. It is purely a technical point, I admit, because the Acts of 1890 were in substance re-enacted; but that is not the point my hon. friend takes. I understand him to take the technical point that the remedial order adjudges that the Acts of 1890 should be amended in certain particulars, and in nothing else. It does not adjudge that any state of facts created by subsequent Acts should be amended, and he says that inasmuch as those Acts of 1890 were repealed entirely, and did not exist at the time the remedial order was passed. the remedial order itself is substantively defective. The point is strictly a legal and technical one, but it does appear to me to have a great deal of force. Of course, if it has, all the legislation we are considering, and all the time we are spending on it, are simply wasted. I would like to hear what the opinion of the Minister of Justice is on the point before we proceed any further.

Mr. DICKEY. It does not seem to me, with such consideration as I have been able to give to this point, that there is anything in it to justify the House in refusing to read the Bill a second time. It is quite true the Acts of 1890 were displaced by the consolidation of the statutes, before the petition was presented to the Privy Council of Canada: but the consideration of the statutes was not to repeal the Acts of 1890. That was expressively said to be declaratory of those Acts and others, and to continue them in force.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier to read that. As a matter of fact, the Act of April, 1892, did in express words repeal the Act of 1890, but contained a declaration that that repeal should be read as continuing the former Acts for other purposes. But that they were repealed is beyond a doubt.

Mr. DICKEY. Section 5 says that the said revised statutes shall not be held to operate as new laws, but shall be construed and have effect as consolidation and as declaratory of the laws contained in the Acts of repeal. They are repealed in some sense —technically repealed : but the Act that repeals them says that the new Act shall not be held to be a new law. However, it seems to me that the language of remedial order would be quite sufficient to meet the case, although the Acts of 1890 had been as a matter of fact repealed, assuming that the grievance set up by the enactment of those laws continued. It seems to me at present that the only difficulty that arises, if any, in connection with the point that has been raised, with the recital in the Bill which is before the House, which, I admit, may need examination, although I do not at all say that it does at the present time. But I do not see anything at all in the point raised in my judgment, to justify the House in waiting for any further consideration of it, before voting on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, before the motion for the adjournment of the debate is put, I desire to take this opportunity to make a few remarks on some statements that were made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) the other afternoon during my absence from the House. I was charged by the hon. member with violating those principles which should guide members of the Government, in my opposition to the Government's policy, and with not acting consistently with my position as Controller of Customs of Canada. The language used by the hon. gentleman on that occasion was, in the first place, that I "remained a member of the Government," after the solemn declaration of the leader of the Government referring to Sir John Thompson, "that he would be guided by the judgment of the Privy Council, whether it was for or against the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba." I am sorry that the hon. member is not in his place, because I would like to ask him or any of his colleagues who are conversant with the matter, whether Sir John Thompson made that statement. I was with him in his tour through Ontario, I think, at every public meeting, and I never heard him make such statement, and never saw any such statement reported in any of the newspapers as made by him. At that time, meetings held in Shaftsbury Hall, in Toronto, I am quite sure he did not make any such statement.

Mr. MASSON. I heard him make it.

Mr. WALLACE. We all heard him make the speech, but we did not hear him make any such statement, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to produce the report in any newspaper of words used by the hon. member for Pictou or in corroboration of the statement that the hon. gentleman who interrupts me now makes to the House. Every newspaper in Toronto, on that occasion, reported his speech. That report I know was a verbatim report, and I am quite sure that the words quoted here were not the words used by Sir John Thompson on that occasion.

Mr. MASSON. Not the exact words, perhaps, but the meaning is exactly the same.

Mr. WALLACE. I beg to differ. I say that the words he did use were not these words, and the hon. member knows it, and they have not the meaning those words have.

Mr. MASSON. I say they have, and I do not know anything to the contrary, and the hon. gentleman has no right to make such a statement.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has no right to interrupt me, and he should know the rules of the House. He should not get up and make a statement and then have to deny it himself. He made the statement that these words were used, and now he does not know if they were or not. He had better be sure of his ground before making a contradiction. Those words were not used on that occasion. I may say that when I became Controller of Customs, I had a full consultation with Sir John Thompson on this question. He never anticipated that it would come before the Parliament of Canada. He thought that the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Barrett vs. Winnipeg would confirm that of our Supreme Court. There was, therefore, no compact made between us. He said to me: If, unfortunately, this case should come before the Parliament of Canada, it then would become a political question, and it might be necessary then for parties to take sides. But it was not at that time the policy of the Government. I was bound in no way by any considerations with regard to that while I was a member of Sir John Thompson's Government, and the statement, therefore, made by the hon. member for Pictou, in his erroneous version of the speech made by Sir John Thompson, does not apply. I never concealed the position that I took upon this question, when it became a leading one under the Government of the present Premier. At the incipient stages of it, when the Government made that remedial order, I entered my protest as strongly as I could to the Premier. I also protested publicly, on the first occasion I had the opportunity of doing so, and that was on the 12th of July, in the city of Ottawa. Before doing so, I went to the Premier and told him that on the 12th of July I intended to express my sentiments on that question, and that if the views I held were inconsistent with my retaining the position I then occupied, I was quite ready and willing to hand in my resignation. He said it was not necessary for me to do so, but he hoped I would express my views in a moderate way. We do not expect, he said, that that question will come before the Parliament of Canada for consideration at all. We expect that the government of Manitoba will settle the question themselves, and that, therefore, it will not become a live issue in the politics of the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That was in July last.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, under those conditions I remained in the Government. Every member of the Government knew the position and the views I held on that occasion; and when the question, several days after the 12th July, was brought up in the House of Commons by the hon. member for Oxford, who called attention to the statement that I had made on that occasion, the hon. member who attacked me because of the position I then held, was the one who justified the course I then took. I shall trouble the House by reading a portion of the statement made on that occasion. He said:

> The position is this, that a member of the Government, not occupying a seat in the Cabinet, is not supposed to be consulted, as to the initial stage at any rate, in the consideration of questions of public policy by the Cabinet. The Cabinet are supposed to deal with these matters independently of members of the Government who do not sit in the Cabinet; and when the Ministry comes down to the House with a public measure, with an Act of Parliament, and opportunity is given to the outside members of the Cabinet, so to speak,—not necessarily the junior members in the sense to which the hon. gentleman referred to them but in this case the Controllers—to consider the measure fully in all its bearings and in its application, then it is for those gentlemen either to support the measure or retire from the Administration.

No Act of Parliament had been brought down then, the Act was not brought down until this year, but suppose it had been brought down, I could myself—which I would not hesitate to do—resign my position, or the Government could have said to me: Your views are inconsistent with holding your position, and you will have to retire. That contingency had not arisen, and it was, therefore, unfair of the hon. member for Pictou to make the attack that he did upon me on that occasion. He said still further:

> Then the Controller of Customs if he finds he is opposed to that measure will either have to support it or retire from the Government.

That was what I did when I found the course the Government was going to take, when I found they were unalterably committed to it, and that there was no possibility of a settlement with the government of Manitoba. I considered then that I would be doing an injustice to myself if I remained any longer in the Government. But what was the object of this attack on me, taken in conjunction with the speech of the hon. Secretary of State last evening, where the most extraordinary bid ever made in any legislature of Canada was made for the vote of the Roman Catholic Church, and taken in connection with the further statement that the hon. member for Pictou made when he referred to me as the Grand Master of the Orange Association, and when he said still further:

> Can we, members on one side of you, Mr. Speaker, or on the other, attach any great importance to the action or movements of a gentleman of that ilk and that style? I say he represents no honest, sincere, or outspoken opinion in the country.

And when we see that the great Conservative press—and the Liberal press as well, but I refer more particularly to Conservative newspapers—from the Ottawa River to the Pacific are in opposition to the course the Government has taken and are in sympathy with the opinions which I have found it necessary to express. I say that the evidence is against the hon. member for Pictou, so far as concerns his declaration that there is no expression of opinion against the Government to be found in this country. Moreover, I say, that those citizens who choose to disagree with the hon. member for Pictou or the hon. Secretary of State are just as sincere in the expression of their sentiments, are just as patriotic citizens of this country, just as anxious to advance the best interests of Canada as these gentlemen are, and, judging by their records, are less anxious to promote their own interests than the history of the country and of these gentlemen shows them to be. And I say still further that, as the Grand Master of the Orange Association of British America, as one who has received their confidence by re-election for the last eight or nine years, as one who has gone over almost every part of this Dominion and met them in their thousands and their tens of thousands throughout this country, and I can express their opinion and say that as loyal and patriotic a body of men as are to be found in this country are almost a unit in their opposition to this proposed legislation.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. WALLACE. Who says, "No, no." The hon. gentleman had better go back to North Grey if he wants to find out their opinion. But he is afraid to meet his constituents in North Grey, and he is not going back there again. And I can tell him that his successor as the nominee of the Conservative party holds the same views that I do on this question, and, in doing so, he holds the opinions of the Conservative electors in North Grey.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I just wish to refer to one other matter that has been brought up by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray). The hon. member amused me a little while ago when he denied that Margaret L. Sheppard was in North Ontario. I was in North Ontario assisting in the election of the hon. member in December last, and I certainly heard it stated that Margaret L. Sheppard had been in the town of Bracebridge some time before, and Bracebridge is the place where I addressed a meeting in the interest of the hon. member for North Ontario, and she had been there beyond a doubt. The hon. gentleman cannot deny, though he did deny it when it was stated by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister).

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The hon. member must know——

Mr. WALLACE. Wait a moment till I get through. Then, if there are any explanations you wish to make you can make them. The hon. gentleman may say that Bracebridge is not in North Ontario for the provincial elections. That is quite true. But the hon. gentleman was not running for the local legislature but for the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. And she never was there during the contest and you know it. Does the hon. gentleman say that she was there during the contest for the Commons ?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly not. But about a year and a half before that. The statement was made that Margaret L. Sheppard was never in North Ontario, and she was in North Ontario, which the hon. gentleman represents in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that——

Mr. WALLACE. I am not going to refer to the matter any further, Mr. Speaker. It is quite clear the hon. gentleman was labouring under a mistake. Now as to a further statement of the hon. gentleman. He denies that he every pledged himself to me to oppose remedial legislation. Well, putting it in that way, the hon. gentleman is right. Men do not make pledges to other men ; they are not bound to do it.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. The statement was made to me in the form of an opinion expressed in plain terms by the hon. member for North Ontario at a meeting of the Conservative Association in Ward No. 6, Toronto—I think it was the annual meeting. The hon. gentleman said : I will never support such remedial legislation ; I am opposed to such remedial legislation.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What do you think of that ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I will answer that.

Mr. WALLACE. I met two gentlemen in Toronto, gentlemen of standing and——

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Would you mention the names ?

Mr. WALLACE. One was the Rev. Elliot Rowe, a Methodist minister, who used to live in Bracebridge in North Ontario.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. He will not say it.

Mr. WALLACE. Another is Mr. William J. Parkhill, who is a well known gentleman and a gentleman of reliability.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. He will not say it.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman does not know what I am going to say yet.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. You told me the other day in the lobby.

Mr. WALLACE. These gentlemen told me in the Walker House in Toronto a couple of weeks ago when I met them there that the hon. member for North Ontario, in conversation with them had expressed his hostility and opposition to the proposed remedial legislation.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." On the strength of the opinion he had expressed, these gentlemen supported him in the election.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. The Rev. Elliot Rowe had not a vote in North Ontario, and did not assist me one iota.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the hon. member for North Ontario a question.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I will answer it.

Mr. WALLACE. Was the Rev. Elliot Rowe a delegate to the convention that nominated the hon. gentleman?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Unfortunately he did not get there, or he would have supported me.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not what I am asking. Was he a delegate to the convention?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. He was not, because he did not get there.

Mr. WALLACE. Was he appointed a delegate?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I believe so.

Mr. WALLACE. He was a minister who had lived in the constituency, and used his influence to assist in electing the hon. gentleman. And when he learned the hon. gentleman was experiencing a change of heart he regretted having assisted him. Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the question of the adjournment of the debate, to consider the constitutional question, I am not going to express an opinion. I have not much interest in it, but I have taken this opportunity to put myself right upon two points—first the attack made upon me by the hon. member for Pictou, unjustifiably and incorrectly. As I have said, I have always held one view upon this question from its very inception down to the present day. I have never on any occasion changed my opinion as to the Act itself, or as to the course I should take and did take upon that question.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I wish to reply briefly to the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). As to the Rev. Elliot Rowe, he was then a resident of the city of Toronto, and had not a vote in my riding. He was a very strong friend of mine, and is to-day, and I am not any way afraid of seeing such a letter as mentioned by the hon. member for West York, indicating that he had lost confidence in me. Nor did he indicate in any way that there was any change of heart; so far as I know, there is no change of heart yet. As to the hon. member's statement of what took place in Ward No. 6, he was very careful not to say that I pledged myself to him, for neither that hon. gentleman nor any other man could have got a pledge from me. He speaks of some conference. He knows my record; every one in that county knows my record. But he came into North Ontario and spoke at two meetings; but, unfortunately, he left two of my meetings unfilled, and I had to fill them with the Hon. John Costigan, and he filled them very well.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say why I did not fulfil those two meetings? The "Globe" newspaper had a report of a speech that he had delivered at Bracebridge a day or two previously, and I said to him: "Mr. McGillivray, why don't you come out straight in those meetings, instead of twisting and turning in this way?" And he said: "I have wobbled so far in this campaign, and I am going to wobble through to the end." Mr. Speaker, I did not attend any more meetings in that county.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I will prove the incorrectness of that statement by saying that the last time I saw the hon. gentleman was at the Severn Bridge meeting, and he afterwards went to Bracebridge, and took a meeting after that. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not trying to make out to this House that while he was a member of a Government he tried to pledge me against that Government.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not ask any pledge from him at all. He made the statement voluntarily to me.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I do not know what the hon. member means when he speaks of wobbling. All I know is that at those meetings I arranged with him for two subsequent meetings, and he never appeared at them, and if he had any such reason as that for not appearing, he should have been man enough to have so written to me, and not have left my meetings in that way. Now, as to Mr. Parkhill, I had but one conversation with him, and I really do not remember what we talked about. I know very well he got no pledge of any kind from me.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

Mr. HUGHES. I have waited patiently for the last three or four weeks to speak upon this question of remedial legislation, and I now claim the indulgence of the House for doing so very briefly. In connection with the North Ontario election, I may be permitted to say a word, although it is a matter of very little consequence to this House. I know that my friend from North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) was charged with having brought Margaret L. Sheppard into that riding in the local fight. That, of course, was denied although the hon. gentleman who made the statement did not retract it. The member for North Ontario, neither directly nor indirectly, was concerned in bringing Margaret L. Sheppard into that riding, and he never saw her. That is for a certainty. Then, as to another statement in regard to the member for North Ontario having pledged himself during his campaign to oppose remedial legislation, I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me that I know probably as much about the details connected with the nomination as any one else, and I here state positively that neither directly nor indirectly, either at the convention or at subsequent meetings during the campaign, did that hon. gentleman pledge himself to support remedial legislation. What he did say was this, that if a Bill was brought in along the lines of the remedial order, that is, restoring the schools as they were previously, then he would under no consideration support that Bill. In the presence of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and in the presence of the Minister of the Interior, the member for North Ontario told those gentlemen, on the platform in Sunderland, and in my presence, that he would on no consideration accept such a Bill; but if a moderate Bill were brought in restoring to the Roman Catholic people of Manitoba certain rights in connection with religious instruction in schools, similar to privileges enjoyed by Protestants in that province, he would be willing to grant them that measure of redress. Now, I shall not attempt a discussion of the constitutional aspect of this question, for we are all tired of it. The matter may be simmered down to these issues: Have the Roman Catholics of the province of Manitoba a grievance? Have they a right to appeal to this Parliament? and has this Parliament a right to grant redress? Now, prior to 1890, the schools in Manitoba were not public schools, but they were Roman Catholic schools and Protestant schools, and by the Act of 1890 the schools were all made public. In the first draft of the Act of 1890 the schools were made absolutely secular, and here, to my mind, comes in the kernel of this whole trouble. The first draft of the Bill made the schools secular. The Roman Catholic clergy approached the Manitoba government and asked that they be granted the privilege of giving religious instruction. That request was denied. The Protestant clergy took the matter up and approached the government and demanded the right to give their children religious instruction in the schools. The concession granted to the Protestant clergy appears on the statute-book, and it is in my opinion a matter in regard to which the Roman Catholic minority have a right to express their dissent, for it is a grievance. I will not discuss the aim of the Bill and the object of its introduction here, for these have been pointed out by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Metcalfe). In support of the position, that the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba has a grievance, I will state a few points which present themselves to me. The author of the Manitoba Act of 1890 (Mr. Martin), has on various occasions, publicly in this House and at a large meeting in Toronto and elsewhere, and on two occasions last session, stated that the minority in Manitoba under the Act was subject to "rank tyranny." The Presbyterian Assembly of Manitoba, as reported in the Winnipeg "Free Press," on November 22nd last, also indirectly admitted that the minority had a grievance. At a meeting of the Baptists in Toronto, a motion, moved by Rev. Dr. Rand, and seconded by Prof. Burwash, set out as follows:

> That if and so far as the Manitoba School Act of 1890 involves the compulsory support by our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens of state schools, which are required or expected to teach views of spiritual truth which Roman Catholic parents conscientiously deem erroneous, we consider it as a violation of the principle stated, as a distinct encroachment on the liberty of conscience of the Roman Catholic minority in that province.

That is the view of the Baptists of Toronto. In Winnipeg there had been Protestant and Roman Catholic school boards. By the Act of 1890, one board was provided, the Public School Board. I will quote the opinion expressed by Rev. Dr. King, President of the Manitoba University, on the subject. He said:

> While expressing general approval of the public school system, he thought there had been great absence of wisdom and conciliatoriness; a degree perhaps of injustice of harshness wholly unnecessary in the way in which the change in which, on the whole he approved, had been introduced. If the same kind of indulgence which had been manifested by the authorities in applying a new state of things, had characterized the initiation and introduction of it, we would have heard less of serious difficulties, and in many cases would have made it impossible for the opponents of the system to represent our action in the light in which we have given them some reason to represent it, and we would have taken the edge off some of their severe strictures. In the spring in which the Bill was passed, there was a Protestant school board, also, at the same time, a Roman Catholic school board, in the city of Winnipeg. Some time during the course of early summer the new measure came into operation, and the Protestant board was, by statute, declared to be the public school board of the city. That action had not at least the appearance of justice; it was certainly not, in my opinion, the course which a wise and prudent government would take if the object was to conciliate opposition and win adherents to the new system. He could have imagined that both boards would have been allowed to continue in operation until the time for a new election, and some effort have been made to obtain a school board representative alike of the Roman Catholic and the Protestant people in the city. If that effort had failed and Roman Catholics had refused to have anything to do with the election, how immensely better our position would have been to-day and how much less sympathy they would have had with their aggrieved feeling.

The answer to the statement that the Roman Catholics have not the privilege of giving religious teaching is this, the children are not required to attend religious instruction in the schools. The point lies here, and as one who has fought for years in Ontario for equal laws and rights for all and special privileges for none, I mention that the Roman Catholics of Manitoba, although not obliged to attend, owing to the religious instruction given, have a grievance, in that religious instruction suitable for Protestants has been embodied in the statute, while none acceptable to Roman Catholics has been. Either both should be satisfied; or better still, the schools should be secular, with the privilege to all religious denominations of attending at the close of the school day and teaching their doctrines to those of their own faith who choose to remain. I believe in a peaceful solution of this question, and I rejoice at the words used by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith). I am very much interested in securing such a solution of the difficulty, and six or seven months ago when I was at Winnipeg. I proposed to see exactly the condition of affairs. I had an idea, which was confirmed on my arrival there, that had the Dominion Government not been standing on its dignity, while the Manitoba government occupied a similar position, the difficulty might have been adjusted. Instead of acting as intelligent bodies of men they were acting more like school boys, and this was especially noticeable when these men were dealing with an educational question which might wreck the foundation of the constitution. I did not hesitate to say in the province of Manitoba that the Greenway government should either have given religious instruction, acceptable to Roman Catholics, or, what would have been better, abolished all religious instruction from the schools. The stand I took was, that there should be no religious instruction interfering with secular instruction, a matter relating to the state, but that religion being a matter concerning the relationship between the individual and his God, religious exercises should not form part of state education. I was willing to meet these parties half-way, and I suggested that at the closing of the school day the clergy of the various denominations could come into the school and be allowed to teach, not only Bible reading, but all forms of religious instruction. It matters not to me how a man worships Almighty God, provided the school gives moral training, and I was perfectly willing to leave the clergy of any denomination to give in the schools such religious education as they pleased. The text books selected should be such as not to prove offensive, either to Protestants or Roman Catholics, and so far as Mr. Sifton, Attorney General of Manitoba is concerned, he was prepared to meet the Roman Catholics and to strike out any objectionable passages in historical or other text books, and a leading citizen of Winnipeg assured me that he declared himself perfectly willing to reprint even a whole history, in order that it might be acceptable for the schools. I take the opportunity of saying here, as did the hon. member for Montreal West, that I was more than pleased at the spirit shown by the government of Manitoba when these matters were fairly placed before them. I will now take the liberty of reading to the House portions of the report of an interview with me published in the Manitoba "Free Press" on that visit as indicating what my views were at that time, and in fact what they have been from the outset.

The following is the report of my remarks to a newspaper interviewer at that time, last October:—

> What do you think should be done?
> I think religious exercises of every description should be abolished from the schools, that is as a state requirement. If that were done, I am convinced that all opposition to the national school law would cease. The Government should allow the ministers of each denomination to visit the schools on certain days and instruct the children of their respective denominations in religious matters after regular study hours; but no children should be allowed to attend such exercises unless they present letters from their parents permitting them to do so. Let this be done and we will soon hear the last of the opposition to your school law; and we will hear no more about remedial legislation; in fact under those circumstances no Government at Ottawa would dare attempt to pass remedial legislation, for they would not be supported by the House.
> Do you suppose the Manitoba government has not considered this phase of the question?
> I know that they have refused to make any concessions to the Catholics while they introduced religious exercises in the schools at the solicitation of the Protestant denominations. This is manifestly unfair. If there is a desire to settle this question quickly and for good, a simple remedy will be found in the abolition of all religious exercises. I am sure that such a step would be satisfactory to both Protestants and Catholics.

I shall not dwell any further on that point, Mr. Speaker. Now the question arises——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. HUGHES. I am only speaking for about ten minutes and I trust the House will grant the indulgence of listening to me. I listened patiently to the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) for one hour and a quarter, but I admit that at five o'clock in the morning is not a congenial hour to hold an audience. The question is asked why has not the Manitoba government taken steps to redress the grievances that are known to exist there. Some people pretend to think that it was because of political provincial expediency, and that Mr. Greenway was anxious to secure another term. Others thought that is was owing to the direction of the author of this "rank tyranny" who instructed the Manitoba government that it would form a plank for the Liberals in federal politics by which the Liberal party would get into power at Ottawa at the next election. There are others who say, oh, it is the remedial order that prevented the Greenway government from acting. But that obnoxious remedial order has been only issued for one year and this "rank tyranny" has been in existence for six years. Therefore that cannot be the cause. Others claim that Mr. Greenway is afraid that his followers in Manitoba would not pass any law even though he should be willing. That I do not believe. I am satisfied as the member for Montreal West said to-day that if the Governments meet together and become acquainted with each other and talk over this matter it would be settled to the satisfaction to all concerned. Another point presents itself. Is the Dominion Government justified in the opinion of this assembly in interfering to redress that grievance? It is asserted that the Roman Catholic minority have suffered this "rank tyranny" perpetrated upon them by the member for Winnipeg for five years. It is also stated and not denied that they have the right to appeal under the Act of 1870. It is also stated, and I state this myself, that the principle under which religious education is now carried on in the province of Manitoba is contrary to the spirit of equal rights to all and special privileges to none, for which the Liberal-Conservative party in Ontario have for so many years fought. There is also stated and that is the final clause that the judgment of the Imperial Privy Council declares that there is a right of appeal, that the grievance exists, and it suggests that the grievance be remedied. In this connection I may be permitted to state that the great hope of many people is that the Liberal-Conservative party should be desirous to carry out the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, because the Liberal-Conservative party in this country aims to be an imperial party. The policy of the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada is to upbuild the British Empire. And, Sir, so far as the colonies are concerned I contend that this Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council more than anything else has tended towards the upbuilding of the British Empire. For that reason this decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should receive recognition from Conservative Canadians. That being the case then why should not one support the Remedial Bill? The objections urged against the working of the Remedial Bill in its present form are these: That by establishing the right of any religious denomination to control text books we are building up a nation within a nation which in itself is objectionable. It also establishes the principle of separate schools and that in itself is objectionable. Others maintain that the tendency of the Bill is to redress a grievance by creating a greater grievance, and others claim that it is wrong policy to enforce upon Manitoba this legislation until all other means have failed. Another aspect of the case is this: The Secretary of State made a motion that the Bill be read the second time and that was followed by the amendment of the leader of the Opposition to the effect that the Bill should not now be read a second time, but it should be read a second time this day six months. We are told by the Toronto "Globe" and by hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is the duty of every one opposed to the Bill in any sense to support the six months' hoist. Sir, I have failed to hear either directly or indirectly any reason why the "six months' hoist" is at all preferable to a straight vote on the motion of the Secretary of State. In the first place the whole speech of the leader of the Opposition favours remedial legislation, and that is the construction placed upon it by his friends in the province of Quebec. It is true that those in the province of Ontario who wish to appeal to the Protestant vote, say: Oh, vote for Laurier's amendment any way, and you will defeat the Bill. On the other hand, our opponents in the province of Quebec say in their press and in this House, vote against the Bill and defeat the Government, and in six months time Mr. Laurier will head this Government and will give you a Bill that will not be half-hearted and weak, but whole-hearted and strong. That is their policy. The speeches of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House do not attack the principle of the Bill. Therefore, I do not see any reason why I should support this amendment. In fact, all their speeches indicated that they were in favour of the principle of remedial legislation, only they wanted the measure more applicable to the conditions and the locality. In fact, they merely want to postpone the day on which the Bill shall be brought into this House. Let us see what is the difference in effect of carrying the amendment of the leader of the Opposition and defeating the motion of the Secretary of State. If the amendment is carried, what will be the effect? The Government is defeated and an election must be held: but the tendency would be to put the mover of that amendment, the leader of the Opposition, at a little higher premium than I intend placing him. Sir, if the motion of the hon. Secretary of State is defeated, the Government must resign and a new premier be selected who will be a Conservative. Then I maintain that the disposition of the elections will remain in the hands of the Liberal-Conservative party, and I for one deem it my duty, as well as the duty of every Liberal-Conservative, to do our friends as little harm as possible, in a matter of this kind—at all events, not to play into the hands of the enemy. The six months' hoist, according to the highest parliamentary authorities, merely puts off the measure to a more distant date; but on the motion for the second reading of the Bill, you have to attack the principle of the Bill, and that is what these hon. gentlemen have failed to do. Consequently, whether the Bill passes its second reading or does not, they stand before the country with no better policy in the matter of remedial legislation than do the friends of the Conservative policy; in fact, in a much worse position, so far as that policy is concerned. A further reason why I will not support the amendment of the leader of the Opposition is that its success would mean the return to power in the Dominion of Canada of the men who have wrecked the province of Quebec, the Mercierites and the Parti National, with the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), the Pacauds, and such other men. It would mean also the success of men who have inflamed the province of Ontario for years—the men who, in 1871, were offering $5,000 for Riel's head, and at the same time displayed miles of the cord which tied the unfortunate but noble Thomas Scott, who was murdered like a dog in old Fort Garry. It would mean the success of the men who, at the same moment that they were laughing in their sleeves at Protestants, were forming the famous alliance with the Roman Catholic league of Ontario by guaranteeing offices to nominees of the league in return for votes delivered in the elections, whereby shrievalities and county crown attorneyships were sold almost at public auction. It would mean the return of such men as these to power, and I, as a citizen of Ontario, do not want the return of that class of men. It would further mean the endorsement of the system of separate schools; and I am opposed to separate schools. The hon. leader of the Opposition is on record in the "Globe," as having delivered a speech last fall at Montreal, on the occasion of one of the elections there, and, as he was talking in the province of Quebec, he said:

> I am a Roman Catholic. I want to have the schools of Manitoba, and I want to have the Catholics of Manitoba restored to the same privileges that are given to the Protestants of Quebec and to the Catholics of Ontario.

He endorses the principle of separate schools. The success of the amendment of the Opposition leader would mean the bringing into prominence of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), the author of the Manitoba legislation which he now believes is "rank tyranny," who left the Act on that statute-book for years, and never took any steps to redress the grievances of the minority, and then came to Ottawa and sought to stir up strife on the question here. Were I in the position of that hon. gentleman, I would try and follow the advice given to Joe Hess, the converted bum, in New York. He was holding meetings and trying to convert a Christian audience, when a man who knew him told him that if he was sincere he would return to the dens where he had formerly polluted people, and would try to restore to civilization and decency those whom he had debauched. So I would suggest to my hon. friend from Winnipeg that he should endeavour to restore to the minority of Manitoba the rights they are entitled to. Success to the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition means success to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who has said that he prefers separate schools to secular schools, a position which I do not hesitate to oppose. It also means the success of the Reform party in the province of Ontario, who have taken the old separate school law of 1867, which was passed in 1863 by the Macdonald-Sicotte Reform Government, of which Mr. Mowat was a member, eight days after the passage of the Act. It would mean the restoration to power of the men who had passed the objectionable amendments to that Act. It would mean the success of the men who in the province of Quebec say that: Mr. Laurier does not believe in the efficiency of the method proposed; he will adopt another procedure, and will guarantee to gain the cause of the Roman Catholic clergy of that province. It would mean the restoration to power of men in the province of Ontario who will be willing to endorse separate schools, and who in the province of Quebec will be willing to abolish them. It would also mean giving prominence to the men who a few years ago were shouting "hands on" the province of Quebec in regard to the Jesuits' Estates, and who to-day are shouting "hands off Manitoba." It would mean the success of that class of men whom I think it is dangerous to trust in politics. A short time ago there was a crisis—the last crisis in the history of the Liberal-Conservative party, and during that period, while several of the Ministers were out, some of the men who are to-day strongly opposed to this remedial measure were willing to assist in the election of candidates to support the First Minister and his remedial policy, and were willing to accept office in his Cabinet. Therefore, we may well question the sincerity of such men in supporting the six months' hoist proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I have tried to show that there was a grievance, and how it should be redressed. My proposition would be to do away with religious education in connection with the schools of the Dominion. I cannot see, for my part, why the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act cannot be amended by the people of the Dominion, and a state system of schools substituted, leaving the entire control of the schools, so far as their management is concerned, to the provinces, but operating them under a general Dominion law. The matter must be dealt with by the Parliament of Canada. It was my intention to move a resolution, of which I gave notice some two or three weeks ago, but I do not intend pressing it to a conclusion, because about a week after I had given notice of this resolution, the Government announced that they purposed treating for a settlement of the school difficulty with the Greenway government, if the latter were willing to negotiate. The motion, of which I gave notice, reads as follows:—

> Mr. Hughes—On the second reading of Bill (No. 58) "The Remedial Act (Manitoba)," That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen, praying that she may be pleased to take such measures in conjunction with the Parliaments of Canada and of the various provinces of Canada as will lead to the repeal of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, and of section 22 of the Manitoba Act of 1870 ; and, instead, lead to the enactment of the following :—

In and for the Dominion of Canada there shall be one system of national education embracing :

(1) The intellectual branches including mathematics, history, geography, English and other languages, literature, the arts and sciences ;

(2) The principles of morality ; and

(3) Political and sanitary science ;

But in and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to the same, subject to the following provisions :—

Religious instruction shall not officially form part of the national education ; but nothing in this Act shall prevent those legally controlling school buildings and premises from granting the use thereof for religious purposes to persons of any and every religious faith, after the conclusion of the educational exercises of the day.

As I said, I shall not now move this amendment, my belief being strong that within a couple of weeks the question will be amicably settled by Manitoba itself. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that if I ever cast a vote with the hon. gentlemen opposite, it will be only because I value my convictions on these questions more than I dislike and detest the company I shall find myself in for the moment. The hon. leader of the Opposition has moved a motion in amendment to this Bill. I have stated before to the hon. gentleman and friends on his side that a true settlement of this difficulty rested with him. In my opinion he should have volunteered to help this Government in reaching a solution of this difficulty. If he had extended the right hand to this Government, and offered to assist them in solving this question, I think it would have been settled some time ago. It is not yet too late, and I trust the hon. gentleman will see his way clear to take the step which only he can take to bring about a peaceful solution of this difficulty. I presume he too wants to settle it. But I may tell him, speaking from the point of view of public interest and the upbuilding of Canada, that he might easily have advanced the question toward a settlement instead of hindering it. But, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Metcalfe) says, this is not the time to press recriminations, and to cause any more feeling between the parties. A satisfactory settlement is proposed and is now in sight, and I am satisfied before another week rolls over this House will see itself in a position to be rid of this question, and the people can go on side by side or in opposition on the great trade questions that concern the development of the country.

I cannot conclude without expressing in a word my admiration of the address of the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) and the noble work he has done for Canada in connection with this question. I believe he deserves the thanks and congratulations of this House and the people of Canada. I may say further that I have every faith in the possibility of a peaceful solution of this question, particularly as we now have the affairs of this Government and the country under the firm and capable management of the present leader, the hon. Secretary of State :

PAIRS :

Ministerial.	Opposition.
Smith (Sir Donald),	Rowand,
Montague,	Denison,

Motion agreed to, and Bill read second time.

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall the House go into committee on the said Bill ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now.

Mr. LAURIER. Surely the hon. gentleman does not intend to proceed with this Bill in committee now ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not further than simply to go into committee.

Mr. LAURIER. Do you propose that we shall sit all day ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is merely as a matter of form.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I presume the hon. gentleman will have no objection that the next stage be now taken merely pro forma.

Mr. LAURIER. Certainly, I have the greatest objection to go into committee on it at six o'clock in the morning to take up such an important Bill after a prolonged sitting of forty hours.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That does not make any difference.

Mr. LAURIER. We will take it at the next sitting, if you wish.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will only take five minutes.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well, the next sitting.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 20th March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Report of the Board of Civil Service Examiners for year ended 31st December, 1895.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Montreal and Province Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Desaulniers.)

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House do, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution :—

That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may advance to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, a sum not exceeding two million dollars, for the redemption of certain debentures issued by the commissioners, and the payment of certain loans and advances made to them, and for the construction of certain works in the harbour of Montreal, the commissioners thereupon depositing with the Minister of Finance their debentures to an amount equal in par value to the advance so made by the Governor in Council, repayable within twenty-five years from the 1st of July, 1896, and bearing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum, payable half-yearly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to have a little more information as to the policy of the Government in this matter, and it had better be given now. As I understand, there is more than $2,000,000 due by the company. What do the Government propose to do ? Are they virtually going to guarantee or advance the entire sum required for the harbour of Montreal to these commissioners ?

Mr. FOSTER. I would rather make the full statement when I move the House into Committee of the Whole ; this is merely the notice of such. But I may say to my hon. friend that the amounts which are due at the present time by the harbour to the Government are to be paid, and are included in this amount. In brief, the amount we propose to advance anew to the Harbour Commission, is in the vicinity of $1,000,000. That we propose to advance, taking debentures, and charging them at the current rate of interest.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that after Friday, the 20th instant, for the remainder of the session, Government orders shall have precedence on Mondays, after Private Bills and questions, and on Thursdays after questions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I trust the Government do not propose to proceed with this motion. As I understand this is in distinct contravention to an arrangement which was entered into by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and the late leader of the House, the Finance Minister. I was informed by my hon. friend that when the Government asked to obtain all the days in the week except Monday, it was distinctly understood and agreed that for at least two Thursdays the House should be left alone, and that no attempt would be made to deprive them of those days. Now, I must remind the House that the Government have practically consumed all the time of the House since the 2nd of January. They had, in the first place, the debate on the Address, and certain interruptions to that debate for which the Opposition were in no respect responsible. Thereafter, the debate on the Address, as is usual, proceeded 'de die in diem.' Then all the days except Monday and Wednesday were given up to the debate on the Budget. Then all the days except Monday were given up to the discussion on the Remedial Bill ; and the consequence is that to all intents and purposes, I think, to the best of my recollection, we have only had one, or, at the outside, two Thursdays at our disposal since the House met. Now, under these circumstances, it appears to me, entirely irrespective of the agreement which I am informed was entered into between the leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman who was acting as leader of the House, in the absence of the Secretary of State—wholly apart from that, it appears to me most unreasonable that the Government should now attempt to take all the days except one. I do not think that the thing ought to be proposed by the Government at present at all. I trust that the Government will reconsider the question, and will not attempt to compel us to debate and oppose this motion, which we would rather not do, under the circumstances ; but which, of course, if compelled to, we must.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can easily understand, under ordinary circumstances, the force of the objections which are raised by the hon. member for South Oxford. But that hon. gentleman, and every other hon. gentleman in this House will recognize that we are in a very peculiar position in regard to public business, owing to the fact of the expiry of this Parliament at no distant date ; and I think the House will see the absolute necessity of giving to the public business the time that is required. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance will explain the understanding that he had with the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. But, apart from that altogether, which I suppose practically extended to the time at which we have now arrived, the hon. gentleman will see that all the time up to the present, since the introduction of the Remedial Bill, has necessarily been devoted to the motion of want of confidence moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and which, from its very nature, involved the absolute necessity of proceeding 'de die in diem' until it was brought to a conclusion.

Mr. McCARTHY. What motion is that ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The six months' hoist, which is the strongest possible form that a motion of want of confidence can assume, and which virtually suspended the functions of the Government in regard to the business of this House, excepting the necessary conduct of public business. I can hardly think that, under the circumstances that we all are aware of as to the duration of the session, the proposal which I now ask the House to adopt, can be regarded as at all unusual, or one that is not absolutely demanded, if public business is to be successfully dealt with.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Secretary of States makes allusion to the end of the session. Now, if the House could understand at what time the Government believe the session would end, it would be in a better position to give its decision as to the motion made by the Government. If the Government assumes that the life of this Parliament ends on the 25th of April next, there is more ground for the Government asking for all the time for Government business than would be the case if the Government assume that the life of Parliament continues until a later period. I think that the House, in discussing this matter is entitled to be taken into the confidence of the members of the Government as to this very important subject. If the life of Parliament ends in a little more than four weeks from this day, I must admit there was reason for the request made by the Government. I must admit that in that time there would be little opportunity for carrying through their last stages, many of the orders under the head of Public Bills and Orders. If, on the contrary, the life of this Parliament continues longer, then members having in their charge important Bills might reasonably ask that an opportunity should be given them to press the measures standing in their names. There are upon the list of public Bills and orders thirty-one orders. Now, I will admit that most of these orders must fall to the ground for want of time to press them if the life of Parliament ends when we suppose it does. But if it is to continue its life for six weeks longer than that time, there is opportunity to put these Bills through. I rise for the purpose of asking the Government, in order that the House may intelligently decide this question, at what time do the Government suppose dissolution will take place.

Mr. McMULLEN. It does appear singular that the Government are disposed to press upon the House a motion of this kind at this juncture. Parliament has been a considerable time in session, and there has been a good deal of the time wasted, for which the Government and not the Opposition are responsible. Private members of this House have rights, and I have no doubt that they consider the responsibility resting upon them just as grave as the Government do those resting upon them. A great many measures have been introduced by private members of the House who desire an opportunity of discussing, and, if possible, of crystallizing into law the provision of the measures they have proposed. The course of the Government in introducing this motion must provoke comment. I do not think it is treating the House properly, nor is it in the interest of the country generally that such hasty action should be taken as is now proposed. Parliament is not here simply for the purpose of registering the will of the Government. The Opposition have duties to perform and the country look to them for a proper performance of those duties. We must be answerable to our constituency for the advocacy of measures which seems to us in the public interest, and it is in the interest of the country that we should have the opportunity to present those measures to the House. I think it is hardly treating the Opposition fairly for the Government to introduce a resolution of this kind at this moment. It must be known to the leader of the House that, owing to the long and wearisome sitting, the leader of the Opposition and many others are much indisposed. The leader of the Opposition is not able to be in his place to-day, and it seems that hon. gentlemen opposite wish to take advantage of his absence to force from the House a consent to the Government monopolizing the time of the House. If the business of the House is to be conducted in this manner, of what use is it for members to place on the paper notices of motion for returns with regard to important matters upon which they have a right to information in the country's interest ? Of what use is it to appoint a Public Accounts Committee if the entire time of the House is to be occupied by the Government ? I suppose the Minister of Finance will say : We are not going to take the mornings, during which time committees are supposed to sit. True, but if the time of members is occupied here until late at night with Government business, they cannot efficiently discharge their duties as members of the committee. The history of the country shows that it is absolutely necessary that there should be opportunity to examine thoroughly the transactions of the Government. Year after year we have put in our time in exposing the transactions of gentlemen opposite. If we had a Cabinet that would conduct the affairs of the country honestly the Opposition would not have such laborious duties to perform. Every session the Opposition have been hard worked, they have been driven to their wits' end to expose to the public the rascality which characterizes the conduct of public affairs. I suppose that the Secretary of States fancied that on his return to Parliament to take the dignified and onerous position as leader of this House, the Opposition would be frightened into submission. We want the hon. gentleman to understand that we, as members of this House, claim that we have rights and we are not going to allow him to trample upon those rights. We had an exhibition last night of the peculiar weakness of the Cabinet at this time. We had an admission on the floor of this chamber that was one of the most humiliating exhibitions I ever witnessed——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. If the hon. member is referring to a former debate, he is out of order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am not alluding to a past debate. I am alluding to an incident in this House that does not include a past debate. We had a statement made by an hon. member of this House of the course he felt it his duty to pursue——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member is clearly referring to a past debate.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I must submit. I will keep within the rule, but I shall endeavour by illustration to present to the House what I was going to say. We will suppose that a Cabinet were called upon to discharge the executive duties of the Government of this Dominion. We will suppose that they were discharging these duties, and we will suppose that they were under the guidance of a Governor General or a Lieutenant-Governor, and suppose the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor felt that the course that was being adopted by his advisers was likely to result in absolute want of success. Then he sends for a gentleman whom he thinks in all probability could render very material service, and he calls in that outside aid without the advice of his responsible advisers. Now, Sir, if I were a member of such Cabinet, I would feel, under those circumstances, that the Governor General had not much confidence in my ability and statesmanship. That is what we have seen recently in connection with this Government.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is evidently referring to the action of the Governor General. The rule with regard to references to the Governor General in this House is as follows :—

> It is expressly forbidden to speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty or of her representative in this country, or of any member of the Royal Family. Neither is it permitted to introduce the name of the Sovereign or of her representative, in debate, so as to interefer with the freedom of discussion, or for the purpose of influencing the determination of the House or the votes of members with respect to any matter pending in Parliamnt.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have nothing to take back. I have not used His Excellency's name disrespectfully. I have not, in any shape or way thrown any reflection either upon his conduct or his course. I always have endeavoured to be a loyal subject in this country. During the many years I have sat in this House, I have never for one moment cast a single reflection on the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention especially to the last part of the rule with reference to introducing the name of His Excellency :

> For the purpose of influencing determination of the House or the votes of members with respect to any matter pending in Parliament.

It seemed to me evident, that that was the object of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no hope of being able to influence hon. gentlemen opposite, and it was not for that purpose I was drawing attention to the course that had been adopted. I am quite willing to abide by your ruling, Sir. Coming back to the motion before the House, I contend, Sir, that private members have some rights here which ought to be respected. We have a great many Bills on the Order paper, which have received very little consideration. For instance, my Bill on superannuation should be discussed by hon. gentlemen. I do not think that the superannuation system, as existing in this Dominion——

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is getting out of order again.

Mr. McMULLEN. Very well. I shall not discuss the Bill. I can say honestly, that I am expressing the general sentiment throughout the country, when I say the superannuation system is exceedingly unpopular and objectionable. Then again, Sir, it would be in the interest of the country, if we could discuss this Insolvency Act and a great many other Bills on the Order paper. We should have time to consider those public measures before we are forced, day after day, to discuss this Remedial Bill, important though it may be. I think the Government are not treating the Opposition fairly in attempting to monopolize the entire time of this session up to the time this Parliament ends. Out of courtesy to the hon. leader of the Opposition, they should at least withdraw this motion and take the question up some day next week.

Mr. LAVERGNE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the Government are prepared to tell us whether this Parliament will end on the 25th April next. For my part, I would not oppose the motion made by the hon. Secretary of State. If the hon. Ministers who understand French are willing to give an answer as to this, and tell me that the House will be prorogued on the 25th April next, I will not oppose the motion that has just been made.

I will state in English that if hon. gentlemen are ready to tell us that this session will close by the 25th of April, I will certainly consent to this motion for my part ; but so long as they keep us in ignorance of their view on that question, I think we should oppose the motion.

As the hon. Ministers keep silent, I find they have not made up their minds to give me the information. We have reason to believe, according to the opinion expressed by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), and that of the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), these gentlemen may not possibly expect this session to close by the 25th of April. On the contrary, should the opinion of the ex-Minister of Justice prevail, the session would last till June 3rd. Under these circumstances, I say the Government have no right to make such a motion as this. We have indeed an extraordinary Government. We are always kept in a state of uncertainty. It is quite impossible to get information with respect to matters which are looked upon by common people as very ordinary and very simple matters. We have in this House members whose parliamentary experience extends over twenty-five or thirty years ; we have a Minister of Justice and an ex-Minister of Justice ; the Cabinet is in majority composed of gentlemen belonging to the legal profession, all of them qualified to consider and determine whether this Parliament ought to come to an end on the 25th of April next. We cannot get their opinion on this very simple point. If the Government are willing to tell us that this session will close by the 25th of April, I will not oppose the motion made by the hon. Secretary of State. I will go further, and I will say that the Liberal members will even help the Government to pass the measures now before this House. Referring to the Orders of the Day, I find that a great many measures still claim the attention of the House. We have yet to receive several reports of the Minister of Finance ; prominent amongst all, we have the Remedial Bill, and for my part, I would not like a single moment to be lost, as regards the considering of this measure. I was opposed to the second reading of the Bill, but I am not going to oppose its passing by uselessly protracting the debates. Under the motion made by the Government, and which reads as follows :—

> That after Friday, the 20th instant, for the remainder of the session, Government Orders shall have precedence on Mondays, after Private Bills and Questions, and on Thursdays, after Questions.

There will only remain one day in the week, Wednesday, for the measures introduced by private members. Now, if the Government intend to extend the life of Parliament to June 3rd, I say there is no need for the House hurrying to take away from the members the days that, by right, belong to them. The members of this House have so far been dealt with rather severely. It is true that, through an agreement between the leaders of both parties, we have been for the last three weeks exclusively discussing the second reading of the Remedial Bill. I know for a fact that many of my colleagues on this side of the House, being anixous that this Bill should be speedily proceeded with, refrained from taking part in the debate; many of my friends, especially those from the province of Quebec, would have been desirous to explain to the House the position they assumed in connection with this Bill, but, as I just stated, in order to expedite the business, and that it should not come into the minds of the members of this House—especially those from the province of Quebec—that business was delayed, I may say that at least fifteen of my friends refrained from speaking, and most of those who took part in the debate had to spend two sleepless nights waiting for their turn. We have been dealt with almost cruelly. Why should the Government have waited so long before introducing their measures? For, according to the general opinion, this session ought to come to an end four or five weeks hence. Apart from the Remedial Bill, which has taken so much of the time of this House, and will still engage it in the future, I am aware that the Government have several important measures upon the Order paper. They propose to amend the Act concerning the subsidies to trans-oceanic steamers by providing that the Governor General in Council may enter into a contract for a term not exceeding five years for the performance of a fortnightly steamship service between a port or ports in Canada and ports in France and Belgium, on such terms and conditions as the Governor General in Council deems expedient for a subsidy not exceeding $50,000 per annum. It is a most important measure, and one which greatly interests all those who are in favour of the measure relating to the commercial treaty with France. The House will remember what time it took to have this treaty ratified, which was sneeringly called the "little" treaty with France. It is well known that this treaty can hardly be carried out with any benefit to us unless there be a line of steamers plying between Canada and France, and this line of steamers cannot be established without the aid the Government ask from this House. Without this subsidy the establishment of such a line of steamers will be an impossibility.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman, I think, is out of order in speaking on this subject.

Mr. LAVERGNE. (Translation.) May be, Mr. Speaker, I am out of order, influenced as I am by the interest I take in this measure. But to come back to the question now before the House, I may say, without going into the details of this measure, that we all wish to see it passed and that, as several others put on the Order paper, it is a most important one. I again find that we are called upon to consider certain resolutions concerning the raising by way of loan of a sum of three million dollars, for the purposes of the defence of the Dominion. This is also a measure of the utmost importance. We are all agreed on both sides of the House on the statement that it is in the interest of the country that we should more efficiently provide for the defence of Canada. In consequence of the events that have threatened the peace, we sent a message to the Queen assuring her of our co-operation and our loyalty. We all know, Mr. Speaker, the position assumed by the neighbouring republic, after an exchange of correspondence between the government of Great Britain and that of the United States, and that we have been threatened with war. We wished to show that we were loyal and ready to defend our territory should it ever be attacked. Our country was then threatened with becoming the battle field of these two nations, upon which their opposing forces would have fought for victory. We thought it our duty to make professions of our loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen and to tell her that we were ready to do all that lay in our power as patriots and citizens to defend our territory. It is therefore a most important measure and one in which we are all interested. The Government also propose to amend the Act concerning the Supreme Court and the Exchequer Court. That Bill has come to us from the Senate. To say nothing now of the character of this legislation, I may say, however, that professional men and the Bar are greatly interested in it. If the session should last only four weeks more, that is to say if the Government should state that this Parliament will end on the 25th April next, I would be willing to give away to them the Mondays and Thursdays, and even every day of the week. We want the Government to have all the time required to pass their Remedial Bill, although we are not satisfied with the Bill as it is insufficient. At all events, this is why we have had a sixth session of this Parliament. The Government intended this sixth session to be an ordinary session, and they ask the House to vote the subsidies required to meet the public expenditure up to June, 30th, 1897. If we are to vote these subsidies and pass these Bills and measures which are before the House, the Government ought to give us their opinion as to the time of the legal ending of this Parliament and state whether they think as we do, that it comes to an end on the 25th April next. We cannot be charged with ill-will. Is it through any fault of ours that the Manitoba Catholics are claiming for the redress of certain grievances caused by the passing of certain laws by the Manitoba legislature? Is it through any fault of ours that the Government have waited till a few weeks before the end of the Parliament to try and have us pass a Remedial Bill? Is it through any fault of ours that the Government have been waiting for five years without taking any practical step to remedy these grievances? The Government alone are responsible and they cannot throw on the Opposition the responsibility that is incumbent upon them in this matter. Their course is quite unjust. So far, the Government have done all they could so as to pass no Remedial Bill. Instead of construing the constitution as they should properly construe it, they had recourse to the courts. Instead of reading in the ordinary way a clause of the law, the meaning of which was quite easy to understand, they deemed it their duty to adopt every kind of put-offs, so as to do nothing with respect to this question. It is only at the sixth session, and almost in its last days, that is to say, about six weeks before the end of the session, that they have introduced this Remedial Bill, the second reading of which was agreed to last night, thanks to the good will of my friends on this side of the House, and because they wished to hasten the decision of Parliament in connection with the second reading of the Bill. Had the Government been earnest, had they not always held a most unfair course as regards this Bill, it would have been brought up long ago. Why have not the Government in the months of July last, almost ten months before the end of this Parliament, urged the passing of this Bill? And when they have wasted two months of this session, it does not seem proper to me that the Government should come and ask the members to put aside those measures in which they are interested to favour those of the Government. I think the Opposition have made more than their share of concessions. They have always been at the disposal of the Government. We are here since January 2nd, in an almost extraordinary session, during which the Government were to introduce the great measure known as the Remedial Bill. On arriving here, we found part of the Cabinet were on strike. There was, so to say, no Government; we were in a state of anarchy. It was impossible to proceed with the business of the House. Hence an adjournment for a week; and once come back, another week was wasted, nothing being done. Was it through any fault of the members? Surely no. We have helped the despatch of the business by allowing the Government to proceed from day to day with the Address; we did the same as concerns the Budget debate and the Remedial Bill. Since the Government are unwilling to state when the session will end, I must oppose, to my utmost extent, this motion. I quite understand the Government are driven to their last intrenchment; should they, at least, tell us that they have only four or five weeks more to expedite their business, we could perhaps be charged with making obstruction; but, since they are unwilling to inform us as to the lasting of this session, they will have to assume the responsibility of their course. So, on the ground of the opinion of the Minister of Justice, which is rather like that of the ex-Minister of Justice on this point, I cannot see why we should consent to this motion being agreed to until such time as we are told when the session will end.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) When I last addressed the House, Sir, the hon. the Finance Minister, who is a skilled linguist, almost upbraided me for not speaking in the French language. In order, therefore, to show the hon. gentleman the high esteem which I entertain for his person, both as a public speaker and as a distinguished elocutionist, I am going to speak in the language which seems dear to his heart. We have no intention, Sir, on this side of the House, to be obstructionists, but I may well inquire from the Minister of Finance, if he will give me his attention for a minute or two,—what are the intentions of the Government? We are asked to give up two additional days. I believe that we are entitled to know what use they intend to make of them. We are asked to-day practically to allow them to take up all the days: and that being so, I would like to ask the leader of the House and the hon. Minister of Finance, who seemingly are both alternately leader of the House,—or perhaps of the coteries which they represent—whether the hon. gentlemen are ready to declare that they intend to take those days from the private business of members, in order to go on the more rapidly with the debate on the Remedial Bill? I do not know whether I made my meaning clear to the Finance Minister, for, if I speak in the French language, it is only through deference to his own desire, for, I could just as well express myself in the English language. I wish to know whether the Finance Minister understands exactly what I mean, and I am going to repeat the question I put: Do the Government intend, in taking all the time of the House, to proceed more rapidly with the Remedial Bill?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government have no desire to do anything in the way of coercing the House, and I wish to state frankly the position in which the Government stand. We have been discussing the Budget and the Remedial Bill for a good many weeks. On February 4th, during the Budget debate, I made a motion that we should take Thursday. We discussed that pretty thoroughly, and at the end an agreement was come to that we should go on with the Budget debate de die in diem, and that after the Budget debate was concluded, one day at least, but not more than two days —Thursdays—should be given for the business of private members. That is exactly what was talked over, and was the agreement reached between Mr. Laurier and myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. That is exactly what took place. I am sorry the hon. leader of the Opposition is not here. The words used were one Thursday at least, and probably two. If the leader of the Opposition insisted on two days after the Budget debate was ended, he should have them; but that was the ultimate limit. We finished the Budget debate, and then came the Remedial Bill, which, in the opinion of the whole House was the measure the consideration of which should have precedence over all other business. Before the time came for the House to say whether one Thursday or two Thursdays should be given, the House decided that we should take up the Remedial Bill on a certain day and go on with it de die in diem until it was read a second time. It is my view that when the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the House agreed to that, the day or the two days were then given up.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. That is my view—other business being superseded by the paramount importance of the remedial measure, which it was agreed on all sides of the House should be taken up and pressed forward to the exclusion of other business. On the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite, how does the matter stand? From the very first day after we came here, we were asked when the remedial measure would be brought down. Hon. gentlemen opposite positively refused to go on with the Estimates until it was. They said: You have brought us here to pass that Bill; that is the reason the session was called; and we ought to have the measure before us. There was a good deal of force in that. On that ground we were refused facility in getting the supplies. We are now met with another contention from the other side of the House, which is concurred in by all the legal gentlemen on that side who have spoken on the subject, that the time of this Parliament ends on the 25th of April. The Government are considering that question; and on Monday, when we meet again, I think we shall be able to take the House into our confidence as to what the view of the Government is. But on the view of the Opposition, unanimously expressed by them the other night, this House ends on the 25th of next month. That leaves us only four weeks to finish the important business of the session, and surely the two chief items of that important business, in order of precedence, are, first, the Remedial Bill, and, second, the Estimates for the services of the country. Therefore, we ask the House to give the Government the facility for carrying through the measure for which, chiefly, we have been called to meet this session. We have shown that we are in earnest in passing this Bill. We have had a struggle almost if not wholly unprecedented in this Parliament, to get that Bill read a second time. The Government now ask the House to give them the facility to carry the measure through committee and to a conclusion, and we will do that even to the exclusion of the Estimates; but the country also wishes its services to be carried on, and expects the House to grant the necessary money for that purpose. I put it to the fair-minded men on both sides if the time that remains is too much to accomplish these two objects. The Government are pledged to the remedial measure, and we do not propose to go back one iota on that pledge, but to press the measure to a conclusion in every way we can. One day in the week will still remain for private business. Look over the Order paper and see if that business is so important that it should cut out the two important matters of which I have spoken. That is for the House to consider. I know I could appeal to the leader of the Opposition if he were here, and I appeal to the House to give us the facility for passing the Remedial Bill through committee, which is the main object of this session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would suggest that the far better course would be to wait until Monday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think that probably is reasonable. We will be prepared on Monday to state the view of the Government.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am quite sure that the hon. Minister is stating what he thinks is the understanding between him and the leader of the Opposition, but he is mistaken as to the time most assuredly.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest that as nothing can come of the hon. gentleman and myself discussing what took place between myself and the leader of the Opposition, that any discussion on it be left over until Monday.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The understanding was that there should be at least two days and possibly three days. The hon. gentleman stated across the House the understanding, but it was not put in form because the time was not definitely settled. It is an unusual course, without any agreement or conference with the leader of the Opposition, to propose that the House should adopt a certain course. The proper course would have been, as a matter of courtesy to the leader of the Opposition, for the hon. gentleman to have discussed this question with the leader of the Opposition before he put any notice on the paper.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think that these understandings arrived at between the leaders, while they may be very convenient, are not always fair to the House. At all events all such understandings ought to be communicated to the House. We have had very long sittings which reflect no credit upon this deliberative assembly. The idea that for thirty-nine hours the House should remain in one continuous session, without the excuse that there was any attempted obstruction or delay of business, is in itself an absurdity. It is only possible because there had been some arrangement come to between the leaders. I am bound to say that I was informed of it and assented to it so long as it was agreed to by the leaders, and I could not help myself very well. For the future any arrangement of that kind ought to be made known to the House, and we ought to be allowed to say whether we assent to or dissent to the proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. This was stated to the House. The leader of the Opposition asked the question and I answered it.

Mr. McCARTHY. On two different occasions, first with regard to the giving up of members' private days, and secondly, with regard to the Remedial Bill, these understandings were arrived at, not on the floor of Parliament, but outside, and only communicated to the House after they were agreed to. While it is very important that we should know what the views of the Government are on the duration of Parliament, I do not think that should altogether determine this question. I have no hesitation in saying that I do not think there is a shadow of doubt that the life of Parliament expires on the 24th of April. We have got the information now that the writs were made returnable on the 25th of April, 1891. The British North America Act says that Parliament shall last for a term of five years from the return of the writs. That certainly means the technical return of the writs and not the day when any particular writ may be returned, first or last. That will be found to have been the practice of the Imperial Parliament for half a century back, and the third section of our Election Act says:

> Every writ for the election of a member of the House of Commons shall be dated and be returnable on such days as the Governor General determines.

Turn to the form of the writ in the schedule of the Act, which makes provision for that return day:

> Whereas by the advice of the Privy Council of Canada we have ordered a Parliament to be holden at Ottawa on the day of next. (Omit this preamble except in the case of a general election.)

There was an order made for the summoning of Parliament on the 25th April. To suppose that the life of Parliament did not begin on the day the Governor General summoned it to meet seems to me utter absurdity. When you come to look at the Election Act itself, it is perfectly apparent that in some of the elections the writs cannot or may not be returned before the day named. For instance, the death of a candidate, after nomination and before polling, puts the whole matter at large again, so that a new date has to be fixed by the returning officer for the holding of the election. Again, a recount in circumstances where the lists were not completed, the return is delayed until the appeal is finally determined. Many accidents may happen, as did happen in Algoma, where the returning officer was not able to complete his return within the time mentioned in the writ. It is clear as noonday that the return day mentioned in the British North America Act fixing the commencement of Parliament, is the technical date mentioned in the statute for the return of the writs. If there were any doubt, the proper way would be to appoint a committee of the House as this is not a party question, but one in which the House as a whole is interested. If we sit beyond our time, everything we should do would be simply null and void. We cannot lengthen our own days, and if there is any question, it is not a matter that ought to be determined by the Government, but by a committee of the House. The session will last, in any event, nearly four months, and, if from the unfortunate differences in the Cabinet, delay occurred in the early part of the session, if from the difficulties which beset the Government in framing this Bill, notwithstanding the fact, that they had six months in which to make up their minds in respect to it, and bring it down, delay arose in the prosecution of public business, private members are not, therefore, to be deprived of the days which belong to them by right for the discussion of questions which they have thought fit to place on the Order paper. If private members' days are thus to be taken away by the Government, we might as well surrender all our days at once. It is a perfect farce, that private members should take the trouble of preparing Bills under such circumstances. There are thirty Bills on the Order paper, and yet the Government on some pretext or other seeks to take away all private days. There is not one public Bill, except the Remedial Bill, on the paper, not a piece of legislation suggested. I have standing in my own name a matter which should be disposed of before the elections, and that is with respect to the election law. This subject should be taken up by the Government and be dealt with, as it is necessary that the election laws should be amended before the general elections take place. I protest most strenuously against this motion, and object to private members' days being taken away on any pretext. It is important to know whether the Government have yet been able to make up their minds as to the duration of Parliament, and the present motion might be allowed to stand over until the next Government day, when we shall probably hear from the Government on that point.

Mr. MARTIN. The Bill of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), respecting the representation of the North-west Territories, should be placed on Government orders. I have introduced a Bill on the same subject, but, if my hon. friend's Bill was amended by introducing a clause which has been omitted and carried, I should be satisfied. It is most important that this Bill should be passed before the elections; otherwise, only a small portion of the people will have their names on the voters' lists, and the Government might as well take power to name representatives of the four North-west constituencies. I also draw attention to the fact, that the change made in the law was not made by this House, but by the Senate; and, while it was agreed to by this House, it never was discussed here, and, with the exception of the Minister of the Interior, not a single member was aware of the change made in 1894. My hon. friend's Bill is No. 13 on the list of Public Bills and Orders, and will probably not be reached in the ordinary course.

Mr. DAVIN. It is most important that the subject which my Bill deals with, should be dealt with this session. The North-west members have had a conference with the Minister of the Interior on the subject, and he has promised to make my Bill a Government measure, or introduce a Government Bill to deal with the question, framed substantially on the same lines.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The hon. Minister, speaking on behalf of the Government, told us that it was his intention to press through the House with all possible speed the Remedial Bill. We are delighted to hear the hon. gentleman make that statement, and we will lend him our assistance. In order to show that we are anxious to help him to prove to the House and to the country that he is in earnest in his statement, I intend to move an amendment to the motion now before the House. I understood that the hon. leader of the House meant to put off his motion till Monday. I have no objection to that, and my amendment will share the fate of the main motion, and come up for consideration on Monday next. I move in amendment, seconded by Mr. Brodeur:

> That the words "Government orders" be struck out and the following substituted: "The Order of the House that the House go into committee on the Remedial Act (Manitoba)."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With the consent of hon. gentlemen opposite, I propose to ask leave to withdraw this motion, with the understanding, that it will be taken up on Monday, when the Government will be prepared to make the statement suggested. I think I have a right to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, by consent, to allow this matter to be brought up on Monday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the suggestion of the leader of the House is a reasonable one, under the circumstances, on the understanding, that the Government will then state their decision as to the duration of Parliament. Under these circumstances, I will ask the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. McNEILL. I am interested in the suggestion made, because I have a resolution on the paper. If there be an understanding that, in case Monday be largely consumed in the discussion of this question, the Government will give me another day, I will be perfectly satisfied.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not expect any difficulty to arise. I will take care that the hon. gentleman shall have an opportunity of bringing up that question, which is a very important one.

Mr. McCARTHY. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the motion to bring this matter up on Monday can be carried without the consent of all hon. members?

Mr. SPEAKER. With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), it can only be by consent that this matter can be taken up on Monday.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will not consent. So the matter can stand till Tuesday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I propose to ask the House to deal with the motion that is now before it.

Mr. DICKEY. It is, of course, of considerable importance that, in view of the approaching elections, the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) should desire his Bill to be taken up. I had my attention directed to the matter before, with a view of seeing whether it would not be desirable to make the provisions of that Bill part of the election law. I am not at present able to say that the Government would adopt all, or any of its provisions, but I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) that I will look at the Bill more carefully, and if I consider the provisions are such as should be necessary for the purposes of the general elections, I should be very glad indeed to put them on the Government orders.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

Mr. DICKEY. The matter referred to by the member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is being dealt with, I believe. I think, Sir, that the House would hardly be wise in tying its hands as proposed by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette). The proposition of the Government, as understood by the House, is that the consideration of the Remedial Bill shall go forward continuously. But it is quite another matter to make that a standing order, so that no other business of any kind could be taken up. If the course of the Government in prosecuting the Remedial Bill is not satisfactory to the House, the attention of the House can be called to it in many ways that are quite proper. In the meantime, it seems to me that it would be premature for the House to agree to the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Choquette). The Government has stated what its intention is, and it asks for these extra days in order to carry out that intention.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We have arrived at a stage of the debate when surely an arrangement can be come to by both sides. It does appear to me not unreasonable that the Government should ask for a little time to consider this question of the duration of Parliament, and to make a declaration to the House. Let the matter come up on Monday. I would suggest to the hon. members for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) if it would not be better to withdraw their amendments, in the same manner as the leader of the House withdraws his motion. After the declaration on Monday we will be able to discuss the matter better, when we know definitely what the position of the Government is.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not the slightest objection to delay, but I have decided objection to rendering Monday, which is probably the last private day we will have. I do not see what urgent reason there is for taking this up on Monday instead of Tuesday.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I must confess that neither do I see any urgent reason for it. However, the Government seems to think it necessary, and in view of the declaration made, it does seem to me imprudent to press the amendment.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Let the motion of the Government stand until Tuesday instead of Monday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That cannot be done.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does seem to me that there is not a very great deal of difference between the gentlemen leading on both sides of this House with regard to this matter I believe, however, that the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) takes a somewhat peculiar view of the rights and privileges of the members of this House. There seems to be a desire, as it were, to coerce private members. I hope I have not used too strong a word, but I am expressing my own feeling, and no doubt the feelings of members on both sides of the House. This I explained to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) the other day in conversation. There seems to be no justification for trying to force away the rights of private members. We have during the past few days gone through what appears to me an unreasonable course, and members on both sides have a right to protection. There might be no objection if the leader of the House could advance the very strongest public reasons in support of his course, but he has given no argument yet which would appeal to the common sense of any member of this House. I say to the hon. gentleman, and I say to this House, that hon. members have the same rights and privileges as the most prominent of the leaders in this Parliament. It is not unreasonable that we should ask for one day's delay in the debate. What was the result last night. I went to four, at least, of the most prominent members of this side of the House, and at my request they forebore making speeches which they intended to deliver on this question. Even in view of that, my hon. friend who was leading the House at the time, and in my absence, at least by insinuation, made out that there was a breach of faith. Sir, there was not the slightest foundation for that statement. I felt annoyed, and I had reason to feel very sore about it. Who was it that took up the time of the House ? My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Hughes) had a perfect right to address the House, and I take this opportunity to express my regret, as I did privately last night, that there should be any interruption when any member desires to lay his views before the House. If the hour was unreasonable he was not to blame for that. It is unreasonable to try to force the House to accept the views of one or two individuals. I appeal to the leader of the House to accept the reasonable suggestion that has been made. When members of this House desire to bring up matters which they consider of importance to the country, or of interest to their constituencies, it is not right that they should be accused of a desire to obstruct ; and when a reasonable proposition is made to the leader of the House, I think it ought to receive his favourable consideration.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am the last man in the House who would desire in the slightest degree to interfere unnecessarily with the rights of private members. I recognize most fully the importance, for the wise dealing with the questions that come before this House, that the greatest possible consideration should be given to the views of hon. gentlemen on both sides, especially to private members who may be interested in certain measures before the House. I am quite willing, also, to acknowledge the great courtesy I have received from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and I should regret extremely that if he or any other member should have the idea that there was a desire to coerce the House, or to use any improper means of pressing the views of the Government on the House. I fully concur in every word the hon. gentleman has used. But he will remember that the suggestion that this motion should be postponed until Monday came, not from the Government, but from his own side of the House ; and I met the suggestion made by the hon. member for South Oxford as a reasonable one, for the reason given, which I think the hon. member recognizes as a sufficient reason for taking the additional time—that is, on the assumption of the opinion expressed uniformly on the other side of the House, and by a very high authority on this side as to the time this session would absolutely terminate. I may say, also, to the hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment that the most important reason why the Government are promptly asking that the additional time be placed at their disposal is for the purpose of pressing to as steady and rapid a conclusion as possible, the Remedial Bill. The Government attach the utmost importance, the gravest importance, to that measure being promptly proceeded with and completed. Under these circumstances, the object which the hon. mover of the amendment seems to have, entirely accords with the view of the Government, and is one of their main reasons for asking from the House these additional days.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then, the Government have abandoned, I suppose, all idea of negotiation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not necessary for the hon. gentleman to assume that. The Government have not abandoned the idea of negotiation. On the contrary, I think I may venture to say to the House the Government propose to proceed with those negotiations immediately; but the House will see that while they are proceeding it is absolutely necessary, unless this remedial legislation is to be abandoned, that the measure be as steadily and rapidly as possible proceeded with, in order to be in a position to become law in case of the failure of the negotiations. I have no objection to take the House into the confidence of the Government in regard to the position of that question. I state frankly that I thought the proposal of the hon. member for South Oxford a very reasonable proposal that this motion should be withdrawn—it cannot, I am informed, stand over, according to the rules of the House—and be taken up on Monday, when the Government will be in a position to announce their view with regard to the question of the duration of Parliament.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There are a number of members who object to taking it up on Monday, and who say that it should be postponed till Tuesday. Why not, instead of wasting time, which seems to be inevitable otherwise, wait till Tuesday? That would settle the whole matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I think we will go a step further to meet the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and withdraw this motion, on the understanding that it will be the first order on Tuesday.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. As I do not desire to embarrass the Government, I am willing to withdraw my motion, in order that the suggestion just made may be carried out.

Mr. OUIMET. I think the hon. gentleman is to be congratulated on his change of opinion. Yesterday he wanted the Bill to be left for six months, while to-day——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. OUIMET. What is the point of order?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You are referring to a previous debate.

Mr. OUIMET. I am not referring to debate. I am referring to a decision of the House, an accomplished fact, to which we can now refer. I was not referring to any of the hon. gentleman's reasons for his opinion, but I am entitled to refer to his vote, and I congratulate him upon the very great and very important change in his opinion.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I have not changed my mind, but I am in favour of this delay in order to assist the conference taking place.

Motion and amendment withdrawn.

VISIT OF SIR DONALD SMITH TO WINNIPEG.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I want to call the attention of the House and the two gentlemen opposite me, in particular, to certain statements which were made in the House some little time ago. On the 2nd March, the hon. member for North Simcoe asked the following question:—

> 1. Was Sir Donald Smith authorized on behalf of the Government to negotiate with the Premier or administration of the province of Manitoba with reference to or on the subject of the school law of that province?

There were two other questions put, which it is not necessary that I should read. To this the leader of the House replied:

> I beg to say, in reply to the hon. member, that the answer to the first portion of the question is, No. In response to the remainder of the question, I have to say, that the only communication that has taken place between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Donald Smith was of a purely personal character, no report having been made.

Now, I am informed, on the very highest possible authority, that when the hon. gentleman from Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) did proceed to Winnipeg, he proceeded there, having had communication with, and, as I understand, having been authorized by the Governor General of Canada. Under these circumstances, I can form no conclusion but this, that the Governor General of Canada, acting on the advice of His Excellency's advisers, had authorized, consented to, or agreed with, the hon.

member for Montreal West to proceed to Winnipeg and enter into these negotiations. That being so, it appears to me impossible to reconcile the information we have obtained with the answer given by the hon. leader of the House. I recognize, as everybody does, the extreme desirability of avoiding to the uttermost any reference to His Excellency here, but these references were not made by me. They have been publicly made. I draw no distinction between what His Excellency may do, in his capacity of Governor General, and in his private capacity. He must be assumed to have been advised by his Ministers in all the steps he took, or else responsible government in Canada would become a farce. Under those circumstances, I call upon the leader of the House to explain how it came to pass that His Excellency communicated, with the consent of his advisers, no doubt, with the hon. member for Montreal West, and how, that being done, the leader of the House deemed it within his right to tell the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that Sir Donald Smith was not authorized on behalf of the Government to negotiate with the Premier or administration of Manitoba with reference to, or on the subject of, the school laws of the province. I need waste no words, I hope, in pointing out to this or any other constitutional assembly the imperative necessity of maintaining our rule, that His Excellency can only act by and with the advice of his responsible officers. That being so, I maintain, that the hon. member for Montreal West was authorized by the Government to open negotiations with the government of Manitoba, and, therefore, that this information given to the House was misleading in a very high degree. I think it is the duty of the Government, and, more particularly, the leader of the House, who is the person who made this statement, to inform us of everything that transpired with respect to these negotiations, and more particularly how such an extraordinary statement as that came to be made to the House; and, in view of the very grave importance of the question which underlies this matter, I move the House do now adjourn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection at all to state, in the most frank and full manner, to the House, the position of this question. The hon. gentleman has correctly stated the question that I put to him, and the answer that we got; and I hope I need not say to the House, that that answer was strictly accurate. I was asked the question, whether Sir Donald's Smith's visit to Winnipeg was of an official character, in fact, whether he had gone at the instance of the Government. I stated, in the frankest and fullest manner, that it was not. I stated, that the Government had not been consulted, in any shape or form, with reference to his visit to Winnipeg, and that the hon. gentleman, so far as I was aware, acted entirely in his personal capacity. I had not the pleasure of hearing the speech of my hon. friend from Montreal yesterday in the House, but, I believe, he himself made a similar statement—that he had not authority from the Government to open up any negotiations whatever. I understand, from that hon. gentleman, that anything that passed between His Excellency and himself, was the expression of a personal feeling and a personal opinion. I am not aware, nor was the Government aware, of any communication between the hon. member for Montreal West and His Excellency the Governor General. They were not parties, directly or indirectly——

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Constitutionally, that cannot be. Constitutionally, the Government cannot repudiate responsibility, and are responsible.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not wish to make nice distinctions, but it is the facts I want to give, and those are, that any communication which took place between His Excellency and Sir Donald Smith, was not at the instance of, nor in connection with, the Government, or any members of the Government. The first occasion on which the hon. member acted in an official capacity, was in the message which he sent, at the instance of the Prime Minister, to Mr. Greenway, the answer to which was submitted to the House.

Mr. MARTIN. Part of the answer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will take this opportunity of saying, that the attempt to make it appear that there was interference—

Mr. MARTIN. Garbling.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not garbling. That slander, I think, can be disposed of by a single word, and that was, that all which was considered by me pertinent to the case, was laid before the House, and, in the form in which I laid the answer before the House, it was transmitted by telegraph the same day to the Governor of Manitoba, to be placed in the hands of the gentleman who sent the message. It is not customary for persons to be charged with garbling and misstating, when they submit a message in the form in which they thought they were warranted in using it, and in the form in which they sent it back into the hands of the sender. The hon. gentleman is not warranted in taking that view.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Greenway took that view that very afternoon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have already expressed my great regret that Mr. Greenway took that view, and that, under the circumstances, there should be any cause of complaint in any way whatever. I cannot do more than that, but I call the attention of the House to the fact, that this message, in the form in which I considered it necessary to lay it before the House, was, the same day, placed in the hands of Mr. Greenway in the same form, by being transmitted to the Governor for that purpose. Now, Sir, I say that was the first communication of an official character in any shape or form between the Premier and the hon. member for Montreal West, and the moment that took place, as I have already stated, it was submitted for the consideration of the House. I am quite sure that no hon. member on the other side of the House would limit the Governor General of this country, would prevent him privately and personally expressing his opinions to a private member of this House on any question of public importance in which he took a great interest. I do not understand the hon. member for Montreal West to have gone to Winnipeg at all at the instance of the Governor General.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to read the words the hon. member for Montreal West is reported to have stated—with the consent of the House——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—because I think, after what the leader of the House has stated, these words should be read. What the hon. member for Montreal West is reported to have said is this :

> It is true that I had the privilege of communicating with His Excellency the Governor General, not so much as Her Majesty's representative here, but as one who, as we all know, has taken a very deep interest in everything that is for the benefit of Canada. Having incidentally had an opportunity of speaking of this very important matter of the Manitoba schools, His Excellency was good enough to express to me his very great desire that it should be satisfactorily settled in one way or the other, so as to be agreeable not only to the people of that province, but also to the people of the Dominion as a whole, desiring that it should be settled outside altogether of party politics, for we know that the Governor General never allows himself to become a partisan, but he is accustomed to look equally at all sides and to discriminate against none. I myself was greatly impressed with the view that were it possible to dispose of this matter outside of this Parliament, it would be for the general good, and I consequently determined to go to Manitoba with the view of seeing Mr. Greenway and some of his colleagues and of endeavouring to find if there could not be found a satisfactory way out of the difficulty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not see anything inconsistent with the statement I have made in what the hon. gentleman has read.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman permit me, in view of the extraordinary proposition he has laid down, to ask this question : On the question of practical politics and one of prime importance to the Government, may the representative of the Crown have a policy of his own independent of that which arises from the advice he has received from his Ministers ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that I have never said anything of that kind or anything that would bear being tortured, by any misconstruction, into meaning what the hon. gentleman has said. I have frankly stated the facts to the House, and I hardly think that, under the circumstances as they stand, any hon. gentleman would feel that there was any sufficient ground for raising this question in the mode in which it is raised here to-day.

Mr. EDGAR. I am sure that never since the days of the early Georges have there been such extraordinary ideas of responsible government propounded in any free assembly. Why, Sir, the idea that the leader of the House will try to persuade this House that it is constitutional for the advisers of the Governor General to shirk the responsibility for his acts in connection with a matter of the highest importance before this country——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must rise to a question of order. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the rule you have read to the House to-day shows this discussion to be a most extraordinary one. After the rule has been read to the House to-day, here is an hon. gentleman rising and charging His Excellency the Governor General——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes—charging His Excellency the Governor General with having a policy different——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the charge, Sir. I say it is a grave charge, in view of the statement which I have made to the House, a grave charge which can reflect only upon the Governor General. I raise that question of order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On the question of order, I suppose we may all be permitted to express an opinion. The position of my hon. friend (Mr. Edgar) is not that he reflects upon the Governor General in the slightest degree, but that he lays down this proposition, which ought, I think, to meet with universal acceptance—that the advisers of His Excellency are responsible for all that His Excellency does and must accept that responsibility, that they cannot under any condition of things, be permitted to screen themselves from the consequences of their acts by seeking to throw upon His Excellency a responsibility which belongs strictly to them.

Mr. EDGAR. On the point of order——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask your ruling on the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point of order is being discussed, I believe. Is the hon. member discussing the question of order ?

Mr. EDGAR. Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am not discussing the personal action of His Excellency the Governor General, because it would be unconstitutional for us to do so, just as I claim that it is unconstitutional for the Ministers of the Crown to shirk responsibility for the acts of the Governor. I am assuming that the acts of His Excellency are the acts of his Ministers who sit in Parliament and are responsible to this House for those acts. Therefore, I contend, we have the right to discuss them.

Mr. McCARTHY. On the question of order, I would say, it surely must be open to the House to ascertain the facts. What is charged here is, taking the answer that has been given by the leader of the House, that it appears as a matter of fact, if that answer is to be assumed to be correct, that His Excellency the Governor General has a policy for which the Government have not assumed and do not assume the responsibility.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is a question we have a right to discuss. We are not bringing in any question as to the position of the Governor General. But what is called in question is whether the Governor General has or has not acted upon the advice of his Ministers, or, to put it in another way, whether the Ministers are assuming the responsibility for the acts of His Excellency.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What acts ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not discussing the question before the House. The hon. gentleman will hear from me before this debate closes in regard to it. I am at present speaking on the question of order. If we are to be told that we must not name His Excellency, how are we to discuss these questions ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) The rule the hon. gentleman has quoted for the purpose of putting an end to legitimate discussion is one which has no applicability whatever to this case. That rule was intended to prevent the name of the Crown being used in Parliament for the purpose of influencing discussion in Parliament. My hon. friend (Mr. Edgar) has not used the name of His Excellency for any such purpose. The hon. gentleman was pointing out that a communication was made to the House yesterday by the hon. member for Montreal West, which follows after statements made by the leader of the House some time ago. And we are pointing out that the statement of the leader of the House is necessarily an inaccurate statement, because the Crown is a corporation sole, the Crown cannot act except through the instrumentality of some parties or other, and those parties, under our constitution, are the responsible advisers of the Crown. Now, if the Minister is not prepared to accept the responsibility of that act, he should retire.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What act ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why, Sir, does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the act of His Excellency in approving or recommending the member for Montreal West to go to Winnipeg to discuss this question with Mr. Greenway with the object of securing a settlement, is not an important act in connection with a matter that is now before this House ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it is an important fallacy, for no such thing has occurred.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member will remember that after the Government of Mr. Granville was compelled to retire, Mr. Perceval undertook to escape responsibility, but it was pointed out that he could not do so in coming into office, although he was not a party to the act of the Crown at all, but in coming into office after that act, he assumed the responsibility of it ; and so Sir Robert Peel assumed the responsibility for the dismissal of the Melbourne Government, although he was in Italy at the time that government was dismissed. So the hon. gentleman cannot escape responsibility in this matter, he is responsible, for whatever His Excellency has done in connection with any act or transaction relating to any matter of public policy, is a matter for which the Government is responsible, and the responsibility of which the Government ought to have had the courage at once to assume.

Mr. OUIMET. I understand the charge made by the hon. gentleman arises from what was said yesterday by the member for Montreal West. It was stated that in private conversation with His Excellency, His Excellency expressed a very strong desire that this vexed question should be settled where, in the opinion of every one who loves this country, it should be settled. That was the very earnest desire expressed by His Excellency ; and the hon. member for Montreal West very naturally thought that if he could do anything in his personal capacity, considering the great interest he had in the North-west, and the great influence he wields there, he might do something in the direction of accomplishing the desire expressed by His Excellency, and there was nothing else than a desire. And, Mr. Speaker, can it be charged that His Excellency has a policy different from the policy of the Government ? Has it not been stated here again and again that it was the policy of the Government to have that question settled in Manitoba instead of here ? Now, directing my argument to the question of order, I say there is no foundation at all for making the grave charge that His Excellency has expressed anything that could lead the public or this House to believe that he has a policy different from the policy of his advisers. If the facts are, as I have stated, the hon. gentleman is himself violating a rule that has been laid down by you, Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago, namely, that His Excellency's name cannot be brought here on charges which are not founded in fact, when the only result will be to prejudice public opinion against His Excellency, and in order to influence this House in the disposal of the question which is now before us. I say that the question of order has been correctly raised. Besides, Mr. Speaker, and in saying this I admit that I am not in order, you will observe that the whole of this debate is taking place without anything before the Chair.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, there is a motion to adjourn before the House, and I would invite an expression of opinion on the question which has been raised in connection with it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As you have invited an expression of opinion from hon. members on this point, it is because you attach great importance to it. I myself see that the matter is one of the greatest importance. The constitutional position assumed by my hon. friend from Bothwell would appear to me to be absolutely unquestionable. He says at present the House cannot assume, the House is precluded from assuming, that any policy can be followed or recommended to His Excellency except that policy is the policy of his advisers. The Governor General cannot have a policy distinct and apart from that of his advisers. If the Governor General adopts any policy, whether directly or indirectly, for the settlement of a great public question, his advisers must assume all responsibility for it. If they decline to assume such responsibility, they must retire, and their successors must be prepared to assume such responsibility for His Excellency's action. That is perfectly plain, and the best constitutional writers to-day contend that there cannot be any public action taken by the Queen or her representative for which the advisers of the Crown cannot be held responsible to Parliament. Therefore, when His Excellency took the position that the member for Montreal West says he did, and when that hon. gentleman went on a mission that His Excellency sanctioned, this House is bound to assume that every step taken in that connection was taken with the full concurrence and advice of His Excellency's advisers; and they are precluded, while they remain advisers, from saying that there is not a certain responsibility. They are violating the constitution if they do say it. If they are not in thorough unison with, and prepared to adopt and defend, the course taken by His Excellency, they are bound, by all constitutional rule, to put their resignations in His Excellency's hands, and then His Excellency will find somebody who will take the responsibility for his action. I will say that if the Government were to resign on this occasion, and if the leader of the Opposition were called upon to form a Government, he would have to assume responsibility for the action of His Excellency. Now, a statement was made in this House by the leader of the House as to the connection, and knowledge, and responsibility, the Government chose to assume for this mission of Sir Donald Smith to the west, and the member for South Oxford points out that the statement made last night was at variance with the statement made by the leader of the House as to the position the Government took. Then we are discussing, necessarily and properly, how far the Government ought to be held responsible, and is it possible to discuss that question without introducing His Excellency's name? I opine, from reading Bourinot and other authorities on this subject, that it is perfectly proper to refer to His Excellency, and to use his name in all matters in connection with the affairs of state, except we use it for the purpose of interfering with the freedom of discussion, or influencing the determination of the House, or the vote of members. Subject to these limitations, it is perfectly proper and in order to refer to His Excellency's name. When we say that His Excellency did so and so, we mean to say that he did it by the advice of his advisers, and on their responsibility. Unless it can be shown that my hon. friend is introducing His Excellency's name for the purpose of influencing or interfering with the freedom of discussion, or influencing any member of the House, then he is perfectly in order in discussing this great question, and the responsibility that should be attached to the Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to say one word on the point of order, and perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you may think that it would come in more properly on the main subject of discussion. Where it seems to me we are out of order in discussing the case as put by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to-day is here, that in order to make his point and raise this subject for discussion, he had of necessity to refer to a statement which the leader of the House says he did not hear, a statement of which the Government officially have no notice whatever, a statement made in a previous debate from the lips of the hon. member for Montreal West. Without disputing in the slightest degree the accuracy of that hon. gentleman in regard to the conversation which he said he had with His Excellency, it seems to me that you can neither hold the Government responsible for what is said to have occurred on that occasion, nor is it seemly that what occurred on that occasion should be discussed in this House until the Government have had proper opportunity of stating, of course with His Excellency's authority, the official version of what did take place. Then the Government can quite understand the gravity of the question and the importance of its solution. I submit we have not reached the stage when it is either in order or respectful to His Excellency to consider this question, for a hypothetical case has to be assumed in connection with His Excellency's conduct.

Mr. COCKBURN. It is unfortunate that this subject has been brought before the House immediately after a discussion which was continued about forty-eight hours. I hold that the question with respect to any responsibility assumed by the Government as regards the Governor General is not before the House. It will be an evil day for us if a Governor General cannot express to a private gentleman the hope that trouble in the North-west or in any part of Canada should be amicably settled. So far as I understand it, there was no intention or thought on the part of the Governor General to instruct the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) to go to Manitoba to try and settle the difficulty there. So far as I can understand, the statement given by the hon. gentleman I understand to be simply this. That two gentlemen were sitting together, perhaps over their nuts and wine, and the Governor General expressed the opinion that he would be very glad to see this question settled. It may have been very wicked to have expressed such an opinion. Apparently some hon. gentlemen opposite think so, but I believe public opinion will bear out the hon. member for Montreal West in his having felt so strongly that it was desirable to follow up the suggestion of the Governor General, that on his own responsibility he determined to go to the North-west and see what could be done there by his personal influence. I think it would have been well if hon. gentlemen opposite manifested a similar conciliatory spirit. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) points to this side of the House. I can assure the hon. gentleman that while perhaps the principle of Christian brotherhood may not prevail to the full extent on this side of the House, I do not think it prevails to a larger extent in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite, and any remarks in regard to exercising a conciliatory spirit in this matter could be well omitted by hon. gentlemen opposite, for there can be little of that conciliatory spirit exercised when so much is made by hon. gentlemen opposite of the fact that a gentleman in his private capacity proceeded to the North-west to see what he could do for the good of the country. Party spirit runs away with hon. gentlemen opposite, when on an attempt being made to settle in a private and amicable way this difficulty, they object because it was not done in a strictly regular manner. I should be only too glad if half the members of the Opposition would take a trip to Winnipeg and see what they could individually do to effect a settlement. I am sure when they arrived at Winnipeg they would be met with more open arms and a more generous embrace than hon. members on this side of the House.

Mr. DICKEY. In speaking to the point of order only, I think if the question is what the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) takes it to be, there can be no doubt that this discussion is entirely out of order. The hon. member for Simcoe states the question before the House to be as to whether the Governor General has a policy distinct from the policy of his advisers. I cannot fancy any question which could be more objectionable to discuss than a question of that kind. Suppose any supporter of the Government who thought the Government policy was right is to be held to be at liberty here to rise and justify the Government by assuming and arguing that the Governor General is personally carrying out from some different policy from that of the Government, nothing could be more indecent than that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The leader of the House gave an answer to that.

Mr. DICKEY. I am discussing the question of order on principle only. What I submit is this, that it seems to me impossible that the discussion can proceed on the lines which it has taken with respect to the personal actions of the Governor General, without violating the well-understood rule, that the Sovereign cannot be made the subject of debate in this House, and that the actions of the Sovereign can only be discussed through the Ministers.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman answer this question? Suppose the Governor General did interfere without the authority of his Ministers. Is this House not to refer to that fact? Surely, the rule does not go that length. I am not saying that this is the case; but, supposing the fact that the Governor General did interfere, and was interfering without the advice of his Ministers, are we not, in this Commons chamber, to direct attention to the rule with respect to the responsibility of the Government, to the fact that the rules with respect to the responsibility of the Government are being practically violated? We cannot do so without mentioning the name of His Excellency.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not think it is ever in order to discuss the personal action of the Governor General. The Governor General is responsible here through his advisers, who are responsible for his acts.

Mr. MULOCK. They repudiate them.

Mr. DICKEY. I am not discussing the constitutional question. It is not now before the House; I am discussing simply the question of order. I submit that this discussion cannot fail to be ruled out of order, because it involves the consideration of the personal action of the Governor General.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to confine my remarks strictly to the point of order. Let us see where we are. The hon. member for South Oxford has moved the adjournment and brought up the question now under consideration. With regard to the objection of the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), that all the facts are not before the House, we have the facts admitted by the Secretary of State, and any attempt to shut them out cannot now succeed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have not the statement from any one, that His Excellency or his advisers were acquainted with the statement of the hon. member for Montreal West.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We must accept the statement of the hon. member for Montreal West.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed out, that an answer was made to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), as to the mission of the hon. member for Montreal West to Winnipeg, and that that answer involves a contradiction of what the member for Montreal West himself has said. Then, the Government take this position in answer to the charge of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the hon. member for Montreal West did not go to Winnipeg at their instance, but at the instance of the Governor General.

Sir DONALD SMITH. No.

Mr. MARTIN. I will make my statement, and it can be answered. If the hon. member for Montreal West went to Winnipeg with the consent of the Government, then, the answer which the Secretary of State gave to the hon. member for Oxford cannot be supported. What is the answer that the Secretary of State gave? He said, that his answer to the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was correct, and that the hon. member for Montreal (Sir Donald Smith) did not go to Winnipeg at the instance of the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. Now, we know that Sir Donald Smith did go to Winnipeg, and we know that the Government did know that he went to Winnipeg, because they have put before this House officially the result of the hon. gentleman's mission. How did the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith) go to Winnipeg.

Some hon. MEMBERS. By train; by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MARTIN. We know very well, that he went by private car, as he had a right to, but that is not material. Under what circumstances did he go there? Was the going there of the hon. gentleman a public act of the Government? If it were, then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) is quite in order in alluding to the Governor General as he has done, because it is laid down in Todd's "Parliamentary Government and Colonial Institutions":

> Constitutional usage will not permit of any attempt to affix upon the Governor General, or the Queen, by either branch of a colonial legislature, a direct personal responsibility for public acts of Government.

Is this a public act of the Government? Is not every act between the government of Manitoba and this Government, in regard to this question, a public act of government? I say, Sir, that it is. Todd continues:

> All such responsibility should be assumed by his Ministers.

Sir, according to every constitutional authority, it is quite impossible for the Governor General, as suggested by the member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn), to take a personal interest in this matter, or to do anything personal whatever with regard to it. It is beyond doubt, that it is not open in any way for His Excellency the Governor General, constitutionally, to take the slightest action, personally, with regard to this matter. Everything that he does must be done at the instance of his advisers. It has not been proposed by any gentleman on this side of the House to affix to the Governor General any personal responsibility for what he has done in this matter. We repudiate that. We say, that it is not possible under the constitution to affix any personal responsibility upon him, but I do say, that the answer of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) to the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is an attempt to affix personal responsibility on the Governor General. Surely, Sir, if the House of Commons of Canada—for the reason that we cannot mention the Governor General's name—bring into this House a great public question of that kind, it would be absurd. Rule 13 of the Rules of Order says:

> No person shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty the Queen, nor of any person administering the Government of Canada.

Sir, there has not been an offensive word used towards the Governor General during this debate. The hon. member (Mr. Edgar) was not referring to the Governor General in any disrespectful way. Was he not, rather, doing it for the purpose of endeavouring to convict the Secretary of State of an inconsistent and inaccurate statement, and an evasion of his responsibility ? It is a pity, that it should ever become necessary to draw the attention of the House to the delinquencies of the Secretary of State, but it has frequently been necessary in the past, and it may be necessary in the future. This rule of order has been made for another purpose altogether, and is it to be used now to prevent our referring to the conduct of the Secretary of State ? I say, Sir, that no more important question can come before this House for consideration, than the question: Whether the Governor General can be presumed to have done anything whatever in this matter on his personal responsibility ? That is the only question before the House.

Mr. CASEY. Speaking to the point of order, and not to the motion to adjourn, I must entirely agree with the constitutional view taken by my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). This point of order has been raised, not to avert unseemly discussion of the conduct of the Governor General, but to avert well-merited censure on the conduct of the Secretary of State. It is simply absurd, as you, Sir, or any other old parliamentarian, must know, to say, that we must not mention the name of the Governor General. We know that His Excellency must not be spoken of disrespectfully, and that his name must not be used to influence debate or the decision of the House. But, Sir, the person who has broken the rule in this case, is not the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) who has been called to order, but the Secretary of State himself. He has been telling us, that it was the Governor General who sent this ambassador to Winnipeg, and that the Governor General is to blame for it, if anybody is to blame.

Some hon. MEMBERS. The Secretary of State never said that.

Mr. CASEY. He has said, that, if there is any responsibility for the matter, it does not rest upon the Government, because it was not by their authority, but by a personal act of the Governor General, that Sir Donald A. Smith carried on these negotiations. Sir, I charge, that it is the Secretary of State who has violently and flagrantly broken all the fundamental rules of this House, in trying to shirk responsibility for the conduct of the Government, and to place it upon shoulders where it cannot be, constitutionally, placed. When we discuss the conduct of the Governor General in this House, we discuss his conduct as a constitutional Governor, and, therefore, we are discussing the conduct of his Ministry. His Ministers are responsible for everything he has done. If they knew of this conference and these negotiations before they were entered into, then, they must have advised them. And, if they have only become aware of the matter since, and have not resigned, they are still equally responsible. Sir, they have not only recognized these negotiations, but they have used in this House, to influence debate, documents connected with this matter. They have brought the whole of these negotiations before the House.

Mr. LISTER. No.

Mr. CASEY. I admit that they have not given us all the particulars of the negotiations, but they have brought the whole matter before the House, so as to make it open for discussion, by introducing a mutilated telegram in connection with the negotiations. By so doing they have made themselves responsible for them, if they were not responsible already by constitutional rule.

The hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), in his natural zeal for the family, urges us to leave this matter alone, because the Governor General has, as yet, had no official notification from his advisers, or otherwise, of what was said by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith). That is not the question at all. It does not matter whether the Governor General has heard of it or not. The question is whether the Government, his advisers, have heard the statement made by the hon. member for Montreal West. They sat here and heard it ; they have not repudiated it ; they have substantiated it ; and the question has reference to their conduct in the matter, as the persons responsible for these negotiations. It does not matter whether the Governor personally has heard of it or not.

The hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn) has approached the matter in a simple and child-like spirit—in the same simple and child-like spirit with which he formerly approached the public of the universe assembled at Chicago. He is sorry that certain other members did not go to Winnipeg on their own responsibility to endeavour to settle this question. He said that the hon. member for Montreal West was asked to go there by the Governor General merely as a private individual.

Mr. COCKBURN. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that one gentleman as a private individual might talk to another gentleman as a private individual. I never for a moment suggested that the Governor General, or any one else had suggested it to the hon. member for Montreal West.

Mr. CASEY. That is what the hon. gentleman said. If he did not mean by it that the Governor General had made that suggestion to the hon. member for Montreal West, there was no sense in what he said. The suggestion certainly was that the Governor, as a private individual, had suggested to the hon. member for Montreal West, as a private individual, to go and talk this thing over in Winnipeg, and that he had done so. That is all I have to say on the question of order. Other matters have been raised by the hon. member for Centre Toronto which

I shall discuss in the place where they more properly belong.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question before the House at six o'clock was the point of order raised by the hon. leader of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I did not know the discussion was concluded at six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is the question before the House. Does the hon. member wish to address the House ?

Mr. MULOCK. Yes. Mr. Speaker, the point of order was raised on some remarks that fell from the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), although the debate appears to have taken a wider range ; and I would like to know now whether the point of order has reference simply to the utterance of the hon. member for West Ontario or to the larger question involved in the discussion which was raised by the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. SPEAKER. The discussion at six o'clock was confined to the point of order.

Mr. MULOCK. The point of order was raised in the middle of the remarks of the hon. member for West Ontario, wherein he had referred to the contention of the Government, and described it in language which was regarded as extreme, observing that this was presenting parliamentary government in a light that had not been recognized since the time of the early Georges. However, if the point of order is to go on the whole question as to whether or not we can refer to His Excellency here, let me put a supposititious case. The Government, we will say, on a certain matter has a policy of coercion. We will say that the Opposition have another policy upon the question—that they suggest a policy of negotiation. Here are two policies on a great public question, the Government taking their stand upon one, and the other great political party taking their stand upon the other. The Government allow one of their supporters on the floor of Parliament to represent that His Excellency favours a policy opposed to theirs, and the Government themselves profess to acquiesce in that policy, and their willingness to endeavour to carry it out. It is a policy which they have opposed, which is antagonistic to their own recognized policy, and yet it is alleged, we will suppose, that the other policy has the imprimatur, the endorsement, and the sympathy of His Excellency, and that, at the same time, the Government profess their desire to take advantage of His Excellency's attitude. Under these circumstances, is it possible that no one can be responsible ? What must be the duty of the Government under such circumstances ? While one might be willing to concede a certain degree of individual opinion to the responsible representative of Her Majesty, yet should we concede for a moment that His Excellency could maintain a view on a great public question, and should advocate that view, and endeavour to bring it into effect—a view conflicting with that of his Government—it appears to me that the Government must either adopt the view of His Excellency, or resign.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is discussing the alleged policy of His Excellency, and we have no evidence whatever that there is any policy of His Excellency before us.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman was discussing the constitutional question and not the point of order. He must confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. MULOCK. I was endeavouring to do so, and I was basing my remarks solely upon recent events and upon a supposititious case, which would enable us to arrive at a conclusion as to what ought to be the attitude of the Government under such a supposititious state of things.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question of order raised was as to whether the Governor General's name could be introduced into this discussion with propriety. That is the point on which I have been asked to rule and I should be glad to hear the opinion of hon. gentlemen with regard to it. The constitutional question is an entirely different one.

Mr. MULOCK. Even the determination of that point can scarcely be dealt with satisfactorily without regard to what has led to it. And what led to it is this, that the hon. Secretary of State informed the House that the Government had communicated to the Greenway administration their willingness to take part in a conference, in consequence of certain action taken by the hon. gentleman for Montreal West, on the advice of His Excellency the Governor General, and without the advice of the Government. I believe we have that statement before us. Technically, there is no way by which Parliament can ascertain what communications passed of a verbal character between His Excellency and the Government ; the Government are masters of the situation ; they may make their communications to us, but they are the source of information. We cannot put His Excellency in the witness-box, we cannot ascertain his connection with the proceedings, and so the question arises : Can we assume for a moment that what has taken place had not his imprimatur and authority. We must assume, under responsible government, that when the Government adopts a course of conduct advised, recommended and brought about by His Excellency, they adopt it and become responsible for it from the beginning, and therefore it is an administrative act of the Government, for which they are wholly responsible. Therefore, it appears to me that the Government cannot, at this stage, repudiate or disassociate their responsibility for what has taken place.

Mr. DICKEY. Keep to the point of order.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the point of order, and I maintain that the reference to His Excellency is this, that His Excellency has spoken and acted through the Administration, and that the Administration are responsible, and that by alluding to His Excellency, we are placing the responsibility where it should be placed, upon the Government, and that the Government are estopped from seeking to transfer responsibility to His Excellency, and that we are here advocating responsible government and protecing His Excellency against the disloyalty on the part of the Administration towards him. It is not questioning His Excellency's advice, but endeavouring to secure for His Excellency that constitutional endorsement and responsibility to which he is entitled. Not questioning what he has done, but debating the recognized theory that within the scope of his authority, he cannot do wrong, that he can do nothing of himself, and has acted throughout on the advice of his responsible Ministers.

Mr. MARA. The argument of the hon. gentleman, as well as the supposititious case which he presented to the House, is based on the assumption that the Government disclaim all responsibility for the action taken by His Excellency and repudiate his action. I have not so understood the Government, and I think it would be perhaps better if the Government would state whether they accept or repudiate the responsibility. If they accept the responsibility of His Excellency's action, then it is certainly not desirable to use the language just now used by the hon. gentleman opposite, when he stated that the Government desired to take advantage of His Excellency's interview with the hon. member for Montreal West and spoke of His Excellency being called to account by this House. These words are entirely disrespectful, and, so far as the point of order is concerned, I think it is very well taken. But the point is this—do the Government accept responsibility, or do they not ? I they do accept responsibility, then the hon. gentlemen should not drag His Excellency's name into the debate as they have done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) brought this question up today and read the answer which I gave to the House in response to the question of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), I stated to the House that the answer to that question was undoubtedly correct, that the Government had taken no part whatever in the mission of the hon. member for Montreal West to Winnipeg. The Government were not aware, as I had not been in the House, and had not had the pleasure either of hearing or reading the statement made by the hon. member for Montreal West, as I stated to the House at the time, it was impossible for me to say more than I had stated on a previous occasion—and that was that the visit of the hon. member for Montreal West to Winnipeg was spontaneously undertaken, and we had no lot or part in it, but that we were only too glad to have any gentleman occupying any position, either in Parliament or out of it, do anything that would tend to a conciliatory settlement of this very vexed question. That mission has been spontaneously undertaken so far as we were aware, and the first time that the matter assumed a different condition was when the hon. member for Montreal West placed in the hands of the Prime Minister, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the answer which he had received to a message from Mr. Greenway. Then the Government took that communication into consideration, and on that they addressed a telegram to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, to be laid before Mr. Greenway, as I had stated to the House. That is a plain simple narrative of the position, so far as it was within the knowledge of the Government. I said that any communication previous to that had taken place between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Montreal West was of a personal and private character, and until the message to which I have just referred which led to an answer from Mr. Greenway which was placed in the hands of the Government and upon which they took action. That is a very simple, a very plain and a very straightforward position of things. I have since had the opportunity of reading the statement made to this House by the hon. member for Montreal West, and I have it now under my hand. As I said, I was, unfortunately, engaged in receiving a deputation at the time the hon. gentleman was speaking yesterday, and so was not able to be present in the House, and did not know what had been said. Since the House rose I have had an opportunity of learning what that statement was, and I will read it to the House. This is what the hon. gentleman is reported to have said, and I assume that it is a correct report :

> I wish to state very distinctly that I did not act at the instance of the Government.

Nothing could be clearer than that.

> It is true that I had the privilege of communicating with His Excellency the Governor General, not so much as Her Majesty's representative here, but as one who, as we all know, has taken a very deep interest in everything that is for the benefit of Canada. Having incidentally had an opportunity of speaking of this very important matter of the Manitoba schools, His Excellency > was good enough to express to me his very great desire that it should be satisfactorily settled in one way or the other, so as to be agreeable not only to the people of that province, but also to the people of the Dominion as a whole, desiring that it should be settled outside altogether of party politics, for we know that the Governor General never allows himself to become a partisan, but is accustomed to look equally at all sides and to discriminate against none. I myself was greatly impressed with the view that were it possible to dispose of this matter outside of this Parliament, it would be for the general good, and I consequently determined to go to Manitoba with the view of seeing Mr. Greenway and some of his colleagues and of endeavouring to find if there could not be found a satisfactory way out of the difficulty.

Having had an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of learning what the statement was that was made by the hon. member for Montreal West, I have no hesitation at all in saying that the Government are quite prepared to assume the entire responsibility of that transaction as stated by the hon. member for Montreal West.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am prepared to make a statement in reference to the point of order raised by the hon. Secretary of State, and, if it is the desire of the House, I will give the opinion I have arrived at. But it may not be necessary, the Government having assumed the responsibility for the action of the Governor General.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point raised by the hon. Secretary of State is as to whether the name of His Excellency the Governor General could be introduced with propriety into a discussion of the character of that which arose here this afternoon. I hope I may be pardoned if I take occasion to state the circumstances under which this discussion was brought up. In the first place, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred to the answer which was given by the Government to the following question :—

> Was Sir Donald Smith authorized on behalf of the Government to negotiate with the Premier or administration of the province of Manitoba with reference to or on the subject of the school law of that province ?

The answer to that question was that Sir Donald Smith was not so authorized. In the debate of yesterday, the hon. member for Montreal West made a statement which has just been read by the hon. the Secretary of State. Upon these two statements, the hon. member for South Oxford based an attack, as I understand it, upon the Government, on the ground that they had evaded responsibility for the act of the Governor General. However, the statement that has just been made by the leader of the House, I think, gets rid of that imputation. So far as the introduction of the name of the Governor General into this House is concerned, the rules, I think, are explicit and plain. The rule is that it is out of order to introduce the sovereign's name or the name of the Governor General to influence debate. It is also stated in this book which I hold in my hand :

> By the indulgence of the House, the Sovereign's name may be introduced in respect to a statement of fact, and not meant to influence the judgment of the House.

The facts in reference to this matter, it seems to me, have rendered it necessary to introduce the name of the Governor General, the hon. member for Montreal West having stated that he had had communication with the Governor General before he went to Winnipeg. With the nature of that communication, we have nothing whatever to do. Whether the matter was a public matter of sufficient importance to justify the inference, that the Governor General had improperly interfered, is another matter altogether. If that was the object of the hon. gentleman in introducing this matter to-day, that is to say, if he intended to cast any aspersion upon the Governor General because of his action, that, I think, would be an impropriety ; I do not think it would be a proper reference to make to His Excellency in regard to a matter of that nature. But I see great difficulty in ruling, that the name of His Excellency cannot be introduced under any circumstances into a discussion in this House, because, as was pointed out by one hon. member to-day, the Government might shirk their responsibility altogether by shielding themselves behind the action of the Governor General ; and so I say, that I can hardly come to the conclusion that the Governor General's name cannot be introduced under any circumstances in this House. But I may point out further, that I think that the name of the Governor General ought to be introduced with very great reticence, and that it should never be introduced unless it is absolutely necessary to the elucidation of arguments which hon. gentlemen are presenting to this House. I may say, further, that, in reading the debate which brought up the question of order, it seems to me, that the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was not referring to the name of the Governor General in terms that would savour of impropriety. What he said was this :

> I may say that never since the days of the early Georges have there been such extraordinary idea of responsible government propounded in any free assembly. Why, Sir, the idea of the leader of the House trying to persuade this House that it is constitutional for the advisers of the Governor General to shirk their responsibility for his acts in connection with a matter of the highest importance to this country.

That seems to be rather an attack upon the Government than upon the Governor General. I may state frankly—I express my opinion upon this question with a good deal of diffidence, and I am greatly indebted to the legal members of this House for the information which I have been able to obtain during the course of this debate—that I cannot come to any other conclusion than that which I have already stated, and that I cannot rule that it is not proper, under any circumstances, that the Governor General's name should be introduced into a discussion in this House. But I would further emphasize the statement I already made, that it ought to be introduced with very great reticence, and only under conditions that render it absolutely necessary for the elucidation of arguments that are being presented.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In reference to a remark made by you, Mr. Speaker, just now, I may call attention to the fact, that I most expressly disclaimed, in my opening remarks, any intention to reflect on His Excellency at all ; my charge was only directed against His Excellency's advisers.

Sir DONALD SMITH. Nothing could have been further from my thought, nothing did I expect less, than that anything arising out of the little speech, the short, plain statement of facts I made yesterday, would have given rise to the debate on which you, Sir, have given your ruling. It is not often that I speak in this House, and I generally refrain from speaking when I have not some knowledge of the subject that I am treating ; and I think, if the outcome of any of my remarks were at all times to be such as this discussion now taking place, the House ought to be under a debt of gratitude to me that I do not speak often. As to what I did say, I wish to emphasize the fact, which I have already stated, that I did not go to Winnipeg at the request or the instance of the Government.

Mr. McCARTHY. Or their knowledge ?

Sir DONALD SMITH. My hon. friend from North Simcoe says, "Or their knowledge ?" Perhaps, Sir, as I took you and the House into my confidence a little more than it may possibly have been proper for me to do in mentioning at all His Excellency's name, I may go a little further, and, in confidence, state, that just within half an hour of leaving for Winnipeg, I happened to be with the Prime Minister, or should I say, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, as, possibly, although I have been so long in this House, I know so little of parliamentary proprieties in addressing the House, that I may be wrong even in referring to the Prime Minister. But it happens, at any rate, that, within half an hour of taking the train for Winnipeg, I was with the Prime Minister, and I think I did say to him, that I intended to take a trip by and by to Winnipeg, instead of going to Florida, where I had been recommended to go by my doctor. And I think you will see at once how much he knew of the object of my going to Winnipeg, when I tell you, that he was good enough to ask me to go with him at that moment to take luncheon, when I had to leave within half an hour, or less, for Winnipeg. It is true, I did see His Excellency, and, possibly, being more accustomed to ordinary business matters than to those of a political character, I may not always use that exact language which will preclude me from being misunderstood by any one. But I certainly had the privilege and the honour of meeting His Excellency the Governor General ; and, as I say, I took the House into my confidence before, and I told them of a conversation which had taken place between, as I considered, two gentlemen in their private capacity. I mentioned that, incidentally, this vexed question, the school question of Manitoba, had been referred to, that His Excellency did say that he sincerely hoped it might be settled in a satisfactory way for the whole people of the Dominion, as well as for those in the provinces, as in Manitoba ; but I did not say that His Excellency had requested me to go to Winnipeg, nor did I say that he recommended, or that he even suggested to me that I should go. Also, I think it very likely indeed, that a nobleman, a gentleman who has shown such a very great interest in everything that is for the welfare of this country, one who, as we all admit, fills admirably the high position he now holds—I think it very likely, indeed, that he would not at all object to the inference being drawn from what I did say—if any hon. gentleman chooses so to consider it—that he was of opinion, that no private individual would be out of order, or doing that which is wrong, by going to Winnipeg for that purpose. I did so certainly. I spoke to His Excellency as one who takes very great interest in everything that could tend to the well being of the province. Had it not been that Her Excellency happened to be here at the moment I spoke in the House, I think it very likely I should have included her name in that remark as well ; but perhaps speaking of Her Excellency might have been quite unconstitutional. In short I made a mistake, perhaps, in speaking of His Excellency the Governor General instead of referring to the Earl of Aberdeen. Well, Sir, I certainly did go to Winnipeg. But, as has been said by the Secretary of State, the communication I made to the Government of a telegram from Mr. Greenway and mine to Mr. Greenway, to which his was a reply, given in confidence to the Government, was the first time on which it could be considered that anything even approaching to an official knowledge of my having gone to Winnipeg and having had interviews with Mr. Greenway, could have been assumed. I would repeat what I have already said with respect to my conversation with the Governor General, and I trust that in any and every communication I may have the honour of having with a gentleman in the high position he holds or any other gentleman the outcome of it will not be that I have said anything other than would be befitting with that which is in accordance with the instincts of a gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN. Now that the constitutional aspect of this matter has been cleared up, I desire to say a few words more in the direction indicated by the hon. member who moved this motion. I think we must admit that the question was certainly more or less mixed, and I might say this with respect to the observations of the hon. member for Montreal West, that surely it was most unfortunate that any public act of the Government—for after what has been said we must call this a public act of government, it being so according to Todd—should be communicated to this House not by His Excellency's advisers, who are responsible to this House for public acts of government, but by a private member of this House. Surely that shows what little appreciation the Government has had of their responsibility in this connection, that they should allow a public act of government, for which now they assume, after being practically forced to assume after the discussion in this House, full responsibility to be so brought forward. I take it, after what the Secretary of State has said this evening, that the facts of this case now are clear. His Excellency the Governor General in Council, not alluding to His Excellency personally but to the Government, despatched the hon. member for Montreal West——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir DONALD SMITH. No. I beg to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) that I never made any such statement—entirely to the contrary.

Mr. MARTIN. I certainly did not say that the hon. member for Montreal West stated so; he did not state so, but the Secretary of State did. He said he assumed full responsibility for the action of the Governor General in sending——

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MARTIN—the hon. member for Montreal West to Winnipeg.
