Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. That is an incorrect statement of what was said. The hon. gentleman has just stated that I said the Government assumed entire responsibility for the Governor General having sent the hon. member for Montreal West to Winnipeg. You, Mr. Speaker, and every hon. member knows, that that is entirely contrary to the statement I have made. I read the statement which the hon. member for Montreal West had made to the House yesterday, in which he said the very reverse, and I said the Government were prepared to assume the entire responsibility for what had occurred as stated by the hon. member for Montreal West yesterday.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, what was it that occurred? We are thrown back to that again, for we must have this matter cleared up. The hon. member for Montreal West stated that he had not gone to Winnipeg at the request of the Government, but that he had gone to Winnipeg at the request of His Excellency the Governor General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MARTIN I heard it. I should like to ask the hon. member for Montreal West what he did say with respect to that matter. The hon. gentleman, as I understand him, said he went to Winnipeg with the sanction and approval, not of the Government, but of the Governor General.

Sir DONALD SMITH. I beg pardon, I did not. Shall I read again for the hon. gentleman's information?

Mr. MARTIN. I have the hon. gentleman's remarks as taken down by "Hansard," and if they are not correct the hon. gentleman may correct them. The hon. gentleman is reported to have said:

> I wish to say very distinctly that I did not go at the instance of the Government. It is true that I had the privilege of communicating with His Excellency the Governor General, not so much as Her Majesty's representative here, but as one who, as we all know, has taken a very warm and deep interest in everything that is for the benefit of Canada. Having incidentally had an opportunity of speaking of this very important matter of the Manitoba school question, His Excellency was good enough to express to me his very great desire that it should be satisfactorily settled in one way or the other, so as to be agreeable not only to the people of that province, but also to the people of the Dominion as a whole, desiring it should be settled outside altogether of party politics, for we know that the Governor General never allows himself to become a partisan, and that he is here as the representative of Her Majesty, to look equally at all sides, and to discriminate against none. I certainly had the privilege of communicating with the Governor General. I myself was greatly impressed with the view that were it possible to dispose of this matter outside of Parliament, it would be for the general good; and I consequently determined to go to Manitoba with the view of seeing Mr. Greenway and some of his colleagues, and of endeavouring to find if there could not be found a satisfactory way out of the difficulty.

The Secretary of State has declared that he accepted responsibility for that. For what? For the interview which took place between His Excellency and the member for Montreal West, the result of which was that in order to settle the Manitoba school question, this very important matter that should be settled in one way or the other, so as to be agreeable not only to that province, but to the people of the Dominion as a whole, the hon. member for Montreal West went to Winnipeg and had a conference with Mr. Greenway's government. As has been pointed out in this discussion, either the Governor General, not as His Excellency the Governor General, but as one whom we all know "has taken a very warm and deep interest," &c. ; either he did it that way personally on his own behalf, had this interview as a result of which the hon. gentleman (Sir Donald A. Smith) went to Winnipeg, or, His Excellency as Her Majesty's representative here had that interview, the result of which was that the hon. gentleman (Sir Donald A. Smith) went up. The hon. member for Montreal West clings to the idea that His Excellency did this on his own personal responsibility. It has been abundantly shown here that that is altogether impossible under our constitution, and when it was brought to the notice of the Government the Government solved the difficulty at once by saying that they took full responsibility for what His Excellency the Governor General did at that time. So I say we had that fact settled. We have no more to do with it. It was the Government who did it. His Excellency the Governor General did not undertake in any way to act personally, apart from his representative character. He could not do so, and he did not do so. But he, acting with the advice of his Ministers, called in another adviser, for what reason it is hard to imagine. We have got seventeen or eighteen Ministers of the Crown, and none of them appear to have had the necessary ability to have taken this matter in hand, and they advised His Excellency to apply to the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith), who had diplomatic qualities, who had ability of some kind or another, who had experience in negotiations, and who had contributed very largely to settle a previous trouble in Manitoba, many, many years ago. So the Government applied in this emergency for the help of the hon. member for Montreal West. He went to Winnipeg. More than that, it was announced in all the newspapers that the hon. gentleman had gone there for the purpose of holding a conference with the Manitoba government. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), observing this report in the newspapers, asked the Government about the matter, as follows :—

> Was Sir Donald Smith authorized on behalf of the Government to negotiate with the Premier or administration of the province of Manitoba in reference to or on the subject of the school law of that province ?

And Sir Charles Tupper replied :

> I beg to say in answer to the hon. member, that the answer to the first portion of the question is, "No."

Now, Mr. Speaker, how can we reconcile that with the position of the Government to-night. To-night the Secretary of State does, as he must do, unless he is prepared to resign his position : he accepts full responsibility for what the Governor General did, as detailed to us by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) last night.

Sir DONALD SMITH. Might I ask the hon. member (Mr. Martin) what is generally understood by the word "incidentally" ?

Mr. MARTIN. Well, it means casually. It is pretty clear what it means, I suppose.

Sir DONALD SMITH. Perhaps the hon. member (Mr. Martin) will kindly give me the exact meaning of it. How is the word "incidentally" generally understood ?

Mr. MARTIN. I scarcely think it is a fair interruption. I was returned to this House for another purpose rather than to act as a dictionary. I would be glad to inform the hon. gentleman, but surely he understands the meaning of the word as well as I do.

Mr. DALY. He thinks you do not know the meaning of it.

Sir DONALD SMITH. The reason I say so is, that I find here, and I believe I said so yesterday, that I had the privilege of communicating or of seeing His Excellency the Governor General, not so much as Her Majesty's representative here, but as one who, as we all know, has taken a very deep interest in everything that is for the benefit of Canada. And then I continued :

> Having incidentally had the opportunity of speaking of the very important matter of the Manitoba schools.

Surely that shows that I was not called there for the purpose of discussing this matter. I really thought I was sufficiently exact in my statement.

Mr. MARTIN. It is perfectly unimportant whether the hon. gentleman was sent for for that purpose, or happened to be there, if he should require to be sent for.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MARTIN. We all agree as to what was done when he was there. And now, who was responsible for what was done. What was done ? The hon. gentleman (Sir Donald Smith) don't deny, and he has made it more emphatic by his declaration in this debate. He says he does not think for a moment that His Excellency the Governor General would object to its being inferred from his remarks that he desired him to go to Manitoba. Can there be any doubt at all as to what the hon. gentleman meant when he made his statement yesterday ? It was clear as daylight that he intended to say, and did say, that the Governor General, in his private capacity, arranged for him to go up there.

Several hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir DONALD SMITH. No, no.

Mr. MARTIN. This is what the hon. gentleman said :

> I certainly had the privilege of communicating with the Governor General. I myself was greatly > impressed with the view, that if it were possible to dispose of this matter outside of Parliament, it would be for the general good, and I consequently determined to go to Manitoba.

Two things occurred. First:

> I had the privilege of communicating with the Governor General.

Then, as to the hon. gentleman himself:

> I myself felt that I desired to have the question settled.

And because of those two reasons, he consequently determined to go to Manitoba with a view of seeing Mr. Greenway and some of his colleagues, and endeavoured to see if there could not be found a way out of the difficulty. Now, I say that the Government have accepted the full responsibility for that. Let us see what has occurred? The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) asked a question, an answer to which was given directly contrary to that position, saying that the hon. gentleman (Sir Donald Smith) was not sent up by the Government. Now, they cannot disassociate the two. The discussion and the judgment of the Speaker on the point of order make it too clear for argument; if there was any doubt about it before, except what was expressed by the Secretary of State—for apart from the leader of the House, I do not think there was any doubt upon the constitutional question. I say that on the 2nd of March the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) deliberately informed this House that Sir Donald Smith was not sent up by the Government. Now we have the fact that he was sent up there.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he contend that the hon. member for Montreal West was sent up directly by the Government or constructively?

Mr. MARTIN. I had purposely avoided that aspect of the case, and, I think, for good reason. If we are to assume, as the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) assumes, that the Governor General did this of his own accord, that he disregarded the advice of his Ministers——

Mr. DAVIN. I assume that the Governor General did nothing at all.

Mr. MARTIN. What, then, does constructively mean?

Mr. DAVIN. I ask the hon. member whether he was contending that the hon. member for Montreal West was sent up directly by the Government or constructively? I understood him to argue that the Government sent the hon. member for Montreal West, because the hon. Secretary of State said a few moments ago that for certain proceedings that have recently taken place, the Government assume responsibility.

Mr. MARTIN. Then I understand the hon. gentleman to allude to the question whether or not the Government had knowledge of what His Excellency did with regard to this matter at the time. Is that so?

Mr. DAVIN. No. That would assume that I say the Governor General did something. I do not say anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman states that the Government of Canada sent a member of this House on a certain mission, whereas there is no evidence whatever before this House that the Government did anything of the kind; and what I want to know is whether my hon. friend is making a positive statement on a merely constructive basis.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. Secretary of State assumed responsibility for something. What was it he assumed responsibility for? He assumed responsibility for His Excellency's conduct as detailed to us in the speech of the hon. member for Montreal West. That has been made clearer by the speech of the hon. member for Montreal West to-day.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, because he said to-day that he was sure that His Excellency would not object to the inference being drawn from his remarks of yesterday that it was His Excellency's desire that he should go to Winnipeg for the purpose of bringing about a settlement of this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir DONALD SMITH. I did not use the word sure. I could not be sure. I said I thought very likely His Excellency would not take exception to such an inference.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know that that makes it any different. It is very clear to me. Now, the hon. gentleman went to Winnipeg, and had certain confidential—and I wish to lay particular stress on the word confidential—communications with the local government—with Mr. Greenway and some of his colleagues—upon this very subject. The hon. gentleman returned to Ottawa and had a communication with the Premier as to his mission to Winnipeg. The hon. member for North Simcoe obtained that information from the hon. Secretary of State, because the hon. Secretary of State said:

> I have to say that the only communication that has taken place between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Donald A. Smith was of a purely personal character, no report having been made.

That is to say, that no report in writing was made; but a personal communication took place between those two gentlemen. Now, on the 2nd day of March, the very day on which these answers were given—answers which I charge to be entirely inaccurate and entirely misleading—showing no appreciation by the hon. Secretary of State of the responsibility which he assumes as Minister of the Crown—showing an entire ignorance of his relations with His Excellency the Governor General—on that very day, in pursuance of this public act of government, a telegram was received from Mr. Greenway by the hon. member for Montreal West. That was received in answer to a previous telegram which had been sent by the hon. member for Montreal West, after he had seen the Premier, and after he had reported to him the result of this public act which he had been engaged in on behalf—not of the Governor General, and not privately, as a private member of this House or as a citizen of Canada—but as the messenger, the ambassador of the Government of Canada—after he had made his report, not in writing, but verbally to the Premier of this Dominion. Then, presumably on instructions from Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the hon. member for Montreal West sent a telegram to Mr. Greenway, which we are told comprised a hundred words. In answer to that telegram, Mr. Greenway transmitted a telegram to the hon. member for Montreal West, a portion of which telegram was read to us by the hon. Secretary of State. The hon. Secretary of State being pressed for the telegram to Mr. Greenway, in order that the House might understand the significance of Mr. Greenway's reply, stated that these communications between the hon. member for Montreal West and the Manitoba government were confidential, and that the hon. member for Montreal West would not allow him to give the House the telegram to Mr. Greenway without Mr. Greenway's consent. Incidentally I may allude at this stage to a most unfortunate circumstance that then occurred, that is, that the hon. Secretary of State not only committed the gross impropriety of reading to this House a telegram which was a private and confidential communication between the two gentlemen whose names were appended to the telegram, but deliberately left out an important sentence from that telegram. He has given us his reasons for so doing. He said he did not think it mattered and that it was all right, anyway, because he had immediately telegraphed to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba what he had laid before this House, and that was shown to Mr. Greenway. We are not complaining on Mr. Greenway's behalf but that the hon. gentleman misled us. No doubt it was scandalously unfair to Mr. Greenway to leave out a whole sentence of that kind in his telegram, but that is not the offence with which we are charging the hon. gentleman, and no communication by him to Mr. Greenway could absolve him from the charge that he had deceived this House.

Mr. OUIMET. I rise to a point of order. The debate has arisen on the responsibility of the Government for any action by His Excellency the Governor General, and the fact that the hon. Secretary of State read a telegram or omitted to read any portion of a telegram from Mr. Greenway to the hon. member for Montreal West is outside the question altogether. The hon. gentleman is also out of order in referring to a past debate.

Mr. MARTIN. I am referring to a former announcement by the Government. There was nothing before the House. The hon. Secretary of State announced that he had received a telegram from Mr. Greenway, and it is to that I am referring and not to a past debate. Then my remarks referred to the question brought up by the hon. member for South Oxford, which was: Did the hon. Secretary of State gave a truthful answer to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). The hon. member for South Oxford contends he did not, and I am endeavouring, by alluding to the circumstances in connection with the visit of the hon. member for Montreal West to Winnipeg, to throw light upon the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point raised by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) is that the reference to the telegram read by the hon. Secretary of State in the House is not relevant to the subject under discussion, because the telegram itself is not relevant and because it is a former debate. As regards the question of relevancy, I am inclined to think that the telegram is relevant to the question raised by the hon. member for South Oxford, which I understood to be an attack on the Government for having shirked responsibility for something that took place, with the consent and knowledge of the Governor General, in relation to a public matter. With regard to the other question, as to whether the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State and his reading of the telegram was in the nature of a past debate, I am inclined to think it was not. But I may go somewhat further, and say that a great deal of this discussion has had reference to a past debate and therefore is not in order. The debate of yesterday is a past debate.

Mr. MARTIN. I shall make no further reference to the question, although I had the opinion that answers to questions would hardly be considered as debates.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the authority of the English House of Commons on this point. Mr. Brand says:

> An hon. member cannot refer to a late debate, and the same rule applies to a question as to a debate.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the conduct of the hon. Secretary of State, in giving to this House a portion of a private and confidential correspondence between the hon. member for Montreal West and the Premier of Manitoba; and I was alluding to the fact, that in that communication, the hon. gentleman, for purposes of his own, which are quite transparent, left out a sentence in that telegram. I was alluding to the further fact, that the hon. gentleman seeks to excuse himself for what is, to my mind, an unpardonable offence against this House, by saying that he communicated to Mr. Greenway the fact that he had done it, and, therefore, it was all right. Now my point, Mr. Speaker, is, that no communication to Mr. Greenway could condone the offence the hon. gentleman was guilty of towards this House. I have hinted that the hon. gentleman had a most palpable motive in leaving out this sentence from this telegram. What was that motive ? What was the sentence that was omitted ? I have not the exact words, but it was to this effect : "We do not consider ourselves at all to blame for the situation of the Manitoba school question." Now, the hon. gentleman introduced that telegram into this House for the purpose of leading this House to believe that that telegram was an offer from Mr. Greenway of a compromise, or something of that kind. Mr. Greenway's statement, that he did not consider himself to blame, would detract from that meaning, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman deliberately left out that important sentence. I say, it was unpardonable for him to do so. It was conduct entirely unbecoming a Minister of the Crown, especially unbecoming that Minister of the Crown who leads this House, and, therefore, has peculiar responsibilities to this House. Where are we to be, Mr. Speaker, if we cannot believe implicitly every word that drops from the lips of the hon. gentleman who holds the chief place in this House ? Where are we to be, if, when any document is read to this House by that hon. gentleman, we cannot be sure that the real document is read to the House, and not only a portion of it ? If the hon. gentleman thought this sentence was not important, why did he not say to the House : Here is a portion of a telegram to Mr. Greenway ? It might have been, that the telegram contained a lot of matter having nothing to do with the question; and, if so, it would not have been out of place for the hon. Secretary of State to have announced that he had received a telegram from Mr. Greenway, a portion of which he would read, the remainder being immaterial. It would then have been open for any member of the House who wished to dispute the immateriality of the remainder of the telegram, to have asked, and pressed the hon. gentleman to make it known to the House. Had it not been for Mr. Greenway, members of this House and the people of the country would never have known but that the hon. gentleman had given, as he purported to do, the whole telegram, and not merely a portion of it. Mr. Greenway might have had some reason for not giving that information to the public, and, if that had been the case, the people would have remained in ignorance of the facts, because we would have relied upon the statement of the leader of the House, as we have a right to do, that he was reading to us what he said he was reading. The hon. gentleman said he was reading a telegram from Mr. Greenway, and he read only a portion of that telegram. We must not forget the purpose for which that telegram was produced in this House. A burning question was being discussed here, a question which divided parties and threatened the existence of the Government of which the hon. gentleman is the head. That telegram was produced for the purpose of holding together, if possible, the hon. gentleman's following in this House, by the suggestion, that at last the Manitoba government had come to time, at last they had seen the error of their ways, at last, after holding out since the passing of the remedial order in March last, they had come to their knees and were ready to go down on their knees to this Government rather than have remedial legislation passed. That was the object of bringing this telegram before the House. If I am right in that, the sentence which the hon. gentleman deliberately left out, was a most important one, for it would have prevented any such inference being drawn as the hon. gentleman desired the House and the country to draw from the garbled copy of that telegram which he produced here. The inference, that Manitoba had reconsidered her action, and was yielding, was possible from the telegram which was read to this House, and the hon. gentleman's object was to produce that impression. There could have been no other possible object, for the hon. gentleman was not announcing then that a conference was proposed. He was announcing nothing whatever, except the telegram. He did not say : In view of that telegram, we have asked Mr. Greenway to hold a conference, but he brought the telegram in here, and merely announced: We have transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba the statement I am making here to-day, and we intend to go on with the Bill to the second reading, 'de die in diem,' thus hinting that it was possible an offer for a conference would be made. It was not for the purpose of announcing in this House, that they intended to have a conference with Mr. Greenway, it was for the sole purpose of making this House believe that Mr. Greenway's telegram meant that Manitoba had altered her position.

No doubt at all, when Mr. Greenway indicted this telegram, he saw himself that the first part of the telegram would give that inference ; he saw himself that the telegram, as read to us here, would lead the Government here, and lead any one who perused it, to believe possibly that Manitoba was weakening, that Manitoba had changed her mind ; and for the express purpose of preventing any such inference, Mr. Greenway answered plainly and distinctly : "We do not consider ourselves in any way to blame for the situation as it is to-day." And yet the hon. gentleman comes here and tells us that he thought those words were immaterial. The hon. gentleman's misstatement to this House would never have been known had not Mr. Greenway considered it most important to Manitoba's position that he should at once repudiate the inference which the hon. gentleman desired to draw from his telegram. I may also say that Mr. Greenway did not get his knowledge of the hon. gentleman's statement in this House from the telegram sent to the Lieutenant-Governor, but he got it from the newspapers, because in making his announcement to the legislature of Manitoba the next day he said: Of course, I cannot say whether the despatches in the newspapers are correct, but if they are, then the Secretary of State has not read the whole telegram as I sent it. But in reading the morning papers in Winnipeg, and learning that the Secretary of State had made this announcement, he at once rose in his own legislature, and stated that this most material and important statement was deliberately left out by the hon. gentleman. Then the leader of the Opposition, or the member for South Oxford, naturally inquired for the telegram to which this was an answer, and the hon. gentleman was forced to make the humiliating confession that he had obtained the telegram from Mr. Greenway improperly, that he had obtained it in confidence from the member for Montreal West, that he had deliberately violated that confidence; and that when he applied to the member for Montreal West for permission to read his telegram to Mr. Greenway, he learned for the first time the view that the member for Montreal West took, and he informed us that he was not able to read to the House the telegram to Mr. Greenway without Mr. Greenway's consent. Now, Sir, we have never yet had that telegram, and as we were informed by the Secretary of State that permission had been asked from Mr. Greenway to give that telegram to the House, I think we can infer that Mr. Greenway has refused his permission, for we have not been told anything about it. I think we may naturally infer that Mr. Greenway has refused his permission, and we can well imagine why. I would like to say that in mentioning these matters, I do not pretend to any knowledge myself. I am merely inferring, as any other hon. gentleman might from what has occurred, what has likely influenced Mr. Greenway in refusing permission, if he has so refused it. We must remember that all those communications were confidential, we must remember that not only these telegrams, but all the negotiations which had proceeded, were entirely confidential, and it may be that Mr. Greenway felt that it would not be fair to him or to his government to give his assent to the promulgation to the public of the telegram from the member for Montreal West to him, without having all the negotiations from beginning to end disclosed. It may well be that the public could not understand fully the import of those two telegrams without having explained to them all of these negotiations. Now, Sir, if I am correct in that, how great is the magnitude of the offence which the Secretary of State has committed in this matter, that is, the offence of deliberately, for political purposes, in order to save his Government from danger of defeat, taking advantage of the hon. member for Montreal West and giving us this telegram. What explanation has he had to offer for it? An apology, he says he is sorry. Will that help us any? I say it is a most unfortunate thing that we should be, as a House, as a component part of the Parliament of Canada, placed in the humiliating position that we cannot take for granted that the statements made by the Secretary of State are true. Am I warranted in making that statement? Am I warranted from the facts which I have been relating to this House, in saying that after what has occurred in regard to this telegram, and with regard to the answer that was made to the hon. member for North Simcoe, we cannot take for granted that what the hon. gentleman communicates to this House is accurate? If we are placed in that position is it not a most humiliating one. Hon. gentlemen opposite have complained from time to time that they have not been treated by the Opposition as a Government in the English Parliament would be treated. Can any member of this House imagine for a moment a member of the English Government deliberately doing what the hon. gentleman confesses to have done, and for which he asks for pardon? Can any one imagine Mr. Gladstone, or Mr. Balfour, or any other English statesman coming down to the House and admitting that he had ingratiated himself into the confidence of a member of the House, that he had obtained, under pledge of confidence, a telegram or telegrams that might be useful to him for political purposes, and that having obtained one of those telegrams, he deliberately, in violation of confidence, read it to the House of Commons, and in doing so deliberately left out, without informing the House of the omission, the most material part of that communication? Can any member of this House imagine Mr. Balfour or Mr. Gladstone doing such a thing? If they did such a thing, what would be demanded of them? Immediate departure from public life. Such a course of conduct would not be tolerated by the great Conservative party of England on the part of any one of their chiefs. If a chief of either of the great political parties in England had to place himself in the humiliating position of asking the pardon of the House, the pardon of an hon. member of the House for deliberately abusing confidence, revealing confidential communications, and in the revelation committing the further offence of deliberately garbling that communication for political purposes, what would happen to him ? If he were in the Conservative party, his resignation would be demanded by every great organ of that party. If he were in the Liberal party, the same course would be pursued. He would be ostracised as a public man, because in England if one thing more than another is required of a public man, a leader of one of the great parties, it is the nicest sense of honour, and when that feeling is lost the usefulness of that man is gone. Mr. Speaker, it is our pride, it is our ambition to model our conduct in this House, as far as we possibly can, upon the House of Commons of England, of which this is as far as it is possible to be, a copy. Do the same sentiments which actuate public men in the House of Commons in England actuate the public men in this House ? Are the facts that I have stated correct ? Can they be denied ? Am I putting the case more strongly than circumstances deserve ? Is it true or not that this was a confidential communication, the hon. gentleman knew it ? He has not pretended he did not know it. He has admitted that he was under the strongest bonds of honour to the hon. member for Montreal West not to use these communications in any way except for his own personal knowledge and information. Was it done inadvertently, or was it done with deliberate purpose, for the purpose of gaining political capital in an emergency in this House ? Then are my statements as to the leaving out of that sentence correct, or not ? Was it material, bearing in mind the circumstances under which the telegram was brought forward and the purpose for which it was used ? Was that a sentence which entirely destroyed the inference which the hon. gentleman desires us to adopt from the telegram, or was it not ? If my facts are right, if my charges are fair, then in England a public man putting himself into that position would not escape the consequence of his acts by doing as this gentleman has done, getting down on his knees to the House in which he committed the offence and asking the pardon of that House. Will that be done here ? Will the great Conservative party in the country follow their representatives in this House in condemning an action of that kind ? Have we in Canada been successful in endeavouring to carry on our public affairs on the same high plane on which public affairs are conducted in the old country ? If we have, then public sentiment must condemn the hon. gentleman, and it is most unfortunate that this offence should occur on the part of one who has lived at our expense for many years right in the city where this great House of Commons to which I have alluded holds its sittings, who has had exceptional advantages of learning the principles upon which public affairs are there conducted, who as the representative of this great colony has mixed with kings, with emperors, with premiers, with members of the House of Lords, with members of the House of Commons, who has had every opportunity of learning what is decent and what is right and what is honourable from an English standpoint, and yet here we are after having had for about twelve years that gentleman, at an expense to this country of some $20,000 to $30,000 per annum in order that he may be educated in habits of decency and habits of honesty, in a school where that education can be obtained. But we know that if certain children are sent to school they are so bad at heart that the very best professors cannot instil in them the principles of morality, that a long course of study at the knees of the best teachers leaves them still as bad as they ever were. This is the case with the great statesman we sent from Canada twelve years ago to represent us at the Court of St. James ; while there he mixed with distinguished people of all classes, and yet he comes back here to take out of the hands of an old imbecile of the great Conservative party——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MARTIN. I must admit that that is a most unfortunate expression. I am very sorry to have to use it, but I understand that the Finance Minister applied it to Sir Mackenzie Bowell. I know I am quite at liberty so far as the rules of this House are concerned, to call Sir Mackenzie Bowell anything I like. I have, however, respect for the position which that gentleman occupies, and I certainly would not dare myself to apply that epithet to him, no matter how much I might think it ; but when the Finance Minister tells this House in a solemn statement as ex-leader of the House that he and his friends had bolted because this gentleman had not mental capacity sufficient to lead the party, in other words he was afflicted with imbecility, then I must take the estimate of that gentleman from a member of the House who has been a colleague for so many years. I say, then, the hon. gentleman, High Commissioner, was sent to London to be educated in morality at our expense for so many years, for it was charged the High Commissioner when in Canada that he had need of education in morality. It has been charged against him——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member is exceeding the bounds of parliamentary license.

Mr. MARTIN. I will keep myself within parliamentary rules. But when we are dealing with a matter of this kind, are we to refer to it in the term that it deserves, or is it parliamentary to do so. Is it unparliamentary for me to express, as I have, my utter abhorrence of the conduct of the Secretary of State in those matters to which I have referred. If strong expressions have to be used, is it my fault, or is it the fault rather of the offenders whom it is my duty and my right to attack in this House. The hon. gentleman has been over there. He has had these rare opportunities. Can he imagine for a moment a member of the Government for the House of Commons in England, in the first place committing the offences, and then making the admission with regard to this matter which that hon. gentleman has been obliged to make here. He was guilty of deliberately violating confidences, as I have said. I do not know what the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith) thinks about it. We had a very excellent speech from the hon. gentleman (Sir Donald A. Smith) yesterday. We listened to it with great attention. We have had another from him to-day, although I cannot say that his utterances to-day were exactly in the same direction as yesterday. He seemed to be trying to explain the situation from an entirely different standpoint from what the situation had become by the action of the Government. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Donald A. Smith) having at last after some five years become an active member of this House, I would be very glad indeed, to hear his view of the conduct of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) in this matter. I would be glad to know, whether the hon. member for Montreal West treated this negotiation with Manitoba as a confidential matter ? I would like to know whether the hon. member for Montreal West would feel justified in giving to the public, without the consent of Mr. Greenway, what was said by Mr. Greenway or his colleagues at the conference in Winnipeg. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman would feel that it was fair to repeat what his Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface said to him, and what he said to his Grace in Winnipeg, or what his Grace said to Mr. Greenway, and so on. I notice that the hon. gentleman very properly brought these people together in Winnipeg. Was it, as I have alleged, a confidential matter, or was it not ? If it was a confidential matter, can it be disputed that the hon. gentleman distinctly told Sir Mackenzie Bowell and other members of the Government. We know very well that when he came back here he was interviewed by members of the Government, including the Secretary of State. And, we may take it for granted that what occurred in Manitoba was very fully reported to members of the Government, including the Secretary of State. I think that follows from the answer we are discussing here. Then, what does the hon. member for Montreal West think of the using of that telegram ? The hon. member for Montreal West has not expressed an opinion to this House, but we know what his opinion is, because we are told by the hon. Secretary of State, that the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald A. Smith) would not give him that other telegram. For what reason ? It was because it was confidential, and could not be used without Mr. Greenway's consent. Now, if the telegram to Mr. Greenway, for which Mr. Greenway was not responsible at all, cannot be used without Mr. Greenway's consent, how much more must that apply to the telegram from Mr. Greenway, and for which Mr. Greenway was responsible, being used. The Secretary of State has not attempted to tell us that he did not know this was confidential. All he has done is to apologize for it, and to regret that Mr. Greenway regarded the leaving out of the sentence as unfortunate. He expects the House and the country to accept him as a fit leader of a great party to which he is attached, with a charge like this admitted by him, and proved against him. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have used strong language to-day. I have made strong observations as to the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), and as to the nature of his conduct in this matter. Are my statements justified ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Are my statements true ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MARTIN. Will hon. gentlemen on that side show where they are not true. Do hon. gentlemen propose to condone these offences because the hon. gentleman is the leader ? Does that not rather heighten the effect ? It would be bad enough for an ordinary private member of the House to be guilty of offences of this kind, but for a Minister of the Crown—nay, a leading Minister of the Crown in this House, having become a Minister of the Crown under very special circumstances, having been brought over from a high position in order to lead his party, as it is hoped by them, to victory at the polls soon.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PRIOR. That is what we want.

Mr. MARTIN. I suppose so. In order that the Secretary of State may be able to do that, are you willing to condone these offences ? Do you put him forward as the kind of man that the law-abiding, honourable electors of the Dominion of Canada should vote for as the first citizen of the state. Would it be an honour to Canada for the next five years, to have at the head of affairs a man who knows no more of honour——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FRECHETTE. Let him go on. Nobody minds what he says.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has cast an imputation on the honour of the Secretary of State. That is not in order.

Mr. FRECHETTE. He does not know what he is saying.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to cast no imputation upon the Secretary of State at all, but

I wish to hold the Secretary of State strictly responsible for what he has done.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Take it back.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) may assail the Secretary of State, but it must be done within parliamentary bounds. To cast an imputation upon the honour of the Secretary of State is, in my opinion, not parliamentary.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, of course, I bow to your decision ; but it seems to me, that I am precluded, under that decision, from alluding to the circumstance to which I have been alluding. I am desirous of expressing my reprehension of the conduct of the Secretary of State in violating the confidence reposed in him by the hon. member for Montreal West, for that conveys an imputation upon the hon. gentleman's honour, which I certainly must refrain from doing.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member went a little further than that. He made a direct imputation upon the hon. Secretary of State. Of course, the hon. member may characterize the conduct of the hon. Secretary of State in as strong language as he chooses, provided he keeps within parliamentary bounds.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, I can follow the example of the hon. leader of the House, so far as withdrawing is concerned, and say, that for the words "an imputation upon the hon. gentleman's honour," I substitute the words, "an unfortunate occurrence." Following that hon. gentleman's withdrawal, which, I suppose, is a precedent on which we are to act, I will substitute the statement that it is a most unfortunate occurrence, that the coming Premier of the Dominion—because, I suppose, we cannot prevent him being Premier for the short time between now and the elections, if the party so decides—should have been guilty of what, to my mind, is the grossest offence that could be perpetrated against the rules of decency and parliamentary propriety. Now, I may not have made myself clear in what I charge against the hon. gentleman ; but, to my mind, the situation is extremely clear. I would have thought, that my statement was clear and definite, had it not been for the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that it was not so, that I was not correct in supposing, that these circumstances show the hon. gentleman to be entirely unfit for the position in which they propose to place him—that he has not the moral qualifications which are required of the leader of the House. I suppose it is quite fair, Mr. Speaker, to say, that the people of Canada require from the gentleman who is to be the Premier of Canada certain political, certain business, certain moral qualifications. Now, I regard this particular incident as throwing light upon the hon. Secretary of State's moral qualifications for the high position which he expects to assume. What can be worse than the feeling, which we must have in this House, that, when the hon. gentleman is reading to us a telegram, or a letter, or a report, or is conveying any documentary matter to this House, he will, if necessary, leave out a part without telling us, that he has left it out—that, if he thinks it is going to help him in an emergency, he will deliberately take a confidential communication, which he knows to be such, and use it in violation of the confidence that has been reposed in him with regard to it ? Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret, and, I think, every member of this House must regret, that it becomes necessary to discuss actions of this kind in the House. But they have occurred ; they are there. We must either repudiate them, or we must coincide with them and confirm them. Speaking for myself, I have no hesitation in saying, that, to my mind, the hon. gentleman's apology for committing these offences is only a stronger reason why he should not continue to be the leader of this House. It may make things better between him and the hon. member for Montreal West, that he should apologize for what he has done. We are not concerned with that. But, in this House, we are concerned with the character of the gentleman who undertakes to lead the House. In many respects he represents the House. In the conduct of debate, in communications from the Government to the House, in all important matters of that kind, he represents the House, and he represents the Government ; and it is a sorry thing to me to think, that we must hesitate and weigh the words that fall from his lips, and consider whether he can have any reason to desire not to communicate to us what he pretends to communicate to us. I say, it is most unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, and for that reason I must express my obligations to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) for having given me an opportunity for expressing my sentiments with regard to these matters.

Mr. TARTE. Mr. Speaker, the House has listened with attention——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. TARTE.—If hon. gentlemen will allow me. The House has listened, I say it again, with attention to the statements of the hon. member for Montreal West.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. TARTE. The facts of the case which we are now discussing, some of them, at any rate, are pretty clear. In a debate, the hon. member for Montreal West used the name of His Excellency. To our knowledge, Sir, members of this Parliament have stated that, in the vote they were going to give, they have been influenced by the use of His Excellency's name. The leader of the House has assumed the responsibility of the relations in this matter between His Excellency and the hon. member for Montreal West. The hon. gentleman could not help doing so. He was bound to do so. If he remembers what took place three or four days ago, he had already done so. On the 13th March, he said :

> I feel it due to myself to make this straightforward explanation to the House as to why a telegram which I regard as virtually a communication to the Government from Mr. Greenway was used to which I thought there could be no possible objection.

As I have said, the leader of the House had accepted the responsiblity of the relations which took place between His Excellency and the hon. member for Montreal West. What these relations were we do not know precisely. You have ruled, Sir, rightly that the name of His Excellency cannot be brought into the debate without grave reasons, but I may be permitted to allude to this fact, that it is not the first time in the knowledge of the House that His Excellency has been obliged to resort to outside advice. In the Shortis case, for instance, His Excellency was obliged to do so, as he did in this case. But if he did, he should not be blamed. What is the rule ? It is this :

> It is true that by usage and the constitution Cabinet Ministers are alone empowered to advise upon affairs of state, and that they alone are ordinarily held responsible to their subjects and Parliament for the government of the country, yet it is quite conceivable that circumstances might arise which would render it expedient for the King, in the interests of the constitution itself, to call for aid and counsel apart from his Cabinet.

The hon. member for Montreal West is here and he has, I must say, a great command of language. He knows what has taken place between His Excellency and himself better than any of us. I do not say that he is obliged to tell us everything, but he knows to what extent his advice has been sought. The country will not reproach him for what he has done, but what the country has a right to reproach the Government with is this : We have responsible government, and is it possible that His Excellency, in difficult circumstances, has had to resort to outside advice ? The hon. leader of the House has assumed the responsibility of the relations which have taken place between His Excellency and the hon. member for Montreal West, but that does not preclude us from knowing the fact that His Excellency had a conversation with the hon. gentleman and that, after that conversation, the hon. gentleman proceeded to the city of Winnipeg. And did what ? Did an act of state, Sir, for this was no private act. I beg to differ from some of my hon. friends who have spoken on this question. Surely negotiating on such a question as this with the province of Manitoba—I do not say at the request, because that would not be fair or true—but with the full knowledge of the Governor General of Canada cannot be considered a private act. Then it is admitted by everybody that the hon. member for Montreal West, with the full knowledge of His Excellency, went to Winnipeg and there had interviews with members of the provincial government. The statement that the hon. gentleman has made to-night is even more important than the one he made yesterday. He told us that before proceeding, he met the Prime Minister, and he was good enough to tell us that he was ready to take the House into his confidence. Well, I would like to ask him if, in that conversation, the hon. gentleman stated to the Prime Minister the reason why he was going to Winnipeg ?

Sir DONALD SMITH. Not one word regarding it. I had not one word to say, and did not say one word to the Prime Minister about the case or the reason why I intended going to Winnipeg.

Mr. TARTE. I thank the hon. gentleman for his statement. I think that the House and the country are greatly interested in knowing all the details of this most extraordinary case. The hon. gentleman, I am sure, will have no objection to tell us whether on his return from Winnipeg he reported immediately to the Prime Minister the result. He has told us that he had been permitted to communicate to the Government the result of his negotiations. Are we to understand that he was permitted by Mr. Greenway or by His Excellency ? I think that is an important question, and I should be glad to have his answer. If he is not in a position to reply, I shall not insist. Very well, the hon. gentleman shakes his head, and I understand he is not in a position to say by whom he is authorized to communicate with the Prime Minister.

Sir DONALD SMITH. In the way of being very frank—I will tell the hon. gentleman that in the conversations I had with the Hon. Mr. Greenway, I gave him to understand, in the most explicit way, that I was not there in any official capacity.

Mr. TARTE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I must say that this is not a very plain answer, but, at any rate, we must take his answers as they are. The facts are clear. The hon. gentleman proceeded to Winnipeg and tried to render a great service to his country. Now, what are going to be the results of his visit and the statements that followed ? He has told us that he thinks that by means of a conference now, we can arrive at a settlement. I saw the great effect upon the House of that important statement ; but now it seems to me that it has no longer any importance, because the Ministers are going on as if nothing had happened. They are responsible for what he has done and must be responsible for the statement that he has made. Have they got any confidence in those statements ? Are they in a position to tell us that those statements are no more of any value, that they are not deserving of an confidence, or are they prepared to say that the negotiations, for which they have assumed all the responsibility that they were bound to assume, will amount to nothing ? At any rate, Sir, I think that the House must be thankful to the hon. gentleman from Montreal West for the trouble he has taken in carrying on these negotiations ; but I do not think that the House should thank the Government for the attitude they are now taking. They have hesitated a great deal before saying that they were responsible for these negotiations, though assuredly, in view of the statements of the hon. leader of the House on the 13th March, they had held themselves responsible before. Now, Sir, I say it again, are these statements of the hon. gentlemen going to pass as if they had not been made ? If so, let us know it. If I am not mistaken, there are still two currents in the Government, one going in one direction and the other going in the opposite direction. I think that the hon. gentleman from Montreal West represents to a large extent the best current. He is for peace, he is for a conference, he is for a settlement that he feels sure can be had. There is another current, the representatives of which do not want any settlement, but want disunion and trouble for party purposes. We do not yet know in what current the hon. gentleman who leads this House is swimming. He will allow me as one who in my younger days, in my inexperienced days, it may be, have admired him, to make an appeal to him to-night. He has had great experience ; he has seen many things and many men. It seems to me that if he were to put aside, perhaps, some party interests, or what have been represented to him as party interests, but which he may find later have been brought before him in a wrong light, he would join hands with the hon. member for Montreal West. As I have said, he has not stated in which current he is swimming. Why does he not take the House into his confidence as the hon. member for Montreal West has done ? I know it will be said that as the leader of a party he has grave responsibility, but he is old enough and experienced enough to know that above party interests are the interests of the country.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire to draw the attention of the House to a matter which, although it did not escape the attention of the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has not been sufficiently dealt with, if I am at all right in the importance I attach to it. It is now, Sir, pretty clear what did take place with regard to these negotiations with Manitoba. It is clear that my hon. friend on my right (Sir Donald Smith) very properly, at all events quite within his right, having had an interview with His Excellency the Governor General, in which a visit or negotiation or the possibility of a settlement between the Dominion Government and the province of Manitoba was referred to, in consequence, if I am to judge of that interview, undertook upon his own responsibility to visit Winnipeg for the purpose of entering upon that negotiation. My hon. friend (Sir Donald Smith) says : Not necessarily as a consequence of that, and, for my part, I do not desire to press the sequitur, nor does it appear to me to make any difference as to the view I am going to present to the House on this question. Now, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I cast no reflection, in any respect, upon the part His Excellency had in this matter. On the contrary, it appears to me in the highest degree creditable, if I may venture to say so, in His Excellency to have interested himself in any matter of government. I might venture, perhaps, to go further, and say that it would have been his duty to give his Cabinet any assistance in his power in any matter in which, as a Government, it is interested. There is no question, it appears to me, as to that. But, Sir, I venture also to think that if His Excellency had, directly or indirectly, without the knowledge of his Ministers, delegated to a private member of Parliament or a private individual the duty or the right to enter upon negotiations with Mr. Greenway, under these circumstances, it would hardly have been within the scope of His Excellency's responsibilities. We can easily see how embarrassing that might be to the Government. They, of course, are supposed to know their own business best. They are supposed to keep His Excellency advised of all that they are doing with reference to transactions of this kind ; and to have the Governor General interfering upon his own responsibility without their knowledge might be exceedingly embarrassing, to say the least of it, and might lead to very unpleasant results. Now, in this case nothing of the kind appears to have happened. I judge from what the hon. member from Montreal West has told us that His Excellency might well have inferred that he was going to Winnipeg for the purpose of endeavouring to bring about this settlement, which, in his view, was very desirable. I judge further that before he started for Winnipeg he saw the Prime Minister. It was a short interview, but I rather gather from his words, reticent though they have been on that point, that the Prime Minister understood he was going to Winnipeg, and generally the object of that visit.

Sir DONALD SMITH. Quite otherwise, I may say to my hon. friend. I did not speak to him at all of the object for which I was going to Winnipeg.

Mr. McCARTHY. I misunderstood that, and of course I accept what the hon. gentleman says. But when he said in answer to my question that the Prime Minister was aware of the object he had in going to Winnipeg, and when he said that he had seen the Prime Minister about half an hour before he started, I thought the matter must have been mentioned in their interview. But he says it is not so, and I accept the statement Then he went to Winnipeg, if I understand it, the Governor General having reason to think he might have gone, but without the knowledge of the Prime Minister; although he had seen the Prime Minister, he did not think to communicate to him the object and purpose of the visit. Now, so far, I do not know that there is anything much to be said about it. But I want to draw the attention of the House to the manner in which subsequently this House has been dealt with. That visit to Winnipeg was some time about 20th February. I see from a despatch which I have before me in one of the papers, that it was upon the 20th February. He had frequent interviews with Mr. Greenway and with the archbishop. I think, in point of fact, as we know, he was interesting himself with the view of endeavouring to bring about some settlement of this vexed question. I gather from the information I have here, that after spending some time in Winnipeg, having given Mr. Greenway to understand that he was not a delegate of the Government, he returns here and arrives in Ottawa. I am taking this now from a statement I find in a paper of 24th February, and the dates, I think, are important. He then saw the Prime Minister if he did not see the Secretary of State, it is not doubted that he saw the Prime Minister. I think we may gather that he communicated to the Prime Minister what had taken place between him and Mr. Greenway, and the result of the Winnipeg negotiation. Well, what happened next? And here now, I ask the attention of the House. The next thing that was done was to send a despatch to Winnipeg, sent by my hon. friend here (Sir Donald Smith), acknowledged to-day by the Secretary of State to have been the first official despatch, which was answered upon 2nd March, and which must have been sent some days before, probably some time towards the latter part of February, which despatch was a private and confidential document, as we are given to understand, and was answered by a private and confidential document on 2nd March. Now, I would ask the hon. Secretary of State—because I desire to make no misstatement in this matter—whether I correctly understood him to-day to say that that despatch was the first official document which the Government felt themselves responsible for. If I am wrong about that, I would like to be corrected now. I so took it down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman ask about the despatch sent or the despatch received?

Mr. McCARTHY. The despatch sent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then I may say that I regard the despatch sent as a continuation of the private and confidential communication between Sir Donald Smith and Mr. Greenway; and the answer which was communicated by Sir Donald Smith to the Government as the first official despatch.

Mr. McCARTHY. It seems hardly possible that the answer would have been received and that the despatch itself, to which the answer of 2nd March is a reply——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to make myself plain. The thing I think is susceptible of being quite plainly understood. As I stated to the House in answer to the member for North Simcoe, the communications that took place were regarded as private and personal communications between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and the member for Montreal West. The hon. gentleman has my answer which I gave to this question, and that was that Sir Donald Smith's mission to Winnipeg was not at the instance of the Government; and, in the second place, that he had made no report, and that any communications that had taken place between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Donald Smith down to 2nd March, down to the time of answering that question, were personal and private communications. That was the condition of things down to that period. In the course of those communications, the hon. member for Montreal West, carrying on his relations with Mr. Greenway, sent a message. The answer to that message, I regard as an official communication, because he put it in the hands of the Government, with the message, for the purpose of showing the Government that Mr. Greenway was open to negotiation; and that I regard as the first official communication, and that is the statement that was made by me to the House.

Sir DONALD SMITH. And which was, I may add, of course, like every such communication, of a confidential character.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I may say that I regard the answer to Mr. Greenway communicated by the member for Montreal West, as the first official communication. I regard it as an official communication, because it was distinctly intended to be communicated to the Government. And as I stated to the House before, I would have been very glad to lay upon the Table the message from the member for Montreal West, and endeavoured to obtain it for that purpose, in order that it might show exactly the position of the question.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps the matter is not very clear yet. But I will state it now as I understand it, subject to correction. I understand that this despatch from Ottawa sent by the member for Montreal West, was sent with the knowledge and authority of the Prime Minister; I understand that that was a confidential despatch between the hon. member and Mr. Greenway, as was the answer thereto. Now, I have no doubt that the hon. member on my right (Sir Donald Smith) will disclaim having done anything improper or dishonourable with reference to these documents; but if they were confidential as between him and Mr. Greenway, then it is difficult to understand how he communicated them to the Prime Minister. If, on the other hand, they were written officially—of course, I use the word in a modified sense—if they were written officially or despatched officially—and I take it that was the position my hon. friend here will take—of course, there was nothing wrong in the delegate reporting to his principals the communications that were passing between them. Now, if that is so, these were official documents, confidential, it is true, sent by the hon. member for Montreal West with the knowledge and authority of the Government, sent some time in the latter part of February, and answered on 2nd March. Now, I ask attention to the answer that I got in the House. Surely, Sir, when we ask questions here of the Government, we have a right to get accurate answers. The Government have a right to say that their negotiations are such that in the public interest they will not mention them. That is their privilege and that is their right. But there is no right in a member of the Government to mislead this House, and to make statements to the House which are not in accordance with the facts. I ask attention to the words of that answer, which I questioned very much at the time, but which, according to the rules of the House, I had to accept. I ask attention to the answer to see whether, with the knowledge we now have, that statement was a fair or candid statement given to this House. The first answer may be strictly and technically accurate, but it was not very candid. You will find it on page 2735:

Mr. McCARTHY asked:

1. Was Sir Donald Smith authorized on behalf of the Government to negotiate with the Premier or administration of the province of Manitoba with reference to or on the subject of the school law of that province?

2. If yea, has Sir Donald Smith made any report with respect to such negotiation?

3. Or did Sir Donald Smith voluntarily or otherwise undertake to act as mediator between the Government of Canada and the government of Manitoba, or to negotiate with the said last mentioned government on the subject referred to in the first preceding question?

4. If yea, has Sir Donald Smith made any report in respect of such mediation or negotiation?

5. And what, in either of the supposed cases, was the substance of Sir Donald Smith's report?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say, in reply to the hon. member, that the answer to the first portion of the question is, No. In response to the remainder of the question, I have to say, that the only communication that has taken place between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Donald Smith, was of a purely personal character, no report having been made.

Now, how is it possible to reconcile that answer with the knowledge we have here. My hon. friend having gone as a volunteer delegate for the purpose of bringing about a settlement, endeavouring, personally, as he said, to keep it out of party politics, purposely endeavouring to free the Government from responsibility, having achieved a certain measure of success in that negotiation, comes back to Ottawa, reports what has taken place, is accepted as the delegate and the agent, and a communication, which I think I am not wrong in saying was approved here by the head of the Government, if not by the other members of it, was sent off, a reply to that is received; and when the question is asked in this House, we are told that nothing but personal matters had passed between the Prime Minister and my hon. friend. Was that an answer, under those circumstances, which should have been made to the House? I do not say at that time it was necessary for the Government to disclose to this House the particulars of those negotiations; but I do say, that, if hon. members are entitled to ask for information, I consider they should get truthful answers to questions put to the Government, and the Government were bound to say: Negotiations are pending, but at this time it is not in the public interest that the particulars of the negotiations should be disclosed. I deem this matter of sufficient importance, notwithstanding the time taken up in the discussion, to draw particular attention to it, because this is not the first time, by any manner of means, we have been put off by evasive answers. This answer was actually written down, deliberately concocted in Council, and read to the House; it is not an impromptu statement of an hon. gentleman who was called upon unexpectedly to make a reply, but having had time for consideration, this statement of which the House is quite capable of forming an opinion without my expressing anything as to its character, was the result we got by our inquiry. I discovered the result from the subsequent statement that was made on a later day. On a later day, when it became the interest of the Government, in their own opinion, to make a partial disclosure, we have the mutilated telegram read to the House, and then it appeared, from this mutilated telegram, that, undoubtedly, there was some official correspondence, that there was a communication from my hon. friend which was not given to us, that, although the Ministry and the leader of the House thought fit to violate the confidence which Mr. Greenway was reposing in my hon. friend, and gave one part of the correspondence, to this day they have never given the other portion; that, so soon as it was in the interest of the Government, they brought down this partial correspondence, and they pretend to say, that they are prohibited by my hon. friend from bringing down the balance.

An hon. MEMBER. By whom?

Mr. McCARTHY. It is difficult to understand that. I can understand, that neither communication should have been brought down; but I am unable to conceive why the Government should assume the right—they evidently treated the hon. gentleman as their delegate and their agent, and the Government were the principals—to communicate to this House one document, or part of one document, and withhold, until they should get Mr. Greenway's authority and my hon. friend's authority, to communicate the other document, which we would like very much to see, and without which we are unable to form an opinon as to the terms on which the negotiations were to take place. One word more, and I think the House will see the necessity of a little care being exercised on our part with respect to these matters. Last year, Sir, a similar negotiation took place. You remember, Sir, that Mr. Greenway and the Attorney General of the province paid a visit to Ottawa, and we learned from the newspapers, that they had several interviews with His Excellency the Governor General. I ventured to ask, at that time, about those negotiations. There were negotiations carried on by His Excellency with the representatives of that province, presumably and according to all the information we had, on this important question; and I asked then, and it is reported:

> 1. Whether it is the fact that negotiations have recently taken place between His Excellency the Governor General and the Honourbale Messrs. Greenway and Sifton, Premier and Attorney General of Manitoba, on the subject of or in relation to the action of the legislature of that province on the remedial order passed by the Governor General in Council on the subject of the Public Schools Act of the province, or in connection therewith? 2. Was the Governor General in these negotiations acting on the advice of the Privy Council, or in what capacity? 3. Have the negotiations been concluded? 4. Is it the intention of the Government to bring down to the House the history and result of the negotiations, and if not, why not?

How was I answered? In answering the question, the leader of the House said:

> Nothing which could be called "negotiations," in the proper acceptation of that word, have taken place recently between His Excellency the Governor General and the Hon. Messrs. Greenway and Sifton, &c., &c. But, the Governor General has had some communication with these gentlemen at Ottawa. In these negotiations—if the question is a question of fact—the answer to it is: That the Governor General was not acting on the advice of the Privy Council. The negotiations,—as I have said, in the former reply there was nothing that could be called negotiations—I believe the communications have been concluded. There is nothing to bring down to the House as to the history.

Here it is stated definitely, in answer to the question, that His Excellency the Governor General had had communications—and I do not know whether the distinction is drawn between negotiations and communications—with the Prime Minister and Attorney General of Manitoba about the school question, and these negotiations were not conducted upon the advice, or, apparently, with the authority of the Privy Council. Was that a strictly accurate statement? The information I have is,—and the hon. gentleman who made the statement, is here, and will be able to correct me, if I am wrong—that, in all these negotiations, communications were made by His Excellency, at the close of each interview, and that the Government had full knowledge of all that was going on. I make that statement on what I think is good authority. The Finance Minister, who answered me, can deny it, if it is not so. I think we are entitled to know, whether this country is really governed under the rules of responsible government or not; whether, in other words, His Excellency is made use of as a shield, whether he is put forward to negotiate in such a way that those hon. gentlemen are willing to accept any advantage that may result, and disclaim any responsibility that may happen to them, because, if so, that is really a most unfortunate position in which to place His Excellency the Governor General, and I think this House ought to know exactly how the system of responsible government is carried on by His Excellency's present advisers. I have tried to make good my two points. I think the answer I got to the question with respect to the communications was not of that fair, candid character, to say the least, that an hon. member was entitled to receive; and that this discussion on the motion to adjourn the House was certainly well justified, because what happened a year ago, it was quite possible might have happened again on this occasion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If I may be permitted again to restate the case, which appears to be singularly plain and clear and not susceptible of any misconception, it is this. The answer given to the hon. gentleman on the first occasion, I regard as a strictly accurate answer, and as the only answer I was able to give. The hon. gentleman asked:

> 1. Was Sir Donald Smith authorized on behalf of the Government to negotiate with the Premier or administration of the province of Manitoba with reference to or on the subject of the school law of that province?
> 2. If yea, has Sir Donald Smith made any report with respect to such negotiation?
> 3. Or did Sir Donald Smith voluntarily or otherwise undertake to act as mediator between the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba, or to negotiate with the said last mentioned government on the subject referred to in the first preceding question ?

4. If yea, has Sir Donald Smith made any report in respect of such mediation or negotiation ?

5. And what, in either of the supposed cases, was the substance of Sir Donald Smith's report ?

That was the question that I had to answer. My answer was as follows :—

I beg to say in reply to the hon. member, that the answer to the first question is "No."

You have not only my statement, Sir, but you have the statement of the hon. gentleman from West Montreal (Sir Donald Smith) ; that that is strictly accurate and correct, and that he went to Manitoba of his own motion, without any communication with the Government as to the object of his mission, but with a view to use the best endeavour in his power to bring about a negotiation for the settlement of this question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) therefore, must see that I could not do otherwise, without stating what was not true to the House.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not object to that at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman accepts that. Then the hon. gentleman asked me: whether Sir Donald Smith made a report and I said : No, there is no report. In response to the remainder of the question, I add :

I have to say that the only communication that has taken place between Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Donald Smith was of a purely personal character, no report having been made.

Now, what were the facts. The facts were, that the hon. member for Montreal West having gone, of his own motion, to Manitoba—animated as every member of this House, I believe will admit—by a sincere desire to contribute to a wise and advantageous settlement of this difficult question ; the hon. member on his return had communication with the Prime Minister. He made no report, but he explained the position of the question to some extent I presume. Any communication that he made to the Prime Minister, he made as a private and personal communication, just as I have stated in this answer ; and a communication which could not be treated as official in any shape or form whatever.

But, the question having arisen as to what view Mr. Greenway took in this question, the member for Montreal West, of his own motion, sent a further telegram to Mr. Greenway which elicited the answer that I laid before the House.

Mr. MARTIN. Partially.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says "partially." I think that subject has been sufficiently exhausted. I left a portion of the telegram out, that I considered had no relation to the subject matter that was under consideration, and, that it was only a matter of opinion on the part of Mr. Greenway, that could be answered by a different opinion from somebody else ; and which was raising altogether a different and outside question, and that was, as to who was to blame for the condition of things. It had no bearing on the question, which was : Is Mr. Greenway ready to open negotiations with the Government of Canada on this subject ? I may say to the House, and I say it in answer to the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Tarte) who has made an appeal to me on the subject, and wants to know what current I am swimming in ; I say, that from the first hour I have had anything to do with this question I have been animated by the highest desire to avail myself if I could, or the Government if it could, of any means of communication, private or personal, directly or indirectly or otherwise, with the government of Manitoba, to lead to a negotiation that would produce a favourable settlement of this question, and remove it from the arena of Dominion politics altogether. I shall tell that to the hon. gentleman in all frankness. I have never held any other view, and I confess that I was gratified in the extreme when it was rumoured in the newspapers at Winnipeg, that negotiations were being had between the member for Montreal West, on his own account, and the government of Manitoba. I was extremely glad, and I hoped—and I sincerely hoped—that that private and persoanl negotiation volunteered by the hon. member for Montreal West, from motives that every gentleman in this House must appreciate as of the purest and highest kind, would result in bringing about a favourable arrangement. Now, when the message, sent on his own account by the hon. member for Montreal West, resulted in the answer which I laid before the House, I was gratified in the highest degree to find, that at last—and it was the first intimation that the Government had had in any form that the government of Manitoba were willing to have negotiations with the Government of Canada for the purpose of settling this question—I say I was gratified to find, that that was the case, and I regarded that as an official communication, because no person can read it without seeing that it could have no raison d'être, no object in the world, except to be placed in the hands of the Government. That was the first communication whatever, that I regarded as not of a personal and private character. It was placed, confidentially I admit, in the hands of the Premier, by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), and would not have been used without his consent but for the unfortunate circumstance that he was absent in New York and the Government had not his address. As I was anxious that the House and the country should have the earliest possible intimation of the fact that the question was open for negotiation, I took the responsibility for which I have since expressed my regret of laying it before the House, and notwithstanding all the taunts of the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) I do not think it a dishonourable act, or that it reflects any dishonour on a gentleman, when he finds that the course he has taken, in the belief that he is acting in the public interest and that he is violating no confidence whatever, was not so regarded by Mr. Greenway. I regarded it is a communication from one government to another, for an avowed purpose. I do not feel that it reflects any discredit on any hon. gentleman that he should express regret when he finds that the parties concerned have taken a different view from him. I have expressed regret, and I should not hesitate to do so on any similar occasion. I believe there are few men whose minds are so constituted, that they can base, upon a circumstance of that kind, a charge against any hon. gentleman in this House.

Now, Sir, let me come to the other point. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) wants to know : Why the telegram sent by the hon. member for Montreal West, and to which that was a reply, has not been laid before this House. Sir, the hon. gentleman does not require to be told, for the House has already been told why. They have been told that I was most anxious, that the Government were most anxious, to lay that telegram upon the Table of the House ; but, that the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) to whom they applied to obtain it for the purpose of laying it before the House, communicated with Mr. Greenway, and did not obtain his permission to make that telegram public. We were all anxious, I was most anxious, I am most anxious now, that that telegram should be before the House, and I took every means that I could take for the purpose. The only reason is, that we were not able to obtain the consent of the party to whom that message was sent. I do not think it is necessary for me to say more, than that from beginning to end, this matter has been treated, so far as I am concerned, in the most open and frank manner with the House, and with a desire of laying all the information upon this subject which was in my possession before the House. I regret extremely, that there should have been any misapprehension in regard to the confidential nature of the telegram, and it was only because that telegram, for the first time, was the first official communication as I regarded it between the government of Manitoba and this Government, through the intermediary action of the member for Montreal West, that it was treated as a public telegram. That gave Mr. Greenway an opportunity of which he availed himself, very properly, of supplying the portion that had been eliminated as not pertaining to the subject matter in issue, and of presenting it in the light in which he himself viewed it. It is not necessary that I should take up the time of the House ; but I deemed it necessary that I should make this frank statement, clear and unmistakable ; and I trust that if the House feels that any error has been committed in dealing with this subject, so far as I am concerned, in the communications which I have made to the House, it certainly has not been intentional on my part. I have always endeavoured to deal in the frankest possible spirit with these matters, and I regret that any person should have any misapprehension in regard to this matter.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me say a word of explanation. The hon. gentleman says that I knew perfectly well why that telegram to Mr. Greenway had not been placed on the Table of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I had stated it to the House before.

Mr. McCARTHY. What the hon. gentleman said before was that he had not got Mr. Greenway's consent. That any applications had been made to Mr. Greenway for his consent I never heard before.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Secretary of State says that he has given us a frank statement of his acts. The most valuable information he has given us was involved in the statement that he does not yet see any impropriety in the course he has pursued with regard to these telegrams. It is extremely important that the House should know from that hon. gentleman what his sense of propriety or of gentlemanly conduct is, in dealing with matters of this kind. Though I cannot say that we are very glad to know, it is very important that we should know, that he still believes that he dealt in a proper, decent and gentlemanly manner with these telegrams. It enables us to estimate the hon. gentleman at his true value. He tells us that nobody could be charged with garbling a telegram who at once sent it on in the same garbled shape to the person who had sent the telegram. That is a very extraordinary statement to make—that it is perfectly correct and consistent with the conduct of a gentleman to bring down a mutilated despatch to this House as being the only despatch, because he afterwards told the man whose telegram he had mutilated that he had done so. I leave that statement to the judgment of the House.

He told us why he had mutilated it. He said it was because he thought the concluding sentence had no bearing on the question at issue—whether Mr. Greenway was willing to negotiate—and that Mr. Greenway's opinion as to whose fault caused the present condition of affairs, had nothing to do with that. In the first place, Mr. Greenway had officially and formally notified this Government of the readiness of his government to consider this whole case by means of a commission or otherwise—to go into all the facts bearing on it—and see what was best to be done. So that there was no question of Mr. Greenway's willingness to negotiate. It was known officially that he was. In the second place, if it was for the reason alleged that the sentence in question was cut off, why was the other sentence left in—"I appreciate your very kind offices in this matter"? This was the sentence addressed by Mr. Greenway to the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), a very proper sentence, but surely with no more bearing on Mr. Greenway's willingness to negotiate than the sentence that was cut out. The reason one was cut out and the other left in, was, that the one excised implied a censure on this Government and the other did not.

The hon. Secretary of State has told us further that the strain of propriety, as he confessed it, was a strain of propriety, in bringing down this telegram, was for the reason that the hon. member for Montreal West was not here at the time, and his consent could not be obtained. Now, it is on record that the telegram came to the hon. member for Montreal West on the 2nd of March; that that telegram was laid before the House on the 9th of March, and that between those dates the hon. member for Montreal West was here, or in Montreal, and his consent could have been obtained; but they waited until he was in New York before they strained propriety and submitted the telegram to the House. That, the hon. Secretary of State considers a perfectly proper method of dealing with the question.

Again, he says that he regarded this telegram, which was only one of a series, as an official communication of the Manitoba Government to this government. It is very strange, seeing that all the telegrams were exchanged between the Manitoba government and a private person who went up as a private negotiator, that only one of the whole series should be considered official, and all the others private. I say it is very strange that that should be urged, but I should rather say that it is very absurd and silly. The simple fact is that all these telegrams between Mr. Greenway and the hon. member for Montreal West were either all confidential, or all official. If they were all confidential, it was indecent and improper to publish a part of the correspondence, without the consent, and in the absence of the hon. gentleman to whom it was addressed. The circumstances would indicate that the Government had sought a time when that gentleman was absent to produce this telegram, for fear he would forbid its production if he were present. The subsequent confession of the Secretary of State is that he has, since that gentleman's return, failed to obtain his consent to the production of the rest of the correspondence.

The inference from that is—and the hon. member for Montreal West nods his head to it, that he has not given his consent to the publication of the rest of the correspondence—the inference is he would not have consented to the publication of a mutilated portion of it, if his consent had been asked, and that the opportunity was not afforded him of preventing the production of that mutilated portion. It is for the House and the country to judge of such conduct on the part of a responsible Minister. If, as the hon. Secretary of State has said, the communication he gave the House was official, the whole series were official, and the hon. Secretary of State is entitled to produce the whole of the communications, without asking the consent of the hon. member for Montreal West, or anyone else. He has either violated personal confidence, and done what he says no gentleman would do, or else he has refused to bring down those portions of an official correspondence which tell against the Government, while selecting portions that he thought would suit his purpose. Either horn of the dilemma will be a very uncomfortable resting place for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a point in connection with these explanations by which the hon. Secretary of State has managed to mystify the House to-night, which requires clearing up. It is admitted on all sides that the hon. member for Montreal West went on his own account to Manitoba, and that the Government is not responsible for his mission, in which case we need not discuss those anterior proceedings at all. But there came a time when that hon. gentleman returned to Ottawa and reported his proceedings to the First Minister, acting on behalf of the Government. If he made his report to the First Minister, and, according to the language of the hon. Secretary of State this afternoon, at the request of the Finance Minister, and if, as the agent of the First Minister, he sent a telegram of 100 words to Mr. Greenway, that telegram was an official act. The Government spoke to Mr. Greenway by an accredited agent of their own; they sent through him an official telegram; and in response to that official telegram, sent at the instance of the First Minister, Mr. Greenway sent his message, a mutilated copy of which was put before the House. The House is asked to believe that that was not a reply to an official telegram which had been sent to the Manitoba Government, but a reply to some private communication sent by the hon. member for Montreal West, on his own account. Well, it is well to understand that that is not true, that the House was not dealt with honestly or fairly, that it was not dealt with in that open manner which the hon. Secretary of State led us to believe it was, and that there has been shown a disposition, as regards the House of Commons which, in my humble judgment, well deserves the censure which is being heaped upon the Government to-night.

Mr. DICKEY. I cannot take up the time of the House by going over all the details of this matter, but I think the hon. Secretary of State has completely cleared up the subject to any hon. gentleman who cares to have any light thrown upon it whatever. On my own behalf, I repudiate the statement of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) that any disposition has been shown to deceive the House in any way with reference to these negotiations. It is quite true that their exceptional character, arising from the exceptional circumstances of the case, has given hon. gentlemen who desire it, an opportunity to make, at one time, one use, and at another time, another use, of them, as the particular circumstances give them an opportunity to make speeches which please them a good deal, but it will not convince anybody that any substantial wrong has been committed by the Government. The case is tolerably plain. The Government has been attacked on two lines. It has been attacked, first, by the hon. member for Simcoe for having suppressed an official despatch of 100 words sent by the hon. member for Montreal West to Mr. Greenway, and the hon. member for Queen's seems to reiterate that charge. Another party in the House attacks the hon. Secretary of State for having given to this House the message he did give, on the ground that it was a private, confidential telegram which should not have been communicated at all. So that there are absolutely two inconsistent lines of attack.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not at all.

Mr. DICKEY. The fact of the matter is that the Government, rightly or wrongly, have viewed the communication which the hon. member for Montreal West sent to Mr. Greenway as a matter over which that hon. gentleman and Mr. Greenway have absolute control.

Mr. MARTIN. Does not the reply come in the same category ?

Mr. DICKEY. They have taken the position that it was unfair to these gentlemen to say that the public interests required the telegram which the Secretary of State read should be laid before the House, and they take that position in spite of the fact that they desire very strongly the House should see the telegram which was sent to Mr. Greenway. The hon. member for Winnipeg has said that that one part only of the telegram from Mr. Greenway was given, and that a sentence was left out. That is quite true, but it has been explained over and over again. The hon. leader of the House was probably wrong in giving that telegram at the time he did. Possibly he may have been wrong, but if he were, he certainly cannot be asked now to produce a despatch to which it was an answer. Unless you give up the charge of wrong-doing in publishing the last despatch you cannot insist on his giving the one to which it was a reply. The two contentions are entirely inconsistent. The hon. member for Simcoe has made a very strong and broad charge, based on a statement which was absolutely incorrect. The hon. leader of the House said that Mr. Greenway had not consented to that telegram being brought down, and the hon. member for Simcoe undertook to say that such a statement had never been made by him. If he will look at page 3548 of "Hansard," he will find that the hon. Secretary of State made the following statement in reply to Mr. Martin :

> Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if the Government have applied for permission from Mr. Greenway to lay before the House the telegrams and other communications that have passed between the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) and Mr. Greenway's government ?
> Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member for Montreal West did communicate with Mr. Greenway on the subject of asking his permission, or asking whether he was willing that the telegram from the hon. member for Montreal West to Mr. Greenway, to which that laid before the House was a reply, should be laid before the House and I have just stated to the House that consent has not been obtained from Mr. Greenway for that purpose.

That is the position in which the matter stands. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing of any great importance in it at all, that it has all arisen from the peculiar circumstances of the case, and from the use which hon. gentlemen opposite think it necessary they should make of those circumstances.

Mr. WELDON. I think it is a matter of great satisfaction to every member of this House who is thoroughly in earnest when he says, that he desires, above all things, a solution of this school difficulty by the authorities most competent to solve it, namely, the legislature at Winnipeg, that all parties who to-night have been at one time or other attacked in this regard, have done so much in the direction of a local settlement. His Excellency first, the Administration second, and the hon. member for Montreal West third, in their several ways, have endeavoured—and I believe they have all done something—to favour this local solution of the question. They deserve the thanks and good-will of this House and this country. In the warmth with which hon. members opposite pressed their motion this afternoon, I discovered some justification for the taunt which members of the Liberal-Conservative party have thrown at members of the Liberal party, that they are not sincere in the declaration they make, that they desire a local solution of the difficulty. The taunt has been thrown out by Conservative members of this House and by the press of the Conservative party, that the members of the Liberal party are dealing with this question with the hope of dividing and wrecking our party, and I must say, as a bystander, who has watched the run of the discussion this afternoon, listening carefully to what was said, that the whole tone of the discussion and of those who have spoken—perhaps not all, but very strongly was that the tone of the hon. member for Winnipeg—goes to show that these gentlemen fear that there is now a reasonable hope of a provincial solution of this almost insoluble difficulty. And, therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the strongest way—though, perhaps, it is not very good form to speak in praise of the Governor General—I claim the thanks of the country for His Excellency. I never could subscribe to the view many gentlemen on the other side seem to hold, which would prevent a Governor General from getting information from any public man or any other man with whom he desires to converse, with whom he has the right to converse. I cannot see any possible harm in the Governor General taking these methods of informing himself upon public matters. I do not see that anything but good can come from the Governor General furnishing his mind with all possible information. We all say, and I think most of us with sincerity, that it distresses us to find five or six years of public energy wasted in dealing with a difficulty like this—the energy of the Government wasted and the time of Parliament mainly occupied with this question, preventing progress in those large questions of commerce and development to which we would like to give attention. I thank the member for Montreal West for his action. I think he has acted the part of a patriot. And I thank the Government still more, for I heartily accept their statement, that they desire a settlement. From what little I know—I am not at liberty to speak of matters that are half confidential—but I am free to make a general reference to the fact that approval was expressed by a number of members of my own party, when first word came that there was a possible hope of settlement by the local legislature in Manitoba and the local leaders, whom I blame, deeply blame—though I do not wish to press this matter, at the present condition of affairs. I believe that at the bar of history these gentlemen will be held responsible. There is no fault in that regard that can possibly be found with our Administration. They have had to deal with the question. But, so far as I understand, the difficulty is due primarily to the treachery of these men. I do not pretend to be fully cognizant of the facts, but I have heard the statement of the Minister of the Interior on this side, and I have heard the statement of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Devlin) on the other side, and I have heard also the very inadequate answer of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I myself do not know, and cannot know, the full evidence, but, as a bystander, I say again, that the weight of evidence is strongly against those gentlemen. If that be true, I can readily understand the irritation of the Catholic people, who felt that good faith had been broken, who felt that they had defeated one party and put another in power only to have faith broken to their disadvantage. I have always felt sympathy with the Roman Catholics who felt that this measure was born in perfidy and in a breach of faith and honour. While I regretted the position that the Ministry took last year, I think they showed the courage not of little men, but of great men, and, if they have in a certain sense waived or abandoned nice points of etiquette, it has been because there was some light from the west, and they have taken this way of solving the difficulty. I believe that they have acted with courage and good faith, and that they hoped for and are working at a solution of that difficulty by the province of Manitoba; and I wish them, for my part, God-speed in their efforts, and I trust that this solution may be worked out, to the great relief of this distracted and unhappy country.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say a word or two on this subject, as it relates to a province so near the territories from which I come. Complaint is made because an eminent man of this House went up to Winnipeg in his private capacity, and the Government of Canada was availing itself of his good offices there. It seems to have been forgotten that in a celebrated case, where there was the greatest possible excitement in England, namely, on the trade relations between France and England, Mr. Cobden went over to Paris, in his private capacity, and actually negotiated a treaty of trade with the Emperor of the French. And, when, in the House of Commons, the question was asked, whether a private person was conducting negotiations on behalf of the Government, Lord Palmerston, for what reason, the House can draw its own conclusions, treated the question, though elaborately put by a prominent member of the House, with silence. Subsequently, late in the autumn of that year, another gentleman asked a question, and then Lord Palmerston replied, that they were availing themselves of the services of Mr. Cobden. And you will find it in the life of Mr. Gladstone, how Mr. Cobden had gone as a private person, an eminent man, and had commenced and carried out to completion these negotiations. Now, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, in this debate, complain of the action of an eminent personage, which is not shown to have taken place, and which the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) does not say took place. He has not said that His Excellency took any initiative in his going to Winnipeg. What the hon. member has told us is, that he incidentally had a conversation with His Excellency. It seems to be forgotten that, when Mr. Mackenzie was Prime Minister, and sat in the seat now occupied by the Secretary of State, Lord Dufferin, one of the most eminent Governors General we have had, and certainly not the least useful to Canada, went to British Columbia, and, while there, of his own motion —the Secretary of State will know it, Sir John Macdonald told me of it many a time; he was fond of talking of Lord Dufferin and of how loyal and serviceable he had been to Mr. Mackenzie—he almost strained his position to do service to the Government of the day and to Canada. Sir, I do not take the view that the position in our constitution of Her Majesty the Queen, or her representative in Canada, the Governor General, taken by some hon. members in this House. If the view taken here by certain gentlemen were correct the Governor General would be reduced to a position of almost a dummy, even in his private life. Sir, there is nothing to estop a Governor General who takes a deep interest in Canadian affairs, conversing with any member of this House. I remember that Lord Dufferin was accustomed to meet in his office, in the eastern block, members of Parliament of both parties, and discuss political questions with them. And how would it be possible for a man in his august position fully to discharge his duties, unless, by conversation with eminent men, he made himself familiar with the events of the day? And what would be the object of such communications unless he were free, not to suggest policies or advise schemes of political action, but to express his opinion on the events of the day, and on great questions such as this? Why, Sir, you limit greatly the usefulness of those eminent men who, from time to time, come here as Governors General, if you take any such miserable view of their position as has been taken by some hon. gentlemen. An attempt has been made to strain an incidental allusion made yesterday by the member for Montreal West, and to make out that in some way His Excellency had taken a very positive action, and that the Government of Canada wanted to try to escape from responsibility therefor. Sir, if I were to characterize the language, for instance, of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) who has descended below the level of anybody, including himself, that I have ever known in this House—if I were to characterize it properly, I might strain the possibilities of parliamentary demeanour, and so I will not do so. Hon. gentlemen have been blaming the Secretary of State because he did not place before the House certain documents which they declared to be official. That was their contention at first, but the bare fact that he could not lay them before the House, and so stated, was the best possible proof that the member for Montreal West was acting in his private capacity. How could the member for Montreal West refuse to give his consent to the production of certain telegrams, if he had been an official agent of the Government and not acting in his private capacity? Sir, I listened with great pleaure to the language that fell from my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), and I say that what has been stated by him is thoroughly justified by what we have seen here to-night. What we have seen on the Opposition side of the House to-night stamps with insincerity all their professions of a desire to have the great question that now troubles this country, settled by the local legislature of Manitoba. Sir, I listened to the speech of the member for Winnipeg with perfect shame; and I will go further than that now in reference to the management of our political affairs. It is part and parcel of an oraganized effort, that is already baffled, to try and countervail the weight and influence that is felt to be in the Conservative party to-day, in consequence of the introduction of the hon. Secretary of State into this House. Sir, I stated some time ago that the hon. member for South Oxford greatly feared him. I stated that the whole party feared his coming to the House, and that fear has now been made abundantly manifest. I say this organized attempt to make a mountain out of a mole hill, is a manifestation to all Canada of their efforts to countervail the influence of that hon. gentleman. I say that if the hon. Secretary of State had only come into the House and sat silent in that seat, and only gave his great weight of experience and force of character to the Conservative party, that alone would have made a great difference. But, Sir, it has made all the difference in the world that he is not only there with his experience, but there with all his old force, and all his old fire; and it is felt already among the Opposition. I think I may say to the member for Winnipeg and others, that they may as well give up this sort of tactics, because they belong to that order of human action that the moment they are known, and seen, and discovered, all their strength evaporates. They are like thunder-clouds, very thick and lowering, but they carry with them the elements of their own dispersion, and soon pass away.

Mr. FLINT. I think the observations of the last speaker, as well as those of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), were quite uncalled for in consequence of anything that has been said on this side of the House in connection with the matter that has just been discussed. Sir, not one word has been said by any hon. gentleman on this side of the House reflecting upon the conduct or upon the position of the Governor General. Hon. gentlemen in warmly assuming to defend the Governor General from supposed attacks, are simply putting up a man of straw of their own imagination, and violently knocking it down for the delight of the by-standers. There is not one syllable uttered by any hon. gentleman who has criticised the conduct of the Government, reflecting in the slightest degree upon the public spirit or upon the dignity of the position of the Governor General. An attempt has been made to indicate that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have attacked the propriety of the conduct of the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) in his public spirited endeavours to lead on to a solution of this very embarrassing school question. I challenge the recollection of hon. gentlemen who have listened to what has been said and ask them to look over "Hansard" to-morrow, and I believe they will not be able to find one sentence in condemnation of the attitude assumed by the distinguished gentleman representing Montreal West. We all appreciate the motives which induced him to assist the Government in this very difficult question, we all appreciate the care with which he undertook to conduct a series of very delicate negotiations, and the whole of the animadversions have been as to the conduct of the Government with respect to its relations to the House and these negotiations. We have contended, whether correctly or not, we leave those who peruse this debate to judge, that the Government has pursued a shifting and evasive policy, that it has not taken the House into its confidence as it should have done, from the day that the Secretary of State read a portion, and only a portion, of the correspondence which has taken place between the hon. member for Montreal West and the representatives of the Manitoba government. This is precisely the situation. We can easily see, when the tactics of the Administration were exposed by the discussion, that on the one hand they were endeavouring to show their followers that they were pursuing a strong and vigorous course, and on the other hand were endeavouring to convince other followers that they were pursuing a conciliatory policy, and were negotiating for a settlement on the lines adopted by the leader of the Opposition. If the Government pursued an honest, fair, reasonable and manly effort to negotiate with the Manitoba government for the adjustment of this serious difficulty and remove it from party politics, they would have the sincere sympathy of every Liberal in the House. This has been the declared policy of hon. members on this side of the House since the difficulty commenced. In attempting to carry out negotiations and to arrive at an amicable settlement with the Manitoba government, hon. gentlemen opposite would have the support of the Liberals in Parliament and out of Parliament. It is not a fair representation of the character of the remarks made by hon. members who have criticised the conduct of the Government and animadverted on the manner in which the Secretary of State has brought up the matter, to intimate that any blame in any way has been laid on His Excellency and on the distinguished member for Montreal West. The discussion has shown more clearly than ever that the negotiations were really intended to be brought to naught. I believe the Liberals are prepared to say that if the Government will go forward sincerely and frankly to carry the negotiations with the Manitoba government to a successful issue, they will have their support.

Motion for adjournment of House negatived.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved:

That the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba).

Mr. McCARTHY. I propose to move an amendment on this subject which will take some little time in discussing, and I would suggest that we now adjourn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. If we are to go on, I suppose we will go on, but I do not think it is at all to the credit of the Government that they force the discussion in this untimely and unsuitable way. It is now twelve o'clock. We have been sitting two nights all night, and it is hardly to be expected that members of the House are in a fit condition to discharge their duties properly and continue the discussion night after night.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must remind the leader of the House that we sat until six o'clock this morning after a forty-eight or fifty hours' session, and I do not suppose to repeat the operation will be conducive to our health. If my hon. friend moves a resolution which will involve a long discussion, it is simply absurd to commence at midnight.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman that he must not forget the statement made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) during the discussion in this House, and that was that the Government would not be able to get this Bill through committee. I take it that every hon. member who has been present in this House to-day cannot have failed to observe an organized and determined obstruction, designed to waste the time of the House. We have been called upon to listen to long tirades and to hon. gentlemen repeating themselves over and over again, and every one must have recognized the fact that there is a determination on the part of certain hon. members that this great measure demanded in the interest of the country, shall, if possible, be prevented passing into law. I say, under these circumstances, I will call upon the supporters of this measure to stay here day and night if necessary. Not only this House, but the people of the country will resent this attempt at organized opposition to defeat this great measure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I tell the Secretary of State that I think he is making a great mistake in his own interest. He will find it utterly impossible to bulldoze this House into considering an important measure in the way he proposes. Of course he obtained his division this morning by a number of hon. members, at my special request, I may tell him, abstaining from speaking, on the ground that it was expedient to bring the discussion to a close in view of the arrangement made. Under these circumstances, the attempt to resume the discussion at midnight is to pursue the extraordinary system of bulldozing the House which was initiated during the last two days, and which will only lead to extreme inconvenience to the hon. gentleman and other parties.

He is an old member of this House, as well as myself, and I just put it to him, did he ever know of an attempt of that kind to lead to any success? Let him look back over his thirty or forty years, and his experience, I am sure, will confirm my statement, that any such attempt, of necessity, defeats itself. He knows perfectly well that there are ample resources and means, if we wish to use them, for obstruction, but we have not tried any of them. He knows very well that the discussion which took place to-day was on a most important constitutional question, and he knows perfectly well that it would have been within our power to prolong it to any extent we pleased. Now he attempts to choke off discussion on this question at a time when it is utterly impossible for us to do otherwise than discuss the Bill, although it is perfectly easy to go on to twelve o'clock, or till any time he pleases to-morrow night.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I remember the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) himself, a few years ago, charging the hon. the leader of the House with trying to kill the members off, by keeping them sitting after a certain hour. I am not, however, saying, that the hon. gentleman is trying to do anything of that kind. But the hon. gentleman will remember, that we sat through two days and two nights, and members who have been without sleep and without ordinary rest during two nights in succession, are not in the most Christian mood to resume public business on the following day. The hon. gentleman, I dare say, has seen how easy it is for a Christian gentleman to lose his temper in trying to get a pig out of a garden on a hot day. And, when the hon. gentleman has everybody tired and everybody irritated by a want of rest during two nights, I do not think we are in a good mood to continue our discussion on the present occasion. If we have an adjournment, with the pious labours of the Sabbath and the rest on the Saturday preceding intervening, we would be in a better frame of mind to undertake business in a business-like way on Monday. I think that the hon. gentleman will do his friends and those on this side of the House good service by adjourning now. My hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) might read his motion, and let it stand for discussion later on.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to make a remark on this occasion. If the hon. gentlemen in this House will look at the debate which has taken place, they will find that the members of the Liberal party did not take up as much time as those on the other side of the House. I have heard it stated, in the House and outside of it, and I suppose there is some party reason, that there is an organized system of obstruction by gentlemen on this side of the House. I am in a position to say, that no such understanding exists. What may be in the minds of individual members, I do not know, but the fact remains, that more time was taken up in the discussion by members on the other side than by members of the Liberal party. It is only fair to say, that the speeches on this side of the House were not lengthened improperly.

Mr. STEVENSON. What about a three-hours speech at five in the morning?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I could refer the hon. gentleman to the length of speeches made on the other side of the House. I have no doubt that members had reason to put on record the speeches they made and read, for great latitude was given, and some speeches were read altogether. For some reason that I cannot understand, there seemed to be statements made, that the Opposition wished to obstruct, and I want the fact to be known to the House and the country, that this is not so. Does the leader of the House think it fair to make the statement, that there is an organized attempt to obstruct, when there is not? If there was any obstruction, the charge would be fair enough against the party, and they would have to take the responsibility. I say again, there is no obstruction from this side of the House.

Mr. CASEY. I would call attention to a very unfortunate class of officials in this House who will be cruelly ill-used if this business proceeds. I refer to the official reporters of this House on whom depends the publication of the debates. They are only mortal men and not machines. They cannot last for ever, and I for one would not blame them if they struck work altogether under the circumstances.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am quite willing to read my motion. I think when hon. gentlemen hear it, they will consider it a matter, at all events worthy of discussion, and although it has been to some extent dealt with on the motion for the 2nd reading, it has not yet undergone that very full discussion which I think its importance deserves. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to draw attention to this: that the Bill which we are considering contains matters or suggests matters of very serious constitutional difficulties. The whole formation of the measure from beginning to end is of course new to us. It is proposed under a clause of the Act which has never yet been brought in question since confederation, and as the hon. gentleman, who I suppose is responsible for the drawing of it, or at all events for introducing it to the House, told us very candidly, it is a most difficult measure and one which he finds almost impossible to put in a constitutional shape. My hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) in the very able speech which he addressed to us on the second reading, pointed out with some little detail some of its legal difficulties. I have briefly referred to them in my closing remarks the other night, and my hon. friend (Mr. Weldon) more fully dwelt on them and pointed them out. I will read the conclusions which have occurred to me as being worthy of the most serious consideration of the House before we take any further step in regard to this Bill. First, is it constitutional and within the power of Parliament to enact, by reason of the fact that it fails to carry the remedial order into effect, to the full extent of the order. That point was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and made with very great force, and it deserves our most serious consideration.

But, Sir, the Bill does not merely sin in that direction. The Bill as I venture to submit it still more defective in this regard: that it proposes to enact a good deal more than the order requires. It goes far and away beyond the terms of the remedial order, and when I come to deal with the matter in detail, I will point out in what respect it appears to me the Bill sins on the point to which I am now referring. The Bill also assumes, Sir, to delegate a power that is vested in the provincial legislature to levy a direct tax within the province. Now that has appeared to me from the very first, since ever I have considered this question at all, one of almost insuperable difficulty. The right of appeal is given to the minority, and the appeal is upon the educational clauses, which are sometimes termed the educational code; but the right to levy a tax, the right to impose a tax, is under a different clause of the Act as to which we have no appeal, and as to which we have no right to interfere.

I am bound to think that the best solution of the very difficult problem which the Act presents was given in the speech which my hon. friend charmed the House with the other evening. I mean that the Act gives to us the power to provide for a conscience clause, in the event of any school law depriving people of that protection, or compelling pupils to attend a school which their parents could not, conscientiously, approve of. On reflection, I think it will be found that if effect is given to the clause in that way, every possible mischief which we can imagine which would be done by any interference with school laws, would be obviated and protected. Again, the Bill purports to interfere with the law of the province which enjoins the payment of taxes in support of public schools. The province has thought fit to pass a law, and by that law has directed that not merely parents who send their children to the schools, but all the ratepayers in the school section, shall pay taxes for the support of public schools. This Parliament is undertaking to say that that law shall be abrogated, and that a certain portion of the population shall be absolved under certain circumstances from the payment of that tax. Well, I venture to say that is a matter which it will be found we have no jurisdiction to interfere with. It not only does that, but it proposes to vest in the Governor General the authority appertaining to the Lieutenant-Governor, although the Manitoba Act—adopting in that respect the terms of the British North America Act—distinctly states that the executive power and authority of the province is vested in the Lieutenant-Governor. We undertake to say, as to certain matters and upon the happening of certain events, the Governor General shall be the executive so far as the school law is concerned, and not the Lieutenant-Governor. This Bill also purports to reserve to this House authority to legislate further in this matter. I have always understood—I have never heard any lawyer express a different opinion—that the power of Parliament, which is limited to carrying into effect the remedial order and that alone, is a power which is to be exercised once for all—which cannot be reserved by Parliament. As to that it does appear to me that the Bill is a very flagrant violation of our powers. Lastly and seventhly, I think it is important that we should know—I do not think there is a member in this House who would not desire to know—whether we have the power to deal with this question again, or whether the law we pass is not, so far as we are concerned, irrevocable. I ask, therefore, that this Bill be not now proceeded with, but that it be declared, before going further into the consideration of the Bill, that the important and difficult questions arising in relation thereto should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for its opinion, among which are the questions which I have mentioned.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hon. gentlemen laugh. I thought their great pride was that their leader, the late Sir John Thompson, had availed himself of the act which Mr. Blake suggested, and which this House afterwards adopted. That act, Sir, permits a submission of questions of this kind to the Supreme Court, just as it permitted the submission of questions as to the power of the Governor General in Council under the remedial order. The terms of the Act are:

> Important questions of law or fact touching provincial legislation or the appellate jurisdiction as to educational matters vested in the Governor in Council by the British North America

Act of 1867 or by any other Act or law, or touching the constitutionality of any legislation of the Parliament of Canada, or touching any other matter with reference to which he sees fit to exercise this power, may be referred by the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration, and the court shall thereupon consider the same.

Now, Sir, is it or is it not important, before we plunge this province into a sea of litigation on every possible and conceivable question arising out of this school Act, that we should obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court as to whether and how far we have a right to legislate with respect to this troublesome school question? Was it important, and if it was why was it, that before the remedial order was made the authority of the Government to make that order should be ascertained? As Sir John Thompson pointed out when this question was under discussion in 1893, it was far wiser and better to know exactly where we stood before that order was made, because it was perfectly clear that the legislation following upon the order would be called in question, and its validity would in the end have to be determined by the courts. And assuming that the Government were right in entertaining the petition at all, assuming upon the facts that they were right in interfering, which I have always ventured to doubt, and which I still think they erred in doing, then unquestionably the course pursued by the late Government in ascertaining in advance what the jurisdiction of the Governor in Council was, and whether the order could legally be made, was prudent and wise; but the unfortunate circumstance, after all, was that the inquiry did not go as far as it was intended to go, or as far as it might have done, to ascertain to what extent the legislation would be within our authority. Perhaps under the circumstances that was not very extraordinary, because I dare say it had not been thought out at the time, and the trouble did not occur until a subsequent stage of the proceedings had been reached. But I would again suggest that, at this hour, it is hardly fair to enter on a question of this importance. It is certainly not fair to me——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. McCARTHY. We will go on if necessary. The hon. gentleman need not be in the least alarmed about that. I was proceeding to say that there are two sides to this question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Two sides to the Government.

Mr. McCARTHY. At all events, there are two sides to this question. The hon. Secretary of State has told us that it is because of the statement made by me, that this Bill would never go into committee, this course is to be taken. When I made that statement in my speech, I was not, in the slightest degree, thinking of the proceedings we are now engaged in. There was present to my mind what was given out as the course of the Government, which, I believe, was changed yesterday rather suddenly, and under a certain degree of pressure, and that was that the Government proposed, after the Bill had passed its second reading, to enter upon negotiations with the Manitoba government. If that course had been taken, I am certain there would have been no committee on the Bill this session.

An hon. MEMBER. That is too thin.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hon. gentlemen say it is too thin or too thick, they can please themselves. All I can say is that this is what I had in my mind at the time, and I am quite willing that the hon. gentlemen should take it or leave it as they please. There are two sides to this question, and I venture to say that the people of this country who are opposed to this Bill will certainly resent this attempt to force this measure by main strength through this House; and I think the gentlemen who are supporting this course will ascertain that there is outside of this House a spirit of fair-play, if that is not to be found within the walls of this chamber, and that although one party may be somewhat more numerous than another—and certainly it has not very much to boast of when the Bill was only carried by a majority of four on its own side, and when it owes its strength in numbers to the support of some members of the Opposition, who felt they were not at liberty to oppose the Bill, but who yet have no confidence in the Government. Under those circumstances, the Government have not much to boast of as regards the majority by which they carried the second reading.

Mr. WALLACE. May I be permitted to ask what is the intention of the Government as regards the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe? Is it to be forced through the House to-night. If it is, I think it is most unfair. It is most unfair not to allow us time to consider properly this important amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did he not give notice?

Mr. WELDON. I strongly hope that moderate counsels will prevail, and that the hon. leader of the House will allow the House to rise. If I had had the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe with me, I would have moved it last night, but it seems to me that it is a very practical and important matter, and I hope that rather than bring us into another determined conflict, the leader of the House will consent to the reasonable proposal that is made to him.

Mr. DUPONT. Why did you not put it at three o'clock this morning? That was the proper time to put it instead of now obstructing the business of the House.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman asks why I did not put it at three o'clock. I could not put it until the Bill was moved. I put it the very first moment the Bill was moved.

Mr. FOSTER. We might have moved it much earlier.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was not responsible for that. I do not think that any good will come of this attempt to stifle discussion. I wish to say that, from first to last, there has been no obstruction with regard to this matter. I do not think that any one made a speech on the second reading of the Bill with any object of delaying the division which we ultimately reached. The debate was a long one, no doubt, but it was on a most important question, a question which has aroused feeling in every part of this country. It was not extraordinary therefore that members should desire to put themselves right before their constituents with regard to it.

Mr. McNEILL. Feelings that will not be allayed by this course.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is quite certain. This country is not going to be satisfied with the House sitting for two nights in succession and on the third night forcing a discussion upon an amendment such as this after 12 o'clock. Now, I desire to point out, in the first place, the power that this Parliament has with regard to this question. As hon. gentlemen know, that power is to be found in the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act, which has not been read, perhaps, more than necessary, though it has been read very frequently. I want to draw attention, however, to the clause under which we are now dealing. The third subsection of the 22nd section of the Manitoba Act says :

> In case any such provincial law as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on an appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, as far only as the circumstances of each case may require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

Now, it appears to me that this third clause deals with two facts—two different conditions of things—and that we have to eliminate certain portions of the section under the facts with which we are now required to deal. The Governor General in Council has not, of his own motion, made any direction or decision. The first part of the section says :

> In case any such provincial law as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made.

Well, I take it, that is not a portion of the clause under which this Remedial Bill is proposed, and we may, for the purposes of discussion, eliminate that part of the section. Then I shall read that portion under which we are supposed to be acting :

> Or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council or any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper authority in that behalf.

Now, that is the circumstance that happened here. An order has been made, that order has not been duly executed by the proper authority, namely, by the legislature of Manitoba, and, that being so then in the case and so far only as the circumstances of the case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the decision of the Governor General. Now, Sir, we have to go back to the remedial order for the purpose of seeing what it is the Governor General in Council has directed the legislature to do, because that is the foundation of our jurisdiction. We cannot, as it appears to me, go beyond that, and it is argued with a good deal of force by my hon. friend from Winnipeg that the province has had no opportunity of obeying the order, and therefore no opportunity of doing what His Excellency the Governor General thinks the province ought to do. Now, Sir, the order, after recitals with which I need not trouble the House reads as follows :—

> And whereas the 26th day of February, 1895, having been appointed for the hearing of the said appeal, and the same coming on to be heard on that day, and on the 5th, 6th and 7th days of March, 1895, in the presence of counsel for the petitioners (the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba) and as well for the province of Manitoba, upon reading the said petition and the statutes therein referred to, and upon hearing what was alleged by counsel on both sides, His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to order and adjudge, and it is hereby ordered and adjudged, that the said appeal be, and the same is hereby allowed, in so far as it relates to rights acquired by the said Roman Catholic minority under legislation of the province of Manitoba, passed subsequent to the union of that province with the Dominion of Canada, and His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to adjudge and declare, and it is hereby adjudged and declared that by the two Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba, on the first day of May, 1890, intituled respectively "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province, in relation to education, prior to the 1st day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges, which, previous to and until the 1st day of May, 1890, such minority had, viz. :—
> (a) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.
> (b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

> (c) The right of exception of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.
> And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.
> Whereof the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Manitoba for the time being, and the legislature of the said province, and all persons whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

Now, I will take these up separately and will endeavour to point out what the rights under the Act of Manitoba, the original School Act of Manitoba, which was repealed, and what the privileges are which are to be restored. Now, section (a) of this order commands the restoration of :

> The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.

Now, Sir, if I look at the Act in force at the time I shall find what the rights of the Roman Catholic minority were. Regarding the Board of Education which was to be appointed, the Act says :

> The board shall resolve itself into two sections, the one consisting of the Protestant and the other of the Roman Catholic members thereof ; and it shall be the duty of each section :
> (a) To have under its control and management the schools of the section, and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general conduct and discipline, and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act.
> (b) To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers, the recognition of certificates obtained elsewhere and for the withdrawing of the licenses on sufficient cause.
> (c) To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control, and to approve of the plans for the construction of school-houses.
> Provided, however, that in the case of books having reference to religion and morals, such selections by the Catholic sections of the board shall be subject to the approval of the competent religious authority.

By section 22, which I need not trouble the House with reading any further there is a duty imposed upon the council of each municipality to establish and alter when necessary the school districts within its own bounds. Then there is the election of school trustees, and the corporate power of school sections. Then the school trustees were to have power :

> To take possession and have the custody and safe-keeping of all common school property which has been acquired or given for common school purposes under this Act. In their district, and such corporations shall be empowered to acquire and hold, as a corporation, by any title whatsoever, any land, movable property, moneys, or income for school purposes, and to apply the same according to the terms on which the same was acquired or received, but they shall not without the sanction of the section of the board of education to which they belong, have power to alienate or dispose of any school real estate.

Then there was the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public fund, and that division was based upon a census return which the trustees were directed to make annually ; and it is according to that census return that the sum of money which was voted for school purposes was distributed between the two sections of the board. The right of exemption was contained in the section which says that no Roman Catholic should be required to support a Protestant school, and that no Protestant should be required to support a Catholic school. The provision with regard to that was very sweeping. Section 73, says :

> The ratepayers of a school district, including religious, benevolent, or educational corporations, shall pay their respective assessments to the schools of their respective denominations, and in no case shall a Protestant ratepayer be obliged to pay for a Catholic school, or a Catholic ratepayer for a Protestant school.

Now, this being the general power let us see what the proposed Bill does :

> The Lieutenant-Governor shall appoint and constitute for the separate school board of education for the province of Manitoba, a certain number of persons not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics.

Then it deals with their tenure or office :

> If the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not within three months after the coming into force of this Act make appointments to the separate school board, or if the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not fill any vacancy that may from any cause occur in the separate school board within three months after the occurrence of such vacancy, then in either such case His Excellency the Governor General shall make any appointment not made by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

Then the Department of Education may, for the observance of the separate schools, make regulations for the registering and reporting of daily attendance, subject to the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and the duty of the board is thus defined :

> (a) To have under its control and management the separate schools and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline and the carrying out of the provisions of this Act.
> (b) To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers, and for the withdrawing of licenses upon sufficient cause; provided that the standard of qualification for teachers shall be in secular matters the same as that at any time prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character established under the statutes of the province of Manitoba.

That I may say, is a new provision not to be found in the original Act, and a very great limitation upon the power of the school board, as originally appointed by the Manitoba School Act, the board of the Roman Catholic section had complete control in the matter of teachers :

> To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of its teachers, the recognition of certificates obtained elsewhere, and for the withdrawing of the license upon sufficient cause.

I am not dealing now with the propriety of the amendment proposed here. I am only drawing attention to the fact that there is that substantial difference between the authority that was conferred upon the board with reference to teachers under the old law which the province was directed to restore, and the proposed law which we are asked to enact. Now, the province was directed to restore to the minority the right to manage Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for in the statutes which were repealed. This Bill, instead of carrying that term of the remedial order into effect, stipulates that the standard of qualifications, which before was a matter that wholly related to the discretion of the board, shall be in secular matters the same as that prescribed for teachers of other schools of a public character established under the statutes of Manitoba.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. When the hon. gentleman put his motion I was at a loss to understand how a motion of that character could be discussed at this stage. I believe, however, there is authority in English parliamentary practice for referring an amendment to the courts in the nature of a reference. And yet I am conscious of a rule which obtains there and here, that until we reach the committee stage, the clauses of a Bill cannot be discussed in detail. Now, I do not mean to raise this point, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not misunderstand me, for the purpose of endeavouring to exclude a consideration of these points. They must come up at some stage, but for the purpose of convenience, and in connection with the point of order, I would like to explain the difficulty that is in my mind. As the hon. gentleman has outlined his argument, if he is permitted at this stage to put those points and to raise those difficulties, we shall have to deal twice, at least, with every one of the clauses which he proposes to call in question. I have not had the opportunity, perhaps, that the hon. gentleman has, of looking up the precedents upon which he relies in making his motion, as to whether, for instance, the references to a court at this stage were not of such a nature that they could be discussed without entering into a detailed consideration of the Bill clause by clause. My point is one of order, and I think also one in the interest of the economy of the time of the House. It is clear that every point that he has taken can be considered when that particular clause comes up in committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know that the point requires much consideration. I understand that on a motion that you do leave the Chair is the proper stage for moving any amendment against the further prosecution of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. I was going to refer to that rule, and to say that so far as I have been able to follow the argument of the hon. gentleman, I have not understood him to be discussing the provisions of the Bill in detail.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, that is not my meaning. The hon. gentleman alluded to the Manitoba statutes, and then came down to the Bill under consideration, and gave us the changes which we proposed to make in connection with this new legislation.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not understand the hon. member to discuss the clauses of the Bill. The hon. member understands that under the rule it would be impossible for him to discuss the clauses of the Bill before the House. There are several decisions establishing that upon a motion to go into committee on a Bill, the whole subject may be discussed. Then further on I find that on a motion to go into committee no clause shall be discussed. Further on I find :

> On the order for going into committee on a Bill, the main provisions of the Bill may be discussed, but not the clauses or amendments thereto.

Therefore, if the hon. gentleman avoids discussing the clauses he will be perfectly in order. So far as I have been able to gather from hearing the provisions of amendment cursorily read, there is no objection to the amendment itself.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It will not surely be contended that in a case of this kind, where an hon member is discussing the clauses of the Bill, not for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are wise clauses, but when he is raising a question of jurisdiction and asking for a reference to the Supreme Court, then it seems to me a reference to clauses of the Bill, for the purpose of showing that some of these clauses are beyond the jurisdiction of the House would stand on a somewhat different footing.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot discover anything in the authorities I have consulted that would justify the assumption that clauses of the Bill can be discussed in detail under any circumstances.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). On a question of jurisdiction ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not going to discuss the Bill any more than is necessary to explain the amendment, but it is absolutely necessary to do so, to some extent, in order to make my meaning plain. I suggest the questions that ought to be submitted for the opinion of the court. The first is whether the Bill, as a fact, fails to carry out the remedial order in full. In order to establish that, I have to show what the remedial order is. That involves a statement as to what the old law was, and a comparison of the old law with the proposed new law, otherwise I do not make good my statement that there is a falling short in the law of the terms of the remedial order. So, with respect to the second question in which I have to show that in some respects the Bill exceeds the terms of the remedial order, because the remedial order says the schools are to be restored as they were prior to the passage of the Acts of 1890. I cannot put the House in possession of the Acts of 1890 without giving a summary of them, and I do not desire to take up the time of the House, unnecessarily, although the conduct of the members on the Treasury benches is not conducive to my shortening my harangue, although I might crystallize it more if I had got any encouragement. If those hon. gentlemen are determined to use force it will only engender opposition.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A motion to refer must be a motion of the nature indicated by the general character of the Bill, and not having regard to particular sections.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is a substantial difference between the old law and the proposed new law. The remedial order called for restoration of the old system of schools, and in some respects, therefore, the new law falls far short of the remedial order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman, in justice to himself, and according to the rules of the House cannot pursue this line when, in order to commend the amendment to the judgment of the House it is necessary to deal with the Bill by clauses, or to refer to any particular clause. Of course, there may be nothing in my point, and I raise it in hesitation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That argument shows conclusively that the rule cannot be applicable to cases of this sort, which raise questions of jurisdiction.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not perfectly sure of my ground, but it strikes me that an amendment which involves the necessity of discussing details of a Bill would, at all events, preclude the hon. gentleman from discussing the clauses.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not proposing to discuss the clauses, but only to mention them. I desire to point out in what respect the new law differs from the old law. I must do that or found my argument on a mere statement not established or proved, and that would be ineffective. I am not contending that this is right or wrong, or arguing for or against it, but I am simply pointing out that there is a substantial difference between the new law and the old law.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you ruled the hon. gentleman is at liberty to refer to sections of the Bill ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I find further on in this book that an hon. member is not at liberty to comment on a clause.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is on an ordinary motion that you, Mr. Speaker, do now leave the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is speaking to the motion.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, but to the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot move the amendment without speaking to the motion.

Mr. McCARTHY. Do you rule, Mr. Speaker, that if I move an amendment I cannot seek to establish its truth ?

Mr. SPEAKER. That depends on whether the hon. gentleman is discussing the amendment according to parliamentary rules.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not proposing to discuss the clauses but merely refer to them, and also point out how the new law differs from the old law.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may do so in a general way ; but if, for the purpose of illustrating his argument, he refers to specific clauses upon which it is proposed to go into committee, so far as I am able to judge at present from precedents, the hon. gentleman will get into deep water very soon.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will wait until I get in.

Mr. SPEAKER. So far I think not. As I have said at the outset the hon. gentleman has not violated the rule.

Mr. McCARTHY. The next important thing is, in the selection of the books. The old law gave power to the school board to select the curriculum, subject only to this, that in the case of books having reference to religion and morals, such selection by the Catholic section of the board should be subject to the approval of the competent religious authority. The difference now is, that no—

> No book, map or globe shall be selected unless such book, map or globe has been authorized for use, either in the high or public schools of the > province of Manitoba, or the separate schools of the province of Ontario.

So that unquestionably, this does not go as far as the remedial order requires. I am speaking now simply of the fact that the right to manage the schools, which was commanded by the remedial order, was in a manner provided by the statutes which were repealed, and in the two important matters that I have drawn attention to, there is a very substantial difference between the repealed law of Manitoba, and the law which we are asked to make. Now, Sir, if the Act sins in that regard, it still more is objectionable in exceeding the terms of the remedial order, and for that purpose I shall have to ask the indulgence of the House while I refer to the parts of the clause in the new Act, which are not to be found in the old statute, which are entirely new, and which are altogether in excess of the order passed by His Excellency the Governor General. That order the House will understand, requires the old system to be fully restored. There is not a suggestion in the remedial order, that the legislature were to improve or to amend in any shape or way, the law which existed prior to 1890. The minority did not complain that the legislature of Manitoba were not willing to amend the law, or that the law itself was not perfectly satisfactory. What the minority complained of was, that the legislature had swept away the separate school system under which they managed and controlled their schools, and they asked —if the order was in the terms of the prayer of the petition, and the order followed the prayer—what they asked was that these schools should be restored. If we compare the two, the House will be astonished to find the enormous difference there is between the old law and the new one. I do not propose to go through all these differences. It is sufficient for the purpose of the argument which I desire to address to the House later on, to establish the fact that there are very substantial differences. Compare the sections relating to school assessments in the old Act with the section of the new. The old law was to be found in section 74 and it provided :

> That for the purpose of supplementing the legislative grant there shall be a board of trustees of all school districts not situated in a city or town the whole territory of which is in the limits of a single municipality, to prepare and lay before the municipal council an estimate of such sums, exclusive of such legislative grant, as may be required for school purposes during the current school year.

Subsection (a) defines the time that these estimates were to be laid before the municipality, and subsection (b) says :

> It shall be the duty of each board of school trustees to make out a list of the persons liable to be assessed for the balance of their school estimates as hereinbefore provided, with the assessment of each such person copied from the assessment roll placed opposite his name, also the amount of school taxes to be collected from him and to hand such list to the clerk of the municipality on or before the 1st day of August in each year.

Then we have the declaration as to arrears of school taxes and exemptions. Now, if we look at the new law, we find that these two or three clauses to which I have referred are expanded into nearly seven pages of the Bill, and the statement of that fact alone is sufficient to show the enormous difference there is (unless there has been a very useless expenditure of verbiage) between the old law and the new so far as assessment is concerened. There has been no doubt an attempt made, so far as I have been able to understand, and perhaps not unsuccessfully made, to copy in from the new Act of 1890—the Minister of Justice can tell whether I am right or wrong—the provisions of that law, which no doubt, are supposed to be an improvement on the Act of 1884, which is the date of the last consolidation of the old school law. But that very much enlarges the powers of the trustees with regard to the assessment. The borrowing powers are also very much increased. The powers for the compulsory attendance of children authorize, as the old law does not, investigations of complaints made against parents or guardians. There are powers of expropriation of school property not to be found in the old law. I venture to say that a careful analysis of these two Acts will show that more than half of this Bill is absolutely new.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I rise to a point of order, and I want to read the following from May, the authority to which Dr. Bourinot refers in regard to the reference of a Bill at this state :

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reason for not agreeing to the second reading of a Bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the Bill ; or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution ; or otherwise opposed to its progress ; or seeking further information in relation to the Bill by commissioners ; the production of papers or other evidence, or, in the lords, the opinions of the judges. The principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such resolution, which must, therefore, "strictly relate to the Bill which the House, by its order, has resolved upon considering," and must not include in its scope other Bills then standing for consideration by the House. Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the Bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee. When such a resolution amounts to no more than a direct negation of the principle of the Bill, it is an objectionable form of amendment ; but there are special cases for which it may be well adapted. On the 21st February, 1854, an amendment was made to the question for reading the Manchester Education Bill a > second time, that "education to be supported by public rates, is a subject which ought not, at the present time, to be dealt with by any private Bill," which gave legitimate expression to the opinion of the House. Amendments, however, to the question for the second reading of a Private Bill, which seek to substitute for that question a resolution declaring the opinon of the House on a matter of public or general policy, are out of order.

This is the reference cited by Dr. Bourinot in regard to amendments on the motion to go into committee on a Bill. An amendment that may be considered without reference to the clauses in the Bill is in order at that time, but the clauses cannot be considered seriatim until the Bill is in committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think the rule the hon. gentleman cites is at all applicable to the case before us. The contention of the hon. member for North Simcoe is that many sections of this Bill are ultra vires, and therefore not amendable. His motion is not such as might be made in committee. There you discuss the clauses of the Bill for a very different purpose. The hon. member refers to the different clauses for the purpose of showing that this Bill, in many of its features is ultra vires, not for the purpose of discussing the merits of the Bill in the ordinary sense, or for the purpose of amending those clauses, because, when that is the case, the question of jurisdiction does not arise. This is a discussion of a wholly different character. It has reference to the validity of the whole measure, and the references of the hon. member to the clauses are for the purpose of showing that the measure ought to be referred to the Supreme Court for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the court on that question.

Mr. MULOCK. The ruling cited by the hon. member for Pictou is to the effect that we cannot at this date do what may be done in committee. If the objection of the hon. member for North Simcoe is well taken, namely, that this whole Bill is ultra vires of the powers of this House, inasmuch as it does not comply with the law, then nothing that can be done in the committee can make it good, so that the point taken by the hon. member for Pictou cannot possibly apply.

Mr. LISTER. The objection taken by the hon. member for Pictou applies to Bills which there is no doubt of the power of Parliament to pass. But the Bill now under consideration is one which there is serious doubt of the power of this Parliament to pass. The Bill under consideration is a Bill founded on the remedial order. The Bill under consideration was introduced into this Parliament under special statutory conditions, and it is contended by those who oppose the Bill that these statutory conditions are not exactly complied with, so far as this legislation is concerned. If there had been no remedial order at all, I suppose it could not be argued that this Parliament had power to pass the Bill. The remedial order was issued specifying particular terms upon which the Manitoba legislature are to enact the law they are ordered to enact. It is alleged that the Bill before us varies from the remedial order in certain respects, and is therefore ultra vires of this Parliament. The hon. gentleman who moved the amendment should be allowed to show wherein this Parliament has no jurisdiction, because if it has not, then there is no use of our going into committee at all. We could not in committee amend the Bill so as to give us jurisdiction, because our jurisdiction is based on the terms of the remedial order and the Manitoba Act. The rule my hon. friend cites applies to Bills over which this Parliament has complete control. This is not that case at all, because, if the argument of my hon. friend be correct, then this Parliament has no power whatever to pass this measure.

Mr. DICKEY. I can see no reason why the rules established for the proper course of Bills through the House should not apply to the question of jurisdiction as well as any other. I was struck with that feature of the hon. gentleman's amendment, but did not wish to raise any point of order, because it was better, of course, to have before the House all the questions which are likely to arise, so as to have time to consider them. But as the hon. gentleman is going on, it is likely to lead to a good deal of discussion and detail. There seems to be no doubt that the motion to refer the question to a court is quite in order at this stage, and the difficulty arises from the fact that the motion in your hands, Sir, it seems to call for a discussion into details. It is a mistake to say that these clauses, if they are ultra vires cannot be dealt with in committee. The committee can strike out the clauses if they are ultra vires. The hon. gentleman's motion is not to declare that the Bill is ultra vires, but to point out that particular clauses go beyond our power. The House has adopted the principle of the Bill, and the proposition before us is that, in certain respects, it is ultra vires ; and if we are to go through each section carefully and see exactly in what it differs from the law, it will provoke a long discussion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The statement of the Minister of Justice, occurred to me that these clauses, if not wide enough or too wide, should be amended in committee, but I understand there is another question raised by the hon. member for Simcoe, and that is as to whether the Bill is wide enough to cover the order which was sent to the local legislature of Manitoba, and that if not wide enough, if not in accord with the terms of the remedial order, we have no power to pass it at all, because the government of Manitoba have not been required to do what this Bill proposes to do. That is the question which puzzles me with regard to the question under discussion. It seems to me obvious, from all I have been able to see with regard to this particular stage of proceedings on Bills, that it is manifestly not in accord with the practice either of England or this country, that Bills should be discussed in detail except in committee.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not going to do that.

Mr. SPEAKER. If there were no other question except as to whether these clauses were wide enough or too wide, they could be amended in committee; but the other point has been raised, that Manitoba had not had the opportuinty of dealing with the subject in the form in which it has been introduced into this Parliament.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the Government will say that they will withdraw the clauses that are in excess of the law, I will accept that and abandon that part of my motion. If they will not, I have to point out that the clauses do exist, and I am afraid their Bill would be an abortive attempt to legislate on school matters.

Mr. MULOCK. In committee you could not discuss more than one clause at a time.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will not necessarily take up the time of the House by reading these clauses. It may be sufficient if I just refer to them and state shortly their substance. I mean the clauses which are new and in excess of the old Manitoba school law. Now, the 17th section is new altogether. It is not to be found on the old law. The following also are new. The 23rd section with its seven subsections occupying more than two and a half pages of the Bill, the 24th section with its nine subsections—another two and a half pages of the Bill; the 28th section, the 29th section, the 30th section, the 31st section, subsection L of the 37th section——

Mr. DICKEY. May I ask the hon. gentleman with what law he is comparing it?

Mr. McCARTHY. With the old school law.

Mr. DICKEY. When was that?

Mr. McCARTHY. The last was 1884, the consolidated school law of 1884. The 54th section, with its subsections a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i and j is all new. The 63rd section is new, also the 64th section, the 68th section, the 74th section, the 75th section, and all its subsections; the 76th section, the 77th section, the 78th section, the 83rd section, the 84th section— or rather subsection 3 of section 84—the 90th section, the 93rd section, the 94th section, and the 96th section—which is a very long one, comprising 13 subsections—the 97th section, the 98th section, the 110th section. Now, it is quite obvious that if all these were taken out this Bill would be much reduced in magnitude. And a little later on I shall ask the hon. Minister of Justice under what authority this Parliament is endowed with legislative powers to pass a school law for the province of Manitoba.

Mr. MARTIN. Do I understand that these clauses are all new and not contained in the Act of 1890?

Mr. McCARTHY. They are not contained in the Act prior to the Act of 1890.

Mr. DICKEY. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McCARTHY. I may be mistaken, but I have the Act here and I have gone over it. If I am wrong, I shall be obliged to the hon. Minister if he will show in what respect I am mistaken.

Mr. DICKEY. What do you take it from? There are Acts in 1888 and 1887.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; but they are not nearly as full as the Act of 1890 from which I think most of yours were taken.

Mr. DICKEY. No; ours are all taken from the old Act. I admit there are additions.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not all taken from the old Act.

Mr. DICKEY. The clauses you have read are taken verbatim et literatim from the old law.

Mr. McCARTHY. Which clauses?

Mr. DICKEY. The clauses you refer to, but there are substantial additions quite enough on which to raise the point the hon. gentleman is raising.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is sufficient, I think, to establish the facts upon which the first two clauses of the amendment are based. Now there is no doubt that this statute does violate the principle which is referred to in the next clause of the amendment. It assumes to delegate the power vested in the provincial legislature of levying a direct tax within the province. This is done by the clause which authorizes the municipal council, upon the requisition of the school trustees, to levy a tax. Then by another clause it frees or purports to free the Roman Catholic supporters of the separate schools from the payment of the public school tax which is enjoined by the public school Act of 1890. And it professes to vest in the Governor General in Council the authority pertaining to the Lieutenant-Governor in whom the executive government and authority of the province is vested. This is done, I think, in two places. I do not know that I can name the second, but it is done in the early part of the Bill where it is provided that:

> If the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not within three months after the coming into force of this Act make appointments to the separate school board, or if the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not fill any vacancy that may from any cause occur in the separate school > board within three months after the occurrence of such vacancy, then in either such case His Excellency the Governor General shall make any appointment not made by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council.

So it purports to assume that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council will not do his duty and transfers the authority to the Governor General. This is done also I think in reference to the borrowing power. Then the last clause of the Act says :

> Power is hereby reserved to the Parliament of Canada to make such further and other remedial laws as the provisions of the said section twenty-two of chapter three of the statutes of 1870, and of the decision of the Governor in Council thereunder may require.

And lastly there is a very important question as to whether this Act so far as we are concerned, will be final, or whether we shall have power afterwards to repeal or amend it. Now, having said so much upon the facts, let me address a very short argument to the House upon the soundness, or the propriety, at all events, of the view for which I am contending. It will be remembered that the late Sir John Thompson, in a discussion which took place in 1893, justified the reference to the Supreme Court under Mr. Blake's Act. And I would invite the attention of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House to the arguments of Sir John Thompson on that occasion. The hon. and learned gentleman said :

> I desire now, at the risk of wearying the House a little, to call attention to what was done here upon that subject in the year 1890. The existence of this very Manitoba difficulty, this very stage of it, was brought to the notice of the House by the Hon. Mr. Blake, and he moved a resolution which, in 1891, after he had left, was embodied in a statute, enabling us to refer such questions as this to the determination of the court. Let me read a few of the remarks of Mr. Blake with regard to that subject, because they are as cogent and as pertinent to this very case as if they were uttered upon this floor this very night. I read this first passage to show that Mr. Blake had in his mind this very difficulty in regard to Manitoba, and that he put it forward as one of the reasons for adopting the resolution which he had moved :

Then he goes on to quote Mr. Blake, as follows :—

> I would say that recent current and impending events have combined to convince me that it is important in the public interest that this proposition should receive attention during this session.

After further quotations he continued :

> I commend that to the consideration of those gentlemen on both sides of this question who undertake to say we have usurped judicial power—an unwarrantable conclusion, as I shall ask the House to declare, on the report upon which that criticism is founded, one that was not sanctioned in 1890, when Mr. Blake used almost the same language contained in the report that in coming to a judgment upon this question we were to a certain extent " entering upon the judicial department, but not upon the domain of the judicial power."

Then, having quoted at great length from Mr. Blake the Hon. gentleman went on :

> Not to weary the House too much, I forbear to read from that report a great deal more in the same line, establishing in the first place that, in dealing with questions of this character—and hon. gentlemen will see, if they read that speech, many other passages which I have marked, that the argument of Mr. Blake is quite as applicable to what should be done with regard to an appeal as with regard to questions of ultra vires or intra vires, and that, not only is his principle applicable to the second class of questions, as well as to the first, but his express language and argument apply more to the solution of questions arising with regard to the determination of the rights of minorities asserted on appeal, than to the mere decision of whether the statute is ultra vires or intra vires. Sir, that resolution was accepted by the leader of the House, Sir John A. Macdonald, in the spirit in which it was put forward by Mr. Blake, and Sir John took pains to declare that, while the terms of that resolution, taken alone, might seem to be ambiguous, he accepted it in the sense in which it was put forward in the lucid argument by which Mr. Blake had supported it in the House ; and he expressed the hope, that in subsequently framing a statute we would be guided by the argument which Mr. Blake had advanced, as well as by the words of his resolution. * * * *
> Surely the functions which devolve on His Excellency under this clause of the constitution are not only peculiar to this constitution, not only exceedingly difficult and delicate to exercise, but they are different from any other functions given to the executive by the terms of the British North America Act. In the opinion of His Excellency's advisers the application is not to be dealt with at present as a matter of political character or involving political action on the part of His advisers. That has been put forward, and is put forward in this resolution, as showing that we are endeavouring to free from political responsibility the executive who should be responsible in regard to what advice we may give. * * * Why, Sir, a politician advising His Excellency in ordinary matters is bound to give his personal predilections weight ; is bound to give his personal and private opinions for the benefit of his colleagues and for the benefit of His Excellency. He is bound to do what is best for the interests of the country as a whole. He is bound to consult the welfare of the majority, if the interests of the majority and the minority cannot be reconciled. * * * * *
> We submitted the question of the rights of the parties to the courts first, and acted on the decision which we procured from the courts. I admit, Sir, that with regard even to that question that we were subject to ministerial responsibility, and that it was the perfect right of any member of this House, while that case was in progress, to move a resolution declaring that we should not submit it to the courts, or declaring, after it came from the courts, that we should have evaded the instructions of the courts, or acted on the authority which the courts said we had. Therefore, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, I disclaim in the strongest manner any attempt to evade ministerial responsibility, and I again assert that the criticism which is contained in this resolution and which is made elsewhere, is a criticism which carves words and > splits hairs, and that the metaphor which we did use, and which related to a judicial rather than a political subject, was fully justified by the language used in this House in 1890, when the principle on which we were acting was adopted.

And the result was that he justified the propriety of submitting the question, and the common sense and the practice cannot be well doubted, to ascertain whether they had power to pass the remedial law before passing it, instead of passing it haphazard, involving the parties interested in the province with regard to which it was to be passed, in all the litigation which would necessarily follow its adoption. Now, Sir, we are coming under a very peculiar and a wholly new jurisdiction, new not merely here, but absolutely new everywhere. As was pointed out by the Lord Chancellor in the discussion of the Brophy case, this legislation is unique, in no other place is there anything like it to be found. And what is our power ? The Governor General in Council, having made his decision, then, and only so far as the circumstances of the case may require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of any decision. The Governor General in Council has directed certain things to be done by the province, which the province has not done, and we are authorized to pass such laws as will duly execute that order. What we are doing is not executing the order in full, in spirit, or in fact, but what we are doing, and what we are proposing to do, is to embody a lot of laws, a code of laws, with regard to education, which the province was not directed to restore, and as to which there was no complaint on behalf of the minority. Now, is it possible to imagine that that law can be good ? Is it possible to imagine, under the limited jurisdiction this Parliament has, which is merely to execute the order of the Governor General, which goes far in excess of anything that the minority ask for, or that the Governor in Council thought fit to direct—which possibly he might have done upon his own motion, if he had thought fit—that that law can be a good law, or that that law can be one which the inhabitants of the province can be forced to obey ? Now, as to the question of taxation, because, without the taxing power this attempted legislation would, of course, be wholly abortive. It has been pointed out that without a legislative school grant, which the hon. gentlemen have not thought fit to interfere with, except by an empty declaration, the schools will be practically starved, and cannot be made effective. But the Bill does not purport to vest in certain local authorities the power to levy a rate for the purpose of carrying on the schools. Now, it has been decided in the courts in more than one case that the authority to levy a tax, vested in our municipalities and in our school trustees, is a delegated power, dependent on the legislative grant of the provincial authorities. We have no right here to pass a law for the purpose of raising funds for the schools in any province, that is a matter wholly within the jurisdiction of a province. But you have assumed here to exercise the power of the province, and to delegate to the local authorities, municipal or otherwise, the power to make assessments, and to levy this tax. What is the power to tax, and where is it to be found ? It will be found in the 92nd clause of the British North America Act, adopted in the Manitoba constitution, and is to this effect :

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinbefore enumerated, that is to say.

So the province may exclusively execute and make laws for direct taxation, and for the purpose of raising revenue for certain provincial purposes. It is under that power that the provincial authorities delegate to municipalities and school trustees power to make assessments and levy rates. Our power of appeal comes from a different section of the Manitoba Act, namely, section 22, which has special reference to education. So we first find that there are two concurrent powers given to the province. One is to levy direct taxes for the purpose of revenue ; the other is to pass laws respecting education. With regard to the laws passed respecting education an appeal will lie, but an appeal is not permitted with respect to the other powers and authority vested in the municipalities. It is necessary for my purpose to ask the House to agree in the conclusion at which I have arrived, and which I now press. What I ask the House to consider with me in this : is it wise, is it prudent, is it proper, or is it not the act of madmen to pass such a law as this in our hurry, with all these legal difficulties bristling in the way, when by the judgment of the Supreme Court we can ascertain whether we are passing a constitutional and valid law. If it were wise and prudent to ascertain whether the Governor General in Council had power to make a remedial order, surely it is still more important to ascertain whether we have power to pass this proposed law which we are asked to pass, involving as it does anomalies and difficulties. The same argument applies to the next objection, which appears to be fatal to the constitutionality of this Act. The province is required to provide for the support of its schools, and for that purpose all the inhabitants shall be taxed. We now propose to step in and say that a certain proportion shall be absolved from the payment of taxes. The consequence is that an additional burden will be added to a certain section of the people. Again, a Bill such as this, dealing with the question of taxation, is one that should originate in Committee of the Whole. That question may, perhaps, have to be determined before we get very much further, but it is clear that any law proposing to exempt as well as impose a tax or burden is a law which must be made in committee of the whole House. If this law is one of that character it is clear and plain that it deals with the question of taxation and imposes an additional burden on those left to support separate schools by the withdrawal of those who are in favour of separate schools under the provision of the statute. But as regards the peace of the country, I attach more importance to the proposed interference with the executive power of the Lieutnant-Governor in Council. The executive power of the province is to be found in clause 58 of the British North America Act. Then we have a general clause that the provisions of the Act which apply to the Governor General shall be applicable to the Lieutenant-Governor. The executive power of the Governor in Council is to be found in clause 9. The Bill is based on the assumption that it is within the jurisdiction of Parliament and that, when passed, we shall be able to disregard the Lieutenant-Governor and the jurisdiction of the provincial authority will be transferred to the Governor General in Council here. Is it possible for us to abrogate and disregard and tear up the British North America Act with respect to executive powers which are vested exclusively in the provinces ? Is such legislation likely to add to the harmony which should prevail between the Dominion and the provinces ? I venture to think, notwithstanding the argument of the Minister of Justice, which after all was more a statement than an argument, the execution of this power is provided by the Act. We are at liberty to pass a Bill so far as it is necessary to carry out the decision of the Governor in Council. But why and under what pretense can we arrogate to ourselves jurisdiction to interfere in this matter again ? Here is a complaint made about a certain so-called grievance. The Governor in Council has entertained the complaint and has adjudicated upon it. He has ordered the restoration of the schools, the abolition of which formed the ground of complaint. We are authorized under these circumstances to carry out that order. When we have duly executed it, has not our function ended ? Under what pretense can we reserve power to deal with and interfere with the Manitoba legislature hereafter ? The province is not deprived of the right to legislate on education. Under the circumstances has the province lost its rights or has it vested them in this Parliament, not merely for the occasion but for all time concurrent jurisdiction on the question of education. I have never heard any lawyer say that that is so, and in the minute that was made by the Council, they drew attention to the fact that that point had been made before them, and they rather lent the weight of their authority to the sufficiency of the point—the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Justice being one of the Council. That was either an empty threat or it was the honest conviction of the Council at the time, that that order was passed.

Mr. POWELL. Do you argue that that clause is merely a nullity, or that it has the effect of making invalid the other portions of the Act ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am only arguing that we cannot do it.

Mr. POWELL. Then it would simply be a nullity.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. It would not affect the other portions of the Act ?

Mr. McCARTHY. It would not affect anything at all.

Mr. POWELL. It is perfectly harmless.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, but some hon. gentlemen are legislating with a view that we can come back and legislate again and it is well to know whether we have the power to create that jurisdiction. But, the more important one of all, and I attach great weight to this consideration. From the first time I have given this Act some little attention—I cannot say the same of all the opinions I originally formed, but there is great difficulty about it, and I would not like to feel bound to earlier opinions in every respect that I expressed—from the first, it has appeared to me, so far as this Bill is concerned, that we have no more power to repeal than we have to amend. We are executing the Governor's order and the passage of this Act is the execution of this order, like the execution of a judgment.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is a provincial law, after it is done.

Mr. McCARTHY. After it is done it is a provincial law which is in force only in that province.

Mr. MULOCK. It is liable to be repealed by them ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Possibly. I had originally thought it was beyond their power to repeal it, but I cannot say I am of the same conviction now. It is a difficult matter, and there is a good deal to be said on both sides. However that may be, there is, in my judgment, certainly no power on the body who are authorized to execute a certain order by passing this Bill, to repeal that, and to nullify the Governor General's order. The Governor General has thought there are grievances which ought to be remedied. He has no power to legislate, but the jurisdiction is vested in this Parliament to execute the order which the Governor General has made. Where do we find the right to intervene in that order, and without the ground-work which originally gave the jurisdiction to repeal, amend, or interfere.

Mr. GRANDBOIS. You could complain again.

Mr. McCARTHY. Undoubtedly they could commence all over again.

Mr. GRANDBOIS. We would be safe, then.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am only speaking on the legal point. I say there is no authority, so far as I can understand, to reserve the right to interfere ; with or without that, to interfere by repeal, or by amending it, or in any other way.

These are seven matters which have occurred to me, all of them difficult, I venture to say, and none of them without strong ground in support of them. I venture to say that there is not a lawyer in this House, the Minister of Justice down, who will say that these are not questions of difficulty, and questions that are likely to create doubt, and questions that are certain to involve the province—if this law is ever passed—in a sea of litigation. I appeal to the House whether, under such circumstances, it would not be madness to pass a law of that character.

Mr. HAGGART. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question. Suppose the committee of the House amends any of these clauses in any direction they like, and if doubts arise as to the constitutionality of that, would you re-submit it again to the courts ?

Mr. McCARTHY. What I am desirous of is not submitting clauses, but principles.

Mr. HAGGART. And suppose they amend it in the direction of a principle ?

Mr. McCARTHY. If it is a matter of principle, I think it would be better submitted, but that, of course, would be a point of discretion or judgment. What we are dealing with now is the condition this Act has reached at this stage. This House has arrived at the conclusion that the principle of this Act is one which commends itself to the judgment of the majority of this House.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. That should settle it.

Mr. McCARTHY. On what point ?

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. Because the majority says so.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, but the majority are not done with it.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. But you say the majority must rule.

Mr. McCARTHY. Do you say the minority have no rights? Now, Sir, I desire to say a few words on the general question. The Minister who leads the House in his address, made two statements with regard to myself which I thought I ought to take notice of, for the purpose simply of telling that hon. gentleman and the House, that the hon. gentleman was misinformed, and that his statements were absolutely and wholly incorrect. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is well known, of course, to have a lively and vigorous imagination, and perhaps that is so well known that his statements do not stand in need of contradiction. Like the slanders of some persons, his statements are not of sufficient importance to require refutation. But I know the use that might be made of my silence, and, therefore, I desire to say here, that when the hon. gentleman stated to the House that I had said the French were the curse of Canada, he stated what was absolutely incorrect. I never uttered any such language, and when that hon. gentleman again refers to it, I would be very glad, indeed, if he would point out on what authority he made that statement. He also said, in equally strong terms, that I abused the Roman Catholic religion. Now, Sir, that hon. gentleman has been some years out of the country. I suppose he speaks on some kind of information, for it is harly credible to think that he would make these broad charges wholly out of his imagination. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman is again absolutely misinformed. On the contrary, whenever I go into a constituency, the followers of that hon. gentleman hound me about from place to place because, as it happens, I have a Roman Catholic daughter living in my house, and I am abused by such gentlemen as the hon. gentleman from Gananoque and others of that ilk all over the country on account of that fact. Then, Sir, when I come to this House I am to be told the same thing by the hon. gentleman who leads this House, who certainly now ought to have some little regard to fact, and who ought not to be allowed to make these wild statements without any foundation whatever. I have been very careful. I have never disguised, and do not disguise now, that I think the perpetuation of the dual language in our Territories is a grave mistake ; and I have pledged myself before, and I intend to adhere to that pledge, that so far as Manitoba and the new territories are concerned, I will do everything I can to prevent the spread of the dual language or the creation of a French nationality, or a German nationality, or any other except the Canadian nationality. But, Sir, the man who says that I ever said a disrespectful word of the religion of any of my fellow-subjects is saying something for which there is not the slightest foundation. I never said of them even that I had not confidence in the breed. I am just as free, as the hon. gentleman who leads the House, perhaps a little more so, of any ground of imputation on that score. Perhaps the most important contribution to the debate was made by the hon. member for Montreal West, and I desire to say a few words with regard to that, as some misapprehension I think is likely to be created by the statement——

Mr. DICKEY. I would like to rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is, I understand, discussing a past debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. The objection does not apply to a stage of a Bill. If the hon. member proposes to refer to a discussion which has taken place on this Bill at a former stage, he would of course be entirely in order.

Mr. McCARTHY. It would be a great thing, Sir, if the gentlemen on the treasury benches could be sent a little while to school to learn the rules of order, because I think since I commenced this short address to the House, these gentlemen have been rasing points of order on every one of which they have been out of order. They seem to have forgotten, if they ever knew, what the rules of order are. Now, Sir, what I desire to refer to is the statement of fact made by the hon. member for Montreal West. It will be found, on an examination of the authority given to that hon. gentleman, that he was only to negotiate—that he was not authorized to conclude any arrangement or treaty with the parties whom he was delegated to visit. I do not think there is a word in the hon. gentleman's statement to the contrary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend is referring to his visit of 1870, I suppose ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, the original visit. The Governor General in the correspondence that passed between him and the home authorities, drew attention to the fact that the hon. member for Montreal West and those who were sent with him, were authorized to negotiate, and not to make any arrangement or any treaty. It will appear in the history of the event that he did visit the body of delegates—I think there was twenty-four assembled as a council at that time—and that he pointed out to them that Canada was prepared to respect them, and deal with them on fair and generous terms. The result of that negotiation was, not that he made any arrangement or concluded any terms, but that the people themselves prepared a bill of rights in which they set forth the terms under which they desired to be admitted into confederation. This is what is known as the third bill of rights. It was given to the delegates, and they were officially instructed in regard to its demands. As to some, they were authorized to treat ; as to others, they were told they had no authority to abandon them, but they must stand by them. Three delegates, Father Richot, Mr. Scott, and Judge Black, were despatched to Ottawa, with this bill of rights, for the purpose of treating for the admission of the Red River settlement into the Dominion ; and, as it was known and perfectly clearly stated, and as the hon. member for Montreal West has reiterated here, they never thought or dreamed about separate schools ; I suppose they had never heard about separate schools. Nothing was ever said about separate schools. But what the hon. gentleman says is that they understood that the grants which they had been getting from time to time as donations from the Hudson Bay Company, the body that had authority in that part of Rupert's Land—that those grants, which they were getting, not as a matter of law, but as a matter of grace——

Mr. DUPONT. Practice.

Mr. McCARTHY. Practice, if you like, just as any wealthy citizen might have contributed to the support of the schools, would be continued. All I can say of that is that the hon. member made no such report on his return. There is not a word in his evidence, so fas as I can find, in support of any such contention. The reason he gives for adopting that conclusion is that afterwards, in 1871, the legislature of the new province did adopt a separate school law. Now, the two positions are inconsistent. It might have been, as the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) suggested a moment ago—and that question was before the Privy Council—that the existence of that grant might be called a privilege of some kind. That fact was before the Privy Council in the Barrett case, and duly considered, and whatever weight was due to it was given in the judgment.

Mr. POWELL. Article 9 says—that is the bill of rights—while the North-west Territories remains a territory, the sum of $25,000 a year to be appropriated to schools, roads and bridges.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is a matter with which the Dominion had never interfered. It would have been utterly impossible for the Dominion to grant to the province, without creating jealousies all round, a sum of money for the support of its schools. That is a clause which you will find was not acceded to on the part of the Dominion, and for which there was no doubt given some substitute acceptable to the delegates, because they went home quite satisfied. It would have been extraordinary if we had found these delegates surrendered their rights with regard to education. They had unlimited power at the time. They were free as air at that time. If that province had been created as any other province had been, such as British Columbia, a Crown colony, it would have been vested with absolute and complete legislative powers. What has happened is that part of that power has been taken from it under the scheme of confederation. Instead of being, as they were before confederation, and as they would have been if they had not come into confederation, free to make just such a school law as they pleased and to amend it, just as the other provinces were prior to confederation, with the exception of Ontario, they would have been asking that their rights over the schools should be taken away and that the control should be given to a paramount body, namely, to the legislature here. The reason that education was limited at all in the scheme of confederation arose from the peculiar position of Upper and Lower Canada. New Brunswick did not ask, or Nova Scotia, or Prince Edward Island, and of Newfoundland, as the hon. Secretary of State says, and no doubt correctly, was represented, they did not ask that their local authority over education should be limited or transferred to the central power. The peculiar circumstances existing in Upper and Lower Canada at the time of confederation, when it must be remembered that the two older provinces were in fact one, with legislative union, in each of which old provinces the Protestants were relying upon the assistance of their brethern in the Upper province and the Catholics were relying on the assistance of their brethern in the lower provinces, by which the Catholics in the upper province had actually been able to enforce a system of separate schools against the wish of the majority,—these peculiar circumstances made it, in the judgment of those who were interested at the time, necessary or, at all events, advisable, that they should stipulate for some meed of protection when the partnership was to be dissolved, and they were created separate provinces. That scheme was in the first place, carried out by D'Arcy McGee's amendment, and for a long time it was thought sufficient by simply enacting that the laws as they stood at the time of confederation should be unrepealable and be saved from the rights of the provinces in other respects. Now, no such provision applied at all in the case of the North-west or its settlers. They had not any disputes between Protestants and Catholics. The Catholics had gone to their own schools, the Church of England had private schools, so had the Presbyterians, and so had the Methodists a short time before the union; but these were separate private schools, maintained by fees and subscriptions, in no sense state schools, and there was no sign of any of the jealousies or difficulties among the inhabitants there, or anything to suggest the necessity or the advisability of any control with regard to one set of schools or the other. Well, that being so, it is perfectly plain that when these school provisions were inserted here, they were inserted to carry out, so far as the new provinces are concerned, the general scheme, the general good, with such a variation as made it equal, so far as new provinces are concerned, with the position in which the old provinces were; and whether that was suggested by the late Sir George E. Cartier or by whom we do not know: the Bill was introduced as a Government measure with these clauses in it; and I suppose if you were going to frame an Act for the admission of any other province, in all probability the draughtsman of that Act would commence by adopting the clauses relating to education found in the British North America Act, with such variations as made them equivalent in the new province to the position in which the old provinces stood. That is probably the reason why they were found here. We have therefore to look at them simply for the words they contain, and I venture to say that upon careful perusal of the speech of the hon. member for Montreal West, it will not be found that he carried the case in favour of separate schools any further than it is carried by the terms of the Act. I therefore move in amendment:

That all the words after "That," in the motion, be struck out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—before proceeding further with the consideration of the Bill intituled "The Remedial Act (Manitoba)," that the important and difficult questions of law arising in relation thereto should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for its opinion, among which questions are as follows:—

1. Whether the said Bill is constitutional and within the powers of Parliament to enact by reason of the fact that it fails to carry the Remedial order into effect to the full extent of the said order?
2. And inasmuch as it exceeds the requirements of the said order?
3. Assumes to delegate the power vested in the provincial legislature to levy a direct tax within the province?
4. Purports to interfere with the law of the province which enjoins the payment of taxes in support of the public schools?
5. Proposes to vest in the Governor General in Council the authority appertaining to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province, in whom the executive government and authority in the province is vested by the Manitoba Act?
6. Whether this Parliament in passing a law for the due execution of the Educational Code of the said Act has power to reserve to itself the authority to further legislate respecting the matter?—and
7. Whether any Act which this Parliament may pass is irrevocable, amendable or repealable by it?

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House at any length on this matter. One of the difficulties in connection with the motion of the hon. gentleman is that, whether it be in order or not—and I admit that your ruling on that point is correct—it involves for its complete discussion a consideration of the details of the Bill. I could not undertake to discuss to-night the various interesting points that were raised by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) for the reason that to discuss them properly it would be necessary to take up the very verbiage of each particular section and compare it with previous legislation. That task, of course, I am obliged to be ready to perform when these particular sections come up, but I could not at this stage undertake anything like a thorough discussion of the various points. It is impossible for me to say that there is nothing in the points that have been raised, when the matter is brought before the House by a lawyer of such high position as the hon. member for North Simcoe. But I must say that I would be less influenced by the hon. member for North Simcoe upon any legal matter in connection with the Manitoba school question than I would upon any subject under the sun, because I think the mind of the hon. gentleman is not in that impartial and fairly-balanced state with regard to this particular question, which has been agitating him for some years, as to make his opinions in that connection as valuable as they would be upon other questions. At the same time, even with that limitation, I am bound to say he has raised some very important questions. None of them, however, are new, and as to a good many of them, in my opinion, he is entirely wrong in his facts. The legislation is not beyond the remedial order to the extent he seems to suppose, nor is it less than the remdial order to the extent he seems to suppose, though I admit, on the matter of principle, that the degree of the variation from the remedial order is not material. The real point here, it seems to me, is whether or not, there being admitted differences in this Bill, their being doubts as to the constitutionality of some provisions, it is advisable at this stage to refer this Bill to the Supreme Court as proposed in this motion. It seems to me that this reference would not be advisable. The only case I remember of an Act going before the court, is a Bill which bore the name of the member for Simcoe, the McCarthy Act. I do not know under what circumstances the Bill went there.

Mr. McCARTHY. Under the provisions in the Act itself.

Mr. DICKEY. That is the only precedent I know of. But with regard to this particular question, we have already referred the preliminaries of it to the courts, and it has been very thoroughly discussed, although I admit that the section under which we are acting is not only new but it is difficult. We have more light upon it than is usually the case in dealing with legislation. We have laid down by the Privy Council of England the principles by which this House should be guided in this legislation. If the hon. gentleman submitted his questions here, he would only get certain principles laid down, and I think that the principles laid down by the Privy Council at the close of its judgment in the reference under the Act of 1891, are pretty fairly definite as general guides. If we cannot take those principles and frame a Bill that is reasonably certain to have the support of the Privy Council, it seems to me that this House would not be competent to deal with any subject at all, and that in every Bill that came after, we would be confronted with this alternative of transferring our functions from this House to the courts. I admit entirely the reasoning which the late Sir John Thompson used in his speech in 1893, and the force of it ; but it seems to me that that is an argument which does not apply at this stage of this Bill, when we have already taken the opinion of the courts with regard to our powers in the matter. The Privy Council of England would certainly complain, and fairly complain, if, after we have taken their opinion on this matter, after they had given that opinion, and had expressed it so clearly and so fully as to have been somewhat reproached for going so far, after they have taken the trouble to lay down the lines on which legislation should proceed, it seems to me they would fairly complain if we were to send to them a Bill which it was proposed to pass in this House, and to take their opinion upon its details. The motion, moreover, as coming from the hon. member for North Simcoe, is objectionable, I think, because I am quite satisfied that no hon. gentleman should propose and no hon. gentleman should support the reference of any question from this House to the courts of justice, unless he is prepared to accept the decision and act upon the decision of the courts when that is rendered. The hon. gentleman from North Simcoe is an out and out opponent of this Bill upon principle. In the opinion of the majority of the members of this House, the hon. member for North Simcoe has alredy received the opinion of the Privy Council that any legislation upon these lines should be proceeded with, and the hon. gentleman has negatived that opinion, both by his voice and by his vote. Therefore I say that this motion certainly should come from some other member than the member for North Simcoe, it should come from some person who wishes to improve the legislation and not to destroy it. The member for North Simcoe, who is the greatest enemy that remedial legislation has, will perhaps excuse the friends of remedial legislation for declining to accept his care of the interests of remedial legislation, and I think he will excuse them if they trust themselves to more friendly hands. I think it is not unfair, in view of the attitude of the member for North Simcoe to this legislation, to say that this motion is not made in a friendly spirit to the legislation that is before the House ; and if anything were needed to show that completely, it is the fact that this resolution which the hon. gentleman proposes is entirely unnecessary. This resolution, if it were carried, would postpone this Bill over this Parliament ; it would answer the same purpose in another way of the six months' hoist which was voted on yesterday. The hon. member from North Simcoe knows as well as I do, that under the Act of 1891 this Government has the power, after the Act has passed the House, and is in a complete state, to refer it to the courts to get the opinion of the courts upon it, if it should desire to do so ; and I think that in that state of the law, the hon. member from North Simcoe will have a hard task to persuade this House that it should take, not a completed Act, but an imperfect Bill, which may be amended in committee of the whole, in a direction which no hon. gentleman here can foretell—the hon. gentleman will have a difficult task to persuade this House that it would be wise or that it would be statesmanlike, as he has referred to the course of the Government, to kill this measure for this Parliament, for the sake of getting an opinion which they can get better on a completed Act, if it is passed by this Parliament. I think, Sir, that for these reasons the House will hesitate before they adopt the motion of the hon. member for North Simcoe. It is, as I have said, premature ; it is moved on an incomplete Bill as to which the final state cannot possibly be foretold. At this stage, the object of the hon. gentleman would be served, if he wished to improve this legislation, by going into committee on the Bill, discussing frankly these constitutional difficulties as they arose upon the several clauses, and then, after the Bill is completed, moving an instruction to this Government to refer the complete Bill to the courts for their consideration and opinion. At the present stage, I sincerely hope the House will reject the amendment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has certainly not contributed very much in the way of argument against my hon. friend's motion, but he has supplied a most admirable argument against the proposition made by the leader of the House that we should proceed to discuss this difficult and intricate question at three o'clock in the morning. Now, I may just observe for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, that if they choose to proceed with this matter, we will have of course at our discretion, and we will use the discretion freely, the right of reviewing the debate which has lasted for some three weeks ; and I have not the slightest doubt that a considerable amount of time can be profitably spent in exposing the hypocrisy and inconsistencies of the hon. Secretary of State and of other gentlemen who have supported him. One thing tolerably clear, and that is that no more impudent absurdity was ever proposed by any Government than a proposition to treat with the government of Manitoba and hold a conference with them, while they go on with the details of this measure in committee. If they had any honest desire whatever to treat with the government of Manitoba, they would at once suspend consideration of this measure until such time as they had that conference, and were able to come to this House with reasonable ground for supposing that they could effect a settlement with the government of Manitoba.

The hon. member for Montreal West, notwithstanding, I have not the faintest idea that the Government have any hope of making a definite and amicable arrangement with Manitoba. The conduct of the Government throughout shows that they have no desire to enter into an arrangement with, or to conciliate that Government. What hon. gentlemen opposite are now doing is entirely in deference to public opinion ; this is an attempt to get a few members of their party to support the Government under circumstances which will lead to the certain destruction of those hon. gentlemen's political lives. However, that is their own affair. In the present instance, we are not going to spend our time in needless discussion of this matter. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it is reasonable that the House should now adjourn. We have made certain progress in the debate, and have regained the time that hon. gentlemen opposite chose to waste in needless obstruction to-day.

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to a point of order. I ask whether it is in order for the hon. gentleman to allude to the conduct of hon. members in this House as needless obstruction.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think that the Secretary of State is out of order in saying there was obstruction.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I now proceed to say that the intention of the Government was to ask the House to adjourn at six o'clock, and had reasonable progress been made with this debate—and hon. gentlemen know that if we are to succeed in passing this Bill into law it is absolutely necessary to take up the subject seriously and go into committee and pass the Bill through committee—that course would have been followed. Hon. gentlemen are aware that at this period of the session, with the probability of such an early termination of it, it is absolutely a waste of time to discuss the subject unless it is done seriously. As hon. gentlemen opposite chose to spend the afternoon fruitlessly, the Government had no alternative but to ask the continuation of the debate until this late hour. We have made very substantial progress I am glad to know by hearing the speech made on the amendment, and I now suggest that the motion for the adjournment of the House be allowed tc pass.

Mr. LISTER. I desire to resent the statement made by the Secreatry of State that there was any desire on the part of any gentleman on this side of the House unnecessarily to prolong the debate which closed last night. As a matter of fact more hon. members opposite spoke than did hon. members on this side of the House, and further the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite occupy more pages of "Hansard."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I made no reference to last night's debate.

Mr. LISTER. I beg your pardon.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2.55 a.m. (Saturday.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 23rd March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Report of the Secretary of State of Canada, for the year ended 31st December, 1895.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION—NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE MANITOBA GOVERNMENT.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I apprehend that the House is anxious to know from the leader of the House whether there is any truth in the rumour that a commission has been appointed to proceed to Winnipeg to confer with the Manitoba government in reference to the school question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that a delegation has been appointed, consisting of the hon. Minister of Justice, the hon. Minister of Militia and the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), and that they proceed to-day to Winnipeg for the purpose of opening negotiations with the government of Manitoba, who have, as the House is aware, been good enough to adjourn the legislature of Manitoba until the 16th day of April, instead of proroguing as they had intended before this arrangement was made; and I take this opportunity to say how glad the Government will be to have the kind co-operation of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and his influence with his friends the government of Manitoba in doing what he can to facilitate the object of that mission.

Mr. LAURIER. I am glad to say to the hon. gentleman that this they have, and always had, although they take the tardy step, which I think is a most important step, of doing at the last what they should have done long ago, in my estimation. I would further ask the hon. gentleman whether it is the intention of the Government—I suppose it is—to lay upon the Table of the House the commission and the instructions given to the commissioners.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We shall be very glad to lay on the Table of the House the papers relating to the delegation.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In the early part of the month I moved for and obtained an address to His Excellency for the contracts and correspondence between George Goodwin and the Department of Railways with reference to contracts 4, 5, 6, 7 and 12 on the Soulanges Canal. As these papers are more than ordinarily important, I am very anxious to obtain them at an early date, and I would ask the hon. Minister if I may hope to have them within a few days.

Mr. HAGGART. I will make inquiries.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 53) respecting the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

IN COMMITTEE.

Bill (No. 28) to incorporate the Huron and Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. Sproule.)

SIR CHARLES TUPPER—ALLOWANCES AS ACTING HIGH COMMISSIONER.

Mr. CASEY asked:

1. Were any allowances for house rent, travelling expenses, or on any other account, made to Sir Charles Tupper while acting as High Commissioner without salary? If so, what amounts, at what dates, on what accounts?
2. Are any similar allowances to be made to him during the present term of the Acting High Commissionership without salary? If so, what, and on what accounts?
3. What statutory or other authority is there for the appointment of an Acting High Commissioner without salary? Is he appointed by a commission, or by Order in Council, or in what other manner?
4. Is he subject to the same instructions, and bound to perform the same duties, as were originally imposed on the High Commissioner by the commission and instructions issued to Sir A. T. Galt in 1880?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In answer to the first question I desire to say that Sir Charles Tupper acted as, High Commissioner without salary from 30th May, 1883, to 28th May, 1894, and as acting High Commissioner without salary from 7th March, 1887, to 6th July in the same year. During the first of those periods he was paid $836 removal expenses to London, which amount was specially voted by Parliament. He also received in lieu of house rent, fuel and taxes, between 1st July, 1883, to 24th May, 1884, the sum of $3,133.06. During the second period, namely, from 7th March to 6th July, 1887, he received nothing. The answer to the second question is, No. The first division of the third inquiry, involving as it does a question of law, I do not feel called upon to answer, but I may inform the House that the Order in Council of the 15th January, 1896, appointing me acting High Commissioner has been cancelled, and an order passed requesting me to supervise and direct the High Commissioner's office for the present. The answer to the fourth question is, There has been no change in the instructions.

SURVEYS ON CANADA-ALASKA BOUNDARY.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

1. Have the Canadian engineers and surveyors, who have been engaged upon the boundary survey between Canada and Alaska, completed their work upon the boundary line between the two countries ?

2. Did they prosecute their work in company with the engineers and surveyors appointed by the United States government to define the boundary line between Canada and Alaska ?

3. Does the delimitation of line between the two countries, as made up to the present date by the Canadian and the American surveyors and engineers agree ?

4. If the two corps of surveyors and engineers do not agree upon the boundary between the two countries, upon what points and in what respects does disagreement exist ?

5. Has correspondence passed, within the last twelve months, between the Government of Canada, through the British Embassy at Washington, and the government of the United States upon the question of the settlement of the Alaska boundary line ?

Mr. DALY. 1. The Canadian engineers and surveyors have completed the work they were appointed to do under the treaty made at Washington in 1892. 2. They prosecuted their work in company with the surveyors and engineers appointed by the United States government, but that work was not to define the boundary line between Canada and Alaska, as reference to the treaty will show. 3. The Canadian and American engineers and surveyors referred to were not appointed to delimit the line between the two countries, but in respect of the work that they had to do they have agreed, as stated by His Excellency the Governor General in his Speech from the Throne. 4. The answer to the previous question answers this one also. 5. Yes.

FISHWAYS IN THE NORTH RIVER.

Mr. GIROUARD asked :

1. Whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has considered the petition of the inhabitants of the counties of Terrebonne and Two Mountains, asking for the establishment of migratory fishways in the dams across the North River, between St. Andrews and St. Jérôme ?

2. Whether the department has sent an inspector to the locality in order to ascertain whether fishways can be constructed on the said river ?

3. Whether such inspector, if sent, has made a report ?

4. What are the results of the said report ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. Yes. 4. In July, 1895, notices were served upon five mill-owners calling upon them to construct fishways in their mill dams across North River. On representations from the mill-owners that their dams were of such a nature as to be weakened, if not endangered, by the buildings of fishways therein, and that fishing interests there were not of sufficient importance to call for the large expenditure necessary to comply with the demands of the department, the local fishery overseer was directed to stay proceedings pending further instructions.

EX-SOLICITOR GENERAL'S PRIVATE SECRETARY.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

What is the date of the ex-Solicitor General's resignation from that position ?

Who was his private secretary during his term of office ?

Has the person who acted as private secretary received the allowance since Mr. Curran's resignation, or has it been stopped since there is no Solicitor General ?

If the allowance is still paid, why ?

Mr. DALY. In answer to the first question, the date is 18th October, 1895. In answer to the second question, J. Mullin was the English private secretary, and P. Coté the French private secretary. In answer to the third question, No. In answer to the fourth, the allowance is not being paid.

HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS—COUNTY OF GASPE.

Mr. BRUNEAU (for Mr. Choquette (translation) asked :

Whether it is true that a sum of $4,000 is to be expended by the Government for the improvement of the harbours, rivers, etc., between Pointe-à-Frégate and Ste. Anne des Monts, in the county of Gaspé ?

Has there been correspondence in relation to this matter with Mr. Joncas, M.P., and, if so, to what effect ?

Mr. OUIMET. (Translation.) In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may inform him that the department has received several letters from Mr. Joncas, member for Gaspé, in connection with the matter referred to in the above question.

DUTIES ON THEATRICAL SCENERY.

Mr. McSHANE asked :

Has the Government received any petitions or communications from the theatrical managers and citizens of Montreal in reference to the existing duty on scenery, costumes and pictorial printing ? If so, is it the intention of the Government to grant the petitioners' request in whole or in part ?

Mr. WOOD. The answer to the first part of the hon. gentleman's inquiry is, Yes. In answer to the second part of the question, I beg to say that it is the intention of this Government to give this subject careful consideration when tariff changes are in contemplation.

Mr. McSHANE asked :

Has the Government received any complaints from the theatrical managers who have been compelled to pay duty several times within one month on the same scenery, &c., entering Canada at different ports ?

Mr. WOOD. Verbal representations to that effect have been made.

PRIVATE CARS FOR USE OF GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CHARLTON asked :

1. How many cars, fitted up for the use of Cabinet Ministers, their guests and officers of the Government, are now in the possession of the Government, or have been in the possession of the Government, and in use for the purposes of Government officers during the last two years; and by what names are such cars designated ?

What amount of expenses have been incurred for each of said cars during the fiscal year 1895 ; for stewards, porters, furniture, fittings, glassware, provisions, liquors, wines, cigars, and all other outfit and expenses ?

What amount of repairs have been put upon any or all of said cars during the fiscal year 1895 ?

What amount has been, or is yet to be, paid to Canadian railway corporations for the haulage of said cars, or either of them, during the fiscal year 1895 ?

What amount has been, or is yet to be, paid to American railway corporations for the haulage of said cars, or either of them, during the fiscal year 1895 ?

Mr. HAGGART. Four, "Cumberland," "Ottawa," General Manager's car, "No. 34," Paymaster's car, "No. 35." The amount of the expenses incurred for each of said cars during the fiscal year 1895, for stewards, porters, furniture, fittings, glassware, provisions, liquors, wines, cigars and all other outfit and expenses, was :—Cumberland, $858.81 ; Ottawa, $663.31 ; General Manager's car, No. 34, $915.91 ; Paymaster's car, No. 35, $452.44. The amount of repairs put on these cars during the fiscal year 1895 was, $1,413.08. Nothing has been paid or is yet to be paid to Canadian railway corporations for haulage of these cars during the fiscal year 1895. Nothing has been paid or has yet to be paid to American railway corporations for the haulage of said cars during fiscal year 1895.

SUPERANNUATION OF MR. L. A. CATELLIER.

Mr. BRUNEAU (for Mr. Rinfret) asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to superannuate Mr. Ludger Aimé Catellier, Under-Secretary of State and Deputy Registrar General, and to replace him by Mr. Joseph Pope, now Assistant Clerk of the Privy Council ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say in answer to the hon. gentleman, that the members of the Government are not permitted to disclose the advice that they may intend to offer to His Excellency. Therefore, the hon. member will see that I am unable to answer his question.

GERMAN TRANSLATION OF THE MANITOBA SCHOOL LAW.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Has the hon. the Minister of the Interior received a copy of an authorized translation into German (printed and published by the Queen's Printer, Winnipeg) of the Manitoba school law ?

Whether the hon. Minister intends to provide that a like opportunity shall be given to the Germans of the North-west Territories to become acquainted with the school ordinances of the Territories ?

Mr. DALY. 1. The Minister of the Interior has received a copy of an authorized translation into German (printed and published by the Queen's Printer, Winnipeg) of the Manitoba school law. 2. This is a matter entirely within the jurisdiction of the executive committee of the North-west assembly, and I am not aware what their intentions are in this respect.

CUSTOMS EMPLOYEES AT TORONTO.

Mr. McMULLEN asked :

What is the number of all employees of the Customs Department at the port of Toronto ? The name and salary of each, and the date of their appointment, and whether permanent or temporary ?

Mr. WOOD. I must ask the hon. gentleman to ask that question by way of a return. I will get it for him in a couple of days.

ARTHUR SIMARD'S DISMISSAL.

Mr. ANGERS asked :

1. Whether the lighthouse keeper at Cap au Saumon, Arthur Simard, has been dismissed ?
2. If not, is he about to be dismissed ?
3. If the answer be in the affirmative, what were the grounds for such dismissal ?
4. Are the Government aware that Mr. J. U. Gregory, agent for the Department of Marine and Fisheries, ordered the said Arthur Simard, in November last, to come up to the city of Quebec, with witnesses, to undergo an inquiry with reference to the discharge of the duties of his office ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The reply to the first question is, yes. 2. Same answer to the second. 3. Mr. Simard has been found not qualified for the proper discharge of his duties. 4. The Government are not aware that Mr. Gregory, agent at Quebec, ordered Mr. Simard to come to the city of Quebec. 5. In making inquiries or investigations, the department is guided by the circumstances of the case in regard to the place at which investigations should be held. 6. The Government are not aware that Mr. Simard expended any money in the matter. 7. That will be considered by the Government when it is brought under its notice.

EXPORT OF BUTTER.

Mr. BAIN asked :

What was the quantity and value of butter, the product of Canada, exported to Great Britain, for the six months ending 31st December, 1894, and for the same period in the year 1895, respectively ?

Also, the quantity and value of the imports of butter for consumpion in the Dominion, for the said two periods respectively ?

Mr. WOOD. 1. The quantity and value of butter, the product of Canada, exported to Great Britain for the six months ending 31st December, 1894, and for the same period in 1895, are as follows :—

	Quantity. Lbs.	Value. $
1895	4,254,700	772,479

2. The quantity and value of imports of butter for consumption in the Dominion for the six months ending 31st December, 1894, and for the same period in 1895, are as follows : -

	Quantity. Lbs.	Value. $
1895	41,809	7,764

PREFERENTIAL TRADE AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire, with the permission of the House, to make a slight verbal alteration in the terms of the resolution I have the honour to submit. I wish to strike out the word "naval" in the last clause of the resolution, which will make the resolution more comprehensive in its terms. And the resolution so amended I shall therefore move, with the permission of the House:

> That it would be to the advantage of Canada and the Empire as a whole that a small duty (irrespective of any existing tariff) be levied, by each member of the Empire against foreign products imported by them, and that the proceeds from such duties be devoted to purposes of Imperial intercommunication and defence.

It is only right I should say that I have made this alteration to meet the views of my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), and that I do so with very great pleasure. The hon. gentleman and I do not, perhaps, take exactly the same view as to the amount of increased naval expenditure necessarily incurred by the mother country on account of her colonial possessions, but it is not very likely that we shall all be agreed upon all the details connected with so great a subject as that which is embodied in this resolution, and so long as we are agreed upon the main principles, I am only too happy to allow details to stand over to be discussed at some other time. I am very glad, indeed, to have been able to meet the views of the hon. gentleman who has done so much to promote the cause of Imperial unity, and who, on the other side of the Atlantic, has been a co-worker with us, who, in our humble way on this side, have been endeavouring to arrive at the same great end. By reason of the favour shown me by the electors of the North Riding of Bruce, and by reason of the indulgence of hon. members, I have had an opportunity of moving and carrying in this House two resolutions, which, as subsequent events have shown, have, I venture to hope, made materially for the unity of the Empire. To have been privileged to do so, is, in my judgment, to have been very greatly privileged—to have been privileged far beyond anything that a humble private member of this House could have dared to hope for ; and if I am so insatiable as to come here to-day with another resolution tending in the same direction, and ask for the support of this House for that resolution, my excuse is the overwhelming importance of the subject, and the urgency of the times. And, perhaps, it may not be improper for me, it may not be immodest on my part, to make this remark, in further palliation of my conduct, namely, that I do not think that hon. members of this House have any reason to regret or to be ashamed of the course which this House adopted in reference to the two previous resolutions which it did me the great honour to accept at my hands. It is true that my hon. friend, the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) with that light—shall I say headed or hearted—well, I think for the sake of old friendship and by reason of his good conduct on a more recent occasion, I will say that light-hearted—gallantry which so often characterizes his attacks in this House, described the first resolution as perfectly absurd, and altogether unworthy of the serious consideration of a deliberative assembly. Another hon. gentleman gravely proposed that the House should proceed to business, that hon. members should not waste their time in discussing a matter which is altogether ridiculous, and the House should get down to practical business, and I believe, if I remember rightly, that this statesman proposed to reach a discussion with respect to a country post office. However, Mr. Speaker, the political instinct of the House rejected the view of those hon. gentlemen, and the result was that the resolution was carried by a large majority, but a majority, I regret to say, which was composed exclusively of members on one side of the House. I say I regret to make that statement, because, if there be any one thing more than another which those who have been trying to promote the cause of Imperial unity have striven for, it is to keep this question altogether free from the slightest taint of party politics. We have considered it a question too great and too high to be in any way affected by mere considerations of party politics ; so, from the very first, we have striven in every way within our power to induce hon. members on both sides of the House to regard it from a point of view absolutely above and beyond party considerations. I, therefore, regret that on that occasion the majority was composed altogether of members on one side of the House ; and, therefore, it was, Mr. Speaker, that I and every thoughtful man who has the interest of Canada and the Empire at heart, were most unfeignedly gratified to find on a recent occasion, that on the main question of all we were all united, French and English, Conservatives and Reformers, all were determined that the unity of this great Empire shall be maintained, and, furthermore, we were all agreed that the integrity of the Empire must be preserved at whatever cost and sacrifice to ourselves. The resolutions to which I have referred, are, I suppose, within the memory of most hon. gentlemen—one certainly is—but it may be well to recall the attention of the House to and remind hon. members of the terms of the first resolution, and there are no doubt some hon. members in the House who were not present when that resolution was carried. The terms of the first resolution were these :

> That if, and when, the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admits Canadian products to the markets of the United Kingdom on more favourable terms than it affords the products of foreign countries, the Parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages by a substantial reduction on the duties it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

That is the first resolution which we carried. The second resolution I need not read, because it is in the memory of all hon. members and by it we pledged ourselves, when the occasion arose, to do our utmost for the defence of the Empire. The House has, therefore, solemnly and formally pledged itself to these two principles : in the first place, to the principle of Imperial reciprocity, or preferential trade within the Empire ; and, in the second place, to the principle that Canada is prepared to make substantial sacrifices for the defence of the Empire. The resolution which I had the honour of placing in your hands a moment or two ago, Mr. Speaker, is of this nature, that it proposes to use this preferential trade, which is so much desired by the colonial part of the Empire, as an instrument for producing the means of Imperial defence. It does so in this way : The resolution proposes that Great Britain and the other members of the Empire shall impose a small preferential duty on all foreign products imported by them, not imposing any duty, so far as this matter is concerned, upon English or colonial products, upon products raised within the Empire. Therefore, so soon as England agrees to this proposal and places a duty on foreign products imported into her markets and allows our goods to enter free, we at once have preferential trade, and, just in proportion to the amount of the duty thus imposed, do we have a greater or less amount of preferential trade. I hope that is clear to hon. gentlemen, because I know some hon. members did not realize that this was in reality a resolution in favour of preferential trade as well as a resolution in favour of Imperial defence. So soon as these duties are imposed by England against foreign countries and our goods are allowed to go in free, then at once we have preferential trade with England. This proposal, Mr. Speaker, is not mine. I cannot lay claim at all to the credit of having originated this proposal. It is the proposal of that South African statesman, Mr. Hoffmeyer, who made it as long ago as the time of the first intercolonial conference, in the Jubilee year of the Queen, 1887. It is true that when Mr. Hoffmeyer made his proposal, he had with a view only to the raising of a fund for Imperial defence. But he recognized at the time that it had within it the germ of preferential trade. Events have moved fast since then, very fast indeed, and those of us who have been paying any considerable attention to the progress of this great Imperial movement which is going on under our very eyes, and which is so rapidly forcing itself to the very forefront of Imperial politics, the Empire over, have observed that there are two thoughts in relation which are most engrossing men's minds. The one is that the safety of the parts requires concerted action for their defence ; and the other thought is this : that British subjects ought to have in British markets more advantageous terms than their foreign rivals, who any day may become their foreign enemies, and who give to their own subjects in their markets advantages very much greater than they accord to us. Those are two great thoughts which, at present, are swaying the minds of men who are looking for a consolidation of the Empire. But, Sir, while there are a great many who are equally impressed by both of these thoughts, there are some who are more impressed with the importance of one of them than with the importance of the other ; and this resolution in effect says to those who are most impressed with the importance of Imperial defence : Give us preferential trade and we will not only give to you the preferential trade which we have already proposed, viz., a substantial reduction of our duties in your favour, but we will also place these duties upon foreign goods, and we will appropriate the proceeds of these duties for Imperial defence. And, Mr. Speaker, to those who are more impressed with the importance of preferential trade than of Imperial defence, this resolution, in effect, says : If you will consent to appropriate these duties for the purpose of Imperial defence, that great boon of preferential trade which you desire, may be obtained. And that other thought I have already expressed is worthy of consideration, namely, that the larger sum that is appropriated for purposes of Imperial defence under this scheme, the greater amount will be the preference to be obtained in the greatest market of the world. This also ought to be borne in mind : That this sum which will be thus appropriated for purposes of defence, will, to some very considerable extent—but to what extent, of course, it is impossible exactly to say—will to some very considerable extent at all events, come out of the pockets of foreign rivals, who are seeking admission to the markets of the Empire. Now, I wish to call attention of hon. members to this phase of this matter: That these duties which are proposed, under this resolution, are altogether irrespective of, and outside of, any other duties which may exist at the time.

Mr. CHARLTON. May I inquire of the hon. gentleman what amount of duties he would propose to levy for the purpose covered by his resolution ?

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) allow me, for a moment, to proceed, and I will come to that point, and if I overlook it—I do not think I shall—I hope he will call my attention to it. I was saying, Sir, that these duties which are proposed to be levied under this resolution, are irrespective altogether of any existing duties, and therefore any modification in existing duties may be made so long as the modifications do not interfere with the principle of preferential trade. You may, under this scheme, if it be thought advisable, have free trade within the Empire. It does not in any way interfere with existing duties, except in this sense, that any alteration of the existing duties must not interfere with the principle of preferential trade. Now I will answer the question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton). The hon. gentleman asks me: What amount of duty I would suggest. My reply is: That to-day I do not very greatly care what amount of duty is fixed, so long only as the principle of preferential trade is maintained, so long as there be a substantial preference guaranteed in the English market, and so long as there be, also, a substantial increase in our expenditure for defence. I may say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), that a duty of 5 per cent would cover our present military expenditure, and would cover our present expenditure for steamship subsidies, as well as the prospective expenditure for the fast line, and it would leave us some balance over. A duty of 7½ per cent, or a duty of 10 per cent would, of course, do more. But that is a matter of detail, and, in the meantime, all that I am proposing to this House is, that it shall accept the principle. All I want the House to accept, in the meantime, is the principle that preferential trade and defence shall go hand in hand together. But my proposal would be this: That a conference should be called to take up the details of this question, and to work them out. I am merely proposing at the present moment that this House shall adopt the principle, and when the other colonies adopt the principle, and when the mother country adopts the principle—as I venture to say one day they will do, and that day will be hastened by the action of this House—when they adopt the principle, Sir, then the details can very well be worked out.

Now, if I am asked, whether I consider that our present military expenditure should be a portion of, and should be defrayed out of this fund, I say: Yes, most assuredly. If I am asked, whether I consider that expenditure an expenditure for Imperial defence, I say, yes. I cannot consider the defence of half a continent any less than Imperial. If I am asked, on the other hand, do you propose to take the management of this fund, which is now expended for defence in Canada, out of the hands of those who at present administer it, and place it in the hands of some central body, I say I make no such proposal. I say there is nothing of the kind included in this resolution. It is not within the four corners of the resolution, either by implication or statement. All that the resolution says is, that the fund to be raised for defence shall be raised in this particular manner. As to who shall expend the money, it is not stated here at all. All that we assert in this resolution is simply this: That if preferential trade be accorded to us, we will devote the proceeds of these duties to the purposes of Imperial defence, and we point out, that the greater the amount of preferential trade, so much the greater, under this scheme, will be the contribution to defence, by the colonies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to enter into a lengthy discussion on the principle of preferential trade. I have already discussed that question in this House more than once, and my views on the subject are very well known to hon. members. I have no desire to weary the House. Moreover, the House has already adopted in the most solemn way the principle of preferential trade. Neither do I intend to discuss the treaties which stand in the way of preferential trade, because, as a matter of course, if the mother country makes up her mind to grant us preferential trade, the clauses of those treaties which interfere with it must be denounced. It is unnecessary for me, therefore, to discuss those treaties. The Parliament of Canada has already expressed its opinion upon them. I wish, however, with the kind permission of the House, to call attention for a moment to the extraordinary growth in the mother country, of the sentiment in favour of preferential trade, and also to call attention to the importance of the action of this House in connection with the question. Let me remind hon. gentlemen that on the 25th of April, 1892, this House passed the first of these resolutions. As I have said, it was very much belittled by some of our friends in the House at the time. But on the very next day after the passing of that resolution, the "Times" published a leading article describing the resolution as an important one, and saying that if South Africa and Australia declared for the same policy, these united declarations might give rise to a new departure in the fiscal policy of England. Immediately afterwards, lengthy cablegrams were published in the leading papers of the United States, referring to the excitement that had been produced in political circles in England by the action of this House on that occasion. In one of these messages it was declared that in some quarters it was held that if Lord Salisbury would only go to the country on the question of preferential trade with the colonies, he would sweep the country. Then we had resolutions by Conservative associations and by Chambers of Commerce in England, one after another. I will just trouble the House with one of these resolutions, adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of one of the greatest and most noted cities in the Empire, the city of Birmingham, which was known for so many years as the city which sent to the Imperial Parliament the most eloquent and strongest apostle of free trade the world has ever known. What did this resolution, which was passed within ten months of the passage of the resolution of this House, say ? It was as follows :—

> That, as in the opinion of this meeting the future prosperity of British commerce must increasingly depend on our commercial relations with our colonies, and recognizing the fact that Canada has, by the resolution of her Parliament, invited the mother country to enter into an arrangement for reciprocal preferential duties, we hereby urge upon the Government the necessity of taking that invitation into their immediate and most serious consideration.

Mr. LAURIER. What did the Government do about that ?

Mr. McNEILL. I am afraid the Government has not done anything yet. That is just the reason why I am urging them to do something now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Imperial Government ?

Mr. McNEILL. That is what I am speaking of.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did Lord Salisbury give any encouragement to the principle ?

Mr. McNEILL. I shall have a word to say about Lord Salisbury further on. The next phase in this movement was the summoning of a great colonial conference to Ottawa in 1894. We all remember that occasion. We all remember the scene in the Senate Chamber on the day on which those delegates from all parts of the Empire met together. I do not think there is an hon. member of this House whose mind was not turned to greater thoughts and filled with higher ambitions by what he saw that day. And for myself, I will say, that as long as memory lasts, I shall never forget the eloquent and noble words used by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition descriptive of what he saw, and of the effect produced upon him by what he saw, on that occasion. The conference met—a conference composed of leading statesmen from all parts of the Colonial Empire of England ; and what did that conference do ? It endorsed the action of this House. It passed a resolution supporting the action of this House in adopting the resolution of the 25th of April, 1892. Therefore, we had in 1894, what the "Times" called for at the time of the passage of our resolution in 1892 : we had in the short space of two years the declaration by the colonial portion of the Empire in favour of the policy of this House. It is true, and it is unfortunate, that the action of that conference did not have the weight that it might have had, and that it ought to have had ; because, by reason of some strange arrangement which I have never been able to understand, Canada was considered in the vote of the conference as only equal to Tasmania. The North American colonies were federated, and I suppose, because they were federated—because they had advanced that further step in their progress towards Imperial unity—they had but one representative to vote for in the division. The seven colonies and the North-west Territories together counted one; and Tasmania, which is nearer in population, I think, to Prince Edward Island than to any other of the North American colonies, counted one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Where was that ?

Mr. McNEILL. Here—at the conference. What was the result ? The result of that most unfortunate condition of things was this, that it placed a most powerful weapon in the hands of the opponents of preferential trade. And, when the question was asked in the Imperial House of Commons, what the Government intended to do with reference to the declaration of the colonial conference in favour of preferential trade, the answer was made, that, after all, the declaration was not a very strong one, for the vote was only five to three. In point of fact, if the North American colonies had received an equal representation with the Australasian colonies, the vote would have been 12 to 3, and that is the only fair way of looking at the vote, as, I think, my hon. friend the leader of the House will admit. But not only was that argument used against us in the House of Commons, but on two occasions, if my memory does not deceive me, the "Times," in a leading article, referred to the same fact. It was true, but it was only true on the surface, because, as we know, each of the North American colonies, in point of fact, had only, counting the North-west, one-eighth of a vote, while the Australasian colonies had a vote each. The vote of that colonial conference was, to all intents and purposes—whether you take the numbers of the colonies, or the population represented—12 to 3, a sufficiently overwhelming majority. I may say that it would be improper on my part, and improper on the part of all of us, not to recognize the very great services of the present Premier of Canada (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) in bringing about that conference. There is no doubt at all that to his energy and courage is largely due the fact that we had a conference at all, and the fact ought never to be forgotten.

Well, then, on the 11th July of that year the "Times" published an article, to which I shall call attention for a moment, because it is, from certain points of view, a very remarkable article :

> The problem would be greatly simplified if this country had adhered to the fiscal notions that still dominate the greater part of the commercial world. But our free trade system, great as are its benefits to ourselves and the Empire as a whole, leaves us with little means of striking turns and little power to discriminate in favour of the colonies. * * * It is remarkable that Englishmen should have acquiesced as calmly as they have done in arrangements which place them, as regards food, in a precarious and naturally dependent position. * * * By adhering to and developing the Imperial idea, and not in any other way, can we regain the self-sufficing position which the United Kingdom has so conspicuously lost.

Those are pretty weighty words. Then, on the 5th December, last year, the "Times," in a leading article, called attention to another very important aspect of this question, and one which is pressing itself more and more upon the attention of statesmen of the mother country. The "Times" spoke as follows :—

> It is a matter of common knowledge that the trade of the colonies with the United Kingdom is not increasing in proportion to the trade that the colonies are doing with foreign countries. In the case of some of the most important colonies, this disposition is very marked. Taking, in the case of Australasia, a comparatively recent period during which Mr. Chamberlain has asked for returns, it will be found that in 1881 the total external trade with British possessions amounted to £57,340,763. In 1892, it was £60,952,541, showing an increase in round numbers of little more than three millions and a half. The foreign trade of Australasia in 1881 was £7,213,916, and in 1892 it had risen to £14,394,557, or very nearly double the figures of the earlier date. Had trade with the United Kingdom progressed to anything like the same extent, the effect would have been of the utmost importance to British industry. The increase, on an examination of the detailed returns, will be found to have gone almost to the United States, Germany and France, and by so much has served to stimulate the competitive enterprise of those countries. An almost similar state of things is to be traced in the trade returns of South Africa, where also mining enterprise has of late shown a tendency to pass into French, American and German hands. In Canada where, twenty years ago, the imports from Great Britain formed 55 per cent of the entire imports of the colony, the proportion has now sunk to 37 per cent, while in the same period the proportion of imports from the United States has risen from 35 to 46 per cent, and those from France and Germany have heavily increased.

Hon. members will see what a strong hold this question of trade within the Empire is taking on the minds of the people in England. Then again, on the 16th December, we have a most remarkable cable message, which I desire to read to the House. And I would earnestly ask the attention of hon. members to this, because I think they will agree with me that it is a most remarkable evidence of the growth of this feeling in favour of preferential trade. I have here the "Mail and Empire," of the 16th December last. In this paper appeared a cable despatch from London. I think a despatch precisely in the same terms appeared in the Montreal "Star," and a message, in substance, the same, but condensed, was published on the same day in the Toronto "Globe." The following is the despatch I refer to :—

> London, Dec. 15.—The feature of home politics during the past week here has been the development of a marked advocacy of protection. The demands for a change in the fiscal policy of the country from free trade to protection, in one guise or another, have been more or less frequent for the past year or so. But the unexpected degree of prominence which the matter attained during the week has opened the eyes of the politicians to the extent to which the antagonism of free trade has spread in the provinces.
> The cattle show at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, has been the occasion for mustering in London of hosts of representatives of every branch of industry connected with husbandry, and the Cabinet Ministers have been overwhelmed with deputations, urging them to take steps to prevent British agriculture from being wiped out by foreign competition. The course suggested to the Government is a tariff upon a variety of imports.
> The Marquis of Salisbury,——

Now, this will be, no doubt, a grain or two of comfort for my hon. friend who asked about the Marquis of Salisbury a moment or two ago.

Mr. WELDON. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. It will be, no doubt, because it is in the direction the hon. gentleman suggested.

> —replying to one of these deputations, said that he could not hold out the slightest prospect of protection, and explained that his famous speech at Hastings in 1892 was misunderstood. He added that when he denounced Cobdenism and urged the country to arm for an attack upon the wall of tariffs, he never believed or expected a restoration of protection. This, with the replies of other Ministers, was extremely disappointing to a great body of their supporters, and the severe criticisms of some of the sturdiest Conservative organs, which followed, created quite a sensation.
> The "St. James Gazette"——

Which, I suppose, hon. gentlemen all know is one of the very staunchest of Conservative papers——

> —congratulates the Ministers upon pleasing the Radical press, "whose caresses," it adds, "may console Lord Salisbury for the distinct chilliness of the Unionist papers."
> The "Standard" remarks :—Under a Minister thus pledged to free trade, the farmers——

I do not quite follow this—I do not know what this means.

—should have free trade in the matter of sugar, i.e., fair competition against foreigners. Foreign governments should be informed that unless they cease paying a bounty on sugar, a duty equal to that will be levied on it at our ports.

I presume the word "farmer" is substituted for the word "colony," referring to the West India colonies. That is the only explanation I can give of that expression.

The "Morning Post" says:—Lord Salisbury would be far more in touch with the sentiments and wishes of the masses if he defended and expanded his protection remarks at Hastings. The bent of public opinion is directed strongly and firmly to a speedy alteration of the fiscal system, which only hurts those who employ it.

Hon. gentlemen all know the high standing of the "Morning Post" in London. There are some remarks about the proposal of the Government to assist the agricultural industries in their troubles, and then we have the following:—

There are 232 members of the House of Commons pledged to maintain the programme of the National Agricultural Union, and they will not accept other than a substantial instalment of their demands. "If the Government fails to satisfy us some how," said a leading agriculturist at a conference of the union, "let us make a clean sweep of them." This proposition was received with applause. Another programme of the union declares for preferential trading between all parts of the British Empire. This programme——

Will hon. gentlemen kindly listen to this:

—This programme obtains, besides the unanimous adhesion of the Conservatives——

This programme of preferential trade for the colonies.

—the growing support of the Liberals.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As evidenced how?

Mr. McNEILL. I give this cable message as evidence, whatever it may be worth. This is a cable message sent here and published, not only in this paper, but in the Montreal "Star" as well.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Sent by whom?

Mr. McNEILL. Sent here from England and——

Mr. LAURIER. The Cattle Bill was probably the outcome of that resolution.

Mr. McNEILL. It may be.

The circular of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, to the Governors of various British colonies, has raised the question of an Imperial zollverein into the sphere of immediate practical politics. The "Statist" argues that such is impossible, unless the colonies consent to absolute free trade with the mother country, but the tone of the Conservative, and some of the Liberal papers, tends to the acceptance of the resolution adopted by the late Intercolonial Conference at Ottawa, which declared in favour of granting to Great Britain only a preferential tariff over foreign countries.

Now, hon. members can take that statement for what it is worth. It may be an entire misrepresentation of the facts. It is for hon. members to say whether they think it is so or not. It would be a very extraordinary manufacture, I think, upon the part of the agent who cabled that message—

Mr. MULOCK. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he will kindly read the resolution of the Agricultural Union. Has he it there?

Mr. McNEILL. I have not got it here. But I think the statement that the Agricultural Union is in favour of preferential trade with the colonies, and the statement that the Conservative papers and some of the Liberal papers are advocating the same, and the statement that 253 members of the House of Commons are supporters of the programme of the Agricultural Union—all these should be worthy of consideration. I have also the statement of Sir Howard Vincent that two-thirds of the supporters of the government in the House are in favour of preferential trade with the colonies. I have also the statement which was read by the leader of the Heese when he addressed the Montreal Board of Trade on this subject, in which there is a quotation of another paper in England, the "Saturday Review." The hon. gentleman quoted the "Saturday Review," of January 4th, as follaws:—

And as soon as America is conciliated we must proceed to set our house in order. The greater part of the emigration into the United States comes from these islands. It would need but little to deflect the major part of it from the American North-west to the Canadian Northwest. A 10 per cent differential duty in favour of our colonies would settle up Manitoba in ten years, instead of settling up Minnesota and Dakota. This differential duty would restore prosperity to New Zealand and enrich Australia and Canada, while reducing to hardship and to straits the population between the Alleghany Mountains and the Rockies, which is now clamouring for war. There is a kernel of good even in things evil. Pressure on the outside, science tells us, increases the cohesion between the units that compose the body corporate. The threat of war by America will cause Englishmen to hold more closely together, and will diminish that selfishness on the part of the mother country towards the colonies which has hitherto been regarded as the true commercial policy of the nation, and which has never deserved the name of policy, because it makes for disunion and not for union, for weakness and not for strength.

That is another of the leading periodicals in London, the "Saturday Review," one of the very ablest journals in the Empire. Then, I have another extract, and I must apologize for reading so many, but I hope hon. gentlemen will forgive me. I think it is very important that the House should be put in possession of the facts, so far as these quotations will put the House in possession of the facts, in reference to the progress of thought in the mother country in connection with this great subject. I would like to read an extract which is perhaps the most important of any that I have read. for this reason. that it discloses the conversion to this policy of one of the very strongest opponents of the policy, a gentleman who was an opponent of the policy only last summer. a gentleman who argued most strongly against this policy when our friends met together and discussed the formation of the British Empire League. of which the Duke of Devonshire is the president. I mean Mr. Arnold-Foster. He most strongly argued against preferential trade at that time ; and I now desire to read an extract from an article which he has published in the "Nineteenth Century" for February:

> If, as there seems reason to fear. President Cleveland be determined to force war upon us. then war, of course. cannot be avoided. I believe that even in that sorrowful event this country is not without means of effective defence, and may indeed inflict upon her adversary an amount of injury which not even the United States can contemplate without alarm. If such a war were to end by freeing us once for all from our dependence upon a foreign country for our daily bread. and enable us to transfer to our own colonies the ninety million pounds which we at present pay annually to the United States for what our own people can well supply, then some compensation would be gained for a great and terrible loss.

He then proceeds to argue the point raised as to the cost of an Imperial understanding:

> Let us deliberately consider whether the advantage of getting our food supply from our own colonies and dependencies be not worth paying for ; let us find out how much we should have to pay——

You will remember, this gentleman is a great freetrader.

> —and, abandoning any absurd ideas that we can get food cheaper by making it dearer, let us see if our people have not the common sense and self-restraint to examine a very important national problem calmly, as I firmly believe they would. If once we can arrange this matter. the future of our colonies will be made, and not the most scrupulous stickler need then object to our asking the colonies in what way they propose to contribute to the defence of the Empire from whose existence they gain so much. It may possibly turn out that the result of the whole operation will be to make the quartern loaf cost a farthing, or half a farthing, more than it does at present. But if that were so, there is not the slightest reason to hold up our hands and shriek as if we had suddenly invoked the devil. That is precisely the course which some instructors of public opinion would have us adopt. But it is not a sensible course. It is conceivable that the people of this country, even the poorest of them, may think that, as a matter of fact, it is reasonable to make some sacrifice for the public welfare. The sacrifice will be infinitely smaller than the blood tax which is demanded from, and cheerfully paid by, continental nations. If the payment resulted in bringing unheard of prosperity to Canada, Australia, the Cape and India, and in making those countries desirable homes for British workers and profitable destinations for British capital, the people of this country would not perhaps complain.

Now. I think that hon. gentlemen will surely regard these extracts that I have read as of some little importance in connection with this question. I remember very well. that Sir John A. Macdonald used to say that just as soon as the peole of the mother country came to realize the peril of being dependent on foreign nations for their food supply. and came to understand that these foods could be supplied to them by their own colonies. we would be very near to the time when we should have preferential trade. Well, Mr. Speaker. events which have transpired recently have convinced the people of the mother country. have brought home to the people of the mother country in a very strong manner indeed. the reality of the peril in which they stand. and. as a result. they have turned to the colonies. and the question is eagerly asked to-day in the mother country : How far can the colonies supply our food requirements ? Sir. there can be only one answer to that question, when the people of the mother country come to consider it seriously. as they are doing now. We know perfectly well. I said it myself in Sheffield. and I say it here. that, if we have only granted to us preferential trade, we can smother the people of the mother country in wheat ourselves. if necessary. Now, I have adduced no argument whatever in favour of preferential trade : I have simply been pointing out this fact. that. whether preferential trade be good for Canada or bad for Canada. good for the Empire or bad for the Empire. good for the mother country or bad for the mother country. there is a rapidly growing public opinion in favour of that policy. and that is the point which I want to impress upon this House. Now. Sir. as I have said. I do not want to discuss the question of preferential trade at any length at all. but there are just two points that I want shortly to deal with in regard to that question. There are two arguments of a very different kind ; one of them is a very important argument. one deserving the very gravest consideration, and that is that the foundation of the trade prosperity of the mother country depends upon her being able to produce as cheaply as possible, well-manufactured goods ; and that the proposal for preferential trade is a proposal, in point of fact, to put a tax upon raw material in favour of the colonies ; because the goods that the mother country obtains from her colonies, are practically raw material. if you include the food supplies as raw material. The putting of a duty upon the raw material means, they say, an increase in the price of raw material ; that means an increase in the price of the manufactured commodity ; that means that England will be less able to compete with her great rivals in the markets of the world. That, I think, is a very important consideration, it is a very strong argument, an argument, as I have already said, which deserves the very gravest consideration. But with respect to that I would say, in the first place, that I think it rests upon a mistaken assumption of a premise. I am not going, however, to enter into a discussion of the general principles of the question at all. In reply to that argument I wish to state a fact, and I desire the House to consider the fact that I state, and I ask the House not to be too much startled by it, for it may be a little startling to some hon. gentlemen. I am going to speak of the foreign trade of England. England's exports of manufactures last year, which was an unusually favourable year, amounted to the value of £196,000,000 sterling. What did her imports of manufactured goods amount to ? They amounted to the value of £125,500,000 sterling. In other words, England imported of manufactured goods about two-thirds in value of all she exported. Of the goods she exported fully one-third went to her own possessions, and therefore England exported of manufactured goods to foreign countries just about the same amount in value as she imported from foreign countries. What follows ? It seems to follow that if England were to lose some of her foreign trade by putting on duties against foreign competition in favour of her own colonies, she would gain as much by the recovery of her own market as she would lose in the foreign market, and she would have to the good the enormous advantage she would obtain by preferential trade with her colonies and by building up her colonial empire. That is my answer to the first argument. With respect to the second argument, that is an argument of a different kind. It is this, that England's trade with her colonies is comparatively small compared with her trade with the rest of the world. That is an argument for which I have no respect whatever. I think it is a poor, narrow, contemptible, contracted argument, worthy only of the little England school in the very zenith of her glory—of her glorious glory—when the good lady flaunted about in the very best bib and tucker which sweating system could produce, and plumed herself on the cheapness of it. It is a petty, contemptible, shortsighted argument. Let us suppose a man who has an interest in two fruit farms. One belongs to a company, some of the members of which are hostile to himself ; the other he obtained by inheritance and made over to members of his own family, who were loyal to him and who were filled with affection for him. The farm of the company yields the largest amount of fruit. Some of the trees are going out of bearing, however, and he is losing a portion of the farm from time to time. On the other farm the trees are young, strong, healthy and vigorous, but they are only just coming into bearing, and the amount of fruit received is comparatively small. It is as if the man having the interest in two such farms were to say : I will cultivate the farm belonging to the company, even though some of the partners be unfriendly, because I obtain a larger crop of fruit from it to-day than from the other. I venture to say that the man who uses that argument to which I have referred is a man who is scarcely able to look beyond the silver streak. The man who cannot project his mind even a very little way into the future and see something of what this great Empire must become, is in my judgment a very short-sighted statesman. There is no one here who can fail to see, always supposing there is no great national calamity, that the trade of Canada must within a comparatively short space of time, as we measure the life of nations, be equal to the trade of the United States to-day. We find that per head of our population our trade is four times as much with the mother country as that of the United States with Great Britain. The people of Australia and South Africa buy from England four times as much as we do. Is not the trade of this great colonial Empire, with all the mighty people that will inhabit it, in the near future, worth securing to-day. England is losing it ; the "Times" says it is notorious she is losing it ; all the world knows it. The people of our own Empire stretch out their arms to her and ask her to trade with them. They say : Trade with us and we will trade with you : you can help us and we can help you. Give us a preference in your markets to-day, and we will secure to you the lion's share of our trade, as against your rivals, for generations to come. And this great politician goes to his book-shelves and takes down his book and puts on his spectacles and looks up his column of figures and sees that England's trade with foreign countries is very much larger to-day than is her trade with the members of her own Empire. He sees that, and he sees no further ; and I say that such a man is not only short-sighted, but from the standpoint of the statesman, he is well nigh stone-blind. Time was, Mr. Speaker, when those of us who believed in the consolidation of the Empire were regarded as dreamers of vain dreams. We were jeered at, we were held up to ridicule for a little while. Our opponents had their little jeer and their tiny jest, and I do not think any one grudged them. For, Sir, we had an unfaltering faith in the Imperial and self-governing instincts of the race. We knew, as Matthew Arnold has it : That the majestic river floated on, and we knew that it drew to its breast from either side, the rills and brooks as it went. If we wanted our revenge—and I do not think we ever did—but, if we wanted our revenge, we had it on the 31st of January when Lord Salisbury, who himself at one time was inclined to be somewhat sceptical, and who on one occasion described Imperial federation as a subject which lent itself rather to eloquent peroration than to practical politics; I say, Sir, on the 31st of January we had our revenge when Lord Salisbury used these words:

> Surely the lesson which has been taught us by those recent times, is that all parts of the Empire must draw together. If we are in trouble in the new world and the old, it is not because we have thought of any domestic interest attaching to England. It is because we have been anxious to defend the rights and the security of colonial brethren, and the colonists have answered in the spirit in which we have acted. They have sent us back assurances of sympathy and support which have been of the greatest encouragement in the troubles that we have had to deal with. We all know how difficult it is to find any formula or statute for the federation of the Empire, but we yet feel that something greater than formulas or statutes is driving the Empire together; is forming a federation which will be a reality before the expression to denote it has been invented.

These were the words of Lord Salisbury on the 31st of January last. I have only one other quotation to make and then I will conclude. I want to call the attention of the members of this House to the words of the Imperial statesman who is especially responsible for the welding of the Empire, and who is, as a matter of course, in a position to be best informed as to its condition and its requirements at the present day. A few days before Lord Salisbury had spoken, Mr. Chamberlain made use of these memorable words:

> I have long believed that the future of the colonies and the future of this country were interdependent, and that this was a creative time, that this was an opportunity which, if once let slip, might never recur, for bringing together all the people who are under the British flag, and for consolidating them into a great self-sustaining and self-protecting Empire, whose future will be worthy of the traditions of the race.

These are the words, Mr. Speaker, which I consider, have justified me in taking up the time of the House to-day, and in bringing this subject to the notice of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. DAVIN. In rising, Sir, to second this motion, I am gratified to know that my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) has gone so fully into the argument, that I need resort very little to the main arsenal of our eloquence in this House, namely, statistics. My hon. friend, in the conclusion of his speech, used the phrase "nobody with the foresight of a statesman," and said such a person would find it difficult to take any other view than that which he was pressing on the House. Sir, it is because the great majority of statesmen have no foresight whatever, that men like my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) and others are obliged, in each age to stand out from the rest of men, advocating theories which in advance of the times are crystallized into legislation in an after period of history. It is, Sir, because the mass of men who are called statesmen, instead of having foresight, can generally not see further than their noses. But, all great things are simple once we get at their formula.

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. DAVIN. Is my hon. friend hard of hearing? I hope he is not blind as well as deaf. But, if he should be, and if he is interested in this subject, I shall endeavour to coach his intelligence as well as to reach his ears. Now, Sir, as a fact, in England, and all over the continent, and in ancient times, and here in Canada, it is the exception to get statesmen who see far off. Why, we can all remember how in this very House, men regarded the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway within the time it was built as a simple impossibility; and statesmen in England have in my opinion been just as short-sighted as statesmen elsewhere. The question now before us belongs to that class of subjects which are brought forward from time to time in assemblies of this kind, and pressed upon the attention of the country. It is of the class of policies, which, however far-seeing statesmen may be, it would be improper for them to take up, when they are initiated, but which being pressed upon the attention of Parliament, and on the attention of the public, gradually materialize. They are studied, and often what was a doubted proposition of yesterday becomes the conviction of to-day; and then the far-sighted statesman, and the short-sighted statesman, when he happens to be a practical man, can alike take such a matter up. Any one who has observed the course of Lord Salisbury for a few years, cannot fail, in reading between the lines of his utterances, to come to the conclusion that Lord Salisbury has been converted for some years past to the proposition of preferential free trade. But, he is the leader of a great party, and at present the head of the government, and Lord Salisbury is in the hands of the electors of England, and of course as a statesman, his duty and his interest, is, first, to convince the masses of the country, and in a way, the masters of the Empire, namely, the voters of these two Imperial islands. The way I read Lord Salisbury's utterances—at one time talking like an enthusiastic convert to the views of us protectionists, at another time harking back from that position—is that the educator of the public is talking at one time, and the statesman who is responsible to a great party and dependent on votes, is talking at another time. I am quite convinced that you could have no better index of the change that is taking place in public opinion in England in regard to this and similar questions which my hon. friend has brought before the House, than the utterances of a man so experienced, whose training and native character of mind both fit him so completely to be an observer of facts. This question—if you regard it in the light of recent events, or if we had no such events to quicken us in the direction in which my mind at the moment travels—is one of those questions that cannot properly be discussed unless you remember that man is not ruled solely by political economy any more than he lives by bread alone. Looking at the history of ocean empires of the past, in ancient and in modern times, without going into detail, we find—and the proposition will commend itself to every man familiar with the history of Tyre, of Athens, of Venice, of Holland, and of our own Empire—that a great ocean Empire like England cannot recede. She must continue to go forward. When she begins to pause, she must take the next step backward. She cannot hold back from progress. She must expand. She is like a great oak of the forest that grows strong and powerful in every direction as long as her branches spread out and gather sustenance from the air and the winds of heaven: but lop off those branches, and you have only a pollard, hollow, weak and contemptible, and only interesting by comparison with the power and amplitude to which it furnishes so great a contrast. As the oak tree—to continue the figure—receives strength and power not only from its roots, but also from its branches, in the same way an Empire like England—and England is now, I am glad to say, beginning to realize this—draws her strength not merely from the body and heart within those Imperial isles, but also from the branches which have spread out from her, and in which in every age is to be found her most adventurous sap—her most heroic and wilful sons. Sir, you have only to try to imagine what would be the consequences, both in a direct practical loss of power, and also in that loss of sense of power, that loss of moral sap, of moral order and moral strength, that England would suffer if her colonial possessions were, as some foolish persons have from time to time suggested, cut away from her. We have an example of that in the case of Holland. Holland was at one time a great Oceana—a great sea power. It looked at one time as if she was to be the great sea power of modern times. But England—partly because of inherent advantages belonging to those two islands, but also because the vigour and energy of English colonizing power outdid that of Holland—outstripped her in the race for ocean empire. She continues to-day to maintain her superiority; and there is no apparent sign that she may not be able to maintain it for centuries to come. And now, Sir, what was it that made Tyre, for instance—all that Tyre is described in that celebrated chapter in Ezekiel?

Mr. CHARLTON. Give us a part of the chapter.

Mr. DAVIN

Mr. DAVIN. I am not going to take coals to Newcastle, and quote Scripture to the hon. gentleman. Again, take Athens, or take Venice. What gave them their power? It was simply their unequalled maritime ports—their unequalled maritime position at the time. And, Sir, you have many reasons in England and in Ireland why they have become the ocean empire. they are—because you have in those islands the finest ports in the world. But go to England's possessions—go to Canada, and you will find there also some of the finest ports in the world. Go also to the southern cross, and you will find there some of the finest ports in the world. And, Sir, in the Antilles—those islands that circle round the Caribbean Sea like a necklace of jewels—we had the means of wealth and power for the sons of England, until the policy, not of far-sighted statesmen, but of short-sighted statesmen—of those men who would be forward to oppose such a proposition as my hon. friend has brought forward—reduced island after island in that quarter of the world to barrenness and weakness; and those of them that are at the present time sources of wealth at all, are sources of wealth, not to England, but to the United States. But at that time, as any one who has conversed with those who have visited the West Indies, those islands where the Empire's greatest battles were fought—knows that you have only to think of those little islands scattered around that central sea, and memories come to you that bring before you what is the real source of our anxiety for the adoption of a policy such as is proposed. That is, that in those seas, and in other seas, aye, in every quarter of the world:

> Never was isle so little,
> Never was sea so lone,
> But over the scud and the palm tree
> An English flag has flown.

All over the world, our race has, by its valour, won for itself a commanding position, from their bones are made the pillar on which this great British Empire rests to-day. This brings me to the kind of consideration in which one, on an abstract occasion like this, is apt to indulge in. This is a proposition looking towards closer union between the various parts of the Empire. Why is it that we long for closer union? Why is it that we long to see that Empire wrought more strongly together? Why is it we want to see the Imperial sap circulating more freely through all the branches? Is it simply that more men, calling themselves Englishmen should eat better, should read newspapers, should have homes, should feed and sleep and drink and rest better? Not at all. That is part of it. We want to see material happiness diffused. But that is not the idea which governs us when we desire to see the Empire more closely knitted together, and its power advanced. We have before us the exemplification of the great truth that the abstract is greater than the concrete, and that there can be no moral greatness for a nation or a man until an ideal has been created and become, to some extent, a part of the nation or the individual. It has a material base, but there it stands superior to everything material, the ideal that lifts the man and the nation above itself, so that when the little flag that represents it flouts the sky, the Englishman, the Scotchman, the Irishman, and the French Canadian, who has the Imperial instinct in his nature, is ready to make any sacrifice for that piece of bunting which represents so much devotion and heroism, so much glorious death, which is better than any amount of ignoble life. When we come to think of the British nation, not merely do we think, looking to those islands that I spoke of a moment ago, of the valour of Rodney, or looking to the Mediterranean, not merely do we think of the valour of Nelson, not merely do we think of the thousand battlefields of the Imperial race to which we belong and which show that noble life and noble death is the only thing worthy of noble men, but we think of that noble sentiment put into the mouth of the old Greek hero :

> One crowded hour of glorious life is worth > an age without a name.

One crowded hour of memory, given to us as British men, is worth any amount of political economy and prosaic statistics telling us how much we have gained and how much lost. Away with the enthroning this ledger view of national greatness ; it is important, but essentially subsidiary. The real greatness of the nation, as of the man, is moral greatness, and it is because such a proposal as that of my hon. friend tends to preserve that sentiment that it should command our support. Why, who that has any care for what is glorious in history but would feel as if life had been deprived of all value, if any misfortune should smite down that Imperial idea—that British Empire—that rises before us now. We are not thinking of the men toiling in Sheffield, we are not thinking of the men reaping in the fields, we are not thinking of the thousands crowded in London. No, we are thinking of that British Empire which is the abstract greatness of the British race, and which is surely as true a divinity for British men as Pallas Athene was for the Greeks. I heartily second the motion of my hon. friend, as the first step in the solution of the problem which is placed before us of bringing together peoples—nations, at all events in width of populations—such as must inhabit this country, such as must inhabit Australasia, such as will inhabit South Africa, such as will, I hope, again be found inhabiting the islands of those several seas ; and if we can only bring all of these together, without loss of self-respect on the part of the extremities of the Empire, and without loss of the Imperial dignity that is dear to the hearts of Britishers, we may look to the creation of an Empire compared with which even the Empire of England to-day might be small in comparison. The solution is a difficult one, and for this reason. The child is like the father ; the British people, accustomed to free government, would not brook any other people ruling them ; and their off-shoots, Canadians, Australians, Britishers of the Cape of Good Hope, will not subject themselves even to the inhabitants of the British Islands. But it seems to me that the English people are getting into a mood in which we can solve it. The problem before us is not a union between a superior, looking down upon our colonies, and the colonies, but a union between co-equal nations all over the world—some of them, indeed, bearing the relation of child to England, but co-equal, sharing the burdens of the Empire, participating in Empire, and making such an Oceana as the world has never yet seen. I may say that the people do not need as much waking up as the statesmen. Disraeli, dreamer, to some extent, as he was, had the intuitiveness that belongs to the man of genius. He thoroughly realized that the mass of the English people are more Imperial and more conservative than the smug middle class, the shopkeeping class of the people. Their business, their functions have a tendency to produce certain virtues and certain defects, and there are certain domestic virtues, certain quiet virtues that belong to the small trading class, and we see these in the middle class in England, but they are virtues that are not consonant with what you would call Imperial instincts. And I remember when Lord Russell was trying to pass his Reform Bill in 1866, I was then just winning my spurs as a journalist. I was then earning the first money I ever earned as a journalist, and I made it a point to aid me in my writing to try and become familiar with the sentiment of the mass of the people in regard to the Reform Bill which Mr. Gladstone had placed before the House of Commons. And one of the most instructive ways in which a man could do this was to get on the knifeboard of an omnibus going off to Putney—a very long ride—and hear the people talk. One day I was sitting on the front seat of an omnibus near the driver, a great, big, stout Englishman—a thorough John Bull. We were passing the Houses of Parliament and I said : What do you think of this Reform Bill Mr. Gladstone is trying to pass—Lord Russell's Reform Bill ? He answered : We don't want no Reform Bill. I said : Why not ? Well, I cannot give you the answer in the heroic language my friend, the driver used——

Mr. GIROUARD. Go on.

Mr. DAVIN. No, nor could I translate it into French for my hon. friend ; it is untranslatable. But it was, in substance, this: We don't want any ragged-clad fellows in there. That expresses his idea, but the picturesqueness is gone. It was a rough answer, but it indicated the sentiment in the minds of the masses of the English people. As you will see if you attend their meetings, or watch them in their amusements, they respond to the Imperial idea. So that if Lord Salisbury, as I surmise, is trying to educate the English people up to the acceptance of a step like this, I do not think he will have so much difficulty as some may have expected. Look at the matter in the light of events. Recently England was menaced, and that turned men's attention to the question as to whether the Empire could feed itself. Magazine article after magazine article has appeared upon that subject, waking up the English statesmen to the fact that England has scattered over the embracing seas colonies with mineral resources and agricultural resources greater than those of the mother country herself, and all they have to do, instead of frowning on these children of the old land, instead of treating these children in a stepmotherly spirit, is to adopt the policy which every man who is familiar with the history of England knows was adopted when she was building up her commercial greatness —direct the energy of the mother country to the solving of the problems of the hour and send emigrants to those colonies and let us have a combined emigration policy for Canada and elsewhere, and let them show that kind of family preference for our goods that nobody could object to. This done, I believe we shall have taken a great step forward. Now, it just occurred to me that this motion might, perhaps, have even been improved if it had taken the form—some may say it is six of one and half a dozen of the other—of a declaration in favour of admitting the goods of the colonies at a lower rate than the goods from foreign countries.

Mr. McNEILL. May I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the first resolution we carried did propose to let English goods in at lower rates of duties than those of other countries. But, of course, we could not get our goods into England at lower rates than now, for there is really no duty upon our goods.

Mr. DAVIN. You are quite right. But it occurred to me as I was speaking. It occurred to me that it would sound better.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is very much a matter of sound, anyway.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend says it was very much a matter of sound. I am afraid, really, that my hon. friend——

Mr. McNEILL. He is not sound.

Mr. DAVIN—does not approach this question in the sympathetic mood we should like. My hon. friend does not realize that the true mood of criticism is appreciation, not cynicism. He cannot truly judge a book, or anything else, in any other way. I have been a critic myself; I used to suck my sustenance through a critical quill, and I always bore in mind what was said by a great tutor of mine, that the true mood of criticism is appreciation, not depreciation. The easiest thing in the world is to condemn and sneer, but the hard thing, and the thing that will test the critic's real power, is to get out of a book, or anything else, what is good in it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are surmounting the difficulty.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) gives us so little in the way of compliment that I cannot but say to him that the smallest donations are thankfully received. Let me follow these suggestions further. Suppose we had it that not only colonial goods, but goods from British ports should have an advantage in the ports of England and Ireland and Scotland over those from foreign ports, what would be the result? It would direct the whole trade of the western states from New York to Montreal, and it would make Montreal, in a very short time, great as it is now, still greater in magnitude and in commercial importance. It would make the St. Lawrence what nature intended it to be, the great highway from the vast producing areas in the centre of this continent, and would add greatly to the wealth and importance of Canada. And let me say, in this connection, that the way to build up a city like Montreal or Toronto is not with trade near it, merely. Some time ago when the Toronto people were asking what was to build up Toronto, what was to fill its empty houses, what was to make it as prosperous and as populous as it was supposed some ten years ago by Torontonians, it was about to become. The answer is, if I may say so, just episodically. People up the North-west Territories, fill the North-west Territories, make the North-west Territories populous, and there you will have customers for your manufactures for many a year, because ten, or even twenty years may elapse before in the North-west we shall have manufactures, and the people going in there will buy implements in the east. The Ontario farmer, when he has bought an implement, does not need another one for a few years, but there we ought to have an ever-expanding population sending to Toronto, and Montreal and other cities, for their products. Now, if we are to be as useful to the Empire as Canada is able to become, one of the things we must do, and one of the things the Imperial power should do, and is doing, is to make that North-west the teeming producer of products for the central part of the Empire. Anybody who has visited that country—and the leader of the Opposition has visited it, and appreciates it, as he has in many an eloquent word declared —will see that that North-west is capable of supplying all the food that at present is got from the United States. But, Mr. Speaker, in sending wheat to England, it is not the United States we have to fear. We can compete with the United States. If we had only the United States to compete with, wheat would not be what it is to-day, and I am sorry to see it is falling in price. What we have to fear is Argentina; we have to fear the great competition from Argentina; and it is possible, and I think even probable, that if the Empire were to accede to the proposal of my hon. friend, the result would not add even the farthing to the price of the loaf, that advantage could be given to the colonies without even adding the farthing to the price of the loaf.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How ?

Mr. DAVIN. I said it is possible, and even probable; and I will tell my hon. friend how. First, it might occur in this way, that whatever duty of advantage was given, whatever duty was placed upon wheat coming from foreign ports that was not placed upon wheat coming from Canada and Australia, that duty might be such as that the immense amount of wheat cultivation they have gone into in Argentina, and the cheapness of the methods by which they can produce wheat there, might enable it to jump over that barrier in order to compete with us. Under these circumstances it might do us little or no good. But the chances are that what would happen would be that, as Mr. Foster has calculated, some slight addition might be made to the cost of the loaf; and if so, and even after that, the chances are that we should get the advantage, because it is a well-known fact that the price of the loaf in Canada and the price of the loaf in England do not bear a strict relation to the price of wheat. As we know in Canada, it is one of the things that is very annoying to any one who takes an interest both in the farmer and in the poor; it is very annoying that wheat should drop and yet that the price of the loaf should remain the same, either because of combinations, or for what other reason it is not necessary for my purpose to inquire. On the other hand, sometimes wheat goes up, while the price of the loaf remains the same, so that the price of the loaf may not be enhanced at all, although the price of wheat to the producer of the flour, and ultimately to the producer of the loaf, might be enhanced.

Mr. McNEILL. I think it has been computed that a turn of as much as ten shillings a quarter might occur without changing the price of the loaf, that is to say, wheat might be ten shillings a quarter more than it is, say, at the present moment, and yet the price of the loaf not at all increased.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By what authority does the hon. gentleman say that ?

Mr. McNEILL. There was quite a discussion about that some years ago in England, and many persons who went into the subject very carefully, came to that conclusion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That depends on the bakers' profit.

Mr. McNEILL. Of course.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, Sir, those of us who believe in an Imperial policy for the Empire, not merely at Westminster, but here in Canada, under the southern cross, all the world over, wherever British power is felt, we take this view; I certainly take it, and I believe it is generally shared, that the inspiration for this Imperial expansion has really come from the colonies, the heroic blood that has come from the centre of the Empire to the extremities, has been given back to the old lands, and where these old lands seemed to falter, as though the weary Titan, to use Matthew Arnold's language:

> Staggered on to her goal;
> Bearing on shoulders immense,
> Atlantean the load,
> Wellnigh not to be borne,
> Of the too vast orb of her fate.

Where she seemed to falter, the colonies have said to her for years: Go on, what you have done in the past is nothing to what you may yet do. We consider the inspiration has come from the colonies, and, Sir, it is of good omen that we have now at the head of the Colonial Office a man of not merely practical—as practical in business matters as any of us, as practical in business matters as my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), as practical as the most thorough delver in statistics around or before me—but we have a man of ideas, a man full of new ideas, a man of energetic character, a man of political faith—Mr. Chamberlain. I believe you will find that he has already directed his mind to one of the weak spots in the Empire, and is about to make it all it ought to be, the Island of Dominica in the West Indies. That is one of the best parts of the Empire for development and exploitation, and Mr. Chamberlain intends to make it all it ought to be, a source of wealth to the Empire, a place where the sons of the Empire can go, and also a source of Imperial and warlike strength. Now, Sir, let me say this in conclusion. England has the greatest possible interest in adopting any policy of this kind that will bind her colonies closely to her, or will make her colonies feel a co-equal interest in her Imperial safety and her Imperial progress and advancement. She has the interest of self-preservation in it, because you have only to think for one minute how completely her commerce would be at the mercy of a hostile power if she were without the coaling stations of the Pacific, without coaling stations on the western Atlantic, without coaling stations in the Caribbean Sea, and among the Antilles. If she was without coaling stations in the southern seas, where would be this vast commerce that dreamers like my friend Goldwin Smith speak of as being all in all —if the Empire were to throw away Gibraltar, and throw away Canada, and throw away various portions of the earth, whether regarded from the point of view of commercial advantage, or as furnishing an impregnable world-wide panoply to the Empire itself? Why, Sir, her commerce, by a hostile power, could be cut completely away, and she could be reduced as though by the fiat of the Almighty to the helplessness of Holland. As I commenced, I conclude, that this is purely a question of commercial advantage, both to the colonies and England ; but the commercial advantage is small compared with the moral, the national, the Imperial advantage, the advantage that makes the wealth of life for the citizens of a great nation, the advantage that makes it so much a richer thing to be an Englishman, a citizen of this Empire, than to be the citizen of some paltry state, whose glory is of the past, and is now without weight in the councils of the world. All this has to be taken into account, the sentiment as well as the pounds, shillings and pence, and both in this matter, in my opinion, point in the same direction, and that is the adoption by this House of some such resolution as that of my hon. friend who has been, as he is now, one of the members in this House most open to receive new ideas, most ready to uphold here the interests of the Empire, and who will deserve this tribute when the history of the Imperial movement in Canada comes to be written, that he was the earliest, perhaps, I think the first, to press upon this House and press upon the country, with his enthusiastic spirit and eloquence and feeling words, the necessity of consolidating the great British Empire.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the resolution moved by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) consists of two parts. It contains, in the first place, a statement of the proposition which this House proclaimed four years ago, that it would be to the advantage of Canada to have preferential trade relations with the other parts of the Empire ; and, in the second place, a statement which now appears for the first time in specific form, though the principle was undoubtedly declared in that resolution which unanimously received the sanction of this House some weeks ago, that we have taken our place in the Empire, and her fortunes are ours. One word with respect to the second part of this resolution, which contemplates the creation of a fund for Imperial defence, a part of the resolution which, I think, will be most challenged by hon. members, if any part of it is challenged. Reading the text in the light of the statement which the hon. mover has made, it would seem to indicate very little more than that in this new way a fund would be raised, principally for an old service which has been provided for out of the consolidated revenue fund, and for other services to which the funds of this country are pledged, though these expenditures are not now bearing upon them. I understood the hon. mover to indicate that this defence fund, so-called, or this fund to be devoted to Imperial intercommunication and defence would cover the amount now incurred for the militia vote, the amount of the grant we are contemplating giving for a fast steam service, when the contract is entered into, and also the amount we intend to contribute for cable communication between this country and British possessions in the other half of the globe. If that is the substance of the scheme, it will probably excite little hostility, and though it might seem to be somewhat pretentious, yet, in fact, it would carry with it very little that is new. The import foreign trade of Canada, that is, goods for home consumption entering Canadian ports, amounted, last year, to the value of $70,000,000. It is clear that a very low duty, whatever rate or percentage the hon. mover may have had in his mind, a duty of 2½ per cent would easily cover the cost of those services, the militia vote, the vote for a fast steamship line and the proposed vote for Pacific cables. Of course, if the hon. mover contemplates a larger percentage than that, something like 5 per cent, which has often been spoken of, there would be a much larger fund raised than was necessary for those three services, and the discussion as to the disposal of that fund would undoubtedly raise new, large and embarrassing questions. But I take it that we may discuss the resolution in the light of the statements of the hon. gentlemen who have already spoken to it, and I take it for granted that the money raised will be enough for those services, called in the resolution Imperial services, a large word to describe them, yet, in a sense, they are truly Imperial. I take it, also, that we need not concern ourselves in this discussion with the idea that we are raising a fund for general Imperial purposes. If there were any large surplus available for that purpose, then new, and large, and difficult questions would be raised and have to be dealt with. The few remarks which I shall address to the House, will be confined almost entirely to the part of the resolution which has reference to preferential trade. Even if so large a figure as 5 per cent were put in that resolution, where the words "a small duty" are spoken of, that, in my judgment, would be altogether too small a figure to give an effective preference. If this resolution were adopted by the British communities, so that there was levied a 5 per cent toll on the existing values of all goods coming from foreign countries into British ports, that would not give us in Canada a sufficient preference to be very effective. An arrangement of that sort throughout the Empire would, in my view, have to be supplemented in Canada by a special arrangement with the people of the British West India Islands. I look with very great hope to some such supplementary arrangement with these British communities in the West Indies to which my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) referred with so much eloquence this afternoon. I look to some arrangement with them as supplementary to the project outlined in this resolution, and which would make a very much larger preference between us and them. If we should leave our tariffs as they are at present, and put 5 per cent duty on the goods coming from all foreign countries to Canadian ports, my view would be that it would be necessary to lower our duties on British West India products by 5 per cent, or, possibly, by 7½ per cent. This would create a double preference, as it were, between Canada and the West India Islands, and it undoubtedly would be a powerful influence in developing trade between those two countries. In spite of the heroic efforts made by this Parliament in the way of subsidizing steamers to the West India Islands, the position of our trade with them is discouraging. Twenty-two years ago, our total trade with the West India Islands was, in round numbers, six million dollars a year, but in 1895 it only amounted to eight and a half million dollars, a very inadequate growth indeed, having regard to that long period of time and the efforts we have made to develop our trade. Hon. members who are more familiar with the condition of trade and tariffs in the West Indies than I am, tell me that this is a peculiarly favourable juncture for opening up this whole question of trade between our people and the people of the West India Islands. My information is, that the West Indies, including British Guiana, are buying something like $45,000,000 worth of products of the kind that we in Canada can export, such as flour, lumber, fish, hay, and other agricultural products, as well as boots and shoes in the manufacturing line. Canada is able to supply them with every dollar's worth of that $45,000,000 which they import. The question with us is : How to get that market ? We have tried by way of steamship subsidies to get a larger hold on that market, but our success has been very limited. Experts, in the city from which I come, experts who have spent a lifetime in that trade, are, at least some of them, possessed with the idea that if a preferential duty of 10 per cent, or 12½ per cent, were in force, we could wrest that commerce out of the channels in which it has been running for twenty years, and bring it back to its natural channels. This would give us an export trade of almost half as much more as we are now enjoying. But it may be said : Why have you not succeeded already in this line ? Well, practical men are discouraged. They have tried in St. John, they have tried in Halifax, to make a rapid and considerable extension of their trade, but so far without success. The answer to the question I have put is, that trade has set in so strongly in the deep channels already worn, that these steamship subsidies were not strong enough to divert trade from these channels. Although Canada was producing a considerable part of the lumber and other products that were sent to the West Indies, the middlemen in the United States were doing the carrying trade, and making the profit. Every one who is connected with that commerce knows that the great difficulty is the return trade to Canada, and that, while we can furnish all of that $45,000,000 worth of goods that I speak of, we are not able to buy back from them anything like that amount of their produce. The things which we can buy, and which they sell, are limited in number. They are confined mainly to four or five items, such as sugar, molasses, coffee, fresh fruits and precious woods, such as dye woods and the like. And, while under some such trade bargain as this, we might buy pretty much of all these things, which we need, from them, even then we would not, by any manner of means, need $45,000,000 worth. Sugar, for instance, is the largest item we would take from them. Last year Canada bought 345,000,000 pounds of sugar, a very large figure, indicating very great prosperity and a high standard of living among the people of this country. That was imported free of duty, but did it all come from the British West India Islands ? Not at all. From the British West India Islands we imported the very small amount of 30,000,000 pounds, little more than one-twelfth our total import. Experts in the sugar trade, of whom we have some in this House, say that the large preferential duty we speak of would throw the bulk of that trade into the channel between the British West India Islands and ourselves, and would divert it from its present origin in the Spanish West India Islands, the Dutch colonies, and the far east, and, of course, Germany, whence we get our beet-root sugar. If this were accomplished, it would be a great result to achieve. In the matter of coffee, last year we bought considerably more than 3,000,000 pounds, not more than one-sixth of which was taken from our own West India colonies. Yet it is admitted, by those who are familiar with the coffee business, that the British West India Islands are growing an admirable coffee, and are able to bring it to a very high state of perfection indeed. Even as regards the coffee trade, we have something very considerable to offer these islands in return. Then, as regards fruit. We bought half a million dollars' worth of bananas alone, and, strange to say, we bought nearly all of that from middlemen in the United States. $457,000 worth of bananas were brought from American jobbers, and the small remainder came from the West India Islands. Out of a total of $60,000 worth of pineapples which we bought last year, the direct importation from the West India Islands amounted to almost nothing. As to oranges, no doubt even with preferential duties, during some seasons of the year, we would buy from the United States. But a preferential duty would, I believe, largely increase our imports from the West Indies in that item alone. We have also a very large trade in molasses, and, with a considerable preferential duty, almost the whole of that commodity would come from the British West India Islands, including Guiana. In the light of these facts, if we can accomplish half of this result by completing the arrangement suggested by my hon. friend from North Bruce, it would not then be a difficult task to induce our West India neighbours to come to a special arrangement with ourselves in Canada, and agree to a differential duty, and thus open up between us a large trade, which would make our maritime cities like St. John and Halifax go forward by leaps and bounds, afford employment to the vessels sailing to our maritime ports, and be of no inconsiderable value to the lumber producers and manufacturers of boots and shoes in Quebec, and to the growers of wheat and the producers of dairy products in Ontario and the west. So, Mr. Speaker, I single out this point for emphasis, as being, though a small part, yet a practical part of the larger subject, and urge that it should be considered with sympathy and favour by the House. If it were possible, in connection with some of the exhibitions which are coming on next year—a big one is promised in Toronto—to get influence enough, through the Colonial Office or in some other way, to induce eight or ten of the foremost men of the West India Islands—the real leaders of their legislatures—to come up to one of our cities and meet our own public men, and realize the tie of brotherhood, and discuss the subject in a full and friendly way, it is probable that some such arrangement might be perfected. Before I sit down, let me emphasize the idea that, from all the information we can gather from the West India papers, and from men who have gone down there and talked with business men, the present seems a peculiarly favourable juncture for working out this project. The statement is made that when the McKinley Bill passed through Congress, and when Mr. Blaine had added to it that famous clause providing for the making of treaty arrangements between his own country and the West Indies and the Spanish republics to the south, large numbers of the sugar planters in our own colonies turned their faces to the United States, and were almost giving their trade to that country, alleging that they could make better terms with the United States than with England. They made treaty and tariff arrangements with the United States, but these arrangements were scarcely made before they were broken up. Now their tariffs and their trade are in a state of confusion, and before they settle down to some fixed policy, in view of the present peculiarly favourable conditions, why should we not seek to open up some such arrangement as is suggested? For these reasons, and, having regard to this very narrow part of the large project, and for many other and larger reasons, I have great pleasure in supporting the resolution of my hon. friend from North Bruce.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, the House will, without dissent, I imagine, give to the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) the credit of deep earnestness in the matter which he has brought before its attention to-day, and will also credit him with the possession of patriotic motives in the course he has taken. He has pride in the achievements of the race to which he belongs; he is warmly attached to the motherland; and upon this occasion, as well as upon other occasions, he has urged upon this House measures which he has deemed likely to increase the power of the great Empire of which Canada forms a part. I appreciate most fully the character of his motives. I sympathize most fully with his motives, although I am unable to agree fully with the methods he proposes to adopt for the purpose of arriving at the results he desires. I have listened also with great pleasure to the characteristic speech of my hon. friend the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in which he indulged in those rare flights of fancy which he commands with greater facility than any other member of this House. I enjoyed his speech thoroughly, although I do not know that in cold fact and logic it had a very great amount of weight with me. It is unnecessary to say, Mr. Speaker, that the feeling that exists in this Dominion with regard to England and the interests of the Empire is a feeling warmer than friendship. It is unnecessary to say that Canada is thoroughly loyal, or that the people of Canada take pride in the achievements of the parent state, and will unite their efforts to those of other English-speaking people, as far as their abilities will permit, for the good of the Empire. The people of this country desire to see England extend her possessions; they desire to see her Empire grow, realizing that wherever her power is extended, a blessing is carried to the race that is brought under the influence of her institutions. We know the influence exerted by England's occupancy of Egypt; we know that that nation has had, for the first time since the days of the Ptolemies, good government and just laws properly administered, and that its finances have been brought to such a sound and healthy condition that to-day it has a surplus of over a million pounds sterling. We know the influence that England has exerted upon the hundreds of millions of India—an influence which has been a blessed one in every respect—an influence which is raising that vast population year by year up to a higher plane in the scale of humanity. We are willing,—we are more than willing, we are anxious—that England shall paint Africa red—British red ; that she shall extend her dominion from Cairo to Cape Town ; that she shall bear sway from the valley of the Nile to the great lakes of the interior, over the valley of the Zambesi, and over the whole of South Africa. We desire, if possible, that she shall control Syria and the valley of the Euphrates. We believe it would be a blessing to humanity if she had under her sway as many hundreds of millions of Chinamen as she has of Indians. England's Empire is the most wonderful empire that has ever existed in the history of man, and it is necessary, if England is to maintain her Empire, that she shall maintain her power on the sea. The sea power is the one essential element in England's greatness. She has purchased that power by centuries of struggle. Her grim sea kings have won battle after battle on the sea, and she has purchased her right to be the great naval power of the world by her own prowess. Kipling says very beautifully :

> There's not a wave goes shoreward now,
> But lifts some keel that we manned ;
> There's not an ebb goes seaward now,
> But drops our dead on the sand.

And it is the price paid in blood and heroic struggle that makes England the great naval power she is to-day. This naval power, as I have said, is England's safeguard ; it is her life. Her possessions are scattered over the whole surface of the globe, and she maintains her communication with those possessions by the sea. If her free road upon the sea were blocked by any other nation or by a combination of nations, and her naval power were destroyed, the British Empire would fall to pieces. She would have no more cohesion than a rope of sand. Therefore it is essential that England should maintain this power. It is a power necessary to her existence—not to ours, and it is not incumbent upon us to make contributions to the naval power of England, or to the military power of England, so far as these powers are exercised, either for the maintenance of her chains of communication, or for the extension of her possessions. I shall show later on that we ourselves have made contributions in the direction of building up Imperial power which are ample, considering our circumstances, and which should entitle us to the thanks of the motherland.

My hon. friend, the mover of this resolution, dwelt at considerable length upon the question of preferential trade. His dream undoubtedly is that we may have established again, not exactly a reproduction of the old English corn laws, but a modification of that policy which shall tax the food products that England requires for the use of her millions, and exempt from such taxation the products of her colonies. This kind of preferential trade, if obtainable, would have very much to recommend it to the people of this country. If we could have preferential treatment in the English market for our breadstuff, a preferential treatment sufficiently pronounced to amount to a substantial advantage, it would be a dream that would go a long way towards reconciling the people of this country to such an arrangement. But I do not admit that it is anything more than a dream. I do not imagine that the matter is within the bounds of possibility at all. I do not suppose that the English nation, after having adopted free trade, and after having lived for half a century under that system and risen with such marvellous rapidity to the rank of the first commercial and manufacturing power in the world, is likely to reverse that policy. There unquestionably is an element in the English population which is in favour of such a policy. No doubt the agricultural interest would favour it, but the agricultural interest does not control English politics, and it is the only interest that would favour such a policy. Such a policy would be inimical to English manufacturing and commercial interests. Their policy is to have the raw materials used in manufacturing laid down at the smallest possible cost. Among these is food stuffs, and England will never consent to lose the great advantage which she has, as a manufacturing nation, by enhancing the cost of her food or any other raw material that enters into the consumption of her people. The character of England's trade at present and its character for the last half century is such as to preclude the reasonable entertainment of any such proposition. Twenty-three per cent of her imports were from British possessions last year, and 33 per cent of her exports were to British possessions. Her imports from countries not under the British flag amounted to over 70 per cent of her entire imports, and her exports to countries not under the British flag amounted to between 66 and 67 per cent of her entire exports. It is preposterous to suppose that England will adopt a policy calculated to injure the great bulk of her trade, for the benefit of the smaller amount of trade I have mentioned. My hon. friend, in the course of his remarks, drew a very pleasant illustration, by supposing that some individual owned two orchards, one of which was just coming into bearing and the other was just going out of bearing, but still bearing much more than the young garden. He compared the colonies of England to young fruit orchards that had vast expansion before them, while the other nations were old and effete and not likely to increase their trade, and he followed up this by saying that in a few years the trade of Canada would equal that of the United States. With all deference to my hon. friend, I must say that he undoubtedly made this statement upon the spur of the moment without realizing how preposterous it was. The United States to-day possess nearly 70,000,000 inhabitants. Canada possesses a little more than 5,000,000. Now, we have no reason to suppose that our prospective growth would be so rapid as to bring us up alongside the United States in population and resources.

Mr. McNEILL. I think that perhaps I may not have made myself clear upon that point. What I intended to say, and what I thought I did say, was that in a comparatively short time, as we count the age of nations, the trade of Canada would be equal to the trade of the United States of to-day.

Mr. CHARLTON. Even with the hon. gentleman's explanation, I think this statement is still wide of the mark. The United States in 1790 had 3,900,000 inhabitants. At the end of fifty years, in 1840, they had 17,000,000 inhabitants. Canada in 1871 had 3,635,000, about 300,000 less than the United States had at the commencement of the period I have mentioned. Two decades of fifty years have passed, and Canada, if it maintains the average of growth and increase of population that it did between 1871 and 1891, will have in 1921, 7,450,000, and at the expiry of fifty years, it will have about the amount of population that the United States had at the expiration of the first twenty years of their fifty years period I have referred to. We are not increasing fast enough. Last decade our increase was less than 12 per cent, and the decade before last it was less than 19 per cent; and a careful student of public affairs, who watches the rate of progression enjoyed by this and other countries, must be aware that one will be a long time in reaching the position in which we will be an important nationality, at the present rate of progress.

Mr. McNEILL. We want our preferential trade.

Mr. CHARLTON. We might have something better, and I shall point that out later. However, if we could get preferential trade, if corn duties were imposed from which Canada would be exempt, I would be inclined to look over the matter very carefully before pronouncing against it. But I think the proposition is an impossibility.

My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) scouted the idea of taking a merely ledger view of things. He wanted a spiritual, transcendental, esthetic view of national affairs. I believe the English people take a ledger view of things largely. One of the great objects of the English nation in extending their colonial possessions, in bringing other people under the British flag, is to increase their market. That is the great need of England, an outlet for the products of her factories. She is able to supply 100,000,000 people more than she does, she is able so to increase her output as to supply nearly the whole world; and the expansion of her trade, the increase of her wealth, are the elements that enter into the calculations of British statesmen in adopting a policy of extending her possessions. My hon. friend referred to the low price of wheat in the Argentine republic, and he thought that this preferential theory could be adopted and a duty imposed upon wheat to the advantage of the colonies, which would increase the price of wheat largely in England, without increasing the price of the loaf. In other words, that all the advantage which the British colonies were to gain from the increased price received by them for their grain, was to be taken out of the pockets of the English bakers. I hold that that is a most absurd proposal. It will be impossible materially and permanently to increase the price of grain, under the operation of preferential duties, without the effect of that policy being felt by the consumers in England. And speaking of the Argentine Republic, speaking of the cheap wheat from that country and from India, it is well to bear in mind that the people of Canada to a small extent, and the people of the United States to a much larger extent are responsible for the opening up of the wheat fields of the Argentine Republic and of India. The people of the United States in 1861 adopted a protective policy. The object of that policy was to exclude English goods from their markets. The result of that policy was to compel England to seek other sources of supply, where she could procure food products in exchange for the products of her own labour. Acting under the stress of that necessity she expended vast sums of money in opening up the resources of India. She brought into competition with other wheat-growing countries the wheat region of that part of her Empire. She carried out the same policy in the Argentine Republic. The opening up of these newer wheat regions is the result of the protective policy adopted by the great food-producing nations that were the natural consumers of the English manufacturers. If the United States of America had continued to live under a moderate revenue tariff, if Canada had never adopted a protective policy, it would at least have put off the necessity for England securing other food supplies from other sources. We may thank ourselves partially and the American protectionists largely for opening up these wheat fields which supply wheat to England at these abnormally low prices.

My hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), in the course of his speech, which was directed almost exclusively to the maritime provinces in connection with the trade of the West Indies, informed us that the development of that trade has been very unsatisfactory, that the increase had only been from $6,000,000, in round numbers, to $8,000,000, in round numbers, during a long period of years. He admitted inferentially that we sell to the West Indies as much as we buy of them, that we bought all we required and gave in exchange our own products. But he deems it possible to take the whole of the West India surplus of sugar, molasses and bananas and other fruits, and bring them into Canada and make money upon them by acting as factors and middlemen and pay for them in exports of our own goods.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And pay for the privilege.

Mr. CHARLTON. He wonders why we buy bananas from the United States instead of importing them direct. The reason is because the trade in bananas is so vast, particularly between the United States and Jamaica, that a line of steamers is run from New York and other ports, making trips two or three times a week, and making the trip from Jamaica in three or four days. We do not use enough of the fruit to establish the communication necessary to bring it in rapidly and in fresh condition, so we buy in small quantities from the great importing country in conformity with the well-known laws of trade. Then, with regard to oranges. We do not buy West India oranges, nor does anybody else to any considerable extent, I believe. The oranges used in this country are, or at least until the frost of last year they were, principally from Florida. The West India oranges do not compare in quality with Floridas or Californias. I think if we were to pay a little more attention to the developments of markets right at our doors, and gave a little less attention to the Australian trade, the Sandwich Island trade, the West India trade, the South African trade, and trade with other points at the ends of the earth, it would be much better for us. We could develop trade with our neighbours who number nearly seventy millions with less difficulty and with less expenditure of money—in fact with no expense at all—if only we would adopt a proper commercial policy.

My hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) told us, in the course of his speech that a great Imperial movement was now in progress, and that this great Imperial movement marching on was bringing us to the realization of a great confederation of the English-speaking nationalities, the United States excluded. Well, there is undoubtedly a feeling among the colonies of England and a feeling in England also that tends to draw these communities more into accord with each other. The means of intercommunication are growing better every year, and these nationalities are brought more into contact with each other, their commercial relations are more intimate, and there is a feeling existing among them of friendliness. It is well that such is the case, and that feeling cannot exist to too great an extent. But, so far as a confederation is concerned, it strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that there are many obstacles in the way. For instance, in Canada we have established a Government. This is a confederation and——

Mr. McNEILL. May I ask my hon. friend to explain what he means by a confederation, so that we may understand exactly what he is discussing.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose it would be difficult for the hon. gentleman to say what he meant by a confederation.

Mr. McNEILL. I have said nothing whatever about a confederation.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman was speaking about a great Imperial movement tending towards confederation.

Mr. McNEILL. No, no ; excuse me. My hon. friend must not put words into my mouth. I made no reference whatever to a confederation in my speech. I quoted an extract from a speech of Lord Salisbury, but I made no reference, for my part, to a confederation.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman's resolution asks for the imposition of a > Small duty (irrespective of any existing tariff) be levied, by each member of the Empire against foreign products imported by them, and that the proceeds from such duties be devoted to purposes of Imperial intercommunication and naval defence.

Mr. McNEILL. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman expects to carry that plan out without machinery, without arrangements, without an understanding, without force to collect duties or a basis for apportioning them, or to decide how the moneys thus collected shall be expended. The whole drift of the hon. gentleman's movement looks to the establishment of some system between the British colonies and Great Britain of a mutual character, that must be in the form of a confederation of an alliance or a government.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sure my hon. friend will allow me to explain that there is nothing in this resolution which proposes to take the administration of these things out of the hands of the local authorities who now administer them. I intended to say that, and thought I had said it ; but if not, I wish now to explain it to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am afraid the hon. gentleman's arrangement, under such circumstances, would be a good deal like the American confederation that existed for ten years in which the various states were to contribute voluntarily certain sums for the common defence. But the scheme was found to be unworkable, for the various states, if left to their own free will, did not contribute much, and the government could not be carried on. If this plan is to be made effective, if there is to be a union of interests between England and her colonies, there must be some system of confederation, some system by which a central authority shall have control, some authority under which taxes shall be collected, and which shall decide how the revenues shall be distributed to the parties to the agreement. If we are to reach the consummation of such a project, how is it to be carried out? Are we to have a central parliament charged with federal duties? If so, how is it to be constituted and how are its members to be chosen? How are its members to be apportioned? Is it to be on a basis of population? Is India, with her 275,000,000 souls, to be represented on a basis of population, as well as Canada and Australia and England? And what is the jurisdiction of that parliament to be? And how are taxes to be levied? And how are they to be expended or apportioned? Sir, if we attempt anything of this kind, we drift inevitably to a condition of things where a great central power is created. And that being so, we are abdicating our own powers of self-government to a certain extent. It must necessarily be so. I think it is high time, when considering this question, that we should stop and consider what the ultimate consequences will be, and conclude to guard against a policy that may result in absolute Imperial control. We are loyal, we admire our motherland, we wish her victory by land and sea, we will to the utmost in our ability aid in securing such results. But we cannot abdicate our powers of self-government, we cannot place ourselves and our interests in the hands of some great central power. This is a Dominion, with its institutions established, with its form of government thoroughly planted upon this continent, and we must maintain this Dominion and its autonomy, and all its powers intact. While yielding to England good-will and a desire to forward her wishes, we cannot, and will not, abdicate our powers.

Now, Canada has failed in the past to discharge properly and fully her obligations to the Empire? Can Canada be accused to-day of having been niggardly, of having turned a deaf ear to appeals of the mother country, of having failed to discharge her duties as a dutiful and loyal daughter to the motherland? I say, no. I say there is no reason for the arguments that are used for the creation of a condition of things that implies that Canada has not heretofore done fully what she ought to have done. What have we done? We spent $70,000,000 to create an Imperial highway across this continent. We gave, in addition to that 18,000,000 acres of fertile land—I refer to our having purchased back a portion of that and added $10,000,000 to the cash cost—to create an Imperial highway that is as important to England as to ourselves. Now, I say that is a contribution that ought to excuse this country from further contributions for half a century. But we have done more. We gave subsidies to steamship lines, we propose to establish a fast Atlantic line from Canada to England, with the object of advancing our own interests, and British interests as well. We propose to increase our steamship facilities from the west coast to Australia, and we built at our own expense the great graving dock at Esquimalt, where the great naval depot of England upon the Pacific is situated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not altogether.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps not altogether, but largely, we contributed our money liberally to that. In doing all these things, we have incurred a crushing burden of debt. The magnitude of our debt is due largely to our contributions for Imperial purposes, for the purpose of building up the British Empire, of doing loyally our part as a portion of that Empire, in laying the foundations of that Empire, and securing its future growth and greatness. Our fixed charges and expenses are now heavy; they are so heavy that we cannot prudently increase them. They are heavier than they should be. We pay annually nearly $11,000,000 in interest upon our public debt. We have other fixed charges, and our expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund of $38,000,000 a year, is ten millions greater than it ought to be, measured by the resources of the country. Now, we talk about reducing these expenditures, about economy, about retrenchment. Well, Mr. Speaker, with the fixed charges, and the absolute necessity resting upon us to meet other charges, a very large reduction of these expenditures is impossible; four or five millions would be the utmost limit of the retrenchment that could be effected. Under this condition of things, it is not to be thought of for a moment that we should add to our burdens for Imperial purposes; it is out of the question. We have paid enough for Imperial purposes already. We have contributed sums for Imperial purposes that should excuse us from any further demands.

Now, if the proposition of my hon. friend were carried into effect, I think that he intimated that somewhere about 5 per cent would be a pretty modest special tax in the shape of a special tariff for the purpose of aiding Imperial communication and defence. Suppose we levied a tax of 5 per cent, that would not be doing anything of any great consequence. Last year our imports from other British possessions were $33,800,000; our total imports were $105,252,000. After exempting imports from British possessions, we would have to levy a 5 per cent duty for the purpose of my hon. friend's resolution, upon $71,443,000, and a 5 per cent burden upon this amount, would be $3,572,000. Now, under the condition of things that exist at present, we cannot sand that, we are not in a condition to add $3,572,000 to our burdens.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He makes the farmers pay it.

Mr. CHARLTON. One feature of this tax would be that we would tax cotton, tax wool, tax other raw materials that now enter this country free of duty. Now, I can tell the hon. gentleman of a better way to aid England than the way he proposes.

Mr. McNEILL. Would my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him ? The proposal was not to increase the tax to that amount, but that the present military expenditure of the country and the subsidies for steamship lines, both existing and prospective, so far as the fast Atlantic line was concerned, would be included, and that not a very great deal would be left over from the 5 per cent for increased expenditure for defence.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I am unable to understand, if we are to spend the money for expenses we are now meeting, what the necessity of this resolution is. But, as I was about to say, I think I can point out a better system of showing our good will to the motherland, and aiding the motherland, than the one my hon. friend proposes, and the policy I would recommend the House to adopt would be to let up on the restrictions we impose now upon our commerce with England. Our imports from England in 1873 were $68,522,000 ; the duty upon those imports that year amounted to $7,398,000 ; the rate of duty was 10·8 per cent. Our imports in 1895 had fallen more than one-half the amount they stood at in 1873. In 1895 they were $31,131,000 as against $68,522,000 in 1873. The duty on this smaller amount was almost as great as upon the double amount, and was $7,006,000, or at the rate of 22½ per cent upon the entire bulk of our importation from England last year. Now our imports from Britain last year were the least since 1879 ; they were $7,585,000 less than they were the preceding year. I think, under the circumstances, it must certainly strike hon. members that it would be a good idea to adopt some policy that would check this great diminution of our trade with England, considering that it has fallen to less than half the amount in 1873, and had fallen $7,006,000 in one short year. We imported from England last year, of dutiable goods, $23,311,000. We raised in duties upon that amount $7,006,000. The rate of duty upon dutiable goods imported from England last year was 30 per cent. Last year we imported, of dutiable goods, from the United States $25,795,000. We collected in duty $6,897,000, or a percentage rate of 26 7-10ths ; so that we discriminated against England, as regards dutiable imports, to the extent of 3 7-10ths per cent, we collecting 30 per cent on dutiable imports from England, and 26 3-10ths on dutiable imports from the United States. It is a singular fact that the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), and every other hon. member who is a supporter of Imperial Federation, is a supporter of the policy that thus discriminates against England, and has reduced our imports from that country from $68,500,000 in 1873 to $31,000,000 in 1895. I would recommend the hon. member for North Bruce to turn his attention to that branch of the subject, with the design of applying the honest and earnest efforts he is now bestowing on the principle of preferential trade to the propriety of diminishing our burdens on English commerce and trade, so as to permit us to trade with England on at least as favourable terms as with the United States.

We, in Canada, are subduing a wilderness, and, in addition to all the contributions I have mentioned amounting to $100,000,000, for Imperial purposes, we are opening up a great new land, we are constructing highways, we are bringing that country under cultivation, we are laying the foundation of an empire, and we are doing this at the cost of personal sacrifice, public resources, and we are doing it, not for Canada alone, but for the great Empire of which Canada is a part : and our contributions to Imperial purposes are, I hold, as large as we could reasonably be asked to make, and our contributions are given to a degree that should entitle us to credit and to thanks.

England is engaged in vast schemes of conquest and the extension of her possessions in the Eastern Hemisphere. As I said a few moments ago, we wish her success, we watch her progress with pride, and no degree of prosperity she can make will exceed our wishes and our desires. But, as a Dominion, as a people, we have no direct interest in England's conquests in the Eastern Hemisphere. It does not matter to us, so far as our interests are concerned, if she pushes her acquisition of territory up the Zambesi and beyond that up to Lake Tanganika, and on to Victoria Nyanza, and down the valley of the Nile, covering 36 degrees of latitude. We desire she should do so, and we are proud of the fact that she is doing it. It would not be an unfortunate day if four hundred millions of Chinese were to be brought under British rule, it would be a good thing for the Chinese ; but, as regards contributing money for a purpose of carrying forward these vast schemes of aggrandizement, we are not called upon to do it. It is not our duty to do so. We are working in our sphere, and we have all we can do to keep working within that sphere.

On this continent the only foreign relations we can possibly have are with the United States ; the only foreign interests we can possibly have are with that country, and, in the event of trouble, and of war with the United States, what would our contribution be ? Our contribution would be a devasted country, burning cities and towns, hundreds of thousands of graves on our soil, a soil soaked with blood. We would fight to the death—it would be a fight to the death—but we could not reasonably be expected to do more than it was possible for us to do in case of strife, which, God grant, may never come, between Great Britain and the United States. We cannot, then, afford to inaugurate an aggressive policy on this continent, and we have nothing to do with an aggressive policy on the other continents. I respect my hon. friend's aspirations, his dream of a unity of the various confederations and commonwealths under the British flag. It is a beautiful, a grand dream ; but I indulge at times in a grander one. I think sometimes that it would be worth while to conciliate and to open up negotiations with the seven-twelfths of the English-speaking race that dwell in the country to the south of us. The English flag waves over five-twelfths of the English-speaking race, and the Stars and Stripes wave over seven-twelfths. If a confederation of England and all her colonies would be an imperial power, what would be a confederation, an alliance, that embraced within its folds all the English-speaking people of the world, the 125,000,000 that speak the English tongue ? I believe that the interests of humanity would be promoted by such an alliance as they could be promoted in no other way. I believe such an alliance is within the bounds of possibility. I believe it requires merely mutual forbearance, cultivation of friendly relations, manifestations of good-will and interest in the affairs of one another, to knit these two great nations together, and it is a grander dream than the dream in which my hon. friend indulges ; it is a dream the consummation of which is at least worthy of our energies and our efforts to see if it can be secured.

The best course, then, to adopt, I may say in conclusion, is to look abroad over the world, to realize that we ourselves have a mission, that we have laid the foundations of a great power here, that we have our laws, our institutions, our commerce, our legislative independence and our fiscal independence, that these have been granted to us by the motherland that their continued possession is a boon which we should cherish and never release. We should remember that we are placed in a position where we can exercise an influence potent in its nature upon the relations between the great Empire of which we form a part and the United States of America. Our policy, our sentiments expressed, our course pursued in regard to the relations existing between this country and the United States, must have an influence and effect upon the relations between that country and motherland. We can smooth the way for good relations and alliance, or we can sow dragon's teeth and the seeds of bitterness ; we can exhibit, at least, a spirit of conciliation and good neighbourhood, and, while loyal to our motherland, anxious to see English power extend and that power increased day by day, we can extend the scope of our dreams and the theatre of our desires and seek to secure an alliance, a confederation, if you choose to term it so, that would be all-powerful to control the destinies of this globe, the exercise of the power of which would inevitably be for the best interests of mankind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House long, but I can hardly allow this discussion to pass without offering a few remarks. The hon. mover of this resolution has stated that he acceded to my request to make a slight alteration in the motion, as it appears on the paper. While desiring to thank him for that alteration before submitting the motion to the House, I wish to express my regret that I had not an opportunity of conferring with the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) before this resolution was placed on the paper. If I had had the pleasure of being consulted by my hon. friend I would not have advised the placing of the resolution upon the paper, although I subscribe in the most hearty and emphatic way to every word contained in the speech of the hon. gentleman. The speech was a very admirable one in favour of a most important measure ; probably as important a measure as could occupy the attention of the House, in the interests of Canada, and it was also a very able speech in favour of preferential trade within the Empire. I am entirely at one with my hon. friend on that question. I believe I had not even the honour of being in Parliament at the time the resolution was placed upon the paper, but if I had had an opportunity of being consulted, I would have suggested to the hon. gentleman not to embody that feature in the resolution, to which exception has been taken by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I will say frankly to the House why. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has correctly said, that this resolution embodies the proposal propounded by Mr. Hoffmeyer, a very eminent South African statesman, who took part in the colonial conference in 1887. That resolution obtained a good deal of attention, and consideration at that time, but after having been discussed and subjected to a considerable amount of criticism, I may say that the proposition fell flat, and it has not since been urged, nor has it assumed any prominence in regard to this question of inter-Imperial trade. The objections taken by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) are, I think, however, entirely fallacious. The objection that it necessarily involves a federation is quite outside the scope of the resolution itself, and outside of any remarks which fell from the hon. mover of it. The proposal is a very plain and simple one, and it is: That a small duty shall be imposed, not by any Federal Parliament or anything of that kind, but that a small duty shall be imposed by the different portions of the Empire—the United Kingdom on its own behalf, Canada on its own behalf, and the Australasian and South African colonies on their behalf. The proposition is that each government, the Imperial Government, and the governments of the various colonies shall, of their own motion, and on their own behalf, impose this small duty, in addition to existing duties, for the purpose of providing a fund to maintain the common defence of the Empire—not a common defence fund to be administered by a central power or authority, but to be administered by the different portions of the Empire, as at present. I hold—and I presume hon. gentlemen in this House will not differ with me—that expenditure for the defence of Canada is expenditure for the defence of the Empire, in its highest sense. And, whether it be to maintain a fast line of steamers, to act as Royal naval reserve cruisers in time of war, or whether it be to maintain a small permanent force, or a large militia or voluntary force in this country, I say that it is essentially a defence of the Empire, for I hold that Canada is as much a portion of the Empire as Yorkshire is, and I regard, therefore, that whatever expenditure is made by Canadians for the defence of Canada, is made as absolutely for the defence of the Empire, as any similar expenditure that is made in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). On what products is this duty to be imposed?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not propose to go very much into that, because, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) has observed, I do not favour that feature of the resolution. At the same time, I would be quite prepared to vote for this resolution, recognizing the fact that the money derived from this tax would be expended as now by the Government of Canada, whoever they may be, for either naval or land defences, in precisely the same way that we are now regulating our militia expenditure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would the hon. gentleman, then, be in favour of a uniform principle agreed upon; that the same articles should be taxed in all portions of the Empire?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not go into that question at all. I simply say that if this were the only means by which we could obtain preferential trade within the Empire, I would be prepared to adopt the policy contained in this resolution, in order to achieve that great purpose. But I do not believe that it is necessary. I believe that the question of preferential inter-Imperial trade is in such a position, that this is not required, and I doubt very much if it would be materially advanced by the passage of this resolution. I state my position thus frankly to the House, because if it were absolutely necessary to secure the policy, of the products of the colonies being admitted into the United Kingdom free of duty, and having that advantage over similar products from foreign countries; if it were necessary in order to obtain that, I would be prepared to vote for the policy contained in this resolution. But I do not think it is necessary and I will state, briefly, to the House why.

I have had an opportunity—perhaps a better opportunity than most hon. gentlemen in this House have had—of witnessing the progress of this question of preferential trade. That policy was propounded, as the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has recited, by Mr. Hoffmeyer, in a similar form to that which is presented by the resolution today. Although it attracted some attention at the time, no special action was taken upon it, but an organization was formed in the United Kingdom, called the United Empire Trade League. That Trade League is presided over by the Right Hon. James Lowther, a man of very considerable ability and of high standing in the Imperial Parliament, but a gentleman who, I think, has rather retarded, to some extent, the policy of the organization over which he presides, from the fact that he is an avowed protectionist. He is almost the only one I know in the Imperial Parliament; for although there are a great many protectionists there, and very strong ones, too, Mr. Lowther is, in my judgment, almost the only one who is an avowed protectionist, and who stands by that policy in season and out of season. I think he would have accomplished more than he has accomplished if he did not avow in the same open manner his belief in the old policy of protection. The policy of the United Kingdom has been so emphatically a free trade policy that the avowal by Mr. Lowther of those protectionist principles has, I think, rather retarded the movement.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It generally does, in any country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am much obliged to my hon. friend for the support he has given to my view. I was going to say that Sir Howard Vincent, a very active able and energetic member of the House of Commons, is the secretary of the United Empire Trade League, and that the avowed policy of that organization, proclaimed to the world, and agitated in season and out of season, is the imposition by the Imperial Parliament of a duty upon the products of foreign countries coming into the United Kingdom, and the free admission of all colonial products, from whatever part of the Empire they may come. The efforts of that organization were materially strengthened, and were given additional influence in Parliament by the adoption, in 1892, by a large majority of the Canadian House of Commons, of a resolution declaring in favour of a similar policy, and offering, on the part of Canada, that when Great Britain would admit into the United Kingdom the products of Canada on more favourable terms than the products of foreign countries, Canada would be prepared to make a substantial return in the tariff on British goods. I say that movement attracted a good deal of attention in England, and gave great additional force and zest to the policy of the United Empire Trade League. The United Empire Trade League was mainly directed in the outset to the policy of protecting the manufacturing and agricultural industries of the United Kingdom against foreign competition, and they embodied with that policy the free admission of all colonial products as a means of advancing and developing the Empire itself. They pointed out the very important fact that the development of the colonies was a matter of vital consequence to the advancement of Imperial trade. Every person who has been watching the condition of trade matters in the United Kingdom, knows that a most serious falling off has taken place in the exports of its industries. It is so serious that from 1890 to 1894 there was a decline in the export of the products of English and Irish industry of nearly £48,000,000 sterling. That was a very striking circumstance, and one that naturally arrested a good deal of attention, and has been made great use of by the friends of the policy to which I have adverted as a means of improving the trade of the United Kingdom. I need not remind any gentleman in this House—for the Queen's Speech refers to it in the strongest and most emphatic terms—of the present deplorable condition of the agricultural industry of the United Kingdom. If I remember that reference correctly, it describes the agricultural distress as the most acute and serious that has ever been known in the history of the country. Taking these two facts together—the serious falling off in the exports of English and Irish products, and the condition of agriculture—a great deal of additional attention is now being directed to the means by which the one may be averted and the other relieved; the fact being that so serious is the competition that breadstuffs have to meet that since 1870 nearly 3,000,000 acres of land that were under cultivation of wheat, have gone out of cultivation, and are turned to grass. The result is that this year, so depressed has the farming industry become that in the United Kingdom only one-sixth of the amount of wheat has been raised that is absolutely necessary for the consumption of the people, leaving five-sixths which must be brought from abroad. Under these circumstances, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has said, it is not surprising that the depressed agriculturists of the United Kingdom should be ready to hail with great satisfaction a proposed imposition of duty upon breadstuffs. But the mistake into which the hon. member fell was in supposing that that readiness to have a duty imposed on breadstuffs was confined to the agriculturists. It is not so. The great mass of the people who are engaged in manufacturing industries throughout the United Kingdom have come to the conclusion that if they did pay a little more for the loaf, it would be better to have it cost something more, and have something to buy it with at the same time. A very widespread feeling has grown up all over England in the manufacturing centres that in favour of the imposition of duties upon foreign products which would have the effect of giving the people employment, which is now taken away from them by the competition of Germany and other countries where labour is very low, and which are successfully competing with Great Britain, not only in the United Kingdom, but in other countries which formerly afforded markets for the products of Great Britain almost exclusively. Under these circumstances, renewed attention is being given to this subject; and when the Parliament of Canada had passed the resolution offering reciprocal advantages to the products of the United Kingdom, provided the products of this country were admitted into England on better terms than those of foreign countries, a great impetus was given to this movement. Not only that, but attention was drawn to the fact—and it is a very vital and important fact—that a policy of that kind would inevitably result in a great improvement in the export of British and Irish products to the colonies. In the year 1891, as every person knows, a very serious commercial and financial embarrassment occurred in the colonies of Australia and New Zealand, which led to a very great decline in the imports of the products of British industries.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Eighteen hundred and ninety-two was the year of the distress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, but I take the year 1891 as the year before that occurred, and as showing the normal condition of things. Because we all hope and believe that steadily the financial and commercial position of Australia will resume its normal character, and they will have the same prosperity that they had before. An examination of the statistics shows that six of the great self governing colonies took of the products of British and Irish industry not only took more per capita than six of the largest foreign countries which England has her trade, but actually from eleven to twelve times as much. Hence it struck every public man in the United Kingdom, naturally, that if they could develop and expand the colonies, if they could throw a population of industrious men into these great possessions in Canada, in Australia and in South Africa, and if trade follows the flag, as is manifestly shown, just in proportion as the population of the British colonies and possessions throughout the world increased, they would have the opportunity of expanding their trade much more rapidly, and to a greater extent than before. Attention was thus drawn to the means by which that could be done, because it is obvious that if you give—take Canada, for instance—if you give advantage to a man who raises wheat north of the boundary line over the man who raises wheat south of the boundary line ; if one goes to Mark Lane, the largest wheat market of the United Kingdom, free of duty and the other has to pay a duty in order to get there, although the price of wheat would not be materially increased perhaps, still this would follow, that the man who was bringing from the old world to the new his capital and industry would go north of the boundary line, because he would know that he would be in a better position there than if he settled south of the boundary line, and thus Canada would be filled up with an industrious population, capital and industry would flow into our country to build it up, and her increased population would become consumers to a vastly greater extent than the United States, a foreign country, that lies to the south of her, because Canada to-day consumes a very much larger proportion per capita of the products of British industry than is consumed by the great republic to the south. When this resolution was passed the "Times" newspaper, the most potent organ of public opinion in the world perhaps, declared that this was an important resolution which had been passed, and said that of course it conflicted with the doctrine of free trade, but that free trade was made for the man and not man for free trade, and if this policy should be taken up and adopted by her great self-governing colonies, England would have seriously to consider the question as to whether her fiscal policy should not be reconsidered. Well, what happened ? The great conference at Ottawa, inaugurated to a large extent by the present Prime Minister (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), which presented one of the most striking spectacles, probably the most striking ever witnessed in any British colony or dependency, or, in fact, in any colony of any country in the world, endorsed, by a very large majority, the policy which had been propounded. I think over eighty was the majority by which that resolution was passed in 1892. Under these circumstances, additional attention was drawn to this very important question, and I may also say that the London Chamber of Commerce—a very large and influential body of public men, representing both the great parties in the United Kingdom—invited a congress of the chambers of commerce of the Empire to meet in 1892, after that resolution was passed ; and I mention this to hon. gentlemen as an evidence that this question of preferential trade is not so hopeless a question as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) seems to consider it. This congress of chambers of commerce of the Empire, which met in London in 1892, spent two entire days in the discussion of this question of preferential trade within the Empire. I have no hesitation in saying that three years before that took place, you could not have got an hour's discussion in London by these commercial men of that question ; but so great and so rapid has been the change of public opinion that two entire days were spent in the discussion as to whether the members of that congress should pronounce in favour of preferential trade within the Empire. The result of that vote was most encouraging. That resolution, which was the resolution sent forward by the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Montreal, and which was made the ground of controversy between the two parties, was defeated by 47 to 34. The different chambers of commerce represented on that occasion had each one vote, and on that occasion that motion was only defeated by a majority of 13, after two days of discussion. I regard that as an evidence of a most unqualified character. These thirty-four chambers of commerce that voted in favour of the resolution were, many of them, from great commercial centres, such as Birmingham and cities of that kind, in the United Kingdom ; and gentlemen that represented the labour element and industrial element, the artisans of the United Kingdom, took the ground and maintained it in the strongest and most able manner, that the time had come when British industry required to be fostered by having a different tariff within the Empire to that imposed against foreign countries outside.

As an evidence of the progress that this question has made, I will just draw the attention of the House, for a few moments, to the action of Lord Salisbury in 1891, when the United Empire League approached his lordship in favour of this question of preferential trade. The great feature, and I suppose the cause of the introduction of this question of the imposition of a small duty on foreign products throughout the Empire, was that it would be the means of inducing Her Majesty's Government to take measures to modify the Belgian and German treaties, which prevent preferential trade within the Empire being carried on. The House will remember that when the United Empire Trade League approached Lord Salisbury, his lordship stated, in the strongest terms, his disapproval of those treaties. He said that no Government of the present day would, for a single moment, think of such a thing as making treaties with foreign countries which would interfere with any trade relations within the Empire. And when he came down to the question of preferential trade, he said he was not prepared, that no Government could be prepared to bring forward a policy of that kind until they were satisfied that the public mind of the country and the popular sentiment would support it. But he used this very emphatic language :

> And no doubt it is in a great measure true with respect to the great mass of legislation on secondary questions that they have to propose; but it is not true with respect to "an organic question which concerns and will control the very existence of our Empire and the very foundation of our trade." On this matter public opinion must be framed or formed before any government can act. No government can impose its own opinion on the people of this country in these matters. You are invited and it is the duty of those who feel themselves to be the pioneers of such a movement and the apostles of such a doctrine to go forth to fight for it, and when they have convinced the people of this country their battle will be won.

Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman will find that very great progress has been made. Hon. gentlemen will find that Lord Salisbury was taken at his word. It is known, I imagine—I am not going quite so far as the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in saying that Lord Salisbury's personal opinion and his political opinions do not always coincide,—but I believe I am safe in saying that there are few statesmen in the United Kingdom who hold stronger views upon the great importance of fostering and assisting the development of British trade in every way that it can be possibly fostered or assisted. Lord Salisbury's opinion with reference to the Empire may be gathered from a single sentence that he uttered at the Mansion House in the city of London in 1890:

> We know that every bit of the world's surface that is not under the English flag is a country which may be, and probably will be, closed to us by a hostile tariff, and, therefore, it is that we are anxious above all things to conserve, to unify, to strengthen the Empire of the Queen, because it is to the trade that is carried on within the Empire of the Queen that we look for the vital force of the commerce of this country.

Undoubtedly that expresses Lord Salisbury's real sentiments in regard to this question, but he was not prepared exactly to nail his colours to the mast in favour of inter-imperial trade or preferential trade within the Empire just on the eve of a general election. But I draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that great advance has been made since Lord Salisbury was first approached. I may also say that the result of the last general election, in my judgment, has shown the overwhelming influence upon the public mind of this important question. The Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, as you know, inaugurated his entry upon his present position by sending a trade despatch all over the Empire, the object of that despatch being to obtain such information as will enable the trade between the United Kingdom and the colonial portion of the Empire to be extended and developed to a much greater degree than hitherto, and, as this is a very important fact in connection with this question, I may, perhaps, be permitted to read just a sentence or two from a speech delivered by Mr. Chamberlain shortly after he became Secretary of State for the Colonies:

> It is because I desire to see whether there may not be room for still further developing our resources in these new countries and for opening up British markets. What is the state of the case? Great Britain, the little centre of a vaster Empire than the world has ever seen, owns great possessions in every part of the globe, and many of those possessions are still almost unexplored, entirely undeveloped. What would a great landlord do in a similar case with a great estate? We know perfectly well, if he had the money, he would expend some of it, at any rate, in improving the property, in making communications, in making outlets for the products of his land, and that, it seems to me, is what a wealthy country ought to do with regard to these territories which it is called upon to control and to govern. That is why I am an advocate of the extension of the Empire.

The general election took place and resulted in one of the most overwhelming changes ever known in British politics. Not only were the Liberal party defeated, but their opponents came back with a majority most unusual for either party in Great Britain.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Local option.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says "Local option." To local option was due the defeat of one very great man, Sir William Harcourt. And no doubt it played a prominent part in the result of the elections. I had an opportunity, standing in a perfectly impartial position and looking on with keen interest to form an opinion as to the forces which produced the results we see. And, having made a careful examination of the reasons for the wonderful changes that took place, having given it the most careful investigation I could, I have come to the conclusion that the most potent influence in producing this great and overwhelming change was the trade question. Not only among the great agricultural community, which is still a potent influence, notwithstanding the depression which it is suffering, but among the operatives and artisans of the United Kingdom from one end of the country to the other there was a feeling that they were not getting fair-play in the policy of the country. They found that not only was the United Kingdom open to the free admission of any number of foreigners to come into the country and compete with them in their own industries, but, while Germany and France and the United States of America and every country in the world built up a hostile tariff, a chinese wall of protection against British industry and thus excluded British goods, the goods from these countries were admitted into the United Kingdom to paralyze the industries of that country. I met a gentleman who has been for many years a very influential member of the House of Commons in England, shortly after the general election. We were speaking of the tremendous change that had taken place, and he said to me: "I was one of five gentlemen who were doing business in a large town in England, and who were supporters of Lord Rosebery's Government in the House of Commons. Our constituencies were spread about far and near, and out of the five men who were supporters of Lord Rosebery's Government, I was the only man who secured my seat, and my majority was reduced a thousand." I said: You astonish me very much. How could your majority be reduced? You represent a Welsh constituency, you were in favour of the disestablishment of the church, you were in favour of everything they wanted, how do you account for the change?" Wales was known to be very strongly Liberal. "Well," he said to me, "it was on the trade question. The people have got it into their heads that they are not getting fair-play, that not only is England suffering, but her industries are paralysed by allowing the products of foreign countries to come into competition with the work of our artisans; in addition to that, the very markets that England had in various parts of the world, are being closed to them by this foreign competition of the same parties who are flooding this country with the products of their industry, and paralysing ours." I have no hesitation in saying that at a very early date it is going to become a burning question, and one upon which, in my judgment, the fate of parties will mainly turn. I will now give the hon. gentleman a further evidence upon that point. I think he will see that Lord Salisbury, with that prescience for which he is celebrated, begins to see and to recognize that the tide of popular indignation in England is rising against the manner in which, under the existing policy, the artisans and agriculturists of the United Kingdom are suffering. Sir Howard Vincent addressed a letter to Lord Salisbury, and it contains a very pertinent sentence in which, so far as my information goes, he is perfectly accurate. Lord Salisbury is supposed to know the condition of party strife and party struggles in the United Kingdom, and in this letter sent to him the other day by Sir Howard Vincent, I find this sentence:

> The greater number of the members returned to the present Parliament in support of your lordship's policy and administration, advocated, either in their election addresses, or in their platform speeches,—the policy of United Empire trade——

Which is the free admission of everything from the colonies, but the imposition of a duty upon foreign products that come into competition.

> —and to this fact must be ascribed some portion of the unparalleled majority in the House of Commons by which your lordship is supported—especially from working class constituencies.

That, I believe, to be absolutely true. Although there were other important influences at work, I believe that one of the main influences that contributed to the overwhelming defeat of Lord Rosebery's government, was the disturbance that is taking place in the public mind in reference to free trade. It is only yesterday that free trade was worshipped as a fetish in the United Kingdom, a man saying a word against free trade ran the risk of being driven from public life. But the whole thing is changed, and that change is well expressed in the sentence which I have read, and is recognized in the reply which Lord Salisbury has given, and to which I invite the attention of this House. The "Times" newspaper of March 10, says:

> The Prime Minister has addressed a letter to Sir Howard Vincent, as honorary secretary of the United Empire Trade League, in reply to the memorial presented last month by the council of that body praying that notice might be given denouncing the clause in the commercial treaties with Germany and Belgium preventing British colonies from levying a lighter duty upon British goods than upon foreign goods, should they elect to do so. Lord Salisbury says that "since the accession to office of Her Majesty's present advisers the question of the trade relations between the mother country and the colonies has been taken into serious consideration"——

Mark that, a very great advance upon the statement. You must go forth and fight for your opinions, and when you have convinced the country, come back to me and you will not meet with any difficulty. Well, Sir, they have been fighting for years, they have been advocating their principles, and the general election has shown that they have done it with great effect. The general election has shown to Lord Salisbury that there has been a great awakening among masses of the people who control the government of the country in the United Kingdom, and that due heed and notice must be taken of that. He goes on to say:

> —"and that he is in thorough accord with the views expressed by Mr. Chamberlain as to the extreme importance of securing as large a share as possible of the mutual trade of the United Kingdom and the colonies for British producers and manufacturers, whether located in the colonies or in the United Kingdom." The letter goes on to add that "while the Prime Minister fully recognizes the inconvenient character of the stipulations in question—stipulations which should never again be agreed to by this country—he is not prepared to give notice for the termination of these otherwise valuable treaties until a definite scheme has been produced offering such probabilities of increased trade within the Empire as would fully compensate for the risk involved."

Now, Sir, Lord Salisbury or the Imperial Government can have no object in disturbing those treaties if they do not wish to favour the policy of preferential trade, because the whole burthen of the difficulty which they create, is the obstacle that they interpose against preferential trade. We can understand, therefore, why Lord Salisbury said, four years ago, to the United Empire Trade League : Go and fight for your opinions, and when you have convinced the people, you will not have any trouble with Her Majesty's Government. He recognized the overwhelming change that has taken place in public opinion in the United Kingdom, and he said : I am with Mr. Chamberlain, I heartily endorse the step he is taking to see if we can improve the trade relations between the mother country and the colonies. But before we disturb these treaties, that have caused the difficulties, before we give notice for the abrogation of those treaties, we want to have a definite scheme propounded by which we will show the substantial advantages that will be gained by having preferential trade between the colonies and the mother country. I give that to the hon. gentleman as an evidence not only that this is not a hopeless question, and one in which gentlemen who have taken an interest have not good reason to believe that at an early date their object will be accomplished, but as evidence of the wonderful progress this question has made in the mother country. I want to take this opportunity of saying that the third congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire is convened by the London Chamber of Commerce for next June, for the consideration of questions which are of the most vital importance to Canada and the Empire at large. I have no hesitation in saying that, if Canada sends such a representation of various boards of trade and chambers of commerce throughout this country as it can send to that congress, our representatives will be met by delegates from Australia and South Africa, who voted at the last congress against preferential trade, but who will now unite with our delegates in advocatiing a policy of preferential trade within the Empire, and such a resolution will be carried by a very large majority. I am glad to state, at the same time, that I have had the pleasure of learning from Messrs. H. A. Allan, and Torrance & Co., representatives of the Allan and Dominion lines of steamships, that they will be prepared to give a passage to and from the United Kingdom to any delegate at a reduction of 33⅓ per cent from the usual fare. Those companies have explained the reason why, in view of the luxurious accommodations provided, they cannot carry our representatives at a lower rate without such being actually non-paying. I mention that circumstance because I am most anxious that every board of trade and chamber of commerce, whatever its political views and sentiments may be as regards the great questions between political parties in this country, should take the opportunity to send able and efficient delegates on that occasion. I have no hesitation in saying to such chambers of commerce that have it not in their power to send delegates, that they will find gentlemen on the other side of the water who will be only too happy to carry out any views with which they may be charged, and present them for consideration. I do not propose to detain the House much longer on this question, because it has been so fully and ably spoken to by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me ; but I hope, with the prospect of preferential trade being attained at no distant date, and, in fact, I may say at an early date, with all these evidences of the great change that has occurred in public sentiment, I trust no measure will be propounded, no step taken or policy advocated that would be calculated to paralyze it. We have the fact that the United Kingdom is prepared to give the fullest consideration to this important question, and, under these circumstances, I feel it would be most unwise to place any difficulty in the way by propounding a policy that will gain part of the advantage, but which will leave Canada without obtaining that advantage and consideration which it is perfectly obvious she is going to obtain under this measure. I do not want to weary the House, but this matter has recently obtained an importance which it has never known before, in connection with the attitude of the great republic to the south of us, and with the still more threatening attitude of the German Empire. As regards the mother country, attention has been drawn as it never was drawn before to the fact that England is not in a good position, as she stands to-day, in respect to food supplies ; that, in fact, the time has come when she will be consulting her own interests, promoting the most important and vital interests of the great British Empire by the adoption of a policy which will render her less dependent on foreign countries than she is to-day. The great crop that has been obtained in Manitoba and the North-west, has furnished a most striking evidence to the mother country of the advantage of possessing among her dominions the Dominion of Canada. Although we have only scratched, as it were, the margin of the great wheat field of the world in Manitoba and the North-west, which a few years ago formed a desert, this territory has produced as much wheat, or about as much, as the whole of the United Kingdom. If that can be done under the condition of things that have existed, with the low price of wheat, with the depression that has prevailed in that country, with the loss of crops that occurred in previous years, what cannot be done by a policy on which the United Kingdom and the Imperial Government will feel that, by sending capital and people into that great North-west, they will be able to place themselves in a position that at no distant date we will be able to furnish the people of the United Kingdom with the other five-sixths of the wheat they require for consumption over and above that they can grow themselves ? The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) read from a most striking article, written by Mr. Long, in evidence of the fact that Great Britain cannot furnish herself with food. Attention has been drawn to the fact, and the "Saturday Review," one of the most able and independent journals in the United Kingdom, has come out and advocated, without any reference to the free trade policy that has so completely governed England for so long a period, a policy of preferential trade, a policy that would fill up Manitoba and the North-west with hardy and industrious immigrants, and would develop what that country has shown herself able to produce. With such a prospect before us, there is no one who does not feel that in this policy of preferential trade, both as regards bread and meat, we occupy a vantage ground that only requires steady, patriotic, determined and intelligent effort to make this country go forward by leaps and bounds to an extent that will throw into the shade anything that has previously occurred. I am delighted to know that this is not a party question. I am delighted to know that with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the only difficulty was that preferential trade, in his opinion, was impossible to obtain. Everybody favours preferential trade. The 'Globe' said, when the matter was brought up, that all persons would hold up both hands in favour of preferential trade. I trust that newspaper will not fall back from maintaining that doctrine, because it finds an unworthy advocate on this side of the House. Sir, with this Parliament united upon this question, with the great parties of this country united on the policy of promoting the question of preferential trade, it would be given an impetus and cause a progress and a prosperity to Canada of which we perhaps have scarcely dreamed. Why, Sir, look at the position of England under this fast line steamship service, which she has pledged herself to assist us in carrying to a rapid consummation. With this fast line of steamers crossing the ocean, she would be only five days journey from a country that only requires capital and industry, to furnish her at no distant date, with all the food products which she may require in case of a continental or a European war. I believe we will fail in our duty to ourselves, and fail in our duty to our country, if with this prospect bright and cheering before us, we do not one and all do everything that lies in our power to take advantage of the present position of this question, and to promote this vitally important question to Canada, of preferential trade within the Empire. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that it was a fatal objection to this policy of preferential trade, that the trade of the colonies was smaller than the volume of trade between the British Empire and foreign countries. Sir, what has that to do with it ? What we propose to do is to reverse the figures. What we propose to do by this policy of preferential inter-Imperial trade, is, to relieve England to a large extent from the necessity of cultivating foreign trade. But, is there anything in the policy of preferential trade with the Empire, that threatens the foreign trade of the United Kingdom. Not at all. What ground has Germany, the United States, or any other country that hampers free trade England with a policy of ever increasing tariffs to shut out the products of British industries from their country, what claim have they, I ask, to complain of England——

Mr. LAURIER. What claim have we to complain ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) opens a wide question, and I am afraid I would have to take another hour to convert him. I will spare the feelings of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but I will say this to the leader of the Opposition. Last November I stood before one of the most interesting and intelligent commercial audiences to be found in the United Kindgom, at Newcastle. I was invited by the Chamber of Commerce in that city to address them, and I had an opportunity in the Guildhall of speaking to a densely crowded body of the first financial, and commercial, and shipping men to be found in Newcastle, and with what result ? I placed before them the naked facts in regard to the policy of Canada in relation to the United Kingdom, and I satisfied them that the policy of this country was a thoroughly British policy. As the hour is late, Sir, I have no doubt I will have to give the hon. leader of the Opposition a copy of my address on that occasion, in order to satisfy him upon the question. I say that there is no reason why any country should complain of the imposition of a small, say a 10 per cent duty, against foreign countries. Is there a colony in the world, is there an Empire in the world, is there a country in the world except the United Kingdom, which does not favour her own colonies, and place them on a different footing in relation to trade between the mother country and her colonies. I do not know of one, and I say therefore, none can complain. Can the United States complain ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). She may retaliate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. How could she retaliate I would like to know ? Does the United States send to England any of her products for England's good ? No ; she does it for her own good. She consults her own interests and her own interests alone. But I will tell you what happened. In 1890 Great Britain was taking £90,000,000 sterling of the products of the United States of America without charging a farthing of duty, and the United States was taking from the United Kingdom £30,000,000, or one-third—I am speaking in round numbers but this is near the mark. What happened ? Was the United States animated by any feeling of gratitude to the United Kingdom for the favour with which this enormous amount of her product was received, and when she gave so little reciprocity in return. Not at all. What did she do? Why, she sat down and constructed a McKinley tariff to see if she could not knock off 10 per cent of this paltry £30,000,000 she was taking in return for the £90,000,000 sterling Great Britain took from her. And, not only to knock off 10 per cent or 20 per cent of the paltry amount the United States was receiving, but she coupled with it, the so-called reciprocity clause, under which, like a great octopus she proposed to throw her tentacles around the whole of the continent of South America, and to drive British trade out of that country. Under those circumstances, no man can venture to say that the Unites States could complain, nor would she complain, if England adopted the policy that every country in the world, except England has adopted, namely, that of placing her own family, her own colonies, her own dependencies, upon a different footing from that of foreign countries.

But, Sir, it may be said that it would involve the abandonment of the policy of free trade for England. That is another fallacy. There is no protection in it. Lord Salisbury has in a most authentic and formal manner declared, that whatever fault may be found with the policy of preferential trade within the Empire, certainly no man can call it protection, so that that question is authentically set at rest. And, when it was suggested that the United States might retaliate, as it was suggested when this question was discussed in the Imeperial Parliament, the present first Lord of the Admiralty, then the Chancellor of the Exchequer, denounced that doctrine in the most emphatic terms, and said: that England would never recognize the doctrine that she was not in a position to make such arrangements with her own dependencies, and her own colonies, as the interests of the Empire might dictate, without any foreign country having the slighest right to complain. It may be said, and it is said by some of the extreme apostles of free trade: This is a restriction, and we are opposed to all restrictions on trade. Sir, this is the only way by which the restrictions on trade can be removed. When Cobden propounded the policy of free trade, he rested it, as hon. gentlemen opposite know, upon the conscientious belief, that if England adopted free trade every other country in the world would follow her example. And, Sir, he based his policy of free trade upon that belief. The events have shown that he entirely miscalculated—that he was entirely mistaken. Instead of the whole world adopting his policy, Lord Salisbury tells you that every other country in the world is building up higher and higher tariffs for the purpose of shutting out England from sharing in their trade or having any advantage of their markets. Therefore, he says, you must look to the policy of trade within the Empire as the means of the building up and making the Empire great. And so far from greater restrictions being imposed upon English goods as a result of that, look at what occurred before the last presidential election in the United States. Lord Salisbury, in fact, went a good deal further in his speeches that he was afterwards quite prepared to carry out. In an important speech in reference to retaliation which he delivered at Hastings, Lord Salisbury said: "England finds herself in the position of a man going out to fight a battle, having been stripped of all his armour, because we have nothing to give." When Spain made a treaty with the United States of America, it said to Spain: "Unless you make a special treaty with us, giving us an advantage in your markets over everybody else, we will not allow your sugar and two or three other articles to come into the United States free of duty as they come from other countries." What did Spain do? Spain at once surrendered and made a treaty giving to the United States of America advantages over other countries. England came forward and said: "Do you mean to say you are going to give to the United States of America these advantages for receiving three or four of your products free of duty? Why, we take everything that Spain and her colonies send to us without any duty, except wines and tobacco; and do you mean to say that you are going to shut us out of your markets?" "Oh, yes," Spain answered. "you have nothing to give us; we are only authorized to give advantages for a quid quo pro; and, as you have given everything you possessed before, you have nothing to give now, and, therefore, you cannot share the advantages which the United States obtains." I say that under these circumstances it was no wonder that the indignation of Her Majesty's Government was stirred, and that they felt that advantages were taken of the liberal and magnanimous policy extended by England to every country in the world; and Lord Salisbury went so far as to say that under that condition of things, it would be a question whether Her Majesty's Government would not have to reconsider whether there were any means of moving those countries to treat England more fairly. What happened? Why, Sir, that menace or suggestion of Lord Salisbury's was telegraphed to New York, and the New York "World" came out with heavy headlines, calling attention to this note of warning, and that paper was scattered broadcast all over the United States on the eve of a general election. It said: "The British lion is getting aroused, and if we are not careful, this McKinley tariff is going to result in England imposing a duty on the breadstuffs we send to that country." And, Sir, what was the result? I do not say that it changed the presidential election; but I say that one of the most potent influences in the election of a Democratic president pledged to remove the rstrictions from trade, was the sentiment of alarm excited all over the bread-growing portions of the United States that their interests were in danger. Therefore, this suggestion of the imposition of a tariff by the United Kingdom had the effect, the important effect, of contributing largely to the removal of restrictions imposed by the McKinley tariff.

I do not intend to keep the House longer. I could give you some very interesting evidences of the effect of that speech of Lord Salisbury's but I will simply conclude by saying that I do trust that on this question, being one in which every Canadian is vitally interested, that no hon. gentleman in this House, or out of it, will adopt any line that will not be calculated to aid and assist in accomplishing that which, I believe, every Canadian recognizes as one of the most important measures that can be taken for the advancement of Canada and for its progress and prosperity.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, the importance of the subject to which my hon. friend drew the attention of the House this afternoon in itself justified him in asking the House to give a few hours to its consideration. I myself feel quite sure that, apart from the importance of the question, the well-known sincerity and earnestness of the hon. gentleman himself would have prompted the House to listen very carefully and heartily to any arguments he might advance in favour of any of those propositions which he has so much at heart. The importance of the debate has been enhanced by the intervention of the leader of the House. That hon. gentleman has given us a mass of interesting, though, to some of us, somewhat doubtful figures and facts. The hon. gentleman has spoken of information gained by him when he was the High Commissioner in London, as to the change of public opinion in that country. He has told us, among other things, that, in his opinion, one of the most potent influences that affected the result of the late English elections was this trade question ; and, as I gathered, more particularly by inference than by direct statement, from that particular feature of it which he has been advocating to-night. If his statement is true, that one of the greatest majorities every obtained in English history was obtained by his friends on this question, I think it is a very appropriate question to put, where are the results ? What propositions have been made by the British Government, directly or indirectly favouring the question which he says has carried them into power ? What statement has been made by a leading man in the Cabinet, indicating that they favour or countenance any such proposition ? If neither by the voice of any Minister, nor by resolution of the House, nor by any reference in the Queen's Speech, nor by any of the recognized methods of placing the government's policy before the country, do we see the slightest sign of such a policy dominating or controlling the present government, I think we may fairly conclude that the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in his opinion. I had not the same opportunity as he had of judging, though I followed pretty closely the late elections in Great Britain, and I think I am not wrong in saying that the great question of Home Rule for Ireland exercised a great influence in that election. I think I am not wrong in saying that the leaders of the Conservative party put that question in the forefront, in their cards and addresses, and asked the people to support them in their opposition to the policy of Mr. Gladstone and Lord Rosebery on the ground that it would be fatal to the integrity of the Empire ; and I think that local option and the disestablishment of the church in Wales had infinitely more to do with the result than any of the questions which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. He says that Lord Salisbury stated—and he gives that as an evidence of the great advance in public opinion on this question in England a short time ago, in answer to a deputation which waited upon him, that this was a matter which he would take into serious consideration. Well, Sir, there are Prime Ministers on this side of the water who do not necessarily adopt any policy suggested to them when they say they are going to take it into their serious consideration. What did Lord Salisbury say. He said what any sensible man in his position would say. He told them that the scheme they proposed was calculated to inflict a very heavy loss on trade, and that he would take it into very serious consideration—when ? When they produced a scheme which showed that the certain loss to British trade which must follow the abrogation of the treaties with Germany would be recouped by the new proposal they suggested. If you can venture to show, said Lord Salisbury, that in the smallest degree, the certain loss of trade which must follow the adoption of this principle can be in any way recouped to us, I will seriously consider your proposition. Have they shown this ? They have not. The hon. gentleman argued the case entirely from a protection standpoint, and he adopted the ordinary line of protectionist argument. He pointed out to us what an extraordinary decline had taken place in the exports of Great Britain, and how the agricultural interest of Great Britain was depressed and being destroyed, and how the colonies of the Empire could produce sufficient to supply the English market. Well, the hon. gentleman will not complain if we decline to accept him as an authority upon Manitoba. Whatever else we may accept him as an authority upon—British trade or politics or anything else—we decline to accept him as a reliable authority upon Manitoba and its productions. I need not remind the hon. gentleman that many years have not gone by since he told us that in 1891 Manitoba would export 640,- 000,000 bushels of wheat, and the time has come for the hon. gentleman to implement his promise and produce the 640,000,000 bushels. In fact, five years have passed since that time, but we shall allow him those five years as grace, and will accept the 40,000,000 without the 600,000,000 millions. He repeated to-day the statement that Manitoba produced as much last year of wheat as Great Britain and Ireland. Now, the production of Manitoba is very creditable, and one of which we are all proud, but there is no necessity for exaggerating it. There is no necessity for making statements which the facts will not justify, and that is the less excusable on the part of an hon. gentleman holding the position of leader of this House than it would be on the part of a private member. As a matter of fact, the production of Manitoba last year was not one-half of the production of wheat in Great Britain and Ireland. I turned up the authority the other day, when the hon. leader of the House made this extravagant statement, and I saw he was wrong, but I thought it was a 'lapsus linguæ,' and did not correct him. But to-day he has repeated the statement, and I now call his attention to the fact that while he made some foolish and ridiculous predictions some years ago, we thought that, at his present time of life, he would have come down to common sense, and would adhere a little more closely to the facts. The Statesman's Year-Book shows that the production of wheat in Great Britain and Ireland last year reached 60,000,000 bushels, and in Manitoba it did not reach 30,000,000.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The grain produced by Manitoba and the North-west Territories this year is calculated at 60,000,000 bushels.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman must surely see the utter irrelevancy and impropriety of his interruption. I made no reference to the grain produced in Great Britain—to the oats and other grains—but confined myself to the statement of the leader of the House, that Manitoba—not Manitoba and the North-west Territories—but Manitoba herself, had produced 60,000,000 of bushels of wheat. Now, we all know that that was ridiculous nonsense. Manitoba did not produce 60,000,000 bushels of wheat. She did not produce over 30,000,000 bushels. What reliance will be placed on the hon. gentleman's statement on the subjects with which agriculturists are not so well acquainted, if on subjects with which they are well acquainted they seem so utterly unreliable.

The hon. gentleman argued from the standpoint of an extreme protectionist. He argued that there had been an extreme decline in the manufacture of British goods, a decline amounting to nearly forty million pounds sterling. Well, no doubt there has been a great decline between 1890, when the manufacturing interest was almost at its zenith, and 1894, when the depression was at its worst. But the hon. gentleman surely, with the facts in his hands, could have told the House that the depression has passed away entirely in Britain, and good times have returned. I have the "Trade Review" in the "Times" newspaper of 31st December, and the hon. gentleman will find that, according to this authority, the times are back again where they were ten years ago—the good old times. The exports of British manufactures last year exceeded those of the year before by fifteen million pounds sterling, and there have been only four years in the history of the Empire when the exports of manufactured goods have been larger. What has the hon. gentleman to say to that ?

Mr. MACDOWALL. I think there is a decided improvement which may be owing to complications with foreign countries, but the authorities do not consider the commercial situation anything like as satisfactory as the hon. gentleman makes out.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am reading from the Statesman's Year-Book, the Statistical Abstract. And I read in the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Henry Fowler at Wolverhampton the other day, reported in the "Times" of the 20th January, that there has been a marked and extraordinary development in the manufacturing industries of Great Britain last year. In the manufacture of iron and steel alone, there has been an export from Great Britain of one million pounds sterling more than the previous year. And times have so improved and the people have consumed so much more dutiable goods, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer came down with the extraordinary statement the other day, that he had a surplus of $40,000,000 in the year's work, while other countries—the United States, Canada and the rest of them—are doubling their deficits. These indications cannot be ignored.

Then the hon. gentleman pointed out that there has been a great depression in the agricultural industry. No doubt there has been, but when the hon. gentleman says that all the agriculturists of Great Britain and a large part of the manufacturers favour a tax on breadstuffs, he states no doubt what would naturally be the desire of the agriculturists. Did he tell us, however, that they favour a tax upon foreign products, and the admission of colonial products free ? Not at all. The agriculturists speaking from their standpoint, would like to see the tariff changed so that they might be enabled to get higher prices for their products; and if they did, it would not protect the agricultural labourer or the farmer, but it would simply enable the farmers to pay the landlords those abnormally high rents levied years before and which the fruits of agricultural labour have not enabled the farmers to pay.

The hon. gentleman cited that as something extraordinary, and asked our special attention to it. But suppose that the British agriculturists' idea was carried out to-morrow, and a tax against agricultural products, colonial and foreign, was imposed, would that benefit the Canadian farmer ? Certainly not, Sir. The thing only needs to be mentioned——

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly.

Mr. McNEILL. Does my hon. friend recollect that when protection was the policy of Great Britain before, there was protection against foreign goods and that England's colonies had a preference in the British market ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am aware of it, and I have never yet found a well-read, thoughtful man who desired the colonies to return to the state of colonial dependence with all the privileges they then enjoyed. I do not think it was to the advantage of the colonies.

Mr. McNEILL. Does my hon. friend say that he thinks preferential trade would not be for the benefit of the colonies ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will say quite frankly to my hon. friend, that, if he could secure the adoption of the tariff in Great Britain which would tax all foreign products and allow colonial products to enter free, he would confer a great favour on the colonies. That would be to our advantage, of course.

Mr. McNEILL. Suppose that there was a tariff against foreign products and a tariff upon colonial products, but that the duties upon colonial products were lower than upon foreign products, would that be an advantage ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I) To the extent that we had a preference, to that extent it would be an advantage. But I am calling attention to statements of facts made by the hon. leader of the House. He called attention to the important fact that the agricultural population of Great Britain favoured a tax upon breadstuffs. I say that is quite natural. But, from the statement of the hon. gentleman, it appears they favour a tax on breadstuffs as against the colonies, as well as against foreign countries. What benefit would it be to them to tax foreign produce, if colonial products are to be admitted free? They do not care whether the wheat that competes with theirs comes from Manitoba or Argentina. They want to keep out all wheat and so secure a higher price for their own. That is the most natural thing in the world. If the hon. gentleman can get colonial goods in at a lower rate than foreign goods, of course, he will confer a benefit upon us.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman too often, but did he observe that I pointed out that it was the policy of the Agricultural Union in England to have preferential trade with the colonies?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And if the hon. gentleman will permit me, he will see, if he did me the favour to follow the remarks I am making, that there are two distinct lines adopted, one by himself, and one by the leader of the House. The leader of the House stated that he would not favour the proposition of the hon. gentleman, that it would be a national calamity to have such a policy adopted. He said the hon. gentleman was ill-advised, and hoped he would withdraw his proposal, and said he could not give his assent to it. It is against the proposition of the hon. leader of the House that I am addressing my remarks.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sure the hon. gentleman will give me credit for not wishing to interrupt him rudely, but he will hardly say that the objection of the leader of the House had anything to do with the matter I was putting to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) a moment ago ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it had a great deal to do with it. The leader of the House objects to that part of the hon. gentleman's conclusion where he proposes to put a tax upon the products of the colonies, as well as upon the foreign products.

Mr. McNEILL. No, no. He does not object altogether, because he says that, if it is necessary to obtain preferential trade, he would be willing to support it. But he thinks our prospects for preferential trade are so good that it is unnecessary to do this.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not only that, but he objects to it as an evil in itself ; but, if it could bring about the greater good, he would yield this point. But the hon. gentleman's proposal, he thinks, is inherently bad. Now, the hon. leader of the House goes further, and tells us that Lord Salisbury, in a certain speech, said : You must look to trade within the Empire, because protective laws are raised against Great Britain outside the Empire. Is it only outside the Empire that tariff walls are raised against Great Britain ? What have her colonies been doing ? What has the super-loyal colony of Canada been doing for the last seventeen years ? Aye, and the super-loyal party within Canada ? What have they been doing but building up tariff walls as high as they could, and not only building up tariff walls against Great Britain and the rest of the world, but building those walls up specially against Great Britain and discriminating against her and in favour of her commercial rivals ? I felt ashamed, when the hon. gentleman asked the House to give him sympathy for the proposition he advanced, on the ground that foreign countries were raising up tariff walls against Great Britain to her injury, while he himself was leading a party that had been guilty of the same offence, and not only guilty of the same offence, but guilty of committing it unnaturally. It may be all very fine for the United States, for France, for Austria, and these other foreign commercial rivals of Great Britain to try and destroy her commercially by building up these tariff walls. How is it, when her own offspring, when a country that should assist, as far as possible, in building up Imperial trade, how, I ask my hon. friend, whose heart, I am sure, is right, but whose intellect and vote on this question are wrong—how can he justify a policy of building up these tariff walls against Great Britain, and not only that, but a policy of building them up so as to discriminate directly and strongly against the trade of the mother country. Before I leave that branch of the subject, the question of agricultural depression in Great Britain, let me call attention to the summary or review of agriculture made by the London "Times," and published in its issue of 28th December, 1895. That review goes to show that one of the leading causes of that depression is climatic and such that no tariff can overcome or ameliorate it. I do not know whether I trespass upon the time of the House, if I read a paragraph from that very able and lengthy review, but I venture to do so:

> One half of the closing decade of the nineteenth century is now completed. In not one of these five years have farmers enjoyed a normal season, if, indeed, there are any features in our British weather which may reasonably be called normal. In 1891 we experienced a severe frost, a memorable blizzard, and at midsummer tropical heat, followed by torrential rains, which rendered the harvest not only unduly costly, but so protracted that even in the south of England corn was still out in the fields in November. In 1892 the mischief arising from the spring drought was aggravated by the severe frosts of the second and third weeks of June; then came the almost ruinous fall in the prices of sheep at the autumn sales, and persistent rains that well nigh spoilt the corn harvest. The terrible drought of 1893 and the privations incident to the fodder famine that succeeded it the following winter are events of too recent occurrence for their effects to have disappeared. Matters seemed likely to set themselves right in 1894, and at midsummer the prospect was a tantalizing one, but it ended in bitter disappointment. Continuous wet weather blotted out all hopes of the best harvest which had been promised to the farmers of the present generation, and, though the bulk of produce was great, the quality throughout was inferior. To fill up the cup, the average price of English wheat declined in October of that year to 17s. 6d. per imperial quarter, by far the lowest average ever recorded.

And so we see, Mr. Speaker, that, while there are other causes, no doubt, contributing to the depression which exists in that branch of industry in Great Britain, there are also causes climatic in their character which no tariff, no matter how high, can overcome, or, perhaps, very much ameliorate. Now, there are a few remarks made by my my hon. friend which I would like to offer a word or two upon before I sit down. He says that some years ago this House committed itself to a resolution proposed by him, a resolution which was carried by a party majority, a resolution which declared that if, and when Great Britain admitted Canadian products on more favourable terms into her ports than foreign products, then Canada would be prepared to make a concession in favour of British goods. Well, Sir, we know how that resolution was met. The hon. gentleman says it received favourable mention at the hands of the "Times," the great exponent of public opinion of England. So it did; but when the "Times" received, after a long time, a true report of the resolution which had been moved in amendment by the Opposition, that amendment received still greater praise than the hon. gentleman's resolution; but, Sir, from causes which I cannot myself determine entirely, the whole of the Opposition amendment on that occasion was mutilated, shamefuly mutilated, so that when it appeared in the "Times" before the English people, nobody could understand what the policy of the Opposition was at all. But, apart from that, the hon. gentleman says that that resolution of his being carried by a majority, committed this House to Imperial preferential trade. Well, Sir, what stands in the way? England's free trade policy stands in the way. The hon. gentleman has to change the policy, the determined policy, of Great Britain, before he can hope to succeed. Now, look at these figures. The English blue-books show them to exist with reference to England's trade. The imports from the British possessions, including India, amounted to £94,000,000 out of a total of £400,000,000 pounds of imports; in other words, that is 23 per cent. But remember when we speak of 23 per cent, that embraces India as well as all the other colonial possessions. Of the exports of Great Britain, that amounted to £215,000,000, the British possessions, including India, took £72,000,000, or 33 per cent. But if you exclude India, what a showing we make. Why, Sir, we talk about Canada's trade with Great Britain, forgetful of the fact that it only amounts to 3 per cent of Great Britain's trade. The total trade of Great Britain last year amounted to £700,000,000 sterling, and Canada's total trade with Great Britain was a shade less than £19,000,000 sterling, or less than 3 per cent of the total trade. The total imports of Great Britain were £408,000,000 and she got £13,000,000 from Canada, or less than 3 per cent. Of her total imports of £215,000,000, she sent to Canada £6,000,000, or 3 per cent; so that the total trade of this great Dominion, the chief child of Great Britain, her largest colony, amounts to 3 per cent of Great Britain's total trade.

Well, Sir, what are the kinds of goods which we ask Great Britain to tax ? Food products and raw material. Where do they come from ? Why, Sir, Great Britain imported last year 14,000,000 cwt. of wheat from her own possessions. and 9,000,000 cwt. from India. But how much had she to import altogether ? Seventy-eight million hundred weight. She got 27,000,000 from the United States, 23,000,000 from Russia, 11,500,000 from Argentina, 1,000,000 from Chili, 2,000,000 from Roumania, and only 1,800,000 from Canada ; 3,500,000 from Australasia, 8,800,000 from India. I quote this to show how infinitesimally small are the proportions that we send from the Dominion of Canada, and how almost ridiculously small are the quantities sent to Great Britain of the food she requires from the whole of her possessions. Well, Sir, when we see that so small a proportion as 14,000,000 hundred weight of wheat out of 78,000,000 imported by her, are sent her from her possessions, when we see her asked to tax 60,000,000 hundred weight of wheat she imports, and let in 14,000,000 free, we can see how, on the face of it, unless there are overwhelming arguments to be urged on the other side, how ridiculous it must appear to Englishmen. What hope can we have she will do it ? Certainly the figures do not justify us in the hope. If Great Britain is able to produce cheaper goods than any other country in the world, and sell them to the rest of the world cheaper than they can be manufactured elsewhere, the two main reasons are that she imports free all her raw products and she imports free to feed her population all the food they require. But you ask her to turn round and tax the very articles, the raw materials and the food, which enables her to manufacture her goods cheaply and sell them to the rest of the world. Why, you are going to fetter her in the commercial race by the very proposition you cheaply and sell them to the rest of the world. start with. Her policy is unalterable, so far as we are able to judge, and it stands across the very threshold of your proposition ; and until you can show that there is a reasonable hope of overcoming in England the free trade policy to which she has been allied for the last fifty years, and under which she has made a progress unparalleled in the history of the world, you cannot satisfy me that there is any hope whatever of her adopting this proposition, much as its adoption might prove favourable to Canada. But in addition to all that, you have the treaties with Germany, and with Belgium, and with the other countries, and when you see the trade that Great Britain does with Germany, and with Belgium, and with France, and compare it with the trade she does with us, you will see how likely she is to abolish these treaties under which her trade is flourishing so greatly. I find that in 1894-95 her exports to France were £13,500,000 sterling ; to Germany, £17,500,000 ; to Holland, £8,500,000 ; to Belgium, £7,500,000 ; to Russia, nearly £7,000,000 ; while to the whole of British North America they were only £6,000,000 ; to South Africa they were £8,000,000 ; and to Australasia, £16,000,000. Now, what prospect is there of altering that? The hon. gentleman referred here to-day to certain statements made by Lord Salisbury. Now, we were told by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who most amusingly asumed an air of superiority in talking on this question, I suppose from the fact that he did not seem to understand a thing about it—we were told by that hon. gentleman that all his opponents were narrow-minded pedants, they were little Englanders, who did not know anything ; and, as for Lord Salisbury, he was a kind of incarnation, a double man, a political Mr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. He told us that when he was speaking as Lord Salisbury, he said what he believed to be true, but when he was speaking as leader of the Conservative party, he spoke what he did not believe to be true.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He was imitating the member for Assiniboia.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Now, I would like to call attention to Lord Salisbury's statements on this very question, three different statements made at three different times, to show that Lord Salisbury has been, so far, thoroughly consistent, and has used language which nobody except an enthusiast could misunderstand. In 1888, speaking in the House of Lords on a motion made by Lord De la Warr, as reported in English " Hansard " 323, Lord Salisbury said :

> I have simply to say with respect to the question of protection that this country has adopted the opposite system after a controversy unexampled in its length, in its earnestness, and in the decision with which the ultimate issue was arrived at. If we are to understand the re-examination of that question, it must not be done incidentally, by insinuation, by allusion, by hints. You must firmly walk up to the fortress that you have to atack and lay siege to it in form. * * * In my belief the economical arguments in favour of free trade are very strong, but they are not the strongest with which we have to deal. If he (Lord De la Warr) will look back upon the debates of 1846 and read the speech of Sir Robert Peel when introducing his great proposal, he will see that the political argument weighed more heavily than even the economical argument in his mind, and I believe that the political argument has lost none of its force. I utterly disbelieve that it is in your power to introduce protection. If it were I think it would be introducing a state of division among the classes of this country which would differ very little from civil war.

I do not think that this language is lacking either in lucidity or in force. Surely we understand Lord Salisbury's opinion in 1888. Where did he stand in 1891 ? His Lordship is reported in " Hansard," speaking to a motion moved by Lord Dunraven, in favour of inviting the colonies to send representatives to a conference to consider the advancement of trade with Her Majesty's Dominions, as follows (Hansard, vol. 350, page 434) :—

> I ask him to look at the state of opinion in this country, especially the state of opinion in our commercial, manufacturing and industrial classes, the state of opinion above all among the capitalists and the most educated classes, and say if he sees the slightest chance within any period to which we have a right to look forward of such a modification of opinion in this country as will enable any statesman, whatever his opinions may be, to propose the establishment of retaliatory duties. It seems to me to be absolutely out of the question. If you wish to set up a discriminating system in favour of the colonies as against the rest of the world, just consider what are the goods on which you would have to levy a heavy duty in this country in order to make that discrimination felt. They are grain, wool and meat. What chance have you of inducing the people of this country to accept legislation which would make these essential articles of consumption susceptible of such tariffs ? I see no probability whatever of it. That being the case, I think we should be hardly behaving respectfully to the colonies if we asked them to send representatives to a conference to discuss the question, when we know that the answer which many of them, at all events many of their statesmen, would give must be met immediately on our part by the information that such a thing is absolutely impossible.

What language could be stronger than that ? In the face of the statement made by Lord Salisbury that public opinion in the commercial, manufacturing and industrial classes showed there was not the slightest sign within any period to which we had a right to look forward of such a modification of opinion as would enable any statesman to propose the establisment of preferential duties, we have the leader of the House declare that Lord Salisbury knows nothing about it, that he (Sir Charles Tupper) had resided in England, had ascertained public opinion in commercial centres and that his conclusion was exactly the opposite of that reached by Lord Salisbury. Hon. members can make their selection between the opinions expressed by the late High Commissioner and by the Premier of Great Britain. Then we have a statement made by Lord Salisbury on 22nd November, 1895, in answer to a deputation that had called on him asking for a special protective tax on hops. What did he say ? He spoke as follows :—

> There is another matter you must consider and deal with—the general question of protection. You must remember England is not the only country that has tried the experiment. We have tried the experiment of free trade, and you think it a terrible failure. If you cross the water you find that the French have tried the experiment of protection in its extremest form, and there agriculture is suffering as greatly, if not more so, than here. There is some other cause at work than the mere question of imports or no imports, and, merely speaking as one desirous of judging the political forces of the time, I cannot honestly say that I see any probability of any prospect of any import duty being imposed on any article of foreign production which is generally used in this country.

One would imagine that that would be conclusive. But the hon. leader of the House read a speech couched in equivocal language, delivered by Lord Salisbury at Hastings shortly before the last elections, and that speech the Secretary of State seem to think contained some evidence that Lord Salisbury had changed his opinions. When he read that speech the hon. gentleman knew that Lord Salisbury had taken occasion but a short time ago to contradict the view held by those who allege that any such inference could be drawn from his Hastings speech, and in fact the hon. Secretary of State knew that Lord Salisbury formally repudiated the inferences drawn by protectionists of the type of Sir Charles Tupper. That hon. gentleman was not dealing fairly with the House when he quoted the British Premier's Hastings speech and withheld the repudiation which Lord Salisbury made on the 11th January last. When receiving a deputation asking for customs taxes in the interest of English producers of hops and barley, of which the Earl of Winchilsea acted as spokesman, Lord Salisbury, said :

> I am glad to hear that your lordship did not pledge yourself to any theory, and as a matter of practical politics you did not urge any departure from the National policy in respect of free trade. I observe that Sir F. Lockwood has represented me as having been guilty of trifling with the hopes of those who are interested in agriculture by promising protection for hops in a speech at Hastings in 1892 and abandoning that promise the other day. I never promised on that occasion, or on any occasion, any relief by protection, or held out any expectation that there would be a restoration of protection in this country. I distinctly disavowed any advocacy of such a policy.
> I am sensitive upon the suggestion that I have ever promised or urged upon any audience a belief that protection would return within any period to which this generation can look. I have thought it wise—although certainly your lordship's speech did not furnish ground for any imputation that you were unsound on this point—to reiterate those opinions, so that there may be no mistake as to the view we take concerning the problem which lies before us, and conditions under which it must be solved.

So we have Lord Salisbury in 1888, 1891, 1895 and 1896, even as late as January last, unequivocally declaring that he adhered to free trade doctrines, and that there was no prospect whatever of the doctrine of protection, or the policy which my hon. friend squints at in his resolution, legislation in favour of the colonies, ever being introduced during the life of the present generation at least in Great Britain, or indeed that it was a question which was within the area of practical politics. His lordship indeed pointed out that the commercial and social opinion, and the opinions of the agricultural and the manufacturing classes, were all opposed to it, and yet in the face of these statements made by the highest authority, from the Conservative standpoint at least, we have the leader of this House stating that this is all fudge and he does not believe a word of it. These statements convince me that Lord Salisbury was not speaking as an educationist but as a practical statesman, with all the responsibility which he felt as the leader of a great party and the Prime Minister of the Empire, and he spoke in language which he hoped the colonists would understand that they might not be misled by demagogues or others. I am very far from desiring to use that term towards my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill), because I entertain the very opposite opinion of him. I know him to be thoroughly honest and thoroughly sincere in his opinions, but, unless you can show that these statements of Lord Salisbury have been retracted or that he is not speaking the mind of the Government of which he is the head, I say it is impossible for you to imagine that there is any hope whatever of introducing these political ideas which my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) advocates into the practical politics of Great Britain. Can my hon. friend name a leading statesman of Great Britain—I decline to allow Mr. James Lowther to come within the category—who has ever given the slightest hint that he has apostatized from the national faith and become a protectionist. To-day, the two great parties in Britain are at one upon the fiscal question, and, if a great political leader wanted to sound his death-knell, he could not take a better means of doing so than by suggesting such a policy as my hon. friend advocates, and which, in a modified form is supported by the leader of this House. A distinguished statistician, Mr. Ephraimson, has made a calculation as to the effect of the imposition of even 5 shillings duty per quarter upon the corn imported into Great Britain, and, in a pamphlet published by him, he estimates that, if such a tax were levied in Great Britain, and an equivalent tax upon all food products, it would amount to £100,000,000 sterling a year upon the people of Great Britain. Is there a sane man who can for a moment believe that the working classes of Great Britain will subject themselves to any such enormous taxation as that ? Sir, the idea is ridiculous.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Does the hon. gentleman mean on the importation of breadstuffs, or on the whole foreign trade ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No. The statistician says that, if there was a 5 shillings duty placed upon foreign grains, and an equivalent duty upon all foreign importations of food, that increased duty would amount to £100,000,000 a year. If these figures are true —and they have not been controverted, except by the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) pushing them to one side, and saying there is nothing in them—if they are true, how can you expect the English people to accept such a policy ? If they did accept it, would not the results be destructive of the manufacturing interests of Great Britain. Looking at this question from a practical standpoint, what good can come of it ? If we adopt the modified proposition suggested here, what would be the result ? The hon. the leader of the House says, that the United States cannot complain. No, Sir, they could not complain, in a sense, because they know we have the right to adjust our tariff as we please ; but, while they could not complain, they could retaliate. Every one knows that one of the two best markets in the world that Canada has for her surplus products is the United States, and are we going to adopt a policy that would be a direct invitation to them to retaliate on us. It would be very easy for them to cripple many branches of Canadian trade by raising their tariff against us until it became absolute prohibition. There is no use shutting our eyes to the fact that there are many articles for which the United States is our only market, and, if they were to prohibit them by an increased tariff, Canada would suffer materially. The least we can do is not to adopt a policy which can invite retaliation, but, on the contrary, let us adopt the policy which has been consistently advocated for many years past by the Liberal party, the policy of reciprocity of trade, which will not only develop our existing trade, but which will develop and increase it in similar proportions under the old reciprocity treaty from 1854 to 1866.

Mr. STAIRS. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour, I will not reply to the arguments of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), especially as that hon. gentleman has admitted, that, if preferential trade could be obtained, it would be a very good thing for Canada. Most of the arguments advanced against the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) have been to the effect that such preferential trade cannot be obtained, and, if hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are convinced that preferential trade within the Empire is in the interest of all parts of the Empire, then, why should we not make a hearty and honest attempt to secure it. An important change of policy like this cannot be obtained in a short time, and Canada and the other colonies of the Empire may have to wait for this great boon. But, if it is in our interests, as is admitted by hon. gentlemen, why should we not attempt to secure it ? My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) told us that the agricultural classes of England had no intention of giving the agricultural products of the colonies preference in the English markets. If that is the case, there would be no preferential trade, but it is hoped that in time the whole people of the United Kingdom may be convinced that it is in their interest to give preferential trade to the colonies, and that the agricultural classes will agree to it because of the general benefits that will accrue to them in indirect ways. My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) asked : What is Canada doing now; and he answered the question by saying : She is building up a tariff wall against Great Britain. I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman that Canada has always treated England in the same manner as England has treated Canada. England gives to Canada no preference whatever in her markets; England gives to foreign nations as favourable terms in the English markets as she does to her colonies, and Canada gives to England the same treatment in her markets as she gives to other countries. This being the case, I do not see that England has any cause to complain. I am convinced that there has been a great change in public opinion in England of late years respecting this question, and, as I believe, that improved feeling towards the project will continue, I feel that it is worth while for Canada and the other colonies to wait, in order to see if this change in feeling does not lead English statesmen to realize that it is in their interest to consolidate the whole Empire by having preferential trade within the Empire. For many years I have thought that the change in British public opinion has been shown by the fact that leading statesmen and many of the British newspapers have gradually been obliged to advocate in favour of free trade, and against protection. I believe that this fact shows the growing strength of the great change in public opinion. Twenty-five or thirty years ago the statesmen of England and the business men of England had so completely adopted the free trade theory and practice, that I do not believe that you could have found one statesman—from men in the highest position, such as Lord Salisbury, down to the humblest man in Parliament in England—or that you could have found any business man in England, to think that any argument against protection was necessary. It was accepted by them at that time as an axiom—as a truth that could not be disputed. At the present time there are men in England occupying the very highest positions, and some of the most important newspapers, that find it necessary to advocate protection, showing that there is a growing sentiment in England in favour of protection.

Mr. Speaker, I only intended to-night to give very briefly, indeed a few of the reasons which have led me to believe that preferential trade within the Empire is a good thing ; and I support the resolution of my hon. friend from North Bruce because it is in favour of that principle. What preferential trade means I need not take time to explain to-night, because it is generally well-known. Now, I have never been able to understand why England did not continue to her colonies the preferences that existed many years ago. That was before my time, and I do not know exactly what benefits the colonies enjoyed in the English market ; but I know that they have very important benefits. If I am not mistaken, in those days English colonial sugar went into the market of the mother country at very much lower duties than foreign sugar, and I believe the same was the case with timber. I have never been able to understand why England did not continue that arrangement, and why at the same time the efforts of English statesmen were not directed to building up one united empire, between the members of which, if there should not be absolute free trade, there would be a very general measure of preferential trade ; so that, as to trade between themselves, they would be in a better position than foreign nations. If that had been done, it seems to me, looking at matters as they stand to-day, that England might have had a very much more important trade with her own colonies than she possesses at the present time. The hon. gentleman was inclined to blame Canada for adopting a protective tariff, to my mind England is very much to blame for it. She gave here colonies no inducement to do anything else. I have never been able to understand, either, in what way preferential trade within the Empire could injure England's trade with foreign nations. That point has been answered very well by the hon. leader of the House. I listened with very much interest to what he said, and I do not wish to enlarge upon it ; but it seems to me that not only would no foreign nation have any right to complain, but it would not retaliate because of anything that might be done within the Empire itself. I cannot see why a foreign nation has not as good right to complain to-day of Canada, which does not admit foreign goods duty free when England does, as it would against any preferential arrangement that might be made between the colonies and the mother country. Now, what could be more natural than that the people belonging to the Empire should trade together ? Is it not an unnatural thing that during the last 50 or 60 years the colonies and the mother country, in matters of trade, have been gradually drifting away from each other ? Why should not England treat Australia, Canada, South Africa and her other colonies more favourably than she treats foreign countries? England to-day is treating her colonies in exactly the same way as she treats foreign nations. England did not always treat them so. What is the reason of the change ? The only reason we can see for it is England's adoption of free trade. I was very much struck with the statement made by my hon. friend from North Bruce in reference to the imports and exports of English manufactured goods. He said that England imported £125,000,000 sterling of manufactured goods. Now, I cannot see why England should not impose a small revenue duty upon that amount. I cannot see why her manufacturers and artisans of all classes, when they send the products of their factories and their labour into foreign countries to the extent of £200,000,000 sterling, should be met with hostile tariffs of from 15 to 100 per cent, and sometimes more, when the products of these countries are admitted into England absolutely duty free. Many of these imported goods are luxuries, and could well afford to bear a small tax, and such a tax would enable the Government to dispense altogether with the income tax. However, that is not the business of the Parliament of Canada, but belongs to the people of the United Kingdom. In considering this resolution, we have to do it from our own standpoint. Now, we hear sometimes of discrimination against England. From my knowledge of business, and of the imports of Canada, I am satisfied that if there be any discrimination against England, although I do not admit that there is, the only way to do away with it is to adopt a system of preferential trade. I am certain that no general reduction of duties on manufactured goods coming into Canada would benefit the English manufacturer to any appreciable extent. The effect of such a general reduction would be to open the markets of Canada more fully to the manufacturers of the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why could we not adopt the policy adopted some time ago in this House—reducing the taxes on goods imported mainly from Great Britain ?

Mr. STAIRS. To answer that I would have to go more into detail than I can do on the spur of the moment. The hon. gentleman would find it almost impossible to reduce the duties on staple articles imported into Canada without benefiting the manufacturers of the United States more than those of England. On one article I think a reduction of duty would benefit the manufacturers of England more than those of the United States, though it might injure the manufacturers of Canada—that is, woollen goods.

Mr. O'BRIEN. And cutlery.

Mr. STAIRS. I am not prepared to admit that altogether. In some kinds of cutlery, perhaps, the finer forms of penknives and articles of that kind, my hon. friend may be right, but it must be remembered that of that particular article Canada does not import very largely. But I was speaking a few minutes ago in a general sense only. In that sense I am quite certain you could not reduce the duties of manufactured goods coming into Canada very much without benefiting the United States manufacturers more than the manufacturers of England. But it may be asked here, could the manufacturers of Canada stand a reduction in the duties on goods which they make coming into Canada ? I think it would pay them to do it on goods coming from England, for the indirect advantage they would obtain. I believe that if preferential trade could be secured, it would lead to a very general increase in farming in Canada. The farmers are our most important class of people. If farming is not prosperous, we have not the market for manufactured goods we otherwise might have. If you increase the number of farmers, you proportionately increase the market for manufactured goods. It has been complained lately that the number of farmers has not increased. The reason is patent on the face of things. It is that the markets in Canada have not increased proportionately with the power of production. The farmer's power of production at present, owing to improved machinery and appliances, has increased enormously. It does not take anything like the number of men to produce a given quantity of farm produce of any kind that it did thirty or forty years ago. Therefore, under similar conditions in the country, you will see that naturally the number of farmers in the country at present as compared with thirty or forty years ago must decrease in proportion to the rest of the population. What we want is a market for our farmers. The adoption of preferential trade would lead to this. As regards the food supplies of the United Kingdom, especially during war time, the colonies of England, if not in a position at present to supply the United Kingdom with food, would, in a very few years, under the stimulus of preferential trade, be able to do so ; and the means of transport have improved so vastly that even in time of war I believe England, if the farm produce were ready in Canada, could obtain it without difficulty. There is to-day an ever increasing number of very large and fast ocean steamers engaged in trade on the north Atlantic, which in time of war, with a European country, could be drawn from their usual business and employed in the transport of food to England. England is in a better position to import from abroad at present any articles she requires than she was a hundred years ago. She has to-day practically the absolute control of the fast steamships of the world. She has to-day, under her control, a fleet of ocean steamships which the fastest foreign cruisers afloat could not catch. As an illustration of this, I may refer to an account which was published in the Ottawa "Journal," a few days ago, of a race which took place in Japan between the United States fast cruiser "Olympia" and the "Empress of India," which is not by any means a very fast steamer, compared with the fast steamers of the merchant fleet of England to-day. I am not absolutely certain whether this is a true account, it is written by an American, and is rather amusing. But whether it is absolutely true or not it serves the purpose of proving what I say, because I know that what is there said to have taken place is certain to take place whenever any foreign man of war attempts to catch one of our fast merchant steamers. The fast man of war is not in it. My reason for saying this is that fast men of war at present are never run at full speed for more than a few hours at a time. I do not believe they are able to keep these men of war at full speed for two or three days running. As an illustration of what I say, I will read an extract from this account. When it was found out that the "Olympia" was being very easily passed by the "Empress of India":

> The pilot of the "Olympia," an American citizen of Danish extraction, told a friend of his that he was never so mortified in his life. He begged the captain to order another boiler (two only were in use) and after a while the captain sent word to the engineer, who replied that the force was too tired.

It may seem a very strong statement to make, but I am sure that I am correct in saying—and this little extract only illustrates the truth of what I say—that the force in the engine-room and the stoke hole of the ordinary man of war do not have sufficient practice at running at full speed to give them the endurance to enable them to keep their ship at full speed for any continuous time. This simply means that England today has an enormous advantage over every other nation in the world, compared with what she had a hundred years ago, in everything connected with the transport of food and supplies which she may require during time of war. I think that what my hon. friend has in view, and what is kept in view by the advocates of this policy, is to consolidate and build up the Empire more than anything else, that we may have an Empire scattered all over the world, but united in heart and in trade, so that not only sentimentally, but also for motives of not so high a nature all the different parts of the Empire may be bound together, and when trouble comes stand together and meet the whole world if necessary. We know that strong as patriotism is and sentiment is, these feelings possibly cannot be produced, but they can be strengthened and helped by mutual interest, by the feeling throughout the Empire that it is profitable for all the members to keep within it and strengthen it.

I heartily support this resolution and I trust an opportunity will yet be given to secure some such measures as will give to us preferential trade.

Mr. O'BRIEN. At this hour of the night and in this thin House it would seem waste of time to discuss at any great length a question of so important a nature as this. Five minutes will suffice for what I wish to say now. It will have been noticed that in this debate the main object of the resolution, which is to provide for Imperial defence, has been entirely lost sight of. We have not heard anything, so far as I am aware, in the course of this debate, in regard to Imperial defence, and what the hon. gentleman looked upon as a strong part of the argument is really a weak one. His mistake is in attempting to mix up two things which must be kept distinct; one being preferential trade, and the other the means by which the defence of the Empire can best be secured. Every proposal tending to promote harmony of sentiment or unity of action between the different forces of the Empire ought to receive the most careful and respectful consideration, but, at the same time, we should endeavour, as I see it, to keep the two subjects embraced in this resolution distinct. My hon. friend, I believe, has weakened his proposal very materially, moreover, by uniting the question of naval and land defence. One can understand that a distinction must exist and does exist in an Empire like ours between warfare carried on by sea, and that by land, that naval defence is based upon different principles altogether from the defence of a land frontier. Take ourselves, for instance. We have a great commerce by sea; on every water the flag of Canada is to be found, and defended, wherever it floats, by the vessels of the Imperial navy. For us to defend our own sea-going commerce from our own resources, would be an expense which we could not, for one moment, think of undertaking. But a small contribution might fairly and reasonably be given from Canadian revenues, as well as from other colonial revenues, for naval defence entirely distinct from any other kind of defence. But when we come to consider how that money is to be raised and are asked to adopt such a plan as that proposed by my hon. friend, we come across practical political difficulties which it is impossible to overlook. Take our own case. The hon. gentleman finds himself in this position—that people who would be glad to support the proposition as regards defence, object to the method proposed because it would be an additional protection given, while the desire of the majority of our people is to see protection reduced. Goodness knows we have protection enough, and every cent put on by virtue of this proposal is an addition to that protection of which the people think they already have too much. And so the resolution antagonizes every man who wishes to see a reduction in our present tariff. And, moreover, it antagonizes the same principle in England. I do not talk about the possibility of supplying England with food products; we have already had so many predictions about Manitoba that one is really sick of listening. The hon. gentleman told us that we could smother England with wheat. I would like to know how the English farmers would contemplate a proposal of that kind. Would he regard it as an advantage to him?

Mr. McNEILL. I said we could smother England with wheat, if it were necessary.

Mr. O'BRIEN. But if it is not necessary, what is the use of getting ready to do it? The proposal antagonizes every agricultural interest in England. It is very well to say that the proposal for protection and preferential trade go hand in hand. To my mind, that is very much like begging the question, because if the English agriculturist understands that this proposal is to not give protection to him, but practically to give protection to his rivals, I think he will view the matter in a very different light. I merely wish to point out that in this proposal there is a great weakness. There is a combination of two principles entirely independent of, if not entirely antagonistic to each other; and, in the second place, there is a confusion of naval and land defence which is a very vital defect ; and, in the third place, there is that in it which antagonizes all those in Canada who desire a reduction of duties and those in England who desire the maintenance of the present system there. No one will dispute the proposition that preferential trade within the Empire is to be desired. And no one will dispute the proposition of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) that it seems only a natural and reasonable proposal. But before we attempt to bring about anything of that kind, we must practice a little of what we preach and not demand of England every possible advantage which it can offer in the way of a market for our own products, yet leave a heavy tax resting upon English manufacturers coming into our country. That seems to me to violate the rule that a man ought to practice what he preaches. The first step to bring about preferential trade will not be to tell England : If you will give us a preference in your markets we will reduce the duties on your productions. The first step is to reduce the duties on the articles of English manufacture, and then, with some little grace, and appearance of reason, we can ask for preferential treatment in their markets. But so long as we continue the present system it seems to be adding insult to injury to go to England and say that we will maintain a tariff against England and yet ask for preferential trade. It cannot meet with success, and I would almost go so far as to say that it ought not to succeed. While perfectly willing to discuss any reasonable proposition to make a fund for naval defence, which rests upon an entirely different principle from land defence, I am entirely unwilling to accept the proposition that preferential trade is to be forced upon England, or that it is to be considered so long as we have such high protection against England.

Mr. McNEILL. I realize that it is almost an impertinence to ask the House to listen at this time, but I promise to be not more than three minutes by the clock. I wish to say one word as to what my hon. friend said concerning Lord Salisbury's views in regard to protection. My hon. friend has entirely misapprehended Lord Salisbury's views. He has explained that he is not opposed to reciprocity, and that is what we are asking for. Now, with regard to the point which my hon. friend who has just sat down has endeavoured to make to the effect that this proposal necessarily implies a greatly increased amount of protection which he says is already too high, I may observe that it does not necessarily imply an increased duty at all, in the meantime, i. e., if my hon. friend does not think the increased preferential trade worth the increased duty. Suppose we add 5 per cent, which would give us a preference of 5 per cent in the English market, it would only about cover the expenditure we now have to incur. So, if we obtained the money in this way, we should be able to reduce the duties otherwise. I wish to refer to two documents. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) said that in England a man would be considered ridiculous who would propose preferential trade.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why don't you put a duty on wool and raw cotton ?

Mr. McNEILL. If I stop to answer my hon. friend now I cannot finish within the time I have stated. I wish to read from the "Saturday Review," in answer to the statement of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island :

> We are sorry to be obliged to say that Lord Salisbury appears to entirely fail to grasp the widespread interest which this subject of our fiscal policy excites in the country.

There must be a good many Englishmen, then, under these circumstances, who are dissatisfied wth the fiscal policy in England. The "Saturday Review" concludes in this way :

> Let us argue the question of free trade and protection boldly, and yet cautiously, like men of business. Let us see whether we cannot unite the mother country and the colonies into a trades union against the world.

That is the "Saturday Review" of 29th February last. To the writer of that article, at all events, it was not a ridiculous proposition. Now, I have just one minute left me, and I wish to employ it in this way, to explain that, when the leader of the House said that I had not consulted him with regard to this matter, I did consult him on the very first occasion I could possibly do so. I went down to his house and found him unwell, and had a long talk with him about this matter. At his suggestion, I struck the the word "naval" out of the resolution and sent him a copy of the amended resolution, with the word "increased" hurriedly inserted in place of "naval," "increased expenditure." I saw almost immediately, that the word "increase" would imply that England was to raise about fourteen millions more for defence, and I altered that. I received from the hon. gentleman a letter, in which there is this paragraph :

> I am greatly obliged to you for sending me a copy of your amended resolution respecting the imposition of a small duty upon foreign products, and which I shall have much pleasure in supporting.

I was, therefore, a little surprised to-night to find that there was not the strong support for the resolution I had expected from the hon. gentleman, more especially as I had subsequent conversations with him on the subject, in which he did not suggest for a moment that he entertained any other intention than thoroughly to support the resolution.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is such a thing as appropriating another man's thunder.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not know how that may be, or what may have occurred since to change my hon. friend's views.

Mr. POWELL. As the hour is late, and there is going to be a deal of time at our disposal this session, I move the adjournment of the debate. Johnson, when he spoke of the journey to the Hebridies, has said that it is characteristic of civilization that the distant and the future predominate over the present and the near ; and I think it is illustrated in this case, for, although we see the first faint glimmerings of this question, as a practical question, it will not be ours, but our grandchildren's to enjoy. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Report of Canadian Archives, 1895.—(Mr. Foster.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved :

> That, for the remainder of the session, Government Orders shall have precedence on Mondays, after private Bills and questions, and on Thursdays, after questions.

He said : I may say in connection with this that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) requested the Government to state to the House their views regarding the termination of the session, and expressed at the same time the intimation that if the view entertained by the Government was that it would be necessary to terminate this session, under existing circumstances, on the 24th April, that would be a very strong additional reason in support of this motion. That question having been carefully considered by the Government, we feel that the strong doubts that have been entertained on that subject would render it extremely undesirable to prolong the session beyond the 24th April, and we do not propose to prolong it beyond that time.

Mr. LAURIER. I am glad to hear that the Government have come to the determination not to attempt to prolong the session beyond the 24th April. This decision will commend itself to the approval of everybody in the House and out of it. The motion now made to take two days from the days of private members, I may say very frankly to the hon. gentleman, is not an unheard of motion at this period of the session. It is almost the unwritten law of Parliament that when the session has reached a certain period, the Government should be allowed to dispose of the business of the House by taking some of the days set apart for private business. But, at the same time, I must tell the hon. gentleman that previous to his coming here, there was an arrangement made with the then leader of the House, that the private members were to have two Thursdays. There is a good deal of private business to be done, and the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) cannot have forgotten that arrangement. With the exception of these two Thursdays, I have no objection to the motion of the hon. gentleman. I am not particular as to whether two Thursdays be taken or next Thursday and next Monday, and am willing that the motion should read after the 2nd April, for the remainder of the session.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman was absent on Friday when this matter was brought up. I stated then my understanding of the agreement, which, I am glad to say, is entirely in accord with what the hon. gentleman has just said. I, however, put this view to the House. It is perfectly true that it was agreed that the Budget should go on de die in diem and that after the Budget was over, one or at most two Thursdays should be given for private members' business. So far as that is concerned, we are perfectly at one. My own view, as stated on Friday, was this. At the conclusion of the Budget, the House then came to the contemplation of another subject ; and that was as to when and how we should take up the discussion on the Remedial Bill. If the hon. gentleman leading the Opposition had intimated then that the two Thursdays had been given, before we went on the Remedial Bill, he would have been perfectly in his right. But I submit this, that as new business intervened and the House concluded to go on with the debate on the Remedial Bill de die in diem, the hon. gentleman gave up his claim to the two Thursdays. I submit that view in connection with the extremely limited time in which we have to accomplish it, between now and the 21st April. Under the present motion, every Wednesday would be given to private business. If my hon. friend thinks that Thursdays would be better than Wednesday, I have no objection to substitute the one day for the other. But in that case the hon. gentleman ought to give us the two Wednesdays. I suppose he has no objection to that.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will understand that I am claiming nothing more than was previously understood before. We were to have had two Thursdays after the debate on the Budget was over. But the hon. gentleman, instead of giving us an opportunity of having these two days, moved at once that the House should take up the Remedial Bill and proceed with it de die in diem.

Mr. FOSTER. To which the hon. gentleman agreed.

Mr. LAURIER. We acceded to that at the Government's request and for the advantage of the Government. We gave to the Government more than we had agreed to do, and the Government gave us nothing. So I am only insisting that we should have these two days which it was agreed we should have. As I said, so far as this side of the House is concerned, we are ready to consent to this motion taking effect after Thursday the 2nd of April. That would give us next Thursday and next Monday, to which we are entitled.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not understand the proposal of the hon. leader of the Opposition. Monday, of course, is a day devoted to one class of business, but not to public Bills and orders. What I understood was that private members who had items on the paper under Public Bills and Orders were to have two days in addition to the Wednesday afternoon, and I think the hon. gentleman will see that Monday would not supply the place of one of those days.

Mr. LAURIER. If my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) will look at the Order paper, I think he will see that most of the notices of motion are not debatable and that we should soon get through them and reach Public Bills and Orders.

Mr. McCARTHY. There are a great number of them.

Mr. LAURIER. There are a great number, but few of them debatable so far as I can see.

Mr. McCARTHY. Oh, you can always get up a debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid, after the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, we shall be obliged to sustain in its entirety what that hon. gentleman understood as the engagement in reference to these two Thursdays, and I will therefore amend this motion in such a way as to meet the point and provide that Government business shall have precedence on Thursdays on and after the 2nd of April.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the House would consent to a motion that would change the order of the day for Monday so as to substitute for it the order of the day for Thursday, I think in that way the motion could be made agreeable to all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid that would be impossible. I have already stated to the House that, under the decision arrived at, this Parliament will close on the 24th April, and I am quite sure that under these circumstances, hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will see that it is absolutely impossible to hope to deal with the necessary business of the country unless the motion as it now stands before you is carried.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the hon. gentleman misunderstands me. I thought you had consented that we should have next Monday and Thursday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; but the two Thursdays that were agreed upon by the leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LAURIER. This arrangement takes place from the 2nd April.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman gets his Thursdays, but the motion is that we take Mondays and Thursdays on and after the 2nd April.

Mr. MULOCK. That would leave but one Thursday and no Monday at all.

Mr. FOSTER. No; that gives the hon. gentleman two Thursdays.

Mr. LAURIER. But you give us the 2nd of April also ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And you take Mondays ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; we take next Monday.

Mr. LAURIER. Will you read the resolution as amended, Mr. Speaker ?

Mr. SPEAKER :

> Sir Charles Tupper moves that, for the remainder of the session, Government Orders shall have precedence on Mondays after Private Bills and questions, and on Thursdays after questions, except Thursday and Monday next.

That would be Thursday of this week and Monday of next.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No objection to that.

Mr. LAURIER. I was willing to take a Thursday and a Monday, I did not care which particularly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon gentleman takes one Thursday and one Monday instead of two Thursdays.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. This motion will give to the Government all the Thursdays after next Thursday, and all the Mondays after next Monday.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. PERRY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) to an order of the House passed some time ago for papers showing the amount of money spent on certain public works in Prince County, P.E.I. We are drawing near to the close of the session, and before we get into the Estimates on public works I would like to have these papers.

Mr. OUIMET. The return asked for is being prepared. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that, from all appearances, he will get it before the Estimates are before the House.

PROPOSED PERMANENT EXCLUSION OF CANADIAN LIVE CATTLE FROM GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to a motion standing in his name, and, if he does not intend to proceed with it now, I will put myself in order by concluding with a motion. I refer to the motion, notice of which the Minister has given in reference to the Bill now before the Imperial Parliament to make permanent the exclusion of Canadian live cattle from England.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member cannot by moving the adjournment of the House put himself in order in discussing a motion, of which notice has been given.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not going to discuss the motion, I am going to discuss the situation. The reason the situation is somewhat urgent——

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me, I may say that I intended to bring up the motion to-morrow, but I think under the circumstances it would be just as well——

Mr. MULOCK. That is not a Government day.

Mr. FOSTER. On Thursday, then, but as it is a matter of great interest, I think the House would be quite willing to go on with it to-morrow.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MULOCK. Can the hon. gentleman say what day he will go on with it ?

Mr. FOSTER. On the next Government day.

Mr. MULOCK. That is Friday. The hon. gentleman will make it the first order of the day on Friday ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will that be in time for it to be of any service ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, just as much as today.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand the Government will take up this matter on Friday ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee on Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba) and the motion (page 4370) of Mr. McCarthy in amendment thereto.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have not had the privilege of addressing the House on this very important measure. Before proceeding to take a vote on the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and on the resolution of the leader of the House to go into committee on the Bill, I desire to offer some remarks. It is undoubtedly one of the most important questions that has come under the consideration of this House since it has been my privilege to occupy a seat in it. It has stirred up more ill-feeling and strife, both in the House and outside of it, than any other question that has ever come up in this chamber, and all owing to the manner in which it has been handled by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the first place, I wish to express my regret that it ever found its way into this House. In my humble opinion the legislature of Manitoba, in view of the provision in the constitution under which that province exercises its powers it would have done well had it treated the minority in a different manner. However, as the highest court in the realm has pronounced their legislation intra vires, we have no right to challenge the course they have deemed it prudent on their part to take. Every province is a little kingdom within itself, and if we as a central authority, exercising all the powers and functions that are relegated to this chamber under the Confederaction Act, recognize the absolute independence of the several provinces within the sphere marked out for them under the constitution, a great deal of friction and a great deal of unpleasant happenings that tend to disturb the peace and harmony of the Dominion, might be avoided. Now, after the Privy Council had given their decision in this matter, to my mind the most unfortunate incident in the history of the whole case was the passing of the drastic remedial order that the Government sent to the Manitoba government. It was sent in a mandatory and tyrannizing spirit, and in place of recognizing the independence, the sovereignty, if I may so speak, of the province of Manitoba within her own powers, they commenced to dictate in a very uncourteous and mandatory way as to what course she should pursue to bring about a settlement of the difficulties that had arisen between Manitoba and the minority of her subjects. That remedial order has been pronounced by every sincere advocate of peace and harmony, as one of the biggest blunders that has ever been perpetrated by the Government of the day. Had they, in place of taking that course, forwarded to Manitoba an outline of the judgment, with a courteous note expressing a sincere desire that they might see it their duty in some way to restore the privilege or meet the wishes of the minority, and thus settle amongst themselves, quietly and peaceably, the difficulty that had arisen, the probabilities are that Manitoba might have taken the question into her serious consideration, and kept it out of this chamber. But, Sir, that was not done. The course, as I said, before, that was pursued by the Government under the circumstances, in my humble opinion, was a very grave mistake. Now, Sir, after the remedial order was passed, Manitoba replied in courteous terms, but refusing to comply with the provisions of that order. In her reply she very courteously suggested an investigation. She stated that the Government of Canada could not be aware of all the surroundings connected with the school system that had existed in that province before the passage of that School Act, and in addition, she promised every assistance that could possibly be given on her part to present a clear and distinct review of the whole situation that existed prior to the legislation on the school question, in order that the Government of this Dominion, and the members of this House, if it necessarily came before them, might have data of a reliable character upon which they could deal with the whole question. Sir, notwithstanding that very courteous invitation to the Government of this Dominion to take that course, they declined to comply in any shape or way with the invitation that had been made. They simply rested on their oars, and refused in any shape or form to meet the suggestion that Manitoba had made. After that, the Government here complained that a considerable delay took place. But whose fault was it ? Manitoba, no doubt, was waiting, expecting every day that the Government might see it their duty to move in the direction of appointing this proposed commission for investigation ; but there was nothing done. Now, with regard to the subsequent acts that took place, the Government intimated to Manitoba that it was not necessary that she could comply with all the provisions of the remedial order. The Government of Manitoba expressed regret that the Federal Government had not adopted the course suggested, that of investigation. But the Government here did nothing ; even then they simply acted as if they had Manitoba under their hoof, and were bound to make the province come down on her knees and carry out whatever suggestions were made by the Dominion Government for a settlement of the question. I contend that from the inception of the trouble down to the present time, the action of this Government has not been in the direction of harmony, but has tended to stir up bitter feelings between the Dominion and that province. While Mr. Greenway may personally be disposed to make concessions with a view to the settlement of this difficulty, we must not forget that he has at his back the very large majority of the people of Manitoba, who, on two occasions have pronounced very clearly in opposition to separate schools. No doubt Mr. Greenway's suggestion that an investigation should be made was put forward for a specific purpose. He sought to satisfy his supporters that however desirous they might be to get rid of separate schools, there was a minority who held that they were suffering injustice and were entitled to separate schools under the constitution. However willing he might be, it would be very dangerous on his part, to make concessions unless the people were, after investigation, convinced that it was their duty in the interest of peace, harmony and justice, to make some concessions to the minority, and no doubt Mr. Greenway expected in that way to educate his people so as to secure their acquiescence to some reasonable concession. I have never been an advocate of separate schools, and I am not an advocate of such schools to-day ; but, at the same time, I am not disposed to trample upon the conscientious rights of any minority. I would be very glad if our Catholic friends would unite with us in one common school system, all the children being sent to the common schools ; but, under our constitution, and in the face of the compact entered into at the time of confederation, I decline to be a party to force, by law, the Catholics to comply with such a system, as they hold it would inflict an injustice on the minority. The Manitoba school system may have been a very inferior system, but I will not discuss it. It may not have come up to the standard as regards efficiency, either of Catholic or Protestant schools, but the fact that it was inferior does not render its abolition justifiable. Suppose the entire system of education in Manitoba were inefficient, would it be proposed to abolish the whole of it? On the contrary, it would be the duty of the authorities to seek to improve the standard of efficiency so that the youth of the country might be thoroughly educated. When Sir Oliver Mowat came into power in Ontario, he found separate schools were in the province to stay. No doubt he came to the conclusion that under the constitution they would have to be maintained in perpetuity. He at once proceeded to improve the standard of the separate schools and sought to make them efficient, and it is generally admitted not only in our province, but throughout this continent, and it was admitted at the World's Fair, that the educational system of Ontario is equal to that of any country.

Mr. DAVIN. And also that in Quebec.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the Catholics would only join us in seeking to arrive at some compromise, an arrangement might be arrived at instead of the present troubles being continued. I was very glad to hear the statements made by members from the maritime provinces. I was glad to know that the Protestant majority in those provinces has extended to the Catholic minority the greatest courtesy and consideration for their conscientious rights, and the people in those provinces are now living in peace and harmony. If we approached all these questions in a spirit of toleration, forbearance and Christian charity, we would get along very much better than by fighting and bickering about trifling differences, which tend to bring about discord in the Dominion. I desire to point out two or three matters in regard to which the present Bill is exceedingly objectionable. The whole proceedings connected with the inception of the movement have not been creditable to hon. gentlemen opposite. If this Bill were adopted, some peculiar results would follow its application to the conditions existing in Manitoba. In that province there are 190 schools with an average attendance of not over ten children. No doubt there is a mixed population, but the average attendance at 100 schools will not exceed seven children. In order to meet the requirements of the Manitoba School Act, there must be ten children living within a square, four miles one way and five miles another way. In order to have a school at all, there must be ten children between the ages of from five to sixteen years within the radius I have mentioned. After the passage of this Act the parents of every Catholic child in Manitoba become separate school supporters. Before they can join any other school system, they have got to give notice of their intention, and it will take considerable time before the names are transferred from the separate to the common school list. Say there are ten children in a school section, three of whom are Catholics and seven Protestant, you could have no school at all in that section. If you have one hundred sections in Manitoba in which there is an average of ten children of school age, and that they are divided in religion in the proportion I have mentioned, you would unschool, if I may use the word, one hundred school sections under the operation of this Act. That is one unfortunate feature in connection with the matter. Again, there are thirty-five of those schools which have joined the common school system, and which are now obtaining the Government grant. So far as I can learn, these are not seriously interfered with in the matter of Christian education taught in the schools. They are, I understand, allowed very considerable latitude. These thirty-five schools are almost entirely attended by Catholic children, and the moment this Act passed they would be turned out of doors, their parents will become separate school supporters and they will have to go to the expense of building new schools, while these schools will remain idle there, unless the use of them is allowed by the local government. All these difficulties prove to me the great necessity there is for having this question settled amicably between the two governments. I am glad that this Government has decided at last to send as a commission, the gentlemen who are now on their way to Winnipeg, with a view of bringing about a settlement. In my opinion, no lasting and peaceable settlement of this trouble could ever be accomplished by continuing the strained relations which now exists between the Federal and Manitoba governments. If you ever get a settlement to be of any benefit at all to the minority, it must be obtained with the consent and co-operation of the people of that province, if possible. I do not say for a moment that you can force that settlement, but I do say that every possible means should have been exhausted in that respect, before this measure was brought before us, or before the Government attempted to apply the reservation in the constitution. I have not seen a constitutional lawyer in this House who is prepared to stake his reputation upon the legality of this Bill. I have talked the matter over with some of the best legal talent in this House, and it appears to me the Government are virtually moving in the dark. They are not at all satisfied that even though the Bill should become law, they can force compliance with its provisions in the part of the province of Manitoba. The result undoubtedly will be that every clause in this Act will become the subject for litigation. As the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said, it will bring about legal difficulties from year to year and from decade to decade, which will result in unpleasant feelings between the minority and majority of that province. It is absolutely necessary, under these conditions, that a settlement should be had, by Manitoba on her part making some reasonable concessions, and by the minority on their part accepting these concessions. It is said, Sir, that the minority in Manitoba are suffering, under existing circumstances. While my sympathies are with the minority, and while I should greatly regret that any minority should be subject to conscientious disabilities in the matter of education, I am glad to say that I have been informed that the present school system in Manitoba is practically the same as the system in Ontario. I am rejoiced to know that our public school system in Ontario is so inoffensive from a Catholic standpoint, that about half the Catholic children are attending the public schools, and have no conscientious injustices imposed upon them. If that is the case in Manitoba, then no very great affliction is being imposed upon the minority. However, I am not for a moment saying that the minority should be asked to part with any constitutional right, simply because they are not for the moment subject to any conscientious wrong. I do not say that, but I am glad to know that that is the condition of things at the present moment. Now, Sir, a good deal has been said with regard to the delay that has taken place. I do not hold the government of Manitoba altogether responsible for that delay, although they may be partly responsible. The case has dragged along slowly from court to court, but I do not think the Manitoba government could be held responsible for the delay until, at all events, the last decision of the Privy Council, declaring that the minority had a right to appeal to the central authority for remedial legislation. From that time down to the present, the Manitoba government undoubtedly may be held responsible for some procrastination. But, Sir, had this Government taken the course that was suggested by the people of Manitoba, I believe that in place of the time of this House being taken up with this measure, we would have long since reached a happy settlement of all the difficulties. The hon. Finance Minister, in addressing the House on this question, said that he divided this House into two parties. One party declared that under no circumstances could Manitoba be interfered with, justly or unjustly, in regard to her school legislation. That party was headed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He said that all the rest were agreed that the provision of the constitution for the relief of the minority should be applied ; but the Government's position was to apply it here and now, while the Opposition's position was to put it off indefinitely, in order to see what Manitoba would do. Well, Sir, I contend that there are three distinct parties in this House. There is the party that the Finance Minister has referred to, headed by the hon. member for North Simcoe. Then, there is the Government party, who propose to proceed in a mandatory and tyrannizing way in applying to Manitoba the reservation in the constitution, whether for better or worse, whether successfully or unsuccessfully, whether effectively or ineffectively—to pass the Bill now before this House, and let the minority take their chances. Whether it is good for them, or bad for them, whether it is the best settlement or the worst settlement, is a matter of secondary consideration. Rush the Bill through the House, get the majority and the minority in Manitoba into a wrangle, and let them fight it out as best they can. That is the course the Government propose—no investigation or examination ; no compliance with any suggestion that comes from Manitoba at all ; but go forward and rush the Bill through without regard to consequences. The course which the Opposition, headed by my esteemed friend the leader, propose, is this. We say, in the first place, that the action of the Government has very seriously interfered with a peaceable settlement. We say that what has been done should be virtually undone. We say that the vexatious and irritating remedial order that was issued by the Government, was a huge blunder, and should be withdrawn. We say that Manitoba should have been invited courteously to meet representatives of this Government, to talk the matter over, and, if possible, come to some settlement. We say that Manitoba should be allowed reasonable time to settle the question. We say that, after a full, fair and thorough investigation into all the conditions formerly and now, a proposition should be made to Manitoba of the least irksome character, a proposition which would in the least degree interfere with her present school system, which would not tend to annoy or exasperate the majority. But she should be asked to put into law a certain measure of relief which would, to some extent, if not completely, satisfy the minority. If, after that, Manitoba should continue to stand in the breach, and persist in a refusal to do anything, to grant justice to the minority, then, we say, give the minority the advantage of the reservation in the constitution, whatever it may be worth ; but not until we first put upon Manitoba the entire onus and responsibility of saying whether she is willing to do anything or not. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) some time ago stated, either in a letter or verbally, that, if certain privileges touching religious instruction in the schools at certain hours were granted, possibly the minority would be willing to accept that concession in settlement of this question. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) replied that, if a settlement of that character would be satisfactory to the minority, he had not the slightest doubt that the government of Manitoba would go the length of meeting that suggestion. Afterwards, I believe, that suggestion was withdrawn, as being not quite satisfactory to the minority, and the matter rests there. Nothing has been done since that time; but I do believe that by a careful discussion of the whole question with the people of Manitoba in the proper spirit, we might fairly hope to arrive at a settlement. I am sure it would be a matter of satisfaction to every man in this House and to the people of this Dominion to know that a question which has caused so much agitation and so much strife, had been peaceably and quietly settled. I do not want at the present juncture to be a party to the coercion of Manitoba. I frankly admit that. But, while I have no desire to support coercive laws, for the purpose of forcing concessions out of the government of Manitoba until they have had a fair opportunity of educating their people up to the point of doing justice to the minority, I would like to, at the same time, press upon Manitoba that she herself should not coerce her own minority to accept a law which they appear to resent very strongly, but should be generous to them. Now, Sir, I was quite amused with an address that was delivered a few evenings ago by the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Prior). He appeared to take special delight in referring to the hon. leader of the Opposition as the follower of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I suppose that, in doing that, he wished to engender in the breasts of the Catholic people of this country a feeling of resentment and bitterness towards the hon. leader of the Opposition. Well, Sir, it is no credit to any member of the present Cabinet to try to stir up bitterness and strife of that kind. But the hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken, when he said that the leader of the Opposition had become the follower of the hon. member for North Simcoe. The case is the very reverse. Who moved the resolution that was voted on in this House? Was it the hon. member for North Simcoe? No, it was my honoured leader; and the hon. member for North Simcoe followed the hon. leader of the Opposition, by supporting and voting for that resolution. Therefore, I cannot understand the remarks of the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue. We are quite glad to have the hon. member for North Simcoe follow the leader of the Opposition by supporting that resolution, and if he continues to follow him we shall be delighted. I would say that as far as he is concerned, in point of ability and eloquence he is an acquisition to any party which he chooses to join. Nobody denies his great ability and power of debate, and we are very glad to know that, in the course he took on this question, he felt it his duty to vote with us, and we consider it an honour to our leader that men of his ability and power should support this side of the House on this very important question. The hon. gentleman spoke also of my hon. leader's quibbling on this question. Well, if any party in this country has quibbled at all upon this whole issue, it is the party of hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, the Cabinet Ministers were not required to keep within their lines. In one section, we had one Minister preaching one thing, and in another section another Minister preaching an entirely different thing. The hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Montague) went back to his constituency, and declared that, so far as the Dominion Government were concerned, they have performed all the duties that devolve upon them. They had received the judgment of the Privy Council of England and had transmitted that judgment to the Manitoba government, and had nothing more to do with it; that it was now for Manitoba to say what she would do with it, but that the Dominion Government had done their duty in the matter. At the same itme, we had Ministers in other sections making very different statements, and it ill becomes hon. gentlemen opposite to belittle, in any way, the hon. leader of the Opposition by trying to show that he has quibbled on the school question. He has taken a straightforward, manly, upright, statesman-like course on the whole question, from beginning to end. In the course that he took in regard to the six months' hoist, I am satisfied that when he reviewed all the clauses of the Remedial Bill, when he saw how they failed to apply to the conditions of the minority in the North-west, when he carefully criticised the different provisions and the probable results, he saw in it nothing but a measure that would cause a good deal of strife and ill-feeling, and he did, as any honourable statesman would do, he preferred to allow matters to remain as they are in the hope that a better and more peaceable solution of the difficulty might be brought about in some other way rather than have a Bill of this kind become law, which would cause endless strife and bitterness. I am satisfied that was his view, and it was because he came to that view that he took the course he did.

Now, I want to say a few words in regard to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly). I heard him upon this measure a few nights ago, and I was amazed to listen to the tirade of abuse and criticism which he heaped upon the Manitoba government, at the very moment when the Government of which he was a member were proposing to send up a delegation in the hope of bringing about a settlement. Is that the act of a responsible Minister who desires a peaceable settlement of the question? If it be, then I do not know what diplomacy or statesmanship is. I was amazed to listen to that address brimful of criticism and abuse, which certainly would not tend to allay the feeling of bitterness caused by the strained relations that exist between Manitoba and the Dominion Government. For a member of this Cabinet, under the circumstances, to indulge in a speech of that kind was, in my humble opinion, exceedingly inopportune and not at all calculated to promote a settlement. I would like to know what his honourable colleagues, who are on their way to Winnipeg, to secure a settlement of this question, could reply to Mr. Greenway, if, on their arrival, that gentleman were to ask them an explanation of the utterances of the Minister of the Interior in this House a few days ago. Were he to say to them: If these are the sentiments of your Government, if this is how you feel with regard to Manitoba, if this is the clear and distinct statement of what you think is the feeling an ddisposition of the Manitoba Cabinet, you had better return home again, for you have evidently not come here for peace but for political war, —what could be their reply? They would well deserve such a rebuke from Mr. Greenway. In my humble opinion, the Government should have assumed the responsibility of long ago appointing a commission to thoroughly investigate the whole position of things, in order to bring about a settlement of the difficulty. Had they done so, we would have had from that commission a report which could easily have been presented to the House this session, as there were six months since the House last rose during which that commission could have investigated and reported. We would then have had something before us on which to legislate satisfactorily, and we would have been in the position of knowing exactly how the whole matter stood. I do not see why the Government did not take that course. They have appointed commissions before this. When the liquor question was pressing itself so forcibly upon them—a question upon which the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) in his simplicity——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is getting away from the question altogether.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am trying to show why a commission should have been appointed.

Mr. SPEAKER. The liquor commission is not the question before the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was trying to give some reasons why a commission should have been appointed in this case, and was merely drawing attention to the fact that on either question commissions had been appointed. I was about to draw attention to the fact that a commission had been appointed by the Attorney General of Ontario recently to examine into the school difficulty which had arisen in that province, and by means of that commission the difficulty was settled. With these experiences before us, the Government would have been justified, in the interests of peace and harmony in this country, in appointing a commission; and had they done so, they would have been able to bring before the House, in an unanswerable form, the condition of things that existed prior to the present school system and also the injustice to which the minority of that country have been subjected under the present system. In my opinion, and I frankly make this statement, a general system of separate schools in the North-west would be a mistake. The population of Manitoba is exceedingly sparse in the rural districts, every family lives on 160 acres or 320 acres, or even more. A large proportion of the land is held on speculation, the Hudson Bay Company being a very large holder. Under such circumstances, to divide the entire rural population into two section for educational purposes, would, I think, be a great blunder. I would be glad to see the Manitoba government make a concession to the Catholic minority in cities and towns wherever there is a sufficient number to establish efficient separate schools without interfering with the efficiency of the other schools, all being under government control and government inspection with teachers holding provincial certificates of qualification, and the curriculum of the separate schools to be the same as that of the public schools, except as regards religious teaching. in the rural districts would result in one or two things, either in making the education of the rising generation exceedingly expensive, or by compelling the engagement of cheap, and, therefore, too often inefficient teachers, and therefore to make that education very inferior. A great deal has been said in this House on this question which, in my opinion, is altogether beside the issue. For instance, a great deal has been said about the different bills of rights. I listened to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey) in his long address and I thought a great deal of what he said must only tend to confuse the public mind on the main issue. We in this House cannot go behind the constitution. It may be that improper influences were exercised to import into that constitution clauses which would not otherwise have been there. This is an Act of the British Parliament, and we cannot amend it. If improper influences were used in the moulding of that constitution, that may be an argument for going to England and asking for an amendment of the Act, but it is no argument in favour of ignoring any clause in that enactment. No judge upon the bench would listen to an argument as to the influences brought to bear upon the members of this House in passing the law which the judge is called upon to apply to the cases before him. And so with us, we have nothing to do with the influences that made the constitution; all we have to do is to intelligently interpret it as we find it.

A good deal has been said with regard to influences exercised in this House upon this question by the members from the province of Quebec, and many insinuations have been thrown out. I must say, after holding a seat in this House for fourteen years, and after a long business experience, that I have never had the pleasure of being associated with a more broad-minded, liberal, patriotic body of men than the French Canadians I have met in this House. I have never noticed any disposition on their part to be biassed in their views or harsh in their utterances with regard to any class or any creed. I am glad to be able to bear testimony to this fact. I think the course they have taken upon the question, following their noble leader, as they have done in the statesman-like views he has expressed upon this question, is creditable to them, and will do away with the feeling entertained by many in this country that the French Canadians of Quebec are disposed to interfere with the rights and liberties of other classes and other provinces. I hope we have heard the last of such opinions.

Let me express, in closing, my earnest hope that the commission which has gone to Manitoba may succeed in bringing about a settlement of this question. I shall be glad indeed if they return with an agreement entered into or outlined, that will be satisfactory to all parties. And I hope that the application of the reserve power in the constitution will never be brought into play in this Dominion. After studying it, I cannot but think that the fathers of confederation, when they adopted that clause creating a reserve power, never expected that it was to be used. I think it was intended to be like a boquet in a man's button-hole—more for ornament than for use ; for it does not carry with it any declaratory provisions making it clearly understood and showing how it can be applied in the interests of any particular minority. It is unquestionably in a very unsatisfactory form, to say the least of it. I hope that in the interests of the Dominion and of each of the provinces, whatever may be the minority in any province, whether Catholic or Protestant, the treatment of that minority will be so generous, so conciliatory, will be characterized by such toleration and forbearance, that never in the history of this country will relief have to be applied for under this clause. If we proceed upon these principles, we will get over our difficulties far better than by going into a struggle of a province with the Dominion, and the Dominion with a province, which undoubtedly will end in trouble of no ordinary character. Manitoba has cost this Dominion a considerable sum of money already. Nor do I say this with the desire at all to reflect upon that province, which possibly may become the most important province of this Dominion. It has unquestionably a fertile soil, and is destined to become a grand country. But we have had a little lesson from Manitoba already. After she had got a provincial charter and commenced to exercise her provincial powers, she ran across a contract that we had entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway with regard to granting charters to railways running south-west of the main line, for twenty years. As a result of that unfortunate entanglement, we had to pay the Canadian Pacific Railway a sum of $10,000,000 to get rid of that contract. On that occasion, Sir John Macdonald, who was a very experienced statesman, declared that we could not check Manitoba. I believe that was a true saying. We have no desire or wish to check her, and for that reason I hope the commission that is now at work will bring about a quiet and peaceable settlement of the trouble that is now agitating this House and causing so much agitation throughout this country, and enable us to get back to our old party lines, and fight on the lines of Grit and Tory, protection and revenue tariff. But let us by all means get rid of this vexed question that is taking up so much of the time of this House, and has caused so much unpleasantness between different classes of our people.

Mr. BORDEN. It is not my intention to address myself to the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), but to the main motion before the House. I observe that nearly all the speakers on this subject have agreed that this is the most important question which has ever come before this House since confederation. The hon. leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper, Bart.) said that, in his long experience, reaching over forty years, he had never before proposed to any assembly, or any parliament, a measure of such gravity and importance. But I am inclined to think that hon. gentleman has made an error. I believe that he did once propose a question to the parliament of his native province which was of even greater consequence, of more gravity, than this one. Mr. Speaker, this measure proposes to make such use of the powers of this House as has never been attempted since confederation, namely, to interfere, to amend, to supplement, to change, the legislation of a province with reference to a subject over which the provinces have exclusive control under our federal system of government. But Sir, that hon. gentleman found it convenient at one time to submit to the legislature of his own province a measure which did not simply propose to change the constitution under which that province existed, but to sweep away the very constitution itself, and to legislate the province out of the condition in which the people had lived happily for many years, and against what was well known to be the will of the people, into a confederation for which their permission had never been asked. Now, I can understand the hon. gentleman desiring to say that this was a more grave and extraordinary use of power than the one to which I have just referred, because he was taking exception to a statement which had been made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier), with reference to the action of the hon. gentleman at the time to which I refer. The words of the leader of the Opposition to which the hon. leader of the House took exception, were these :—

> But the hon. gentleman knows that the bitterness of the initiation of confederation, the feeling against the coercion then practised, has never been removed, and never will entirely disappear until it is buried in the grave of the last man of that generation, whose manhood was outraged by the arbitrary proceeding which trampled under foot the dignity and manhood of a proud people.

I stand here now as one of the representatives of the province of Nova Scotia, to say that every word uttered by the hon. leader of the Opposition with reference to the manner in which confederation was carried in the province of Nova Scotia, is absolutely and literally true. But, if the leader of the House desired to palliate the force of that indictment made by the leader of the Opposition, how did he proceed to do it? He took us back a long way into the history of the province, but, as he has seen fit to do so, and as he has seen fit to misstate the history of those times, I think it is only proper that we should have on record the facts with reference to what took place in those troublous times in Nova Scotia. Now, Sir, I give the hon. gentleman the full benefit of his line of argument, and this is what he said in the House:

> Hon. Joseph Howe was the leader of the Nova Scotia government at that time, and in 1861, a year afterwards, he moved, in his capacity of leader of the House, a resolution in favour of a federal union, or otherwise, of British North America. His motion was as follows—I only read the main clause:—
> "And whereas, while many advantages may be secured by such a union, either of all these provinces, or any portion of them, many and serious obstacles are presented, which can only be overcome by mutual consultation of the leading men of the colonies and by free communication with the Imperial Government."
> When I tell the hon. gentleman that I seconded that resolution, and it was passed unanimously by the legislature of Nova Scotia in 1861, I think he will absolve me from the charge of having pressed a union of the British North American provinces, and brought Nova Scotia into it on terms that would warrant my action being characterized as the hon. gentleman has characterized them. But what was the action taken? I moved in the legislature of Nova Scotia on 10th April, 1866, my resolution. The general elections took place two years afterwards. Mr. Howe and myself were committed, in the face of the legislature and the country to a policy of the union of the British North American provinces, which proposition received the unanimous assent of the legislature. The elections took place two years afterwards, with the result that I was brought into power at the head of the largest majority that any leader of the Nova Scotia government has had at its back in the history of the country. I was elected, and an overwhelming majority of the members were elected to support me, in the face of my public declaration made in 1860 in favour of a union of the provinces of British North America.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what were the facts in reference to that matter? I find that, on the last day of the session of 1861, in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly, Mr. Howe did move the following motion, not the one read by the hon. gentleman—that was only an unimportant clause of it—but this:

> Whereas the subject of a union of the North American provinces, or of the maritime provinces of British North America, has been from time to time mooted and discussed in all the colonies, and whereas, while many advantages may be secured by such a union, either of all these provinces or of a portion of them——

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, is my hon. friend in order?

Mr. BORDEN. Make your point of order.

Mr. DAVIN. The point of order I make is this: My hon. friend is discussing what is really a side issue of the main debate, and I ask whether he can, on a motion to go into committee and an amendment thereon, hark back and discuss the main question?

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, an hon. member can refer to any debate that has taken place in previous stages of the Bill; but I would suggest to the hon. member the desirability of keeping to the question before the Chair.

Mr. BORDEN. I am endeavouring to answer what I believe to be a misrepresentation, using the word in a parliamentary sense, of the history of the province of Nova Scotia with respect to the passing of the Confederation Act, made here by the leader of the House, which misrepresentation I think I am entitled to answer, as I certainly must be in order if the leader of the House was in order in making the statement. When interrupted, I was reading a resolution, of which the leader of the House read a very small and unimportant part, in which he claimed that the question of confederation was virtually before the people prior to the date at which it was passed by the House at the instance of the government of which he was a member, in 1867. That resolution was as follows:—

> Whereas the subject of a union of the North American provinces, or of the maritime provinces of British America, has been from time to time mooted and discussed in all the colonies.
> And whereas, while many advantages may be secured by such a union, either of all these provinces, or of a portion of them, many and serious obstacles are presented, which can only be overcome by mutual consultation of the leading men of the colonies, and by free communication with the Imperial Government.
> Therefore resolved, That His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor be respectfully requested to put himslf in communication with His Grace the Colonial Secretary, and His Excellency the Governor General, and the Lieutenant-Governors of the other North American provinces, in order to ascertain the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and the opinions of the other colonies with a view to an enlightened consideration of a question involving the highest interests, and upon which the public mind in all the provinces ought to be set at rest.

There is not a single word in that resolution which in any way commits the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia to the adoption of confederation at any time in the future. It was simply a resolution declaring that it was expedient to have a conference with the Colonial Secretary to ascertain his views on the subject of confederation. Besides, the resolution did not refer specially to the union of all the provinces, it might be a union of two or three or all the provinces, and in no sense can it be claimed that it in any way indicated the state of public opinion in Nova Scotia at that time. On the contrary, it was passed on the last day of the session, just before prorogation, and in the reports of the debates, which in Nova Scotia have been always very fully given, I fail to find one word of debate as having occurred on that motion, and even the motion itself does not appear in the official debates. In 1864, after the hon. gentleman, who was then in opposition had come to power, as leader of the government, he proposed a resolution setting forth that it was desirable to have, not a union of all the provinces, but a union of the maritime provinces, the resolution being in these terms :

> Resolved, That His Excellency, the administrator of the Government, be requested to appoint delegates (not to exceed five) to confer with delegates who may be appointed by the governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, for the purpose of arranging a preliminary plan for the union of the three provinces under one government and legislature, such union to take effect when confirmed by the legislative enactments of the various provinces interested and approved by Her Majesty the Queen.

This proposition looked entirely to the establishment of the union of the three maritime provinces. In justice to the leader of the House, I will quote from his speech, delivered by him in introducing the resolution I have read. The hon. gentleman then said :

> There is consequently, I am satisfied, such a disinclination on the part of these two great sections in which the Government of Canada is divided as to render it quite impracticable to discuss, except as theory for the future, a union of Canada with the maritime provinces. But I am satisfied that whilst the financial condition of affairs has been such as it has been for years in Canada—the deficit now between the expenditure and revenue being more than a million of dollars—these maritime provinces would look very doubtfully upon a proposal which was to unite them with a country that is placed in a position of such financial embarrassment.

That was the resolution and that was the speech which the leader of the House presented to the legislature of Nova Scotia in 1864. But now the hon. gentleman, on the strength of the resolution I have read, passed in 1861, and of the resolution which looked entirely to a maritime union, and his speech, in which he said that a union with the upper provinces was absolutely impossible, seeks to justify himself in passing the Confederation Act for Nova Scotia in opposition to petitions signed by tens of thousands of people asking that the Act should be submitted to the people. I am old enough to remember the events of that day, and I know that from one end of the province to the other there was a union of all the old parties against the Act of coercion which the hon. gentleman was attempting to press upon the province, which he had been called upon to govern, not for the purpose of carrying out the union of the provinces, because it was never thought of or referred to in 1863. The hon. gentleman came into power in Nova Scotia on a cry of retrenchment, and he got into power only to inaugurate a system of extravagance which had never before been equalled in that province, and I am happy to say has never been equalled since, and to legislate out of the hands of the people the rights which they had reposed in his hands to guard.

I think these facts pretty effectively dispose of the claim of the hon. gentleman that he had a mandate from the people to pass the Act of Confederation. But the hon. gentleman claims that he entered into a compact with Mr. George Brown and others. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) says he gave a promise that he would carry this measure through the province of Nova Scotia without consulting the people. Well, Sir, I understand that the Hon. Mr. Tilley was one of the delegates to the Quebec conference and if any pledges were given, I suppose that hon. gentleman would have given the same pledges as the hon. leader of this House. But what do we find with reference to the province of New Brunswick ? We find that the question was submitted to the people of that province, not once, but twice. First the province of New Brunswick declined to accept confederation, but a few months later the question was submitted again, and adopted by a majority of the people of that province, and ever since there have been no heart-burnings in New Brunswick, because they felt they were fairly treated. Whether the bargain was good or whether the bargain was bad, it was of their own making. As was rightly pictured by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), the people of the province of Nova Scotia felt they had sustained a gross injury and that a gross wrong had been done them. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) might have gone further than he did in his statement, because it will not only be the last man who was able to exercise the franchise of that time, but his children and his grandchildren will have to pass away, before the memory of that unjust act is effaced from the minds of the people of Nova Scotia.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the legislation before this House. As a reason for justifying the statement that this is the most important and gravest measure that has been presented to Parliament for its consideration since confederation. I desire to refer to one point in a sense that may not be universally agreed upon. I am not a lawyer, but I have followed this discussion pretty closely and have read all the literature pertaining to it. At any rate, some of the leading lawyers have taken the view that whatever legislation we may pass with reference to this matter, it cannot be afterwards changed ; that it is like the laws of the Medes and Persians, fixed and unalterable. It seems to me from my reading, and looking at it as a layman, that that allegation is well grounded. If that be the case, Sir, then the circumstances are indeed momentous. When we think that we are about to pass a system of laws upon the subject of education which is exclusively a provincial right, and that we are going to impose upon a great province, this law for all time, no matter how the circumstances may change, or how the population may change, or how desirous they may be to make a change in that matter, when we think that for ever that law, by our act here, is to be fastened upon that unwilling province, surely it ought to cause us to pause. I wish to call your attention, Sir, to the words of the remedial order itself, bearing upon this point :

> The committee, therefore, recommend that the provincial legislature be requested to consider whether its action upon the decision of Your Excellency in Council should be permitted to be such as, while refusing to redress a grievance which the highest court in the Empire has declared to exist, may compel Parliament to give the relief of which under the constitution the provincial legislature is the proper and primary source, thereby according to this view, permanently divesting itself in a very large measure of its authority and so establishing in the province an educational system which no matter what changes may take place in the circumstances of the country or the views of the people, cannot be altered or repealed by any legislative body in Canada.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is a serious question enough. It seems to me in view of this point alone, that this House should hesitate before undertaking to pass legislation, which no matter what may happen can never be changed afterwards. I want to ask who are we that we should undertake this important legislation ? Why, Sir, we are a Parliament which it is announced to-day by the leader of the House, will, within three or four weeks come to its end by efflux of time under the constitution. This is the body which proposes to encroach upon the exclusive domain of a province with legislation which can never be changed, no matter how much that province, or no matter how much this Parliament or its successors may desire to change it afterwards. We are a Parliament elected upon lists made in the year 1888, upon which not one-half of the names are to be found of those who are eligible voters to-day. There is 50 per cent of change in the electorate which returned to this Parliament the hon. gentlemen who now propose to enact this legislation. I do not desire, Sir, to say anything offensive, but it is well known that as we approach the end of every Parliament, there are hon. gentlemen who have got tired of politics, who do not propose to seek re-election, and who possibly have chosen for themselves comfortable offices which they hope to enjoy for the rest of their days. There are of necessity several hon. gentlemen in this House who come under that description. These are the gentlemen who propose to settle for ever the destinies, not only of the province of Manitoba, but of this Dominion. I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, and I put it to such hon. gentlemen, whether it is desirable that a question of such immense significance should be settled by a House composed as I have pointed out. Now, what happened in 1891 ? Then we had a great leader of the Conservative party who, whatever else we might say of him, was a man inclined to stick to constitutional usage, at any rate. That right hon. gentleman had occasion to propose a subject for the consideration of this country, a subject referring to the question of trade, a subject affecting our material prosperity. That hon. gentleman thought it of sufficient consequence to appeal to the country a year before the natural end of the term of that Parliament, in order, as he said, to get a body of men fresh from the people to consider the important question of a reciprocal treaty with the United States. But to-day a question which far transcends in importance that question of reciprocity, important as it is to us—a question on which the happiness of a province hangs, a question on which the fate of this Dominion may rest—it is proposed to settle here within four weeks of the end of this Parliament, by hon. gentlemen who have either made up their minds to go out of politics and have no further care for the people, or who know that when this Parliament comes to an end, they will be placed in comfortable offices for the rest of their lives.

I am reminded again of what happened in Nova Scotia in 1867. As I have said, we had there a question of greater consequence even than the present question. We had the question of a provincial legislature legislating away the constitution of the province, and legislating the province into a new arrangement. We had nine-tenths of the people known to be opposed to that legislation, just as the vast majority of the people of Canada to-day are known to be opposed to the Bill which these hon. gentlemen are now trying to force through this House. And what happened ? At one time, not many weeks before that confederation measure was carried through the legislature of Nova Scotia, it was well known that the leader of the government of Nova Scotia, to-day the leader of this House, was in a minority in that province. The hon. gentleman boasted here the other night that he had carried that measure by a considerable majority; and so he did. But what happened? The hon. gentlemen who helped him to carry it stepped out of the legislature of Nova Scotia into the Senate of Canada, or into public offices from one end of the province to the other. Not a man of them was re-elected in the elections of 1867, except the hon. leader of the House, and he was elected only by a very narrow majority; he got in just by the skin of his teeth. I say we are repeating in this House what happened in the province of Nova Scotia in 1867; and I dare say it is fitting that the hon. gentleman who so successfully bulldozed the legislature of Nova Scotia in 1867 to carry confederation through the House against the well-understood wishes of the people of that province, should be brought here to coerce this House into passing legislation which the majority of the people are opposed to, and which is inimical to the interests of the province of Manitoba and the interests of the Dominion at large.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in reference to this question, there seem to be certain facts as to which there is agreement upon all sides. There is no question whatever that the Manitoba Education Act of 1890 is constitutional; that has been settled by the highest court of the realm. There is no doubt, further, that the minority in the province of Manitoba have the right of appeal; that has been settled by the highest court of the realm. There is no doubt, in my mind at any rate, and, I think, in the minds of the majority of the members of this House, certainly not in the mind of the Minister of Justice, that this Parliament is free to act or to refuse to act, as it may see fit. There is no doubt either—this fact was settled in the argument that took place before the Privy Council in England—that the action of this Parliament is purely political. The question is—and it is a question which the Government have to face and accept the responsibility for—whether the enactment of this legislation is the best thing that can be done in the interests of Canada at large? We hear a great deal about the rights of minorities. I believe in preserving and conserving the rights of minorities. But, Sir, we are here under a system of responsible government, and the very foundation stone of responsible government is to govern in the interests of the majority, with a view to the greatest good of the greatest number. Now, Parliament may act or Parliament may refuse to act. If that be true, how enormously our responsibilities are increased. I have felt, all through this delicate question, that I would be glad if any man could satisfy me that there was a plain duty on the part of this Parliament to act, no matter what the circumstances might be, after the Committee of the Privy Council had decided that there was a right of appeal. I cannot take that view. Therefore, if I am free to act or to refuse to act, how important it is that I should be possessed of all the knowledge which it is possible to be possessed of, in order to act intelligently. And therein, I take it, Sir, is one of the main arguments in favour of the policy which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition—an argument in favour of the fullest inquiry and investigation, in order that we may intelligently and honestly discharge our duties as representatives of the people. Suppose we have to delay a few days, or a few weeks, or a few months; what is that, if by that delay we are able to settle this question upon intelligent lines—upon lines which are just to all the parties concerned? In this connection, I will observe that the province of Manitoba invites, requests investigation; and, although the despatches have been read many times, I shall have to trouble the House by reading them again, as an important part of my argument. After the remedial order was sent to the legislature of Manitoba, that legislature sent an answer, containing these words:

> We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not available then to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools.
> We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order.
> Being impressed with this view, we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.
> It is urged most strongly that upon so important a matter, involving as it does, the religious feelings and convictions of different classes of the people of Canada and the educational interests of a province which is expected to become one of the most important in the Dominion, no hasty action should be taken, but that, on the contrary, the greatest care and deliberation should be exercised and a full and thorough investigation made.

That was the message of the legislature of the province of Manitoba to the Government of Canada in answer to the remedial order. It seems to me that nothing could indicate more certainly the desire on the part of that legislature to meet the requirements of the case, because, as the language points out, they are ready to expedite in the fullest way an investigation into the whole matter. I find the Government next sent to Manitoba a modified remedial order, which seems to have been issued shortly after the close of last session, and in which we saw some hope that the Government had come down from its high horse and was willing to be reasonable, in the following language:—

The remedial order coupled with the answer of the Manitoba government, has vested the Federal Legislature with complete jurisdiction in the premises, but it by no means follows that it is the duty of the Federal Government to insist that provincial legislation to be mutually satisfactory should follow the exact lines of this order. It is hoped, however, that a middle course will commend itself to the local authorities, so that federal action may become unnecessary.

In answer to that the government of Manitoba sent the following message to this Government :—

It is a matter of regret that the invitation extended by the legislative assembly to make a proper inquiry into the facts of the case has not been accepted, but that, as above stated, the advisers of His Excellency have declared their policy without investigation. It is equally a matter of regret that Parliament is apparently about to be asked to legislate without investigation. It is with all deference submitted that such a course seems to be quite incapable of reasonable justification and must create the conviction that the educational interests of the people of the province of Manitoba are being dealt with in a hostile and peremptory way by a tribunal whose members have not approached the subject in a judicial spirit or taken the proceedings necessary to enable them to form a proper opinion upon the merits of the question.

The inquiry asked for by the reply of the legislature to the remedial order should, in the opinion of the undersigned, be again earnestly invited, and in the event of the invitation being accepted the scope of the inquiry should be sufficiently wide to embrace all available facts relating to the past or present school systems.

The desire of the legislature and government of the province throughout the whole course of the proceedings, beginning with the enactments of the statutes of 1890, has been to provide the best possible means of education for the children of our citizens. To that end every possible effort has been put forth and every possible pecuniary sacrifice made in order that there might be established a school system based upon sound principles and equipped and administered in accordance with improved modern educational methods. Though very much remains to be accomplished it may be fairly asserted that a reasonable measure of success has attended the efforts which have thus been put forth.

In amending the law from time to time and in administering the system, it is the earnest desire to remedy every well-founded grievance and to remove every appearance of inequality or injustice that may be brought to notice.

I desire to emphasize this clause again :

In amending the law from time to time and in administering the system, it is the earnest desire to remedy every well-founded grievance and to remove every appearance of inequality and of injustice that may be brought to notice. With a view to so doing, the government and the legislature would always be ready to consider any complaint that may be made in a spirit of fairness and conciliation.

Now, I have read to you, first, the reply of the legislature of Manitoba to the first remedial order, and, secondly, the reply of the Manitoba government to the amended remedial order : and now I will read certain resolutions passed by the legislature of Manitoba immediately after the general election —not by a moribund legislature about to end, by efflux of time, in three or four weeks, not by a legislature composed, to some extent at least, of gentlemen who no longer intend returning to their constituencies to ask anew the suffrages of their electors, gentlemen who are sitting, possibly, if not with commissions in their pockets, with the promises of commissions and offices after this Parliament has ceased to exist—but by a legislature fresh from the people, a legislature elected upon this question, a legislature elected by a majority of six to one in favour of the policy of the government which enacted the legislation we are now proposing to alter :

That it is sincerely regretted that these repeated and earnest invitations for an inquiry have been absolutely ignored by the advisers of His Excellency, who propose, without complete information themselves, to ask coercive legislation from Parliament, the great majority of whose members are necessarily without a full knowledge of the facts relative to the past and present school systems of Manitoba.

That in amending the school law from time to time and in administering the school system of the province, it is our earnest desire to remedy any well-founded grievance and to remove any appearance of inequality or injustice that may be brought to our notice and to consider any complaint which may be made in a spirit of fairness and conciliation.

That while the constitutional right of the Dominion Parliament to deal with the question in some way is not denied, it is confidently maintained that the central authority should not interfere with a province except in a case of most urgent necessity and only as a last resort and after the clearest possible case has been made out of flagrant wrong-doing on the part of the provincial authorities. That no case has ever been made out for interference with the local law by the Dominion Parliament which will justify said Parliament in setting aside the well recognized principle of provincial autonomy, a principle the maintenance of which is essential to the satisfactory operation of our constitution.

Now, I have read the answers of Manitoba to the remedial order and to the proposal to pass a Remedial Bill in this Parliament. And I am sure you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, and no man can dissent from the statement, that no language could more plainly indicate a desire on the part of the government and legislature of Manitoba to meet this Government and this Parliament half-way at least and to remedy any injustice which may exist under that legislation. They have asked over and over again for an inquiry ; they have asked practically for a conference. That has been denied them. They have been treated in a most cavalier manner. But it seems that, at last, through the kind offices of personages outside of the Government, we are about to have a conference between this Government and the government of Manitoba. The Government seem to be very much afraid to accept any responsibility for the conference. We had questions put across the House by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) as to whether the Government had authorized the visit of Sir Donald Smith to Manitoba with reference to this school question. That was denied. But at last, on Friday last, we succeeded in getting the Government to accept responsibility for the policy of a conference and so now, I suppose, we may infer what the policy of the Government is, because they have sent two members of the Government to negotiate with Manitoba with reference to this question. Better late than never. The Government have come to their senses very tardily, but they seem to have come to their senses at last. It is most gratifying to us on this side of the House whose policy has favoured this course from the first, because my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition long ago laid down the policy of investigation and the policy of conciliation as opposed to the policy of blind coercion which seemed to have been the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite until within a very few days. But while these hon. gentlemen are going to the province of Manitoba with the flag of truce, in the name of reason let us observe the rule of ordinary decency here by stopping what we are doing, by refraining from pressing further this obnoxious legislation until we know the result of the negotiations now taking place. What possible good can be served by proceeding with this Bill until we know what becomes of these negotiations ? It seems to me that the hon. gentleman who leads this House has conducted himself in such a way as to give every indication of the strongest desire to annoy the government and the people of Manitoba to the utmost extent of his ability. I ask any man to read his speech upon this subject and say whether I am not justified in thinking so. He went out of his way to be offensive to the province of Manitoba, when he characterized their legislation as dishonest and as robbery, as "Hansard" will show. And this is the hon. gentleman who now, forsooth, at the last moment, is sending a deputation to Manitoba to meet the government of Manitoba with the view to procuring from that province legislation by which action here will be rendered unnecessary. Nothing could be more undiplomatic. No greater mistake could be made than for the Government to pursue the tactics they are pursuing. And, Sir, they lay themselves open to a very strong suspicion on the part of the public that they are not in earnest, that they are not candid, when they pretend that this deputation sent to Winnipeg is for the purpose of a conference which may result in a solution of this vexed question. What has been the course of the Government with reference to this matter ? If the Government were so certain, as they appear to be, of the absolute duty devolving upon them to interfere in this matter, why did not they interfere when they had power to do so by the disallowance of this law ? Months and months passed by during which at any moment they could have disallowed the Act. But they allowed the law to go into operation. Their policy has been a policy of delay—anything to avoid facing the music. And it has come out in this discussion that they hoped—that they were certain almost—that the decision of the Privy Council would be such as to relieve them of all further responsibility. That was one of the motives in submitting the case. After the judgment of the Privy Council declared that the right of appeal belonged to the minority in the province of Manitoba, what happened ? We have been five years during which these various references had taken place, during which this Government had been delaying, had been going from one court to another to get an opinion to enable it to dispose of the question. For five long years the minority in Manitoba had waited, but when this last decision of the Privy Council was delivered, what happened ? Why, Sir, a new mode of action seemed to inspire hon. gentlemen. The hon. gentlemen who had been so ready to delay, so anxious to delay, suddenly became imbued with the idea that they must hasten, hasten at once to act. If they had been willing to continue as they had done, taking their time, and had approached the legislature and government of Manitoba in the spirit in which they pretend to be approaching them to-day, and had said to them : Here, you see this is the decision of the highest court in the realm. The responsibility now devolves upon this Government of dealing with this question, and it will devolve upon Parliament, if you do not settle it. Did they do that ? No, Sir, they acted, I say, with indecent haste in this matter. When they got ready for the hearing, which was immediately, they would not wait for the government of Manitoba to come to Ottawa to plead their case. The legislature of Manitoba was in session, as we know, in Winnipeg ; the Premier of the province of Manitoba was lying on a sick bed ; the Attorney General of the province, who was the man who should have been here to represent his government before the Privy Council, was unable to leave his legislative duties. The Manitoba government asked for delay. Was that an unreasonable request ? I think not. In view of what has happened since, nobody can say that it was an unreasonable request. But the hon. gentlemen hurried on, impelled, Sir, by what ? Impelled, one must believe, by something which does not appear on the surface, and which, when the history of this country is written, some day, will not be very creditable to the hon. gentlemen ; impelled by a desire to force into the arena of party politics a question which would disturb this Dominion from one end of it to the other ; impelled by a desire to make an unholy use of race and religious prejudices in this country. If that was not the reason, then, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what possible reason can be adduced for the conduct of these hon. gentlemen ? They had waited five years ; they could not wait three weeks, then. Surely, the best interest of the Dominion and of a settlement of this case, would have been subserved by a further delay. Nobody can deny that, nobody can doubt it. We are told that the province of Manitoba has refused to act. How much time has the province of Manitoba had to act ? This Government has had five years to act. The province of Manitoba knew that, so far as any judgment that had been given, was concerned, the Act of 1890 was intra vires, and within their power to pass, a perfectly constitutional Act, and is yet, for that matter, and was up to the time of the last judgment of the Privy Council. But when was that judgment of the Privy Council delivered ? One short year ago. So that, at best, the province of Manitoba has only had since the date of the last judgment of the Privy Council, which declared that there was a right of appeal, and from that date down to the present moment. But how has she been hampered ? Has Manitoba had an opportunity to act ? No, Sir, instead of, as I have pointed out, approaching the province in a friendly spirit, to point out what the nature of the judgment was, and what the responsibilities were which devolved upon this Government, and, perhaps, upon this Parliament, the Government proceeded to issue its offensive and coercive remedial order. I say, we have a right to suspect, Mr. Speaker, that the motives of hon. gentlemen were not of the highest, when they took that sudden course of action. Now, it can not be doubted that the hon. gentlemen, when they passed that remedial order, intended to go at once to the country. That remedial order, Sir, was an address to the electors of Canada, or to one section of them. They had fully determined on that line of action, there cannot be a question of it ; and that, Sir, is the explanation of the sudden course adopted by the Government in issuing that remedial order. And yet we are charged in this House by the hon. gentleman who leads the House, with a desire to inflame passions, to light the fires of racial and religious prejudices in this country. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was charged by the leader of the House, on a recent occasion, in the course of this debate, with desiring to light up these fires in Canada. Well, Sir, I leave it to the hon. member of the House to judge who were mainly responsible, if these fires have been kindled in this Dominion, whether it is those hon. gentlemen who rush madly into this offensive course towards the province of Manitoba, or whether it is my hon. friend here, the leader of the Opposition, who has always counselled moderation, who has always counselled conciliation, who asks only that all the facts of the case be ascertained, that the fullest information be secured, before this tremendous step is taken which is now proposed to this House. Now, these hon. gentlemen pursued a very different course in dealing with other matters. My hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has referred to the course they pursued with reference to the temperance question, where a commission seemed to be wanted. My hon. friend the Finance Minister also pursued a very different course, when he undertook the important duty of revising his tariff a few years ago. Was the hon. gentleman able by himself to make up his mind what alterations should be made in the tariff. No, Sir. He took his two assistants, the Controller of Inland Revenue and the Controller of Customs, with him, and he went all over the country, and called into his councils people who were going to be affected by the legislation which he proposed, that is, some of the people. At any rate, he called upon his friends the manufacturers—always. Sometimes he called upon the importers ; I am not aware that he took very much pains to consult his friends the farmers. But, at any rate, he laid down this principle, that he was going to enact legislation which affected the rights, and might affect the prosperity, of the people of this country, and that it was his duty to consult or confer with those people who were to be affected by the legislation which he proposed to enact. Why did not the hon. gentleman pursue the same course with reference to what is certainly a matter of equal importance, of vastly more importance, a matter which, as I have shown, possibly may end in legislation which can never be altered in this House ? We can change the tariff as many times as we like, but this legislation, once enacted, is there for ever. Why did not the hon. gentleman's Government propose to meet the Manitoba government, which were to be affected by the legislation, in the same spirit as that government undertook to meet the people of Canada ? He did not see fit to do that. The course of hon. gentlemen reminds me a good deal of the course they pursued with respect to the question of reciprocity. Hon. gentlemen opposite have professed a great deal of zeal with regard to bringing about a reciprocity treaty with the United States ; but when they entered upon the business seriously, it seems to me as if they were endeavouring how not to do it. And so it is with regard to this question of inducing Manitoba to pass legislation which would relieve this Parliament from the trouble and responsibility it has undertaken, hon. gentlemen are conducting themselves in the manner indicated by the phrase " how not to do it." The speech delivered by the leader of the House has done more than anything that has occurred since the commencement of the difficulty to interfere with the prospects of the conference which is now proceeding in the city of Winnipeg between the representatives including members of this Government and members of the Manitoba government. Many hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken have expressed great solicitude for the rights of the minority in Manitoba. The leader of the House was carried away with what he termed a strong desire to protect the rights of the minority of Manitoba. He was not so anxious about the rights of the minority in Nova Scotia on a certain occasion, in fact he was not so anxious as to the rights of the majority in that province on another occasion. The present leader of the House boasts that he is the father of the free school system in Nova Scotia. I am not aware that he took any special pains to guard the rights of the Roman Catholic minority in that province. The legislation of that day shows that nothing of the kind was done by him. But hon. gentlemen opposite are very solicitous of the rights of the minority in Manitoba. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), the whip of the great Conservative party, was very solicitous about the rights of that minority. He was impelled to vote for the second reading of the Bill because those rights had so strongly influenced his mind, they even haunted his dreams. Let me read to the House from the speech of the hon. gentleman in whose hands, forsooth, the rights of the minority of Manitoba have been placed, this hon. gentleman who constitutes himself the champion of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba. Here are his concluding words:

> Therefore, in my opinion, the constitution will be fully met if this Bill is read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole House, where it may be so amended as to meet my views, or the views of the majority of this Parliament.

The hon. gentleman's view is well known. I commend it to the Roman Catholics on the Conservative side of the House, for they will see that the view expressed by the hon. gentleman was that he was so solicitous for the rights of the minority that he was forced to vote for the second reading of the Bill, but he did so because he felt his duty was done when he had so voted, and the Bill, when it got into committee, would be changed completely, so as to meet his notions of the rights of the minority in that province.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the House, in the course of that somewhat remarkable second speech which he delivered on this question, and to which I have been devoting some slight attention, endeavoured to constitute himself the special champion of the Roman Catholic faith in this country. In fact, Sir, he had the audacity to point to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, as a man who had trampled under foot his race and religion, and he (Sir Charles Tupper) pointed to himself as a gentleman who had, from the very earliest day he entered into politics in Nova Scotia, became at once the defender of that faith, and numbered amongst his chosen and sworn friends and supporters, the Archbishop of Nova Scotia, and the leading Irish Catholic families of that province. He referred, among others, to the Hon. Mr. Kenny, the father of the hon. gentleman who now sits in this House, as one of his friends during these trying years of 1866 and 1867. Has the hon. leader of the House forgotten; can it be possible that he has forgotten, that both the father of the hon. gentleman who now sits in this House, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kenny) himself, were among the most uncompromising opponents of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) when he introduced his confederation scheme in Nova Scotia? The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) was the treasurer of the anti-confederate league in the province, in 1866, and yet the leader of the House stands up in this chamber, and enumerates among the leading Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia who stood shoulder to shoulder with him in these days, the name of Sir Edward Kenny, when he must know, unless he has forgotten history, that the Kennys were uncompromising opponents of confederation, in the early days when this scheme was introduced in the legislature and placed before the people of that province.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) mean to say that the Hon. Edward Kenny, afterwards Sir Edward Kenny, did not support that measure in the legislative council, and that he did not take office immediately, as a member of the first government that was formed? Does the hon. gentleman say that Sir Edward Kenny did not accept the office which was offered to me, and which I declined, advising his appointment?

Mr. BORDEN. Well, Sir, I do not deny that Sir Edward Kenny ultimately supported confederation, but I say there was a time, and a considerable time, during which that gentleman was opposed to confederation, and I say that the member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) was the treasurer of the anti-confederate league. That cannot be contradicted. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), as I say, constituted himself the champion of the Roman Catholics in the Dominion of Canada. He told us:

> When I first entered politics in the province of Nova Scotia, I was entrusted with the important duty of reconstructing and leading the Conservative party. Well, what did I do at that time? I unfurled my banner to the breeze, and on that banner was emblazoned: Equal rights and equal justice to all, without respect to race or creed.

Well, Sir, at the time the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) entered political life in the province of Nova Scotia, what was the condition of things ? He found a great leader in that province who had quarrelled with a portion of his Roman Catholic supporters, and the hon. gentleman who now leads this House, was willing and ready to take advantage of the differences which existed between that prominent leader, Mr Howe, and the Roman Catholics of the province. Although Mr. Howe was not a member of the Liberal government, at that time, yet he was a prominent leader of the party. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), as he was starting out in his political career, was ready to take advantage of a war of creeds in that province, and I am sorry to find that the hon. gentleman now, as the sun of his political career is setting, comes back here, and repeats in the concluding years of his life, that which he enacted in the beginning of his career. He is ready in this Dominion to array creed against creed, and race again race, in order, if possible, to maintain his Government in power.

Now, the hon. gentleman has claimed for his party in the province of Nova Scotia, all the benefits which have been given to the Roman Catholics in that province. As I have pointed out, he has endeavoured to pose here as the special advocate and defender of the Roman Catholics in Nova Scotia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to go back with him to the time to which he refers. I say without fear of contradiction, that every concession which was ever given to the Roman Catholics in Nova Scotia was given to them by the Liberal party there. I am in a position to prove that statement. I hold in my hand an article published in a Conservative newspaper in Nova Scotia at about the period to which I allude, and I also have another article published by a Roman Catholic newspaper at that time. I propose to make a very brief extract from these articles in order to establish the point I am making.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the date ?

Mr. BORDEN. What I am reading from is a speech delivered by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, in the year 1857, in which there are quotations from these newspapers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Who was the Attorney General ?

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. William Young, afterwords Sir William Young. This is the quotation from the Conservative newspaper :

> We are opposed, utterly opposed, to an influx of Roman Catholic immigrants, even though they were healthy and willing to settle. Let us be understood as writing against all of the Roman Catholic Irish. We believe that there are very quiet and orderly men among them, but unfortunately men of another class preponderate, and wherever they congregate together so as to form anything like a numerical force, the peace of the community and the safety of life and property is at once destroyed. Now, if several thousand Irish Roman Catholics land upon our shores annually, and scarcely any Protestant immigrants, what have we to look forward to or expect but that this party will in a few years gain a complete ascendancy, and should this be the case dare any one imagine that Protestants will be any longer safe.
> There is but one way to prevent this consummation. It is useless to expect anything from the legislature ; but Protestants must be united. They must—if they would ward off the threatened blow—cease employing, or dealing with Roman Catholics as much as possible. They must by organization, adopt such measures as will inform the Roman Catholics of Ireland that they will find neither employment nor sympathy in this province—that we do not want to have our throats cut ; and at the same time hold out encouragement to able-bodied Protestants to come and settle among us.

This is from a speech delivered by Mr. William Young, afterwards Sir William Young, in the House of Assembly in 1857, in which he quotes from a Conservative organ this article which I have read.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of what date?

Mr. BORDEN. The article was written prior to that time, of course.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh.

Mr. BORDEN. Does the hon. gentleman deny that that was ever published ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have told the hon. gentleman that when I entered public life I was entrusted with the reconstruction of the Conservative party. Down to that period the Conservative party was an anti-Catholic party. After that period the policy of equal rights and justice to all was adopted, and it has remained the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party from the time I reconstructed it down to the present hour. That was exactly my position.

Mr. BORDEN. I was endeavouring to show that the Liberal party of the province of Nova Scotia had given the Roman Catholics all the benefits and advantages they have ever received in that province ; and I was endeavouring to show the animus and attitude of the Conservative party prior to 1856, at any rate, towards the Roman Catholics. It may not concern, particularly, the time when the hon. gentleman was in the House, but it affects the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, and of which he was the leader in that province. Now, Sir, I have just a few words of quotation from a newspaper known as "The Cross," which was the representative of the Roman Catholic body in the province of Nova Scotia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of what date?

Mr. BORDEN. Prior to the date of which I am speaking.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh.

Mr. BORDEN. Prior to the date at which the Liberal party came into power in Nova Scotia :

> There are more than 80,000 Catholics in this province, and not one of them that we know is permitted to hold the petty situation of a postmastership of a country village. And yet this is the "denomination" against whose "vaulting ambition" the "Times" appeals to the Protestant fears of the country.
> We will also turn our attention to the manner in which the many thousands of French Catholics in this province—the descendants of those primitive settlers who were so brutally expelled from their country, by some of the "tolerant spirits" of the times—are treated in Nova Scotia, as far as public situations are concerned. Not one Frenchman receives two pounds (£2) a year in any official situation. And yet these worthy Acadians form no small portion of the usurping "denominations."
> We will likewise have a word or two to say upon the manner in which our people and our clergy are treated in their commissionerships of education.

Then Mr. Young goes on to say :

> Now, Sir, mark the contrast between the position occupied by that body then and now. Look at the public offices in this building ; there is scarcely one in which you will not find a Catholic. Travel the country over and you will meet them everywhere in office. Their clergymen at the school boards—their laymen in the magistracy, in the post offices, and in all the public offices in the gift of the Government. Two Catholic gentlemen have filled alternately the presidential chair of the legislative council, and we have seen a member of the House elevated to the legislative council by the present government, that being the first marked distinction ever conferred on a French Roman Catholic in this province. Away then goes the charge that the government has acted partially or unfairly in the distribution of patronage.
> I believe from the bottom of my soul that had it not been for the fierce and sudden quarrel which has arisen between the hon. member for Windsor and the Irish Roman Catholics, we would not have heard a word of that charge. The Catholic body I know to be as loyal subjects of the Queen as any in the province—distinguished for their industry and alive to the promptings of ambition. Sir, am I about to become a proscriptionist—am I to lift my hand against the Catholics as a body ? They may abandon old friends—dissever old ties, and disturb old connections. They may link themselves with Conservatives, their natural enemies—even then, Sir, I will be no party to the proscription of any class of Her Majesty's loyal subjects.

Now, Sir, in justice to the Liberal party of the province of Nova Scotia, that grand old party which has given to the Roman Catholics of that province all the liberties they possess to-day, I thought it proper to read the extracts which I have read. The hon. gentleman, as I have said, has constituted himself the champion of Roman Catholic rights. He is the emancipator, forsooth, of the Roman Catholics in the province of Nova Scotia. Mr. Speaker, there was no need of his services. The Roman Catholics had already been emancipated by the Hon. Joseph Howe and Mr. William Young from the oppression of the Tory Family Compact which held office in Nova Scotia prior to the time of responsible government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question : Was there no need of aid to the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia, when a government came into power and proclaimed through a member of that government that their policy was that no Roman Catholic could be permitted to hold a seat in the government of Nova Scotia ? And I want to know whether those who came to the front on that occasion and fought down that proscription of the Roman Catholics, and led to its complete abandonment, are not entitled to claim that they did stand by the interests of the Roman Catholics of the province of Nova Scotia ?

Mr. BORDEN. I am in a position to say this. When the hon. gentleman who leads the House to-day entered the legislature of the province of Nova Scotia it is a matter of history that he was prepared to make an alliance with the most extreme Protestant wing of the Liberal party in order to carry on a crusade against the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I give that statement a most emphatic denial. When it was made on the floor of the House of Assembly, it met with a most emphatic denial on that occasion, and it has been buried for nearly forty years.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman has resurrected several things that happened forty years ago, and we will give him some more of them. I can only say that that is the popular belief in the province of Nova Scotia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I deny that emphatically. It is the belief of no person.

Mr. BORDEN. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman, in the role of Defender of the Faith, has somewhat fallen, or should have fallen, in our high esteem, because that which he claims to have done for the province of Nova Scotia had already been done. The hon. gentleman asks me if I do not know that a member of the Liberal government of that day made certain sweeping statements with reference to the Roman Catholics. I only know this, that the leader of that government, Mr. William Young, who alone was responsible for the policy of that government, utterly and absolutely refused to take any part in the difficulties between Mr. Howe and the Roman Catholics. The very speech which I have read was an elaborate argument against doing so ; and the concluding sentences of that speech should prove conclusively to everybody that, at any rate, the Premier of Nova Scotia of that day could not be the man to whom the hon. gentleman alluded.

Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to these troublous times. The hon. gentleman says that he was not ready to enter into a league with the extreme Protestant wing of the Liberal party in order to discipline the Catholics of that time; but he was not unwilling to take advantage of the difficulties which had arisen between Mr. Howe and the Catholics of Nova Scotia and to foment those difficulties, in hopes thereby to attain to power in 1859. He, however, failed in his purpose. He thought that by taking that attitude in 1856 and 1857, he saw a short road to power. The hon. gentleman failed utterly. He thinks now, by making the speech which he made here three or four nights ago, in which he endeavoured to arouse the prejudices of race and creed, he will find a short road to retaining power, but I predict that he will be equally disappointed when the people get an opportunity to pronounce upon his conduct.

But I have other evidence to offer as to the way in which the Roman Catholics of the province of Nova Scotia looked upon the conduct of the hon. gentleman and his associates. I have in my hand a letter written by the late Sir John S. D. Thompson to Senator Miller on the eve of Sir John Thompson's accepting the candidature of the Liberal-Conservative party in the county of Antigonish for a seat in the Nova Scotia House, and I shall read what Sir John Thompson said, because it has a direct bearing upon the matter under discussion:

> You are aware that nearly all the difficulties with which Catholics have had to contend in matters of local legislation,—education, for example,—have come from members of our party. (that is, the Tory party.) That is the great cause of our being unable to carry sufficient Catholic support to make the seats in Halifax secure. I flatter myself that if I obtain a seat in the House, I can effect a considerable change in that respect, and I accept the obligation to do so.

That is the statement of the late Premier of this country with reference to the conduct of the Liberal-Conservatives, of whom the hon. leader of the House must have been one, who had denied Roman Catholics their rights, and therefore made it very difficult for them to carry their seats in the county of Halifax. I hope that evidence will be satisfactory—not satisfactory but convincing—to the hon. leader of the House. Now, the hon. gentleman in this matter has taken to himself, with that modesty which characterizes him, credit for the school system of the province of Nova Scotia. His words were as follows:—

> When I introduced the measure for the support of free schools by taxation in Nova Scotia, the provisions of that Bill were of such an admirable character, guaranteeing as it did the rights of the Roman Catholic minority, that I had the support of his Grace the Archbishop and every Roman Catholic member of the legislature.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN. Will the hon. gentleman hold that he had the support of his Grace the Archbishop to that school measure of his?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do.

Mr. BORDEN. Will the hon. gentleman deny that at the time of confederation, when the delegates went across to London to promote the scheme, the Archbishop of Nova Scotia went to England in order to induce those delegates to put a provision in the British North America Act, by which that school law, of which the hon. gentleman boasts could be changed so as to give the same rights to Roman Catholics that they receive in Ontario?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I made the statement and repeat it, that when I carried the free school law in the province of Nova Scotia I had the support of his Grace the Archbishop, Dr. Connolly, and I had the support of every Roman Catholic generally in the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia. Mr. Miller's name was mentioned as having taken some exception to it, and it is just possible that I may have forgotten that circumstance; but the whole body of Roman Catholic members of the House were supporting the government of which I was a member, and, with the approval of his Grace the Archbishop, to my certain knowledge, passed the measure as I placed it on the statute-book. And I read to the House the letter of the Roman Catholic Archbishop to me, after that legislation had been in operation two years and more, declaring himself my earnest and hearty supporter. I can give the hon. gentleman no better evidence.

Mr. BORDEN. Nevertheless, it is a fact that his Grace the Archbishop of Nova Scotia was opposed to the Act introduced and carried by the hon. gentleman, and that Mr. Miller, now in the Senate, opposed that Act in the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia in every one of its stages, and Mr. Miller was believed by those who ought to know to have been acting in the interests and at the dictation of his Grace the Archbishop.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not so.

Mr. BORDEN. Will the hon. gentleman deny it? I believe that it is susceptible of proof yet that that is so. Will the hon. gentleman deny that Archbishop Connolly went to England for the purpose of endeavouring to secure a modification of the British North America Act, by which the Roman Catholics in Nova Scotia should have the same rights that they were receiving in the province of Ontario? He will not deny that, he cannot deny it; it is a fact. Now, what becomes of the support of the Archbishop? What becomes of the letters which the hon. gentleman read here? When the hon. gentleman cannot, dare not, deny the statement which I make that the Archbishop went to England for the sole purpose of securing for the Roman Catholics of his province in the British North America Act the same rights which had been given them in the province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman said a few moments ago, but it is scarcely worth while perhaps to enlarge upon that point now, that every Roman Catholic member in the legislature of Nova Scotia supported that Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They are all dead.

Mr. BORDEN. All but one or two. Here is the speech of Senator Miller, of which I might quote page after page in opposition to that school law. Senator Miller said :

> If the principal object of the clause referred to —(speaking on one of the clauses of the Bill)— was to ensure the teachers' salary, that end could be secured by providing, in case the sum agreed upon at the annual meeting was not raised, that an assessment be made upon those who, at each annual meeting, had agreed to the engagement.

The principle of the Bill was the general public assessment, and that was the point that Mr. Miller objected to. Further, Mr. Miller says :

> In Great Britain every sect had its own training school, its own inspectors, its own teachers, its own separate grant from the public treasury in proportion to its numbers, the Government conceding to its integrity the principle for which he contended.

What could be plainer than that, Mr. Speaker ? It was the principle of separate schools he was contending for.

> The example thus afforded was worthy of imitation, but surely it could not be called similar to the compulsory feature of the Bill. The introducer of this measure——

That is the present leader of this House.

> —just now told them that he believed in state schools, that he held the opinion that the state owed to every child within its boundaries a common school education, to be provided, if necessary by arbitrary means even if hostile to the wishes of the people.

That was the nature of the hon. gentleman's contention, and that is the law, forsooth, which guarantees the rights of the Roman Catholic minority in the province of Nova Scotia. There is even an earlier history of this matter ; the hon. gentleman did not go back to the beginning. What I am about to say will show how differently the parties conducted themselves in the province of Nova Scotia. Some years before this, the Liberal government in Nova Scotia brought down a school law, which contained the principle of assessment. That law was brought down in 1856. A resolution was moved, I think, by Mr. Young, declaring in favour of the principle of assessment as a proper ground-work for the establishment of an educational law. That resolution was carried, and was voted for by the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper). Subsequently, it was found that the Bill could not be carried without the assistance of the Roman Catholics of that House. The Roman Catholics refused to support that measure, they refused to adopt the principle of general assessment for educational purposes. Did the hon. gentleman who had voted for that principle, and who took it up a few years later, when it suited his own purposes, did he say to the government : I will assist you to carry this measure ? No, Sir ; the hon. gentleman took advantage of the defection of the Roman Catholics to prevent the passage of that law, by that act, no doubt, giving the Roman Catholics hope—in fact, I have the words here in which he practically stated, after having voted for it, that he did not know whether he was in favour of the principle of assessment or not. This is what the hon. gentleman said in the following year, in reply to the charge against him that, having voted for the principle of the Bill, he refused to assist in carrying it through. He is reported to have said :

> Now, Sir, I do not say that it is necessary for the Government to deal with the question of education at all or that assessment is the proepr mode, but they said so.

The hon. gentleman, who had voted for the principle of assessment in 1856, in 1857, when he saw an opportunity of taking an advantage of the fact that the Roman Catholics had turned against the government, says in effect : I do not know now that the government should deal with the subject at all, and I do not know whether the principle of assessment is a correct one or not. Having lulled the Roman Catholics into security with this kind of talk, at the first opportunity, when he comes back with a large majority behind him, he takes almost the identical Bill and forces it down the throats of the Roman Catholics. And he says that not a man opposed it, and that the Archbishop was the strongest supporter of the Bill. Why, Sir, the situation is as clear as can be. The Archbishop and the Catholics had quarrelled with Mr. Howe. They found themselves in the hon. gentleman's (Sir Charles Tupper) power, and he was not slow to make use of that power, and they were compelled, to a certain extent, to make a virtue of necessity.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). I understand the hon. gentleman takes the ground that the school law of the province of Nova Scotia provides no privileges in the way of separate schools for Roman Catholics.

Mr. BORDEN. There is no such provision by law.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). Then, will the hon. gentleman explain to me, why it is that the school law for the city of Halifax is entirely different from that of the rest of the province ? Why is it that commissioners of schools are appointed to regulate schools in the city of Halifax, six appointed by the provincial government and six by the city council of Halifax, and these commissioners have very great power with regard to the regulation of schools, assessments and everything else that pertains to the maintenance and support of the schools, whereas the commissioners for the rest of the province have very small powers and are appointed by the local government ? Why is such a great distinction made between the city of Halifax and the rest of the province, and is it not because there is a large body of Catholics in Halifax and that provision was made in that law for such schools in Halifax ?

Mr. BORDEN. I am not an Irishman, but I will take an Irishman's privilege of answering one question by asking another.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). That is never satisfactory.

Mr. BORDEN. It is perfectly proper. The hon. gentleman has the Act in his hand to which my question relates ? Will he point out the provision in the School Act of Nova Scotia which confers any special privilege upon the Roman Catholics——

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). The Roman Catholics are not named as a body, but I say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that that provision is made expressly for the purpose of guaranteeing to the Roman Catholics in Halifax separate schools.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read, read.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). It is in 15 or 20 clauses of the Act.

Mr. BORDEN. I want the words quoted which confer upon any denominational body in Nova Scotia any special powers or guarantees them any special rights.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). That is begging the question.

Mr. BORDEN. You have not answered my question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has a right to ask a question, but this bandying of words across the floor of the House cannot be permitted to continue.

Mr. BORDEN. Having got so near the law, I desire to ask the House to draw some lessons from the administration of education in the maritime provinces. If the hon. gentleman who interrupted me, had referred to the administration of the law, I might have agreed with him, that in that administration due regard is had for the prejudices, if you choose to call them so, or the feelings, of a certain section of the community in Nova Scotia. As a result of a broad and liberal administration of that Act, to-day, in the province of Nova Scotia, there are very few complaints as to the law itself, although it is not a law which in its letter would be in line with the demands of the Roman Catholics.

Mr. FOSTER. But in spirit it is.

Mr. BORDEN. It is in its administration, but not in its spirit. In its administration it does supply all the requirements. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), in a very able speech which he addressed to the House on this question, in many respects an exceedingly fair speech, has said, and it is to his credit, that all denominations in Nova Scotia are satisfied with the administration of the law in that province. I was glad to hear him say that. He went further, and he said he would be willing to leave it to the common sense of the majority of the people of this country that they would not inflict an injury upon any minority in this country. Well, Sir, if that is the case, if the hon. gentleman has so much confidence in the good sense of the people, why should he not leave the administration of the law in the province of Manitoba to the people who are charged with administering that law ? Why not give them an opportunity, at any rate, of showing whether they are willing, by the administration of the law, to do as the government and people of Nova Scotia have done, that is, to consult the prejudices or requirements of the minority in that province ? Mr. Speaker, in the province of New Brunswick we have a similar law to that in Nova Scotia. I was here during part of the time in 1872, 1873, and 1874, when the question of the New Brunswick school law was brought up by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who invited us to interfere. Wisely, Sir, we abstained from interference, and what is the result to-day ? The result is that in New Brunswick the law is being administered in a way that is satisfactory to all classes of the community. Suppose we had listened to the hon. gentleman who now fills the position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who so eloquently urged upon us the necessity of interfering with the legislature of New Brunswick, and had undertaken to interfere with the law of that province——

An hon. MEMBER. Could you interfere ?

Mr. BORDEN. Well, the hon. gentleman invited us to interfere. Suppose we had interfered, what would have been the position in that province to-day ? Think you that you would have the same amicable and friendly relations between the different denominations in that province, and the same amicable and friendly relations between that province and this Dominion that exist to-day ? No, Sir. If the hon. gentleman had prevailed, he would have sown the seeds of discord throughout this Dominion. Happily, better counsels prevailed, and as a result, I say, to-day you have in the province of New Brunswick as happy a condition of things as exists in the province of Nova Scotia. So also in the province of Prince Edward Island there is a Public School Act. and there is no difficulty among the different denominations in that province. There we have the three maritime provinces of this Dominion presenting an object lesson to this Parliament to take note of, and to take warning by, that it is possible, nay, that it is probable, that if the province of Manitoba is left to the administration of its own laws, it will administer them in such a way, in its own interest, if it is wise, that every part of the community shall be satisfied. Why, Mr. Speaker, no government that is not blind will desire to administer the laws in such a way as to leave any considerable section of the people with the feeling that their rights are being trampled upon, and that injustice is being done. But that is what will happen if the minority of the province of Manitoba are permitted to remain in the present temper of mind. I say that the province of Manitoba, if it possesses the ordinary instincts of government, will see to it by the administration of its law, that by such changes as may be necessary, the minority of that province shall be entirely and thoroughly satisfied. But hon. gentlemen opposite propose, without having given that province an opportunity to say whether they desire to make their law satisfactory to the minority of that province to start out on a policy of coercion. They take the province of Manitoba by the throat by issuing their remedial order, and then they follow up that remedial order by legislation, impotent, it may be, worthless it may be, but nevertheless laying down a principle which we cannot, at any rate, at this stage of the proceedings, afford to adopt as a proper principle for the great Parliament of Canada to adopt towards one of its provinces. Hon. gentlemen propose to coerce that province. Mr. Speaker, I ask you, and I ask this House, whether anything was ever gained anywhere by a policy of coercion ? Hon. gentlemen have seen it tried in other countries. It is bound to fail. As pointed out by my hon. friend from Wellington to-day, these hon. gentlemen tried it for a short time on this very province, in connection with the railway legislation of that province, and the right hon. gentleman who then led this House stated here in the presence of the House : "You cannot check Manitoba." Well, Sir, if we cannot check Manitoba, I say you cannot coerce Manitoba, and your legislation will be a failure. We have heard a good deal of the rights of minorities. I have referred to the particular view that the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) takes of the rights of the minority. But speaking seriously, we all desire, from the bottom of our hearts, to protect the rights of minorities everywhere. The rights of the minority appeals to our best sympathy always. But, Sir, we have to consider what is the best course in the interest of that minority. Is it the best course to pursue, in the interest of the minority, to run amuck of the great majority of the people of Manitoba, and to attempt coercive measures upon that province ? No, Sir, I think not. I think that no more fatal mistake could be committed in the interest of the minority of Manitoba than to attempt to force this measure through this House at this time. Speaking for myself, I would say this, that the rights of a minority must be maitnained, and must be preserved. But let us be very careful to ascertain the extent of those rights. Let us give due opportunity to those directly charged with matters of education in the province in which the minority lives, to rectify and to correct the injury claimed to be done to that minority ; and if it turns out that the province absolutely refuses to rectify a wrong, then, Sir, I say we would all be prepared, I believe, to see that the rights of the minority are restored.

Mr. EDGAR. I think that the order of business we are considering now, this further step in the Manitoba Remedial Bill, should certainly never have been called by the Government to-day. We had a formal announcement made after three o'clock that at last the Government had made up their minds that conciliation was the proper method of settling the school question of Manitoba. To the surprise of a great many hon. members the leader of the House subsequently called the order for the Remedial Bill, Manitoba. Formal peace negotiations for the settlement of this dispute have been opened. The ambassadors for Canada are on their way to Winnipeg to-night for the express purpose, and commanded by the Dominion Government to undertake the settlement of this question without federal interference, and it is almost beyond belief that the Government in the face of that action are calling upon this House to proceed to-night to consider proposed compulsory legislation against the province of Manitoba. In to-day's "Globe" there is a cartoon, which presents the situation so admirably that I will ask permission to refer to it.

Mr. FOSTER. Read it.

Mr. EDGAR. I will interpret it, and I am sure if the hon. gentleman will look at his portrait he will recognize it. I hope he will purchase extra copies of the "Globe" for his constituency—what is it ?—King's, or Queen's, or St. John !

Mr. FOSTER. I do not spend my money for naught.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You spend plenty of it.

Mr. EDGAR. The cartoon shows the leader of the House, with sword drawn and cocked hat. He has his sword in the air and is calling upon his brave artillerymen to aim their guns and fire. There is in the distance a flag marking the boundaries of the province of Manitoba, and a solitary unarmed man is coming with a flag of truce out of the Manitoba camp—Mr. Greenway. In the distance, on the other side of the picture, there are two ambassadors going towards Mr. Greenway with flags of truce, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of War. In the meantime, while they are on their way, while this solitary unarmed man is coming forward with a flag of truce, the leader of the House, with cocked hat and sword, calls to his gunners : Now then, gunners, do not let up on your cannonade ; give it to them for all you are worth. There is the Finance Minister aiming one of the quick firing guns —probably a pneumatic or air gun,—at the bearer of the flag of truce, Mr. Greenway. The Minister of Public Works is aiming another gun at him ; and the Postmaster General, who is represented as the powder monkey, is carrying a load of coercion balls to put in these guns. That is the situation of affairs as the public will understand it. I protest against the order for the Remedial Bill being proceeded with on this occasion. Do not the Government believe that the legislature of Manitoba are acting in good faith ? Did the Manitoba government not, at the suggestion of this Government, secure the adjournment of the legislature until April 16th, instead of its prorogation ; and did they not agree, at the request and suggestion of the Dominion Government, to meet their representatives and confer on the question ? If the Manitoba government are acting in good faith, it can hardly be said that the Dominion Government are acting in good faith towards them. But I believe the fact of the matter is this, and everybody understands it pretty well in this House, that the Government is at present being ground between the upper and nether millstones. There is one wing of the party saying: You must negotiate with Manitoba and settle this question without remedial legislation ; there is another wing of the party saying, you must go on with remedial legislation ; you may humbug other people if you like by pretending to send ambassadors to Manitoba, but you must and shall go on with coercive legislation. There is no other sensible explanation of the situation in which the Government find themselves placed today and the course they are taking. The course which the Government are pursuing is one of the greatest acts of self-condemnation and confessed error of which a government have been guilty. It admits as plainly as it can admit that they were utterly and absolutely wrong in passing the remedial order without having negotiations with Manitoba. It is a clear admission that they were altogether and utterly wrong in proposing legislation a year ago, and further, in calling this the sixth session of this Parliament at an expense of half a million of money when the result must be utterly inconclusive and injurious instead of beneficial. These are the reasons I think this order should not have been called to-day.

I now desire to call the attention of the House to a more technical point in connection with this matter. I should like the ruling of the Chair as to whether it is possible under our rules to make any substantial progress with this Bill in committee. I contend that the general character and main object of the Bill are to impose a tax on a class of people, and that none of the clauses imposing or providing for such taxation can be considered in Committee of the Whole unless they have been first considered in a preliminary committee of the whole House, under Rule 88. I submit that this legislation comes directly under the provisions of Rule 88. The words of that rule are these :

> If any motion is made in the House for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and the debate thereon may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned until such further day as the House shall think fit to appoint, and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole House before any resolution or vote of the House be passed thereupon.

Let us take the plain object of this Bill, which I do not propose to discuss at all in detail, but merely to draw your attention to certain important clauses, and not argue whether it is right or wrong that we should pass them, but, Sir, to draw your attention to their scope, in order to show you that they come under the rule of creating a charge upon the people. The sections from 23 to 31 in this Bill provide for the levy and the collection of taxes upon the real and personal property of Roman Catholics in Manitoba, and it is directed that it shall be the duty of the municipal councils to levy and collect such taxes.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. member is beginning to discuss the clauses of the Bill, which, of course, he knows is not in order at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. EDGAR. I tried to explain my intention as being specially to avoid discussing details of the Bill. I do not propose to suggest whether any one clause or any other clause should become law or not become law.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member takes up the clauses in detail, clause by clause, that, of course, would be contrary to the rule which governs the debate at this particular stage of the proceedings.

Mr. EDGAR. I shall content myself, Sir, with simply drawing your attention to the general nature of these clauses I have referred to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Order.

Mr. EDGAR. I am perfectly in order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You are contrary to the direct ruling of the Chair.

Mr. EDGAR. The general effect of these clauses is to establish a taxation upon the people through the municipal officers, or, in case of their failure, by the Board of Trustees, whose election is provided for in this Bill, or in other cases, by the Board of Education who are expressly to be appointed by the Dominion Government in case the local government neglects to do so. We have, therefore, the machinery of taxation, and the machinery of expenditure of public taxes by these officials, and we have taxation upon the Roman Catholics who do not give notice to the authorities to exempt themselves from this taxation. That is a charge upon a class of people, if any charge upon a class of people can be created by a legislation. In Bourinot's book, page 598, it is laid down in a general statement that Rule 88 also applies "to the imposing of any state taxes or charges upon the people, or any class thereof.

In England, while they had the same rule almost in words, it was, I admit, sometimes held by Speakers there, that the necessity for a preliminary committee did not apply to cases where the taxation was purely for local objects. I think it will be found, upon examination, that that exception would not cover such a case as this, even according to English precedents. It will be found on further investigation that the object of avoiding going into preliminary committee, under that rule, was a special and a peculiar one in the English House of Commons. We know that there is a great deal of municipal and parish work in the English House of Commons. They have to take up any number of municipal and local measures for the whole kingdom, and, on account of the congested condition of business there, it is welcomed by the whole House, whenever a Speaker can find that a Bill of that nature does not require to go through the two committee stages. There was a special object for that exception to the rule in the English House of Commons which does not exist here. We should, I think, live up to the spirit of the rules of this House. Rule 88 is for the protection of the people. It is intended to give the representatives of the people every chance to investigate the levying of any charge upon the public; first, in preliminary committee stages, and afterwards in the ordinary stages of the Bill. Well, Sir, it will be found that in order to make the rule of the English House conform to the decisions about local objects being exceptions, the rule of the English House has been altered. Until 1866 it was exactly the same as ours, but it was altered then so as to have quite a different effect, and words were introduced into the first line, making it read this way:

> If any motion be made in the House for any aid, grant, or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the consolidated fund or out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, or charge upon the people, then the consideration shall be in preliminary committee.

These words are new:

> Grant or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the consolidated fund or out of moneys to be provided by Parliament.

I contend that the insertion of these additional words has altered the meaning of the words, "or charge upon the people," for this reason. The ordinary words, "or charge upon the people," are left in, and follow those new words, which refer simply to moneys payable out of the consolidated fund or of moneys to be provided by Parliament. That change in the language of the English rule, which has not been made in our rule at all, makes the greatest difference in its interpretation, and in its bearing on this question. The whole rule, according to the proper interpretation of it, applies in England only to moneys payable out of the consolidated fund or to moneys to be provided by Parliament; and the reason I say that the meaning of the rule is quite different now, is based on an ordinary principle of interpretation of statutes, which we have to apply to these words. The general words, "charge upon the people" that are left in the English rule are limited in their meaning by the new restrictive words that have been inserted in the rule as it stands in England to-day. It is an old and common rule of law that general words following specific words are of the same nature. There is an old and familiar illustration of this which all lawyers will remember. In the old Sunday Act it is provided:

> No tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, or other person whatsoever, shall do or exercise any labour, business or work of ordinary calling on the Lord's Day.

Now, Sir, what is the meaning of the words "or other person whatsoever"? It is held that they do not mean a coach proprietor, or a farmer, or an attorney, but that these general words are absolutely limited and restricted by the words that precede them. So I think the present English rule on this subject does not at all apply in the broad way that the Canadian rule does, or that the English rule did before it was changed. But what, after all, is the real and proper interpretation to be placed even upon the old English rule? I admit that there have been a number of decisions of speakers which held that this rule did not apply to local works. But, Sir, in 1833 there was a Bill called the Irish Church Temporalities Bill, which made provision almost absolutely analogous to the provisions of the Bill which we are considering to-night. It provided for ecclesiastical commissioners for Ireland, to be appointed by the Crown, and for a bank account to be kept in the name of those commissioners. The commissioners were to levy yearly assessments on the livings of the Church of England in Ireland, just exactly as the trustees or the municipalities or the Board of Education are to levy taxes upon the Roman Catholics in Manitoba. The funds in the hands of the ecclesiastical commissioners were to be applied to the strictly local purpose of the maintenance of the church in Ireland, just as this Bill provides for the strictly local purpose of the maintenance of the schools in Manitoba. Well, Sir, what happened in that case? Was that held by a Speaker or by any one else in Parliament to be an exception to the rule about a preliminary committee. No, Sir, it was not. The Government of the day had introduced the Bill, as this Bill has been introduced, without a preliminary committee. Objection to that course was raised by Sir Robert Peel. The Chancellor of the Exchequer tried to show that it was a local Bill, and therefore did not require a preliminary committee. Sir Robert Peel contended that it was not merely a local Bill, and Mr. Daniel O'Connell, another great parliamentarian, and several others, contended the same; and what was the decision? Why, Sir, the point was considered so important by the House of Commons that it stayed proceedings, and appointed a special committee of leading men from both sides of the House, to look into precedents, and make a decision whether the Bill should go to a preliminary committee or not. They gave their decision in these words:

> What the general spirit of the standing orders and the resolutions of the House require is that every proposition to impose a burden or charge on every class of people should receive its first discussion in the Committee of the whole House.

There, Sir, is a decision of a solemn committee, interpreting the same provision that we have in a similar case; and it settles for our guidance, once and for all, that a case like this is not a case in which there should be an exception to the rule in favour of local works. Then, Sir, it will be found that in England, too, all bills for the taxation of colonies have been first sent to a preliminary committee. And I say that this Bill is as analogous to those colonial Bills as any Bill can be at all. The relationship of this Dominion to our provinces we know is very much like the relation, in many ways, of the Imperial Parliament to the colonies, and in a case of this kind, the analogy, I think, is complete. I know that the late Sir John Macdonald, in the confederation debates, page 42, made this statement:

> The general Government assumes towards the local governments precisely the same position that the Imperial Government holds now in respect of each of its colonies.

Equally all colonial Bills, Canada Bills, Australia Bills, Newfoundland Bills, emanating from the Imperial Parliament, authorizing local taxation there for local purposes, originate in preliminary committees; and that rule ought to be held to apply to this case also. Then, what are we doing to-day by this legislation? This legislation is to be enacted by us in place of the province itself; and I do not think it would be contended that if the province of Manitoba were passing this very Bill which we have here, it could go according to its rule, if its rule is the same as ours, without putting it through a preliminary committee. And therefore, I say, under the special circumstances of this case, we must put ourselves in the place of the Manitoba legislature and make provision of that kind for the protection of the people by first putting the Bill through a preliminary committee. We do not require to argue so much upon English precedent when we have precedents of our own, which, I maintain, are absolutely in point. The last and the most important precedent that we have in Canada is to be found in the "Hansard" debates of 27th February, 1889. That was the case of a Bill introduced by Mr. Ellis, providing for the assessment of the salaries of Dominion civil servants by the different local governments. I say that that case was absolutely on all fours with the present one. That authorized assessments by municipal officers of a certain very limited class of the population, the Dominion Civil Service. Mr. Rykert took the objection that that Bill should have originated in a preliminary committee of the House. The late Sir John Macdonald and the late Sir John Thompson sustained that view of the case, and Mr. Speaker Ouimet decided absolutely in favour of that view, as I think you, Sir, ought to decide on this occasion. His words are to be found at page 357:

> The general principle that all measures having the effect of imposing some new charge on the people must originate first in a Committee of the whole House is admitted by both sides. The only question then is as to the application of this general principle to this special measure. I see that by the first clause of the Bill, it is provided that the salaries of public officials may be assessed, and furthermore in the second clause it is provided that if they are assessed at present or may be assessed in future, such assessment may be legal. It is clear to my mind that the effect of this Bill, the moment it becomes law, will be to legalize all assessments so made or to be made. I must hold, therefore, that the Bill comes under the operation of the general rule, as imposing new charges on a certain class of the people, that is the public officials or employees, and that it must originate in Committee of the Whole.

That, I think, is a precedent exactly in point, and which, I submit, should have great influence in your decision of the matter. Then there is another class of exceptions to the rule made in England, and I want to show that this Bill does not fall under that class of cases referred to in the tenth edition of May, where the Bills imposed charges on any particular class of persons for their own benefit. That does not apply to this case. The facts do not fit at all, because the tax that is imposed by this Bill is not a tax only on the parents and guardians of the children who are sent to the schools, it is not confined to those who are benefited, but it is imposed upon childless married people, and bachelors, and spinsters, and also upon those who do not believe in separate schools and do not use them. It is likewise imposed upon corporations ; and by reason of the exemption which it creates, exempting from payment to public schools the property of Catholics, it throws an additional tax upon the public school supporters. Therefore, it is not a tax imposed by these people for their own benefit. I would resume my argument by simply stating that rule 88 is binding upon us, that these money clauses fall under rule 88, as they impose a tax upon the people, and that therefore they should originate in a special preliminary committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have been asked by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) to rule upon the point he has just raised with regard to the question as to whether the provisions in this Bill are such as would require it to emanate in Committee of the whole House ; and I think I may be pardoned if I give the authorities upon which I have come to a decision upon this question. In the first place, looking at our own parliamentary authority here, Dr. Bourinot, I find that there are exceptions to the rule which the hon. member for West Ontario has quoted. I find that Dr. Bourinot says :

> It has also been held that a Bill merely declaratory in its nature, and involving no new charge, need not originate in Committee of the Whole. Neither is a committee necessary in the case of Bills authorizing the levy or application of rates for local purposes by local authorities acting in behalf of the ratepayers. Nor does the rule apply to Bills imposing charges upon any particular class of persons for their own use and benefit.

Then, coming to the parliamentary authority in England, I find it laid down in May, as follows :—

> Charges not subject to royal recommendation. The practice requiring the recommendation of the Crown, and the committee stage, for proposals involving public expenditure has been explained. The procedure must now be considered, which arises under standing order No. 62, regarding the imposition of charges upon the people which does not require the recommendation of the Crown, because the charge does not form a portion of the Crown revenue nor expenditure drawn from the exchequer.

Mr. EDGAR. May I call your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that that is the amended rule.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before going further, I will express my own opinion with regard to the change of the rule which the hon. member for West Ontario has quoted. In my opinion, the change in the rule rather enlarges than restricts. I mean to say that it goes further than the old rule in the direction of requiring a Committee of the whole House, if I have read the rule correctly. Of course, I do not pretend to have gone into the matter as thoroughly as the hon. member for West Ontario. But, in my opinion, the new rule is more stringent than the old, that it requires a Committee of the whole House in cases where it might not have been considered necessary for the initiation of a measure under the old rule :

> Bills dealing with charges of this nature are not introduced on resolutions reported from a committee of the whole House appointed under standing order No. 62, in consequence, Bills authorizing the levy or application of rates for local purposes, administered by authorities acting on behalf of the ratepayers, are brought in on motion, and the clauses relating to those objects are not printed in italics ; such, for instance, as the Main Drainage (Metropolis) Bill, 1858, and the Thames Embankment Bill, 1862, as the expense of the proposed works was to be paid out of local rates upon the metropolis ; and an objection, that a clause in the Corrupt Practices Prevention Bill, 1858, imposing a charge upon county and borough rates should have been authorized by a previous committee resolution, was overruled.
> The same principle is applied to Bills relating to church rates, and to the incidence and recovery of tithe ; and the Tithe Commutation Bill, 1836, the Tithe Bills of 1890 and 1891, and the Church Rates Commutation Bill, 1864, were ordered in on motion ; nor has standing order No. 62 been held to apply to Bills imposing charges upon any particular class of persons for their own use and benefit.

The foot-note to this I propose to quote, because it has been referred to by the hon. member for West Ontario :

> During the session of 1833, notice was taken that the Church in Ireland Bill (which proposed to levy "an annual tax" upon all benefices in lieu of first fruits) should have originated in a committee. A select committee appointed to examine precedents reported that no case precisely similar had been discovered, but "that the general spirit of the standing orders and resolutions of the House required that every proposition to impose a burthen or charge on any class of the people should receive its first discussion in a Committee of the whole House," and the Bill was consequently withdrawn.

Says Sir Erskine May :

> But the opinion expressed by that committee has not influenced the practice of the House.

There are decisions of the English House of Commons, which, from my point of view, are specially applicable to the case under discussion :

> A Bill authorizing the levying of local rates for local purposes by local authorities does not come under the class of Bills which must originate in Committee of the whole House.

> Church Rates Commutation Bill—Second Reading.
> Objection taken by Mr. Hadfield, that inasmuch as the fifteenth clause proposed that the charge which now fell upon occupiers should be transferred to the owners of real property, whereby such owners would be subjected to a new tax to which they had hitherto been liable, the Bill should have originated in Committee of the whole House.
> The Speaker, dissenting, says :
> The rule of the House is this : That Bills which directly impose a stated charge upon the people must originate in a Committee of the whole House. But the rule has been held not to apply to Bills authorizing the levy of rates or charges for local purposes for local authorities. The question is, under which head should this Bill for the commutation of church rates be classed. In my opinion it would be most in accordance with the spirit of the general rule of the House, and with the course of precedence, that it should be placed in the second class. The hon. member urges, that by the 15th clause a new tax is imposed on the owners of property, to which they have not been liable. But so in Tithe Commutation Act, the 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 71, the tithe payable by the occupier was made a charge upon the land, the Bill was brought in without having been first considered in a committee. Then came the Metropolis Police Act, 10 Geo. IV., c. 44, which shows that a Bill enacting that local rates are to be imposed by a local authority does not require a preliminary committee. That Act empowers overseers in every parish within the metropolitan district to levy a police rate not to exceed 8d. in the pound, and it was brought in without a committee. In my opinion there has been nothing irregular with the introduction of the present Bill and I think the House may properly proceed to consider it on its merits.

Looking at these precedents, and having given the Bill such an examination as I could, I am of opinion that it is not a Bill which would require, nor would any clause in it require, to be introduced through a Committee of the whole House. But, if I am wrong in that opinion, I do not see any objection to proceeding with the stage of the Bill now before the House, because, if these clauses are determined by the chairman of committees to require to originate in committee of the whole House, then the clauses to which objection is taken, if the chairman so determines, can be introduced subsequently through Committee of the whole House. My opinion, however, is that such is not necessary.

Mr. WELDON. Having heard your ruling, Sir, on the point taken by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), I rise to address myself to the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I did hope, in common with other members on both sides of the House, seeing the Government had succeeded in securing the second reading of the Bill in spite of all that we could offer in the way of constitutional opposition, and seeing that they have complied with the wishes of members on both sides, and certainly with the very strongly expressed wishes of many members on this side to make one more last heroic effort to procure the solution of the difficulty which confronts us, by means of negotiations at Winnipeg, that they would have been willing to slacken up somewhat—not to abandon their measure, for to ask for that would be unreasonable, from their point of view, but to go more slowly. There is a widespread feeling that this country ought not, in this year 1896, to be put to the great expense of holding two sessions of Parliament. I do not know what the cost of a session may be, but I am sure it is not overstating it very much when I put it at half a million dollars. That is a very large sum of money. Now, if, by a less precipitate and urgent pressing of this Bill upon the House, it were possible during some days of the week to go on with the Estimates and vote the necessary supplies, it might be that this matter of remedial law during the present session of Parliament, would be dealt with one way or the other, and also that the ordinary supplies for the Government would be voted, so that the elections coming on after the House rises during the approaching summer, there would be no necessity for a second session of Parliament in this calendar year. There is much complaint coming from many quarters, of the exclusive devotion of the time of the House to this matter. For my own part, in the earlier weeks, it seemed to me that the Opposition were blameworthy in this regard ; at the present time, it seems to me the Government are blameworthy. At all events, I am sure that many thousand electors in Canada will say outside, as I am saying inside these walls to-day, that it is a great pity the necessary public moneys for the year cannot be voted before this Parliament dies its natural death.

But passing away from that—in the view that I take of the constitution—and on that point I think there will not be much conflict of opinion—whatever powers we have in regard to a remedial law, are not lost by our failure to exercise them during the present session. If we would agree now to go more slowly, and the result did come about that the present remedial law should not pass its third reading in time to go to the Senate and be properly considered there during the weeks that are still open to us for law-making, there is coming within a few months, at the latest, six or seven months, an entirely new Parliament which will have all the power we have to deal with these matters. That is a fact that we should have present in our minds in dealing with this question. I say there is no loss of federal power, there is no lapse from delay, even from this session to the next one. I share heartily the view expressed by the hon. member who has just sat down, when he says that he thinks our chances are better of getting a local solution of this question worked out by the legislature of Manitoba, if we take our guns off, and if for some days to come, we forbear to irritate them, to wound them, to exasperate them, when we need to find them in the best possible mood. I come now to the matter contained in the amendment of my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), he asked for a reference of this Bill to the Supreme Court of Canada on some seven points of law. There cannot be much doubt, I think, that some of these seven question, at all events, are very difficult and embarrassing. I will address myself to the discussion of this matter, following very much the order which the mover himself has laid down in drafting and marshalling his points. The first inquiry is : Is not this Bill now before the House ultra vires of the power of the Canadian Parliament because it is too narrow ? The text of the constitution on this point is familiar to us all. Our powers are contained in these words :

> In case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section, is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, and so far only as the circumstances of each case may require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provision of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

Now, if hon. members will turn to the Order in Council addressed to the authorities at Winnipeg, they will find this paragraph which contains the pith and substance of the whole matter :

> And it is hereby adjudged and declared that by the two Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba, on the first day of May, 1890, intituled respectively "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and "An Act respecting Public Schools," the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province, in relation to education, prior to the 1st day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges, which, previous to and until the 1st day of May, 1890, such minority had, viz. :—
> (a) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.
> (b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.
> (c) The right of exception of such Roman Catholics, as contribute to Roman Catholic schools, from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.
> And the committee also recommend that Your Excellency in Council do further declare and decide that for the due execution of the provisions of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act," it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid should be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which would restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid and which would modify the said Acts of 1890 so far, and so far only, as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) hereinbefore mentioned.

That is the text of the constitution, and that is an extract from the remedial order. Now, the question is whether this draft Bill which we have before us, conforms to that order, to the degree that it may be called a due execution of the order. In short, the province of Manitoba was called on to do three things "a," "b" and "c," to establish and organize a system of separate schools ; to relieve the Catholic ratepayers who contribute to such from the duty paying burdens to the national schools ; and thirdly, to allow them to enjoy their share of the provincial funds. This Bill covers two out of the three, it does not cover the third. As a matter of constitutional law it may be argued that the Bill should contain "a," "b" and "c." It does contain "a" and "c," it does not contain "b" ; and the point is raised as to whether that defect is a vital defect, whether the omission is such that the power designated by the letter "b" in that order, is an omission fatal to the constitutionality of the Act. It is of course the part of no prudent lawyer to express an opinion in this House, and I take care not to express opinions.

Mr. GILLIES. Does not the Bill now before the House come within subsection 4 of section 93 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows :—

> In case any such provincial law as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

Does not this Bill now under consideration, although not entirely conformed to the remedial order, come under that part of subsection 4, of section 93 ?

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend emphasises the line "as far only as the circumstances of each case require." I answer him by putting the question to the leader of the House, a question which, on a previous occasion, I addressed to the Minister of Justice unsuccessfully, and afterwards to the Minister of Finance, and that question is suggested by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Gillies), following the fact that we are now calling attention to the omission in this Bill to contain a clause such as was suggested by paragraph "b," in the remedial order. In case the expectations held out as regards section 74 of the draft Bill are not fulfilled, and there is no provision made for any federal money being granted to sustain separate schools in Manitoba, and Manitoba itself does not give provincial money for the purpose of supporting such schools, I beg to ask the Secretary of State to take the House into his confidence as to whether this House will subsequently be asked to vote such money for the province of Manitoba ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think the time has come when I am called upon to answer a question of that kind.

Mr. WELDON. I must ask the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) what the circumstances of the case are in Manitoba which will deprive Catholic teachers, assuming these districts to be organized, of provincial aid ; in other words, to say that Protestant teachers shall receive the full provincial grant and Catholic teachers of the same grade and doing the same kind of work shall be deprived of it. I should like an explanation from the hon. member for Richmond as to what circumstances exist in Manitoba which should lead to such a condition of affairs.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Greenway has not yet taken that position, and it will be time enough for us to deal with it when he does so. It is non possumus, and is therefore not arguable.

Mr. WELDON. I begin with the assumption that there are no circumstances existing in Manitoba which would justify this Parliament in saying that a Protestant teacher in the public schools should receive a portion of the provincial grant, and that a Catholic teacher giving instruction in the separate schools should not receive similar assistance from the public treasury. One of the glaring defects of the Bill on the score of justice is that it makes fish of one and flesh of another. If the hon. gentleman who drafted the Bill would declare that, if under section 74 the provincial government do not do their duty, Canada at all events would do her duty and pay the Catholic teachers as well as the Protestants——

Mr. GILLIES. We could not do it.

Mr. WELDON. Should there not be a second subsection to section 74, declaring that if Manitoba does not make this grant, Canada would do it.

Mr. COCHRANE. Would you support it ?

Mr. WELDON. I give the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) the same answer I gave the hon. member for Lambton the other day. So there is the first difficulty. It may be that the Act is beyond the power of this Parliament.

Mr. MARTIN. I beg to suggest to the hon. gentleman that the argument goes a good deal further. Not only is subsection "c" of the remedial order not dealt with, but in dealing with subsection "a" a very different kind of school is provided by the Bill to the schools which existed when the system was repealed by the Manitoba Bill of 1890, and Manitoba has never been called on to provide such schools. The schools to be provided under the remedial order are the old schools that existed prior to 1890. The schools provided by the Remedial Bill are attempted to be made efficient, but the Bill differs in very many respects as regards the schools provided under it and the Act in force prior to 1890.

Mr. WELDON. I think that position is a very strong one, and I shall listen with pleasure to the reply which hon. members supporting the Bill may make. I notice in the Bill a large number of sections which fully support the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). Many of those sections were referred to by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) the other night in introducing his amendment, and indeed he cited a large number of such sections. Section 23 is in point with respect to this very matter. That is a section which cannot be found in the Manitoba law as it existed before it was repealed in 1890. I desire the House to bear with me while I read that section, and I will ask hon. gentlemen who differ from me to give their answer.

Mr. DALY. I do not like to contradict the hon. gentleman, but I desire to point out that he will find section 23 of the Bill to be identical with section 9, chapter 27, of the Act of 1885.

Mr. WELDON. Has the hon. gentleman the Act of 1885 ?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. WELDON. When I have the opportunity, I will make a comparison between the Act of 1885 and the present Bill, and it must be understood that I do not reflect in the slightest degree on the accuracy of the hon. gentleman. I am disappointed by his correction.

Mr. DALY. No doubt ; because the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) made out the other night that there had not been a law passed since those of 1884 and 1890, whereas Acts had been passed in almost every session of the legislature.

Mr. WELDON. I frankly admit that I thought the more important Acts were those of 1871, 1875, 1884 and 1890.

Mr. McCARTHY. There have been amendments passed since, but they are merely as to matters of details. The substantive Acts are those to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. DALY. They cannot be considered matters of detail, as I have informed the House that the Act of 1885 is identical with clause 23 of the Bill, on which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) dwelt the other night and exhibited ignorance that I thought was astonishing.

Mr. SPEAKER. This discussion across the House should not be indulged in, and it is contrary to the rules of the House to contradict an hon. member.

Mr. WELDON. I am very glad to be corrected by hon. members if I am wrong. When I have the opportunity of looking at the Act I shall ascertain whether the statement of the hon. member for Simcoe is more nearly accurate than that of the Minister of the Interior or not, and whether these amendments are not merely as regards to matters of details. Of course I accept the statement of the hon. Minister, and I do not mean to challenge its perfect genuineness, but still I have the suspicion that the main modifications of the laws are the Acts of 1884 and 1890. Section 28 and subsection 2—and I hope the Minister of the Interior will correct me if I am wrong—are undoubtedly new.

Mr. DALY. They are both new.

Mr. WELDON. Subsection 2 of section 28 is of very great importance, and I will read it :

> 2. No Roman Catholic who is assessed for the support of a separate school shall be liable to be assessed, taxed or required in any way to contribute for the erection, maintenance or support of any other school, whether by provincial law or otherwise ; nor shall any of his property in respect of which he shall have been so assessed be so liable.

It can fairly be said that this is substantially carrying into effect a term of the remedial order. I have a large number of sections marked, which are, to the best of my knowledge, new, and several of them have been mentioned, though not cited by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Section 74, which has been so much discussed, and, as to which we are much in the dark, is certainly new. I wish to call the attention of the House to the very remarkable statement that there are a good many clauses in this Bill in which this Parliament stays its hand until the provincial authority has acted. Other sections go on to say that if that provincial authority does not act within reasonable time, the federal will come to the front and act. The want of a corresponding statement in this section 74 is significant. It gives colour to what is whispered, that this Bill is a most disingenuous Bill. The Government go to our separate school friends and say : Here is all you want, a system of separate schools, and although there are some little defects in the measure, we will remedy them by and by : and they go to the friends of the national schools, and they say : The whole thing is harmless. I may mention, Sir, that my constituents are writing to me by the dozen, almost by every mail, and many of them say they are in favour of the policy of the Administration, getting their cue, no doubt, from the papers supporting the Administration, and circulating in that Protestant district. These papers tell them that this Bill is harmless as skim milk. That is the cry in these districts which are largely Protestant and opposed to separate schools. They are told that the Bill is no good—which I believe is true—and that the Protestants need not fear it, because it is simply humbugging the separate school people. It is only fair that I should ask here for an explicit statement, and I believe that the leader of the House, or the Minister of Justice, or the Minister of Finance, should have taken the House more into their confidence. Under this Bill, we have charged the provincial authorities to appoint members of the Catholic school board, and if it turns out that the provincial authorities do not appoint these members, then there is a declaration to say that the Governor General shall appoint them. Why should we not have a more explicit declaration with regard to this matter. I am within my right in putting the question to the House, and I think I might have expected a more explicit answer. I have a right to inquire, Sir, whether it is the intention that this Parliament shall be asked to grant from the school lands fund any public money to help Catholic separate schools in Manitoba ? If the Government say, no, we will not put our hand in the Canadian treasury and give to the teachers in separate schools a sum corresponding to the provincial allowance, then, that would be an answer. If, on the other hand, the Government say : By and by we will do so, and if the people at Winnipeg will not do what section 74 contemplates they shall do, then we will act, and take public money, Canadian money, to perform that simple act of justice. As I said the other night in the debate, so I say to-night : One set of men may very well favour a system of national schools, another set of men may very well favour a set of separate schools, and both have millions of men on their side. Both are supported by the opinions of very able men in many countries ; both systems have much to be said for them, but one weakness of this wretched Bill, is that while it purports to set up a system of separate schools, there is nothing in the Bill to give these schools vitality and success.

I would like very much to know, Sir, and I think it would instruct the House, if some who differ from us would take the floor and give us their argument—for they must believe that we are wrong—give us their argument in favour of the constitutionality of these taxing powers in the Bill. Let me again state briefly what seems to me the difficulties in upholding the powers that are claimed by this Federal Parliament, when we say to a certain class of people in Manitoba : You shall pay taxes into a certain fund. There is some difficulty to be sure in the partition of the power between the provincial and the federal powers in respect to taxing, and many other matters, and the light we have got from the decisions on a number of cases by the Privy Council, and by other courts, is valuable in the reconciling of these apparently contradictory clauses. There is a group of powers specifically enumerated and attributed to the Federal Parliament in section 91. There is another group of powers, sixteen in number, specifically enumerated and attributed to provincial legislatures, and there is, thirdly, a statement to say that all undescribed powers belong to the Federal Parliament. There is also another clause to say that the provinces and the Dominion have concurrent powers with respect to agriculture and immigration, although in the event of a conflict of law, the federal overbears the local. Another clause, one which gives us all our difficulty on the present occasion in this House, is clause 93, which contemplates that legislation shall be initiated by the province, and in a certain event, remedied by the federal power. We want to see how the other sections of the constitution which seem to be somewhat in conflict, can be reconciled, if they can, in any way, be reconciled. We want to see what general rule we have for reading them together, if there be any general rule. Long ago the theory used to be, that if the alleged provincial power were in conflict with the alleged federal power, that the latter overbore the former. But that simple sweeping rule of law has long since been abandoned, and during the last seven or eight years, it has had but scant courtesy from the higher courts. Take any one of these subjects which are to be dealt with in part by the province and in part by the Dominion Parliament. Take, for instance, the subject of marriage and divorce. Item 26, in section 91, describes that as one of the federal powers, in these bald words, "marriage and divorce." Item 12, of section 91—item 12 being one of the provincial powers—has these words :

> The province may exclusively make laws with reference to the solemnization of marriage in the province.

How do we read these two clauses together? We read them together and say, that, generally speaking, marriage laws and divorce laws must be federal, but, grafted upon that is this exception : That matters respecting the solemnization of marriages, such as the publication of banns or licenses, civil or ecclesiastical marriages, and the like, and all that partakes to the celebration of marriage, are to be governed by provincial laws. We assume that if the section were more fully written they would state that the federal power may make laws with respect to marriage, but that they may not make laws in respect to the solemnization of marriage. Let us now take the taxing power, which brings us back to the centre of the discussion. Clause 3, in the group of federal powers, says, "that the Dominion Parliament may exclusively make laws with reference to the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation." And clause 2, in the group of provincial powers, says, "that direct taxation within a province, in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes, is exclusively a provincial power." These two clauses would seem at first to be in conflict, but when you read them together, the specific power is carved out of, and is an exception to the larger statement of the federal power, and you will see, then, that the province has this power of imposing direct taxation. These school taxes are direct taxes, and are for provincial purposes, as that phrase "provincial purposes" is clearly defined by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in a case from my own province—the case of Dow vs. Black. "Provincial purposes" include district purposes, county purposes, school purposes. Again, the Dominion has the power of raising money by any system of taxation, exclusive of the power of imposing direct taxes within the province for provincial purposes. These words lead us to the conclusion that the Dominion has no taxing power of the kind which we are trying to exercise in this Bill. That cannot be discovered in the taxation clauses of the constitution, and I have touched upon the two clauses which refer to taxation. I may refer for a moment to the clause of the constitution which provides for the enactment of customs laws. The power of this Parliament to impose customs taxes is clearly contained in the section which I have read. It is also recognized in section 122 :

> The customs and excise laws of each province shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, continue in force until altered by the Parliament of Canada.

Which is a mere recognition of a power explicitly declared and set forth in subsection 3 of section 91. Where does this Parliament get its taxing power, then, when the taxation clauses of the constitution do not grant that power. The answer given by the gentlemen who uphold the constitutionality of the Bill is that we get it, not from the taxation clauses, but from the educational clause—section 93. They say that when the constitution makes a grant of power that carries with it whatever is necessary to the effective exercise of that power. That statement, true in itself, implies that a taxing power is a part, and a necessary part, of the remedial power set forth in section 93. The recent case upon which these gentlemen rely for that opinion is the case that went to the Privy Council after running through our courts, with reference to bankruptcy—the case of Cushing vs. Dupuis, where the point in controversy was as to whether certain provisions in one of our Bankruptcy Acts were constitutional ; it being alleged that they interfered with the provincial power to make laws respecting "property and civil rights." The judgment of the Privy Council, delivered, I think, by Lord Selborne, stated that the federal power to enact a bankruptcy law carried with it enough power to make that law workable and effective. That is a clear doctrine, well laid down in that case. It was pointed out that you cannot provide a complete scheme of insolvency without interfering at every step with property and civil rights. Therefore, the specific federal power to make a bankruptcy law involved necessarily an invasion of the vague power of the province to make laws relating to "property and civil rights." That case, and those which followed it, bring us to this excellent constitutional rule—this golden rule of interpretation—which the courts have often laid down, that where there is a conflict between a general power, clothed in vague words and a specific power, the first shall be held subject to the narrower but more specific power; because when men are using specific words, they are expressing their meaning exactly, whereas when they are using vague and general words, they are only expressing themselves in general terms. So the courts have upheld the specific power as against the general power. Now, apply that principle to this school question. Those who contend against us are arguing in this way: This Parliament they argue, has a remedial power. It cannot, they argue, exercise its remedial power unless it has the power of taxation. But there we join issue, and say that that is begging the whole question—taking only one view of the matter. But, we say, it is not necessary to the exercise of our remedial power that we should in the slightest degree interfere with the power of taxation; and the constitution has never taken that view of our remedial power, otherwise it would have clothed us in some way with the auxillary power of taxing. In attempting to exercise that remedial power as is attempted to be done in this Bill. We are merely knocking our heads against clear statements of specific provincial power. We want to tax, but we have no power to tax. We are trying to levy a direct tax on Manitoba Act without interfering with the provincial power of taxation. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I am inclined, on the third point raised in the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe, to doubt the legality of this exercise of the power of taxation. We are trying to levy a direct tax on Manitoba, when the constitution says that the province alone may levy direct taxes on Manitoba. How can we take ourselves out of that prohibition of the constitution?

The fourth matter to which the amendment of the hon. member calls our attention is closely related to the last-mentioned. The hon. member doubts the legality of that section. I think section 28, which relieves the Roman Catholic ratepayers of Manitoba from the duty of contributing to the support of the public schools in cases where they have a school of their own. I need not re-read the section. The difficulties are practically the same as in the last case. The difficulties are these. The province of Manitoba, possessing the undoubted power to address a mandate to the people of Manitoba, have ordered all the people of Manitoba to discharge a certain duty; and we in our might come in and say to one class of those people: "You need not obey your master." Where do we get that power? Who are we that come to the Roman Catholic people and say: "You need not obey the order you have received"? The provincial legislature has the exclusive power to tax; the constitution is perfectly explicit as to that. The provincial legislature has the power, and the federal legislature has not the power—that is the meaning of the word exclusive—to impose any such tax. How, then, can we break through that explicit prohibition, and relieve those people of that burden? I must ask my hon. friends who uphold the Bill to strengthen their position in some regard. Otherwise, if they do not correct us and show us where we are in the wrong, they leave us free to say in the country, and it is our duty to say, that this Bill is simply scattering mischief and creating litigation. The case is like that of one who goes into a clean garden, all moist and prepared for seed, and scatters nettles and the seed of thistles in it. Sir, the only gentlemen who are likely to make anything out of this measure are those who get retainers from the Manitoba government and from the Catholic minority. The only people who, it seems to me, can contemplate with much pleasure the condition of things which will ensue after the Bill becomes law, are the lawyers of the western country. My hon. friend the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the other night, pressed that point. Looking to their own interests, they may see a golden harvest before them—questions of ultra vires and intra vires, questions of most diverse character, questions of the greatest interest, which are raised by I don't know how many sections of the Act, and on which many lawyers would be delighted to take a retainer on either side, and not expect a very early conclusion of the suit.

An hon. MEMBER. Is the hon. member for North Simcoe retained?

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend on my left asks, if the hon. member for North Simcoe has not been retained already. If he has been, then, in trying to kill the Bill, he is trying to kill the goose which lays the golden egg, and displaying an amount of personal unselfishness not often met with. The fifth ground contained in the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe, has to do with the action of the Governor General in Council. According to the very first clause of this Bill, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of Manitoba is to appoint a separate school board for the province of Manitoba, to be composed of a certain number of persons, not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics. Then, there is a provision of that class to which we have called the attention of the House more than once, that, if within three months after the coming into force of this Act, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council does not make appointments to the separate school board, or does not fill any vacancy that may occur in the separate school board, within three months after the occurrence of such vacancy, then, in either such case, His Excellency the Governor General shall make any appointments not made by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. There is a provision that, if the local authorities do not do their duty, we will do it for them. I have complained that in clause 74 a corresponding provision is not made, as it should be, in simple justice to Catholic teachers. But, if the executive at Winnipeg does not do its duty, the executive at Ottawa will do it. What power has the Governor General for the appointment of school officers in Manitoba? The powers of the Governor General are such as are contained in his commission, supplemented by his instructions, and as are set forth in section 12 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

> All powers, authorities and functions which under any Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the legislature of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, are at the union vested in or exerciseable by the respective Governors or Lieutenant-Governors of those provinces, with the advice or with the advice and consent, of the respective executive councils threof, or in conjunction with those councils, or with any number of members thereof, or by those Governors or Lieutenant-Governors individually, shall, as far as the same continue in existence and capable of being exercised after the union, in rlation to the Government of Canada, be vested in and exerciseable by the Governor General, with the advice or with the advice and consent of or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, or any members thereof, or by the Governor General individually, as the case requires, subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland) to be abolished for or altered by the Parliament of Canada.

That section has been construed carefully by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case that went to that committee from New Brunswick four years ago, popularly known as the Maritime Bank case, in which the strongest view was taken of the provincial powers, and one that very greatly narrows the range of the Federal Executive. And while it would be, at this late hour, trespassing upon the patience of the House for me to take up that report and read at length from the judgment, I am in the memory of every man in this House who is interested in this class of study, when I say that it is not easy to hold section 2 of this Bill constitutional, with the case of the Maritime Bank in your hands. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held in that case that the executive powers of the province moves along on equal step with the legislative powers of the province, that the best means of determining the range of the executive power of the Lieutenant-Governor of a province was to see what powers the legislature had, and that such executive powers as were of the same nature and as are necessary to give the legislative powers their full expression, is possessed by the Lieutenant-Governor. The same principle has been held clearly by the courts of Ontario. It was held in one memorable case by Chancellor Boyd, in this province, when speaking of the pardoning power of the Lieutenant-Governor, and it is a view that seems to have been upheld in subsequent cases. I need not read from those cases, because the argument will not be controverted by any hon. gentleman, whatever view he may take of the legality of the Bill, that this judgment greatly strengthened the authority of the provincial executive, and, therefore, limited the authority of the Federal Executive, and throws great doubts upon the legality of clause 2 of this Bill.

The amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe raises another point, as to whether Parliament, having performed this function of passing this Bill—a function which, in my poor judgment, they will not perform this session——

Mr. ROOME. Why?

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend asks me, why. My hon. friend will have to hold this inquiry until I have dealt with my seventh point. I am following the order of my hon. friend from North Simcoe, and will have to argue his seventh objection before I can give in order a particular and courteous answer to the question put by the hon. member for Middlesex. I am now coming to the sixth point: Has this Parliament further power in regard to this matter? There I cannot express an opinion. The whole matter is shrouded in darkness and doubt.

An hon. MEMBER. It is not a practical matter.

Mr. WELDON. It is, as my hon. friend will see before I have done. The words of the constitution are in the memory of members, and I need not read them. Parliament may make remedial laws, and, in passing this Bill they make one. The question is, whether they can make another or not on the same subject. I shall not delay the House to argue that phase of the question, but go on to one which is very pressing, and that is, whether this law, once made by us, can be repealed by us. On that point I have much doubt. If I were free from doubt, if I felt perfectly clear that the Parliament of Canada. in its next session, could undo the legislation of this. I would give a very different answer to my hon. friend. I would then be content to offer a very clear and short opposition, and say that the House, having declared itself, our duty now was to go on and give that declaration the most perfect expression we could. That seems to me the common duty of Parliament in the case of ordinary measures, but in the case of a very important measure, and particularly where there is doubt as to the power of repeal by any authority on this side of the sea, my own view of my duty is altered entirely, and I say to my hon. friend very frankly, taking the view that I do, that this Bill is inexcusably unjust to the Catholic people.

Mr. McALISTER. If they are satisfied with it, is it not their own business?

Mr. WELDON. By no manner of means. How do we know that they are? My hon. friend may be satisfied, but I do not know that the hon. member for Restigouche has power to speak for all the Roman Catholics of Canada.

Mr. McALISTER. I do not pretend to.

Mr. WELDON. I hear many hon. members, who are of that faith, express their disappointment at the Bill, and I look to them as proper exponents of Catholic opinion. Mr. Speaker, I deny the right as a member of this House, elected by the votes of the people in my own county of Albert, of any authority, however eminent, in respect of a matter of legislative action coming before me, to set aside my judgment and put his instead. I am glad to learn, to gain information, I am delighted to illumine my mind with all the information I can get, and most of all from the words of those who can speak with most authority as to the wishes of any particular class or section of the people. This is particularly true of those who can inform me as to the wishes of those who are far away from my own home or of those belonging to communions that are furthest removed in thought from my own, as Protestant and Catholic communions are a good way apart in their religious belief. And if I wish to know what the Catholic people feel in regard to a certain matter, I am only too careful to find what their opinions are from those who are most competent to express their views. But my duty is not then done. It is not sufficient for me to know, for instance, that a certain member of the Manitoba legislature is willing to accept this as a finality. I would be glad to discuss the matter with Mr. Prendergast to learn why he accepts it. If I could know that he regarded section 74 as a finality, I should understand the question better. If I had the acquaintance of Archbishop Langevin, I should like to discuss frankly and fully this Bill with him to know how he can accept that as an adequate measure for the relief of his people. I do not believe that he can accept the Bill as it stands and that alone. I confess to a feeling of surprise when I read in "La Presse" the telegram sent by Archbishop Langevin to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) indicating his approval. I could not but think that that approval had been hastily given—more than that quickly given—and given on some misunderstanding of that section 74. For why in the world should that good bishop, that good shepherd of his flock, of whom we all believe that he wishes nothing but well for his people, who is bound to protect them and who desires to do so—how in the world he can accept that Bill without an understanding or at least a strong hope that it will be followed by something substantial, is a puzzle to me. It seems to me that that clause simply makes this Bill the offering of a glass upside down to a thirsty man. I have not the pleasure of knowing that distinguished prelate, but I should like, I should dearly like, to have the opportunity of meeting that illustrious clergyman and discussing that phase of the question and finding out at first hand why his Grace the Archbishop should accept such a Bill as a finality. Now, Mr. Speaker, every one of us must exercise his own judgment, and it is not enough that another, A or B or C, however profoundly you may admire him is satisfied with the measure. We must be satisfied, and we do not regard our duties seriously enough unless we found our opinions upon our own personal study of the statute itself. There is the beauty of a deliberative assembly. We can hear opinions differing from our own and we can reserve our own expressions until we hear these opinions given. We have had a long and interesting debate upon this measure and we have heard the views of all classes of our countrymen, Catholic and Protestants, Englishmen, and Frenchmen, Scotchmen and Irishmen, most of these expressions of opinion being characterized by great fairness and candour. We are now in a position to judge this matter. I say to my hon. friend from Restigouche (Mr. McAlister) that I cannot allow any man, however much he may exceed me in wisdom or goodness or patriotism or capacity, to supplant my judgment with his own. Such a thing would not be in accordance with the true view of my duty as a member of this House.

On the question whether this Bill is irrevocable or not I desire to say one word more. There seems to be some unrepealable federal powers in our constitution. I do not know whether the House will agree with me, but it appears to me that there are one or two powers under the constitution which once acted upon are functi officio—our powers are spent and we can do no more in the matter. I do not know whether I can carry the members of my own profession with me in this argument. In paragraph c of clause 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act, there is a curious statement which contemplates the passing of legislative power swiftly from the provincial to the federal authority. I will read that in a moment. It is said in clause 10 that local works and undertakings with three excepted classes belong to the provincial authority. Then comes the statement of the three excepted classes which come under the federal authority. These three classes of public works that are meant to be controlled by the federal power are :

> Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings, connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province :
> (b) Lines of steamships between the province and British or foreign country.

Then comes a paragraph to which I wish to call the attention of the House :

> (c) Such works as, although wholly situated within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

It is within the memory of the older members of the House—the statute was passed some years before I came here—that in 1883 Parliament made a declaration, which this cause contemplates, in so many words that every branch of the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canada Southern and other large lines of railway or other lines crossing these great lines should be works for the general advantage of Canada. That statute, at one sweep, took an enormous mileage of railway out of the control of the provincial authority and placed it under the control of this Parliament. I believe I am right in saying that that was the Act of 1883. Now, it is a question which, to my mind, is not very arguable, but it is a question, whether, if we undertook to repeal that statute we could re-establish the status ante quo. If we were simply to enact a repealing Act declaring that chapter so and so is hereby repealed, could we effectively repeal that Act ? Could we put these railways back under the control of the provincial authorities ? I do not think we could. It seems to me—I express the opinion very cautiously—that it is at least doubtful whether we could do that—very doubtful. It seems to me the more likely view that once used this power was spent, and once these railways were taken under the federal authority nothing but an imperial amendment could put them under provincial authority again. If so there is one case where we have the power to act without the usual power to repeal. The question is whether with regard to this educational system, we are in the same difficulty. Between the two, I grant you, there is not an absolute analogy. There is a certain power which we have. It is put in section 93 and not in section 92. If it were put in section 92 you would expect to find that the Parliament which had the power to enact had the power to repeal. And in that whole group of powers seems to be but one exception. And in the other group of 29 attributed to the federal authority there seems to be no exception. Now, that rule impressed itself so strongly upon Sir Henry Strong, the Chief Justice of our court of appeal that he laid it down as an important constitutional maxim that only unambiguous words in the statute would lead him to say that the Parliament that could enact could not repeal. It is true, and the members of the House who are of the legal profession will remind me that the Lord Chancellor in London challenged the soundness of that maxim on the Brophy appeal. Those members of this House who attach great importance to the most casual words uttered by the Judicial Committee, will no doubt hold by Lord Herschell ; but for my own part the statement of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada seems to be very much stronger ; and as we are dealing with judgments now which are not decisions, and which bind no one, I feel free to say what I would not say if I were dealing with almost any other judgment of the Judicial Committee, namely, that we must exercise our own private judgment as we reserved liberty to do when we passed Mr. Blake's resolution, and the Act of Parliament in the following session founded upon that. We must go by the declarations therein made, so far as they are conformable to our own judgment. I take the liberty of saying, although I may be alone in this House in saying it, but I am not afraid to be alone—that I have more confidence in the opinion of Sir Henry Strong than of the most distinguished living English lawyer, and for this reason, that in our courts, and in the Supreme Court of Canada, and in the fact that in our superior courts of justice generally, our judges are very familiar with constitutional cases, owing largely to the division of power between the province and Dominion, brought about by the federal Act, and in part by the limitations of our own power as a colony, being kept within bounds by the paramount Imperial legislative authority that we have ten cases of constitutional law in this country to one in England. Consequently, our judges are incomparably more familiar with constitutional law than the judges of the mother country. Therefore, I say that I am more bound by the authority of a distinguished Canadian lawyer than by any English lawyers on questions of this nature; and when Sir Henry Strong said that he thought there was a strong presumption in law that the province which passed such an Act could repeal it, that carries, at all events in my own judgment, a greater weight than Lord Herschell's answers. You see, in this case, I am unusually fair, for a lawyer, for I am arguing both sides of the case to show its difficulties. In my view, if there were no reasonable grounds for apprehending that an Act once passed by this Parliament is passed for ever, my opposition to this Bill would then be much weaker. Feeling as I do that if we pass this law, it may well be that this Parliament cannot tear it up. I cannot take the responsibility of laying down my arms, or allowing this Bill to go on as rapidly as it might. I regard the Bill as so mischievous, so useless in its essence, so inadequate in giving any redress to the Roman Catholic people in Manitoba, that I cannot believe that the best lawyers in the country really think, in their hearts, that it will give relief to the Roman Catholic people in Manitoba. What the motives of the Government may be, is more than I can imagine, or more than I would be allowed to comment upon. Feeling so strong a doubt upon the legality of the Bill, feeling so strongly the weakness of that section 74, about the want of public money to drive the machinery of separate schools, I am puzzled to know what possible good this Bill will do when it is carreid.

Now, I will deal with the last point that is germane to the resolution of the hon. member for Simcoe, where he asks us to refer this Bill to the courts. I myself must have very strong reasons given me to favour a reference to the courts of justice of a question of this nature. All questions which excite political passion, and this does in a large degree, and all questions which excite religious feeling, ought to be put before the courts as sparingly as possible. The best buttress and wall of defence for civil order in this country, is that the whole people shall have the profoundest belief in the purity and the fairness of our courts of law. I have uttered many times in this House the famous saying of that great English law reformer, Bentham, that it is better for the people to believe that they are getting justice, though they may not be getting pure justice, than to believe that they are not getting justice when the courts are giving it to them. A popular belief in the purity and soundness of the courts of justice is the great guarantee of peace and civil order, and the more we throw these vexatious political questions, these vexatious religious questions, upon the courts of justice, the greater the danger that we will weaken their public authority, and weaken the respect that a large part of the people have for them. Therefore, I find myself unwilling to vote for the motion of the hon. member to refer this question to the Supreme Court : though if that motion had run in another line, and the proposition had been to refer it to a Committee of this House, of men who are specially familiar with it, my objection would have been averted. I would like very much that Parliament should have had the advantage of clear, though it may be a technical legal argument by the lawyers of this House, so that those of us who have somewhat strong views as to the unconstitutionality of the measure, could have had their criticisms corrected by others who may have a strong view in favour of its constitutionality. With this remark I say that all that I have to say that is germane to the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe.

Now, a word or two with reference to some matters which were suggested by the debate that closed on Friday morning. I see in the House the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I thought his impatience and heat of his speech last Thursday entirely unprovoked—for of all the Ministers he is almost the only one to whom I really, neither directly or indirectly, made the slightest reference. Had any one of his colleagues risen and directed severe criticisms toward me, I would have got what I deserved. Had the Minister of Finance, or the Minister of Public Works, or the Postmaster General, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, addressed a few energetical remarks to me, I would have thought that was perfectly fair, as far as parliamentary debate goes, because I had been in a sense the provoked aggressor. But in reference to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries I had no occasion to comment upon his conduct, nor had I made the slightest reference to him; therefore, I felt great surprise in hearing him use the expressions which I think would give offence to even the most thick-skinned member of the House. I wondered at it, and I wondered until the debate was over, when I bethought myself that he is the most fortunate member of this House. They say, "there is a divinity that doth hedge about a king," and the hon. member has some sort of unseen protection that is pretty well described in that expression. Other men are struck, but not one strikes him. Other men are put on their metal, and have to put on their arms to defend themselves, but no one puts that hon. Minister upon his defence. I remember, Sir, taking the point of order the other night, and I put myself within the rules of the House when I asked the Speaker (at this moment absent from the Chair) as to whether a certain expression was parliamentary. That strong Speaker, that first Commoner whose authority is never overborne by the leader of the House or by the leader of the Opposition, who stands before these great parliamentarians as the old Hebrew prophet stood before the old Hebrew kings, and made them obey—even he forgot to rule on the point of order, but unexpectedly turned his attention to another matter altogether, and when this Speaker whose firmness, strength and fairness we all admire, showed exceptional kindness to this Minister, then the whole House wondered. And I have seen the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) whom no one charges with want of courage, I have seen him once in his recklessness attack the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and what happened I do not know, but within twelve hours his nose was brought down to the ring bolt, and he came to the House and made an apology. I do not think there is another member of the House, under the same conditions, who could have drawn that apology from the member for South Oxford. I must say that, personally, I have a great deal of admiration for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He has been thirty-odd years now in Parliament, and he has never lost an election. That is saying a great deal; not many members of the House can say that. He has been thirteen or fourteen years a Minister, and we have said behind his back that he is a very fair-minded and satisfactory man; and what could be more natural than that a warm-hearted Roman Catholic Irishman should have stubbornly resisted the old King School Bill, though in a larger way I thank my stars that when engaged in conflict with Mr. King, that young man tossed him in the air on his horns as lightly as could be, and made permanent as regards its main features that excellent measure of national schools.

Mr. OUIMET. I have to ask the indulgence of yourself, Mr. Speaker, and of hon. members while I address a few remarks on the question now before the Chair. I must say I feel at first rather embarrassed at having to answer the numerous and very well expounded arguments of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). However, I feel relieved because he has taken on himself to demolish at the conclusion of his speech all his arguments, showing that he was only playing to the gallery and taking up the time of the House, as he was going through a gymnastic performance, and was simply showing the arguments on one side and on the other side of the question. He himself undertook to show that he did not believe in his arguments against the constitutionality of the measure, when he concluded by stating that he would vote against the amendment of the hon. member for North Simcoe. The first argument I intend to deal with is this, that this Parliament should not deal with the question in the last days of its existence. In my opinion it is the duty of this Parliament to deal with this question, and this Parliament is more qualified than will be the next Parliament to decide the issue now before it. This question is not a new one, and it is not a new one even in this Parliament. It was first raised in 1890, and directions were adopted, at the suggestion of a distinguished gentleman who was then one of the main figures on the other side of the House, for dealing with it. That hon. gentleman told the House how useful and advantageous it would be for this Parliament, before dealing with such a question as the school question, to refer it to the decisions of the courts, so as to have the directions of the court and ascertain exactly what were our powers and in what way those powers should be exercised. This resolution, to which I need not further refer, was adopted unanimously by the House, and in accordance therewith this school question was referred to the courts. At first it was referred in the form of a suit which was taken in the province of Manitoba by some representatives of the minority to test the constitutional validity of the Act itself. This was done with the consent and approval of Parliament, it was done at the public expense, and the decision then obtained was very valuable in so far as it determined very important points and it can now be utilized as directing the line of policy we are bound to adopt. The decision was unfavourable to the minority, and according to directions given in the report of Sir John Thompson, and approved by this House, the question next came up in the shape of an appeal, and this appeal was again referred to the courts in order to have declared what were the powers of the Executive and the powers of this Parliament. This question has been before this country for six years, one year longer than the existence of this Parliament, and if this Parliament is not qualified to deal with it, I venture to say the next Parliament will be still less qualified. Probably a large number of new members will come in, and it will be again, and more than ever, a matter for argument as to what our powers exactly are, especially as even the hon. member for Albert at this late date cannot say exactly how we should deal with this question and the questions of law involved. We would be remiss in our duty if we failed to dispose of this question now. We are bound in the interests of this country to take it away from the active political field, in order that at the next general elections the other important issues which have to be decided, very important issues as regards the future of this country, although I will not say they are more or less important than the present issue, may be brought prominently to the front and disposed of. To my mind, however, although perhaps many hon. members will disagree with me, I do not think there is any constitutional question of more paramount importance to the whole country than this school question. I will not argue this point, but nothing can be more important to every British subject living in Canada than that he should know exactly what privileges and rights this constitution guarantees to them, and how long he will enjoy them, especially if he happens to belong to a minority. This general question of the protection of minorities is the very foundation of our constitution, and if this is not to be respected, it is not worth while for any one of us to work and strive to maintain the constitution and keep this Dominion together. It ill becomes hon. gentlemen opposite to say that it is now too late to deal with this question, and especially to find fault with the Government when we are dealing with it in the very way they have themselves indicated they wished it to be dealt with. When the discussion of the question came on in 1893, and I was addressing a few remarks to this House, the question was put to me several times as to what this Government would do after the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had rendered its decision, and the answer given time and again was that the decision would be followed up, and this is what we have been doing and are doing now. Last year again when some of my hon. friends expressed their dissatisfaction at the fact that the Government had decided —and I believe it was in the interest of the country at large, and especially the minority in Manitoba—to postpone the introduction of remedial legislation, nearly every hon. gentleman opposite found fault with the postponement. Was it that they expected that this Government would find itself unable to pass the legislation, and they hoped to make this Government responsible for what they considered a 'deni de justice' to the minority of Manitoba. I say again, Mr. Speaker, and I say it with all sincerity, that this Parliament must deal with this question and must settle it. It is the duty of this Parliament to deal with it. It is qualified to deal with it, and it is in the best interests of this country that this question should be taken out of politics, and that it should not be the main issue during the next election. It is said that a new reference to the court would be in the interest of the minority, would serve to make this Bill better, and would satisfy the conscientious scruples of men like the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). I agree with that hon. gentleman (Mr. Weldon) in his conclusion that a reference to the court under the present circumstances would not advance the interest of the minority in Manitoba, and would not help this House in any degree at all. I say that we have had all the directions that we needed from the courts. A reference to the court would imply that the court should examine every clause of this Bill, and decide whether any one of its 112 clauses is within the remedial order, or falls short of it. It would take a month or two to do that, and then the Bill would come back to this Parliament. Suppose the court would consent to give its direction, are we going to abandon our liberty to decide on every one of those clauses, and to resign the powers which are vested in this Parliament by the constitution ? If eventually any one of those clauses were amended in committee, or any number of them were amended. I daresay it would be logical that they should be referred back to the courts again. Sir, if after the Bill is passed, and in order to avoid litigation a reference to the court was suggested, there might be something in it, but there is certainly no reason for that suggestion now. I venture to say, Sir, that the minority are satisfied with this Bill, and that they are also satisfied to run the risks of all the litigation that may be raised by the government of Manitoba, if that government decides to continue its persecution of that minority. At all events, the minority say that this Bill will place them in a better position than they are to-day. For, at the present time, they have to pay their taxes to schools to which they cannot send their children, and, having paid theses taxes, they have again to tax themselves in order to support their own schools. They have no legislative grant at the present day, nor do they share in the school land fund. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we are told by some who take an apparent interest in the minority, that they would be better without the legislation provided under this Bill. I say to these hon. gentlemen that those who represent the minority, and who represent the feelings, and the aspirations, and the needs of that minority, are better qualified to tell us what will suit that minority and what they should be satisfied with. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the case of the minority has been before the courts for the last six years, and that we have received from the courts every direction that we can expect, in order to draft this Bill. In order to summarize the decision in the present case, I wish to refer to the points that have been settled by the Privy Council. First of all, it was decided that the majority had a right to provide for themselves whatever schools they liked. The decision in the first case of the City of Winnipeg against Barrett, in appeal, was that the legislature of Manitoba had a right to repeal the Education Acts in force in 1890 and to pass the Acts that are now complained of. That decision did not go any further. It follows, therefore, that it would be ultra vires for this Parliament to pass any Act that would interfere with the Act of the Manitoba legislature, with the exception that I will mention further on. It was decided that it was in the power of the legislature to repeal its own Acts, and thereby to abolish the rights and privileges created to such minority by these Acts, but it was also decided that, in such a case, the aggrieved minority, if not satisfied, had an appeal to the Governor General in Council, and could ask that these rights should be restored to them by way of a remedial order ; and, in case such remedial order should not be obeyed by the local legislature, then, by way of legislative interference and enactment by the Dominion Parliament. I repeat again that the majority had the right to establish the schools of their choice, but in the exercise of this right, if the majority abolished any right belonging to the minority, that minority had the right to come here, first by addressing itself to the Governor General in Council ; and, on the remedial order being passed, ordering the legislature to restore the rights that had been taken away from them—unjustly, although not unlawfully, as has been contended—the minority had a right to come here and have those rights restored by this Parliament.

Mr. BRODEUR. Would the hon. gentleman tell us if by the first judgment of the Privy Council the rights of the minority had been affected by the Act of 1890 ?

Mr. OUIMET. The point that was adjudicated upon by the Privy Council was purely and simply that the rights and privileges which were enjoyed by the minority before the Union Act of 1870 had not been unlawfully affected by the Acts of 1890. The second judgment declared that the majority, by those Acts, although they were constitutional, had no right against their wishes to take away the privileges of the minority, acquired by them after the Act of Union of 1870 ; and the minority so aggrieved had the right to come before the Governor General in Council by way of appeal, and ask that an order should be given to the majority to restore those rights ; and those rights not being restored this Parliament has full jurisdiction to deal with the question and restore those rights in full or in part, as the circumstances of the case permitted or justified. Now, the rights acquired by the minority by the various Acts in force from 1871 to 1890 were : first, the control and management of their schools by their section of the Board of Education, who had amongst other powers and privileges the choice of the particular books to be used in the schools ; second, the privilege to pay their school taxes towards the support of their own schools ; third, the right to share in educational funds and educational grants proportionately to the number of their children of school age. These are the rights we have attempted to restore to the minority ; and when the discussion of the clauses of this Bill comes up, it will be shown that none of these clauses really interfered with the Public Schools Act of Manitoba, so far as the majority are concerned. The minority are given all the rights that were possessed by them ; and, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the aspects of the question which have been purposely lost sight of by the Opposition. When they blame us for having failed to restore the minority in all their rights, the answer is that no more rights could be given than those which had been clearly given to them by the legislation in force up to 1890. For instance, we have been blamed for enacting that the members of the separate school board shall be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. Well, this was the state of things before 1890, and we could not change that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The point taken was that the remedial order, which alone gives us the power to legislate, did not provide for the establishment of a separate school board. It was not contended that we should not appoint a spearate board, if we had taken the proper step. The contention was that the remedial order did not provide for it, and if the remedial order did not provide for it, it is incompetent to us to legislate in that direction.

Mr. OUIMET. The remedial order sets forth the rights of the minority under three heads. Then, the order was made to restore these rights in the term of the judgment of the Privy Council, in the following words :—

> All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as were necessary to give effect to these provisions.

When the hon. gentleman tells me that it was not necessary to have a separate school board, I say that we have been obliged to provide for that. The power to restore the rights of the minority carried with it all the powers that were necessary to do so ; and as by the law of 1890 the joint Board of Education, which existed then, was wiped out, and the authority of the Department of Education substituted in its place, we could not interfere with that so far as the management of the public schools was concerned. The only way in which we could give the minority control of their schools without interfering with the Public Schools Act was by giving them a separate board of education.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then why don't you provide that by the remedial order.

Mr. OUIMET. That is implied. We have to provide the machinery to restore these rights, or all the rights that this Parliament believes that the circumstances justify them in restoring. We had to provide the machinery to establish, control and maintain the schools. We had to provide that the minority should be exempted from the working of the Public School Act, in so far as they were taxed for the support of these public schools, as they had acquired before 1890 the right of paying their taxes to their own schools alone, and this is the secret of the whole machinery which is provided in the Bill. It is a machinery rendered necessary by the action of the legislature of Manitoba itself, and which would not have been necessary if the legislature of Manitoba had itself restored the rights which it unduly took from the minority. The Manitoba legislature was not bound to do, perhaps, as much as we have done, because it had the power to make enactments, just as these enactments had been made in the province of Ontario. But, as we have to restore these rights to the minority, we have been obliged to give them machinery by which these rights can be effectively exercised. My hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) has stated that we have exceeded our jurisdiction in delegating to the Governor General in Council the authority to act in various cases in which, according to the old law, the Lieutenant-Governor had the right to act, should the Manitoba executive refuse to act. This was a necessary power in order to work the machinery which alone could secure to the minority the enjoyment of these rights which the Privy Council has determined they were entitled to. My hon. friend from Albert, and most of the members who have spoken against this Bill, even the hon. member for Simcoe himself (Mr. McCarthy) did not go to the trouble of comparing the present Bill with the old law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, the hon. member for Simcoe, in his speech, compared the two.

Mr. OUIMET. He committed several errors. I must say that, while I am going into the details of this Bill, I feel that the House cannot be placed in the best possible position to judge of the present Bill, because in order to answer his argument, we have to discuss the details of the clauses, which we could do more easily in committee ; for, when we are in committee, every clause will be read in conjunction with the clauses of the old law previous to 1890, and then every member will be in a position to judge as to whether we have done justice to the minority, or have taken away any rights that they enjoyed before. And I venture to say that, by that comparison, it will be shown that none of the valuable rights this minority had have been taken away from them. Conditions have been imposed, it is true, but these conditions referring especially to the standard of education, have been made as a peremptory answer to the only argument that has been advanced upon this subject by the government of Manitoba, and that is, that, by restoring those rights to the minority, we were restoring the old system of schools, which were inefficient, and were condemning Catholics to illiteracy. This has been contradicted and shown to be totally unfounded. But without going into this question of fact, I say that we have acted upon this principle, that those schools should be placed on the same footing, as far as secular education is concerned, and up to the same standard, as the Manitoba schools under the Act of 1890. I say that we have made every provision that the teachers shall be equal in standing, and that the subjects of study in the schools shall be the very same as now exist in the public schools, and, in fact, the only thing we have conceded to the minority is the right to mix with the secular teaching given in the public schools, their own religious teaching. That is the only thing that is provided in this Bill. This is the only privilege the Catholics claim, and it has been fully given to them by this Bill. One important feature which will strike every well-thinking man, is this, that we have provided for just as high education in the separate schools as is given in the public schools, and we have given the minority the privilege, in those semi-religious subjects of study, of having books that suit their own religious ideas and opinions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I notice that the Bill provides for a distinct examination of the teachers, with a qualification equal to the public school teachers' examination. It also provides that a person who holds a public school certificate is qualified to teach in these schools. Why have a separate board of examination except upon the condition that the public school board refuses to examine ?

Mr. OUIMET. This is another illustration of what I have stated, that we have, in fact, re-enacted every clause in the old law, which applied to Roman Catholics, as well as to Protestants. According to the old law, the teachers who held certificates of teaching from the Protestant or Catholic board, had the right to teach in any school in the province, and we could not take that out, because, in restoring the rights of the minority, we must give them what they enjoyed before, and no more. And we have only given the new school board the right to make regulations for the examination and certification of teachers, so as to give them the right to teach in the separate schools. And that carries this provision—that, so far as secular matters are concerned, the matters upon which these teachers were to be examined are the same subjects as those upon which persons had to undergo examination to qualify them to teach in the public schools, leaving to the separate school board, if they saw fit, to add any qualification that they thought necessary for a teacher in the separate schools. Now, if the board of trustees is willing to engage the services of a teacher holding a certificate from the public school board, that is their concern. This principle of liberty permeates the whole of this Bill, and that leads me to state another thing against which some hon. members from Quebec have protested. I think it is in section 28——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the hon. gentleman passes to that, if he will allow me, I should like to have an explanation of something he said. I understood him to say and to repeat when he appealed to the Protestants that the only condition made by the minority was the right to teach their religion in the schools. If that was the only condition why did not the Government in the remedial order ask Manitoba to give the right to teach religion in the schools and stop there.

Mr. OUIMET. It is all one. By the Act of 1890 and the regulation made, it was provided that a certain type of schools was established which professed to be unsectarian, and that type of schools made it impossible for the Catholic minority to give to their children the education in matters of religion that every Catholic wishes to give his children.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question? Supposing that the subject of religion in the schools had not been touched at all, but that the Bill of 1890 had been confined to the abolition of the two boards and the department of the local superintendent or inspector, would the hon. gentleman argue that the minority would have a right under the statute to come here and ask to have any right restored?

Mr. OUIMET. I do not know that this question has a great bearing on the point I am discussing, so that I should be bound to solve it. But I say that if the new Public Schools Act had only provided that even where the Catholics were numerous enough to have their own schools the teaching of religion was not allowed, their rights under the laws previous to 1890 would have been violated. This leads me to say, referring to the charges that have been made against us that we have been promenading from one bishop's palace to another in order to get instructions from their lordships, that I for one have not had the benefit or privilege of getting any instructions from any one. And I may say that the whole of this trouble, if this law was passed, could be arranged by the government of Manitoba without going very much out of their way.

Mr. LAURIER. Explain that.

Mr. OUIMET. Clause 28, the permissive clause, enables every Catholic wishing to do so to pay his taxes and send his children to public schools. That clause is not objected to by the Catholics and they see in it the safety valve of this legislation. Suppose this Bill were passed it would be the consecration of the rights of the minority and upon it they could always fall back if they were not satisfied with the few concessions that I have thought would be sufficient. These concessions could be made by regulation enabling Catholics where they are in sufficient number to control their schools, to use their books and give their religious teaching. If these few concessions were given to them, this Bill would become perfectly unnecessary.

Mr. LAURIER. Is this part of the instructions to the commissioners?

Mr. OUIMET. I am not allowed to say. It may be that it is. But I think that all the instructions that were given to the commissioners were to see if an arrangement could be arrived at satisfactory to the majority and minority alike.

Mr. LAURIER. Here is a basis of arrangement in what you stated a moment ago.

Mr. OUIMET. If this Bill were passed the Catholics would be satisfied that it is not only a recognition but a guarantee of their rights, and then, in order to bring to an end all these disputes and wranglings that have taken place, in order to restore peace and harmony and good will between themselves and the Protestants of Manitoba they would be willing to accept any reasonable compromise that would give them in the main what they claim, the control of the religious teaching of their children in their schools. This would enable the Catholics to pay their taxes to the public schools, and they could be managed according to their own ideas, leaving always in secular matters the obligation on the Catholics to give to their children a teaching up to the same standard and on the same subjects that are prescribed in the public schools. I say this would be an end to all the trouble. But I think that the Catholics will require that this Bill should be passed in order to secure them, in future, against the abrogation of the compromise that may be arrived at between them and the authorities in Manitoba.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then the hon. gentleman proposes that this Act shall be carried, even though the local government should agree to restore the right to give religious instruction?

Mr. OUIMET. If I were in their place, I would insist upon this Bill being passed.

Mr. CASEY. Will you insist upon it?

Mr. OUIMET. That will remain for you to find out. Again, I repeat this Bill gives to the Catholics all the rights they wish, except that which I admit we do not undertake to give, at present at least, their proportionate share of the legislative grant for educational purposes. With the exception of that point, I think we give them all the rights they had before, and we preserve to the Manitoba government all the rights they had under the old law. We do not interfere in any way with the rights and powers of the local government, under the Acts that were in force in 1890. This will be proven to the satisfaction of the House when we come to discuss the different clauses in detail.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is practically arguing that you cannot change the administrative control, that the local government was not at liberty to substitute something else for the board.

Mr. OUIMET. I say that by section 93 this Parliament has been vested with the jurisdiction of restoring to the minority the rights that have been taken away.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What rights?

Mr. OUIMET. These rights are indicated in the remedial order; every one of them is covered by the three headings in the remedial order, and these rights have been given back to them. I say that every power necessary to carry out this jurisdiction that is given to us, is impliedly conferred upon this Parliament; and when we have gone beyond, and have vested the Governor in Council with power, in case the government of Manitoba should refuse to appoint the members of the board, we have done what was absolutely necessary in order to provide the machinery by which the minority may enjoy the rights that we are giving them.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. What about the money ?

Mr. OUIMET. I wish the hon. gentleman to find out the way of giving them the money ; he would be much more clever than I am, and he would have more power than this Parliament has. Is there any power by which this Parliament can compel the legislature of Manitoba to divide between the majority and the minority their respective shares in grants of public money made to education ? Is there any machinery by which you can do that except by this Parliament voting and paying it ? Has the time come for that ? Is this Parliament justified in assuming that the legislature of Manitoba will refuse to comply with the various dispositions of this law, and with the principles that are embodied in it ? We have provided machinery only in those cases where it was absolutely necessary to do so, as for instance, in the case of the appointment of members of the separate school board. We have provided that if this is not done by the Lieutenant-Governor within three months—and perhaps this may be changed within one month—in order to enable these people to organize their schools, the Governor General shall do it. This provision was a necessity, in order to constitute the board entrusted with the task of organizing the schools at once. This provision has been made because it was urgent. In the old law, as well as in the new law, it is provided that the separate schools shall be entitled to their share of the legislative grants only on conditions that these schools are shown, after due and official inspection, to be up to the standand required by law for the public schools, and as was required for both Protestant and Catholic schools under the old law. Consequently, the Catholic schools will only be entitled to their share of the legislative grant at the end of the first year of their operation, after the official inspection has been made, and it has been declared that they are carried on according to this law. This is not a new enactment. This is according to the old law. It would have been the worst feature in this Bill—I say that this clause would have been the very clause against which every citizen in Manitoba could have protested, because it would have been unwarranted coercion, such coercive provision being made before it had been ascertained that the legislature of Manitoba is willing to carry out the law after it has been passed. Will you say that the legislature of Manitoba has proclaimed to the world that they will resist the enforcement of this law. It is not the law of the land yet. Place it on the statute-book, and then it will be incumbent on the legislature of Manitoba to comply with it, or to say that they are going to resist. But until it is the law of the land, we have no right to assume that the government of Manitoba—at the head of which, after all, we must remember, there is a representative of the Queen, the fountain of the authority, under which we are now acting here—we have no right to assume that that authority will resist the higher authority of this Parliament, and of the Queen herself. This Bill certainly does full justice to the minority, so far as it is possible under the present circumstances of this Parliament to do so. It has been framed very carefully in order not to interfere in the least with the system of public schools now in operation in Manitoba, which, after all, is the choice of the majority. This is their right, and we recognize it to the fullest extent. When the Bill is passed a compromise can be arrived at between the majority and the minority which will cause all the dissatisfaction on the part of the minority to disappear, and will be the means of restoring peace among the people of Manitoba, and I may add that the Catholics will not after all be so very exacting. If a compromise is possible, it will be made easier because under this law the minority will have a guarantee so long as this law remains on the statute-book.

Mr. LAURIER. Then you want both the compromise and the law.

Mr. OUIMET. If the concessions made are withdrawn from the minority, they will have a right to fall back on this law, and have independent schools, to which they are entitled, as decided by the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman maintain that if Manitoba should make this concession, this Parliament would have the right to go on and legislate ?

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. gentleman is a philosopher.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are a warrior.

Mr. OUIMET. I will not say the hon. gentleman is a legal philosopher, he is a philosophe-legiste. I cannot go so thoroughly into all these questions as does the hon. gentleman, but I will not hesitate to say that if the legislature of Manitoba were to legislate to-morrow before this Bill becomes the law of the country, having obeyed and fulfilled the order that has been given to them, the jurisdiction of this Parliament ceases.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then you could not go on with your Bill.

Mr. OUIMET. For the last five years we have been asking the Manitoba legislature to legislate on this subject and take away our jurisdiction.

Mr. LAURIER. Are we right in understanding the hon. gentleman to say that even if the delegates who have gone to Manitoba come to a settlement, this Bill is to be proceeded with?

Mr. OUIMET. The statement of the leader of the House disposes of that question.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes. But his speech does not dispose of it.

Mr. OUIMET. The statement of the leader of the House is this, that this Parliament is bound to push the proposed legislation through during this session, unless legislation is passed by the province of Manitoba which will be satisfactory to the minority. I repeat that unless such legislation is passed by the province of Manitoba, the Bill now under consideration must be enacted during this session, if hon. gentlemen in their zeal for the welfare and happiness of the minority do not prolong the discussion to the 24th April, when all the proceedings of this Parliament will come to an end. If they do that, they will have to take the responsibility and answer for it during the next general elections.

I now desire to say a few words in reply to the arguments of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), the general tenor of which was that we are interfering with some of the powers that have been exclusively conferred on the provinces. The hon. gentleman, at the outset, dealt with the power of taxation. Section 93 gives in terms the power to restore to the minority all rights and privileges which they enjoyed before 1890. The hon. gentleman has stated the jurisdiction of this Parliament and of the legislature, these being given to sctions 91, 92 and 93. Section 91 details some of the powers of this Parliament, all those not mentioned afterwards coming within its jurisdiction. In section 92 are given the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures, and in this section we find exceptions made as to public works and especially to railways. The hon. gentleman admits that whenever, by the operation of this section, any railway company which is under the jurisdiction of the local government has been declared to be in the general interest of Canada, it thereupon comes under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and this Parliament has jurisdiction over the company to the exclusion of any provincial legislature. In section 93 we find there is another exclusive power given to the provinces, but also with another limitation. This limitation is to the effect that, whenever the legislature has given to the minority rights and privileges in matters of education, then, the minority have the right to appeal to this Government, if these rights and privileges have been repealed against their will. After the appeal has been determined by the Governor in Council, and an order made for the restoration of these rights, then this Parliament assumes jurisdiction, and assumes jurisdiction to the exclusion of the local legislature, as soon as this Parliament chooses to exercise that jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This Parliament has no jurisdiction until there is a failure to get redress elsewhere.

Mr. OUIMET. There has been a refusal on the part of the Manitoba legislature to act on the remedial order, and now it becomes the duty of this Parliament, and it is within the power of this Parliament, to enact whatever legislation it shall think requisite to restore the minority to the rights they had before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a discretion.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not say it is not discretionary, but the hon. gentleman should know that this Parliament has already decided to legislate. The principle of this Bill, which is to restore to the minority the rights they had before the Act of 1890, has been approved of by this House, and it is too late now for the hon. gentleman to say that this House will not legislate. The principle having been determined on by Parliament, it is for this Parliament to proceed with an examination of the details of the Bill, and to pass it through committee. I know that on the third reading of the Bill hon. gentlemen opposite will be within their right to move an amendment, and, especially, to move the six months' hoist again. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite are, in their speeches, greatly in favour of the rights of the minority, but, in practice, they vote that the minority in Manitoba should not be restored to their rights. Sir, we are interfering with the power of the local legislature, because we are given special jurisdiction to interfere. We cannot relieve the minority from the grievance of paying taxes to schools they conscientiously object to, and not to their own schools, unless we provide in this law that in future, the moment they are willing to organize and maintain separate schools, they will be entitled to pay their taxes for the support of these schools, and be exempted from paying taxes to the public schools. The privilege of not paying taxes to the public schools was their privilege before the Act of 1890 was passed, and we are now restoring that privilege to them under the provisions of this Bill. The larger power always contains the lesser power, and, if we are now given jurisdiction in this matter, surely, we must have all the necessary power to make that legislation effective, otherwise the jurisdiction would be of no use whatever. I hold that this jurisdiction must be exercised, and that we are duly exercising it in the proposition we have made to Parliament. Another question that has been referred to by my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), and as to which he has not given us his legal opinion, is: Shall this Bill be repealable after it is enacted into law ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By this Parliament.

Mr. OUIMET. Yes, by this Parliament. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Weldon) has expressed a doubt, at least, that the power of repealing such legislation existed in this Parliament, and he has stated that the opinion expressed by the Chief Justice of Canada on this point had not been endorsed by the Lord Chancellor presiding in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I do not find that in the judgment of the Privy Council. There is no expression of opinion about it at all there. The Lord Chancellor refers to the opinion of the Chief Justice in the following words :—

> The learned Chief Justice of the Supreme Court was much pressed by the consideration that there is an inherent right in a legislature to repeal its own legislative Acts and that "every presumption must be made in favour of the constitutional right of a legislative body to repeal the laws which it has itself enacted." He returns to this point more than once in the course of his judgment, and lays down as a maxim of constitutional construction that an inherent right to do so cannot be deemed to be withheld from a legislative body having its origin in a written constitution, unless the constitution in express words takes away the right, and he states it as his opinion that in construing the Manitoba Act, the court ought to proceed on this principle, and to hold the legislature of that province to have absolute powers over its own legislation, untrammelled by any appeal to federal authority, unless it could find some restriction of its rights in that respect in express terms in the Constitutional Act.

Then, Lord Herschell says :

> Their lordships are unable to concur in the view that there is any presumption which ought to influence the mind one way or the other.

He does not say that the law, as expounded by the Chief Justice of Canada, is not correct, but he says it has no influence in the present case. He says that the power of the legislature of Manitoba to repeal their own enactment may exist or may not exist He does not give his own opinion. He does not contradict the opinion of the chief justice. He says this has nothing to do with the case before the court, that they were not reviewing the judgment rendered by the Privy Council in the case of the City of Winnipeg and Barrett. On the contrary, he says, though not in positive words, that this judgment can stand, and the appeal which was then before him and his colleagues could not be entertained, because it was for a different remedy altogether. The appeal given to the minority by way of appeal was entirely different from the remedy that was given to them against an unconstitutional Act—against an Act that had no legal existence. I venture to say that what was held by the chief justice was the correct law, that is, that the power of enacting this law gives to this Parliament the power to repeal or amend the law which it has passed. Certainly it would be of no advantage to this House to go back to the Supreme Court—for what purpose ? To have the chief justice tell us that in his opinion this law may be repealed. He cannot have altered his opinion except on a contrary decision from the Privy Council ; and as the Privy Council has not even expressed an opinion on that point, the opinion of the chief justice remains intact—remains the law, so far as it goes. So that by going to the Supreme Court we could get no better opinion than the opinion expressed by the chief justice, which every one knows was shared in by the majority of his colleagues. Why should it be otherwise than in the special case mentioned by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who said that a railway corporation could change from the jurisdiction of a local legislature to that of this Parliament ? Has it ever been contended for a moment that such legislation which could be passed here could never be repealed or amended ? Certainly not ; and I do see why this legislation should be different in that respect from all other legislation passed by this Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I do not see for myself any reason in favour of the amendment moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe. I think the sooner we get to work on the details of the Bill the better ; and I am very sorry that I should have set such a bad example in speaking so long.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Obstruction.

Mr. OUIMET. Hon. gentlemen cannot blame me, because they have certainly lengthened my speech by their interruptions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have elucidated it.

Mr. CASEY. Before the hon. gentleman sits down, I would beg to trouble his indulgence with another question—a double question. I understood him to say, in the first place, that this Bill restores the privileges of the Manitoba Catholics.

Mr. OUIMET. If I may be allowed to interrupt the hon. gentleman, I think his double-barrelled question will take a pretty long time to answer ; and I will leave it to somebody else to answer it. Thanking the House for its indulgence, I beg to resume my seat.

Mr. HASLAM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in reference to the question before the House. It does not appear to me that this Manitoba school question ought to be a question for politics at all. So far as I am concerned, my vote would have been given for this Bill just as freely, if it had been proposed by the hon. leader of the Opposition, as it has been given for this Bill. I think it is a matter of justice and right that the grievance of the minority should be remedied. I have not heard any one in this House dissent from that opinion. While it appears to be the general feeling of the House, it does seem to me that there ought to be some better means of arriving at a conclusion in regard to it, than moving such amendments as that now under discussion. There have been two amendments to this measure moved, and I do not think that either of them have been in the right direction. The amendment under discussion at present, proposes to refer the question of the constitutionality of this Bill to the Supreme Court. From what I have heard of the legal opinions expressed in this House, it appears to me that they are of a very fine-drawn character. If the Bill, as it stands, were submitted to the court, and that court rendered a favourable decision, have we any guarantee that there would not be changes made in the Bill after it was returned to the House again, to render that opinion entirely worthless ? I do not think that, under the present circumstances, a legal opinion would be of any value whatever, from the simple fact that the whole tenor of the Bill might be changed by a comparatively trifling change in its complexion. For that reason, I feel it my duty to vote against the amendment. When the whole trend of opinion, with very few exceptions, is, that there is a grievance, and that that grievance ought to be remedied, I do think it is the duty of every member of this House to try to facilitate in every possible way our arriving at a conclusion as to the best means of granting to the minority of Manitoba the redress to which they are entitled, and which it is the duty of this House to grant. It does not appear to me that there is any other power that can grant a remedy, or that is willing to grant it. I think that we ought to go as far as we possibly can, and, if the matter has to be submitted to the court, we will have this advantage, that, in submitting an Act of Parliament, we are submitting something tangible, something definite, on which the court can pronounce an opinion, whereas, in submitting an incomplete Bill, the decision of the court would not have nearly the same value. I have no desire to say anything further at this late hour, except to express the hope that every member will do his duty in making this Bill as perfect as possible, and thus redress the grievance under which the people of Manitoba are suffering.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. LAURIER. At this late hour, I would suggest to the leader of the House that we might adjourn, on the understanding that we shall go into committee, whenever the Bill comes up again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand the proposition of the hon. leader of the Opposition to be that the House should now adjourn, with the understanding that, at the next sitting on this question, which will be, I suppose on Friday, all amendments will be disposed of and the House will go into committee on the Bill. If that is the suggestion of the hon. leader of the Opposition, I can only say that I think it is a very reasonable one, and that the Government are disposed to agree to it.

Mr. LAURIER. That is practically my understanding, that, whenever the Government take up this question, whether Friday or Tuesday, or any other day, all the amendments will be disposed of, and we shall go into committee.

Mr. WALLACE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.40 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 25th March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE LATE COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT BERLIN.

Mr. CASEY asked :

1. When did A. L. Bowman, late collector of customs at Berlin, resign or give up his office ?
2. When did the department take possession of the office ?
3. When did the late collector leave Berlin ?
4. Was Bowman a defaulter when he left office, and, if so, to what amount ?
5. Had the Government sufficient security for Bowman as collector ? If so, to what amount, and who were the bondsmen ?
6. Has the Government taken any steps, and what, to recover from said bondsmen, and how much has been recovered ?
7. Has the Government taken any steps to arrest or prosecute said Bowman ? If so, what steps, and with what result ?
8. Has any one been appointed collector in place of Bowman ? If so, who ?

Mr WOOD. 1. A. L. Bowman, late collector of customs at Berlin, did not resign or give up his office, but defaulted and fled the country. 2 and 3. As to the date the department took possession of the office and the date the late collector left Berlin, it is difficult to give exact particulars, as all official records are with the Toronto agent of the Department of Justice, but as nearly as can be learned it was early in July, 1895, that our officer went to Berlin, and the collector's disappearance was coincident with his arrival there. 4. Bowman was a defaulter, and judgment has been obtained against him for $6,708.42. 5 and 6. Bowman's sureties are Messrs. George Randall and Fennell, of Berlin, and the sum of $2.000, with costs, which was the total of their liability, has been recovered from them. 7. Criminal proceedings have been taken against Bowman. 8. Mr. Shaw, Surveyor of Customs, Kingston, has been appointed acting collector in place of Bowman.

FERGUS MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. STUBBS asked :

1. When was the contract for carrying the mails between Fergus post office and the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railways, last made ? To whom was it given, and what price do the Government pay to the contractor ?

2. Was the contract awarded after calling for tenders ; and if yea, who were the parties who tendered, and what were their tenders ?

3. If the contract was not awarded after calling for tenders, was the contract renewed ; and, if so, had the person in whose favour the contract was renewed, at any previous time, offered to perform the services in answer to an advertisement calling for tenders ? If yea, who then tendered, and what were the sums at which they offered to perform the work ?

4. Did one Couse, at any time, and when, tender for the said job ? If so, was his tender the lowest ?

5. Was the contract awarded to Couse ? Was it subsequently cancelled ; and, if so, when was it cancelled ?

6. How long has the present contractor had the contract for carrying of the mails ? Is the department aware that the contractor has sublet his contract, and at what price has the contract been sub-let ?

7. Is the department aware that the contract has been sub-let to one G. W. Murton, to whom $100 is paid for the service ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. There are two contracts for these services, the one for the connection with the Grand Trunk Railway station being made on the 1st April, 1893, and the other for the connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway station on the 1st January, 1895. J. C. Morrow is contractor for both services. The rates are, for the former, $125 per annum; for the latter, 16 cents per trip. 2. No. 3. The contracts were not renewed, but tenders were not invited. 4. No offer was received at the department from one Couse. 5. The contract was not awarded to Couse ; and therefore was not afterwards cancelled. 6. The present contracts have been in existence since the 1st April, 1893, and the 1st January, 1895, respectively. Mr. Morrow has had both contracts for a very long time, since at least 1881. The department is not aware that the contractor has sub-let his contract. 7. The department is not aware that the contractor has sub-let his contract.

Mr. WOOD.

COMPARATIVE EFFICIENCY—INFANTRY.

Mr. INNES (for Mr. Bain) asked :

1. Why is the return of comparative efficiency—Infantry, for 1895, not brought down ?

2. When will the return be brought down ?

3. Under what authority were the 34th, 35th and 36th Battalions inspected by their own commanding officers, in connection with the comparative efficiency competition for 1895, at their respective regimental camps ?

4. Will the corps which drilled at local headquarters be allowed to participate in the efficiency competition ?

5. What mode of marking was adopted by the commanding officers of the 34th, 35th and 36th Battalions at the examinations at their regimental camps ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. It is not customary to bring down such returns to Parliament. 2. The drill of rural corps during last summer was for 1894-95. If the returns are required they will be brought down when ordered by Parliament. 3. By authority of the officer commanding the militia at the time. 4. They will be shown in the comparative efficiency returns when published. 5. The officers who inspected the 34th and 36th Battalions made the usual comparative efficiency returns. No return was received from the officer who inspected the 35th Battalion.

GOVERNMENT RIFLE RANGES.

Mr. McSHANE asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to put the butts at Côte St. Luc and other places, in the city of Montreal and district, in proper repair and give more accommodation to the volunteers which can be obtained at very little cost ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is the intention of the Department of Militia to keep Government rifle ranges in proper repair. An amount has been placed in the Supplementary Estimates for this service, no money at present being available.

POSTAGE ON DROP LETTERS.

Mr. McSHANE asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to reduce the charge for drop letters to one cent postage ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the intention of the Government at present to reduce the charge for drop letters to one cent postage.

POSTMASTER AT SUDBURY, ONT.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (for Mr. Fraser) asked :

1. Has Stephen Fournier, postmaster of Sudbury, resigned his position at any time within the last two years ? If so, who was appointed in his place ?

2. Is the Government aware that Stephen Fournier was a Conservative candidate in the late election of members for the Ontario legislature?

4. Did the Government grant him permission to resign in order that he might run ?

5. Was he re-appointed after his defeat ?

6. Who is the present postmaster at Sudbury, and what is the date of his appointment and salary ?

7. Is the Government aware of the fact that the said Stephen Fournier is at the present time mayor of Sudbury, and was he granted permission to run for the position ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. The postmaster at Sudbury resigned 21st May, 1894. 2. Marie V. Fournier was appointed in his stead 26th October, 1894. 3. No. 4. No. 5. No ; he was reappointed on the death of his successor. 6. Stephen Fournier was reappointed on the death of Marie V. Fournier 1st August, 1895; salary, $1,200. 7. The Government is not aware that Stephen Fournier is at the present time the mayor of Sudbury.

WILLIAM H. HOWEY, OF SUDBURY.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (for Mr. Fraser) asked :

Is William Howey, of Sudbury, at the present time a sub-collector of customs at that place ? If not, who has been appointed in his place ? When was the appointment made ? Was Howey dismissed, or did he resign, and what are the reasons for the change ? Was the work in his office in arrears, and if so, how long ?

Mr. WOOD. 1. Mr. William H. Howey, of Sudbury, is at the present time sub-collector of customs at that place, but has tendered his resignation, and asked to be relieved from the work, as his professional duties leave him insufficient time to attend to customs matters. One of the officers from the port of Sault Ste. Marie, of which Sudbury is an outport, is at present at Sudbury helping with the work. 2. As to the work of the office being in arrears, it was found on the last inspection, 28th February, ultimo, that a large number of entries for free goods, entries outwards, and uncalled manifests, require to be passed through. The inspector reported that it would take a few days to bring these matters up to date.

BOUNTIES TO FISHERMEN.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (for Mr. Fraser) asked :

Have the bounties been paid the fishermen in Nova Scotia for the past year in all the counties ? If not, in what counties have payments not been made ? If any part remains unpaid, when will payments be made ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The fishing bounty for 1895 has been paid in all the counties of Nova Scotia.

CUSTOMS DUTIES, DISTRICT OF KOOTENAY.

Mr. MARA asked :

What amount has been collected in customs duties in the district of Kootenay, from 1st January to 31st December, 1895 ?

Mr. WOOD. The collections of customs duties in the Kootenay district are only shown separately from the 1st of August, 1895, on which date Nelson was created a port of entry. The customs duties collected in the district of Kootenay from 1st August to 31st December, 1895, were $84,744.04. Previous to 1st August, they were reported through New Westminster, which was the chief port.

MINING MACHINERY.

Mr. MARA asked :

What is the value of mining machinery admitted free of duty in each province since the last return laid before this House ?

Mr. WOOD. The total value of mining (and smelting) machinery admitted free of duty into each province since the last returns laid before this House, namely, the Trade and Navigation tables for the fiscal year, 1895, was : Into Ontario, $10,844 ; Quebec, $13,697 ; Nova Scotia, $6,544 ; New Brunswick, $730 ; Manitoba, $2,551 ; British Columbia, $8,755 ; total, $140,781. The customs classification of imports making no distinction between mining as distinct from smelting machinery, it is not possible to give the value of mining machinery alone.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask the Minister of Railways whether he will be able to let me have the papers with respect to the Goodwin contract on the St. Lawrence Canal. He promised them a day or two ago.

Mr. HAGGART. They are ready, and will be here to-morrow. I was looking over them.

MILITARY COLLEGE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I lay upon the Table papers supplementary to the papers already brought down, which were a report of the visitors to the Military College. The papers which I now lay on the Table comprise the report of Mr. Sandford Fleming, and, in connection with the report of the visitors to the Royal Military College, the answer of Major General Cameron.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice laid upon the Table some time ago, in answer to an inquiry, what at the time was thought to be the full report of the board of visitors to the college. It subsequently appeared that that was only a partial report: and I made inquiry, and the Minister promised to lay the rest of the report of the board of visitors upon the Table. I do not understand he has yet done so. I do not understand that the papers now laid on the Table by the hon. gentleman include the balance of that report of the visitors.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, it does. The papers I now bring down are the papers to which the hon. gentleman called the attention of the acting Minister of Militia in this House, as not being the complete report of the visitors. I have supplemented the papers which have been already brought down by the report of Mr. Sandford Fleming, and by the reply of Major General Cameron, which complete the whole series of papers which were asked for.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman give us the verbatim copy of the report of the visitors?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. In the report that was brought down there were two or three pages out.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot answer as to that.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

Mr. EDGAR moved:

That on the 21st day of May, 1894, the following resolution was unanimously adopted by this House, namely:—

That it appears on the 16th June, 1893, the following resolution was proposed by the First Minister, the Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone, and was unanimously adopted by the British House of Commons, namely: "Resolved, That this House has learnt with satisfaction that both Houses of the United States Congress have by resolution requested the President to invite, from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any government with which the United States have, or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences or disputes arising between the two governments, which cannot be adjusted by diplomatic agency, may be referred to arbitration and peaceably adjusted by such means; and this House, cordially sympathizing with the purpose in view, expresses the hope that Her Majesty's Government will lend their ready co-operation to the government of the United States upon the basis of the foregoing resolutions."

Therefore this House, believing it to be in the interests of Canada, that the present friendly relations between Great Britain and the United States should be cultivated and maintained, views with the highest satisfaction the disposition shown by both countries to promote the peaceful settlement by arbitration of any disputes or differences between them which cannot be adjusted by diplomatic agency.

That it is expedient that a copy of said resolution be transmitted to Her Majesty's Government for their information.

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General requesting that His Excellency will be pleased to so transmit said resolution.

Mr. MULOCK.

That such Address be presented to His Excellency by such members of this House as are of the Queen's Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOUR OF REFUGE IN LITTLE METIS BAY.

Mr. McSHANE moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, papers, documents, telegrams, &c., from steamship and shipowners and agents, marine underwriters, manufacturers, merchants and others, of the city of Montreal and elsewhere, in the hands of the Government, in reference to a harbour of refuge in Little Metis Bay.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy the time of the House very long with this motion. A petition from the merchants and other citizens of Montreal has been sent to me, asking me to bring this question before the attention of the House. The petition is as follows:—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable the Earl of Aberdeen, Governor General of the Dominion of Canada in Council.

The petition of the undersigned steamship and shipowners and agents, marine underwriters, manufacturers and merchants of the city of Montreal, humbly showeth:

That there is no good or safe harbour of refuge on the River St. Lawrence between Quebec and Gaspé, and that such a harbour is very badly needed and would prove of the greatest benefit to the navigation of the St. Lawrence.

That the necessity of such a harbour is well known to every one connected with the shipping trade, and was very markedly shown during the past summer when the SS. "Canadia," being disabled by striking a reef near Matane, required to be and was beached to save her from sinking in Little Metis Bay, by which the steamer and the cargo of great value were saved, and risk of loss of life and suffering to crew avoided.

That in view of the Fast Atlantic service now proposed, and for the protection of life, shipping and property, it is very desirable that a good and safe deep water harbour be provided in the Lower St. Lawrence, giving safe and speedy communication with the shore in all conditions of weather and affording at all times a place where passengers, mails and pilots can be landed quickly and safely, so avoiding the great dangers, delays and inconveniences now so frequent at Rimouski and Father Point.

That a natural harbour of refuge exists at Little Metis Bay, which is sheltered from all but east and north-east winds, and that in the opinion of your petitioners, the construction of a breakwater there would give complete protection to shipping in all weather, and constitute Little Metis Bay one of the best harbours in the river or gulf.

That this could be done at a very moderate cost by the extension of the reef known as Little Metis or Lighthouse Point, in the vicinity of which there is ample stone suitable for the purpose, much of which is on Government property. This harbour has many other natural advantages, amongst them being a level, sandy bottom on which to beach ships when necessary, also deep water, say to the depth of twenty-five feet close inshore, which could be easily increased to thirty or thirty-five feet and so give ample water for the largest vessels visiting the St. Lawrence, always to lie afloat. The Grand Metis Falls are distant only five miles, and from thence power could be given to light the harbour with electric light at a minimum of cost. It is also close to the Intercolonial Railway, and could be easily connected with same by a spur line.

The improvements recommended would certainly greatly increase trade on the Intercolonial Railway, the Government railway, and should Metis be ultimately chosen for the Fast Atlantic steamers, they would form most important feeders to that road and give it a paying business which is what it has so long required.

The time between Little Metis and Montreal is now about fifteen hours, but could be easily shortened to twelve by quicker trains.

For these and other reasons your petitioners earnestly pray Your Excellency in Council to order the construction of a harbour of refuge at Little Metis, and with that end in view to order that the necessary surveys may be proceeded with as early as possible.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

This petition is signed by H. & A. Allan, David Torrance & Co., Robt. Reford & Co., the Donaldson Line of steamers, the Hamburgh American Packet Co., Wm. Johnston & Co., Limited, Kingman, Brown & Co., Black Diamond Steamship Co., Henry Dobell & Co., Elder, Dempster & Co., and others. In fact, it is signed by all the steamship owners and agents and leading merchants of Montreal. When this question was brought before the attention of the people, it was very generally discussed in the press, and I shall take the liberty to read several expressions of opinion which appeared in the newspapers. The following is a letter written by Mr. John H. Ferguson :—

THE HARBOUR OF LITTLE METIS.

To the Editor of the "Star."

Sir,—A brief reference to the rescue of the SS. "Canadia" by the stranding of that valuable ship in Little Metis Bay, with a lesson taken from the circumstances bearing upon the advantages of the locality as a harbour of refuge, in an evening contempoarry in a recent issue, deserves amplification. For years the question of a safe retreat for vessels coming up the gulf, in distress, has been discussed and then forgotten. In the present instance, an event of importance brings up the matter, and provides the argument, with facts which are more eloquent than words. The case of the "Canadia" is as follows :—Off or near Matane, in hazy weather, the ship, with a valuable cargo, and over eighty passengers, struck a sunken rock, not in the chart, and disclosed so alarming a leak that the captain shortly after landed his passengers in the ship's boat, continuing his course, in the hope of discovering a sheltered spot into which he might lay his vessel, with the view of saving ship and cargo. Nothing in the chart indicated where such a place existed, and over twenty miles were run, with the ship sinking visibly and listing heavily to port, until at dark he signalled for assistance opposite Metis Light, to which the keeper, Mr. Martin, responded, rowing to the sinking vessel in a small skiff. The captain told him that the ship could not remain afloat for an hour longer, and threatened to capsize any moment, and, being told that by coming inside the reef, which extends easterly about half a mile, from the lighthouse, the vessel could be safely beached, he at once turned, and by the advice of the keeper, in a few minutes, laid her gently on a sandy bottom in a sheltered bay. Here part of her cargo was removed by lighters, and in thirty-six hours, at half tide, she—having the assistance of a steam pump—floated without further injury. It is worth while to note, moreover, that the large tug steamer "Lord Stanley" lay alongside, at low water, and that the lightening was accomplished without the slightest difficulty from swell.

What was saved to the owner and underwriters by this, I do not pretend to know, but that it saved the ship and cargo from total loss, is beyond dispute. Nor is this the only case on record. In 1876 the sailing ship "Churchill" collided with the SS. "Normantier," the "Churchill" being loaded with wheat, at the prices then ruling, a most valuable cargo. With the bows crushed, and head sails and spars gone, she came drifting in, and would have been dashed to pieces on the reefs, had not Capt. Jas. Sim, of this place, gone out to the rescue and piloted her into almost the same spot where the "Canadia" was beached. After undergoing some repairs, the "Churchill," too, was floated and towed back to Montreal.

In 1874, I think, the SS. "Viking," with a valuable cargo, struck, like the "Canadia," at Matane, and continued her course, afraid to approach shore, there being, at the time, a heavy sea running. Not being aware of the harbour within Metis Point, the ship, fast sinking, was driven onward, and sunk, in deep water, a few miles west, becoming a total loss. Had she been steered into the bay here, she, like the "Churchill" and "Canadia," would have been saved, and a heavy loss averted. These facts speak for themselves, and call for action on the part of the Government. In the words of the captain of the "Canadia," who had an excellent opportunity to take in the situation, and can speak with authority, only a breakwater, with half a mile of dredging, the latter of soft material, is necessary to provide a harbour in which any ship in distress can find safety, a harbour which, if entered on our chart, would be taken advantage of in all emergencies. As the matter now stands, there is not a safe harbour, into which a ship could be brought for relief, from Gaspé Cape upward ; and I have no doubt that those interested in our great shipping trade will, with the late event fresh in their memories, use their efforts with the Government to supply the artificial needful to what nature has provided, and so secure to the navigation of the St. Lawrence what it so much requires.

JOHN H. FERGUSON.

Little Metis.

Here is a report from the proceedings of that important body, the Chambre de Commerce of Montreal :

STEAMSHIP QUESTIONS

Discussed by the Chamber of Commerce on Saturday.

The Chambre de Commerce held a special meeting Saturday afternoon. H. Laporte presided. The committee appointed to prepare a reply to the Government on the matter of the proposed French steamship service to this port, presented an elaborate report, detailing possibilities for a fortnightly line trading with Anvers, ports in the north of France, and intermediate points. The report was adopted, and was ordered to be sent to the Government. The proposal to make Little Metis a port was then discussed. The opinions of various experts were heard, all extolling the advantages of Little Metis for shipping. It was decided to memorialize the Government, asking that a pier be built at Little Metis, and that this point be made a calling place for mail steamers. Capt. Clift, as an expert, reported that Little Metis might be made one of the finest harbours of the world.

The following article also bears on the question :—

LITTLE METIS HARBOUR VS. RIMOUSKI.

It is reported that the Government intends to spend $200,000 on the wharf at Rimouski, in addition to the $750,000 said to have already been spent on it, although it is difficult to explain what public benefit is to be derived therefrom. Of what utility has been the Rimouski wharf up to the present ? Although it is over half a mile long, no ocean steamer has been alongside of it, or ever will. Then what is the use of wasting $200,000 more on this useless wharf ? About thirty miles east of Rimouski, and twenty-two miles east of Father Point, however, is a safe harbour, known as Little Metis Bay (into which the SS. "Canadia" was taken and saved) which would answer the purpose of Rimouski as a shipping port far better ; and it is somewhat surprising that the member for Rimouski has never thought of Little Metis Bay, considering that it is so admirably adapted as a harbour of refuge for vessels on that part of the gulf coast, in singular contrast to the boulders and mud of Rimouski, which vessels take great care to avoid. The harbour of Little Metis is protected by a natural ledge of rock about a mile in length on the north side ; and, with a wharf or pier constructed on its eastern extremity, it would form every protection to steamers inside its safe and sandy bay. Besides, the mails could be landed at Little Metis and delivered in Montreal eight hours sooner than by having them landed at Rimouski. And as there is no harbour of any kind between Quebec and Gaspé, it is another reason why Little Metis should be made the much-needed port of call for the incoming mail steamers. By building a wharf at the end of Little Metis Point, which could be done at a comparatively small expense, a splendid harbour could be formed, and, as before stated, the English mails could be landed there and delivered in Montreal, quicker, by eight hours, than from Rimouski ; and, besides, incoming steamers could be sighted two hours sooner at Little Metis than at Father Point. This new project seems to meet the approvol of shipping men, and before another $200,000 is wasted on the extension of the Rimouski wharf, it is well worth consideration at the hands of the Government, as the interests of the people of the whole Dominion would be benefited thereby.

I shall now read a letter from Mr. Matthewson, one of our leading merchants in Montreal :

LITTLE METIS HARBOUR.

Advantages its improvement would offer to St. Lawrence Commerce.

To the Editor of the "Gazette" :

Sir,—The question has been raised, would the Government be justified in expending money to make Little Metis Bay a harbour of refuge, and in building a wharf at Little Metis Point, so that the English mails could be landed there, instead of at present, by lighter, at Rimouski ? The general public believe it would be justified in spending twice the amount that harbour of refuge and wharf would cost, for the following reasons :—There is not a harbour of refuge, on the St. Lawrence, between Gaspé and Quebec, and Little Metis Bay is a place where a harbour could be built at small cost, because over half of it is now built by nature. In Little Metis churchyard lie over one hundred bodies of shipwrecked sailors and immigrants, who might not be there if Little Metis Bay had been a harbour of refuge. The steamer "Viking" is lying at the bottom of the St. Lawrence, and she, too, might have had a chance to escape that fate if Little Metis Bay had been a harbour of refuge. During the past ten years, some splendid ships have been driven ashore at Grand Metis, and lost. The following vessels have been saved by being brought into Little Metis Bay :—"Princess Royal," "Churchill," and "Canada." The cargo of the barque "Laurel" was also saved in Little Metis Bay. The "Blanche Alind" would not be in Gaspé now, had Little Metis Bay been a harbour of refuge. Three weeks ago, she was anchored in Little Metis Bay, but had to put to sea, as it began to blow an east wind, and there is no protection from east wind there. She had the winter supplies for Matane on board, and was blown past her port, and now lies at Gaspé for the winter, and the Matane merchants have to do without the goods.

Now, as regards the wharf, it will have the following advantages :—The village of Little Metis has grown wonderfully during the past ten years, until it is one of the favourite watering places of the St. Lawrence. If the wharf was built, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company would have a first-class chance to send a boat there. The Gulf Ports Company would have the same opportunity, and hundreds of people who don't care for rail journey would be tempted to take the trip by boat. The English mails could be landed there and delivered at Montreal, in many instances, several hours earlier than at present, for there would be no time lost waiting for the tender, as sometimes happens at Rimouski. And all this could be accomplished by the expenditure of a less sum than the Rimouski wharf cost. The Government now possess the soundings of Little Metis Bay, and there is now wanting the enterprise and energy to get the wharf built and ready to receive the first mail by the fast Atlantic service. One point more in favour of the wharf. There are a number of the largest saw-mills in this province situated in the district of Grand Metis. If the wharf was built, the Government would get a revenue from these firms towards the interest on the capital invested, in wharfage dues.

W. B. MATHEWSON.

The committee of investigation on "the Little Metis Harbour," beg to report :

That at a meeting held on the 23rd December, the above question was set forth by Mr. W. B. Mathewson, of this city, and the committee have come to the following conclusion, to wit :—

That the situation of the Little Metis Bay offers great advantages for the building of a wharf where could be landed the mails and passengers brought by the incoming trans-Atlantic steamers, because that bay offers, as a shipping port, advantages far greater than the actual port of call at Rimouski. At the latter place, the steamers suffer considerable delays from the dangers of navigation, and the boulders and mud which they take good care to avoid, while at Little Metis, the extension of a wharf provided by nature, by an artificial one, would enable the larger vessels to come alongside of it and receive the mails and passengers without any other transhipment and without the service of the lighters being required.

That many a time ocean steamers after making a quick voyage, were delayed for twelve hours before they could communicate with Rimouski, owing to bad weather, while at Little Metis, steamships might come alongside the quay, in all weather, without the service of tenders.

That the line of 30 fathoms of water showing on the chart, the course of sea-going vessels, deflects materially north of Rimouski, driving them off from that latter place, while at Little Metis they need not follow the line of 30 fathoms, as water is deep enough within a short distance from the shore and as the entrance of the harbour offers no difficulty.

That the contemplated wharf at Little Metis would give, within a distance of 3,000 feet from the shore, a depth of water, at low tide, of 42 feet, while at Rimouski, supposing that the actual wharf should receive an extension of 5,000 feet, which is the projected length, the depth of water would be only 21 feet at low tide, which would prove insufficient for the steamers of the Fast Atlantic service or any other smaller vessel. That if Little Metis were selected as a port of call for the transhipment of mails and passengers, either for the inland sections of the country or for Europe, that would enable the railway to bring the mails and the passengers nearer their destination by six or seven hours, while saving them the dangers and inconveniences of the Rimouski harbour.

That Little Metis offers a safe harbour for ten months in the year, owing to the fact that ice does not pile up so as to interfere with steam navigation.

That in the opinion of the steamship and shipowners the selection of Little Metis as a calling port and a harbour of refuge, would be so highly valued by them, first, from the standpoint of saving in the expenditure subsequent to the first call, then from that of a harbour of refuge in that part of the river ; that it would tend to a large extent to do away with the prevailing prejudices against the St. Lawrence navigation.

That the construction of a wharf at Little Metis to the anticipated depth of water, would prove of incalculable benefit to the shipping of lumber in that part of the province, inasmuch as there are large saw-mills situated within a distance of five miles from the projected wharf at Little Metis, that is to say, as the Great Metis, while now lumber for exportation via Rimouski has to be shipped over 25 miles of rail, therefore, that would represent a considerable saving for the lumber trade.

On the above grounds, and in addition to the benefits which would accrue to the country and which are not mentioned in the present report, your committee think it their duty to suggest to your chamber, to strongly urge the Government not to go on with the extension of the wharf at Rimouski, and that the appropriations made for such extension be applied to the construction of a wharf at Little Metis, and of a connecting line with the Intercolonial Railway. Your committee insist upon the fact that the construction of a wharf which would meet the exigencies of navigation in that part of the river and of the connecting line with the Intercolonial, with all the buildings necessary to accommodate traffic, would cost according to the estimates made, less than the contemplated extension of the wharf at Rimouski ; and further, that such a work would be of incalculable benefit to the operation of the contemplated fast line, and to the shipping trade in general.

Chambre de Commerce,
Montreal, 23rd December, 1895.

Here is another communication which I have received on the same subject :

There is no harbour of refuge on St. Lawrence between Gaspé and Quebec, 400 miles of the most dangerous coast in America where many valuable steamships and sailing vessels are lost every year. Little Metis is half-way between Gaspé and Quebec and the best place for a harbour on the St. Lawrence. It is situated within six miles of the Intercolonial Railway. Navigation is open there three months longer than to Quebec, viz., six weeks earlier in the spring and six weeks later in the fall. You can, therefore, see the extra amount of trade that would be gained by a harbour at this place. With a breakwater of less than 3,000 feet the largest ocean steamers would find safe shelter. Vessels could load and unload their cargoes at this breakwater. The foreign mails could be landed here and delivered at Halifax and Montreal at least four hours sooner than from Rimouski as at present. The Government owns the reef from which this breakwater would be built and all the stone needed to build it, therefore it could be built very cheaply. The six miles of rail needed to connect the port with the Intercolonial would not cost $50,000. Should the Fast Atlantic service be an assured fact, passengers would save at least one day by taking the steamer at this point. The Intercolonial Railway would gain a large amount by hauling light freight and passengers from Point Lévis, 220 miles, and lastly, the steamship owners and merchants of Montreal demand it, therefore it should be built at once as there is lots of water to build a safe harbour.

I thought it my duty, Mr. Speaker, as representing the city of Montreal, to bring this matter up. I am not acquainted with the merits of the place, apart from what I have read in the letters and newspaper extracts which have been sent to me, and in the resolutions of the Harbour Board and the Chambre de Commerce. There are other gentlemen here who understand the question far better than I do, and who no doubt will have something to say upon it. I regret exceedingly that the hon. gentleman representing that portion of the country is not in his seat. When I brought the question up he was in his seat, and I think it was his duty to remain here. However, that is his own affair. I hope the Government will take this matter up, and deal with it in the interests of the city of Montreal and a large portion of the province of Quebec. For many years the city of Montreal has received very little of the public money that has been expended by this Government ; but I am very glad to find that I have brought the Government to their senses, because I see that they are about to propose a resolution granting $2,000,000 for the harbour of Montreal which they have hitherto refused year after year. I hope that at some future day we shall have a Government which will do the city of Montreal justice by giving it some share of the vast amount of money that is expended over the whole Dominion.

Mr. SCRIVER. As the seconder of this motion, I propose to say but very few words. My hon. friend to my left has treated the question so thoroughly and exhaustively that there remains, perhaps, but very little to be said. I have not had the same advantages that he has had of acquainting myself, personally, with the facts connected with this proposed harbour of refuge, and, therefore, I am not able to speak from personal knowledge on the subject. A friend of mine, however, who has given a good deal of attention to the subject, and has had rare opportunities for making a thorough study of it, has communicated some facts to me which, with the permission of the hon. gentleman, I will proceed to read. His communication embodies, very largely, the same facts which have been stated by my hon. friend from Montreal Centre, but there may be some information contained in them which has not been given to the House by the hon. mover of this resolution. My friend says :

> For the safe navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, it is necessary to have a harbour of refuge, as there is none between Gaspé and Quebec. Little Metis is the only place where such a harbour could be easily and safely made. It is situated midway between Gaspé and Quebec. It is 220 miles from Quebec by the Intercolonial, and 22 miles east of every other point by water, and has direct communication with the Atlantic Ocean. The Gulf of St. Lawrence is never frozen solid at this point, and steamships could be navigated to and from it at least two months longer in the year than Quebec, and most likely navigation could open six weeks earlier in the spring at that place and close six weeks later in the autumn. It is the extreme north-east point from the Intercolonial to the ocean by the gulf, and is distant six miles from the Intercolonial. The lead or reef which forms the northern boundary of Little Metis Bay protects small vessels from the north wind, and were a breakwater extended from this reef in a north-easterly direction, say 2,500 feet, we should have a safe harbour for sea-going vessels. The steamer "Canadia" was taken into this bay for safety. A large number of valuable vessels and steamers are wrecked on this coast every year, and if Little Metis Bay were made a harbour of refuge, there is no doubt many of them would be saved. Within 30 miles on each side of Little Metis, during the past fifteen years, 12 large ships and one ocean steamer have been lost. During the past year two large ships were driven on shore and lost. The past year two large ships were driven on shore and lost within six miles of this point, and were there a safe harbour at Little Metis into which vessels could go and where they could remain until a fair wind rose, these losses could be avoided. From a commercial standpoint, the value of Little Metis harbour cannot be overestimated. With three months more navigation via the Gulf, the trade of the St. Lawrence would be one-third probably more than it is at present. As the depth of water between Montreal and Quebec is not increasing and large steamers cannot load fully at Montreal, their cattle cargoes could be carried to this point and a large death rate saved in bad weather. And the By building large saw-mills at Metis, the Intercolonial could increase its earnings to a large extent as the mills could deliver their lumber in Halifax and Montreal at least four hours sooner than they can at present. The passenger traffic could be also greatly increased every year and 36 hours saved on each trip. The cost of construction of this harbour would be small and only six miles of easy grade railway would have to be built to connect it with the Intercolonial, and the firms of this district which have no market for their produce now would then have all the advantages they require. The saw-mill owners could ship their lumber over six miles of rail to this harbour and load ships alongside the breakwater instead of as at present having to load the ships from batteaux out in the open.

Mr. OUIMET. Petitions urging the necessity of constructing the harbour at Little Metis, have been received from Montreal Board of Trade, Montreal Chambre de Commerce, J. A. Mathewson & Co., Robert Reford, John Terrance, and many others. These petitions all point to the great advantages that would result from the building of a harbour of refuge at Little Metis. They say that not only could it be used as a harbour of refuge, but as a stopping place for the steamers employed in the service of the fast line. I must admit that the department is not in possession of sufficient information to decide as to the advisability of doing this work at present, which is estimated to cost at least half a million dollars. I have instructed my officers to have a survey made of the harbour, and a correct estimate of the cost of the works, and the whole matter will then be laid before Parliament. I may say that if what is stated in these divers petitions and letters is corroborated by the engineers of the department, there can be no doubt that this work on the south shore of the St. Lawrence would be of very great advantage, indeed, to the commerce shipping of the St. Lawrence at large. No time will be lost in getting all the information possible and laying it before the House.

Motion agreed to.

TRAFFIC OF THE PORT OF MONTREAL.

Mr. McSHANE moved for :

1. A copy of the proceedings of a conference held in the rooms of the Board of Trade in Montreal, in April, 1893, by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with representatives of the ocean shipping interests at the port who complained of the adverse effect of the tariff on the import traffic from the United Kingdom to Canada, upon which they depended for west-bound cargoes for their steamships.

2. Copies of any communications addressed to the Government or the departments by the steamship agents or shipping interests of Montreal on the injurious effect of the iron and other duties on the shipping trade of the St. Lawrence with the United Kingdom.

3. Copies of memorials or other communications made to the Government or to any member thereof, by the same persons and interests during the winter of 1892-93 and since, complaining of the excessive governmental dues and charges levied on ocean steamships, and on British traffic via the St. Lawrence route, when compared with similar charges at ports in the United States with which Montreal is in keen competition.

He said: This motion has been on the Order paper for a very long time, Mr. Speaker, and as I know that since it first appeared a great deal of business has accumulated for this House to deal with, and as I do not wish to retard the business of the country, I shall say only a very few words on this subject. It is not the first time that motions of a similar nature have been brought before this House. The falling off of trade coming to the port of Montreal through its canals and other channels is very great. We find that there has been a practical disappearance in recent years in Canada of the Canadian built craft in the traffic of the lakes, while the traffic of the United States has increased in volume, tonnage and size of craft. The season's receipts of grain and flour by water at Buffalo were 161,401,815 bushels, and in 1895, they were 162,930,620 bushels, whereas during the season of 1880 the quantity of grain delivered by water at Montreal, inclusive of what passed eastbound through the St. Lawrence Canals, amounted to 19,280,017 bushels. Ten years later, to wit in 1891, the deliveries had decreased to 10,987,893 bushels, and last season's deliveries showed a further decrease to 7,349,299 bushels, of which about 2,000,000 bushels was for city consumption, leaving only about 5,000,000 bushels as the quantity of competitive traffic which passed through the St. Lawrence Canals. I do not know how the Government can account for this reduction. Can they account for the failure of the St. Lawrence Canals which pass craft carrying 40,000 bushels, to divert traffic from the Buffalo route and Erie Canal which can only pass vessels carrying 8,000 bushels? We are told by every gentleman on the other side of the House who rises to his feet that our trade is increasing, that our shipping is busy, that prosperity abounds throughout the Dominion. But I have given facts that cannot be denied. We find that in the city of Montreal obstacles of every kind are put in the way of vessels coming into our port. The harbour dues are very exorbitant. I hope this Government, before they go out of power, will do all they can to increase the trade of Montreal and Quebec and thus confer a benefit upon the whole Dominion. The imposition of the tonnage tax known as the hospital dues has led to talk of a retaliatory tax being levied on Canadian tonnage trading with ports in the United States, which tax, if once imposed, will never cease to be levied while Canada levies her tax. A Bill is now before Congress repealing their standing offer of reciprocal freedom from taxation, thereby making their tax a permanent one. Now, Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that the feelings of the merchants of Montreal in reference to the commerce and shipping of their city are not at all favourable to this Government. Montreal has been neglected. No attention has been paid to her commerce or the complaints that are made by her merchants. We know that large sums of money have been expended by the Government on harbour works all over the Dominion. In Quebec they spent $5,000,000 on the Princess Louise Basin, and $1,000,000 on the Lévis Graving Dock, but they forgot about Montreal and never expended a dollar on the harbour there. The Montreal Harbour Board has had to bear the expense of maintenance and construction without any financial aid from the Government. Not only that, Sir, but in connection with the deepening of Lake St. Peter, this Government is nearly $1,000,000 in pocket through exactions in the shape of interest, charged to the Montreal harbour. They are subject to heavy exorbitant customs duties. We hear hon. gentlemen talk about establishing preferential trade with Great Britain. Why, Sir, the heavy duties imposed upon goods coming from the United Kingdom have almost closed down the great commerce in silks and other goods which used to bring such wealth to the ports of Montreal and Quebec. And not only that, but our merchants have been harassed and worried and watched as if they were thieves by the officers and agents of the present Government. If the Government only knew the feeling that exists growing out of such treatment, I am sure they would at once try to remedy it. At our board of trade our merchants complain day after day, and they have sent in many memorials and petitions signed by nearly everybody in business in Montreal. But what attention has been paid to these representations? None at all. They have asked also that arbitrators be appointed to value goods coming through the customs. The question was up in this House last year, and, while every gentleman on the Liberal side voted in favour of that proposal to put a fair and honest valuation upon the goods imported, what action did the Government take on the question? Every man of them voted against the merchants and against the welfare of the citizens of Montreal. Why, Sir, I have here the petition of the merchants of Montreal calling attention to the injustice done to the importer by the present system and asking for the appointment of a board of experts to value goods coming through the customs. Let me now read an article of the Montreal "Star" on this question:

A most influentially signed petition is going up from the business community of Montreal to > Parliament asking for the appointment of a board of customs experts. The different sections of the board of trade are most fully represented ; great care having been taken by Mr. Henry Miles, who had the affair in hand, to secure the signature of every interested man. This board of customs experts is needed to secure uniformity in the valuation of imported goods, so that the duty levied may at all times and places be the same for the same article. They have such a body in the United States where it does admirable work. The need for one here is well put by the first clause in the petition which reads as follows :—

> " That your petitioners suffer from want of uniformity in the application of the tariff and from the circumstances that there is no satisfactory recourse or remedy in matters of dispute as to classification for duty, value for duty, or in cases where customs officials inflict injustice upon importers by erroneous and arbitrary rulings."
> A board of five members is asked for here, who shall represent the principal branches of trade : (1) dry goods ; (2) hardware, oils, paints, &c. ; (3) drugs, chemicals, fancy goods, stationery and jewellery ; (4) groceries, provisions and fruits ; (5) leather and shoefindings. Appeal is to be had by both the Government and the importers to the Exchequer Court. Similar petitions are being sent up by the various other boards of trade of the Dominion ; and the Government can hardly fail to be impressed by so imposing a display of influential opinion. It is certainly desirable that the tariff should be uniformly applied ; that the Government should thus get the full amount of revenue to which it is entitled ; and that friction should be avoided between Government officials and the business men of the country. The cost of such a board is easily exaggerated ; and, if properly manned, it would be certain to pay for itself in many ways.

Now, Sir, let me read you another article from a trade journal in Montreal :

> Who has not had some grievance with the present system of customs administration ? There are many good friends of the Conservative Government who cannot " swallow " the Customs Department, who cannot applaud its efficiency, and many, too, who are ready to denounce the administration of that branch of the public service as thoroughly incompetent, overbearing, neglectful and unjust even.
> The current mismanagement in this department affords the strongest possible invitation for general attack and a change must take place or the Government itself will fall under a weight that it cannot carry. The governing of Canada can not be estimated as an easy task. It requires the best men of the country to conduct the ordinary business features of administration, and while we will not attempt to criticise the ability or efficiency in any of the other departments of the Government and while we might go so far as to admit the existence of every requirement in all other directions, we voice the feeling and conviction of the business men of the Dominion in saying that the Department of Customs is mismanaged and that incompetency is current from the head down.
> It is the most important of all the departments and its interests and care and in a great measure the commercial interests of the Dominion are practically sacrificed in hands unfit for the charge. It is the revenue producing or collecting department—to speak of it as one would of a business, it is the most important in the Dominion—are tinsmiths or tailors or men with the limited experience afforded by keeping small country stores fit or competent to have charge and direct the enormous magnitude of business falling to the lot of the executive officers of the Department of Customs ? The best business men in the Dominion should be found in these positions, and then, too, the interest is too grave and important to be dealt with by the ideas of one man. The system as well as the detail of administration is wrong, and no Government can thrive and stand bearing upon its back as it were the load involved in a mal-administered Customs Department. Rulings are issued—one at variance with another. No fixed principle is current in the issuance of decisions—one decision contradicts another. The expression " at sixes and sevens " cover the position within the walls of the department, and business men cannot get replies for weeks and months in hundreds of cases from the officers of the department.

Now, Sir, the administration of customs today is as it has been for many years part faulty, and imperfect, and wrong. The whole power is vested in one man ; the Controller. This is wrong under our political system, it is not fair or right to grant such power in dealing with technical questions as to values, qualities, strength and classification. No one man living is competent to deal as an expert with any and every business on the face of the earth. The law of years ago says we shall have a Board of Customs, and that Dominion appraisers shall be appointed to said board. Dominion appraisers were appointed, but ever since the law was passed (some ten or fifteen years ago) they have formally met twice. The Customs Department claim they meet daily. They do. The clerks of the department meet daily, very likely. Any man who ever tried to lay a question before the so-called Board of Customs, never obtained an answer from that body, but from some " two-penny half-penny " clerk in the department, or perhaps the Acting Commissioner. The whole working of the department is unsatisfactory to importers, due principally to the system, and to the gross ignorance and incompetence of many of the employees. They claim now to be calling together the Dominion appraisers more frequently ; but if they do, it is not what we want. The merchants of Canada want a board established of competent men, experts in the various lines. Nothing but thoroughly competent men will answer. Give them a judge, or eminent lawyer, as chairman, and the board must be made independent (as a court) of the Ministers, and political " pull," free from the direct control or veto power of the Controller, or Minister of Trade and Commerce. Otherwise, their decisions as of the present nominal board, can be undone or vetoed at sweet will. The appraisers in Montreal are competent and good men. The present nominal Board of Customs is nominal in every sense, for it receives no pay for the service. Different values and rates of duty upon numbers of articles, are different, and vary at different ports. There is an utter lack of uniformity. The Customs Department constitutes, and is the hardest feature and worst opponent of the honest merchants in Canada. A merchant can depend on nothing. The rulings vary. No fixed principle is adhered to in giving rulings by the department ; one ruling conflicts with another. In one case canary seed was ruled free as a stem seed, not manufactured, and as not edible. A few months later the same man ruled that it is dutiable, as it is edible and eaten freely by the niggers on the west coast of Africa. Now, Mr. Speaker, I could give you hundreds of letters from merchants and business men deeply interested in the welfare of this country, and articles of newspapers, to show the maladministration of the Customs Department by the present Government,. an administration which tends to ruin the business and destroy the trade and commerce of our country, and to crush down our honest merchants all over this Dominion. The Government have treated them, as I said a short time ago, as if they were thieves. I desire to speak on this occasion more especially for the city of Montreal, where I have had occasion to know how harshly some of our honest traders have been treated. I hope, Sir, in the interest of the business of Montreal, and the interest of the honest merchants everywhere, that the Government will speedily effect some reform in their administration of this department. As a representative of the city of Montreal ; and so far as I am able, while I hold a seat in this House, I will do my best to aid this Government, or any other Government who may rule the destinies of this Dominion, in making any serious effort to administer that department in a better way than it is now being done.

Mr. IVES. I could hardly have expected, from the notice on the paper, to have heard a specific attack made upon the Department of Customs and its administration. The first clause of the hon. gentleman's motion refers to the proceedings of a conference held in April, 1893, upon the adverse effect of the tariff on the import traffic from the United Kingdom to Canada ; the second clause asks for copies of any communications addressed to the Government by the steamship companies on the injurious effects of the iron and other duties on the shipping trade of the St. Lawrence, and the third and last paragraph of the motion asks for copies of memorials made to the Government during 1892-93, complaining of the excessive governmental duties and charges levied on ocean steamships and on British traffic via the St. Lawrence route. The papers will be brought down, but they will give no information for the purpose of an inquiry as to the administration of the Department of Customs, nor of the specific complaint which the hon. gentleman has made, with respect to this subject. I may say, however, to the hon. gentleman that I am very glad he has made that charge here, because I am aware he has frequently made it elsewhere, and it is better it should be heard on the floor of Parliament, in order that it may be met. With respect to the administration of the Department of Customs, the hon. gentleman must understand that it is absolutely impossible for any Minister, Controller, commissioner or assistant commissoner, or for any board, no matter how constituted, to always protect the interests of the revenue, and at the same time give absolute satisfaction to those who have interests at stake, and who naturally feel aggrieved if they do not get a decision exactly in accordance with their own views. It was proposed at one time that a Board of Customs should be organized, made up of merchants, and that they should form a body which would decide questions that arose between importers and the Government. The objection urged by the then Controller of Customs to the organization of such a board was, that those merchants must necessarily cease to be engaged in active business, so as to have no personal interest whatever in importations, or they would not be qualified to deal with questions that would be laid before them ; in other words, if merchants were taken they must be merchants who have ceased to have an interest in importations and in business. That is exactly what has been done. Recently a Board of Customs has been brought into active operation. That board is composed of members who possess absolute technical knowledge of all leading branches of trade that are connected with the importing business of this country. It is made up largely of the appraisers at the leading ports, with Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, St. John and other cities. The appraisers in the drug business, the hardware business, and in dry goods, all have seats upon this board, and these appraisers are men who have had long experience as importers themselves and as business men. We have complied as far as possible with the desire of those who petitioned for the organization of a Board of Customs. When the hon. gentleman says that the decisions are arbitrarily made by one man, the Controller of Customs, he says what is not the actual fact. There must be some one to decide these questions ; but, in actual practice to-day, the Board of Customs considers the technical questions, and the Controller only decides questions involving penalties or forfeiture. Any question of classification, any question as to what is the proper rate of duty, is now referred to this Board of Customs and is decided by the board. The matter does not necessarily end there. There is an appeal, under the Customs Act, from the Board of Customs to the Governor General in Council, and within the last two months there have been two actual appeals from decisions of the Board of Customs to the Governor General in Council, and these have been heard before the Governor General in Council and have been finally determined by the Government sitting as a court of last appeal in regard to the matter. So far as I have been able to give attention to this matter since I have occupied the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce, I do not see very well how the machinery can be improved from what it is at present. We have a board, siting frequently, sitting as often as there is an accumulation of questions to submit to them, which is competent, if any board is competent, to settle questions of classification and kindred questions. That board sits, and it is a fact that not more than 5 or 10 per cent of their rulings are found fault with or are appealed from, and those who find fault may appeal from these rulings to the Governor General in Council, as I have stated. The Controller (Mr. Wood) does not undertake, and does not in fact decide questions of this kind arbitrarily and without appeal. I am quite certain that the hon. gentleman is endeavouring to make the administration of the law equitable and just, and as little oppressive and arbitrary as it can possibly be made, and I should like the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane) to do the present Controller the justice to say that he is endeavouring, to the best of his ability, to meet the exigencies of the case and do justice in all matters that are brought before him. The law makes him the person to decide questions of seizure, he is bound by the law to do so ; but in that case there is an appeal to the Exchequer Court, his decision is not final, and at the present time there is, in my opinion, very little ground for an attack which is very popular—I will not say it is kept up for political effect—against the administration of the Department of Customs.

Mr. McSHANE :

> This year's council of the Board of Trade of Montreal seems to be much less subservient to the Government of the day at Ottawa than any council ever before elected by the board.

Mr. IVES. What are you reading from ?

Mr. McSHANE. I am reading from the Board of Trade—from the "Witness."

> Councils in the past have always been extremely considerate in regard to the Government, and have always been careful to promote and never to embarrass its policy on any question.

Mr. IVES. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I take it that he is reading an extract from the Montreal "Herald" in regard to the Board of Trade.

Mr. McSHANE. I have just stated that three-fourths of the merchants of the Board of Trade are against the arbitrary rulings which have prevailed for some time past, and, if the hon. gentleman will allow me to read, I will satisfy him that I am right.

Mr. IVES. Is it from the "Herald" ?

Mr. McSHANE. I do not desire to occupy the time of the House. I wish to say just now that there is a very strong feeling in Montreal. When the hon. gentleman says that very competent men have been appointed appraisers, I tell him that there are no appraisers in the city of Montreal. I had not a seat in this House last year, when Mr. D'Alton McCarthy——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McSHANE. When the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) brought forward a motion on a petition sent to him by the leading business men and merchants of the city of Montreal——

Mr. FOSTER. Order.

Mr. McSHANE. What is the order for now ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Proceed ; you are perfectly in order.

Mr. McSHANE. The two members for the city of Montreal at that time, I say joined in with the Government and voted against the motion of the member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and voted against the prayer of the petition signed by hundreds of merchants in that city. The House is well aware of that fact, and the record of it can be found in "Hansard." If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ives) imagines for one moment he can stand up in this House and condone the acts of the Customs Department for some years past, he is very much mistaken. The merchants of Montreal will not feel very much flattered by the remarks he has made. As I said before, there is a very bad feeling amongst our merchants on account of the manner in which the customs laws are administered, and I trust their grievances will be remedied. I have numbers of opinions on the matter here and I will quote some of them. The following is a copy of a letter from the Montreal Board of Trade sent to every member of the House of Commons last year :—

THE MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE.

Montreal, 25th May, 1895.

Sir,

By direction of the council of this board, I inclose printed copy of the Montreal section of a petition to the Governor General, the Senate and the House of Commons, praying for the establishment of a Board of Customs experts. The same petition has also been very generally signed in the leading business communities throughout the Dominion, and it has been arranged that each city and town shall procure the presentation of its section in Parliament through the senator and M.P. for the district, the original of the inclosed being entrusted by the council to Sir Donald Smith and to the Hon. A. W. Ogilvie.

The council trusts that the widespread support the petition has received will commend its prayer to your judgment, and that you will use your influence towards procuring the legislation for which it asks.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
GEO. HADRILL,
Secretary.

Petition from various cities and towns for the establishment of a Board of Customs experts, addressed to the Governor General in Council, to the Senate, and to the Commons.

THE MONTREAL PETITION.

To the Honourable the Senate of the Dominion of Canada, in Parliament assembled :

The petition of the undersigned merchants, importers and manufacturers of the city of Montreal, humbly showeth :

That your petitioners suffer from want of uniformity in the application of the tariff, and from the circumstance that there is no satisfactory recourse or remedy in matters of dispute as to classification for duty, value for duty, or in cases where customs officials inflict injustice upon importers by erroneous and arbitrary rulings.

That your petitioners believe that these grievances could be removed by the establishment by Parliament of a board of experts, with power to deal with all questions and disputes between collectors of customs and importers as to rates of duty or classification, and as to value for duty; also to act as a board of reference in matters of seizures to the end that the technical facts of a case may be established prior to publicity, and with a view to avoiding practical injustice through error or precipitate action of irresponsible employees in the customs service.

That your petitioners suggest with respect to the establishment of such a board of experts :

(a) That it shall consist of five members, being one for each of the principal branches of trade as follows :—(1) Dry Goods—(2) Hardware, Oils, Paints, &c.—(3) Drugs, Chemicals, Fancy Goods, Stationery and Jewellery—(4) Groceries, Provisions and Fruits—(5) Leather and Shoefindings.

(b) That appointments be made on the basis of competence for the office.

(c) That sufficient remuneration be given to secure men technically competent and with business experience, so that the board would enjoy the confidence of merchants.

(d) That the board be empowered to administer oaths and subpoena witnesses.

(e) That the board's decisions be published periodically and sent to collectors of customs and boards of trade throughout the Dominion, which would promote uniformity as to classification and value for duty ; and

(f) That both the Government and importers should have the right of appeal from the board's decision to the Exchequer Court.

That such a board of experts has for some years been in operation in the United States, where it appears to have well fulfilled its purpose of insuring to the Government the full customs revenue intended by the Customs Act, of securing uniformity in valuation for duty, and of affording satisfaction to importers.

Wherefore your petitioners do pray your honourable House to enact legislation for the establishment of a Board of Customs experts as hereinbefore suggested, and so relieve them and importers generally from the serious disabilities now suffered by reason of lack of uniformity in the administration of the tariff.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

This is from the merchants of Montreal and it is in keeping with the tone of the feeling of the merchants in all parts of the Dominion. That letter is signed by James A. Cantlie, President ; John Torrence, First Vice-President ; John McKergow, Vice-President ; and Charles F. Smith, Treasurer of the Board of Trade. That letter, Sir, is signed by representatives of all the leading trades in the city of Montreal. This is signed by the Corn Exchange Association, and representatives of the following trades :—Dry goods, druggists, spices, grocers, sundries, cigars and tobacco, hatters and furriers, paints and oils, boots and shoes, fruits, &c., jewellery, leather, hardware and every branch of commerce in the city. This goes on to say :

> A few days ago a protected manufacturer of hardware was appointed by the Government to determine the "value for duty" on his own class of goods in a case of which he complained that an importer had paid too little duty, though it was on the invoice price of the goods, and the importer had to pay an additional value of 12 to 30 per cent. "Is not the tariff made for the manufacturer" ? The petition also complains that "customs officials inflict injustice upon importers by erroneous and arbitrary rulings," and also "of practical injustice through error or precipitate action on the part of irresponsible employees." The employees are unjust and arbitrary because the Customs Department is unjust and arbitrary, and the "irresponsibility" is owing to the fact that secret agents and detectives, as well as other employees, share the fines levied by the Government and are encouraged by the Government to treat importers as a suspicious class of criminals. It is the Government that acts irresponsibly, for there is an appeal to it ; but the appeal is worthless.

Mr. IVES. What are you reading from ?

Mr. McSHANE. From the Board of Trade.

An hon. MEMBER. From the Montreal "Herald," very likely.

Mr. IVES. I beg your pardon, that is not from the report of the Montreal Board of Trade.

Mr. McSHANE. If it is from the New York "Herald," I have not seen that paper for some time. You may be accustomed to read the New York "Herald," every Yankee is.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Do I understand him to say he is reading from a report of the Montreal Board of Trade ?

Mr. McSHANE. I have been reading from the Montreal Board of Trade—yes.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the hon. gentleman reading from now ?

Mr. McSHANE. Do you ask for the date of this ?

Mr. WALLACE. No. Is the statement that you are reading now from the report of the Montreal Board of Trade ?

Mr. McSHANE. I have read from the Montreal Board of Trade. I will send you this and you can see for yourself.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not the question. Is the statement the hon. gentleman was reading, when interrupted, the report of the Montreal Board of Trade ?

Mr. McSHANE. I am sorry you interrupted me.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must address the Chair. He is an old enough parliamentarian to know that.

Mr. McSHANE. I will, Mr. Speaker.

> The Government in its customs dealings with the trade interest of the country has forfeited and lost the confidence of the importers, the merchants, and even of the importing manufacturers. That is clear to every one, and is plainly manifested in this petition, which prays that the customs laws in regard to administration shall be so changed as to take the decision of disputed cases out of the hands of the Government altogether, and place it in the hands of boards of experts and the regular courts of the country

This one is from the Montreal "Witness" :

> For years the "Witness" has been agitating and urging this course, and now that protection has disgusted the people, even the manufacturers, as well as the importers and traders, are at last found revolting against the arbitrary and tyrannical despotism of the Government, and petitioning in favour of the establishment of boards of experts, with appeal to the courts. The petition asks for the establishment of a board of expert appraisers consisting of five members, with a knowledge of, and representing the chief departments of trade, dry goods, hardware, drugs, stationery and jewellery, groceries and fruits, leather, &c., to be appointed because of their competence, sufficiently remunerated, empowered to require sworn evidence, who shall decide all questions in dispute, their decisions to be published and made known to collectors, and the public generally. An appeal by either the Government or the importer to the Exchequer Court is also asked.
> This petition, which is a constitutional rebellion against the customs tyranny of the Government has already been supported by over forty boards of trade of the Dominion, in towns and cities from Vancouver to Halifax, whose petitions have already been presented. So far as we have heard, only one board of trade did not join, that of Ottawa, which is still too near the presence of the Government of the day to dare to do more than squeal, though it declares that "something" should be done, and is understood to be secretly in favour of the petition. As for the Board of Trade of Montreal, it, with the whole business interest of the city, seems to have unanimously and heartily taken up arms by signing the petition. The Montreal petition is headed by the president and officers of the Board of Trade, followed by all twelve of the members of the council, and these are backed up by the names of all or nearly all the most prominent members of the Corn Exchange ; by the dry goods department to the number of about thirty of the firms at the head of trade ; by hirty firms of wholesale druggists ; by sixty firms of retail druggists ; by forty-six wholesale and over fifty retail grocery firms ; by long lists of tobacco firms ; hatters and furriers ; paint and oil firms ; boot and shoe men ; fruit dealers, jewellers, leather merchants ; all the prinicipal hardware firms to the number of about sixty ; by the crockery and earthenware dealers, and the stationery and fancy goods houses to the number of about fifty, and others. This petition will probably be presented to Parliament to-day, and has already been preceded by those of some boards and will be followed up by those of other boards.

We all remember, Mr. Speaker, when this petition was presented. How was it treated ? What interest did this Government take in the welfare of the city of Montreal and of its great people, the merchants ? They did nothing, and to a man those people voted against the Government. Yet we are told that everything has been done by this Government for the welfare and prosperity of the city of Montreal, and that that city should support the Government. I know that there is to-day, and has been for a long time, a feeling amongst the business men of Montreal that only a few people in that city, the monopolists, have the ear of the Government—the men who in my election put up the money to defeat me. These are the men who are taken care of and fostered and cherished ; but the great mass of the business people are crushed, and they will endure it no longer. I came here, Mr. Speaker, with the promise that I would do my utmost to get these great embarrassments to our trade and commerce removed. I hope the Government will help me. Not only Montreal, but the whole Dominion is interested in this matter. These embarrassments must be removed if our people are to enjoy the happiness and prosperity to which they were entitled. This Government have not treated as they should the men who have helped to build up this great Dominion—great, not in population, but a people of energy, love of work, and a desire to do everything that is right. I wanted to bring this matter up before. I have frequently been asked to speak on this great question, which is one of vital interest to our merchants, our bankers and our business people generally. I know some cases, Mr. Speaker, in which unfortunate merchants have been treated very badly ; but it is useless for me to name them. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, last year, when that important petition was sent from forty boards of trade all over the Dominion, did this Government do anything for them ? No ; but deputations which come here to-day are promised everything. You find them lobbying in every hotel in Ottawa. The Government promise them everything. They say, "Oh, give us another chance, and we will mend our ways." But the people will not give them another chance. They quarrel among themselves. One day three or four men go out of the Government ; another day seven or eight go out ; and we have the Premier, one of the honestest of men, I believe, in this country, telling these men——

Mr. SPEAKER. I have been trying for some time to discover the connection between the hon. gentleman's remarks and the motion before the House.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep to the question. If hon. gentlemen opposite imagine for one moment that I am not going to stand here and speak in a cause which I think just and honest, because of any raillery or gibes or laughter, or holloaing "louder," they mistake their man. I may err sometimes in my parliamentary language ; but I do not wish to err in representing the people who have sent me here, or in doing my best to get removed from them the yoke under which they had been labouring for many years. In the remarks I have made, I have only said what is true, honest, just and right. These hon. gentlemen may laugh if they choose ; but the day is coming when the people will laugh at them. The people will tell them, "You have forfeited our confidence, you have betrayed the trust that we have reposed in you, and you need not ask us to return you to power." I have only stood up in the honest and faithful defence of the petitions that have come to me and of the interests of the city of Montreal. How has the city of Montreal been represented here ? I have not known a man from that city for many a day to stand up and open his mouth to protest against the way in which this Government has treated that great city. I wish to say this to the members of this House on both sides, that if a Liberal Government were in power here and were to mete out to the people of Monreal the same treatment that has been meted out to them by this Government, I would raise my voice against them, as I have done before in the city of Quebec.

Mr. WOOD. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I understood him to speak of petitions having been sent to him. I would like to ask him if, as a fact, any petitions have been sent to him since his election.

Mr. McSHANE. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. From the merchants of Montreal ?

Mr. McSHANE. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. Will you produce them ?

Mr. McSHANE. I do not see why I should produce them for the hon. gentleman. I can give him my word that there are plenty of them.

Mr. WOOD. I never heard of them. You never presented them to this House.

Mr. McSHANE. Have you ever heard of this petition of the board of trade ?

Mr. WOOD. The hon. gentleman is dealing in ancient history. We know all about that.

Mr. McSHANE. I desire to say that petitions after petitions have been sent to me of every nature and character to try to do what I could for everybody. If the hon. gentleman desires to read these petitions, I can show them to him.

Mr. WOOD. I would like to see them.

Mr. McSHANE. I think that I have proved to this House that our merchants have not been honestly and fairly dealt with, and, if I have touched a sore spot in the administration of the hon. gentleman, I regret it very much, but I had to do my duty—it is my duty, as a member of the House of Commons, to attack hon. gentlemen opposite, when I believe that they are wrong, and I certainly had no intention of saying anything to hurt the personal feelings of the hon. Controller of Customs.

Mr. WOOD. I had not the pleasure of listening to the first part of the hon. gentleman's speech, having been out of the House listening to one of those same Montreal merchants spoken of by the hon. gentleman, and one who did not seem to be at all displeased with the action of the Government. I may say that that merchant to whom I spoke, however, was not a manufacturer. I only rise for the purpose of referring to one portion of the remarks of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane), and that is, his allusion to the petitions that he has received from the merchants of Montreal. I only desire to say that, if he has received any petitions from them, complaining of the administration of the Department of Customs, since the date when he became member for Montreal Centre, he has not laid them on the Table of this House. I can only say this further, that no representations complaining of the Department of Customs has ever been made either to the department itself or this House, or through the public press of the country, since the hon. gentleman became a member of this House. I speak very positively, but at the same time subject to correction ; and, if there have been any representations of that kind, I shall be very glad to hear of them, and take note of them, and remedy any grievance that may exist. I submit that it was not at all necessary for the hon. gentleman to revive a discussion upon this subject, which was discussed thoroughly in this House during last session. It was then most thoroughly threshed out, and my predecessor, the late Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) took a very active part in the discussion, and, to my mind, and in the judgment of almost every member of this House who paid attention to the subject, justified, to a very great extent, if not completely, the establishment of the present Board of Customs, and showed conclusively, by the reports of the officers and men appointed for that purpose, that the working of the Customs Board in Canada was far superior to the working of the like board in the United States, owing entirely to the mode in which the boards are constructed in each country respectively. I have no desire to go back into that discussion and revive what ought not to have been brought up and submitted in the motion placed on the Order paper, because there is not one word in that motion which would indicate that anything pertaining to the administration of the Customs Department would be made the subject of discussion here. There never was a time, and there never will be a time in any country, when the administration of the Customs Department will not give rise to some displeasure and, possibly, unpopularity on the part of the department itself and the officials, because the work itself and the administration itself are matters as to which the public do not take very kindly; and, in order that the work itself should be performed satisfactorily, in justice to the department itself, and to the importers and others interested, it is only reasonable to suppose that, once in a while, friction may occur between the importers and manufacturers and the department. I believe—and I speak, knowing something of what I say, because I have had the advantage of visiting the city of Montreal twice within the last three months, and meeting many of the merchants and those who are brought in close touch with the administration of the Customs Department—I believe, what even the hon. gentleman himself must admit, that there is not much complaining in the city of Montreal with regard to the Customs Department or the working of that department.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think that the hon. Controller of Customs has added much to the debate. He tell us that, instead of listening to this important debate, concerning the management of his department, he was out interviewing an individual from Montreal. Now, this is just what the hon. member for Montreal Centre told us, that the Government were now very anxious and very willing to receive deputations and make promises. But the hon. Controller of Customs thinks that my hon. friend from Centre Montreal should not have said anything, because no complaint has been made during the time that he has been member for that division. The reason why he had to make these complaints was simply because his predecessors, the members for Montreal, had not taken up and brought to the knowledge of this House, these complaints. He has to go back to what occurred before his time, because his predecessors did not do their duty. But the point I want to come to particularly, is the hon. Controller's contention that there was no need to revive a discussion that took place last session, because that was satisfactorily concluded last year by the appointment of the present board of valuators, which, he says, has been shown to have worked better than a similar board in the United States. I say there is need to revive that discussion until the matter is satisfactorily settled. I contend that it was not satisfactorily settled last year. The Controller of Customs thinks it was settled to the satisfaction of nearly every member of the House. He must have made very few inquiries among the members of the House, if he thinks that. The objection to a board appointed within the Civil Service, within the Customs Department, is the same that it was last year. That is a board composed of civil servants subject to a Government which, in its turn is dominated by the combines; and the importers not only of Montreal but of all Canada feel that they cannot expect fair-play at the hands of such a board as that. They had reason to expect, and they will find as time goes on, that the decisions of this board will be, as far as possible, in the direction of enforcing the highest duty collectable under our protectionist tariff. In other words, they have reason to fear and to expect that the board will be managed in the interest of the combined manufacturers of Canada. We had illustrations last year of what was done before this board was organized, when the agent of a certain manufacturing concern was sent to the United States, to collect information as to prices.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member is hardly justified in discussing this subject on the motion now before the House.

Mr. CASEY. I am answering the remarks of the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood) which have introduced the subject into this debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I fail to see how that applies to the motion before us.

Mr. CASEY. I will try to show how it comes in, Mr. Speaker. We are discussing the petition of the Montreal Board of Trade——

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the question before the House is the effect upon the trade of the port of Montreal of the protective tariff.

Mr. CASEY. The resolution is for:

> A copy of the proceedings of a conference held in the rooms of the Board of Trade in Montreal, in April, 1893, by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with representatives of the ocean shipping interests at the port.

And so on.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, but I do not see that that makes the discussion in order.

Mr. CASEY. But the question arose in some of these conferences of the appointment of a valuating board, and thus was referred to by the hon. Controller of Customs.

Mr. WOOD. I only discussed it in referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane). I did not introduce it myself.

Mr. CASEY. This is a continuance of a discussion which has already been ruled in order. Sir, the appointment of a board of this kind is not such as to inspire confidence among the importers of Canada. The Controller of Customs stated that this board operated better than a similar board in the United States. I am not aware of any report upon the operations of this board; if there is one, I have not seen it. I think it would be a valuable thing to have a report of its operations and how they have affected importers generally. I think the thanks of the House and the country, and especially the thanks of the importers, are due to the hon. member for Montreal Centre for bringing this question before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the motion is adopted, let me say that I would not like to have it go as it is with the idea in the mind of the mover or of other members that everything asked can be brought down. For instance it calls for:

> A copy of the proceedings of a conference held in the rooms of the Board of Trade in Montreal, in April, 1893, by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with representatives of the ocean shipping interests at the port.

These are not documents which can be brought down. I am not sure that they are in existence. They were simply memoranda taken at the different interviews that took place between ourselves and the parties who were good enough to come and talk over these matters with us. So it will have to be understood that such papers as can be brought down will be brought down. With that understanding, I have no objection to the motion.

Mr. WALLACE. The statements quoted by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. McShane) from the press were misleading and, to my mind, quite untrue. In proof of that I may say that certain of these papers, while making most unjust and unfair charges against the Customs Department, made somewhat similar charges against myself, and I made two of these Montreal journals publish ample apologies for the statements they then made. The statements read by the hon. gentleman were not at all correct. Now, with reference to the position of the Montreal Board of Trade and the statement made that every board of trade had passed similar resolutions, that is entirely a misleading statement, for this reason—that every board of trade that took the trouble to investigate this matter reached a different conclusion. The Board of Trade of Ottawa took up the matter, and Mr. Ross, a prominent merchant of this city and a member of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, who is either president or vice-president, made an exhaustive examination of the proposals made in the petitions of the Montreal Board of Trade, and, as a result, the Ottawa Board of Trade refused to endorse the petition sent them by the Montreal Board. The same may be said of the Board of Trade of Toronto. The proposal made by the Montreal Board of Trade is that the system adopted in the United States shall be copied here, and that a board of experts shall be appointed one from each line of business, and that these men meeting together will make decisions. As was pointed out last year, and I think demonstrated to the satisfaction of the House, and the mercantile community, the system we have in Canada is much better than the system in vogue in the United States. I took the trouble to visit New York with Mr. McMichael, our chief Inspector of Customs, to examine the system there. On comparison of the two systems, it was recognized by experts in the United States that our system had many advantages over the system adopted there. One result of that system was that 25,000 to 30,000 undecided cases were before the board of experts a year ago when we were there investigating this matter. The system they have there is a cumbrous and expensive mode of dealing with this question, and it has raised up a brood of lawyers who are making large sums of money out of the importers and out of the government of the United States. They carry appeals from court to court at great expense, taking chances with the importers. In one case that came under my notice the United States had to refund several millions of dollars, that great sum being divided among the lawyers and the importers, the general public receiving no benefit. What are the comparative merits of the two systems? In the United States, out of a board of nine, six were originally engaged in the practice of law, one was a hotel-keeper, and one a journalist—so that eight out of nine were men who had no practical knowledge of the commodities they were engaged in investigating. They were more a judicial tribunal than a board of experts. In Canada, on the contrary, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) has said, we have a real board of experts. The hon. gentleman said they were members of the Civil Service. Would not the men appointed under the proposal of the Montreal Board of Trade be part of the Civil Service? Would they not have permanent appointment? But the men we have now as the board in Ottawa, are men chosen from the different ports, men who have had training in the various trades, and who are well qualified to judge. Among them we have two or three dry goods men, two or three hardware men, two or three druggists, and so on, through the list. Moreover, when occasion requires, and when the board is not called together, we have correspondence with all the experts, with all the appraisers in the various ports. If a question comes up that is difficult to decide, the opinions of the experts are obtained upon it; so that we, in Canada, have a wiser decision arrived at, and by men more capable of judging, than they have in the United States; and we have avoided that enormous expense which attends the formation of the board of experts in that country.

Mr. LAURIER. Although I am not a business man, and cannot afford to give an opinion upon this question, I am a witness of the very general complaints which I have heard in the city of Montreal against the present system. It is no news for me to hear the hon. gentleman who has had control of the Customs, say that there are no complaints in the city of Montreal. If he is of that opinion, I think he is greatly mistaken. The complaints amongst the merchants there are universal; and the ground of complaint which we hear every day, in the street, in offices, and everywhere, is that the present system, for some cause or other, leads to inequality of appraisements between the ports, that there is no uniformity in the system in the various ports. Merchants find this very annoying, because they find that in one port their rivals can pass entries at a lower figure than they can pass similar goods in some other ports. This is the great complaint, and it seems to be universal, and, consequently, we must conclude that there is some ground for it. It may be, that the remedy suggested by the late Minister of Customs, will meet the case. As to that, I will not offer an opinion; but I must say that, so far as I know, the opinion of business men is against it. The only argument which hon. gentlemen give against the suggestion which has been sent forward to the Government from the business men of Montreal, is, that the same system does not work satisfactorily in the United States. I can well understand that, if the law in the United States is administered by lawyers, by men who have never been in trade, it does not work well. But I can imagine that the framers of the system did not intend that it should be carried out by men who had been politicians, and who were appointed merely as a reward for political services, and without the necessary business qualifications. But, if that system were administered by business men, it seems to me it would furnish the results which were expected from it. I would hope, if such a system were adopted in this country, the boards would not be composed of lawyers or broken-down politicians, but that it should be composed of men who have been long in business, and who understand every branch of it. Now, with regard to the statements made by my hon. friend, that there is a portion of the papers here asked for, which cannot be brought down, that is to say, the minute of the conference which the department, or two of its clerks, had with the business men of Montreal and elsewhere, I take some exception to what he said. If I remember rightly, we had some promise, not very definite, I must say, but we had some promise, a session or two ago, that we might have some of those reports, perhaps not all. I was under the impression that the hope had been held out to us that we should have some of those reports, as the hope is held out to-day, that whatever could see the light, should see the light. But I understand that there are some reports which cannot see the light, and, perhaps, it is to the advantage of the department that they should remain there.

Mr. FOSTER. Better for you.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Finance has made a statement that, if I understood him correctly, I do not agree with. Of course, the Government, receiving confidential reports from its own officers, is not obliged to submit them to the House; they are for its own information; and, if such reports were submitted, the result would be that men would hesitate to state frankly what their impressions were. But I understood the Minister of Finance to refer to interviews that had taken place between himself and some other member of the Government, and certain importers in Montreal; and, if the hon. Minister lays down the proposition that he has to exercise his judgment with regard to those matters, and decide what it is prudent to submit to this House and what it is prudent, in his estimation, to withhold, then I say he is exercising a discretion that does not belong to him as a Minister. It is the right of the House, if such reports are in existence and in the possession of the Government, acting on behalf of the House, subordinate to it, and under its jurisdiction and control—it is the duty of the Government to submit such reports or information that the House chooses to order. If the Minister thinks there is anything that he does not want to bring down, it is his business to obtain the consent of the House to withhold that particular portion. But a Minister has not a right, if he has in his possession papers, interviews and suggestions made with regard to these matters, to withhold them. We are the parties ultimately entitled to decide what the public policy shall be with regard to such matters. We have a right to have before us all the information that is in the possession of the Government, and every suggestion that is made to the Government that is on record in any way, and in the possession of the Government. I think, that being so, the Minister, if he has such information in his possession, such interviews with boards of trade, or with representatives on their behalf, or with importers, it is the right of the House to receive those reports and that information.

Motion agreed to.

YAMASKA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BRUNEAU (Translation) moved for :

Copies of all documents, memorials, petitions and correspondence between the Government and the Board of Trade and corporation of the town of Sorel and other persons, in relation to the granting of a subsidy for renewing, repairing and rebuilding the railway bridge on the South Eastern Railway, across the River Yamaska, at the village of St. Michel de Yamaska ; copies of all documents, petitions and correspondence between the Government, the persons aforesaid, the Pacific Railway Company, the South Shore Railway Company and the United Counties Railway Company in relation to the application and use of the subsidy of $50,000 granted under the Act of 57-58 Vic., chap. 4, for the repairing and rebuilding of the said bridge.

Previous to placing that motion in your hands, Sir, I wish to state the grounds for the same. On the 4th of January last, I wrote to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, informing him of my intention to bring again this question before the House. This question has not the merit of novelty, for it has previously been brought to the attention of the Government and of the House. Coupled with my letter to the Minister was the following resolution passed by the city council of Sorel, on the 14th November, 1895. Here is the letter which I sent to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals :

Sorel, 4th January, 1896.

To the Hon. John Haggart, M.P.,
Minister of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa.

Hon. Sir,—Coupled with the present letter I forward you copy of a resolution passed by the council of the corporation of Sorel, on the 14th November ultimo, in connection with the South Eastern Railway, which has been closed to traffic from October, 1892, in consequence of the Yamaska bridge not having been rebuilt. I have the intention of calling again the attention of the House of Commons to the matter, during the next session.

Believe me, Sir, &c.,
A. A. BRUNEAU.

Now, I will read to the House the resolution passed by the city council of Sorel :

Corporation of the City of Sorel.

At a regular meeting of the city council of the corporation of Sorel, held in the city hall of the same place, on Thursday, 14th December, 1895, at 7.30 p.m.

In pursuance of the provisions of the Act of Incorporation, chap. 80 of the Quebec Statutes, 1889, 52 Victoria, and amendment thereof, at which meeting a majority and a quorum of said council were present, to wit :

Mr. Louis Morasse, chairman ; Messrs. C. O. Paradis, W. L. M. Désy, Bruno Leclerc, Alfred Guèvremont, Adélard Trempe, Olivier Lesieur, Edouard Ponbriant, Frs. Gendron, Pierre Guèvremont, Séraphin Guèvremont, alderman.

Moved by Alderman C. O. Paradis, seconded by Alderman W. L. M. Désy, and reolved,

That this council, in view of the action previously taken and of the promises secured as to the re-opening of the South Eastern Railway, cannot allow such a state of things to continue any longer to the prejudice of Sorel and of the other places located on the line of that important railway, and that, in consequence, the Federal Parliament and the provincial government be earnestly urged to take the necessary action in order that this road may be operated within the shortest possible time, so that the interested municipalities, whose financial status is seriously involved owing to the heavy expenditure already incurred in that connection may be relieved, and be not exposed to suffer such a serious wrong as would be entailed upon them by the fact of being deprived of that important factor from the standpoint of business accommodation and railway facilities.

A true copy of the minutes of the council.
J. G. CREBASSA.

Now, Sir, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the following facts :—In 1870, the city of Sorel voted the sum of $40,000 in favour of the construction of the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Railway. Later on, that road passed into the hands of the South-Eastern Railway Company, and all the rights and obligations of the ancient company were transferred to the latter company. The latter company became insolvent and trustees were appointed. Those trustees entered into arrangements with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for operating the line. In the spring of 1892, the bridge on the River Yamaska was carried away by the ice, and in the fall of the year, as early as the month of October, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company stopped all traffic between the city of Sorel and Drummondville. As early as the month of June, the Chamber of Commerce and the corporation of the city of Sorel, perceiving that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were putting off the rebuilding of the bridge, took the matter into consideration and entered into communication with the Government, with a view to securing in future their help and influence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in order to operate again the line between Sorel and Drummondville. On the 14th June, 1892, I wrote the following letter to the Premier of the day :—

14th June, 1892.

Hon. J. J. C. Abbott,
Prime Minister.

Hon. Sir,—Allow me to call your attention and that of the Government to the following facts, and to ask you on behalf of the Chamber of Commerce and of the corporation of Sorel, as also in the name of the county of Richelieu, which I represent in the House, to kindly use your influence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in order to induce them to rebuild their bridge on the Yamaska River.

About the year 1871, Sorel subscribed a sum of $40,000 in favour of the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Railway. That sum was mainly voted for the road to run between Sorel and Yamaska. Quite recently the town of Sorel paid out that sum which, including interests, represents the enormous sum of about $100,000. Later on, as you are no doubt aware, the South Eastern Railway Company took possession of the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Railway. It was agreed upon with the South Eastern Railway Company that every possible satisfaction should be given to the city of Sorel : that the trains on the South Eastern, and particularly between Sorel and Yamaska, should run regularly and without any interruption ; and the pledges then given, the contracts entered into between that company and the city of Sorel leave no room for doubt as to the intention of the interested parties.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is now in possession of the South Eastern Railroad. Last spring the bridge on the Yamaska River was carried away by the ice. A similar accident had already happened a few years previously, but now the Canadian Pacific Railway Company declines—on what ground, we are unable to say—to reconstruct that bridge, thus entailing incalculable damage upon the city of Sorel, the county and the district of Richelieu.

Should the company persistently decline to rebuild this bridge, they would themselves incur severe losses, and perpetrate a cruel wrong upon the city of Sorel, the county and district of Richelieu.

It seems to us that the state having so largely aided and subsidized, in the well-understood interest of the country, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, we should be allowed, in view of the facts which I have just recited, in view also of the considerable pecuniary sacrifices which we have imposed upon ourselves, in order to develop this part of the country, to humbly beseech the Government and you, as Prime Minister, if not to interpose, at least, to use your influence with the company and take some action in our behalf. Rest assured, Sir, that in so doing, you will be entitled to the gratitude of all the interested parties.

Of course, it was not the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that passed the contract with Sorel, but while assuming the control of the road, they also at the same time assumed the pledges and the responsibility, and we believe that those pledges and that responsibility could not now be infringed, without incalculable injury being entailed upon the interested parties.

I am not aware of the course which the corporation of Sorel, which has paid out the extraordinary sum of $100,000 in favour of this road, would follow in case the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should formally decline to act upon their just petition, but, in my humble opinion, it were better to hope for a speedy solution of the question, if the Government were willing to aid us in an effective way.

I therefore call the attention of the Government to that question of public rather than local interest, and I hope, in common with the interested parties, that it will be taken by the Cabinet into their most serious consideration in the common interest of all the interested parties.

I remain, Sir,
Your humble servant,
A. A. BRUNEAU.

At the same time, I wrote the following letter to the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Sorel, 14th June, 1892.

W. C. Van Horne, Esq.,
President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Dear Sir,—Permit me to call your attention in your quality of President of the Canadian Pacific Company in reference to the construction of the railway bridge on the River Yamaska, at Yamaska.

This bridge which was carried away by the ice last spring has not been built yet, and a certain rumour goes to say that the company hesitates to take steps for its construction. As the member of Parliament for Richelieu, I hope that you will permit me to say that this question of the construction of the bridge is, for Sorel, a most important one, especially for the trade and for the travellers, and that the true friends of the company would regret that the construction of the bridge would be abandoned.

About 1871, the city of Sorel has subscribed a sum of $40,000 to the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Railway, which sum was recently paid, and if we add the interest, the amount goes up nearly to a hundred thousand dollars. The city of Sorel has, at the time and since made a great sacrifice ; and afterwards when the South Eastern Railway Company took possession of the road, it was understood and agreed that trains would run regularly between Sorel and Yamaska ; for the said amount had been given specially for the road between Sorel and Yamaska.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has succeeded to the South Eastern Railway Company and we believe that if the company does not build that bridge it would be prejudicial both for the company and for the county and district of Richelieu and for all the parishes along the line.

I do not know what steps will take the council of the city of Sorel on the question. I only write to you in my personal name and as a member having in charge the interest of my electors and wishing before all the success of all the parties interested in this question.

Hoping that you will take in consideration the present letter and send me an answer to Ottawa, and let me know what the company intends to do on the subject, if there is not indiscretion, I will be very thankful.

I remain, Sir,
Yours truly,
A. A. BRUNEAU, M.P.

On the 16th of June, I received from the Prime Minister a letter which reads as follows :—

Privy Council Office,
Ottawa, 16th June, 1892.

A. A. Bruneau, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Your letter of the 14th instant has been received. I am not aware in what way the Government will exercise an influence over the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I will refer your letter to Minister of Railways.

Yours truly,
J. J. C. ABBOTT.

Later on, the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company sent me the following reply to my letter :—

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company,
Montreal, 25th June, 1892.

A. A. Bruneau, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—Absence has prevented an early reply to your letter of the 14th June.

In order that you may fully understand the matter, I wish first to say that this is not a Canadian Pacific matter, but one with which the trustees of the South Eastern Railroad have to deal.

The Canadian Pacific Railway is operating the South Eastern Railroad for the account and benefit of the trustees for the bondholders under an arrangement which may be terminated by either party at any time. The Canadian Pacific Railway is largely interested in the South Eastern Railroad as a bondholder, but it does not control the property. Under the existing temporary arrangements, whereby the Canadian Pacific Railway operates the South Eastern Railroad for the trustees, it simply accounts to the trustees for all of the earnings and charges against the trustees. All of the expenses and all the improvements or extraordinary renewals are made under the direction of the trustees.

I am one of the three trustees, another is Mr. Farwell, of the Eastern Townships Bank, and the third represents the Boston and Marine interest in the South Eastern.

The trustees have two difficulties to deal with in the matter of the Yamaska bridge. One is that they have no money in hand for the purpose. The South Eastern has not earned its working expenses, and, therefore, the trustees are largely in arrears. But this financial difficulty will probably be met in some way. The other difficulty is as to how the bridge can be built so that it will be reasonably sure to stand against the ice. The engineers are working at this problem now, but they have not yet been able to submit a satisfactory plan. I have no doubt that when the engineers find a way, the premanent bridge will be built.

Yours truly,
W. C. VAN HORNE.

On the 22nd of August, 1892, the hon. Minister of Railways sent the following reply to the letter which I had written to the hon. Prime Minister :—

Department of Railways and Canals,
Ottawa, 22nd August, 1892.

Sir,—With reference to your letter of the 14th June last, addressed to the Hon. Sir J. J. C. Abbott, and transferred to this department, on behalf of the Commercial Board, and the corporation of Sorel, and county of Richelieu, asking that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be induced to reconstruct the bridge on the River Yamaska, carried away by the ice last spring, I am instructed to say that the Minister does not see his way to interfere in the matter, as it does not appear that there is anything in the Railway Act which empowers him to compel a railway company to reconstruct a bridge.

Where a complaint is made of a railway bridge being unsafe for traffic to pass over it, instructions are given for an inspection to be made by an engineer in the employ of the department.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
T. TRUDEAU,
Acting Secretary.

Two days later, on the 24th August, 1892, in reply to the letter which I have just read, I sent the following letter to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals :—

Sorel, 24th August, 1892.

To the Hon. John Haggart, M.P.,
Minister of Railways and Canals.

Hon. Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of a letter from your department, bearing number 43361, dated 22nd instant, in which I am informed that there is nothing in the Railway Act which empowers the Government, at the request of the corporation and the Board of Commerce of Sorel to interfere in re the rebuilding of the bridge on the Yamaska River, by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Allow me to call your attention to the following article published in the paper "Le Monde" of Montreal, in its issue of the 8th instant, and to ask you whether the suggestion contained therein is agreeable to the Government. For my part, as member for the county of Richelieu and the city of Sorel, which is largely interested in the rebuilding of that bridge, and speaking also on behalf of the interested parties, I should like to see the Government adopting the scheme proposed by the "Monde," which only re-echoes the wishes of the parishes concerned in the line of the South Eastern, continuing to be operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Here is the article :—

"About the year 1870, the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Railway Company built the railway which now connects Sorel and Acton. Anticipating the profits which would accrue to it from that railroad, the city of Sorel had subscribed for the undertaking the sum of $40,000, which has been paid out to the last cent. The thriving parish of St. Guillaume subscribed a similar amount.

In addition to those $80,000, the road was generously subsidized by the local government.

The South Eastern Company, since that time, bought the road and connected it with their system at Sutton. That road has, meanwhile assumed a considerable importance, by reason of its connections with all the great railway lines in Canada and in the United States.

It connects directly Sorel and the whole district located on the line, with the United States. There is a considerable traffic carried on in hay, bark, and grain, &c.

Eight or ten years ago the wooden bridge built on the Yamaska River, at the village of St. Michel, was carried away by the spring flood. Upon that occasion, the city of Sorel again subscribed $12,000, we believe, in aid of the rebuilding of the bridge. A new wooden bridge was then rebuilt by the South Eastern Company. Two or three years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway Company took possession of the road, as rightful creditor of the South Eastern, and since that time operates the road, as a part of its railway system. It was a guarantee for the public that the service of the road would be done in a regular way. The company caused repairs to be made to the road, where most needed, and offices built at all the different stations. In short, the company has done its utmost to accommodate the public on that part of the road.

Last spring the breaking up of the ice again demolished everything, the piers, the woodwork, the platforms, the superstructure, in short, the whole bridge was demolished and carried away by the ice. And since the month of April the railway is without a bridge at Yamaska. We need hardly add that trade suffers considerably from this gap. It is reported that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company does not want to rebuild the bridge, unless the municipalities of the village and of the parish of Yamaska should contribute at least $38,000 to help in rebuilding it. Therefore, if that large amount were not subscribed, Sorel and St. Guillaume would be deprived of that railway accommodation for which they have drained themselves, in the hopes and with the promises that they would have regular railway accommodation.

The company alleges that as they do not own the road, they have no interest in spending a hundred thousand dollars on the Yamaska bridge. We do not know what are the arrangements entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the South Eastern Railway in connection with this road ; but we know perfectly well that the public suffer enormously from the present state of things. It is an urgent case which both Federal and provincial governments should deal with, without any delay. Because there is a dispute between the two companies the public is not bound to wait until the litigation be adjudged upon. And both governments, being trustees for the public, and in the interests of the public, ought rather to have the bridge rebuilt at the public expense. They will always find the means and the opportunity of getting repaid by the interested companies, if necessary. Admittedly, it is not fair for the city of Sorel to be forced again to contribute to a work which has already cost the city $40,000. It is now the turn of the Federal Government. They have done nothing so far for that railroad in that part of the country, and absolutely nothing for the South Eastern Railway. Now, why should they decline granting to that railroad the subsidy of $3,000 a mile which they so freely grant everywhere else ? We are safe in saying that with the federal subsidy, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would undertake without any delay the rebuilding of that bridge, without asking either Sorel or Yamaska a single cent. The federal exchequer overflows with money, and the Government are quite in position to render that service if they be willing to do so. We could refer to many precedents that warrant the granting of this subsidy. If it were found too expensive to subsidize the whole road, the Government might, without the credit of the Dominion being involved, grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the $38,000 which that company claims from the municipalities of the county of Yamaska. Let the Government make their own terms for that subsidy. They could, for instance, secure the right of way on that bridge for the trains of the Intercolonial, once it will have reached Montreal by the southern shore. We hope that both the Federal and local governments will do all in their power to satisfy the commercial interests of the city of Sorel and of the thriving district through which the South Eastern Railway runs, and that they will see their way to rebuild without any new charges being imposed upon those municipalities, the famous Yamaska bridge, the history of which we have just recited.

The suggestion offered by the " Monde " seems to us so well grounded, that we need offer no further remarks in support of it. I may add, however, that it should be given effect to right away. For, beyond any doubt, neither Sorel nor Yamaska can now, after all the expenditure which they have incurred, be called upon to make any more disbursements. A fair portion of the municipal liabilities of Sorel is represented by the capital and interests sunk twenty years ago in the Richelieu, Drummond and Arthabaska Railway. I repeat then that there is urgent need for the Government to take immediate action, should they come to the conclusion of accepting the suggestion offered by the " Monde," and I fail to see why it should not be accepted, in view of the facts and grounds alleged. It is a question involving the trade interests of the whole population, and more so those of Sorel. Should the Canadian Pacific Railway Company decline to rebuild the bridge on the River Yamaska, Sorel would find itself, next fall, completely isolated and without any means of communication. You are no doubt aware that the road between Montreal and Sorel is closed to traffic and not operated ; hence, in order to communicate with Montreal, the commercial metropolis, we will have to go and take the cars, either north or south-east, several leagues from Sorel. In view of the facts which I have related, the Government cannot but act upon our petition. With the sole public interest in view, I am confident that the Government will act upon the suggestion offered by the " Monde," a proposal which I willingly endorse.

Yours truly,

A. A. BRUNEAU.

While I busied myself communicating with the Government in connection with the subsidy asked for, meetings were held at Sorel, asking the Government for aid and relief. Resolutions were passed and forwarded to Ottawa, and delegations were also sent to the capital. As a matter of fact, from 1892 to 1894, while the question of the subsidy of $50,000 referred to in the present motion was pending, we sent delegation upon delegation to the Government. The Commercial Board of Sorel sent to Ottawa several resolutions, and the president of the board never failed, each year, to call the attention of the Government to the matter.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all petitions, letters, correspondence or documents of any kind asking the Government to place the steamer " Stanley " on the route between Cape Tormentine, N.B., and Cape Traverse or Summerside, P.E.I., during the present winter.—(Mr. Yeo.)

Copies of all petitions, letters or documents of any nature asking the Government to construct breakwaters at the entrance of the Summerside Harbour, county of Prince, P.E.I. ; also, all reports of engineers and others on said work.—(Mr. Yeo.)

Copies of all applications for fishing licenses at Clearville, West Elgin, Ont., for the season of 1896, and of all correspondence, memoranda and other documents in possession of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in regard to the same.—(Mr. Casey.)

Map showing the borings across the Straits of Northumberland, up to date, and all other documents connected therewith.—(Mr. Perry.)

Copy of mail contracts with the Canadian Pacific Railway from Winnipeg to Pilot Mound, and points west of same.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Statement giving full particulars of the expenditure of $5,000 on Port Stanley Harbour four years ago, including pay-lists, and detailed account of all payments in connection with such expenditure.—(Mr. Casey.)

Copies of all papers and correspondence between E. Adams, formerly inspector of boilers, &c., at Kingston, and now Chairman of Board of Steamboat Inspectors, and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, relative to any complaints by said Adams against T. Donnelly, Hull Inspector at Kingston, or relative to his discharge of the duties of that office.—(Mr. Borden.)

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 71) to provide for the amalgamation of the Bay of Quinté Railway and Navigation Company and the Kingston, Napanee and Western Railway Company, under the name of "The Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. Northrup.)

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company.—(Mr. Lachapelle.)

Bill (No. 82) respecting the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company. —Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 81) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Alberta Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Montreal and Province Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Fréchette.)

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should be glad if the Minister of Railways, who is present, would communicate with his colleagues and let the House know to-morrow, if possible, when we may expect the Supplementary Estimates for the year ending 30th June, 1896, to be brought down.

IRRIGATION IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I observe that a number of Bills relating to irrigation are before Parliament, several of which are intended to tie up the use of the water of streams in the North-west Territories in the interest of particular companies for a series of years. I have received many letters of complaint and also several newspapers, with articles marked, in which it is pointed out that serious detriment will result if the control of these waters is handed over to different companies. It seems to me that this is a matter of great consequence, that in fact it is one of the most important matters connected with the settlement of the North-west, and that the Government should have some policy in regard to it. I should like to know whether these Bills has attracted the attention of the Government and whether the Government have decided on any policy with respect to them, because to permit the waters of the North-west, the few rivers coming down from the Rocky Mountains, to be locked up in the hands of private companies for a term of years would be very injurious to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. HAGGART. I will draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the subject, and no doubt he will reply to the hon. gentleman to-morrow. My hon. friend has a policy on the subject, and I think he has introduced a Bill with respect to irrigation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Some Bills have expired and are being renewed.

Mr. HAGGART. One has expired and has been renewed.

LABOURERS ON PUBLIC WORKS.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 4) respecting the liability of Her Majesty and public companies for labour used in the construction of public works.—(Mr. McLennan.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. OUIMET. I suggest that the period allowed for the filing of claims be one month instead of three months. I do not think it would be very inconvenient to the labourers interested, whereas it would be a great advantage to the contractors. The section as at present drawn might have the effect of compelling a contractor to keep three months' wages in hand. I am informed by my department that the Bill would be much more workable if this change were made, and while it would prove of great advantage to contractors, it would help the department to expedite matters.

Mr. McLENNAN. When the Bill came before the Special Committee it was intended that two months should replace three months. Two months should be inserted, because men may commence work towards the end of the month and would not get paid until the 15th of the following month; in other words, they might be employed six weeks before they would know what was due to them or whether they were going to get paid at all. I think the Minister will see the necessity of having the time placed at two months.

Mr. OUIMET. Two months are certainly better than three months.

On section 6,

Mr. MASSON. I may mention that the words of the amendment added to this section are taken from the New York statute, of which the section as now amended is almost a copy. The first addition is that requiring particulars of the notice to be given. The second provides for notice being followed by action.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

DETECTIVE CORPORATIONS AND MERCANTILE AGENCIES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Sproule for secondond reading of Bill (No. 11) respecting detective corporations and mercantile agencies.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not think it would be very desirable for this House to adopt the principle of this Bill. Detective associations and mercantile agencies are matters that should be largely left to regulate themselves, and I do not see why we should take the responsibility of authorizing or endorsing them. Such legislation would serve no useful end. So far as mercantile agencies are concerned, it would be very difficult to put them in any legislative position that would make them any more or less reliable than they are now. Business men and others use them now according to their own discretion ; but the instant you recognize them by any legislative Act of this Parliament, you would rather aggravate any evils connected with them, if there be any. It seems to me that these associations are largely in the line of inquiries that business men make either in that way or in some other, and they should be left to be dealt with by the public entirely. If we were to attempt to regulate them, we would be to that extent giving them our sanction. Nor have we the information we require to enable us to pass such legislation as would be desirable, if we determined to legislate at all. If any representations had been made to us by the commercial community regarding these associations, we should first appoint a committee to gather the information necessary to enable us to legislate with a full knowledge of all the facts, and such information it cannot be said that we are now possessed of. The same argument may be applied to detective associations. Some people may think they are useful. My own opinion is that they are useful for the different purposes of the administration of justice, and should be controlled by the provinces or by the Dominion for secret purposes in connection with the administration of justice. Beyond that I do not think they are useful or desirable or particularly prejudicial, and I should be inclined to let the people go on utilizing them as they see fit. We have many more weighty subjects to consider, there are some on this Order paper, with which we could much better occupy our time than with this measure.

Mr. MASSON. No doubt the hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill deserved great credit for attempting in some way to regulate these two classes of persons largely employed by the commercial classes, and to whom the public attribute, rightly or wrongly, many acts of injustice, if not of direct wrong-doing. However, before entering into the details of this measure, it would be well to consider whether it is within our jurisdiction, and whether, if it be, its provisions are such as should meet with our approval. As to detective associations, the Bill virtually provides that any number of persons who associate themselves together and file a declaration with the Secretary of State should have the sanction of this Parliament as a society for the purpose of doing this particular business. If we are going to undertake the control of detective agencies, we should take greater control than that. It certainly gives a sanction to any body of men who can get together and sign a certificate or declaration and file it with the Secretary of State. I do not wish to be understood as saying that they become directly incorporated, but they secure a quasi incorporation and are recognized as a society for the purpose of carrying on a certain business, that of detectives. It further provides that these persons shall have certain powers. But first a certain form of oath is prescribed. If there is to be any limit put upon these people it should be made more definite. The provision is that they should take an oath that they will discharge the duty of a detective. Well, my experience as a lawyer has not enabled me to find out what the duties of a detective are. These people can make a declaration that they will perform the duty of a detective and they are left as much law unto themselves as they are now. I point this out, not by way of discussing the details of the Bill but to show what the Bill covers. Next arises a difficulty as to the powers granted these people. Having granted them incorporation, how can we define or limit their powers ? In giving them general powers, have we any authority to limit them without having them under our control as corporations ? I think it is very doubtful. The same thing is true with regard to the other clauses relating to mercantile agencies. It is a common thing in the commercial world for an outcry to be raised about commercial agencies and the evil they do. And it is said occasionally that some person is ruined by the reports of these agencies. That these reports furnished by commercial agencies are not in all cases reliable is well known, but that they are of advantage to the commercial world, generally, must be recognized because of the fact that nearly every person in the wholesale or manufacturing line makes use of the information they supply. That they are not perfect is certainly to be admitted. It is true that hardships arise and that occasionally a man is ruined in business, it may be through information furnished by some irresponsible agent acting from spite or ill-will or jealousy. But the question arises, can any legislation that we can possibly enact prevent that state of things existing ? Can we remove that great and, it may be, growing evil. I do not think that anything in this Act will succeed in doing it. I would like to hear from the promoter of the Bill how he expects these various provisions to work out before I give my support to these clauses with respect to commercial agencies. The general tenor of the Bill, if it is within the powers of this Parliament to control these institutions, I regard as good, but the details, I think, are in many cases defective. One provision is that detective agencies shall deposit a bond of $10,000. This would certainly be a guarantee of stability and it would be an asset that could be got at. I would like to hear the promoter of the Bill explain how it would work out before going into details.

Mr. SPROULE. As I gave some lengthened explanations——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has already spoken.

Mr. McCARTHY. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPROULE. As I gave a somewhat lengthy explanation when the Bill came up for consideration before, I do not propose to go over the general ground, but merely to refer to some objections that have been raised. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) said that these agencies should be left to regulate themselves. He might say the same with regard to every line of business and it would apply with equal propriety. If you allow people to do things according to their own will, they may injure the trade of the country, or they may injure individuals, unless there is a law to regulate them. As these agencies are now, there is no means of punishing them except under the common law of the country. It is said also, that people can use these agencies or not as they please. Mr. Speaker, I would remind the House that that is not the fact. If you are in business life your name appears in the book issued by the commercial agency without asking your consent. The reports may be to your detriment, or they may be to your benefit, but they very often contain wholly inaccurate information which may result in great detriment to you. The hon. gentleman suggested that in attempting to cure the evil we might only aggravate it. If you put these detective agencies under a bond of $10,000 as this Bill proposes and compel the parties responsible to take an oath that they will faithfully discharge their duties, it can hardly result in aggravating the evil. I have a letter here sent by one detective agency, the Grose detective agency, in Montreal, and I will read one clause of it to show that they regard this Bill as a very desirable one:

> I may state that I was much pleased to see that such a measure was about to be introduced. The reason is that there is hardly a month that I do not read or hear of some underhand blackmailing scheme that has been carried on by some irresponsible party who may be styling himself a private detective.

He goes on to say that it is very necessary that these agencies should be put under the restraint of law, because, from time to time, it has been brought to his notice that grievous evils have been perpetrated under the name of a private detective agency, and, where there is really no law to control that agency. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) says, if there was any demand for such a law, that we should have it. Now, I may tell him that there are many demands for it. Since I introduced this Bill a few years ago, I have had letters, I think I may safely say, between one and two hundred letters from merchants in different parts of the country, wholesale and retail, traders and other, who complain of the liberties which mercantile agencies take with them to-day, in using their name and establishing for them a credit, or giving them no credit at all, destroying their credit, destroying their reputation, destroying their business, and, as they claim, upon incorrect information. But, when I wrote back to those parties, asking them to allow me to use their names or their letters in this House, what was the result? In every single instance, and I have written, I may safely say, to dozens of them, they invariably say: No, it would be the ruin of me, if you did, because, as soon as it became known that I, as a business man, was attacking this agency, I would have no chance to maintain my credit in the country after that; in other words, if they knew that I was endeavouring to bring them under the restraint of law, they would destroy my business reputation and credit before the country. Is that not strong evidence that the people of the country, especially the business men, want such agencies brought under the control of law? But they are afraid, they are so tyrannized over by these agencies, that they are afraid to let their names be used in this House. I may say that I have dozens of letters in the same line, and in every instance where I wrote to the parties, asking them to allow me to use their names, they would not allow me to do so, for the reason I have given. Now, we see in different parts of the country failures that take place, where men are reputed to be worth a great deal of money, but their assets turn out to be, perhaps, not more than 5 or 10 cents on the dollar. When you come to inquire into that, what is the result? You find there is either some collusion between the agency and the individual, or the information given upon which the rating is based, is very incorrect and very unreliable. Now, I cite one instance that was brought to my notice soon after I introduced this Bill before. Away up in West Toronto, there was a concern that was rated by one of the mercantile agencies as perfectly good. I think it was by the Bradstreet agency. Several wholesale men were selling to that firm and sending their travellers around, and one traveller told me he sold to that firm upon the strength of the rating that he found in the agency's book, believing it to be perfectly good. Shortly afterwards, that firm broke down, and they found, upon inquiry, that it was virtually worth little or nothing at all. There were comparatively no assets to divide amongst the creditors, although it was reputed to be financially sound, and in good standing, and to have a reasonable amount of capital to carry on the business.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the name of the firm ?

Mr. SPROULE. I forget the name of the firm, but I think it was Hamilton. At any rate, inquiry was prosecuted further, and it was found that one of the members of that firm was the agent who was reporting to the Bradstreet Agency in giving that firm a rating, that it was really one of the stockholders of the firm who gave the information upon which it rating, normally high, was struck, a rating by which people who sold to that firm lost their money, because, I am told, they did not pay more than 5 or 10 cents on the dollar. I give that illustration of the evil these agencies work in a business community. Now, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) contends that this Bill does not control these agencies at all. Well, those members of the legal profession to whom I have shown it, and who have gone over it, tell me that it controls them fairly well. The Law Clerk, who drew this Bill, says that, in his opinion, it is a suitable Bill, and one that will control them fairly well. The hon. member for North Grey asked : Have we the right to pass such a law in this House ? I can only say that the legal authorities whom I have consulted, including the Law Clerk, say we have the right, and that it is within the province of this Parliament to pass such a law. Before having the Bill drawn, I had that question gone into fully so as to ascertain if we had the power to pass this law. The hon. member for North Grey says the declaration should be more definite. I admit it should be, and perhaps it is not definite enough, but that is only a matter of detail that we can regulate when the House goes into committee on the Bill, and when we are considering that clause which refers to the declaration. Mercantile agencies are of great value, says the hon. member, and, therefore, we should not interfere with them. Well, we admit that they are of great value, and we do not want to destroy their value to the country, but we want to bring them under some control, so as to make them more valuable, and to give more correct information to the country. Now, the hon. member for North Grey says that he would like to hear from the promoter of this Bill, how he expects it will be instrumental in accomplishing this object. I may give him one way. The Bill provides that a schedule must be left with every business man in the country once a year, for him to fill up, giving his financial standing and a statement of his business, his worth, according to his own estimate, with the lines of business in which he is engaged, the amount of money that he believes himself to be worth, and information on any other point that may be considered requisite in the interest of the business community. Now, at the present time, these agencies are giving no such information as that. I am told very lately that they do apply to business men for this information, but it must be only lately, because I know that a few years ago they did not apply. But we want to make it compulsory upon them to lay such a schedule at least once a year before every business man, and then he has an opportunity of which I am sure he will avail himself of. Rather than allow incorrect information to be given that might be used to his detriment in the future. It is not compulsory on the business man to fill up this schedule, it is not compulsory on him to give the information, but, in the event of his refusing to do so, the mercantile agency is at liberty to accept the next best information it can get, and upon that basins strike a rating of the man they are dealing with. But I claim they have no right to give any man a financial standing without first giving him an opportunity to make a statement himself with regard to his business, with the ramifications of his business, the amount of capital he has in it, what he considers himself worth, and what line of business he is carrying on. I admit that he may overrate himself, but the commercial agencies may set whatever value they like for the individual's statement. They are not bound to accept his own rating, but they may get what other information they can, and then endeavour to strike a rating on that data. But I say that there is this advantage in that provision, that it gives the business man an opportunity of making a statement in regard to his own business ; and who is better able to make it than the man himself, who knows his own business and all its ramifications ? It is fair to do that, and unfair to do it without that information, because, I must say, that the information is usually very unreliable. The Bill compels these agents to go around once a year. I am told that they now go around once a year, and that in some places, they go around even four times a year. It may be so in the large cities and towns, but the custom must have changed during recent years, for, as one who reported for these agencies during twenty years, I know the original practice was to go around once in three years only. These agencies depend largely on reports made by people who may live five, ten, or fifteen miles distant from the individual in regard to whose standing they make a report, who know little or nothing about his business operations or financial standing, and yet these agencies depend upon such information to furnish data for his business rating. This is very unfair to business men. No one has a right to take another man's name and give a financial rating without that man's authority; but, if for the convenience of the commercial community and banking institutions, this practice is allowed, the agencies are in duty bound to obtain the very best information before they give a man a rating, which may be based upon incorrect information, and which may destroy his chances for a lifetime; or, on the other hand, mislead people into giving him credit. This Bill proposes to regulate these matters. There is a penalty clause; there is a clause which provides that these mercantile and detective agencies shall keep everything secret; that any money or other valuable article, or articles, in their possession must be handed over to the proper parties; they must renew their sureties once every five years; when a new member is brought into the agency, he must give security by having a bond filed by two responsible parties for the conduct of the business on the lines laid down by this Bill. There are clauses for letters patent of incorporation; there is a penalty for carrying on business without authorization; that no person shall carry on the business either of a detective agency or a mercantile agency, without being incorporated. When a company is incorporated, it comes under the control of the law, and there are certain restraints attached, and there is a remedy, if any injustice is done by these agencies. The Bill also gives power to examine the books from time to time, and there are penalties provided for false declarations. Perhaps this Bill, in the opinion of some hon. members, does not go far enough, but I ask its second reading, and, when the committee stage is reached, hon. members can endeavour to improve it, either by curtailing or extending the powers given, so as to make the measure as perfect as possible. I believe a Bill of this character is very much needed. I know there is great power brought to bear on this House, from certain quarters, to prevent a Bill of this kind being passed into law. Efforts have been made in the United States to bring such corporations under the influence of the law, but this has not yet been effected, owing to the influence possessed by these corporations. I need not mention the influence that is brought to bear, but I may say that these agencies every year set aside a portion of their earnings for the purpose of fighting Bills introduced for the objects of this one in the United States I believe in Canada, and they use this money in various ways. It is not for me to say in what ways; there are some ways I know of, but there are many other ways besides. Again, some men who otherwise would desire to support such a law, are intimidated, for merchants and financial men are afraid that their standing may be affected. In other instances, men are told that we are seeking to destroy an agency useful for business. This Bill is not for the purpose of destroying such agencies but for the purpose of placing them on a proper footing. I, therefore, ask that the Bill be read the second time, and that hon. members will endeavour to perfect it in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. IVES. Has the hon. gentleman received any petitions from the mercantile community in favour of the passage of this Bill, and, if so, from what body, from what boards of trade or other bodies?

Mr. SPROULE. I have received no petitions, but I have received a great many private letters, in which several of the persons state that they could get up very large petitions in favour of the Bill, but they dare not do so. This is owing to these agencies controlling the financial rating of individuals. I believe the Board of Trade of Montreal, two years ago, passed a resolution in favour of this Bill. The Board of Trade of Toronto have had it before them, but—I do not know whether it was the influence of Bradstreet Agency or not, I was told it was—the board passed a resolution against the Bill. That is my information, at all events. I have clippings from several papers, endorsing the Bill, the "Shareholder" among others, but I need not take up the time of the House by reading them. Except for the fact that these agencies have such perfect control over merchants, I could get extensively-signed petitions to present to the House in favour of the Bill.

Mr. COCKBURN. No doubt, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) would be able to get up petitions in favour of the Bill of sufficient length to extend from here down to the Langevin Block; but petitions of that kind are of no value whatever. I regret I was unaware that this Bill was to come up this evening, and I have not had time to devote to considering the relief which it seeks to give. There is no doubt of the good intention of the hon. memebr for Grey in introducing a Bill of this kind, but he has been led away by the woeful accounts given by men who consider that their prospects have been blasted. I must, however, at once come to the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that the Board of Trade of Toronto was so influenced by Bradstreet, or any other agency, as to decline to petition in favour of the Bill. The Board of Trade of Toronto is composed of men of such standing that they could not be influenced by any insinuation as to their personal character and standing made by Bradstreet or any other agency. I take it that mercantile agencies are as defined by my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) in this Bill:

> Establishments which make a business of collecting information relating to the credit, character, responsibility and reputation of merchants or others, for the purpose of furnishing the information to subscribers.

I think, Sir, that if I wish to purchase any information of this kind, I have a right to go to the source I consider best, and that this House has no right to control me in the matter. I find it stated in the Bill, that instead of the information given being left to the judgment of the principal officers of such institutions, it is to be devised somewhat after the following scheme :—

14. Schedules shall be prepared by or under the direction of the manager or principal officer of the mercantile agencies incorporated under the provisions of this Act, for the purpose of being filled up by or on behalf of the several persons, companies or corporations, whose property, profits and gains, and whose credit, character, responsibility and reputation, it is advisable to note or publish in the books of the agency. Such schedules shall include and state particulars of the names, sex, rank, profession, occupation or condition, to be required of the persons to be included in such books. The schedules shall among other information include returns of property in any lands, tenements or hereditaments in Canada ; and for and in respect of every annuity, pension or stipend payable by Her Majesty or out of the public revenue of Canada and for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, dividends and shares of annuities payable by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, companies or societies whether corporate or not corporate ; and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in Canada or elsewhere, or from any annuities, allowances or stipends, or from any profession, trade or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively exercised in Canada or elsewhere, such particulars, information and returns to be calculated to the night of a certain fixed day in every year, most suitable for the purposes of the agency ; and the managers or principal officers shall in the course of the week ending on the said fixed day leave or cause to be left one or more of the schedules upon the persons aforementioned.

This is a pretty deep Bill for a man to fill, and I fear very much that the result of it would be, that men of the highest standing would refuse to give such information. The information that a wholesale merchant wants, in selling goods to another, is not exactly the information required here.

Mr. SPROULE. I believe the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) is interested in a bank. If a man went to his bank to open an account, would not the bank require information about him ?

Mr. COCKBURN. The bank would require information similar to this, but it would deal with other considerations of a different character altogether. It would look to the character of the man, perhaps, and to the characters of members of his family.

Mr. SPROULE. Why should he not give the information to an agency if he would have to give it to a bank ?

Mr. COCKBURN. The bank gets its own information, and this information provided for here, is only subsidiary information. There are a thousand very important questions to be asked, which are not provided for here at all.

Mr. SPROULE. This does not hinder you giving any information you like.

Mr. COCKBURN. I do not say it does, but you are attempting to interfere in a business with which you have nothing to do, and with which this Parliament has nothing to do. You might as well regulate a bakery or a shoemaking establishment. The Government has no right to undertake this business at all.

Mr. SPROULE. What right has an agent to destroy your credit, reputation, or character ?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). You have an action against him.

Mr. COCKBURN. I deny that the agency has any right to do that, but I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), what right he had to make the insinuation that a corruption fund was provided by the commercial agencies to prevent the passing of this Bill ?

Mr. SPROULE. I will answer the hon. gentleman. When Dun. Wiman was under oath, at the trial that took place, he showed that $500,000—I give that sum from memory —out of the proceeds of these agencies was provided for the purpose of fighting such Bills as this. That is my information.

Mr. FOSTER. Have you any information that any of it came to this House ?

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say it came to this House. I was not speaking about this House.

Mr. COCKBURN. Our friend provides in this Bill for making inquiries once a year. Why, a mercantile agency gets its information every day, and amends and corrects its information accordingly. There are a thousand other considerations which are to be taken into account in addition to these mentioned in the Bill, and if the Government are going to license such institutions, the Government, ipso facto, assumes a responsibility in this matter which I do not think it is prepared to assume. If the Government puts its imprimatur upon certain institutions that pay a fee, it will say, in effect, that their information is valuable, and that the information provided by other concerns is not valuable. That is a serious matter. I prefer to put a matter like this on the basis of free trade, pure and simple.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKBURN. Yes, free trade as it is in England.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long will you stick to that excellent doctrine?

Mr. COCKBURN. As to these agencies controlling the financial standing of merchants, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), in his zeal, has overrated their powers. They do not control the financial standing of merchants. The financial standing of a man is gathered in a thousand ways, and it is not an uncommon thing to find the financial standing of a person better known in his neighbourhood, than he knows it himself. Then, again, I may mention that one of the wealthiest men in Canada, who died the other day, had not a dollar, almost, in the country. He was rated at $2,000,000 or more, but the assets which gave him that rating were elsewhere. It would be very hard to estimate the rating of the late Mr. Massey, from such information as is asked here.

Mr. SPROULE. He would have his rating in the United States, where he had property, as well as in Canada.

Mr. COCKBURN. Possibly, but if the agencies in the United States were not under the control you want to place them under, they would be very unreliable, according to your contention. It is impossible for us to control the agencies in the United States and Great Britain. Now, as to the blackmailing spoken of, I must say, I am thoroughly unacquainted with it. There may have been some blackmailing practised, but, so far as I know, it has never assumed such proportions that we should go out of our way in this House to enact a special law on the subject. I think that the character of the men engaged in this business is such that they feel the responsibilities placed upon them. If I am not mistaken, my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) was himself, at one time, the agent of a commercial agency, and I am sure there is no man in this House in whose word and honour I would place higher reliance than I would in the word and honour of the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). My friend was connected with a commercial agency, and I would take his rating as correct, to the best of his ability. He might be misled, but I have no doubt he would be unconsciously misled, just as a person might be who fills out this schedule and who will think that his real estate was worth a hundred thousand dollars, whereas, if it were sold three or four months afterwards it would not be worth $20,000. My friend, as the accredited agent of a respectable agency, would have rated such a man high, but he would have been mistaken. I mention that merely to illustrate how difficult it is to get at the standing of a commercial man. When we find a man of the high standing of our hon. friend, who has been the accredited agent of a commercial agency, wishing to put these men under a special law. I may say, that I believe that if he himself had been under such a law, his judgment would not be more accurate, nor his honesty greater. We are proud of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) as a citizen, and we trust that every agent of a commercial agency evinces in his conduct in life the same high principles which have characterized the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). I think, under the circumstances, that it would be better for us to let this Bill drop.

Mr. COATSWORTH. With regard to the first part of this Bill, that referring to detective associations, I have not had any experience with them, and cannot say much about them. I have had occasion, as a matter of business, sometimes to employ private detectives, and I must say that my experience with them has been fairly satisfactory. I have had a good deal to do in a business way with mercantile agencies for the last fifteen or twenty years, and I sympathize to some extent with the motives and the object of the hon. member who is promoting this Bill. I sympathize also to a great extent with the sentiments expressed by my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). I am sure that the one great object which commercial agencies themselves desire to attain is a perfectly accurate estimate of the standing of every merchant whose name is on their books. No doubt, as my hon. friend says, the information they get is not always as accurate as it might be, owing to various circumstances over which possibly they have not full control. The information given to them may not be complete; the commercial standing of a man may be exaggerated or it may be underrated. In my experience, the rule is rather to overestimate than to underestimate the standing of a merchant who is reported upon. This is a difficulty which I am sure the commercial agencies feel just as much as my hon. friend who is promoting this Bill; and they would be much obliged to any one who could devise a plan by which they could ascertain the exact standing of those upon whom they report. But it does appear to me that without further consideration we are not in a position to deal with the matter in the way proposed by the present Bill. The substance of the Bill is to be found in the 14th section, which my hon. friend from Centre Toronto has criticised; and I am inclined to agree to some extent with his criticism. This section provides that schedules shall be prepared by the mercantile agencies and sent to every person doing business, for the purpose of being filled up and sent back to the agency. In the first place, there is no obligation imposed upon any one to fill up these schedules; and we may be sure, from our experience and from the experience of the agencies themselves, that people will not fill them up, or at all events will not fill them up accurately. The next clause makes provision for the collection of these schedules by the agents, and for their supplementing them with the best information they can obtain. That practically leaves the agencies in the same position that they are in at present. It provides that even after the schedules have been filled up by the person seeking credit and have been reported to the commercial agency, it has still to go round and obtain information from other sources, and rate the person asking credit accordingly. That leaves the agencies with exactly the same system that they have at present. That is, speaking generally, the information will not be furnished by the person whom the agencies want to rate in their books. When we consider the enormous expense to which this Bill would put these agencies in preparing the schedules, sending them to all the business men in the country, collecting them afterwards, and then causing their agents to report upon them, I feel that there is no corresponding benefit derived to justify us in adopting it. I believe that not one-half or even one-fourth of the schedules would be returned filled up and in many cases they would be found inaccurately filled up. Many persons would expect to receive a rating to which they would not be entitled. I would be quite satisfied, as I am sure the commercial agencies would be themselves, to support any scheme that would enable them to get perfectly accurate information. That is what they themselves want to obtain. While it may be that some agents of the associations do not furnish accurate information, I am sure that it is not the general rule. I do not think, however, that this Bill improves matters. While it imposes on the associations extra expense and trouble, I do not think it would give us anything better than we have at present. While I agree with my hon. friend that we ought to help the associations to get accurate information, we do not need to force them to do so. I am sure that they would be better satisfied than any one else if any improvement could be devised. Suppose we put them in such a position that the information furnished to them would be so accurate as to be beyond question, what would be the result ? We would relieve them at once of liability to actions against them. We would relieve them at once of the anxiety they must continually feel with regard to the rating of persons concerning whom there may be any doubt. We would solve all their difficulties and perplexities, and put them in a position of freedom from worry which they have never yet enjoyed. With all deference to my hon. friend, who has given this matter a good deal of thought, and who knows something of the internal working of these agencies, I do not think he has struck at the foot of the difficulty yet. If we are going to put the imprimatur of this Parliament on the Bill, the commercial agencies will be able to go to the country and say : Here we are authorized by the Dominion Parliament ; and we are following out the scheme they have made law. That would give them a standing and character they have not now. We are well aware of the use to which these agencies are put. We are well aware that the only persons affected by them are the persons who are seeking credit. Now, mercantile agencies are not the only sources merchants have for the obtaining of information. In the first place, the travellers who go throughout the country selling goods report on the standing of every man to whom they make a sale and who desires credit. Then, the merchants obtain reports from the commercial agencies as a check upon the reports of their travellers. They therefore do not rely altogether on the reports of the commerical agencies ; and I am bound to say, from my experience, that these agencies endeavour to report as accurately as possible. In the course of my business, I have had to report upon the standing of persons who have been rated by these agencies, and have sometimes had to report adversely to the ratings of these agencies, but none the less do they endeavour to give the best possible information. Therefore, I feel the object of any legislation on our part ought to be, not to hamper them with restrictions, but to aid them in such a way as to enable them to get the most accurate information. No one will doubt that these associations have become almost a business necessity. There is no merchant doing a large business who does not rely more or less upon them, and who is not anxious to have them continued. Were it otherwise, they would not continue to subscribe to them. If they did not find the information these agencies give reasonably accurate, they would not continue to subscribe to them. I must say that while I sympathize with the object my hon. friend has in view, which, I believe, is to place these agencies in such a position that their information can be relied upon, not only in the interests of the merchant, but in the interests of the small dealers throughout the country, I fear that clauses 14 and 15 would impose on them a great many restrictions and conditions, and a great deal of expense to which they are not subject at present, and they would still have practically to give the same reports that they do now. I think that the hon. gentleman should let his Bill stand until next session, and see whether he cannot perfect his scheme in such a way as to make it complete and practicable. It seems to me to be very crude at present. The object he desires to gain is certainly a laudable one, but we must be careful to protect all interests, including those of the agencies, who are, to the best of their ability, carrying on a legitimate business, and endeavouring to supply accurate information.

Mr. SPROULE. The Bill could be perfected when we go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I should be glad to help to perfect it, but I do not see my way clear to arrive at any scheme which would attain the object the hon. gentleman desires. If we can get at any plan by which we can enable these agencies to give more accurate reports, then I should be very glad to give such a measure my support. But how are you going to devise such a plan ? If I understand the matter rightly, one of the first things these agencies do is to go to the man on whose standing they desire to report, and obtain from him a statement of his business, of his capital, his financial standing and everything pertaining to his business, and then check that by inquiries from outside sources ; and while in solitary instances they may be deceived, as a general rule they endeavour to arrive at what is right. And it is their interest to do so. If the hon. gentleman is in a position to show that the mercantile agencies are making capital for themselves by placing any man's rating on their books otherwise than it actually is, that would be something for us to legislate upon; but the great object they have to accomplish is to get the man's exact standing, and the nearer they can arrive at that, the more satisfactory will be their work to their subscribers. Now, after the consideration I have been able to give this Bill, I do not think it will accomplish its object. And I do now not see exactly how we are going to accomplish it. My hon. friend has pointed out instances where injustice has been done, but I must say, so far as my experience of Toronto goes, such instances are very few.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The hon. member for Centre Toronto considers that this House has no right to control such agencies. I presume that if this House has right to control other commercial enterprises, and some of the greatest we have, there can be no possible objection to its controlling such agencies as these.

Mr. MASSON. What enterprises do we control—banking?

Mr. MACDOWALL. Yes.

Mr. MASSON. That is specially provided for.

Mr. MACDOWALL. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) desires to specially provide for this too, and that is an answer to the question. I feel some sympathy for the motives of the hon. member for Grey in bringing forward this Bill. At the same time I cannot disguise from myself that the subject presents a great many difficulties. We know that, as a rule, when these companies give a statement of the standing of any commercial firm they apply to that firm for a statement and it very frequently happens that no statement is furnished them. In that case they try to make up a statement of their own, and possibly they may do injustice to many of the smaller traders. There may be also a temptation to belittle the small traders. It is not sufficient that the small traders' credit should be kept up with the banks, for they do not do business with the banks only, but very frequently with the wholesale houses. If they are far removed from the wholesale houses, the wholesale people naturally apply to the commercial agencies for information. I quite agree with the hon. member for East Grey that the information is very frequently inaccurate. And I think that any one who has had experience of these agencies must realize that that is the case. Those who have visited the large centres in the United States will probably know that the business men in such places regard the reports of Dun, Wiman, and Bradstreet in regard to the commercial standing of firms in those large cities as unreliable. If you desire to know the standing of any firms there you generally get far more reliable information from private sources than from the commercial agencies. Sir, the hon. member for East Grey rather astonished me by saying that a corruption fund had been furnished by the commercial agenies to oppose any such Bills as this. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he has received petitions or letters from the mercantile agencies in opposition to this Bill?

Mr. SPROULE. No.

Mr. MACDOWALL. That shows that the commercial agencies themselves do not seem to take much stock in the Bill. As regards the corruption fund, I am glad to say there does not appear to be any attempt to apply it in this House. I remember that last week the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made remarks which seemed to imply that the hon. members in this House were in the habit of eating dirt. I take the opportunity to congratulate the hon. leader of the Opposition and the phalanx back of him, excepting the noble seven who did not back him, on the fact that there is no sign, so far as this Bill is concerned, of members of the House having been corrupted in any way from this fund. I think perhaps if this Bill were remodelled it might be a good idea. It would be rather difficult to frame a statute that would absolutely control such associations as this, but I think there would be no harm in compelling them to register, and, perhaps, put up such bonds as the hon. mover has prescribed, and, at the same time, impose severe penalties on these commercial agencies for any wrong done by them to those upon whose business standing they report. The remarks of my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), I think, were very wise and very apposite. I quite agree with him that if we could devise a scheme to furnish accurate information to these companies, we should attain all that we desire, but I must confess that I think it quite beyond the power of this House to devise such a scheme. In the old country they have what they call commercial associations. Any one desiring to find out the standing of any person with whom he is about to do business applies to one of these commercial associations, pays a fee, and the association furnishes such information as it possesses or as it can obtain. But the person so obtaining the information takes it for what it is worth and no more. I appreciate, however, the distinction which the hon. member for East Grey makes between such commercial agencies as Dun, Wiman's and Bradstreet's and these commercial associations in the old country, because Dun, Wiman and Bradstreet's are supposed to have such a very high standing that anything they say is presumed to be accurate. That, I think, is the very great danger, and therefore I should be very glad, for my part, to assist the hon. member, so far as lies in my power, to improve the facilities for keeping control over these mercantile agencies. I do not think it would do any harm to have this Bill go into committee. It might not pass its third reading, but even so, a great deal of work can be done while the Bill is in committee, work which will be made very useful should this Bill come up in the first session of the next Parliament.

Mr. CAMPBELL. After the general expression of opinion on this Bill, I think it would be well for the hon. member who is promoting it to withdraw it. I quite agree with the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), that this is a matter we have no business with at all. The management and control of mercantile agencies is, in my opinion, beyond the proper authority of this House. These are purely business organizations. In this country there is so much credit given that the reports of the mercantile agency are an absolute necessity ; you cannot get along without them. Now, there are two principal companies in Canada, R. G. Dun & Co. and Bradstreet's, who furnish very valuable reports to their subscribers. They issue four books a year. Every three months a new book is issued, and for every new book there must necessarily be an investigation of the firms doing business, so that the necessary corrections may be given and all the best information that can be obtained up to date. Now, the value of these reports depends upon their accuracy. If they are not accurate they are no good, and people will not buy them. People do not subscribe for a thing which is no good, and the fact that these reports are subscribed for by nearly every business man in the Dominion is sufficient evidence that they are accurate and reliable. Of course, it is utterly impossible, in any case, to estimate exactly what a man is worth, but these estimates are made as near as possible, and I repeat that reports are as accurate as they well can be made. I think it is all nonsense to say that these agencies oppress men and give wrong and inaccurate reports. It is against their interest to do so. They have only one object, and that is to make their reports valuable to their subscribers, and that they can only do by giving accurate reports, as far as possible. The hon. member quoted a case in West Toronto, the name he gave, I think, being Hammond. I know of no such firm. I have no doubt, however, that in some cases these commercial agencies do give very erroneous reports of firms upon which they report. But are you going to provide against that by this Bill ? Not by any means. This Bill does not provide a remedy for such a case. If these schedules that are referred to are sent out, ninety-nine out of a hundred people would pay no attention to them, and would not fill them up, and so the commercial agency would have to do as they do now—get the best information they could. The question is one, in my opinion, that the House should not deal with. The Bill should be withdrawn, or, if it is pressed, it should be rejected.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. When speaking before in support of the Bill moved by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I gave expression to my opinions as to the requirements of such a Bill ; and on that occasion I also heard the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) give expressions to exactly the same views as he has expressd to-night.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not changed at all.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. I think some hon. members misconceive the idea of the promoter of this Bill. I think he has made it clear to this House that at least the principle of the Bill is a good one. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) and the hon. member for Kent, I can well understand, would speak kindly of associations such as these. We know that banks are largely indebted to organizations of this kind, and we know that wholesale dealers, such as the hon. member for Kent, rely very largely upon such reports. Hon. members have spoken to-night of two well known organizations in this country, Bradstreet's and R. G. Dun's. Now, these are not the only organizations doing business in this country. I presume there are at least a dozen doing business in Ontario, and with the exception of these two, I know of none who have reached such a standing that any credence should be given to their reports. I do not think it is right that any man, or any two or three men, to band together putting a few hundred dollars into a concern, and then launch out and pretend to have information upon the strength of which traders in the different villages and towns of the province would be safe in doing business. I think that some regulation should be adopted by this House, or the Government, in respect to these agencies. What that regulation should be, I do not purpose to inquire except to say that I think if this Bill got into committee, much useful information could be gathered and much valuable service rendered to the country. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) suggests that if a man is improperly reported, he can have recourse to the courts of law. That is quite true. For instance, one individual doing an injury of that kind to another, has a recourse against him ; but is it fair that the small country store-keeper should be put into antagonism in a court of law with a rich corporation such as Bradstreet's, in order to preserve its rights? I think some such regulations are required as are provided in this Bill. The hon. member for Kent says that possibly ninety-nine out of one hundred would refuse to fill us the blanks given them for this purpose. I think there is not much danger of that. Although some men might think it useless to do so, I think a majority of them would give fairly honest reports. But even if they did not, that would not be the fault of Bradstreet's, or of R. G. Dun & Co., or of the collecting agencies. That would at least be one protection in the interest of the subscribers to these associations, and in the interest of traders generally, whether subscribers or not. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) said, Are you going to prevent me from making inquiries where I like ? No, Mr. Speaker, there is no attempt of that kind in the Bill. The member for Centre Toronto can go to R. G. Dun & Co., or Bradstreet's, or to Tom Jones, or to any one else for information. He is not confined to the information furnished by one of these organizations, and he would be very foolish to confine himself to their reports, which are often unreliable. Now, it has been said that these organizations are useful because they are well patronized ; they have their patrons all over the country and the member for Kent says if they were not providing useful information, they would not be so well patronized. Well, Sir, no one knows better than the member for Kent that it would be a very foolish thing, quite outside the usefulness of the concern, not to subscribe to one of these agencies. The hon. member for Kent would not like to be black-listed by any one of these organizations.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not subscribed for many years.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. No hon. member would like to have one of those agencies down upon him. They can do great injury, as they did to Mr. Carsley of Montreal, and as they did to Mr. Todd, of whose case I spoke the other night—ruined the latter and would have ruined the other, only that he was so well off he could not be ruined by any such organization. But nevertheless, it cost him a great deal of time, labour and money to repel the slander.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are they not liable for any damages they cause ?

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. That is true, and I answered that suggestion when replying to the member for Richmond. The member for Richmond suggested that they could have recourse to a court of law ; but what good is a court of law to a man like Mr. Todd of whom I spoke the other night, who went to the Whitby Assizes, succeeded in getting a verdict, but the case was carried to the Court of Appeal, and it went off on a technicality in favour of the defendants. Then Mr. Todd, although strong in his right, though ruined beyond hope of redemption by the action of this organization, could go no further, as he had spent several hundred dollars in going that far, whereas Bradstreet could have gone on and carried the case to the Privy Council, without scarcely feeling the loss.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He is like any other gentleman who, having a claim, loses that claim by the inadvertency or negligence of his own solicitor.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Or a mistake of a judge, as in this case. It is not suggested that this Bill would be a complete remedy. We simply ask that such protection as can be reasonably thrown around business men, should be afforded them against injury from these organizations. Now, the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) asks what other organizations was treated as the member for East Grey wants to treat this organization. My answer is that every other organization is so treated. Insurance companies, banks, loan companies, joint stock companies of every kind and character are all brought under certain regulations for the safety of their patrons. I submit that no harm, at least, can be done by this Bill if it were allowed to reach the committee stage. Now, my chief argument in favour of the Bill would be in the interest, not of the men who patronize these organizations, but of those who do not, and who are subject to their action. There is not one small trader out of a hundred that can afford the $50 a year required from a subscriber.

Mr. McGREGOR. They do not require it.

Mr. McGILLIVRAY. Does the hon. member mean to say that a small business man in Chatham, for example, in the apple season, who, in the fall of the year, buys apples and sells them in Winnipeg, does not want to know the standing of the Winnipegger to whom he is selling ? It is of just as much interest in that particular sphere as in the case of the wholesale trader in Toronto. I submit that these reports should be made as accurate as possible. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has been asked, whether any petition had been sent in, and he answered in the negative. But there have been no petitions sent in against the Bill by those agencies, nor even by individuals. If that is the case, it indicates that these organizations are quite willing that we should perfect their machinery. I think the Bill should, at least, reach the committee stage, and be considered there, and, if we cannot perfect it to the satisfaction of the promoter, he will then have an opportunity to withdraw it ; but he certainly deserves the thanks of the House and the country for having brought the matter before Parliament.

Mr. McGREGOR. Twenty-five years ago, you and I, Mr. Speaker, heard the same references made in regard to these agencies, and these two firms, Dun, Wiman & Co., and Bradstreet, have gone on doing business, and the mercantile people of the country are now using their reports regularly. I have used them during many years. It is true, if you have to do with a great number of people outside your own district, and do not know them, you must make inquiries from others, and I am free to say that these agencies should take every precaution to ascertain correctly the standing of the business men. It would be impossible to run a business in some districts without these agency reports. No one will suffer so much as these two firms, if they fail to give proper information. Undoubtedly, great efforts are made by them to have every trader properly rated, and they have no interest, directly or indirectly, in giving anything except correct information. My opinion is, that these firms are doing good work, and are essential to the business people of this country. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray) has stated that a small firm, sending apples to Winnipeg, might require to use these agency reports, and yet might not be able to pay for them. But it must be remembered that such a firm sending apples or any other commodity to Manitoba, could call on the bankers, for they would make drafts on the party, and in that way they would be able to ascertain the standing of the firm, or the individual, in Winnipeg. These agencies are doing good work, and, if such were not the case, the subscribers would drop off, so that the firms would cease to carry on business.

Mr. FOSTER. With respect to this Bill, we have had two debates of some length upon it. I must confess, I have not looked into it very fully myself, but there are two or three points I should like to emphasize, and they are these: In the first place, I think, before this House undertakes important legislation like this—for it is important, as it is transferring mercantile and detective agencies, to a certain extent, to the keeping of the Government of the day, whatever it may be—it ought to be pretty well ascertained that there is a very real and widespread grievance, which requires a departure from the methods of business which have been in force in this country for the last twenty or thirty years. So far as I am concerned, I do not know that such grievance exists: I do not know that such a feeling exists among the business men of the country, who are chiefly interested, and who will be chiefly affected, and who are chiefly affected, and who patronize these agencies. This House is not aware of such a grievance. Petitions have not come up from mercantile bodies, or from individuals, to any extent, complaining of a grievance, and asking that legislation should take place in respect to that matter. I think we ought not to rush into legislation and assume these powers, and to that extent interfere with large mercantile agencies, which have their business established, and which are conducting that business in a satisfactory way, without there being certain ground for grievance and complaint, calling strongly for a remedy. In the second place, while a good deal may be said in regard to the principle of the Bill, in making mercantile and detective agencies as reliable as possible, so that, by having their organization perfected, they can be more easily and successfully reached by persons who have grievances, and who think they are entitled to damages, I feel confident that the Bill, as presented, involves a great many difficulties as regards its practical working. I wish to say to my hon. friend who has introduced the Bill, and secured a discussion upon it, that he probably will have done all he can do in the present session by having called the attention of the public to it. The attention of the public is not very much called for a Bill until it has been thoroughly discussed in the House. The discussion that has taken place to-day, and that which occurred last week, will call the attention of the country, to a large extent, to this matter, and it will do no harm, I think, to the principle which the hon. gentleman seeks to have given effect to in his proposed legislation, if he allows the Bill to go to the country and gives time for the people to think it over. It is impossible at this stage of the session to perfect this Bill in committee.

Mr. SPROULE. Affirm the principle, and I will withdraw it.

Mr. FOSTER. It is for the House to consider that point. It has been stated that there is no opposition to the Bill. There is opposition. I have received communications strongly against it, in which it was stated that, if such a Bill was going to be passed, if the Government was going to take the position indicated in the proposed measure, the Bill should be considered under conditions which would allow the business men and mercantile agencies to state their objections, and have them thoroughly weighed by a competent committee of Parliament. What I would urge, in the case of this Bill, if we are going to take it up seriously and contemplate legislation, would be to send it to committee and let those business men state their objections before the committee: and then let the committee decide with reference to the matter, and give its recommendation to the House.

Mr. SPROULE. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. FOSTER. But, during this session, my hon. friend will see there is not time for that. I think the hon. gentleman will have gained his object if he will allow this discussion to go to the country, and let opinion formulate about the Bill. If he will introduce it when he is here at another session, it could be sent to a committee like the Banking and Commerce Committee, where its principles could be discussed, and then the boards of trade who have communicated with me in reference to it, and the mercantile agenies could state their case before the committee. As we cannot accomplish that this year, my hon. friend would probably be wiser if he would, in consideration of the existing state of things, not proceed further with the Bill at the present time. I think there is an indisposition in the House to go further with this Bill at the present stage of the session.

Mr. BOYLE. I have been somewhat surprised to find so general an expression, from what might be called the leading men of the House against the principle of this Bill. As has been properly pointed out by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. McGillivray), who anticipated somewhat of my line of argument, every other institution and corporation, which perhaps have less to do with the general business affairs of this country than have these agencies, are brought under the control either of this House or of the provincial legislature. It may be that no fault can be found with the two great mercantile agencies which virtually control the commercial interests of this country and the United States. Their standing is so high, that for their own interest, I do not believe that Bradstreet or R. G. Dun & Co. would wilfully under-rate any business man. At the same time there are constantly cropping up mushroom concerns, so-called commercial agencies, which place the business men of the country in the position that they have either to contribute their support to them or feel, in a certain sense, that they will be blackmailed. It is no doubt to meet such institutions as these that this Bill is devised. I was somewhat surprised to hear from the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that no where has such legislation as this been adopted.

Mr. SPROULE. They have tried it many times, but have never succeeded yet. They have been defeated in many of the state legislatures, as the funds were too large against them.

Mr. BOYLE. Whether that is the case or not, it is somewhat surprising that concerns which virtually control the business interests of the country in which they exist, and which control the business interests of Canada from Halifax to Vancouver, have never been brought under the control of legislation. The member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) referred to the credibility of these agencies. That, no doubt, is a fact, in so far as it relates to Bradstreet and R. G. Dun & Co., but the same remarks will not hold with regard to other agencies which are being established. It is stated that sheets were furnished to the business people of the country by which they could give information to these mercantile agencies. I have had such sheets myself, and I have filled them out carefully, and I must say that proper treatment has been given them by the two great mercantile agencies, but these are filed in the office of the company, and if by any reverse of fortune a merchant happens to fail in business, these are brought out in judgment against him and it is often made to appear that he has been guilty of fraud in furnishing these reports, and misrepresenting his position. They appear rather as admissions against him than as evidence in his favour, and they often do more harm than good. I do not believe that the respectable agencies would at all object to legislation of this kind. I believe that their position would be strengthened and their standing would be elevated in the public mind if they were brought under the laws of this country. They would feel then that their reputation was at stake, and the public generally would place more confidence in them than they do at the present. The new and unreliable concerns whose only object is to make a little money for themselves would no doubt object to legislation of this kind. Whether this Bill becomes law or not, the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) deserves the thanks of this House and of the country for the persistence with which he has brought this matter to the attention of Parliament. It is not a popular subject to legislate upon. A man who speaks against these companies may feel that he will be placed under their ban, and the courage displayed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) is most commendable. The discussion which has taken place, if it has no other effect, will cause these organizations to see that the eyes of the country are upon them, and that they cannot with impunity tamper with the reputation and standing of business concerns, however insignificant they may be in their opinion.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is unquestionably a very important matter. I have listened attentively to the discussion, and in my humble opinion, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) should now consent to withdraw the Bill, with the prospect of taking it up next session, if there is any real demand throughout the country in favour of it. If there was any general request from the boards of trade or business organizations throughout the country for legislation in this direction, it might be well for the House to consider how far it would be prudent to enact such a law as this. I have, however, seen no general demand for this legislation. I dare say there are odd cases in which individuals have suffered by being wrongly reported by these agencies and possibly it may have affected their credit for the moment. Errors will occur in the best regulated concerns, but taking the commercial agencies all in all, I think they have endeavoured to give fairly accurate reports.

My impression, from what I know of them is that they generally try to keep their estimate of a man's financial standing rather below than above what it possibly might be. That is a good feature of the business. Of course, in some towns they may get agents who are imprudent and not careful enough in getting accurate information to make up their reports. These agencies are dependent upon the reports they receive from individuals whom they employ, and some times they unfortunately drop upon a man who is only too anxious to take advantage of the opportunity to make an inaccurate report about the financial standing of his neighbour. I dare say, that merchants who are called upon to report upon the financial standing of their competitors, might be liable to injure them. I have known cases of merchants being engaged as reporting agents for commercial agencies. In my opinion, it is not a prudent thing to engage one merchant in a town to report upon the financial standing of all the others. It gives him a wonderful power to do harm, if he happens to be an evil-disposed person, to those with whom he competes in business. I think, however, that the agencies have endeavoured to avoid that. At present, I know that, wherever there is a chartered bank, they try to secure the services of the manager, which is, unquestionably, a prudent course to take. They are certainly more careful than they were years ago, to get responsible, reliable, level-headed agents in the different towns. Everything considered, I think these agencies try to discharge the duties devolving upon them with care and accuracy ; and, when there is no general demand from the business people of Canada for legislation of this kind, I think we would, perhaps, be looked upon as legislating ahead of public sentiment, were we to put such a Bill upon the statute-book at the present time. I have not noticed that the board of trade, or similar organizations, have taken this matter up. You generally find that, when a grievance affecting business men exists, these bodies are very quick to move and make their complaints known, both in Parliament and in the public press. I have not seen anything of this kind in this case. These agencies have been of great advantage to business men generally. During my lifetime I have done a good deal of business based on their reports, which, taking them all in all, are fairly accurate. I admit that there are cases of men whose credit stands pretty high for some time, improperly ; but it is very hard for a commercial agency to find out such men's secrets, and to put a thoroughly reliable estimate upon their assets. I have known men to be reported worth $20,000 or $30,000, who, when they failed, to the surprise of everybody, could not pay dollar for dollar of their indebtedness. Such cases will be met with, and it is impossible for any commercial agency to get at all the secrets of a man's private affairs. But, on the whole, the agencies get pretty reliable information. Taking everything into consideration, the business world is greatly benefited by these associations ; and we should hesitate before we take any serious step to interfere with their operation. At all events, we should have a greater expression of public opinion in favour of a measure of this kind before we undertake to place it on the statute-book of the country.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. McCARTHY moved second reading of Bill (No. 14) to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to this Bill, I remember that my hon. friend put a question to the Minister of Justice, before he went away, at the time the Government were proposing to take some further days for Government measures, asking whether he would be prepared to take into consideration this and one or two other Bills that he mentioned, with the view of adopting such of their features as he considered good ; and I understood my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to say that he would be very glad to do that, and to suggest that, with that understanding, these Bills should stand. I feel very certain that the Minister of Justice will, as he stated, take this measure into consideration, and will, so far as can be agreed upon, initiate the legislation in connection with the Bill he has on the Order paper.

Mr. McCARTHY. He has no Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. He is to have a short Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not see why the Bill should not be read a second time, and, possibly, if the leader of the House thought well of it, it might be referred to a special committee. The principal clauses of the Bill are to interpret that section of the Elections Act which makes it an illegal and corrupt practice to pay the travelling expenses of electors going to the polls. It has been found that section 88 of the Elections Act, which makes it illegal and corrupt to hire :

> The hiring or promising to pay, or paying for any horse, team, carriage, cab or other vehicle by any candidate or by any person on his behalf, to convey any voter or voters to or from the poll, or to or from the neighbourhood thereof, at any election, or the payment by any candidate, or by any person on his behalf, of the travelling or other expenses of a voter in going to or from any election are unlawful acts.

In one case, in our courts, the judges differed as to the interpretation of this clause. They considered it doubtful whether it applies to railway companies, so that while everybody else is prohibited from hiring a team or paying the expense of a team, the railway companies have been permitted, under the division of opinion to which I have referred, to give free passes or tickets and to carry electors to and from the polls without violating this Act. Everybody, of course, will see that if common carriers are at liberty to do that, they are given a privilege and power which it is not at all desirable they should possess. What I propose is to make it plain that the railway companies have not the right to carry electors free of charge or at lower than ordinary rates to or from any election ; and the first four or five clauses of the Bill deal with this subject. Then the other main clauses are with reference to personation. There is no doubt that personation very largely prevails, and the difficulty is to prevent it. Personation is generally done by persons who are unknown ; and before they can be taken into custody or prosecuted by the ordinary machinery of the law, they are away from the place where the offence has been committed. The damage has been done, and if they are afterwards discovered it may not be worth any persons while to initiate a prosecution. Then again personation is sometimes done by outsiders. I have heard of cases where persons have been actually engaged outside of this Dominion to come in and personate, and have been paid for the vote which they manage, in that way, to formally record. They are gone the next day and cannot be prosecuted. These provisions are to enable the deputy returning officer to arrest and detain upon the spot, without warrant, any person committing the offence, whether his name be known or not, and in this way put an effectual stop to the commission of an offence which the law justly considers one of the most serious election offences that can be committed. These clauses are taken from the amendment that was made to the Ontario Election law just immediately preceding the last general election, with the general consent of both sides of the legislature, and backed up very largely by public opinion. I do not think, therefore, there can be any objection to the Bill, although I am not at all pretending to say that it may not be improved in committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to the second reading and to sending it afterwards to a Select Committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am perfectly in accord with the principle of the Bill, and have only one suggestion to make. I hope the special committee will draft a clause which will enable us to reach the officials of the Intercolonial, who are, in this respect, the greatest offenders in Canada. As the Bill now stands, it does not prohibit Intercolonial officers from carrying voters by the score, and those of us who live in the maritime provinces know that the Intercolonial organization is used for the purpose of carrying Conservative electors free from one end of the maritime provinces to the other. In fact, books of coupons are issued to heelers and distributed by them on election day to carry voters from one place to another. At the last election we secured evidence in one or two cases, to prove the offence, in the hope that some steps might be taken to prosecute the parties criminally, but the election petitions went off, on one ground or another, and we were unable to bring the evidence into court.

Mr. McMULLEN. I earnestly hope that whatever committee this Bill is referred to will try to give it careful consideration and let us have it crystallized into law this session. No doubt the hon. gentleman who has introduced it came to the conclusion that changes were necessary, from his extended experience in election courts, and I do think that there are some provisions in this Bill which unquestionably should become law. I do not say, for a moment, that all acts of personation or other improper acts are chargeable to the one side only ; but however we may differ on questions of politics, we ought to be willing to join hands in obtaining an honest election law, so that the expression of the people's will may not be frustrated by personation or other evasions of the law.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. DALY moved that the Bill be referred to a select committee composed of Messrs. McCarthy, Davies, Daly, Masson, White (Shelburne), Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper and Langelier.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have no objection at all to the reference to a select committee, but unless the Government will undertake to take charge of the Bill later on, I do not think that at this stage of the session it can be disposed of. There will only be to-morrow and possibly Wednesday evening of next week, and it could not take two stages on the one day, unless the Government will undertake to take charge of it or to give me the opportunity of moving it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the statement of the Minister of Justice will cover that.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 26th March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CHIGNECTO MARINE RAILWAY.

Mr. McINERNEY moved that Bill (No. 75) respecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company be placed upon the Orders for a second reading on Friday next. He said: In making this motion I wish to add a short statement of my reasons for so doing. A few weeks ago I introduced into this House a measure affecting the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, differing somewhat from the Bill which was refused a second reading a short time ago. The Bill I introduced, after examination was found to contain certain powers that could not be proposed in a Bill moved by a private member. My position in connection with the Bill at that time arose from the fact that the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell), who had the Bill in charge, was not in the House at the time, and in his absence he asked me to introduce it. It happens that the hon. member for Westmoreland, who was to make this motion, is absent to-day on very important business, and I have made this motion in his stead. Now, I wish further to state that I have no personal interest whatever in connection with this matter; that the constituency I represent does not lie near the enterprise in question; that I am not acquainted with any member of the company, nor have I any interest of any kind or nature in this transaction. The position I take in this matter is taken merely because I think this project is in the public interest. Now, Sir, it is well understood exactly what the motion I make implies. It is simply for the purpose of reinstating this Bill on the Order paper in order to give it a second reading, a Bill which has for its purpose the extension of the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company's charter. This, Sir, is not an exceptional course to take. Very frequently in this House railway and other companies have had their charters extended and their rights extended; and I do not think it proper that, without some very grave reason, an exceptional case should be made against the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company I do not think that any declaration of policy on the part of the Government with regard to the money grant to this company should have any bearing at all upon the merits of the motion that is now before the House. I think it would be poltroonery on the part of any member to hide himself behind an excuse of that nature, and to say that because of the money grant, even though this company performed their work, he would therefore oppose extending the charter of the company, so that they might have a chance of completing the enterprise they have in hand. I wish further to state that an impression has got abroad, and is prevailing in the country, which I think has been suggested by statements made by gentlemen in important positions, a false impression has got abroad that this project, even if completed, can be of no advantage to the shipping interests in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Now, I wish to correct that false impression. It has been stated, and the impression has been created, that nothing is to be gained by the shipping of the north shore, or of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, by having a transport across the Isthmus of Chignecto. Why, Sir, anybody that looks at the map, and is at all familiar with that region, knows that the north cape of Cape Breton is on a line with the most northern point of Prince Edward Island, and that a vessel going around the northern point of Prince Edward Island must necessarily round the north cape of Cape Breton and go very far to sea in a voyage to New England ports. Anybody who looks at the map and sees that even by taking a course down through the Gut of Canso vessels must, in order to make their way around the coast of Nova Scotia, make a distance of over 300 miles, which would be completely cut off if this enterprise was carried to a successful completion. It has been said that one of the great advantages which would result from the completion of this work is that in the fall months when navigation along the coast of Cape Breton or Nova Scotia is most dangerous, this project, when completed, will offer great advantages to shipping coming down the Northumberland Straits from the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Against that contention there has been set up a statement which, if true, would, I think, go a long way towards destroying that contention: that statement is that no insurance companies that are known of will allow insured vessels to navigate the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the first day of November. That statement, permit me to say, is entirely erroneous, and apart from the fact altogether. No insurance company that I am acquainted with doing business in insuring shipping in the Gulf of St. Lawrence refuses to permit vessels carrying policies to navigate the Gulf long after the first day of November. I admit that in most of them there is a printed clause to the effect that the waters of the Gulf of St. Lawrence are prohibited after the first day of November; but I venture to make the statement that no shipping man in this House will dare to contradict that there is not a company doing business and carrying insurance on any shipping in the Gulf of St. Lawrence that does not permit shipping to carry risks long after the first day of November. Why, Sir, the California Insurance Company, the Nova Scotia Insurance Company, the China Insurance Company, issue policies one condition of which allows the Gulf of St. Lawrence to be used down to the 15th day of December, not to speak of the first day of November. I therefore say that the statement that may be made in this House or outside of it to the effect that navigation in the St. Lawrence after 1st November is prohibited by insurance companies, or any impression conveyed to that effect is entirely false and without foundation in fact. In the interest of the navigation of the Gulf in the waters of which there is very large shipping engaged, I wish to protest and protest most earnestly against any such statement going uncontradicted before the people of this country. I do not know what particular interest any hon. gentleman may have in making that statement. It may be that no vessel in which he is interested sails the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or that the hon. gentleman is afraid that shipping in the Gulf may enter into competition with the shipping in the Bay of Fundy. I make this declaration and I defy contradiction, that the waters of the St. Lawrence can be navigated by vessels holding policies in insurance companies after 1st November. In my practice I have collected insurance from insurance companies for losses in the Gulf on 13th November, in which the policies have been upheld and subsequently paid when vessels have been lost on the shores of the county I represent and at other points of the Gulf coast. In one of these cases which I recall the insurance policy was held in the " Pelican " ; and the hon. member for King's (Mr. McLean), who is a large owner of shipping, informs me that at the present time he holds policies in which clauses are inserted extending the risk to 15th December. If, therefore, there is anything in the contention that the late fall business in the St. Lawrence is to be benefited by this enterprise, it is not at all contradicted by the false declarations which have been made and the false impression created that navigation in the Gulf is prohibited by insurance companies during the fall of the year. I do not seek to make a very strong argument in favour of this motion, for I do not think it is necessary to appeal to the sense of justice in this House in regard to this matter. I do not think any hon. gentleman who is opposed to a money grant to the Chignecto Ship Railway Company should seek refuge behind that contention for the purpose of preventing the request embodied in this motion being granted. Shall we put our foot down upon this company and refuse rights to them by denying them this legislation, when in every other case that I can recall the privilege asked for has been granted graciously ? I do not think so. This company has expended large sums of money to carry out this enterprise. They have been peculiarly unfortunate as regards the circumstances connected with it. After the company was granted its first charter it was prevented owing to a clause in the Railway Act from going forward with the work. Then a misfortune befell the company by the failure of one of the money institutions in Great Britain which carried their credit, and by other unfortunate circumstances they were prevented from carrying the project forward. At the present time the company say they are in a position to carry it to a successful completion. One thing should be borne in mind above all others, and that is that until they show conclusively that the railway is able to take a vessel from the St. Lawrence and place it in the Bay of Fundy successfully, and without any great risk or danger, and to the advantage of the trade and commerce of the country, the company does not receive any money grant from the Dominion. In my opinion no contention has been set up which is sufficiently strong to deny this measure of justice to the company, and I hope the House will not deny to the Chignecto Ship Railway Company that privilege which time and again has been granted to other companies coming here and making a like demand.

Mr. WELSH. I have always opposed this Bill since it was introduced, I think by the Secretary of State. I then pronounced it a wild-cat scheme, a scheme that would be of no practical use to the marine interest of this country, and one which would ultimately impose burdens on the taxpayers of Canada to the extent of $5,000,000. At that time I asked the Secretary of State to withdraw the Bill, as people investing their money in the enterprise would lose it. I am of the same opinion to-day as I was at that time, and I have never yet heard a single member interested in our marine, sanction the scheme. It has been denounced by all hon. members who have the slightest interest not only in shipping but in commercial affairs. The advocacy of this project was always entrusted to some member who did not know what he was talking about ; so soon as it is advocated by any practical man, I am willing to listen to him. I shall object to every step proposed to be taken with a view to push through this scheme. So soon as the Bill has been advanced a stage the Government will ask a grant of $5,000,000, or a renewal of the annual subsidy of $170,000, for twenty years. If the Government will announce that they will not ask a subsidy, I will say nothing further. I object to this Bill being placed on the Order paper, and the good sense of this House, as well as of the people generally, will support me in my opposition.

Mr. LISTER. If the object of the promoter of this Bill was simply to get the charter which has expired revived, there would be no objection to the House granting what the company asked. They are entitled to that as a matter of course, no matter how visionary the scheme may be, how absurd it may be. But there is a feeling in the House and in the country that the object of the promoter of the Bill and the object of the Secretary of State in supporting it is to supplement the Bill, by a grant of two or three million dollars.

Mr. WELSH. Five millions.

Mr. LISTER. There is lurking behind this scheme some proposal the particulars of which the Government have not been frank enough to convey to the House. The manifest object of the revival of the charter is to float another of the wild-cat schemes of the Secretary of State. These people are entitled to invest their money in any undertaking they may think proper ; they have a right to burn their money or destroy it in any other way. They have a right to build a worthless work. That is their own business, but they have no right to ask the representatives of the people in Parliament to vote the public moneys of this country in aid of a scheme such as this. Members of this House would be recreant to their duty, if they in any way recognized or approved of this scheme. This Chignecto Railway is a child of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). In looking back at the history of this country from the time that the hon. gentleman first took a seat in this House, he has been the author of many schemes which have involved great loss to the country, and considerable loss to the people who invested ; but I think I am within the mark, when I say, that of all the wild-cat schemes, the Chignecto Ship Railway is the very worst, and the most indefensible. Knowing all that we do about this scheme, I have no hesitation in saying that it is one of the most astounding frauds of the present century. We have had gentlemen in this House supporting the Government, men perfectly qualified to form an opinion upon this question, and they have not hesitated to rise in their places and denounce it in the very strongest language, as being one that cannot be defended from a national standpoint, or from the standpoint of the investor. The Secretary of State was asked by the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), if it was the intention of the Government to revive the statute giving aid to this company, in case this Bill became law. He remained in his seat silent, and the fair inference to be drawn is, that he has promised the promoters of this scheme that he will back it up by the money of Canada. The representatives of Canada in this House will be false to the people and to the country, if they permit this measure to become law, without the stoutest opposition that they can offer to it. Sir, what right has the Secretary of State to come to Parliament and ask two and a half million dollars for this scheme ? It was one of the boomster schemes of long ago. It was initiated for the purpose of spending money, in the years gone by, when it was thought that the money of the people of Canada could not be spent fast enough, particularly if it was being spent for the purpose of retaining in office the men who now occupy the Treasury benches. It is all very well to talk about canals ; it is all very well to talk about ship railways. Of the men who have thousands upon thousands of dollars invested in shipping, who has ever heard of one of them who would be foolish enough to trust his valuable property upon a ship railway ? Where in the world, I ask, is there such an undertaking that has been worked satisfactorily or profitably ? I venture the assertion that it is entirely novel, and that there is no railway in the world of any length which can be shown as a precedent for the undertaking which these promoters ask the Government and Parliament to give them aid towards. It is said that the English people have invested their money in this scheme. So much the worse for the English people. If the English capitalists are credulous enough to listen to the wild representations made by some members of this House, as well as others, they have their own credulity to blame, and they must not complain if Parliament refuses to give them aid. Why, Sir, the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) came from London to look after a fast line, and to look after a cable scheme, but, remarkable as it may appear, it is true, nevertheless, that with the hon. gentleman came the promoter of this scheme, upon the very same ship. He has been haunting the corridors of this House ever since. Has he been doing so under the promise of the Secretary of State, that he, the great "I am," will see that this Parliament grants aid to this bogus concern. It is a bogus concern ; it never can earn one sixpence for the stockholders, it never can pay one sixpence of interest upon the investment, and, in that sense, it is utterly and absolutely worthless ; and, forsooth, because it is worthless, Canada is to give it two and a half millions out of the public Treasury. Heaven knows, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has been bled until she is almost white. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) came here at confederation, and he is responsible mainly for the sad condition that this country is in to-day. There was no scheme too chimerical for that hon. gentleman. He was ready to embrace them all, and, in embracing them, to pour out the wealth of Canada with a lavish and prodigal hand. That, no doubt, is the hon. gentleman whom this gentleman from England expects to back up his scheme by inducing his followers in this House to vote for the granting of money towards it. I say, Sir, that this scheme is condemned from one end of the Dominion to the other. There is hardly a man in this country who has heard of the Chignecto Ship Railway, and who has not condemned the law which initiated it in days past. Hon. gentlemen who undertake now to support this scheme, and to make further grants towards it from the money of the people of this country, have to answer seriously to their constituents for their acts. I believe that, of all the schemes that have ever been presented to Parliament, this is the most popular. It is the scheme which can be least justified, and here we are to-day asked to give life to this corporation, and at the same time we are told that the object of doing this is to grant the money of the country in aid of it. As I said in the first place, if the hon. gentleman had asked that this Bill simply should be passed, and if there was nothing behind it, there would be no objection whatever to reviving this charter. But, before Parliament should be asked to do that, I submit that we should have the assurance of the Government that no subsidy or subvention will be given to this undertaking. Let the Government do that, and I believe I am safe in saying that there will be no voice raised against the passing of this Bill. But if the object is, as we believe it to be, to follow up the revival of this charter by granting public money in aid of this scheme, then it should receive the most energetic and strenuous opposition. The works that have been constructed are of no value. The money that has been invested has been absolutely and entirely lost. Nothing that this Parliament can do will restore to the English investors the money they have lost. That has gone, like millions more which the English people have invested in various parts of the world. If they lose here, they make up their loss somewhere else ; so that at the end of the year, they come out, if not ahead, very nearly even. I submit that this Parliament is under no obligation, moral or legal, to grant one farthing of Canadian money in aid of this scheme. I said a moment ago that the work was of no value. We have had that opinion from the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Baird), who is thoroughly familiar with the shipping business, who lives in the section of the country where this work is, and who knows whereof he speaks. It is of no value, first, because there are no ships to go over it ; it is of no value, in the second place, because men who own ships would not put them upon the railway. We have had the same opinion from my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I.. (Mr. Welsh), who has spent half a century about the coasts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and who is perfectly familiar with the whole subject. He has told us that he has opposed this work from the first, and that he will continue to oppose it to the end, because he regards it of no value. In opposing this measure, we are not moved by any spirit of hostility to the stockholders of the company. We do so rather in a spirit of kindness to them. Because, if they receive aid from this Parliament, it will be simply an inducement to them to put more money into the hole where so much of their money has already disappeared. That would be the object and end of it ; so that, after taking 2,500,000 out of the people of Canada, they would be in no better position than they were in before. The Secretary of State told us that the bankers of London had the bonds of this company. If they have, they have taken them at a most terrible discount, they have paid but a small price for them ; and, perhaps, the effect of this Parliament giving aid to the company would be to give a fictitious value to the bonds which these gentlemen hold, and perhaps enable them to get rid of them at a higher price than they paid for them.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will allow me—it does not pertain to the present question, I suppose, but, as a matter of fact, the bankers, in reality, pay par, or very nearly par for the bonds.

Mr. LISTER. Then, all I can say is that the English people are more simple than I have given them credit for being. Is it possible, as I have heard it hinted, that the Secretary of State, while occupying the exalted position of High Commissioner in London, spoke favourably of this scheme, rather commending it as a profitable undertaking? Is there any truth in that ? Are the friends of the hon. gentleman the bondholders or the stockholders in this company ? It has been whispered in Canada that the hon. gentleman took a considerable interest in this Chignecto Railway during all the time he was in the city of London. Perhaps he may feel personally obligated; and, if stories are true, he may be legally obligated to make good to some of those men the vast amount of money which they have invested in this scheme. Is it possible that there is anything of that kind behind ? Rumours have been afloat that there are some very compromising documents in the old country which may—I do not say that they do—create a legal liability against the Secretary of State. Is that true, or is it not ? Why is it that the hon. gentleman takes so much interest in this Bill ? Why should he put it into the hands of a private member to be introduced, instead of introducing it himself ?

Mr. LANDERKIN. Because he has lost his grip.

Mr. LISTER. These are all questions which Parliament has to consider. But whether it considers them or not, it is of no consequence to the people of Canada whether the English bondholders or stockholders have lost their money or not. When they invested, they invested knowing that the company existed under a charter, and knowing that if the company did not live up to the terms of that charter they stood a chance of losing their money. Knowing all that, they took all the chances involved in taking stock or investing in the undertaking, in any way ; and if they lose their money, they lose it with their eyes open, and they have no reason to complain that Canada has not acted fairly with them. Our contract with them was that if they completed the work in a fixed time, they should receive certain aid. They have not done so, and there is no legal responsibility, and there can be no moral responsibility, upon us to pay this company one single dollar. I repeat, Sir, that it is in the interest of the people of this country that this measure should be opposed from the moment it shows its head in Parliament to the very last moment. I say, moreover, that it is the duty of the representatives of the people here to oppose the voting of one shilling in aid of this enterprise. Speaking for myself, I will give it every opposition that it is possible for me to give it, from this time out.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I certainly hoped that the Secretary of State, after the very strong appeal that was made to him by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, would have risen and given the House some information on the very vital point as to whether the Government are committed to a revival of the grant that was originally made for the construction of this work. We certainly have a right to be placed in possession of that information. As my hon. friend stated, there should not be any serious objection to reviving the charter in order to allow the company to make the best use they can of the material that has been wasted in trying to construct the work. But, in my humble opinion, an Act to enable them to wind up the whole affair and to realize on whatever assets, if any, there are in it, would be a much more prudent Act than one to revive the scheme. Now, this scheme has been before Parliament for a number of years. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) was, I believe, the father of this particular scheme, and the hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) discharged the duty of attendant physician when it was brought forth to the light of day. He helped to vitalize the scheme by advocating very pointedly and strongly the grant of $150,000 a year for twenty-five years, to carry it on. We had at that time, a great many schemes which were on a par with this particular one, some of which have been completed, and stand today positive monuments of folly, in which the money of this country has been spent, and from which not a dollar has ever yet been drawn for the national treasury. I must say that there is no one who can put up such a good case, and advocate in such powerful and eloquent terms, and with all evidence of sincerity, any scheme he takes in hand, as the hon. Secretary of State. I can well remember, years ago, when the question of making a change in the grant awarded for the construction of this scheme was before the House, the Secretary of State then outlined very forcibly and clearly, the enormous advantage which the completion of this structure would be to the shipping interests of the maritime provinces. At that time, the grant of $150,000 a year for twenty-five years, was altered to $170,000 a year for twenty years. Well, the company has not been able to complete the work and to earn either of those grants. The time was extended from year to year, and the last extension was given subject to a fine of $5,000 a month for every month the company failed in completing the work after the time fixed. That extension was made for some two years, but even then the company did not complete the work. In the face of these continuous failures, we are justified in believing that the people of England have been humbugged. We had a speech from the hon. member for Queen's, N.B., (Mr. Weldon) a few evenings ago, in which, although a supporter of the Government, he very clearly outlined the results that would accrue from the completion of this undertaking. Although, no doubt, an admirer as well as a supporter of the hon. Secretary of State, he declared frankly, from a shipper's standpoint, that whatever excuse might have existed at the time of its inception, for the construction of this undertaking, every vestige of argument has now absolutely departed, and there is nothing left. I ask, then, would it at all be prudent to bring this scheme to life again and leave it in the hands of the Secretary of State to commit the country to another grant such as was given years ago and has twice expired? I do not think it would. I quite agree with the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) that it is high time the representatives of the people should determinedly oppose the revival of any such scheme. When we consider the fact that the debt of this country is now over $250,000,000, and that it takes not less than $32,000 to $35,000 a day to pay the interest, we must be convinced that we would be false to the responsibility resting upon us, as representatives of the people, if we were to sit silently by and allow a scheme of this kind to be again brought into existence. I have no animosity, I have nothing but pity for the English bondholders who were induced to invest their money, and if they were induced to do so because this House granted a bonus for the construction of the work, I must express my sincere regret that we should ever have offered them any such inducement. But we have gone far enough. No doubt it would be very desirable, in the interests of the bondholders, that this scheme should be revived, if they can thereby pocket the bonus we originally granted. The sum of $170,000 a year will give pretty nearly 4 per cent on $5,000,000, and if they could sell their bonds and get 4 per cent for twenty years, even if they got nothing else, that would be vastly better than losing the entire money that is sunk in the work. The hon. Secretary of State said, of course, that they would not be entitled to this annual grant unless they did the work. Perfectly true, but they are not bound to find work for the road to do. All that they are required is to do the work provided for them. Take the opinions of experienced men. Take that of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Welsh), who has had fifty years' experience in shipping, and who, consequently, thoroughly understands the handling of ships, he knows perfectly well that the idea of taking a ship out of the water, transferring it to a railway and running it across ten or fifteen miles, and then plumping it into the water on the other side, is an experience to which he would not allow any of his ships to be subjected.

Mr. WELSH. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are bound to accept the opinions of men of his experience. The hon. member for Queen's, N.B., (Mr. Weldon) also spoke to the same effect. It would be gross folly on the part of this House to permit this scheme to again become vitalized in order that the Government might have the opportunity, by Order in Council, or in some other way, of committing this country to a renewal of the grant. Suppose we revive that charter now, the hon. Secretary of State refuses to get up and declare the intentions of the Government. He has been challenged by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) to say what the Government policy was and whether they intended to consider again the granting of $170,000 a year to this scheme. Will the hon. Secretary of State rise now and satisfy the House on that point ? If he will do so, I am prepared to say that I desire to do everything to enable these poor, unfortunate, duped men to realize the best they can out of the work in which they have spent their money. But past experience has taught us that the Secretary of State is always willing, when he thinks it advisable in his party's interest, to spend money in schemes of this kind, schemes from which the country will never realize a dollar. If he will say nothing, we are bound to stand in the breach and see that this scheme is not vitalized. We are here for the purpose of considering any fair, decent scheme introduced in this House for the general welfare. We desire to give any corporation the facilities to work out its future, but not at our expense. Why, Sir, we have had other schemes of this kind. A short time ago—I believe we did not have to pay money to it—we had the dead meat scheme——

Mr. SPEAKER. What have these schemes to do with the question before the House ?

Mr. McMULLEN. I will endeavour to confine myself, Mr. Speaker, to the question before the House. I only make this reference by way of comparison. I am trying to impress upon hon. members that we cannot afford to go into such schemes in the future, whatever mistakes we have made in the past. In view of the heavy debt of this country and the enormous drain it makes upon the resources of the people, we simply cannot afford to continue in the path in which we have been moving. It is only a few years since the Finance Minister told us that the debt of this country had reached its highest point, that we were now to move in the opposite direction. But what will be the result, if this scheme is vitalized ? We have a deficit to-day. If we are going to grant $170,000 a year to a scheme of this kind, not having the money, the amount must be added to the debt.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no such proposition in the Bill before the House.

Mr. MULOCK. The Secretary of State has intimated that it will be proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER. It can be discussed when it is proposed.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am trying to confine myself to the vitalizing of this scheme. The hon. Finance Minister is laughing——

Mr. FOSTER. I was laughing at the vitalizing of this scheme.

Mr. McMULLEN. We do not want to give a reckless Government the opportunity to carry out such a scheme. At the same time, we want to give this company the chance to work out its own salvation. I do not blame the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) for bringing in this resolution. I suppose he does it at the urgent request of the Secretary of State.

Mr. McINERNEY. I may inform the hon. gentleman that the Secretary of State never requested me to introduce this Bill. But the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) wrote me that he was urgently called home, and asked me to make this motion for him, and in his name, this afternoon.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am very glad the hon. gentleman is not directly responsible, but that he made this motion as a favour to the hon. gentleman who first introduced this Bill.

Mr. McINERNEY. In order that the hon. gentleman may not make a mistake, I wish to say that I have made my statement, that I believe in the scheme, that these people ought to have the right to complete the work ; and I think the hon. gentleman turns aside from the question, when he talks about something which is not before the House, and which cannot, in any case, be brought up until some time in the future.

Mr. McMULLEN. This measure was before the House, and was rejected. The object of the motion presented by the hon. gentleman is to secure a revival of this charter. From several benches on this side, the Secretary of State has been challenged, he has been besought, to state what the Government's intention is with regard to this scheme. If these people come before Parliament and simply ask a charter to enable them to carry out the scheme, or to realize upon their assets, we are perfectly willing to do anything which can be fairly done to help them out of the trouble in which they find themselves. But we are not willing to give this Government an opportunity to pledge the country to another renewal of the grant. Why cannot the Secretary of State frankly tell us that it is not the intention of the Government to pledge the country to any further expenditures on this scheme? We have extended the time for this grant again and again, and the company has failed in every contract, and has no claim upon us. I hope, for the sake of the country the Secretary of State is not personally bound, because, in that case, I should be afraid there might be some way by which we should have to pay the money. In view of the intimate connection of the leader of the House with this scheme, from its inception down to the present time, and his personal intimacy with those who have been connected with it, I say it is a dangerous thing to set the scheme again upon its feet, so that these people may rap at the door of the Privy Council, and urge, and plead that they be granted again $170,000 a year. To do so would be to throw away money, and this country has no money to throw away. What Canada needs is to husband its resources, and keep clear of kite-flying schemes which waste the people's money and result in no benefit to the country.

Mr. CASEY. I have waited till the last moment in order to give the Secretary of State an opportunity of making the statement he has been asked to make by more than one member on this side of the House. He has been challenged to say whether the reviving of this charter does not mean a new request for a money grant. He has pointedly refused to deny that it does include a renewal of that grant. The whole tenor of his speech in support of this Bill when it came up for its second reading, pointed to the necessity of renewing that grant. He urged it upon us as a matter of good faith, as a matter of a solemn, binding contract. He threatened us with the ill-will of the bankers who hold the securities of the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, if we went to them in the future asking to borrow money for Canada. I wish to call your attention specially to that threat:

> One eminent banking house said: We are prepared, under these circumstances, to subscribe £50,000 more for the purpose of completing this undertaking. Now, this £700,000 sterling is represented by securities in the vaults of a large banking house in the city of London, who are deeply interested in the completion of this work. I do not mention it as an additional inducement, but every member of this House, I am sure, will see, that, when the Minister of Finance goes to London to raise a loan, these are the parties to whom those interested in the matter go for the purpose of furnishing money for the Government of Canada; and I need not say to the House the disaster it would be to the Dominion, if it was felt that parties acting in good faith, supplying their capital, as this capital has been supplied, in good faith, and expending such a large amount of money in order to carry out a public contract with the Government of Canada, were not in a position to obtain from the Government and Parliament of this country every fair, honourable and just consideration.

He says he does not mention that as an additional inducement, but there is no meaning at all in the quotation unless he means to threaten this House and the people of Canada, that, if they do not revive the contract with this company, revive the charter, revive the grant, these bankers in London will oppose future Canadian loans. That is the clear meaning of the statement he made to the House.

He calls it carrying out a contract. It is absurd to speak of the renewal of this grant as the carrying out of a contract. There is no contract. The contract has expired by the fault of the other party. This House is not being asked now to carry out the contract, but to make a new contract on the same terms as the old one, which has expired without any fault on our part. The Secretary of State tried to make out that it did expire by our fault, because of some amendment to the Railway Act of 1888; but he had to confess a little later on that it was not this amendment, but the fact of a financial disaster that took place in London, which prevented the promoters of the scheme from raising the necessary capital. This amendment to the Railway Act which, he said, interfered with the raising of capital on their part, was subsequently repealed, and the company left in a position to raise money if they had been able to do so. Now, this company, which was unable to go any further than they have gone, took hold of the Secretary of State when he was in London, and proposed to him to come out here and get the whole thing renewed, and get the grant revived, along with their charter.

What other proposals they may have made, I cannot know; it would be improper, perhaps, to guess. But, Sir, we are all aware of one thing, that one of the principal lines in which the Secretary of State has been useful to the party, has been in the line of filling the "barrel," to use an American expression, for election purposes. He has always been looked upon as the most successful collector of election funds in the party. We have known cases before—we have had the statement across the floor of the House by Ministers, by the Postmaster General, for example, that the Government have accepted cheques from people who have received subsidies from this House for railway purposes, and have put these cheques to the credit of the election fund. The Postmaster General admitted receiving $25,000 from Mr. Armstrong, if I am not mistaken, and stated that he would do it again.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member is not discussing the question now before the House.

Mr. CASEY. I think if you will allow me I can show that I am discussing——

Mr. SPEAKER. No, the hon. member is discussing something entirely foreign to the subject before the House.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member is discussing something entirely foreign to the question now before the House. The hon. member may refer in general terms——

Mr. CASEY. Let me show whether it is foreign or not.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member may appeal from my decision, but he cannot discuss it.

Mr. CASEY. I beg leave to say that I intended to show, if you had allowed me to proceed, that it was not foreign, but very cognate, to this question, to show the use that would probably be made of this subsidy if we granted it to this company. For that purpose I wished, in order to illustrate, to quote the instance I have already quoted, to show how similar subsidies have been used in previous cases. However, the country at large are quite aware of the facts which I wished to bring before the House; and while I have to submit to your refusal to allow me to mention them now, the country will be quite aware of them.

I say one of the reasons why we object to this thing is the possible use that might be made of the subsidy. Now, it has been stated and reiterated, and goes without saying, that what we object to is a new grant of money to aid this company. We do not object in the least to giving these people longer time to build this road out of their own funds, no matter how wild-cat the scheme may be, but we do object to any further meddling with wild-cat schemes on the part of the Government, or even on the part of a single member of the Government, such as the Secretary of State. In his speech on the second reading, he told us:

> This work having been thus commended to British capitalists, not by myself, but by the authority of a royal commission——

And so on. I should like now to ask the hon. gentleman whether he is quite sure that this scheme was never recommended by himself to British capitalists? I do not think he can deny that he, personally, acted as the representative of this country, and in the interest of this company in London, did recommend this private scheme to capitalists there, and lent it the weight of his official position, and lent it the weight of the Government of Canada. I do not think it can be contended for a moment that British capitalists revived their confidence in this scheme, put up the money and renewed the project, without such encouragement from the High Commissioner, who is now Secretary of State, as led them to believe that his influence would secure to them a renewed grant from this House. That is the only understanding on which we can imagine their confidence in this scheme was renewed. In fact, I have the very gravest doubt as to whether their confidence has been renewed. I believe the whole affair is a scheme for election purposes, that the revival of the grant is a scheme for the purpose of filling of the "bar'l."

Mr. MARTIN. What bar'l?

Mr. CASEY. That is an American phrase usually understood to mean the fund raised by the Government from such sources as this Chignecto Railway Company for election purposes, and they always pronounce it "bar'l."

Speaking of the Secretary of State's connection with this scheme, I am tempted to use a phrase quoted not long ago; I think he is the dry nurse of this scheme, the 'arida nutrix'—a very dry nurse as regards himself, but he hopes to make the treasury of Canada the efficient source of supply of the milk. I need not quote further from the hon. gentleman's speech to make it clear that he intended to revive the charter, and at the same time revive the grant, for he spoke throughout of the necessity of spending money.

During the whole of his speech he raises the bugbear of injury to Canadian credit. I should like to know which will do most injury to the credit of Canada in England, our refusal to endorse this wild-cat scheme and give it a grant, or to allow those men to risk their money in an undertaking in which, owing to the lack of business precautions, they will lose it? Nothing can be more hostile to our credit abroad than the endorsation of this scheme. This grant would no doubt secure the completion of the road, but no power in heaven or earth would secure business to the road, if it does not exist. Dividends, if there were any at the outset, would soon fall off, or there might be no dividends at all. The shareholders would then complain, and against whom would they complain? Against the Parliament of Canada for inducing them, by an illusory grant, to embark in a visionary scheme. I said an illusory grant; I take back the word, for the grant would not be illusory, but in hard cash; the result, however, would be illusory, especially as regards furnishing profits to shareholders.

I think in this matter we can trust the hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird), a gentleman whom the Government were very anxious to see in this House, and who justified their anxiety to have him here by the business-like remarks he made in respect to this scheme. He said :

> Well, Sir, this company have evidently met their fate by the pure course of circumstances, by meeting changes in commercial enterprise. Changes have taken place that have completely revolutionized the business. This business was once great and profitable. In 1882, for instance, we were in the very zenith of our greatness as a maritime people. Canada, I think, was fourth in the world in commercial importance, and St. John was the fifth city in the registration of her merchant marine. That has entirely changed.

Yet, in spite of the National Policy, that has entirely failed.

> The trade has been completely revolutionized, and almost swept away from us.

Again he said :

> I can see no future for the company, no hope of prosperity, no way that they can make up their lost ground. I feel that it is a matter of kindness to them to speak frankly, and I feel deeply in earnest when I urge them to abandon the scheme. As to the Parliament of Canada, well, I would ask them to be deeply in earnest when dealing with the people's millions in works of this kind that are of a doubtful character.

I repeat these words uttered by the hon. member for Queen's—I ask Parliament to be deeply in earnest in dealing with our millions. We have heavy taxes, heavy deficits and a heavy debt, and millions count. I would urge the hon. gentleman not to be misled by the support given to this scheme by the Secretary of State into considering it a Government question. I would urge them notwithstanding the influence that may be brought to bear on them, not to look at this question as one of want of confidence in the Government, or the Secretary of State, but as a question of business and morality. I would call on every hon. member to ask himself how he will justify a vote given for this scheme before the constituents who have sent him here to look after the country's interests, and I have great hope, from what has already passed, that there will be sufficient independence to resist the influence of the Secretary of State, and to refuse to place this Bill again on the Order paper. By whose votes was it knocked out ? By the votes of the supporters of the Secretary of State, by the votes of the hon. member for Albert, the hon. member for Queen's, the hon. member for West Middlesex, the hon. member for East Elgin, the hon. member for Northumberland, and other supporters of the Government. It is evident that they were not led to have confidence in this scheme by the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State in regard to it ; indeed, I am satisfied that if the Secretary of State had not made the speech he did, if he had not shown his personal interest in the scheme so clearly, if he had not made it so certain that a revival of the charter and an extension of the time meant a renewal of the grant, this Bill would have passed its second reading without a division.

Mr. IVES. I am quite prepared to discuss the question from the point of view of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He desires the House to consider the question from the point of view of morality and of business. It seems to me that as a question of business it would certainly be, to some extent at least, disastrous to Canadian interests if it were established publicly and well known that the Parliament of Canada, under any circumstances, will refuse a renewal of the corporate life of a company which has been chartered by this Parliament and encouraged by a public grant. Here is a company which has expended £100,000 of its own money on this undertaking and now comes to this Parliament and asks for a renewal of its corporate existence in order that the shareholders may make an effort to save a portion of that money, or prevent its total loss, and I say, as a question of business, we as Canadians are largely interested in deciding whether this Parliament, under such circumstances, should refuse to renew the corporate existence of this company. Suppose any body of men go to the English market or to any market in the civilized world with a bond based upon a Canadian charter, whether a mining bond or any other kind of bond, and ask for public subscriptions and foreign capital to enable the company to carry out the mining or railway work, what would be the effect if it were known that the Parliament of Canada would take, for political reasons or otherwise, this unfair and unjust position, and say : You may embark your money, you may spend your money, but if you have not finished the work within the time limit fixed in the original charter, you will lose it, your money will have been expended, the work will be useless, the company will have no corporate existence, you can neither go back nor forward, your money has been expended and you are now entirely ruined. I have never know during my twenty years of parliamentary life, of an instance where a company has been refused the renewal of a charter. I have known hundreds of cases in which not a dollar has been spent, but where renewals have been given, not once, but three or four times. If you look upon this as a question of business, then I tell you it is a serious question of business to Canadian interests ; because I consider that to refuse it would be affixing a serious stigma upon the trust that may be reposed in the justice of the Parliament of Canada. From a moral point of view, it would be immoral for us to refuse it. There are three classes of opinions in this House with regard to the question. There are those who, like the gallant Admiral from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh), do not believe in the scheme at all, and, because they do not believe in the scheme, they think it is not entitled to common fair-play and common justice.

Mr. WELSH. Do you believe in it ?

Mr. IVES. That question will come up in its proper time. There are others, the large majority of the House, who are prepared to say at once that the charter ought to be renewed, but some of them say : We should not renew the charter, because then the next thing will be a proposition from the Government to renew the grant. Now, these gentlemen, who cannot trust themselves to do justice in this case, and, in the next case, vote according to their opinions, certainly have not a great deal of confidence in themselves. I do not believe there is a man on this side of the House who is opposed to the money grant, who cannot trust himself to do justice in the matter of restoring this charter, and, at the same time, to take independent action, if the financial question is ever brought up. Surely, the members on this side of the House have independence enough to restore this charter now as an act of justice, and to preserve their independence and vote as they see fit, if the Government should ever propose to renew the grant. It is a matter so simple that it is hardly worth while to occupy time in discussing it. Here is a company—not a company that never spent a cent, and that has had two or three renewals, as we have been in the habit of giving in this House—but a company that, on the faith of a solemn engagement by a previous Parliament of Canada, have expended their own money—not ours—to the extent of three and a half million dollars. They have now expired as a corporation, they can neither move forward nor backward, their money is there, and, so far as it is perishable, it is perishing. They simply ask us, under the circumstances, to give them a corporate power to go on and complete that work. The question of the renewal of the grant is not before the House at all, and the member who votes against putting this Bill back on the Order paper because he would not vote for a renewal of the grant, simply says to the country and to the House that he cannot trust himself to take what action he thinks proper, when that other question comes up, if ever it does come up. Let us do justice, and let us do that which is absolutely necessary to be done, if we are ever to get a dollar of foreign capital again interested in any Canadian company, whether it be a mining, or a railway company, or anything else. If it is considered that the Parliament of Canada cannot be trusted to do so simple an act of justice as this, then good-bye to any Canadian enterprise which seeks for foreign capital.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. Minister (Mr. Ives) can scarcely have been listening to the speeches upon this question, because it must be very plain to the House that no member has expressed a desire for one moment to refuse to renew this charter. It is because the House has a well-grounded impression that something will follow the renewal of the charter, in the shape of a money grant, that objection is taken. There is no guarantee that this company intend to complete this railway out of their own funds. If this company came as other companies have come to Parliament, simply asking for a renewal of their charter because, on account of unforeseen circumstances, they have been stopped in their work, then, no doubt, the House would grant the request. We are indeed under no moral obligation whatever to do so, although the Minister (Mr. Ives) seems to think we are. It would be perfectly moral and perfectly right for this House to refuse it at any time and for any reason. If the doctrine of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) were to prevail, that we were morally bound to renew a charter every time it was asked for, that doctrine would be subversive of the rights of this Parliament. Why does the House place in every private Bill of this kind a provision that the work must be commenced and completed before a certain time ? What would be the use of such a provision, if the contention of the hon. gentleman is correct, that we are bound to renew every charter that has expired ? That clause is put in every Bill in order to retain in this Parliament control over that work, and in order that Parliament may be able to judge whether such circumstances have happened as give a company the right of renewal. It has been made plain by every member who has spoken against this motion, that, if this company asked merely to get their charter renewed, as a corporation, and to spend their own money for the completion of this work, there would be no objection. But, avowedly, this application is made for another purpose altogether. It is stated, on behalf of this company—I think, by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper)—that it will cost one and a half million dollars to complete this work. We also know that the subsidy granted by this Parliament in previous years would amount to $2,300,000, as stated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster).

Mr. WELSH. $5,000,000.

Mr. MARTIN. That may be so.

Mr. WELSH. I am sure of it.

Mr. MARTIN. I am taking the admission of the financial man of the Government that this bonus amounts to $2,300,000. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that apart from the question whether this company is a fraud, and apart from the question whether a ship railway is an absurd proposition or not ; it is directly to the advantage of this company that they should get that bonus and complete the work, even if the work is worth nothing when it is completed. They have paid out one and a half million dollars, they get their work completed, and they receive immediately from the Treasury of Canada a bonus which is worth, at present value, $2,300,000, and so there would be a profit to the company of $800,000. And, if we are to place reliance upon the statement of the hon. member for Queen's N.B. (Mr. Baird), that is the most that the company can ever expect. In urging that we should vote against the second reading of the Bill, he told us that it would be a great kindness to the unfortunate English investors who had put their money into this concern, to refuse to give them any further incorporation, because, as a commercial institution, it was utterly useless. It would be far better for those people to burn their bonds and let their money go, than to put any more money into it. In addition to what has been told us by the hon. Secretary of State in favour of passing this Bill, we have the fact that a previous Bill was introduced in this House by this very company, providing that they should get a Government bonus. That Bill, which was found to be out of order, contained a clause reviving not only the charter of the company, but all the subsidy rights which the company had before. So that the object of this motion is plain.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would like to correct the hon. gentleman. There were no such words as subsidy rights of the company in the first Bill. There were general words which were supposed to cover those particular rights. The promoters of the Bill did not think they did cover them; but when it was shown that they did, they withdrew the Bill and re-introduced it without those words.

Mr. MARTIN. Then do I understand the hon. gentleman to deny that this company do intend to urge the Government, and expect the Government, to give them the bonus?

Mr. McINERNEY. There is no need for the hon. gentleman to jump until he gets to the stile. The question now before this House is whether this company shall have its charter extended. When we come to the other question, we can meet it like independent men. The question now is whether the hon. gentleman objects to extending to this company the same privileges as are extended to like companies.

Mr. MARTIN. It depends entirely on the object for which this Bill is being pressed. If the object is to give this company the privilege of going on and completing the work with their own money, and without the money of Canada, then I understand there is no objection to it. If, on the other hand, the object of the Bill is to put the company in a position to receive the subsidy from the Dominion Government for the purpose of completing this ship railway, then it seems to me that we are justified in doing as the hon. member for Queen's, N.B., suggested, opposing the measure from the outset. The Government are in a position to settle this question at once. If they think it is important to this company to have the right to go and complete their work, why do they not state to the House that they do not intend to ask for an extension of the bonus to the company? As a matter of fact, in a very strong speech, the hon. Secretary of State showed the obligations of Canada to this scheme, and went very much further than the proposition of the promoter of the Bill on the last occasion that it was before us. My hon. friend says that the object of the Bill is simply to renew the charter of the company. If so, why had we such a long speech on the merits of the scheme, and in justification of the large bonus which Canada had granted to it. The hon. gentleman urged that it was necessary to do justice to this scheme in order to maintain Canadian credit in the old country; and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce laid great stress on that point today. I would like to say, for one, that if my vote is going to have the effect of destroying the credit of institutions like the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company in London, I would be very glad to destroy their credit. I regret very much that Canada has been more or less mixed up in this affair. I regret very much, indeed, that the High Commissioner in London has used his position as Canada's representative to recommend to English capitalists a scheme like this, bearing in mind the very clear exposition of the real nature of the scheme given to us by the hon. member for Queen's, N.B., when this matter was previously before the House, in which he told us that if everything said in favour of it were true—if this ship railway could be built, and if it became practicable to take ships from one water, carry them over twenty or thirty miles of land and put them in another water—granted all that, he says, when it is completed there is absolutely nothing for it to do. What should we think of the desirability of helping the credit of enterprises of that kind, when we find a member of this House, who has a most intimate practical acquaintance with all the circumstances of the trade which this ship railway is supposed to benefit, telling us that although the unfortunate investors had sunk $3,500,000 in the work, in his judgment it would be a kindness to them to prevent them putting another dollar into it? That hon. gentleman stated that it would be better for them to lose the whole $3,500,000 than to put another dollar into it in the attempt to get any of their money back. So far as credit is concerned, I can see no difficulty about putting our foot down—a little late, perhaps, but better late than never—upon a humbug of this description. A fraud, it has been called. It is the worst kind of a fraud; and the injury it has done to the credit of real enterprises in this country, in which capital could be employed beneficially not only to the country, but to English investors, is great. The fact of a scheme of this kind having been floated, more or less with the connivance of the Government, is destructive of the only credit we should desire to maintain—the credit of Canada as a legitimate field for the investment of English money.

Motion agreed to.

VOTERS' LISTS OF 1896.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 87) respecting the voters' lists of 1896. He said : This is simply to do away with the revision this year and is similar to the Act of 1895.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT.

Mr. HAGGART moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 88) further to amend the Government Railways Act. He said : It was supposed that railway employees on the Intercolonial were not liable to the statute labour tax and the clearing of roads, but under a decision of the courts it seems they are. When the Intercolonial is blocked with snow, the municipal authorities take the men from the railway, who ought to be engaged in clearing snow from the railway tracks, and utilize them for the purpose of cleaning the different streets and roads throughout the different municipalities. It is proposed by this Bill to relieve the railway employees from this liability.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is undertaking an impossible task. Those employees cannot be taxed by local authorities in consequence of any earnings they have in connection with the public service ; but statute labour is a duty imposed everywhere upon the citizens of every province, and that duty rests upon those in the employ of the Government here as much as upon any other citizens of the country. I do not see upon what ground it is possible to pass a Bill here which would have any effect whatever in relieving those in the public service from the discharge of duties that devolve upon every citizen in every province.

Mr. HAGGART. We will discuss that on the second reading. I am just following the advice of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey), who says we can.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE.

Mr. WOOD moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Act respecting the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue, chapter 11 of the statutes of 1887. He said : The Bill proposes to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Customs to the sum of $4,000 per annum. The salary at present received by him amounts in all to the sum of $3,600, $2,800 of which is provided by statute and $800 is paid as an allowance for acting as Chairman of the Customs Board. It is proposed to make the salary $4,000, which shall include all remuneration for his services as Chairman of the Customs Board, so that the actual increase is but $400 beyond the sum now paid. This will make the salary exactly equal to the amount received by the Commissioner of Inland Revenue ; and the importance of the office itself is such as leads the Government to believe that the services of so competent an officer is worth this amount.

Mr. McMULLEN. I want to enter my protest against any increases. They are not justifiable at all, even in the case of an officer of this kind. The cost of living is considerably reduced, the ordinary commodities are considerably reduced——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can give hon. gentlemen opposite some information with regard to that. Wheat used to be worth $1.20, and it is now down to 60 cents a bushel. Flour, which sold $7 or $8 a barrel, now sells at $3.50 and $3.25 ; potatoes which used to sell at 40 and 50 cents a bushel, now sell at 15 and 20 cents. That is one of the results of the National Policy. I enter my protest against this increase. There is no necessity or justification for it and the revenue of the country does not justify it. Every condition we have points in the opposite direction, and I shall oppose any increase whatever.

Mr. WOOD. I shall ask that the matter stand, because it may require to be introduced by a resolution. I did not suppose the hon. gentleman would object, because the increase, of which he complains so loudly, is after all but $400. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the Department of Customs to-day is run by the Controller and Acting Commissioner, whereas in previous years we had a commissioner, an assistant commissioner, and one other high official.

Mr. LAURIER. Do you not propose to go back to that ?

Mr. WOOD. And I can show that there has been such a saving in the administration of the department that I do not believe any hon. gentleman will object to the addition of $400 to the salary of a competent officer, filling one of the most important positions in the service of the country.

Mr. SPEAKER. The objection to the Bill is that it provides for an increase of salary to the Commissioner of Customs and must therefore be introduced by a resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

BINDING TWINE MANUFACTURED IN THE KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked :

1. What was the total output of binding twine, manufactured in the Kingston penitentiary, in the year ending 31st December, 1895 ?
2. Has the said output been sold, and, if so, to whom ?
3. What amount has been received therefrom ?
4. Is any money still due and unpaid, and, if so, how much ?
5. By whom is the said money due, and is it secured in any way, and, if so, in what manner ?

Mr. DALY. I regret I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman's question. The delay in answering this question is occasioned by the fact that the information required to fully reply to it has to be got from the books of the Kingston penitentiary. On inquiring of the department, I find that the information has not yet been received from Kingston, and it is of such a nature that I would suggest that the hon. gentleman move for an Order of the House for a return.

Mr. McMULLEN. As my question was on the same subject, perhaps the same difficulty may stand in the way of answering it. It is as follows :—

Whether any sum or sums of money are due or unpaid for binding twine sold, as set out on page I—43 of the Auditor General's Report ? If due, by whom, and what security is held for payment ? If paid, when was payment made, and in what way ? Has payment, for twine sold, been made in anything else but cash ? Has security been deposited for twine sold ? If so, what does the security consist of ?

Mr. DALY. I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow that to stand. I thought I had the answer here, but I find I have not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to remark that in the Public Accounts Committee when this question came up it was understood——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think I am in order in asking for the information.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is referring to something that took place in the committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But not a matter in which there was any difference of opinion. I merely wished to say that we were asked not to go into an examination of this question before the committee because the information was to be given in the House to-day. I think I am in order in bringing to the attention of the leader of the House the fact that we did not proceed before the committee because of that promise.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question stands at the request of the Government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Do I understand that my question also stands at the request of the Government ?

Mr. DALY. No, I answered your question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. Minister of the Interior has answered the question by stating that it will be necessary to give notice of motion.

INSOLVENCY BILL.

Mr. MARTIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call attention to the fact that Bill (No. 51) respecting insolvency, has not been printed in French. It has stood for second reading since the 4th February. I am in hopes that this Bill will be reached shortly on one of these private members' days, and I fear it will be blocked under the rule requiring Bills to be printed in both languages. I am very anxious indeed to get a vote of the House upon this measure, and to have the Bill passed into law. It seems to me there must be something wrong that it has not been printed in French, although two months have elapsed since it was introduced and the English copy was distributed a month or six weeks ago. I am informed by an hon. gentleman near me that the Bill has actually been printed in French, but, by some oversight, it is not so marked in the Order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER. The failure to mark it as printed in both languages would not prevent it being moved if it really were printed and distributed.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not know, when I began to speak, that it had been printed in French.

VOLUNTEERS FOR THE SOUDAN EXPEDITION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In a late issue of a St. John paper a statement is made to which I desire to call the attention of the leader of the House. The statement is to the effect that the 18th Princess Louise Hussars, of King's County, N. B., have volunteered for service in the expedition to the Soudan. I believe a despatch has been sent to the Government making that offer, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the statement is true that they have volunteered and whether the Government have forwarded the offer either by despatch or cable, or what action has been taken or is proposed to be taken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like the hon. gentleman to repeat that question when the hon. Postmaster General, who is acting for the Minister of Militia, is in the House.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I take the opportunity to inquire of the Finance Minister whether he is yet prepared to state when he will bring down the Supplementary Estimates for the present year. I may remind the hon. gentleman that it is highly desirable, if any of these are important, that they should be submitted at an early day.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I can promise my hon. friend that they will be down on Monday at the latest.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. MULOCK. I desire to inquire of the Government if they propose to take any action, and if so, what, with regard to certain recommendations made by the board of visitors and the officer commanding in regard to the Royal Military College. Among others there is a recommendation by the officer commanding, a very pointed recommendation, suggesting some changes in the personnel of the staff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would say that I prefer that that question be repeated to-morrow.

On the order for Bill (No. 8) respecting interest being called,

Mr. MULOCK. Might I be allowed to make plain my question. The recommendation I refer to is that of Mr. Fleming, as well as that of the commanding officer.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot do that on this order.

COMBINATIONS FORMED IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Mr. SPROULE moved second reading of Bill (No. 12) to amend the law relating to conspiracies and combinations formed in restraint of trade.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I think we should have some explanations from the hon. gentleman as to the nature of the amendments he proposes to make by this Bill and the reasons for those amendments.

Mr. SPROULE. The amendments proposed by this Bill consist in striking out three words in the old Bill, or rather one word in three different subsections. In section 520 of the Criminal Code there is a prohibition of combinations to unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, &c. By this Bill I propose to strike out the word "unduly," in paragraphs "c" and "d," so that they will read, in the first case, "to prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture," and in the second case, "to prevent or lessen competition." I may explain that the Bill passed this House twice with those words left out, and therefore the House assented twice to the Bill in that shape. The first time it passed this House and went to the Senate, these words were put in again, and the Bill became law in that shape. The Bill was again amended in this House by leaving out the word "unduly" in each of these three subsections, and went to the Senate again, but the word "unduly" was again introduced in the Senate. Afterwards it was introduced into the Senate with these words left out, passed the Senate, and came to this House; but it was so late in the session that before we reached the second reading the session was over. I propose now to endeavour to get the Bill passed and amended in this direction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 16) respecting the House of Commons.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 17) to facilitate voting by employees at the election of members for the House of Commons.—(Mr. Rider.)

SUPERANNUATION SYSTEM.

Order for:

Resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McMullen for second reading of Bill (No. 19) to abolish the superannuation system as applied to the Civil Service of Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker,——

Mr. SPEAKER. On a motion for resuming the adjourned debate, the hon. member can hardly resume the discussion.

Mr. McMULLEN. At the suggestion of the Minister of Finance, I think, I moved the adjournment of the debate myself.

Mr. SPEAKER. No hon. member can speak again on a resumed debate.

Mr. McMULLEN moved second reading of the Bill.

Mr. BERGERON. The hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Frémont) is in his seat, and he has not voted.

Motion negatived.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I move the second reading of Bill (No. 21) further to amend the Banking Act; and in so doing, Sir, I belive that I am proposing a measure of considerable importance, and, as a matter of fact, the most important measure which has yet come up before this House, from a business and commercial standpoint. It is not my intention, Sir, to review the history of the banking institutions which have suspended payment and become insolvent. My object now is not to go into all those details, but merely to explain the Bill which is before the House. The object of this Bill is to protect the shareholders and depositors, that is to say, those who place their savings in the banks. I believe that the depositors are still more interested in the good management of the banks than the shareholders themselves, because the depositors have very little security for their money. A certain number of shareholders use the credit of the bank as directors. They seek to do business on a large scale and with that end in view they borrow money from the bank without giving sufficient securities to cover those advances. That explains why banks are wrecked and why failures result. In my opinion, depositors have as much, if not more interest in the good management of the bank than the shareholders themselves. They make deposits in the bank in order to reap certain benefits, say, an interest of three or four per cent. which is admittedly a very modest profit, but still they do so under the belief that they have all possible securities. Now the banking law does not provide a sufficient security to depositors. For the bank which has only a paid-up capital stock, say of $1,000,000, is empowered under the statute to receive deposits to the amount of three, four or six million dollars. As a matter of fact, the amount of deposits which banks receive is unlimited. Those depositors believe that, when they have put their earnings in the bank, they are perfectly safe and they run no risk. Now, their deposits are guaranteed only by a capital stock which often reaches barely half a million or at most one million dollars. It often happens—and unhappily, it is quite too common an occurrence,—that a certain number of commercial men, when comes the time to elect the board of directors of a bank, qualify themselves as such, in order to get credit from the bank. Once they have been elected, those business men, open accounts with the bank to the amount of fifty, eighty and even one hundred thousand dollars. A few years later, these same men, as shown from experience, become insolvent, having open accounts with the bank to the tune of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars, although they are not worth one cent, or, at any rate, without having given one-tenth of that sum as security. No bank with a capital stock of a million or a million and a quarter dollars can possibly stand such a drain. It is with the deposits that such advances are made and they are lost when those business men become insolvent. The law must by all means be modified so as to protect the depositors and put a stop to such abuses. I believe that the Banking Act does not provide to limit the power of the directors as to the advances which they may make. For some years past, commercial men who wished to get more credit have been anxious to qualify themselves as directors, in buying a certain number of shares. In certain cases, merchants have even been known to get from their friends or relatives the loan of their shares, in order to qualify themselves as directors. And once they have been elected to the board, they took good care to draw as much money as possible from the bank, when they could do so. If a banking law were framed so that bank directors, no matter what may be their financial status, should be precluded from drawing money from the bank, or to get advances beyond the amount of their paid-up shares, I believe that it would be a good departure both for the shareholders and for the depositors. The law ought to be amended so as to have it enact that no bank director shall be allowed to draw from the bank, under the shape of credit or advances, an amount beyond that of his paid-up shares. I believe that such a measure would be calculated to prevent abuses, because a director who would have a capital stock of three hundred thousand dollars would be mighty careful not to make risky advances and thereby to impair or lose his capital and that of the other shareholders. They who wish to open accounts with a bank beyond their means with a view to increase their commercial transactions, are undesirable customers. Another abuse as to which I wish to call the attention of the House is this: Bank directors enter, as it were, into partnership with the cashier who has generally no other interest in the bank beyond the amount of his own salary, thus being in compact with that official who might inform against them and make known their doings to the shareholders. The cashier being an interested party, in so far as he borrows money from the bank, looks over the loans which the directors get from the bank on their own account. On the other hand, the cashier avails himself of his chances and the directors, interested in having mutual good understanding prevail between themselves and the cashier, do not interfere with him, in order to prevent him denouncing them to the shareholders. Money is the sinews of war and business; and they allow the cashier to open an account in his own name in the bank or even to lend the funds of the bank to other parties, to friends. I could mention the names of certain banks, but I will refrain from doing so. A certain bank—

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The Banque du Peuple.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I shall not mention any names. I merely state public facts. It has transpired, of late, that a bank official who was not worth a cent had one hundred thousand dollars credit in the bank of which he was cashier, and by whose authority, I ask, Sir ? The president of the bank stated that he had no knowledge of it. Bank directors, whose income amounts to very little, have been known to make considerable commercial transactions, after having drawn from the bank of which they were directors sums amounting to sixty and even one hundred thousand dollars. And when the shareholders, who meddled with the affairs of the bank only in so far as they had dividends to receive, wished to have some information about those transactions, they were told that they could get none, because that would interfere with the credit of the bank. That is, in my opinion, a good means of keeping the interested parties in the dark. One melancholy feature of those transactions is that poor widows and orphans have been thrown on the charity of the street, because they had deposited in the bank as a small deposit the balance that remained of an inheritance worth four, five or six thousand dollars. Such deposits represented all the fortune of those families which were ruined through the maladministration of the directors, and because under the banking law the directors are empowered to lend trust funds to themselves or to their friends without any serious guarantee. A certain number of families, after having deposited in a certain bank all their savings, depending upon the yearly interests to provide for their small expenditure, are now ruined and thrown on the charity of the street. But I may be told : We have a perfect banking law, and as perfect a system of banking as is to be found anywhere in America. Possibly at the time when it was framed, that law was as perfect as its framers could afford to make it, but the world moves on, and is progressing. I do not know whether that can be called progress, but, in common parlance, it goes under the name of sharpness. Nowadays, with the cleverness with which they manage their business, people succeed in deceiving the public, while avoiding to fall into the clutches of the criminal law. Matters have reached a point where it becomes necessary to amend the banking law. The Bill which is now before the House is not complete. I believe that the Government ought to have taken charge of it. I believe that they ought to consolidate the banking law. It needs to be consolidated. Guarantees should be given to the depositors rather than to the shareholders. Under the law as it now stands, banks are empowered to receive deposits far beyond the amount of their capital stock. Those deposits are made by poor labourers who put in the bank their small savings, and sometimes incur the risk of losing in one day deposits amounting to a few hundred dollars, the savings of several years. The Government, in my opinion, contribute to bring about such a state of affairs, because the banking law is not drastic enough and, in consequence, depositors are not given sufficient guarantees. There are also the Government Savings' Banks, and I am aware that they can receive deposits to the amount of several millions, and they are able to return them, as the country is security for them. But it is not so with the banks. It is easily understood how a bank which has a paid up capital of one million dollars and which receives six millions deposit, payable on demand, is often unable to repay them, at a given moment. But I am told : the bank transacts business with that money. That is the trouble with our banks. Several of our banks have become insolvent, and others were obliged to reduce their capital by one-half ; now, had they not been authorized to receive deposits for an amount beyond their paid up capital stock, they would not have been wrecked and failure would have been avoided, and the poor labourers, the widows and orphans would not have lost their savings ; they would not now be dependent on public charity or on that of their relations or friends. We have been taught by experience prudence in money matters ; and, although plain-dealing and honesty have their merit, still prudence requires that we should act as if we suspected those with whom we deal of being dishonest ; that is the best way not to be imposed upon. When we transact business with a bank, it is that we believe it to be a safe institution, and that is preferable to put our money in it, than lending it to other parties or upon mortgage or hypothecation. Now, as most people are very little or not at all conversant with the Banking Act, and above all the depositors, it often happens that they are gulled. I say that this law ought to be made more drastic than any other, because the future of poor families is at stake. If the Government choose to let the banks continue receiving deposits, I have no objection to that, provided they see to it that no bank be allowed to receive deposits beyond its paid up capital stock. Under the Bill now before the House, no bank directors are entitled to the right of lending trust funds to themselves for a sum larger than the amount of capital they contribute to the bank. Such a provision is a guarantee, as I am going to show. Should they take away from the directors the power of borrowing from their own banking institutions a sum larger than the amount of their paid up stock, you would not have sitting at the board of directors so many men anxious to get there for the sole purpose of borrowing money from the bank ; but on the contrary, you would have there capitalists who would not need borrowing funds from the institution, thus affording a guarantee to the public, and such men would also show themselves very strict in their dealings with the customers of the bank. If a merchant wished to open an account, such directors, being interested in protecting themselves as shareholders, would also protect the public. Customers would not come and tell such directors, as certain directors were told, under other circumstances: You have fifty thousand dollars discount; your solvency is no better than mine; I want you to make me an advance of ten thousand dollars. Then, commercial men who depend on the banks to make large commercial transactions, would feel more reluctance to go and ask the directors to open an account, because of the board being composed of men of independent means bound to protect their own interests as well as those of others. I believe that the banking law should be so amended that nobody could be elected director of a bank of a half a million capital stock, unless he had fifty thousand dollars of paid up shares; and in the same ratio, one hundred thousand dollars of paid up shares, in a bank having one million capital. I may be told, perhaps, that the change I advocate is impracticable, because, if so considerable a sum of paid up shares were required, the bank would be without directors. Such an objection is groundless, because, in my opinion, the better the guarantee, the better will the shareholders be protected, and the more will people be inclined to become shareholders. In order to become director, nowadays in certain banks, it is enough to hold shares to the amount of five thousand dollars, and it sometimes happens that out of these five thousand dollars, there is only fifty per cent paid up. With other banks, a capital of ten thousand dollars is required. Now, as to the commercial man who becomes director with a capital of ten thousand dollars in paid up shares and who has made advances of twenty-five, thirty or forty thousand dollars to himself, how could he decline granting the same favour to a customer who wishes to open an account with the bank? I would further suggest an enactment to the effect that the board of directors should not be allowed to lend either directly or indirectly a dollar of money from the bank to any bank official, and that if a director should permit such a thing, that director should, ipso facto, be disqualified and cease to be a member of the board. Such an enactment would be a guarantee against bank officials using the trust funds for speculative purposes. Those officials would then devote all their energies to fulfilling their duties and honestly earning their salary. A stop would thus be put to that system whereby a bank official opens a personal account for speculative purposes or with a view to helping relatives and friends to speculate on the funds of the bank. It may perhaps be urged that officials to whom advances are made and who fail to repay them are dismissed. Quite true, Sir; those officials may possibly lose their situation, but it is also true that the bank loses its funds and finally, it is the depositors who lose their money.

I said that the present Bill was necessary, in order to guarantee the interests of depositors, and why so? As a matter of fact—and I do not speak here of capitalists who make large deposits amounting to one hundred thousand dollars, of men who are conversant with the financial transactions of the exchange and who watch them closely, for, such men know how to protect themselves—but I speak of small depositors, of those men who are not free to watch so closely the operations of the money market, because they have to provide for the daily bread of their family, and those, I say, are the very men whom the law should protect. As to the capitalist, he is quite able to protect himself, and has no need of the law. No sooner does he hear of the slightest suspicion transpiring about the solidity of the bank where he makes his deposits, than he hastens to withdraw his money, and the withdrawal of those funds impairs the credit of the bank. The public is always warned in the end. The fact that an important depositor has withdrawn his money gives rise to suspicion and apprehension. They say: Mr. So-and-so, who has made a deposit in the bank, has withdrawn his money from it; he is a wealthy capitalist, and there must be something wrong with the bank, when a man of his means withdraws his deposit. The small depositor then infers the fact that he had better withdraw his money, for fear of losing it. Those depositors are the very men who, like the minorities, are entitled to protection at the hands of the law, because they have no time to make inquiries, as they must devote their whole energies to the support of their families. Moreover, many of them lack the necessary experience for closely watching banking transactions and to post themselves about all circumstances connected with the exchange. When those small depositors hear that such a bank is shaky, and that its credit is becoming involved, the bank in question has already closed its doors, and a large number of those depositors are forced to sell their deposits, as occurred quite recently, at forty or fifty cents in the dollar. If the banking law were made more drastic and required better security, mainly with regard to bank deposits, if the law, I say, enacted that those deposits should not exceed the amount of the paid in capital, I believe that such an enactment would afford better security to the depositors and to shareholders alike, who would not incur the risk, as they do now, of making losses involving, in many cases, the ruin of their fortune. Let us take a bank with a capital of one million and a quarter, and having received deposits amounting to five or six millions. Instead of making advances in proportion to the capital in hand, the directors of that bank make commercial transactions with their customers, out of their trust funds. It often happens that those commercial men are forced to compound with their creditors, and we know cases where they found themselves indebted to the bank to the tune of seven hundred thousand dollars. Then it happens that the bank is obliged to take as security property worth about one hundred thousand dollars, on which it cannot realize, while it has to pay taxes, assessments and insurance premiums. As the Bill under discussion is highly important, not only for a portion of the country, for the city of Montreal, but also for the city of Toronto and the rest of the Dominion, I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I admit, Sir, that at this advanced stage of the session, the House cannot debate this Bill at any length ; that is the reason why I say that the Bill should be referred to the Banking Committee for consideration, and I believe that, next session, the Government, whether the Liberals or the Conservatives are in power, will be ready to place before the House amendments to the Banking Act, in order to give better securities to the depositors in our various banks, and better guarantees to the shareholders, to the benefit of the general public. If we allowed the Banking Act to remain as it stands now, and as operated within the last few years, our system of banking, of which we boast so much, will not be much appreciated by the public. Last year, I heard several hon. members say : Look at the United States, where banking institutions foundered by hundreds, swallowing up the fortunes of thousands of families which were thrown on the charity of the street, after having been up to that moment looked upon as wealthy people. Here in Canada, we had no such collapse. I say, Sir, that we must prevent such a calamity, for if our Canadian banks were wrecked, as it happened in the United States, we would have very little left. Our banking law ought, of necessity, to be consolidated. I speak in the interests of Montreal, for I am better acquainted with the state of affairs in that city than anywhere else. The banking law ought to be consolidated and modified, so as to afford better securities to depositors, who are clamouring for such a change, calculated to so protect them as to place them beyond the risk of losing one single cent of their deposits. Now, if in the commercial metropolis of Canada, if in Montreal, which is the great business centre of the Dominion—and I make no exception for Toronto, because, if Montreal did not exist, Toronto would have very little commercial activity, being too far from the centre of business——

Mr. COCKBURN. How is that ?

Mr. JEANNOTTE, (Translation.) I am going to explain my meaning. In order to communicate with England, via the St. Lawrence, Toronto commercial men have to pass through Montreal, and it is because we treat them well that they come down to Montreal to take the steamers. If Montreal had not such a fine harbour as the one we have, they would have to pass through the United States, where they would not meet with as kind a reception as they do in Montreal. But we are happy to see the Toronto people coming down to Montreal, because the better they know us the better we will understand each other. To come back to the Bill now before the House. I would like to know whether the Government intend, as early as possible, to modify the banking law so as to afford better security to both depositors and shareholders, and so that the banks shall not be authorized to receive deposits beyond the amount of their paid in capital stock. I am aware that, last session, in July last, Parliament declined incorporating a company seeking incorporation as an institution, to receive small deposits from five to ten cents. The Government declared that they could incorporate such companies, because they had savings banks which afforded better security to the public than those companies could do. The Government were undoubtedly right, under the circumstances, but in order to be consistent with themselves, they ought to prevent banks receiving deposits beyond the securities which they can afford. If not, the Government would be inconsistent in declining to give incorporation to other companies, under whatever name, on the ground that they do not afford sufficient securities. Now, under the law as it stands, in order to be a bank director, one must own shares to the amount of ten thousand dollars in the banking institution, and those directors may loan to themselves the whole bank capital. If there were nine directors in all, they would only require to own shares to the amount of five thousand dollars each or forty-five thousand dollars in all, and they would be entitled, under the law, to borrow the whole bank capital, or one million dollars. And who suffers therefrom ? Not the directors, but the shareholders, and, chiefly, the poor depositors. In moving this amendment, as I said at the outset, I do not wish to throw any blame on the banks which receive large deposits, in so far as they remain within the limits prescribed by the statute. It may, perhaps, be urged that under the law as it stands, a director who knowingly is guilty of breach of office and maladministration of the bank business, may be arrested and sent to prison. But would poor depositors be thereby repaid the money they have lost? Would poor widows and orphans be thereby repaid the small capital, the only resource left them to provide for a rainy day ? The directors may be sent to jail, but the money would not thereby be reimbursed. The object which I have in view would dispense with applying that penalty to bank directors, if the law were amended in such a direction, as to take away from them the opportunity of going to jail, and hence they would well administer the affairs of the bank, and could not render themselves liable to such a penalty, unless they were robbers. If a bank director with $5,000 of stock were not entitled to loan to himself an amount beyond that of his paid-up shares, or allow his friends among the capitalists and commercial men to open large accounts, heavy losses would thereby be averted, and all the evils which I have pointed out would be avoided. I may be told that in such cases it would be necessary to pay large salaries to have the affairs of the bank administered, because very few persons would be willing to go to the bank two or three times in the week for the transaction of business—for time is money—and no bank directors could therefore be found. The honour of being director will always be an incentive for business men to accept that position. The more drastic the law will be with regard to bank directors and bank cashiers, the more security it will afford to depositors, shareholders, to commercial men, and it will prove beneficial to the latter, as only the honest man who is making bona fide commercial transactions would then have credit at the bank. Men whose whole capital consists in advances and discounts from the banks would no longer be able to make transactions like millionaires. From the very fact that bank directors will no longer be interested as borrowers, they will show more concern for the progress of the institution, and for the profits it may realize. They will no longer be tempted to further their business or their trade by means of advances they may make to themselves as bank directors. So that bank directors will give to the bank all their labour, their brains, all the benefit of their financial attainments, and they will more closely watch the operations of the bank. They will make advances to none but solvent customers, to persons offering reliable security by their social and commercial standing in the community. The bank will then have the guarantee of being paid the amount of each bank note discounted. If it were necessary to give directors a higher salary in order to secure their time and their services, I say that both the bank and the shareholders would be benefited thereby. When a man transacts my business creditably, he deserves to be paid double the salary I would give another man who would manage to his personal benefit and to my personal risk. The man who manages my business well, who increases my capital, who contributes to the progress of my firm, deserves to be well paid, and notwithstanding the high salary I may give him, I will still be the winner in the long run. The man who has only a small salary says to himself : Now, I have only $1,000 a year, and I am going to work for just the amount I am paid. He does not busy himself with the interests of others, nor with the progress of the business of his employer ; he comes to the office at nine o'clock in the morning and leaves at four o'clock in the afternoon, not caring for anything beyond being present during office hours. Bank directors who are not paid say to themselves : Why should we go and spend three hours a day to manage the affairs of the bank, and neglect our own business ? and how can we be benefited by transacting the bank's business and neglecting our own business ? If, on the contrary, a bank director were to have a sufficient salary, let us say $20 for each meeting, the shareholders might tell him, in case he should neglect the affairs of the bank : Why did you not attend to the business of the bank ? Why did you take your salary without having earned it ? Now, a bank director may say to himself : I am not paid as director, and I am not going to waste my time on that banking business. I do not believe that such a state of things is beneficial to the shareholders themselves. Bank directors ought not to loan trust funds to themselves or to accept bank notes, the whole value of which is represented by the name signed at the foot of it. Banks show themselves very exacting with customers who are not commercial men ; for as to professional men, Sir, banks never lost much, because when they advance money to them they require so many securities, that they do not incur the risk of losing a single cent. It is with the higher branches of trade that banks lose money. Wholesale men are given an almost unlimited credit, and the day comes when those large commercial firms become insolvent, leaving banking institutions their creditors for amounts sometimes reaching a million. That happened, Sir, not so very long ago in this country. Those large firms then came and offered twenty-five cents in the dollar. The bank lost money : the savings of the shareholders and of the depositors were swallowed up in those failures. If bank cashiers were free to speak out what they know, abuses like those witnessed not so very long ago would never occur. And yet, it is stated that the capital borrowed from the banks amounts to some $600,000. And what security did the bank have for the reimbursement of such a sum ? None. If such a fact occurred, it is because the banking law does not afford sufficient security and protection to the public, to the depositors and to the shareholders. The board of directors are allowed too full scope. But I may be told : How are you going to refuse to directors the right to loan money to themselves, when they have a right to lend it to others ? Such is the mainspring of all the evils we complain of, and if no change were made to the law, heavier failures and collapses would be in store for us in the near future. When a bank suspends payment, it is a public calamity, because a great many people are brought to grief, who had toiled to earn the money deposited by them in the bank, under the belief that it was in a safe place. At the very moment when they need their money, they find themselves deprived of their hard-earned savings, as happened not long ago. I now bring my remarks to a close. I believe that I have made sufficiently clear my meaning, and my object in bringing down this Bill to the House, and I call the attention of the Government to it.

The present law is not satisfactory. The law should be consolidated and more effective provisions inserted than exist now, and special provision should be made that directors of banks should not be able to borrow money from their own banking institutions, except to the amount paid by them for stock. Again, a bank should not have power to receive deposits beyond the amount if its capital. I know of a Montreal bank, with a capital of $1,000,000, which receives deposits to the extent of $6,000,000. If the depositors were suddenly to demand their money, they could not be reimbursed. The working classes, of course, cannot lend money on mortgage, and are, therefore, obliged to deposit their money in banks, and they believe that these institutions afford them the greatest security. There is no guarantee, however, when a bank receives deposits equivalent to six times its capital. Whenever a rumour arises that the bank is in a shaky condition, small depositors at once claim their deposits, and, as these cannot be immediately returned, the bank closes its doors, and, in some cases, these poor depositors lose their earnings, and even become recipients of charity. The Government should take these suggestions into their serious consideration, and, although it is said that our banking law is more perfect than any known, in my opinion, it could be improved in the direction I have indicated. Last year, a company sought incorporation as an institution to receive deposits. The Government refused it incorporation. It is pointed out that we have now Government savings banks, and that they afford a guarantee to depositors. While the Government refused to allow a company of, say, ten individuals, with a capital of $500,000, to take deposits to the extent of two or three millions, at the same time they allow existing banks to receive deposits to the extent of about six times their capital. The Government should take my Bill into their serious consideration, and introduce a measure next session dealing with all the banks, and containing a provision forbidding directors borrowing money from their own banking institution, except up to the value of their stock. At the present time the surplus funds of a bank may be all loaned to directors and employees.

Before resuming my seat, Sir, I beg to move, with your permission, that the present Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. MULOCK. I thought from the concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jeannotte) that he did not contemplate pressing this measure any further, and I am therefore surprised that a motion has been made referring it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. With all respect to the hon. gentleman, I would say, that the proposition in the Bill appears to be a rather immature one at least, and I submit that the Banking and Commerce Committee could not, for one moment, assent to any such proposition as is involved in this Bill. If it became law, it might happen at any time that a bank would be without any directors at all. The proposition is, that if a director should permit any officer of a bank, however humble, to borrow a dollar of money from the bank, then, ipso facto, that director ceases to be a member of the board. You might possibly, therefore, have a bank with large interests involved, and no board of directors to take charge, leaving the whole property in danger. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jeannotte) of course does not contemplate any such state of affairs as that. If there is anything unwise in lending to officials, the remedy suggested in this Bill is not adequate. I think there is a mistaken idea, too, as to the unwisdom of banks lending to their directors. I admit, that in the abstract, there is a conflict of duty in bankers lending trust funds to themselves, but there has no evil come from that in Canada under our present Banking Act. In times gone by, banks have suffered from that cause, but I am not aware that under the present Bank Act there has been any abuse.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman cannot be aware of the Commercial Bank of Manitoba.

Mr. MULOCK. Manitoba was an exceptional case altogether.

Mr. DALY. An exceptional bank.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, an exceptional bank.

Mr. MARTIN. But still it shows what can be done under the system.

Mr. MULOCK. We cannot make laws to deal with exceptional cases. In many instances, the directors are the safest men to loan to, and if you carried out this rule, you would perhaps deprive many a bank of some of its best customers. It is well enough to introduce the proposition, but I think it would be much better to withdraw it now. It has not received a great deal of consideration, and it would be only waste of time to forward it to the Banking Committee. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jeannotte) says that if any director should borrow an amount equal to his stock, he would cease to be a director. Does the hon. gentleman mean the par value of the stock.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Paid up.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, some stock is not worth anything like the amount paid up. Some stock is not worth par, and the hon. gentleman is indirectly sanctioning a loan to a director, of a sum equal to the par value, which would be much in excess of the market value of the stock. As to that class of stock, he would be injuring the bank by indirectly giving statutory authority to the directors to borrow up to the par value of the stock. On the other hand, in the case of bank stock that might be 200 or 300 per cent above par, he would be depriving the bank of a very good opportunity of loaning. No matter how you look at this Bill, I do not think any of its provisions are worthy of being adopted. I may say, in making these remarks, that I am not a director of any bank, but I have had occasion to notice the working of our Bank Act, and it is from my observations that I have drawn these conclusions.

Mr. COCKBURN. I agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) that it would be better, after some discussion, that the Bill should be dropped for this session, and when we meet again—as we must meet soon again—we would be able to take up this question. I sympathize with my friend (Mr. Jeannotte) fully in his deeply-felt sympathy for the widows and the orphans. He pictured to us a poor widow with her thirty or forty piastres in her pocket, and he seemed to think that in the case of a bank failing, this poor woman would be thrown on the charity of the street. I beg to remind the hon. gentleman that five years ago our banking system was fully and ably discussed, that we had at that time in the Banking and Commerce Committee, representatives from the leading banks of this country, and that after lengthy consultation and protracted debate, a Bill was passed which, I believe, is about as perfect as a Banking Act could be made under present circumstances. My friend (Mr. Jeannotte) has wasted his sympathy on these widows and orphans, for he has forgotten that every bank pays five per cent of it circulation to the Government, and that a fund of some million and a half dollars is provided as a guarantee for the redemption of the notes. The moment a bank suspends or fails, these notes begin to bear interest, and at the present rate of interest, 6 per cent, the notes would be at a premium, so that the poor widow would have her $30 safe, and perhaps make a dollar in addition. My friend (Mr. Jeannotte) seemed to think that a bank ought to be restricted in its loans to exactly the amount of its capital.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Not to receive deposits exceeding its capital.

Mr. COCKBURN. Therefore, a bank with $1,000,000 capital could only have $1,000,000 deposits. When the hon. gentleman reviews the history of banking in Canada, he will see that it has been a marked success: such a success as has excited the admiration, not only of banking men in the neighbouring republic, but throughout the known world. We have adopted to a great extent the Scotch system, and engrafted thereon securities and safeguards of our own which place us beyond the peril of loss, at any rate so far as these poor note holders are concerned. At present, the security is somewhat collossal, for while the banks have thirty or forty millions deposit, they have some $330,000,000 securities. Therefore, for every dollar the poor woman referred to by the hon. member (Mr. Jeannotte) may put in the bank, she has $10 security, and for her $30 she has $300 to secure it. I hope that after that assurance, my hon. friend (Mr. Jeannotte) can sleep to-night calmly, and not let his heart be disturbed by any wrong, real or imaginary, which may fall on any poor orphan or widow in the Dominion. Since 1870, for more than a quarter of a century, we have had only one failure in which the notes have not been fully redeemed; and, with the alterations and amendments made in the Banking Act five or six years ago, such a thing can scarcely occur again. The position in which my hon. friend wants to put bank directors, is rather anomalous. A bank is a congregation of gentlemen who have subscribed a certain amount of money, and whose business it is to buy and sell money; and, apart from the fact that we have to guard against loss by noteholders, I do not think it is our duty to interfere unduly with the banks in regard to the mode in which they conduct their business. I think the shareholders are able to manage their own affairs; and, if we, as a Parliament, interfere with them in these matters, we shall be assuming responsibilities which we are in no position to fulfil. My hon. friend suggests that bank directors should have very small advances—at any rate, advances not larger than the amount of capital they contribute to the bank. My hon. friend, in making such a proposal, seems to forget that an advance is not made by a bank to an applicant on the ground that he has a certain amount of money invested in the bank as a shareholder. In fact, a bank is forbidden by law to make any such advances; it can only make advances on such securities as appear to it to be ample to cover the loan given. No shareholder can go to a bank and ask, because he happens to have $10,000 of stock in it, that a loan of $1,000, or even of one dollar, should be made to him on that stock. So far as that is concerned, the public is perfectly protected. I believe that directors, instead of having, as is suggested, little or no interest in the bank, should be encouraged to have a large interest in it; and, in the selection of directors, it is not an uncommon thing for banks to look for men who, not only have large capital, but who are engaged in large commercial transactions, because such men increase the security of the bank, and help it to do a large and safe business. However, I do not wish to detain the House. If it is desired by the House that this Bill should go to the Banking and Commerce Committee, we shall then be in a position to bring here a number of the leading bankers and commercial men of the country and obtain their views. But, as the time is so short before this House must be dissolved, perhaps my hon. friend will consider how inconvenient it is to go on with the Bill, which cannot be carried to a conclusion this session. I would, therefore, ask him, whether, under the circumstances, he would not consider it advisable, while allowing the discussion to go on, to withdraw the Bill in the meantime?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I understand, Sir, that the Committee on Banking and Commerce, in order to discuss a measure of such importance, as the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn) just remarked, would be obliged to summon here the banking men and the business men of the country, and that, owing to the advanced stage of the session, it is practically impossible to do so.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) The hon. member has no right to speak twice to the same question. He may at most ask leave to withdraw his motion.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Well, Sir, I will ask leave to withdraw the motion. I have moved to the effect that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION.

Mr. MARTIN moved second reading of Bill (No. 22) further to amend chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, being the North-west Territories Representation Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is for the purpose of changing the law in the North-west Territories with regard to voting at elections. I explained the provisions of the Bill very fully on the first reading. In the North-west Territories the Franchise Act is not in operation. Two years ago the Government, when applying the provisions of the Election Act with regard to voting by ballot to the North-west Territories, dealt with the question of a voters' list. Prior to that time, there practically was no voters' list in the Dominion elections there. A voters' list was prepared, but, under the provisions of the Act, any person entitled to be an elector could have his name added to the list on election day; so that, for preventing any one from voting or enabling any one to vote, the list was of no account. In 1894, when the provisions with regard to the ballot were extended to the North-west Territories, the provisions of the law with regard to voting there were not changed, that law providing for a purely manhood suffrage; that is to say, every person who was a British subject, who was twenty-one years of age, and who had resided a certain time in the electoral district, was entitled to vote, entirely irrespective of any other qualification. When that Bill went to the Senate, a provision was added, the result of which was to provide for a list of electors in the Territories, which, like the list of electors provided by the Franchise Act, was to be final. I may say that that very fundamental change in the law was never discussed in this House. When the amendments came back from the Senate, it is true, they were duly passed by this House, and appeared, as all such amendments do, in the Journals: but no one reading them would know what the effect of them was. I fancy that most of the members of this House thought they were immaterial changes, as most of them really were; but one amendment repealed section 44 of the old North-west Territories Representation Act, which provided that an elector might vote, on having his name put on the list by the deputy returning officer on the day of election. I myself did not observe the change in the law. I may say that in the debate that took place upon the Bill before it went to the Senate, several members discussed this question as to the advisability of leaving the law as it was, and it was thoroughly understood that it should be left as it was. The attention of the House was drawn to the position in which the law was up there as to voters' lists, and I myself took the ground that the voters' lists was an immaterial matter entirely in the Territories, on account of the existence of this particular clause, which practically allowed every voter to vote, whether his name was on the lists or not. I remember stating that we might as well save the expense of a voters' lists, under the circumstances. But it was claimed by one of the members from the Territories that the list was necessary because without it it would not be possible to poll all the votes within the time limited by the Election Act. This very vital change was made in the Senate. I think it will be admitted by the House that changes of this kind should not be made in the Senate. This is one of the matters surely which should originate in this House—an alteration in the law with regard to the constitution of this House. It does seem to me that it is going very far for the Senate to undertake to make that vital change in the law. Of course, it is quite true that the Senate has the power to make a law of that kind and send it back here for approval ; but it was entirely unexpected that they should think of making any such change, and I think it was very unfortunate that they should have undertaken to do so. It has since been explained in this House that the changes made in the Senate were made at the instance, I understand, of Senator Perley, who acted at the suggestion of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) ; and I understand that the hon. member for East Assiniboia is the only representative from the Territories who advocates the change. I understand that the reason he gives is the possibilities of false voting, personation and repeating, which, he claims, are very prevalent in the Territories. We have not the pleasure very often of hearing from the hon. member for East Assiniboia in this House, and I think, if he desires to add to the legislation of Parliament, he should do so in this House and not through the medium of a friend in the Senate. The matter was first brought fully to the attention of this House when, in 1895, the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) introduced a Bill here to remedy some slight errors that were made in the legislation of 1894 ; and upon examining these changes, it appeared quite evident what a change in the law had been made the previous session. Very serious protests were made against the change in 1895. The hon. Minister was urged very strongly by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and other members on this side not to press it, and I think the position taken by this side was agreed to by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and not objected to by any hon. member for the Territories. The hon. Minister declined, however, to accede to this protest ; and as the matter was only brought to the attention of the House in the dying days of the session of 1895, we had no opportunity of really discussing the question. In the meantime, public attention in the Territories had been directed to the matter, and the North-west Territories assembly passed a resolution, which I read in full on the first reading of this Bill of mine. In that resolution, they drew attention to the very unfortunate position in which the Territories would be placed at an election on account of this change, and they urged that one of three things be done,—either that the Franchise Act applicable to the rest of the Dominion should be put in force there ; or that the territorial law with regard to elections should be adopted ; or that the law should be put back where it was. This resolution was introduced in the North-west Territories assembly by Mr. Insinger, member for the northern part of Eastern Assiniboia, and was supported unanimously by the assembly, a majority of which are supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite. I may say also that the amendment by which it is proposed to adopt the old system as one of the alternatives, was suggested by Mr. Haultain, who occupies the position practically of Premier of the Territories, and who is also the candidate, on behalf of the Government, for the constituency of Alberta. Under these circumstances, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) introduced Bill (No. 20), which has not yet had its second reading ; and not knowing that that hon. gentleman had the matter in hand, I likewise introduced the present Bill for the purpose of carrying out the desires of the assembly and of rectifying what I thought was a very unfair law. I may say that it is quite impossible, at this stage in our history, to attempt to apply the Franchise Act to the Territories, because there is not now sufficient time to provide a list under that Act. Then as to applying the territorial law, there would perhaps be no very great objection to that, except that it is not in accord with the policy of the Government to adopt a provincial law with regard to voting. We had at one time the assurance that such a policy met with the approval of the late Sir John Thompson while he was leading this Government ; and we were in hopes, during the last session he was in the House, that he would carry out the suggestions which had fallen from us, at different times, of the advisability of adopting that principle, namely, of recognizing the provincial franchise and electoral lists for this House. So that, practically, if we are to rectify this wrong it comes down to the re-enactment of section 44, in order that a man who is entitled to vote may know whether his name is on the list of voters or not. And the reason why the assembly were so unanimous in condemning the change in the law, and the reason why I think I can appeal confidently to this House to make the change is that there are no sufficient delays provided for, and it is quite impossible, in the nature of things, to provide sufficient delay in making this list to enable both parties fairly to get their names upon it. The list is not to be made out at all until a proclamation is issued for an election. As soon as that proclamation issues, the Government appoint enumerators for each polling division. The enumerator makes a list for the polling subdivision. He has nothing to commence with except what knowledge he may have of the subdivision. It is not necessary under the law for the Government to appoint a resident of the polling subdivision, and it might happen, and it would happen, probably, that the enumerator would have very little actual knowledge as to which electors should have their names upon the list. However, he is to do the best he can, and, certainly, if he were a partisan, and were inclined to use his position for the purpose of aiding his party he would have unlimited opportunities to do so. He could make the list in any way he sees fit, putting on names or leaving them off as he wished. And no delays are given, such as would afford an opportunity to either party to really get the list right. The list is to be made up in eight days only before the polling, that is, it is completed the day before nomination. It is then posted—written out, for there is no time to print it—in two places in the polling subdivision. It is quite impossible for the electors to know where it is posted, as no provision concerning that appears in the Act. So it is a mere matter of chance whether the person entitled to be an elector sees the list or not. But if he has the good fortune to see the list posted up, and finds on examining it that his name is not on the list, he must make application within six days, that is two days before the election, to the enumerator to have his name put upon the list. But first he must find the enumerator ; there is no place fixed where he can be addressed. As soon as the list is put up the enumerator may leave the subdivision, in fact, he may never have been in it at all. If the citizen can find him, he has the privilege of saying to him : You have omitted my name from the list. But the enumerator is not bound to pay the slightest attention ; he may leave the list uncorrected, and there is no means to compel him to correct it. There are no provisions, as in the Franchise Act, for the posting in schoolhouses of the list and for distributing it, giving everybody an opportunity of learning whether his name is on the list or not, and giving every person time to make proper application to the revising officer to get his name upon the list. As I said before, it is practically no list at all. It simply leaves it in the hands of the men appointed by the Government to do as they see fit. I suppose we have no right to assume that these gentlemen will not do their duty, but that is very little protection. In the matter of the voters' lists, it is most important that every elector should have a fair opportunity of proving his right to be upon the list ; and if he proves his right there should be no such provisions in the law as would ensure that name going upon the list. But no such provision appears in this Act. For that reason, I have felt it my duty to call the attention of the House to the matter, and so has the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). A few days ago, when the Government announced their intention of taking Mondays and Thursdays, I drew their attention to these Bills, and I was assured—at any rate, the hon. member for West Assiniboia stood in his place and stated—that the Government intended to introduce an Act for the purpose of making this matter right. No such Act has been introduced, and, as time is passing, and we are getting close to the end of the session, and as there is a large amount of business to be done—practically no Government business has been done yet—I am much disappointed at not seeing a Bill upon the Order paper for the purpose ; for the assurance given by the hon. member for West Assiniboia as to the Government's intention was corroborated, I am not sure by whom, but I think by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Dickey). And if that course is adopted—of course I do not suggest that the Government do not intend to adopt it—it will be very satisfactory indeed to the people of the North-west generally. The only suggestion that I have to make is that, the Government having decided to do it, it will be advisable that it shall be done at an early day in order that the measure may go to the Senate with time to be passed there and so become law. I would ask that my Bill be read a second time in the meantime, and then allowed to stand, the committee stage not being taken now, so that the Government may have an opportunity to bring down their measure.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

REBATE ON IMPORTED CORN.

Mr. McMULLEN moved second reading of Bill (No. 23) in further amendment of the Customs Tariff, 1894. He said : A short time ago, during the present session, I asked for a return of the amount of corn imported into this country and ground presumably for human food. I have here the return which was laid upon the Table, and I find that during last year the quantity of corn imported into this country, corn to be ground presumably for human food under the regulation made by the Government for that purpose, was 642,507 bushels. I find we paid on corn thus imported, as rebate of duty, $43,369.20. Now, I do not wish for a moment to impute to residents or dealers in any province, any dishonesty, but I would respectfully submit that it is impossible that such an enormous quantity of corn as that would be imported, and ground, and used for human food. My object in introducing this Bill is not to prevent the use of corn for human food, but to extend the provision so as to permit corn to be brought in and used for food, simply extracting from the clause the word "human." In this country, particularly in the province from which I come, the raising of stock is becoming a most important feature of agricultural industry, and it is highly desirable that the farmers should be allowed to supply themselves with the cheapest and best food that the continent will afford for the purposes for which they want it. For instance this year, if the farmers were permitted to bring in corn for the purpose of feeding cattle and hogs, they could lay down corn for about half a cent a pound. There is no food to be got in this country at the present moment that is anything like equal to corn, that can be procured for half a cent a pound. My object is to give the farming community the privilege of bringing in and grinding in bond, corn for food, either human food or animal food, just as they feel disposed to use it. This will give the agriculturists in the Dominion the opportunity of taking advantage of corn when it is to be got on the other side at a very low price. We know that year before last corn was high, and this last year it has been exceedingly low. The crop in the United States was very large, and consequently it could be bought and brought in very advantageously. This year particularly, when food for cattle has been so scarce, a great many farmers in the district from which I come have had to bring in large quantities of all kinds of food for their cattle, and had they been able to get corn at the exceedingly low price at which it could have been laid down, it would have been a decided boon to the farmers of the country this year. I wrote to the Minister of Finance some months ago suggesting that a change should be immediately made by Order in Council, permitting the farmers to enjoy that advantage, seeing that they required so much food this year in excess of what they raised themselves. But nothing was done in the matter, and they have been compelled to get along as best they could, without any effort or any move being made in the direction of enabling them to supply themselves with what they required. Now, Sir, I find that in the province of New Brunswick there were 174,452 bushels of corn imported, and presumably ground into human food. The rebate upon that quantity was $12,486.89. They are entitled to draw 90 per cent of the duty paid if it is ground into human food, and there is only 10 per cent of the duty retained. Then I find in Nova Scotia there were 268,839 bushels imported and presumably ground into human food, upon which there was $18,211.17 of a rebate. Now, take the province of Ontario, and I am quite certain that I am within the mark when I say that over half of what is ground in that province is barrelled up and sent east to the other provinces; and the entire rebate in the province of Ontario, which is larger than Nova Scotia and New Brunswick together, was only $11,489.71. But without at all imputing anything wrong to any province, or any section, I simply ask that alterations should be made which would enable the famers, if they choose, to import corn and have it ground in bond, and use it either for human food or for animal food, which ever they consider best. With these explanations, which I hope the House will consider sufficient, I move the second reading of the Bill that stands in my name.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think myself that the Government should by all means allow this Bill to pass. During the present season a great many farmers in the province of Ontario have been compelled to buy food for cattle on account of the unfavourable season we had last year for crops. A great many farmers who have had coarse grains, both barley and oats, have sold those grains, and purchased corn, which they mix with some of their coarse grains to feed to their cattle. We have found that corn is the most profitable food to buy for cattle. Now, the Government are always telling us what they are doing to assist the dairymen and to help the farmer. I hold that giving a rebate of duty upon corn brought in for human food and for animal food, would be one of the greatest benefits that could be conferred upon the farmers at the present time. In the counties of Grey and Bruce, and in the north part of Huron, a great many farmers are compelled to buy food for cattle, and although we have got to pay an extra duty of 7½ cents per bushel, yet with that extra duty, many of the farmers are purchasing and bringing in large quantities of corn in order to keep their stock over. As one that keeps stock all the time and feeds all the corn he possibly can, I must say that this present winter we have sold a considerable portion of our coarse grains and purchased corn, believing that it is best to do so, and believing that it is a better food when mixed than what we are selling; and we also get a variety of food by mixing corn with other grains. Where a farmer is confined to one kind of food he cannot feed as successfully as a farmer can who has a variety of food, and there is no other food I know of that can be imported into the country for feeding stock, that does not come in free, that would benefit the farmer as much as corn. I see that 1,485,980 bushels of corn came into the country for consumption last year. Now, when corn was accustomed to come in free, we used to import over five million bushels in the Dominion of Canada, that was brought in and entered for consumption. That corn was a great benefit to the farmers at that time, and we could feed much more successfully than we can at the present time. I know that some contend it would reduce the price of our coarse grains, but I say, as a farmer, that it would not and does not reduce the price of our coarse grains. I have shown on many occasions that, when we had large quantities of corn consumed, our coarse grain realized better prices than when small quantities of corn were consumed. In a great many places in Ontario there are farmers who keep stock during the summer on low-lying lands, where they are able to raise a certain quantity of hay, but not sufficient to feed the cattle, and it would be a great benefit to those farmers to be able to import corn and obtain a rebate. I hope the Government will take into consideration this matter, and grant some relief in the direction I have indicated, because I believe that a considerable quantity of corn brought in at the present time is used for human food and also for feeding animals, and, in my opinion, a mixture of corn and our coarse grains makes a cheaper and better food than either corn alone, or pease and oats. If the farmers can secure this favour from the Government—although I do not consider it to be a favour, but a concession that should be extended to them—it will prove of greater value than many of the so-called benefits which are promised to the farmers. This would be a direct benefit and not a doubtful one, and, moreover, it would be a benefit the value of which would be almost immediately felt, whereas in many instances expenditures supposed to be in the interests of the farmers are not only very doubtful, but the results are not realized until after a long period. This is a most important question, and it is one that at present presses itself very strongly on the farmers of Ontario, because we have been brought face to face with low prices for cheese, and, although butter is a fair price this year, it was low last year. Corn produces a first-class article of butter in winter dairying, especially if mixed with pease and oats, and it is also useful in feeding stock and raising young cattle, many of which had to be raised on straw and a little grass last year, because in Ontario the hay crop was destroyed by frosts in May. I hope the Government will give their serious attention to this matter, and afford this measure of justice to the farmers.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was somewhat surprised to hear the speeches delivered by hon. members on the other side of the House, by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who represent agricultural constituencies, and I am sure, if they consult the farmers of their constituencies, they will not favour the proposition now before the House. The Government have considered this question, and in the tariff that was passed last year, a proposition was made to the American Government that, if they admitted our barley free of duty, we would admit their corn. Now the hon. gentleman proposes that we should admit their corn, and allow the Americans to keep up the blockade against our barley. The hon. member for Wellington has pointed out that we have a short crop of hay, and that, therefore, we require to use our coarse grains for feeding purposes, while corn can be imported cheaply. I can buy corn in Chicago for 29 cents, May delivery.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman is taking a wrong view of the Bill. We are not asking that American corn be allowed to come in free, but only that those importing it be given a rebate of the duty.

Mr. TAYLOR. The rebate of duty is 90 per cent, and that would be equivalent to admitting corn free of duty for all purposes.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. Corn comes into direct competition with our coarse grains, barley, pease and oats. I can buy corn, 56 pounds to the bushel, May delivery, at 29 cents; oats, 34 pounds, at 29 cents, and the country is full of them; barley, 48 pounds, at from 35 cents to 40 cents, and the country is full of this coarse grain; and, if our farmers want to purchase coarse grains, they certainly can purchase them in this country, where we have them to sell. If a farmer like the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who is a cattle-feeder, wants to purchase in a foreign market a cheaper product than he can buy in this country, and bring it in free of duty, I do not think the farmers in his section, or in any other section, will sustain the action he proposes, namely, to allow him and others to go to a foreign market and import, duty free, corn, an article which comes into direct competition with the products of our own farms. If the proposition of the Government is carried out by the American Government, namely, to admit our barley free of duty, then, I say, admit their corn, but to admit their corn otherwise would remove at once our chance of securing reciprocity in those articles. We have embodied in our tariff a number of propositions based on action which may be taken by the United States Government in connection with our Government. Let the United States Government admit our barley, and we will admit their corn and other articles in the same way; but for this Government to say that we can grow pease, oats, barley and corn—because in the western counties we are now producing corn in large quantities—is fallacious, especially when we can go to the North-west and purchase oats at 11 cents to 13 per cents per bushel. Admit corn duty free, and the price of oats will drop there, as well as in Ontario and Quebec, 5 or 6 cents per bushel, because the corn comes into direct competition with the coarse grains raised by our people. It would be a monstrous proposition that we should give a drawback on corn imported for the purpose of feeding animals, because, if the Government did so, they would be practically admitting free of duty all corn consumed in this country, except that used by distillers, and this imported product would come into direct competition with the products of our own farmers. I represent an agricultural constituency, and if the question were put to the vote in that constituency, I presume that 99 out of every 100 would say: Keep the duty on corn. I presume that the same thing would occur if the question were submitted in the constituencies represented by the hon. members for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) and Huron (Mr. McMillan), who spoke in favour of this motion. I am satisfied that the farmers there know that it is to their interest that the duty should be kept on corn, because if you reduce it, you lower the price of oats, pease and barley correspondingly. Therefore, I say most emphatically, unless the Americans admit our barley free of duty we should keep the duty on corn coming into this country for all purposes. We can grow corn enough for our own requirements, and if not, we have other substitutes, such as pease, oats and barley, which are just as good for feed for cattle, hogs or horses as corn is. Therefore, I will oppose any change being made in the line suggested by the member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen).

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call your attention to a point in connection with this Bill, and I shall ask your ruling upon it. The Bill has to do with a certain charge upon the revenues of the country, and whether it is the object or not, the result of the Bill would be to increase the amount of drawback that is to be paid out of the public revenues. The hon. gentleman is not dealing with the clauses of the Tariff Act at all, but he is dealing with the drawback clause, which reads at the present time in this way:

> On imported Indian corn to be kiln-dried and ground into meal for human food, or ground into meal and kiln-dried for such use, under such regulations as are made by the Governor in Council, there may be allowed a drawback of 90 per cent of the duty paid.

There is a certain charge which is to be met by the revenue of the country, amounting to the drawback upon that portion of the corn which is kiln-dried for human food. The hon. gentleman proposes to take out the word "human," and he therefore extends the line of corn used for human food to all kinds of food. The direct result of his Bill is to add by that much to the amount of money that we shall be called on to pay from the revenues for drawback. I contend that he imposes a burden on the revenues of the country, and that it is outside the power of the hon. gentleman to do so.

Mr. McMULLEN. There were 640,000 bushels of corn imported last year, and suppose there is double that amount imported. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman if the treasury would not have an increased amount of tax instead of a decrease. If you retain 10 per cent of the duty, and if you import double the amount, you put money into the treasury instead of taking money out of it. The Minister of Finance certainly cannot prove that his contention is correct. The larger the amount you import the larger the amount which is left in the treasury. Consequently, I contend that this would not be a drain upon the resources of the country in the sense that it should be introduced by resolution. The Minister of Finance will remember that when I first introduced this Bill he raised the point with reference to the right of a private member to affect the tariff of the country, and the Speaker ruled I had a right to introduce the Bill.

Mr. WOOD. The Minister of Finance is plainly right in the point he as taken. My friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) may argue and argue correctly, that the result of this Bill, if it becomes law, would be an increase to the consolidated revenue fund, beyond what it is to-day. Nevertheless, with just as strong force it can be argued the other way, namely: that when you come to carry out the provisions of the Act, it means an additional sum to be taken from the revenue for the purpose of paying this drawback. For that reason, I think the point is perfectly clear that this Bill cannot proceed any further without being based on a resolution.

Mr. FORBES. The Controller of Customs (Mr. Wood) surely must be wrong in urging that this Bill intends to take the money out of the consolidated revenue. The Act provides that only 90 per cent of the duty should be taken out of the drawback.

Mr. WOOD. Is not that money taken out of the revenue?

Mr. FORBES. The corn must be imported before there can be a rebate of duty. If you increase the import of the article, you do not affect the treasury, but rather you will place more money in it. I think the hon. member for Wellington has a perfect right to introduce this Bill.

Mr. FLINT. The Minister of Finance has, I think, made a forced and illogical construction of the rule of the House which applies to matters of this kind. The rule reads as follows:—

> If any motion is made in the House for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration of the debate thereon may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned until such further day as the House may think fit to appoint, and then it shall be referred to a Committee of the whole House, before any resolution or vote of the House is passed thereon.

This Bill does not make any charge upon the revenue, unless the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) can show by actual demonstration that the effect of this will be a charge upon the people. That is a matter which does not appear in the terms of the resolution itself, nor by any necessary implication, from the resolution. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) might possibly say that in the balance between revenue and expenditure there would be a charge, but I contend it must appear on the face of the resolution that it makes a charge upon the people, in order to come within this rule. I think the point of the Minister of Finance is not well taken, and that his construction of the rule is so forced and unnatural, that it should not be sustained by the Chair.

Mr. WALLACE. It is quite easy to demonstrate that this would be a charge upon the revenue. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that there were 25,780 barrels of cornmeal imported into this country last year at a duty of 40 cents a bushel, amounting to $10,313. Now, if that corn were permitted to be imported free for animal food, it would be ground in this country, and there would be no duty paid, except the difference between 90 per cent of the duty and the 100 per cent, or three-fourths of a cent per bushel, which would be 5 cents per barrel instead of the 40 cents per barrel which we receive now. It is capable of direct proof that the revenue would be affected under the provision proposed by the hon. member for Welington (Mr. McMullen).

Mr. MASSON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order is well taken, on the ground that it is not for us to decide what will be the net result to the revenue. If the net result should be against the revenue, then, even on the argument of the hon. gentleman opposite, the Bill would be clearly within the prohibitive clause, and would require to be introduced by a resolution. But I submit that it is not necessary for us to consider on which side of the ledger the balance would be, if it is necessary that a larger sum should be paid out than comes in. The money that comes in goes into the consolidated fund; the money that goes out comes from the consolidated fund. Therefore, the plain interpretation of the Bill is that whatever money comes in, a larger sum must be paid out. Hon. gentlemen who say that the balance would be on the right side of the account, and that what money came in would not affect the payment of money out of the consolidated fund, assume that a larger amount would come in. Of the corn that came in last year, a rebate was paid only on what was ground for human food. If the same quantity came in under this Bill, the rebate would be paid on all of it, except what went to the distilleries. Therefore, in whatever way you look at it, the point is well taken. To my mind, the only interpretation of the Bill is that it provides for a larger sum being paid out of consolidated fund than is now paid out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am bound to say that that is a forced construction of the rule. My hon. friend is, in substance, proposing a reduction of taxation for the general benefit; and the underlying principle is that any member may propose a reduction of taxation, although he cannot propose an addition of taxation, except by a message from the Crown. But I am not prepared to say that there may not be something in the technical point raised by the hon. Minister of Finance, although it is a very forced one. In principle, my hon. friend is perfectly right.

Mr. FOSTER. His intention is good.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. His principle is right, and the hon. gentleman's principles are all wrong. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear your decision on the question.

Mr. OUIMET. I would like, if I may be allowed, to say a few words on the point of order. The section of the Tariff Act which is now sought to be amended is section 15, which reads as follows:—

> On imported Indian corn, to be kiln-dried and ground into meal for human food, or ground into meal and kiln-dried for such use, under such regulations as may be made by Order in Council, there may be allowed a drawback of 90 per cent of the duty paid.

The amendment proposed is to strike out the word "human," so as to allow the drawback to be paid on all Indian corn, kiln-dried and ground into meal for food in general. What is the result of the amendment? By article 43 of the Tariff, schedule A, Indian corn is dutiable to the amount of 7½ cents per bushel, and the sum paid in duty goes into the revenue of the country. On that part of the corn entered for consumption, which is kiln-dried and ground into meal for human food, an amount equal to 90 per cent of the whole duty is paid to the miller or manufacturer in the shape of a rebate. So much money is thus taken out of the treasury and paid to these parties engaged in the process of preparing the corn for human food, according to the above statutory provision. Now, the rule is very plain. Here is how it is stated by Dr. Bourinot, at page 597 of his book on "Parliamentary Procedure and Practice":

> Whenever the main object of a Bill is the payment of public money, it must directly originate in Committee of the Whole; or else the proceedings will be null and void the moment objection is taken.

I say that this rebate, which is granted to a certain class of the community, is really paid by the rest of the community for the benefit of that class who use that special kind of food. In that way it is a bonus or an encouragement in the shape of a reduction or a rebate to that class at the expense of the rest of the community. Therefore, the Bill comes clearly within that rule under which no Bill for the disposal of public money can be introduced without being proceeded by a resolution in committee; and the objection taken by the Minister of Finance is well taken. As a further argument in favour of the point of order, I would direct your attention to another rule of this House, which states:

> No Bill relating to trade, or the alteration of the laws concerning trade, is to be brought into the House until the proposition shall have been first considered in a Committee of the whole House, and agreed unto by the House.

I say that this Bill affects directly a very important branch of trade, the importation and manufacturing into food of corn, and not having been authorized by a resolution, first adopted by the House in committee, it is clearly out of order.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not an increase of duty but a decrease of duty, and clearly does not come within the rule of the House, which requires that any Bill interfering with trade and commerce should follow a resolution first adopted by the House in committee. But the hon. gentleman suggests that it is a payment out of consolidated revenue. Well, it is not such a payment as requires an estimate of this House. The only payments out of consolidated revenue which require the House to go into Committee of the Whole are payments provided for by estimate. The present rebate on corn used for human food is not a payment out of estimates, but it is treated as if the money never belonged to the Government at all.

Mr. FOSTER. It is part of the consolidated revenue most certainly. Every dollar goes into that.

Mr. MARTIN. It goes into the consolidated revenue, but is not included in the estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes no difference.

Mr. SPEAKER. With regard to the question raised by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), I frankly confess that when this Bill was introduced, it seemed to me to be a Bill providing only for a reduction of duty; but when I come to examine it, I find that it is a Bill providing for the payment of certain moneys out of consolidated revenue. Now, it does not matter whether the moneys are paid out under the Supply Bill or under other statutory provisions. Under the statutory provisions in the Customs Act of 1894, drawbacks may be paid out on Indian corn ground into meal for human food only. All that the statutory provision enables the Government to do is to pay a drawback of 90 per cent on all corn imported and ground into meal for human food. But this Bill provides, as I see on more careful examination, that a drawback may be paid out of moneys that have already been paid into the public revenue, upon a further quantity of Indian meal, and, under these circumstances, it seems to me to come clearly within the rule requiring that it should have the recommendation of the Crown and originate in a Committee of the whole House. It provides for the payment of a sum out of public revenue in addition to that already provided for by the law, and therefore comes within that rule.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 78) respecting certain female offenders in the province of New Brunswick (from the Senate).—(Mr. McInerney).

CANADIAN CATTLE IN ENGLAND.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That it appears that for many years previous to November, 1892, Canadian cattle were allowed free entrance into the ports of the United Kingdom, without being required to be slaughtered on landing.

That, on the 21st November, 1892, regulations were put in force by the British authorities making the slaughter of Canadian cattle obligatory upon being landed, on the assumption that the disease of pleuro-pneumonia was detected in certain animals imported from Canada.

That a Bill is now before the Imperial Parliament which proposes to make the exclusion of all foreign cattle permanent.

That the most thorough investigation carried on in Canada has failed to disclose the existence of a single case of pleuro-pneumonia.

That, in view of the foregoing facts, this Parliament, whilst not wishing to interfere in any way with legislation considered necessary in the United Kingdom, desires respectfully to protest against the permanent exclusion of Canadian cattle on the ground of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, and to express in the strongest possible manner its belief that pleuro-pneumonia has not existed in the past, and does not at the present time exist in Canada.

He said : I desire, Mr. Speaker, in the first place, before the motion is discussed, to say that the reason why it is necessary to take it up to-day, that is on the first available opportunity, is found in the position of the Bill which has been introduced into the British Parliament with the object of permanently excluding foreign cattle from the ports of Great Britain. I do not suppose ; I do not anticipate that there will be very much discussion on this resolution, which is exceedingly simple, and I think exceedingly plain, in the main groundwork upon which it is founded. I do not intend to take up any matters at all extraneous to the resolution directly before the House, not only for the purpose of confining myself to the discussion of the question involved here, but also from the fact that by the consent of both sides of the House, it is proposed that we should take up the Remedial Bill and go into committee upon it at this sitting. I therefore do not intend to waste one single moment of time more than is necessary to explain this motion to the House, and I hope the discussion, whatever length of time may be given to it, may be kept solely and closely to the question in hand. The reason why this motion is introduced is apparent, of course, to hon. members on both sides of the House. For a series of years previous to 1892 Canadian live cattle were allowed entrance into Great Britain without restrictions. Although for many years previous to 1892, through different reasons, suspected cattle had been found amongst the importations, cattle suspected in a degree, at least, which had been made subject to special inspection, yet there is not on record up to 1892 in the very large importations that had taken place from Canada into Great Britain, a single suspicious case of disease approaching pleuro-pneumonia. But in 1892 in the shipments of cattle for that year, there were a few cases, not very many, which were suspected and slaughtered, and according to the contention of the veterinaries of the British Board of Agriculture, in two or three cases, it was reported that pleuro-pneumonia had been found. Consequent upon that report, a temporary scheduling of Canadian cattle was put into force, which, however, did not affect to any extent the importations for the year 1892. In 1893 some other suspected cases were found, about a dozen in number : but of those I think only about two were reported, after inspection by British veterinaries, to have been cases of pleuro-pneumonia, the other cases having failed in the pathological inquiry that was made to show symptoms which proved in any degree whatever that the disease was pleuro-pneumonia. So that, for 1893, the question was held in abeyance on account of this, and the temporary schedule continued. The same took place in 1894, and up to the present time our cattle have been excluded. Now, a Bill has been introduced which has had its second reading in the English House of Commons, providing for the permanent exclusion, not of Canadian cattle solely, but of all foreign cattle, prohibiting them from being distributed alive in the United Kingdom, and providing, of course, that they shall be slaughtered at the ports of arrival. Any person who has followed the course of events from 1892 will be able to come to no other conclusion than that the reason, and the sole reason which has been given, and is to-day given, by the British Government for their action, either so far as regards the temporary exclusion or the proposal for permanent exclusion of all foreign cattle, has been based upon one sole ground, and that is, the desirability of keeping the British herds from contact and consequent disease from contagious pleuro-pneumonia brought in from abroad by the importations of foreign cattle. Whatever side lights may be thrown, from different points of view, to explain the steps which have been taken, and which are being continued, to exclude cattle ; the official reason given, and the reason which we must presume to be the correct one, is that which I have named. Following up that ground, the assertion is made in this resolution that there is no good reason for scheduling or permanently excluding Canadian cattle from the British ports on the ground that pleuro-pneumonia exists now, or has in the past existed, in the Dominion of Canada. If we take, for instance, the proofs of that, I think they will be found to be eminently satisfactory. In the first place, out of the total cattle importations in the years 1892, 1893, 1894 and 1895, we have an infinitesimally small number of cattle that have been even suspected ofpleuro-pneumonia. Of these suspected cases that have been examined by the British veterinary surgeons attached to the Board of Agriculture, still fewer—amounting to four, or five or six cases, at the utmost—have been pronounced by these veterinaries to be absolutely, in their opinion, cases of pleuro-pneumonia. Veterinary surgeons—I am not going to say of greater merit than those attached to the British Board of Agriculture—but eminent veterinary authorities in Great Britain were called in by the Government of Canada, through the High Commissioner, and the lungs of suspected animals were submitted to their investigations. The first thing that strikes one in looking into the subject is, that there is at once a divergence of opinion between the veterinary surgeons attached to the British Board of Agriculture and the British veterinary surgeons that were called in on behalf of Canada. The point of divergence was chiefly in this : that whereas the Board of Agriculture veterinary surgeons say that these cases that they considered absolutely were cases of undoubted pleuro-pneumonia, still did not present the exact symptoms of the disease, which are found in the types of pleuro-pneumonia as existing in Europe, in Australia, or in other countries. The veterinary surgeons called in by Canada to assist in the investigation, laid particular stress upon this divergence of symptoms, and consequently they are forced to the conclusion that they ought to rely for an ultimate judgment on this question, rather upon the history, the spread and the prevalence of the disease than upon these symptoms, which bear a marked difference from the usual symptoms of the disease, even according to the opinion of the British Board of Agriculture veterinarians themselves. Portions of the lungs of these suspected animals were also sent to Canada, and were thoroughly investigated by our own veterinary authorities ; by Prof. McEachren and Prof. Adami, of Montreal, who is an eminent authority in pathology of this kind. These two gentlemen, whom we may call the Canadian experts, laid stress upon the differences developed in the symptoms of the disease, and they go still further and declare that in none of these cases do they find it to be contagious pleuro-pneumonia. They state that the symptoms were of a disease different from contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to which Prof. McEachren gives in certain cases the cognomen of transit pleuro-pneumonia, that is a disease which develops from long travel, ill-ventilation, and exposure either on land, or more probably at sea. Therefore, the weight of expert veterinary testimony in these cases—if we consider the Canadian experts, the British experts called in to support the Canadian case, and the veterinary authorities attached to the Board of Agriculture—seems to be in favour of freedom from the disease of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, even in the cases which have been suspected, and with regard to which the Board of Agriculture veterinaries think pleuro-pneumonia of a contagious character did exist. As a further proof of that, it is contended—and although I am not an authority at all, it would seem to me that the contention ought to have very great weight—that if there were cases of actual pleuro-pneumonia in cattle which were exported from Canada; the tracing of these cattle back to the herds from which they started must necessarily show disease of that kind to exist in the Canadian herds from which these cattle were taken in the first place. The testimony which is undoubted, and I think entirely irrefragible, is that through the seasons of 1892 and 1893, after making the most thorough investigation by veterinaries in Canada, and tracing back to the herds from which they came, the animals which were supposed to be afflicted with contagious pleuro-pneumonia, the most thorough investigation has developed no sign of the existence of the disease. Many cases of such direct tracing might be mentioned. One was the case of an animal shipped on the "Hurona" in October, 1893, which was declared by the British Board of Agriculture veterinary surgeons to have been inflicted with pleuro-pneumonia. This animal was traced back directly to the herd on Howe Island near Kingston. The cow had been in contact with that herd for months before, and the herd itself was perfectly healthy, as it was stated the cow was at the time it was sold. No symptom of pleuro-pneumonia or other lung disease was or has been since developed in that herd. The same thing occurred with reference to suspected cases traced to the North-west. They got directly upon the track of these, they went to the herds from which they had been taken, and they made the most thorough investigation; and neither at that time nor since has any symptom of pleuro-pneumonia been found.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is that the same year?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. That is strong corroborative evidence, not only of the contention of Canada, but also of the contention of the British veterinaries who were called in to inspect on behalf of Canada, and who, noticing the variety of symptoms, said that in a case of that kind they would have to depend very largely on the prevalence of the disease amongst the herds or in the district from which these cattle came. The fact that the strongest investigation developed no trace of that is another proof of the soundness of the contention that was made by these veterinaries. But there is more proof than that. Up to 1892, 1,500,000 neat cattle, in round numbers, were exported from Canada to the United Kingdom; and out of that whole number and during that whole period, not a single even suspected case of pleuro-pneumonia developed. Although these cattle were spread amongst the different herds in Scotland and England, no trace of contagion in the British herds resulted.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Extending for how many years?

Mr. FOSTER. I think that would probably extend from 1889 up to 1892. Then, for two seasons after 1892, when the order was passed, about 800,000 Canadian cattle were exported to Great Britain, and were slaughtered under the schedule in the districts of the British veterinary surgeons; and of that whole number there were but twelve suspected cases of cattle, whose lungs were examined, and of these but two developed any symptoms of pleuro-pneumonia. That, also, I think, is a very strong evidence of the absence of disease in Canadian cattle. To make assurance still stronger, orders were given to the Canadian veterinaries here to make a rigid inspection of the cattle which were exported; and in the year 1895 nearly 100,000 cattle were inspected by them, of which only ·14 per cent were rejected from passage, and of even this small proportion so rejected from passage, not one was found to be actually affected with pleuro-pneumonia or with any lung disease. Carrying out that method of proof, the veterinaries were asked to inspect the abattoir cattle in Montreal and in other cities of the Dominion. The lungs of nearly 5,000 head of cattle which were slaughtered in that way were examined by our own veterinaries; and in all that number but two cases of diseased lungs were found, and in neither of these cases was there the least symptom of pleuro-pneumonia. I just mention these facts as cumulative and I think very satisfactory proof that in Canada there can be no doubt that not only has pleuro-pneumonia never existed historically, and cannot be proved to have existed, but that it does not exist at the present time. It is a disease which is, I believe, very contagious and very deadly; and that is the whole reason why the action of the British authorities has been taken—to prevent this disease being introduced, first, by United States cattle, and afterwards, from 1892, by Canadian cattle. The fact that there has been found in Canada not only no plague, but not an isolated case, furnishes, I think, indisputable proof that we are entirely in the right in saying that pleuro-pneumonia does not exist and has not existed in Canada. So that the only plea we make to the British Government, and through them to the British Parliament, is that as they have based their exclusion of Canadian cattle from 1892 up to the present time on the ground of their fear of the introduction of pleuro-pneumonia into Great Britain, and as the Bill at present before the House of Commons is based on the same ground, we have the best of reasons for disputing the ground taken by the British Government and the British House of Commons, and pressing upon them, in this special way, as the voice of the Canadian Parliament, that on that ground they have no valid reason for excluding our cattle; because pleuro-pneumonia does not exist in this country, and consequently there is no danger to British herds from the introduction of Canadian cattle into British ports. That is as far, I think, as this Parliament has any right to interfere with a matter of internal policy and arrangement on the part of the British people themselves. Whatever wishes or desires we may have in the matter, whatever we may think may be to the greater or the less advantage of particular lines of trade in Canada, we must accord to the British legislature the same freedom of legislation which we demand for ourselves. As we would not care for their interference except on the ground of disabusing our minds of any wrong reasons or prejudices for any legislation which we might propose, I think we should go no further in reference to their legislation. This resolution, therefore, proceeds on that line; and, if passed by this House, as I hope it will be unanimously, it will simply in a few words sustain this position: If your contention is that you have kept out Canadian cattle because pleuro-pneumonia exists in this country, if your contention is that you propose to exclude them permanently for the same reason, we beg respectfully to state to you, as our united opinion, that that disease does not exist in Canada, and that consequently your basis for legislation is not a good basis. I do not propose at the present time to say more on this subject. I confine myself, as hon. gentlemen will see, strictly to the question in hand, without making any excursions far and wide with reference to the question, about which a great deal might be said in different ways.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Minister of Finance has been able to find in the reason for the Bill now before the Imperial Parliament the only reason that we should attribute to that body, namely, their honest desire to protect British herds. I mention that because on other occasions and in other places, and perhaps in this House more than once, different reasons have been attributed to the English government for their action.

Mr. FOSTER. And in the British Parliament.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps there as well. So that we now have the matter presented to us in the one light alone, namely, that the threatened legislation for the permanent exclusion of Canadian cattle from Great Britain arises from the danger apprehended on the part of the British authorities that the importation of live cattle from Canada and their comingling with British cattle might contaminate British herds. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of this Parliament to adopt every means calculated to prevent such a misfortune accruing to this great Canadian industry. One cannot look at the Trade and Navigation Returns of Canada for the last fifteen years without being impressed with a sense of the great importance to the farmers of Canada, who are the backbone of our country, of this industry up to the present and the far-reaching importance it cannot fail to acquire, if allowed to become developed, as it would be if left to the untrammelled industry and enterprise of Canadian farmers. If it should unfortunately happen, however, that restrictions are interposed whereby a serious loss must accrue to the Canadian producer, every one in Canada will deplore that result. Therefore, I heartily agree that we ought to make every honest effort to impress upon the Imperial authorities the advisability and the justice of staying their hand. The hon. Minister of Finance has briefly reviewed the controversy. It is necessary to understand that assertion on our part is not proof to the satisfaction of the English authorities, and it is necessary to bear in mind, in any efforts we may make to ward off this blow to our Canadian cattle trade, that the government of England are in command of the position. We are not in a position to dictate, but we must prove to their satisfaction that the requirements of their law are being lived up to here. We must satisfy them that the importation of Canadian cattle into Great Britain will in no respect endanger the sanitary condition of British herds. It is idle for us to indulge in mere assertion, declamation, or perhaps even less influential means, such as suggestions of improper motives on the part of the Imperial authorities or that the Imperial officers have been guilty of fraud or of giving false evidence or making unfounded reports in favour of the establishment or maintenance of the embargo. We must bear in mind that we have to satisfy the Imperial authorities; we have no legal rights; it is wholly in the discretion of the Imperial authorities whether or not they will admit our cattle; and if they suggest any methods by which the difficulties may be removed, it remains for us, even if possibly humiliated, even if we differ from their views or their advice, to endeavour to meet their advice and views in order to cut away from them any ground they themselves may seek to interpose against the removal of the embargo.

The hon. Minister of Finance has briefly referred to the circumstances under which this embargo is maintained. Allow me in like manner to deal with the subject. In October and November, 1892, four Canadian cattle imported from the port of Montreal to England by the steamships "Monkseaton" and "Hurona" were reported by the English board of inspectors to be affected by contagious pleuro-pneumonia; and subsequently the reports of the board of inspectors were submitted to the regular veterinary officers of the Board of Agriculture, which is a department of state there, and the findings of that board were confirmed. At that time, we had attending to our interests in Great Britain a High Commissioner, the present Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), and when these reports came to his knowledge he, no doubt, believing in the accuracy of his statements—and I hope he was accurate in his statements too,—challenged the correctness of these findings. Oft and anon he declared that these reports were unfounded. However, his assertions were not accepted as evidence against the testimony of the British experts, and Great Britain scheduled Canadian cattle. It may be mentioned, in connection with this initial difficulty, that the veterinary officers of the British Board of Agriculture found that an animal bred in Britain, which had been in contact with one of the Canadian animals, was ordered by the British veterinarians to be slaughtered, on the ground that it was affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia; and they drew the inference that this British bred animal acquired the disease from having been in contact with the cattle exported from Montreal. It was in consequence, first, of the report of the British veterinarians in respect of the Canadian cattle in question, and then of the subsequent report in respect of the British beast, that Great Britain placed the embargo upon Canadian live cattle. Subsequently, in the month of May, 1893, further investigations were made in respect of three other animals from Canada—one imported into Great Britain by the steamship "Brazilian," and two other by the "Lake Winnipeg." These three, in the month of May, 1893, were also subjected to examination by the veterinarians, and a like unfortunate finding followed, the report being that they also were suffering from contagious pleuro-pneumonia. This finding was also submitted to the High Commissioner, and, as in the former instance, he challenged the correctness of the finding, fully believing no doubt in the accuracy of his statements, but nevertheless the British experts adhered to their own opinion and saw no reason to advise the removal of the embargo. Later on in that year, namely, in the month of October, 1893, another Canadian beast, imported into England by SS. "Huron," was reported by the veterinarians of the British Board of Agriculture as suffering from pleuro-pneumonia. In like manner, the High Commissioner on this occasion challenged the accuracy of that finding. But all denials on our part had no effect whatever upon the action of the home authorities. They felt themselves bound to act upon the finding of their experts, and so they maintained the embargo. Thus the season of 1893 closed. In 1894, an animal shipped from Montreal on board SS. "Toronto," in the month of May, was in like manner reported by the veterinarians of Great Britain as affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia. The High Commissioner on that occasion was equally active and solicitous, and took the same position as formerly. On some of these occasions he brought his professional skill to bear, offering his services as a professional man in support of his testimony. Nevertheless, the home authorities placed reliance upon their experts, and maintained the embargo. Later on, five other cases were reported upon in a similar manner by the veterinarians of the British Government.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the English Government, when they found, at the commencement of the traffic in 1893, that their veterinarians reported adversely in respect of the animal whose case I have mentioned, were good enough to make a report for the guidance and information of the Canadian authorities. I will read from that report more fully later on, but now I may say, for the information of whomever on the Government side intends to follow me, that, in a communication dated 21st July, 1893, and directed to the Colonial Office, and transmitted to the Canadian authorities, the Board of Agriculture set forth certain requirements on the part of the British Government, compliance with which by the Canadian Government would go a long way towards satisfying the British Government upon the question in controversy. This report suggested that, if we were anxious to remove the embargo, we should adopt, amongst other things, the following directions, and take the following steps:—It asked that the Canadian Government should inform the British Government what steps were being taken by Canada for the administration of our own laws. We have on our statute-book laws which, if enforced, would go a long way, I have no doubt, to protect the sanitary conditions of Canadian herds. These laws provide for proper quarantine regulations, and they empower the Government, whenever they see fit, from time to time, totally to prohibit importations. They further empower the Government to slaughter suspected animals, and, more than that, to slaughter animals that are in an absolutely healthy condition, if they have been in contact with suspected animals. We have laws that were designed to vest in the Government the fullest powers for the protection of Canadian herds from disease being imported and for stamping out disease, if it should, unfortunately, acquire a foothold in Canada. But I may say that, with our frontier, extensive as it is, enforcement of such laws is not unaccompanied with much difficulty. The British Government also asked that in all cases where there were any suspects—I mean by that Canadian cattle suspected of being affected with pleuro-pneumonia—the animals should be examined by a veterinarian, and that these officers should make full and ample reports, which were to be submitted to the Imperial authorities for their review, as well. They asked that, at the point of embarkation of the cattle for England—not referring particularly to the point of embarkation, but that would be implied, probably, by the report—all animals that were unfit for the journey and supposed to be suffering from any diseases likely to suggest contagious pleuro-pneumonia, should be examined by veterinarians and slaughtered, and their lungs pathologically and microscopically examined, and, if found to be suffering from this unfortunate disease, that they should be traced and the herds from which they came slaughtered. In England, when an animal is found to be suffering from any of the diseases that are covered by the Animals' Contagious Diseases Act, the British Government sends officers to the herds with which the diseased animals have been in contact, and, no matter what the cost of the animals that have thus been in contact, they are slaughtered and paid for. Great Britain has spent hundreds of thousands of pounds in slaughtering animals in contact with diseased animals, but which themselves have not manifested any sign of disease ; and the authorities there asked us to apply in Canada the same rule that they applied in England. They were not asking something that we were unfamiliar with. I may mention that when the late John Henry Pope was Minister of Agriculture, he pressed the same point upon the attention of the Canadian Parliament, and we obtained from Parliament the power on compensating therefor to slaughter Canadian herds simply upon the ground that it was shown that they had been in contact with animals suffering from any of these diseases enumerated in the Act. The British Government, in this document of 21st July, 1893, asked us to do in Canada what, under similar circumstances, the English law required them to do in England.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the hon. gentleman to be a little more definite as to that inspection, and then the slaughter of the rejected, and then, in cases where pleuro-pneumonia was found, I understood him to say the British Government asked us to trace out and to slaughter the herds. But, in his concluding sentences, he said they were to trace and slaughter the herds in case of any disease. Which is it ?

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman has quite misunderstood me. The British Government intimated in their report—and, for accuracy, and to remove any doubt, I will read the report later on, and then he will have the exact language of the report. The hon. gentleman will then see that the English Government would surely not ask us to slaughter an animal rejected from passage to England, when rejected, for some reason that could not possibly suggest that it was suffering from this particular disease.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, this particular disease ; but you said any disease.

Mr. MULOCK. No, I said any disease mentioned in the Act.

Mr. FOSTER. What diseases are mentioned in the Act ?

Mr. MULOCK. If you will read the English statute, you will find out.

Mr. FOSTER. The English statute does not govern us.

Mr. MULOCK. I beg your pardon, the English statute does apply to us. That is where the hon. gentleman misunderstands the Act. The English statute enumerates a certain list of diseases for which cattle may be slaughtered. Pleuro-pneumonia is one: I cannot pretend to give them all, or to enumerate them. We are only dealing now with the subject of pleuro-pneumonia. But if the hon. gentleman will look at the British Act, and he can get it in a moment by sending into the Library for it, he will find the provision in the English Act for slaughtering British herds that are affected, or suspected of being affected, or by chance may become affected, with any of the diseases enumerated in that Act ; and they asked us to administer our law in that same spirit : and if our veterinarians were, in any place in Canada, either at the port of shipment, or elsewhere, to come across Canadian cattle that were suffering from disease that might, in any reasonable way, on thorough examination, be shown to be pleuro-pneumonia, all these animals, they asked, should be slaughtered, and if found to be suffering from pleuro-pneumonia, their source was to be traced, and the animals with which they had been in contact were to be slaughtered. However, I am not defending what the Government of Great Britain has done, I am only stating what they have done, and inasmuch as they were in command of the situation and chose to lay down these conditions, I fail to see what we had to do except to endeavour to comply with them. Well, Mr. Speaker, that report was submitted to the High Commissioner in England, I presume forwarded to him by the Colonial Office, and by him transmitted to Canada. But he chose to reply to it as well, and I will refer to his answer in a few moments ; and I would like him to explain, as he is present, how he came to draw such an inference as he did from that report. The High Commissioner pooh-poohed all the suggestions of the English Government. He said, as he had before : There is no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada. He joins issue at once with the English Government. When the English Government made these suggestions, instead of the High Commissioner endeavouring to comply with them, and advise the Canadian authorities to comply with them, he pooh-poohs them, controverts them, discredits them, and so expresses himself to the English Government and perhaps—though this point I have no information upon—perhaps, also, in the same spirit, to the Canadian Government. I may say that when the High Commissioner, on 4th August, in 1893, replied to the report to which I have alluded, in the tenor, and in the tone that I have mentioned, the Colonial Office, with very great regret, placed on record their opinion of his attitude ; they placed on record their regret that the High Commissioner should have so treated their well-intentioned advice and suggestions in order to the removal of this embargo. As I see the Secretary of State, then the High Commissioner, sitting before me now, I emphasize this, because I do not wish to import any suggestion into the controversy that it is not absolutely well founded and absolutely justifiable. As the High Commissioner will no doubt speak in this debate, I would hope that when he does, he will explain how it was that he was not able to acquiesce in the request of the Imperial authorities, and endeavour to induce the Canadian Government to adopt the course that the English Government asked us to do, a step towards the removal of this embargo. Well, whatever was the reason for it, here is the plain, unfortunate fact, that on the 21st July, 1893, the English Government asked the Canadian Government to adopt a certain course in order to lay the foundation for a removal of this embargo. I have in my hands the official return of the correspondence between the Canadian Government and the Imperial Government on this question, and, so far as this return was complete—and it is bound up in three volumes, issued by the Imperial Government, and I have no reason to suppose that they omitted from it any documents whatever bearing on this question—I say, assuming the completeness of these returns, there is this unfortunate circumstance at this very stage, that in July, 1893, the English Government made the request of us as a preliminary in order to put them in a position to be able, if we could satisfy them, to remove the embargo. Yet the Canadian Government did not even acknowledge the receipt of that document, until long afterwards. On 29th January, 1894, the English Government, up to that time having received no acknowledgment—and now I would ask the Secretary of State to explain this point, and I dwell upon it so that it shall not be omitted ; he will excuse my pressing him upon the point, but I think we are entitled to an answer on this point. On 21st July, 1893, the Board of Agriculture of Great Britain asked the Canadian Government to do certain things to which I have alluded. Why did this Government not answer that communication, why did not the Government pay respect to it, why did they ignore it for months and months, and only answer it when Great Britain had a second time, on the approach of the spring trade of 1894, begged for an acknowledgment ? On 29th January, 1894, the Board of Agriculture wrote to the Colonial Office, which document was transmitted to the High Commissioner of Canada, calling attention to the neglect of the Canadian Government in not having answered or complied with the request of the Board of Agriculture of 21st July, 1893. In this document of 29th January, 1894, the British Board of Agriculture says : "Navigation will soon be opening, the spring trade will soon be on, the embargo still exists ; we, six months ago, pointed out to you the steps to take for the removal of the embargo ; we are sincerely anxious to be able to make recommendations leading to the removal of the embargo, but, up to the date of writing, 29th January, 1894, we have not received any communications from the Canadian Government dealing with this matter, and we do not know what they are going to do about it. In the interval, the High Commissioner, no doubt, had been asserting and re-asserting that the findings of the Imperial veterinarians were unfounded in fact and unwarranted by the circumstances ; but the British Government, not being able to disregard the report of their sworn and trusted officers by the strong statements even of the High Commissioner had been begging of us to give them some just foundation for removing the embargo ; and so, more solicitous for our welfare than we were ourselves, they wrote us, at the commencement of the season of 1894, reminding us of our default and begging of us to carry out the suggestion contained in their report of 21st July, 1893. Well, Mr. Speaker, what followed ? I have here at last the report of the Governor General in Council, dated 6th February, 1894, and this report, instead of declaring the intention of this Government to live up to the suggestions made or act upon them, proceeds to controvert them, to argue in regard to them, in some cases to suggest, in one case at least, that the proposition of the Imperial authorities would be out of reason altogether, and, in another case, if you please, the Canadian Government tell the British Board of Agriculture that their suggestion is simply ridiculous. I venture, further, to assert that you will search through a great many state papers before you will find such language as is contained in this report. Considering our position, considering that we were, in fact, the suppliants, it would have been dignified, if, instead of using offensive language, we had, at least, confined ourselves to a dignified dissertation on the views expressed in the British report. However that may be, it brought forth a mild rebuke ; it was not allowed to pass unnoticed. Nor was another unfortunate episode in this unfortunate controversy allowed to pass unnoticed.

When the British Government sent to the High Commissioner their report of 29th January, 1894, telling him that the Government could not ignore the report of their veterinarians, who were men of great eminence in their profession, notwithstanding the great weight that should attach to the assertions of the High Commissioner, instead of the High Commissioner replying to that communication in becoming language, he sent a reply of a different character. I venture to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask the Secretary of State now, if he does not think it was an error on his part, a mistake in tactics, if nothing more, for him to reply to that document by suggesting that the veterinarians in the service of the British Government, however eminent they might be, had given questionable evidence, from the circumstance that they happened to be in the employ of the Royal Agricultural College, and other important agricultural organizations in Great Britain? And yet, Mr. Speaker, I will show, when I come to read some documents, that the High Commissioner on that occasion made that error of tactics, to say nothing of taste, in throwing doubt upon the credibility of the Imperial veterinarians because of the alleged circumstance that three of them happened to have some honorary connection with the Royal Agricultural College.

We come down in this controversy, then, to the season of 1894. The British Government appeared exceedingly solicitous to ascertain the facts, and, from a perusal of all these records, I have been unable to draw any other conclusion than that there was a sincere desire on the part of the Imperial authorities to obtain satisfactory evidence which would warrant them in arriving at the conclusion that there was no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada; and, inasmuch as we had not acted on their suggestions, and inasmuch as the High Commissioner still continued to challenge the findings of the Imperial veterinarians, the British Government determined to adopt another method in order to do absolute justice to Canada. At this point I think it is due to the British Government that we should recognize frankly their course of action throughout, and not the least in the matter to which I am now about to allude, for it must commend itself to hon. gentlemen; it commended itself to me, and we must admit that, in taking the course the British Government adopted in June, July and August, 1894, in order to ascertain the very truth, they adopted a course of action that was, in every respect, dignified, honourable and straightforward. What did they do? They said to the High Commissioner: You challenge the accuracy of the reports of our veterinarians; we accept your challenge; and, no matter what has taken place in the past, whether right or wrong, there is a future; there are going to be large importations into Great Britain and Canada; we will instruct our veterinarians at all ports of entry in Great Britain to make reports upon the cases of suspects, and we will submit the reports to a proper court of experts, and Canada will be represented on that court; witnesses will be examined, and every proper step will be taken in order to get at the very truth; we want nothing but the most exhaustive inquiry into the facts, and to ascertain the real state of affairs. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, the veterinary officers in the service of the British Government, found as a result of their observations at the ports of entry, a number of cattle which they reported were suffering from pleuro-pneumonia. These veterinarians made unqualified reports that several of our cattle imported in the month of June, 1894, were afflicted with contagious pleuro-pneumonia. Thereupon, the English Government selected a number of experts, five, I think, men of the highest standing in the veterinary profession in England, men filling important public positions, and they were constituted a court to try this issue. Witnesses, consisting of professional men in Great Britain, of years' standing in connection with veterinary and biological science, were appointed, and counsel were employed, legal and pathological, to attend this court in order that the examination of the witnesses should be absolutely thorough and exhaustive. The High Commissioner was asked to appoint witnesses, and he appointed three, two of whom gave evidence. The court sat. The actual lungs of the alleged diseased animals were submitted to the experts. They were examined by them in the ways known to experts, microscopical and pathological. They gave their evidence before this court, and were examined and cross-examined. The actual diseased tissue of the lungs was produced, and the investigation lasted for several days. The experts, sitting as a court, also saw the alleged diseased tissue, and they brought in a report, dated August, 1894, sustaining the findings of their veterinarians, to the effect that the animals in question were affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia.

Now, that was the report, and after that inquiry followed by the assertion and reassertion of the Canadian Government and the representatives of Canada, that there was no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada—which I wish were the case—we are called upon as a Parliament to assert now, that, in our opinion, there is no such disease in Canada. The question that arises to my mind is: What affect such assertion on our part will have to protect us from this threatened law, in face of this verdict which is still outstanding against us in England. It may be our honest conviction that there may be no such disease in Canada, but, nevertheless, what weight will such an expression of opinion have to prevent the English Parliament legislating against us, when they have this report before them. I have alluded to a number of documents, Mr. Speaker, and permit me to go a little further into them. I shall return, first of all, to the document referred to by the Minister of Finance, and I will read the requisition of the English Government. This is a letter from the Secretary of the Board of Agriculture to the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies. The first part of it merely states the case as to the suspected animals, but the latter part of it refers to our future conduct, and that I will read. This communication is dated 21st of July, 1893 :

> Inasmuch as the board have also to consider whether the administration of the law——

That means the administration of the law in Canada.

> —is such as to give full effect to the provisions of such statutes,——

That is the Canadian statute for protecting the health of Canadian cattle.

> —the board would also be glad to receive detailed information as to the machinery by which the requirements of the statutes are carried into effect. On this point I am to say, that it would be most desirable that the Dominion Government should be able to state that the existing arrangements secure the submission of diseased lungs to veterinarian officers well acquainted with the characteristics of pleuro-pneumonia in all cases in which any doubt exists.

In this same communication, the board would also suggest :

> That it might be worth while for the Dominion Government to consider whether an additional measure of security could not be obtained by the total prohibition of the importation of live cattle into the Dominion, except for breeding, exhibition, or other exceptional purposes, and also whether any further means can be devised for the prevention of any breach of the law and regulations along the extensive frontier which requires to be watched. With regard to the question of further evidence as to the sanitary condition of animals in the Dominion, the board venture to think it might be done by the Canadian Government. The disease is well known to be difficult of detection in the living animal owing to its lengthened period of incubation, and the slaughter of suspected animals, and the subsequent examination of the lungs by experts acquainted with the special characteristics of the disease afford by far the most reliable test of its existence in a particular locality. Under the circumstances which exist, the board cannot but think that the Canadian Government would have obtained valuable evidence, if arrangements had been made for the slaughter and examination of the lungs of all the animals rejected by the officers of the Dominion Government during the present season, as unfit for shipment, and if, as has been stated, some of these animals came from the same district as other animals shipped by the "Lake Winnipeg," the result would have been very material to the question at issue.
> On the same grounds, the board would suggest that the herds to which the diseased animals are reported to have been traced should have been slaughtered out in the same manner as would undoubtedly have been the case if the diseased animals had been home-bred and had been traced back to herds in this country. If this had been done, and the disease with which the diseased animals landed here were affected had not been found, another valuable piece of evidence would have been available.

At this point allow me to break off the reading of this communication to impress upon the Government the significance of that observation. You will observe that the Board of Agriculture is there speaking of animals that had been imported from Canada into England, and had been found by their experts, rightly or wrongly, to be suffering from contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and they say that in England, under similar circumstances, the British Government would have traced out the herds with which these animals had been mingled, and making compensation would have slaughtered them out. Why did not the Canadian Government do that ? The moment the Canadian Government received the report as to these animals in November, 1892, they should, according to the statement of the British Government, have slaughtered out the cattle with which these animals had been mingling. Without going into the question of the origin of this unfortunate matter, I may be allowed—as the High Commissioner is not, perhaps, as familiar as we are with the circumstances—to state briefly what the reference is, to show that this was a reasonable suggestion, and one that he would have acquiesced in if he had been familiar with the situation. It appears that these two suspects which, in the fall of 1892, led to Canada being scheduled, came from herds at Pilot Mound, in southern Manitoba. It is in evidence that thousands of American cattle were allowed to be imported into Manitoba and the North-west Territories without quarantine, or without inspection ; and these suspected animals, according to the report of the veterinarians of England, had been traced to these herds.

Mr. FOSTER. In what year did these American cattle come in in thousands ?

Mr. MULOCK. They began to come over in 1880, and for many years they came without any quarantine at all—later after quarantine from that time to this.

Mr. FOSTER. I think they came in without quarantine from 1884. Up to that time they had been quarantined.

Mr. MULOCK. The contract with England was that if our cattle were not to be scheduled, importation of American cattle should be totally prohibited. Will the hon. gentleman deny that ?

Mr. FOSTER. I deny it in the hon. gentleman's acceptation of it.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister cannot deny that the bargain with England was that we should totally prohibit the importation of cattle from the United States into Canada, except in trains that should go through in bond until they left our country again. There is no qualification in the agreement ; it was unqualified. However, I am digressing. I am not seeking, on this occasion, to ascertain the first great cause. I am now dealing with the situation, to see what is the best to be done under the circumstances. We will leave out that controversial point, as long as the Minister controverts it. What I wished the High Commissioner to understand was the suggestion of the British Government. The moment they told us that some of our animals had arrived in England suffering from pleuro-pneumonia, we should have slaughtered out the herds with which those animals had been associating. That was the course adopted in England, and there was no difficulty in our adopting it, because you will find from the statement of the Government that they knew where those animals had come from—that they had been traced to herds in southern Manitoba. Now, I will go on with the communication of the 21st July, 1893 :

> The board presume that it is now too late to resort to these measures, but they would earnestly recommend the Canadian Government at once to proceed on these lines in regard to any further animals rejected for shipment to this country and any other suspected animals which may be landed here during the remainder of the season.

The Canadian Government did not act on that suggestion. So far as we know, they have never acted on it. The Board of Agriculture goes on to say :

> The board would also suggest that the districts, to which the diseased animals, and any suspicious cases hereafter detected, may be traced, should be placed under regulations applicable to comparatively extensive areas, requiring a report to be made to a veterinary officer of cattle dying within the district and providing in all cases of doubt for an examination of the lungs. A retaining fee might be given to veterinary surgeons in such districts in order to secure the notification by them of suspicious cases in which slaughter and examination might be ordered by the proper officer. The latter course has been taken in this country, and it has been of great assistance to them in the discovery of centres of the disease.

Then, after some reference to details, the board conclude, as follows :—

> The board have expressed their views thus frankly and fully, because they approach the whole subject with a real desire to find themselves in a position to sanction the resumption of unrestricted trade between the Dominion and the mother country at the earliest possible moment, and they earnestly hope that the Canadian Government will on their part recognize the obligations attaching to the board under the statute, and govern their action accordingly. In the opinion of the board, the interests of both countries will be best consulted by the interchange of the fullest possible information on both sides, and if this be done, and the Canadian Government will at once institute the special measures proposed for tracing the disease, if it exists, and will also communicate to the board any information in their possessions as to its past history, the board will not hesitate on their own part to do everything in their power to facilitate the restoration of the privilege of free entry.

Now, that concluding part of the report was encouraging. It was frank, and I again express my surprise that it was able to bring no acknowledgment from this Government until the time I have mentioned, in the following year. However, the High Commissioner did send a reply on the 4th of August, 1893. He again, I think, took the unfortunate attitude of simply controverting the existence of this disease, instead of endeavouring to comply with the request of the British Board of Agriculture. That board had had advice from their officers, which they could not ignore simply on the strength of the assertions of the High Commissioner, and yet that is what the High Commissioner seems to have demanded. For example, in his letter of 4th August, 1893, to the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, in reply to the request that we should have suspects examined, the High Commissioner waives the whole request away in such words as these :

> On receipt of the letter in question, I telegraphed as follows to the Minister of Agriculture of Canada :—" How many animals during the present season were rejected by officers of the Dominion Government as unfit for shipment, and for what causes ? Reply immediately." The following answer has reached me :—" Animals rejected, no record kept."

Well, Mr. Speaker, without finding fault with the past, I think that the time had then arrived for keeping a record. The Secretary of State continued :

> Reasons chiefly, lump jaw, physical injuries and, in very few exceptional cases, tuberculosis.

The High Commissioner then proceeded to say :

> I think this disposes very completely of the inference which seems to have got abroad that some of the rejected animals have been suffering from contagious pleuro-pneumonia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps it might : but, inasmuch as the home authorities wanted evidence, it seemed only reasonable that their request should be complied with. It was not for us to question the reasonableness or otherwise of their request. They asked for examination, for reports, for evidence. They did not simply ask the High Commissioner to send a cablegram to Canada and then to forward them the reply. But they wanted a report from experts in Canada. This correspondence shows the unreceptive condition of the High Commissioner's mind and the impossibility he was under of fully appreciating what it was wise to do under the circumstances. However, the Board of Agriculture replied to that communication. They themselves recognized the unfortunate position that the High Commissioner was assuming. They saw that it was going to lead to misfortune, unless he receded from it, and they went out of their way again to emphasize their former attitude. I shall now read a letter from the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, in reply to this communication from the High Commissioner. The letter is dated 15th of August, 1893, and, after referring to the controversy, the Under Secretary of State proceeded to say :

> It is to the future position of Canada under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act——

That is, the English Act under which the scheduling takes place.

> —that a particular importance now attaches irregularly introduced across it undoubtedly the measures by means of which the Canadian Government could go far to secure evidence bearing materially on the question of the restoration of the privilege of free entry, which they wish to obtain and which the board wishes to be in a position to confer. It is with much regret that the board read the High Commissioner's remarks as to the suggestions made by them under this head.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that I am not expressing my regret alone, but I am rather concurring in the opinion of the Colonial Office, that it was greatly to be regretted that the High Commissioner failed to appreciate the significance of the requisition of the Imperial Government, and simply delivered, in his off-hand way, a final judgment upon their opinion. The Under Secretary of State goes on to say :

> The argument that the disease with which the animals recently imported were affected could not have been contagious pleuro-pneumonia, because that malady is not known to exist in Canada is only valued to the extent to which efficient measures are taken to secure information on the point. An external examination of the animals, without slaughtering in a single case, is clearly insufficient for the purpose, if the nature and attributes of the disease are kept fully in mind.

Yet the hon. Minister of Finance asks us to-day, in an off-hand way, to assert that the whole finding of the veterinarian experts of England is incorrect. The Under Secretary of State proceeds further to say :

> There is abundant evidence that contagious pleuro-pneumonia may remain dormant during a lengthened period, and it was stated in evidence given to the Parliamentary Committee in 1888 that cases had been known to develop disease after no less a period than fifteen months...... Where the disease is not indicated by any outward symptoms—a condition which is not at all uncommon—slaughter and examination of the lungs afford the only means of detecting it.
> The fact, therefore, that the Canadian Government have at present no information as to the existence of the disease appears to the board to be very far from conclusive, and in the interests of the trade of the two countries, and even of the health of the live stock in the Dominion itself, the board would venture to press most strongly upon the Canadian Government th adoption of vigorous and really effective measures, such as those we have already indicated, in order to ascertain whether, by any mischance, the disease has obtained a footing in the Dominion. It is certain the disease exists in the United States. The frontier between that country and Canada is a very long one and of such a character as to make its protection difficult, and the possibility that the disease may have been irregularly introduced across it undoubtedly exists.

Now, what did the Government do, in the face of that second communication, which arrived here on the 15th August, 1893, emphasizing the communication of the British Board of the 21st July, 1893, and which ought to have awakened our Government to the sense of the importance that the Imperial Government, at least, attached to their contentions ? Our Government still seems to have been asleep. I cannot in any way justify, much as I would like to do so, its silence, or, in fact, the contempt with which it seemed to have treated these requests of the English Government. At all events, the Imperial authorities were thinking of us, even if this Government—the farmers' friend—was not. On the 29th January, 1894, the Board of Agriculture of England sent to us the following communication, reminding us that the spring was just opening, and that, up to that moment, our Government had not taken the first steps to meet their wishes. This letter is as follows:

> I am directed by the Board of Agriculture to state for the information of the Marquis of Ripon, Secretary of State for the Colonies, that the period is now approaching when the board may expect to receive inquiries as to the conditions under which the importation of cattle from Canada is to be carried on during the coming season. And they would be glad to be placed as early as possible in possession of the views of the Canadian Government with regard to the matter set forth in the board's letter of the 21st July last.

It is to me humiliating to think that in a great interest like this, the cattle interest of Canada should be placed in the hands of a Government represented on this occasion by a High Commissioner in Great Britain, and yet we have to depend upon the British authorities to awaken our authorities to a sense of responsibility and of the importance of the interests involved. The document goes on to say :

> In that letter the board asked to be supplied with copies of the statutes now in force in the Dominion, relating to the contagious diseases of animals, and also for detailed information as to the machinery by which the requirements of those statutes are carried into effect, especially with regard to the submission of diseased lungs to veterinary officers well acquainted with the characteristics of pleuro-pneumonia.
> The board at the same time suggested that the Canadian Government should consider whether an additional measure of security would not be obtained by the total prohibition of imported cattle into the Dominion except for breeding, exhibition or other exceptional purposes, and > also whether any further means could be devised for the prevention of any breach of the laws and regulations at the frontier.

> With respect to the collection of further evidence as to the sanitary condition of animals in the Dominion, the Board indicated various means by which further very valuable information might be secured. They suggested that the animals rejected for shipment to this country should be slaughtered.

And so on. And then, omitting their reference to their former communication, the letter proceeds as follows. And here I would ask the High Commissioner to take notice of this observation and to explain, if he can, the dilatoriness on the part of his Government :

> But the board have not, as yet, been made acquainted with the conclusion at which the Canadian Government arrived. Nor have they received the information with which they asked to be provided.

This was on 29th January, 1894. The letter of the 21st July, 1893, dealing with one of the most important of Canadian interests unanswered and at last, in January, 1894, the British Government ask for an answer.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What is the first date ?

Mr. MULOCK. The letter first referred to asking us to adopt precautionary measures was dated 21st July, 1893.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the answer ?

Mr. MULOCK. The first acknowledgment of it from the High Commissioner was in August, 1893, but he ignored it, and the English Board of Agriculture replied by their letter dated 15th August, 1893, to which I have already alluded, reaffirming their doubt set forth in their communication of 21st July. So that it cannot be argued that the reply of the High Commissioner simply sitting on the Board of Agriculture of England was the answer they expected. And so I say, coming to the 29th January, 1894, the English Government, more alive to our interest than our own Government, wrote to us as I am reading. That communication goes on :

> In this connection it is to be observed that since the board's letter of the 21st of July last was written, the suspicion which attaches to the sanitary condition of Canadian cattle has been deepened by the detection of disease in the animal landed in this country from Montreal by the "Hurona" on the 22nd October last ; and, as stated in the board's letter of the 2nd November last, this further occurrence appears to them to emphasize the desirability of further action by the Canadian Government in the directions indicated.

After some further reference to Sir Charles Tupper, the communication proceeds :

> In conclusion, the board may observe that they remain very desirous of finding themselves in a position to restore the privilege of free entry to Canadian cattle, and it is with the hope that this result may be secured that they have asked for the information and have made the suggestions above referred to. As they have already stated, it is impossible for the board to set aside as inaccurate a diagnosis made in no fewer than eight cases, especially in view of the fact that the veterinary officers of the department are in entire agreement, and that their verdict is known to, and endorsed by, veterinary experts of eminence, who have their opportunities for forming an opinion respecting it. The questions for determination at the present time are, therefore—firstly, whether the disease exists in the Dominion ; and, secondly, whether the arrangements for preventing its introduction can with advantage be supplemented. The latter question has already been to some extent dealt with by the Canadian Government by the extension of the quarantine regulations, although those regulations even now do not supply the same measure of security as is obtained under the law in this country. The former question—viz., whether the disease exists at the present time in the Dominion or not—the board regret that they must regard as an open one, until they are in possession of the results obtained by the adoption of measures such as the board have indicated—measures to which they themselves would have resorted if the circumstances of the case were reversed.

Well, Mr. Speaker, at last the Canadian Government is heard from. When the communication reached the home authorities, I know not ; but we find that on the 6th February, 1894, His Excellency in Council dealt with this matter, and I have now in my hand the report in question. Reading through this whole report you find that it entirely fails to appreciate the point of the English Government. It simply reaffirms the statement of the High Commissioner, and, so far as I can discover, manifests a fixed determination simply to rest the Canadian defence upon assertions that Canada is free from disease. But it does not express any intention of seeking to supply the Imperial Government with any of the evidence from our veterinarians that Great Britain asked for. Not only that, but it is in this state paper that words are used which apparently gave umbrage to the Imperial authorities. For example, Sir, I will read a portion at page 65.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it all.

Mr. MULOCK. No ; part of it is controversial :

> The report of Prof. McEachren, giving particulars of the subject of the very few animals rejected, and the reasons why they were rejected, as being unfit for shipment, is appended hereto, marked J. It appears there was not in a single case any reason why slaughter for suspicion of contagious pleuro-pneumonia could have been justified, or in which such action would not have been ridiculous.

Now, I submit that that was not a dignified or fitting way in which to reply to a request made of us by the Imperial authorities. The report goes on :

> It will be seen from the report of Prof. McEachren above referred to, that any attempt to slaughter out the herds from which the animals were taken, which were rejected at the embarkation inspections in Montreal, in search of the > disease pleuro-pneumonia, would have simply been an action without reason. If any animals had been found respecting which any reasonable suspicion of the disease in question attached, they would indubitably have been slaughtered, and the herds from which they came traced out, but in the absence of any existence or even of the suspicion of the disease, it would be out of reason to go slaughtering among the herds to end it.

The Imperial Government did not ask anything so ridiculous. I presume we must give the Board of Agriculture credit for knowing the practice in England, and all they asked was that we in Canada should adopt the practice they were obliged to put in force in England. But instead of treating that communication with respect, it is, by Order in Council, dealt with in language that seems to me offensive. Well, the High Commissioner, on 28th March, gives his testimony as well, in a communication to the Under Secretary of State, in which he says, in reference to what I have read :

> The communications and inquiries from Canada furnish the most conclusive evidence it seems possible to obtain in proof of the non-existence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, and there does not, therefore, appear to me to be any ground for further postponing the restoration of the free admission of Canadian cattle into the United Kingdom to which every country shown to be free from pleuro-pneumonia, is entitled.

There is the evidence of the High Commissioner, instead of the positive testimony the Imperial authorities asked for, the evidence of our veterinarians, after examination and slaughter of suspects. Well, Sir, what impression did these assertions, on our part, make upon the Home Government ? They replied to that on 16th April, 1894—I now quote from a communication of the Board of Agriculture, page 82 :

> The fact that the slaughter of contact-animals has formed no part of the investigations made by the Canadian Government with regard to the existence of disease, deprives those investigations of much of their value. Whatever may be the opinion of the Dominion Government as to the diagnosis of the veterinary officers of this department, it is surely going too far to say that the slaughter of the herds from which the diseased animals were taken, or of animals with which they had been in contact, would have been an action " out of reason," or " ridiculous." The difficulty of detecting contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and of distinguishing it from other lung disorders, save upon post-mortem examination of the lungs, renders the slaughter of contact-animals a matter of necessity if the disease is to be discovered and the spreading arrested, and the board greatly regret that the investigations made by the Canadian authorities should have been deprived of so much of their value by their failure to obtain evidence by this means.

That is the opinion of the board in England. Well, I have stated that at last the Imperial authorities, in their anxiety to remove this embargo, inasmuch as our Government had not given them the information they asked for, determined to adopt what they deemed to be a most thorough system, to slaughter and examine, in the way I have formerly mentioned, the lungs of slaughtered animals at the ports of entry in England, and submit them to the court that they proposed to constitute. Now that the court has made its finding, allow me to tell you briefly who constituted that court, the character of the evidence, the thoroughness or otherwise of the inquiry, and the verdict; and then it will be for us to say whether, in face of that finding, any good can come of a mere assertion by us, one way or another on this question. Will the English Government attach any importance to a mere assertion on our part against such a finding ? Who made this report ? I have in my hands, Mr. Speaker, the state paper issued in England. " Minute of the Board of Agriculture," dated 13th August, 1894. This report sets forth who were appointed to investigate this case, the witnesses, the procedure, and the verdict. Now, in the first place, who were the experts who constituted the court ?—because, as the High Commissioner will appreciate this is an Imperial court, so far as it has to do with cattle questions : it is the highest court in the Empire, as the Privy Council, we are told, is the highest court in the Empire in respect to other matters. Is this verdict, then, of the highest court in the Empire entitled to any weight ? The court was composed of the following gentlemen :—

> Professor John F. McFadyean, M.B., B. Sc., C.M., F.R.C.V.S., Professor William Williams, F.R.C.V.S.

I understand this gentleman was appointed but was not able to act.

> Mr. F. R. Ingersoll, M.R.C.V.S., Mr. S. J. Rayment, M.R.C.V.S., Dr. Francis Vacher, F.R.C.S., Edinburgh, Dr. H. D. Littlejohn, F.R.C.V.S., Edinburgh, Dr. G. Simms Woodhead, F.R.S.E., Mr. William Hunting, F.R.C.V.S., Mr. Clement Stephenson, F.R.C.V.S. Professor Williams, Dr. Simms Woodhead, and Mr. Hunting, had been asked by the High Commissioner for Canada to make reports to him regarding some of the previous cases to which the board have above referred. The board subsequently, by desire of the High Commissioner, extended a similar invitation to Professor J. McCall, F.R.C.V.S., Professor J. Macqueen, F.R.C.V.S., and Mr. R. Rutherford, F.R.C.V.S.

I understand from this report that Professor McCall was not able to take part.

> And they also asked Mr. S. G. Holmans, M.R. C.V.S., their senior inspector at the Foreign Animals Wharf at Deptford, to examine the specimen. All these gentlemen were able to accept the board's invitation with the exceptions of Professors Williams and McCall, who were unable to leave Scotland in time to admit of an early examination of the diseased lung. Subsequently to the landing of the " Toronto " animal, and during the operation of the Canadian Cattle (Slaughter and Examination) Order of 1894, five other cases of disease were detected by inspectors at Liverpool, Deptford and Glasgow, amongst cargoes of cattle arriving from Canada, the disease being declared by those in> spectors and by the veterinary officers of the board to be in each instance contagious pleuro-pneumonia.

Before proceeding with the inquiry, this court, in order that the inquiry should be thoroughly exhaustive, appointed what they call assessors. They are referred to in the following paragraph in the report :—

> It remained for the board to determine in what manner the scientific evidence thus available as to the nature and character of the morbid appearances, could be best presented for consideration, and the board decided in favour of viva voce examination of the pathologists and veterinarians above named——

I should say there is a list of veterinarians and pathologists, which I have omitted for brevity.

> —with the aid of assessors specially well qualified who elicit completely and accurately the opinions of experts on an intricate and technical question which affected most important interests, and which it was on many grounds essential to place in as clear a light as possible. The board were fortunate enough to obtain assistance in this capacity of Right Hon. Sir Henry James, Q.C., M.P., and of Dr. J. Burdon Sanderson, F.R.S., Waynflete, Professor of Physiology in Oxford University, to whom they desire to express their grateful acknowledgment of the very valuable services they have been so good as to render to the board in this matter.

Here follow the names of the witnesses and their qualifications :

> 1. Mr. Alexander Curtis Cope, M.R.C.V.S., Chief Veterinary Officer of the Board of Agriculture.
> Mr. Cope stated that he had been acquainted with pleuro-pneumonia for thirty years, that he had held office under the Privy Council and subsequently under the Board of Agriculture since 1872, that since 1890 he and the present assistant veterinary officer had had under observation 3,133 sets of lungs, in which they had detected 1,087 cases of pleuro-pneumonia, and that in consequence he had had exceptional opportunities of seeing and recognizing the disease.
> 2. Professor George Thomas Brown, C.B., Hon. Assoc. R.C.V.S., Consulting Veterinary Adviser to the Board of Agriculture.
> Professor Brown stated that he had studied pleuro-pneumonia since 1846, that after appointment to the Royal Agricultural College at Cirencester in 1850, he had much experience of the disease in the surrounding districts, that on the formation of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council in 1865 his opportunities of examining morbid specimens very much increased, and that since the department had been engaged in stamping out the disease he had been constantly examining the lungs of diseased cattle.
> 3. Mr. William Wilkinson Smart, M.R.C.V.S., Senior Veterinarian Inspector of the Port of Liverpool.
> Mr. Smart stated that he had acted as a port inspector for about 18 years, and during that period he had had considerable experience in the examination of the lungs of cattle.
> 4. Mr. Steven Jiles Holmans, M.R.C.V.S., Senior Veterinary Inspector at the Port of London (Deptford).
> Mr. Holmans stated that he had had experience of pleuro-pneumonia during the past thirty-six years, and that he had been employed at Deptford for about twenty-one or twenty years.
> 5. Dr. German Simms Woodhead, M.D., F.R.C.S., F.R.S.E.
> Dr. Woodhead stated that he was Director of the Research Laboratory of the Conjoint Board of the Royal College of Physicians, London, and the Royal College of Surgeons, England, that he was closely in pathological research, and that he was the author of works on the subject.
> 6. Dr. Henry Duncan Littlejohn, F.R.C.S., Edinburgh, President of the British Institute of Public Health and Medical Officer of Health, Edinburgh.
> Dr. Littlejohn stated that since 1863 he had been Chief Inspector of the Edinburgh Abatoirs, where meat inspection was vigorously carried on.
> 7. Professor John F. McFadyean, M.B., B. Sc., C.M., F.R.C.V.S., Dean of the Royal Veterinary College
> Professor McFadyean stated that he had been familiar with pleuro-pneumonia for about eighteen or twenty years, that it was his duty to prepare and examine sections of pleuro-pneumonia lungs as a class exercise, and that he had examined very many hundreds of sections in that way
> 8. Dr. Francis Vacher, F.R.C.S., Edinburgh, M.R.C.S., Edinburgh, F.Cs., Medical Officer of Health for Cheshire.
> 9. Professor James Macqueen, F.R.C.V.S., Professor of Surgery in the Royal Veterinary College.
> Professor Macqueen stated that since 1877 he had had a good deal of experience with pleuro-pneumonia, that he had acted for nine years a Deputy Inspector to the Local Authority for Glasgow, and as Deputy Inspector at the Port of Glasgow, and that he had seen most of the cases sent to the Royal Veterinary College under the slaughtering order.
> 10. Mr. William Duguid, F.R.C.V.S., Assistant Veterinary Officer of the Board of Agriculture.
> Mr. Duguid stated that his tenure of office under the Privy Council and the Board of Agriculture had afforded him exceptional opportunities of studying pleuro-pneumonia.
> 11. Mr. William Hunting, F.R.C.V.S.
> Mr. Hunting stated that he had been in practice for a considerable number of years in London, and had also been for some time one of the veterinary inspectors of the London County Council. He had not had very much experience in connection with the disease of pleuro-pneumonia. He had had to deal with about half a dozen cases of pleuro-pneumonia in London and with probably twenty cases before he came to London, but the former were the only cases in respect of which he had borne any responsibility during the past thirteen or fourteen years. His professional experience had been almost entirely among horses.

I think he was one of the High Commissioner's witnesses.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. He does not appear to have proved himself much of an expert.

> 12. Mr. Richard Rutherford, F.R.C.V.S.
> Mr. Rutherford stated that he had had a very large experience of cases of pleuro-pneumonia, both in this country and in Australia.
> 13 Mr. Clement Stephenson, F.R.C.V.S., Veterinary Adviser to the Northumberland County Council and the Corporation, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

> Mr. Stephenson stated that he had been familiar with the post-mortem appearances of pleuro-pneumonia since 1856 ; that between 1878 and 1890 he had made a post-mortem examination of the lungs of every animal in his district which had died from the disease, or which had been slaughtered as being affected, or as having been in contact with the disease, and that he had seen the diseased condition of the lungs in all stages from its inception till death had resulted.

> Mr. Ingersoll stated that in the district in which his practice lay there had been, until recently, a great deal of pleuro-pneumonia, and that he had frequent opportunities of studying that disease.
> 15. Mr. Samuel James Raymant, M.R.C.V.S., Veterinary Inspector at the Metropolitan Cattle Market.

> Mr. Raymant stated that his position at the Cattle Market and in connection with the slaughter-houses there had given him special facilities for the study of pleuro-pneumonia.
> 16. Dr. M. Armand Ruffer, F.R.S., F.M.S., London.
> Dr. Ruffer stated that he was a member of the Physiological and Pathological Societies, and had acted as assistant editor of the "Journal of Pathology and Bacteriology." He had very little experience himself of veterinary science ; he had seen cases of pleuro-pneumonia, but was not an expert on the microscopical appearances of it.

> Professor McCall stated he had held the appointment last named since 1865, and that it had given him great opportunities of studying pleuro-pneumonia.

These were the witnesses with their qualifications, who gave testimony before the court, and the report of the inquiry follows. It gives the heads, the evidence and the finding. It may be fair to assume that, considering the interest involved, the object of the court, the result of the finding, the inquiry was thorough and exhaustive. I will not trouble the House with the evidence. The Minister of Finance ventured to deal with the evidence. As stated in this report, this is a matter highly technical. No doubt physicians and experts will find some difficulty in determining with absolute certainty as to the distinction between contagious pleuro-pneumonia and pleuro-pneumonia itself. It is not competent for us as a parliament to pronounce on this evidence. We must, in this case, take the evidence of gentlemen who were there for the purpose of rendering it, who were thoroughly qualified, who had witnesses before them, who saw the diseased tissues, who were men of the highest professional standing, men who could not by any mistake, I would assume, arrive, almost unanimously—in fact, I think, unanimously—at the verdict which I will read in a moment, and no one will for a moment suggest that men of this high character and standing would render other than an honest verdict on the matters which they were engaged in investigating. Now, what was the conclusion at which this board arrived ? I will read it from the report :

> It appears to the board, on a review of the evidence above summarized, that the result of their inquiry has been to support and confirm the diagnosis of the professional officers in a degree beyond what might have been expected. The position of those officers differs very materially from that of the non-official witnesses who were good enough to give evidence before the board, by reason of the fact that the former are compelled to come to a distinct and definite conclusion in every case submitted to them, and upon that conclusion the administrative action of the board must necessarily depend. It is, therefore, in the highest degree satisfactory to the board to find that so much evidence corroborative of the verdict of their officers has been forthcoming from gentlemen occupying, it is true, a much less onerous and responsible position than the veterinary officers of the board ; but who were nevertheless well qualified to form a judgment on the question at issue.
> In no single instance did any of the witnesses examined find themselves in a position to assert without qualification that either the "Winnipeg" or the "Mongolian" case was not one of contagious pleuro-pneumonia ; whilst on the other hand the verdict of the professional officers of the board was absolutely and unreservedly confirmed in many instances.

And, after dealing with the evidence, and in support of that finding, the report concludes as follows :—

> In the institution of the inquiry the board were actuated by a two-fold desire. In the first place doubts had been freely and publicly expressed as to the accuracy of the diagnosis of the board's professional officers, and the board were anxious to acquaint themselves with the grounds upon which these doubts had been based. In the second place, the board desired, in the event of the diagnosis being confirmed and supported, (as it has been by English professional opinion) to place Canadian veterinarians in possession of a complete statement of the views of experts in this country, since it is with the members of the veterinary profession in the Dominion, that in the opinion of the board, the next step rests. It is beyond question that a disease occurs in the lungs of Canadian cattle imported into this country which, in the opinion of many of the most experienced and best qualified veterinarians in this country, is contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and even in the opinion of pathologists ready to take the hypothesis that the disease is new and still unobserved as a bacterial or germ disease, and which cannot develop to the extent shown by the slaughter of the diseased animals in this country, a fortnight or three weeks after shipment, unless it had been originally contracted before leaving Canada. In the view of the board these matters deserve, and will doubtless receive, the serious attention of the Canadian Government, and of public and private veterinarians in the Dominion, but in the meantime the duty of the board is clear. They have no alternative but to act on the assumption that the disease found in the Canadian animals was in fact contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and in view of this fact they must maintain in force the normal security provided by the statute against the introduction of disease by means of imported animals, namely, by their slaughter at the first port of landing.

(Sd.) HERBERT GARDNER,
President of the Board of Agriculture.

13th August, 1894.

Prior to that, in reference to the inquiry that was going on, the board had, on the 6th of June, 1894, dealt with the matter in the following words :—

> It only remains for the board to add that it is with much regret that they received the intelligence which they now officially communicate to the Secretary of State, inasmuch as it confirms the fear which the board have previously expressed as to the introduction of pleuro-pneumonia into the Dominion without the knowledge of the authorities there. The matter is a grave one from every point of view, and the board venture to hope that the investigation now being commenced, will have the effect of providing common ground upon which the action, both of the Canadian Government and of the board, can alike be based.

And what was the common ground ? On the 13th August, 1894, the board made that finding. What was the duty of our Government at this stage ? They had refused, up to that moment, to do what the Imperial authorities asked them to do on the 21st July, 1893. They were asked to adopt the same methods as are enforced in England. The High Commissioner in August, 1893, pooh-poohed these suggestions. His Government neglected them. His Government actually ignored the existence of this suggestion. Not until they were wakened up to the matter on the 29th January, 1894, did they take it into serious consideration. Not until February, 1894, did they even answer the communication, and then their answer practically was: We decline to do what the Imperial authorities ask ; we simply assert there is no pleuro-pneumonia here, and that is all there is about it. The English Government said : That is folly ; that proves nothing ; we have an adverse report, and now we will give you another chance. And they suggested the investigation, the particulars of which I have given, and the verdict was rendered, and still the communication of the 21st July, 1893, was outstanding and unattended to. Mr. Speaker, I ask this House, even if up to that point the Government was in any respect justified in maintaining their attitude, what should they have regarded as their duty after the verdict of that court ? Do you not think, Sir, that, in the face of that verdict, they might at least have recognized the reasonableness of the request and the suggestions of the Imperial authorities, and set to work to seriously live up to them. Not so, Sir. Months went by ; I do not know whether they have to this moment acted upon this suggestion—perhaps the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) will tell me—but this I do say, that some months afterwards, the Secretary of State took part in a public controversy in Scotland upon this matter, and this brought forth a communication from the then President of the Board of Agriculture, the Right Hon. Herbert Gardner. Mr. Gardner, writing on the 24th November, 1894, to Sir John Laing, a letter which was published in the press, stated that up to that date, the request made by the Imperial authorities on the 21st July, 1893, had been denied, neglected, and unattended to. That was months after the verdict was rendered, and, for all we know, up to this moment, the Canadian authorities have maintained the attitude of simply negativing every assertion, as if that would satisfy the Imperial authorities. I commend the letter of Mr. Gardner to the attention of the House. The first part of the letter is immaterial, but he continues to say :

> As regards the future I can only say that the matter rests with the Canadian Government.

You will bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that these are the words of the President of the Board of Agriculture ; the gentleman charged with the responsibility of administering the laws of England respecting the cattle trade, the gentleman on whose recommendation the embargo was imposed, the gentleman who had made recommendations, leading, as he hoped, towards the removing of the embargo ; the gentleman who, as long as his government was in power, was the one to determine as to whether or not we had made out a case to warrant him in recommending the removal of the embargo. What did this gentleman say to the British public on the 24th November, 1894, as to the action of the Canadian Government ? I read it :

> As regards the future I can only say that the matter rests with the Canadian Government. If that Government would adopt the suggestions made by this board as far back as July, 1893, and make sufficient arrangements for securing the notification of suspicious causes of lung diseases to expert officers, by whom post-mortem examinations could be made, exact records of the appearance presented being kept, valuable evidence as to the sanitary conditions of animals within the Dominion would after a sufficient interval be available, and it would be seen whether the result was to corroborate the views expressed by Sir Charles Tupper as to the absence of pleuro-pneumonia in that country.

You will observe that he mentions the High Commissioner, and is unreasonable enough to ask that his statements should be corroborated. And now, I call the attention of the Secretary of State to this statement :

> Up to the present time, however, the action of the Dominion Government, so far as the board are informed respecting it, has unfortunately not been such as the board thinks they would have felt it their duty to take if there had been similar grounds for suspecting the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in this country. I can only hope that some alterations of the position in this respect may speedily take place, so that the prospects of my finding myself in a position to remove the existing regulations may be increased.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what inference are we to draw from that letter ? The head of the Department of Agriculture states publicly over his own hand that the deadlock, if you call it such, is wholly attributable to the inaction of the Canadian Government. Now, the British Government have their case. They have formed their conclusions ; they have appointed their men ; they have had their court ; they have had a verdict ; they have assumed a certain attitude. Their opinion is, rightly or wrongly, that the findings of their veterinarians are correct. Are they going to discredit them ? Were they likely, during all these years, to ignore those findings merely upon our assertion, or the assertion of any man, I care not how high in office, that our country was free from this disease ? Would it not have been a more reasonable course, and one more likely to have resulted in success, if we had acted on the advice and the suggestions of the British Government at the very earliest moment after they had said : "Our officers find this disease, and we ask you to adopt certain methods in order that we may be justified in removing the embargo." Instead of that, instead of furnishing them with the evidence they desired, and adopting the precautionary measures they requested, we chose obstinately to go our own way. They asked us, for instance, to prohibit totally the importation of cattle except for breeding and exhibition purposes. Have we done that ? No ; you have ignored that provision ; you have allowed hundreds of cattle to come in from the United States, the country specially mentioned in this communication as having in it pleuro-pneumonia. Under these circumstances, I think the farmers and the people of Canada have just cause of complaint that this very important branch of industry—especially important considering the depression in agriculture—has been administered in such a way as to bring this calamity upon us. I submit that if the Government had really acted in the spirit of the request of the British Government, and shown a desire to meet their wishes, we would probably have found in England a more friendly attitude towards us than that which has broken out in this attempt to make the exclusion of our cattle permanent for all time. If the Bill now before the Imperial Parliament becomes law, I question if for many a year it will be removed from the statute-book. The almost irrevocable character of the injury to accrue to us ought to have awakened the Government to a sense of the danger ; and their bounden duty was to have acted on the suggestions of the Imperial Government, with a view to the removal of the embargo, even if in their own judgment those suggestions did not appear to be reasonable. But, instead of that, our Government took their own course ; they had their own view, and obstinately persisted in it. I would not blame them for continuing to say that the country was free from disease, if they so felt. But what I do blame them for is that whilst maintaining their opinion, they failed to endeavour to satisfy the Imperial authorities in the direction in which they wished to be satisfied. They could have done that without prejudice to their opinion that there was no disease in Canada. But they chose to treat with contempt—I do not wish to use the word offensively—the requests of the Imperial authorities. They risked, and they lost, or rather Canada has lost. Under these circumstances, the occasion calls for an expression of opinion from Parliament. Does anybody in his senses suppose that, in view of the opinion the people of England have formed, they will attach the slightest weight to an expression from this Parliament that Canada is in a sanitary condition now ? That we have been saying through the High Commissioner and through our Governor in Council ever since the embargo, and with what effect ? We have simply been getting into greater danger. All these assertions have accomplished nothing ; and does any one suppose that a mere assertion by this House that there is no disease in Canada will prevent a passage of the Bill before the British House of Commons ? I do not propose to comment on the rest of the resolution ; but I fancy that the people of England, when they read this resolution, in which, assuming that it passes, the Canadian Parliament records its protest against Imperial legislation, will very naturally ask : Is there no legislation on the Canadian statute-book excluding English products ? What about our tariff—what about our customs law—excluding, or almost excluding, Imperial manufactured goods ? Fancy our approaching the English Parliament and protesting against their legislation. Does this Parliament think that that is a dignified or proper course to pursue ? I suppose the majority of this House will adopt the resolution ; but it appears to me that the Government ought to eliminate that part of it themselves. With regard to the situation, I have not on this occasion referred to the origin of this disease in Canada. That has been dealt with before.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say the origin of this disease was in Canada ?

Mr. MULOCK. What do you mean ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, I understand, says that he has not yet referred to the origin of this disease in Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. I have not dealt with it thoroughly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that it has or ever has had any origin in Canada ?

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman need not become excited over it. The matter was discussed in 1894. I am not asserting that the disease is here ; I am not an expert; I am not making any statement as to that at all. I say the English Government have found that against us. They have made the finding, and I am not seeking to trace what ground there may be for that finding. I take the verdict of the Imperial authorities.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As sound?

Mr. MULOCK. No. I do not say I take it as sound. I presume that it represents the view in England; I presume they will not discredit it there. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the Imperial Government will discredit their report?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not the point. I am not saying what they hold in England; that we all know. But what startled me was the hon. gentleman saying that he was now going to take up the question of the origin of this disease in Canada, which contained an admission which I regarded as a most startling one to come from a member of the Parliament of Canada; in face of the evidence that no such disease ever has existed or does now exist in Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman has substituted the word "now" for the word "not." I said, I am not. The hon. gentleman says, I am "now."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Precisely; that is the same thing.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not going to enter into any discussion as to whether or not the disease is in Canada, or who is responsible for it. I dealt with that in the month of July, 1894, and my views are on record. I have an opinion upon that question, and I am quite prepared to discuss it, if necessary; but what I am now discussing is the situation in which this trade is in England, and as to whether or not the Government are right or wrong. We have a situation to face, and it is such as I have tried to describe it. That situation, the threatened permanency of this embargo, I believe, Mr. Speaker, is attributable, to some extent at least, to the manifest negligence or inattention of the Administration, in not having taken the necessary steps to satisfy the Imperial authorities of the non-existence of this disease in Canada. They called upon us to give that evidence. They said that there had been a case made out. Will the hon. Secretary of State deny that? They said that, in their opinion, a strong case had been made out, and that there was conclusive evidence to support it. I have never asked the hon. gentleman to admit, I do not want anybody to admit that there was a case; but, when the Imperial authorities said there was, and asked us to refute it, I think it would have been wise to give it a little attention and try to controvert their statements, instead of confining our reply to mere assertions. They asked for evidence and not assertion. I may ask the Government now, if they have done anything towards complying with the request of the Imperial Government, as contained in the letter of the 21st July, 1893?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are not in a division court, Mr. Speaker. I will answer the hon. gentleman, when addressing the House in reply.

Mr. MULOCK. Then, I ask him to produce, in his reply, for the information of this House and country, the official documents from this and the Imperial Governments, showing to what extent, if at all, this Government has complied with the request of the Imperial authorities. I would respectfully ask the hon. gentleman to produce, for the information of the House, the correspondence from the 13th August, 1894, to date, to show whether they have or have not complied with the request contained in the communication of the Imperial Government on the 21st July, 1893. I cannot compel the hon. gentleman to answer; but, at all events, I can put him in a position where, if he does not answer, we will be compelled to draw conclusions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK. I think that is fair. Under the circumstances, I beg to move in amendment:

> That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following added instead thereof:—"In view of the repeated official declarations of the British Government of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia amongst Canadian cattle, and the serious consequences to Canadian interests from the passage of the Bill now before the British Parliament permanently to exclude Canadian live cattle from Great Britain, this House regrets that the action of the Government of Canada has not been such as to protect the cattle industry of Canada from the serious injury calculated to accrue to it from the passage of such a measure."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have witnessed with very great regret the course adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not refer to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, but I refer to the statements made by a large number of gentlemen on the other side, with reference to this important question; and I can only say that, if those hon. gentlemen desired to secure the passage of Mr. Long's Bill, which is not correctly, but very incorrectly represented in the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), they could not have adopted any course so calculated to attain that object. If these hon. gentlemen opposite wished to prevent any live cattle from Canada, ever being permitted to enter the United Kingdom, they have adopted, in their speeches and in the line of argument they have taken in this House, the very best possible means of achieving that purpose. Now, I think that, however anxious hon. gentlemen opposite may be to bring a charge of any kind against the Government, they ought not, in their desire to attack the Government, to put themselves in the position of being willing to break down and permanently injure a very important Canadian industry. That is the position which hon. gentlemen opposite occupy to-day. We listened with great regret to these statements made by them on a former occasion, and reiterated on this, and to which they knew then that the Government, anxious to press forward the business of the House, were not in a position, without lending themselves to the obstruction of public business, to reply. I was in hopes that the patience with which the Government then endured those unjustifiable and unwarranted attacks on their policy, would have satisfied these hon. gentlemen, and that they would not, on the present occasion, have followed up those statements by those to which we have listened to-day.

I complain of the misrepresentation contained in the resolution which the hon. gentleman has just placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker. That resolution declares that the object of the Bill before the Imperial Parliament is to shut out altogether the admission of Canadian cattle into the United Kingdom. Sir, the hon. gentleman ought to know that that is not the purport of the Bill. The hon. gentleman ought to know that that resolution is not directed, in any sense whatever, against Canadian cattle, but is a general resolution, applied to all the world.

Mr. MULOCK. Would it not have that effect on Canadian cattle ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say it is a gross misrepresentation of the facts to say that the Bill is aimed at Canadian cattle, when it is a general Bill applied to all cattle in the world, and therefore is not susceptible of the construction that is placed upon it.

Mr. LAURIER. Do you protest for all the world ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that so far as we are concerned, we protest against the passage of this Bill on the ground that there is contagious pleuro-pneumonia in Canada ; that is what we protest against. We do not undertake, as the hon. gentleman intimated, to question the right of the Imperial Government to make such laws as they believe to be in the interest of their own country ; but what we do object to is that a declaration which has been maintained by the Imperial Government, or a portion of it, that contagious pleuro-pneumonia exists in Canada, should be made a ground for the passage of such a measure. We know that Her Majesty's Government are charged by the Liberal papers, and by the Liberals in Parliament, and they are charged by the late government, and by Mr. Gardner, who is now in the House of Lords, but who was the gentleman who imposed these restrictions upon Canada—they are charged broadly and distinctly by the Liberal party in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords with passing this measure as a purely protectionist measure. I say, therefore, that under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman has no right to intimate that this is a Bill exclusively directed against Canadian cattle, whereas it is a principle that is to apply to every country in the world, whether there is cattle disease in it or not. Now, I may say that I was engaged in public duties in Paris in 1892 when this question was raised that pleuro-pneumonia had been found to exist in the lungs of Canadian cattle ; and my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, and my lamented friend, the late Sir John Abbott, then Prime Minister, were in London, and they cabled to me to go over to London for the purpose of assisting in an endeavour to prevent the exclusion of Canadian cattle on the ground that pleuro-pneumonia had been found to exist. I went over immediately, and the Government were good enough, at my request, to appoint a committee of the Cabinet to hear the statements that we wished to make, Mr. Abbott being good enough to accompany me. The committee of the Cabinet on that occasion was composed of the President of the Board of Agriculture, the Colonial Secretary, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Earl Spencer, and Lord Kimberley ; and I placed before them the evidence on which I held that they were not justified in arriving at the conclusion that pleuro-pneumonia existed in Canada, and that the disease which had been described to be pleuro-pneumonia by the veterinary surgeons of the Board of Agriculture, was in reality not such.

Mr. LANDERKIN. In what year was this ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This was in 1892. I will briefly state to the House the argument that I held then, and hold now, to have been an incontrovertible argument against the policy that the Imperial Government proposed to adopt. This proposal was made upon a report made by three gentlemen, Prof. Brown, Mr. Cope, and Prof. Duguid, who were the veterinary experts of the Board of Agriculture, and they reported that they had found in the lungs of two Canadian cattle symptoms of undoubted contagious pleuro-pneumonia. I drew the attention of that distinguished committee of the Cabinet to what I think was a very important fact, that these three gentlemen, Prof. Brown, Prof. Duguid and Mr. Cope, had, in 1890, made a precisely similar report to the Board of Agriculture when the Rt. Hon. Mr. Chaplin was President of that board ; and I stated that although their report was precisely similar to the report which they had then made, Mr. Chaplin, then presiding over the Board of Agriculture, had refused to accept that report, or at all events, had not acted upon it, and that it remained in the records of the Board of Agriculture, and that Canadian cattle were not scheduled. Now, Sir, I was aware that at this very moment, Mr. Chaplin, a leading member of the Opposition in the House of Commons, who had been President of the Board of Agriculture, was pressing in the strongest manner upon the government that the law should be put in force, and that Canadian cattle should be prevented from having free access into the United Kingdom. I asked them to explain how it was, if they were warranted in accepting this statement of these three veterinary surgeons and acting upon it, and excluding live cattle from Canada from going all over the country, as they had hitherto been allowed to do—I asked them how it was that Mr. Chaplin, when he was charged with the same responsible duty of administering the law, and when he had precisely similar report before him, identically the same in both cases, why he had not acted. I said, if you will look at the statement made at a public meeting by Mr. Chaplin three days ago, you will find that he declares that contagious pleuro-pneumonia had never been known to exist in Canada. Now, Sir, what followed ? Why, there was the fact that between the time Mr. Chaplin had refused to accept the report of these veterinary experts, and the time that we were then discussing the question, no less than 214,000 cattle had been brought from Canada into the United Kingdom, without a suspicion having been raised by anybody that pleuro-pneumonia existed in Canada, or that it was to be found in any of those cattle. I said, therefore, you have 214,000 reasons given by Mr. Chaplin himself why you should not schedule Canada. He did not do it when the responsibility rested on his shoulders, and since that time to the present, 214,000 cattle have come from Canada and gone all over this country from end to end ; and yet nobody has ever insinuated that pleuro-pneumonia has been brought into the country, or that it has been found to exist in any of the Canadian cattle. I held that that was incontrovertible evidence, that the report of these veterinary experts was not infallible, and that it was not safe to arrive at the conclusion in face of the testimony of Mr. Chaplin himself who, with that report placed in his hands in 1890, had not scheduled Canada, that these cattle had all been admitted, and that he himself had, in addressing a public meeting three days before, declared that contagious pleuro-pneumonia down to the present time had never been known to exist in Canada. Well, Sir, I may say a great impression was made on this committee of the Cabinet of the Privy Council, and Sir John Abbott, being present, authorized me to make the suggestion that instead of excluding Canadian cattle by imposing a restriction against their free admission as before, if they would take no action and refrain until they had made further examination, Sir John Abbott authorized me to say that the Canadian authorities, as it was near the close of the season, would prevent any further shipment of cattle, and in the meantime the Board of Agriculture would have the winter before them for the purpose of making investigations. So strong was the argument felt to be against the accuracy of this report of the experts and in favour of the statements that I had been able to place before them, that they came to the conclusion that they would accept the proposition made by myself, upon the authority of Sir John Abbott, provided it could be legally done, and they took the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, the Attorney General and the Solicitor General of England, for the purpose of ascertaining whether that course could be legally pursued. The decision of the Law Officers of the Crown, unfortunately, was, that they could not adopt that course, because, with the evidence which had been submitted by the professional advisers of the Board of Agriculture, they had the evidence before them upon which they were compelled to act, and therefore they had no alternative. But I have no hesitation in saying that this extreme measure was adopted with great reluctance, and, as I have said, only after they found that they were obliged to take that course.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 28) to incorporate the Huron and Ontario Railway Company.—(Mr. Sproule.)

CANADIAN CATTLE IN ENGLAND.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, in continuance of the remarks I was making when the House rose at six o'clock, I may say that I listened with amazement to an hon. member of this House devoting from two to three hours to an argument which, had he been retained by the Imperial Government to defend them for excluding Canadian cattle from that free introduction into the United Kingdom which they formerly had, could not have been more industriously prepared to convince the Imperial Government that they were right in adopting the course they did. I take it to be a very great compliment to the Government of Canada, when an hon. gentleman in this House who is very anxious indeed to find some cause of complaint, is compelled to adopt a course of that kind in order to make a case against the Administration. I think that, if that hon. gentleman, or if any other hon. member thought the Government were guilty of any shortcomings in this matter, he could find terms in which to challenge their conduct, without at the same time sustaining a policy which has been most injurious to Canadian interests, and from which the people of this country have suffered so severely. The hon. gentleman says that I challenged the accuracy of the report of these veterinary officers of the Board of Agriculture. I did more than challenge it, Sir. I say, Sir, I convicted the experts of the Board of Agriculture of having been incapable of discharging their duties efficiently. I was able to lay, as I did in their presence, the evidence before the committee of the Imperial Cabinet that they had made a report in 1890 that contagious pleuro-pneumonia existed in Canada, and that after that 214,000 cattle had been brought into the United Kingdom and distributed all over the country, not a single instance had been adduced of contagious pleuro-pneumonia being found in connection with any one of these animals. And the President of the Board of Agriculture, the Right Hon. Mr. Chaplin himself declared, after that experience of the importation of Canadian cattle, in the face of their declaration that contagious pleuro-pneumonia had been brought into the United Kingdom by Canadian animals, that down to that hour not a single case of contagious pleuro-pneumonia had existed in Canada. I say there could not be more conclusive evidence than that, that these gentlemen had blundered in the discharge of their duty, and that they had done a gross injustice to Canada, and that causelessly, seeing that no such disease existed in this country. Is there any man in this or any other country where contagious pleuro-pneumonia is known, who does not know that it is a disease that cannot be concealed? The moment contagious pleuro-pneumonia shows itself in any part of the great republic to the south of us, that instant the country is made aware of it, and measures of the most energetic character are taken to stamp it out. Is there any person who does not know that the very foundation of the Animals' Contagious Diseases Act in England is the fact that contagious pleuro-pneumonia, wherever it exists, at once shows itself, so that the Government can take steps to meet it ? The moment a case of the disease is found to exist in any part of the United Kingdom, under the law, they are compelled to slaughter the whole herd in which it presents itself, and also to slaughter all the animals, wherever they may be found, throughout the United Kingdom, that have come in contact with that herd. Sir, it is perfectly obvious that, if contagious pleuro-pneumonia had existed among Canadian cattle, this import trade having continued for two long years, the disease must have manifested itself, calling for the enforcement of the law. But I may tell the hon. gentleman there were additional reasons why I challenged the opinions of these experts. The first of these experts is Professor Brown. Who is Professor Brown ? Why, Sir, Professor Brown is no less than the consulting veterinary adviser of the Board of Agriculture in England—the Board of Agriculture of England, which has been moving heaven and earth to prevent the importation of live cattle, not only from Canada, but from all other countries. And yet this gentleman, the paid officer of an organization known to be hostile to and to be doing everything in their power publicly and by deputation, and in every other way, to prevent the importation of cattle from Canada, or any other country, is the individual trusted by the Board of Agriculture with the power of destroying, by his own act, and his own motion, the cattle trade between the Dominion of Canada and the United Kingdom. I do not charge Professor Brown with being influenced by that position.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I expected that Professor Brown would be justified by hon. gentlemen opposite in doing anything against Canada. That is on a line, and in conformity with the position taken in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to everything. If a blow can be struck against the Government of Canada, it appears to matter not what injury the country suffers, and to what extent the best interests of this Dominion are struck down.

Mr. MULOCK. You could hardly do a better turn to Canada than to strike down this Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not object to the Government being struck, if hon. gentlemen opposite do not strike below the belt. The Government are a fair object of attack by hon. gentlemen opposite ; it is the business of a loyal and constitutional Opposition to criticise as closely as possible the conduct of the Government, and if they find a joint in the harness of their adversaries, to take advantage of it. I want to draw a line, however, in this warfare, and that line is, that in striking the Government, hon. gentlemen opposite should not strike the country. If the Government stand in a position so that hon. gentlemen opposite cannot strike them without striking the country, the best evidence is afforded that hon. gentlemen opposite are not worthy of taking their places.

Mr. LISTER. Do your duty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that Professor Brown is not qualified, that it is an outrage for him to occupy the position of being the paid officer of an organization that are doing their utmost to prevent the introduction of live animals of any kind into the United Kingdom, and, at the same time, hold the position of an umpire, on whose advice, according to the opinion of officers of the Crown, the government are compelled to act, even if it is contrary to their own opinions as regards this important trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. But I have had the best reasons for knowing that these gentlemen were not infallible, for I have proved out of the mouth of the President of the Board of Agriculture, that he was not prepared to accept their opinions, that, in fact, he rejected their opinions, and never, to this day, has stated the reason. But the fact remains that with their statement on record that contagious pleuro-pneumonia existed in Canadian animals, shipped to the United Kingdom, that report was disregarded and remained a dead letter in the archives of the office, while 214,000 head of cattle were brought from Canada into the United Kingdom, to prove that those gentlemen had blundered and that their opinions were not such as should entitle any government to strike down a great trade with one of its colonies. Who are the rest of the gentlemen? There is Professor Duguid. I had some little experience with him. What happened? He was sent down on the report of Mr. Elliott, inspector of cattle quarantine at Liverpool, that a cargo of animals had arrived from Canada with Texan fever, one of the diseases which, under the Contagious Diseases Act, warrants the department in scheduling a country. Professor Duguid was sent to Liverpool by the Privy Council—it was before the organization of the present Board of Agriculture—to examine into this matter, and report. I received a letter from the secretary of the Privy Council, a very eminent man, asking to see me. I immediately waited on him. He said: "I have very bad news for you. We have been obliged, on the report of Professor Duguid, to order a large cargo of Canadian cattle to be slaughtered to-morrow, and the scheduling of Canada must follow, as a matter of course, because some of the animals are found to have Texan fever." I said: "Will you do me the great favour of sending a telegram to counteract that order, to stop the slaughtering of those animals for twenty-four hours, and be good enough to give me a letter to Professor Duguid, authorizing me to join him in an investigation of this question, before you carry out so extreme a step?" I went down in the night to Liverpool. I met Professor Duguid. I went to the cattle quarantine, and I called upon Mr. Elliott, who had made the report, to point out six animals in the herd which he considered to be the worst cases among the animals. He pointed them out. They were knocked down and slaughtered; and I was able to satisfy Professor Duguid that he had made a complete mistake, and that night he sent a report to the Privy Council admitting that he was entirely mistaken, and the animals were allowed, the next day, to be distributed over the country, and Canada was saved from being scheduled. Yet he is one of those experts upon whose fiat, along with that of Professor Brown, the paid officer of the Board of Agriculture of England, this trade between Canada and the United Kingdom was struck down without there being any sufficient foundation, in fact, for such action.

Mr. LANDERKIN. In what year was that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will find, if he refers to the newspapers, that a large body of cattle dealers in Canada, of all parties of political opinion, tended me their grateful thanks for having saved the cattle trade of Canada on that occasion.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I only asked in what year it was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will find that in the Library. He will find there a report on the whole question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is embalmed; for it is many years ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It may be embalmed, but it has not been forgotten. The hon. gentleman will find that the manner in which I discharged my duty on that occasion commended itself, not to the sneers and jeers of hon. gentlemen like himself, but to the good sense and intelligence of the independent electors of Canada of all classes, and of all parties. I give that as another reason why I challenged the accuracy of those gentlemen's opinions. But my challenge was not required. There stood the evidence of the gentleman who had been President of the Board of Agriculture, who had rejected their opinion, and this enabled him, two years afterwards, to declare that pleuro-pneumonia never existed in Canada, whereas, if he had accepted the statement of those gentlemen, that trade would have been destroyed two years before it was destroyed. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has gone over his brief in a very elaborate manner, in order to convict the Government of Canada of having entirely mismanaged the matter, and made a great many blunders and mistakes in regard to it. I will give him his answer. The hon. gentleman wants to know why time was lost in answering the proposition, the absurd proposition made by the Board of Agriculture, to do that in Canada which it was impossible to do. What did the Board of Agriculture propose? Why, the board looked upon Canada in the same light as it viewed the United Kingdom, and thought we could apply, in Canada, the same principle, and the hon. gentleman has denounced the Government, and myself, then holding the position of High Commissioner, because we did not do what the Board of Agriculture demanded we should do. The answer is plain. It was simply a case of non possumus, we could not do it. No human man, no government could do what the board proposed. What did the board propose? The law requires that as regards England, in case of suspicion, the animal shall be slaughtered, and if found to show evidences of pleuro-pneumonia, the herd shall be slaughtered, and all the cattle that have come in contact with it shall be slaughtered. Why cannot we do the same thing here? Simply because pleuro-pneumonia does not exist in the country; simply because the first element of the proposal of the Imperial Government was wanting. It is only cases in which you have reason to expect the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, that you could slaughter an animal, and it is only when that slaughtering of the animal has proven that pleuro-pneumonia does exist, that you can slaughter the herd and all the animals that have come in contact with the one diseased. Well, Sir, what was our case? The condemned animal was traced to Pilot Mound, one of a large cargo of animals brought from, I suppose, 150 different farms throughout the North-west and Canada. What would this proposal of the Imperial Government amount to? It would amount to this: that we would have to slaughter all the animals in Pilot Mound, and on all the 150 farms around the country, because the experts in London who had been so grossly deceived two years before, had come to the conclusion that one or two animals had pleuro-pneumonia. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has harped upon the word "ridiculous" I repeat it, Sir. I repeat that had the English Board of Agriculture understood the position of this country, they would discover that their proposition was, what Mr. McEachren, an eminent veterinary surgeon, probably the most eminent veterinary surgeon in Canada, pronounced it to be, and properly pronounced it to be, viz., a ridiculous proposal, and one that was utterly incapable of being carried out. There is not an intelligent farmer in the whole Dominion of Canada that would not have scouted such a proposal as the most monstrous and ridiculous that anybody could conceive. But, Sir, what did this Government do? The first moment that the charge was made, the Government sent intelligent experts and veterinary surgeons all over the North-west of Canada, to find if it was possible to discover any indication of pleuro-pneumonia in the country, and sworn testimony was adduced from the butchers and those who had slaughtered cattle all over Manitoba and the North-west, to prove that they had not discovered, in a single case, any evidence of pleuro-pneumonia. We could not follow the advice of the Board of Agriculture, because as I say, the first element of their advice was based upon the existence of the suspicion of pleuro-pneumonia, and an examination of Canada from end to end had failed to show a single case of suspicion. On the contrary, that thorough examination proved beyond controversy, that the disease had no existence within the boundaries of the Dominion. The Imperial Government, I think, were misled by a telegram—I will not say from what sort of source it emanated—to the London "Standard," stating that a number of animals had not been allowed to be shipped at Montreal. That was at once construed that we were keeping back the cases of pleuro-pneumonia and only sending animals that were supposed to be free from it. I telegraphed at once to the authorities here, and the answer was plain, that not one of those animals was even suspected of pleuro-pneumonia, and a statement was made as to lump jaw, and tuberculosis; diseases that did not warrant animals being excluded. Now, Sir, I think I have given the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) the reasons why it was impossible for the Government of Canada to carry out the suggestion of the English Board of Agriculture. Before answering the despatch, the able Minister who then presided over the Department of Agricultuure here; the Hon. Mr. Angers, who devoted the most painstaking care to this subject, and who felt that it was to be answered with all the evidence that it was possible to collect in this country; the Hon. Mr. Angers took measures to have the most complete investigation that was possible to be had, in view of the fact that no pleuro-pneumonia existed in the country. Months were consumed in gathering overwhelming information in reference to this important question. The Hon. Mr. Angers says in his report:

> In the month of November last the undersigned ordered an expert examination to be made of the lungs of all neat cattle slaughtered at the abattoirs of the old settled provinces, during one month, in order to ascertain if any case of pleuro-pneumonia could be found. The number of sets of lungs examined was 3,085, namely, 1,789 at Montreal; 381 at St. John, N.B.; 334 at Halifax, N.S.; 308 at Toronto; 138 at London; 57 at Galt and 78 at Hamilton. No trace of pleuro-pneumonia was found.

We could not slaughter whole herds; we could not slaughter an animal, nor under the British laws could you have slaughtered one animal in compliance with the request of the Board of Agriculture, simply for the reason that there was not a single case that any person suspected of being a case of pleuro-pneumonia. But, we did the next best thing in our power, and that was to collect indiscriminately all over the North-west and Manitoba, the evidence of those who had slaughtered the animals, and which evidence was put before Her Majesty's Government to prove, that while we could not comply literally with the order, we had done all the Government could do to comply with their wishes and to give to the country and to the Imperial Government the most conclusive evidence, that no disease existed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has referred again and again to the fact, that some time ago animals were allowed to pass freely across the boundary in the North-west and Manitoba. It is well known that the quarantine restrictions were confined to the old provinces of Canada, and there was a very good reason why the same restrictions should not exist on the confines of Manitoba and the North-west. That reason was, that down to to-day, nobody has ever been able to assert, or even to insinuate, that a case of pleuro-pneumonia existed in the United States within a thousand miles of the boundary of Manitoba and the North-west. That was the reason why it was not necessary to quarantine in the North-west. But, when this was brought before the public by some good-natured friend of Canada, who sent a cable to England to say that these animals were allowed to go to and fro ; we said to the Imperial Government : It is quite unnecessary to quarantine there ; there is no pleuro-pneumonia in that part of the country nor is there any danger ; but to render assurance doubly sure, we will enforce the quarantine there, and all through the Rocky Mountains down to the coast of British Columbia, from sea to sea. That is the condition of things to-day. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) dwells upon this again and again, as if he were afraid these restrictions would be removed, and that unfortunately this Government might receive some consideration at the hands of the Imperial Government.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has spoken a great deal with reference to the committee that was appointed by the Board of Agriculture, and he has spoken in rather harsh terms of my not treating that body with very great respect, as he says. Well, Sir, I looked upon that committee and that investigation, as an investigation forced upon the Imperial Government because of the manner in which I had challenged the soundness of the opinion and the action of this board of experts. I defy any fair and candid minded man in Canada to examine the evidence that was taken before that body, without arriving at the conclusion that the aim and object of that investigation, was not to arrive at the question as to whether pleuro-pneumonia existed in Canada or not, but whether the reputation of these experts of the Board of Agriculture was to be protected. Sir, who formed this board ? Professor Brown, Mr. Cope, Prof. Duguid were on hand, and when any evidence was given touching the value of their opinions and ability, they would immediately recall them as witnesses to contradict anybody who reflected in the least degree upon their judgment. But what is the result ? There were no higher authorities in England on that board ; and every person who knows anything of the position of veterinary science in England knows that there were no higher authorities on that board than Professor John F. McFadyean, himself Dean of the Royal Veterinary College, of which Professor Brown was the head, and Professor Macqueen, Professor of Surgery in the Royal Veterinary College ; and yet these professors, under Professor Brown, refused to give evidence that would tend to show that pleuro-pneumonia existed in Canada. You have only to look at the testimony of these men to find that, although the colleagues of Professor Brown, they could not be induced to sustain his opinion that there was satisfactory evidence of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada. I said there never was a case ; but I must qualify that. I find there was one, and it is described in the admirable despatch of the Hon. Mr. Angers. The hon. member for North York says that the despatches of the Imperial Board of Agriculture have never been answered. I tell him that the despatch of the Hon. Mr. Angers, the Canadian Minister of Agriculture, has never been answered, and never can be answered. I say that he gave conclusive evidence that the charge that pleuro-pneumonia has ever existed in Canada is utterly unfounded and is incapable of being sustained by proof. What better evidence have we than the fact that Canada authorized me to offer the Imperial Government that if they were not satisfied with the overwhelming evidence produced, they might select the ablest and most experienced experts—Professor Brown, Professor Duguid and Mr. Cope, if they would come—to come to Canada to examine the matter for themselves, and Canada would pay all the cost. I say the Government did everything, and I did everything that man could do ; and I will now give the evidence that we did not work in vain. We have the strongest evidence that a colony, or the representative of a colony, was able to give that we did not labour in vain, but that the evidence we laid before the Imperial Government was convincing and conclusive. When I say the Imperial Government, I speak of the Colonial Office, which, as you know, is the medium of communication between Her Majesty's Government and all her colonies and dominions. Well, what was the result ? Why, Sir, there was not, from the Marquis of Ripon down, a man in the Colonial Office who was not as satised as I was that the charge that pleuro-pneumonia had any existence in Canada was utterly without foundation. One of the most unusual things, I suppose, that has ever been known to occur in connection with the Imperial Government was the Marquis of Ripon dissociating himself from his colleagues on this question. The position was this : The Liberal Government, as I need not tell the House, was a very weak Government. It had a majority of about 25, and not of a very reliable character, as the end proved. But, Sir, that weak Government was driven at the point of the bayonet by the Right Hon. Mr. Chaplin, the former President of the Board of Agriculture, and the friends of the British Agricultural Association in the House of Commons, who were determined 'per fas et nefas' to prevent Canadian cattle, or cattle from any country, being allowed to enter the United Kingdom. When the Government thus weak were assailed by the powerful interests that were opposed to the competition of Canadian cattle—for it was an important competition—they were driven, I say, at the point of the bayonet by a large body of the Conservative party in the House of Commons, headed by Mr. Chaplin, to adopt the report of these experts. So far did these gentlemen go that they introduced a resolution similar in terms to Mr. Long's Bill, declaring that under no circumstances should cattle from any country be allowed to come into England alive without being subjected to immediate slaughter. That motion was defeated by Lord Rosebery's Government by a very small majority. Therefore, I was not surprised when the party who were thus determined to protect these agricultural interests in England adopted the policy they have adopted, as embodied in the measure now before the House of Commons. But, Sir, I say that it stands on record that we were able to convince the Colonial Office, from Lord Ripon himself down to the humblest clerk,that Canada was free from pleuro-pneumonia, and that these restrictions ought to be removed. I give that to the hon. gentleman who spent so long a time in endeavouring to convince this House that we had not adopted the wisest and best methods. Whether or not they were the wisest methods must be tried by the result, and there you have the result that the medium of communication between Her Majesty's Government and this Government was entirely satisfied on that point. But, Sir, what more ? I was called upon very unexpectedly—reference has been made to it by the hon. gentleman—to address a great body of farmers in the city of Aberdeen. I endeavoured, in doing so to dissociate myself entirely from party, and when the persons who had opposed the previous resolution had animadverted strongly against Lord Rosebery's Government in regard to this question, and had intimated that these restrictions would be removed if they could get the Conservatives back into power, I joined issue with them there and then, and said that so far as my experience went, there was much more to be hoped for from the Liberal party in England than from the Conservative party. I denounced the law that put it in the power of three veterinary surgeons, irrespective of what the Government might themselves think, to strike down and destroy a great and valuable trade between the Dominion of Canada and Great Britain. What happened, Sir ? The Right Hon. Campbell-Bannerman, the Secretary of State for War in Lord Rosebery's Government, delivered a speech two or three days afterwards in Forfarshire, where an election was being held, and when he was challenged by the hard-headed Scotchmen there as to why Scotchmen who were engaged in fattening cattle were made to suffer because they chose to buy Canadian cattle as the healthiest and most profitable they could buy, what did he say ? He said that unfortunately the matter was in such a position that the Government had not the power, as the law now stood, to prevent it. And he said it would become well worthy of consideration whether there should not be an alteration in the law to prevent three veterinary surgeons, by their own fiat, from controlling the policy of the Government of England in a question of that kind. I may say that the hon. gentleman dwelt with very great effect upon this subject, but if he will read over with care this admirable report which was made by the Hon. Mr. Angers, he will find that the case was presented in the strongest and clearest and most emphatic manner possible.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the Order in Council of February, 1894.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the Order in Council giving all the efforts that had been made in order to show the entire absence of pleuro-pneumonia in this country, and so successfully and effectually was this established, that no person has been able successfully to challenge it, down to the present time. I went to the Colonial Office, when I learned that this inquiry was to be held, to know if I could attend it. Oh, yes, they said, the High Commissioner of Canada is quite at liberty to be present, but he cannot say anything. I could not cross-examine a witness or put a question to him. I was to be there, muzzled, as a spectator, without any power to take the slightest part for the protection of Canadian interests. I must say that the Colonial Office viewed that investigation in the light I did ; and although the Colonial Office had committed itself to a strong opinion on that question, they said, under the circumstances, it was impossible to have anything to do with such an examination as that.

But the hon. gentleman has referred, in rather disparaging terms to Mr. Hunting, He said that Mr. Hunting was employed by me.

Mr. MULOCK. No, I did not. I only said that I thought you had suggested his name as a witness.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He was more than a witness ; he was employed by me, but he was employed not as a witness. I had the authority of the Canadian Government to employ an eminent veterinary surgeon for the purpose of attending these examinations of lungs that were held to be diseased and suspected of pleuro-pneumonia. And I may tell the hon. gentleman who Mr. Hunting is. Of course, I had not the requisite information with reference to these matters, and I thought it was desirable that I should have some one engaged to assist me who had the requisite knowledge. I went to Professor Brown, and I said to him : The Board of Agriculture have been good enough to say that I might take part in this investigation, where there are lungs suspected of disease, and I would like to consult you as to the most eminent man at my service to aid in these investigations. And Mr. Hunting was employed by me on the assurance of Professor Brown that there was no more eminent man at my disposal for the purpose. I give that to the House as my reason for the course I pursued in engaging the services of Mr. Hunting. He was engaged in the investigation, and saw every one of these lungs. What did he say? He has declared, and he has staked his reputation as an eminent veterinary surgeon upon the fact, that there was not a single case shown which established that pleuro-pneumonia existed in Canada. He was sustained in that testimony by Professor McFadyean and Professor Macqueen, two most eminent men, both of them professors in the college of which Professor Brown was the head; and they sustained his opinion, after severe cross-questioning and examination to draw from them the testimony desired, namely, that there was evidence of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada. Dr. German Sims Woodhead was employed by me to make a microscopic investigation of the lungs of the animals that were declared to give evidence of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, and his testimony was that they gave no such evidence. What more? Why, Professor Nocard, the most eminent veterinary surgeon probably in the world. I believe—there is not a more eminent one in the United Kingdom; Professor Brown, Mr. Cope, Professor Duguid, are not to be named in the same category with him—and yet Dr. Nocard, to whom portions of these lungs were shown, which had been declared by these other gentlemen to exhibit the evidence of pleuro-pneumonia, said there was a marked difference between them and cases of pleuro-pneumonia. I intended saying there was one case of pleuro-pneumonia, which we admitted—one case in which the lungs presented all the evidence of that disease. I will read the evidence, because it is a very interesting fact:

> No trace, in all these examinations of lungs, of pleuro-pneumonia can be found, but at Montreal an interesting fact was discovered. The lungs of one of the animals were found to be affected by pneumonia, accompanied by the "marbling," so often described in these papers as the characteristic of the disease found in the lungs of Canadian animals which forms the subject of this discussion. The cause, however, of the lesion was not far to see. A small branch of a rose bush, about 3½ inches in length, and ⅛ inch in diameter was found embedded in the lung, some of the prickles of the rose bush remaining untouched. It is supposed the animal had inhaled it and it worked its way down the bronchial tubes.

That is the only case in which there was a marked evidence of pleuro-pneumonia.

I can understand why the Board of Agriculture was misled. They said: If you have any cases of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, we demand that you should examine what you have got; here are the lungs of animals brought from Canada, and they exhibit such and such indications, common to pleuro-pneumonia, and if that is not contagious pleuro-pneumonia, we want to know what it is. Well, we could not examine into that, because it has never been found in Canada. It is what Professor McEachern has correctly described as "transit pneumonia." It is a case in which animals, cows and steers, that have been subjected to great cold and great heat, or from any other cause, have attacks of inflammation of the lungs. That is pneumonia. It is what men have recovered from. Perhaps a half a dozen times in his life, a man has an attack of inflammation of the lungs, and is treated and gets better, and perhaps very little trace of it is left. But it is not infectious. You may herd all the cattle you like together that have inflammation of the lungs, just as you may herd men together, afflicted with that malady, and they will not communicate it from one to the other, because it is not contagious. That is what has misled gentlemen on the other side of the water. But, they say, we have investigated this disease, and that you cannot deny comes from Canada. I am not prepared to admit that any of these cases ever came from Canada at all, and I shall tell you why. When the Board of Agriculture passed this order, an arrangement was made that all the cattle that were slaughtered should have their lungs examined, and that all the suspected lungs should be sent from Liverpool to London. I said to the Board of Agriculture: You have no security that these lungs which come to you are the lungs of Canadian cattle. They replied: Oh, yes, we will give instructions of the most rigid character to prevent the possibility of anybody being misled. Well, what happened? A lung came up and was examined by the Board of Agriculture and found to be the most perfect illustration of a healthy lung that ever was seen in London, and they immediately sent it back to the inspectors at Liverpool, and asked them what they meant by sending up such a lung. What, do you suppose, was the answer? The answer was: We never sent it. And so I said to the board: If that can occur, as you admit it has occurred in a case here under examination, what is to prevent the surreptitious changing for a diseased lung obtained from another quarter and sent forward by parties who have the greatest interest in shutting out Canadian cattle from free admission? So I am not prepared to admit that in many of these cases the lungs ever belonged to Canadian cattle at all. But if they did, then I say this is the explanation of it. We cannot find the disease; we have found no lungs in Canada of the character of these Canadian lungs there. The solution of it is this—these animals probably contracted an inflammation of the lung three or four times, and recovered. They are put into a car in the North-west, and are sent a thousand miles by rail, crowded together, like sardines in a box. On reaching Montreal, they are put into a steamer and are sent three thousand miles across the ocean.

During the whole trip they are exposed to heat and cold, and they breathe a vitiated atmosphere; there are draughts, and the animals take sick. Inflammation is lighted up in a lung that has suffered from it before. That is transit pneumonia. That is a disease that we cannot investigate in this country, because you must send an animal, probably, a thousand miles in a car by land, and three thousand in a ship by water, before it can be developed. I do not intend to take up more of the time of the House. I believe the Government have done everything that was possible for a government to do. I have no hesitation to say that I never have taken a deeper interest in any question in my life; and I had the gratification of finding that the Colonial Office was convinced as firmly as I was, that the whole thing was a mistake, that it was a blunder on the part of the veterinary surgeons, but, unfortunately, as the Right Hon. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman said, under the law and the decision of the Crown officers, the Government, who wished to avoid scheduling Canadian cattle, found that could not be done. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) says we have no legal rights. I maintain that the exclusion of Canadian cattle has been in violation of the statute. That statute only gives power to the Department of Agriculture to shut out——

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. What I intended to say was, that the Canadian Government had no legal recourse. They had no means by which they could legally compel the Imperial Government to change their tactics.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I took down the words of the hon. gentleman, and I think he will find them in "Hansard" as I have them here: "We have no legal rights." However, I accept his explanation. I think we have legal rights, and I think those legal rights have been violated.

Mr. MULOCK. They are not enforcible rights.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say we have legal rights. Our cattle could only be excluded under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act. The British Government have only one power, and that is, to shut out cattle coming from a country in cases of which there is reasonable evidence to show that it is necessary for the protection of British cattle against contagious disease. They have shut out our cattle for between three and four years, when they had not reasonable evidence to show that the health of the cattle in England was endangered. I contend that, in the presence of the overwhelming mass of testimony as to the entire freedom of this country from contagious disease, it almost amounts to a violation of the Imperial statutes to enforce the exclusion of Canadian cattle, as has been done, and as is being done now.

But I believe this question is not as serious as the hon. gentleman supposed. I do not hesitate to say that, if the law is to remain as it is now, if a great business of this kind is to be at the mercy of three veterinary experts, who can at any moment strike it down, it is much better for this country to understand that it must turn its attention to other means of trade. Take the question of store cattle; how does it stand? Why, we sent large numbers of store cattle to Scotch feeders, and what was the result? The result was, that the profit in turning the produce of the country into prime beef is lost to Canada. Instead of our farms being enriched by the feeding of these cattle, they are impoverished by sending them away and the profits of making the prime beef go to the scotch feeders, instead of to the Canadian farmers. So I say there are two sides to the story. So far as prime beef is concerned, we can still continue to send it to Great Britain, and I am gratified to find that, in the face of this exclusion, there has been a large increase in the cattle shipments to the United Kingdom, even though the cattle had to be slaughtered on landing. There is the further question, to which attention is being directed, especially in connection with cold storage and fast Atlantic transit, of having the cattle fattened in the country, but also securing the advantage of the fifth quarter, the by-products being utilized in this country, and the animals sent in the form of dressed beef into the markets of the United Kingdom. There is an enormous traffic carried on today of a most profitable character between the United States of America and the United Kingdom in the way of dressed beef, and I see no reason, in view of this exclusion, why we should not turn our attention to that branch of industry. I have told these agriculturists who are so anxious to shut Canadian cattle out of the United Kingdom, that they are sure to meet with a keener and greater competition in the way of dressed beef which the farmers of this country would be compelled to resort to in competition with themselves. Now, Sir, I regret to have been obliged to occupy so much of the time of the House; but, after the plea of the hon. gentleman who preceded me, the impassioned plea that he made, justifying the Imperial Government in striking down our trade, as I contend, not only without reason, but in face of the most overwhelming testimony, I felt it was necessary to say a few words to show that this Government had not failed in discharging their duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think I can promise the House that I will not say more than a few words, and not in the fashion the hon. gentleman has said a few words. The hon. gentleman's speech, it appears to me, is open to the criticism of being a little inconsistent. I took down his words about three-quarters of an hour ago to the effect that the policy the British Government were about to enforce was most injurious and most mischievous to Canadian interests ; but I now find that it is a blessing in disguise, and that in all human probability we are going to benefit and not to be injured by Mr. Long's Bill. Now, Sir, there are two totally distinct questions which the hon. gentleman has chosen to mix up ; one of these is how far the Government are to blame for the present state of things ; and the second question, and quite as important, is whether the action which they now propose to take, is the wisest under the circumstances. Sir, I believe, and I think that every hon. gentleman here believes—and I have heard no hon. gentleman speak otherwise—that there is no pleuro-pneumonia existing in our Canadian herds to-day. That is my opinion, and I do not think any hon. gentleman on this side would dispute it for a moment. But there is another question, Has the course of the Government been such as to give any just ground of suspicion to the English Government that would induce them to propose this somewhat stringent measure in defence of their heads ? Sir, let me ask, what was the wise course for the Government to have pursued ? Now, the hon. gentleman admitted correctly that we in Canada had been enjoying for years a very valuable privilege, and that very valuable privilege is being taken away from us. Sir, the onus lies on the Government to show, under the circumstances that have been narrated by my hon. friend, that they have been guiltless, that they have afforded no cause for the action of the English Government. The hon. gentleman's statement was this, that the privilege afforded to Canada, to the best of my recollection, is accorded to very few other states ; indeed I do not think there are two other states that receive the privilege Canada had. If there are, I would be glad if the hon. gentleman would name them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think there is any other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, that was my impression. Canada had an exceedingly valuable privilege, the hon. gentleman and the Government knew that that privilege was regarded with extreme jealousy by a very influential class in England. It was their duty to give no cause for complaint ; and one question that we are fairly called upon to deal with to-night in regard to this matter is, Did the Government give any just ground of complaint, or did they not ? I think I will have a word or two to say presently on that matter. I want to speak briefly on this matter, as there are other gentlemen in this House whose opinions on this subject are those of experts, and better worth listening to, perhaps, than those of the Secretary of State, and certainly than my own. In the first place, I take exception to the hon. gentleman's preliminary statement. If my hon. friend was able to show that the Government had grossly neglected their duty, and if, as we all know, very unpleasant consequences to the people of Canada have followed, how can the hon. gentleman say that my hon. friend was in the wrong in exposing the conduct of the Government ? Why, Sir, he was in his clear right and duty in doing so. Now, let us for a moment review the facts. Canada was in possession exclusively of a very valuable privilege. How many millions that may have been worth to the people of Canada, I will hardly pretend to say, but I believe it was worth several dollars a head, many dollars a head, probably, for all the cattle, and they were very numerous, that we send to England. Sir, it appears to me, and the hon. gentleman's conduct and language to-night go far to justify the imputation, that the hon. gentleman has been aggressively controversial instead of diplomatic. It was not his business to attack and violently assail these parties ; it was his business to preserve our cattle trade to us if he could ; and I doubt exceedingly whether his conduct was at all calculated, at any rate, the best calculated, to bring about that desirable end.

Mr. MULOCK. Coercion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT Well, coercion on the part of our High Commissioner towards the English Parliament is not altogether the best way to bring about the object he had in view. Now, Sir, what is the answer to my hon. friend ? My hon. friend proves that the conduct of the Government in this matter has been open, prima facie, to grave suspicion. Nobody disputes the value of the trade, nobody disputes that it is a trade which ought to be preserved by us, even if we had to take what seemed to us somewhat unreasonable precautions. Now, Sir, the Secretary of State, to the best of my recollection, was not present in this House on the numerous occasions on which my hon. friend beside me, and my hon. friends here, who are familiar with the mode in which this traffic was carried on, have pointed out, times without number, the excessively careless manner in which the Government carried out their obligations towards the British Government as regards the transit of cattle ; and, Sir, if they have any defence for that, I at any rate, have not heard it. Why, it was proved again and again that when the British Government had insisted on proper inspection being made of all the cattle that passed through our territory on the way to England, it was proved again and again that the Government had deliberately converted the inspection into a farce ; that they had allowed the inspection to be conducted by persons who had no real knowledge ; that they had allowed it to be conducted at night ; I believe that they allowed it to be conducted by railway employees, the servants of the men who were interested in carrying on the traffic with as little impediment as might be. All that was shown and proved. The hon. gentleman has had many warnings. Over and over again, for the last three or four years before the measure was fully put in force, over and over again he knew that our proceedings on this side were, as I said, jealously watched by influential classes in England; and it is clear that the conduct of the Canadian Government, I do not know how far the High Commissioner, who was then an officer of the Government, was to blame for it, but the conduct of the Canadian Government, although, as I say, I do not believe that there was any pleuro-pneumonia existing in our herds, was such as to show a grave disregard of the obligations which they had entered into with the Imperial Government, and by consequence, they afforded serious grounds for suspicion, which would readily be taken up and used to our disadvantage by those very parties to whom the hon. gentleman has referred. Sir, after all said and done, the really important question is this: Can we do anything to prevent this matter becoming law, and if so, is what these hon. gentleman propose to do the best mode of bringing it about? Now, I take leave to doubt exceedingly whether we will make one step forward by passing the resolution submitted by the Minister of Finance. I do not see that there is anything in that proposition which is in the slightest degree likely to induce the Imperial Government or Parliament to pause in their career. The farmers of Canada have difficulty enough in finding markets for their produce to-day, it is of great importance to them that this market should not be shut to their live cattle, whatever hon. gentlemen may say; it is of great importance to them that, if possible, this Bill should be delayed; that, if possible, a clause should be put into this Bill which would enable the Imperial Government to re-instate our cattle on proper proof being given to them that the Government of Canada were prepared to comply with all reasonable recommendations. The chief fault which I think can be laid to the door of the Government of Canada is, as I have often pointed out, that they did not honourably and scrupulously fulfil their obligations to the Imperial Government in this matter of the transport of cattle. To that I have heard no sufficient explanation given by any of the Ministers, or by any of their apoligists in this House, and I doubt very much whether any reasonable explanation can be given. But, Sir, after all said and done, the question is, Can we as business men do nothing better than just to pass this Bill and make this protest? It appears to me the hon. gentleman ought to make one suggestion still which would deserve some consideration. Now, I would like to hear the views of my hon. friends behind me who are fully acquainted with the details of this trade. But it seems to me it would have been worth our while, and is worth our while, to make an offer to the Imperial Government, not merely to have an examination, which has been suggested by the Secretary of State, but looking at the importance of this trade, looking at the value of this trade to our agriculturists, I would be willing for one—but I speak for myself personally, and merely make the suggestion—not merely that such an inspection should be made, but I for one would be willing to consider, if the Government saw fit and considered favourably the idea, of having, if need be, as there are only one or two ports of export from which our cattle go, proper officials paid by us but appointed by the British Government to inspect our various cargoes on departing from this country. And it is worth considering, looking at the enormous volume of our trade with England, looking at the fact that we shipped 80,000 or 90,000 of horned cattle to England last year, and that our total importations only reached 3,000 or 4,000 animals, whether, if it were necessary to preserve the larger trade, it might not be worth our while, if that is demanded by the British Government, to stop the importation of live animals into Canada. I do not altogether like that idea, but still the larger trade may be preserved at the expense of the minor one. Sir, my impression is that if the Government were well advised, they would withdraw the motion and make reasonable offers to the Imperial authorities; and it may be that they had better instruct their representatives on the other side to pledge themselves to carry out any engagement they may make a little more rigorously than has been done previously, and having withdrawn this motion, having made these offers, they might either obtain a respite of the passage of this Bill, or obtain the insertion of such clauses in it as would enable the Imperial authorities to reinstate the cattle of Canada on receiving—which I believe myself they could receive, and ought to receive—satisfactory assurances on the two points: first, that no pleuro-pneumonia exists here; and, second, that we will regularly in future comply with all such precautions as the British Government might fairly exact from us, so as to avoid any risk of the infection of their herds by the transportation of cattle in transitu. I offer these suggestions without prejudice, as we say, and for the consideration of those hon. members who have a practical acquaintance with this most important trade, which I do not myself possess, and which Ministers can hardly claim personally to possess.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to address a few words to the House on this most important question. Before recess the Secretary of State informed the House that the Bill now before the British Parliament was not one aimed at Canadian cattle. It seems to me to be a Bill almost entirely aimed at Canadian cattle, for the reason that cattle from the United States were scheduled some time ago, and only 6,182 cattle were taken into the United Kingdom from other countries, excluding Canada, and of these 32 came from Norway and 1,305 from the Channel Islands. These figures show the number of cattle imported in 1893 from other countries, except Canada and the United States. There is another statement of interest and importance. The London "Daily News" publishes an article, from which it appears that this journal considers the Bill is specially aimed at the exclusion of Canadian cattle. In all my examination of public prints as regards their utterances respecting the Bill in question, it has always appeared that the newspapers believe the Bill is to make the scheduling of Canadian cattle permanent, as it is only now temporary under Order in Council. There is another matter to which I desire to call the attention of the Government. If the Government are proposing to take any action and send any despatch to the British Government, I would ask them to intimate their intention to withdraw our quarantine against cattle brought into Canada from the old country for breeding purposes. As I understand, there is no pleuro-pneumonia in Britain at the present time, and has not been for some time past, and the withdrawal of these regulations would be very much to the advantage of Canadian stock-raisers. We find that all over the Dominion our stock has not been kept up to that high degree of excellence to which it had attained five or six years ago, and one of the reasons is that as the cattle trade has become less profitable, our stock-raisers have purchased fewer male animals in the old country, and a further reason for their action is that the ninety days' quarantine imposed and the necessary expense involved. There are few breeders who, having purchased valuable animals, will allow them to remain in quarantine in charge of other individuals. If it is true that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in Britain, and if we are able to assert, as I believe we can, that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, why should the Canadian Government when they approach the British Government on the subject of withholding action in regard to the scheduling of Canadian cattle, not announce that they will remove the quarantine on cattle imported from the United Kingdom, especially when it will be to the interest not only of all breeders in Canada, but to every farmer who pays attention to stock-raising. It is found all over the country by those engaged in the trade that when they desire to purchase animals for breeding purposes they cannot obtain animals of the same excellence as six years ago. Fewer animals of higher grade are coming into the country, and many of the stock-raisers have only second-class animals. That indeed is one of the complaints prevailing to-day. If our quarantine was withdrawn, our breeders would be able to bring first-class animals from the old country to Quebec and Montreal, where they would undergo a rigid examination, and if it was found that they were free from contagious disease, the owners should be allowed to take them to their farms. Let this Government in this way show that Canada is not asking anything as regards our herds that we are not willing to grant to British cattle. Not only would this withdrawal of the quarantine benefit our own breeders, but it would prove to the interest of breeders in the old country, because they would be able to ship to this country larger numbers of first-class animals. I hope the Government will consider this suggestion.

With regard to the scheduling of Canadian cattle, there is one name that I should like to mention in this connection. There was one gentleman who not only examined the lungs himself, but had them examined by veterinary experts in the different countries of Europe. That was Professor J. F. McFadyean, M.D., B.S.C., C.M., F.R.C. V.S., dean of Royal Veterinary College, Edinburgh, whom I have not heard referred to to-night. I must say that I have met that gentleman in the old country, and I have the honour of his acquaintance. He delivered a lecture before the Lancashire Veterinary Association on the 16th of December, 1891, and in that lecture he made the following statement :

> On the occasion of a visit to the continent during the past summer I personally submitted portions of the lungs of this animal to Professors Bang (Copenhagan), Schutz (Berlin), Johne (Dresden), Cosker (Vienna), Kitt (Munich), and Lupke (Stuttgart), and each of these distinguished pathologists without hesitation declared that the lesions present were those of contagious pleuro-pneumonia.

That lecture was published in the press throughout the length and breadth of England, and so my quoting it here will not do any harm to our case in England. Here is evidence not only from veterinarians in the British Islands, but in the different countries of Europe, declaring that these animals had pleuro-pneumonia. In view of this, is it to be wondered at that the British Government came to the conclusion that the disease existed in Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMillan) what relation that has to the scheduling of Canada because of pleuro-pneumonia. The date you have mentioned is before it was claimed that Canadian cattle had pleuro-pneumonia, and before they were scheduled.

Mr. McMILLAN. It was just before they were scheduled, but this shows that pleuro-pneumonia existed in Canada, and you stated in your address to-night that no evidence could be adduced that pleuro-pneumonia had ever existed here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What is the hon. gentleman reading from ?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am reading from the Board of Agriculture Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 to 1893, which the British Government sent to Canada, and which I got in the Library here. With the evidence the British Government has before them from these eminent veterinarians on the continent of Europe, I am very much afraid that the Secretary of State has used rather strong language with respect to the British Government, and with respect to the experts whom he declares have been the cause of scheduling out cattle. He cannot get any concession by decrying the opinions of these trusted officials of the English Government. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) also said that my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) had censured the Government very strongly because they did not fulfil all the conditions asked by the Board of Agriculture. Now, what were the conditions that were asked ? I find in a letter dated January 29th, 1894, from the Board of Agriculture to the Colonial Office, the following :—

> I am directed by the Board of Agriculture to state for the information of the Marquis of Ripon, that the period is now approaching when the board may expect to receive inquiry as to the conditions under which the importations of cattle from Canada is to be carried on during the coming season, and they would be glad to be placed as early as possible in possession of the views of the Canadian Government with regard to the matter set forth in the board's letter of the 21st July last.

The Board of Agriculture asked to be supplied with copies of the statutes in force in the Dominion relating to the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, and asked for detailed information as to the machinery by which the requirements of those statutes are carried into effect, especially with regard to the submission of diseased lungs to veterinary officers well acquainted with the characteristics of pleuro-pneumonia. The board, at the same time, suggested that the Canadian Government should consider whether an additional measure could not be obtained by the total prohibition of the importation of live cattle into the Dominion, except for breeding, exhibition, or other exceptional purposes, and also, whether any further means could be devised for the prevention of any breach of the laws at the frontier. They go on to say :

> With respect to the question of further evidence as to the sanitary condition of animals in the Dominion, the board consider that further and very valuable information might be secured. They suggested that the animals rejected for shipping to this country should be slaughtered and the lungs examined by veterinarians familiar with the appearance of pleuro-pneumonia, and also that arrangements should be made similar to those adopted in England, for securing the notification to veterinary surgeons of suspicious cases so that slaughter and examination might be ordered by the proper officers.

During this time, the case of the animal on the "Hurona" complicated matters, and yet the Government either neglected or refused to comply with the request of the British authorities to send them our statutes, regulating the admission of cattle into the country. It was a reasonable request, and the Canadian Government should have attended to it at once. In that matter alone, I hold that this Government showed a very great want of discretion and diligence. They should be condemned for that. This statement goes on to say :

> The latter question has already been to some extent dealt with by the Canadian Government, by the extension of quarantine regulations, although these regulations even now do not supply the same measure of security as under the law in force in this country.

It has been stated that the regulations in Canada were very strictly enforced. I have here a question put by myself in the House of Commons on the 20th February, 1893, and the answer of the Finance Minister at that time showed that the regulations were not strictly einforced. The following is the question and answer :—

> Mr. McMILLAN (Huron) asked, Whether settlers' cattle are admitted into the Canadian North-west from the United States without quarantine ; on inspection only ? If so, is it the intention of the Government to enforce quarantine regulations against all American cattle entering Canada ? Have representations been made to the Government at any time, either written or verbal, of the danger of the British Government scheduling Canadian cattle if settlers' cattle were admitted into Manitoba and the North-west Territories from the United States without quarantine ?
> Mr. FOSTER. Settlers' cattle are not admitted into the Canadian North-west from the United States without quarantine, and they are admitted on inspection only.

The hon. Minister of Finance, with his usual manner of answering questions, answered this question in a very evasive manner :

Mr. LAURIER. Since when ?

> Mr. FOSTER. The Government is now enforcing quarantine regulations against all American cattle entering the Canadian North-west. No representations, either written or verbal, of the danger of the British Government scheduling Canadian cattle if settlers' cattle were admitted into Manitoba and the North-west Territories from the United States without quarantine, were before the Government previous to Canadian cattle being scheduled by the British Government.

I have evidence in my possession, if the fact is disputed, that the Government had notice that there was danger of the British Government scheduling Canadian cattle, if we allowed cattle to go into the North-west on inspection only.

Mr. LAURIER. Since when has this order gone into force ?

Mr. FOSTER. Since Saturday.

My question was put on the Notice paper on Thursday ; it remained there till Monday ; in the meantime, the Government passed an Order in Council that the quarantine should be strictly enforced ; when my question was put on Monday, they answered that the quarantine was enforced ; and, when the hon. leader of the Opposition put the question squarely, it was found that the Order in Council had been passed only the Saturday before, and after the notice of my question had been put on the paper. Yet they have the audacity to come to this House and tell the people of Canada that cattle were not allowed to go into the North-west on inspection only. There is not the least doubt that they were, because there was a remonstrance, stating that cattle did come in from the United States, and were entered by a certain test ; and the Canadian Government stated that they would have to be more rigid as to the manner in which cattle were allowed to come into Canada. Now, let me say a word or two about the accommodation provided for cattle which entered at Sarnia and passed through the country in bond to the eastern parts of the United States. In the first place, only veterinary surgeons were to be appointed inspectors of those cattle, and one was to accompany each train, and the inspection was only to be carried on during the day. But it was only a short time before these rules were relaxed. It was found that the inspection, if only taking place in the day time, would interfere to some extent with the traffic on the railways; and it was only a very short time before the inspection took place both by day and by night. Just think of an inspector going in the night, with a lantern, to inspect a carload of cattle for disease. As an experienced cattleman from my boyhood up, I can say that it is an utter impossibility for any one to inspect cattle in that manner. Another regulation was that these cars were not to be used for carrying Canadian cattle, and they were all to be cleaned and fumigated after leaving Canada, and before coming back again. Yet it was proven that these cars were used generally for the transportation of Canadian cattle, and that many of them were not clean, even the manure being left in them. Another regulation was that the cattle were to be taken from the cars at Lynn, and fed and watered there in an inclosure with a double fence, so that Canadian cattle would not come in contact with them, as it had been found at Quebec that animals could communicate pleuro-pneumonia to each other from the opposite sides of a single fence, a fine herd of Galloways, belonging to Mr. McRae, of Guelph, having been destroyed in that way. But the fences at Lynn were broken down, and proved to be no protection at all. There was also a regulation that the manure at Lynn was to be burned, but, instead of that, the farmers of that locality were allowed to take the manure from the yards, and the result was that the disease called anthrax broke out among the cattle of that locality. More than that, after a little time, almost all the veterinary surgeons were withdrawn, and the conductors of the different trains were appointed to inspect the cattle and to go along with them. Does any one believe that a railway conductor would stop a train, if he found that he could possibly get it through? The regulations that were adopted were a perfect sham. Mr. Smith, the veterinary surgeon of Toronto, admitted that they were: and one man who gave evidence, said that Professor Smith might as well have examined the cattle, sitting in his arm-chair in Toronto. It is also admitted that blank certificates were handed to the railway conductors, and were filled up by themselves. With such a loose system as this, it is a wonder to me that our cattle were not scheduled long before. During the time all this was going on, there was a report, and I believe it was correct, that pleuro-pneumonia existed in Illinois, and at the same time cattle from Illinois were being transported through Canada. The cattle industry in Canada is to-day a most important one, and I am very anxious to see it placed on a proper basis ; and I believe that the lines I have indicated to the Government with respect to removing the quarantine at Quebec and Montreal would be one step that would show the British Government that Canada was doing the best she could in the interest of Canadian breeders and in the interest of the breeders of the best stock in the British islands. I have always held that, where a government or an individual asks for a favour or an accommodation, their first duty is to remove any evil that is within their own power, before they ask for that favour or accommodation from another. I do hope the Government will take this matter into their consideration.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the effort made by the hon. Secretary of State to reply to the very long and pointed statement of the whole case of the scheduling of our cattle in England made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). The hon. Secretary of State, instead of taking up the points submitted by that hon. member, descended into a tirade of abuse and lost his temper, and failed to answer one single point that had been submitted to this House. Now, Sir, the whole history of this case is an exceedinly unfortunate one for the farmers of this country. The hon. Secretary of State said that the hon. member for North York could not have presented a better case, had he been the hired advocate of the British Board of Agriculture, as against Canada, in regard to the scheduling of our cattle. The statement presented this afternoon by the hon. member for North York, clearly and distinctly outlined the whole history of the events leading up to the condition of things with which we are now face to face.

The Government from the very time that American cattle were first scheduled, which was in 1878, entered into an extended correspondence with the British Government with the view of securing a continuance to Canada of the privileges she enjoyed. After a very extended correspondence, arrangements were come to. What were they? They were virtually that American cattle should be prohibited from coming into Canada at all. American cattle were not to be permitted to pass through Canada; and on the condition that this arrangement would be loyally and honourably carried out by us, we were permitted to continue to send our cattle to Great Britain. A very short time afterwards the railway companies pressed very strongly on the Canadian Government for some relaxation of that arrangement. After an extended correspondence between the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), who was then in England, and the British Board of Agriculture, terms of compromise were eventually agreed upon. These were very strict, clear and definite; and the Canadian Government, through its representative in England, bound itself to see that they were honourably carried out. Notwithstanding that, the ink was hardly dry upon the paper on which that arrangement was written, when an effort was again made by the railway companies to have it relaxed; and after further correspondence, there was a final arrangement made, by which the railway companies were permitted to carry American cattle through Canada on certain conditions. These conditions were that the cattle were to be unloaded on the other side of the line, that they were then to be closely and carefully inspected, and that if found absolutely free from disease, they might be reloaded and permitted to pass through Canada, subject to certain other very stringent arrangements. These arrangements were not carried out. The inspections, as the hon. member for Huron has just stated, were not properly made. One concession after another, in violation of the agreement entered into with England, was made to the railway companies. These companies were allowed to have the cattle inspected at night and on the cars without unloading. Permission was given to have the cattle accompanied through Canadian territory by railway officials instead of by Dominion servants. Thus from one step to another, and from one point to another, the Government violated the covenants they had entered into with Great Britain, and the result of these violations was that our cattle became eventually scheduled.

The hon. Secretary of State has told us that there was no necessity for rigid inspection in our North-west Territories and Manitoba, because pleuro-pneumonia was not known to exist in the bordering states or within a thousand miles of our country. I would like to know if he thinks that Illinois is a thousand miles from our border? And whether he thinks it would not be possible, with the railway facilities existing in the United States, to carry cattle there from any section. Why, cattle are carried all the way from Texas to Chicago, which is a distance of more than a thousand miles, and there is no reason to suppose that they might not be carried equally long distances into our North-west Territories. The English Government gave as a reason why scheduling should take place, the very laxity with which the regulations were carried out as regards our North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman says that there was no necessity for rigid arrangements. Permit me here to read what Mr. Gardner said, as I find it reported in the report of our Agriculture Department:

> In a letter published in the "Times" of November 26 last from Mr. Herbert Gardner, the Minister of Agriculture, to John Long, M.P., of Dundee, Mr. Gardner stated that taking into account the importation of animals, both from Canada and the United States, there had been no less than ten cases of pleuro-pneumonia reported from the commencement of October to the date of his letter, the end of November, and that these formed part of seven cargoes. He, therefore, inferred (to quote the terms of his letter) that if cattle have been admitted into Canadian territories from the North-west states upon inspection only and that quarantine regulations were inefficiently carried out, it is not surprising that animals infected with pleuro-pneumonia should have reached this country from Canada as well as the United States.

You can see by that communication that Mr. Gardner was quite aware of the very lax manner in which our arrangements were carried out as regards the admission of American cattle into Canada. Owing to that and owing to the laxity with which the other regulations were carried out, our cattle were scheduled.

The hon. Secretary of State claims to have very efficiently and faithfully performed the duties devolving upon him as High Commissioner in England in the interests of the cattle trade. Let me point him to one case and ask whether he can explain what occurred. It was supposed that pleuro-pneumonia existed in one of our Canadian cattle that was landed and slaughtered. A cablegram was sent from here asking the hon. gentleman to at once procure a sample of the lungs of that animal and have them sent to Canada for analysis. Now, what happened? In answer to that telegram a small piece—and I shall read the report out of the blue-book, if the hon. gentleman denies the statement—of the lung, about four inches long, an inch wide and half an inch thick, was put in a bottle in some spirits and sent out. The bottle was fastened with paper and not properly sealed.

so that when it arrived out the spirits had evaporated and the piece of lung enclosed was in such a decomposed condition that it was quite unfit for analysis. That is a sample of the attention and the anxiety which the hon. gentleman manifested in the interests of the cattle trade. That was the manner in which he met this request to supply the Veterinary College at Montreal with the sample of the lung of the animal supposed to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia. From the very inception of the trouble down to the present, the utmost disregard, the greatest lack of activity and want of care on the part of the Canadian Government and of the High Commissioner and of every Dominion official, has characterized the whole business: and as a result the farmers of this country are deprived of the privileges which they would otherwise be now enjoying of shipping their fat cattle to the English market. But the Government did not discharge their duty efficiently, as they would have done, no doubt, if the interests of any other class had been at stake, and the farmers are brought to the unfortunate position in which we find them to-day. While the Americans enjoyed the privileges of sending their cattle free into the English market, they had veterinaries in every port in the British Islands where their cattle were landed for the purpose of taking part in any inspection that took place, with a view to protecting the American farmers' interests in that market. Did Canada ever send home a veterinary to look after the interests of the farmers in that market? Not one. What did we see when the case arose that unfortunately resulted in our cattle being scheduled? There was not a man to look after our interests, it was committed entirely to the veterinarians of England themselves.

Mr. IVES. Whose cattle were scheduled first?

Mr. McMULLEN. The cattle of the United States were scheduled first.

Mr. IVES. In spite of all their veterinarians?

Mr. McMULLEN. Does my hon. friend mean to say that there was the same ground for scheduling Canadian cattle that there was for scheduling American cattle? I state fearlessly that pleuro-pneumonia has not existed in Canada. But it did exist in the United States, and when that was proven, their cattle were scheduled.

Mr. IVES. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what was the use of sending veterinary surgeons there if there was no pleuro-pneumonia?

Mr. McMULLEN. You should have sent them for the purpose of guarding our interests when the question was raised as to whether there was pleuro-pneumonia in Canada or not: when first the suspicions of the veterinarians in England were aroused. The Secretary of State said that 211,000 Canadian cattle had been admitted into Great Britain after these experts had declared that they had found symptoms of the disease in cattle coming from Canada. Surely, that should have been sufficient warning to have some one there to guard our interests. But the High Commissioner never asked that his efforts should be seconded by an experienced veterinarian from Canada. Not a single move was made. But the United States made every effort possible to preserve that market.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman say what the Americans gained by these efforts; did they accomplish anything?

Mr. McMULLEN. They preserved the market of England for years, but, notwithstanding all their efforts, they lost it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is only within the last few years that they did anything of that kind.

Mr. McMULLEN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I can prove that they had veterinarians there before their cattle were scheduled.

Mr. IVES. But they were scheduled all the same.

Mr. McMULLEN. Simply because they had pleuro-pneumonia. But our country has no pleuro-pneumonia. We had a High Commissioner in England and a Government here who say they were doing everything they could, and the result of their efforts is that although our country has no pleuro-pneumonia it is placed on the same footing as the United States which has. Now, to review the history of this affair, we know that in 1893 several cases of pleuro-pneumonia were alleged to have been discovered in cattle coming from Canada. But, notwithstanding that fact, no effort was made by the Canadian Government to show that pleuro-pneumonia did not exist here. The cases were: On May 1st, on the steamship "Brazilian," 2; on board the "Winnipeg," 1; and on board the "Hurona," 1. The hon. Secretary of State said there were only two. I beg to call his attention to the fact that he is mistaken, and that during that season four cattle sent from Canada to England were pronounced to be diseased with pleuro-pneumonia. Now, it has been said with a good deal of plausibility that possibly the disease was contracted during the journey, owing to the conditions in which the cattle lived while in transit, and that symptoms somewhat resembling those of pleuro-pneumonia were developed. If there was any ground for that, the Government might well have made an experiment to prove it. They might have taken a dozen head of English animals known to be perfectly clear of pleuro-pneumonia and inspected to the satisfaction of the English veterinarians and ship them across the ocean and back subjected to the conditions under which our cattle lived in transit, and then slaughter them when they got back. It might have been found that in those cases a disease something like pleuro-pneumonia might have developed just as in our cattle. But nothing was done. A striking evidence of the manner in which the Government has disregarded its duty in this matter is seen in the fact that a letter sent them by the British authorities on the 21st July, 1893, was virtually left unanswered until the 29th January, 1894, a little more than six months after the time it was sent. That letter was sent by the English Board of Agriculture making inquiries with regard to the regulations that existed between Canada and the United States repsecting the importation of cattle from that country to ours, and with regard to our laws, with regard to the quarantine, and also the inspection that had been made with regard to the existence of the disease. The Secretary of State said to-night that it would be impossible to carry out the instructions that were given by the English Board of Agriculture, because it would necessitate the slaughter of a great many herds of cattle. Well, Sir, it would have been a good paying investment on the part of Canada if the Government had slaughtered thousands of head of cattle if, by so doing, they could have met the demand of the English Government, and prevented the scheduling of our cattle. If we had had to spend millions of money in order to satisfy the home government and the Board of Agriculture that pleuro-pneumonia did not exist in our country, it would have been a profitable investment in the interests of our agriculturists. But there was no investment, there was no cattle slaughtered, there was no effort made. The Secretary of State says that investigations were made, that Mr. McEachran went to the North-west; and I presume the first thing he did was to go and inspect his own herds. He there manages a large ranch for the Waldron Ranching Company, he is their servant as well as ours, he is paid by them in the interest of that ranching company, and is paid by us; he is performing a double duty in this country. Now, I contend that we should have had a man that had no interest whatever in any herd or any ranch in this Dominion. We surely can afford, in the interests of the agriculturists in this country, to keep one man who is not under the thumb of any ranching company, or anybody else. There is no doubt that that ranching company required to bring cattle in from the North-western states, and Mr. McEachran, who was then veterinary for Canada, would, in the interest of the company he was serving, wink at cattle being brought in by the hundreds, and they were so brought in. The records of this country prove that there were from 40,000 to 50,000 head of cattle brought into the North-west in clear violation of the covenant of the Government of Canada with England. When we made that arrangement, cattle from the United States were virtually prohibited, but in face of that prohibition, in 1883, 1884 and 1885, cattle by the thousands were admitted into the North-west, in some cases without inspection, and in all cases without quarantine. Now, the English Government evidently became aware of the looseness with which arrangements between Canada and the United States were being carried out. The correspondence that I have read to the House to-night, the portion of a letter written by Mr. Gardner, clearly proves that they were aware that very great laxity characterized the admission of cattle from the American side into Canada; and he goes on to state the fact that if pleuro-pneumonia existed in the United States, as it did, how easy it was, and how possible it was, that the herds in Canada might get that disease, and that in the shipment of these cattle to England, part of them were diseased with pleuro-pneumonia. No doubt any reasonable man would come to that conclusion, and Mr. Gardner came to that conclusion. It has been stated on the other side of the House that this action is taken in order to protect the agriculturist of England against the competition of cattle coming from Canada and other countries. Sir, any man who takes up the record with an unbiased mind, or will go over the whole history of this unfortunate case from the start down to the present moment, cannot possibly come to that conclusion. Why, Sir, there is not the slightest evidence whatever to show that there was any desire on the part of Great Britain to schedule our cattle; it was only forced upon them by the laxity and indifference of the Canadian Government in carrying out the arrangement that had been entered into. Several letters were sent, remonstrances were made, again and again applications were made for replies to them, and the chief officials of the Boards of Agriculture in England declared that they were only anxious to be able to give Canada such a clean bill of fare in regard to her cattle, that she would not be subjected to the scheduling. They did everything they possibly could for that purpose. Mr. Gardner, in his reply to Mr. Long, drew attention to the indifferent and careless manner in which Canada had treated the whole question, and had failed to comply with the terms agreed upon. England admitted it was for the purpose of preventing her herds from being contaminated by coming in contact with American herds. For sixteen months the request of the chairman of the Board of Agriculture was not complied with, and during this time the Canadian Government had an opportunity of making a thorough investigation, and to reply fully and promptly to the point raised by the English Board of Trade, but they did not reply. On 21st July, at the time this letter was sent, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture were about to start on a tour for the North-west. They went off and were received in Winnipeg, they travelled through the North-west, and all that time this great and important question was being neglected in the office of the Deputy Minister in Ottawa, the letter was lying in his desk waiting the return of the Minister of Agriculture to give a reply to this important demand that England had made ; but party interests and the probabilities of an election, were matters of more vital importance to hon. gentlemen opposite than the protection of the interests of the people of this country in regard to their cattle trade. Now, after the English Government proposed to make the investigation that the hon. member for North York has referred to, by a board of nine members, and after the establishment of that board, there was no person sent from here to represent Canada. The High Commissioner undertook that arduous duty. He was supposed to be equal to the occasion himself, although not a veterinary, not knowing very much with regard to cattle, possibly not able to tell whether an animal was diseased with pleuro-pneumonia or not. But after all he was there, and there was nobody sent from here. Mr. McEachran was not sent, there was no proper accredited veterinary in Canada that was sent for the purpose of taking part, taking an active interest on the side of Canada. The whole case was left to the English veterinarians to that board that was appointed, and our side of the question was positively neglected. The Secretary of State tells us that he was not able to ask questions, or to take any part in connection with the investigation. The investigation commenced on 7th May, 1894, and continued to 13th August, 1894. Then on 20th May, the first test of the lungs of an animal from the steamer "Toronto" was made, and after that test there was nothing further done, no effort to show that that animal was not diseased. If the Government had felt anxious to make a thorough, careful and exhaustive investigation in regard to pleuro-pneumonia in our herds, it could very easily have done so. It would not have been very expensive to have sent a properly qualified veterinary into every county in the Dominion, and have made a careful search for the disease ; then to have made reports under oath, and prepared the case in such a shape as to be capable of being presented to the home government, as positive proof that pleuro-pneumonia does not exist in Canadian herds. But not the slightest movement was made in that direction. Instead of sending forty-five immigration agents to the United States, forty-five veterinaries might have been sent throughout the country with greater advantage. The Secretary of State stated that there was no disposition on the part of the Board of Agriculture to remove this embargo. I was rather surprised to-night to hear the discourteous language used in regard to the Board of Agriculture and their officials. If we expect to regain the privilege we previously enjoyed in the British market, the Secretary of State will have to do as he did at Washington after the last general elections. The hon. gentleman is trying to evade the effective and pointed thrust made against the Government by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and he is preparing for the general elections, which are not far distant. No doubt, he will turn a similar somersault to that achieved by him in connection with the last elections, when he told the people that he favoured reciprocity with the United States, and afterwards went to Mr. Blaine and took it all back. No doubt, the hon. gentleman will return to England after the elections, and he will then apologize for the harsh language he has used to-night with regard to men occupying prominent positions in England in connection with the Board of Agriculture. The question having been already so fully dealt with by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), it remains for me now only to express my sincere regret at the present position of Canada as regards its cattle trade. I make this statement, because I know the inevitable result of this unfortunate scheduling of our cattle. The Secretary of State has referred to the desirability of establishing an export dead-meat business. I do not think such a trade can be successfully carried on. It is true, the United States export a very large quantity of dead meat, but, notwithstanding that fact, the exportation of live animals to England is increasing every year ; meat reaches the consumer in much better condition, when it goes across the Atlantic in the shape of live animals on foot, than as carcasses in refrigerator steamships. We know that consumers prefer meat that has reached England as live animals, and it is greatly to be regretted that the present situation has been brought about, whoever may be to blame, and, in my opinion, the whole blame for the present situation lies at the door of the Government and the Secretary of State, when he was High Commissioner, owing to the neglect that characterized his actions in England, and the action of the Government here, the result of which has been the introduction of a Bill into the English House of Commons to make perpetual a condition of things that has existed hitherto only by Order in Council, and which might possibly have been removed, if active and honest efforts had been made. Greater advantage would have accrued to Canada, if we had sent to England a number of veterinarians, instead of the High Commissioner. That gentleman cost the country $15,000 or $16,000 a year, and for that expenditure the Government could have retained the services of eight veterinarians, who, no doubt, would have been able to have averted the present condition of affairs, but, unfortunately, they were not sent. England now proposes to give us a little dose of our own medicine. It is said that this action has been taken in order to give a measure of protection to the British agriculturist by raising the price of his stock. No doubt, the people in England remember that we turned a deaf ear to their appeals in regard to iron duties, when the ironmongers and the boards of trade and chambers of commerce remonstrated in the most positive and clear way with respect to the thrust made by Canada on the English iron trade. When we appeal to them in regard to scheduling our cattle, they will be ready to say: How did you use us when we appealed to you in regard to our iron trade? You simply turned a deaf ear to our appeals. Hon members on both sides of the House are glad to be able to say that we have no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada. It is unfortunate to think that, notwithstanding that fact, the British Government is proposing to pass a Bill to permanently exclude our herds from the United Kingdom. Our cattle trade had grown to great importance both in Ontario and in the North-west, especially when we had the privilege of sending in live cattle without restrictions. It is difficult to see how our farmers are going to get along in the face of permanent restrictions in force in the United Kingdom on their cattle, and, instead of the condition improving, it appears to be gradually getting worse. The National Policy, in my humble opinion, is directly responsible for all the evils that have ever overtaken this country. England undoubtedly felt very keenly the action we took in 1878, in closing out her goods, virtually, and doing everything we could to produce within our own limits the goods which we required, thus shutting out the English products. When difficulties of this kind arise, no doubt they have a vivid recollection of the heartless manner in which we treated them, and, of course, they do not cultivate very much regard for us when we are suffering under the heel of the legislation which they now propose, and which is of serious concern to us. In order to show the absolute necessity for our having veterinary surgeons in England, I may mention that there was one case in which portions of the lungs of two animals that were supposed to have pleuro-pneumonia were sent to London, and when they got there, the High Commissioner was unable to say whether they were the lungs of animals that came from the United States or from Canada. How necessary it was, under these circumstances, that we should have had an active and efficient veterinary at these ports, to see that the diseased lungs were positively from a Canadian animal. How easy it would be for the lung of a United States animal to be substituted for the lungs of a Canadian animal, when we had no officer of our own there to see that such a thing should not happen. I must express my surprise at the remarks of the Secretary of State with regard to Professor Brown. I do not think it was at all prudent for the Secretary of State to speak so uncourteously of these English professional men. He would virtually lead this House to believe that these men had acted dishonestly, and that they sat down with a fixed determination to bring in such evidence as would result in the scheduling of our cattle. It was a very discourteous reflection to cast upon men who must occupy a distinguished position in their profession in England. If I had not known the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), and had not known how ready he is by times, to creep out of a difficulty by loading the blame upon somebody else, I would have been much more surprised at his remarks. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) told us of his wonderful action in going to Liverpool, and performing the extraordinary act of relieving a cargo of cattle that was about to be slaughtered, because they were supposed to have Texas fever. That great feat has been recited a thousand times in the newspapers, and on the floor of this House whenever the appropriation for the High Commissioner's office has been under discussion. That particular exploit of the High Commissioner has been brought forward many a time as a proof of the advantage of having him in London. Well, if he did zealously discharge his duty on that occasion, I am sorry to think that his zeal disappeared on many other occasions when it was as necessary as then. I express my sincere regret at the present condition of our cattle trade in the English market. I say it fearlessly, and I am prepared to prove it on any stump in Canada, that the responsibility for the present condition of things rests on the Government and on the shoulders of the High Commissioner. The farmers of Canada will hold them responsible at the approaching elections for the manner in which they have neglected the duty which they ought to have discharged in the interests of our cattle trade, and in the interests of our agricultural classes. I expect that if the present Bill passes the English House of Commons, the embargo will remain for a very long time, and the discourteous and ungentlemanly manner in which the High Commissioner has referred to the English officials to-night will be in no small degree responsible. If this Bill becomes law, the High Commissioner, after the language he has used to-night, should be the last man in the world to go over to England for the purpose of trying to get it removed.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is much to be regretted in the interests of the great industry which we now profess a desire to serve, that the action taken by the Government is simply to affirm a proposition, which, judging from the debate, can produce no possible good result. And, perhaps, it is not the best occasion for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, to go over matters which, however they may reflect upon the character of those by whom they were carried out, will not tend to relieve us from our present difficulty. It is quite evident from this debate that the proposal of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) cannot bring any possible advantage to those who are interested in this trade. The mere reaffirmation of what has been so frequently affirmed before, that is to say, that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in this country, and which proposition has been denied in England upon grounds which are not without foundation, is not one which is going to influence the legislation now before the Imperial Parliament. It is also equally evident from this debate, that the conduct of this Government, from first to last, in dealing with this question, is open to such serious censure that one cannot help feeling that any statements made by these hon. gentlemen in regard to this trade—especially the statements made by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper)—are statements which will not be accepted by the people and by the Government of England, as resting upon any sure foundation. What I have to say with regard to the Secretary of State is this: That if, in the long dealings he has had with the British Government, they have not been able to find that they can place more confidence in his statements than we have found from our experience of the last few weeks, then, they can place very little confidence in him in England. I do not assume that the Secretary of State was altogether derelict in his duty in regard to this matter, but to-night, in dealing with the proposal made by the Imperial Government as to the steps which should be taken to clear our skirts from the suspicion of having this dreaded disease amongst our cattle, he said: What an absurd thing it would be to prohibit the importation of cattle from the United States into our North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman could certainly have known very little about the cattle trade when he made that statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I made no such statement whatever.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then my ears must have deceived me. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that considering there was no pleuro-pneumonia within a thousand miles of our frontier, it would be absurd to prohibit their importation into our North-west. If he did not say that, what did he say?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said that although the fact remained that there was not the danger from cattle passing from the United States into Canada along the North-west frontier, owing to the fact that pleuro-pneumonia had never been found within a thousand miles of the boundary, yet, notwithstanding that, the moment the Imperial Government required it, we imposed the quarantine regulations. That is the statement I made.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Very well. The hon. gentleman says they imposed the quarantine regulations. That was not what the Imperial Government asked.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was precisely what they asked.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What they asked was that the importation of American cattle should entirely cease. The hon. gentleman, in making that statement, shows that he knows very little about the business. If he knows anything about it he knows that if a man goes from Alberta or from any other part of the North-west Territories to purchase cattle in Montana or Dakota or any other of the north-western states where he would naturally go for that purpose, he would buy cattle coming from all parts of the union and largely from the state of Texas. So that his assumption is entirely without foundation. There is no place where a man could go to purchase cattle where they would be more subject to disease than in the states bordering upon our North-west. It was not quarantine that the Imperial Government asked for, but the prohibition of importation. But assuming the hon. gentleman's statement to be correct, that is just one of the points in which he failed to meet the views of the Imperial Government. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) a few moments ago gave us an instance of the manner and spirit with which this Government have dealt with the cattle trade. The very fact, which is known to everybody, that it was simply the placing of a notice on the paper that caused the Minister to put in force regulations that ought to have been in force before, is evidence of the sort of spirit with which the administration of that trade was carried on; and when we know, as we do—because the fact has never been denied—that when the Imperial Government gave our railways the privilege of carrying cattle which might be infected, from our western to our eastern frontier, in order that our railways should have the advantage of that carrying trade—because it was of no advantage to the farmers or the people of this country—on condition that it should be carried on under strict regulations, it is in evidence that there was not one of these regulations that was not openly and notoriously violated. In that matter the Canadian Government were guilty of as gross a breach of faith with the Imperial Government as any government could be. That being the case, what faith could the Imperial Government put in any protestation or statement made by these gentlemen? These things were known to the Imperial Government. I do not say, because I do not know, that they were the immediate causes of the scheduling of our cattle. But we may assume that they threw the greatest possible suspicion on any statements made by our Government with regard to this trade, because when the Government would grossly violate regulations, at the risk not only of injuring the farmers of Great Britain, but also at the risk of loss to our own farmers, only in order to enable the railways to make a little more money out of the trade, it showed how little the Imperial Government could trust them to act in the interests of the agriculturists of Great Britain. But I do not think it is worth while to discuss this question any further. We have had abundant evidence to sustain, if it is needful to sustain it, the amendment of the hon. member for North York. But for my own part, while I think the resolution of the Minister of Finance is perfectly useless, as useless as the paper on which it is written, I do not think it would be advisable for this House, in the present condition of affairs, to pass the amendment of the hon. member for North York. If the one is useless, the other would probably be prejudicial to us; and as our great object, if we have any object at all in discussing this matter to-night, is to endeavour to find some practical method of escape from the danger with which we are threatened, it is better to let these bygones be bygones, and address ourselves to some practical proposal for getting rid of that danger. There are certain things which could be done, and which, if possible, ought to be done. If we can, at this late hour, notwithstanding all that has happened, notwithstanding the bad faith of our Government, approach the Imperial authorities with some practical proposals which would obviate the danger of infection, it is possible even yet that the threatened danger might be averted. I quite agree with the hon. member for South Oxford that that is a subject that ought to engage our attention to-night. Those interested in the trade, and who desire to see it maintained, should suggest to the Government some proposals which may be made even at this late hour to induce the Imperial Government to delay the passage of the Bill. With regard to the cattle in the North-west, from which a great proportion of our supplies come, I quite admit the truth of the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State that it would be impossible for us to have a system of inspection or slaughtering of cattle in the North-west Territories, or even, probably, in Manitoba, where, from the beginning of the year to the end, the cattle range at large, and mix together in enormous herds, without any possibility of watchfulness beyond the most cursory kind. It would be impossible to trace disease under such circumstances; and even if a case were found, it would be impossible to pursue the disease into the herd, as could be done in England or in Ontario, and destroy it. The only precaution that could be taken in Manitoba and the North-west Territories is absolutely to prohibit the importation of cattle from the United States. It would be a great sacrifice, no doubt, and a great inconvenience to settlers coming from the United States to the North-west; but it would be far better to make that sacrifice if doing so would save the greater trade in which we are all interested. With regard to inspection, believing as we all do that there is no pleuro-pneumonia in this country, the only practical form in which I think inspection could be carried on—I speak not with the knowledge of gentlemen engaged in the trade—would be by the Imperial Government appointing inspectors at all our ports and everywhere else that they think proper, to inspect cattle intended for shipment, our Government paying all the expense. They should be Imperial officers, with the duty of seeing that no animal suspected of having infectious disease should be allowed to go upon any vessels. And authorize them also, not only carefully to select and reject any cattle with regard to which there might be suspicion, but to slaughter them where suspicion did exist, so that it might be ascertained at once, from the clearest evidence, whether or not there was any disease in the cattle so rejected. By so doing it is possible that we might make the English farmer absolutely safe against the possibility of infection to his cattle from cattle shipped from this side of the Atlantic. It seems to me that these are the two methods by which it would be practicable to deal with the question—by absolutely prohibiting the importation of cattle from the United States, by putting an end to the transport by the railways through the country of American cattle, and by having the Imperial Government appoint officers, to be stationed at all our ports, with full power to reject any cattle they may consider suspicious, and to slaughter any cattle wherever they thought it desirable to do so. The same officers ought also be authorized to visit the herds throughout the whole of Canada, and be given absolute power of inspection, and to report in every case where suspicion exists. If some proposition of that kind were made, it might, possibly, bring about some beneficial result.

But simply to pass the resolution in your hands, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely futile. It may save the dignity of the High Commissioner (Sir Charles Tupper), but, as to doing any good to the cattle trade, it is absolutely useless.

For my part, although I think there is ample justification to vote for the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), I am not inclined to do so. And, as to voting for the proposal of the Government, it is a matter of very little consequence whether one does so or not. It is the desire of the House, and should be the desire of the Government, to make, if possible, amends for the previous neglect to comply with the many reasonable proposals made by the Imperial Government. Some of the proposals were, perhaps, not reasonable, and in their case representations could have been made to establish this ; but by complying with such of the proposals as are reasonable, and making these further proposals, it might be possible, even at this hour, to delay the progress of the measure in the British House of Commons until some such conclusions could be arrived at.

Of course, if the Government have come to the conclusion that we are better off without the trade of shipping cattle alive to England, it is not worth while to pursue the subject any further. On that point, there is, undoubtedly, a great deal of force in the contention that it would be better for us not to ship our stock to Scotland or elsewhere, but to feed them at home and get all the profits out of feeding them, and ship nothing but beef of the first quality. But I do not think that we should be restricted to resort to that alternative. It seems to me it would always pay us better to do so, and that the bulk of our trade would always go in that direction. Experience shows, undoubtedly, that an animal landed in Liverpool, if allowed to rest and to be taken to fairs throughout England, and to be slaughtered when wanted, and not compelled to be slaughtered the moment landed, would fetch a higher price and be more valuable in every respect, and gain a higher reputation for Canadian stock, than could be possible under any cold-storage system or the present system of slaughter. I think that, in all probability, when we get a little better off, and our farmers are able to spend a little more time in feeding their cattle, they will not be willing to sell young stock, as they have been doing. Still, I do not think it would be desirable to have an absolute obstacle placed in the way of that trade, especially as you will understand there is a great demand for that class of cattle, and it is a demand which makes the only opposition in England now to the passage of the Bill.

There is another objection made, from a totally different quarter and on totally different grounds, and that is the prohibition of the admission of Canadian cattle, such as took place before our cattle were scheduled, is a left-handed piece of protection to the English farmers. If that be the case, I do not know that these gentlemen who have been crying out for protection and hailing with joy and satisfaction every indication of protection in England, ought to grumble, even at this left-handed piece of protection. Our mouths are closed with regard to that.

Mr. GILLIES. Have you not always been a protectionist ?

Mr. O'BRIEN. No.

Mr. GILLIES. When did you cease to be one ?

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is not the question in hand at present. I have discussed that before, and am prepared to discuss it again. But the question now before us is, how we can best meet the difficulty in the way of this cattle business. Undoubtedly, our case is weakened by the fact that we are doing exactly ourselves, in our own interests, what the British farmer is charged with doing in his interest. If it be a measure of protection, why is it ? Because it prevents a certain degree of competition. I presume that you, Mr. Speaker, would call me to order, if I were to enter into a discussion of the National Policy on this resolution ; but I may say this, that, if the English farmer, in his own interests, is doing something which prohibits the importation of Canadian cattle, we did exactly the same thing when we put a duty on English woollen goods, for instance. We practically prohibit a very large class of English woollen goods, and it certainly does not lie in our mouths to find fault with the English farmer, if, for the sake of a little protection, he is going to prevent the importation of Canadian cattle. But there is no doubt our case is weakened, as it is weakened in every possible way in which we approach the Imperial Government, asking favours of this kind—asking even for what we think simple justice—by the fact that we, for our own selfish interests, have been willing to do exactly what we now charge the English Government with doing.

If the measure proposed by the Imperial authorities is simply a domestic measure, intended to protect any farmer from the danger of infection of his herds, it is a domestic matter, with which we have nothing to do. We may remonstrate, we may say it is very hard for us, as a portion of the Empire, not to be allowed the special privilege we ask ; but the English farmer can answer that very properly by saying, as the free-trade organs in England are saying now, these people are protectionists, why should not we be ? What right have they to find fault with us ? If they regard it from that point of view, we have nothing to reply.

If it is done for the sake of protection, we have still nothing to say ; but, at the same time, it is a matter well worth making a fight for, and, as I have endeavoured to impress upon the House during the few moments I have been speaking, we are not going to gain our object by passing a bald resolution, such as the one proposed. Nor are we going to attain our object by passing the amendment of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). We have sufficiently washed our dirty linen, and I think we ought not now perhaps—it would not be the part of prudence, even though properly justified to do so—to place upon the Journals of this House and bring before the English people a fresh reminder of all our misdeeds with regard to this British trade. Therefore, I am not inclined to support the amendment, even though I have ample justification for supporting it.

If the Government really desire to do anything for the farmers, if this motion is anything more than an easy way of getting down out of the difficulty and saving themselves all further trouble, by washing their hands of the matter, and saying to the farmers: Go to the cold-storage system; it will pay you best, and we will not take any trouble about the other trade—if the Government are really anxious to maintain this trade, there are two or three methods which they may propose to the Imperial Government, as methods they are willing to adopt, and ask that, for a time, at any rate, until these methods are tested, the progress of the Bill might be delayed.

Unquestionably, though the Bill does not profess to be levied against Canadian cattle in particular, no doubt practically that is what it amounts to. The main object is to probit the importation of Canadian cattle. Of course, it does not say so. It would be impossible for the Imperial Government to pass an Act in which that was openly declared. It would be contrary to all the instincts and ideas of the British Parliament, especially of a free trade Parliament to pass an Act which prohibited the importation of any class of cattle. For, so long as there is danger of infection, there will be no necessity for such an Act. I presume the Secretary of State is right in saying that legislation is necessary in order to enforce the prohibition of our cattle, and that is the reason why it is introduced, but whether he is right or not, whether legislation is necessary or not, we know that legislation has been framed and that it is rapidly going through the Imperial Parliament. And so I say that now is the time, late though it be, for some practical method to be proposed, not merely a bald resolution, which means nothing, and can effect nothing, but some suggestions such as I have ventured to lay before the House, which might induce the Government of England at any rate to stay the progress of this measure until some satisfactory arrangement has been arrived at.

Mr. LANDERKIN. As the constituency I represent is very deeply interested in the cattle business, I would like to say a few words on this question. I naturally feel strongly upon this subject, and I am naturally led to inquire, as the people of the country generally are, by what means this embargo upon our cattle was brought about. To those who are in charge of public affairs in this country, we naturally look to ascertain if they have been remiss in this matter. Have these gentlemen faithfully carried out the compact that was entered into between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada in regard to this trade? If not, they deserve the censure of the House and the censure of the country. I am not going to go over the evidence on that point, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) in his speech last session showed very conclusively that the compact entered into had not been faithfully observed by this Government, and that those who were in charge of the administration of the law and the regulations, were not careful in the performance of their duty; in fact, did not perform their duty in anything like a satisfactory manner. The British Government has all along shown an anxious desire to serve the interests of the people of Canada in this matter. It was shown to-night by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) that on the 21st July, 1893, the British Government, in their anxiety to perpetuate this trade between the United Kingdom and Canada sent a letter to the Government here, which the hon. member read to this House. They asked the Canadian Government in reply to inquiries that they made in order that they might, if the evidence was favourable, restore this privilege to the Canadian farmer and the Canadian shipper of cattle. It has not been shown by the Secretary of State or the Minister of Finance that, up to the present time, any answer has been made to this pressing and kindly demand by the British Department of Agriculture upon the Government of Canada. Even from a business standpoint, that letter should have been answered. The British authorities wrote with the view to having the former relations re-established, and this should have induced this Government to give prompt consideration and a careful answer to that inquiry. They went on until the 29th January, 1894, when the Department of Agriculture of England, a branch of the Imperial Government, again wrote asking the Government of Canada to furnish the information desired. But, up to the present time, no answer has been given. I remember well that in the election of 1891, I was told on nearly every platform in the riding of South Grey that if there was a change of government our cattle would be scheduled because the people of England were very much more favourably disposed to continue these arrangements so long as the present Government were in power. It was only a very short time after, that that delusion passed away and the cattle from Canada were placed on the same footing as any others coming into Great Britain. In view of the evidence produced from official documents by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) this afternoon, I expected the Secretary of State would give a reply to the point raised. But instead of meeting the charges and the evidence upon which they are based, the hon. Secretary of State gives us assertion, not fact. He does not give a scrap of evidence to sustain his contention. He charges the hon. member for North York with striking down a great interest of the country. That statement he makes with all the force of his utterances of his former days. He tries to make the country believe that the hon. member for North York, to gain a party advantage, is willing to strike down this great industry. But when it is shown that the Government have failed to uphold this privilege of the Canadian people, the hon. Secretary of State takes some comfort that the action of the British Government would be a blessing in disguise. I cannot understand what he means by the two positions he takes with regard to this question. When the hon. member for North York does anything, he is striking down a valuable industry, but when the Government allow it to be done, why, then, it will turn out a blessing in disguise. I wonder the hon. gentleman did not give some better reason than that for the course the Government has pursued. I think the hon. Secretary of State has been very imprudent. He has made statements which I think are hasty and ill-considered, and I am a little surprised that one who has been in public life so long as the hon. gentleman should give mere assertion instead of argument and fact when dealing with a question of so much importance to the people of this country as the cattle trade. Now, when the evidence of the experts of the Board of Agriculture of England is produced and read by the hon. member for North York, how does he meet these statements ? He says these are paid officers of the Crown, and yet he afterwards produces the evidence of Dr. McEachran and others who were in the employ of this Government. When he tries to break down the evidence of Prof. Brown and others who were in the employ of the English Government, he comes back to Dr. McEachran and also tries to minimize the force of his evidence because he is a paid officer of this Government. In doing that he casts reflection upon the Civil Service of this country, a reflection not in keeping with the position he occupies in this House. These were disinterested people, they had no interest but to ascertain the facts and report them to the Board of Agriculture. Consequently when the Secretary of State seeks to injure and destroy their evidence, he is only destroying the evidence he spoke of afterwards and rebutting the testimony they gave. For my part, if there is any contagious disease, among the cattle of this country, I do not want to see them shipped to any other country. If there is any contagious disease among the herds of this country, I would like to have it discovered so as to prevent its spread among the rest of the cattle in this country. I am not so anxious to do business with other countries as to jeopardize all the herds of the land in case this disease should be found to exist. The Secretary of State says that it is very easy to diagnose pleuro-pneumonia. The best authorities on this question say that it may exist in an animal for fifteen months before it can be discovered, and then only by those who are competent authorities on the subject. Now, the hon. gentleman told us again to-night how on one occasion he had prevented the scheduling of a car load of cattle that landed in Liverpool. Well, I remember hearing that told by a gentleman who seconded the address here in the year 1884, and I remember him giving a great deal of credit to the Secretary of State for having done it. But when we came to examine the report we found that the Secretary of State did nothing on that occasion but to take off his coat and roll up his sleeves. He did not do anything else, according to the historian, than that ; and for that, all his friends here claim that he had great power and influence with the Imperial authorities. If he was able to do so much on that occasion by merely taking off his coat, why did not the hon. gentleman take off his coat in 1892 ? What was the reason he kept his coat buttoned up and allowed the scheduling of our cattle in 1892, if he had power to prevent it in 1884 ? Is it possible that the hon. gentleman became better known in England during those years, and that his statements subsequently were not relied upon, that his assertions did not pass as evidence as they did when he was a stranger to them ? How is it that after he became better known there, he had neither power or influence, and that in fact when he went to the Colonial Office and asked to be allowed to speak before this court, they refused him. The Colonial Office did not want to be trifled with. If he had evidence, why did he not produce it ? They wanted none of his assertions, he had produced his assertions before. In the way of diplomacy the Secretary of State has failed, and signally failed ; because when it was established by the highest authority in England that the disease had been brought there, he goes and says to those authorities, You do not know what you are talking about ; you are a set of fools ; you do not understand this question ; I understand the question. The consequence was that he was not allowed to speak at the conference. Now, what is to be the effect of this resolution of the Minister of Finance passing ? It was very likely drafted by the Secretary of State, because it is quite in keeping with the letters that he wrote, and the statements he made to the Agriculture Department. And what good is it calculated to do ?

That, in view of the foregoing facts, this Parliament, while not wishing to interfere in any way with legislation considered necessary in the United Kingdom, desires respectfully to protest against the permanent exclusion of Canadian cattle on the ground of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, and to express in the strongest possible manner its belief that pleuro-pneumonia has not in the past, and does not at the present time exist in Canada.

Now, the Government here say that this is merely an effort to give a little protection to the farmers of Great Britain. If that is so, who are responsible for it ? Who have been telling the people of England that England is going to ruin if they do not get protection ? Let me read you just a few extracts from what they have said :

> The old land is going to ruin under free trade. Protection is the only thing that will save it, &c. "Mail," Government organ.
> The trend in Britain is towards protection. Glorious.—Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.
> John Bull is a chump not to adopt protection.—Montague (in substance).
> The British flag is being driven out of civilized markets of the world by the silly free trade policy.—Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.
> Davies' motion for reduction of tariff on goods chiefly imported from Britain—voted down by the solid Conservative party in the House of Commons.

Here was an olive branch held out to them, and after the entire Conservative party in this House voted it down, now they go and whine to the people of England. After we have offered a reduction of the tariff on goods coming from England, and after they have voted it down, they come seriously and ask this House to affirm this resolution. I can understand children acting in this way, but how responsible people who are entrusted with the management of the Government of Canada, after voting on this resolution of the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), come and ask the House of Commons to adopt this resolution of the Minister of Finance, I cannot understand. Had they supported the motion of the member for Prince Edward Island they might have had some ground. We hear them state in this House every session that England is going to decay, that England is declining, that her navies is falling off, her army is falling off, her trade is falling off, and yet we have the Minister of Finance seriously—I do not know if it is seriously—proposing this resolution to the Commons of Canada and asking England, after all they have done to discriminate against the motherland in our tariff, to let our cattle be exempt from the operations of the Bill now before the British Parliament. It is a most absurd position. The British Parliament would not listen to this request by a Government that has done so much to injure trade between Canada and England. It has been clearly established that regulations entered into between England were not carried out, that there was neglect in carrying them out. The charge was made clearly by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and was substantiated, for the hon. gentleman showed that the neglect of the Government had been such that they could scarcely approach the mother country and ask favours for Canada. If the High Commissioner had been kept away from England, I fancy our cattle would never have been scheduled there. We have had unlimited and unrestricted trade with England for fifty years. It was never suggested that restrictions should be imposed until the High Commissioner began to meddle with political contests, until he travelled through the country attacking public men and public parties, and until he proceeded to England. I charge the High Commissioner and the Government with being responsible to the people for the existing state of things, which has entailed a loss of millions on the people of this Dominion. I say, moreover, that, under these conditions, the trade between England and Canada has very materially fallen off, as regards cattle shipments, the shipments being now $2,000,000 less in value as compared with previous years. When we notice this decline, brought about by the neglect of the Government, and then listen to the Secretary of State abusing England, her institutions, laws and commerce, and then hear the hon. gentleman ask this House seriously to consider the resolution now before it, the action appears to be a specimen of the highest folly and absurdity. I do not understand how hon. gentlemen opposite possess the necessary assurance to seriously make such a proposition. The resolution will be just as ineffective as is the High Commissioner. I believe if we keep the High Commissioner out of England, the embargo will be removed—let the office be run by a clerk, and complications will not arise. We can have the Secretary of State here, he can do neither good nor harm. His usefulness is gone here as well as in England, and after thirteen years' absence he does not understand the public questions. He cannot galvanize the Conservative Government into life and restore its unity, any more than he can restore our cattle trade to its former position in England. On the contrary, there are good reasons why hon. members should support the amendment moved by the hon. member for North York. That hon. member understands the question, and has given a great deal of attention to it, and he is confident, and the people generally are confident that the Government, by neglecting this great and vital interest have jeopardized our trade, a condition which has been brought about by factions and schisms that have existed in the Government during recent years.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. The cattle question is one that has been agitating the minds of the people for a long time, and has been agitating the minds of hon. members of this House ever since I came here in 1891. At that time the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had a Bill before this House for the purpose of carrying out the demands we were then making on the steamship companies that were carying our cattle across the Atlantic to Great Britain. I had the pleasure, at that time, of assisting him in obtaining what was required for the cattle shippers of this country. We had a grievance in regard to space provided on the vessels, the compartments being too narrow and too short, the result of which was that our cattle were knocked about, and arrived in such a bruised condition that the people in England thought they must be suffering from disease, and that the carcasses were not fit to be used as meat in the United Kingdom. I desire now to call the attention of the House to some of the obstructions offered at that time with respect to our cattle trade in Great Britain. A member of the Imperial Parliament, Mr. Plimsoll, was opposed to the importation of Canadian cattle and American cattle, on the ground that cattle shipments endangered the safety of the vessels, and thereby the lives of sailors. Objection was also made by the farmers of England. They did not want our cattle to come into competition with their cattle, especially on the open market. They were willing at that time to put up with the dead meat trade, but they did not want our cattle to be sold in competition with the cattle of the United Kingdom. This question has been agitating the minds of the people of the United Kingdom to such an extent that they have brought pressure to bear on the Imperial Government to lead them to place an embargo on Canadian cattle, as is the case to-day. Opposition also came from the association for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. No doubt this society had grounds for interference, as its agents saw our cattle landed in poor condition, as if they suffered abuse on the voyage, and no doubt this arose from the lack of that accommodation for which we were agitating in 1891. The only objection I had to the regulation imposed at that time was that the fees for inspection were charged against the cattlemen instead of being paid by the Government, as is the case in the United States. I now desire to draw the attention of the House to the number of cattle shipped during the five years during which I have had the honour of a seat in Parliament. In 1891 we shipped 108,947 cattle, and 32,157 sheep. In 1892, which was a year when the agitation commenced for the exclusion of cattle on account of disease having been found in some herds, we shipped 98,775 cattle, and 15,932 sheep. In 1893, the number was reduced, on account of the embargo placed on our cattle, the exports being 80,895 cattle, and 1,781 sheep. In 1894 we shipped 82,217 cattle, and 121,304 sheep. In 1895, we shipped 99,606 cattle, and 187,338 sheep. In 1891 very few Manitoba and North-west cattle were shipped. In 1895 we shipped 99,606 cattle, out of which 42,000 were sent from Manitoba and the North-west. Hon. gentlemen will therefore see that by making a comparison between 1895 and 1891, after the embargo had been in force for four years, our shipments of cattle were only 57,606 from Ontario and Quebec, as compared with 108,947 head in 1891. Any person who has any knowledge of the business must admit, that that has been a great loss to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; while the cattle growing industry has become so great in the North-west that they are now shipping nearly as many as we are. Hence the reason that I advocate the system of slaughtering cattle for export to England, instead of sending them over alive as before.

I wish now to draw the attention of the House to the fact that our sheep exports increased very largely in the years 1894 and 1895. In 1892 after the embargo was placed on our cattle, our farmers had to divert their attention to sheep growing. In that year scarcely any were exported, as the farmers were raising their flocks so as to go largely into the business, on account of their not being able to carry on the cattle trade as previously. For that reason again, very few sheep were shipped in 1893, but in 1894 we shipped 121,304, and in 1895 we shipped 187,338 sheep to England. We cannot claim credit for all these being Canadian sheep, because 20 per cent of them were American. Last year I called the attention of the Government to the danger of allowing American sheep to be shipped with Canadian sheep to Great Britain, because American sheep were suffering from a disease called the sheep scab, and I thought, in the interest of the sheep trade, that the Government should take precaution to prevent the spread of that disease among our flocks. I predicted at that time, that our sheep would be scheduled in England as our cattle had been. My prediction unfortunately proved true, and a short time afterwards, the British Government put sheep on the schedule, so that to-day it is scarcely worth while raising sheep on account of the low price we can obtain for their carcasses in the English market. I venture to predict that the decrease of our sheep exports this year will be 50 per cent, as compared with those of last year. I find in the report of the Minister of Agriculture for 1895, the following report of Dr. McEachran, in respect to this question:—

> Professor McEachran reports that this disease is not known to exist in Quebec or the maritime provinces, and that it has been exterminated in the North-west Territories. This disease, is reported, however, as having been discovered on arrival in Great Britain on several steamers sailing from Montreal with sheep on board. It is probable that the disease as reported, was contracted from some of the large number of sheep exported from Chicago on Canadian ships, but of which no evidence was obtained before sailing.
> Immediately on receipt of a cable from the High Commissioner reporting the discovery of scab on sheep arriving in England, departmental inquiries were made respecting the condition of the Canadian flocks. Professor McEachran immediately reported that very few of the cargo were Canadian and that the latter came from the province of Ontario.
> Professor Andrew Smith was then immediately directed to make an inquiry and he reported complete absence of scab in the locality whence the sheep sent forward were taken.

This report is from men who are supposed to be orthodox in the way of inspection, such as Mr. Smith. I know that some of the men he sent out to make examinations throughout the country, were men of practical experience, like Mr. Cowan of Galt. He made an inspection of the different flocks in the neighbourhood whence I come, and from which a great many sheep are exported, and he found no disease. There is no doubt in my mind that this disease came from American sheep, and the gain to our railroads, in allowing them to carry United States sheep through our country, is as nothing compared to the loss our farmers have sustained by their being deprived of the privilege of having their live sheep go into the British market. What are the facts, Sir, with regard to the request of the British Government that we should prevent the importation of American cattle through Canada, and which matter has been referred to by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). According to the Government statistics, we shipped last year from Windsor through Canada 162.750 head of American cattle. That has been going on for years and the English people must have been cognizant of that through the reports which we issue annually. We could not expect that they would submit to having American cattle coming in from the United States where disease is known to exist, and passing through Canadian territory, without placing an embargo upon us. They undoubtedly looked with a great deal of suspicion on American cattle being allowed to come through Canada, because they knew that pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases such as Texas fever existed among the American herds. Hence they placed an embargo on our cattle going into England. In 1891, the Americans imposed a quarantine of eight days on our sheep going into the United States, because as they said, Canada had not quarantined sheep imported from England, while the Americans had imposed quarantine regulations upon English sheep. I took an interest in this question at the time and I asked the chairman of the Agricultural Committee to intercede with the Government to pass an Order in Council quarantining English sheep, the same as the Americans did. His answer to me was, that the Americans did as they pleased and that we could not help ourselves. The result was that the Americans quarantined our sheep. If that had continued for six or eight months it would be the ruin of the Canadian sheep growing industry, because we were shipping thousands of our lambs from the west, and from Ogdensburg and other ports in the east to Boston and New York. After two or three days inquiry into this matter, I brought the question before the House, and our Government decided at last that they would impose similar restrictions upon British sheep coming into Canada as were imposed by the American Government on British sheep going into the United States. Less than eight days after that, the Americans removed their restriction on Canadian sheep going to the United States market, and consequently great benefits accrued to the sheep industry in Canada. I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to make some reference to complaints which have been made by our live stock breeders in the West.

In shipping our cattle, the different railway companies have been imposing about treble the rates that should be exacted for carrying thorough-bred cattle from one point to another. At the annual meeting of the Live Stock Breeders' Association, recently held, a committee was appointed to interview the railway companies. That committee visited Montreal yesterday, and interviewed the railway authorities there. Before going, they had the proceedings of their meeting published in the papers, so that the railway authorities were in a position to receive them on their arrival. The committee reported to me to-day that they had been received very cordially by the railway companies, and that all their requests had been granted. This was, no doubt, because they were reasonable requests, for any one making a reasonable request is most likely to obtain it. So, if our Government, at the time our cattle were first scheduled, had gone to the British Government in a business-like way, I have no doubt that they would have had influence enough with that Government to prevent our cattle being scheduled, and that trade being left in the very precarious position in which it stands to-day. Now, the regulations with reference to the space for cattle on the steamships were made in the year 1891; but, in 1894, the steamship companies interceded with this Government and induced them to agree to change the regulations in their favour. When the question came before the House last year, the Minister of Finance stated:

> I think I can give my hon. friend the information he wishes with regard to this matter. It is true as he has said that last year the space was fixed at 2 feet 8 inches, and that this year, on representation, it is proposed to fix the space at 2 feet 6 inches on the upper deck, the space below being the same as last year. I understand that it is the same space as is allowed on vessels which go from American ports, and the object was to enable steamboat owners to carry as large and consequently as paying a freight as possible, but at the same time under the impression that the cattle upon the upper deck would not be at all injured, so that both interests would be conserved. The cattle men have made and are making their representations. They are here to-day and are being heard by the members of the Government who have this matter in charge, and I have no doubt at all that satisfactory arrangements will be come to in a very short time.

I thought it very strange, at that time, that the Government would attempt to make any changes in the regulations on behalf of the steamship companies without consulting the cattle-shippers. But, seeing in the press that the steamship people had got the ear of the Government, they felt it necessary to make some move, and they sent a delegation to Ottawa to interview the Government on the subject. The delegation arrived just in time to prevent the change being made. Now, I think that, if the Government would consult with the stock-dealers and stock-breeders of this country on all such questions as this, they would have very little trouble in getting at what is best in the interest of the cattle trade. In conclusion, I would say that the interests of the farmers of this country should be the first consideration of the Government. This is an agricultural country. We have great timber limits and mineral deposits ; but, if the agriculturists are not prosperous, no other class of people will be prosperous. Therefore, we must look after our agricultural interests. I am satisfied that the prices of cattle are going this year to be much below what they have been for the last ten years. I am satisfied that this year men who feed cattle will not make it pay, but will lose money. I am sorry to say it, but it is my honest opinion, that this year will be the worst-paying year the farmers have ever had in this country. Our horses are liable to be excluded from the British market, as well as our cattle, if precautions are not taken to prevent diseased animals going there. The Americans have sent a great many diseased horses to England, and many of these are going from Canadian ports ; and, if we do not take steps to prevent the spread of disease among our horses, I fear that they will also be excluded from the British market.

Mr. MARTIN. I am very much surprised, Mr. Speaker, that no members on the Government side of the House have taken sufficient interest in this question to deal with it, apart from the two members of the Government who have addressed the House. This is a very important question indeed, and I must admit that my knowledge of the subject is not very great. It certainly is a question of great importance to Manitoba and the North-west Territories, because the shipments of cattle are beginning to form a very large proportion of the exports from that part of Canada ; and, just as we were getting into a position to make some money out of this business, unfortunately, the scheduling of cattle in the old country occurred. The first time I heard of this question was in the general election of 1891, when I was a candidate, on behalf of the Opposition, in Manitoba. It was urged by speakers on behalf of the Government, that, if the Liberals came into power, this disaster would be sure to occur. However, the Liberals did not come into power, but, about a year after the election, this scheduling did occur. Now, I understand that the hon. member for North York is of the opinion that the conduct of Canada in connection with this matter has been of such a character as to weaken very much the strong case which Canada otherwise would have had with the Imperial authorities ; and, after listening to the facts upon which he based that charge, it seems to me that no answer has been made to it by the hon. Secretary of State.

And it does seem to me that the conduct of Canada has been of a nature not to conciliate the English Government, but rather to place that Government in such a position that they could not help enforcing the law as it was there. Attention has been drawn, in this debate, to the language used by the hon. Secretary of State, as the representative of Canada, with regard to the action of the English authorities in this matter ; and I would draw attention to the fact that the late Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Senator Angers, found it necessary, in the report which has been praised so highly to-night by the hon. Secretary of State, to apologize to the Imperial Government for the language which has been referred to here. I find that Senator Angers referred to the complaint that had been made with regard to this language as follows. First quoting from the Imperial document :—

> Whatever may be the opinion of the Dominion Government as to the diagnosis of the veterinary officers, it is surely going too far to say that the slaughter of the herd from which the diseased animals were taken, or of animals with which they have come in contact, would have been an action out of reason and ridiculous.

And then apologizing in this way :

> In respect of these remarks, the undersigned desires to explain to Your Excellency that it was very far from his intention, and that he would be very sorry to convey any impression of the nature of that attributed.

Yet we find the hon. Secretary of State reiterating these harsh expressions in the very strongest terms to-night, and even going further. We find him alleging that the officers of the Imperial Government, who made these reports, were actuated by improper motives ? Now, let us suppose that this Government had, in a matter which came under their cognizance, appointed officers to inquire and report, and that these officers had made a report on which this Government decided to act. And let us suppose that the action upon that report affected one of the provinces of this Dominion, and that the representative of that province had come here and demanded that the Government should not act upon these reports because they were made by officers in the pay of the Government, and therefore entirely inaccurate. That is the charge which the hon. Secretary of State makes against the Imperial officers. He charges them with having declared that they found pleuro-pneumonia where none existed, and with having so declared because they were paid officers, and made a report such as they believed their employers desired them to make. Well, if any province dared to make such a charge against the officers of this Dominion, and dare to make such insinuations to the Dominion Government, what would the Government reply ? They would say : You insult us, we are bound to act upon the report of our officers, and because we pay them is no reason to suppose that they would deliberately violate their honour and make a report which they might think was desired by us. Sir, such an insinuation would be considered the height of impertinence, and the hon. Secretary of State would make this chamber ring with denunciation of any province that dared to so reflect upon the honour of the servants of the Crown. Yet a province of this Dominion occupies as fully a strong position—in fact, a stronger position—as regards the Dominion Government, than does a colony of Canada towards the Imperial Government, because the connection between the provinces and the Dominion is very much stronger than between the colony and the Imperial Government, the tie in the latter case being, after all, practically one of sentiment. The Imperial Government have practically no control over us in local matters, and we certainly have nothing to say with regard to the manner in which they conduct their business. And yet, presuming upon our connection as a colony, our Government undertook to say to the British Government: You are acting improperly in this matter; you pretend a desire to keep your herds clear from pleuro-pneumonia, while, as a matter of fact, you are not actuated by that motive at all, but simply by a desire to keep your markets for your own farmers, and, therefore, instruct your officers to make false reports. It seems to me that to take a position of that kind makes us powerless advocates of our own case, and I cannot understand at all how members of the Government can charge members of this side as striking a blow at Canada when they explain the facts. We cannot change the facts. Because the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) reading from the English blue-books their side of the case, does not strengthen that case in the least. But it is right that this House should know on what grounds the English Government have scheduled our cattle and on what grounds they are proposing now to practically prohibit the landing of our cattle at all in England. These grounds having been put forward by the hon. gentleman, he then called attention to the fact that England had expressed herself at all times, at any rate until the defeat of the Rosebery Government, strongly desirous of removing these restrictions from Canadian cattle, if they could be put in the position of doing so under their law. He drew attention to the fact that they have called upon Canada repeatedly to take the same care here that they take in their own country with regard to following up this disease. What is the answer of the hon. Secretary of State? Why, he says, he cannot do it because there is no pleuro-pneumonia here. Surely that is not an answer. All they ask us to do is, when an animal is suspected, to trace that animal up, and if it is found to be infected with pleuro-pneumonia, to slaughter the herd from which it came and all other cattle with which it came in contact. Surely we can agree to do that, and if there is no pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, we will not have to slaughter any cattle. But when an animal was traced to Pilot Mound, the hon. gentleman says he refused to carry out that very reasonable suggestion, because if he did so he would have had to slaughter the cattle on all the 150 farms from which cattle were collected for that particular shipment. I do not understand the regulation in that way at all. I understand that all that would have been necessary in that case would have been to find what particular farmer that animal came from, and then to cause all other animals on the possession of that farmer and all animals coming into contact with his cattle to be slaughtered. This the Government flatly refused to do. It does appear to me a very unfair suggestion to make that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) desires to strike at Canada through the Government, because he condemns the Government for refusing to do what the English Government, which is all powerful in this matter, suggested as a sine qua non for the removal of the restrictions. I notice that the hon. Secretary of State claimed that this scheduling of Canadian cattle was forced upon the Liberal Government in power at the time by the Conservative Opposition. He told us that the Rosebery Government was a very weak government, having only a majority of twenty-five which could not be depended upon, and, being weak, had been driven into this course against their will. I find that these alleged facts are not facts at all. I find that this scheduling of Canadian cattle took place on the 21st November, 1892. The Rosebery Government had not come into existence at that time, and did not come into existence for over a year afterwards. So what the statement that the Rosebery Government was a weak government could possibly have to do with the scheduling of cattle on the 21st February, nearly two years before they came into existence, and while Mr. Gladstone was still premier, I cannot imagine. There is the further fact that when this scheduling took place, Parliament, in England, was not in session at all, so how could a Conservative Opposition have any effect upon the Government? Mr. Gladstone had just been returned to power, the general elections having taken place in July, 1892. The government, instead of having a majority of twenty-five, had a majority of forty, so that they were comparatively strong. As a matter of fact, Parliament did not meet until the 21st January, 1893. Then, let us see about this resolution the hon. gentleman has been telling us about. On the 17th March, 1893, a long time before Lord Rosebery became Premier of England, this resolution, to which the hon. gentleman referred was moved in the House by Mr. McCartney, an Irish member:

> That this House is of the opinion that, subject to the exemption contained in section 2 of the Contagious Diseases Act, no foreign animal landing in the country should be allowed to leave the wharf alive.

A full discussion took place, and it was pointed out that this was practically an attack upon Canada. The Government showed no weakness. They did not appear to be afraid of Mr. Chaplin, but, on the contrary, Mr. Herbert Gardner's speech is a most defiant one, charging Mr. Chaplin and Mr. McCartney with making a political attack upon the Government, and an attack upon Canada ; and Mr. Gardner again stated in most emphatic language that the Government had been most reluctant to schedule Canadian cattle as they had done in the previous November, and they had every reason to believe that the Dominion Government would take such precautions as had been suggested to them and thus prevent any danger from pleuro-pneumonia, and pointed out that the case of pleuro-pneumonia which had been discovered among the Canadian cattle landing at Dundee from the steamers "Monkseaton," and "Hurona" had proably arisen from the contiguity of Canada to the United States, that they had really come from the United States. He also pointed out that the long line of boundary between Canada and the United States stretching, as it did, from ocean to ocean, made it extremely difficult to maintain the quarantine. He resisted definitely and boldly the proposition of Mr. McCartney, and when the vote was taken, instead of a small majority which the Secretary of State said, they had the very respectable majority of thirty-five, considering that their whole majority at the election a few months before was forty. So we find that the hon. gentleman cannot deal with a question like this which he is intimate with, which, at any rate, he ought to be intimate, having been a resident in England at this time, without making statements which have no foundation in fact. The hon. gentleman says this scheduling took place because Lord Rosebery's Government was a weak government, and could not depend upon its majority. The hon. gentleman must know that it occurred, not in Lord Rosebery's time, and that, in any case, his weakness was not in having Conservative opponents, but in the fact that his majority consisted partly of Irish Home Rulers who were not always ready to stand by the government, and who decided to stab it, and did stab it. But Lord Rosebery's Government had nothing to do with it. It was done when Mr. Gladstone was in power, and when, though he had a comparatively small majority, he had a strong and apparently united party behind him. So it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman was quite justified in the charge he made against the Government, and certainly if that charge is a true one, it is one which will sink deep in the minds of the people of this country. I am glad, as a Liberal, that those who have been opposing Canada in the old country are Tories, and that the Liberals have been standing right by us. I notice with pleasure that Mr. Herbert Gardner refers to the loyalty of Canada, calling her one of the brightest jewels in the Crown of England, and he regrets exceedingly that it has been found necessary to apply harshly the law of England against that colony. But we find that the Conservatives, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. McCartney, and others, all Tories, have been doing their utmost to get a general law passed to prohibit altogether the landing of live animals in that country. We find, Mr. Speaker, that all endeavours to get Canada to put this matter right, that all promises to make the matter right for Canada, if Canada would only do its duty, have failed, have disappeared into smoke, since Lord Rosebery lost power in England ; but, as soon as the Conservative Government came into power, the first thing they proposed to Parliament, when Parliament meets, is a law which finally excludes the live cattle of Canada from entering the United Kingdom. We find, Sir, that the Liberals in the Imperial House of Commons are protesting against the harsh action of the Government against Canada ; it is the Liberals there who are standing up for Canada. We are glad to know it, and I can say that the position is the same in both countries. In the English House of Commons the Liberals are fighting for fair-play to Canada, and in the Canadian House of Commons the Liberals are fighting for justice to Canada. It is true, they are also blaming the Government, but not for the mere purpose of opposing it, because, Mr. Speaker, the woods are full of reasons for attacking the Government. They are so plentiful that we have not time to allude to them. We would not waste our time in looking for opportunities of attacking the Government, so weak, so imbecile, so rotten, so lost to all sense of everything that is right and proper in the interest of this country, as the present Government is. But, when a great question comes up like this, where it is necessary for Canada to act, the Liberals are found doing their duty, even though incidentally they may find it necessary to pass censure upon hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As the cattle industry is one that affects largely the district I represent, and indeed the whole country, I cannot allow the resolution to be disposed of without making a few remarks with regard to it. I must say that, after seeing what has taken place, and after listening to the debate upon this resolution, I can hardly consider this a sufficient protest, or one that is likely to be of any practical benefit in protecting the cattle industry of Canada. I must also say that, in view of the fact that in past years this matter was brought to the attention of the Government, especially by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and the whole question was laid before the House and the country, I can hardly help feeling that there has been some apathy, if not neglect, on the part of the Government. It has been said by many that, probably, the unfriendly attitude of this Government in its tariff policy, by discriminating against Great Britain, has aroused some feeling there against Canada. However that may be, I think if the Government had been more energetic, had taken more interest in this matter at the time, and had realized the great importance of this industry, they would not have allowed this matter to drift along without giving it sufficient attention, and, probably, we would not have been in the condition we find ourselves in to-day, when the Imperial Parliament is likely to pass an Act for the permanent exclusion of our cattle from that market. I say it is very much to be regretted, and I am sorry the Government have not seen their way clear to make a more energetic protest. I hope, even after these resolutions are disposed of, that the Government, in view of the great importance of the question, may devise some other means by which this disaster may be averted, for it will be a disaster to the trade of our country, if this Act should be passed by the Imperial Parliament.

Amendment (Mr. Mulock) negatived, on a division.

Motion (Mr. Foster) agreed to, on a division.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper: "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee on Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba)."

Mr. WALLACE. Before this motion is put, I desire to move an amendment.

> That all the words after the word "That" be struck out and the following added instead thereof:—"Regard being had to the opinion that is entertained that the said Bill, if passed, will be absolutely irrevocable so far as the Parliament and the legislature of Manitoba are concerned, and to the short period for which this Parliament exists, and that it is without any mandate from the electors respecting this question, it would be unwise and inexpedient to proceed with the said Bill."

I hope this amendment will meet with the approval of the Government, though I have some doubts upon that point. The Government has proceeded with this matter with so much haste and so little consideration, that I can scarcely expect they will adopt this amendment. We were told by the Minister of Finance, in the speech he made, that the Government proceeded with great deliberation; and he informed the House that this question had been before us for six years.

So far as my recollection goes, the first time the Parliament of Canada could have interfered in the matter or adopted any legislation was during last session, in March, 1895. The Government proceeded throughout with much precipitation. I have read the record of the proceedings. The decision of the Privy Council was rendered on 29th January, 1895. Before their decision reached this country the Premier, at the instigation of the counsel for the minority, had summoned the parties to appear before the Privy Council. Mr. Ewart on 4th February asked that the Privy Council meet to hear counsel for both parties in this case. On 16th February a memorandum was signed by the Premier to the effect:

> Memo.—Mr. McGee notify Ewart that Council will hear him on the 26th February, 1895, at 11 o'clock a.m.
> MACKENZIE BOWELL.

On the same day a communication was sent to the Government of Manitoba that they should appear before the Privy Council on the 26th. This notice was sent a distance of 1,200 or 1,400 miles, and the provincial government was called upon within ten days to appear and argue their case before the Privy Council. After the case had been heard and a decision given, a peremptory order was issued to the government of Manitoba, an order severe in its terms and which allowed them practically no latitude but compelled the provincial government to adopt the separate school system, which was opposed to the interest of the people and opposed to the legislation which the province had adopted five years before, and to which after five years' experience both political parties had pledged themselves, and which the people at two elections had endorsed without qualification or doubt, and the people, particularly at the last election, declared in favour of their public school system and against any spstem of separate schools. After an experience of five or six years of the public school system and of nineteen years of the separate school system the people came to the conclusion that the public school system was the most suited to the genius of the people. The resolution which I have the honour to submit states that the Bill if passed, will be absolute and irrevocable. Some hon. gentlemen have expressed a different opinion. It has been said by some eminent lawyers that such will not be the case, that if the Dominion Parliament passes legislation it becomes part of the statutes of the province and the province may change or repeal the statute. That opinion was not shared by the Government itself. The opinion of the Government in the report of the Privy Council dated February, 1895, is thus stated:

> In this connection, it was urged by counsel on behalf of the province that should Parliament legislate under these circumstances its enactment would be absolute and irrevocable so far as both Parliament and the provincial legislature are concerned.
> The committee, without necessarily adopting this view, observe that section 22 of "The Manitoba Act" may admit of that construction. The committee, therefore, recommend that the provincial legislature be requested to consider whether its action upon the decision of Your Excel> lency in Council should be permitted to be such as, while refusing to redress a grievance which the highest court in the Empire has declared to exist, may compel Parliament to give the relief of which under the constitution the provincial legislature is the proper and primary source, thereby according to this view, permanently divesting itself in a very large measure of its authority and so establishing in the province an educational system which no matter what changes may take place in the circumstances of the country or the views of the people, cannot be altered or repealed by any legislative body in Canada.

That being the view of the Government itself, they should be careful as to what steps they should adopt in the way of legislation. If this legislation is irrevocable both by the Parliament of Canada and by the legislature of Manitoba, it is legislation which affects our whole future, and if found to be unworkable—and it will be found unworkable—and if found unsuitable to the genius of the people—and I predict this will prove to be the case—then this Parliament is committing itself, without due consideration and full knowledge of the circumstances, to legislation which is irrevocable and absolute. I hold then that we are fairly entitled to ask, although I am afraid we will ask in vain, to allow this proposed legislation to stand, because we are now within a very short period of the end of this Parliament. The electors who sent members to this House were put on the voters' lists in 1889, no less than seven years ago. How many of those electors are electors to-day ? And what is of more importance perhaps, how many men who are qualified to have their names on the voters' lists are not represented in this Parliament ? This is the sixth session of this Parliament, an unheard of circumstance in the history of this country and the old country, and so Parliament is not representative to-day of the views of the people on this question. It may be, for example, that the views I hold are not the views of my constituents. I received a petition the other day from fifty of the electors of the riding of West York asking me to abstain from voting on this Bill. Whether that meant that I should not vote, or that I should vote for the Bill, is a question the petition does not make clear ; but if those fifty electors represent the views of the majority of the electors, then I have no right to vote against the Bill. But my opinion is that they do not represent the majority of the electors of the constituency, and the only way to decide the question is to allow this Bill to stand over until the people to whom we must appeal within the next few weeks shall decide this matter. More particularly as in 1891, when the elections were last held, this was not a question that was discussed before the electorate, except in a very meagre way. The elections were held on different issues altogether. The people were not consulted on this issue, and they not having been consulted, I say that we have no right—especially as we are at the threshold of another election—to put this legislation upon the statute-book. Other legislation passed by this Parliament can be repealed, but this we are told by the Government itself cannot be repealed, and therefore I say we have no right at the present time to thrust such a law upon the people of Canada, and upon the province of Manitoba. I do not intend to speak at greater length upon any points that have occurred to me with reference to this question, but as the hour is getting late, and as the leader of the House (Sir Charles Tupper) I know is quite wearied, I shall not trespass upon your time to further express other views that I had intended to ventilate to-night. I move this resolution, seconded by Mr. McNeill.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at this hour of the morning to occupy the time of the House in discussing the very important amendment that has been placed in your hands. For my part, I do not hold that the Government are not justified in carrying out their views with regard to this Bill. I only regret very much that they hold the views they do hold with reference to it. It is, I think, reasonable from their point of view that they should endeavour to carry out their policy in reference to this measure. It is not fair, I think, to suppose, that because negotiations are going on just now, they should drop this measure on that account. I do not think they are blameworthy in this respect, because the negotiations may fall to the ground. But I futher consider, Mr. Speaker, that the nature of the vote which has been taken on this Bill on its second reading is a sufficient reason why the Government should proceed no further with this measure. There is no moral sanction behind this Bill. There is no vote of this House which justifies the Government in stating that the representatives of the people are in favour of the principles of this Bill. The majority on the second reading of this Bill was eighteen. If you subtract the votes of the members of the Government themselves, which would be ten in this House, and if you subtract the the vote of those who never intend to appear before the electorate again——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McNEILL. I merely refer to those whose constituencies are being swept away, and those also whom we know do not intend to present themselves for re-election—I do not desire for one moment to speak in any disrespectful way of any member of this House ; I am speaking of a notorious fact—I say, if you subtract the vote of the Government themselves, the votes of those who will not be representing constituencies after the general election because their constituencies have been swept away, and also the votes of those who notoriously do not intend to present themselves to their constituents again for re-election: I say there is no majority behind this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McNEILL. Hon. gentlemen may say oh, but the "oh" does not change the fact. I say there is no majority behind this Bill, as a majority of the representatives of the people of this country supporting the Government. Under these circumstances, I think it would be well that the Government should pause before they proceed further. It is not to be supposed that the province of Manitoba can pay much respect to a measure which has been passed under such circumstances. It is not to be supposed that the province can pay much respect to a measure which is being forced through a dying House of Commons in a sixth session, in such a way as to deprive the people themselves of their constitutional right to be consulted on a question of such enormous importance. Therefore, for my part, I would urge the Government to stay their hand, and at all events to deal with the House of Commons with some degree of consideration, and, if they do make up their minds to proceed with this measure, let them proceed with it in such a way as is consonant with the usages of British parliamentary procedure.

Mr. MARTIN. I would just like to say, that while I would be prepared to vote for this amendment I would not like to agree with the first portion of it which suggests, that this Bill, if passed, would be absolute and irrevocable so far as the Parliament and the legislature is concerned. I regret very much that this motion should be moved at such an hour of the night that gives a person no opportunity of discussing such an important suggestion. I regret also that the motion should have to be moved after the House had been engaged for so many hours in the debating of a very important question requiring attention on the part of the members of the House. I would be very glad indeed to have an opportunity of stating why I do not agree with that statement of law, that the Bill is absolute and irrevocable; but I feel it would be trespassing altogether too much on the good nature of the House to attempt an argument at this late hour, and I cannot expect that the House would give attention to my argument. I do not feel physically in a position to take it up at this late hour of the night. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to protest against an important measure of this kind being forced in such a way, that it cannot be fairly and calmly, discussed and considered by the members of this House.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is that I do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee on the Bill.

Mr. LAURIER. For my part I have no objection that this motion should be carried, but I suppose the hon. gentleman does not intend to take up this important Bill at this late hour.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I propose only to go into committee.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. leader of the Opposition, whether there is any objection to passing the first clause?

Mr. LAURIER. Oh, certainly. That clause requires discussion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, as it was understood between the hon. gentleman and myself that we should only dispose of any amendments and go into committee, I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ADJOURNMENT—CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS FOR THE SOUDAN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire, now that the hon. Postmaster General is in his place, to repeat the question I put yesterday to the leader of the House, whether the Government are aware that the Princess Louise Hussars, of King's county, N.B., have volunteered for active service under the British Government on the expedition up the Nile, whether the application has been received, whether it has been forwarded to the British Government, either by despatch or by cable; if not, what has prevented it being forwarded, and what action the Government propose to take. I understand that this is the same company that volunteered in 1884 to go on the expedition up the Nile under Lord Wolseley; but its offer was received at the Home Office just a few minutes after the offer of the Australian volunteers, which prevented its acceptance. It is a cavalry company, 330 strong on a peace footing, and 600 odd strong when on a war footing. It must be gratifying to hon. gentlemen, that such an offer has been made, and gratifying to Canadians that our people not only talk about the unity of the Empire, but are prepared, in this practical way, to evince their faith in its unity.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I regret that, owing to my absence from the House, I have put the hon. gentleman to the trouble of repeating his question. I beg to state that the offer for service in the Soudan of the 8th Princess Louise (N.B.) Hussars, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel James Domville, was made on the 19th of March, 1896. A copy of the correspondence on this subject is herewith annexed. What the hon. gentleman has stated is quite correct, and will be found corroborated by the correspondence. I fully concur in what the hon. gentleman has said, that the offer by this Canadian regiment—one of the very best, so far as my recollection goes, among the cavalry regiments of Canada—of its services to England, shows the deep feeling which Canadians entertain to help the Empire whenever such action is called for. I will lay the correspondence upon the Table, so that the hon. gentleman can read it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman kindly inform me, whether the offer having been received, has been forwarded by this Government to the War Office, if so, whether by despatch or by cable, and whether there has been any answer ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot say whether it has been communicated, but I have no doubt that it has been communicated to the Home Office ; but I have not the information to enable me to say whether it has been replied to or not.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. MULOCK. I asked, yesterday, what the intention of the Government was with regard to certain recommedations respecting the Royal Military College. The hon. leader of the House asked me to renew the inquiry to-day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that the reply of Major General Cameron and the report of the visitors having but very recently come to hand, it is not proposed to consider that question until the return of the Minister of Militia ; but, in the meantime, I would call the attention of the Printing Committee to the importance of having these papers printed, so that they may be in the hands of every member of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 30th March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE, KINGSTON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to lay on the Table of the House papers with regard to the Royal Military College, Kingston. There appears to have been an inaccuracy in the former document laid on the Table of the House. There was a page omitted, and this correct copy takes the place of the other.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved :

> That all the papers laid on the Table of the House this session respecting the Royal Military College, Kingston, be printed for the use of members, and that Rule 94 be suspended in reference thereto.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have much pleasure in seconding that motion.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 89) to incorporate the Yukon and British Columbia Trading and Development Company of Canada, Limited (from the Senate).—(Mr. Corbould.)

HUDSON'S BAY CANAL AND NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. BOYD moved :

> That the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Hudson Bay Canal and Navigation Company.

Mr. DEVLIN. I would ask that this Bill be allowed to stand. I understand that certain changes have been made with regard to it in committee, and that they have not been printed ; and further, that the Bill has not yet been printed in French.

Mr. MARTIN. This Bill has been very much changed between its first introduction and as it now appears before the House, and I submit that the House should not go into committee as it now stands. In the first place, the Bill as introduced read as follows :—

> Whereas a petition has been presented praying for the incorporation of a company for the purposes and with the powers hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition ; Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—
> 1. Archibald Wright, Thomas C. Scoble, Nathaniel F. Hagel, Frank A. Fairchild, Hugh Armstrong, Richard Radcliffe Taylor, Josiah T. Robarts, George T. Orton, Edward D. Moore, Stewart Macdonald, William J. Boyd, Robert R. Scott, William Crawford, Colin Campbell, Richard W. Jamieson, David W. Bole——

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman is going to discuss the clauses in detail, I would point out to him that that is not allowable at this stage.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not pretend to discuss the clauses in detail.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is reading the clauses of the Bill now.

Mr. MARTIN. I am reading the whole Bill. I do not wish to discuss the clauses in detail. I wish to discuss the principle of the Bill, and for that purpose I wish to read the Bill as it was originally introduced, and the Bill as it is now before the House, in order to show the change in principle and not in detail. There are two principles in the Bill. The first one is a canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, and the second is that the incorporators wish to have control of all the rivers running into Lake Winnipeg. These are the two points I wish to discuss and not the details. It seems to me necessary, in order that the House should understand what the Bill is about, that I should read the Bill as originally introduced.

> —John A. Howard, Charles W. A. Kennedy, William Bathgate, Charles H. Allen, James Scott, William D. Douglass, Frank J. Clarke, John Dick, William W. Watson, Robert Gerrie, Alfred J. Andrews, Robert Rogers, Elias G. Conklin, James E. Steen, James C. Sproule, George H. Campbell and Thomas W. Taylor, together with such persons as become shareholders in the company hereby incorporated, are hereby constituted a body corporate under the name of the "Hudson's Bay Canal and Navigation Company," hereinafter called "the Company."
> 2. The head office of the company shall be in the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, or in such other place as is fixed by a by-law passed at any annual meeting or special general meeting of the shareholders of the company.
> 3. The company may improve and connect the waterways for the purposes of navigation and traffic thereon, between Lake Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay, by canals or otherwise, and may erect and maintain dams for the purpose of such canals ; and may in like manner connect and improve the navigation of any or all waterways tributary to Lake Winnipeg so as to secure continuous navigation on the same.
> 4. The company may impose and collect such uniform rates, tolls, fees and fines, upon all persons and corporations using the canals and improved waterways constructed or effected by the company, as may from time to time be fixed by the board of directors and approved by the Governor in Council, but such schedule of rates, tolls, fees and fines shall not be less than sufficient to realize to the shareholders ten per centum per annum upon the actual cost of the said canals and improvements.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would point out that the rule with regard to this question is as follows. Mr. Speaker Brand ruled, in reference to the discussion on the clauses of a Bill, on motion for committee :

> On the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,
> Mr. Biggar was proceeding to examine the Bill clause by clause, when
> Mr. Speaker said the hon. member was not in order in going through the Bill clause by clause on the motion that "I do leave the Chair." The discussion of the clauses was reserved for committee, and his remarks must be directed to the general principle of the Bill.

Mr. MARTIN. True, Mr. Speaker. I am not going through the Bill clause by clause.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is certainly going through the Bill clause by clause.

Mr. MARTIN. I am not discussing a single clause of the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MARTIN. Surely I can discuss.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MARTIN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that for the purpose of understanding the general principles of the Bill, we must know what the Bill is.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member may discuss the general principles of the Bill, and discuss the whole question if he chooses, but the rule is perfectly plain that he may not go through the Bill clause by clause.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not know how the general principles of a Bill can be set out better than by reading the Bill, and I do not understand that my hon. friend intends to do more than that.

Mr. SPEAKER. My duty is to point out what the rule is.

Mr. MARTIN. I must ask leave, Mr. Speaker, to appeal from your decision to the House. It seems to me that it is impossible to understand any Bill before this House unless a member has the privilege of reading it. I only wish to read the clauses ; I do not now wish to discuss them. I therefore beg leave to appeal from your decision.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope the hon. member does not intend to raise a question of such serious import as an appeal from the Chair. Hon. members on both sides are alike interested in having the rules of order strictly maintained by the Chair, and I am quite satisfied that both sides will look with great regret upon a motion of that kind from any hon. member.

Mr. LAURIER. I agree that it would be in a certain sense very much to be regretted if there should be an appeal from the Chair. But I was about to point out to Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Winnipeg states that he has no desire to violate the rule or to discuss the Bill clause by clause ; but that, in order to make out the arguments he intends to present, he must of necessity go over the general scope of the Bill. Under such circumstances, I think the hon. member should be allowed to proceed ; and if it is found that his discussion of the Bill is too detailed, he may perhaps be called to order. But when the hon. member protests that he has no desire to violate the rule, but that he cannot discuss the Bill without going over its whole scope, it seems to me that there ought to be some relaxation of the rule, even if there be some infringement of it, which I am bound to say there does not appear to be.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to call the attention of the hon. leader of the Opposition to the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg set out by objecting to this Bill because a number of its clauses had been altered in the committee.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. I did not do that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The ground the hon. gentleman took was the change this Bill had undergone, and in order to establish that change, he proposes——

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He proposes, as I understand, to contrast the Bill as it was originally with what it is now, which involves necessarily a comparison of the clauses. I hardly think the hon. leader of the Opposition appreciated that point, or he would have concurred in the view the Speaker has taken.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg is that he desires to read the Bill as it is. Mr. Speaker rules that an hon. member is not at liberty to discuss the clauses of a Bill on the motion to go into committee. I did not follow the rule closely when Mr. Speaker read it, to see whether it goes so far as to declare that a member cannot read a Bill without discussing it.

Mr. DEVLIN. Before this question is taken up, I would like to know what is to be done with the objection I raised to this Bill going into committee, that it had not been printed in French.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the Bill was not printed in French before the second reading, the objection might have been taken at that time ; but the objection that it has not been printed in French, or that the amendments have not been printed in French, or printed at all, cannot be taken at this stage. Of course, the hon. member for Winnipeg is quite within his rights in appealing from my decision. My mind is clear that on a motion to go into committee on a Bill, it cannot be taken up clause by clause.

Mr. LAURIER. I certainly should not desire to see an appeal taken from the Chair on this question. We should understand what the question is. My hon. friend states that he has no intention to discuss the clauses of the Bill. If he is going to do so, of course the ruling of the Chair should be supported ; but there is a misapprehension between my hon. friend and the Chair in that respect.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member pointed out, when he first rose to discuss this Bill, that he proposed not only to discuss the Bill itself, but the amendments made to it in committee. Of course, every hon. member must know that that is entirely improper at this stage.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to discuss the details of the amendments made in committee. But I wish to discuss the principles of the Bill. It relates to two things,—first, the construction of a canal between Lake Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay, and, secondly, the control of all the rivers running into Lake Winnipeg. The latter feature has been changed in committee ; but the promoters are asking control of Red River. These two points I wish to discuss ; but not the details, as to how the work is to be carried out.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is perfectly competent for the hon. member to discuss these two principles without going through the Bill clause by clause. At the same time, if the hon. member desires to appeal from my ruling, it is perfectly within his competence to do so ; and if he is disposed, I shall put the question whether the ruling of the Chair shall be maintained or not.

Mr. MARTIN. All I can say is, Mr. Speaker, that I am utterly unable to present this matter to the House in the manner in which I wish to do so, without reading the two Bills. Of course, at the suggestion of other members of the House, I will not proceed in appealing from your decision, although personally I believe I am correct.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MARTIN. I think I am in order in saying that. I find myself very much at a loss to go on with my argument under this system of procedure, and I have great difficulty in devising on the spur of the moment any scheme by which I shall make my argument understood by the House. However, I will do the best I can. This Bill, as originally introduced, provided for two things. The first was to build a canal and improve the waterways from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. Hon. members will understand that the waters of Manitoba and the territories have their outlet in Hudson's Bay. The North-west Territories are drained by the Saskatchewan River, with its various branches and tributaries. This river flows into Lake Winnipeg. Lake Winnipeg also receives, at its northern part, the waters of a number of other rivers. A smaller river called the Little Saskatchewan, connects it with Lake Manitoba. Lake Manitoba also receives various streams which water the province of Manitoba. Then, in the southern part of Lake Winnipeg there falls into it the Red River, which rises in the United States, drains a large portion of North and South Dakota and Minnesota, and, going northward, receives, at Winnipeg, the Assiniboia River, which drains, practically, the whole of the province of Manitoba and a large part of the North-west, contiguous to Manitoba. The Assiniboia joins the Red River at the city of Winnipeg, and the two flow down together into Lake Winnipeg. Then these waters all find an outlet from Lake Winnipeg into the Hudson Bay by various routes. There is the Nelson River, and south of the Nelson, the Hayes River. These two rivers communicate with Lake Winnipeg by means of various lakes and other waterways. Now, this company intend to connect Lake Winnipeg with Hudson's Bay by means of Hayes River, and the lakes and other tributary waterways, which are part of the system of the Hayes River. The intention of the company is to improve those rivers and lakes, wherever they require improvement, for the purposes of navigation, and in such portions of the territory, where the river is not navigable, to build canals. It is stated, I believe, by the company, that there will be about fifty-one miles of portages, which will have to be connected by means of canals. The rest of the distance is navigable, except that it requires more or less improvement. Now, I would say, with regard to that portion of the scheme, that the people of Winnipeg are heartily in favour of it. They would be very glad indeed to have a canal system from Lake Winnipeg to the Hudson's Bay. There has been, in that country, ever since I went to the province, and prior to that time, more or less agitation for the obtaining of an outlet by way of Hudson's Bay. This House is familiar with that feeling, because it has been crystallized into legislation here ; but, up to this time, that legislation has contemplated a railway as the connecting link between Manitoba and the Territories and Hudson's Bay. That railway system is based upon the same idea as the present scheme, namely, that it is practicable to carry on communications between Port Nelson or Fort Churchill on the Hudson's Bay and the markets of the old world. Of course that is the fundamental question. Unless navigation is practicable between Hudson Bay ports and Liverpool, the whole system, whether canal or railway, falls to the ground, because no capitalists would put money into either, unless it were demonstrated that navigation was practicable between Hudson's Bay and the ports of the old world. Well, on that question, there is a great deal of difference of opinion. I understand that the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), who has had very great experience, having been in charge of the Hudson's Bay Company, in one capacity or another, for probably thirty or forty years, is of the opinion that navigation is not practicable to an extent sufficient to warrant the investment of capital in any such enterprise, and his opinion is shared by a certain number of people. On the other hand, many of the people of Manitoba take the contrary view, and are firmly impressed with the belief that navigation is practicable and that if we had communication between Manitoba and the North-west Territories and the Hudson's Bay, the vexed question of cheap transportation would be solved.

An hon. MEMBER. Which view are you in favour of ?

Mr. MARTIN. Probably that will transpire before I get through. It is well known that this problem of cheap transportation is probably the most serious question with which we in the North-west have to deal. It has been accentuated very much, indeed, by the very low price which now prevails for wheat and other staples, wheat particularly ; and if it were possible to reduce the price of carrying wheat to the sea-board in the same proportion that the price of wheat itself has been reduced, the people of the North-west would be in a much better position to get along and make that country the prosperous, happy and great country, which no doubt it will be some day. But, unfortunately, the railway company claim that the rates which they now charge for carrying wheat out of that country are as low as the cost of taking the stuff out will permit them to charge, with any reasonable profit, and I must say, on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that they have, from time to time, met the petitions of the people, by reducing their rates upon wheat. The rates, however, are still very high, and really more than one-half the value of the wheat. Still, the position taken by the railway company is that they are not at present able to reduce their rates, and that it is not at all likely they will be able to reduce them. The Government, a year or so ago, appointed a commission to investigate this question of freight rates, and that commission reported that the freight rates charged in that country by the Canadian Pacific Railway were not unreasonable and compared favourably with the rates charged for similar distances in the United States. That report, to a certain extent, I suppose, is binding upon the Government, and upon this House, although I would like to say, with regard to it, that the people there are not at all satisfied with it. They contend that the Government did not appoint proper commissioners. One of these commissioners was Mr. Pierce, who is an officer of the Interior Department ; another commissioner was an officer of the Intercolonial Railway, and the third was another officer of the Interior Department, Mr. Allison. So all the commissioners were Government employees. It may be that their report is correct, still it is rather unfortunate that Government employees should be appointed to decide questions of so great importance. For it is generally understood there that the Government are favourable to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and do not enforce the law against them as strongly as they ought to do So, if it really is true that the present prices paid to transport wheat out of that country are as low as it is possible for the company to charge while making a reasonable profit, I say it is unfortunate that the commission was not composed of independent men, who were not under obligations, either to the railway company or to the Government. For it is charged that these gentlemen were under obligations, not only to the Government, but to the railway company. I do not know as to that, but that is the statement that is made. We have first the fact that the cost of taking stuff out of that country is very great indeed, nearly half the value of the wheat being paid for transportation. These commissioners have reported that the rates are not unreasonable, and, if that report is correct, these people must submit to these rates for the future, unless they can get some other outlet. That is the reason why the people of that country have, during all these years, been so much interested in the question of an outlet by way of Hudson's Bay. For that reason many attempts have been made to get a railway constructed to Hudson's Bay. In attempting to finance the building of a railway, as I have already explained, this question of the navigability of Hudson's Bay has been very much debated. Some years ago, the Government sent a steamer called the "Alert," under the command, I think, of Lieutenant Gordon, to those waters to investigate this important point. I have not Lieutenant Gordon's report at hand, but he reported very strongly against the navigability of Hudson's Bay. And I must say that that report has proved a very great hindrance to the raising of the necessary funds to construct the railway. Here was a Government expedition sent out, headed by an expert; and, after remaining there a season, they reported—speaking from memory, but I think I am correct—that during May, June and July there were large quantities of floating ice and that, practically, navigation was not open. I must say, however, that the promoters of the railway company have always claimed that that was not a satisfactory investigation. They have always claimed that the report really does not prove that these waters are not navigable, they still hold that they are navigable for a sufficient time to give a full opportunity for getting out the products of the country—but not during the same year; that is a feature of the case that I shall have to deal with. Since the "Alert" was sent up, and since Lieutenant Gordon made his report, many efforts have been made to induce this Government to send another expedition, better fitted up, to satisfactorily determine this question. The Government, however, have always neglected or refused to undertake this work, although I see now that it is announced that they do intend to send a vessel to these waters, but for the purpose of looking into the question of how far the Americans are violating the rights of Canada by their fishing there, and other questions of that kind, and that, in addition, this expedition will be charged with the duty of fully investigating the question of the navigability of the straits. But I understand that this expedition is to be gone some years, so that, whatever good it may ultimately do, it is not likely to be of any immediate benefit. I am glad that the Government intend to take this step. It is better than nothing at all. This project of a railway to Hudson's Bay was first put in the shape of incorporation, I think, away back in the year 1880, or perhaps 1881. Since then every effort has been made by the government of Manitoba, and some effort has been made by the Dominion Government, to get that railway constructed. A great many propositions have been made by the Government with the view to enabling the railway company to float this scheme. At one time a bonus of $1,000,000 was offered; at another time a guarantee of interest, I think at the rate of 5 per cent upon $4,500,000 of bonds. All these bonuses which have been offered from time to time by the Manitoba government, have elapsed by the effluxion of time. The most recent one, I think, was a bonus of $750,000. I may say that in all the bonus legislation of the province of Manitoba, with regard to the Hudson's Bay Railway, a condition was inserted that none of the bonus was to be available for the purposes of the company, unless, and until, the road was completed, and in operation from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. Apart from its being a railway connecting the country with the Hudson's Bay, the country which it passes through for a portion of the distance, something like 700 miles is not a country from which there is likely to be any local traffic; and that is the reason that the Manitoba legislature have always annexed to their offers of a bonus to the railway company, the important addition that none of the bonus shall be available until the road is actually completed through to the bay. Then I say the Dominion Parliament has done more or less to aid this enterprise. In the first place, shortly after the company was incorporated, a land grant was given to the company of 6,400 acres per mile, for the portion of the line inside of the province of Manitoba, and 12,800 acres per mile for that portion of the railway outside the province of Manitoba. Then, again, I think, in 1891, another bonus was offered by this Parliament. It was proposed to pay the company $80,000 per annum for twenty years, upon completion of 250 miles of railway. But there is this to be said with regard to this proposition, that it was most distinctly laid down by the Hon. Mr. Dewdney, Minister of Interior at that time, that the Government did not give this as a bonus to the Hudson's Bay Railway, but simply as a bonus to a colonization railway from Winnipeg northward 250 miles. The "Hansard" will show that Mr. Dewdney, on behalf of the Government, was very definite upon that point, and that he refused to endorse, so far as that bonus was concerned, the scheme as a railway to the Hudson's Bay. However, none of these offers have produced anything in the way of a construction of the road, except the forty miles to which I shall allude. Again, prior to the session of 1895, the present Government passed an Order in Council offering to give the sum of $2,500,000 to this company as a bonus for the construction of 250 miles, or $10,000 a mile, in return for which the Government were to take as security this other bonus of $80,000 a year for twenty years, and also, I think, the land grant. Now, that Order in Council was passed in accordance with a vicious habit of the present Government of passing Orders in Council without any authority at all, in order that Parliament might be bound. Now, I think Parliament should protest against that kind of thing. Of course, the Governor in Council has no power to pass an Order in Council of that kind ; the Governor in Council has no power to give a bonus to a railway company. Everybody understands that. And what was the Order in Council passed for ? For the purpose of pledging the Government's honour to give that bonus, so that when the question came into the House, unless the House was prepared to vote want of confidence in the Government of the day, the House would be bound to put through the bonus. That has been done in many cases, I am sorry to say. Land grants having been given to the company by Order in Council, without any authority whatever, when the question came before this Parliament, it came under very unfortunate circumstances. Unless the members of the House, in which the Government, at that time, had a majority of sixty or seventy—and I am sorry to find it has fallen now to eleven—unless that majority, composing a very large portion of the House, were prepared to give up their allegiance and oppose the Government, and put the Government in the position of having to repudiate their Order in Council, they were bound to pass it. However, Mr. Speaker, that Order in Council was passed under some other very peculiar circumstances ; and those circumstances were, that just about the time the Order in Council was passed, the Government decided to dissolve the House and have a general election. Of course, their object in passing the Order in Council was to influence the elections. Well, Sir, although the Government were pledged in that way, although they passed that Order in Council, a session of Parliament was duly held in 1895, and the Government failed, during that session, to lay before this House any legislation giving vitality to that Order in Council. This House has never been favoured with any explanation why it was that the Government failed to put upon the statute-book the provisions of that Order in Council. Eventually, almost at the close of the session, the Government did bring in a Bill with regard to the Hudson's Bay Railway. That Bill, instead of proposing to give a bonus of $2,500,000 to the Hudson's Bay Railway, proposed to divide the subsidy granted in 1891 into two portions of $40,000 a year each for twenty years ; it would give the company $40,000 for twenty years, provided they built 125 miles, and then give them the second $40,000 for twenty years if they built an additional 125 miles. But, Sir, there was this very strange proviso connected with that grant, that the Government could take it away from the Hudson's Bay Railway Company and give it to any company building a road up into the Lake Dauphin country in Manitoba. Now, that was looked upon by the people of Manitoba as an indication that the Government did not intend further to bonus or support a railway to the Hudson's Bay, because they took this power, I say, of giving it to another company, not as a Hudson's Bay Company at all, but simply as a colonization road, opening up a valuable portion of the province, the Lake Dauphin district, in which a considerable amount of settlement has already taken place, and which is without a railway. The Dauphin settlement is seventy miles distance from the Manitoba and North-western road, and the people are very much in want of a railway, and it is very desirable that the Government should aid them, if they are aiding any railway. But that is a different question from the necessity of diverting the bonus of the Hudson's Bay Railway to a railway of that character, because that would afford to Manitoba and the North-west an outlet on Hudson's Bay, which is a question of great importance, and the action of the Government with respect to that matter has always evoked great interest in that country. The Hudson's Bay Railway Company has never built any portion of the road. That, however, I must admit, is hardly a correct statement because in 1886 the company built forty miles of road from Winnipeg northerly. I am sorry to say, however, that the circumstances under which those forty miles were built were such as not to help the promoters of the road to finance their scheme to the bay, because the steel rails for the forty miles were obtained by the railway company from a steel manufacturing concern in England, and have never been paid for ; and every effort the railway company has made to float their scheme in London has been offset by the circulation of this fact, which had been made known to all financial houses in the old country, that the railway company were guilty of a most deliberate swindle in connection with the building of those forty miles. Those rails were obtained under false pretenses, they were put into the road, and have been lying there rusting ever since, but the unfortunate company from whom the rails were obtained have never been paid anything. Not only so, the contractors——

Mr. SPEAKER. I have listened to the hon. gentleman for a long time, in the course of which he has spoken of the Hudson's Bay Railway. I should like to know how the hon. gentleman is able to establish that his argument has any bearing upon the motion to go into committee on a Bill to incorporate the Hudson's Bay Canal and Navigation Company.

Mr. MARTIN. The bearing is this. I want to show how important this project is in connection with the Hudson's Bay scheme, and with a view to show how important it is to get that outlet, I am going into the history of what has been done in that direction as regards railway building. The project now under discussion is, I know, for a canal, but it is for the same purpose—to carry the produce of Manitoba and the North-west Territories out of the province and North-west by means of the Hudson's Bay route to the old country.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am unable to see the connection between the construction of the Hudson's Bay Railway and this canal, unless the hon. gentleman desires to argue that the passing of this Bill will retard the construction of the Hudson's Bay Railway.

Mr. MARTIN. I am speaking in favour of the Bill, which I wish to have passed. I am arguing as a reason for passing it that the people desire an outlet by way of Hudson's Bay, and I am showing what has been done during all these past years, how much bonus has been asked for, and I am now endeavouring to show that the province of Manitoba itself has actually invested $256,000 in this scheme. I consider both projects really one scheme. It is unimportant whether a canal or a railway is built, so long as the people obtain some outlet for their products by way of Hudson's Bay. Probably if the railway company had acted honestly they would have been able to induce the people of the old country to furnish the money with which to build the railway; but unfortunately the forty miles to which I have referred were constructed under circumstances that militated against the credit of the company, and I believe have prevented, in spite of the large bonuses which the Dominion of Canada and the local government were prepared to give to the scheme, the company successfully floating their bonds. In addition, there is the fact that they never paid for the steel rails which were put down over those forty miles of road, and there is the further fact that the contractors, Mann, Holt & Co. obtained a judgment for a considerable amount against the company for grading and other work of construction. There were appropriated by the province for the building of these forty miles provincial bonds for $6,400 per portion of the road constructed—it was never completed—did not cost, including the steel rails, more than $6,400 per mile. There was no fencing, no ballasting, the prairie was just turned up and the ties put down and the rails put down on the ties; I do not think it was even surfaced. But in spite of the fact that Manitoba handed over to the company over $256,000, or $6,400 per mile, of its bonds at 5 per cent, the contractors have a judgment for a very large sum against the company and the manufacturers of the steel rails have never been paid, and of course the road has never been operated. I understand the farmers have taken up the ties and burnt them for stove wood, I do not know whether they have taken away the steel rails or not, but the road has gone completely into disuse and the work done, of course, has been entirely lost. If it were desirable to use these forty miles, a large expenditure would be necessary to put the work in proper order so that it could be used. In view of these facts, it is most important for the interests of the North-west that if a canal is practicable a canal should be built, and I have from the first taken the ground that there should be no opposition offered to a company which would undertake the construction of a canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. The company itself have given more or less particulars with regard to the practicability of its scheme, and, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read some of the arguments put forward by the company in favour of their scheme. From this circular, I read as follows:—

> I should have mentioned that in addition to the railway companies which are projected to reach the bay, a new corporation is seeking a charter, and that is a canal, the building or constructing of a canal from Winnipeg to the Hudson's Bay by way of the Nelson River, or rather by way of the Red River and the Hayes River, which is parallel to Nelson River about 100 miles to the south of it. The route of this canal has been gone over during the last season by practical engineers. There has been what is known as a boat route for the Hudson Bay traders for the past hundred years and has been utilized by them for that purpose, and, therefore, is an interesting one and one that is perfectly practicable at a very small cost. I will read, as I think it is the first time that it has been brought before the public the report of the engineers that went over the route last year. They say:
> The proposition to connect Winnipeg with Hudson's Bay by the improvement of the existing waterways is neither novel or chimerical. The Red River of the north, flowing for 600 miles from south of the international boundary to its northern outlet on Lake Winnipeg, presents, with the lake, a navigable stretch of nearly 1,000 miles, broken only by the rapids on the Red River, a hiatus of not more than ten miles altogether. The Nelson, or Sea River, as the eastern branch of that river is called, is navigable for 38½ miles farther, to the point of departure on the proposed chain of communication. From that point north-easterly to Hudson's Bay, there exists navigable stretches of 320 miles, broken only by surmountable obstacles embraced in a total distance of less than 50 miles. The existing open channels are both wide and deep, and the banks are uniformly of sufficient height to admit of a greater depth of water by means of dams, where such are necessary, in order to group the rapids for canals and locks to overcome the descent. It is not proposed that a greater depth than seven feet of water shall be at present provided, as that would be sufficient to float barges of 500 tons capacity, such as recently have been constructed at Cleveland for use on the upper lakes and Erie Canal. These barges are of whaleback pattern, and are stated to draw 5 feet 6 inches water loaded.

The canal is exclusively a public highway, upon which all vessels have a right of way ; the tolls upon which are regulated by government in proportion to its cost and capacity. No combination can control the cost of transportation over its length, which depends upon individual vessel owners, and is regulated altogether by the number of vessels competing for the traffic. Unlike a railway, therefore, it cannot be operated for the sole benefit of the stockholders, and is essentially a public highway. Not only is it in itself an enormous factor in transportation, bringing goods at the lowest cost of transport, but by its very existence it exercises an immediate and dominant influence upon railway charges which must bear comparison with its rates. Canals do not obviate the necessity for railroads, but rather the contrary, as has been proved in numberless instances in both the United States and Europe. Where canals have first existed, railways have been built paralleling their route, competing for the traffic that the existence of the canal has created. It may be said, therefore, that canals create railways rather than destroy their usefulness.

This is the route that the report covers :

For over 100 years the traffic of the Hudson's Bay Company between Norway House and York Factory was carried on in flat-bottomed boats capable of carrying a load of four or five tons, with a crew of nine men. These boats draw from 3 feet 10 inches, 3 feet to 3 feet 6 inches of water when loaded, and are provided with a mast and square sail, like lighters, as well as with oars. When coming up a rapid current, a line is attached to the boat, which is pulled or tracked up by four men walking on the shore, while the remainder of the crew pull or pole the boat. These are locally known as York boats. Leaving the Sea River about three miles below Sea River Falls, on the downward journey by the loaded boats, which are unloaded and tracked up when going against the current, a small river emptying from Hare Lake is entered and followed for about 30 miles in an easterly direction until the waterway comes to an abrupt termination at the height of land known locally as the Painted Stone Portage, 29 yards in width, and with a summit of about 4 feet midway between the eastern and western channel. It is a curious fact that the existence of a wide and deep channel on each side of such a narrow elevation has not hitherto attracted remark, while it presents the singular phenomena of two full-grown rivers or waterways, and with a current setting eastward, and the other with a current setting westward, each apparently without reason for existence from any drainage area, and the head waters of both of which are practically at the same level. The western channel of the Echimamish (signifying in Cree " the river that runs both ways ") is followed through alternate wide and narrow channels for 20 miles until Robinson's Portage is reached, which is three-quarters of a mile in width, with a descent to Franklin Lake of about 45 feet, thence for 50 miles passing through a rocky gorge with a wall from 70 to 80 feet high, and several rapids across Pine Lake and Windy Lake to the channel leading into Oxford Lake, whereon four rapids and one fall of five feet obstruct the passage. Thence across Oxford and Black Lake by Trout River to Knee Lake, whence the route lies through Jack River, with five rapids, Swampy Lake, Hill River, Steel River, and Haze River to York Factory. In the downward journey it is necessary to haul the boat over three portages only, viz. : At the Painted Stone, 29 yards ; Robinson's Portage, 1,315 yards, and Trout River Fall, 24 yards respectively. In the upward journey there are 21 demi-charges or tracking places, where a portage of 40 yards must be made at Island Portage. The distance over this route from Lake Winnipeg to York Factory is stated by Thompson to be 372 geographical miles.

Now, that is the route that this canal is supposed to be constructed upon. I will now give the distances of this canal between Winnipeg and the Hudson's Bay. The distances along the line of route heretofore described are approximately as follows :—

	Miles.
Winnipeg (city) to foot of St. Andrews Rapids	16
Head of Red River navigation to Lake Winnipeg	26
Mouth of Red River to Warren's Landing (Lake Winnipeg)	270
Warren's Landing to Norway House	23½
Norway House to Winter Portage (Sea River)	15
Winter Portage to Molson's Lake	12
Molson's Lake to Inlet White Water River	22
White Water River	12
Echemamish and Robinson Lakes to Portage	12
Robinson Portage	¾
Franklin Lake to Portage	12
Portage between Franklin Lake and Lake Max	⅓
Lake Max to Pine Lake	11
Pine Lake and Channel to Windy Lake	10
Windy Lake and Channel to Oxford Lake	12
Oxford Lake and Jackson's Bay	24
Jackson's Bay to Knee Lake and Portage (3)	8
Knee Lake	40
Jack River	10
Swampy Lake	10
Hill River to the Rock	26
The Rock to York Factory	109

Totalling up altogether 681½ miles, the last 100 miles of which is navigable for boats drawing 7 feet of water.

The navigable stretches for canal boats and steamers of light draught without improvement are approximately as follows :—

	Miles.
Head of navigation on Red River to Winter Portage on Sea River	334½
Musketabaan Channel, Molson's Lake and White River to Fall	36
White Water River, Echemamish River and Robinson's Lakes to Portage	24
Franklin Lake to Portage to Lake Max	12
Lake Max, Pine and Windy Lakes, and intervening channels to the first rapids on Winnipinapis	27
Oxford Lake and Jackson's Bay	24
Knee Lake	40
Swampy Lake	10
The Rock to York Factory	109

That is 616½ miles ?

The distances which would require to be improved are as follows :—

	Miles.
Rock cutting, height of land, White Water Falls, Robinson Portage, Lake Max Portage, Winnipinapis River (two cuts), Mission Portage (3 cuts)	4½

Dredging, sand and marsh, Winter Portage Bay, Musketaboon, Robinson Portage, Pine River, Mission Creek and Knee Lake Creek and three other points	14
Improvement by dams and rocks, Red River, Jack River, Hill River and other points	46½

That is 51 miles altogether in the whole of that distance, requiring any improvement to make it navigable from the city of Winnipeg to the Hudson's Bay. I do not think that all of that requires canalling. It includes all the portions where obstructions have to be removed, such as blasting shoals and removing boulders. Of course, that opens up an entirely new field.

What I contend is, that a vessel should be sent up there, manned by Nor'-westers, who want to find out what the truth is, and not by people who, perhaps, do not want to see the bay opened up. We will get more information in that way. I will just read one extract—of course, we have had several extracts dealing with the question—from the evidence of James Ward :

This portion of the circular has reference to the navigability of Hudson's Bay, which, as I have already explained, is a sine qua non, without which it is of no use to build a railway or construct a canal. Unless it can be demonstrated that the Hudson's Bay itself is navigable for a sufficient portion of the year to enable the enterprise to be a commercial success, there would be very little advantage in trying to induce English capitalists to put their money into either a railway or a canal. With regard to that, this is the evidence of James Ward :

> Left Stromness on the 6th July, 1882, on the Hudson's Bay Company ship "Prince of Wales," reached York Factory in five weeks and three days, were 19 days reaching Resolution Island at the eastern entrance of Hudson Straits. It took us 17 days to get through the straits on account of calm weather and floating ice. A sailing vessel cannot push through the ice without a fair wind. We would not have lost two hours in a steamer. When we reached the eastern entrance of the straits, we met five American whalers. They took the south side of the straits while we took the north. They made the trip through the straits in about three days and met no ice. Our voyage was an exceptional one. Captain Hurd, who commanded the vessel, told me that was his 46th trip through the straits and he had never seen so much ice before. After reaching Mansfield Island, at the western end of the straits, it took us but three days to reach York Factory where we arrived on the 12th August. Hudson's Bay was clear of ice and as smooth as glass ; have often heard old employees of the Hudson's Bay Company say that the bay was clear of ice about the first of June. The ice begins to form on the shores of the bay about the first of November, but the bay and straits are open all the year round. There would be no use for the Hudson's Bay Company's vessels leaving before July as they expect to bring back cargoes of furs from York Factory gathered at various points in the North-west, and if they arrived sooner than August, these cargoes would not be ready. I wish to express my firm conviction as to the feasibility of Hudson's Bay navigation. We did not meet with ice all the way through the straits. The most ice was met from Resolution Island to Wegg's Island. Very little was met after passing that place. As regards which channel is the best no man can decide that. It depends on the wind. If the wind is from the north the north side will be the best ; if from the south the south side of the strait will be the best.
> I wish to state that the 17 days we were in the straits ice did not delay us all that time. From the time we made Resolution Island we had head wind. We would beat up against the wind until Resolution Island would be lost sight of, and the turn of the tide would carry us back to the island. The current in the straits is very strong, no difficulty met with only when the wind blows with the current. I am surprised how people can doubt the navigation of the bay or straits on account of the ice. Not one man that has come over that route but believes in its practicability. Manfield Island will be a good place for a lighthouse and station. There is a little lake of good water on that island.
> The day before we made land we were sailing through large shoals of white whales, they being so numerous that we could see them turning on the ship's bows. All the ice met with in the straits was hummock ice, which was so rotten that when the ship ran against it, it would break. I believe more ice will be met in the straits in July and August than in May and June.
> I was in Franklin Bay in August, 1865, and met a party of Esquimaux who had come from the Gulf of Boothia in canoes and boats. The ice set south about one month before they were able to travel by water.

> Note.—The Gulf of Boothia empties through Fury and Hecla Straits (latitude 70° N.) into Fox's Channel, and thence through Hudson's Straits.

Then, the pamphlet goes on to say :

The reason the Hudson's Bay vessels have always left so late is because there is no object in their starting sooner, because they have to take the return cargo of furs that are brought down to the coast, and, therefore, they have to wait until the rivers and lakes are open in order to get cargoes. I have given the evidence of one man ; I could pile up evidence of that character that would make it perfectly plain to all who are intent upon the developing of that route, that it was a practicable route for a considerably longer period than we are led to believe it is by the Government reports. Those reports themselves are contradictory. Captain Gordon's reports of his first trip were much more favourable than his reports of the second trip and it really looked as if the second trip was made for the purpose of counteracting any effort the first trip would have. We want to know more about the fishing, because we would be glad to supply the fishermen with flour and beef, if they would supply us with fish. That is the way the trade is developed, and mutual benefits are conferred. If this canal is practicable, it opens up an entirely new field, because the route passes through regions that may possess mineral wealth, that can only be developed where water communication is available. It may be the means of Nova Scotia sending coal to the heart of the continent, with water transportation the whole way to Winnipeg. Hon. gentlemen know perfectly well that the cost of water transportation is about one-fifth the cost of transportation by rail, and, when it comes to heavy freight, a canal would be a great factor in assisting us in the development of the North-west. We could bring Nova Scotia coal at the very lowest possible cost, so far as transportation is concerned, into competition with coal from the south and west. That is what we want. That is the life of any country—competition. We have to sell everything that we produce at competitive prices chiefly in the British market, and we want to be able to buy everything that we purchase at competitive prices. When we can do that, then we can rank with the progressists of the age, and our country will advance in national greatness and strength.

Then the circular goes on to deal with the question of the amount of grain that is sent out to that country, this being another argument for the necessity of having some other outlet than we now have by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway or the American railways or the Great Lakes :

A number of bushels of wheat delivered to the elevators at Fort William, were, according to the information received from the Canadian Pacific Railway, as follows :—

	Cars.
1892	12,430
1893	12,448
1894	16,055

Each car may be estimated at 600 bushels. All grain inwards is inspected.

Now, the figures for 1895 are not here, but I have no hesitation in saying that the export that year is double what it was in 1894. In that year, the Canadian Pacific Railway returned 6,055 car loads. Then the circular goes on to say :

So that from 1888 to 1894 the grain that passed through the elevator at Fort William, which is only a portion of the grain of that western country—some of it goes by way of Duluth and a great deal goes out in flour—increased from 4,000,000 to 11,000,000 bushels. The number of bushels loaded on vessels from the said elevators were :

	Bushels.
1887	1,980,653
1888	4,183,215
1889	3,191,702
1890	2,267,165
1892	6,628,055
1894	11,161,596

The Winnipeg Board of Trade report gives the following exports from 1886 to 1894 :—

Wheat (including Flour).

		Bushels.
Crop	(1886)	4,000,000
do	(1887)	10,500,000
do	(1888)	4,000,000
do	(1889)	4,500,000
do	(1890)	11,500,000
do	(1891)	14,000,000
do	(1892)	14,000,000
do	(1894) estimated	15,000,000

Of the wheat crop of 1894, there was exported from Manitoba in grain and flour 15,150,000 bushels, of which 11,480,000 bushels went via Buffalo. Of the crop of 1895, up to December 1st, out of 8,183,175 bushels exported, 4,862,000 went to Buffalo, and 3,321,175 bushels went to the mills in Keewatin and Ontario. It will thus be seen that Canada gets only the advantage of a short haul, and no benefit from the lake freight, as, owing to the coasting laws, the grain destined for Buffalo must be carried in American bottoms.

As to the crop of 1895, a prominent grain dealer says the estimate of the province is too small, and his buyers assure him that the wheat crop is fully 40,000,000 bushels, oats 25,000,000 bushels, and barley 6,000,000, and other grains and flaxseed 2,000,000, or a total yield of grain of 73,000,000 bushels, which, with the North-west Territories' grain, would give a total crop of 79 to 80,000,000 bushels. He considers even this to be a conservative estimate, which may possibly be increased, but is hardly likely to be lessened, when all returns come in. Of this crop the Canadian Pacific Railway has moved about 8,000,000 bushels, and has in its elevators 2,000,000 bushels, while in all the other elevators there is stored about 6,000,000 bushels, shipped by other railways 4,000,000 bushels, accounting in all for about 20,000,000 bushels, leaving one-half the wheat crop still in the hands of the farmers, with no immediate prospect of realizing upon it, and no possibility of selling their coarser grain.

The pamphlet goes on to say :

That, I think, is a fair and reasonable statement of the condition of the crop for this year. It shows also the diversion of a large quantity of grain from Canadian channels. In consequence of the Canadian Pacific Railway having reduced the all-rail rate on their grain five cents a bushel, from Fort William to Montreal, there has been a considerable trade this winter which has contributed largely to increase the exports of Canada during January and February over the corresponding months of last year. The reduction of five cents has made it possible for the people of the North-west to ship by the all-rail route, whereas if it had been maintained at the old rate, it could not have been done with profit by the western producers. It only shows you what competition will do. It increased traffic on the railway in January and February over the corresponding months of last year very considerably. If that reduction was only applied over the whole of the Canadian Pacific Railway system, the company would find that the volume of trade would more than compensate them for the reduction of rates. Here is a report from the Board of Trade which I should like to read. It covers very much the same ground, so far as the export of the crop is concerned. In 1886 the crop export was 4,000,000 bushels ; in 1887, 10,000,000 ; in 1888, 4,000,000 ; in 1889, 4,500,000, and so on, and in 1894 it was 15,000,000 bushels. Those are the exports which show the variation in the quantity of grain exported each year. Then I wish to show hon. gentlemen the climatic difficulties we have to contend with in addition to the difficulties of transportation there. I am not one of those who think we should be silent as to the difficulties that we have to contend with lest we might keep away intending settlers. The settlers who come there knowing the truth will be much better satisfied to stay than if they are induced to come by false promises or by hiding the whole truth, and therefore I do not wish any one to think or realize that we have not got our difficulties to contend with naturally, difficulties that may be overcome by changes of policy and system, introducing competition. Those are difficulties which may be overcome by our own will, but there are difficulties which > cannot be overcome, which are climatic and providential.

> I want to show the necessity for competition and the reduction of rates, and I want to show that we have climatic difficulties to contend with as well as the difficulties of monopoly. I want to show that in opening out that route there should not be a feeling of jealousy, because our grain is now going by New York instead of Hudson's Bay. And I want to remove from the minds of hon. gentlemen of this House the idea that they are going to be injured in any way by the deflection of the grain to the Hudson's Bay.
> I do not suppose hon. gentlemen in this House are yet prepared to endorse the Hudson's Bay scheme to the extent of supporting a motion that in the opinion of this House it would be expedient to develop the resources of the Hudson's Bay.
> I will not enlarge upon the question of the grading or the transportation of grain from Fort William or its diversion to Buffalo, and, of course, so far as navigation is concerned, I have said all that is necessary for me to say, so far as it is applicable to the question I have put before the Government.

Now that shows the nature of the scheme which is suggested by the promoters of this Bill so far as concerns their claims to a right to construct a canal and improve the waterways from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. It is very fortunate if it be true, that only fifty-one miles of canal construction is necessary in order to open up this waterway. As I have stated, I am in favour of that portion of the Bill, that is of granting to a private corporation the right to construct canals and improve these waterways, although, probably, these gentlemen will not be able to raise the necessary funds to develop the works they propose to take charge of, unless they can convince the investing public that Hudson's Bay and Hudson's Strait are navigable. There is an objection that has been very much urged against any of these schemes, and one that I suppose would apply to the same extent against the canal as against the railway, and that is that even granting that Hudson's Bay and Hudson's Straits are open long enough during the year to successfully carry on navigation, still it must be admitted that it is not possible to take out the grain the same year that it is grown. And though, as I have said, in Manitoba it very often happens that a very considerable portion of the grain is not taken out the same year, still farmers and grain dealers are always in the position to take it out that year if they see fit. If it were sent the other way, however, they would not have that option, but the grain would have to be stored in elevators either near the place of growth or at Fort Nelson or the other port, whatever it may be, through which this canal would go. Probably elevators would have to be erected at very great cost in which to store these immense quantities of wheat. And it has been urged, and I think it would be a matter that the promoters of this scheme would have to deal with in negotiating with investors, that it is a very great objection that the grain should be held over a winter. If a buyer were buying to ship by way of Hudson's Bay, he would have to calculate the price of wheat for the following season. It has been urged, it has been stated publicly by many wheat buyers, that it would be impossible to do that, that no wheat buyer could give the market price, say, in the fall of 1895, knowing that he would not be able to sell his grain until July or August, 1896. It seems to me that that phase of the subject will require very considerable explanation before capitalists will put their money into this scheme, as a scheme, for the purpose of taking out the wheat of Manitoba and the North-west. It may be that there is a complete answer to that objection. I hope there is. But surely it would be a very serious matter for a grain buyer in Manitoba to buy wheat at market price in one year knowing that he could not sell it until July or August of the following year when the new crop of India, the Argentine republic, Australia and many other wheat producing countries would be upon the market with the effect, possibly, of depressing the price. However, so far as the people of Manitoba and the North-west are concerned as I understand their views, they would be very glad indeed to help in every way they reasonably could any scheme for the purpose of obtaining another outlet for their products. This matter has been discussed frequently. It has been urged that the government of Manitoba should undertake to complete a railway connecting Manitoba with Lake Superior in order to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I mention that as an instance showing how strong the feeling is up there in favour of some additional outlet for that country, in view of the fact that the price of wheat has fallen to such a low figure that it really cannot be produced at very much of a profit. In a year like last year, when we had a very large crop, no doubt the farmers of Manitoba did very well. If they could be certain of a crop like that they could profitably engage in the growing of wheat. But we have to admit that the crop of last year was abnormally large. We cannot expect every year to obtain an average of 25 or 26 bushels of wheat to the acre as we did last year, but that the yield falls sometimes to an average of 14 or 15 bushels or even less. When the farmer gets only 40 cents or at the best 50 cents a bushel for his wheat, the question that faces him becomes a very serious one. The position is serious that the people there have had to consider very earnestly the question of going into other kinds of farming. I suppose it is fortunate that the attention of the people there should be directed to other means of obtaining a living, for it is not advisable that the farmers should stake their whole year's work upon one crop. However, that country is specially adapted to the growing of wheat. It can grow the very best wheat in the world. There is no part of the world where the quality is better than that grown in Manitoba and the Territories, and there is no part of the world where the quality is as good, except, possibly, the American states immediately south, Minnesota and North Dakota; in those states they grow the same kind of hard wheat that we grow. But, apart from that, there is no place in the world where as good a quality of wheat can be grown, and it would be a great misfortune to that region, and to the whole of Canada, if, on account of the great cost of transportation, the farmers were obliged to abandon the growing of wheat. We can grow immense crops every year of coarser grains, oats and barley, in that country, but no price can be obtained for them. When we have a big crop, as we had last fall, the price of oats and barley falls to such a low point that there is no profit at all in raising it. The reason of that is plain; it is the heavy cost of transporting these coarse grains to the eastern markets. I am told by persons engaged in brewing in the province of Ontario, that their supply of good malting barley is not sufficient at the present time from that province. Those portions of Ontario that formerly supplied a large quantity of good malting barley, are not supplying the same quality of barley that they used to. It appears that, after some years of growing barley in a particular locality, the quality deteriorates, and I am told that brewers are obliged to abandon the places upon which they have relied for the supply of barley in recent years, and to seek new places. There is no doubt that there is no place in Canada where barley can be grown so successfully as in Manitoba and the Territories, and a good malting barley, too. During these last years, when barley fell as low as it did up there, very considerable quantities have been imported into Ontario, and I am told, by a very prominent brewer, that the malting quality of the barley grown in Manitoba is considerably higher than that grown in Ontario. So, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of the greatest importance that the freight rates should be in some way reduced. We know that in England there is an immense market for malting barley. An experiment was tried in the province of Ontario, some time ago, at the instance of Sir John Carling, late Minister of Agriculture, with a view of growing two-rowed barley for export to the old country. That experiment was, unfortunately, not a success, but it has never yet been tried to any great extent in Manitoba and the Territories, for the simple reason that, even if it were possible to grow a satisfactory article of two-rowed barley in that portion of Canada, with the present freight rates, it would be quite impracticable to send it to England. I believe, from information I have, that two-rowed barley can be grown of the very best quality in Manitoba and the Territories, and, if you could send that two-rowed barley over to England, we would find a very large market for it, and it would become a very important article of export from that portion of Canada. But the trouble of the freight rates comes in again; so, Mr. Speaker, any proposition to afford competition with the present railway systems in that country, and especially a proposition to supply a canal upon which it is practicable to carry freight at much less cost than upon a railway, would be looked upon with delight by the people of that country. I am, therefore, in favour of the Bill, so far as that part is concerned. However, Mr. Speaker, this company is asking for privileges which are opposed very strongly by the people of Winnipeg, whom I represent here. They point out that it is necessary for the realization of their scheme that the Red River should be improved. I will admit that, if they construct their canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, in order that it may become fully effective, it would be necessary that the Red River should be improved. There is a place on the Red River which has often been heard of in this House, called the St. Andrew's Rapids, which, for the purpose of navigation, require to be overcome by a lock, or locks. Now, the proposition of the promoters of this Bill is rather an extensive one. They propose to carry through to Hudson's Bay not only the products of Manitoba and the Territories, but also the products of that great portion of the North-western States which is drained by the Red River on the north, and, in order successfully to do that, it would be necessary to have a complete system of navigation upon the Red River. I admit that, but I say that it is not absolutely necessary for the success of their scheme that they should improve the Red River. So far as Manitoba and the Territories are concerned, the navigation of the Red River is a matter of very little importance, as regards sending out their products by way of this water route. Wheat and other stuff would have to be brought to the Red River, or to Lake Winnipeg, by means of railways, and, if you have to put stuff upon a railway at all, it would be just as cheap to carry it to Selkirk, to the mouth of the Red River, or to a point a few miles from where the Red River enters into Lake Winnipeg, as it would be to bring it to Winnipeg, or any other point upon the Red River, and this will apply to all that great portion of territory which is not tributary to the Red River. The amount of wheat that is grown in the valley of the Red River is comparatively small; the great bulk of it is grown in the western part of Manitoba and the North-west Territories; so that, as I say, it would be necessary to convey wheat from different portions of the province and the North-west Territory to Lake Winnipeg by means of railways; and, if you are going to put your wheat upon the railway, you might as well take it 15 or 16 miles further, and the railway company would charge no more. In fact, for a very considerable portion of the province, probably, Selkirk would be nearer than Winnipeg, because, if this scheme were successful, and a canal were actually constructed and operated new railways would, no doubt, be built, connecting different parts of Manitoba with Lake Winnipeg. If that were not done, if railways were not built through the province in connection with this water route, it would be largely ineffective. That has always been one objection to the Hudson's Bay Railway itself; it has always been pointed out, with regard to the Hudson's Bay Railway, that it could not compete successfully with the Canadian Pacific Railway and with the Northern Pacific in carrying wheat out of the country, unless it were in a position to go practically to every farmer's door, as other railways do at the present time. If you had to place the wheat, say, at Brandon, carrying it on the Canadian Pacific Railway to Winnipeg or Portage la Prairie for the Hudson's Bay Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would charge local rates on the wheat, and that would practically prevent the Hudson's Bay Company carrying the wheat at any such rate as the Canadian Pacific Railway itself would charge to Montreal or Fort William. So that is another matter which has to be dealt with in considering the question of the construction of a railway to Hudson's Bay, and that matter has to be considered by the railway company. And the company proposed to build several branches from the mouth of the Saskatchewan into Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Of course, it would be very expensive to attempt to parallel the different railways now passing through Manitoba and the Territories, in order to have a railway go right to the doors of the farmers where the wheat is grown, and the same argument would apply to this scheme. Unless the canal company had railways of its own running through Manitoba and the Territories to gather up wheat to carry by that route, the Canadian Pacific Railway would be able to charge such local rates on the wheat sent by their lines to Winnipeg as would prevent the Hudson's Bay Company sending wheat by that route.

Mr. BOYD. Is that why you are opposing the Bill ?

Mr. MARTIN. I am not opposing it ; I am in favour of it.

Mr. BOYD. Do not be in a hurry.

Mr. MARTIN. While I admit that it would be advisable for this canal company to make improvements in Red River, as a portion of their scheme, it is not all essential to their scheme to have that power ; and if the improvements of the St. Andrew's Rapids on the Red River were not desired for any other purpose, there would be no objection to this company obtaining the privilege they are asking with respect to those rapids. But the people of Winnipeg for many years have been agitating for the improvement of the St. Andrew's Rapids for other purposes. That is where the desire of the people there comes in conflict with what is asked by this company. They hold that the St. Andrew's Rapids should be improved by the Government, that it is purely a Government work, and they have been urging upon the Dominion Government—they urged it upon the Mackenzie Government—to take charge of this work and improve the rapids. The Mackenzie Government did not take action. Since 1878, year after year, the people of Winnipeg have urged in every way within their power the advisability of having this work undertaken as a public work by the Government. The Government have made many promises. They have assured the people, especially at election times, that Canada would take charge of this matter. These promises have all been broken, the Government have never taken charge of it. I see it now announced in the Winnipeg Conservative papers that the Dominion Government are going to take up this important work; but again this announcement is made when elections are at hand. I hope it is not merely an election announcement, but that the Government intend to do something in that direction, because that is what the people want ; and why they want it is that in their opinion there would be a very large and profitable trade between Lake Winnipeg and the city of Winnipeg, if navigation were opened between those two points. The nature of the St. Andrew's Rapids is such that no boats of any considerable capacity can pass down from Lake Winnipeg to the city of Winnipeg, except at the highest water ; so the rapids afford, practically, a complete obstruction to navigation. The reason the Dominion Government has, up to the present time declined to take hold of this work is its excessive cost. Some years ago a Government engineer was detailed for the purpose of preparing plans and specifications for the work. An estimate was made, and I think the sum required was placed at $900,000. So far, the Government have thought that this is too much to expend on improving that navigation. However, an engineer connected with the city of Winnipeg has also made a plan of the improvement and has estimated the cost at $450,000, and that estimate, of course, very greatly removes the objection raised by the Government. The principal article that it is expected will be brought from Lake Winnipeg to the city, is firewood. This is a very important consideration in the province. It is thought by many persons that as Manitoba is a prairie country, we have no timber there. There is a very large quantity of timber in the country ; the only difficulty is as to its distance from Winnipeg, and the heavy cost of transportation by railway. There is a very large quantity of timber suitable for firewood between Winnipeg and Rat Portage, and an immense quantity is brought into Winnipeg by the Canadian Pacific Railway from the east. A large quantity is also brought from south of the Assiniboia River, in the neighbourhood of Portage la Prairie; the timber there is principally poplar and oak, and it is carried into Winnipeg over the Northern Pacific. The excessive cost of transportation is shown by the fact that cordwood, which is sold in Winnipeg at $6 and $7 per cord, can be purchased in Portage la Prairie at from $2.50 to $3. It is believed by those who understand the question, that the market for firewood in Winnipeg could be entirely supplied from Lake Winnipeg at $2 per cord less than the present price. Wood would be largely substituted for coal, which is now very expensive, the hard coal having to be brought from Pennsylvania, and the soft coal from Lethbridge or the Souris district, which latter coal is of a very inferior quality. Besides that, the fisheries of the lake could be developed. Immense quantities of the very finest of whitefish are caught in Lake Winnipeg, and if navigation is improved there, the fish could be more easily brought to the city market. On the shores of Lake Winnipeg, and on some of the islands, there are large deposits of iron ore, and it has been found impossible to develop the iron industry there because of the difficulty of getting the ore to the smelters in the United States. Arrangements were almost complete some years ago for establishing a blast furnace at Fargo, and if the St. Andrew Rapids had been improved so that navigation had been complete from Lake Winnipeg down to Fargo, these vast deposits of iron ore could have been developed.

Mr. LISTER. What kind of iron ore is it?

Mr. MARTIN. It is magnetic iron ore. There is no doubt but that large quantities of it exists there, and there is one island, that is supposed to be entirely composed of this iron ore.

Mr. BOYD. Do you think there is any brass on it?

Mr. MARTIN. Marquette's representative has nothing else to recommend him but brass.

Mr. BOYD. If that is true, then, as the Irishman says, we can touch thumbs about it.

Mr. MARTIN. There are other industries which might be developed upon that lake, and if it were not for taking up the time of the House at too great length I should refer to them. I do not desire, especially at this stage of the session, to delay the House unduly. However, from the items I have mentioned, it will be seen that the people of Winnipeg are quite justified in taking the great interest in this matter which they have taken for years past. Every member who has represented that city in this House, since I first went there, has brought the question before Parliament. Col. Scott was elected member for Winnipeg in 1882, I think, and he urged upon Parliament the necessity of granting sufficient funds to complete this work. Mr. W. B. Scarth who succeeded Col. Scott in 1887, was well acquainted with the wishes of the people upon this matter, and on various occasions it became his duty to introduce large and influential delegations to different Ministers of the Crown who happened to pass through Winnipeg, and which deputations asked for the aid of the Government for this public work. Mr. Scarth brought up this matter in the House several times. In 1891, Mr. Scarth was succeeded by Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, and he urged the completion of the construction of this work very strongly upon the Government. I am sorry to say that while Col. Scott, and Mr. W. B. Scarth, and Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, were very warm supporters of the Conservatives, which unfortunately for Canada were in power from 1882 to 1891, and are even at the present time apparently in power; these gentlemen were unable to obtain anything more from the Government than illusory promises in regard to this matter. Well, Mr. Speaker, when this Bill was read the second time in the House, I sent a copy of it to the Winnipeg Board of Trade, and also to the Winnipeg city council, because while it appeared to me there were serious objections to it, I did not feel like taking the responsibility of opposing the Bill unless I knew that I had with me the feeling of my constituents. The board of trade called a meeting of their executive, and considering it a question of very great importance, the executive called a special meeting of the full board to consider the matter. As I suggested to them that time was pressing, and that the matter would be up in the Railway Committee, the board sent me the following telegram after their meeting:—

> Winnipeg, March 4th.
> The board heartily endorse project of constructing waterway, Emerson to Hudson's Bay, but cannot sanction sweeping privileges asked by company in connection with the control of streams flowing into Lake Winnipeg, or powers connected with disposition of stock. Our opinion is, that the opening of navigation from the city to the lake is a work that should be undertaken by the Dominion Government, and privileges secured by such work made free to all and uncontrolled by private corporations.
> (Signed) CHARLES M. BELL,
> Secretary.

Then, I received the following telegram from the city council:—

> Winnipeg, March 3rd.
> The following resolution adopted by Winnipeg City Council this afternoon re Hudson's Bay Canal Bill:
> "That while this council appreciates the fact that the improvement of Red River is most > important to the city of Winnipeg and greatly to be desired, they believe that the work should be carried out by the Government and not by a private corporation, unless the greatest care be taken to safeguard the rights of the public; and while they wish the promoters of the scheme of constructing a waterway to Hudson's Bay every success, they think, Parliament should not grant any exclusive rights or privileges unless the Government have the right to take over such improvements at actual first cost, as a public work if it should be thought advisable, and unless Parliament protect the public by imposing proper limitations upon tolls and charges without regard to dividends, and also that the Government's approval be requisite for plans of all works, and not merely those named in section 7. Section 5 is indefinite. Section 8 should provide for city's consent as to tramway in limits.

> R. W. JAMESON, Mayor,
> C. J. BROWN, City Clerk."

It has been contended that the telegram from the city council is not opposed to this Bill; but there can be no question at all what the board of trade think. Their telegram is distinct, clear and definite, as to the board being entirely opposed to the handing over the exclusive control of any portion of Red River to a private company. The city council take precisely the same view. They object, just as strongly as the board of trade do, to a private company having the right to take charge of the improvements of St. Andrew's Rapids, and charge whatever tolls they like. They suggest that the public interest must be protected, and one of the ways of doing that is to have the tolls fixed by the Government without regard to dividends. Of course, that is entirely destructive of the proposition that the work should be constructed by a private corporation. No private corporation would put its money into a public work if the Government were to be allowed to fix the tolls, entirely irrespective of what the work had cost. In order to induce capitalists to put their money into this scheme, they must be allowed to take sufficient tolls from the vessels passing through the locks to pay interest on the investment. That is clear. It would be absurd to suppose that any company would take hold of the work unless they had that privilege. But the people of Winnipeg do not want that. The council say: "We must have the use of that canal at such tolls as the navigation can afford to pay—not at such tolls as the company may desire to charge for the purpose of paying dividends." My objections to this Bill would not be nearly so strong as they are if such provisions were inserted in the Bill as would eventuate in the tolls being fixed on that basis. As it is, the tolls are to be fixed by the Governor in Council; but it would be unreasonable to ask the Governor in Council, after the company put their money into the work, to fix the tolls at a rate that would destroy their capital. It is not to be expected that they would do that. So that to all intents and purposes the two telegrams are precisely the same. I may say that, in addition to these telegrams, I have received a number of letters from gentlemen of high position, who are largely interested in the city of Winnipeg, urging me to oppose this portion of the Bill. And it does seem to me that the omission of this portion of the Bill would not in any way affect the company's real scheme. Look at the title of the Bill. It is a Bill to incorporate the Hudson's Bay Canal and Navigation Company. That does not suggest improvements on the Red River; so that the company could go on and build their canal and improve the waterways from Lake Winnipeg to the Hudson's Bay without necessarily for that purpose having any control of the Red River at all. But they insist upon the control of Red River, which makes me think that their scheme is not a scheme for building a canal from Lake Winnipeg to the Hudson's Bay at all, but a scheme for the purpose, in this roundabout way, of getting control of that improvement on the Red River. That is what I suggest, and I think all the circumstances lead to that conclusion. It is admitted on behalf of these gentlemen that they have not the money to go on with the work. They propose to borrow the money. It has been announced that the Government of Canada intend, at last, to do something with St. Andrew's Rapids. Past experience would probably induce us to think that that promise was perhaps made in view of the election. I prefer to be more generous to the Government—more credulous, an hon. gentleman suggests. I will not put it in that way. I prefer to believe that the Government intend to do something with St. Andrew's Rapids, and I believe that is what this company think. They think that the Government, under the pressure that has been brought to bear upon them, realizing that they have lost Winnipeg from some cause or other, and that one of the causes is perhaps their failure to carry out the many promises they have made in regard to that work, have at last waked up to the idea that they have to be a little more honest and straightforward with the people of the North-west if they are to get any support from that country in the next election. This company have perhaps come to that conclusion, and they come here and apply for a Bill in order that they may get control of this work. But the fear of the people of Winnipeg is that they will get the control of the work, and that when the Government come to take charge of it, and to construct it as a public work, if they decide to do so—and I hope that if the present Government do not, the next Government will—they will be on hand with their chartered rights and with a certain amount of money expended, and will have to be dealt with and got rid of before the Government can take hold of the work. Of course, I am not at liberty at this stage of the Bill, to discuss the limitations or the conditions which have been proposed by the Government, and which are embodied in the reprinted Bill, with a view of keeping certain control over this work. You can make those conditions just as strong as you like, you may hedge them round in every possible way, it will be found, as it always has been in matters of this kind, that the Government will get the worst of it. If you allow a company to get franchises and privileges, when you come to take away that franchise and those privileges, you have to pay for them. That has been the experience of Canada from its inception to the present day. You have got to pay for these things, if you want to take hold of them as a Government; and, no matter how carefully you work out the details—and I do not think they are worked out very carefully—even supposing they be improved in Committee of the Whole, and put in such a shape as, apparently to insure against this anticipated evil, you will find, that, when the Government come to take charge of the work, they will be confronted by this company with an enormous bill.

Again, it has been suggested that, instead of taking hold of this work and constructing it as a public work, the Government should give a bonus to some private company for the purpose of constructing it. Now, it may be that the company think that that is the course which will be ultimately adopted. I have very serious objections to that course. I do not believe it would be satisfactory at all in the interests of that country, which is urging the expenditure of this public money. But it may be that the company think that the Government will pursue that course, because it has been announced in newspapers, supporters of the Administration, who are supposed to foreshadow the action of the Government. One of them, the "Nor'-wester," of Manitoba, which is said to be the special organ of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), has said, I believe, that it is the intention of the Government to fulfil its obligations to the citizens of Winnipeg by granting a bonus to some private company; and it may be that this company rely on this course being adopted, and that, if they get this charter, it will be simply a matter of a little political influence to get their plans approved of by the Government. If they get hold of the right man to send down here to interview the Government, they can probably arrange to have their plans approved of; and, once the plans are approved of, the company will be in a position to receive this bonus, if the Government adopt that system of acquiting themselves of that obligation, which they admit they are under, on account of the very numerous promises which they have made to the people. I say that this is most objectionable and against the interests, not only of the city of Winnipeg, but of the surrounding country, to get any rights there at all. If, after this canal is constructed and it is demonstrated that the products of the North-west can be taken out by way of Lake Winnipeg to the Hudson's Bay, and that navigation of the Hudson's Bay is practicable, and if, after these other difficulties to which I have referred, have been removed, the Government has not already improved St. Andrew's Rapids, I do not think any one would object to a franchise being given to this company. I may say that, at first, the company wanted to get a great deal more than they are now asking. They wanted to get control of the Red River and of all the rivers that fall into Lake Winnipeg, including the Saskatchewan, with which I, individually, am not very much concerned, because the Saskatchewan is a long way from my constituency, and, in fact, scarcely goes through the province I come from. But that project was abandoned by the Government. The company also proposed to have rights on the river connecting Lake Manitoba with Winnipeg, but that, too, was abandoned. They also proposed to have rights on the Winnipeg River, a very important river, which connects Lake of the Woods with Lake Winnipeg, but that was equally abandoned; and now they have come to this one question, which is, after all, the most important of all, from the standpoint of the people of Winnipeg. There is no opposition to the Bill, if the company would be prepared to leave out, for the present, any rights in connection with St. Andrew's Rapids. If the people of Winnipeg could be sure that no rights or franchises were given to this company which would prevent the Government of Canada improving the St. Andrew's Rapids, then our opposition to this Bill would disappear, and the people of Winnipeg would give all the support and encouragement to the company which they could possibly expect, so far as the main proposition is concerned, namely, the building of a canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, because I believe that the people of Manitoba have lost all confidence in the Hudson's Bay Railway ever being constructed, so long as it remains in the hands of those who at present have it in charge, but I believe, also, that the general feeling is in favour of a road to Hudson's Bay. I must say that the extracts from Senator Boulton's speech, which I have read, and which have been circulated by the promoters of this Bill as a reason for passing it, show that there are strong reasons to suppose that a practical scheme can be carried out from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay; and, if such canal can be built, the necessity for a railway would not be so great, although, of course, a railway could run in summer, as well as in winter, while the operations on the canal would be confined entirely to the summer season. But, as I have already pointed out, a railway could not take the grain out the same season, so that, in that respect, a canal would be quite as effective for the purposes of the country as a railway. Then there is this great advantage of a canal over a railway that, in all probability, they would be able to charge much lower rates. The only object of building a railway to Hudson's Bay is to afford competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and reduce freight rates, and if these rates were not reduced not only on wheat, oats and barley, but on cattle as well, it would not accomplish the purpose that the people of Manitoba have in view. We must remember that it is 700 miles from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, and that after the first 200 miles there is not any means of affording local traffic, and never will be. I may be misinformed as to that country, but all that I have read or heard of it leads me to believe that west and north of the boundary line of Manitoba, is a barren country, with swamps and rocks and sterile land. If a railway has no local traffic, how can it give low rates on through traffic ? That is a very important consideration. There was a time in Manitoba when it was considered a sort of treason to discuss the question of the Hudson's Bay Railway. Whether there was any reason in the scheme or not, you must uphold it. But the attitude of the people on that question has changed. They are just as desirous of having a railway to Hudson's Bay as ever they were, and even more desirous of having competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway than ever before. But they insist now that in discussing this question all phases of it shall be considered, and this that I have suggested is certainly a phase calling for serious thought. At what rate will the railway people take the grain of Manitoba to Hudson's Bay ? Can they take it at such a rate as added to the rate from the Hudson's Bay port to Liverpool will be less than is now given by the Canadian Pacific Railway to Fort William, by steamer to Buffalo, and by canal or railway to New York. For we must recognize the fact that for some reason or other—some people blame the Government for it ; I am prepared to blame the Government for almost anything, but whether this is the Government's fault or not, it is, nevertheless, a fact—nearly all the grain sent by the North-west to Liverpool goes via New York. It is not carried in Canadian vessels ; in order to get to Buffalo it is necessary that it should be shipped from Fort William, in an American vessel. Then we must consider another question, Mr. Speaker. While the distance from Port Churchill or Fort Nelson to Liverppol is a great deal more than it is from New York to Liverpool, in all probability it will be necessary to have specially constructed steamers for the traffic on the Hudson's Bay route.

Mr. WELSH. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. If that be so—and I have no doubt the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) could throw considerable light upon that question—we can hardly expect to get as low a rate from Fort Churchill to Liverpool as we do at present from New York to Liverpool. I understand that you can get a much lower rate from New York to Liverpcol than from Montreal to Liverpool, the reason being that there are at all times large numbers of tramp steamers that seek that port in hopes of doing business there. I would ask hon. members who are familiar with shipping matters if that is not the case.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MARTIN. At six o'clock I was alluding to the important fact that has to be considered in this problem, that is, the enhanced cost of transportation from Hudson's Bay ports to the markets of the old world on account of the necessity of having specially constructed steamers to navigate that inland sea, and on account of the prevalance at all seasons, so far as I can understand the reports, of more or less ice in the straits ; and also owing to the fact that on account of its situation, it is not at all likely that there will be any such vessels plying to Port Nelson or Port Churchill, and trade would have to be carried on exclusively by a single line of steamers which the railway company, as originally incorporated, proposed to provide. While that is an argument that applies not only to the railway but also to the canal scheme, the other objections that has been made with regard to the long haul on the railway, and the lack of local traffic, would not apply so much to the canal scheme as they do to the railway scheme. I think that is an advantage in connection with the scheme as put forward by the promoters of this Bill, because it appears to me that if the facts are as they allege, and if it is an easily practicable scheme to construct canals and improve the waterways so as to obtain communication direct from Lake Winnipeg by canal boats into the Hudson's Bay, then I think it must follow that the freight rates would be less upon a waterway of that kind than they are by the other route which is at present taken by the products of the North-west when transported to the markets of the old world ; so that I think the advantages of this scheme are quite evident. Therefore, while I am strongly in favour of the principle of the Bill asked for, I am sorry that it has been coupled with a demand for franchises and privileges so utterly subversive to the rights of my constituents that I am obliged to oppose this scheme. If the promoters were willing to drop their franchises upon the Red River, or rather postpone the obtaining of those franchises until later on, I would be very glad ; however, they have seen fit to adopt the other course, and have insisted upon there being included in the Bill the right or franchise of improving the Red River. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care in what part of Canada it might be, I submit to this House whether it is a proper principle to adopt to hand over the control of any of the natural waterways of the country to a private corporation. I submit that that is a principle that has not been adopted in the past by this Parliament. Where a river or other navigable water required works for the purpose of improving it, where that river was of sufficient importance to justify it, in all cases the work has been done by the Dominion Government, and the moneys have been voted by the Dominion Parliament. I believe that in any other part of Canada a proposition to take away from the people agreat natural highway like the Red River would be resented as strongly as the people of Winnipeg resent the proposition to hand over the complete control of the Red River to this private corporation. The people of Winnipeg are interested more especially in that portion of the Red River to which I have referred, the St. Andrews Rapids, but this company really expect to control the whole river. They ask special power to improve some four or five places between Emerson and Winnipeg, in addition to the St. Andrews Rapids. If this charter is passed, and if the company go on with the works authorized under this Act, they would have absolute control of the Red River, they would be in complete possession of the most important river in Manitoba. There exists an additional fact to be noticed, that this company is not only a canal company, but it is a navigation company, and they take power in the Bill to build and purchase ships and boats. If this charter is allowed to go through and they actually build and improve the St. Andrew's Rapids with the vote which they expect, the large bonus from this Government, they will be in a position to drive every other navigation company off those waters, to control entirely the navigation between Lake Winnipeg and the city of Winnipeg. If, as I have suggested, it would be possible, when navigation opened, to deliver cordwood in the city of Winnipeg $2 a cord less than the present price, considering the large amount of cordwood that is required in the city of Winnipeg at present, without taking any account of the increase in the future, which is likely to be large, judging from the past, I say it would be a great monopoly, a very valuable monopoly, to get the absolute control of the Red River as this Bill proposes to give to this company. In answer to that it may be suggested that the Governor in Council have power to fix the rates. I attach no importance whatever to that. Mr. Speaker; I consider that is no benefit at all in the direction to which I have alluded. But it would be a hopeless task for the people of Winnipeg, or any people along that route who were satisfied with the tolls authorized by Order in Council in connection with those works, to appear before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to protest against high tolls. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council certainly would ask such protestants whether the present rates would give undue profits to the company, and the company would probably be able to show that the rates did not give undue profits to the company, but stilll those rates might be so high as to give this company an absolute monopoly of the navigation on that river, because they could exact the full amount of tolls from the boats of every company or private individual, and give their own boats such a reduced rate of tolls as to enable them to make a paying trip, and the loss they might sustain on the capital invested in the improvements could be easily met and largely overcome by the monopoly of this trade which they would obtain. They would have the whole matter in their hands, and have practically a monopoly of supplying Winnipeg with cordwood, because if the facts I have stated are correct, they could cut below prices which have to be obtained on account of freight rates, and they could stop the importation of wood into Winnipeg over the Canadian Pacific and Northern Pacific. They could keep the whole business in their own hands and make such large profits out of it as would enable them to meet any moderate loss they might incur from their investment at St. Andrew's Rapids. So it is most unfortunate for the city of Winnipeg that the scheme should be encumbered with projects of this kind and I am inclined to believe that the company did not, bona fide, intend to construct a canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, but they hope and expect, by putting forward such a scheme, to get hold of privileges and franchises of an exceedingly valuable character on the Red River, much to the detriment of the city of Winnipeg. This is the reason why I oppose the Bill, and why I urge that the Bill should not be passed by this House. There never has been a case where a Government of a country or the government of a municipality have handed over to private persons valuable privileges and franchises and have not seen the time when they regretted their action. We find natural monopolies handed over, monopolies which should be retained by the Government or the municipality in the interest of the people, so that when they became exceedingly valuable on account of the growth of the city or the country, the value that attaches to those privileges and franchises may accrue to the people at large instead of an interested few. That is a principle which has been demonstrated in the history of Canada and the United States time and again. Under these circumstances, the people of Winnipeg will scarcely be blamed for being desirous of conserving these interests for their own use and the use of their children, and the new-comers we expect in such large numbers in that country when we get a Government in power that understands how to deal with the question of immigration, and does not throw away the public money as does the Minister of the Interior. When that immigration comes and Winnipeg grows to the proportions which it should have reached long years ago, a city with a population of one hundred thousand, a growth which it would have reached except for the iniquities of the Government franchises like this under discussion will possess great value. Why, then, do the Government allow a private company to come here and secure privileges of this kind. I know that the telegrams I read to the House this afternoon from the Board of Trade of Winnipeg and from the city council were also sent to the Minister of Railways, but in spite of those protests from Winnipeg the Government propose to allow this Bill to go through in its present shape, and hand over this monopoly to this company. Hon. gentlemen opposite seek to palliate that offence to a certain extent by urging that there are provisions in the Bill which would protect the rights of the public. I am not permitted to discuss what those provisions are, I do not care what they are; I say that the experience of the past shows that you cannot bind these companies and corporations, that when it comes to an issue between a corporation and the Government, the people represented by the Government always get the worst of it, and we cannot rely on any provision on any provision in a company's Act. The only way we can protect a great public work or franchise, such as navigation rights on the Red River, in order to secure the benefits to the people at large is to refuse to give the Hudson's Bay Canal and Navigation Company, or any other private company, any privileges whatever upon that river. I would go this far: I would refuse to give those privileges even if that action were destructive of the whole scheme, because I consider them of sufficient importance to justify that step. Fortunately, it is not necessary to go that far. It is not necessary to destroy the scheme proposed by those gentlemen by refusing to give them a franchise and monopoly of the Red River. They can still go on and construct the canal, which is the main proposition they advance, and make it practically just as available for the purpose of carrying the produce of Manitoba and the North-west as it would be with the additional privilege of controlling the navigation of the Red River. Further concessions might be granted when the company have completed that work, after they have shown their bona fides, and that they have substantial capital behind them, and are not mere charter-mongers, as they appear to be, mere speculators, and in fact, I understand they admit that that is their position, that their business is to induce capital to go into this scheme, and they do not allege to have any capital to prosecute it. They do not allege, as I understand, that they have any capital ready to take it up. Well, then, after they have got the canal in working order from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, if they desire to show that it is necessary for the further success of their scheme, to improve the St. Andrew's Rapids, and if, by that time, the Government of the day have not improved St. Andrew's Rapids, there might be some excuse for allowing the franchise they ask for. But, just at this time, when the Minister of Public Works tells us that the Government have seriously decided to do something with regard to this matter, after long years of delay, how unfortunate and how inopportune it is, that along with that statement, we should have the Government actively promoting this Bill which is to hand over that public work to a private corporation. I say that after the telegram which I have read to this House—and which was also sent to the Minister of Railways—from the board of trade, and from the City Council of Winnipeg, I cannot do less than urge as strongly as I know how upon the House, to pause before they commit this outrage on the rights of the people there. I have done so. I am afraid I have been talking to ears that paid little attention to what I had to say, but that is not my fault. Hon. gentlemen opposite, if they allow this Bill to go further, must take the responsibility. They must take the responsibility, if, in years hence, the country is called upon to pay this company large sums to get back from them that monopoly which we propose to hand over to them now for nothing. Does this company propose to pay the country anything for the monoply of the Red River for all time? Not a dollar. Do they ask us to hand it over to them because they have money to commence the work? Not even that, Sir. They tell us they want it as a speculation, and as a means of making money for themselves. They say, we trust to get some other people to furnish the money, and we propose to take the profits. That is what they say to us. And, it is calmly proposed here that we should take away from the people of the present day, and from future generations in that portion of Manitoba, these valuable rights, privileges and franchises. I protest against it, and I say that a proposal of that kind would be right in no part of Canada. I defy the promoter of this Bill, and I defy the Government who are standing behind him, to produce a single precedent in the history of Canada where the Government have allowed a work of this kind to pass out of their hands into the hands of a private company; and especially so, in the face of the very strong protests that have been made by the city most interested.

Mr. DALY. I am sure the members of this House will agree with me, that we have had a very extraordinary statement from the hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). That hon. gentleman has taken up the time of this House for three hours and some odd minutes, discussing a private Bill. The hon. gentleman started out to discuss the Bill clause after clause, until interrupted by you, Mr. Speaker, and his attention was called to the rule of the House, which did not permit him following such a course.

Mr. MARTIN. I beg to say that I did not attempt to discuss the Bill clause after clause.

Mr. DALY. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) will say that in spite of your having ruled that he did. However, it is a matter of indifference to me whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is willing to be ruled by the Chair or not, but hon. members are aware, that he opened his speech by reading the first clause of the Bill, which contains the names of the incorporators. What object, the hon. gentleman could seek to attain by giving the House the benefit of what they could read themselves in the Bill, and what bearing that had upon the subsequent argument of the hon. gentleman, I am at a loss to understand. Why, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has simply been killing time, because, in the first place, when interrupted by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and queried as to the position he assumed, he said, that he was not opposed to the Bill. About an hour after having made that statement, he told the House that he was opposed to the Bill, and he gave the reasons why he was opposed to it. How, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) could state to this House, that he was not opposed to the Bill, in view of the fact that he has notice of no less than seven amendments to it on the Order paper, I fail to understand. If he is not opposed to this Bill, why has he given notice of these amendments, and why has he taken three hours and a half discussing its provisions. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) has given no good reasons to the House why this Bill should not receive the same treatment as any other private Bill of such an important nature. We have, Sir, the further fact, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) caused no less than seven postponements of the consideration of this Bill in the Railway Committee, evidencing the hon. gentleman's intention to oppose it at all hazards. And, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) would like the House to understand that he is representing his constituents in the city of Winnipeg, in the action he is taking to-day. The hon. gentleman presumes to speak for the city of Winnipeg, and in his closing remarks he said, that the people of Manitoba, in future, would hold this Government responsible for handing over a monopoly of the Red River navigation to the promoters of this Bill. Sir, it seems to me a most extraordinary thing, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin), having read a telegram from the mayor and the city clerk of Winnipeg—a telegram which was also sent to the Minister of Railways and Canals—and the House having had an opportunity of considering that telegram; it seems to me an extraordinary thing that the hon. gentleman would like this House to believe that this Bill is not framed exactly in accordance with the wishes of the people of Winnipeg. According to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, we cannot discuss the different clauses of the Bill, but any person perusing this Bill and perusing the telegram from the mayor and city clerk of Winnipeg, can come to no other conclusion than that the Government have safeguarded the interests of the people of the city of Winnipeg, and have paid attention to the position taken by the city council and the board of trade of the city of Winnipeg in reference to this measure. If hon. gentlemen will look at the different clauses which the member for Winnipeg seeks to strike out by his amendments, they will see that every interest has been safeguarded; not at the instance of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), but at the instance of the Government itself. The Minister of Railways and Canals, looking after the interests of the people generally, and particularly of the people of Winnipeg, and those interested in the navigation of the Red River, has seen to it, that the Bill has been amended in such particulars as to provide against any of the contingencies which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) would lead the House to understand would eventuate if the Bill were passed. Now, Sir, this is a very important measure. It is a measure that seeks to give relief to the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman, in his opening remarks, said, very truly, that if there is one matter in which our people are interested, it is the question of having an outlet for their surplus produce. As the House is aware, we have had a very large yield of grain this year——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman excuse me, as I am anxious to ascertain exactly on what this Bill depends? Do I understand correctly that any possible benefits that are to flow from its passage will depend absolutely on the navigability of Hudson's Bay?

Mr. DALY. I am not aware of that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that a necessary condition of the Bill?

Mr. DALY. I presume it would be. It would be very necessary to the carrying out of the desire of the promoters of the Bill, and for the utility of the canal and waterways proposed to be constructed under the Bill, that the navigability of Hudson's Straits should be ascertained.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In determining whether one should vote for the Bill or not, the first condition upon which to satisfy his mind would be that the Hudson's Bay is, in fact, navigable for commercial purposes ?

Mr. DALY. Certainly, and that is a condition that can be met by the very strongest authorities.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You will understand me as not questioning it at all. I have been re-reading to-day Lieutenant Gordon's report, and I was anxious to know if I was correct in that.

Mr. DALY. That is a matter on which one should be satisfied—that the straits are entirely navigable. I was going on to say, when I was interrupted, that this Bill seeks to incorporate the gentlemen named in it for the purpose of utilizing the water stretches that lie between the city of Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay. These have been enumerated by the hon. member for Winnipeg as consisting of the Red River, running from the city of Winnipeg to Lake Winnipeg, Hayes River and Nelson River. As the hon. gentleman has correctly told the House, this is not a new matter at all, because for years the only outlet which the people of the old Selkirk colony and the people of Rupert's Land had was by the very route which the promoters of this Bill now seek to make navigable for the carrying out of the produce of the country. The hon. gentleman told the House that he was not opposed to that feature of the Bill which has reference to the utilization of these waters ; but he confined his presumed opposition, after he had declared himself in favour of the Bill, to that portion which seeks to give to the promoters the right to improve the navigation of Red River. As the hon. gentleman has stated, the people of Winnipeg and of the surrounding country, have for a number of years applied to the different Governments of Canada with the view of getting the St. Andrew's Rapids improved. Surveys have been made of those rapids by the Government engineers and by the engineers of the city of Winnipeg. A difference appears to exist between the surveys and estimates made by those respective engineers as to the cost of the work. But, Sir, I am satisfied of one thing—that so far as the terms of this Bill are concerned, if it becomes law, it cannot interfere in the slightest degree with any interests in the city of Winnipeg, or any interests that can possibly be affected by making the Red River navigable. On the contrary, it will give to the people who are interested in the navigability of Red River, a chance which they have been looking for for years. If it should happen that the Government cannot undertake the work of removing the difficulties at St. Andrew's Rapids, Union Point Shoal, Elm Point Shoal, Two Point Shoal, South Bend Shoal, and the other shoals in the river that interfere with navigation, and if an opportunity is given to the company, under the safeguards provided in this Bill, to carry out this work, the people of Winnipeg will not say that the Government have done anything to inflict upon them any wrong, or to prevent these long-looked-for improvements being carried out. Now, Sir, what does that telegram of the mayor and city clerk of Winnipeg say ? It says :

> While this council appreciate the fact that the improvement of Red River is most important to the city of Winnipeg, and greatly to be desired, they believe the work should be carried out by the Government and not by a private corporation, unless the greatest care be taken to safeguard the rights of the public; and, while they wish the promoters of the scheme of constructing a waterway to Hudson's Bay every success, they think Parliament should not grant any special right or privilege unless the Government have the right to take over such improvements at actual first cost as a public work if it should be thought advisable, and unless Parliament protect the public by imposing proper limitations on tolls and charges without regard to dividends, and also that the Government's approval be requisite for plans of all works and not merely those named in section 7. Section 5 is indefinite. Section 8 should provide for the city's consent as to a tramway in limits.

The first objection taken by this telegram is that we should safeguard the rights of the public, and should not grant any exclusive right or privilege unless the Government have the right to take over such improvements. The Bill provides for the Government taking over these improvements, so that that difficulty is removed. Then, Parliament must protect the public by imposing proper limitations on the tolls and charges without regard to dividends. By the Bill, Parliament proposes to impose proper limitations on tolls and charges. Then, it is said that the Government's approval should be requisite for plans of all works, and not merely those named in section 7. The Bill as amended, and now before the House, provides that the tolls and charges shall be regulated by the Governor General in Council : so that that difficulty is removed. Further, it is asked that all the plans be approved by the Governor General in Council. That has been provided for. As to the consent of the city to tramways within the limits, the Government have incorporated in the Bill, section 13, which provides for all the safeguards that are given in similar Bills passed through the Railway Committee, namely, the usual model Bill clause ; and, strange to say, amongst the amendments which the hon. gentleman offers is one to strike out this model Bill clause, which the people of Winnipeg, through their mayor and city clerk ask should form part of the Bill, providing that the building of the tramway and any other works that may be constructed in the city of Winnipeg shall be surrounded by the usual safeguards provided by Parliament in Bills similar to this. So that every change that is asked for by the city council of Winnipeg or by the board of trade, has been provided for in this Bill. Yet, in spite of that, and in spite of the fact that the representative of the city council of Winnipeg, Mr. Alderman Andrews, who appeared before the Railway Committee——

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, it is quite out of order for the hon. member to refer to what occurred in the committee. I was very careful not to do that. I would have anticipated points of this kind if I had been allowed to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think there is anything to prevent any hon. member referring to what has taken place in the committee on a Bill that has been reported by the committee, except that he cannot discuss the conduct or language of members of the committee further than appears on the records.

Mr. DALY. What I was going to say was that the city council of Winnipeg had a representative here in the person of Alderman Andrews. Mr. Andrews appeared before that committee, and expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the Bill as it now appears before the House. The amendments that were made at the instigation of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), were quite satisfactory to him, representing the city council of Winnipeg, and yet, in spite of that fact, in spite of our having met, by the provisions of the Bill as now printed, every objection raised by the mayor and city clerk of Winnipeg, we find the hon. gentleman here consuming the time of the House for three hours, protesting against the passage of the Bill and asserting that he speaks on behalf of the citizens of Winnipeg. I am perfectly satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that when the citizens of Winnipeg have an opportunity of examining into the provisions of the Bill, they will not thank the hon. gentleman for the position he has taken here to-day, because I am perfectly satisfied that every right-thinking man, who considers the Bill in its present shape, must come to the conclusion that the citizens of Winnipeg, as represented by the city council and board of trade, will have nothing whatever to complain of.

But the hon. gentleman went outside the provisions of this Bill. Not satisfied with discussing the navigability of the Hudson's Straits or the position in which the St. Andrew's Rapids would be placed by the passage of this Bill, he undertook to discuss the question of the building of the Hudson's Bay railway and other matters pertaining to the relief which the people of Manitoba expect to get by the construction of that line of railway, as affording them another route for exporting their overplus of grain. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman was quite within the truth when he said that the people of Manitoba now discuss this question of the building of the Hudson's Bay Railway or of other railways in that country in a different spirit from that in which they discussed them a few years ago. There was a day in the history of Manitoba when there was no warmer advocate of the Hudson's Bay Railway than the hon. member for Winnipeg himself. There was a day when that hon. gentleman and his colleague, Mr. Greenway, sought to drive the Hon. John Norquay from power by attacking him and his government upon the attitude they had assumed as regards this very Hudson's Bay Railway scheme. There was no warmer advocates of that scheme in Manitoba than the hon. gentleman and Mr. Greenway, prior to their becoming members of the government which Mr. Greenway formed in 1888. Why, it is a matter of history that this hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) introduced a resolution in the legislature of Manitoba which proposed to guarantee four and a half million dollars of the bonds of this company to which the hon. gentleman referred this afternoon; and when legislation was introduced by Mr. Norquay, based upon that resolution, he had no warmer advocate of that measure than the hon. member for Winnipeg. The hon. gentleman now says that the Hudson's Bay Railway will never be a success so long as it is in the hands of its present promoters; but, strange to say, we have it, as a matter of history, that the hon. gentleman was a member of the government which gave the highest certificate which could possibly be given to the president of that railway.

Mr. MARTIN. Not the government.

Mr. DALY. It was signed by the Premier (Mr. Greenway). The letter of Mr. Greenway to Mr. Hugh Sutherland was signed by Mr. Greenway in this city. The hon. member for Winnipeg was Attorney General of Mr. Greenway's Cabinet at that time, and he was here at the time the letter was written by Mr. Greenway or by himself—I do not know which. At all events he never repudiated that letter, and the hon. gentleman gave the highest possible certificate that could be given by the member of any government to the present president of the Hudson's Bay Railway. What reason the hon. gentleman has for his change of mind, I cannot say.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to say, if you will allow me, that I knew nothing whatever of that letter having been written; but if I had known it was written and had had an opportunity of dissenting from it, I would have done so. I did not agree to it at that time, and I never have since.

Mr. DALY. I am bound to take the hon. gentleman's statement, but I am aware of the fact that neither he nor any member of his government ever repudiated the action of his Premier when that letter was given by Mr. Greenway to Mr. Sutherland. But at all events, whether the hon. gentleman was a party to that letter or not, I have placed it upon record. It is in "Hansard," in a speech I made in this House two years ago, and at the time the letter was given Mr. Greenway and his government were satisfied with the president of the Hudson's Bay Railway Company and the promoters of that scheme.

Mr. MARTIN. No.

Mr. DALY. The president and promoters of that scheme then, are its president and promoters to-day. But a change came over the dream of the hon. gentleman, when the Northern Pacific Railway deal took place in the city of Winnipeg, of which I also gave the House a short history some few years ago. But I started out by saying—and that is the reason I mention these few facts,—that the hon. gentleman uttered a truism this afternoon, when he remarked that the people of Manitoba look a little more carefully into any railway scheme now than they did a few years ago. It is perfectly true that they do view with suspicion nowadays any railway scheme, and they have good reason for doing so. The people of Winnipeg and the people of Manitoba have had a very sore experience indeed in the matter of building railways in that province. They are burdened with a debt to-day that it will take them many years to redeem, owing to the action of the government that was in power in 1888 and 1889, of which the hon. gentleman was a member; and I have no doubt that the caution they exhibit to-day is the outcome of the warning which these people were given at that time and which is now going to stand them in good stead. They discuss these matters differently now from what they did in days gone by, and I do not blame them, because after the burden that was uselessly inflicted upon them by the building of the Northern Pacific in Manitoba, they have reason to be suspicious of all other railway schemes. But the hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House what he had to do with the building of that railway. He forgot to tell the House that he was a member of the government, which increased the debt of Manitoba from 1888 to the present by some two and a half million dollars; and he forgot to tell the House that one reason given to the people of Manitoba why it was necessary to build the Northern Pacific Railway, was that it would create competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway and thereby bring about lower rates of freight. He also omitted to state that the grain rates to-day are identical on the two lines, and that the people have got no benefit from the competition of the Northern Pacific, in the slightest degree, notwithstanding the statements made by the Greenway government in that particular. And suffering as they do to-day from the want of competition, they naturally look for relief to such schemes as that now before the House which will give them another outlet for their grain. I am not going to weary the House any further than to say that I am perfectly satisfied that, so far as the interests of the people of Manitoba and the North-west are concerned, all their rights are properly safeguarded in the Bill before the House, and that the people will realize, on reading the Bill carefully and on reflecting on the position the company takes, that the company are not getting anything more than we should give them. Why, it would be a matter of great relief to us if we can know that in that country we will have an uninterrupted line of communication from the city of Winnipeg to Lake Winnipeg and out to the Hudson's Straits.

The question of the navigability of these straits has been brought up here. To-day there can be no question of their navigability. The evidence is overwhelming, as given before a committee of this House, and before a committee of the Senate, and before a committee of the Manitoba legislature, and from the reports of men who are competent to speak, that Hudson's Straits, are navigable for five months in the year —

Mr. WELSH. No.

Mr. DALY—and that they can be readily navigated by vessels that are constructed specially for that service. The hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) takes issue with that statement. I would like to know if he has made a voyage to those waters, or if he knows more on the subject than others in this House.

Mr. WELSH. I know more about it than you do.

Mr. DALY. I would like to know what the hon. member knows about it.

Mr. WELSH. I will tell you, by and by.

Mr. DALY. Because, as against any statement the hon. gentleman may make in this House, we have the sworn testimony of others who are equally well up in navigation, and who have had as much experience as the hon. gentleman, and who state that these straits are navigable.

Mr. WELSH. For five months, you said.

Mr. DALY. I say they are navigable for from four and a half to five months in the year. The hon. member for Winnipeg said it was not demonstrated by the voyage of the "Alert" that these straits were navigable. The "Alert" was not a vessel that was calculated to find out whether the straits were navigable or not. She was a vessel that could not demonstrate to anybody, while she was in the straits, whether they were navigable for three months or five months. From the information before the committees I have referred to, it is clear that vessels properly constructed to contend with the ice, will demonstrate to a truism that these straits are open for from four and a half to five months in the year. If that is the case, it is all the more necessary that we people in that western country should make an effort to get to Hudson's Bay. The hon. member for Winnipeg doubted whether we should get much benefit from this work, because our wheat would be stored from one season to another; for instance, you could not get out this year wheat grown this year. The hon. gentleman knows that we get out in any year a very small proportion of the crops of that year, but that the larger proportion of the grain is stored in warehouses or elevators in Manitoba, or Port Arthur, or along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. All that the farmer requires to know is, that he is getting the market price for his grain, and if he is, it is a matter of indifference to him whether the purchaser stores it at Fort Churchill, Port Nelson, Port Arthur, or New York. We know that the mileage from Winnipeg to Nelson is figured at 650, while the mileage from Winnipeg to Montreal, by rail, is 1,400 miles. So the saving in the rail carriage alone and the sea freights that would be given by steamers coming into Nelson, will compensate the buyers, if a better price is given by them for wheat bought to be shipped by Hudson's Bay than that shipped via Port Arthur, or all rail, to Montreal. There can be no doubt, as the hon. gentleman says, that we suffer from high freight rates at the present. There will be no relief until we get another outlet. The freight rates we suffer from are not on the carriage of wheat by vessels, but those charged on the lines of railway. And the hon. gentleman admitted, as the fact is, that the railways could not charge less and pay expenses.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not admit that.

Mr. DALY. It was demonstrated in the evidence that was given before the commission, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is charging less per mile for bringing out wheat from Manitoba than is charged by the Northern Pacific, the Great Northern, the Union Pacific and other roads hauling freight from the Western states. But the point I was going to make is, that any serious difficulties in the way of raising wheat arise, not from the freights on vessels, but from the freights on railways. And, if we can get out our wheat to Hudson's Bay by 650 miles of railway, against 1,400 miles to Montreal, the farmer is going to get the benefit of the shorter haul by railway, and, so far as the ocean rates are concerned, they will be as cheap from Nelson to Liverpool as from Montreal to Liverpool.

Mr. WELSH. No.

Mr. DALY. I am speaking subject to correction, not on the part of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh), but those who are aware of the facts, that offers have been made by leading shipbuilders in the old country, who will undertake to carry our grain from Nelson or Fort Churchill at as low rates as can be given by the St. Lawrence route.

Mr. WELSH. No.

Mr. DALY. They will get the same insurance as they get from St. Lawrence ports, in any season of the year. So that any difficulties that may arise in connection with the navigation of the Hudson's Strait, will be overcome just as soon as we get a line of railway to Hudson's Bay.

Coming back to the Bill—I was discussing the railway only because the matter was introduced by the hon. gentleman—we are satisfied that, not only should we have the railway, but also we should have the water stretches, lying between Lake Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay, utilized. If the grain we have raised this year in Manitoba and the North-west is any indication of what the grain-raising capacities of that country are, I think it is clearly demonstrated that, in the course of ten or fifteen years, we shall require, not only a double track on the Canadian Pacific Railway to Port Arthur, and the Hudson's Bay Railway, but also this canal for steamer navigation. For I think we can demonstrate beyond all doubt that the great grain-raising portions of the North American continent lies north of the 49th parallel, and that the grain raised there is at least the equal, and probably the superior, of that grown in any part of the world. So that this Bill is one in the interests of Manitoba, as a whole, and not of the people of Winnipeg alone, or those interested in the navigation of the Red River. It is a Bill in the interests of those who require low freight rates for their grain. And I am satisfied that the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg will demonstrate to the people of Manitoba and Winnipeg that their interests are not safe in his hands, but that, on the contrary, he is willing, for personal reasons by taking up the time of this House and the time of the committee to prevent the passage of this Bill, even though it is one in the interests of Winnipeg and of the province as a whole. As to the objection concerning St. Andrew's Rapids, when we are in committee on the Bill, and come to deal with the clause providing for the construction of dams and other works of the St. Andrew's Rapids, we shall be able to demonstrate to the House that we have surrounded the construction of these works for overcoming obstructions in the navigation of Red River, with such conditions that there is not a person in the city of Winnipeg who can say that the Government have not done their whole duty in the framing of this Bill.

Mr. WELSH. I am afraid that this is another wild-cat scheme. I am afraid that if we pass this Bill we shall incur further complications as we did with the Chignecto Railway scheme. I have listened to the hon. gentleman's yarn about the Hudson's Bay being open five months in the year. I denied it, I deny it now. I have had interviews with the secretary of the Hudson's Bay Company in London, and I went over the whole scheme of the Hudson's Bay route with him, and I discovered that the Hudson's Bay is only navigable from some time in July till about the 1st of October, and sometimes only until the close of September. If you can make five months out of that, show me how you do it. Now, I do not like this Bill, for I believe it is the thin end of the wedge, which will lead to a demand upon this Parliament for a subsidy. They will issue bonds and deceive those capitalists for whom so much sympathy is felt on that side of the House. They will start this canal, perhaps not a penny paid up, and then issue bonds. When this Bill goes into committee, if it ever gets that far, I shall move that no bonds shall be issued by this company until three millions of the shareholders' capital is invested and spent in the construction of that canal. Talk about five millions for a canal of 800 miles. Why, fifty millions would not do it. Then we heard the hon. gentleman opposite talk about the rate of freight being as low from Hudson's Bay as from New York. Why, it is absurd.

Mr. DALY. I did not say New York, I said St. Lawrence points, Montreal.

Mr. WELSH. Well, Montreal. They can carry freight from Montreal for something like two-pence a bushel. Does he mean to tell me that a ship that can only navigate Hudson's Bay for three months in a year can compete in carrying freight with vessels sailing from sea-board ports that are open all the year around, like Portland, Halifax, New York and elsewhere ? It is absurd.

Mr. DALY. I am not talking about those places.

Mr. WELSH. I believe that those steamers will have to be powerful steamers in order to contend with the ice, and even then, three months is the longest season you can calculate upon during which those vessels will be able to navigate Hudson's Bay ; and the rate of insurance would be much higher in that bay than it would be on the St. Lawrence route. I think the whole scheme is a wild-cat scheme, and that in future we will be called upon to give them a subsidy ; there is no doubt about it. This country a few years ago was convulsed from one end to the other by the great Pacific Railway scheme. That was a large undertaking, and it was completed for the purpose of opening up the North-west, and making a connection with British Columbia and the Pacific Ocean. That was done at a cost to the people of this Dominion of a hundred million of dollars, to say the least. Although the company has the whole trade in its hands, it is not paying, the stock is not at par : even after this Dominion has contributed a hundred million dollars towards the enterprise. Now, here is another scheme for aid to build 800 miles of canal to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway. What will that 800 miles of canal cost ? They say five millions. Why, that will pay no more than 5 per cent of the cost of it. I certainly look on this as a very wild scheme, and I think it behooves the members of this House representing other sections of the country besides the North-west to hesitate and think over the matter well before they sanction this scheme that is going to be a heavy tax eventually, I believe, on the people of Canada. It may not be so ; but I have invariably found that when companies come to this House looking for charters for railways—and I put canals in the same category—the end is a subsidy, or a grant of land, and the resources of the country are all given away to speculators. At all events, I shall certainly insist, if this Bill gets into committee, that a clause be inserted that the company shall have no right to issue any bonds to induce foreign capitalists to invest their money in this undertaking until at least three millions of the shareholders' capital is paid up and invested in actual construction, as a guarantee of good faith.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I only desire to say a few words on this subject. I think, in the first place, it would be very absurd that this House should refuse to allow this Bill to pass simply because some hon. gentlemen are afraid that afterwards Parliament may be asked to subsidize the scheme. There is nothing in the Bill at present that shows any such intention or prospect. When we consider the fact that the people of the North-west are very deeply interested in obtaining an outlet to this northern sea, it really disposes of the question. I think the House ought to be generous enough to lend their aid in passing the scheme. But even supposing the subsidy were asked, that of course would be a question for the future. And then I ask the question : Does not the giving of these subsidies really pay the Dominion ? It is a well-known fact that the Dominion of Canada prides itself on being an agricultural country. Only three or four years ago, as we find by the Trade and Navigation Returns, although this is an agricultural country, and although Manitoba and the North-west exported fifteen million bushels of breadstuffs, yet Canada was an importer of breadstuffs to the extent of 183,000 bushels more than she exported. That shows the immense value the North-west is to Canada. Now, the more we open up the North-west, the more people there will be to consume the goods and manufactures of the east. Therefore, I say that hon. gentlemen who represent eastern provinces should think twice, and think very seriously, before they throw cold water on any scheme that is likely to develop the North-west. I think my hon. friend who leads the Opposition will hardly endorse the sentiments of the last speaker

(Mr. Welsh), because his name has been lately mentioned in the newspapers as a candidate for a North-west constituency; and if he desires to fill the hearts of his supporters there with joy, he will have to join the Government in aid of this scheme that will give the North-west that outlet, which seems to be the great desire of every one who lives in that country. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken says that the Hudson's Bay is not navigable. I myself have no more personal knowledge than he has. But I have this to say, that I have met many sailors who have come out from the north of Scotland, been brought out by the Hudson's Bay Company, and who have navigated craft in the Hudson's Bay, sailing in the Hudson's Bay Company's ships from one point to another in the bay, and their unanimous opinion seems to be that the navigation of the Hudson's Bay is not a bit more difficult than the navigation of the St. Lawrence through the Straits of Belle Isle. That seems to be their unanimous opinion; I myself cannot say anything more than what I have heard. But I believe that when you get sailors who have navigated the Straits of Belle Isle to Montreal, and also the Straits of Hudson's Bay, and from point to point within that inland sea, you should be inclined to accept their evidence. There is another important point that we should take into consideration in considering this canal scheme. We want to get capital into this country as well as population, in order to open up and develop the North-west. If this canal were an accepted fact to-day, I venture to say that millions of capital would come in from the old country that are kept out just now. I say that advisedly, because I know that a great deal of capital would come in, I know the people would bring it in if there were an outlet through this northern country, thereby making a shorter route to the old country. On this account hon. gentlemen can see that any representative of the North-west is called upon to consider the question very carefully before he assists in throwing out this canal scheme. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) referred to freight rates, and the remarks made by the Minister of the Interior. So far as freight rates are concerned, they depend upon two conditions: first, whether there is a sufficient quantity of return freight; second, the condition of the shipping trade. There are certain seasons when the shipping trade is very dull, and when vessel owners are willing to carry freight at very little over cost. We are all aware that when trade is very dull at Montreal, vessels sailing from that port will carry certain classes of freight almost as ballast, at all events at very low rates; and no doubt if the Hudson's Bay were opened out and the route were developed, the same conditions would prevail at Churchill as prevail in Montreal, Boston, New York or any other port on the Atlantic coast. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh) has, therefore, not presented any argument whatever against the canal scheme. As to the question of insurance. Some time ago the president of the old Hudson's Bay Railway Company, which is now known as the Winnipeg and Northern Railway Company, hoped to be able to float this scheme successfully and build the first portion of the railway, and perhaps even the whole of it, and at that time he spent much time and the greatest care in ascertaining all the material facts connected with operating the road, and I have seen letters which he had received from insurance agents in London—this was some years ago—guaranteeing that insurance rates would be given to the Hudson's Bay route as they were to the Baltic and ports thereon. We know that the insurance question does not prevent a profitable trade being done in the Baltic, and we can therefore fairly run the risk, and we may consider the question of insurance as one of the remote questions to be settled afterwards, and one which will probably settle itself. One word more as to the remarks made by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island, and that is in regard to the cost of the work. The capital of the company is placed at $5,000,000, and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh) estimates that at least $50,000,000 will be required to construct a canal of such an immense length. Has the hon. gentleman any idea as to what the length of the canal will be? Does he know how many locks will be required, what their length will be, what sort of material will be required to be excavated? It appears to me that if we had to build a canal for the whole distance from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, the objection put forward by the hon. gentleman would be a sound one; but when a canal is constructed, the cost depends largely on the rivers, lakes and springs that are utilized, the mileage of lockage which is to be constructed, and the character of the material to be excavated. Until the hon. gentleman has positive information as to what that material is, I would suggest that he drop that line of criticism, and when he obtains that information he may perhaps be satisfied as to the wisdom of granting a subsidy, if it should be required. I desire only to offer these few remarks in answer to the objection which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Welsh) has raised, and which, from my point of view, appears to be fallacious.

Mr. WELSH. How long during the year will the canal be opened, if it is built?

Mr. MACDOWALL. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I would say that the canal will be open probably about six months in the year, and I believe from the evidence I have heard of those who have navigated the Hudson's Bay, that probably the navigation of Hudson's Bay will be about nine months in the year.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I have listened with very considerable interest to the address delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) respecting this great portion of our North-west. I was very much surprised that an hon. gentleman who represents the great agricultural district surrounding Winnipeg should embrace this opportunity of throwing cold water on a great project which is destined to build up the material interest and prosperity of that section of the country. We know perfectly well that canals and waterways were advocated many years ago in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and the hon. member promoting the Bill (Mr. Boyd) who has taken the responsibility of placing this measure before the House, has undoubtedly the good of the country at heart, and if the canal proposed is built and tends to bring immigration into the country and to develop our great material resources, it will greatly aid in promoting the prosperity of this portion of the North American continent. We know perfectly well that so far as regards the territory between Hudson's Bay and the city of Winnipeg it is now merely in an incipient stage of development, and this is true so far as accurate knowledge of the section is concerned. The Government of Canada for many years past have undertaken the responsibility of acquiring a more accurate knowledge of this section of the Dominion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman speaks of the development of that great section of country lying between Hudson's Bay and Winnipeg. Will the hon. gentleman—for I know he has informed himself—state what particular lines, what woods or materials or minerals or other products which exist there, can be developed in that section of the country ?

Sir JAMES GRANT. I am very glad the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has asked me this very important and cogent question. Allow me to tell him that there is no portion of the Dominion whose prospects of development are greater than the territory between Hudson's Bay and Winnipeg. We know perfectly well the resources of the country are unbounded as regards the fisheries, the whalebone interest, the oil industry in connection with the great fish that are caught in the rivers, the salmon which are caught in the rivers, these valuable resources having been described by explorers who have visited that section of the Dominion. Investigations made within the last twelve months by two gentlemen who travelled from Labrador to Hudson's Bay show that there is a vast territory which is almost unexplored, and which deserves the most careful attention of the Government in order that its resources may be developed and produce that revenue which must follow from the opening up of a great section of the country. I am astonished beyond measure at finding hon. gentlemen willing to throw cold water on this great country. In the early history of Canada some of our principal rivers were thought not to be navigable on account of ice. History is truly repeating itself. No doubt vessels can be built which will be able to overcome the ice and find their way into Hudson's Bay during several months each year. We know that Hudson's Bay is about 1,000 miles wide by 500 miles long, that in fact it covers an enormous area, and does not lie within the arctic circle, as was formerly supposed, but lies in the same latitude as the northern portion of Scotland. I believe there is a great future before that section of the country. Only a short time ago I learned from a gentleman who had been exploring there that large revenues might be obtained from that section, and this was especially the case in regard to furs, that musk ox skins were collected by Esquimaux who could not find a market for them, and so these valuable furs were ultimately destroyed and lost to our country. I am very much pleased that the hon. gentleman has seen fit to introduce the Bill this session, for, even if it is not carried now, it will be in the incipient stage of development, and the time will come when the measure will be carried by this Parliament. There are large deposits of iron in that country, there are said to be coal deposits, and we know that there are large quantities of lumber in that region. It is high time that these valuable natural resources should be turned to practical account. We know also that there is a large area of agricultural land fit for settlement.

Mr. MARTIN. Where ?

Sir JAMES GRANT. Dr. Bell, of the Geological Survey, one of the first scientists in this country, is satisfied, from his personal observation of the number of large trees, of the vegetation, of the character of the soil, and of the large rivers which water this fertile country, that there is a large area of agricultural land there fit for settlement. What are the advantages, let me ask, of having an outlet through Hudson's Bay from that section of the country ? We know that Winnipeg is 1,200 miles nearer Liverpool, via the Hudson's Bay, than by the St. Lawrence route. Is it not of some importance to the hon. member (Mr. Martin), who has read so much literature this afternoon, and is it not important to his constituents, that this route should be promoted ? Should we not, this House of Commons, proceed in the matter, notwithstanding that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) does not believe in the development of these resources, which are intended to build up the city which he has the honour to represent ? I have no doubt whatever as to the future of this country. I have no doubt whatever as to its resources. The fertile sections that lie north and west of it, to Prince Albert, and eastward again : sections of the country that are hardly yet explored, must find an outlet for shipment of the immense quantities of grain that will be grown there in the near future. We know, as was told us the other day by the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper), that our North-west country has grown more wheat than the whole of Great Britain during the last twelve months. If that was the case last year, what will it be ten years hence ? Do you suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway will be able to carry all the grain to market ? Is it desirable that it should go by Buffalo to the New York markets ? Is it not far better that it should be placed in elevators at Hudson's Bay, or Fort Churchill, and shipped to Great Britain ? When this can be accomplished, you will find thousands of population coming in, for the dozens that are there to-day, to lend their aid to develop that country. I trust that a canal or a railway scheme intended to develop the great resources of the Hudson's Bay Company, will receive the full and fair consideration of these individuals who are interested in developing the resources of that country. Such a scheme, carried to accomplishment, is absolutely necessary for the future of Hudson's Bay and the surrounding territory.

Mr. LISTER. I desire, in the first place, to correct the statement which I have heard the hon. gentleman (Sir James Grant) make on two occasions, namely, that the North-west has grown as much wheat during the last year as was grown in Great Britain. While I am just as pleased as the hon. gentleman at the progress Manitoba has made, I desire to say that Manitoba has only grown about half as much as was grown in Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS. That is not so.

Mr. LISTER. Yes, it is so. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have entirely wandered away from the issue before us. The productiveness of Manitoba is not questioned by us, nor is the practicability of navigating the Hudson's Bay for from three to six months in the year ; but the Bill we are considering asks us to incorporate certain gentlemen for the purpose of constructing a canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, along the Hayes and other rivers. What my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) objects to, is not the construction of the canal, but he says that, in the interest of the city of Winnipeg and in the interest of the people of the North-west and of Canada generally, it is not good policy that the Government should hand over the control of a great waterway to any private corporation. That is the question which this House has to consider, and, furthermore, we have to consider whether the Bill, as amended, properly protects the interests of this country and the interests of individuals concerned. My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) seems to speak in a complaining spirit of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) occupying three or more hours in addressing the House upon the Bill now before us. Surely, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) will not pretend to say that, if a Bill has inherent defects, it is not the duty of every hon. member in this House familiar with the facts, to stand up for three hours, nay, if need be, ten hours, in opposition to the measure. My hon. friend (Mr. Daly) talks about the large number of amendments that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has placed upon the Order paper. My hon. friend (Mr. Martin), in proposing these amendments, hopes to make the Bill a proper measure, and to protect, as far as possible, the rights of people of the country at large. My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) says that this Bill protects the public interest. I deny his statement, and I can only conclude that he has not perused the Bill, or he would not make it. What the telegram from Winnipeg asked the Railway Committee of this House to do, was not to place in the hands of the Governor the fixing of the tolls upon the canal, but it was to place in the hands of the Governor the fixing of tolls, so that the tolls would be in accordance with the traffic upon the canal, and not in order to enable those who might invest in the scheme to pay themselves 10 per cent upon their investment. The Bill now before the House, with all its amendments, contains no provision of that kind, and it does not, in that sense, safeguard the interests of the people of Winnipeg. My hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) has thought it proper on this occasion, as on many other occasions, to introduce into this discussion certain matters of ancient history connected with the Northern Railway and the Hudson's Bay Company. Whenever the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) speaks, the Minister of the Interior avails himself of the opportunity to follow him—somewhat to the amusement of the House generally—and, if the chance offers at all, he never fails to remind us of certain transactions which, he said, took place between the hon. member for Winnipeg and those railways. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is always able to defend himself, and, so far as those transactions are concerned, he will probably have, before the night ends, an opportunity of again pointing out to the House that the charges made by the Minister of the Interior have been slanderous.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LISTER. Very well ; I have not been entirely frank, Mr. Speaker. We will put it in that way. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Welsh) pointed out to the House that in the case of incorporated companies of this kind, companies authorized to create a bonded indebtedness in the English market, there might be, in this case, as there is in a notable other case with which the Secretary of State is familiar, a moral obligation on the part of the people of this country to indemnify the purchasers of the bonds. The mere fact of legislation passing this House authorizing the contracting of debts on the part of the corporation, is something that should induce the House to examine carefully the project under consideration. Now, so far as this particular scheme is concerned, there is nobody in this House who objects to it. My hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) stated that he was in favour of the construction of a canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. If these promoters are able to find capitalists willing to invest their money in this scheme, it will be the folly of the capitalists themselves if it is not profitable. They certainly should have no claim on the country. Whether Hudson's Bay is navigable for three months or four months or five months, there is no doubt that the construction of the proposed canal would be, to some extent, an advantage to the people of the North-west; and for that reason, every member of the committee, and I believe every member of this House, is favourable to the undertaking. But what is objected to is the proposition that the Government or Parliament should hand over to a private corporation the control of one of the great waterways of this country; and that is what this Bill proposes to do. It is true that under the terms of the Bill, Parliament reserves to itself power to take over from this corporation any works that may be constructed upon the Red River, in the words of the Bill, at the actual amount expended by them in such construction. But assuming for a moment that Parliament is wise in divesting itself even temporarily of the control of that great waterway, the question arises, do we not run a great risk in placing this power in the hands of a private corporation? Works will be proceeded with, moneys will be expended in part construction of these works, and the time may come when the Government, in the exercise of the powers which this Act gives it, may conceive it to be in the interest of the country to take over from these contractors the control of Red River. Then the question of compensation arises; and, although the Bill may be, apparently, plain in its terms, we know from experience that when you undertake to deprive a corporation of any property upon the terms of compensation, the compensation demanded is generally enormously in advance of the actual cost. But that is only one of the views to be taken of this Bill. The great objection is that the Red River is a great waterway, and that it should be the policy of the Government never to yield or surrender to any corporation or individual the control of that waterway. I submit, Sir, that it is the bounden duty of a Government to control and to place in a fitting condition for the public wants, the great waterways of the country. As well might the Government have turned over to some private corporation the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. As well might they say to some private corporation: Go into the St. Clair River and construct a canal there or take out some impediments to navigation, and you shall have control of the stream. As well might they turn over to private individuals the great river that runs alongside of us, or the great St. Lawrence itself. These are great waterways belonging to the country, and it is the duty of the country to keep control of them. But, Sir, under this Bill it is proposed to turn over Red River to this corporation, a corporation composed of very respectable men, I have no doubt, but men who, I believe, have no capital to put into it. The intention is that capital shall be invited, that bonds shall be issued for the construction of this work, and the hope and expectation is that the Government will aid in the construction of a portion of the work by public subvention. In that way, it is thought, whether the work should turn out profitable or not, that the aid obtained from the Government will, at all events, secure the interest on the bonds for a number of years, and the bonds will be disposed of, as they were in the Chignecto Ship Railway scheme. Now, Sir, the North-west country generally has been a perfect paradise for exploiters. We have had pretty near all the fertile lands of that country taken up by railways, some of which have been built, and some which never will be built—railways which the bondholders will remember to their regret as long as they live, and of which their children will be reminded afterwards. We have had the timber limits, the grazing lands and coal lands of the country exploited. We have had the rivers of the country granted to corporations for the ostensible purpose of irrigating the country. In fact, Sir, everything that the ingenuity of man could see any money in has been taken up, and the last thing that remains is the Hayes River and the Hudson's Bay. And now it is proposed by this Bill to take up the Hayes River, running from Hudson's Bay into Lake Winnipeg. As it stands now, I do not suppose that the river is of much account by reason of the rapids in it. If any individuals thought proper to improve it, that would be their own business. But in order to make that a valuable franchise, in order that something tangible may be shown to the public—because these gentlemen, shrewd men as they are, know very well that in presenting a scheme of that kind to the public they would be simply laughed at—they asked that the control of the Red River, from the international boundary line up to Lake Winnipeg, shall be given to them for the improvement of the rapids north of the city of Winnipeg. The Bill before the House gives them that right, and provides that the tolls shall be fixed by the Governor General in Council, not with regard to the receipts of the canal, not with regard to the work which it may actually do, but at such rates as will pay interest upon the investment. These men come to the Governor General in Council and show that they have expended half a million or more dollars upon this work, and surely the Governor in Council, in fixing the tolls, will fix them at such a rate as will pay a reasonable interest on the investment. Unless they have some assurance that that would be done, the scheme would be a mad one indeed. These men are not building this canal simply for the benefit of the public, but in order to make something out of it, either by selling the franchise or by partly performing the work and getting the Government to take it over, or by selling the bonds of the company after a subvention has been granted by this Government. The object of these gentlemen is to make money out of the scheme. It is not for the good of the North-west, but for the good of their own pockets that they are working, and they would be fools if they undertook the work upon any other terms. But the question we have to decide is whether Parliament should grant this corporation a charter upon those conditions. The Opposition is willing, we offered in committee, and we have offered here, to consent that this Bill should become law, provided the Red River is not included. The promoters of the Bill refuse to take it upon those terms. For my part, if the Hudson's Bay is open for six months in the year, if that is to be one of the great outlets for the products of the North-west, which are to increase so enormously in the opinion of many, I do not see that it makes any particular difference to those gentlemen whether they get the Red River or not. Give them their charter, let the Government retain possession of the Red River, let the Government do what is necessary to make that a navigable stream —that is what the people want. But rather than have no improvements, as I understand the hon. member from Winnipeg, the people of Winnipeg would be willing that it should be handed over to a private corporation, provided the interests of the public are properly safeguarded. My hon. friend from Winnipeg has pointed out to the House the advantages that this scheme would offer to the people of that city. What they are desirous of is not so much to get the Hudson's Bay as to get access to Lake Winnipeg itself. It is claimed by that hon. gentleman that it is a matter of vast importance to the city to have good navigation to Lake Winnipeg itself. Because of the fuel which abounds in the vicinity, because of its fishing richness, because of the timber that surrounds the lake, and the minerals, and many other reasons, it is particularly desirable that the Red River should be navigable for all vessels that may want to go to Lake Winnipeg and back. As I understand it, it is not a matter of so much consequence, to the people of Winnipeg at all events, whether they get to Hudson's Bay or not.

We have heard a great deal about the navigation of Hudson's Bay. The Government took the trouble to send out an expedition to Hudson's Bay, which, I understand, made a report that has not been entirely satisfactory, and I understand it is the intention of the Government to send another expedition there for the purpose of thoroughly testing the duration of navigation upon that lake. But one can readily understand that it can only be navigated during three months or three months and a half, and then only by vessels specially constructed of great strength, the natural difficulties are so great as to almost deter people from undertaking to transport the products of the country by that route, instead of by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the great lakes to the east. We have had under consideration for many years the question of the building of a Hudson's Bay Railway. That scheme has had a somewhat varied history. When the Government proposed going before the people, shortly before the last sitting of Parliament, and when it was perfectly well known that the people of the North-west, whether wisely or not, were anxious to get that railway built to the Hudson's Bay, the Government secretly, by Order in Council, known to themselves and probably known to the gentlemen who are promoting the railway, undertook to spend two and a half million dollars for the purpose of aiding the construction of 125 miles of that road. The proposed line would run through no settlement and could be of no advantage to the country, because there was nothing binding on the company to construct the road any further. Two and a half million dollars were given secretly by Order in Council, without the authority of an Act of Parliament, without any authority whatever except the sweet will of the Government on the eve of the elections, for the purpose of constructing this section of road, and the further purpose of influencing he electorate of Manitoba, who believed that its construction of that line would be of advantage to them. The press, from one end of the country to the other, denounced it, the people denounced it, the supporters of the Government disclaimed responsibility and so great did the indignation of the country become that the Government dared not carry out the little scheme formulated in their Council Chamber. That was about the same time that they issued the famous remedial order, and issued it for the same purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is certainly going outside the question.

Mr. LISTER. Perhaps I am. If there ever has been a man in Parliament who has well represented his constituents, that man is the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr.

Martin). He has ever been the fearless advocate of the rights of the people of that country when the other representatives from that province were silent. He has ever been the true advocate of the interests of the people of the North-west country, and the people of Winnipeg knew what they were doing when they sent that hon. gentleman to Parliament.

An hon. MEMBER. Wait till the next election.

Mr. LISTER. At the next election the people will know what to do. The hon. member for Winnipeg has not been promoting schemes or corporations or things of that kind in Parliament, but he has been here day after day attending to the best interests of the people of the North-west. And this is the man whom it has become fashionable on the Conservative side to assail from day to day and to impute motives to. The hon. gentleman is quite competent at any time to meet any man on the other side from the Secretary of State down. Now, Mr. Speaker, this Bill ought not to pass. This is a Bill turning over to this corporation valuable franchises——

Mr. MACDOWALL. If the hon. gentleman will allow me for a moment, I would call his attention to the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg, whom he has been praising so much as looking after the interests of the people of that country, says that this Bill should pass. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should oppose the hon. member for Lambton, who says the Bill should not pass.

Mr. LISTER. Is this a question or a speech. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. No.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman is always out of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg is in favour of this Bill passing, but without giving to this company the right to control the Red River. I am willing and everybody is willing that the Bill should pass under those circumstances. But the objection is that the Government is handing over to a corporation one of the great waterways of the country which it is the duty of the Government and should be the policy of the Government to retain under its own control, and under no circumstances to hand over to any corporation temporarily [illegible] manently. If the promoters of this Bill are willing to eliminate from the Bill everything relating to the Red River, there will be no difficulty about the Bill passing this stage and going into committee. But with that clause in the Bill, even with the safeguards which the Minister of Railways provided, it would be unwise to pass it. I am bound to say that the hon. Minister took a good deal of interest in the measure and probably did what he thought was necessary. But I contend that the policy of giving even temporarily to a company control of this river was not a good policy. If this is done you cannot properly safeguard it in the public interest. The Bill does not properly safeguard it, because it does not provide that the tolls to be collected shall be such as the navigation warrants, regardless of the capital invested in the undertaking. That is what the people of Winnipeg ask for, and the Bill does not contain that. It should be safeguarded so that it shall not be a question of interest on investment, but of what the traffic can afford to pay. That is what has been contended for from the beginning and that is what my hon. friend from Winnipeg and others are willing to concede, if the promoters of this Bill are willing to accept it. Another difficulty which the Government will encounter is, that if these works on the Red River are constructed and the Government at any time decide to take them over, grave difficulties will stare them in the face as to the amount of compensation to be paid. The Bill says that the amount to be paid shall be the amount actually invested by the contractors. The Government will find great difficulty in ascertaining what the amounted invested is. We all know that in cases such as this great influence is brought to bear upon the Government. There is a general and natural feeling that the men who have invested their money should have something for that investment. The actual cost of these works is always magnified when the Government becomes the purchaser. Then if the work ever goes on—and that is doubtful—bonds for an enormous sum of money will be issued and sold, and when the works come to be taken over these bonds will be found to be in the hands of innocent purchasers. You will be taking from these people for commercial purposes the most valuable franchise you have granted them; and when you come to settle for it, you must of necessity consider the interests of the men who have loaned the money to the undertaking. You will be compelled to consider that phase of the question and, in fairness to the people who have invested their money you will be obliged to pay a larger sum than the works have actually cost. Taking the Bill from every standpoint, I submit that it should not become law with the grant in it to this company of the power to control the Red River.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to detain the House very long, for this subject has already received a good deal of consideration. But there are two or three points to which I wish to draw attention. I feel the force of a great deal of what has been said by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) and I quite recognize the point he raises as to the inadvisability of a great waterway like the Red River being placed in the hands of a company. But the hon. gentleman is no doubt aware that this subject of the improvement of St. Andrew's Rapids and the promotion of useful navigation between Winnipeg and the lake has engaged the attention of the Government for many years. A very careful survey has been made at that important point, and the Government have felt they owed it to the country, to, at the earliest moment that was in their power, undertake the construction of that work at the St. Andrew's Rapids that would enable the vessels to navigate from the city of Winnipeg to Lake Winnipeg. On that point we appear all to be at one. The hon. gentleman will see, however, that he underrates the provisions that have been made to safeguard that important matter in the Bill. The Bill provides that certain things may be done between Lake Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay via the River by canals or otherwise, "and may in like manner improve the navigation of the Red River, except in those portions of the Red River known as St. Andrew's Rapids." The next clause provides that the company "may, upon obtaining authority from the Governor in Council, improve, for the purposes of navigation and traffic thereon, these portions of the Red River hereinbefore excepted." Therefore the hon. gentleman will see that, consistently with the view the Government have always held since this matter was carefully examined and considered that portion of the work is excepted from that which the company may engage in ; and if this Bill passes in its entirety as it is here stated, they will have no power to touch that portion of the work at St. Andrew's Rapids without the express permission of the Governor in Council.

Mr. LISTER. Will the hon. gentleman excuse me for a moment. The Bill provides that the company may improve the navigation of the Red River except these portions, St. Andrew's Rapids and others, and that the right to do that is given them under the Bill. That is to be done, the right is given to do that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, the hon. gentleman will find that, if this Bill passes in its entirety as it is now before the House, the company will have no power to touch the work at St. Andrew's Rapids on the Red River, because that is distinctly excepted from the Bill.

Mr. LISTER. I beg your pardon. The last two lines of section 3 say "the improvement of which rapids," that is, the St. Andrew's Rapids, "and shoal by the company shall be subject to the provisions hereinafter contained."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so. That is to show that, if this Bill passes, these parties who have this charter have no power to touch that work at all ; because, if the hon. gentleman will look at the next clause, he will see that until they receive the specific authority of the Governor in Council, they cannot touch this work. Now, I do not believe that a blow will ever be struck by the company, under this Bill, on this work at St. Andrew's Rapids. As I said before, it is a work that the Government have long felt it was absolutely necessary to undertake so soon as the financial position of the country would enable us to grapple with it. I do not think, therefore, that the hon. gentleman need be apprehensive, guarded as the scheme is, with the known policy of the Government as it is. I believe it will be found that, while it will be open to them to do that which the hon. gentleman says both sides of the House wishes they should have permission to do, to construct a canal to the Hudson's Bay from Lake Winnipeg, the portion to which the hon. gentleman takes exception is completely guarded, and with that protection I am satisfied the House will rest content. It will require the most serious consideration on the part of the Government, and it would be under very exceptional circumstances, that they would permit the control of a work of so much importance on the great Red River to be undertaken by any private company. Now, Sir, I cannot help but expressing my surprise that the hon. member representing the city of Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) should take up hours of the time of this House in denouncing a measure upon which the hearts and feelings of the people of Manitoba and the North-west are more centred to-day than on any other question that is before this country. I cannot understand why any hon. gentleman should be induced to denounce and endeavour to hold up to ridicule, as impracticable, a work upon which not only the sentiments of the people of Manitoba and the North-west are centred to-day as upon no other question, but a work that I believe, having studied it carefully for many years, is of the most vital consequence to the progress and development of that great country. Now, Sir, I have always been recognized in this House as one who believes thoroughly in Manitoba and the North-west. Indeed, I may say that, in my judgment, the rapid development and progress of Canada as a whole depends more upon the development of that great prairie region between the Red River and the Rocky Mountains, than upon any other scheme that can be devised. The hon. member for Winnipeg has endeavoured, though unsuccessfully, I am sure, to lead this House to believe that this Government only takes this question up on the eve of an election ; that when an election is coming on, then the question of the Hudson's Bay Railway assumes very great proportions. Now, I will protect myself against that insinuation by reading, if the House will indulge me, some remarks which I made, not on an occasion when I was interested in an election in the North-west, but at a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society in London, in 1888, when I never expected to have the honour of sitting in this House again.

On that occasion, a paper on the Hudson's Bay and Hudson's Straits as a navigable channel was read by Commodore A. H. Markham, of the Royal Navy, and I followed the reading of the paper with a few observations. I may remark that elaborate authorities have been quoted here by hon. gentlemen opposite to show that the navigation of the Hudson's Bay is impracticable. Sir, there is no person in this House, there is no intelligent man in this country, who does not recognize the vast importance to Canada of this outlet for that great prairie region, with its boundless capabilities, and there is no person who does not recognize the value it would be to Canada, if it should be proved that there is a navigable route from Fort Churchill to the mother country through that inland sea. Then, why, I ask, should hon. gentlemen exhibit such eagerness, such impassioned eagerness to denounce as impracticable a measure that lies at the very foundation of the prosperity of Manitoba and the North-west? Authorities have been quoted for that purpose, but no authority can be quoted, so high upon that point as the authority of Commodore Markham, now Admiral Markham, one of the most distinguished admirals in the British fleet, a man who has obtained the very highest position in the great profession to which he belongs, whose words are entitled to the consideration of every person who is interested in that question. Commodore Markham accompanied the "Alert" into the Hudson's Bay, for the purpose of satisfying himself with regard to the navigation of those waters. He examined the whole subject very carefully, examined it in the light of history and of experience, and he returned to England impressed and completely satisfied as to the entire feasibility of the navigation of the Hudson's Bay for between four and five months of the year. I may mention that Admiral Markham did not read this paper, because he was away at sea, but it was read by his brother; and I had the pleasure of listening to the detailed history of the navigation of Hudson's Bay and Straits from the very commencement of such navigation down to the period when Admiral Markham visited those waters himself. He went on with his examination, step by step, taking all the testimony and historical evidence that could be adduced, and he arrived at the conclusion, as I have said, that the navigation of the Hudson's Bay for between four and five months of the year, as a great commercial route, was perfectly feasible. Now, on that occasion, I had the pleasure of listening to that elaborate argument, and I would ask the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the statement that the return voyages of the Hudson's Bay Company's fleet take place in September and October, and on many occasions they find the straits clear of ice and free for navigation down to the end of November; so that hon. gentlemen will see that Admiral Markham is within the mark, when he places the period of navigation at between four and five months. Upon that point I will quote his own language, in an article which he published, over his own signature, in "Good Words":

> My opinion regarding the feasibility of an ocean route between England and Hudson's Bay is decidedly a favourable one, and I have so reported; whether it could be successful in a financial point of view is a question for others to decide, it is one that did not lie within the scope of my instruction to answer, nor have I sufficient knowledge of the requirements of the propose railroad even to offer an opinion on it.

I may say that Admiral Markham, having gone through the Straits of Hudson's Bay returned by a canoe voyage from Hudson's Bay to Winnipeg. He continues:

> The country through which I travelled is admirably adapted for the construction of a line, no tunnels are necessary, and but few cuttings, whilst the rivers and streams, that would cross the line of route are so narrow, that the expense of throwing bridges across them would be very small indeed.

I call the attention of hon. gentlemen particularly to this:

> I only hope that the result of my journey will not be altogether fruitless, and that we may soon hear that Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay have been connected by rail; the consequences of such a connection will, I am quite sure, be the commercial development of a very large extent of country, and the increased prosperity of the Dominion of Canada. For such a consummation all those who pride themselves on the greatness and welfare of the British Empire will assuredly pray.

I am afraid, Sir, there are hon. gentlemen here who are not in a sufficiently devotional spirit to pray for a consummation so devoutly to to be wished. On that occasion—and it was not on the eve of an election, and certainly it was not in any way my intention to take part in one,—I spoke as follows—I am now reading from the proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society, June, 1888:

> Sir Charles Tupper said he had listened to the paper with unqualified pleasure. It was impossible to look at the map of North America without seeing how vitally important every question became that had a bearing upon the increase of facilities for intercourse between Canada and the British islands. The American Consul, M. Taylor, who has lived for more than twenty years at Winnipeg, whose knowledge of the country is not exceeded by that of any other person in it, and who might be assumed to speak in an entirely disinterested manner, had stated that of the remaining undeveloped wheat fields in North America, three-fourths were to the north of the boundary line.
> During the last season, sixteen million bushels of grain were produced in Manitoba and in the North-west Territories. It was therefore manifest that it was of the utmost importance to obtain the nearest and best route for disposing of the produce. The chief outlet from that great granary was at present by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which ran from Vancouver down to Montreal and Quebec, from whence the grain was taken by ocean steamers to England ; but another outlet was by the great inland navigation from the head of Lake Superior to the Straits of Belle Isle. A line of communication via Hudson's Bay would bring Winnipeg, the capital of Manitoba, 1,100 miles nearer to this country than via New York. That fact gave immense importance to the investigation which had been made in connection with the navigability of Hudson's Bay. It was perfectly apparent that if the territory were only half developed it would tax beyond their capacity all the resources of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and also the resources of an additional line of railway to Fort Churchill. The Canadian Pacific Railway company, which owned 14,000,000 acres of this great wheat field, would be only too glad to see additional facilities afforded between that region and Europe.

Under these circumstances, it was very gratifying to learn that Commodore Markham was able to add his personal testimony to the experience of those who had endeavoured to open up that country and to give so many reasons for entertaining the belief that it might be found practicable to establish a comparatively safe route for the trade of several months in the year. It was true that the officers sent there by the Canadian Government had not taken so sanguine a view, but Commodore Markham was a higher authority than anyone who had been employed there by the Government.

If it could be demonstrated that for four or five months in the year a fairly safe communication could be established by that line, he had no hesitation in saying that the day was not far distant when a railway would be made from Winnipeg to Fort Churchill. The Government of Canada had not only sent various expeditions to Hudson's Bay for the purpose of testing its navigability, but they had obtained from the Canadian Parliament, seven million acres of land for subsidizing and constructing a line of railway seven hundred miles long, from Winnipeg to Fort Churchill.

I have already stated that this speech was not made with a view to an election, but was a frank and candid statement made in my judgment in the best interest of Canada, and to place in a favourable light before the world the advantages that would accrue to Canada, and especially to Manitoba and the North-west, from the construction of that line of railway, opening up a route to the mother country so much shorter and having so many advantages as this route would present. If I was correct in the statement that at no distant date, and I think events have shown I was not inaccurate, the crop of Manitoba and the North-west would more than tax all the facilities which the Canadian Pacific Railway could offer as an outlet for those products, and there would be also abundant traffic for a line of railway which would bring the North-west and Manitoba so much nearer to the mother country by way of the Hudson's Bay route—if I was warranted in making that statement when the wheat products of Manitoba and the North-west was only 16,000,000 bushels, how much stronger does the case stand to-night when I have already shown that during last year something like 36,000,000 bushels of wheat were raised in Manitoba and the North-west. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lister) is labouring under a great delusion with respect to the wheat crop of Great Britain during the past year. I see where the hon. gentleman has been led into error. He has taken 1894 instead of 1895, and that is the way in which the hon. gentleman has been induced to make a comparative statement so disparaging as regards the wheat crops of Great Britain and the North-west and Manitoba during the past year. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Statesman's Year-book for 1896, he will find on page 68 that the total wheat crop of Great Britain is there put down for 1895 as 37,170,000 bushels.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman said it was twice as much as our own.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) who said that the wheat crop was twice as large as the wheat crop in Manitoba and the North-west. The hon. gentleman must not put his words in my mouth, when I am producing the evidence of the fact that he has underestimated the wheat crop of Manitoba and the North-west by one-half.

Mr. LISTER. You misunderstand me. I was referring to the hon. gentleman who preceded you, the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) ; he put it as twice as much as the wheat crop of Great Britain.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not understand the hon. gentleman to do so. But I understood the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) to say, and I believe he was reiterating a statement made by another hon. gentleman on a recent occasion, that the wheat crop of Great Britain during the past year was 60,000,000 bushels.

Mr. LISTER. I did nothing of the kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say so. But the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) said that the wheat crop of Great Britain was twice as large as that of Manitoba and of the North-west, and that is the statement I am controverting. I may say that the "Statesman's Year-book" is not exactly accurate. The most accurate authority in Great Britain, in regard to that question is known as "Beerbohm," and I also take the London "Standard," a paper of the highest eminence, a paper that devotes very much attention to important agricultural questions. If the hon. gentleman will look at the London "Standard," he will find that they correct Beerbohm's estimate, and give as the actually correct estimate, and give the authority for it, that the amount of wheat grown in Great Britain during last year was 4,600,000 quarters, or 36,800,000 bushels. I was therefore within the mark when I stated that the crop of Manitoba and the North-west was about equal to that of the crop of Great Britain during the past year. Sir, I do not intend to dwell upon the point further than to say that if, under existing difficulties, under the depression which has existed, under the loss of crops from frost and drought, we have produced so much wheat in 1895, with a handful of agriculturists to be found in that country, some 25,000 all told; if we could do so well under such difficulties, now when they are beginning to understand how to raise wheat in the North-west, what will not be produced in that immense granary, which has been so graphically described by the American consul who lived for twenty years in Winnipeg. And, Sir, what would not capital and industry do at a very early date in that country? There is no gentleman here who does not know that in a brief space of time, with the attention that is now drawn in the United Kingdom to the vital importance of building up British colonies instead of foreign countries, and of sending British labour and capital into the colonies instead of foreign countries, there is not a gentleman here who does not know that in a comparatively short space of time, neither the Canadian Pacific Railway with all its appliances, nor the Hudson Bay Railway, if it were in operation to-day, would be able to furnish a sufficient outlet for the products of that great country. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House, but I cannot forbear saying that I wish hon. gentlemen opposite could be induced; I wish anything could induce them to have a little more faith in their country than they appear to have. When measures are brought forward to open up and develop this magnificent territory that is under our jurisdiction, I wish anything could induce these hon. gentlemen of the Opposition to look with more favourable eyes upon our efforts, and not be disposed to criticize them in that narrow and carping spirit which is most deadly to our efforts to bring in that capital and labour, which is all that is required to make that a magnificent domain. I believe that there is nothing to which the energy of the Government of this country could be directed with greater advantage than to carrying out these projects which Admiral Markham has shown, so far as navigation is concerned, are perfectly feasible; projects, the feasibility of which the ablest authorities agree upon, and which after being examined in London by large and influential ship-owners, they have professed themselves ready, as I am informed, to undertake the naval portion of the work, and they say: Construct your line to the Hudson's Bay, and we will bind ourselves to put on admirable steamers for the purpose of carrying to the mother country, the traffic that you will bring to us there. Hon. gentlemen opposite—whenever they have an opportunity—seem disposed to disparage everything connected with the development of our country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. Who does not know that the Hudson Bay itself, opened for nine months in the year—not the Straits, I admit, not navigable for nine months in the year—but who does not know that the waters of the Hudson's Bay are warmer than those of Lake Superior. That has been established beyond controversy, and there is a large portion of the Hudson's Bay open and navigable for nine months in the year. Who does not know that if we had a railway capable of bringing down the valuable fisheries of the Hudson Bay—to say nothing of it as a fur-bearing country—down to the United States, just across our borders in Manitoba; who does not know the immense business that might be developed in that respect.

Why, Sir, I am occasionally taunted by hon. gentlemen opposite for holding very extravagant views in regard to the future of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Sir, it is nothing new for these hon. gentlemen to raise this question. When I stood here in 1880, and endeavoured to convince hon. gentlemen opposite that this country would act wisely and well, to construct a transcontinental railway to connect us with the waters of the Pacific, how was I met? Sir, I was met by the denunciation of these hon. gentlemen. I do not say that anybody descended so low as to characterize it as a wild-cat scheme. That is language that I do not think does any credit to Parliament or to any hon. gentleman who resorts to it. In 1880 I was met by the united phalanx of a great party sitting opposite, who denounced that project from the start to the finish, and who did all that men could do to break it down. I was met by a united party opposite, who held the project up to the country as a project that would ruin Canada, and that would destroy its credit.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am entirely in order, Mr. Speaker, since you have permitted the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) to discuss this question in the manner they have done to-night. Why, Sir, when the hon. gentleman who led the Opposition in this House in 1880, and who led it with an ability that has never been equalled; when the Hon. Edward Blake went to the shores of British Columbia he made a speech there in which he said: I did all I could to prevent the construction of this trancontinental railway, but now that it has been done, I am here to confess that I was wrong. Sir, I had faith in the country then. When hon. gentlemen opposite to-night denounce measures that I believe lie at the very foundation of the progress and prosperity of Canada, I remind them that the past history of the country justifies me in claiming the confidence of the people, as I did claim it and obtained it, and justifies me in throwing grave doubts upon the judgment of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker,——

Mr. FOSTER. How about that wheat ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will come to that in a minute. Do you mean the 640,000,000 bushels ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No. The sixty million bushels.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I certainly should begin to lose faith in my country if I heard many such speeches delivered by the leader of this House as the one he has delivered now. That hon. gentleman seemed to speak without any sense of responsibility at all, and his speech, I will say, would do just as well if applied to any other project, as to the one which is before the House to-night. He spoke about the condition of our North-west Territories and about his action in 1880 with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway. What has that got to do with the construction of a canal to the Hudson Bay, or to the north pole ? Surely the hon. gentleman does not ask the House to accept any of his prophecies as being at all within the region of probability, because nearly every prophecy he has ever made, has been falsified by the facts. The hon. gentleman will excuse me if, as one member of this House, on the very threshold of the few remarks I shall make, I take exception to the quotation which he made from Mr. Blake's speech in British Columbia. Although I have not the speech in my hand at the present moment, I challenge the accuracy of the quotation which the hon. gentleman made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not profess to give a quotation from it. I professed to give the substance of it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) professed to read a recantation of his policy in this House, which, he said, was made by the Hon. Edward Blake. I profess to say here with some authority that that statement is inaccurate. I know Mr. Blake's policy. I was one of those who stood behind him in this House and supported him in that policy. I have never known Mr. Blake to withdraw, for one moment, from the belief that the policy he then proposed to the House was the best policy the country could have adopted. I can tell the hon. gentleman that there are hundreds of thousands of men in this country to-day who believe that if Mr. Blake's policy at that time had been adopted instead of the wild policy which the hon. gentleman advocated, this country would be very much further advanced in prosperity and wealth than it is. A great many of the evils under which we are labouring and suffering to-day are directly chargeable to the reckless policy which the hon. gentleman foisted on this country. If there is stagnation and depression in trade in Canada, unparalleled in our history, upon that hon. gentleman's shoulders more than upon anybody else's must rest the responsibility. I can tell him that some of the cleverest and best men on his own side of the House were entirely at variance with him in his policy at that time, and events have since proved that their heads were level and his was not. The hon. gentleman talks—and I submit to the House whether there is any reason in his talk—of want of faith in the country exhibited by men on this side of the House. In what respect have we shown want of faith ? We have told the world at large time and again that we believe thoroughly in the great material resources of this Dominion, that we have absolute faith in its people, its climate and its future ; but we have no faith now, and we never have had any faith, in the men who misguide the destinies of this country. Sir, is it because we do not support every scheme that is suggested by a private company that the hon. member dares to charge us with want of faith in the country ? How many men sitting beside him to-night have the slightest faith in the scheme now before the House ? The hon. gentleman comes forward to support it, and I ask him and his followers has he produced one scintilla of evidence to justify one of the statements he has made ? The hon. gentleman told us—and I listened with a good deal of curiosity to see how he would support the statement—that Admiral Markham had made certain statements with regard to the navigability of Hudson's Bay, which he was about to establish. The hon. gentleman took up the pamphlet—"Good Words," I think it was—in which there was a popular essay by Admiral Markham on Hudson's Bay, and not one word did the hon. gentleman read to the House, from that essay, showing that the Admiral had committed himself to any of the statements which the hon. gentleman said he had. Some glittering generalities he quoted, but where is Admiral Markham's authority for the statement that Hudson's Bay is navigable for three or four months in the year—and when I speak of the Bay being navigable, I mean, of course, through the Straits. The hon. gentleman did not do it. He read a very pleasing summary of some remarks which he had made before the Geographical Society. It is most interesting to listen to the hon. gentleman, either here or elsewhere ; for he always speaks nicely and in a way that makes it interesting to listen to him. But when you come to analyse what he has really said, and get down to the data on which he bases his statements, is there a man in this House who would venture to commit himself to this scheme on any single authority which the hon. gentleman gave to this House? And, mind you, we are listening to the leader of the House advocating a scheme which will probably commit this country to an expenditure of millions of money. Although it is called a private scheme, that is the very thinnest of disguises from the fact that this company are coming here to seek a subsidy. The very Bill contemplates a subsidy. In the fourth clause it speaks of the amount of subsidy to be paid by the Government of Canada to the company. On the very face of the project, not only is a subsidy contemplated, but indirectly Parliament lends its sanction to it; and we see what is to be done with regard to that subsidy when we have the leader of this House, from whom the taxpayers and the representatives of the taxpayers of this country might have hoped for a calm and reasoned speech, indulging in glittering generalities, in abuse of his opponents, and in a loud trumpet call to his followers in this House to support the scheme, whether it is good or bad. I stand here to condemn this conduct, and the hon. gentleman personally, when he asks the House to follow him in such a scheme without being prepared to produce evidence to show that it is not only feasible, but a judicious scheme, to which the taxpayers should be invited to grant their money. The hon. gentleman is absolutely without excuse. He not only failed to quote one single line to show that Admiral Markham had committed himself to the statement which he said he had, but under his hand were the reports of the men he himself had sent to Hudson's Bay, certifying that the statements he made were not correct, and that Hudson's Bay is not navigable longer than from about the first of July to the last of September, or three months at the outside. In 1883, Commander Gordon was sent out to Hudson's Bay, and made a survey and report. In 1884 the Government very properly sent him back. In 1885 he returned again. He made three separate and distinct surveys. Now, upon this point I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that the whole Opposition are at one in recognizing the enormous importance of obtaining an outlet for the great granary of the North-west. We will not scruple to join in voting any reasonable sum of money to ascertain, if possible, that the navigation of Hudson's Bay is practicable. We do not want to limit the Government in that respect. If they are dissatisfied with the official reports which have been made, let them get other reports; let them be as conclusive as you please; but do not ask us to commit this country to an expenditure of millions of money by reversing the official reports as they stand. These reports run over three years, and what do they show? Are we to shut our eyes to these reports, for which we have paid enormous sums of money? Every one knows that a more careful, accurate or painstaking officer than Commander Gordon never was in the Dominion of Canada. His character stands at the very highest as a prudent, careful, level-headed man, who jumped at no conclusions, and whose report is most valuable, because he not only gives you his conclusions, but the data on which they are based. I remember going most carefully over these reports at the time they were laid before the House. I spent this afternoon refreshing my mind by re-reading them and I could not help admiring the extraordinary pains that were taken by that distinguished officer and by the men who accompanied him, to ascertain the real facts of this matter. I call the attention of the House to these statements. I am reading now from the report of 1884. After giving a summary of his investigation during every day of the three months he was in the gulf, he winds up in the following words:—

> In the foregoing pages the accounts given by the observers at the several stations of the formation and movements of the ice have been given. In a narrative portion of the report the ice met with by the "Alert" has also been recorded, but as it has not been described in detail, I will here make some further remarks concerning it. Our observations show that during the first half of the month of June, a belt of ice, varying in width from 30 to 50 miles, extended the whole length of the Labrador coast, from Cape Chudleigh to Belle Isle. Off the Hudson's Strait at this time the field extended from 35 to 100 miles to the eastward of Resolution Island. On the 16th of June when I endeavoured to enter the strait the ship was beset in heavy ice about 20 miles to south-west Cape Best. This ice was very heavy and some of it in large sheets, but at the turn of the tide the pact generally slacked off a little when a ship was worked on under steam or sail as opportunity offered; this state of affairs continued until the 6th of July, when, owing to the damage done to the ship, we had to return to St. John. Except on one occasion no large amount of open water was seen from our masthead, the ice was always seeming to be tight to the westward of the ship. I measured the thickness of many of the pans. Some were 22 feet, but the common kind was floe ice about 10 feet in thickness. On the 4th of August, when we got back from St. John there were still a great deal of ice in the straits, and some of the pans were of great size, many of them being over half a mile in length. There was at this time undoubtedly a run of clear water to the westward, had I taken a more southerly course, but, in the "Neptune," we had found, in 1884, that the ice all lay over the south shore and this made me decide to try the north shore again this year.
> The Hudson's Bay officers who navigate the straits state that the movements of the ice are both irregular and uncertain, that sometimes they find the north shore clear first, in the following voyage the position of affairs may be completely reversed. I consider that the ice met with in August this year was such that had I been simply endeavouring to force my way through the straits I could have been clear with less than five days detention, even taking the route which

> I did, and had I taken a more southerly course I should most likely have got through with a couple of days delay.
> No ice, other than a few bergs, was met with after leaving Stupart's Bay, on 22nd August.
> In the " Alert " the height of the topmast head from the water line was 99 feet, which gives a horizon of almost 11 miles.
> I am indebted for the following notes to the Rev. Abbe Verreau, taken from the manuscript journal, kept by Captain Wm. Falconer, who was a sloop master in the Hudson's Bay Company's service in the years 1868-69. Captain Falconer states : "In the month of July, when the above Hudson's Bay Company's ships commonly got their passage through the strait outward bound, it is almost blocked with ice, some of which is aground in 100 fathoms of water, and this with the large quantities of floating ice, makes the passage dangerous, and detains the ships, some years, till the latter end of August, before they get clear of the straits."
> The ice mentioned in the above quoted paragraph as being aground in 100 fathoms of water is undoubtedly intended to apply to icebergs, some of which I have myself seen aground in from 80 to 100 fathoms. On the north side of the straits remain some of these large masses of ice getting aground at high water of spring tides will remain fast for weeks if they do not break up. Captain Falconer states that the bay was only navigable from the latter part of July to the middle of October. On 8th August, 1868, he reports heavy field ice off Severn House ; yet, on that particular year he states that the Hudson's Bay ship from England arrived on the 11th August, one of the early dates.

I will not trouble the House with reading many more extracts, but there are one or two that I think it important to read. On the next page, he says :

> It is therefore certain that during the months of May, June and July, large fields of ice were present in the entrance of the straits, and the question remains, at what date was this ice in such a condition as to permit the passage of vessels strengthened for meeting the ice, but which could be used as freight steamers. For in all questions as to feasibility of the navigation I am not considering the date at which one of the Dundee whaling of Newfoundland sealing steamers could be forced through, but when a strongly built iron steamer, sheathed and otherwise strengthened, could make the passage * *
> I am of opinion that the straits were passable at the eastern entrance about the date that we returned to St. John for repairs, viz., 5th July, but any ship going in at this date would still have been subject to these delays, but might have made for 25 to 40 miles a day. * * *
> Everything goes to show that though there would have been very frequent delays, still it would have been possible for a steamship to have got through the straits by the 15th or 20th July. * * * As to the closing of navigation in 1884, Mr. Laperrière reports, at Cape Digges, that on 25th October the ice was solid in every direction, and at Nottingham Island a similar entry is made on the 27th. A distinction must be made between the closing of navigation by the formation of young ice, and the presence of a large field of heavy old ice which is cemented together by the formation of young ice between the pans. In the first case any ordinarily powerful steamer could go through without risk, but in the second case the most powerful of whaling or sealing steamers would be helpless. The western end of the straits is always subject to incursions of this heavy ice, from Fox Channel, and epecially so in the months of September and October, when strong north-easterly and north-westerly gales are frequent, and we have no evidence that in both seasons, 1884 and 1885, this heavy ice came down in October.
> As to the length of season for practical navigation, if we regard the presence of field ice as the only barrier, the information which we have got would point to the months of July, August, September and October as being the months in which the straits are passable. As a rule, in July there will be delays, but to vessels strengthened and sheathed there would be no danger in making the passage.

That was his report in 1885 of the results of his survey in 1884 before he had finally concluded his investigation. That officer was sent back by the Marine Department, in the year 1886, and I shall quote you a paragraph or two from his final report, after he had made the third year's investigation, to show what conclusions he had finally formed as to the navigability of those straits. In order that the House may understand his report thoroughly, I shall quote one paragraph from the instructions given him by the Minister of Marine, so that the House may see what he was instructed to do. The instructions are signed by Mr. Foster, the present Minister of Finance :

> It is desirable that you should proceed to the mouth of Hudson's Straits with as little delay as possible, so as to avail yourself of the very first feasible opportunity to make the passage through. If you are prevented from at once entering the straits, you will occupy your time in taking accurate observations of the extent and condition of the ice, the prevailing winds, and the currents at its mouth.
> At the earliest possible period, consistent with the safety of the expedition, you will push through the straits, in order to demonstrate the earliest date of opening navigation and the time required to pass through the ice, noting carefully all the incidents of the passage.

With these instructions he proceeded, and his very valuable report is here, which will well repay perusal by any hon. gentleman who wants to understand the subject. I shall not weary the House with the details, but call your attention simply to the conclusion to which Lieutenant Gordon came, after giving the data on which he formed his conclusion. At page 90 of his report, he says :

> Having now made voyages on three years to Hudson's Straits, and having carefully examined the report by the observer as to the formation and movements of the ice in Hudson's Straits, I have the honour to submit the following statement in regard to the navigation of these waters.
> In discussing this question I think it well to state that I am not required to report on the commercial aspect of the case, and whether Hudson's Straits navigation can be made to pay, nor do I, in the seasonal limit given, mean to state that it is impossible for a ship occasionally to get in earlier or leave later ; but having care> fully considered the subject, I give the following as the season during which navigation may, in ordinary years be regarded as practicable for the purposes of commerce ; not, indeed, to the cheaply built freight steamer, commonly known as the "Ocean Tramp," but to vessels of about 2,000 tons gross, fortified for meeting the ice, and of such construction as to enable them to be fair freight carriers. These vessels must be well strengthened forward ; should have wooden sheathing, and be very full under the counter ; the propeller should be of small diameter and be well down in the water. I place the limit of size at about 2,000 tons because a larger ship would be somewhat unwieldy, could not make such good way through the loose ice ; and being unable to turn so sharply she would get many a heavy blow, that the smaller ship would escape.

> I consider that the season for the opening of navigation to such vessels as the above will, on the average, fall between 1st and 10th July. The position and movements of the ice I have already discussed, and need not here repeat. The closing of the season would be about the first week in October, partly on account of the descent of old ice from Fox Channel into the western end of the straits ; this old ice being rapidly cemented into solid flow by the formation of young ice between the pans ; in such ice, no ship, however powerful, could do anything to free herself. At this time, too, the days are rapidly shortening, and snowstorms are frequent though not of great duration.
> The tidal currents in Hudson's Straits add very considerably to the risks of navigation. These currents are in velocity from three to six knots per hour, and the uncertainty of this effect on ships has already been pointed out in the case of the "Fury" and "Hecla." I have myself, when fast in the ice in thick weather, tried the ground log, and have made out apparently the rate and direction in which we were being carried, but in almost every instance, when we began to haul in the line, it fouled some spur of ice beneath, and weights and line together would be lost.
> The last, and indeed the most serious, difficulty that I anticipate is in the faulty working of the compasses, especially at about the critical ground of Digges Island. Mansell Island can, under most circumstances, be kept clear of by the lead, but in the neighbourhood of Digges Island nothing but the most sleepless vigilance and the greatest caution will save a ship from disaster.

Now, between the first and tenth they can go in, and navigation closes the first week in October, and so you have the larger part of July, the whole of August and the whole of September, two and a half or three months, at the outside. Then he gives two paragraphs to show why that is so, but it is not necessary to enter into these details. He continues :

> Further, in an iron ship any severe concussion changes the magnetic condition of the ship, hence when working through ice constant changes would be taking place in the ship's attraction and, consequently, in the compass errors.
> I am further of opinion that in an iron ship, making the voyage between, say Liverpool and Hudson's Bay, on arrival off the western end of the straits, the compass will not work.
> Altogether I consider the navigation of Hudson's Straits being more than ordinarily difficult, with shores inhospitable and bleak, presenting such a picture of loneliness and desolation, that it takes some time to get accustomed to it. The only safety in thick weather lies in the constant use of the lead and keeping a bright lookout, as the dead reckoning is frequently in error to a considerable extent.

Now, we have here an official report, accurately made up from data gathered from day to day, during a period of three years, and from the log-books of Hudson's Bay sailors, who have been trading there for many years, and from examinations of the captains of these Hudson's Bay ships. And the hon. gentleman asks us to take instead the superficial opinion of a gentleman who once went into Hudson's Straits, and never went back, but came out overland by way of Winnipeg. To state the facts, I think, is to show how ridiculous it is to give such evidence in the face of that official report, which the hon. gentleman had, or ought to have had, under his hand. Why did I read it ? To show the utter absurdity of the statement that this side of the House was animated by want of faith in the country. Does not the country, do not the taxpayers want to know the facts ? Are they to be led about, to follow every will-o'-the-wisp that is flaunted on the midnight air by the eloquence of the hon. gentleman—eloquent words, but with conclusions based upon no data at all. We are here, Sir, not in a region of fancy, but in a region of facts and realities, and, as business men, we want to deal with the real facts, not with probabilities, or possibilities, or fancy predictions of what may be in the future. We have in this report the facts of the case. It may be, that the future investigations may modify, or, to some extent, alter the conclusion which Lieutenant Gordon reached, but, until these conclusions are altered or modified, the Government ought not to ask us to engage in large financial operations in the teeth of the report Lieutenant Gordon has made. Now, one word regarding the reference made to my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister). I believe the hon. member for Lambton was not so far astray in the construction he put upon the Bill. The Bill hands over, practically, to this company the control of the Red River. The hon. leader of the House points out that there is an exception to these operations known as the St. Andrew's Rapids.

Mr. DALY. An important one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But this House is asked to hand over the control of the Red River, including the St. Andrew's Rapids, with one limitation, and that is, that, before they can construct the work, they must have the authority of the Governor General in Council, approving of the kind of work they are going to build ; nothing more. The Bill provides that the company

> May in like manner improve the navigation of the Red River, excepting those portions of the Red River known as the St. Andrew's Rapids, > Point Shoal, the Elm Point Shoal, the Two Point Shoal, and the South Bend Shoal, the improvement of which rapids and shoal by the company shall be subject to the provisions hereinafter contained.

These are the only limitations upon the exclusive right of control. The next clause goes on :

> The company may, upon obtaining authority from the Governor in Council——

Mr. DALY. Hear, hear—a condition precedent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Let me read it, and I will show you the construction I put upon it :

> —improve for the purposes of navigation and traffic thereon, those portions of the Red River hereinbefore excepted, provided that the plans and specifications of such improvements and the works connected therewith shall be first approved by the Governor in Council, and that the works shall be carried out and completed under the superivision of the Governor in Council.

Now, it strikes me that the meaning of that is, that the character of the work is to be approved by the Governor in Council, and not that the Governor in Council is to give his approval of the construction of the work itself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Both.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it is perfectly plain that the Governor in Council would never attempt to prevent proper works which commended themselves to his judgment. The object is to ensure the construction of proper works, and not to prevent building altogether. That is the view I take of it, and it does seem to me, looking at the prominent fact which meets you at the threshold of the argument, that the Bill ought not to be passed until you are satisfied of the navigability of Hudson's Straits. Until that is done, I think you are doing wrong in chartering this company, to be floated in the London money market, with your approbation and approval, in the face of this report that, except about two and a half months in the year, Hudson's Straits are not navigable. This open period begins in July and ends in September. When is the wheat crop garnered and ready for shipment ? You would be shipping, at the very best, the previous year's crop to come in competition with the current year's crop, shipped by way of Montreal or New York. I have no means of judging whether Lieutenant Gordon's report is strictly accurate or not. But I am bound to assume that it is accurate, and, in view of that report, it would surely be an unwise policy, a fatuous policy, to charter a company to construct a canal to Hudson's Bay, and allow that company to go into the money market of the world with our imprimatur upon it, unless we are satisfied that, when they get their grain to Hudson's Bay, that bay is navigable, so that the grain can be taken to Liverpool. What will be said in the London market if you give your imprimatur to that Bill ? It will be said that the Parliament of Canada, that ought to know, never would have passed the Bill until they were satisfied beyond a doubt that the grain could be carried easily and practicably by the Hudson's Bay route. But we are not satisfied, and nobody that I have heard, except the leader of the House, has ventured to assert—and he did it either in ignorance of Lieutenant Gordon's report, or without having refreshed his mind upon it—nobody has ventured to assert that Lieutenant Gordon's conclusion are not accurate, and should not be accepted by this House.

Mr. HAGGART. I have but a few words to say in reply to the hon. gentleman who has offered this extraordinary opposition to the Bill that is before the House. The Bill received no opposition in the Railway Committee except from the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) who insisted that certain clauses should be inserted in it. If I may be pardoned for referring to what took place in the committee, I may say that I stated what the Government's decision was in reference to it, namely, that they had always contemplated improving the navigation of the Red River to Lake Winnipeg. I informed the hon. gentlemen who were promoting the Bill that before it could pass the Government reserved to itself the right, if they allowed them to construct that work, of making such conditions as would entirely safeguard the public. I was very careful in the clauses that were drawn out. I got the views of the committee on the subject, and had the Bill drawn up by the Minister of Justice, and, I say, it carefully guards, in every particular, the public interest in the construction of that work. The hon. gentleman says that the Government and the people of this country give their imprimatur to a Bill, because we simply give this company a charter. This is a monstrous doctrine, which I never heard before advanced by any person in this House. The hon. gentleman deals in extravagant statements. Who ever heard of the Government of a country giving its imprimatur to a Bill when they give to a company its entity, or a charter for the purpose of constructing a particular work ? No person ever dreamed of such a thing. The leader of the House has stated this evening that every care has been taken for the purpose of guarding the public interest in constructing that communication, between Winnipeg and Lake Winnipeg. That surely cannot be an objection to the Bill. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) says that our imprimatur is not to be given to the Bill ; but the hon. member for Winnipeg, who represents that city, and is most interested in it, says that the Government imprimatur or charter, ought to be given to this company, but, at the same time, we must guard the interests of the people of Winnipeg, who are so deeply interested in this navigation. After that statement of the leader of the House to-night, I suppose the hon. member from Winnipeg will withdraw his opposition to the Bill. The leader of the House has stated, after having plans and specifications prepared regarding the improvements of St. Andrew's Rapids, that in the construction of that work, the public interest will be carefully guarded by the Government. The hon. gentleman attacks the leader of the House because he says that Commodore Markham gave him authority to say that the straits are open for four and a half months in the year. He questions that Commodore Markham made any such statement. I will read his report upon the subject, showing that instead of four and a half months in the year, navigation is open for nearer six months in the year. But, first, here is what Sir Edward Parry says:

> Long experience has brought those who frequent this navigation to the conclusion that, in most seasons, no advantage is to be gained by attempting to enter Hudson's Strait earlier than the first week in July. The annual disruption of the ice, which occupies the upper and middle parts of the strait, is supposed not to take place until about this time. In the course of one single year's experience in these parts, we have seen nothing to recommend a practice different from that at present pursued by the ships of the Hudson's Bay Company.

And Commodore Markham says:

> I heartily concur with every word in this quotation, for it exactly corresponds with my own experience. But the fact must not be overlooked, that this advice is addressed to those who attempt the navigation of the strait in sailing ships. Steam has made a great revolution in ice navigation. A well-found steamer is able to make her way with ease through the ice in Hudson's Straits in June and July.

Notice those two months, June and July.

> When a sailing vessel would be hopelessly beset, incapable of pushing on.

I might quote dozens of extracts from Commadore Markham to the same effect to support the statement made by the leader of the House.

> Early on the morning of 11th July we arrived off the station on the north side of the strait, and anchored in a snug little bay called Ashe Inlet. The observers were found to be in perfect health, and they had spent a pleasant winter, having been well supplied with reindeer meat by the Esquimaux. They informed us that the ice did not form in the strait before December, and that the channel was perfectly free for navigation during the entire month of November.

How many months does that make, from 1st July to the end of November? The hon. gentleman, in making his remarks some time ago, admitted that the commander of the "Alert" was, perhaps, against this contention. This distinguished officer in the British navy stated that there were four and a half to five months of navigation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Where does he state that?

Mr. WELSH. Some one told him so. It is hearsay evidence.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman not understand the meaning of these words: "Steam has made a great revolution in ice navigation. A well-found steamer is able to make her way with ease through the ice in the Hudson's Straits in June and July"? Does he not state that parties who were stationed there all winter informed him that the ice did not form in the straits before December, and that the channel was perfectly free for navigation during the entire month of November?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman asked me to accept that as Lieutenant Markham's own opinion, but the latter says that observers told him so and so. He does not give that as his own conclusions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They were put there for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But Lieut. Markham drew the very opposite conclusion, that the straits were not navigable after the 1st of September.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is raising quibbling objections. The leader of the House said that the information he received from the report of Commodore Markham was that for four and a half months the strait was navigable, and the quotations I have read bear out that opinion of Commodore Markham. The hon. gentleman made a great deal of fuss about it. He said that the leader of the House was drawing his long bow. Has he drawn a long bow any more than did the hon. gentleman, when the other night he stated that the wheat crop of Great Britain was twice that of Manitoba and the North-west.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman read from the "Statesman's Year-book" of 1895, showing the production of 1894, which was 60,000,000 bushels. I read it, and I gave my authority at the time.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman was correcting a statement made by the leader of the House, which he designated as absurd, and the hon. gentleman was stating the crop in 1895.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, no.

Mr. HAGGART. It is so reported in "Hansard."

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. HAGGART. Yet the hon. gentleman finds fault with the statement from Commodore Markham in regard to the navigation of Hudson's Bay.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Read from "Hansard."

Mr. HAGGART. I am not permitted to do so by the rules of the House. If I am permitted, I will read the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. HAGGART. I will not read it, Mr. Speaker, unless I have permission to do so.

Mr. DALY. It is at column 4516.

Mr. HAGGART. I have never before heard of any strong opposition being offered to a private Bill of this character. Whether the company are able to obtain the necessary capital is entirely out of the question. The object of the Bill is for the promotion of a great work which will benefit Manitoba and the North-west. The work is to be constructed out of private capital, and it will be part of the project to connect Winnipeg with Hudson's Bay. The only objection I have heard is to that part of the scheme as regards the navigation lying between the United States boundary and Winnipeg. That point is, however, fully guarded, especially as regards the responsibility of allowing the company to commence the work. The Bill provides :

> 4. The company may, upon obtaining authority from the Governor in Council, improve, for the purposes of navigation and traffic thereon, those portions of the Red River hereinbefore excepted, provided that the plans and specifications of such improvements and the works connected therewith shall be first approved by the Governor in Council, and that the works shall be carried out and completed under the supervision of the Governor in Council.

So it is for the company first to get the consent of the Governor General in Council before they commence any of the improvements. In the next place all plans and specifications must be submitted to and approved by the Governor in Council. Further, the tolls and rates to be charged by the company with respect to the waterway are to be established by the Governor in Council. Several hon. gentlemen opposite oppose this Bill, but the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) supports it. He says he has no objection to the scheme, he believes Hudson's Bay is navigable, that further investigation into the subject of the navigation of the bay and straits may tend to show that this is a feasible scheme, and there is no objection to giving the company the right to build this particular part of the work from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay. He does not agree with the objections taken by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister). Those hon. gentlemen are opposed to the whole scheme, because the Government by giving an entity to a corporation for the purpose of building the work give their imprimatur to the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent my position. I am opposed to the scheme until hon. gentlemen opposite can show that the navigation of the Hudson's Straits is feasible. If I am satisfied on that point, I am not opposed to the scheme, providing the country is not asked to give money to it.

Mr. HAGGART. There never was a proposition to give one cent to it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman must know that the Bill on its face contemplates the granting of a Government subsidy.

Mr. HAGGART. It does not. The section to which the hon. gentleman refers was put in at the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not care at whose suggestion it was inserted.

Mr. HAGGART. So hon. gentlemen opposite may give something towards the construction of this particular undertaking, and it is perhaps to guard against such extravagance on the part of the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., and his friends when they come into power, that objection is taken. That section was not put in at the instance of the incorporators, but I repeat, it was embodied at the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg, who wanted to insert a further safeguard—that the Government in taking over the work should not only have credit for what was contributed, but should appropriate the moneys that municipalities had contributed to the undertaking. The hon. member for Queen's asks that proof be furnished him that Hudson's Bay is navigable for over two months and a half every year. That is a point for the incorporators of the company to ascertain in connection with the investment of capital in the undertaking. The Government by granting this charter to a private company does not by any means state that either Hudson's Bay or Hudson's Straits is navigable for one day in the year. The incorporators seem to be fully satisfied that that part of the bay and straits is navigable for such a period, and that they will be able to secure the investment of money in the company. This Parliament simply gives the company liberty to proceed without giving any imprimatur to the company, but simply allows this company to receive a charter as have hundreds of other corporations, at the hands of this House.

Mr. CASEY. The discussion on this Bill has certainly covered a much wider range than is usual on a private Bill, and perhaps necessarily so. There is no doubt the question of the navigability of Hudson's Bay enters more or less into the question as to whether it is advisable to charter this company or not, and it has therefore been unavoidably discussed. I wish to put one point before the House in that connection. I hope that in the anxiety of many hon. members to oppose what they consider to be an ill-advised scheme, they will not be too ready to assume that Hudson's Bay is not navigable for a considerable portion of the year. I consider that that question is still open—whether Hudson's Bay is open for five months of the year or not. I hope no one in the House will use an argument or make an assertion going to show there is doubt about the navigability of Hudson's Bay during most of the summer.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) and other members, who look to Hudson's Bay as a possible future outlet for the products of the prairie country generally, who look to the country surrounding it as a very valuable territory, and expect to see a considerable volume of trade passing through the Straits in future. A great deal has been said respecting the report of the expedition sent there a few years ago to inquire into this matter. I held at that time, and I hold still, that the expedition did not adopt the best methods to find out whether Hudson's Bay was navigable or not. An excursion was made into the bay and out of it before navigation closed. Explorations were made in the bay. Certain explorers were left to winter on the shore of the straits, and some on an island. The conclusion drawn by the head of the expedition was that it was not feasible to navigate that sheet of water, but I argued then, as I argue now, that more than the report of that expedition is necessary to settle this question finally. Men, camping in the winter on the shores of the Straits, are not able to ascertain during the winter, after the shore ice has formed, whether that channel is navigable in the middle or not. They are not able to tell anything about the navigability of the bay itself, during the winter. The ships which come out about the usual time, and leave the bay when ready, cannot possibly say whether the straits were navigable or not, after they left.

Only one satisfactory method of inquiry is possible, namely, to send an expedition of ships, provisioned for more than one season, to have these ships explore the bay, be frozen in there, if necessary, stay in the bay until the following spring, record the time they were frozen up and the time they got out, and all that has happened to them in the meantime. I believe it is of the greatest importance to the prosperity of the country, and to the interests of the prarie districts particularly, to have such explorations made. I may say that my own impressions are more favourable to the navigation of that bay than those which have been expressed by a number of gentlemen on this side of the House.

After reading the report, as I did some time ago, I am more inclined to agree with Markham's account than with the other commander's, and to believe that the straits may be navigable for a considerable number of months. I hope that, whether under this Government, or under a new and a better Government, full means will be taken of ascertaining the truth regarding this matter. I believe that Hudson's Bay is a valuable property, and that it has been too much neglected. I believe that this Government are to be blamed for neglecting to enforce the rights of Canada over that bay, as well as for neglecting its exploration with a view of its navigation. I am in accord, Sir, with the remarks of my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) to a certain extent. I believe that, until we have satisfactory knowledge of the navigability of that bay, it is a matter of, at least, doubtful advisability to charter a canal company to connect it with inland navigation. The question as to the imprimatur which has been referred to also comes in here.

It is a question, how far investors in other countries would hold this Parliament responsible for the charter, if it turned out that a profit did not arise out of the enterprise. If it turned out that it was going to be a Chignecto scheme, or something of that kind, that promised no profit after it had been constructed, we might be accused of giving assurances of an outlet in a direction where an outlet might not turn out to be available. But I do not look upon that question as the one which will decide my vote upon this Bill. I give the greatest importance to the question, as to how far this company would control the navigation of the Red River and of other navigable waters involved in their proposed route. If it be true, that this Bill would give such control of the Red River navigation, or of other navigable waters, as should not be placed in the hands of a private company, then the Bill should certainly be rejected, whether Hudson's Bay be navigable in the summer or not. That is a legal point, as it depends upon the construction of the words in this charter. I have read the charter over, and I have heard the opinions given by legal gentlemen here upon it. I think I have heard as strong arguments in favour of the view that this company would, by this charter, be given an undue control of the system of navigation, as I have heard on the other side. In fact, I think that the weight of legal opinion is, that this charter would give the company undue control over the Red River navigation. That I consider to be a vital point for me in deciding how I should vote on this question, and, unless I hear these arguments rebutted more strongly than they have yet been, I shall find it my duty to vote against going into committee on this Bill on that ground.

Mr. HASLAM. Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say that, in my opinion, it would appear to an outsider, or to one who is not very much interested in this question, that a great deal of the talk that has been indulged in here this evening is really a subject for merriment, more than anything else. The whole trend of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite was, as to the great fear that English investors should suffer. Well, do hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to act in this House as protectors for English investors, who are supposed to know their own business ? Here is a country and a people who are the recognized financial leaders of the world. Everybody who gets in a tight place, has to go to the English capitalists for money, and, forsooth, we are told here to-night by hon. gentlemen opposite that these English capitalists are not competent to look after their own interests. The idea is tried to be forced upon us that a small body of men in this House must look after the English capitalists, because they are not able to look after themselves, and this body of men in the House are, I believe, as completely ignorant of the whole circumstances of the case as it is possible for men to be.

Mr. MARTIN. Give us some light.

Mr. HASLAM. I think I can give you some light on the subject, although you have lived in Winnipeg for a while. I know a little about it, perhaps more than you do, and I have been in Winnipeg before you were.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order—address the Chair.

Mr. HASLAM. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. He talked across the floor to me, and I presumed I could talk back to him. As a member from British Columbia, I am interested in the navigation of the Hudson's Bay. Let me point out to hon. gentlemen that the Hudson's Bay Company have been able to navigate that bay for sixty years, and I have never heard of them losing a ship yet. They have gone in and out there for sixty years with sailing ships. I have never heard of them running into Hudson's Bay with a steam vessel, and every one knows that a sailing vessel is not as well able to run clear of floating ice as a steam vessel is.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who questioned the navigability of Hudson's Bay ?

Mr. DALY. You did.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not. I questioned the time it was navigable.

Mr. HASLAM. We all know that a steam vessel can navigate the same water for a much longer season than a sailing vessel can, where ice has to be contended with. Now, Sir, so far as the difficulties on the Red River are concerned, the St. Andrew's Rapids offer obstacles, I know. But, if I understand it rightly, one of the principal sources of revenue which this canal company counts upon is from the transportation of wheat south of the line. It is there that the principal part of it will go. A railway will still be necessary to draw the wheat, from the western boundaries of Manitoba to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, and the principal part of the wheat from that section of the country would go by rail. It would not go in the Winnipeg Lake direction at all, because it would have to be sent as long a distance by rail to reach the Red River and take advantage of the canal, as it would have to go by a new railway from York Factory, or wherever the terminus might be. At any rate, this route would, I am sure, open up a large tract of wheat-growing country for settlement.

I understand from the general argument that the intention now is that wheat shallbe carried on the Canadian Pacific Railway to the banks of the Red River, and there barged. I do not agree with that argument at all, because I believe that a new railway would be necessary from York Factory to the Rocky Mountains—either that or advantage might be taken of the Saskatchewan River ; but there are rapids in that river, so that I think a railway would be necessary. But, apart from that, the principal source of revenue for the canal would be on the American side of the line. So far as the navigation of the Hudson's Bay is concerned, I think it is the duty of the investors who are putting their money into the project to ascertain that for themselves. I do not think that this Government is binding itself to anything in giving a charter to construct the canal. It does not guarantee that Hudson's Bay is navigable for one day. Therefore, I cannot see how any gentleman from the west can oppose the Bill. It certainly is in the interest of the country, and it is the duty of the investors to find out the obstacles, and not Parliament.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it the duty of the investors if the money is lost ?

Mr. HASLAM. The investors are quite capable of taking care of themselves. This Government is deriving no revenue from the canal, and I do not think it has any right to spend money in that direction. I cannot see how there is any objection to this Bill on the ground of the responsibility of the Government, for the Government are taking no responsibility. They do not assure anything. They give the right to construct the canal, and that is all that they are asked for.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down need not have read a lecture to any of us on the want of wisdom, for he did not add much to the debate by his own sublime wisdom. The whole question before this House is, as the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) put it, whether we should give these valuable waterways to any company. That is the whole question, to my mind, and I am not going to be bound by the consideration that Winnipeg wants it, in deciding how I shall vote on the question. I think there is a good deal too much of this saying that because some people want a thing, they should give it. The question is a national one, whether, in dealing with a great waterway, we should grant something in one part of the country that would not be granted elsewhere under similar circumstances. I was very much surprised to hear the hon. Secretary of State speak of helping this country because of the great depression that existed. That was news to me, coming from that side of the House. I think the hon. gentleman might also have spared the attempt to work up his followers by attempting to show that gentlemen on this side of the House were always running down their country. There was an issue raised as to the quantity of wheat produced in Manitoba ; and whatever difference there is in the statements made by two hon. gentlemen on that question, I submit that it is not as great a difference as that between the quantity actually produced and the quantity prophesied by the hon. Secretary of State. I thought, to say the least, that modesty or the failure of his prophecy, ought to have prevented him turning his guns on this side in regard to that. The fact is that any project which receives the sanction of the Secretary of State is now viewed by the people of this country with some concern. To use the word of the hon. Minister of Railways, the imprimatur of the hon. gentleman is rather against it. Indeed, it reminds one of the man who went to a banker to get a small note discounted. The banker said he knew the man to be a very good man, but that it was the rule of the bank to have an endorser. So the man went out to get an endorser, and, having got one, he returned with the note. When the banker saw the endorsement, he said : "But for the rule I would have given you the money before, but with that endorser I would certainly not have given it." The endorser had destroyed the man's chance of getting the money. So it seems that any project that receives the hon. gentleman's sanction is doomed to failure at the start. We may work ourselves up to a high point of expectation as to what is going to be done ; but this House has been hearing for fifteen years what was going to be done. Now, we must look for something else. That country was going to go forward by leaps and bounds ; and now we hear from the Secretary of State that there are only 25,000 men engaged in agriculture there. It would be hard work for them to produce 640,000,000 bushels of wheat. The truth is, that anything that has not in it the elements of permanency and success, according to the data before us, ought not to receive the sanction of this House. If you look over all the Bills that have been passed by this House, and the prophecies made as to what they were going to accomplish, you will be astonished at the gullibility of members of this House, who, to-night, cheered the statements of the Secretary of State as to what this Bill was going to accomplish. My chief objection to this Bill is that it puts a great waterway in the hands of a number of men, I care not how wealthy they may be. Waterways, like railways, are the avenues of trade. I think the Government made a great mistake in tying up the land of that country by giving so much of it to companies. It is still a greater mistake to give the control of a great waterway to any body of men. It is for that reason I oppose this Bill. So far as the Hudson's Bay is concerned, I know very little about it except from what I have read in the reports of officers sent out by this Government. In my own county, there are a number of captains who have been trading up there, very intelligent men, and they tell me that its navigation is not practicable, I am not going to say that that is conclusive. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has said that for sixty years the Hudson's Bay Company have been going in there with vessels. They have been doing that for two hundred years ; but did it strike him that that company could not give this Government any information to warrant them in deciding that that bay was navigable, even after all that time, and that the Government had to send out men to examine the question for themselves. This satisfies us that there is still much to learn on that subject. But my reason for opposing the Bill is that I believe we should not give these valuable franchises to any company.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish to make a few remarks on this question. I am of the opinion that no public charter should be given by the Government to any company until the Government establish beyond doubt that such an undertaking is feasible and in the interests of the country. If the Government does not know whether the Straits are open sufficiently long in the year to be of any advantage to that section of country, in my opinion it is their duty to again send parties up there to take observations, as they did a few years ago. I have read very carefully the report of Lieutenant Gordon who was sent up in 1883, and if we can rely on the evidence he has given, it strikes me very forcibly that the scheme is not feasible, or at least that navigation of the straits can only be had about three or three and a half months in the year. In some years, Lieutenant Gordon says, navigation would not even last that long, though in other years it may exceed that time, but the average will not be longer. If that be the case, is it not very imprudent to take a step which will involve this country in the heavy expenditure for perhaps an utterly impracticable scheme. The Government are in duty bound to settle the question in their own minds before entering any scheme of this kind. One hon. gentleman said, a few moments ago, that it was not in the interests of Canada to look after the interests of any large corporation which was about to invest its money in a scheme of that kind. I think it is. The hon. gentleman will bear in mind that some years ago the wild-cat scheme of a Chignecto Railway was put through this House by the Government, and that in consequence of the support given it in this House, English capitalists were induced to invest money in it, with the result, as I was told by one of the directors three weeks ago, that the company has sunk three and a half million dollars in a scheme which will never bring a single dollar either to it or the country. Why, members from the eastern provinces, who ought to be the best informed in the matter, are those who oppose the strongest any extension of time to the company which undertook to complete this wild-cat scheme. Again, if the Hudson's Bay route were open to Churchill, we are told that the wheat grown in Manitoba in the one year could not be marketed in the same season. But to that objection, the reply is made that a large proportion of our western wheat is stored up in elevators at Fort William and other places. That is true, but we must not overlook this fact, that if the wheat market in England becomes stronger, we could at once ship to the old country from these elevators via New York, Boston or other routes, and get the benefit of the increased prices. If, however, that wheat were stored at Churchill, on Hudson's Bay, we could not do that, but would have to allow it to remain there until the following season, by which time the English market might have declined again. So that our farmers in reality would lose a large sum which otherwise they might gain. Then, again, how could the wheat-buyers determine what prices to pay, when, not being able to foresee the condition of the markets at the time they would be able to ship the wheat via the Hudson's Bay route. The result would be that they would buy on the safe side, and our farmers would not realize as much as they would under present conditions. Those who remember the earlier history of this country, when wheat-buyers purchased wheat stored at the various ports along the western lakes, awaiting the opening of navigation, know that these buyers would only give from 38 to 50 cents a bushel, because they were buying on an uncertain market, and that is just what would take place if the wheat were stored at Churchill awaiting the opening of navigation in Hudson's Bay. Suppose a canal were built to Hudson's Bay, have we any expectation whatever of finding a company which would undertake to construct vessels for that particular route—vessels which would have to be constructed of extra size, capacity and strength to meet the difficulties of that route? Do you really suppose that a company would build a special line of steamers for the purpose of working only three or four months and which would have to lay up the balance of the year or seek employment in other sections. When we consider all these things, it strikes one that it is neither wise nor prudent for the Government to place the franchise of any of our large streams or rivers in the hands of other people, before the feasibility of the whole scheme was established beyond doubt, and we were in a position to practically decide what was best in the interests of the country. But when the Government and their supporters find they are beaten in argument, they turn round and accuse the Opposition of always running down the country. Now, I challenge any one to point to one sentence used by any member of the Opposition decrying the country. We have faith in the country if we only had the proper men at the helm of state to guide its destinies. We have faith in the country, but not in the Government which has misgoverned it for the last sixteen or seventeen years. The hon. Secretary of State said that we had opposed the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. If he knows anything about the history of that road, and he ought to know something about it, he must know that the Liberal party was not opposed to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but to the policy upon which the Conservative party proposed to construct it. We were opposed to building the Canadian Pacific Railway as rapidly as the Conservative party built it. I am satisfied that had the railway been pushed through by sections, and the money used in constructing it kept within the country, instead of being paid out to men collected from all quarters of the world, the vast majority of whom left the country and carried a large portion of it away with them—in other words, if we had gone on spending money every year among the farmers of the North-west by giving them employment in building sections of that road, we would have kept millions of dollars in this country which have long ago left it. It may be said that there was a compact with British Columbia to construct that road within a limited time; but no doubt some means could have been obtained to satisfy British Columbia for a few years, and all that money which went out in paying imported labour—the labour of Chinese, Italians, Americans and other foreigners—would have been paid out to our own people. It would have been all spent among the farmers and labourers of the North-west Territories, and in that way have added greatly to their prosperity. Again, if the advice of the late Mr. Mackenzie and the Liberal patry had been taken, the Canadian Pacific Railway line would not have been located where it is; and the best evidence we have of the wisdom of the plan advised by the Liberal party is the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway are now thinking of extending their road just through that section of country through which Mr. Mackenzie intended originally to have constructed it had he remained in power. Again, the very point on Lake Superior which Mr. Mackenzie wanted to make the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway there, and in which he was opposed by the Conservative party of that day, is the point now selected by the Canadian Pacific Railway as its terminus upon Lake Superior. Then again, the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and the Liberal party wanted to cut the lands up into squares of 20 miles, so that the people going into that country might be settled in large sections without leaving intervening sections in the hands of speculators. And the Liberal-Conservative party opposed that policy, and to-day, within 15 miles of the railway, at any rate, every alternate section belongs to the company, so that, when the hard-working pioneer goes in there, he is not only improving his own lands, but he is adding to the wealth of the Canadian Pacific Railway by his labour. This prevents the settlement of the country by separating the people so widely, and preventing that compactness of settlement which would enable the people to support schools and churches and build bridges and roads. Any one who will consider the policies of the two parties at the time the Canadian Pacific Railway was building, must come to the conclusion that the Liberal policy was the better of the two. And yet Conservatives will rise on the platform today, and declare that the Liberals were opposed to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Coming back to the question, I would ask if it was a wise policy to place such large privileges in the hands of private companies without a fair knowledge of what is to be the end of the scheme of which this is the commencement ? For my part, I will oppose the measure on the ground that it is unwise in the present stage of our knowledege of this route to give so large a franchise to this company.

Mr. FLINT. The discussion of the question has taken a wide range, and, I think, properly so, because there is more in this Bill than appears at a superficial glance. A little study and observation seem to show that the promoters of the Bill have something more in view than their mere charter and the operations of an ordinary company. In fact, the Bill is of a quasi-public character, dealing, as it does, with enormous interests, covering a vast area of territory in a comparatively undeveloped country, and requiring an enormous amount of capital to carry the project to a successful issue. Glancing at some of the provisions of the Bill, as amended, as it affects one of the works contemplated by the Government from time to time, and which must be performed within a few years (the improvement of the navigation of the Red River so as to overcome the navigation of the St. Andrew's Rapids) we find this company practically getting a monopoly of the heavy contract which must be undertaken in the near future in order to complete the navigation around these rapids. On glancing at clauses 3 and 4, we find that the only portions of the route excepted from the practical operations of the company are St. Andrew's Rapids, Union Point Shoal, the Elm Point Shoal, the Two Point Shoal, and the South Bend Shoal. These portions can only be improved by the company upon the authority of the Governor in Council, and then only after filing with the Government plans and specifications of the work to be done, which must be satisfactory to the Governor in Council. But the effect of this Bill is practically to give control of the contract which the Government must some day give for this work. Moreover, this company will probably demand, and will make a strong claim upon this Government and Parliament for large public subsidies to carry on the work of the company. There is this further consideration, that foreign capital is to be invited to assist in carrying on this work. I dissent from the view that it is a matter of no consequence to this Parliament, or anybody but the investors themselves, in what form measures of this kind are passed. I think Parliament does assume a moral responsibility to the capitalists of the old world, in consequence of the charters we give and the privileges we hand over to incorporated companies, and which may be made use of to inveigle capital into what are known as wild-cat schemes. The credit of Canada has been injured before now by the failure of companies similarly chartered. I view this question as one of not merely local interest. The company is a most ambitious one, demanding large powers as a canal company, a telegraph company, a telephone company, a shipping company, and the proprietors of an enormous quantity of real estate, besides practically controlling the navigation of the Red River, and, in fact, of all these lakes and rivers running into Hudson's Bay. I think the company would have shown more wisdom and prudence, if it had not come before Parliament to demand such wide powers over such a large territory. Now it has been contended by some hon. gentlemen that it makes no difference in deciding the propriety of granting this charter, whether the Hudson's Bay was navigable for one month or six months in the year. I think that position is not at all tenable. I contend that there has been no successful attempt to show that the Hudson's Bay or Hudson's Straits are navigable for any sufficiently lengthy period of time. Unless it can be shown that navigation can be carried on with success in order to transport products from the North-west to the mother country, then this whole scheme must be a failure. Unless it can be demonstrated that navigation is practicable for such a period of time as will suffice to carry the products of the North-west to the mother land, the scheme must fall to the ground. The whole basis of the scheme and the whole reasoning upon which it is founded, will fail unless it can be demonstrated that the Hudson's Bay is navigable for each year for a sufficient period of time to carry away the enormous crops which the North-west and Manitoba will produce in a single year. A great deal has been read to show that the navigation of that bay is open practically for at least five months in the year. The quotations made by the Secretary of State fall very far short of any proof of that kind. Now, we have the advantage of having in the records of Parliament several important contributions giving precise facts which are of vital importance in coming to a conclusion upon this matter. The celebrated expedition of Lieutenant Gordon in the Hudson's Bay, with definite instructions to ascertain exactly the difficulties and the peculiarities of the navigation of that bay and strait, have been given to the Government and to the public, in reports which are accessible to all, and they show conclusively that in the middle of June in the year 1884, the ice was very thick and dangerous and very difficult to contend with. The "Alert" only reached Fort Churchill about the end of August, and by the 24th November everything was closely sealed up in ice. The report also shows that in 1885, as late as August, the ice in the Straits around Nottingham Island was closely packed. These reports show that if navigation was not absolutely impossible, it was so precarious and so irregular as to be practically useless to trading steamers, which are calculated to make reasonable time with valuable cargoes. The experience of the following year showed that in the early part of October everything was closely sealed and the exit from the straits was practically closed for that year. We come next to July, 1886, and as late as the 9th, 10th and 11th there was no open water in sight, and even on the 15th and 16th the ice was tightly packed. If there was not open water as late as the latter part of July that year, certainly the indications for successful navigation by a large number of steamships carrying valuable cargoes must be considered unfavourable, unless proof can be given that this was one of the most exceptional years known. I also find a letter from Captain Spicer, dated March, 1883. He is one of the most experienced navigators of Hudson Bay and Straits. He affirms that there is no average length of time for navigation in those waters, and that no two years are alike. In this opinion, he coincides with the opinions expressed by Commodore Markham, and Commander Gordon. He further points out that there is great danger in navigating the straits, whether early or late, owing to the storms and the strong currents; that it is impossible for any captain to decide within two weeks when he will arrive at the straits. These statements made by authorities on the question, although not absolutely and finally conclusive, certainly afford a prima facie case for a more thorough inquiry than has ever yet been made as to the practicability of the navigation of Hudson's Bay and Straits, covering a long period of time. Undoubtedly, a large portion of the bay is open all the year round, except as regards floating icebergs. It is obvious, however, from all our reports that the water along the shore becomes frozen very early in the season, as early as 1st August, and the frozen area extends several miles from shore, and includes all the harbours, estuaries and landing places, so that, practically, they are hermetically sealed except two months or, at the most, three months of the year. It is apparent to every fair-minded man that we cannot build up a successful transportation trade as regards the crops of the North-west by this route if the country develops during the next ten or fifteen years as suggested. The powers of nature in matters of this kind it is impossible for human skill or science to overcome. We may tunnel mountains and bridge rivers, but storms of winter and icebergs are entirely beyond the power of man to overcome; and it would be insane folly on the part of the Government or Parliament to give to any company the powers sought by this Bill, particularly when we know what has been the history of charters of this kind and the effect they have had on our credit from capitalists abroad being lured into investing in undertakings of this extraordinary nature. This Bill should lie over for further consideration, and when a new Parliament meets, the promoters could appear before this House with a modified application, supported by the results of a more thorough inquiry, and the House could then grant them powers which are reasonable. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald):

> That this Bill be not now referred to a Committee of the whole House, but that it be referred to a Committee of the whole House this day six months.

Mr. MARA. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) has spoken, and cannot, therefore, second the amendment.

Mr. BORDEN. I second the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly), as usual in discussing matters of this kind, took the opportunity of alluding to various matters connected with local politics in the province of Manitoba; most of which I have dealt with before, although it has never appeared to me to be very material to this House or to matters before this House, what my conduct, with regard to provincial measures in the province of Manitoba may have been. Of course, I am fully responsible to the people of Manitoba for what I have done, and for what the government of which I was a member, have done, and we have never sought in any way to shirk responsibility for our conduct. I have noticed in this House, that when the Conservative party were attacked because of different matters, it has been a favourite reply of theirs to say, that at the elections the people have supported them. I might point out, using that argument which is perhaps not altogether a correct one, that in the province of Manitoba, the government of which I was once a member have been supported very strongly indeed every time they have appealed to the people. And, it has been observed at several of the general elections, one especially in which the hon. Minister of the Interior took a very active part against the local government; it was observed by the people there, that wherever the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daly) went, the majorities for the Greenway government candidate were very great.

Mr. DALY. Was that in 1892 ?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. DALY. We carried four out of the five constituencies in which I took an active part, and the Greenway candidates were defeated.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know about the constituencies——

Mr. DALY. I do.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman was very careful to visit most of those constituencies, where——

Mr. SPEAKER. What relevancy has all this to the question now before the House ?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think it has any relevancy, but the Minister of the Interior was allowed to allude at very great length to my conduct in the province of Manitoba, and it seems pretty hard that I should not be allowed to reply, if that course was allowed to be taken by a Minister of the Crown. I protest, and have always protested against the local matters of Manitoba being dragged into this House. The Minister of the Interior never gets up to speak that he does not allude to matters that have occurred there, and surely, Mr. Speaker, I am at liberty to deal with the question just as well as he is.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that this whole discussion has largely been irrelevant to the question now before this House, and perhaps I may be pardoned for saying, that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was the first transgressor in that respect. It seems to me that I cannot allow this discussion to wander into the local politics of the province of Manitoba. I did allow the hon. member (Mr. Martin) to refer to the fact, that the local legislature had granted a subsidy to the Hudson's Bay Company, because he stated that it was necessary for his argument, in showing that the people of Manitoba were anxious to obtain communication with Hudson's Bay. But surely, the discussion that is now going on has no relevancy whatever to the question before the House.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I submit to your ruling, of course, but it is the first time that I have seen one member attacked by another, and then, when he is attempting to reply, especially to a Minister of the Crown, being ruled out of order for dealing with the very matters which the Minister referred to himself.

Mr. DALY. I did not attack the hon. member (Mr. Martin). Anything I stated with reference to the hon. member was to answer his position with reference to the Bill under discussion, and to point out that he had not always taken the same course that he does to-night, in opposing a measure of this kind.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. Minister referred to the Northern Pacific Railroad. What has that got to do with it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I listened to the reference of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Daly) to the Northern Pacific Railway, and I gathered from his remarks at the time, that that was a scheme that was intended to cheapen the transport of grain from the North-west Territories to the seaboard, and therefore, I thought it had some relevancy to the question now before the House. But I frankly confess, that listening to what the hon. member (Mr. Martin) has just said, I cannot discover any relevancy at all between the local elections in Manitoba and the question before the House.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand your decision as to that, and I shall keep my remarks closely to the points raised by the Minister of the Interior. In dealing with the Hudson's Bay Railway, the hon. gentleman charged me with not having been consistent, and with having a very different view at one time with regard to the Hudson's Bay Railway, from that which I have now. Nothing I have said in this debate to-day will justify such an expression as that. I have not said anything against the Hudson's Bay Railway. I have pointed out certain objections that have been raised by other persons to the Hudson's Bay Railway. I have alluded to the question of navigation which has been very largely dealt with by other members of this House, and I stated that the promoters of the Hudson's Bay Railway believed that Lieut. Gordon's report was not a correct report, and were not prepared to accept it. The hon. Minister was quite correct in saying, that I did support a resolution in the legislature of Manitoba, offering to aid the Hudson's Bay Railway to the extent of a guarantee of 5 per cent, I think it was, upon four and a half million dollars of bonds. But, afterwards when I assumed responsibility by becoming a member of the government, I joined the government in refusing to give that guarantee, because on looking into the matter, we came to the conclusion that $180,000 a year was more than the province of Manitoba could afford to pay. We have never refused to put into force this guarantee, because we were opposed to the Hudson's Bay Railway or because we did not recognize the great advantage that road would be to the country provided the statements made in its behalf by its promoters were realized. But it was on an entirely different ground from that. It was on the ground that $180,000 a year for twenty years to aid one railway institution, was more than that province with a total revenue of about $500,000 a year, could afford to pay, even granting everything that was said on behalf of the company. I have to admit that in doing so I was inconsistent, but I agree with those sentiments I have heard expressed in this House, that a public man is justified in being inconsistent if he comes to the conclusion that he was wrong. A public man has no justification simply to keep himself consistent; no matter what he may have done at another time, he is to do at the time what he believes to be in the interest of the province he represents. So far as the charge of inconsistency is concerned, I am quite willing to admit it; but the charge that I have varied in my attitude towards the Hudson's Bay Railway, is not correct. What I did say, and what I still adhere to, is that, if the Hudson's Bay Railway is an enterprise such as its promoters claim it to be, and as the Secretary of State urged on its behalf to-night, it is an enterprise the onus of which should not fall upon the small province of Manitoba, but upon the great Dominion of Canada, because its benefits will be in a much larger degree for the North-west Territories than for the province of Manitoba. I have always claimed that, if that road is to be built with public money, the greater part of that money should come from the Dominion Parliament, and I adhere to that statement. The hon. gentleman has referred to the building of the Northern Pacific Railway, and, while that might have had some reference to the question before the House, because it was a manifestation of a desire on the part of the people of Manitoba to get competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway, I do not think the Minister of the Interior introduced the reference for any such purpose. At all events, with regard to his statement that the province of Manitoba had been burdened with a very large debt on account of the construction of that railway, I can say, as I have said before, that I defy him or any other member of this House to point to an instance in the history of Canada, or in any part of it, where over 300 miles of railway have been built for so small a subsidy as was given by the government of Manitoba to the Northern Pacific Railway. In addition to the company giving us over 300 miles of railway, they reduced the freight rate on wheat from Winnipeg to Lake Superior from 24 cents to 21 cents per 100 pounds. That railway cost the province of Manitoba a cash bonus of $1,750 a mile, whereas the Government of which the hon. gentleman is now a member, built some 500 or 600 miles of railway in the province of Manitoba, through the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for which that company was paid a bonus of at least $32,000 per mile. It was given 6,400 acres of land per mile, which realized to the company a good deal more than $5 per acre. In addition to this, the province of Manitoba had $1,100,000 invested in a railway which was taken over by the Northern Pacific Company, and that company paid us that amount in hard cash for that railway. I quite agree with you, Mr. Speaker, that these matters are not relevant to this discussion, and I do not intend to deal with them at any length. I object to dealing with them at all, because I do not think it concerns this House whether the government with which I was connected, was a good government or a bad government. That is a matter for the people of Manitoba to deal with, when the election comes round. To show that I had not always held the view of this scheme that I hold now, the hon. gentleman referred to a letter, signed by Mr. Greenway, the Premier of the government of which I was a member. I must say that Mr. Greenway is a very good-natured man, and he was induced in some way or other—I do not know how—by Mr. Sutherland to sign this letter. The letter gives that gentleman a character which I think he is not entitled to; but, when the hon. gentleman suggests that I was responsible for it in any way, he is quite mistaken. I did not know of it, and did not hear of it for several years after it was written, and I do not think it is much to the credit of the gentleman who received that certificate of character, to throw it back at the man who gave it, and to endeavour to injure him politically for a kind act of that sort. I may say that at one time it was intended to issue that letter in Manitoba as a campaign document, and for that purpose to have it lithographed, in order to show it in Mr. Greenway's handwriting; but it was found that, instead of being written by Mr. Greenway, it was in the handwriting of Mr. Sutherland, the only part of it in Mr. Greenway's handwriting being his signature, which he may have given under a misapprehension—I do not know. So much for the remarks of the Minister of the Interior, which, as I said before, have not much reference to the question before the House, and I regret very much to have been obliged to detain the House by answering them. The hon. Secretary of State dealt more with the subject before us, and the hon. Minister of Railways suggests that, after his statement, my opposition to this Bill ought to be withdrawn. It occurs to me, rather, that the promoter of the Bill ought to strike out those clauses, because, if the remarks of the Secretary of State have any meaning at all, they practically mean that these clauses are nugatory, that they are of no use, that they will not be acted upon, because he said that no blow would be struck by the company on the works on St. Andrew's Rapids. If that be so, why are we detained discussing this matter at such length? Why do the Government insist on these provisions, if they do not intend to allow this company to get any benefit from them ?

The hon. Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) very unfairly referred to remarks of mine. He said that I had presented the Hudson's Bay scheme as utterly impracticable. I would refer him to the remarks of his hon. colleague, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), who pointed out that I had done nothing of the kind, but had supported the Bill, so far as the Hudson's Bay route is concerned, and used every argument I was aware of in favour of a charter being given to the company so far as that part of the scheme is concerned, and that my only objection to the Bill was the rights and privileges given to this company, and which the hon. Secretary of State declares the Government do not intend to allow the company to exercise. I am very sorry that the hon. gentleman is not in his seat, because I always regret having to reply to a gentleman who is not present to hear me. It is a little selfish, to say the least, for the leader of the House to keep members sitting here at this late hour, while he is comfortably ensconced in bed, for I understand he has a bed close at hand, and that when it gets on to this hour——

Mr. SPEAKER. Surely the hon. gentleman is not going to trespass on the patience of the House by discussing a matter that is altogether foreign to the subject before the Chair ?

Mr. MARTIN. I was simply saying that I regret the hon. gentleman is not here to hear what I have to say.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is sufficient without telling us where he is.

Mr. MARTIN. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, to be out of order so often. The hon. gentleman is a very strong advocate of the Hudson's Bay Railway. He considers that any member of this House who does not accept as gospel truth every word he utters about Canada or any part of it, is running down the country. He made the same charge when hon. gentlemen on this side ridiculed his prophesy that by 1891 Manitoba and the Territories would produce per year 640,000,000 bushels of wheat. The hon. gentleman to-night made the wildest and most extravagant statements with regard to the matter before us, and because we put no faith in his statements he denounced us just as vigorously as he did then, and suppose the House were to accept his statements and involve this country in a large amount of debt, and then find out a few years later how utterly unfounded they were, he would simply laugh at us, as he does with regard to his prophesy about our production of wheat. He gives as a reason why the Hudson's Bay Railway should be built that in a few years the quantity of wheat grown in that country will be so large that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Northern Pacific will not be able to carry it away. I do not look forward to any such rosy future. I do not think it is all likely that the amount of wheat produced in the North-west and Manitoba will be very greatly increased. It certainly cannot until more people go in there, and they are going in now very slowly. But the hon. Secretary of State has stronger reasons than those he laid before the House for supporting the Hudson's Bay route. According to his own statement, he has very strong love for Canada ; but the country knows that whatever may be his love for Canada, he has really and honestly great love for the distinguished family of which he is the head, and when I tell this House that the eldest member of that family, the future Sir Stewart——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the House must be out of all patience with the hon. member. I must insist on his keeping himself to the question. What have the members of the family of the hon. Secretary of State to do with this question.

Mr. MARTIN. I propose to show that.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is entirely out of order.

Mr. MARTIN. How can I be out of order before I have stated my point ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is certainly not discussing the question before the House. His remarks are not at all relevant, and in that respect he is out of order.

Mr. MARTIN. I am following as closely as I can the speech of the hon. Secretary of State.

Mr. TAYLOR. That has nothing to do with the question before the House.

Mr. MARTIN. Perhaps it has not, but I notice that the hon. Secretary of State was not called to order, and I take the ground that if he was in order I must be in order likewise when I reply to it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can surely confine himself to the question before the House. If hon. gentlemen will not confine themselves to the question before the House, the discussion will be interminable.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know what the question is, if I am not in order in replying to previous speakers. The only object I have in making a second speech is to reply to the arguments brought forward by the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can reply to the arguments adduced with regard to this question before the House, but he must keep within parliamentary rules. If he is determined to violate those rules, I must call the House to aid me.

Mr. MARTIN. I had a notion that I was confining myself strictly to the discussion.

I am quite prepared to submit to the Chair, but I must say I cannot understand what I am to do. The only object I have in making these remarks now, is to meet the arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite who were not called to order ; and I assume that if they were not called to order, I would be perfectly in order in replying. It appears, however, that while they were in order I am not.

I heard Mr. Blake's policy with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway discussed at very great length. I do not know whether I shall be out of order in following up that discussion. I do not know whether it is in order, but if I am not in order, I suppose the Speaker will call me to order. I do not agree at all with the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State with regard to the position of the Liberals on the Government's Canadian Pacific Railway policy. I quite agree with the statements made here to-night that the policy of the Liberals was a proper policy. I believe that Canada has been very greatly injured, indeed——

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to point out what the hon. Secretary of State said. I understood him to say that the Liberals, notably Mr. Blake, who was leader of the party, opposed the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but afterwards when the work was constructed, it was found to be of such great benefit to Canada that Mr. Blake changed his mind with regard to the opposition he had offered to the construction of that work. It was perhaps not entirely pertinent to the motion before the House, but the object was to elucidate an argument the hon. Secretary of State was making that in the construction of this canal a work was being put before Parliament that would be of very great benefit to Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

Mr. MARTIN. It is quite true the hon. Secretary of State did wind up his remarks in that way, but it was the end of a very long discussion which he started by charging members on this side of the House, including myself, with running down the country in connection with the scheme, and refusing to take his statement and the statements of the promoters of this company. So far as we venture to challenge or discuss any of these statements, we were declared to be running down the country. And he proposed to illustrate that by showing that the same party ran down the country in opposing, step by step, the propositions of his Government to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, and he went on at great length and showed how the Liberal party had shown their lack of faith in Canada in that course, and completed that statement by what you have referred to, Mr. Speaker—that Mr. Blake had stated in Victoria or Vancouver that he had come to the conclusion that he had been wrong. Now, I say I dispute, entirely, the charge that the criticisms the Opposition made in this House regarding the manner in which the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed were a proof that the Liberal party had no faith in their own country. They were a proof that the Liberal party understood their country, understood their country, understood Manitoba and the North-west Territorie and British Columbia a great deal better than did the Government of the day. And I say that every criticism—perhaps not every one, but the great bulk of the criticisms directed by Mr. Blake and his allies in this House in 1880 against the contract that was thus entered into had been proved to be true. Take the question of the monopoly that was created——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member must not enter upon such a discussion. It is quite competent for him to say that the statement that the Opposition were opposed to the construction of the Canadian Pactific Railway, and thereby evidenced their lack of faith in the country is incorrect. But the discussion of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract would seem to be taxing the patience of the House beyond reason.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. Secretary of State took exception to the statement made by some men on this side with regard to this being a wild-cat scheme. He thought a member of the House was descending very low, indeed, to refer to any scheme as a wild-cat scheme. I protest against that argument. I submit that if a scheme is a wild-cat scheme, it is perfectly proper so to refer to it, and there are many schemes which might have been thus denounced and exposed in Parliament in their early days greatly to the advantage of Canada and those capitalists who afterwards invested their money in them. It is perfectly proper, in dealing with a work of this kind to deal with the facts as they are. If the facts justify the work, let the work be proceeded with and completed. But if we are to get a canal constructed to Hudson's Bay on statements that are inaccurate and untrue, we must suffer for it in the long run. It is quite right for an hon. member to go carefully into a scheme and bring up the objections against it. It is not important that a member should praise a scheme ; you can always rely upon the promoters to do that. But when the scheme comes before Parliament, it is most reasonable that the objections should be brought forward and being brought forward, they should be considered. If you can get rid of these objections you plant your scheme upon firm ground. That is what I have endeavoured to do in discussing this measure favourably—because I am in favour of it, that is in the canal part of it. The Minister of Railways very tersely and correctly outlined my position, quite in opposition to the view taken by the hon. Secretary of State who seems to have heard me quite differently. I am quite in favour of the canal scheme, and am giving it every encouragement and every assistance. But I do not think it necessary for the scheme that these privileges in connection with the Red River should be handed over to that company. And I feel myself quite justified for having had this matter debated at considerable length in Committee on Railways and Canals, and also in this House, having extracted from the leader of the House and the responsible spokesmen of the Government that in this House the statement that the Government do not propose to allow this company to strike a single blow on St. Andrew's Rapids. Now, that is all I have asked for, from beginning to end. I contended that they should not be allowed there at all, and what I now object to is, that the Government, having announced its object, now point to the Bill and say that it does not permit the company to enter upon this work at all without the consent of the Governor General in Council. Then they say that the policy of the Governor General in Council has been determined, and that they intend to take hold of this as a public work themselves. Now, surely, it is very wrong to put upon the statute-book a law directly opposite to their intentions. Is it for the purpose of misleading proposed investors in this canal, that you are going to give them privileges which are entirely nugatory, that you are going to put upon the statute-book a valuable monopoly in favour of this company, while, at the same time, you have a string by which the Government can refuse to give it to them, and the Government have already, the Minister tells us, decided to refuse to give it to them. Surely, the position is not a tenable one. Look at it in this way ; There is to be a general election in this country within a few weeks. Suppose this Government should not be returned to power, their policy will not be binding upon their successors. Their successors may decide to allow this company to take hold of that franchise. I object to this Parliament handing over its functions in a matter of this kind to the Governor in Council. The question whether a great monopoly is to be built up, the question whether valuable franchises are to be handed over to a private corporation, is surely a question for this House to pronounce upon, and not a question for the Governor in Council. The only reason we are urged now to allow this provision to remain in the Bill is, that the Governor in Council will never act upon it, but, as I pointed out, that determination is only binding upon the present Government, and practically only binding on the Secretary of State. If the Secretary of State goes back to the High Commissionership in London, and the present Government are returned to power, they can well say : We are not bound by that, and they can go on and pass an Order in Council, and hand over all these franchises to this company. On the other hand, suppose the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) comes into power after the next election, he would not be bound in the slightest degree by the statement of the Secretary of State ; it would be quite competent for him and his Government to put into force this Order in Council, and hand over to this company its franchises. I object to that ; I say it is not a right thing for Parliament to do, and, if that objection is removed, all my opposition to this Bill vanishes. But they insist upon keeping it there, in spite of all declarations that it does not mean any thing. They insist upon keeping the power there which may transfer the control of the monopoly of that great river from this Parliament to the Governor in Council. Now, the Minister of Railways has referred to the stand taken by the Government in the Railway Committee. When the Bill first came up, it was announced on behalf of the Government, that they were in favour of it, just as it stood, and the committee were prepared to put it through. However, I wearied the committee, no doubt, considerably by my strenuous opposition to the Bill, and I took up a good deal of time in endeavouring to point out how wrong the policy of the Government was. I had the pleasure of finding that the Government entirely changed their views and of seeing the Minister of Railways come down and attempt to put in some restrictions that would to a certain extent protect the public. But I do not think that the interests of the public are at all protected by the restrictions that are put in there, because, as I say, the control of this monopoly is transferred from Parliament to the Governor in Council. Now, a great deal has been said with regard to the navigability of the Hudson's Bay and Hudson's Straits. I quite agree that any question of a Hudson's Bay Railway, or a Hudson's Bay Canal, must depend entirely upon the navigability of the waterway. There is no doubt that Lieutenant Gordon's report is very strongly against the navigation of the strait ; but I do not know that, even according to his report, it may not be possible to obtain all the navigation necessary, in order to take wheat out of the country, granting that it is not taken out the same year in which it is grown. If we are to hold the wheat over one year, probably the three months that Lieut. Gordon says the straits are open for navigation, would be a sufficient time to get all the wheat out of the country. The only difficulty that arises is that the season of navigation being so short, you are bound to have specially constructed ships to go into the Hudson's Bay. If you only have three months navigation, it would be very difficult indeed to induce capitalists to put the necessary money into these ships. We were told this evening by the Secretary of State that capitalists are already prepared to furnish the money to construct the ships. Well, I beg leave to doubt that statement. It was entirely unsupported by any proof, and I think past experience should justify me in saying that until the statement is proved by something more than the assertion of the Secretary of State, I do not think we can lend it any weight in this discussion. It does seem to me that when English capitalists come seriously to consider the question of furnishing money for a work of this kind, the question of the length of the season of navigation would appear to them to be an important one. I do not wish, however, to have the impression left on the House that I agree with Lieut. Gordon's report. I have heard advocates of the Hudson's Bay Railway charge the present Government in the clearest language with having instructed Lieut. Gordon to report as he did.

I believe the Minister of Finance was Minister of Marine and Fisheries at the time, and I should be very glad if he would throw light on the matter. I will not challange him without proof, but I have heard this charge made, that the report sent in by Lieut. Gordon was intentionally a false report, that he did not find the facts as he reported them, but that he was expressly instructed to report against the feasibility of navigating the Hudson's Bay and Straits, and had simply acted on his instructions. That is a very serious imputation to make against Lieut. Gordon or the Government. If the Government gave such instructions to one of its officers to take such a course, the Government would certainly subject itself to the strong censure of the House and the country. If Lieut. Gordon would allow himself to be guided by such instructions, that is a reflection on his personal and professional reputation. I utterly discredit this story in the absence of proof. But unless we charge Lieut. Gordon or the Government with intentionally misstating the facts with respect to these different trips which the officer made to Hudson's Bay, what answer is there to Lieut. Gordon's report ? Either he was incompetent or he was dishonest. We cannot believe the statement put forward by the railway company that he was intentionally dishonest, in the absence of proof ; and he has the reputation of being a very competent officer. So his report stands, and until it is removed in some substantial way, it must stand more or less as a very strong argument in regard to the statement put forward in it. In view of the fact, and the contradiction given to the report of Lieut. Gordon by Commodore Markham, who was sent by the railway company as their agent in connection with the matter, I must say that his contradiction is a very weak one ; all his statements are second-hand, and placing his statements against the report of Lieut. Gordon, who speaks from his personal experience, we must believe in Lieut. Gordon rather than in Commodore Markham. But a great many persons, speaking from their own personal knowledge, state that navigation in the straits is possible during a longer period than Lieut. Gordon is prepared to allow. Under these circumstances, the only satisfactory way in which to clear up the matter is to have further investigation, and I am very glad the Government intend to do something in this direction, although what they propose to do is entirely inadequate and insufficient, on account of the great delay that will occur before we can obtain any authentic report on the proposed explorations. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have referred as fully as I can under your ruling to the different points brought forward against the stand I have taken. In fact, most of the speeches on the Government side have not in any way affected the stand I have taken on this Bill, and the speech of the Secretary of State has shown that my position is the correct one, and I am quite justified in sustaining it by the instructions of my constituents as to the necessity of making this a great public work. I understand the Secretary of State to take my view, and accordingly it would be much more honest and straightforward for the Government to make this Bill conform with the views expressed by the leader of the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This question has been discussed very fully by members of the House, and the people will no doubt be grateful to the hon. member for Winnipeg for having taken it up. The hon. gentleman voiced my sentiments in protesting against handing over the navigation of the Red River to any private corporation. I am opposed to that principle. If it be in the public interest that the improvement of the St. Andrew's Rapids be undertaken to allow free navigation, the Government should do the work. We have had considerable experience in Ontario in tieing up rivers and navigable waters, and have had many battles over them. I am opposed to handing over any highway or waterway to a private corporation, however efficient the company may be. It is a vicious and unsound position, and it should not be carried out. I have faith in the North-west. I have many friends and relatives living in Manitoba, and they are all inspired with great faith in the country. I do not know that the speech delivered by the Secretary of State was quite in keeping with the subject before the House. I do not know on what ground he made the observation that we on this side of the House had no faith in the country. The Secretary of State imputes motives to the Opposition, which they do not deserve. The Opposition have faith in this country, and it is because they entertain such faith that they oppose the hon. gentleman and the Government to which he belongs. The hon. gentleman has the idea that he owns this country, and not only this country, but the Empire, and there is no foundation, historically, for holding that idea. It is absurd to say that because we do not have faith in that hon. gentleman, owing to his past record, we are decrying the country. We know how unsafe it is to hand over any franchise to the Secretary of State; we know how dangerous it has been in the past. I will never consent by my voice or vote to hand over any franchise belonging to the people, to any company controlled partially or wholly by the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State says he has faith in the country. He has a right to have faith in the country, which has supported him for the last forty years.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If I am out of order I withdraw the expression, but everybody knows the statement is substantially true, although it may in a parliamentary sense be incorrect. The hon. gentleman had such faith in this country that he left this country and many people think it was for the country's good.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am replying to the statement of the Secretary of State.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When the Secretary of State tries to intimate that the Opposition are not loyal, that they are decrying the country, I have a right to reply, and hurl the statement back.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can say he has faith in the country. There is no objection to that, but if the hon. gentleman goes into a history of the Secretary of State, that is hardly relevant to the question.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is not necessary for me to go out of the country to refer to the political career of the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper). When he enters into a wholesale tirade against the Opposition, I surely have a right to reply. The Secretary of State appears to delight in clinging to the coat tails of Mr. Blake. In every speech he makes, he refers to Mr. Blake's career in some way, so as to try and gain some support from Mr. Blake's name. To-night the Secretary of State told us that Mr. Blake admitted he was wrong. I deny that statement. I read Mr. Blake's speech at Victoria, and Mr. Blake never made any such statement as was attributed to him. The Secretary of State tries to get a little prestige in this House and in the country by clinging to Mr. Blake. Well, the Secretary of State and the Government he presides over, must be in a pretty hard place when they resort to such tactics as that. I am proud of this country, Sir, and I say that the best thing that could happen for the sake of the progress of this country, is to have a change of Government. Are we going to take away the constitutional rights of the people of this country, and to place their natural heritage in the hands of this Government? No, Sir, I do not believe in such a thing as that, and I think the member for Winnipeg is entitled to the thanks of this House, the thanks of the people of Winnipeg, and the thanks of the people of Canada for the courageous course he has taken on this question. He stands here for the rights of the people, and in the interests of the country, and he wishes that the rights of the people should be maintained to them, and not be centered in a Government which cannot be trusted. The Secretary of State delivered a speech to us to-night, and I am surprised he did not read a telegram. I never knew him before to make a speech in which he did not read a telegram of some kind or other. He read an eight-year old speech of his to-night, to show that he was not doing this for an election dodge. What else in the world is this scheme being proposed for now? Why was it not brought up before? Why is it not postponed for a few months when Parliament must meet again, and why are not the people of the country and the people of Manitoba allowed to express their opinion on the matter. As to the navigation of the Hudson's Bay and the Hudson's Straits, I do not know anything about that myself. I have read the reports of Mr. Gordon, but the feasibility of this scheme rests altogether upon the navigability of those waters for any lengthened period in the year. If the period of navigation is very brief, what good is there in this project. If, on the contrary, navigation remains open longer, of course it might confer great benefit. The Canadian Pacific Railway is quite capable of doing the business of that country for many years to come, and this country has no right to impede its development by encouraging an opposition route, for the present, at all events. I think that railway, in the first place, should have been built on the plan suggested by Mr. Blake, and if Mr. Blake's idea had been carried out in the construction of that road, it would have been better for the North-west, better for Manitoba, and better for the Canadian Pacific itself.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is entirely out of order. The hon. member is an old parliamentarian, and he must know that a discussion on the Canadian Pacific Railway is not the question now before the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am not quite so old a parliamentarian as the Secretary of State, and if I followed his example I hope you will excuse me. It is not often I follow his example anyhow. His arguments, of course, were dressed up in glittering generalities, and I tried to reply to them in the same way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, in reference to the building of this road, or of this canal, for it seems to be a combination of a railway and a canal. I think it would be well if the promoter of this Bill would allow it to remain over until another session. Whoever will be here next session will be prepared to deal with the question, and will have the benefit of the speeches made in this moribund Parliament on the subject. We should not give away the rights of the people in that river to any company, no matter how good their standing may be. Then, they are to have a subsidy. Why do they wish a subsidy? If the Secretary of State would stand up and say that this is not an ante-election scheme, I would have my idea about it. I know that the Secretary of State would not have anything to do with influencing elections by an outlay of public money. It would not be parliamentary for me to say he would, and I have so much respect for the Speaker that I wish to confine myself within parliamentary rules. I am very anxious to do everything I can to advance the interests of Manitoba and the North-west. The Liberal party have always stood for the North-west. We have our friends there, and we desire to see them get along. Under the system pursued at present, I do not think that country makes the advances it should. I have been struck with the courage and ability which the hon. member for Winnipeg has displayed in advancing measures in the interest, not only of Manitoba and the North-west but in the interest of the Dominion as well. I think he has set an example of perseverance and industry that is to be commended.

Mr. TAYLOR. In blocking legislation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He has blocked nothing. He is only blocking a company against getting rights that belong to the people. I remember, Sir, in the first political address I issued, one of the principal planks was that rights belonging to the people should not be given to any government or company; and since I have been a member of this House, I have adhered to that principle, and I am here to-night advocating it, because I believe it is vital to the welfare of the country.

Amendment negatived on division, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the preamble,

Mr. MARTIN. I think there are many reasons why the preamble should not be considered proven, or rather I consider that it is partially proven and partially not proven. So far as the petition prays for the right to construct a canal from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, I am in favour of that. I find in this pamphlet the following reasons why this power should be granted to the company. (The hon. member read lengthy extracts from the pamphlet referred to.)

Mr. DALY. I do not wish to interrupt the speech, but it is evident from the tactics the hon. gentleman has pursued yesterday afternoon and evening and this morning that it is not his intention to allow the committee to make any progress. The responsibility must rest with the hon. gentleman and with hon. gentlemen opposite for not permitting this very useful and necessary piece of private legislation to go through. I wish to say on behalf of the Government that were it not that we have very important legislation to attend to to-day, I would be willing to sit here until twelve noon or later if necessary, in order to show the hon. gentleman that he cannot force the hand of the Government or of the House, and also were it not for the fact that we would tire out "Hansard" and the officials, I would say go on. But, under the circumstances, and the responsibility resting on hon. gentlemen opposite, and on them alone, and as the hon. gentleman persists in his tactics, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2.35 a.m. (Tuesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 31st March, 1896.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DEATH OF MR. AMYOT, M.P.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to discharge the melancholy duty of drawing the attention of the House to the fact that the fatal shaft has struck one of the members of this House in the full vigour of his manhood, and has deprived us of the privilege of seeing him here again. Lieutenant-Colonel Amyot, who has, for fifteen years, been a member of this House, has, I believe, obtained the respect and confidence of hon. members on both sides. Although having the courage of his convictions, and defending them with great vigour and force, he has been, at the same time, known, inside and outside of the House, as a gentleman of most genial manners; and whatever asperities may have been caused, at any moment, in the discussions which took place here, they were immediately forgotten outside of this chamber. A descendant of one of the oldest and most respected French families of Canada, Lieutenant-Colonel Amyot was called to the bar, I believe, at the date of confederation, in 1867; and as an advocate, as a member of this Parliament, as a journalist, in all relations of life, he has so borne himself as to have obtained the respect and confidence of all who knew him. It will be long remembered that when the unhappy rising took place in the North-west Territories, Lieutenant-Colonel Amyot, who commanded the Voltigeurs, of Quebec, went to the front with that noted force, which had long been connected with the history of Canada, and aided in suppressing that insurrection and in maintaining law and order in the country. That circumstance attracted great attention in the mother country, and that it was felt that the people of the French races in the province of Quebec had vindicated their title as most loyal subjects of the Crown, when, under the peculiar circumstances of that insurrection, they were found ready to discharge, in the most faithful and efficient manner, the duty they owed to their country in restoring law and order in that territory. I have had the pleasure of long personal acquaintance with the late hon. member, and I can only say that the longer that acquaintance existed the more warmly I was attached to Lieutenant-Colonel Amyot, and the more highly I respected the motives that actuated him as a member of this House. As the House well remembers, he has not always sat on one side of the House; but whether he sat on the one side or on the other, every member of the House, I believe, felt that he acted under a conscientious view of what his duty was to Parliament and the country. I am quite sure that every member of this House will join in expressing the most sincere sympathy with his family and friends in the loss they have sustained, as well as our regret at the great loss which this House and the country has sustained by his lamented death.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I have but very few words to add to what has been so well said by the leader of the House on the present occasion. The sudden demise of our late colleague, Colonel Amyot, reminds us once more of a truth, which, indeed, is as old as the world, but which seems to strike us each time with new intensity, that our tenure of life is, after all, but a shadow. No one would have supposed, who saw Colonel Amyot not later than a week ago, full of energy and activity, that the hand of death was already upon him. If there was a trait which peculiarly characterized Colonel Amyot, I think both friend and foe will agree with me that he was a born fighter. In the course of a checkered career, he had distributed his blows right and left; but now that he is no more, I suppose it behooves all of us, both his friends and his opponents, to remember only his good points, and to forget the disputes which we had with him in his life. In his checkered career he has made a good many friends and some bitter enemies; but now that he lies in his grave, his enemies, I am sure, will be the first to pay a warm tribute to the undoubted qualities which he exhibited in his life.

PAY OF SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to bring to the attention of this House a matter of importance, especially to those who are interested; and, to put myself in order, I intend to follow my remarks with a motion that the House adjourn. According to the arrangement made the year before last, in voting the Estimates for contingencies of this House, I find that last year, owing to the protracted length of the session, which extended beyond the 30th day of June, when all the Estimates voted at the previous session lapsed, many of the employees of this House had to be paid out of the Estimates that were voted last year for the present year, and, on that account, I have no doubt there was a considerable reduction in the amount voted for that purpose. At the present session we have the unfortunate state of affairs existing of a large number of the employees of this House being without their pay for the last two weeks—those employees who are paid every two weeks. These include door-keepers, thirty sessional clerks, forty-five sessional messengers, French translators, amanuenses, eighteen pages, charwomen, gas men, servants, and all other temporary employees of this House and of the Senate. Owing to the draft upon the Estimates last year voted for this purpose, I understand the money has run out. At the expiration of the seventy-sixth day of this session this money was all spent, and though the session is not nearly over, there is no estimate from which to pay these parties who are working for us. It is to be regretted that this should continue as it has done, because these people above all others are unable to do without their money. They are working for very small pay, they are temporary employees, and they cannot be expected to have means to fall back upon to defray their expenses, but are dependent upon the pittances they get every two weeks for the purpose of paying their board and other necessary expenses. Some two weeks ago—on the 12th March, I believe—the estimate was run out. The two weeks' term is up and now they have entered upon the third term, and still no provision is made for them. Now, that is a great hardship for these people, for the reasons I have already given. It makes it impossible for them to meet their obligations, as no doubt they had provided to do anticipating prompt payment of their wages from time to time. It makes it unfortunate also for those who are boarding them, and those who are trusting them. It also tends materially to injure their credit and their standing in the community in which they are living. The question naturally arises, why has this not been provided for ? It was known that this difficulty existed. It must have been known some time ago that this session would not be over before seventy-six days of the session had passed. Therefore, it seems that it was incumbent upon the Government to provide, by Supplementary Estimates or otherwise, for these employees of the Government. I understand the matter has been brought to the attention of the Government. These employees are not in a position to do anything themselves, and they are obliged to await the convenience of those who provide the means wherewith they may be paid. Now, during the early part of the session we did very little work. A great deal of time was wasted, practically, on account of the bill of fare which the Government presented to us not being sufficiently advanced or in proper shape to keep this House employed. It was not due to any fault of these employees that the work did not go on and reach a conclusion at an earlier date. If there is any fault at all, it is with the Government themselves. It is certainly not the fault of the Government's following in this House, because they have been ready at all times to render assistance in carrying out legislation, or to deal with any matters that are presented to the House. This being the case, I think the Government should have provided an estimate to meet the demands of these temporary employees. As yet we have not heard when the Supplementary Estimates will be down. I presume that provision will be made in these Supplementary Estimates for the payment of these employees, but I am told that they cannot be paid until the Supply Bill is assented to. Why should the Government let the matter remain in abeyance ? It is a matter of importance to these little pages, to these charwomen, and others who are dependent upon their wages for their maintenance that they should get their pay promptly, and, therefore, we do not see any reason why there should be any delay in providing the money for them. We think the Government should attend to it at once, and propose Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of getting these people their pay. It may be that it is expected that the House will pass the main Estimates in regular form and after that the Supplementary Estimates. But it can scarcely be expected in reason that these people should wait until that time, for if we make the same progress we have been making in this House for weeks past, we cannot expect the Estimates to pass for some time to come. In fact, it seems extremely doubtful that the Estimates can be passed before Parliament closes by the effluxion of time. I move that the House adjourn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret that the hon. member who has made this motion should have done so in the absence of the Minister of Finance. No doubt if some intimation had been given of the hon. gentleman's intention to bring the matter up, the Minister of Finance would have been in his place. I therefore ask the House to allow the matter to stand over until the Government have an opportunity of considering it. A statement will be made to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. There can be no reason why the Minister of Finance is not in his place. He is bound to be here like the rest of us. Unless there is some good reason given, unless he is out of town——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

Mr. LAURIER. Then why should he not be here ?

Mr. GIBSON. I was astonished to find the statement that was contained in the Ottawa correspondence of the "Globe" to the effect just stated by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). It is disgraceful that this great Dominion of Canada should be lax in the payment of its employees. Fancy, Mr. Speaker, these little boys who sit at your feet, many of whom are the sole support of their widowed mothers waiting for their two weeks' pay, and this House told that the matter cannot be even considered until the Minister of Finance arrives. It is a standing disgrace to the Ministers that they have not had wisdom and foresight enough to provide for the wages of their employees. I venture to say they have provided for their own salaries, and that in the earlier part of this session they might have made provision for the wages of employees such as these whose cases we are discussing. You know, as a business man, Mr. Speaker, we all know, that there is nothing by which we judge the credit of a business man so much as the regularity with which he pays his employees. And yet this great Dominion, of which so much boasting is done by the Ministers when it suits them, is under the guidance of men who are remiss in providing for the wages of the staff in our employ. This is not the first time matters of this kind have come before the House. A year or two ago I had occasion to bring before this House the subject of the payment of men on the Welland Canal. The irregularity of the Government pay-day was such that it varied from the 14th to the end of the month, and the store-keepers and those dependent on the Welland Canal service were at a loss to know when the money might be expected. I am bound to say that when the matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals a change for the better was made. There is no one in this House but ought to be ashamed to think that we are presided over by a Government that is so incompetent as not to provide for the salaries of the poorest of its employees, and I think the leader of the House should make provision now that these employees should be paid. I am sure that if one of them was really desirous of doing justice to these people, it would be an easy matter to provide the $2,500 or $3,000 to pay a couple of week's wages, and not have ground given for complaint by members on both sides of want of attention on the part of the Government. I hope the hon. gentleman who leads the House will see that these people are provided with their wages, and that we shall hear nothing more of this kind brought up of the Dominion of Canada running behind two weeks in the payment of the employees of this House. No business man would allow his pay to get behind twenty-four hours, and it is humiliating to think that the Dominion of which we are all so proud has not provided for such an ordinary expense as the wages of employees.

Mr. McSHANE. I am sure that if the leader of the House had risen in his place and stated that he would at once get the money for these people whose wages are overdue and who should have been paid before now, not one dissenting voice would have been heard, but he would have had a unanimous vote, which he does not often get in this House. I ask the hon. gentleman not to delay this matter. We all know poor people want their money. We all know that times are hard.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McSHANE. I am very glad to hear hon. gentlemen on the other side so strongly endorse my sentiments. I will say no more but only ask again that the leader of the House shall rise in his place and say that this money will be paid to-morrow.

Mr. CASEY. The grievance which is now complained of is apparently a very real grievance and one which should not have been allowed to rise. Why, Sir, if public funds were so low, probably some member of the Government might have done as I understand my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) once did when a member of the provincial government, and a similar case arose—he gave his own cheque for the shortage. Some member of the Government should have done so in this case, and have seen these poor folks out of the difficulty. But, if there was no member of the Government worth enough to do that, there is no doubt they could have had a vote in this House, without the slightest objection, for such a small subsidy as will be required for the purpose of paying these wages. But this mismanagement is only one other proof, not enormous in itself, but going to make up a very considerable pile, of the total business incapacity of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. The tenants of the Treasury benches do not understand the business they are engaged in, they cannot even pay the clerks—using the word "clerk" in a general sense to denote the employees under them. I say they are giving many signs of their incapacity to carry on the business of this country. There are other signs, the meaning of which cannot be misread. Whoever approaches this building today, by a track which resembles a side-road in a back township, with stones in some places sticking up through the mud, and in other places with six inches of slush on top ; whoever walks over the rotten sidewalks that surround this building ; whoever notices the general dirt, and decay, and disrepair of all the surroundings of these Houses, cannot fail to come to the conclusion not only that the tenants are incapable of carrying on the business, but that they mean to quit very soon. There is every sign that the tenants are going to quit, leaving the property in wreck and ruin.

Mr. OUIMET. Are you sorry for it ?

Mr. CASEY. No, I am not sorry they are leaving, nor will the country be sorry, but we are sorry they are damaging the property to such an extent before they get out. However, I hope that their downfall will not bring with it the loss of pay to people who can ill afford to lose it.

Mr. LISTER. Hon. gentlemen may treat this subject lightly, if they think proper, but it is a much more serious matter than would at first sight appear. We were told, the other night, that, unless we did something for the Chignecto Railway, in the way of voting $2,500,000——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is wandering from the question.

Mr. LISTER. I was just going on to point out how it might affect the credit of this country, and I was illustrating my point by saying that the Government claimed that the credit of this country would be seriously affected, unless we spent $2,500,000 for that enterprise.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is still out of order.

Mr. LISTER. I am coming back to the question. What will the English people think ? What will the London bankers think who hold the bonds ? What will our creditors generally think ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot discuss these extraneous questions.

Mr. LISTER. I want to say that the nonpayment of the pages, that the non-payment of these poor charwomen, most of them, I believe, widows with large families, the poor messengers, and that class of individuals we see about this House, who have come from every section of the country, the sessional writers of this House, who are worked day and night, with hardly a minute to themselves, and all the other employees of this House—what will be said in England, when it is known to-morrow, telegraphed over, that the Canadian Government is not able to pay the charwomen and these other humble employees, working about the public buildings in Ottawa? Why, Sir, is the exchequer empty? Is there nothing in it? Have the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches been left behind three weeks, or did they get their last month's salary? Hon. gentlemen won't say whether they have paid themselves or not. I am bold enough to venture the opinion that, if the accounts were looked up, every Minister on the ministerial benches will be found to have received a cheque for his pay, and these cheques have been cashed. But, Sir, when it comes to the class of people to whom a few dollars is an absolute necessity, for the purpose of supporting themselves and their family, the Government has been so much engaged in fighting amongst themselves, in hatching conspiracies, in deposing leaders, in stabbing colleagues, that they have not had time to make the commonest preparation for these poor people who are dependent upon the wages they earn for their daily support. Why, Sir, it is amusing that the leader of the House should get up and ask that this question should not be gone into, because, forsooth, the Minister of Finance is not present. The whole amount involved is about $2,500. Why is it that the Minister of Finance is not here? What business has he to be away from this House when important questions, such as this, are brought up, and the leader of the House is unable to answer them? He has no excuse. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Government deserve the greatest possible censure at the hands of this House for neglecting what is their manifest duty, for neglecting the payment of these people, and in that neglect they have been guilty of disgraceful conduct. What other parliament in the wide world could furnish a parallel? Even down in Venezuela could such a spectacle be presented to the country as is presented here—a country bankrupt in means? I will venture to say that that republic pays its pages, and messengers, and charwomen, working about the public buildings. But here in this great country, where we boast of our high civilization, our educational institutions, the honest administration of public affairs—here in the nineteenth century, the charwomen about these public buildings at Ottawa have not received their pay, and are begging, probably, the merchants, the grocers, and butchers throughout the town to give them a little more credit in order that they may keep starvation from their doors. This is the condition of affairs, and the Government have made no provision for it. If you have no money in the treasury, if the box is empty, why, in the name of common sense, don't you discount a note and pay these people? I am sure there will be found men on both sides of this House who will be willing to endorse it, rather than have to face the country with the disgraceful spectacle of the servants of the Dominion of Canada not being paid. I say, Mr. Speaker, that no words that can be uttered are sufficiently strong to censure the disgraceful conduct of the Government in power to-day for allowing these poor people to go unpaid, making it necessary for my hon. friend who moved the adjournment of the House, to call the attention of the House and the country to it. Every hon. gentleman must be amazed. It is something new to us. We never expected the Government could sink so low as to allow the Dominion of Canada to occupy the position that it does to-day.

Mr. ALLAN. While this matter is under discussion, there is another grievance to which I desire to call the attention of the House, to which the Government has evidently considered of a very trivial and unimportant character, but which is of very great importance to the people whose interests are involved. I wish to refer to the loss suffered by a number of farmers in the county of Essex from the slaughter of their hogs last fall, by order of the Government, their claims for which have been filed for months in the department, and for which there has been no provision made in the way of funds. A disease broke out among the hogs, traced to the feeding of refuse from a canning factory, and an outbreak of cholera was feared. The Government inspectors visited the locality and pens, and ordered, in many instances, the hogs to be slaughtered. Under the law, as it exists, the farmer is entitled to one-third of the value of his hogs. In one case, a farmer's hogs were slaughtered to the value of $250.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell me what relevancy that has to the question before the House.

An hon. MEMBER. The adjournment of the House has been moved.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn being made for the purpose of bringing up a specific subject, the discussion must be confined to that subject.

Mr. ALLAN. It is much to be regretted that provision has not been made for the payment of employees of this House. I trust the Supplementary Estimates will be brought down at an early day, as well as Estimates to cover the matter to which I have referred.

Mr. MULOCK. I think in view of the discussion which has taken place, the House is entitled to a statement from the Government as to whether or not they intend at once to remove this scandal, this grievance. The Minister leading the House intimated that he could not deal with the subject to-day or at the present moment because of the absence of the Minister of Finance. It appears to me that by this time the Minister of Finance ought to be in his seat to speak for himself, and if the discussion is now to be discontinued, perhaps the leader of the House will tell us what the Government contemplate doing in respect to the matter. The Government invariably on the eve of elections poses as the friend of the workingman. Where is the friendship of the Government manifested on this occasion ? We have seen for days the public press calling the attention of Parliament to this evil. On Thursday and Friday last attention was called to this public default. You cannot pick up a journal in Canada to-day but it will contain some reference to this default, and the country is indebted to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) for his consideration in calling the attention of the House to this matter. There are sitting in this House men who consider themselves specially the champions of the cause of labour. Where are their voices on this occasion ? Where is the hon. member who represents Montreal East (Mr. Lépine) ? Where are the hon. members for Hamilton ? They are not here when a real grievance is brought forward. Where is the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), who claims to be specially the champion of the cause of labour ? Where is he to-day when members of the industrial classes, the toiling and money earning classes have their cause before this House ? Where are those men who come here as specially authorized to represent labouring interests ? Mr. Speaker, I endorse all that has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister). We have a Cabinet enjoying huge salaries, led by the Secretary of State, who has enjoyed an enormous salary during the last thirty years at the hands of this country. How can he be deaf, and on the eve of the elections too, to the cries of the labouring people ? Why, Sir, a member of this House cannot go into a room an ante-room or a corridor in any part of this great building, which has cost millions, without being confronted by some of the creditors of this country. I look at the young pages, on the steps of your throne, Mr. Speaker ; they are creditors of Canada. You go into the lobby and see widowed mothers waiting for the few dollars due them. When you pass through a door you remember that the door-keepers have unpaid claims for a few weeks' wages. In the lobby and everywhere you are confronted by charwomen who are creditors of Canada. If you go to get a secretary you find that he is unpaid. You cannot get a bit of translation done without meeting an unpaid creditor. Yet the Finance Minister is now sitting in his seat probably indifferent to the whole matter, although he promised some time ago to bring down Supplementary Estimates to make provision to remove this grievance. But the hon. gentleman did not keep his promise yesterday to have the Supplementary Estimates laid on the Table of the House, and unless the hon. member for East Grey had brought this matter to the attention of the House he would probably not have had the Finance Minister in his seat to answer, if he can, for his default. Did not the hon. gentleman yesterday promise to lay the Supplementary Estimates on the Table of the House ? I heard him do so. Yesterday is past and gone, but there are no Supplementary Estimates. Parliament will soon come to an end—the 24th of April will soon be here. Do hon. gentlemen opposite propose to let Parliament expire without the country paying its just dues to this class ? Are these people to wait until Parliament again convenes, until a new Supply Bill is put through ? What public scandal is here occurred. And yet this same Government is quite prepared to ask Parliament to vote millions of money for any rotten and fraudulent scheme such as the Chignecto Ship Railway. At the same time these individuals are posing as the friends of labour and the working classes. I think when the Secretary of State a short time ago stated that the credit of Canada would be greatly impaired because of unpaid bonds lying in vaults in London, he should have remembered that the credit of Canada will be infinitely more prejudiced by the fact that the Government has the incapacity or indifference or whatever it may be called to fail to provide for the unpaid claims of ordinary labourers and employees in the House. If these people had not given value for their claims and if there was any question as to the genuineness of their claims, then some allowance might be made ; but they have earned their pay just as much and more than every hon. member on the Treasury benches. I would like to know if those pages have not put in their time as honestly as the Secretary of State or Finance Minister or any member on either side of this House. I do not find that the indemnity to the members is stopped or the salaries to the members of the Government or the salaries of any of those who are strong and able to take care of themselves. The only class that is submitted to an injustice is the class composed of the weak and helpless people who cannot speak for and help themselves. We have a Government which continually professes the keenest interest in the workingman and the greatest regard for his rights. The present instance is an apt proof of their sincerity. All they have for this class is a few words of sympathy and nothing substantial. For what are these gentlemen paid their large salaries ? Are they paid to discredit this country, to do wrong, to allow rights to go unredressed and injustice to be done ? If there is one obligation greater than another upon those in power, it is the obligation to be just to those who are under them. Under these circumstances, I cannot conclude without again expressing what I believe will be the voice of this country, our deep regret that the Administration has allowed discredit to come upon Canada's fair name by doing an injustice to a certain class. Hon. gentlemen opposite boast of the prosperity of this country and of the financial skill of the Government. This is one of the proofs of that remarkable financial skill, and I might fairly say that you may take this one instance as a fair sample of the skill of the Government generally in dealing with the financial matters of this country. We may ask that their record be judged by the well-known maxim "ex uno disce omnes."

Mr. LEPINE. (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I just heard the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), in the course of his remarks, ask where are the representatives of the working classes in this House, and why they do not stand up and champion the interests of that class under these circumstances. Well, I may tell the hon. member that I am here to champion the interests of the workingmen. I further tell him that I was quite surprised to hear him make the statement that every time there arose in this House a question concerning the interests of the labouring classes, the labour representatives were never found at their post in this House. If I did not rise in my place at once, like the hon. gentleman opposite, and ask that the employees of this House be immediately paid their salaries, it is because I also wished to bring up the case of the French translators of the "Debates," who are equally without their pay. I also wished to hear what the hon. gentlemen had to say on the matter, for, whenever the toiling and money-earning classes had their cause before this House, the hon. gentlemen opposite always failed to raise their voice in their favour, and I do not understand why they now champion with so much zeal the cause of labour.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation). It is because they are afraid of the Remedial Bill.

Mr. LEPINE. (Translation.) For instance, when the question of establishing a labour bureau, and other important matters in connection with the labour interests, were brought up in this House, the hon. gentlemen opposite always failed to co-operate with us. However, I am bound to say that I now share in their expression of opinion about the matter now before the House. While I may not use as strong language as has been used by the hon. gentlemen in censuring the Government, still I say that it is much to be regretted that provision has not been made for the payment of the employees, and what is still more strange is that the appropriation made last year for the payment of the French translators of the "Debates" has run out. What has become of that money ? I am at a loss to say. Quite possibly the Government may not have the necessary money to meet the demands of all the employees of this House ; but, as to the French translators of the "Debates," an appropriation was made last year for their salaries, and I am at loss to know where that money has gone to. But the fact is that they are still without their pay. At any rate, it is much to be regretted that the Government or the Treasury Board have not asked for a special warrant to be issued, or set apart some fund or devised some plan so as to pay regularly the messengers and all the other employees of this House. This is a matter of urgency, which claims the immediate attention of the Government. As the hon. gentlemen know, those employees are working for a very small pay and are dependent upon the pittances they get every month to defray their expenses ; otherwise, they are forced to run themselves into debt or to borrow from shavers, thereby losing a large portion of their earnings. I am very glad that the matter has been brought up in this House, for I do not see why in the world the Government should be running behind two weeks in the payment of the employees of this House. As to the remarks fallen from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that whenever questions interesting the cause of labour and the industrial classes were brought up in this House, I was not in my seat, I deny the statements as utterly groundless. I admit, that quite lately, when a Bill concerning the labouring interests was brought down, the hon. promoter of the Bill was not in his seat when the Bill came up ; but the hon. gentleman forgets surely how often he himself has failed to answer to the call, for reasons best known to himself, when Bills of which he was the promoter, came up for debate. I hope, therefore, that the Government will take the proper steps so that the employees of the House may be paid, without delay, their just claims.

Mr. McKAY. If hon. gentlemen opposite think they are going to deceive the workingmen of this country by the mock sympathy which they are manifesting to-day for an imaginary grievance, they are greatly mistaken. When there is any real grievance of the workingmen to be redressed, I am always ready to stand up in this House and plead their case, but not to talk buncombe such as we have been treated to to-day. The workingmen of this country know who are their friends and so do the farmers, and they are not to be caught with such chaff as hon. gentlemen opposite have threshed out on this occasion.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. member for Hamilton thinks it is an altogether imaginary grievance when people are not paid their salaries. What a stretch of imagination the hon. gentleman must have. Supposing I gave the hon. gentleman my note and it were not paid at maturity, he would consider it simply an imaginary grievance that I did not pay it. He ought to be a poet. In my opinion, the grievance is a very real one, when the wage-earner is not paid his wage, it is certainly a very real one to the person who ought to get his pay and does not, though it may not be to gentlemen like the hon. member for Hamilton. Perhaps the hon. gentleman's present situation and future prospects are such as to lift him beyond the dull prosaic domain of reality and into the coloured realm of imagination. But to the poor toiler such flights are impossible, and the question whether or not he gets his salary in order to supply the daily wants of his life is a very real one. While I may not use as strong language as has been used, the matter brought up by the hon. member for Grey indicates to me that there is something wrong somewhere. Here is a rich country.

Mr. GIROUARD. Very rich.

Mr. FRASER. And the richer it is the more disgraceful it is that we cannot pay our employees. There is no fear of the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me losing anything, and therefore he seems to think that those who are not paid their salaries have no ground to complain. The jeers with which this question that has been raised is greeted is not creditable to the members of this House. I am not going to pose as the friend of the workingman or of anybody else, but I am a strong believer in the principle that the labourer is worthy of his hire, and that our first duty, irrespective of everything else, is to see that he is paid his wages. It is all very well for the hon. member for Hamilton, who has a big account to his credit in the bank, to speak of this as an imaginary grievance ; but it is a real grievance to the widow who has to depend on the earnings of her boy, and who finds herself, through the default of the Government, unable to supply him with the change of raiment with which every mother likes to supply her child at this spring time of the year. If no other good comes out of this discussion but the recognition of this one fact, that the Government should so arrange, should set apart some fund or devise some plan so that they can always obtain the means to pay their employees and thus prevent recurrence of this disgraceful state of affairs, this little discussion will not have been in vain. I trust that the Government will see that those in our employ, and who labour as hard as the members of this House, should never be again put in this position.

Mr. CRAIG. No doubt the hon. member for Grey was perfectly right in bringing up this matter ; but, at the same time, I think that the request made by the hon. leader of the House that the hon. member should wait until the Minister of Finance was here was a perfectly proper request and should have been granted at once. I have no sympathy at all with all this mock sympathy to which we have been treated. There are men on the other side of the House who talk about the workingmen, and who, I am satisfied, do not care a straw whether these people are paid or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order ; withdraw.

Mr. CRAIG. I will withdraw that word if it is not parliamentary.

Some hon. MEMBERS. It is all right.

Mr. CRAIG. If it is parliamentary, I will stick to it. As I looked at some of those hon. members opposite who were talking in this strain, I felt satisfied that they knew that they were not expressing sentiments which the country would receive as sincere.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CRAIG. While I do sympathize sometimes with what is said on the other side of the House, I must frankly say that there are times when members of the Opposition talk in such a way as not only to alienate the sympathy of members on this side of the House, but talk in such a way, also, as to alienate the sympathy of the country from their views. Sir, I do admire the leader of the Opposition, because, on every occasion, he acts as a gentleman in this House, but I do not know that it would be parliamentary to say that there are members behind him and around him who sometimes do not act in that way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CRAIG. Whether it is parliamentary to say so or not, I must say that I think so. Now, Sir, to show how sincere was the sympathy of the member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) for the employees of this House, I wish to recall a few of his statements. Speaking of the messengers and sessional writers, he endeavoured to make out that whether they got their pay or not, they do not earn it. I would like to know what the employees think of such talk as that. He was pretending before this House to sympathize with them, and pretending before the country to sympathize with them, and yet——

Mr. LISTER. I call the hon. gentleman to order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) is saying what he knows is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) must not make that statement in this House.

Mr. LISTER. I was just saying to the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig) what he said to me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order—take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not understand the hon. member (Mr. Craig) as accusing the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) of making statements that he knew were not true. If the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig) made that statement, of course it was out of order ; but it does not excuse the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister).

Mr. CRAIG. I do not know what statement is complained of.

Mr. LISTER. The statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) was that I was ridiculing the messengers and others in this House; that I was pretending to sympathize with them when I did not, in fact, sympathize with them. In other words, that I was pretending to be what I was not. I want to say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig), that so far as he is concerned he has no sympathy with the labouring classes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member (Mr. Lister) has retracted the statement he made with regard to the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Craig).

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has not retracted his statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member from Lambton (Mr. Lister) must withdraw the statement.

Mr. LISTER. Of course I do. You say it is unparliamentary, and, in obedience to your wish, I will withdraw it.

Mr. CRAIG. What I said was that while the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) was pretending to sympathize with these employees——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CRAIG. While the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) was pretending before the country to sympathize with the employees, at the same time he left the impression on my mind, and I think he wanted to leave the impression on the minds of the people of the country, that a great many of these employees were not necessary, and were not doing any work.

Mr. LISTER. Your mind is very plastic.

Mr. CRAIG. I was a little surprised, also, to hear the member for North York (Mr. Mulock) so very sympathetic for the workingmen. I am glad that he is sympathetic for them, because I never knew it before. While I do not wish to talk about private affairs at all, yet I must say that it does not look well for some men to stand up in this House and pose as friends of the workingmen, and, at the same time, try to make out that other members are not friends of the workingmen. The member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) told the House that I was everything that was good, and so forth. Of course, I suppose he meant that. I suppose it would be unparliamentary for me to say that he did not mean that. I may tell the hon. gentleman, however, that I am not standing up here to claim anything for myself. It is not necessary for me to pose as the friend of the workingman, because I believe that the workingmen of Canada are intelligent enough to know who their friends are, without being told about it. It is not necessary for the friends of the workingmen in this country to stand up and protest their friendship. From what I could gather from the statement of the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), it appears that money has not been appropriated for the last two weeks to pay these employees of the House. Well, I have no doubt that the necessary steps will shortly be taken to pay them. I say that while I do not find fault with the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) bringing this matter up, yet I think he might have spoken to the Government about it, and got an explanation. However, he had a perfect right to bring it before the attention of this House if he wished to. The leader of the House asked that the matter be deferred until the Finance Minister was present, and I think that after that request, the discussion was out of order, if not from a parliamentary point of view, at all events from a common sense point of view. However, I suppose it was valuable, in that it gave some hon. gentlemen an opportunity to pose before the country.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must express my surprise at the manner in which the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) spoke of the members on this side of the House. The discussion by hon. gentlemen here was honestly in the interests of those employees who have not been paid their salaries. For the fourteen years which I have sat in the House, I have not known of any occasion when the employees of Parliament were, from day to day, without being paid. I do remember on one occasion, when the lamented Sir John Abbott was Premier, Parliament was asked to consent to the passage of Estimates to pay the salaries of the employees, and the Opposition consented at once. The Minister of Finance is now in the House, and although he has been listening to the discussion, he has given no explanation as to why the Government have not made provision for paying our employees. Since I came to this House, I have never known a session during which so little courtesy was extended by the Government to the Opposition. The Government benches are almost empty every day, and few of their supporters are present. These employees want to get paid, and the Minister of Finance has a right to explain why they have not been paid. I trust he will do so now.

Mr. SPROULE. As the hon. Finance Minister is in his seat now, perhaps he would make the explanation which the hon. leader of the Government said he would make.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not happen to be in, I am sorry to say, at the time this discussion commenced. I have, however, heard a certain portion of it, and I apprehend that it commenced about the fact that the vote for the House of Commons for the present year has become exhausted, owing to the fact that last year's Parliament sat after the 1st of July, and, consequently, payments which it was supposed would be left for this session, were taken up last session. Owing to that fact, the vote is at present, I understand, exhausted, and must be supplemented. The Supplementary Estimates, which will be brought down in the course of a very short time, will make provision for the services of the House of Commons ; and I hope that, when this vote is brought down, we shall not find hon. gentlemen opposite, who are to-day so sorry that these services remain unpaid, interposing against the country voting money for them. I do not think anything very serious has happened to the public credit of the country. A fine opportunity has been given to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) to make a speech, which is a fine example of melodrama, and shows the hon. gentleman, in that respect, to decided advantage. I hope there will be no financial crash in London, or Berlin, or Paris, in consequence of this.

Mr. MULOCK. How about the men who have been a week without any pay ?

Mr. FOSTER. As soon as possible, the Supplementary Estimates will be presented to the House, and the House will be asked to vote them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not wish to take part in the discussion ; but the hon. gentleman most faithfully promised that these Supplementary Estimates would be down last night, at the latest.

Mr. FOSTER. If possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And really I think he would consult the interest of the public service generally, as well as that of these servants who have to be paid, if he would bring them down without delay. I was going to ask the hon. gentleman last night, when the debate was over, for what reason the Supplementary Estimates had not been brought down, as promised, and also when he would bring them down, for the last time of asking.

Mr. FOSTER. The Supplementary Estimates are now in the printer's hands. Such occurrences as that of last night tire me out so much, and there is so much other work of a departmental kind to be done, that it is difficult to prepare the Estimates. My hon. friend knows that there is something more to be done than to print them. When I made the promise, I did so, expecting that there would not be so many things to cause delay, mainly the late sittings of the House.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

THE ARMENIAN ATROCITIES.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to call the attention of the First Minister to a motion which stands in my name on the Order paper, and which I desire to ask the Government to take over as a Government notice. I refer to the motion with regard to the atrocities in Armenia. The First Minister is not unacquainted with the character of the motion, and, I think, it has met with his approval. It is a copy of the motion passed in the British House of Commons, with these words added :

> And that for this purpose, concurrent action by the Christian powers of the world, including the United States of America, may be secured.

The whole motion is as follows :—

> That this House expresses its deep sympathy with the sufferings of the Christian population in Asiatic Turkey, but trusts that further endeavours will be made to ameliorate their lot, and that for this purpose, concurrent action by the Christian powers of the world, including the United States of America, may be secured.

It is not necessary for me, Mr. Speaker, to enter into any discussion of this question, further than to say that the Christian public of this country are deeply interested in the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot discuss the question.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not going to discuss the question. I am merely alluding to the fact that there is great public interest in this matter ; and I rise simply to say that, as the motion cannot be reached, standing in my name, I ask the Government, in view of the interest taken in the matter, to make it a Government order, in order that it may come with more authority and force, and may be acted upon.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the Government warmly sympathize with the resolution which he has placed on the paper ; but it would be impossible for me to engage to make it a Government order, until we are further advanced with the public business. After the exhibition which we have again had of the disposition of hon. gentlemen to prevent the public business being done——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER—I think I must decline to burden the Government with further business until greater progress has been made with the indispensable public business that is now before the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am sorry that I was unable to catch the remarks made by the First Minister. I understood that this motion was to be taken over by the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have just explained that the Government sympathize most strongly with the resolution, but I can make no engagement to burden the Government with any other business until we make further progress with the indispensable public business now before the House, however strongly we sympathize with the hon. gentleman's object.

SITTING OF THE HOUSE ON GOOD FRIDAY.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I beg to call the attention of the leader of the House to a matter which deeply concerns the convenience of the members. We have all understood that the Prime Minister stated in another place that the House would sit on Good Friday, if it were going to interfere with any proceedings ; and I would like to know from the hon. gentleman who leads the House, whether that is the case or not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. leader of the Opposition—because this is a matter in which we are all interested—whether he himself feels any objection to sitting on Good Friday ? It is most important, in relation to the present condition of the public business, that not a day or an hour be lost in pressing the public business ; but I do not hesitate to say that I would not press the House to sit on Good Friday, if it were going to interfere with any conscientious scruples on the part of one hon. gentleman on either side of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg to say that the hon. gentleman's question, so far as I am personally concerned, is perfectly unfair, and I do not propose to answer it. The hon. gentleman has no right to ask what my personal scruples are in the matter. If I have not scruples, others may have. But Good Friday is a statutory holiday, and a day on which we have not been accustomed to sit, and I simply ask the hon. gentleman whether it is the intention of the Government to sit on that day ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As the hon. gentleman did not raise an objection, I thought I was treating him with courtesy by consulting him across the floor. I have to say, as the hon. gentleman raises no objection, that we do propose to sit on Good Friday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the hon. gentleman has made an appeal to the members, I am bound to tell him, although not given to raising conscientious scruples, yet, as a member of the Episcopal Church of England, I, for one, entertain extremely strong objections to sitting on Good Friday. I do not know how that day is regarded by other gentlemen ; but I know that there is no day in the whole calendar on which our sitting would give greater offence to people of the Episcopal Anglican persuasion, than Good Friday, which, in our eyes, is, perhaps, the most sacred day of the whole year. Therefore, I, for one, enter the strongest possible personal protest against any proposition to sit on that day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to add to what the hon. gentleman has said the expression of my own feelings in the matter. I saw the notice given by the hon. gentleman a day or two ago and was very much surprised to see it, and I took occasion to give notice of an amendment. I wished to bring to the hon. gentleman's notice the fact that a very large body of Christians, the Anglican Church, would look with the greatest abhorrence on the conduct of this House in sitting on Good Friday. In the first place, such action is utterly unprecedented, and in the next place it would do violence to their conscientious convictions. There is no day held in such holy esteem by the Anglican Church as Good Friday. Compared with it, all other days sink into comparative insignificance. We know that hon. gentlemen on both sides entertain different views on the propriety of observing this day in the year which calls for yearly observance it is the day which the Christian church has set apart for the observance of the tremendous event which that day is set apart to celebrate. I know personally that there are thousands of good Christians in this country who would be absolutely shocked beyond expression if we were to sit on that day. The hon. gentleman knows that I am sure. He knows that services are held in the Anglican churches, not only the ordinary morning service, but also services during the greater part of the day. He knows that those who belong to that communion are obliged to absent themselves from their public duty on that day, and although we cannot all look alike on these matters, still I hope that respect will be paid to the principles of that communion as well as the principles of any other communion. I ask the hon. gentleman what would be said in England if the proposition were there made that the House of Commons should sit on Good Friday. It is not conceivable that such a proposition should be made, and it would not be listened to for a moment. It would be looked upon by the great Anglican Church as an outrage on their cherished convictions. I hope the hon. gentleman will reconsider his position, and not introduce a precedent which would be productive of very bitter feeling on the part of a very large section of the community.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before answering the question in the first instance, I endeavoured to elicit what I now elicit, and I have no hesitation in saying, that I do not think, under the circumstances, it would do to ask the House to sit at a time when our sitting would infringe the conscientious scruples of any of the members. After the statement made by the two hon. gentlemen who have just addressed the House. I beg to say that we shall not sit on Good Friday.

THE REMEDIAL ACT (MANITOBA).

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 58) the Remedial Act (Manitoba).—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

The Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and consitute the separate school board of education for the province of Manitoba, a certain number of persons not exceeding nine, all of whom shall be Roman Catholics.

2. Three of such members, recorded at the foot of the list of the members of the board as entered in the minute book of the Executive Council of the province of Manitoba, shall retire and cease to hold office at the end of each year, which for the purposes of this Act shall be held and taken to be the second day of October annually, and the names of the members appointed in their stead shall be placed at the head of the list, and the three members so retiring in rotation and annually may be eligible for reappointment.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It might have been expected that before we entered on a discussion of the first clause, attention would be called to the almost impropriety, I was going to say, of our proceeding, in view of the negotiations now going on at Winnipeg. I myself was in hopes that the hon. leader of the House would have taken this opportunity of informing us how far these negotiations had progressed and what probability there was of their being brought to a successful issue. It would be a matter of very great satisfaction to hon. gentlemen on both sides, I think I might say, if some amicable arrangement could be reached by which this vexed question could be withdrawn from the political arena. It is certainly the earnest desire of members of this side of the House, at any rate, that we should lock horns—to use a common expression—with the Government, in the coming elections, on the great trade question. We are desirous that the verdict of the country should be obtained on that issue and not be clouded by or mixed up with a question which unfortunately will give rise to racial or religious prejudices of one kind and another. I had hoped that before entering upon the discussion of this Bill in committee, the Government would have proceeded with other pressing business and let this Bill stand until they were able to assure the House that the negotiations had failed—an assurance which I, for one, would be very reluctant to receive indeed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say in reply that when the Government announced that they proposed to open negotiations with the Manitoba government, we distinctly stated that it was our intention to continue to press the passage of this measure. The hon. gentleman knows that we are not occupying the position a Government usually occupies with regard to Parliament. He knows that the decision which has been arrived at that this House must rise not later than the 24th April, makes it absolutely impossible, with any regard to public business and the position of this most important measure, that any course can be taken except steadily to press this measure to a conclusion; and so far from that course interfering in any way with the negotiations, I regard it as calculated to have precisely the opposite effect. If this measure, which is now before the committee, becomes law, it will be a comparatively simple matter for the government of Manitoba to make such arrangements as will prevent its being brought into operation; but if it is to become law, it must be proceeded with steadily until concluded. If, on the other hand, it was abandoned or withdrawn, and the time lost for putting it upon the statute-books, and the negotiations did not succeed, the minority in Manitoba would be left in the same deplorable and helpless position in which they have been for the last five years. Under these circumstances, the Government propose to press this measure with all the vigour and energy in their power until it is placed on the statute-books.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) At any rate the hon. gentleman's statement does not lack definiteness this time. I must say that I did not so understand the statement he made the other day. I understood that he would press the Bill to a second reading, but not that he would press it persistently from day to day through the committee stages. I can well understand, at the period of time when the Government differed from the Opposition as to the proper policy to pursue, that they should have determined to follow out the course which the hon. gentleman now outlines. But when the Government changed their policy and made what I venture to say—and I do not say it with any desire to taunt them at all—was an honourable back down, and a back down which we were prepared to accept in the proper spirit, by adopting the policy which my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) has time and again so persistently pressed upon them of seeking to have this matter amicably settled, I did think they would have determined that their repentance should be a sincere repentance. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman how can the country at large believe for a moment that the Government are sincerely desirous of reaching an amicable conclusion? They choose commissioners, two of them selected from the Government, and one of them an outside party, and send them to consult with the Manitoba government with the object, as they alleged, of reaching an amicable conclusion, of reaching a fair, reasonable compromise, of ascertaining by personal discussion between the parties, if some modus vivendi cannot be reached that will put this question to one side and withdraw it from the political arena by a settlement upon a basis that will be satisfactory to the Roman Catholic minority as well as to the Protestant majority. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I will call his attention to what he said to this House when he made his official statement on March 9th. Surely we are justified in hoping for better things than coercive legislation after this statement :

> In view of the assurance that the government of Manitoba are willing to have a conference, the Government propose, so soon as the second reading of the Remedial Bill is carried, to have a conference with Mr. Greenway's government with a view to arrive at a settlement of this question on terms that will be satisfactory to his government and the minority of Manitoba, but in the meantime to proceed with the question before the House de die in diem as previously arranged.

Mr. OUIMET. I rise to a question of order. I question the right of the hon. gentleman, at this time, to re-open the general discussion of the expediency of the line of policy pursued by the Government. We are in committee, and I believe the discussion must be limited to the clause before the Chair. We are on clause No. 1, and I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether, on that clause, we can discuss the general policy of the Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before you decide, Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out one or two reasons why, in my opinion, the hon. gentleman's point of order is not well taken. We are now asked to discuss the first clause of this Bill. I think, whether rightly or wrongly, that there are very grave reasons of state, paramount reasons of state, why you should not proceed with the discussion of that first clause in committee, reasons so grave that they prevail not only in the minds of members on this side, but in the minds of the majority of members of this House, if left to themselves. And I submit that men of common sense must see that if this Bill is to be dealt with at all, you cannot press it through at the moment when you are negotiating for an amicable settlement outside the Bill. The thing is a mere burlesque. I was going to use language hardly parliamentary, perhaps, but I feel it is almost an insult to the members of this House to ask them to discuss the details of a coercion measure at the very time when you say you are quietly and amicably trying to make an arrangement outside the law altogether. If I am right in the fact that this paramount state reason stares us in the face and cannot be ignored, surely we may discuss it before entering upon the clause itself. I submit that for your consideration.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I wished at first to remark to the hon. gentleman that we were in committee, and had to discuss the clause before the Chair when the hon. gentleman commenced an attack upon the Government. I thought it pertinent and allowed the hon. gentleman to go on and take his own course until this moment. But since the Government have answered and declared that it was their intention to go on in committee, I must remind the hon. gentleman that we are in committee, and must discuss the Bill clause by clause.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course we accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but there is this very important consideration in connection with it. We have before us the question of the propriety, and it may be the legality of proceeding with the consideration of this clause at all. But hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House know that the law from which we derive our authority to proceed in committee, contemplates this as the last place of resort for the consideration of this question. Well, what have you done ? Since this Bill came before the House you have appointed a commission to meet the government of Manitoba and discuss this whole question. Now, by the appointing of that commission, and by entering upon the discussion with them, you have admitted yourselves that this House has not jurisdiction, at present, to deal with this question, because you are discussing and dealing with another party in respect of this question. Why, look at the provision in the British North America Act. That provision authorizes the Government to hear the appeal from the minority, it authorizes them to inquire into the question of whether or not any right or privilege has been violated. They have ascertained that fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am asking, Mr. Chairman, whether it is not proper that we should discuss this matter preliminary to the discussion of this clause.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order has been raised whether in committee the question to which the hon. gentleman refers may be discussed. The House is in committee on this Bill, and the point of order is raised that only the clause before the House, and not the general policy of the Government, can be discussed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may point out to the hon. gentleman that if the point of order is all that stands in the way, it would be perfectly germane for the committee to rise.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am sure everybody wishes to proceed with the business before the Chair. What has been said by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) might have been said before we got into committee, but we are now in committee, and the point of order has been raised and I would ask the committee to proceed with the clause, and not with the discussion upon the general principle of the Bill.

Mr. McNEILL. If we are not allowed to speak——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You cannot speak to a point of order after it has been decided.

Mr. McNEILL. We can at least appeal from the ruling of the Chair, and discuss it upon that point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, you cannot. Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman must obey the ruling of the Chair, or he must appeal from it. If he appeals from it, the question will be settled at once, but it is not subject to debate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can appeal from the ruling, but he cannot discuss it.

Mr. McNEILL. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. MULOCK. And report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does the hon. gentleman add to his motion, "and report progress and ask leave to sit again."

Mr. McNEILL. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the leader of the House for his statement that he thinks that by our proceeding with the Bill we shall assist the negotiations at Winnipeg. How will our going on help to make those negotiations successful ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not propose to discuss anything but the clause of the Bill before the Chair. The Chair has ruled that this is the only discussion we can have, and I do not propose to discuss any other questions.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand you to rule, Mr. Chairman, that on a motion that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit we cannot discuss the question which I introduced ? I think I have the right to proceed with that discussion. I contend that it is unwise to proceed with the Bill at all at this time, in view of the negotiations pending at Winnipeg. There are two ways that this can be looked at. One is a question of propriety, and the other—and the graver question, raised by the hon. member for Bothwell, and which I will leave to him to argue—is whether you are morally or legally justified in proceeding at all, being simply a legislature acting in the last resort.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise to a question of order. The Chair has decided that the only discussion that can take place at this stage is a discussion on the clause now before the committee. The Chairman having decided that, every word the hon. gentleman is saying is in violation of that decision.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will excuse me if I point out to him what he has not heard. When the Chair ruled that, I stopped and did not advance a step. Then the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No, the hon. member for North Bruce rose to speak, and I decided that he could not discuss the judgment of the Chair, but that he could appeal from it, and the matter rested there. I did not hear the hon. gentleman move that the committee rise.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I did move that the committee rise.

Mr. DALY. I heard the hon. gentleman make that motion.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Then I will put that motion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before that motion is put, I wish to say, in the first place, that everybody will see the vast importance of the decision we are going to come to just here. The hon. gentleman has sent two members of his Government, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Militia, accompanied by the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), as a royal commission to negotiate terms of peace with the Manitoba government. Now, Sir, this is in the nature of an armistice between contending parties ; and surely while it lasts, while this flag of truce is being held out, there ought to be no active warfare carried on. Now, I am bound to assume, I am willing to assume, I state openly that I do assume, that hon. gentlemen on the other side are animated by a sincere desire to obtain an amicable settlement. I cannot conceive it would be otherwise. As I view this matter, it is in the highest degree to be deprecated, by both the Government and the Opposition, that this great question should remain to be fought over at every hustings in the coming election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is just what we intend to prevent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman is not taking proper means to prevent that. I think if we both agree upon that object, that it is desirable to withdraw this from the arena of party politics, then we have got a further step in advance towards the conclusion that we ought to reach upon the question now before the Chair. Now, Sir, what have we ? I have not heard, nor have I seen in the papers I have read, that there is any information from Winnipeg as to the progress which is being made by these commissioners. I see they have met each other, that the meetings have been exceedingly cordial, and although the details have not leaked out, enough is known to show that they have discussed frankly and fully the differences of opinion which exist between the respective Governments. I see by the morning telegrams that enough is known to show that they have been in executive session all day yesterday, considering what ? Considering, I assume propositions which must have been made to them on the part of the Dominion Government, and considering what counter propositions they may make to the Dominion Government ; considering, them I hope honestly, and I believe honestly, desiring to reach a practical and final settlement of this question. But just at the crucial point, when men's minds should be kept quiet and moderate, and no expression of opinion should be given on either side calculated to embitter the relations which already, unhappily, exist between parties, just at this crucial moment, you throw down the gauntlet and challenge a discussion in this House, and necessarily invite—you cannot help it—strong expressions which, perhaps, it would be well not to make at all, which certainly can have no other effect than to retard the universally-desired settlement. I will venture to say that there are but few firebrands in the Dominion of Canada who do not desire that this question shall be settled by the committee now sitting. It will be a great thing for parties, it will be a great thing for Canadian politics, it will go far to sooth and smooth religious and racial difficulties, which promise to be very bitter unless they are so settled ; and I cannot for the life of me conceive what motives can prompt the Government, while that royal commission is pursuing its amicable sittings from day to day—what motive can prompt the Government to invite this House to enter upon a dire conflict on this controversial point at this very moment. It can have but one effect, to retard, if not destroy absolutely, any hope of settlement at all. I must confess that so far as I am concerned, I will hold the Government responsible, I will hold the hon. gentleman responsible if these proceedings fail of achieving the object in view ; I will hold him responsible for it, because, I say, he has taken a course which, above all others, is calculated to destroy a hope of settlement. Now, supposing this was argued before men of common sense. Supposing I went down to the maritime provinces and talked to one or two hundred men, men of average common sense, and asked them : Do you believe the policy of forcing that committee to sit and discuss the coercion Bill day after day, at the very moment the commissioners were trying to obtain a settlement with Manitoba, was calculated to promote a settlement or retard it ? What would be the universal verdict ? Why, they would say : The men are mad, or else they do not desire to obtain that which they would lead us to believe they did. They do not mean business. They do not hope to achieve a settlement, or they never would take the very course which they are taking, and which is the most calculated to prevent and retard it. I would appeal to the hon. gentlemen, if they have any desire for a settlement at all, if these words are not true. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries let fall a hasty expression one day which indicated what we thought a desire on his part, not to have a settlement. He withdrew it afterwards, he said he was misunderstood, and asked to have his statement amended ; and we are bound to accord to him a desire that this matter should be so carried on that, if possible, an amicable settlement can be reached. I appeal to him if it is fair or right, under these circumstances, to press this matter in the way the hon. gentleman is doing now, and which, he says, he intends to do night and day. Not an hour is to be lost, all other business is to be put to one side, and public proclamation is to be made to the people of Manitoba : We are going to force this Bill through committee, whether you will agree to a settlement or not. Sir, if you do that, if my hon. friend's contention is right, and I cannot conceive how it can be otherwise than right, what have you got to say to the proposition he advanced, that your power to act depends entirely upon this House being a court of last resort, and you have already precluded this House from acting as a court of last resort, because proceedings for amicable settlement are still pending, and you say you hope they will be successful. I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is a matter we ought to consider calmly, and, I hope, that the motion of the hon. member for North Bruce will be carried.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has taken very good care, in the address he has just delivered to the committee, to evade the point which I put to the House as the reason that made it absolutely necessary, in case of the failure of the commission, that we should proceed as I have stated. The hon. gentleman has found it convenient to lose sight of the fact that we have but a few days before the end of this session ; and, therefore, if hon. gentlemen who take every means of preventing this Bill from becoming law, who have shown from day to day a determination to prevent the passage of this Bill, if they can succeed in inducing this committee to suspend the discussion of this question, they know perfectly well that there is no means by which this question can be settled before a general election. Now, that is a perfectly plain reason. We are not in a position in which we would be in an ordinary session; if we were, then I fully admit the reasons of the hon. gentlemen for delay. But it is perfectly well known that one of two things must happen, either this Bill must be proceeded with steadily and continuously, and pressed to a conclusion, or if we suspend operations for a few days, all hopes of passing it this session are at an end. And then what the hon. gentleman fears, will take place. Then the country will be inflamed from end to end; there will be a question of race and religion to divide the people of Canada, instead of the public issues that now exist between the two parties. I say, therefore, and every hon. gentleman who wants to put an end to this important question, should favour and promote the passage of this Bill, which was exhaustively discussed before we entered into committee. Everything that could operate on the public or on the mind of any hon. gentleman, has been gone over and over again—the subject is exhausted. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite who do not wish, and there are many of them, to see this unhappy question made a subject of strife at the general elections, to assist the Government in proceeding with the discussion of the clauses of the Bill, and enable the Bill to become law, in case the negotiations which are in progress at Winnipeg, should fail, as we have too great reason to fear that they may. I believe there is no hon. gentleman on either side of the House, I hope there is not even one, who would not be glad to see these efforts succeed in a complete settlement of the question. But, under the circumstances in which we are placed with regard to the determination of the question, it is perfectly obvious that we would be branded with insincerity, and properly branded, by every friend of the measure and by the country as a whole, if we failed to use all the influence in our power, consistent with the forms of the House, to bring this measure to a successful conclusion. I feel it is scarcely fair, at this stage of the session, and with the public business pressing for solution, that day after day should be consumed in endeavouring to prevent anything being done, instead of hon. members assisting to carry through the business of the House.

Mr. CHARLTON. The leader of the House is somewhat agitated about this matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all.

Mr. CHARLTON. And the hon. gentleman has been pleased to attribute to members on this side of the House motives which he is not warranted in attributing to them. I infer, from the language of the hon. gentleman, that the negotiations at Winnipeg have failed. He does not say so in so many words, but the inference drawn from the hon. gentleman's statement is, that such is the case. I can account for the determination of the Government to proceed to press this Bill on no other ground. If those negotiations are still in progress, if there is any reason to hope that they will prove successful, I hold that the Government are not warranted in proceeding with the discussion of this Bill in committee. I endorse fully the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), that the course taken by the Government in proceeding at this juncture to discuss the provisions of the Bill, is a course calculated to excite animosities, race and religious prejudices, to increase the excitement that now exists in the country, to have an effect on public sentiment in Manitoba, and to secure ultimately the defeat of the object which the Government profess to have in view. If the Secretary of State is not thoroughly convinced that these negotiations will fail, if he does not, indeed, know they have already failed—and, if that is the case, he might take the House into his confidence—the Government have no right to proceed with the discussion of this Bill. It is indelicate, it is improper, it is impolitic, it is a course calculated to engender poltical animosities and religious and racial strife. The hon. gentleman tells us that, if this Bill is to become law, the measure must be pressed day by day, for there is barely time enough to pass it through this House. If the Bill fails to go through, what damage does the country suffer? It simply means that time is given to the people for that degree of consideration which the short time remaining of this session does not afford. This Bill should not be considered by this House. This House has no mandate from the people in regard to it. This House was elected on the voters' lists, dated back in 1888. This Government is endeavouring to pass a Bill through the House when it is a moribund House, six years old.

An hon. MEMBER. Five years old.

Mr. CHARLTON. Six sessions old. The Government has no right to endeavour to pass such a Bill through the House. This is a measure that should be considered by the people of Canada. They should send their representatives here, after the next general elections, charged with the duty of considering a measure. How many of the present members will not go before the people for election? How many members will not come back here, and who do not care anything about the principle of the Bill, as to whether it meets the views of their constituents or not? How many members who will vote for the Government, will receive appointments, accidentally, perhaps?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. I do not think the hon. gentleman has a right to impute bad motives. This question was brought up before the whole House, and was ruled upon, and that ruling should prevail in committee.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not referring to any hon. gentleman. The Secretary of State holds a seat that was surrendered by an hon. gentleman who is now in the Senate. It is charged that this hon. gentleman knew very well that he would receive that appointment. I do not charge it, and the Secretary of State has declared that he knew nothing about it. It reminds me of the story of a darkey. He was accused of stealing chickens, a charge which he denied. There was a chicken found in his hat. He was asked to explain the fact. He said he was perfectly unaware of the fact, and that the chicken must have crawled up the inside of his pants. We cannot accuse the hon. Secretary of State of having given the promise; it was a singular coincidence, and it is possible that such coincidences may occur again. At all events, a good many hon. gentlemen will not go back to their constituents, but will find refuge in appointments to customs-houses, post offices, judgeships, senatorships, and so forth. This House is not fit to deal with this question under consideration. The people have no confidence of this House, and there will be many votes cast that do not represent the views and wishes of the people. If the leader of the House advances such an argument, or makes such a statement, that this Bill must be pressed day by day or it cannot be passed, he is simply stating that we are considering a measure with which this House should have nothing whatever to do. We had better proceed with the legitimate business before this House; we had better pass Estimates to cover payments for charwomen and messengers. We had better proceed with the other business that is properly before the House, rather than consider a measure which is not properly before it. It is an outrage upon the liberties of the people, that any attempt should be made to deal with this question, for the House is sitting in its sixth session, it is living on borrowed time, as is, indeed, the Government itself. The leader of the House should not charge hon. members on this side with insincerity. We entertain very deep feelings on this question. We believe in constitutional parliamentary government. We believe that members of Parliament are chosen to represent the views and wishes of their constituents. We believe the people should ratify a measure of this kind, when the opportunity presents itself. We believe Parliament should have been dissolved long ago, and the people given an opportunity to pronounce their opinion on this question; the members would then be charged with a mandate on this question, and, in this way, we should deal with it in the light of public sentiment and in a manner which the great majority of the people would approve. We have every reason to believe that the great majority of the people of Canada would reject this measure. We know that it is distasteful to the great majority, I repeat the observation I made before, that dealing with this question at all, is an outrage by this Parliament upon public rights and upon public liberties.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The Secretary of State (Sir Charles Tupper) laid a great deal of stress upon the fact that we have but a very few days in which to discuss this question. Well, whose fault is it that this House is driven to the end of the session before they can discuss the Bill? It is not the fault of the House. Let the hon. gentleman recall the history of this session before he presumes to blame this House, because this Bill has necessarily to be forced through, as he says, at this late period of the session. This House met on the 2nd of January and adjourned until the 9th. Whose fault was that? Then the House adjourned again until the 14th of January, and why was that adjournment?

Mr. MULOCK. There was a strike on.

Mr. O'BRIEN. As the hon. gentleman says, there was a strike on. Whose fault was it that one-half of the Government were calling the other half traitors, and the other half calling the other imbeciles. Let the Minister of Finance give an explanation of that. Then the debate on the Address lasted until the 16th of January, just six days, not a very extraordinary time for a debate when questions of such great importance were before the House. The Estimates were brought down on the 27th of January, and then began the debate on the Budget. If this Bill is of such great importance, how was it that the Government allowed forty days to elapse from the beginning of the session before submitting it to the House.

Mr. McCARTHY. And forty nights too.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is perfectly clear that the fault of delay, if fault there is, rests with the Government. Had they been sincere with regard to this measure, they would have had this Bill printed and laid before the House as soon as it met. That is the course that is pursued in England with regard to important matters. But here, at the end of the session, an important measure is announced which is not even mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. When the Bill is brought down, two or three weeks elapsed before it is printed, and then a discussion is brought on before the public have had an opportunity of knowing what the merits of the case are. The Government knew at the beginning of the session as well as they know now, that their time was limited, and that Parliament could not sit after the 24th of April. Had they placed the Bill before the House at the opening of the session, they would have had ample time to press their measure. But, Sir, the manner in which they have acted gives rise to the well-founded suspicion, that the Government were not, and never have been in earnest about this matter. If they were determined to pass it, they would not have wasted forty days before bringing the Bill down. It does not lie in the mouth of the Secretary of State, under these circumstances, to talk about obstruction. Apart from that altogether, we have to consider the question raised by the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that it is an improper thing to press this measure at a time when negotiations are going on in Winnipeg. The very fact that the Government are doing this, gives rise to another suspicion, that they were not sincere in sending that commission to Winnipeg. If they were sincere in trying to get an amicable settlement, they would have awaited the sult and proceeded with other business just as important as this is ; and they would afterwards have taken up this measure if the negotiation failed. To press the measure now is simply indecent, if it is not an evidence of absolute insincerity on the part of the Government that they wished that this commission should succeed. Apart from those considerations, the position taken by the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is absolutely unanswerable. We are perfectly justified in using every parliamentary means to prevent this Bill passing, because we say : this is not a Parliament which ought to deal with the matter. What harm will happen to the minority if this matter lies over for another session, because we all know that the House must meet again before the 1st of July. Why should we not be allowed an opportunity to go to our constituents and ask them whether they wish that this Bill should pass or not. Suppose this Bill does pass at this session, will the minority be any better off than if the Bill passed in July next? Will it not be of great advantage to have this Bill passed by a House that is competent to deal with it, instead of having it smuggled through at the end of the last session of Parliament ? Such a course is unparliamentary, is unconstitutional, and will result in the greatest possible disadvantage. The Secretary of State says he wants this question out of the way. Does he suppose that the passage of this Bill, in the manner in which he is trying to pass it, will put this question out of the way. If he does, he is mistaken, and every candidate that goes on the hustings next election will be asked to explain his conduct in regard to this Bill, and by his vote on this Bill he will be judged. We are justified in asking not only that the committee rise now, but we are justified in taking every constitutional parliamentary method to prevent the passage of this measure, which in our opinion this House is not competent to deal with. I will support the motion that the committee do now rise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the Secretary of State had any justification whatever for hoping that this question would be settled by the passing of this Bill, there might be more or less of a strong argument advanced to this House, in its favour. But, I think that every man on both sides of this House, is perfectly aware of one thing, and that is, that so far from this measure being a finality, it will be merely the beginning of never ending strife if the Bill is passed in its present shape. This Bill, I repeat, settles nothing. I do not believe myself that this Bill was intended to settle anything. My own impression is, that this Bill is a compromise measure which could never have originated unless there were two totally distinct factions operating in the Government, without any real settled policy in their minds on this important measure. Now, Sir, I am not going to repeat the arguments used by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), or my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) with respect to the extreme and gross constitutional impropriety of this House attempting to deal with this question at all. I think there never was a case in which a stronger argument could be made against this House meddling at all, as I attempted to show on the second reading by tolerably full and detailed reasons, which, to my mind, no hon. gentleman has pretended to answer, as to the constitutionality of our action in the matter. But the question is now more a question of diplomacy, as my hon. friend beside me has properly put it ; and I hope I was not correct in my understanding of what the hon. Secretary of State said, that he thought there was great danger of these negotiations failing. Did he say that ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I did say that I feared that these negotiations might fail.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am very sorry to hear it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is an expression of opinion. I am afraid these negotiations will fail.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sorry to hear it. I had hoped—as I suppose all sides had hoped—the contrary, and it is a very early date for such an expression to be given by the hon. Secretary of State. I am afraid, if, after they have sojourned two or three days in Winnipeg, the Secretary of State virtually announces on behalf of his ambassadors that these negotiations have failed——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I did not. I did not go so far as that. I said that I had great fear that they had failed. So I have.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Such language, coming from a gentleman in his position, can only have one meaning, and I am very sorry to hear it. I am very much afraid that it will be found that one reason for the failure has been the most undiplomatic conduct of the Government in pressing this measure forward. I believe, Sir, that if this measure had not been proceeded with, it would have been accepted by the Winnipeg government as a pledge of the sincerity of the Government; and there would have been a far greater likelihood of these negotiations being conducted to a successful termination. But, of course, if the negotiations have failed, there is no more to be said, except that we believe the conduct of the Government and their indiscretion in refusing to make reasonable concessions are very largely to blame for it. The hon. gentleman has taken it upon himself to accuse the Opposition of obstructing this Bill. Sir, we know very well that there are two kings in Brantford, and there are two parties in the Cabinet. We know what was the cause of the division between them on January the 2nd. We know that it was not wholly and solely because their delicate and tender consciences could not be reconciled to the idea of serving under Sir Mackenzie Bowell, under whom they had served for eleven months, but that the reason was that Sir Mackenzie Bowell and some of his colleagues were honestly determined to implement their pledges, while another large section of the Government were not; and that is the reason why we met on the 2nd of January, and why the second reading of this Bill was not brought up for two months after that date, in a session expressly called together for the purpose of considering this measure, and none other; and I tell the Secretary of State and the gentlemen behind him that if it be impossible to pass this measure, it is due to nothing but their own divisions, their insincerity, their contests among themselves, and their extremely improper conduct in holding a sixth session for this purpose, and yet leaving us for three months before proposing to go into committee on the measure. I repeat that I am very sorry to hear the hon. gentleman's statement that these negotiations have probably failed, because in one thing I do agree with him, that it would have been most desirable to have had this question amicably settled by Manitoba, if possible. But what is to be expected when only at this time of day the hon. gentlemen adopt the policy which my hon. friend has been advocating for the last three years? Had they been sincere, their attempt to have a conference with the Manitoba government would not have been left till the end of March, but would have been made before this Parliament met. There was time and opportunity then, and it is due to their neglect, their procrastination, and their want of sincerity in regard to this matter, that this whole trouble is due.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the remarks that have been made by the four or five hon. gentlemen who have discussed this question are noteworthy. All of them commence by charging the Government with insincerity. They then gave certain reasons why Parliament should not be called upon to proceed any further with this Bill. The discussion is noteworthy in this respect, that these gentlemen, before they took their seats, completely tangled themselves up in contradictory assertions, which together most effectually prove their own utter insincerity in the position they take against the passage of the Bill. Take just one instance. Here is my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), who first declared that this Parliament could not take up and pass this Bill on account of the shortness of the time—that it was an outrage that we should be called upon within the few days that were left to take up and pass this Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. And discharge other duties.

Mr. FOSTER. And discharge the other duties of the House. But before the hon. gentleman got through he completely shifted his ground, and declared in just so many words, that if this Bill had been ready on the 2nd day of January, still this Parliament should not pass it, because it had no constitutional power to do so. He shifted his ground again. His first reason was that it was an outrage because of the shortness of time; his second reason was that even if it had been introduced at the first, it would have been an outrage, because the constitutional power of this Parliament to deal with it had lapsed; and his last reason was that whether it had been introduced on January 2nd or on the 24th of April, he would have been just as much opposed to it in the one case as in the other on the question of principle. You see the different reasons; they cannot all be the true reasons. My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright), who echoed that reason when it was given by the hon. member for Muskoka, said that we were trying to force through, in a few days, a Bill which should have been taken up in the early part of the session, as if that was their reason. I ask my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), and my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill), whether they would have voted for this Bill if it had been introduced on the 2nd of January, any more than they would to-day? So that their reasons, given variously, are contradictory one of the other; and when they are brought to the same plane, what do you find? That they are opposed to the passage of this Bill, whether it was brought in late or early. There is sufficient time left for Parliament, in ten days, to pass this Bill. Let us look at this thing in a common-sense way. We are told that this Bill has 112 clauses, and that it is impossible in a fortnight to pass such a Bill through this House. It is well enough for gentlemen who do not look fairly at the question, or for people outside who do not understand the measure, to make this assertion. In the 112 clauses there are not more than ten which should provoke discussion as to principles, and the principles of those ten clauses have been discussed day in and day out, week in and week out, in this House already. The great majority of the clauses are simply administrative clauses, which should provoke no discussion.

Once you pass about eight or ten of the principal clauses of that Bill, in which the principles of legislation are involved, you have passed everything of that Bill except what is merely administrative, and need cause no discussion, because, in nine cases out of ten, the clauses are the very ones, word for word, of the Manitoba School Act at present in force. Let us take, if we can, a reasonable view. One member gets up and says: You have no right to pass this Bill, and it should not be passed because it is an outrage. Who is to judge of what Bill shall pass in a parliament or a legislature ? Is it not the majority ? And is it not eminently fair, is it not a principle of parliamentary legislation, that after you have given the principle of a measure the most full and fair and lengthy discussion, and after the majority have acceded to that principle, the majority should have a fair and reasonable chance of carrying out that legislation, the principle of which was affirmed on the second reading of the Bill. Is it not a negation of the principles of parliamentary legislation, and especially of that principle which hon. gentlemen opposite talk so much about, the right of the majority, for a dozen or fifteen or twenty men in an assembly to say : Because we do not agree with the principle of the legislation, which the majority have affirmed, we are therefore justified in preventing the legislation from passing by every means in our power. I do not think we would go far if we were to proceed upon that principle. In the name of common sense, have we not discussed the principle of this Bill to the full ? Is there any point which has been left out ? If there is, let it come up and be discussed. There is plenty of time to pass the clauses in this Bill, the principle of which has been affirmed, after long discussion, by a majority of the House ; and it is but fair and reasonable to ask hon gentlemen on both sides to give facility for its passage. Something is attempted to be made of the fact that negotiations and legislation are proceeding side by side at the same time, and it is declared to be an outrage that we should attempt to negotiate on the one hand whilst attempting to legislate on the other. Let us understand that. Are there not peculiar circumstances with reference to this measure ? If this Parliament had an unlimited time, if its term of sitting were not so near its end, that would be an argument which might fairly be made, that we should allow a reasonable time for these negotiations to be carried on, in order to see whether an amicable settlement could be arrived at or not, because, after all, if they did fail—and wherever there are negotiations there is the liability of failure—there would still be ample time for Parliament to carry out the mandate given to it by the second reading of the Bill. But that view does not hold in this case. We are confronted with peculiar circumstances. We have this Bill which we wish to put through, the principle of which the majority have affirmed, and Parliament is rapidly approaching the limit of its existence, and therefore it is but common sense and fair that the Government should, if it thinks best to do so, that the majority should, if it wish to do so, proceed with the legislation 'pari passu' with the conference being held. That is all the more reasonable because our determination to proceed with the legislation is not an after-thought undertaken after the negotiations had been entered into. It was the condition of that conference—it was so stated to this House, and both parties to the negotiations knew it, and when our delegates went to Winnipeg, and were met by the delegates of Manitoba, they both knew it—that owing to the peculiar circumstances of the case, the negotiations were to go on, but the Bill was not to be delayed. Nor was there any impropriety in that. If the negotiations be successful, what harm would there be if the Bill went on side by side with them in the meantime, and approached its completion ? The Bill would then be harmless, and the results of the negotiations would have force and power. It was a thing that the Government were bound to consider, in the interests of the minority affected by the Bill, that if those negotiations, prolonged day after day, did not result successfully, every day that was consumed, the power and strength of the Government to pass legislation was consumed as well, owing to the approach, day by day, to the limit when Parliament must rise, and legislation would no longer be possible. Now, is it not fair that we should take those things into consideration ? I appeal to the hon. leader of the Opposition, I appeal to him as a parliamentarian, whether or not, after this long debate upon the principle of this Bill, and after the principle has been affirmed by the majority, it is not in the interests of good parliamentary procedure that we should settle down to discuss the clauses of this Bill as much as they need discussion, and pass them, if the majority wishes that they should pass. Now, let me say this in conclusion—I do not want to take up time upon this question, but I do want to put these few ideas before the House and the country—I wish to say this, that there is not one word of truth in the allegations of insincerity that hon. gentlemen on that side publish and declare against the Government and against the members of the Government. They make assertions for which they have absolutely not one tittle of proof. They have not one tittle of proof for those statements they have made concerning the trouble that arose in this and the other House and for the assertions they make concerning the feelings and the utterances of the different members of the Government. If it is any good for my hon.

friend to know it, I can tell him that, so far from his diagnosis of the case being correct, it is entirely incorrect. There was not the slightest shade of difference, as far as remedial legislation was concerned, that had anything to do at all with any difference in the Government in January last.

Mr. MULOCK. That is not what the Premier said.

Mr. FOSTER. I care not what my hon. friend says, I go by the record and by what I know, and I say there is not the slightest foundation for any statement of the kind and hon. gentlemen opposite know in their hearts that there is not. They try to show that there is a difference among the members of the Government, and that it is due to their pulling two ways on this remedial legislation. That is not true. The members of the Government, unitedly and unanimously, stood upon what they considered to be their duty in carrying out the constitution of the country, and they have not wavered on that point and do not to-day. And I can tell my hon. friend that if ever a measure was put before the House with a perfect unanimity and good faith on the part of the Government and a perfect feeling of doing what the constitution made it necessary for them to do, and what the wrongs of the minority made it necessary for them to do, it is that legislation which has been placed before this House by the Liberal-Conservative Government. I think we ought to proceed as gentlemen and legislators, having some confidence in the statements which are made by one another, with this Bill and discuss its clauses and not consume time—I will not say in obstruction—but in discussion which must be going over the same ground which was gone over in the debate on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that a great deal of what has been addressed to the committee by the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has not been relevant to the motion of my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman has discussed the unity of the Government, their perfect accord, and their sincerity in pressing this measure upon the attention of Parliament. I am not going to controvert any statement the hon. gentleman has made with respect to those matters. I content myself with advocating the motion made by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). Let me say that I think this Bill presents very serious difficulties. And, as I dealt with perfect sincerity in discussing this measure upon the second reading, I propose to be equally sincere in the opinion which I shall express upon the measure at this moment. What we discussed upon the second reading of the Bill largely were the rights and privileges which were conferred upon the minority under the legislation of Manitoba in 1871, and subsequently down to 1890. I think I have made sufficiently clear the opinion which I entertained upon this subject upon the second reading. I do not for a moment call in question the minority's rights and privileges or the fact that the minority are entitled to redress. But I am anxious that we shall conform to the law in attempting to give effect to the law. It seems to me that when we examine the conduct of the Government and look at the measure submitted to this House we shall see that if that conduct had been unexceptionable the measure is of such a character as not to give any substantial redress to those who claim at the hands of the Government and on whose behalf the Government profess at this time to act. Sir, when we look at the provisions of the British North America Act on this subject, we find that after the Governor in Council had considered the measure, and after they had ascertained that the minority have a grievance, their duty was in the first instance to call upon the local government to redress that grievance. Now, the local government is, within the sphere of its authority, a sovereign body. It must be approached by this Government as an equal. The intention of the law, it is perfectly clear, was that the two governments in dealing with these questions should be upon the same footing that two independent and sovereign states would be settling any questions of difference that might arise between them. Now, how has this Government approached the local government since this question arose, since the last decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council ? Have they attempted to secure action on the part of the local government, have they discussed or negotiated with the local government, have they sought to ascertain how far the local government was willing to go in redressing the grievance ? Up to this hour, or up to the hour when the commission was appointed, no negotiations were had, and no attempt was made in conformity with the law to secure action by the local government. Now, I say when you look at the provisions of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, you see that the clear intention was not to come here at all until you have failed in all attempts to deal with the local government and legislature. Now, you have got here ? I want to know by what authority you are here. How is it that you assume to press upon this House the duty of legislation, while at the same time you have not exhausted your powers in dealing with the local government, as proven by the fact that at this very moment you are carrying on negotiation and discussion with the local government. I say it is perfectly clear, you have no standing here, you have no right to press this legislation upon our attention, because the duty of this House to deal with the question arises only upon the absolute failure of all attempts at negotiation with the local government and the local legislature. That being so, why does the Government undertake to press this measure upon the attention of Parliament. The Government speak as though this were a measure of redress,—such a measure as the law contemplates—a remedial measure. I shall look at that point more fully in a moment. But I ask the House to consider the provisions of the law in reference to our authority, and that is that an appeal under this section, if not duly remedied by the proper provincial authorities in that behalf, then, in such case and so far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws. Now, by what you have done you have declared that the circumstances of the case do not require any action at all. You cannot claim that the circumstances call for action while you are still carrying on negotiations and thereby admitting that redress may be given elsewhere. How can you, in the face of that provision, undertake to legislate ? One hon. gentleman has said that if Manitoba does come to an agreement with us and does not act, we shall have the Remedial Act, in case they should fail to carry out their agreement. I would like to know what your Act is worth under these circumstances. I would like to know, when the very ground of your constitutional authority to legislate is non-existent how can you undertake to legislate ? Apart from that, when we look at the character of this measure, this point is further impressed upon us. The hon. Minister of Finance said that while there were 112 sections in the Bill, there were only some eight or ten upon which there could be any controversy. I have read over this Bill with a great deal of care and I find that there are controverted questions with regard to taxation, controverted questions with regard to exemptions from taxation, controverted questions with regard to administration, and controverted question with regard to rights and privileges. Now, as I understand the rights and privileges in this case they are rights and privileges in respect of education. But I find that you legislate here for the restoration of school boards. These are a part of the machinery of government. The government may divide its administrative machinery in any way it sees proper. A certain portion of that machinery might continue to exist for twenty years, and if the government, at the end of that period came to the conclusion that it was a cumbrous and inefficient means of administration it could put an end to it without interfering with any right or privilege. These rights or privileges apply to education alone and to the religious instruction given. These are the matters that the minority have the right to have restored somewhere or other by the local legislature of Manitoba in the first instance. You have the right to act after you have failed there. But you have not failed there ; you are negotiating at this moment, and, that being so, where is your authority for coming here at all. I press that matter upon the attention of the Government, and I do it earnestly. I have been ready to go with the Government as far as they are obeying the law. But I resist them with all the power I possess when I find they propose to remedy this grievance not in consonance with the law but in opposition to its provisions. In all these matters when you are calling upon others to obey the law and give effect to the law, you should obey the law and give effect to its provisions yourselves. I say that is a matter of first consequence, and it is not being done under the provisions of this Bill. On the second reading of the Bill I pointed out what I thought an important ground for the defence of the right of the minority by showing that permissive words were used always with regard to Parliament and with regard to the Crown. There was no higher authority than the sovereign and Parliament. But when I look at the very first section of the Bill how does it read :

> The Lieutenant-Governor in Council of the province of Manitoba shall appoint, to form and constitute the separate school board of education for the province of Manitoba.

The Lieutenant-Governor is the representative of Her Majesty. He is the representative of sovereignty, as much as the Governor General himself. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council represents the Queen in Council, and by what authority do you command the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to do a certain thing ? If that section were before us, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the creation of a board of education is not a right or privilege. It may become a necessity, if the local government were to refuse to provide machinery of some kind or other ; but you have undertaken to deal with that here as if it were a right or a privilege. I think it is neither the one or the other. Now, I say that the Government, having their Supplementary Estimates to submit to us, ought to bring them down. They must bring them forward some time during the session, and do they not assume, by what they are undertaking to do here, that the negotiations in which they are engaged now, and in which they ought to have been engaged six months ago, must necessarily be a failure ? I say I am most anxious that these negotiations should succeed. I believe that to-day it is in the public interest and that the peace, welfare and good government of this country for some time to come will largely depend upon the success of those negotiations. But the Government undertake to press this measure here, which I am perfectly sure will give to the minority of that province, whose wrongs it professes to redress, nothing but a lawsuit to every man who contributes a dollar in taxes. I say that that is about all that is accomplished by this Bill. I do not wish to go into the discussion of these clauses containing what I regard as the irreparable defects of this measure, as it stands. But, Sir, it is of some consequence that this House should lend whatever moral weight it possesses to the commissioners that the Government have appointed to negotiate with the government of Manitoba; but, instead of strengthening their hands, and increasing their power to deal effectively with the government of Manitoba in respect to this question, you are reducing their authority to the minimum, you are doing what you can practically to produce a failure, by udertaking to go on and pass this legislation here. I do not care how scanty might be the redress offered by the government of Manitoba, but I am perfectly sure that, if the government of Manitoba had been approached in proper time, and in a proper spirit, the redress would not have been scanty.

Mr. IVES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Do you consider that the government of Manitoba, with Mr. Greenway at their head, are so peculiarly constituted, that they require to be coaxed, to be approached cautiously, and with the utmost 'sauvitor in modo,' for fear they should not do justice? Is it necessary to go up to them with sunny smiles? Are they not men of sense? Don't they know what they ought to do?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I dare say they are men of sense; I have no doubt on that point. But let me say, that this measure which the hon. gentlemen are promoting, is a measure providing, under the circumstances, for redress, through the political department of the Government, and not through the courts. Being through the political department of the Government, every government ought to have the popular sanction and support for what it undertakes. It has its duty to discharge, and it ought to educate public opinion up to the point of obedience to those duties. The local government admit their difficulties, the local government admit that the members of the legislature were pledged to a different construction of this clause of the Manitoba Act before the last judgment was delivered by the Privy Council. They say so in the communication to the Government here, and they invite the Government here to an investigation. Well, what do they mean? I pointed out already that the local government, in effect, asked you to assist them in reconciling public opinion to obedience to the spirit and intention of the second judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Well, what assistance did you lend them? What aid did you give them? Is it not as much to the interest of the Government here that the electors of Manitoba should approve of the remedial legislation, no matter where it may originate, as it is to the government of Manitoba? Has the government of Manitoba an interest different and opposed to the interests of this House in that regard? I say, no, I say that the interest is the same. I say that it was the duty of the Government here, when that invitation was given, to recognize the difficulties that were in the way, that were, in effect, pointed out by the government of Manitoba, and to take proper measures to secure remedial legislation through the proper quarter. Now, that was not done. Supposing there had been a dispute between the Government of England and the Government of the United States; would either have undertaken to take the other by the throat as the Government here has undertaken to take the government of Manitoba? I say, if there had been difficulties in the way, as they often do arise between states, there would have been forbearance, there would have been a disposition to wait until a proper moment came, until the proper opportunity arose. But you did not wait, you did not recognize the difficulties that were in the way; you did not deal with Manitoba, in that regard, as one state deals with another where there is a misunderstanding or difficulty between them, and as the law intended you should do whenever this question came to be dealt with. I say, that being so, in my opinion, this House ought not to proceed with this Bill, but it ought to proceed with other matters, until they see what the results of the negotiations are going to be that are now pending in Winnipeg.

Mr. IVES. May I ask the hon. gentleman, what other matters?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why, the Estimates.

Mr. IVES. When we proposed the Estimates, the hon. gentleman said that this session was called for the special purpose of pressing remedial legislation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So we do say with regard to the Estimates for another year. But I mean now, the Estimates for the current year, for which there is no adequate amount.

Mr. IVES. The messengers, I suppose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, if the messengers were the only parties to provide for, we would have smaller Estimates than we have had submitted as supplementaries since I have been in opposition. But I am pointing out that it is the duty of this House and the Government to give all their moral weight to the commission that is discussing this matter in Manitoba, and to do what they can to make that commission a success; but when they undertake to go on with that legislation here, they are doing their best to make that commission a failure.

Mr. DALY. The speech that has been made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, is the very best proof this Goverment have for framing the remedial order in the terms in which it was framed. We have been charged by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by hon. gentlemen on this side, who oppose us, for having couched this remedial order in too drastic terms. Now the remedial order is succinct and definite in its terms. It sets out by reciting the position of the minority in Manitoba, it sets out the authority of Parliament, and it sets out the hearing of the appeal, and that the Government decided there were grievances. Then it directs the local government of Manitoba to remove these grievances by supplemental legislation in the terms of the order. In compliance with subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, the minority have appealed to the Government, and the Government having heard that appeal, they were seized of jurisdiction in the matter. They adjudicated the case, and their adjudication is evidenced by the remedial order. That remedial order was sent through the proper channel to the provincial government; that government had proper time allowed to consider it; they did consider it, and they refused to comply with the terms of the order. I contend that the position of the Government is, that the provincial government having refused, as they did in their reply, to comply with the terms of the remedial order, this House is vested within the provision of subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act with power to consider this question, and any negotiations that have been entered upon, or are in progress between the two governments, or any correspondence that has passd between the Dominion Government and the government of Manitoba since the receipt of the first answer from the provincial government, cannot, in the slightest degree, prejudice the position of this Government, and cannot prejudicially affect the position of this House as being seized of the necessary authority to deal with this question. I think the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite on this point are entirely idle. All we require to do is to carry out the terms of the law, and it being conceded that Parliament has authority, it cannot be argued that if the Government have undertaken negotiations with the local government, that fact will dispossess Parliament of the authority vested in it by regular protest. Such would, indeed, be an extraordinary position to take. This Government could negotiate for weeks or months without interfering with the legal position of Parliament, and, in fact, no negotiations could affect our position, it having once been admitted that by virtue of the appeal, by virtue of the remedial order and the reply of the local government in refusing to comply with that order, this Parliament is vested with the necessary authority. The Bill has been introduced, its principle has been adopted on the second reading, and the House is now in committee to consider the various clauses; and any negotiations cannot possibly interfere with the legal position of Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Bill, I may inform the hon. gentleman, materially interferes with the negotiations in progress. We are not looking at the question now simply from a legal point of view. The action of the Government is equivalent to that of an individual showing a stick while endeavouring to conciliate some one, which is admittedly poor policy. There is still hope, I trust, in spite of what the hon. Secretary of State has announced, that we may arrive at some reasonable agreement with Manitoba, but there is no chance of arriving at such an agreement if, at the same time, the Government are threatening the province. That is what the action of the Government amounts to, and we may rely upon it that the majority pay more attention to the acts within this House than to the words of the Dominion commissioners. As the Finance Minister has referred to his abhorrence of insincerity on the part of the Government and himself, and that their acts have afforded evidence of the sincerity, I would remind the hon. gentleman that the bolters of last January were not the first bolters on this question in the Government. Did we not see three members go out in July on this educational question, and that one member, and probably the most important one, is out still. There is no use attempting to disguise the fact which everybody knows, in and out of Parliament, that the language and conduct of hon. gentlemen were at great variance, one with the other. We know perfectly well the kind of language that was used in Verchères by the Minister of Public Works, and the kind of language used in the county of Haldimand by an absent member of the Government, whose health does not yet enable him to return and vindicate his wounded honour and remove the reflections cast upon him by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace).

Mr. FOSTER. You should take care of your brother's honour.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I take care of my own honour, and I have never found any difficulty in doing so. But I leave to the hon. gentleman the task of taking care of his honourable colleague's honour, and there is a good deal of reason for doing so, in view of the extraordinary charge publicly preferred by a late colleague against another colleague with respect to that matter.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Motion (Mr. McNeill) that the committee rise, negatived.

On section 1,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the first clause is passed, I desire to submit for a few moments, an argument as to the constitutionality of that clause. Before the Bill passed its second reading, I had the honour to submit to the House an argument to the effect, that the clauses of the Bill, speaking in a general sense, which undertook not to define what the rights and privileges were, but to administer the general education laws of Manitoba, were ultra vires. Of course my remarks were very general, and now that we are on the first clause of the Bill, I desire to repeat my argument in perhaps a more extended form. In calling attention to this vitally important portion of the Bill, I desire the House to remember that the consensus of opinion among the legal gentlemen on both sides, is : That so far as this Parliament is concerned, this Bill, when once passed, is irrevocable. I am aware that one hon. gentleman on the other side, for whose opinion I entertain a very high respect, differs from my opinion on that point. Apart from that single difference of opinion, I think I am right in saying that the consensus of opinion of the legal fraternity on both sides, is, that when this Bill passes this Parliament, so far as this Parliament is concerned it is irrevocable. We cannot repeal it, we cannot amend it, we cannot, in my humble opinion, supplement it. So far as the portions of the Bill are concerned which point to further legislation by this Parliament, I am inclined to the opinion that these declarations will be found to be mere empty words. I merely mention this en passant, to lead up to the legal argument I desire to present. If that is so, hon. members of course will not view this legislation as they are accustomed to view ordinary legislation. I know how difficult, if not impossible it is, for the ordinary legislator to divest himself from the underlying belief, that the legislation which he is engaged in passing is something which, if not perfect, could be perfected afterwards. We know very well that in Great Britain, where they legislate upon any given subject having plenary powers, there is no restriction upon the constitutional powers of Parliament. In this country where our powers are restricted by a written constitution, we are perhaps a little more careful, for our attention is being constantly called to the fact that our powers are limited. I think I am right in saying, that the ordinary member in Parliament, when he is assisting in the passing of any law, assists with the idea in his mind, that after all said and done, if the law is not perfect it can be perfected at the next session. I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that in my humble opinion at least, when we pass this law, we exhaust our powers and we cannot amend it and cannot revoke it. If that is so, it requires extreme and extra caution on our part. I venture to say I will be in the judgment of both sides of the House, when I take the position that the House will not commit itself to legislating upon any important line in the Bill, unless they are quite satisfied that such legislation is within their powers. Now, a view was expressed by an hon. gentleman holding a very leading position in this House with respect to our powers in this regard, which I ventured at a previous stage of the debate to combat. If that view were correct, there need be no discussion on this clause of the Bill at all. The hon. gentleman intimated as his decided opinion, that when Manitoba legislated in the direction of taking away certain rights and privileges which belonged to the minority by law, then ipso facto the power was transferred to this Parliament to legislate. If that were so, of course our powers would be plenary in that regard, and we would have no trouble in determining whether we are within our lines or beyond our lines. If that were so, we would have the same power to legislate as the Manitoba legislature has. Now, we start with the proposition which both sides accede to, that the power of Manitoba to legislate on the question of education is exclusive and plenary. There is of course the restriction which brings the matter now before the House, but, speaking generally, and speaking popularly, and not scientifically perhaps, the power of the Manitoba legislature to legislate upon this subject of education is exclusive. Now, what is our power ? I need not go over it very carefully, because my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) defined it again in his speech this afternoon. We have a strictly limited, conditional power. If we could once get hon. members who choose to give any attention to the subject to understand that point, they will perhaps then appreciate better the importance of the particular objection we take against this section. We have no power to legislate in regard to education. Our power is strictly limited to begin with, and strictly conditional. We cannot legislate at all unless certain conditions exist. I do not think it is open to us in committee to go beyond the Bill itself to ascertain about these conditions, and so I will assume, for the purpose of my argument, that conditions exist which entitle us to legislate in some respect. I start with that assumption, whether it is right or wrong. The question now is : How far can we legislate, and what can we legislate upon ? In order, Mr. Speaker, to determine that point, I have to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the words of the section. They have been gone over so frequently that they are familiar to most hon. gentlemen.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will understand, that, for the purpose of presenting a consistent argument to the House, and not for the purpose of wasting time, it will be necessary for me to recall the words of the section. The main part of section 22, gives exclusive jurisdiction to the provincial legislature to make laws in respect to education, and that exclusive jurisdiction is given, subject to certain conditions following. Then we come to the second subsection, which has been determined to be a substantive one in itself, and which enacts :

> That an appeal shall lie from any act of the legislature affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority in relation to education.

Now, let us see what that provision means. It is an exception to the general law which relegates to the legislature of Manitoba the right to control education generally. In legislating for education generally, the province is not restricted. It determines what educational system shall prevail, and the machinery by which that educational system shall be carried out. Now, I cannot find within the four walls of this section, any clause, word or paragraph, which, under any circumstances whatever, transfers to this Parliament the right to deal with the administration or the machinery of the law. I can find transferred to this Parliament, under certain conditions, a power to restore to the minority certain rights or privileges with regard to education, which have been taken from them. But there our power ceases. After the remedial order was passed, if the Manitoba legislature had in two or three sections carried out the remedial order—had exempted Roman Catholics from taxation in support of public schools, had enabled them to pay their taxes for the support of their own schools, and had determined that the law, as amended by them, should be administered by a single board of education—is it arguable that, under these circumstances, this Parliament could interfere and say, "You have restored the rights and privileges which were taken away from the Roman Catholic minority ; but the manner in which you administer the law is not satisfactory to the Dominion Parliament, and we propose to alter the mode of administration." I would like to submit that question to any legal member of this House. Suppose the Manitoba legislature had substantially carried out the remedial order, and had given to the Roman Catholics the rights and privileges which the remedial order said had been taken away from them, but had decided that the old system of administering the law was too cumbersome and too expensive, that it involved a lot of officials with whose presence and salaries they proposed to dispense, and that they would administer the law by means of a single board, is there a lawyer in this House who would say that it was within our power to amend their law, and divide their board of education into two sections ? The thing is absolutely ludicrous. One has only to state it baldly to show that we have no such power. The administration of the law is a matter which purely and solely belongs to the local legislature, and we have no right to interfere with it ; we cannot amend, modify, or control it. The right and privilege is one thing ; the manner in which the province confers the right, administers it, or carries it out, is another thing. The latter is entirely in their power ; the former may, in certain circumstances, be in yours. That view was in the minds of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council when they gave judgment. The concluding paragraphs of that judgment, although they were, to my mind, obiter dicta, still possess the very great authority which appertains to so high a court. In concluding their remarks, they indicated how, in their opinion, the rights might be restored, and what did they say :

> It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of those statutes should again be made law.

They are exceedingly careful to refrain from expressing any opinion as to what legislature should make these enactments :

> The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province.

That system of education was, of course, held by a previous judgment of the Privy Council to be intra vires and constitutional. They go on :

> All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

Now, what was the grievance upon which the appeal was founded ? I will accept the definition given in the remedial order. The Roman Catholics had a right—we will say for the purpose of argument—to exemption from taxes for public schools, to apply their own taxes to their own schools, and to have their separate schools. Well, what indication is there in that judgment to show that there shall be two boards of education, two inspectors, two boards of examination, or in point of fact, a dual system of any kind ? In fact, I just come back to the proposition I advanced before, that all these are matters of administration which do not affect the right or privilege in the slightest degree, and have nothing whatever to do with it. Therefore, I submit to the House, as a matter of constitutional law, that you have no power in mandatory or any other terms, to direct the provincial legislature to constitute a separate Board of Education for the purpose of administering a separate school law. You may have the power—I am not discussing that now, because we have not reached the section relating to that—to declare that there shall be separate schools in some sense or way, and that the Roman Catholics shall have the right to control their taxes in a certain way, and the right to have the same religious teachings in the schools that they had before. I am assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that you have that power ; but when you have done that, you have exhausted every power you have, and any attempt to go beyond it is clearly unconstitutional and illegal. I would like to ask any hon. gentleman who does me the honour to reply to these remarks, under what section or clause or word of the Manitoba Act does he contend that you have the power to constitute a separate Board of Education ? A separate board necessarily involves a large expenditure. What authority or power is vested in you to impose a taxation for that purpose upon the province ? It is not to restore a right or privilege. It is only to restore a certain machinery which was found to be unworkable, and which it was expressly within the rights of the province to remove or alter. If you read the concluding paragraphs of the first judgment of the Privy Council, you will see that the power to administer the law, to declare how many officers or boards there shall be, to declare whether it will be a cheap or a dear law, to declare whether the machinery shall be cumbersome or simple, or shall be modified from time to time as the circumstances of the province require, are matters belonging to the local legislature entirely, and under no conceivable conditions or circumstances can this Parliament have the right to interfere with them. The province may make an administration which is effective, simple and good, or one which turns out to be bad and ineffective. That is their business. They are the best judges, and we cannot interfere with them any more than we can in the administration of any other law relegated to them under the constitution. But assuming that I am wrong, assuming that we have the power to interfere with the administration of the law in Manitoba and not solely with the existing grievance of the minority, have we that power under the remedial order ? We have not. There is one thing which, to my mind, is abundantly clear. While doubts have been raised as to the power of this Parliament to interfere within the terms of the remedial order by giving less than the remedial order calls for, or whether we are bound to go exactly to the full extent of the order and have no discretion at all—and on that point I express no opinion at present whatever—this other point is abundantly clear, that we have no power to go beyond it. No one suggests that, in the exercise of the discretion which the third subsection vests in this Parlament, we can go beyond what the remedial order has prescribed. To me it seems perfectly clear that the intention was that before the remedial order should go out at all, a very exhaustive investigation into all the facts should be made and a judgment come to upon those facts, which would be a guide to Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have heard all that before about twenty or fifty times.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will have the pleasure of hearing it again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very likely. I expect to hear it fifty times over.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am trying to present closely a sound legal argument, if the hon. gentleman will give me the pleasure to listen, and I have not used any expression beyond what is necessary to present the legal argument fairly to the House. I want to say that the power of this Parliament to act is confined to the terms of the remedial order, and unless you can find within the four corners of that order the express power to constitute a separate board of education, you cannot constitute it,—even supposing you have the power in the case where the remedial order prescribes a separate board. It was argued, I think, by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) that sufficient could be found in the remedial order to justify the interference of this Parliament. I do not think so. That order says :

> It is hereby adjudged and declared that by the two Acts passed by the legislature of Manitoba, the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority, in relation to education, prior to the 1st of May, 1890, have been affected, by depriving them of the following rights and privileges :
> (a) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the Act of 1890 aforesaid.
> (b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for education.
> (c) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contributions for the support of other schools.

The changes made by the Act of 1890, in the mode of administering the education law of the province are not found fault with, except in the respects that are specifically mentioned in these three subsections ; and I understood the Minister of Public Works to answer that the constitution of a separate school board is necessarily to be inferred from subsection A. I do not think he is correct. Subsection A merely provides that the provincial Parliament are to restore to the minority the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support their schools.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That does not involve necessarily the constitution of a separate board of education. The trustees, under the Acts of 1890, can build the schools and maintain, equip and support them, entirely apart from the fact whether there are two boards of education or only one board. An effective concession to the minority of their rights mentioned in subsection A does not depend, directly or indirectly, upon the existence of one board or two boards ; and that being so, it is perfectly plain to me that you have no power to legislate whatever. I conclude my arguments by summing up those two points. In the first place, you have not got the power at all, even if the remedial order had so decreed, to alter the administration of the educational law as prescribed in the Manitoba Acts. Manitoba has plenary power to constitute one or two or three boards of education, just as it pleases, and this Parliament has no right whatever to interfere. If the system be an expensive one, the Manitoba legislature can alter it and substitute an inexpensive one, or can reverse the position as the circumstances and exigencies of the case require. If I be wrong in that branch of my argument, I say secondly that inasmuch as the remedial order does not expressly or by implication direct the return to the dual system or the reorganization of separate school boards, you certainly, as you are not empowered to legislate one inch beyond the terms of that order, are powerless to do what it has not directed you to do. Under these circumstances, I submit that this first section is beyond our power and we ought not to pass it.

Mr. CASEY. When we are invited to consider this clause further, we are necessarily met by the considerations which were under discussion this afternoon : considerations tending to show that we should not proceed with the discussion of the clauses of the Bill under present circumstances, and these considerations have not been met by anything that has been said on the other side. The hon. the leader of the House told us that he was afraid the negotiations in Winnipeg would not succeed. Now, when the commissioners were sent to Winnipeg, we were given to understand that the proceedings before that commission would not be made public until they were concluded. The commissioners themselves have been very careful not to tell what was going on. What object can the hon. Secretary of State have in making a statement of that kind ?

Mr. DALY. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I would like to call your attention to the fact that he is not discussing the clause of the Bill. He is not aware, perhaps, that the previous discussion was finished and that we are now on the clause of the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. If it be the case that my remarks are out of order on the discussion of this particular clause, I shall move that the Chairman do now leave the Chair, for the purpose of putting myself in order.

Mr. DAVIN. That would be out of order now.

Mr. DALY. I submit that that motion is out of order in view of the fact that nothing has intervened between the last motion and this.

Mr. CASEY. Speaking to the point of order, I would remind the hon. Minister of the Interior, or perhaps I should say inform him, that these two motions are distinctly in order as alternatives in Committee of the Whole. You can move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, and then you can move that the Chairman leave the Chair. My motion is quite in order, and I move it merely to put myself in order on the point I am discussing. I had supposed that the old discussion was going on until a moment ago, when I was informed that it had closed.

Now, I ask for what purpose the hon. Secretary of State told us anything about the proceedings of the Winnipeg commission, unless for the purpose of influencing the opinion of this House in this matter. Why did he say that he did not believe that the negotiations would be successful, if it were not to induce the House to go on considering the Bill, notwithstanding that these negotiations were in progress ? He has given us a hint of what he thinks about the matter. He does not pretend that this is a report from the commissioners ; he does not say that he is violating any confidence, or that he is telling something that the commissioners were supposed to keep to themselves. He does not tell us that he is giving out secrets ; it would be unfair to assume, even in this case, that he is doing so. We can only take it for granted that he is giving us an idea of what he desires to happen, and that he is using it for the purpose of inducing this House to go on with the Bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, he says that the Government would be branded with insincerity if they did not press this Bill in the House, at the same time that they are negotiating with Manitoba. The hon. gentleman is a great maker of phrases. By this phrase he may claim in the future to rank with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, who for some time enjoyed the imputed glory of inventing the phrase, "splendid isolation." The one phrase will, perhaps, be as famous in Canadian history as the other. "Branded with insincerity" is a good phrase, and, I think, exactly describes the position of the Government in connection with these negotiations. What can we say of a Government that sends a commission to Manitoba, to consult with the government there as to the possibility of getting along without passing this Remedial Bill, while, at the same time, forcing this Bill through the House by means of the majority at its back, but that in its dealings with Manitoba it is "branded with insincerity ?" I thank the hon. Secretary of State for the phrase, and the country will thank him for it, as it describes exactly the attitude of the Government in connection with Manitoba in this matter.

The hon. gentleman told us that they could not afford to postpone the discussion of the Bill in this House while awaiting the result of the negotiations, because the remainder of the session was too short ; that there was a fixed time for the ending of the session, and we had not time for passing the Bill if it proved necessary, after hearing the result of the negotiations. If it were impossible to negotiate, and afterwards pass the Bill in case the negotiations failed, what did he mean by sending that commission to Manitoba ? Was not that a proof of insincerity ? Does not that brand him with insincerity ?

Mr. BELLEY. No.

Mr. CASEY. I am astonished that my hon. friend (Mr. Belley) should say so. I am astonished that he, or any French supporter of the hon. Minister's should say that it was not a proof of insincerity on the part of the Government. Do we not know that the Minister of Public Works promised his French colleagues in Quebec, promised all the French Canadians in Quebec, promised the church in Quebec, that this Bill should be the remedial order, the whole remedial order, and nothing but the remedial order ? This Bill is not the remedial order.

Mr. BELLEY. No, it is a Bill.

Mr. CASEY. If my hon. friend chooses to play upon words, then, to satisfy his accurate taste in English, I will say that this Bill does not include even the material points of the remedial order. But even with this Bill, which is so different from the remedial order, that one of the church organs in Quebec says it will not be constitutional if passed—even with such a Bill, the Government at this stage, when they know that negotiations and the carrying of the Bill afterwards are incompatible—have the insincerity, for the sake of satisfying the opinion of Manitoba, for the sake of satisfying Protestant opinion, to pretend to send an embassy to Manitoba, and my friends the French Conservatives see no insincerity in that ! I repeat, Sir, that, if there is anything in the argument of the Secretary of State that it is too late to both negotiate and legislate on this matter, he has given—if it be a parliamentary word—the most damning proof of his insincerity ; and if that is not parliamentary, I will say the most branding proof, using his own word.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I wish to remind the hon. gentleman that while he may call the Government insincere, he has no right to call any member of the Government insincere. If he has applied that word to the Secretary of State, I will ask him to take it back.

Mr. CASEY. In deference to your ruling, I am willing to speak of the Secretary of State as representing the Government ; I charge the Government, then, as a whole, with insincerity.

Mr. OUIMET. I do not think it is right that the hon. gentleman should be allowed to waste time in withdrawing his own words.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think the Minister of Public Works should be allowed to waste my time, and the time of the House, with irrelevant and unseemly interruptions. I am not wasting the time of the House.

Mr. IVES. Obstructing.

Mr. CASEY. I am not obstructing. I am here arguing that the Government are insincere in the line of tactics they are pursuing. I am here to prove that the Government are the true obstructionists in this matter ; I am here to prove that the Minister of Public Works, amongst others, is, by every interruption, an obstructionist. I am not here to enable the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Ives) to comprehend an argument.

But I say, if it be too late to negotiate and to legislate, each in its proper turn, we should drop the one or the other. The Government are attempting to do both, or they are pretending to do both, they are pretending to negotiate, and they are also pretending to force legislation. I do not believe myself that they expect, or desire, this legislation to pass the House. They have shown no proof of their desire to get this legislation through the House. They prorogued the House last session, with the promise that this legislation would be ready on 2nd January, when the House met again ; they had not that legislation ready till 3rd of March. In the meantime, they had their little "ruction" amongst themselves, which has been pretty fully characterized already, and which was of a nature to compel us to doubt their good faith, as a Government, in anything they did, after the hollow reconciliation that was patched up between them. Then, after having passed this Bill through a stage, they have entered upon the stage of negotiation.

If they meant to pass this Bill through, no matter what Manitoba was going to do about it, why negotiate at all at this stage ? Why not go on and pass the Bill, and then try and make terms with Manitoba afterwards? If the contention is correct that it is a reasonable thing to negotiate and legislate at the same time, it would be just as proper to negotiate after the Bill had passed the third reading. Sir, this negotiation was undoubtedly presented to the House as an alternative to passing the Bill. Let me read to you the remarks of the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith), one of the commissioners appointed by the Government, whose sentiments were endorsed by the Government, in appointing him on that commission :

> Once more, Mr. Speaker and hon. gentlemen, I would express the earnest hope that the school question may be settled, and settled to the satisfaction not only of this House, but of the whole country. But I look, Sir, to see this Remedial Bill pass its second reading by acclamation. But, Mr. Speaker and hon. gentlemen, I do not look upon it that by voting for the second reading of this Bill, hon. gentlemen are necessarily committed to the voting of the third reading of that Bill.

There is the statement of a man whom the Government appointed as a commissioner to Winnipeg, and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, one of the leading members of the Government, cheers that remark when I quote it. He cheers the statement that it does not follow that because a man votes for the second reading, he is bound to vote for the third reading of the Bill. I leave him to explain his cheer and the inference from it. I leave the Government to explain the inference from their adoption of this gentleman's language, by appointing him on that commission. The member for Montreal West continues :

> If there should be a conference in the meantime, and I trust there may be a conference, I am so hopeful of the result of that conference that I do trust there will be no Remedial Bill required in this House.

And that sentiment was cheered by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and cheered by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and exactly met, as I believe, the public opinion of the country. We were all glad to hear that there was a prospect of the question being disposed of without this Remedial Bill being pressed to a third reading.

Now, Sir, on that statement of the member for Montreal West, the Government appointed him a commissioner to Winnipeg, along with two members of the Government itself. It was clearly understood, from the language used, that they went up there to see if the necessity for this Bill could not be got rid of. That gentleman who was appointed commissioner, the member for Montreal West, stated to a reporter of the public press, that many gentlemen on the other side of the House, voted for the second reading of this Bill on the distinct understanding that they should never have to vote for the third reading, and that it would never come to a third reading. Now, under these circumstances, the conference has met at Winnipeg.

Then, we had the first note of change from the Minister of Public Works the other day, the second note from the Secretary of State to-day, and I hear the third note from some irresponsible bird of passage here on my left. These gentlemen gave the House distinctly to understand that the Government would not be satisfied without getting what was satisfactory to the minority in Manitoba. They wanted to go beyond that. They sent a commission to Winnipeg to make a settlement which would satisfy the Manitoba minority. But whether the Manitoba minority are satisfied or not, this Bill must be shoved through this House by force and arms. I would ask, as did my hon. friend from Bothwell, if the Manitoba minority are satisfied with any arrangement that may be made in Winnipeg, where does the jurisdiction of this House come in ? If Manitoba does what is satisfactory to them, and satisfactory to the Government commission, how, in the name of all that is constitutional, can we ask this House to remedy a grievance which no longer exists ? If the commission succeeds in removing the grievance, how can we be asked to go on with the Bill ? If the commission succeeds in removing the grievance, there is no excuse in attempting to legislate here.

On the other hand, if the commission does not succeed in removing the grievance, this House has a right to know what proposals were made to Mr. Greenway, and what counter-proposals were made by Mr. Greenway, before it comes to any decision on this Bill. I say it would be outrageous, in the strongest sense of the word, to ask this House to pass any Bill of this kind, without reference to its particular clauses, until we know what attempts have been made to come to an arrangement with Mr. Greenway, and what proposals he makes in reply. I can assure the Government and the members sitting in this House, that the country will hold every man to a very stern account who dares to vote for any Bill whatever to coerce Manitoba, until we have heard what the result of this commission at Winnipeg is. The House is entitled to know that result before it passes this Bill, and hon. gentlemen opposite never will get the Bill passed until we know the result of that commission.

I have dealt with the question as to whose fault it was that the session was too late to go on with both proceedings separately, negotiation and legislation. I must characterize the Government's attitude towards Manitoba at certain times as it was characterized very cleverly the other day in a cartoon in one of the papers. A man is seen approaching a house, which is guarded by a dog that is apparently snarling, and at the same time wagging its tail. He is a little afraid of the animal, and a bystander says to him : " Do not be afraid ; do you not see the dog is wagging his tail ? " To this the man replies : " Yes, but he is growling, too. Which end am I to trust ? " The people of Manitoba are in that dilemma about the attitude of this Government. One end of the Government is growling, and the other is wagging its tail. An hon. friend asks, which is the tail ? It is impossible for any one except a person more skilled in natural history than I am to determine. One end of the Government is growling and the other is wagging—you may take your choice which is the head and which is the tail !

The Secretary of State told the House that there is not time to pass the Bill now under consideration. The Finance Minister told the House that this was a Bill which could be passed in ten days. I suppose we could pass it in that time if we were prepared to swallow it whole. But to expect that this House can pass within ten days a Bill that has taken this Government the best part of a year to prepare, even with all the ability they possess, is absurd. This Bill is of a new kind; there is no precedent for it; there is nothing by which to gauge the practicability and constitutionality of its individual clauses. We are endeavouring to regulate by Dominion laws what is ordinarily regulated by provincial laws, and it therefore requires the greatest care and consideration to ascertain whether it is workable even if it is constitutional. We are working with untried machinery, and it is absurd to ask us to pass such a Bill in ten days, while at the same time the Government are asking Manitoba to do what is necessary. If that does not brand the Government with insincerity to one party or the other in the discussion, I do not know the meaning of language.

The Minister of Finance has told us that we are contradictory in urging, at the same time, that the Bill was introduced too late, and that it should not be passed no matter when it had been introduced. The two propositions are perfectly compatible. If the Government meant to pass this Bill, they certainly introduced it two months too late, for they ask us to pass it at the fag-end of the session. On the other hand, if they had wished to pass it, they should have called the House together at an earlier date, say in November, when there could have been an adequate discussion. But they followed the other line, by which it is impossible to have a full discussion of this proposed measure.

The Minister of Finance further stated that no harm would be done if this Bill were passed, even if satisfactory arrangements were made with Manitoba. I affirm that it would do harm by making it impossible for the provincial government to work in harmony with the Dominion Government in carrying out any arrangements made for the benefit of the minority. These are the points I desire to urge why consideration of the Bill should be postponed, and I call on every hon. member to consider well, before he votes for the third reading of this Bill, the position he will occupy, if we go on with it without knowing what is going on in Winnipeg.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very reluctant to say a single word to detain the committee, but I feel it is a duty I owe to the House and a duty I owe to the country. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in a very impassioned manner, expressed his deep regret at the possibility of this burning question, this question calculated to excite the most unfortunate feelings and most unfortunate conflict that it is possible to excite in a country, being placed before the people. The hon. gentleman said he was most anxious that this question should be removed from the arena of political controversy, and that other great questions between the two political parties should be the issue at the coming general elections. I will not for a single moment question the sincerity of the hon. gentleman's statement, but I wish to put to him and to this House and to the country the real position of this matter. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when I made a motion asking for additional time for the Government, stated that if the Government had arrived at an opinion that this House must terminate on 24th April, it would furnish a very strong ground for the Government being awarded further time for the transaction of public business. I am in the judgment of the House when I say that the Government have persistently, from the commencement, endeavoured to do everything that was in their power to advance public business. This great and important question was discussed for a very long period, an unusually long period, and the House had to listen to the same statements and the same arguments, reiterated again and again by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. Hon. members had to listen to interminable speeches containing nothing relevant to the question under discussion. But the Government submitted as patiently as they could to the course hon. gentlemen thought fit to take in the obstruction of this measure on its second reading. After the fullest and most deliberate discussion that any question has ever obtained in this House, a division took place, and with what result? Sir, with the result that the Government was sustained by a majority of its own supporters in this House, and that that majority was largely swollen by a large contingent of hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House. Notwithstanding the fact that a number of gentlemen supporting the Government, warm and determined supporters of the Government—among whom I do not include the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), because no person could have listened to that hon. gentleman's speech without seeing that his object, in common with some gentlemen with whom he was allying himself, was for the purpose of breaking down and destroying the Government of which he proposed to be a supporter. If further evidence of the position of that hon. gentleman is required, it is to be found in his attempt at obstruction to-day, by attacking the Government of which——

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to order, Mr. Chairman. I wish to ask you whether it is parliamentary to use that language. I may say in explanation, that I brought this matter to the attention of the House after seeing these boys asking for their pay, and the second time that they came around they were told by the accountant that there was no money for them. I was also told that the matter was brought to the attention of the Government. In bringing it to the attention of the House in the very moderate way I did, I performed what I thought was my duty, and I had no intention of obstructing the business in doing so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask the hon. gentleman——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No doubt the word "obstruction" is unparliamentary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask the hon. gentleman if he mentioned to the Minister of Finance, or to any member of the Government that he proposed to enter into a discussion on this question.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say in answer to the hon. gentleman, that the Minister of Finance was not in the House. I went twice to see him, but he was not here until after the debate had commenced. Had I waited until the Minister of Finance was in his chair, I could not bring it up to-day. I was quite within my right in doing so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The leader of the House, of whom the hon. gentleman professes to be a supporter, was in his place, and he made no communication to him.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to know, Mr. Chairman, whether there be any member of this House who is above the rules of the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have declared that the word "obstruction" is unparliamentary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have much pleasure, in obedience to your ruling, to withdraw the word "obstruction." But, Sir, I want to draw the attention of the House to the position in which we stand, and it is a very grave position, not only in regard to gentlemen in this House, but in regard to the country. This Government has felt compelled, in order to maintain the law and the constitution of the country, to lay this measure before this Parliament. The most abundant opportunity has been given to gentlemen on both sides of the House—and which opportunity has been largely availed of by hon. gentlemen opposite—for the discussion of this question on the second reading of the Bill. The result was, that the Government not only had a majority on its own side of the House, but that majority was swollen by some seven votes from gentlemen who have usually co-operated with the leader of the Opposition; I believe, I may say, invariably co-operated with him. I draw the attention of the House to this fact, that a majority—a very substantial majority under the circumstances—was obtained, notwithstanding that a large number of devoted friends and supporters of this Government felt compelled, in regard to pledges that they had made to their constituents, and in regard to the strong feeling that existed in the province of Ontario, to withdraw their support from the Government on this measure. Notwithstanding that loss of support on the part of a large body of gentlemen who most reluctantly felt compelled to vote against the Government, it was decided by a substantial majority of this House that the principle of the Bill should be affirmed. Sir, there is an end to parliamentary government: under our system of government, there is an absolute end to parliamentary institutions, if, after the solemn decision of this House, we are, from day to day, to be met with such tactics from the Opposition. If I am not permitted, Sir, to use the word "obstruction," I do not know how it is possible for me to describe their conduct. If a member of this House is not able to state that which is palpable, not only to every gentleman in this House, but palpable to every intelligent man in this country, what shall I say? There is a determined attempt in this House to defeat the Government in carrying out and bringing to a conclusion this unhappy question that has arisen, and not arisen through any fault of the Government. No man can witness what has taken place in this House today without seeing that there is a determined attempt to prevent and retard the business of Parliament. A large portion of the time of the House was consumed by bringing forward a question that every hon. gentleman knows would not have been brought forward but from the necessity under which the Government were placed not to raise any question for discussion, that possibly could interfere with the progress of this Bill. Not only was that done, but when we got into committee, how shall I describe what took place? Why, Sir, from that moment to this, what term can be used to describe the scene, except that it was one of the most open and palpable obstruction——

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) had better sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Chairman, you have already ruled that that term is contrary to the rules of the House, and the hon. gentleman persists in using it again, and I ask you to call him to order now.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) did not use the word obstruction with reference to any member, or to any individual. Neither did he make the charge that obstruction was being used. He simply asked a question as he had a perfect right to do.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have ruled, and every member of the House knows it, that the word "obstruction," attributed to any particular member is out of order. But, generally speaking, the word "obstruction" is not unparliamentary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) will find that, lawyer as he is, he is not exactly in a position to make rules for the regulation of debate in this House. I say, that no person could witness what has taken place to-day without coming to the conclusion that there is a determined attempt to prevent the progress of this important Bill. Now, Sir, I want to ask hon. gentlemen to follow that out and see where it will land them. When a large majority of this House has determined that it is vitally important to the country that this measure should pass, I ask hon. gentlemen to remember the responsibility that will rest upon any section of this House, be it large or be it small, who take up the position of moving, "that the committee rise," and "that the Chairman rise and report progress," and moving these motions alternately to the end of the week. I ask is that obstruction or is it not ? I say there is no other term in the English language that will properly characterize it, and that it is strictly a parliamentary term for me to use in that relation. Sir, I want to invite the attention of the House to this, and I want to show to hon. gentlemen the position in which they are going to place themselves. The House knows perfectly well, that committed, as the Government is, to the passage of this measure, believing, as the Government does, that the passage of this measure is vital to the peace, and prosperity, and happiness, and well-being of this country. I want to put it to hon. gentlemen, where are they going ? They are going to be responsible, in the first place, for defeating a measure which a substantial majority of this House say ought to pass. In the second place, they are going to put themselves in the position of preventing the Estimates which are vital and essential to the progress of this country, from passing. They are going to put themselves in the position of compelling the waste of half a million of money for an extra session. And, Sir, I do not believe they will make much capital out of the defeat of this Bill by unfair and unparliamentary means. I believe the country desires that this measure should be disposed of at once and for ever. The hon. gentlemen will have to face these things and I have no hesitation in saying that there is no question on which an appeal can be made to the electorate of this country, on which I shall feel that the Government can occupy stronger ground than the defeat of this important measure by means such as we have had to encounter down to the present time. I say we will exhaust all the physical power we possess to pass this measure—at the risk of health, it may be at the risk of life ; and at my age I may be permitted to say that I for one do not shrink from that ordeal. I may be permitted to say that if it were necessary to sacrifice life itself, I should feel bound to do it—as perhaps it is not improbable that may be the result—looking at the vital importance which I attach to the settlement of this question. I say, Sir, that there could not be an appeal to this country on which I believe we would occupy sounder, stronger or surer ground, than we should in appealing to the intelligent and independent electorate of Canada in regard to the desperate means and the enormous waste of public money inflicted on the country by the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite. I say, Sir, that I for one am prepared to exhaust every physical power I possess by staying here night and day in order to carry this measure through committee. If hon. gentlemen opposite persist in endeavouring to kill this important measure, to destroy the effect of the whole of this session, and to waste half a million of public money in an extra session, I say I shall be prepared to meet them, first, by doing all that the physical powers I possess—and in this I believe hon. gentlemen who sit behind me will be prepared to co-operate—in bringing it to a satisfactory conclusion ; and failing that, to go to the intelligent electorate of this country to decide between the conduct of the Government in regard to this important measure and the public business of this country, and the unparliamentary means adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite to obstruct the public business. I say that to adopt the policy which is carried out by hon. gentlemen opposite under the circumstances, is to put an end to parliamentary government. There can be no successful parliamentary government in any country if a minority, because they are voted down by a substantial majority in Parliament may resort to measures of this kind to defeat the object of that majority. Why, Sir, what has happened in the United Kingdom. It was precisely such conduct on the part of a minority there that compelled the Imperial Government to adopt the harsh, the most unfortunate, the most deplorable means to which a parliament can be compelled to resort—the closure. I want to know whether hon. gentlemen want to force on the Parliament of Canada so objectionable and unfortunate a measure as that. I say there will be no means of carrying on parliamentary government in this country without resorting to the closure if such means as we have had to encounter to-night are maintained or continued.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. gentleman, who is an experienced parliamentarian, cannot expect that such liberties as he has just taken can be allowed to pass unchallenged or unnoticed. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman has dared to speak of obstruction on this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Let us look at the facts. This measure, Sir, was introduced for discussion on the 3rd of March. This Parliament had been called to examine and determine that question on the 2nd of January. Who obstructed business between the 2nd of January and the 3rd of March ? Who is reponsible. I want to know, for the loss of two months of the time of this House ? The men sitting on the Treasury benches—they are responsible. If they had been able to settle up their differences before the 3rd of March, we might have had the discussion of this measure before that time. But it was only at last when they had been able to patch up their differences, that we came to the discussion of this measure. Then, what took place on the second reading of the Bill ? The hon. gentleman has dared to say that there was obstruction on the second reading of this Bill. He stated that in so many words not ten minutes ago. Who is responsible for obstructing, and where did it come from ? From this side of the House ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. Some man says "yes," echoing the words of his leader—a worthy follower of his leader. Sir, look at the record, and you will find that just as many men have spoken on that side of the House as on this.

Some hon. MEMBERS. More.

Mr. LAURIER. And more. Look at "Hansard," and you will find that more pages have been occupied by members on the ministerial side of the House than by members on this side ; and on the third day after that debate was concluded, we went into committee on the Bill. Now, the hon. gentleman has the audacity to say that there was obstruction on this side of the House to-day because an important question was brought up by a gentleman who has hitherto supported the Government, though if I heard the Secretary of State aright, he has just been read out of the party. On that question six gentlemen spoke, three from the ministerial side and three from the Opposition side. And this is what the hon. gentleman calls obstruction. Then, when we have got into committee on the Bill, my hon. friend beside me raises a very important point. He brings to the attention of the House the fact that the Government have done at last what they should have done long ago—sent commissioners to Winnipeg to negotiate ; and he simply suggests—not as a matter of right, but as a matter of courtesy, a matter of diplomacy, a matter of good-fellowship—that this Bill should not be proceeded with while the negotiations are pending. And this is what the hon. gentleman calls obstruction. Sir, there has been no obstruction on this Bill, and there is no desire on the part of the Opposition to obstruct it. I am quite willing, for my part, to go to the country on the merits of the Bill. I do not want to obstruct it. The Opposition have taken their course on this Bill ; the country understand it and are prepared to judge between the Government and the Opposition on the question. But, Sir, there is no desire on the part of the Opposition to obstruct the Bill. The obstruction only comes from the hon. member, who has perhaps spent more time on this question than any one else. I am anxious, for my part, that we should discuss this Bill, and I desire nothing else than that we should as soon as possible go to the country, and let the country judge between us.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman who leads this House has seen fit to read a lecture to the members of this House as to their duty. He speaks of the great importance of passing this Bill, and he says the deliberate intention of the member for East Grey was to destroy the Government. I emphatically deny that. I also, at the same time, assert my right to differ with the Government or the Opposition upon any question that engages the attention of this House, when I believe they are out of accord with the sentiment of the country. I cannot help coming to the conclusion that they are, from the evidence I see before me from day to day ; and if I should venture a judgment, it would be to the effect that seven-tenths of the ratepayers of Ontario to-day are against the Government on this measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SPROULE. If you read the press, if you take the assemblies that are meeting every day throughout the country and passing resolutions, if you travel amongst the electorate of the country and listen to the opinions the people freely express, you cannot come to any other conclusion. The hon. gentleman says that the passage of this Bill is vital to the peace and tranquility of the people. Why, this measure is the very thing that is stirring up strife from the very foundations of society in this country and stirring up an agitation, the results of which no one can foresee. The hon. gentleman declares that he regards it as of first importance that this measure should be forced through. Is he aware of the feeling in the country against the measure ? If he is not, then he must have been, like Micawber, asleep for the last five years during which this agitation has been going on ; and I do not wonder at it, because he has just come over from the tranquil island across the sea to Canada where this agitation has been carried on for the last five years. When he tells this House that it is of paramount importance that this measure should be forced through by every means in the power of the Government, he misjudges both the temper and the sentiment of the people. He says that if defeated the Government will appeal to the country. Why, we have been asking the Government to go to the country for months, the people have been calling on the Government to appeal to them for their verdict, the people are anxious to declare their minds on the question ; and I say to-day that the hon. gentleman dare not go to the country, because he must know that the country will pronounce against him. I am justified in saying this, because the evidences are too striking not to force themselves upon every one. Take my own province and take the province of Quebec—take these two great provinces which have separate schools to-day, and what is the vote they gave on the second reading of this Bill ? Eighty-one against and sixty-seven for the second reading. Does the hon. gentleman take that as an evidence of the strong feeling that exists throughout the country in favour of the passage of this measure by every means in its power ? Why, it is the very reverse. These are the provinces that, above all others, ought to know the virtues and advantages of separate schools, because they have ample experience of their working ; and the vote given on the second reading by the members from these two provinces shows the feeling that exists in them against the measure.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Does the hon. gentleman infer that the members from the province of Quebec who voted against the Bill are opposed to separate schools ?

Mr. SPROULE. They voted for the motion to give the Bill the six months' hoist, which is the natural motion to kill any Bill.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to infer that those who voted for that motion from the province of Quebec voted against separate schools ?

Mr. SPROULE. I ask the hon. gentleman if those who voted from Ontario against the six months' hoist all meant to vote for the Bill. Why, the very same day some of them voted against the measure.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If the hon. gentleman will answer my question, I will answer his.

Mr. SPROULE. Are all those who voted against the six months' hoist in favour of separate schools ? I do not think they are. We have no evidence that they are, and we have no right to assume that they are. Take the other provinces, will any one say that the members from Manitoba and the North-west Territories, who voted for it, are in favour of that Bill ? Can you take up a single paper in Manitoba and the North-west Territories that does not condemn the Bill ? Take the two provincial elections that were held in succession in Manitoba, did they not give evidence that the people of that province condemn the Bill ? Could Mr. Greenway have carried that country by such an overwhelming majority, if the people there were not opposed to this Bill ? If I analyse the vote and ask the members individually their views on separate schools, can any one doubt what their reply will be ? Take the evidence which is at hand since the vote was taken, and it shows most emphatically that those members who voted for the second reading, instead of representing, misrepresented their constituencies. It shows that instead of doing what the country wanted them to do, they did what the country did not want them to do.

Mr. MACDOWALL. Is the hon. gentleman in order in saying that the members of Manitoba and the North-west have misrepresented their electors ?

Mr. SPROULE. I say that if we can believe the evidence we have, we can come to no other conclusion. Take, for instance, the Regina "Leader," owned by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin)——

Mr. MACDOWALL. I do not wish to press my point of order, but I should advise the hon. gentleman not to believe the papers.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman has no point of order, what is he wasting the time of the House for ? I take the Regina "Leader" that was owned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) who voted in this House in favour of the Bill. It condemns him and asserts that the vote he gave was entirely contrary to the wish of his constituents, although up to within a few days of the time that vote was taken, he argued against it. I take the other member for Assiniboia (Mr. Macdonald). If I understood anything from him, it was that the sentiments of his people were almost unanimously opposed to this measure, and yet, strange to say, he voted for a second reading. Can I accept these votes as an evidence of what the people want out in that country ? I say that if I can believe the evidence which comes to us from the time that vote was taken or before that, we can come to no other conclusion but that these gentlemen are misrepresenting the sentiments of the people rather than representing it. Coming to Ontario, is it necessary for me to analyse the vote of that province ? Dare the hon. gentlemen who voted for that Bill go back to the people of that province to-day ? I challenge contradiction, when I say they dare not go back. We were told the other evening by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) that the people of this country were unanimous in favour of the Bill, and would be unanimous when the time came for them to record their verdict. I challenge the hon. gentleman to resign to-morrow and come into my riding, and I will resign and run against him. I challenge the hon. leader of the House. I challenge any hon. gentleman in the Government to do the same, and then if they dare accept my challenge I can prove to them what the public sentiment is on this question beyond any contradiction, because it will be shown so plainly that they will not be able to close their eyes to it. Look at the vote. Why, this measure was carried by the votes of the members of the Government themselves. In England it would be held, if a government were obliged to carry a measure by the votes of the Ministers of the Crown themselves and the votes of a few of their opponents, that they had not the confidence of the country. That is the position practically in which the government stands to-day. Take out the votes of the Ministers of the Crown and a few they culled from the Opposition, and where would they be ? Decidedly in the minority. Now, then, I say we have the best reasons in the world for believing there is no urgent need for passing this Bill. We were told that it was very important the second reading should take place. What appeal did the hon. leader of the House then make ? He said : We are prepared to send a commission to Winnipeg to try to settle this question with Mr. Greenway, but we want first to pass the second reading. What was the natural inference to draw from this language ? It was that when the second reading was passed, the flag of truce would be raised and we would not proceed with the measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. SPROULE. Did the hon. gentleman say that he would go on with the other stage of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Emphatically no. I have looked over his language since, and he did not say a word about going on with it. He said that the Government wanted to pass the second reading and would then send up a commission ; and the natural inference was that they would then stop the Bill while trying to treat on amicable terms with the Manitoba government. Are they doing that? No, they are holding up the flag of truce and at the same time raising a whip of scorpions over their backs to strike them. Is that method of proceeding likely to lead to the best results ? Under the circumstances, is it a wonder that the commission, as the hon. gentleman intimated to the House, is likely to end in failure. Is it to be wondered at ? For I say it is coercion of the very worst kind on the people of that country, and against their will, and against their wish. And I do not wonder they refuse to be coerced. Are we to be told that members supporting this party are trying to defeat the Government because they oppose what they believe to be wrong and against the opinions of the country ? Are we supposed to be afraid to express our views ? Have we no rights in this House ? We have rights that we are prepared to assert even against gentlemen who are trying to coerce this House as much as they are trying to coerce Manitoba. The hon. gentlemen say the Government do not want to introduce any question that would take up the time of the House. They did not want to take up the question of providing a few thousand dollars to pay the sessional clerks, messengers, and other employees, although it would not have been objected to by any hon. member on the other side of the House, although it might have been passed in fifteen minutes without objection or obstruction from anybody. And then, because an hon. member who has been in the House as long as I have, draws the attention of the House to a matter of this kind, am I to be told that I did wrong, that I did not communicate with my leader or go around and see the Minister of Finance. I thought it was such a simple matter that no person would object to it, and I was innocent enough to think that I had a perfect right to bring it up as I did. And I think still that I had that right, notwithstanding the castigation I have received from the leader of the House, which, I may say, I regard as of very little force in controlling me either in this House or outside of it. The hon. gentleman refers to the statement that the vote on the second reading did not express the views of the electorate. I say it did not. I have given my reasons why I think it did not. I have given my reasons why I believe that if to-morrow this House were dissolved and we were to go to the country, these hon. gentlemen would wake up to a realization of the fact that the country is strongly against them, and is strongly against this measure, and the country wants an opportunity to express its views. The country wants an opportunity to speak upon this question. What harm would it be if this Bill were not put through at this session. The hon. gentleman says that it is most important that it should be put through It cannot go into operation for three months, because the Lieutenant-Governor in Council has three months in which to make the appointments, and if he does not do it in that time then the Bill comes into full operation. We must have another session of Parliament within three months from now. What harm would it be if this Bill did not pass at this particular session, but the country had an opportunity to speak its view upon it ? What harm could be done to the minority in Manitoba or to the majority, or any one else ? I am satisfied no harm can be done, and the country would appreciate an opportunity of having a say upon this vexed question which has engaged attention so long. The hon. gentleman says the limited time at our disposal is the reason for pushing this Bill forward. They wasted about forty days the first part of the session, without doing anything. Who obstructed the work of Parliament early in the session ? Was it the seven Ministers who struck and went out, or was it the others that were dancing attendance on the Government here for weeks waiting to do the work for which we were called together, but which there was no Government to go on with it. We have come now to the last twenty-three days of the session, and the hon. gentleman seems to think it is important that we should work night and day. But for the first forty days we danced attendance here around the Parliament buildings with nothing to do, while the expense of the session was going on just the same. Did we have the Estimates brought down ? Did we have the Budget speech made ? No ; we were waiting for the hon. member to be brought in as the salvation of the country, who was, by force of will, to push through everything with such vigour that there was to be no obstruction or opposition. He has succeeded most remarkably, I must say. He has raised great hopes, but he has effected very little in the way of legislation, and if he continues for the next twenty-two or twenty-three days at the same rate, the country will have an opportunity yet of speaking upon this question. The hon. gentleman said that as soon as the Bill was read the second time negotiations with Manitoba would be begun. In other words : We will hold that as a whip over them ; we will offer to negotiate but we will make them do what we say. It is an old saying but not less true that you will catch more flies with sugar than you will with vinegar. You are not likely to force the people of Manitoba to do what you say by holding this whip over them and saying to them : We want you to do this or we will make you do it. They do not propose to be coerced. They are free-will agents, and believe that they have rights in this country as well as the hon. member who leads the House, or the Finance Minister, or any other. It has been well said that legislation of this kind should be passed only as a last resort. Did we exhaust all the means of negotiation before bringing on this measure ? The hon. gentleman who leads the House says that it was a last resort, the Finance Minister said the same thing. But it is to go on pari pasu with the negotiations with Manitoba, and is to be held as a whip over that province. I say that is not fair. When we went to negotiate with the United States over the Behring Sea question, what did we do ? Did we not first seek what is called a modus vivendi, so that quarrelling might be stopped while we sought by negotiations a friendly means of settling the question ? And when an attempt is made to bring peace between contending armies is not the same principle recognized ? A flag of truce is raised ; warlike operations cease, and the representatives of the two sides meet and try to arrange for terms acceptable to both sides. Why do not we do the same in this case ? We do not take that course, but we simply say to Manitoba : We will make you do what we wish. It is not in human nature to be driven in that way ; and Manitoba, I am inclined to think, does not propose to be so dealt with. Hon. gentlemen are entiled to all the capital they can make out of the announcement that they are trying to pass this measure. They are entitled to all the capital that this measure, which they say is so strongly favoured by the country, can bring them. Go to the country, and see whether the whole country is with you. If the country is with you, then we can pass the measure, having a mandate from the people to do so, but until the country has had an opportunity to pronounce on this Bill, we are justified by the agitation that has been kept up and by what we see here from day to-day, we are justified in trying to prevent this measure from becoming law.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman who moved that you leave the Chair, did so because he had begun his remarks under the impression that the debate on the former motion had not been closed. No doubt it was properly closed, but I know that though I came into the chamber as soon as the bell sounded, I found that the motion was withdrawn or declared lost. And considering the point was a very important one, and that there were other gentlemen who wished to speak upon it, he felt bound to make the motion he did which has drawn upon him and upon the members of this side generally, the outpouring of the vials of wrath by the leader of the House. Now, I do not think that the proceedings so far, and the language, and tone and manner of the leader of the House tend to forward this Bill. If I may say anything with reference to the progress of the Bill, I should say that the hon. gentleman's language and manner tend more to hinder the progress of the Bill than any other thing. I am disposed to accord to him all the respect I can on account of years, but I am forced to say more than I would for his conduct in this House. Although not of the same years of life as the hon. gentleman, so far as party life and experience are concerned, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) is quite the equal of the hon. leader of the House.

Mr. CASEY. Much longer a member of this House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As the hon. gentleman reminds me, he (Mr. Casey) has been much longer a member of this Parliament than the hon. gentleman himself. I think, therefore, the tone he has assumed is unwarranted. There were parts of his speech rather laughable. The idea of the hon. gentleman standing on the platform declaring that the conduct of the Opposition with regard to this Bill would cost the country half a million of dollars, will sound rather ludicrous to those who remember the hon. gentleman's own dealings. The hon. gentleman has announced his intention of sitting here and forcing this Bill through. It is not supposed, under constitutional government that the way to place laws upon the statute-book is by the use of physical force. It is generally recognized that mental force is more needed in matters of that kind. I should not like to see the hon. gentleman exhaust the physical abilities either of himself or of those opposed to him. But what I would like the hon. gentleman to try to do, would be, not to exhaust his mental energy, but to bring his mental energy to bear, in order that the discussion may proceed, and that the Bill may go on. Now, who is in charge of the Bill ? The Secretary of State is in charge of it, apparently, and yet the point is raised by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), a constitutional point——

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Disposed of a dozen times already.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Never been disposed of, never been raised, never been discussed. It is propounded by the hon. member for Queen's and supported by reasoning and arguments that call for a reply. Instead of making a reply, I am sorry to see that, even while he was speaking, the leader of the House was most unseemly, I would say, almost insulting in his expressions. Now, that is not the way to do. The Minister of Finance says it will require ten days to consider this Bill. We have just entered upon its consideration, and the very first clause, a legal gentleman of high standing says, in his opinion, is unconstitutional, and he says, at the same time, that gentlemen of equal eminence on the other side are rather disposed to differ with him. Well, there are a great many laymen in the House, and, while we do not subordinate our judgment altogether to that of the legal gentlemen in the House, I am bound to say, with all modesty, that the laymen of the House do place a value upon the legal opinions, as enunciated by lawyers who are the very first in constitutional knowledge in the House : and, for my part, I desire to hear that question discussed. Here we have these eminent legal gentlemen declaring that the very first clause of this Bill is unconstitutional. In that case, in what position will the Roman Catholic minority be in ? They will be involved in a law-suit at the very start. Then again, the Secretary of State has alluded, in almost insulting terms, to the discussion that took place on the second reading of the Bill, when he characterized the speeches which had been delivered, as irrelevant. Has the hon. gentleman not sufficient modesty to recollect the fact that, of all the speeches that were delivered in this House on the second reading of that Bill, none of them were so irrelevant as the speech in which the hon. gentleman introduced that Bill ? He went on for nearly three-quarters of an hour, until he was interrupted, and only when recalled to himself, did he bring himself away from days gone by, thirty years in the past, from subjects that had no bearing upon this subject at all. Yet this is the gentleman who rises in the House to-night and declares that, in the discussion that took place on the second reading, when the most eminent lawyers of the House took part and every one who spoke, did so under a sense of responsibility, yet their speeches, he says, were irrelevant to the subject. Now, with reference to the motion that the committee rise and report progress, the reason that was assigned seems to me very reasonable indeed. There is the constitutional point brought up by the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and, whatever opinions may be entertained of that hon. gentleman, I think it is generally conceded that, while he is not infallible, when he takes a constitutional point, there is some merit in it. He has taken a constitutional point, that, while you are negotiating with the government of Manitoba, and although the First Minister intimated that the negotiations were likely to fail—a thing, I think, he had no right to do, judging from the news we have in the papers to-night that negotiations will not end until to-morrow—but the member for Bothwell argued that, constitutionally, while these negotiations were going on, and until this House is in possession of the facts that the Manitoba government were not prepared to act in the matter, this House is not invested with authority to deal with this question. Well, he may be right, and he may be wrong. But why does not some gentleman on the other side attempt to answer a question like that, instead of rising, and, by mere force of words and of abuse, endeavouring to push this Bill through ? Sir, the Secretary of State talks about closure, and he has done his best, without an Act of Parliament on the statute-book to enable him to invoke it, to shut off free discussion by disorder and noisy conduct that are anything but creditable to this chamber. Sir, that process of proceeding is not debate at all. Again, I repeat, the questions that are brought up are constitutional questions, and the member for Queen's was entitled to have his argument replied to. I am bound to say, so far as I was able to follow his argument, and not having heard any reply to it, from the other side, that he has convinced me, although my opinion may be changed, that that very first clause is beyond the power of this legislature. But, over and above that, it does seem to me that the other point that is taken, that this committee should not proceed with this Bill until you have a definite answer given that the Manitoba government will not do anything, is deserving of consideration, and that to push this Bill forward now will tend to thwart and prevent them arriving at a happy conclusion. Then, there is the other point that is raised by the hon. member for Bothwell, that you are not invested with the power to proceed with this Bill until the committee is is possession of that fact. Therefore, I say that, instead of charging obstruction, or anything approaching it, it seems to me this is a proceeding that demands recognition at the hands of the Government. If the position of the Minister of Finance is correct, that ten days will be sufficient to discuss this Bill, and I suppose he has given some thought to it, then there is no necessity for putting this Bill through now, because there are almost twice ten days at our disposal, and there are other Government measures on the paper to be dealt with, and the Supplementary Estimates to be brought down ; for two or three days, until we can get an answer from the Manitoba government, other business can go on, and you will not be involved in the difficulty that is pointed out by the member for Bothwell. Sir, I did not intend to speak at this time, but I thought it well that, when the leader of the House was taking the position he did, and indulging in the language he did, and imputing motives that he did, to point out that he was not justified in his criticism. It is evident that there was something that had angered him in some way, something, I think, that could not have sprung legitimately from anything that has been said or done from this side. Whether there is a Cabinet trouble that has ruffled his temper, I do not know ; but if there has been anything more of that kind in the Cabinet, do not pour out your spleen upon unoffending members of the House. Certainly, so far as I am concerned, I have not made these remarks with a view of retarding proceedings, but because I feel impelled to make them from what has transpired.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not intend to take up much time at present, but I may have something more to say later on. At this time, I only wish to make one or two remarks. I regret very much indeed that the leader of the House has thought it right to say that those who desire to discuss the clauses of this Bill, and to discuss matters connected with this very important measure, are to be held responsible for the holding of another session of Parliament this year. I think that is a very unfair statement to make.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I made no such statement. They were hon. members who did not want to discuss the clauses of the Bill, that I complained of, not those who want to discuss the clauses.

Mr. McNEILL. If the hon. gentleman had done me the great courtesy of listening to what I said, he would have observed that I did not confine my remarks to the discussion of the clauses of the Bill, but I also referred to matters connected with this very great measure. I think it is, as I have said, not very fair to make a charge of that kind; and I think it is singularly unfortunate, from the point of view of the Government, because, if there is anything more clear than another, and anything more certain than another, it is, that the people of this country will very clearly understand that those who wasted two months of this session doing nothing, so far as promoting the business of this House is concerned, are the people responsible for delay. The idea suggested here, that we are to be called upon, because the Government chose to waste two months out of the three or four months, to swallow this measure, holus-bolus, that the representatives of the people are not to be allowed to discuss the measure without being liable to charges of this kind being hurled against them, seems to me to be too absurd. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that the people, at all events the people of Ontario, expect this measure will be discussed, and fully discussed, and I wish to say further, when it is said there was a full and fair discussion allowed on the second reading of the Bill, that I deny the proposition. I say there was not a full discussion allowed on the second reading. I say there were scores, or dozens, at all events a good score, who desired to address the House on this important measure at one or two o'clock in the morning, and who were told that they would be obliged to remain here and discuss it, because the House would not be permitted to rise and so give them an opportunity to discuss it subsequently. I say there were hon. members who were induced to hold back their speeches on this question, and who then found themselves closed out by by an arrangement, so that they did not get a fair opportunity of discussing this measure. The statement, or insinuation, that there was an attempt at obstruction during the second reading of the Bill, is an improper insinuation, and an absolutely incorrect statement. There never was a more fair discussion in this legislature, or in any British legislature, than the discussion had on the second reading, so far as those opposed to the measure were concerned. The discussion was not fairly conducted on the part of those promoting the Bill, because they endeavoured to prevent those who differed from them getting a fair opportunity of placing before the people their sentiments and views with respect to it. Therefore, for the leader of the House to come here to-day and make an assertion, a charge, against those conscientiously opposed to the measure, is a most improper course of conduct, from my point of view, at all events. I think it is scarcely less improper to accuse hon. gentlemen who have for many long years acted in conjunction with the Conservative party in this country, men who are just as good Conservatives as the leader of the House, just as fully imbued with the belief in the benefits of Conservative principles as he is, men who are prepared to make as great sacrifices for those principles as he is, or ever was, to accuse those hon. members, because, forsooth, they dare to differ with him, of being false to their principles and false to the party they have all their lives supported, is an accusation which the hon. gentleman should have blushed to make. If it was necessary to import a gentleman from the mother country to come to this House and make accusations of this kind against hon. members of the Conservative party who, as I say, are just as much attached to that party and are just as much believers in the principles of that party as he is, I can only say that the party must indeed have been reduced to a terrible position by those who were leaders of the party at that time. The hon. gentleman who sits beside me (Mr. Sproule) has been in this House for eighteen years, and, during all that time, he has been a consistent supporter of Conservative principles, and now, because he differs on an important measure, because he conscientiously presses his views on this House, he is to be dragooned by the hon. gentleman, and to be practically read out of the party. So far as I am concerned, I will not be read out of the party, even by the hon. gentleman, or by any one else. I am as good a Conservative as is the leader of this House, and no taunt he can fling across the House will be sufficient to drive me out of the party in whose principles I so fully believe.

I have heard a great deal of high-flown talk about the necessity of guarding the rights of the minority in Manitoba ; I have heard a great deal about trampling on the conscientious convictions of the minority in Manioba, but I have heard no evidence adduced to show that the minority in Manitoba are in favour of this measure. I know very well, and I venture to say there is scarcely any hon. gentleman who does not know, there are many members of the minority in other provinces of this Dominion who are not in favour of separate schools.

Mr. WELDON. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON. Name.

Mr. McNEILL. If I chose to give the names, I could give a great many, but I do not choose to give them. I make this statement, and, if the hon. gentleman is prepared to contradict it, he will make a very bold assertion.

Mr. CAMERON. I should like the names.

Mr. McNEILL. I would ask the hon. gentleman this : Does he not know any such persons himself ?

Mr. CAMERON. I know of none.

Mr. McNEILL. Who are not in favour of separate schools ?

Mr. CAMERON. None.

Mr. McNEILL. No members of the minority in the hon. gentleman's own province who are not in favour of separate schools ?

Mr. CAMERON. I do not know one.

Mr. McNEILL. I am very sorry for the hon. gentleman, because his knowledge is not as great as I have given him credit for. I make this statement, that I know personally many members of the minority in Ontario who have told me, at all events that they are not in favour of separate schools; and, if the hon. gentleman does not accept my statement, I must, I suppose, acquiesce ; but that is my statement, and it will go for what it it worth. But have we any evidence whatever that the minority is in favour of any such measure. I know that in my own county of Bruce, and I suppose it might be interesting to my hon. friend that I should mention this incident ; in the county town of Bruce, I know that for years there was opposition by the Roman Catholic minority there to the establishment of a separate school in that town. I know that they fought against it for years. I know that many of the leading members of that body there opposed the establishment of a separate school in Walkerton. But eventually their opposition was overcome and a separate school was established. Now, I suppose I may be told that I would be trampling upon the rights of the minority in Walkerton if there were any interference with that separate school, but so far as my information is concerned, I would be doing what the minority would like to see done. Under all the circumstances, I think that all this high-flown talk about trampling on the rights of the minority is somewhat beside the mark, until we have some evidence that the minority really wish to have continued the separate schools which had been interfered with by the Act of 1890.

Mr. BELLEY. That is enough.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend says "that is enough," and perhaps it is too much, but I further wish to make this remark, and I know my hon. friend will allow me to make it. I was really very much surprised to-day when the hon. member from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) addressed the House, to see the manner in which his remarks were received by some members of the Government and by some members on this side of the House. A few days ago I heard the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) spoken of in terms of adulation. I heard him described as the sage of Bothwell and as the philosopher of Bothwell, and I heard it said that his views on constitutional questions carried the greatest possible weight with those who occupy the Treasury benches at the present time. But to-day I found a perfectly different view taken of the utterances of my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) on matters of constitutional law. I found to-day that there was no attention whatever paid to his views or to his advice, and that every evidence was shown that what he said was considered as of no consequence whatever. I do not know what the reason of it may have been, but I confess I was somewhat surprised and not a little amused at what I saw and what I heard. Now, I heard it stated in the course of the afternoon, that the arguments of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) were altogether contradictory, and that they were inconsistent one with the other. If I remember aright, what the hon. gentleman stated was this: In the first place, he said that the Government ought to have brought this Bill down sooner; in the next place, he said that there was not the time now left to discuss the Bill; in the next place, that this Parliament has no right to deal with the Bill, and lastly, that it is a bad Bill. I cannot see what there is inconsistent in those arguments, for it seems to me that they are perfectly consistent one with the other. It is surely consistent to say that the Bill ought to be brought down sooner, whether it is a good Bill or a bad Bill. We give credit for the belief that it is a good Bill in the view of the hon. gentlemen who have charge of it and who support it, and it is reasonable to say that a measure of this kind ought to have been brought down somewhat sooner. I think it is fair to say that there is no time to discuss a measure of this kind now, and that it is also fair to say that this Parliament has no right to deal with it, more especially from the fact that from the beginning to the end of the discussion no argument that I have heard has been advanced in reply to that fatal objection to this Bill, namely, that this Parliament has no right to deal with it. We have heard from the leader of the House that this matter has been discussed at great length, and so it has. A great many speeches have been delivered from the Treasury benches in regard to the question, but not one single argument has been adduced in reply to the statement that this dying Parliament, without any mandate from the people, has no right to deprive the people of their constitutional right to pronounce upon this measure. No one has answered it because no one can answer it. No one has dared to answer it, because this Parliament knows that no one can answer it, and that is sufficient ground and sufficient excuse for those who hold that it is their duty to resist the passage of this measure. Those who hold that the people have a right to be consulted on this measure, those who hold that the people are being violently deprived of their constitutional right, have surely the right to endeavour to give to the people that constitutional right which it is now being endeavoured to wrest from them. So far as I am concerned, as I said during the debate on the address, from that point of view, I shall consider it my duty to oppose this measure at every stage that it is brought before the House, when I have an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. FRASER. I do not know that I would have spoken at this stage of the Bill were it not for the remarks of the Secretary of State. When he pointed out to the Opposition what the effect of their action was to be on them before the country, I commend to him now the quiet, dignified and manly words of his whilom friend, as to what the effect of his conduct is going to be on his party. No one could have listened to the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) without feeling that there must be a wrench somewhere, when a man who is considered the most loyal and the most thoroughly high type of an old English Tory in this House, should have felt himself called upon to have given the rebuke that he did to the Secretary of State. I was pleased to hear that the Secretary of State was ready to die, and ready to sacrifice himself and all his relations on the altar of his country, at this time. It was certainly a sight to make the angels weep. At his age, with faltering steps, old, yet full of that manly vigour that arises from the consciousness of doing a duty and doing it well, here he was standing up against the guns of the Opposition, ready to fall and die. Well, now, that was a sight. It was something new in this Parliament. The most vigorous man here is not ready to die for his country, except under very exceptional circumstances; but here was a man courting death, and feeling that in the line of courting death he was serving his country as he never did before. Sir, if this were not a very grave question which we are discussing, the ridiculousness of the position of the Secretary of State would be most laughable. Let it not be forgotten that if the 'ipsi dixit' of the Secretary of State is not taken, and that if a single argument is advanced against it, then we are to be accused of obstruction. Before he sat down he attempted to leave the impression, not directly by word, but very nearly by word, that back of him were men who were ready, by physical brute force, to force this measure through Parliament, even though there were ever so many arguments against it. That is not the position for any one to take in Parliament, and that is not the way to gain the point the Secretary of State professes to have so much at heart. Is this not a question that should engage the attention of Parliament as no other question has? Let it not be forgotten that if we undertake to discuss a question relating to banking, we understand that it comes within the purview of this Parliament. But this is a question on which we have never legislated, and on which there may be a conflict between two Parliaments. It is a different question from any other that the Parliament of Canada has ever legislated upon, and we are told that unless we allow it to go through without saying a single word, we are obstructing. Why, it took many years in the United States for one of the most distinguished jurists that ever lived, Chief Justice Marshall, to find out what the constitution of the United States meant. It has taken them a hundred years to understand where the conflict between the state and the federal government comes. We have been learning the same thing in the last twenty-seven or twenty-eight years for we have had a number of conflicts. But this is the first time that this Parliament has legislated upon a residuum of authority that was vested in the local legislature in the first place; and it is a matter to be more carefully considered than any question that has ever come before Parliament. The Secretary of State seems to think nothing of the fact that we may have interminable law-suits, or that we may have to change our constitution if we wrench it; and is he going to arrive at a conclusion satisfactory, in the first place, to the best thinking men in this country who understand the constitution, and, secondly, to the province of Manitoba and the Dominion of Canada, by saying, you are obstructing it if you say a word against it? When it was brought home to the hon. gentleman that as much time was consumed in the discussion of this question on the other side of the House as on this side, I could not help thinking that it was with very bad grace that he accused this side of obstruction. Have men no right to discuss a question that they think of sufficient importance to demand discussion, and must it be said that they are obstructing if they do that? I ask if there was a gentleman who spoke on the other side in favour of the measure who was not honestly trying to give his views to the House and the country? Was he attempting to obstruct? Yet it would be just as fair for gentlemen on this side to say that such men are obstructionists as it was for the Secretary of State to say that gentlemen on this side are, because they discuss the measure from their point of view, deeming it of sufficient importance to merit discussion. The truth is, there is a piece of play in saying that there is obstruction. There is no obstruction, and the hon. gentleman knows that there is no obstruction; but it serves the purpose of carrying on this piece of play on the part of the Government, for the purpose of enabling them to go to certain parties in the country and say: "Oh, just look at that obstruction on the part of those who say anything against this Bill; and the aged gentleman who has lived on his country, is now ready to die for his country to resist that obstruction." Where are the men who will not stand by a man of that kind? Fancy how their hearts will beat to-morrow morning when they read what is flashed all over the country, that Sir Charles Tupper rises in his place and offers his body as a sacrifice to the people who want this work to be done. He was ready to make a personal sacrifice—to live and die for his country. Back of it all, I can see another line running through the hon. gentleman's speech, knowing, as he must know, that the country is not in favour either of a policy of this kind or of his method of settling a vexed question; and he wants to make it appear that he is willing to sacrifice himself. As I have said once before, that is a calculation based upon an under-rating of the intelligence of the very voters he expects to get. Suppose, for example, that a judge sitting on a bench says to litigants who are before him: "This is a matter that should be settled; go together and settle it." What would be thought of that judge if, after the litigants got together to see whether a settlement could be arrived at, he said: "In the meantime, call your witnesses and go on with the case; we will produce evidence to show that the plaintiff is a villian and the defendant a scoundrel"? But would it not be far worse if the plaintiff said: "We will go on and settle, but in the meantime I will insist on going on with the case." That is exactly this case, because the Government have approached the province of Manitoba. Surely it was common courtesy to wait until they learn whether or not any settlement can be arrived at on broader ground than the forcing of this measure through. No such thing is done in private life. When two parties agree to endeavour to bring about a settlement of their dispute, the practice is not to push the case, because the very pushing of it induces an irritation that prevents a settlement. If I might tender advice on that subject, the Government would stand better with the country on both sides if they said: "We have sent our commissioners to Manitoba, and we will wait their answer before going on with the measure." Instead of that, they accuse us of obstructing because we say, as I do now, that we have no authority to pass this measure in this House. In Nova Scotia the Board of Public Instruction is composed of the Government sitting in a different capacity, and the Superintendent of Education. You might as well say that this Parliament might pass an Act providing that the government of Nova Scotia shall constitute a board of education for the province of Nova Scotia. Could it be done? Our Act in Nova Scotia is satisfactory to the people of Nova Scotia. We had a statement that will answer what the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) said, when the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) was speaking. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said it was satisfactory—that is, a free school system, without the slightest touch of anything like separate schools.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). They have separate schools in practice.

Mr. FRASER. They have no such thing as separate schools in practice. In the city of Halifax and one or two other places, they are differently conducted, and why was that done?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Have they not separate schools in Halifax?

Mr. FRASER. They have not, neither by law nor in any other way. They have not separate schools in practice, for the schools are subject to the same inspection and everything else; but the schools where, before the Act was passed, our Catholic friends had control, were taken, the board of education pay rent for the buildings, and they come exactly under the same laws as any other schools, except that in them religious teaching is allowed either before or after the hours. And these schools a large number of Protestants attend every day. In all the schools the same books are used, the same inspection takes place, the teachers must pass the same examination, and the payments go into a common fund, which is paid out to the Catholic and Protestant schools in proportion to the number, and as a consequence good schools prevail in Nova Scotia and the people there recognize that sentiment which does not seem to prevail in this House, or Manitoba would be asked to settle her school question in the same way. The point was raised that there was some semblance of separate schools in Halifax. Well, when the education Act was passed, Halifax was the only city in the province of Nova Scotia, and there the school board was composed differently. The Government appointed half the number and the city council the other half. There might be a majority of Catholics on the board at one time and a majority of Protestants at another, and to-day, in every large town in Nova Scotia where they have a council, the same rule prevails, namely, the Government appoint three and the council three.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). The hon. gentleman must know that is not the case.

Mr. FRASER. In every incorporated town.

Mr. WHITE (Shelburne). Trustees, but you were talking of commissioners.

Mr. FRASER. The trustees are the same. In Halifax they are called commissioners, but in all the towns they are called trustees, but as to the duties performed there is no difference between them. They were called trustees at first, but in Halifax, which was the only place in Nova Scotia that was an incorporated city at the time the Act was passed, they were called commissioners. There is no difference between them as regards what they have to do. There is no special legislation relating to Halifax except that it has a school board, and these men are appointed under the Act, because there was only one city in Nova Scotia at the time. Will any hon. member say that in the carrying out of the Act, there is any difference in Halifax compared with anywhere else ? No, but what happened there two or three years ago ? When a school was required to be built and when the Archbishop of Halifax wanted to build that school and pay for it himself, the commissioners, composed of Catholics as well as Protestants, would not consent but insisted that they should build the school, and they did so at the expense of Halifax. There is no friction whatever. I will tell you more, what the good sense of the people enables them to do. There are five schools that are largely attended by the Catholic children and there are eight largely attended by the Protestant children, and when the commissioners meet, the Protestant commissioners say to the Catholic commissioners : You name the teachers in the Catholic schools and see to the arrangements of the Catholic schools, and we will look after ours. That was agreed to as a sensible arrangement. And when the hon. member for Halifax said that the Act was satisfactory to Nova Scotia, I would like to know if there is a member from Nova Scotia who denies that.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I deny it.

Mr. FRASER. I venture to say that there is not another member from Nova Scotia, except the hon. member for Inverness, who will say the Act is not satisfactory, and he only does it as a pretext for attemtping to show that it was necessary to pass this legislation.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). What I say is this, that the minority in Nova Scotia would like to have by law that which they now have by practice.

Mr. FRASER. Then I can only refer the hon. gentleman to his hon. colleague from Halifax who said that everybody in Nova Scotia was satisfied.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). He did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. FRASER. I will let these two hon. gentlemen settle the difficulty between them, but I will venture to say that the hon. gentleman will not find a corporal's guard to back him in saying that any person desires that by Act of Parliament the common school system in Nova Scotia should be changed which has worked so well. That being the case, does it not strike the hon. member that when that can be done in a province like Nova Scotia, where a very large minority of the people are Catholics, could be equally done in Manitoba ? I wish that the people of Ontario and Quebec were just as well advanced in toleration, as we are in Nova Scotia, with the exception of the hon. member for Inverness. We have learnt the lesson there, that even if there is a conscientious difference between us, there is a method by which we can come together and avoid the friction that is attempted in this House, by Act of Parliament, to be inflicted upon the people of Manitoba. Now, if the Act is unconstitutional, what will follow ? I am not attempting to role of a prophet, but simply stating what experience in the past has shown, when I say that nothing could happen more to disturb the peace of Canada than to pass this Act, which is going to be inoperative and which is ultra vires. You will have all the heart burning that will follow when people who honestly want a certain state of things are finally disappointed by the very act which pretended to give them the rights they claimed. I spoke a moment ago of how the matters was dealt with in Nova Scotia:

> Subject to the provisions of the Towns and Corporations Act of 1895, each school section shall have a board of three trustees and no section shall have more than one board. The powers and duties imposed upon the trustees shall, in corporate towns, be enjoyed and discharged by commissioners of schools appointed for such towns except as otherwise provided in this Act.

And in the towns three are named by the local government and three by the town council. And these appointments are made without any reference to the religion of the appointees. The Act works so well that questions of distinction between Catholics and Protestant are scarcely ever heard of, and that is due to the fact that those who represent the minority in Nova Scotia,—and I refer particularly to one man of great brain, heart and soul, the great Archbishop Connolly, who did more to settle the matter in Nova Scotia upon the firm basis on which it is now than any man in that province—accepted the situation and worked harmoniously with the majority. What did that great and good man, Archbishop Connolly do? Believing as firmly as any other man in Canada of the religion to which he belonged, in separate schools, he took in the situation and he got that which best could be got under the Act and was satisfied. The good sense and kindness of his Protestant friends gave to him that which under the Act he could not have got as a right, and that has been continued since. Is not that an object-lesson to this Parliament? Are you going to precipitate a conflict between the central authority and the local authority, and run the risk of years of litigation, simply to make it appear that certain self-chosen martyrs are ready to die for the minority. That is the sum total. Martyrs. Crowns, bliss. Oh, what martyrs! I am not surprised that one of their followers should groan. He understands that there is not much of the martyr about them. Now, ought we not to discuss this matter, not only in view of the Act itself, but in view of the operation of other Acts in the Dominion that are working well in the best interests of the province? I am here to bear testimony to the Act in Nova Scotia that it is faithfully carried out, and that nothing could be better suited to the province. And I believe the same would be the result in Manitoba. I was very much struck with a point raised by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) as an argument against undue haste in this matter. It will be three months before this Act can go into operation at all, so nothing will be lost by delay. The leader of the House says that $500,000 will be lost by holding another session, and that the country will frown upon the Opposition for being the cause of it. Why should we have spent $500,000 for this session? Was there any necessity for it? Could effrontery go further than to declare that it would be an imposition to hold the first session of the next Parliament when these gentlemen have caused the sixth session of this Parliament for which there was no necessity at all. And the country is to regard these gentlemen as statesmen because they came here on the second of January, and now within a few days before the end of the session they have not taken a step in the direction of what they have been talking about so much, and what they called this session specially to perform. It was two months before we began the discussion, and now the matter is to be forced through with all the physical powers at the back of the Government. Two months were spent in doing nothing and now the Opposition are warned that the country will hold them responsible because, at eleven o'clock, on a particular night they are not ready, at the threat of the Secretary of State, to pass this Bill and say nothing about it. What about all the time occupied at the beginning of the session? In the election in Cape Breton it was freely stated that nothing could be done with the Remedial Bill until the Secretary of State was in the House. So long as it suits these hon. gentlemen loss of time is nothing at all, but when the loss of time may run contrary to the plan of the Secretary of State and the Government for gaining votes by pretending a violent interest in the minority, we are warned of punishment that the country will mete out to us. And we are told that in order to carry out the idea, some are ready to die upon the altar of their country. When I read Foxe's book of martyrs, I thought the age of martyrs was gone. But it is not; there are still those who are ready to immolate themselves. The hon. Secretary of State miscalculates the intelligence of this country if he thinks that he is going to gain the country merely by the threat the people will hold us responsible for that in these closing days of the extra and last session of a moribund Parliament, which has outlived its usefulness, as it almost outlived its time, we do not do his bidding without question. This Parliament does not represent the electorate of Canada. I was very much struck when attending a public meeting lately, at a renomination of a gentleman who represents a county in this Parliament, a conscientious man, who was nominated before the last revision was made. And when he found that between 2,000 and 3,000, or nearly half the electorate had changed in that time, he placed his resignation in the hands of his friends saying: I cannot receive a nomination representing 3,000 voters who do not exist and come before you and claim that I am the nominee of my party. This Parliament does not represent the men who are now ready to vote, for many of those who sent us here have left the country, many are in their graves, and many, from other causes, have dropped from the electoral list and the places of all these classes have been taken by new men. Therefore, when the point is raised that there will be a conflict of authority over this Bill, I think there is every reason why we should discuss and consider the question. For we are making the constitution of the country now. Let no man forget that. The action of this Parliament is going to be taken as explaining and, perhaps, making the constitution so far as it affects conflicts between the central and the local authorities. We ought, therefore, to be careful how we move. I submit that no answer has been given to the points raised by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I think an answer ought to be made to those points. But if the Government have come to the conclusion that no answer is to be given, and that this Bill is to pass without explanation, and depending altogether upon an attempt to put the Opposition in a wrong position because they claim to make statements about what they think the Act is, then we can understand it. And the challenge is thrown out that force must be used. For myself, I laugh at that. I do not think that that is the way a great question like this should be approached. If it comes to an issue of that kind, and no alternative is offered, then, speaking for myself, and for myself alone, I tell the Secretary of State that I will oppose force to force so long as I remain here representing the people and charged to express an opinion on behalf of those people upon the issues that are raised. I think that issue should not be raised, but if the Secretary of State throws that out as a taunting challenge, for my part, I am ready to accept it, and try the case upon that issue.

Mr. WELDON. I think that due consideration should be shown to an Administration called upon to deal with points of law when the legal adviser of the Government, the Minister of Justice, is not now in his place in Parliament, but is engaged in discharging very grave duties in another part of the country. Still, I do not forget that several members of the Administration are barristers of distinction in their several cities and provinces, and I, for one, would like to hear an answer by some of the lawyers of the Administration, particularly from the Acting Minister of Justice upon the point taken by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). For, if that point is well taken, we certainly are leading the country into a swamp in asking this House, at the present time, to advance this legislation. Every hon. member, whether he agrees with the hon. member for Bothwell or not, will see that the point raised by the hon. gentleman is an important one. If that point, I say again, be well taken, then it is an absolute waste of time for this assembly to go on making progress which is no progress, but really retrogression, to take steps which the law does not allow us to take. It seems to me fair to ask that the legal adviser of the Administration, who is now here, should deal with the point taken by the member for Bothwell, for the consideration and guidance of this committee. The practical point in this connection, namely, that it is not conciliatory, that it does not advance the scheme of a local compromise, for us to go on debating in a way that must arouse more or less acrimony, seems to me worthy of the greatest consideration, and I am persuaded that that must greatly impress the common sense of this country. It is better to look to Winnipeg for a solution, to say to the members of the administration there : Now, there have been faults on both sides ; we think there were faults on your side—as I believe there were at the initiation of the measure, six years ago—but there seems to have been faults on both sides, a lack of consideration, a lack of prudence of speech sometimes, sometimes haste, where slower going would have been more judicious, sometimes, I think, intemperate speeches in this House, which had better not have been spoken—recognizing faults on both sides, let us forget the past and see if we cannot, as men who love our country, and they who love their province, all who desire that a peaceful and moderate compromise may be arrived at, let us put our heads together and effect it. It is surely reasonable to say that a long and bitter debate here, while these negotiations are going on in Winnipeg, can do nothing but harm, although, as the Secretary of State has pointed out, some progress may be made in those two or three days. But, if the member for Bothwell is right, that is an unlawful progress, a mischievous progress. The practical point is, that you cannot get men in a yielding temper, when you keep up your talk of threat and denunciation, as you are bound to do, if you carry on this discussion. The hon. member for Queen's read from the "Hansard" of 9th March the statement by the leader of the House, from which he drew the inference that I think is irresistible, that the leader of the House gave us to understand that, if this Bill were put through its second reading, and as soon as the delegates were sent to this Winnipeg conference, we would no longer go at this high pressure speed—'de die in diem' were the very words used by the leader of the House—implying that, after conciliation had begun, after the commission had taken the olive branch and gone westward, the discussion would not be pressed forward with such insistence. I was, at all events, one who was misled by that statement to the House by the leader of the House, and found it impossible to reconcile it with the statement made some days later. I think it was understood all round that once the Bill had passed its second reading, there would be a time of slackwater, when our negotiators had gone away to the west to seek a compromise. I heard with regret the statement made by the Secretary of State, as to his want of hope for success, though I did not understand the statement to be so strong as the hon. member for South Oxford understood it. I thought it an expression by the Secretary of State that he had not such a hope as he would like to have of the success of these negotiations. On the question as to whether this clause now before the committee is valid, it will, I think, be necessary to have much fuller, and more patient, and more technical, and better considered arguments than we have yet had. The argument so far is on one side, and, surely, a prima facie case has been made out. Most lawyers of the House will agree that a prima facie case has been made out. Although the members who are in favour of this Bill, and who apprehend obstruction, do not wish to waste the time of the remaining hours of the session, yet I think we will not waste time, but rather save it, by making a clear answer to those points of law which are pressed by those who take the view that the clauses are beyond our power. The Minister of Finance intimated, as he has been reminded more than once, that ten days would be enough for the passage of this Bill. There are twenty-one days left to us, counting out Sundays, and, if ten days are taken for this Bill, eleven days will be left for other public business. Now, I have a suggestion to make, but I am afraid it will not be considered with the patience and care that it deserves, and that is, that this Bill be dealt with as some other important Bills have been dealt with during the years I have been in the House, that it be considered as having been read, and carefully discussed, and then put before the whole country, where it may be studied by all classes of people, and then, at the coming session of Parliament, which, at furthest cannot be many weeks distant, let it be taken up again and passed, if the new Parliament should so choose. This Bill only came before this Parliament at the end of February. Now, in the case of the Criminal Code, that Bill was printed, and distributed, and studied, and Parliament had the advantage of the opinions from all sorts of experts throughout the country, when the matter came to be dealt with in the ensuing session. In case of the Bankruptcy Bill, which was a measure of great importance, it was printed and submitted to the legislature, and copies of it were sent away to boards of trade, bankers, and wholesale merchants, and various classes of interested people ; and their views were carefully collected, and made to bear upon Parliament. Now, I suggest this as an answer to most of the objections that have been taken by those opposed to the Bill, that the matter be thrown over and deferred until the House meets next session. I know I shall be told that a question that excites race and religious feeling should not be an issue before the electors. Mr. Chairman, we are bound by destiny to face this question. However much we may desire public peace and public order, that question is up, and it cannot be laid. Call it an evil spirit, or call it a good spirit, or what spirit you like, the spirit is abroad, and it cannot be laid. The man who takes the view that we can lay that spirit by passing this Bill, is the rosiest optimist in North America. You cannot get rid of the question that way. You will embitter the opinion of a large part of the population in that way. The point taken by my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), is, I am sure, shared by hundreds of thousands of our people, that this is a moribund Parliament, this is a sixth session, this is a phenomenally long Parliament, and we had no mandate from the people in 1891 to settle this matter. We are members chosen by electors put on the list seven years ago or more. In the province of New Brunswick I never heard a whisper about the Manitoba school question in any serious way, in that election. I have no constitutional means of knowing, except through my correspondence, what the electors of Albert may think on this matter. Some write one way, and some write another ; certainly, the overwhelming weight of opinion is in favour of the view I am trying to express in the House ; but, except in so far as I can gather from my correspondence, I have no constitutional means of knowing what is the mind of that county. As some of my friends frequently remind me in this House, I may be cruelly undeceived, when the election comes. It may be that the opinion of the overwhelming majority is not fairly expressed by the letters I have received from the county. I am quite conscious that I am not now qualified to express their opinions, in a constitutional way, and, indeed, I have no constitutional means of knowing their opinions. I think, too, the answer was a good one that was made by more than one hon. member, who said that twenty-nine days in January, twenty-nine days in February, thirty-one days in March, or, all told, eighty-nine days have elapsed since we filed through the door of this chamber to go to the other chamber and hear His Excellency's address to the two Houses of Parliament assembled. That is a long time to have elapsed. Knowing that this session was to be specially given to a discussion of the proposed Remedial Bill it was proper that the House should be given an opportunity to fairly and fully consider it, and that the largest amount of time possible should be given for its discussion. I think the statement has been fairly made that we have not had such an opportunity, and it is not the fault of hon. members opposed to the Bill that so small a portion of time has been given so far to the discussion of the measure. Hon. members had the right to expect that the Bill would be drafted and brought down at the opening of Parliament. And why was that not done—whose fault was it? The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) has truly said that the House was not called upon to wait for the measure, that an opportunity for considering it should have been at once given, and that it is now too late to drive us by threats and by any suggestion of force. That might, perhaps, have been fairly done if the Government had put whip and spur to their own actions, if they had done their duty. But they did not do their duty. The Administration have not, as they were in honour bound, used due energy in introducing this Bill, but threats of all day and night sittings are now made, threats of force, that should not be made to a free Parliament, and these threats that will not advance the progress of the Bill. It is attempted to apply the cloture in the most obnoxious form known, but we have not yet silenced free speech in Canada by the use of the cloture. While I think the Administration are in honour bound to give all possible, honourable and proper support to the Bill, and bring all the pressure that constitutionally, honourably and legitimately they can bring to advancing the Bill, they are not bound, and they are not warranted in undertaking to coerce a free Parliament. I quite agree with what was said by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) as to the relevancy and duration of the discussion on the second reading. I may fairly say, for my own part, that while I noticed I spoke by the clock one hour and a quarter, it was out of consideration to the House that I did not speak at greater length, and if I had spoken that length of time, or half that length of time, I could have spoken with relevancy to the question. So far from having a full, free and temperate discussion, we were not allowed it, because, being deprived of sleep and nervous energy, being depressed on account of the enormous length to which the discussion had been drawn, commencing, as it did, on Wednesday afternoon, and continuing night and day until Friday, I had not a proper opportunity of discussing the subject. No one can speak as well in the middle of the night as at a reasonable hour during the afternoon. Hon. members were weary, and, under pressure, they were not allowed to speak at length. I have seen much longer discussions on the Budget than occurred on the second reading of this measure, which is of incomparably greater importance. I put one fact against the other. Who can conceive of a question of such unrivalled importance as this, a question that is shivering parties, that is threatening the existence of both parties, being disposed of with undue haste? There may not be great excitement, but there is a profound and deep feeling which is much more to be regarded than excitement. It was not, then, too much to ask for more days of discussion to be devoted to the second reading of the Bill. Parliament has sat in this chamber for thirty years—this is the thirtieth session, or thereabouts. These clauses under which we take power to introduce and deal with this question, and to pass, may be, this remedial law, have lain there slumbering for thirty years. I say, slumbering. In one case a school law was passed by the legislature of New Brunswick, my own province, and during three successive years an attempt was made to destroy that law. Those attempts, I thank the fates, were unsuccessful. Once again a school law was passed by the legislature of Prince Edward Island, a neighbouring province. An attempt was made here again to interfere with the law, and that attempt was futile. With these exceptions, during thirty years, no attempt has been made to use those powers. It is not, then, too much to ask that when these powers are applied for the first time, they shall be used with the greatest care. That part of the Manitoba Act which gives us the appellate power has hung like a loaded weapon on the wall these thirty years. Should not every man say: Let it lie there, except it is imperatively necessary to take it down. Should we not exercise the utmost care in handling it? I advance these considerations, and as the paramount consideration, the fact that we have run thirty years without the exercise of the power now invoked, and we must go very slow in making use of it.

I have followed the defence made by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), of the Halifax school system, and although I did not hear all the hon. gentleman's speech, I heard the latter part, and so far as I heard, the hon. gentleman he was, to the best of my knowledge, giving a fairly correct exposition of that system on practice. I think it will be of interest to the House to read a short statement by an officer who is very familiar with the condition of the schools in that city, but whose name I do not feel free to give—but I will give it to any hon. member who desires it—because that officer would not like his name to be kicked about in a public discussion. I asked from that officer a statement on points of fact, as to how many Protestant scholars there were in schools in which there were Catholic scholars, if any; and how many Catholic schools there were in which there were Protestant scholars, if any. I need not repeat the explanation made by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), that the city is formed into a school district, that the trustees are called commissioners. As the hon. gentleman stated, there are a certain number of Protestant and a certain number of Catholic commissioners, the numbers being divided pretty much in the ratio of population. The Catholic children attend the schools in which they are in a great majority, and the same applies to the Protestants, but as a matter of fact, there is an appreciable number of the children of one faith in schools patronized most largely by the children of the other. With the consent of the House, I will read a short statement, which will be interesting to hon. members who are following this part of the question:

> There are and always have been several Protestant children attending every one of the so-called Catholic schools of Halifax. The percentage varies greatly at different times, say from 3 to 8 per cent in St. Mary's and St. Patrick's schools, and from 2 to 5 per cent in Summer Street school. In Young Street school (Catholic) last year, of 550 pupils, about 75 were Protestants ; at present there are only about 40 Protestants.
> In Dutch Village school (Catholic) about half the pupils are Protestants. Protestants who attend Catholic schools do so because they wish to go to the nearest school. In all the Catholic schools there are religious exercises before or after school. Protestants are excused from these exercises. Occasionally during school hours there may be a very short prayer by the pupils in concert or a religious song in which Protestants sometimes take part from choice or as a matter of habit.

This gentleman is replying to questions I put him, and in reply to my second question he says :

> In nearly all the Protestant schools (so-called), there are a few Catholic pupils. In one Protestant department, of fifty pupils, I found seven Catholics. I think Richmond school is the only Protestant school in which there are no Catholics at present. In the Protestant schools the religious exercises (not prescribed) consists of the singing of sacred songs and generally the reading or reciting of a few verses from the Bible, and the repeating of the Lords' prayer in concert. All this is done before the roll-call. The Catholics are generally present, but do not always take part.

My third question was with reference to the county academy, and this gentleman says :

> In the academy there are at the present time ten Catholics (boys and girls). They sit in the principal's room while the other pupils are in the assembly hall at religious exercises. The Catholics of Halifax have two high schools of their own—one for boys and one for girls. In these high schools for girls, Protestantism has been generally represented.

I think it only fair to this gentleman, who differs somewhat from myself, to read the concluding part of the letter, which will give more support to the friends of the Remedial Bill, than I can see my way to give :

> Will you pardon the presumption of a few general observations. There can be no purely unsectarian schools except where they are wholly managed by agnostics. A good religious Methodist or Presbyterian teacher singing Moody and Sankey's hymns, teaching history, or even saying the Lord's prayers is unconsciously and necessarily undermining the faith of a Catholic child. I cannot blame a Catholic who prizes unquestioning faith in the Catholic Church above everything else, for refusing to send his child to the average public school taught by a Protestant. On the other hand, images and pictures of the saints in a school taught by a good Catholic must necessarily influence the tender mind of a young child. We must therefore have sectarian schools whether we wish it or not. The state in its own interests (while not interfering with the conscience of average men of common sense) must determine the secular teaching of the schools. The state alone has the power to compel universal education. The churches have tried it and failed, even under the most favourable circumstances as in Scotland, but while the state undertakes to give the education which its safely demands, why can it not allow the utmost freedom in religious matters. It has no right to prescribe any religious exercises of any kind, nor should it permit any pupil to be put to any inconvenience on account of his religious belief. If the teacher or the priest chooses before or after school hours to teach religious dogma to those who want it, it costs the state nothing to allow it.

I commend this strong statement to those who support the Bill.

> In all that relates to the secular part of education the state should allow no separate school boards or different text books. There should be the same qualification demanded of all teachers, and the same standards of inspection of schools. How strange it would be to have two co-ordinate sets of law courts to adjudicate upon the same classes of cases. No stranger than to have two sets of officials to conduct the schools necessary to train for citizenship. It would of course be a matter of wise politics and justice to see that Protestants and Catholics were fairly represented on the school boards—to appoint Catholic teachers where the majority of pupils were Catholic—to allow the Catholic teachers to be nominated by the Catholic members of the board—to have separate schools as in Halifax, wherever the populousness of a section would allow of more than one good school. Here in Halifax, we have for the most part not only the utmost harmony but a generous rivalry beneficial to both parties. If the conflicting parties at Ottawa and Manitoba simply want to do what is best for the country, I think their success would be greatly facilitated by friendly conferences and mutual concessions, and for that reason I would be very sorry to see the Remedial Bill passed until there were better opportunities given for compromises to be made.

The gentleman signs his name to this letter. I would be glad to show the letter to any hon. gentleman who wishes to see it, and I am perfectly sure of the accuracy of this gentleman's information. I think it tallies substantially and entirely with the representations made by the hon. gentleman from Guysboro', as to the condition of the Halifax schools.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I would like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Weldon) : Are these schools in compliance with the laws of Nova Scotia ?

Mr. WELDON. Do you mean the Halifax schools ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Yes, any of them.

Mr. WELDON. I cannot give the hon. member a better answer than is given by the gentleman who wrote this letter. He knows the writer as well as I do, and I have no doubt he would be influenced by his statement. I shall hand the hon. gentleman the letter.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). That letter only proves that all these schools are in violation of the Nova Scotia law.

Mr. WELDON. I do not so understand it at all. I think the arrangement is this——

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Why have any arrangement, if there is a law on the matter.

Mr. WELDON. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) will allow me to explain my view, I will do so, and I shall not complain of his interrupting me if I do not answer his question. The position is this, as I understand: That the Nova Scotia school law calls Halifax city a school district, and gives the commissioners and trustees a great deal of freedom of action. I have always understood it was in pursuance of a concordat reached between the late Archbishop Connolly and the present Principal Grant who was the spokesman for the Protestant people at the time. As I have always understood, what they do in practice is this: In St. Mary's, in St. Patrick's, and in the Summer Street schools, the teachers are practically appointed by the Catholic members of the board, and the Protestant members do not concern themselves at all about it. Conversely, when they are appointing teachers for any of the large Protestant schools, the Protestant members of the board are allowed to deal with that matter. The letter explains that better than I could, and I have no doubt about the accuracy of the information as to the way in which the religious exercise part of the matter is dealt with.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Does not that prove that the practice in Halifax is by agreement and not by law? The statute does not tolerate anything of the kind.

Mr. WELDON. I do not think it is against the law in any way.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). That religious instruction is against the law.

Mr. WELDON. I have not the statute at hand just now.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I know it.

Mr. WELDON. As I understood that gentleman who wrote me—I will put the letter in my hon. friend's hands in a moment—these religious exercises are given before roll call, so that technically they are not within school hours. I understand it to be an essential feature of the Nova Scotial law, that the school building is in the hands of the trustees, and they can let, Greek or Turk or Saracen, or any one else, use the building before or after school hours. In the country districts for six hours, and in the city districts for five hours, the school children must have the building for secular teaching, but before and after these hours, or on Saturday or on Sunday, any one who gets leave from the trustees can hold any exercises in the building which he thinks proper. I do not think there is anything contrary to the law in that practice.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It is in direct violation of the law.

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend from Shelburne (Mr. White) reminds me of a sentence in that letter which I read, but which escaped my attention. I will read the sentence again. Speaking of the Catholic schools, he says:

> Occasionally during school hours there may be a very short prayer by the pupils in concert, or a religious song in which Protestants sometimes take part.

So there cannot be anything objectionable, because the Protestant children take part.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Would you legalize this practice?

Mr. WELDON. It certainly is a very little violation of the law.

Mr. CAMERON. Would you legalize this practice?

Mr. WELDON. For my part, Mr. Chairman, I should go a long way to give the use of the schools—if this Parliament has to deal with such a Bill I shall certainly feel bound to go a long way to give anybody of any religious community, the right to come to the school-room, so long as it does not interfere with the teaching of the children.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Would you give them that by law?

Mr. WELDON. By law.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). That is all we want for Manitoba.

Mr. WELDON. Then my hon. friend and I are rowing in the one boat.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). That is all this Bill gives.

Mr. WELDON. I do not care one pin, if the thing does exist, whether it exists in this way or in that way. It does exist in Nova Scotia and I think with excellent results. Practical people regard it as about as happy a solution of this most troublesome question, as has been reached in any country we konw of. My hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) says that for all practical purposes they are separate schools. It seems to me that for all practical purposes they are not separate schools. After all, we are disputing about words. The description given there applies particularly to the city of Halifax. The Nova Scotia members can state more accurately than I can what is the case in the towns outside. I lived for some years in Dartmouth, across the harbour from Halifax, the second largest city in the province, and there the schools are public schools. There are no separate schools, and nothing that can be called such. I know something of the conditions in the province of New Brunswick. In my own county, there is not a separate school, nor anything like it there. There are not many Catholics in the county, and they are largely congregated together, and in the districts where they live, they organize and have their own teachers, and administer the schools very much as they like. These systems are excellent in this way, that they give the local authorities a large discretion, so that in Catholic districts there are Catholic trustees and Catholic teachers, and the great advantage these teachers possess is, that they get their share of public money. I complain of this Bill that it does not provide that the Catholic teachers in the west shall have any public money.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Is the hon. gentleman not aware that in the town of New Glasgow there is a large educational institution, with a large number of pupils, in which the teachers are Catholic, and do not get any public money ?

Mr. WELDON. Will the hon. gentleman tell me why they have not organized under the public school system, as they have done in Halifax ?

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Because the law will not allow them.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). It depends entirely on the trustees of the district. The minority in Nova Scotia have a great deal to be thankful for at the hands of the majority. They have their schools by the toleration of the majority ; and, if the minority in Manitoba had been treated in the same way, they would not have very serious reason to complain. Where the majority are generous, forbearing, patient and tolerant, we are thankful, because they act, not in accordance with the law, but in violation of it.

Mr. WELDON. And the reason, above everything else, in my opinion, why the majority in the province I represent, and the majority in the province of Nova Scotia, are forbearing, patient, tolerant, is, that in the public schools of those provinces Catholic and Protestant children sit together, and learn from their earliest years friendship for each other. I believe nothing has contributed so much to accentuate religious differences in the province of Ontario, where, notoriously, the firebrand has a better field for action than in our provinces, as the fact that in Ontario one generation of children has been divided by this unwise system of separate schools. With a public school on one side of the street, and a separate school on the other side, the Protestant children in one and the Catholic children in the other, distrusting each other, sometimes fighting each other, having bitter rivalries, they are making a very bad start for citizenship. That is the reason why I pointed out the other day that in the Australian colonies and in South Africa, where the people are English, they have never yet committed themselves to the experiment of this double-barrelled system of schools. I use that phrase, not offensively, but for accuracy of description. We have our greater difficulties, because we have two nationalities, and experience does seem to show that these double-barrelled schools—two schools in one village, or in one district—keep alive feelings of distrust and ill-will, which every man in this House, Catholic and Protestant, Frenchman and Englishman, wishes would die out.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there not a great difference, in making that comparison, in this way, that those colonies are not federations, and federations of people belonging to different creeds and religions ?

Mr. WELDON. I think that in Ontario, in 1863, the system of separate schools was not adopted by the majority of the members who represented Upper Canada at the time. I have taken the responsibility of saying that, if the Nova Scotia system is acceptable to my hon. friends who differ from me in faith, for my part, when the time comes, they will have my assistance to obtain that system for the prairie province.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). By law ?

Mr. WELDON. Yes, by law, most emphatically.

Mr. GILLIES. Then, you are in favour of separate schools.

Mr. WELDON. Even if it carries that, I make that statement with much deliberation. But it does not involve separate schools.

Mr. POWELL. I would like to ask the hon. member, if, in the province of Nova Scotia, the sisters do not teach Catholic schools in the conventual school districts ; and, while the books are the same as in the other schools, is there not a difference in the oral teaching of history ?

Mr. WELDON. If my hon. friend will reduce his question to writing, I will have an exact answer from the authorities, who know better than I do. It is a good many years since I had the opportunity of visiting the schools at Halifax. But before I was a member of Parliament, I used to visit the principal schools there, among them St. Mary's School, in the centre of the city. The Archbishop and some of the professors of my own college also very commonly visited these schools ; and I can speak with more accuracy as to their condition ten years ago than I can speak as to their condition to-day. I cannot give my hon. friend a very exact answer.

Mr. POWELL. Will the hon. gentleman go this far ? Do not the sisters teach in conventual schools in the province of Nova Scotia, are those schools not spoken of and recognized as Catholic schools, and is there not that about them which satisfies the Roman Catholic conscience, so that the Roman Catholics send their children there ? And is there not something about them that suits the Catholic conscience, that they send the children there ?

Mr. WELDON. I cannot answer for the outlying parts of the province as well as other hon. gentlemen in this House.

Mr. FORBES. No sisters or nuns, as the hon. member for Westmoreland calls them, are allowed to teach in the public schools unless duly qualified or holding a license.

Mr. WELDON. To the best of my knowledge, the hon. member for Queen's is entirely right, and I do not like to speak too positively in matters regarding which my knowledge is some years old. One word now with reference to New Brunswick schools. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) is here, and I think he is with me in saying that the system is there practically the same as at Halifax.

Mr. HAZEN. The system at St. John is this, that the Catholic children, with scarcely an exception, go to schools by themselves and the Protestant children go to schools by themselves. The schools attended by the Catholic children are taught by Catholic teachers, and those attended by Protestant children are taught by Protestant teachers. That is practically the system in St. John to-day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) All these teachers are certificated teachers, and teach from the same school books prescribed by the school board.

Mr. HAZEN. Certainly they are all qualified teachers, and the same books are used, but the point that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) makes is that it is desirable Catholic and Protestant children should go to the same schools and should mix together, and that does not prevail in St. John.

Mr. WELDON. That is quite true in Halifax, I regret to say ; but as a practical man of affairs, who cannot have everything he would like, that seems the most acceptable compromise between what we would like and that our Catholic neighbours desire: I would far rather have the children all go to the same schools in the cities as in the country parts ; but, as a public man who has to deal with this question, I will take the responsibility and give the answer I gave to my hon. friend from Inverness, who, I am thankful to say, is in the same boat with me. Now, I ask him to help me and those who think with us, to kill this Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). No.

Mr. WELDON. He must act with me because the Bill does not work in the direction he desires at all. He has to turn his back on that Bill and his face to the Nova Scotian solution of the difficulty. That is the best solution, and I understood my hon. friend to say he was with me. I hope that in time wiser counsels will prevail, and that we will be found settling down to the system pursued in New Brunswick, Novt Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, Queensland, Tasmania, and the great colony of the Cape, where there are large numbers of Catholic people and capable, intelligent Catholic bishops just as able and loyal to their church and faithful to their flocks as the bishops of any part of the world.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). I desire to say but a few words on this question. I must flatly contradict the assertion that the Nova Scotia law is acceptable to the minority there.

Mr. LAURIER. Did not my hon. friend hear the hon. Secretary of State, the other evening say that it was passed with the consent of the archbishop ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). If my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, will just allow me to finish my sentence, probably he would understand my meaning better than by cutting me short. They are not satisfied with the law as it exists. They may be satisfied, in a large portion of the province, with the administration of the law.

Mr. LAURIER. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him if he heard the hon. Secretary of State declare the other evening that the law, as it exists, was passed by him with the acceptance of the Roman Catholic Archbishop and the Roman Catholic members of the legislature ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). He was aware that this arrangement was arrived at between the majority and the minority, and under that arrangement the law has given general satisfaction in the province. But if my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) will say that this arrangement practised in Nova Scotia will be established by law there and in Manitoba as well, he will concede a very great deal more than the law as it exists in Nova Scotia concedes. I call the attention of the House to the fact that there was a good deal of discontent with the law in Nova Scotia until this arrangement was arrived at, and under this arrangement, as practised in the city of Halifax, and in the eastern part of Nova Scotia, the law gives very general satisfaction. As my hon. friend from Albert says, it is largely discretionary on the part of the trustees to have religious exercises and to allow the Bible to be used as a text book in violation of the law.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Yes, there is nothing in the law allowing it.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is nothing preventing it.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). And then it gives the trustees power to have separate schools where the majority desire them. To that I have no objection. I have no objection to religious exercises taking place in Protestant schools or to the Bible being used as a text book in Protestant schools any more than in Catholic schools, but I am in favour of separate schools for all denominations ; and if the law gives satisfaction in Nova Scotia, it is simply because the majority administer it in such a way that it does not create very great friction in very many sections, but there are sections in Nova Scotia where it does. The law in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are nearly the same. I hold in my hand the debates of the Nova Scotia legislature in the session of 1870, and I find that on the very first day, after the Speech from the Throne was read, an amendment was moved to this effect, by Mr. Purdy, of Cumberland :

> Mr. Purdy said that in order to provide information for the discussion of the address he would request the government to lay on the Table copies of all correspondence between Mr. Rand, late Superintendent of Education, and Inspector Benoit and the trustees of the Arichat schools. Also copies of correspondence between Rev. Mr. Byrne and Mr. Rand. Also copies of correspondence between Bishop Binney and the Attorney General respecting irregularities in the public schools of Arichat.

The irregularities which existed then have been practised ever since under the arrangement made between the majority and the minority. But a superintendent lost his head who insisted that the law should be carried out in its entirety and not violated in any section of the province. Consequently the session began with the discussion of that question, and just as the Governor was summoned to prorogue the House, the question was still under discussion. During that whole session three-quarters of the discussion of the local legislature was on that vexed question. But fortunately, under the generous treatment which the minority receive at the hands of the majority in Nova Scotia, a great deal of the friction which existed at that time has happily passed away. But if any person tells me that the minority would not prefer to have by law that which they now possess by the grace of the majority, he is very much mistaken. In some sections of Nova Scotia I am sorry to say, although the law is permitted to some extent to be violated, yet in other districts they refuse to have it so done if the trustees are not favourable to the minority. As I have already intimated it altogether depends upon the trustees. As to New Brunswick I find an editorial in the "Union Advocate" of 20th November, 1895, explaining the manner in which the law of that province is administered, and I desire to call the attention of my hon. friend for Albert (Mr. Weldon) to this as showing the condition of things which exists in his own province, and I think not far from the constituency which he so ably and so well represents. This refers to Newcastle.

Mr. WELDON. That is a long distance away.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). But his sympathy ought to extend to all parts of New Brunswick seeing that it extends to the minority of Manitoba according to what he has just told us. This "Union Advocate" referring to a large building put up by the Catholics of Newcastle, speaks of it as follows :—

> The ladies of the congregation will next week make a third move. They commenced to teach in this town some 26 years ago. They then occupied the presbytery. Having lived in the presbytery six years, the Hobart property was purchased. From this residence they now move to the large and more commodious building, which has cost, including land, &c., some $20,000.

A very respectable school-house, I should say :

> The building can easily accommodate 60 boarders, while at least, 200 pupils can conveniently gather within its walls. The nuns who are most accomplished teachers, give instruction in every department, from the primary to the grammar school grades included.

They use the school books prescribed by law the same as in Nova Scotia :

> This convent is one of the very few educational buildings which, after the enactment of the public school system, has continued to live and flourish without financial aid of any kind from the government or municipality. Our Catholic fellow-citizens pay a double tax, one—the tax imposed by the school system, the other—which they voluntarily impose upon themselves.

This is from a Protestant source. It concludes :

> We congratulate our fellow-citizens on the completion of this work of love, and trust that they may, for a long time to come, reap the benefits derivable from a system of instruction whose foundations are solidly laid, whose principles are based upon our common Christianity, whose beneficial results will be visible in the rising generation.

Now, as they comply with all that the law requires and as they would cheerfully give a little religious instruction which they desire to impart either before or after school hours, I hope my hon. friend from Albert will co-operate with other reasonable Protestants in New Brunswick and give them his influence to secure what they desire.

Mr. WELDON. Why do not they get it now ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Because under the law they are under the management of the trustees absolutely and if the trustees were willing to grant it they would have it. But as they refuse them, they must submit to the law. But it is not going to prevent separate schools in Newcastle because they have already expended $20,000 on a school building, they use the school books prescribed by law and they turn out more graded teachers in proportion to the number of pupils, I venture to say, than any school in New Brunswick. That is a strong statement, but I have been a school commissioner since 1864 until the present time, and I think I ought to know something of this subject. As I was saying, anything satisfactory in the law in the province of Nova Scotia is by the tolerance of the majority, and I am bound to say that throughout the province, with few exceptions which I hope will soon disappear, the law gives satisfaction.

Mr. FLINT. I woud like to ask the hon. gentleman if it was not correct, as stated by the Secretary of State, that the school law of 1864 introduced by himself had the support of Archbishop Connolly and Bishop McKinnon ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). My hon. friend may be asking a question which I cannot answer. I was in the United States of America at the time and as to the arrangement between them I am not a competent witness on that question. If he was in public life at that time and knows the facts, let him say.

Mr. FORBES. Were not you a member of the House in 1867 ?

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). The law was passed long before 1867.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would remind hon. gentlemen that the question is on the motion of Mr. Casey that the Chairman do now leave the Chair.

Mr. CASEY. In rising to withdraw my motion that you leave the Chair, I desire to say that I moved it with no intention of obstructing business but for the purpose of having for a short time what seemed to me a necessary preliminary debate as to whether we should continue to negotiate with a club in one hand and a sweet cake in the other. I am glad, however, that that motion has given the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) an opportunity of airing their views upon the question at considerable length. I am glad it has induced the Secretary of State to show the true inwardness of his mind on this subject and to declare that he intended to follow the course alluded to and which the country will judge —that he meant to carry the Bill through the committee by physicial force. I think it would be better, perhaps, if he would use his physical powers less and his brains a little more. I should not have spoken at the time I did, but that there was no reply from him or any of his friends to the argument from the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). It seems that the Secretary of State expects his followers to swallow these clauses without discussion. I find no fault with the Secretary of State for not discussing them, he evidently does not understand the Bill, and he does not even pretend to understand the argument of the hon. member for Queen's. Now, if his mind is so enfeebled by disuse during those years when he has been fattening at the public crib in England, that he cannot see an argument when it is presented——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. CASEY—or if he refuses to answer an argument which he does comprehend, it is time for this House to understand it. It is well for the House that he threatened us with the cloture as he did, that he held out the threat that if this Bill was discussed at what we considered proper length, he would attempt to introduce cloture. His threat is impotent, but the language is so irritating that I, for one, am very glad it was put before the country at large. We do not object to these ebulitions of anger on the part of the Secretary of State when he turns round and bullies old and faithful followers who have been members of this House as long as he has. We enjoy that, although we think it is an unpleasant exhibition of temper on the part of a man of his age and experience. From a party point of view, it is exactly what suits us. I prophesied some time ago that he would be the " hoodoo " of the party, and he is doing his best to realize my prophecy. Now, Sir, having said what I wished to say, I beg to withdraw my motion.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the hon. gentleman's motion is withdrawn, I wish to make a few observations. A little while ago the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) said he did not know one Catholic opposed to separate schools. I think that is a very extraordinary statement to make. I know that in the province of Ontario there are a great many districts where there are sufficient Roman Catholics to support separate schools, and no doubt they are urged to do so by their clergy, but they prefer to use the public schools. Now, the city of Windsor is a very conspicuous example of this kind. Out of a population of 15,000 or 16,000 of whom one-third is Roman Catholic, I am informed that there is not a single separate school, although there is a population of five or six thousand Roman Catholics living close together.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Will my hon. friend allow me to explain ? The term separate schools requires definition. My hon. friend thinks that a separate school is one thing, and we who desire to have separate school, have a different idea of them altogether. If the schools in Windsor have no religious instruction imparted in them, if there is nothing prescribed by the trustees, or principal, or teacher, that is obnoxious to the minority, of course, in one sense, we look upon them as separate schools. It is only where religious instruction is given in a public school that the minority desires to have a school of its own which may be in exact accord with the law of the province, and yet not have any religious instruction in it ; and we call it a separate school simply because we are permitted by law to absent our children from the public school where religious instruction is given to which we cannot conscientiously subscribe.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman must be aware that the system in Ontario is entirely different from that in Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia they have no separate school system established by law, but in Ontario they have a separate school system established by law where the full procedure of the separate school system can be carried out. But in the city of Windsor, where there are between five and six thousand Roman Catholics within a small area, and where there are, no doubt, more than one thousand scholars of school age, they are so well satisfied with the public school system that I am told by Mr. Audette, who has been a public school trustee, public school inspector and a high school trustee, that they have no separate schools, and the laity have no desire to have separate schools When the hon. member for Inverness says he does not know a single one of the minority opposed to separate schools, I can point to the fact that five thousand people in the city of Windsor alone are opposed to separate schools.

An hon. MEMBER. They are not opposed to them.

Mr. WALLACE. I think it is a fair and legitimate conclusion to draw from the fact that they prefer the public schools, to say that they are opposed to the separate schools. I know that that feeling among Roman Catholics in favour of the public schools, is not confined to Windsor. In the part of the country where I live there is a separate school near by, but the people prefer to live out of the school limits, because they are not then compelled by law, or by the pressure of their clergy, to send their children to the separate school. They know by experience that the education given there is better than that given in the separate schools. Now, the hon. gentleman asked the member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) to name any one who was opposed to separate schools. I can name dozens of people within my own knowledge. I can name some people in Ottawa who are opposed to the separate school system, and who, having had experience of separate schools, would desire, and do desire that their children should attend the public schools instead of the separate schools.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). Mr. ROBILLARD. Name.

Mr. WALLACE. I name Mr. Coffey. If the hon. gentleman does not know Mr. Coffey, I must say that he belongs to one of the best known families in Ottawa. He told me, within one week of this time, that he was totally opposed to the separate school system, and that he wanted public schools for his children to be educated in.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does the hon. gentleman refer to Mr. Coffey, the Registrar ?

Mr. WALLACE. I met the gentleman—I do not know whether he is registrar, or what position he occupies, but it makes no difference. He appeared to be a sensible, level-headed and intelligent man, and he does not desire his children to be educated in the separate schools. This was stated to me and to others, when we were discussing the question.

Mr. CAMERON (Inverness). He may be an agnosite.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the hon. gentleman is fair in imputing agnosticism to a gentleman he does not know.

An hon. MEMBER. Do you know him?

Mr. WALLACE. He said he was a member of the Roman Catholic faith, and he was opposed to separate schools. That is the statement I make.

Mr. DEVLIN. I know Mr. Coffey very well, and he is registrar.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman will sit down, I will proceed.

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes, because I think the hon. gentleman is misrepresenting the views of that gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman says I am misrepresenting his views, he is stating distinctly what is not true.

Mr. McNEILL. I was told this day by a well-known gentleman, who is a Roman Catholic, that he was opposed to separate schools.

An hon. MEMBER. Name.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) would let you go on without any trouble.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. I could name many people in my own riding who are opposed to the separate school system, and who are members of the Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Do not forget O'Donoghue.

Mr. WALLACE. I appeal to the members of the Government not to press this question at the present time. It is well known to those who have taken the trouble to investigate, that public opinion is not in favour of pressing this Bill.

An hon. MEMBER. How do you know ?

Mr. WALLACE. I will tell the hon. gentleman how I know. I received a petition a few days ago from fifty prominent members of the Conservative party who have supported me in West York, asking me to abstain from voting on this question. I thought that was a very improper action, but some of them explained to me that they did not want me to vote with Mr. Laurier for the six months' hoist. I could not accede to their request, because parliamentary practice lays down that the six months' hoist is the most effective way to kill a Bill, and I was very anxious to have this Bill killed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Is it something new to hear that announcement from me ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not surprised at the hon. gentleman wanting to kill the Bill, but the hon. gentleman proposing the means of killing it.

Mr. WALLACE. In war any one who supports you in the fight is welcome. When the Secretary of State went to Cape Breton for election, any man who came forward and said he was going to support the hon. gentleman, was, no doubt, taken to his bosom. Therefore, when an hon. gentleman is going to assist you in voting down this Bill, in killing this Bill, I accept his assistance with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER. And boost the leader.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know that I have any leader, particularly just now, on this question. I had a leader in this House and in the Conservative party, but the leader has deserted. I feel like the old Indian. He said he was wandering around, but it was not the Indian that was lost, but the wigwam. I repeat, that the Government should not press this Bill at this stage of the session. At the very moment when they are asking the province of Manitoba to hold a conference, when, in fact, that conference is being held, and the best efforts of both parties are being put forward to effect a settlement, or get the province to settle the question, does any sane man believe that is a good time in which to attempt to force through this Bill ? I am told, but I hope to receive a contradiction from the leader of the House, that the intention is to force members of Parliament to sit here, day and night, until the Bill is passed. An hon. member says certainly, but I do not hear any members of the Government support that monstrous proposition. It is a barbarous proposition that hon. members, who are supposed to be present during the business of the House, should be asked to sit twenty-four hours each day to carry this Bill. Do I understand the leader of the House to say that such is the intention of the Government ?

Mr. DEVLIN. He is treating you as you treated me a moment ago. He won't answer you.

Mr. WALLACE. I asked the members of the Government whether that was their intention, and not one has deigned to give a reply. If the hon. gentleman will not contradict it, I will assume that the statement I have heard is correct, and that it is the intention of the Government to force the House to remain in session day and night until this Bill is passed. I think that is a very unfair proposition.

Mr. BELLEY. Not at all.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the Government will succeed in that direction, because human nature is the same all over, and the people will resent an injustice of that kind. We will not submit to such an injustice, more particularly as the Government in pressing this Bill have not up to date shown any particular wish to press it upon the attention of Parliament.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman says " Oh." I do not know what he means by " oh," but if he means a negative——

Mr. PRIOR. It is only an expression of pain—go on.

Mr. WALLACE. Why, Mr. Chairman, don't we know that this Parliament met on the 2nd day of January, three months ago almost. Don't we know that the Government announced in July last that they intended to hold the session on the 2nd of January for the express purpose of pressing this Bill to a conclusion, if Parliament were willing to pass it. The members of this House had reason to expect the Bill would be placed before them as soon as the House met. But do we not also know that through no fault, at any rate, of the Parliament of Canada, the House adjourned from day to day because of reasons that the Government alone were responsible for. Not until the 16th February did the Minister rise to move the introduction of this Bill, and for many days afterwards it was impossible for us to get a copy of it. It was not until the 3rd day of March, when the House had been in session more than two months, that the Bill came up for second reading. Did the Government show any desire to press on this Bill which they had all along professed to be of such paramount importance. These gentlemen now say : Oh, we must sit night and day so that the House of Commons must accept this Bill, whether in their judgment it is a correct Bill or not. I presume that the members of this House will resent such a course. I can see around me many hon. members who gave their vote for the second reading of the Bill, and given their vote as I conscientiously believe, with many qualms of conscience and with great anxiety, to say nothing more. I could say something more, and something that I know, but for the present I will confine myself to that statement. These men voted that way, not because they did it of their own free will, but because they were strongly pressed by members of the Government and by the leader of this House in particular to vote for that measure. They voted that way, but if they had been left to their own wish and desire, and if they had carried out the wishes of their constituents—which, in my opinion, they were either bound to do or resign their seats—they would have voted another way. It will now appear to the country that these gentlemen are so anxious to carry this Bill that they are to sit day and night to have it carried into law. Well, I wish them much joy of the job they have undertaken. I wish them joy when they go back to their constituents for approval ; and when they say to their constituents : Yes, we not only voted for the second reading of the Bill, but we nearly ruined our health, and we ruined the health of those opposed to the Bill, by sitting up day and night in order to carry that great Bill that you, our constituents, are so strongly in favour of. I apprehend that when they go back to their constituents and tell the story, they will not receive a very warm welcome at any rate.

Mr. INGRAM. It is no fault of yours if they do not.

Mr. WALLACE. I can tell the hon. gentleman quite candidly that it will be no fault of mine if they do not have that matter discussed very fully in their constituencies. I shall make it my pleasure and my duty to visit whatever constituencies that I please, or that the people invite me to. More than that, I shall express my opinion on this Bill as I please, and I certainly shall not be deterred from doing what I intend by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Ingram).

Mr. INGRAM. And he will return the compliment.
