Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is a pleasure for me to endorse this resolution and to see such unanimity upon it. It seems that we are agreed one hundred per cent on the resolution, and I know it will be gratifying to the farmers of western Canada as well as to those of the east to know that the sum of $90,000,000 is to be devoted to the purpose the government has in view. Hon. gentlemen who have already spoken have indicated the difficulties which confront the farmers of the west, but I would point out that there are still a good many farmers who have not been forced to put on a first mortgage. The question therefore is, what about those who have not yet had to go to a mortgage company for assistance? Can they get any benefit through the farm loan board? So far as I have been able to ascertain, it would appear that there is a possibility for such farmers to get some assistance.

One important question, a question on which I feel very strongly, is that of interest. It has been my privilege in the last few months to see many applications favourably received for the writing down of debts owed by farmers. There is no question whatever about it that interest is a millstone around the farmer's neck, at any rate in western Canada. The debt is very often doubled as the result of interest. Take a mortgage of $5,000; in the last four or five years the debt has almost doubled. The average rate is eight per cent and when you compound the interest you can see how onerous the burden becomes.

As regards the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, we are getting results. I have been receiving letters from farmers in my constituency in which they express their appreciation of the writing down of their debts. In other words, there seems to be cooperation between the creditors and the farmers; there may be a few instances in which this is not true, but generally speaking it is. The other day I received a letter from a farmer who lives not very far from me. He is a man of about seventy. He told me that he had taken new heart and courage and he complimented the receiver in my town on the way in which he had made it possible for this farmer to have his debts written down. Previously, he said, he had been disheartened; he had given up hope; but now he feels that it is possible for him to meet his obligations, in part at any rate.

There is however a difficulty in connection with the unsecured merchants throughout the little towns. Most of them would be glad to-day to take fifty per cent of what is outstanding in their accounts. That is the information I have received from most of the merchants in my district, but when they are asked to write down debts, however willing they may be to do this, there is no money forthcoming to enable them to finance their business. They are still obligated to the wholesalers one hundred per cent. They say that if it were possible for them to get fifty cents on the dollar from their debtors they could carry on. With that money they could go to the wholesaler and come to some arrangement with him, but it does not avail them anything to write down debts fifty per cent and receive no money at all.

In my part of the country I do not know how they are going to put in a crop this spring if they have no money, and most of the farmers have not a dollar. During the last three or four years the deterioration in machinery has been something terrible, and the trouble has been aggravated by the dryness, because the land is so dusty that the machinery deteriorates much more quickly than it would ordinarily. But I have not given up hope, Mr. Speaker. There is a future before us. I have lived in that part of the country for thirty years and until a few years ago I never had a complete failure, though I have experienced two now.

About the first of November I had occasion to visit the dried out area in my constituency, a district about seventy-five miles from where I live, where they have had four complete failures. In this district there are mostly Finlanders, and I attended a meeting of the ratepayers' organization, comprising some two hundred of these people. When they got to the meeting these farmers were apparently so discouraged that they almost felt like hanging the reeve of the municipality, whom they blamed for the plight in which they found themselves.

An hon. MEMBER: A member of parliament?

Mr. LOUCKS: No, he was not a member of parliament. I was told that if I got on the platform something might happen to me, but I did. I told the chairman of this organization that I was not afraid to face my audience and so I got on the platform and spoke to these men—there were women also—for three-quarters of an hour, and then I suggested to the chairman that he should throw the meeting open for a sort of fellowship meeting. He did so, and I should like to give you the testimony of some of these people, not all Finlanders. One man said, "I went through the great war, fighting from the beginning to the end. To-day I have a family of seven. This morning I took five of these children to school without any shoes on their feet, though it is the first of November. But I am determined to keep my children at school as long as I can." There was condemnation, not of this government but of the provincial authorities, on the ground that all they were allowing these people was $5 for adults for clothing. This man said it would not buy a pair of boots, and yet he had seen billions of dollars blown away in the great war. He said he had put in his crop the last year in the hope that there would be a harvest, and there he was, unable to get enough money to buy boots for his children. But what encouraged me, Mr. Speaker, at this meeting of two hundred ratepayers, was the optimistic spirit of the farmers after all that they had come through. They said that if it were possible for them to obtain a little bit of money to carry them along they were quite willing to continue.

When we reflect that a few years ago that country produced great crops, we cannot think that there is no future ahead of us. Indeed, the possibilities in Saskatchewan may be beyond the comprehension of some eastern people. We have excellent soil there; some of the best of it lies in that dry area. Would it be advisable therefore for these people to move to the western states, when we know that the same condition prevails right down to the gulf of Mexico?

I am glad that the Minister of Finance is taking steps to help the farmers out of their difficulties, making it possible for them to pay back the money in the future. But as I said before, I feel very strongly on the question of interest, which in my opinion should not be more than four per cent. When we take into consideration the overhead and administration of some of these mortgage companies, I think we are justified in the contention that interest should not be higher than that rate. In our section of the country many of the farmers are to-day assigning a third crop to the mortgage companies. Let me point out what happens in connection with those mortgages. An agent comes out and drives all over the farm to see how the crops are coming along and all this overhead is charged to the farmers in my section. There is no necessity for this because a crop survey is made every year. It is clear that a great deal of this overhead can be eliminated.

Further, the dominion government, if we are going to get lower rates, must set the example. There is no use in going to the mortgage or insurance companies to endeavour to get them to charge a lower rate. If the government cannot get cheap money for us it is hopeless to expect to get it from the mortgage and insurance companies. Just a few days before I came to Ottawa I visited the court of review in Saskatoon and I met the manager of the Toronto General Trusts Corporation. He knows me well. He said to me: "Look here, Bill, the government has not gone far enough yet. Do not forget this: we who represent the trust company are obligated for a great amount of money over in Great Britain; we are obligated also to insurance companies at a certain rate around five or five and a half per cent. The government of Canada should go to the fountain head, to those who loaned us the money, and see if something cannot be done by them to bring the rates down; then it will be possible for us and the other companies to meet the request of you farmers." In other words, he said: We are still obligated for five or five and a half per cent interest to big financial firms in Great Britain and even to insurance companies, some of them in this country, who have loaned us a great deal of money, so you see the necessity of the government going to the fountain head to find out if something cannot be done. While I have great sympathy for widows and orphans, I do not believe at the present time there is much money invested by the widows and the small investors; I think most of this money that is being administered through the mortgage companies is coming from big financial concerns. When I think of the farmers who went from eastern to western Canada, many of them from Ontario—and I am one of them—who took the risk and went out to the west as they did, investing there what they had, and who made good and made that country one worth while to live in, every consideration should be given by this government to those people so as to retain them on the land, looking forward to the time when conditions will improve.

The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) suggests that I should give the house some information as to what we have accomplished in that western country. The amount of wealth we have produced is too great to be realized, but billions and billions of dollars' worth of wheat have been taken out of western Canada. When I think of my own little town of Delisle shipping over a million bushels of wheat in 1915, Rosetown shipping over a million bushels, and similarly with different towns all along the line—that was when wheat was at a much higher price than it is to-day—I think I am safe in saying that money has come from western Canada to the east in billions. One unfortunate circumstance affecting the people out there is that when the price of wheat went down so low the price of the things they consume did not fall commensurately, and that was pretty hard on the farmers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LOUCKS: I agree with that. I may say to my hon. friends opposite that I do not attribute it to the tariff; all we have to do is to take note of some of the investigations made by the price spreads committee. We know what is happening to-day. The government has been blamed for some of the things that have happened, but our answer to that is, no; the distributors or the middlemen have been getting too large profits. It has been a money making business for the middleman, but it has not been so for the producer or the consumer. When legislation is introduced based on the report that will be received from the price spreads committee I believe things will be made more equal, instead of twenty per cent of the people being on the pinnacle and eighty per cent down in the valley. Much credit should be given to the government for the bold stand they took in setting up that committee.

It is a pleasure to know that at the present time through good management our government is so financially situated that it is now possible for the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to inform the house that it can finance the farm loan board to the extent of $90,000,000 or $100,000,000, and with a continuance of the good management that we have had in the past, wonderful results should be achieved. I am glad to support the resolution.

Mr. C. A. CAMPBELL (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank hon. gentlemen for allowing me to say a few words in regard to this resolution. I rise with a good deal of trepidation, this being my maiden speech in this chamber. I have listened with much interest to this debate, expecting that it would take on the aspect of a discussion of a resolution regarding a federal farm loan act, but I note that a good deal of it has been concerned with what has happened in Ontario in regard to the agricultural development board.

Just in passing, before I speak directly to the resolution, it is only fair that I should say something respecting the working of that board during the last five or six months or a little longer. It is very true, as the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Porteous) have said, that during last summer and up to the present time many people in Ontario have been looking for loans. It is also true that a good many applications were received by the board prior to the election held on June 19 last, and that many of those applications were approved just prior to that election, and that some of them have not been approved by the board to the extent that a loan has been made. I want to make it clear to all hon. members that prior to the month of May the interest rate on farm loan mortgages in Ontario stood at six per cent. During the provincial election campaign, in which I had the privilege of taking an active interest, it was announced that that rate would be lowered to five and a half per cent and, as has been stated by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), it was cut to five per cent during the heat of the election. The people throughout the province did not really know just what was happening. When the new provincial government took office they made an investigation to find out just how the agricultural development board stood, and they discovered that some $55,000,000 of the people's money had been loaned throughout Ontario. One unfortunate experience was that many loans had been made, not for the purpose of allowing a farmer to permit his son to purchase a farm and some new stock and start up in business, or for the farmer to improve his farm by building a new barn or house, but rather at the instance of influential people, supporters of the late government, and the fact is that they wanted to turn to the agricultural development board many mortgages which were due and on which the interest was very much past due. That is a serious statement to make, but it is a fact that has been ascertained. Other instances were found in which the board had neglected their business to such an extent that the new board found themselves the owners of many farms on which taxes had not been paid for two or three years. In the township south of the one in which I happen to live, the agricultural development board now has on its hands four farms, on two of which there was no tenant and the taxes had not been paid for over two years; and in one instance the farm was advertised for taxes last fall and redeemed by the board. When the new board made a survey they found that if this $55,000,000 odd of loans were liquidated the province of Ontario would suffer a great loss. Therefore they reorganized the board, made further investigation, and it was decided to carry on. They are trying to sell many of these farms, and the province of Ontario will, no doubt, not suffer as great a loss as at first seemed possible.

The statement was made this afternoon that no loans have been made by that board. I happen to know that during the months of November and December some seventy-two loans were made, amounting to something like $140,000, or an average of about $2,000 each. These loans were made to people who wanted to purchase stock or improve their buildings, or who had sons that they wanted to start on farms for themselves—the purpose for which the board was originally started. It was announced by the present federal government just after the election that the farm loan board and the Farmers Creditors' Arrangement Act would be in operation in the near future, and it was intimated that the interest rate charged would be somewhat lower than was current in Ontario. Consequently I have no doubt received as many applications as the hon. member for North Grey or the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. Many of these people have withdrawn their applications from the provincial authorities, or the agricultural development board of Ontario, waiting to see what is going to happen in the working out of this farm loan act. It was also announced by the Ontario agricultural development board some time ago that the interest rate there would be only four per cent. That was to come about because they said they would be willing to pay the difference between what the federal farm loan board would charge for the money loaned under this act and the four per cent. I note however that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) said to-day that that arrangement would not be allowed to be carried out. Therefore the farmers of Ontario are to be deprived of the chance of receiving money at four per cent, unless the government will consider lowering the interest rate to that figure.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will permit me, I regret to have to interrupt; it is quite contrary to my custom, but he is under an entire misapprehension in saying that the minister said that any action of this government will prevent the people of the province of Ontario from receiving money at four per cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I did not mean just what I think the minister understood me to mean. I merely state that the province of Ontario announced through the Minister of Agriculture that money would be made available on farm mortgages at four per cent. The plan would be that the money would be borrowed from the federal farm loan board, and if the interest rate were higher than four per cent the provincial government would for the benefit of the farmers pay the difference between the four per cent collected from the farmers and the rate paid to the farm loan board. I mention that, as I understand from what has been said to-day that the farm loan board is going to operate as a federal body and that the provincial boards will have nothing to do with it. By that action the people of Ontario will be prevented from receiving that benefit.

Mr. RHODES: If that happens it will be the fault of the provincial government, not of this government.

Mr. CAMPBELL: No; I want to go a little further. The Minister of Finance and his government still have a chance to give to the people of Ontario that benefit by a reduction of interest rates to four per cent. This is a vital point that I want to make clear. Notwithstanding the claims made by the hon. members from western Canada I represent probably the most agricultural riding in the dominion; there is only one incorporated village in my riding, and that has only seven hundred people. The people in my riding are farmers, with a few miners and lumbermen. They represent probably the most substantial class of citizens that this province is privileged to have. They are all descendants of United Empire Loyalists; they have resided there for many years; the farms are mostly owned by their occupants and have been in the family for generations. The only sales made are probably from one family to another as a farmer wants to get a farm for his son. Unfortunately during the last two or three years, on account of falling revenues, the father is not helping the son out, and consequently we have in the counties of Frontenac and Lennox and Addington a large number of farms for sale, and a large number of farm boys for whom farms cannot be bought on account of the interest rates that would have to be paid on a mortgage; consequently they are just staying home and living off the parents. If the Minister of Finance would study the amount of production from the agricultural industry for the last five years he would find that it is impossible for anyone connected with that industry to pay more than three per cent. I have no doubt that even though interest rates should be down to four per cent many mortgages will be in arrears for interest, on account of local conditions, sickness or otherwise. But the government must take cognizance of the fact that the farming and agricultural industry needs just as much help as do the labouring people who by reason of the present tariff and other policies of this government find themselves out of employment.

This morning I received two letters from constituents saying that the mortgages on their farms are held by estates—two different estates, I may add; there is no connection between the two, because the farms are in different townships. It is necessary that both estates be wound up in the near future. In both cases the lawyers find there is no money available to have someone else take over the mortgage, at any interest rate. Probably there are many cases of this kind throughout the whole dominion. Either the farmer must lose the farm through foreclosure or the estate must take less money for a quick settlement. If the government could see its way clear to allowing money to be loaned at a reasonable rate of interest, it would be a very great advantage to the farmers and also to people holding mortgages in cases such as I have just mentioned. I am not going to say what the rate should be; I do not wish to take up too much time, but the fact is that unless you lower the interest rate to around four per cent either this government or the government to follow will have a very sad experience in connection with the collection of interest and principal.

I want to point out something further. All during my recent election campaign the question of lower interest rates, not only on farm mortgages but on government loans and so on, was debated at great length. I was criticized by some hon. gentlemen opposite for the statements I made, but I want to point out that the people of Frontenac-Addington, composed mainly of agriculturists and who realize the severe burden they are bearing at the present time, by electing me have asked this government to reduce interest rates to the greatest extent possible.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a very few remarks to what has been said already in connection with this measure. I do not think the government can be too highly praised for the amendments proposed. There are several reasons why I make that statement, some of which have been stated already.

The first change suggested is the elimination of the provincial boards, and I am very glad to be able to say that I find myself in perfect accord with some hon. members opposite, especially the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), in their expressions of opinion as to this move. By the way, I should like to remark that for the last week or ten days we have been witnessing quite a strange scene. Since the house opened we have been told by some hon. members opposite that the radio speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) were delivered only for the purpose of getting votes; one hon. member went so far as to call them bluff. But when these reform measures are brought down, what do we see? Even hon. members opposite are very anxious to rise and place themselves on record as approving them.

Before I digressed, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that I find myself in accord with the hon. member for Gloucester with regard to the provincial boards. I do not wish to say anything in a political way in regard to those boards, because I do not believe in giving the last blow to a dying man, and if my judgment is correct these boards are on the eve of passing away. But at least this will clear up the situation. Certainly I have had more correspondence in regard to farm loans than in regard to anything else during the past four years. Sometimes I have had to write three or four letters to the same man, all because responsibility could not be placed. I do not wish to say anything harsh with regard to the inspectors or even the members of the provincial boards, but the personnel of the boards was submitted by the different provincial governments, and it goes without saying that most of those appointed—and in the case of our province I think I can say all those appointed—were of the same political faith as the provincial government. So it was only to be expected that even if there was no partiality the people whose applications were refused would think this had been done in many cases because of their political faith. I do not suggest that all who apply for loans in future will get them, but at least they will know who refuses the loan. They will not be told by one person that their loan was refused by the provincial board and by another that the loan was refused by the federal government. That is one desirable feature of the suggested amendments.

Another improvement I wish to commend is the fact that in future borrowers will not have to contribute five per cent of the loan. This was another bad feature of the act, and the borrowers could not understand why they should be borrowers and lenders at the same time. Many times a farmer who needed $1,000 found that, in addition to what it might cost him for a clear title, he received only $950 instead of $1,000, because he had to subscribe five per cent of the loan.

Mr. VENIOT: The resolution does not say that is to be changed.

Mr. GOBEIL: I understood the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to make that statement.

I also wish to join with the hon. member for Gloucester as to the matter of titles. Probably the government cannot help themselves—

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, they can; let the government fix a fee.

Mr. GOBEIL: That might be done. I should like to point out that in the province of Quebec the situation is worse than it is in other provinces. I could mention two cases in my own parish. One man borrowed $1,500, and the cost of securing a clear title was $149. So, with the five per cent that he had to subscribe to the board, instead of receiving $1,500 he received not quite $1,300. I know of many other cases where the cost was well over $100.

I had a note before me in connection with appraisers, a point mentioned by the hon. member for Gloucester. I do not believe it is necessary to go into the matter in detail, but I may say that I agree with him. If I were to suggest anything to the government it would be that they should choose appraisers carefully. I make the suggestion without any thought of criticism. Although in the province of Quebec we have had some very worthy appraisers, on the other hand some had no experience in farm values and a few were nothing more or less than political appointees. It may be that most new appraisers named by this government would be Conservatives—I hope most of them would be—but I would find no fault if some were Liberals. First of all, I would say, "Get a good man, a man with experience who knows the values of farm properties and who could do justice not only to the government but to the borrower."

I believe I have nothing further to say on the resolution, although I may make some additional observations when the bill is before the house. For the time being I shall conclude by saying that I heartily endorse the principle embodied in the resolution.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, so much has been said in regard to the resolution that I have only one or two observations to make. I feel that there are two points which should be emphasized even to a greater extent. The first is that the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act were what might be termed companion bills. I think one hon. member said they were twins. I believe the two acts should be taken together when we are dealing with the farm debt and farm credit situation. I have discussed the matter with men who have been actively connected with the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and it is only because of representations made to me by them that I now speak.

The greatest difficulty farmers find to-day in making arrangements with their creditors under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is that there are no credit facilities available to them. Many of these men who wish to make arrangements with their creditors could do so on favourable terms, if they could get the cash to turn over in settlement of whatever percentage of their liabilities is agreed upon. A great many men could obtain a fifty per cent reduction of their liabilities if they could get a loan for that amount. Of course that is if the whole proceeds could be turned over to their creditors. It seems to me that if in many cases the farm loan board were given instructions by the government, instructions which I think the government should take the responsibility of giving, loans could be made. In other words, I wish to agree with what was said so well by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart). In my view the time has come when in the national interest as well as in the interest of agriculture the government should show their willingness to assume some of the risk entailed in granting loans. I believe they should say frankly to the men administering the farm loan act, "We anticipate you will have some losses, and we do not think it necessary that all the losses you incur in making loans in these times must be charged up to the operation of the act and included in the interest you are going to endeavour to collect from the people to whom you make loans." It would be far better for the board and for the government to have loans under the farm loan act in respect of which they would have a reasonable expectation of collecting the interest named on the face of the mortgage, because once a large number of borrowers get in arrears and find they cannot pay there seems to be a temptation for those who perhaps, by struggling hard enough, could pay, to allow their interest payments to stand.

I would have a great deal of sympathy with any person administering the farm loan board to-day. I do not mean to say that I excuse all the decisions the board has made in the past, but unless they have some specal instructions from the government, or provisions in the act to warrant their running risks, they will not take them. They know perfectly well that the present level of farm prices is such that in many cases the loans being applied for are too large. That is, the earning capacity of the farmer, due to present price levels, is not sufficient to pay the interest. Those in charge of farm loans do not like to have loans placed on their books which they have no good reason to believe will be kept in good standing. There is no guarantee given to the farm loan board that price levels will be raised. We know that at the present time there is a slight raise in price levels. I have before me the last monthly statement of the Bank of Nova Scotia in which are set out farm revenues in the Dominion of Canada for the past three years. I have worked out the figures on a per farm basis, and without going into detail may I say that the average farm income in 1928 was approximately $1,600. In 1932 it had fallen to $630, in 1933 to $600, and in 1934 had raised slightly to $745. There has been a slight increase, but not sufficient to enable the farmer to pay any interest, if he is giving his family a decent standard of living. Any hon. member could easily demonstrate that it was easier for a farmer to pay eight per cent in 1926 than to pay anything to-day. As a matter of fact interest can come only out of farmers' surpluses. It can come out of the revenue available after his living and his necessary expenditures have been deducted, and we know that for the last three or four years there has been no such surplus. If the farmer has paid any interest at all he has paid it because of a reduced standard of living or from capital savings. He may have used his insurance savings. The difference between $1,600 in 1928 and $600 in 1933 has taken away the farmers' ability to pay taxes, to pay interest, to buy new machinery, to pay insurance premiums and to provide for the health and education of his family.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had been emphasizing that in my opinion it is necessary that greater facilities be provided under the Farm Loan Act if the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is to effect anything like the purpose for which it was intended. I simply want to say in that connection that I think the rate of interest should not be more than four per cent, and if these greater facilities are to be provided at a rate which agriculture can pay, it is quite clear that the government must be prepared to assume some liability, at least enough to take care of that part of the rate of interest which has always been added in order to cover the risk of loss. I am not going to labour the point any further because I think it has been emphasized several times this afternoon, so that the minister must surely be convinced by now that this is really necessary.

I have had several cases brought to my attention of men who have been endeavouring to get loans, and who have not found it necessary to make any arrangement with their creditors under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I shall mention only one which I think is typical of a good many others. This farmer has a small farm of 160 acres, sixty acres of which is broken. He has I think fifty head of cattle. He is trying to get a small loan to enable him to put up some better buildings, particularly a dairy barn, but so far he has been unable to interest the board even to the point of encouraging him to send in the $10 to cover the inspection fee. It may be that the board in their wisdom feel that they cannot make that loan, but it does seem to me that we must have some better credit facilities for agriculture that will enable a man in that position to get a small loan in order to put him in a position where he can produce under more favourable conditions. I have seen enough correspondence to convince me that a more liberal loan policy must be adopted on the part of the officials in charge of the board if the Farm Loan Act is to meet in any way the present needs of agriculture in the matter of credit facilities.

Without taking up any further time of the house I would again urge on the minister that the government, in whatever legislation they bring down, provide in it or decide as a matter of government policy that the government itself will assume some of the risk in connection with the losses that will be made from now on.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer a few suggestions to the minister and the house based on the conditions that I have found prevailling in the riding that I have the honour to represent. During the last three or four years I have had occasion to come in contact with farmers' indebtedness to a very large degree, and the conditions I have found are these—and incidentally may I say that I do not think anybody can discuss this resolution without linking it up with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

In my riding the average farm consists of 240 to 320 acres. We will take, for the sake of argument, a farm of 320 acres. Say that a man owes $8,000 on a half section of land. If he is able to take advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and get his indebtedness reduced, say, fifty per cent, that still leaves him with an indebtedness of $4,000. Now if this resolution and the bill to be founded upon it will take care of such a case and allow a man who has had his indebtedness reduced say forty or fifty per cent to consolidate his remaining indebtedness in one loan spread over a period of years, twenty or twenty-two years I think the act says, and only very small annual payments are provided for, he might be able to get out from under. But unless the Farm Loan Act and the regulations that will govern its administration are able to take care of that situation I doubt very much if we are going to make much headway in the readjustment of farmers' indebtedness. In the last few years I have found that many creditors were willing to make readjustments, but they all asked the farmer: What consideration will the loan company get if I reduce your indebtedness? The farmer finds himself in a position where he is unable to say to the loan company or to any of his creditors: I will give you your cash if you will reduce my indebtedness.

I do not think there is any great demand in the country for new loans. Of course there might be in certain districts where people want to get a start, but in my opinion the great demand is to relieve the farmer of the indebtedness which he incurred during the period of high commodity prices, and unless this act takes care of that situation so that the farmer after he has had his debt readjusted will be able to consolidate his remaining indebtedness in one loan, I doubt very much whether this legislation is going to be a success.

May I make these few observations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes)—and I do not do it at all in any way of criticism of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which was passed last summer. Probably it took a little time to get the act under way. As far as I can find out, in the province of Manitoba the board of review has not as yet given any decisions to speak of; if so, it must have been very recently. I find this fear existing, that the farmer was not sure whether the board of review had the right to force a secured creditor to readjust the farmer's indebtedness. In fact I took this matter up with several legal minds in the city of Winnipeg, and I have not yet been able to get a clear and definite understanding whether the board of review has or has not the right to say to the secured creditor who has, say, a first mortgage on the farm: You will have to take so much, and the readjustment will be based on the value that you voluntarily put on the productivity of the farm, or that the board of review puts on it.

When the provincial boards are abolished I assume a provincial representative will have to be appointed for each province. I trust that these representatives and the board here in Ottawa will make every effort to relieve the farmer who is indebted to such an extent that he will never get out from under unless he is able to readjust his debt under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and I would urge that the board be not too critical of the loans after the man's whole indebtedness has been reviewed by the receivers and the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. If this legislation, with the increased credit facilities that are to be placed at the disposal of the board, is administered as it should be, and if due consideration is given to the ability of the farmer under present conditions to pay and to the capacity of his land to produce enough to pay at present prices, some good might be accomplished. But even when you have reduced your debt by say fifty per cent, calculate on the basis, not of $8,500 but of $4,000, at 5½ per cent, and you have $220; and then you have to figure on your municipal and school taxes, at least fifty cents an acre. You must also take into consideration repairs and upkeep of buildings, which would not be less than $100 a year. Then there are other incidental expenses which would add to your overhead, to say nothing of the cost of seeding and of harvesting your crops, and many other costs which enter into farming. So that when you take all these things into consideration the farmer will still find it very difficult to make both ends meet. It is therefore only by amortizing his indebtedness, consolidating it under one head and making small annual payments, the rate of interest being reasonably low, that he can clear his home from indebtedness.

I offer these suggestions in the hope that they will be considered. Very often we feel that the officials are not administering the act as we should like them to, but the difficulties are numerous and they do the best they can. At the same time I think the government should instruct the boards which will administer the act to carry out its provisions having in mind present commodity prices and the conditions that exist in Canada at the present time.

Mr. J. S. STEWART (Lethbridge): Because the amendments which are proposed are of great interest to the farmers of southern Alberta I beg the privilege of taking up a few minutes of the time of the house. Before proceeding to give the house some suggestions based on actual examples that have recently come to my knowledge, I think I should make a short statement in all fairness to the Alberta provincial board—that is, the board that looks after farm loans in that province. As we were told this afternoon, some $15,000,000 has been provided for loans to farmers throughout the dominion, and in Alberta a very small proportion of the money has been lent to the farmers, one of the chief reasons being the provincial legislation which was enacted about the year 1926 and which we call the Debt Adjustment Act of Alberta. Should a farmer get into financial difficulties he seeks the shelter of this act and creditors find it almost impossible to obtain any of the money which they may have advanced to the farmer. Consequently the operations of the provincial farm loan board have been greatly restricted.

I will venture to present to the minister for his consideration four examples that have come to my notice from farmers living in my riding. The first relates to loans on irrigated lands. Most of these lands are held of course under agreements of sale, but we have a goodly number of farmers living on Canadian Pacific Railway lands, holding title to their farm lands, some to the extent of 320 acres. They own this land outright and the only tax which they have to pay outside of school taxes is the annual irrigation tax amounting to $1 an acre. Living within four miles of Lethbridge there is a farmer who owns 160 acres of irrigable land to which he holds free title. On this land he has a magnificent brick house and a barn which would do credit to any farm in Ontario; and yet, although he has to pay only $160 a year water rental, he is not in a position to have his application for a loan considered by the Alberta board. There are quite a number of farmers in southern Alberta similarly situated and it seems to me that the government should take this example into consideration and alleviate that condition. That man surely is entitled to get his loan at five per cent just the same as any other farmer living in southern Alberta.

The second example is one with which I am very familiar. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) this afternoon mentioned a similar example in his own constituency. In the southern part of the riding I represent there is a farmer who owns 2,000 acres of land. He has a home that cost him at least $6,000, in which there is every electrical convenience to be found in Ottawa. His barns are lighted by electricity, he has at least 30 horses, $15,000 worth of machinery, and he owns the 2,000 acres outright, without one cent of mortgage or debt against the property. Moreover, he has made the money with which to purchase this land in the very district in which he now lives, and yet he cannot get one cent by way of loan from the Canadian farm loan board. Why? Because he lives in what is known as the drought area. I have known him for twenty-seven years and he has never had a crop failure and has enjoyed a good standard of living. Notwithstanding what has been said by some hon. members in this house, some of the farmers in southern Alberta, in fact a goodly number of them, enjoy a good standard of living even in these hard times. In order to meet the present unfavourable situation the farmer goes to the bank, and with all these assets, and not owing a dollar, he borrows in the neighbourhood of $2,000 and is charged seven per cent. They discount the note, and when he renews it three months afterwards it is again discounted. That situation should be taken care of. No man could have that estate in southern Alberta, accumulated in twenty-seven years, even though in a semi-dry district, without having had at least good average crops. And he comes from one of the best Scottish settlements in the dominion—I leave hon. members to draw their own conclusion as to where that may be. The one thing he does not want to do is to put a mortgage on his home, because he has never had one yet. But owing to circumstances over which he has no control he desires a loan, and yet with assets amounting to $40,000 or $50,000 he cannot get a dollar.

A little distance away from that gentleman there is another farmer residing in southern Alberta who has complained to me about the operation of the act. This gentleman bought two half sections for which he paid $30 an acre, or $9,600 each. One he bought in 1917 and one in 1918. On the one which he bought in 1917 he has paid $8,580 odd and he still owes over $9,000; on the other half section he has paid $9,800 and still owes over $8,000. In seventeen years in the one case he has made an average payment in interest or principal of over $500 per annum. It ought to be a pretty good country in which to live when a man can maintain his home and family and still be able to pay off that amount of interest or principal each year. In the other case he has paid off an average of $600 per annum. During all this time he has kept up the payment of taxes on those two half sections; each year he has given at least from one-third to one-half of the crop to the parties from whom he purchased the land and he has bought $12,000 worth of machinery. I would like to inform the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) that there are some good sections in southern Alberta, chiefly in the Lethbridge riding. This farmer goes before the official receiver and possibly may eventually get to the board of review in regard to compromising his debts. He is a good Canadian citizen. In the seventeen and eighteen years he has paid nearly $18,000 in interest and principal on those two half sections and he still owes that much more. He can never under any such conditions as prevail at the present time pay off that loan; he must get some help, and when he comes to the board of review or the official receiver he finds that he cannot get any loan from that organization.

As many hon. members have already stated, these two bills are companion measures. There must in my opinion be provision made by amendments either to this act or to the act concerning compromises with creditors, whereby a man similarly situated to this farmer will be able to get assistance to enable him to pay off his debts if he receives a reasonable adjustment. Where should he apply for this assistance if he does not go to the farm loan board?

The fourth case is similar to some that were mentioned this afternoon. There is in another part of my riding a widow who had almost enough boys to make up a full baseball team.

For thirty years they lived in southern Alberta. As the boys grew up they wished to get farms of their own and wanted to buy land in the immediate neighbourhood. The older boys succeeded in buying their farms and securing each a half section, but the two younger ones now find themselves in the position where although they have the machinery, the power and all the implements required to carry on scientific farming, they lack the capital to enable them to make a purchase of or a payment on some land which they now have under option and on which they would make their homes. It seems to me that bona fide Canadians who have been reared in our country, especially those who have been reared in Alberta and who know the conditions there, should be given an opportunity to purchase farms and get the money at a reasonable figure in order that they may be able to become the good substantial citizens they hope to be. These four cases are fair examples of those which have come under my observation and which I hope will all be covered by the legislation which is now before the house.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I desire to make a few remarks on the resolution now before the house in connection with amendments to the Farm Loan Act. At the outset let me say that I agree heartily with the observations of other members who have spoken about the high interest rates; I also have come across them in my travels through the lower Fraser valley, and they are working a very severe hardship, shall I say, on the farmers of that district. I listened attentively this afternoon while some angles of the subject were under discussion. Still there were some aspects which were not touched upon at all, and these I would like briefly to mention.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), if I interpret him aright, in speaking about the cost of borrowing said that it might take one per cent to be a safe coverage, but that it was estimated that two per cent plus the cost of borrowing would be necessary to carry out safely the operations of the act. I believe I interpret him correctly in that regard, but I wonder whether he has taken into account the question of equity. While it is true that it may take one per cent to be a safe coverage so far as the financial end of the matter is concerned, I just wonder whether the minister has thought about the equity that the farm loan board has in these farms. In connection with that I might point out that the situation in the lower Fraser valley to-day is that the equity of the farmers is completely gone, but the equity of the government through the farm loan board still remains. Let me cite one case; many could be cited, but the one I am going to give illustrates the point I am endeavouring to make. This farmer has $12,000 cash equity in his farm, which was valued at one time at something like $18,000. To-day the equity of the board in the land which the man has is $4,110. If the farm were sold on the market at this time at a price similar to that at which neighbouring farms are selling, it would not bring more than perhaps $5,000; but it would bring $5,000, because, as I pointed out, some $18,000 have been expended and the present proprietor or owner has put into that farm some $12,000 in cash. I wonder whether the minister has considered the situation that the farm loan board of the government is adequately safeguarded in regard to land while the equity of those under the act is at the present moment at least entirely gone. That some notice has been taken by the board of falling revenues is evident, I might point out, from the fact that when farm values started to go down the farm loan board demanded more security, and if in their estimation the security was not considered sufficient they put a chattel mortgage on the stock. I would like to say in regard to this action that while it is very true that a mortgage on the land is bad enough to carry, it is certainly crucifying the farmer when he is not allowed to sell stock owing to the fact that the government through the farm loan board have a mortgage on it. That phase of the matter should be looked into and chattel mortgages removed so that the farmer, if he sees fit, will be able to sell any stock off his farm. Land values have gone down, as I pointed out, from a value of $250 an acre in 1928 to around $75 an acre. As I have already pointed out, the total security of the board is still in existence.

Something was said this afternoon regarding the five per cent share capital which the farmer is charged out of his loan. I noticed when the minister was reading the resolution that he spoke of that being done away with in the future and the share capital put up by the various provinces being returned to them. This is not the proper time to ask questions, perhaps, but I should like to know what is going to be done about the share capital that the farmers have in the various loans. I should like to read the notice sent out regarding share capital, because it is striking in view of a comparison with share capital in any business organization. This farmer had a loan of over $4,000. The notice says:

You are also shown as the holder of 215 paid-up shares of the capital stock of a par value of $1 per share.

Most people if they own shares in a company look for some return by way of profit, but the very reverse is the case with farmers who have obtained a loan under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. Not only was five per cent deducted from the loan and shares issued to them, but in turn they were called upon to pay interest on the shares. In discussing the matter with farmers in my district I find that they feel very badly about having to pay interest on shares which they never owned. Before I left to come to Ottawa some twenty-five farmers gathered in the municipal hall at Cloverdale, and asked me to attend the meeting. I found that each and every one of them felt that it is the interest that is crushing them out of existence. I am not going into the question of low prices for farm produce at this time and the inability of farmers to pay; I think that is only too well known. But when we find farmers who in past years have paid their interest and their principal and have kept up their taxes, municipal and dyking and otherwise and who find that they now owe $500 and over for interest on a loan of $4,000, it is little wonder that they feel very much discouraged. As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) pointed out, some farmers who have been paying in the past and have struggled to keep up their payments feel that if others are not going to pay neither should they. It is only with great difficulty that they have met payments, denying themselves many things in order to do so, while others are not paying at all, and because they cannot.

In connection with the five per cent share capital I was wondering if this would be coming back to the farmer. I make this suggestion to the minister: that note be taken of the share capital which was in the first instance deducted from the loans now outstanding and that this amount be deducted from the total interest owed. That would be a great help to the farmers at the present time. Then there is the question of solicitors' fees that I think should be looked into. I know that in registering mortgages in the land registry office there are some costs, but in my opinion there is no reason why a farmer should have to pay $15 to a lawyer for making out the papers in connection with a mortgage to the farm loan board.

Speaking now in regard to the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Debt Adjustment Act, I might point out that so far as British Columbia is concerned these two acts are not in accord. No doubt most hon. members will remember that when the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was before the house the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) changed the definition of the word "farmer." In the Canadian Farm Loan Act the definition of "farmer" is somewhat different from that found in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. When it was under discussion last year those of us who come from British Columbia pointed out that to enable farmers on small holdings, five and ten acre men, to come under the act the word "farmer" would have to be defined differently, so it was changed to read:

"Farmer" means a person whose principal occupation consists in farming or the tillage of the soil.

It was thought that would cover the five and ten acre men in British Columbia. But in the Canadian Farm Loan Act it is not so clearly defined. It reads:

"Farming" includes stock raising, dairying and the tillage of the soil.

So we find that when those in the greenhouse business or the poultry business in British Columbia apply for a loan they are told that those in the greenhouse business or perhaps growing vegetables on five-acre holdings do not come within the act as at present constituted. I invite the minister's attention to that in order that the Canadian Farm Loan Act may be changed to conform to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in that respect.

Regarding valuation, the creditors act passed last year has not worked out as many of us thought it would. I am going to cite two cases from the lower Fraser valley to show that under present arrangements it is almost impossible for a farmer to obtain an adjustment under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. To quote only one or two cases, one man had a mortgage of $9,000, which he had obtained in fairly good times. Finding himself in great difficulty last year he looked around for relief. He appealed to the mortgage company and the company said: "If you can procure $4,500 we will accept that in lieu of the $9,000"; that is, they agreed to cut the mortgage in two. So he went to the official in charge of the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, who suggested that he apply to the farm loan board for a loan. But according to the valuation provisions in the Canadian Farm Loan Act the greatest amount that the board would loan that man was $4,000, because the valuation in British Columbia must not exceed $100 per acre, and the loan must not be over fifty per cent of the valuation, plus twenty per cent on the buildings. Therefore that man was denied the opportunity to save the $4,500.

The other case was that of a man who had a mortgage of $6,000, and the mortgage company agreed to take $3,000. But he found himself in difficulty in an endeavour to procure $3,000 from the farm loan board, although if he could have raised that money he would have saved $3,000, and had his loan cut in two. I suggest that that condition be taken into consideration and the two acts brought into conformity. I have no particular fault to find with the board or the officers of the board; they are servants of the crown carrying out their duties and doing their work in a businesslike way, and of course they must conform to the provisions of the act. Any changes should be made by parliament, and now is the time to make them.

Now I should like to make a suggestion to the minister with regard to appraisals. Ten dollars may seem a small amount to have to put up, but to a man who is going around looking for a loan it is a considerable amount. It is evident that if he is looking for a loan he has very little money, and ten dollars represents quite a sum. So I am going to make this suggestion to the minister: why not have the appraisals made by officials of the soldier settlement board, who are doing all the appraising in the Fraser valley? That is no new departure. We have the Canadian pensioners and those under the British ministry being examined by the same doctors. The old country soldiers in Canada go before the same Canadian doctors that examine Canadian soldiers, and the same principle could be worked out in regard to appraisals. If these could be done by the soldier settlement board appraisers it would save at least $10 to each applicant.

I am going to reserve what further remarks I have to make until the bill is before us, but I should like to repeat that the most serious heavy interest charges. There is no doubt problem confronting the farmer to-day is the that something will have to be done; when a man owes $600 in interest on a $4,000 loan certainly he needs some help. That becomes more difficult to pay as time goes on, because it is like a snowball rolling down hill; it gets larger all the time. If something is not done many of these men will simply leave the land and lose all they ever possessed.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. W. H. MILLS (West Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let this opportunity pass without adding a few words to what has been said already in regard to this resolution. I believe if the governments of Canada—and when I say "governments" I mean provincial and dominion governments—are to bring prosperity back to this country they must start at the foundation, and that foundation is the farmer, the tiller of the soil. Assistance must be given the farmer.

Reference has been made by some hon. gentlemen opposite who represent constituencies in the province of Ontario to the plight of the farmers in this province, and I should like to say a word with regard to the development board that has been in operation in Ontario; for I do not believe any hon. member within sound of my voice knows more than I do of the situation that has existed in this province since the present government came into office. In reference to that board, what were the conditions the present government found when they assumed office? They found stacks of applications that had been passed by the Henry government; everything had been done with the exception of writing out the cheques and passing over the money. They found that loans had been made to 18,000 farmers in Ontario, totalling some $51,000,000, though if they had to be liquidated at the present time they would not realize $15,000,000. I do not say that is any particular fault of the Henry government; you cannot blame a valuator for placing a value in 1928 or 1929 which was almost double the value that would be placed to-day. However, those were the conditions the new government found. It was said that no loans have been made by the new Ontario government. I should like to repeat what my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell) said, that seventy-two loans were made during November and December, totalling in the neighbourhood of $140,000. Those loans were made to applicants whose applications had been received and approved before the previous government went out of office.

Now I am going to say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) that if this is to be a purely federal undertaking a great deal of care should be taken in selecting the personnel of the board that will administer it, so that politics may not creep into the administration. If I were a member of a government which appointed a commission to administer an act of this kind, and if I interfered to the extent of recommending a loan that had been refused by the board and that was not justified, I would not consider myself worthy of the seat I occupied. I might say here that politics did play a prominent part in connection with the administration of this act in the province of Ontario.

I cannot help thinking of the conditions that exist in my immediate neighbourhood. My constituency is purely rural, with the exception of a town and a city. Unless we have prosperity among our farmers there will not be prosperity in our town and city. We have to get those farmers back on their feet, or they will be in the bread line. I know of several good farmers in my own neighbourhood who require a little assistance, which they cannot obtain from private individuals or loan companies. A farmer hardly gets a cordial look to-day if he appeals to a bank for a loan. I am thinking of a farmer in my locality who bought a farm some years ago at a high price, and who has raised a family of eight children. A few years ago he went to the man from whom he had bought the farm, and who held the mortgage, and asked if he could not lower the interest rate a little. The mortgage holder replied, "No, I cannot do it. I can buy government bonds and clip off coupons and get nearly six per cent. I cannot take less than six per cent." I think we must get a lower interest rate because with his present income the farmer cannot meet his overhead.

I should like to tell the house of another couple whom I visited last week end when I was home. They telephoned and wanted to talk to me in reference to a farm loan. This young man had had a position in the shops at Galt, I believe. He lost his position and came home, and has been attempting to redeem the farm held by his father, which had a mortgage amounting to practically what the farm is worth to-day, because farms are not being sold at any price.

On this farm there are good buildings, a new barn and two silos. When he came to the place he had only a small amount of stock, while to-day he has a first class accredited herd of Jerseys. However, he is up against an interest rate of seven per cent. His wife said to me, "If we could obtain a loan bearing an interest rate of 4 per cent I would feel we were right in heaven." I should like to urge that the Minister of Finance make it possible to put loans through at four per cent or less. To-day, in view of the low prices received for farm commodities, these high rates of interest cannot be met. On my farm we are to-day producing over 600 pounds of milk daily. To deliver that milk to the condenser we are charged nine cents per hundred. This milk, rated at 3·5 per cent butterfat, is selling at $1 per hundred. With bran costing $27 or $28 per ton and other feeds at proportionately high prices, one cannot sell milk at that low price and make a profit. As the old saying goes, the farmer is the only man who can continue to do business at a loss.

May I observe in closing that I shall be pleased to support any measure which will be of assistance to the farmers or which will be the means of getting them money at a lower rate of interest, no matter from what party it comes—whether it be the government, the Liberal party or the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. We have to get money for our farmers; we must lend them money because they cannot borrow it elsewhere, and before they can get it we must see that it is available at a low rate of interest.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) must be gratified at the amount of interest his resolution has aroused, the amount of debate it has occasioned and the amount of approval it has elicited from both sides of the house. I hesitate delaying passage of the resolution, but I believe I must do so in order to bring to the notice of the house and the minister one concrete case which to my mind indicates a certain weakness in the present law, a weakness which the minister may not have considered and one which I hope he will be prepared to remedy.

There is a saying in the legal profession that hard cases make bad law, and we recognize the truth of that statement. The case I have to submit to the house is more than a hard case; it is one which in my opinion must be representative of a considerable number of cases. It is an instance not merely of hardship but in a certain sense of injustice which in my opinion ought to be remedied. I refer to a farmer who for thirty years farmed in eastern Canada and for seventeen years farmed first in Saskatchewan and afterwards in Alberta. He owns a section farm three miles from the town of Erskine and one mile from the wheat pool elevator. Some years ago, by reason of an accident to his spine, he became paralyzed, and had to leave his farm and reside in the city of Edmonton, where he still lives. Notwithstanding his paralysis and his age he has been operating his farm from his bed. A man has been working the farm under his absolute control and direction, and he has been paying for the seed and meeting the other costs in connection with putting in the crops. There is an arrangement between the two men whereby the man working the farm gets fifty per cent of the crop for his work. A few years ago the farm was valued at about $25,000. There are 475 acres under cultivation, good buildings and good fencing. For these reasons that valuation would not appear to be at all exorbitant. Since 1930 the owner in Edmonton has fallen into arrears with his taxes. To put in his 1931 crop he had to borrow from the bank. The amount of his indebtedness to the bank plus the amount of his taxes is $3,500; yet he cannot obtain a loan from the farm loan board because he happens to live in Edmonton, paralyzed on a bed, and is not living on the farm.

Hon. members will recall that some years ago a bonus of five cents per bushel was given on the wheat produced. In the spring of the year in which the bonus was paid he borrowed from the bank for the purpose of putting in his crop. He had ploughed 100 acres of summer fallow, had broken 34 acres of new land, and his borrowing from the bank was at an interest rate of eight per cent. In that year of 1931 he raised a crop of 6,000 bushels. Applying for the five cents bonus he was told that because he was not living on the land he could not have it; the man who did the actual work of raising the crop got the whole of the five cents bonus on the 6,000 bushels, while the owner in Edmonton did not get a cent. I am inclined to believe, from memory, that in point of fact there is an agreement of sale executed in favour of the man who put in the crop, and if that is the case difficulties would be possible. The point I wish to urge upon the minister, however, is that there should be a greater margin of discretion or wider powers given to meet cases such as this. In this instance the man is actually operating the farm, although the house in which he lives is at a distant point. His lifetime's savings are in that farm, and to-day I am not sure but what it has been sold for taxes. He entered into the ordinary consolidation of tax arrears agreement and made two payments since 1930, but has not been able to make further payments since. The result is that his tax agreement is in default and his protection under the consolidation agreement has gone. This man is a helpless cripple in possession of a valuable farm. It is possible, if not an actuality, that his farm may be sold for $1,000 or $1,500 arrears in taxes. I urge upon the minister that the definition of the term "farmer" should be widened so as to make provision for such cases. If he has not sold the farm I would urge and press and contend that the mere fact that he is living in Edmonton does not make him a non-occupant of the farm, and that even then he is within the definition of a farmer under the Farm Loan Act. But even if he has sold the farm, surely it should not be impossible to make some provision in the act that men who have a really valuable equity in a farm and who have for so many years been working at farming and building up the prosperity of the east or the west, should in some measure be protected, and that some relief and some concessions should be made to them in some way to enable them to get the money that is necessary to enable this man I speak of and others like him to avert a complete loss of the earnings and toil of his lifetime. I do not know how the amendment can be made, but I do suggest that it might be made in some way. In the 1934 amendment to this act provision was made under section 10 of part II that a loan might be made to a mortgagee who is defined as "any loan, trust or insurance company," and that term is extended to include "such other corporations or persons or classes of corporations or persons" as might be designated by the governor general in council, on the security of an assignment or hypothecation of a first mortgage; and that term is defined as including an agreement of sale covering lands the title to which is in the mortgagee, using the term mortgagee in the wide sense. Now if such can be done in that case, why cannot it be done in the ordinary case of an application for a loan? I made application for this man a couple of years ago, I remember, and it was turned down on the ground that he was not actually an occupant of these lands.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, a good deal of what I intended to say has already been said, and I shall certainly not repeat it. I notice in looking over the statement that the farm loan board has not sustained many heavy losses, and the number of cases in which interest or principal payments are in arrears is not very great.

A few days ago I put a question on the order paper and by the answer I notice that fewer and fewer loans are being made year after year. For instance, in the province of Alberta in 1931 the number of loans was 298; in 1932, 239; and in 1933 the number was 80, and in 1934 the number had dropped to 47. I also asked what areas in the province were excluded from the operation of this act, and the answer I received was this:

None. The policy of the board is to deal with applications on the basis of the productive value of the security offered and the qualifications of the applicant.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, when people in the southern part of the province apply for a loan they are invariably told that no loans are being considered in that district. We cannot blame the board for being very careful with their loans because we know that year after year disaster has overtaken the crops in part of that district, but even in that blanket area where no loans are considered there are farms that annually have produced fairly good crops. There are farmers living in the hills who have been getting on reasonably well and who have every right to have their application for a loan, when they require it, considered.

Then again, as has been said, this act works in with the farmers' debt adjustment act. I would point out to the minister the futility of having commissioners appointed and acting under the farmers' debt adjustment act in a district where there is no possibility of getting a loan from the farm loan board. When the act is being amended I do hope the minister will see his way clear to extend its scope to save some of the homes which are being lost at the present time. In the city whence I come a large number of retired farmers have made payments on their homes in the city and have counted on making future payments from the revenue from their farms. But they have been disappointed in getting that revenue and have been unable to meet their obligations, and consequently stand to lose their homes. Some are now tenants on their own property, and others, of course, will be forced to vacate their property in the near future. I believe that this is a field of activity which might well be added to an act such as this, and if that could be accomplished it would dispel the despair which some of these people feel, and in its place bring some courage and confidence and contribute greatly to the happiness and contentment of the Canadian people.

Mr. WILLIAM H. GOLDING (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity of expressing my views on this question and of endorsing the views expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott). I think that any member who represents a rural constituency and spends any time at all among his constituents must understand the distress and worry that our agriculturists are experiencing at the present time and have been for the last three or four years. I am very glad indeed that the house has devoted the time it has this afternoon and evening to what since I have been a member of this house I have often considered as the forgotten man. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are going on adding to our machinery of government. An unemployment insurance scheme is now proposed, also an economic council; we have our marketing board, and whether we believe it or not, all these cost money to administer. After all, these costs find their way back to the consumer and to the basic producer, and ultimately in my opinion to our greatest industry, that of agriculture.

I have often wondered since I have been a member of this house, and it has given me a great deal of concern, just how long we can continue to add to our machinery of government and place these burdens upon the backs of our farmers who already are overburdened and have been for years.

Take the unemployment insurance scheme, for instance. No doubt it is a good thing in itself, and yet I can see that it is going to place another burden upon the farmers' backs. I think that every manufacturer who has to do with the agriculturists will recognize that all the costs that go into the upkeep of that scheme will have to be passed on to the agriculturists. In my own constituency during last fall and this winter I have been approached on a good many occasions in regard to the Farm Loan Act and the debt adjustment plan. Of course, in Ontario that is not yet in effect but I think it will be; enabling legislation will be passed as soon as the legislature meets. But I do want to add my plea to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to do everything in his power to see that this interest is reduced even to four per cent. Practically every member in this house would, I think, be quite willing to see the government take care of any interest charges over that amount. I have a feeling that a movement of that kind would be supported. We have had loans to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I suppose the government can justify those loans; we have had guarantees to that railway of $60,000,000. When we do that kind of thing I cannot see for the life of me why we cannot do something just as good and big for our agriculturists.

I do not wish to traverse the ground that has been so well covered by various speakers who have preceded me, but as the representative of a rural constituency I want to plead with the Minister of Finance and with the government to do all that lies in their power to have these loans available at four per cent, and I am sure our farmers all through the country would be greatly pleased if that could be brought about.

My only regret is that action of this kind was not taken two or three years ago. I can assure the house that so far as this action at the present time is concerned, it is too late for a great many of the farmers in my constituency, men who have come to me in the last two years to tell me about their difficulties and their troubles. But while that is true, I say let us take action now and do something that will benefit the people who are engaged in what in my opinion is the greatest industry in the dominion.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): While I approve very much of the proposal that is before us, I wish to bring to the attention of the house certain abuses that prevail in the district from which I come. We find that when a mortgage is higher than the value of the farm some banker, some loan company or some real estate man having charged a high rate of interest so that the mortgage value is greatly in excess of the farm value, then they get the farmer and his friends together and they say to him, "We will get you a loan on this from the government." They get a loan on the farm for much more than it is worth and then burden the neighbouring farmer by paying more for the farm than its value, with no intention of paying the mortgage but leaving the farm the next year. This has been done in many instances to the detriment of neighbouring farmers.

In the county I represent the farmers find it almost impossible to get a mortgage on their farms. It was bad enough when the provincial government offered five per cent for their loans, but when they offered six per cent that ruined farm loans almost entirely, because the farmer found it impossible to get a loan. We find therefore in North Wellington that there are barns without shingles, houses needing repairs, fences down and cattle in the grain here and there. The farmers are in a desperate situation for lack of money. They require implements but they are unable to buy them. Implements that should have been discarded years ago they are bound to continue using. Another great hardship is their handicap in producing revenue. Their horses and cattle have been reduced in numbers, and sometimes they have had to sell the best of them to raise money to meet interest.

I do not think that four per cent is too low; the lower we can get it the better. The wages of money should have some relationship to the wages of men, and the man who has a farm does not get four per cent on his investment. Practically speaking, the farmers today are working without wages but only for their keep. We want the interest rate as low as possible.

Mr. J. T. SPROULE (East Lambton): I cannot agree with the last speaker (Mr. Blair). Possibly he has a little money out drawing a high rate of interest and feels that he would not like to have anything less. But in my constituency there are a good many people who will join with some members on the other side in advocating a rate of interest as low as they can obtain. I feel proud of the fact that I belong to a party that has the courage to undertake the task of reinstating the farmer. It is one of the greatest measures we have had before us, and I do not hesitate to say that it is approved by all the farmers in my constituency.

It was suggested by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell) that the late provincial government was trying to collect a high rate of interest. If I understood him correctly, he intimated that they were charging six per cent or thereabouts. As long as I can remember, for quite a number of years, the Ontario board was lending money at five and a half per cent, and in fact that was the only source from which you could get money. If my hon. friend will look up the records he will find that the late government notified all their loan holders in June last that the rate of interest would be reduced to four and a half per cent. If the present government lends at four per cent that will be better still and will be quite agreeable to my constituency, as no doubt it will be to the constituency which the hon. gentleman represents. At the same time the late government should get the credit that it deserves, because a great deal was done in my locality.

The hon. gentleman went so far as to say that the late government had practically thrown away the money, carelessly allowing interest to accrue here and there. I would point out to him that the very same thing would happen if he had the reins of power. These loan boards were compelled to take chattel mortgages on the stock which the men had, but as there was no way in which they could possibly sell the stock to raise taxes there was only one thing for the tax collector to do, and that was to return the tax bill to the county against the property.

The hon. member suggested that the Ontario government had lent several thousand dollars since they came into office. This may be true, but it depends upon what side you are on. However, let it be where it is, it makes no difference so long as the loan does some good, because the man who applies for a loan needs it or he would not try to get one. Far be it from me to make capital out of this matter, because this is something that concerns every man in the rural districts. I do not quite agree with the hon. member opposite when he says that this legislation is too late. Even if it is coming along in the last days of this parliament, I admire a government that has the courage to step in and do something. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that these things should have been done two or three or four years ago, but the former government was in power for a long time and yet it did nothing. The present government is giving action and action at once so that we will get relief, and there has been no time that we needed it any worse than we do to-day.

As regards the suggestion that those loans were given very carelessly and that some received more than they should, surely my hon. friends opposite do not think that the men who made the valuations were not fair valuators. While they are pretty well cleared out, there are some of them in office still. Those men used good judgment. There is a great deal of difference between the days when you could sell a cow and receive enough money possibly to meet the interest, and to-day when you would have to sell a dozen cows to meet it, and the same thing would apply in all these cases. If hon. members would look into some of the records they would see that in those days when it was easier to pay $1,000 or $2,000 or $3,000 from the price of produce sold than it is now to pay $150, the amount at which those lands were valued was not too high. If the present provincial government spends the money as wisely as did the late one, they will not do bad business.

I do not want to take up much of the time of the house because I think we are all of about the same mind on the matter. I am sure we will all be agreeable if the interest rate is kept down, and any government that has courage enough to go ahead and introduce a measure, as I said, to reinstate the farmer at the present time, is certainly going to study the whole question and give him the money at the lowest possible rate of interest.

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): Just before the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) rose to speak I had intended addressing the house for a very few moments on one branch of this subject which has not yet been touched, or at least, had not until then. I do not intend to go over those phases of the Farm Loan Act which have been dealt with. Some of the remarks I heartily concur in; others I do not, but I will leave that for the time being. We have however in all districts in this country cases similar to that stated by the hon. member for East Edmonton, some of them differing somewhat; and I want to deal with one along that line but somewhat different.

There is living in the city of Moose Jaw a gentleman who came to this country from the great republic to the south. He has been farming in that district now to my knowledge for over twenty years. He brought with him to this country over $30,000 in cash, and he invested that money in farm lands in the Moose Jaw district. He has broken those lands and improved them, and all his farms are equipped with the very best of farm buildings. They are also all supplied with the very best of farm machinery and ample power to work them. This man, who had acquired over $30,000 in farming in the United States and who has since then been conducting several large farms in this country, is no longer a young man; consequently he has moved into the city and is living there while his sons and sons-in-law are operating those farms. During this time of drought in that part of the country it has cost a great deal to keep the farms going and his reserves have been pretty well exhausted. He has been buying seed, helping the boys to put in their crops and trying to provide a living for himself. When he was actually farming there was not a year that he could not have had a loan of $5,000 or $10,000 from the bank without any question whatever. This year he went to the bank to borrow a few hundred dollars to pay his taxes and they would not give him a dollar. This man is the owner in his own right of several sections of land, all clear and with the very best of farm buildings. The fact that he is not residing on the land, not actually farming, takes him outside the terms of this act, although he is responsible for the operation of the farms. He is not alone in this; there are many men in that city who are in the same situation, and I have talked to a number of them. The case is very similar to the one stated by the hon. member for East Edmonton. What these men want is not a loan for twenty or thirty years, but a short term loan at a reasonable rate of interest, something to carry them over until they can get a crop and look after themselves. This man unfortunately was hailed out this year.

Had it not been for that unfortunate fact, notwithstanding the drought in that district, he would have had sufficient to pay his taxes and carry on his farming operations. It is that class of people who have come and lived here, built up this country, spent a great deal of money, who are to-day denied any source from which they can get money to keep them alive. This man has not a thing on which to keep up his house in the city except what he gets off the farm. I assume they had perhaps a little to sell off the farm, but he needs some money now to put in seed and carry him for the time being.

If the minister could arrange somewhere in this legislation to provide for short term credits for men of this class—not fly-by-night men, but men who have been here for years, men who have built up the country and are substantial citizens—I think that is what should be done. I just want to bring this matter to the attention of the minister because it is a point that should be dealt with, and it has not been covered in recent speeches.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): I listened with a great deal of interest this afternoon to the minister when he introduced this resolution proposing amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act. I think we can all apprehend a general acceptance of the resolution as introduced. Apparently there was quite general unanimity with respect to the object of the proposed amendments to the act. It goes without saying that they will virtually revolutionize the mortgage loan business of the country, and the dominion government in the very near future will be the sole institution lending money on farm lands. That may be all right. It is a huge step and I can quite appreciate that it may be even more acceptable to the farmers themselves than it will be to members of parliament after this legislation becomes operative.

I can see considerable objection to the old act as to the manner in which it operated, in that it was not applicable in or used by all the provinces. I think that may have been unfair. As regards the proposal to consolidate the administration of the act in Ottawa through provincial offices, I have no complaint or observation to make. Perhaps that will work for more uniform administration. In the meantime I should just like to say that so far as the organization in Manitoba is concerned I have not heard of any particular complaint against the officers operating there.

Mr. HANBURY: Except in Souris.

[Mr. Beynon.]

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): There was no complaint there. With regard to amending the part of the act which required the borrower to subscribe for stock in the company to the extent of five per cent, I am glad to see that eliminated. It used to be in the mind of many people interested in farm loans and rural credits that we should try by this means to secure the interest of the men borrowing the money, with the idea that in so doing he would feel that he was part of the institution, and thereby it would operate more efficiently. But experience shows that that requirement kept a great many people from taking advantage of loans under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. I recall looking into two or three proposals for loans by farmers, and it worked out that the farmer had to pay roughly $8.50 for each $100 borrowed. That looked large to him, so he naturally looked elsewhere for his money. The minister stated this afternoon, if I heard him correctly, that the money subscribed by the provincial governments up to date would be returned to them. The question came to my mind, as it did to that of another hon. member who spoke: what about the five per cent already advanced by farmers who have taken advantage of these loans? I should like to see that money returned to the farmers in the form of credits on their interest or arrears.

There are two other features to which I should like to refer. In this respect I may get into deep water, but it seems to me that in view of the debt adjustment legislation and prior claims and things of that kind that have developed in the last ten or fifteen years in respect to farm mortgages, our whole farm loan policy will have to be considerably changed. The two features that I should like to submit for the minister's consideration are with respect to the personal covenant and the right to repay a loan at any time without bonus. As far as the personal covenant is concerned my feeling is that it should not be required on a farm mortgage. You might say it should not apply to the homesteader. I have in mind a farmer owning say a half section of land. Personally I feel that that is a nice sized little farm. He may have that clear of debt. But sometimes we get ambitious and wish to add more land. When it comes to purchasing that additional land and borrowing money for the purpose from any mortgage corporation I feel that the farmer should be protected to the extent that his personal covenant should not go on that new loan: in other words protect him to keep him on the homestead.

As to the bonus, if a loan should be paid before due I would submit that the minister might make provision to accept the principal of the loan at any time that it is available. We have seen too many cases in the past in which before a loan came due a man might have had a particularly good year and was in a position to pay off his loan, yet because he had to pay an additional amount to get the mortgage company to take that money he refrained from paying it. Human nature just made him take the position that he would not pay any bonus to the mortgage company. That money then was probably not used to the best advantage, and perhaps when the mortgage finally came due it was not there.

This measure will provide that the dominion government may loan to the farmers of Canada up to $90,000,000. That is a lot of money. Of course it is going to operate in conjunction with the debt adjustment legislation passed a year ago; that is all to the good. I suggest to the minister that an effort be made to have this legislation put into operation as soon as possible. I have in mind people preparing to put in a crop this year. If they could feel assured that they could secure money in the way of a loan at a low rate of interest from this organization, they would be much more encouraged to go ahead and put in the crop, and at the same time, where they are heavily involved, would have the additional advantage of making a more satisfactory adjustment with their creditors.

One serious difficulty is with respect to the valuation of land. I cannot tell you how you could go out and value farm lands in Manitoba to-day, and I assume the same thing applies to the other provinces. I listened to what the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) said with respect to loans in his district. He referred to the farm loan board lending money in another district that suffered from flooding a few years ago. This district since that time has suffered for three years considerable grasshopper damage—not a total loss in every instance but many farmers having practically a total loss for the past five years. I have in mind an illustration. I am reminded of a farmer near me who had a first class quarter section of land. He did not live on it, and consequently was not able to borrow money on it from the farm loan board. He had purchased it under an agreement of sale. Last fall he owed $2,300 on that quarter section. The man to whom he owed the money said, "If you can get me $1,000 I will call it square," and he had to beg friends to let him have that $1,000 at six per cent interest. I recall what he told me of one man whom he approached for a loan. The man said to him, "Why should I lend you $1,000 on that quarter section when I can go down into the district where my own lands are and buy a quarter section from the municipality for $750?" Now, the quarter section that he could buy for $750 is in the area which was flooded out some years ago and to which my hon. friend from Souris referred. So the difficulty of placing a valuation on farm lands for mortgage purposes is very great. I know of many farms in my own district carrying mortgages as high as $20 an acre. Of course this man who was able to pay off his $2,300 mortgage with $1,000 was pleased to do it—Perhaps that might be called the purifying effect of capitalism and regarded as one of its advantages. In that connection may I point out that it is likely that some day the government will be obliged to accept a less amount of money for mortgages than the amount loaned.

I think the government is fortunate in being able to start this plan at this time. Farm lands are undoubtedly low in price now, and the risks should be proportionately less. In Manitoba we had the Manitoba Farm Loan Association, which unfortunately started at a bad time. Its history is not any too bright. I hope that this legislation will meet with much greater success. The fact of its being started in a period of depressed prices should make for success.

There is one other point that comes to my mind, and it is this; if I recall correctly the act as it stands at present provides for one per cent additional interest on arrears. I do submit that this should be changed. The man who farms or wants to farm is anxious to keep up his payments if possible, and I submit to the minister that if it can be done some provision should be made for carrying arrears, if they must occur, at the original rate of interest.

The other feature that comes to my mind is that it does seem too bad, when we can secure money at four per cent or perhaps less, that we have to add one per cent for administrative costs. That seems too high a percentage for that service. It may be necessary but it does not seem fair, in comparison with the cost of the money, to have to pay an additional one per cent just to administer the organization and provide for the reserve to be set aside for bad debts.

I have nothing further to say with respect to this legislation except a word of commendation to the government. I honestly think this is a move in the right direction; I feel that we are starting at the right place. I agree with other hon. members who have taken the position that after all is said and done we can talk about the assistance we must give to the unemployed, to the building trades and so on, but in the final analysis if you can get the farm business on a sound basis and in a position to carry itself reasonably well you will do more to relieve our generally distressed situation than by all the other legislation you might put through.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad indeed that this act is to be amended in a worth while fashion. I remember when the act was passed by this house in 1926; we had great hopes in regard to this type of legislation. It was put forward as a great advance, as no doubt it was, and if the administration had been carried on in the spirit in which the act was drawn up, there is no doubt at all in my mind that it would have filled a great want. Unfortunately, however, after the act was passed it was held up for a year, and then it seemed to fall down entirely as far as administration was concerned. I say it fell down because we had hoped that at least twenty per cent of the enormous number of mortgages in Canada would have been taken up under this act. It was estimated that if this happened it would have the effect of forcing the loan companies to bring down their charges to the level of those made by the farm loan board. Owing to the way in which the act was administered, however, very little money was loaned. According to some figures given me in 1932 I find that only 4,119 loans were granted out of 14,423 applications made, and although the Minister of Finance had the right to purchase bonds of the farm loan board to the extent of $15,000,000 I find that up to 1932 only $7,500,000 had been loaned under the act.

I knew that the act was not working out successfully in the province from which I come, so far as loans were concerned, but I was interested in the figures given to-night by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), who said that in 1931 only 298 loans were made in the province of Alberta, and the number dropped as low as 47 in 1934. It always seemed to me that one of the weaknesses in the act so far as Alberta was concerned, and I suppose this applied to other provinces as well, was that loans were not made unless the borrower turned over as security the land on which his house was built. I know many men of excellent standing as farmers who wanted loans on land, but not on the land on which their houses stood. Although they had ample security to offer for the loans, their applications were refused. I know of several cases in which the would be borrowers, after having been turned down by the board, made application to ordinary loan companies and received advances on their land without delay.

I join with others in this house who have stressed the absolute need of a very low rate of interest under this act. I do not know what the Minister of Finance has in mind, but I sincerely hope that the rate will not be more than four per cent, and that if possible it will be less. As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) pointed out earlier in the evening, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Farm Loan Act are two measures that should work together, but while I have great hopes of some good being done by the administration of the first measure I am rather afraid that it will be a partial failure if we do not see that the greatest possible use is made of the farm loan act.

I should like to say just a word with regard to the cost of administration. We are informed in regard to the unemployment insurance measure the government proposes to carry the cost of administration. If that is to be done in order to help those in the cities who are receiving insurance relief would it be too much to ask the government to carry the cost of administration of this act in order to help out those who earn their livelihood in the country?

I do not wish to say more at this time because we do not know all the details of this bill. I freely admit that we had great hopes when this act was first introduced; we have been frightfully disappointed, but at the same time I realize that if the necessary amendments are made it may become a very useful piece of legislation.

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, if I rise at this time it is not because I desire to find fault with what the distinguished critic of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has said. I had hoped to spare the house the trouble of listening to me, but so few members from the province of Quebec have expressed their views on this important question that I fear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) may think us indifferent to his proposed legislation if something is not said by some of us who come from this province.

During this debate we have heard many new members make their maiden speeches, and certainly they deserve to be congratulated because they have pleaded well the cause of the farmers of their constituencies. We know, of course, that they are fresh from the by-elections, and undoubtedly they have come here determined to fight the government to the last ditch. It is a pleasure to the older members, however, to realize that the newer members find it necessary, when they rise for the first time, to congratulate the government on the proposed new reforms which it is hoped will bring salvation to Canada.

This resolution is very important indeed, in view of the sad situation of agriculture, not only in the western part of Canada but in the province of Quebec. The dire condition of farmers and the great poverty under which they are operating certainly cannot be overstressed. I happen to represent a rural constituency which has suffered very much during the depression, and certainly my constituents will welcome with great pleasure the amendments the government is introducing.

I have already advocated some reforms in connection with rural credits. Speaking on the budget in 1932, I said:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, may I refer to other legislation which has been disastrous to the farmers of eastern Canada; I mean the law enacted in 1929 creating the Canadian Farm Loan Board. This legislation may have been beneficial to the western farmers, but it has not been at all helpful to the farmers of eastern Canada. The rate of interest is too high, the legal fees incident to the granting of loans are also too high, and the obligation laid upon borrowers to contribute to the special fund is not only unpractical but absurd.

I realize I might have used milder language, but these were my views. To illustrate the impracticability of the legislation I shall describe to the house the case of a poor farmer living in one of the older parishes in my constituency. His farm was valued at $4,000. In 1932 he applied for a loan of only $1,400 which has not yet been granted. Notwithstanding the fact that he has been unsuccessful in his effort to secure a loan, he has been sued by a notary who is charging him the sum of $400—only $400—for the cost of investigating titles, and so on. I have complained to the federal and provincial boards, but they say there is no remedy because they cannot prove that the notary did not render the services for which he has charged so high a fee.

Nevertheless I feel this case illustrates my point, namely, that the criticism which has been levelled at the act is certainly justified in many respects. I believe all hon. members agree that amendments are necessary, because I have not heard any dissenting voice this afternoon from any quarter of the chamber. Of course we know that at the last session some amendments were made, but as the hon. members for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and Compton (Mr. Gobeil) said this afternoon, the enabling legislation has not been passed by the legislative assemblies of Ontario and Quebec, although in Quebec the legislature has been in session since January 7. Everyone realizes that a general overhauling of the act has to be made. I understand there are difficulties the government will have to face in connection with any change in rates of interest, but I feel I must agree with what some hon. members have said, namely that it would be highly desirable, if at all possible, to have the rate of interest lowered to four per cent.

In 1931 the Conservative opposition in Quebec waged a very extensive campaign for the establishment of a provincial system of rural credits. At that time the leader of the opposition in that province was criticized and considered very unwise because he recommended that the rate of interest should not exceed two and a half per cent. Nevertheless in some financial reviews we have read lately that in Italy Mussolini has created a system of rural credits whereby the farmers pay only two and a half per cent. I am not at all prepared to go that far now, because I realize conditions in southern and central Europe are very much different from those obtaining in America. That is true because of our longer winters, and the fact that farming in this country cannot be carried on for more than six months. Nevertheless I certainly wish the government would lower the rate of interest to as low a point as possible.

I recognize that due to pressure of public opinion the legislature in the province of Quebec has contributed one and a half per cent to the interest charged by the Canadian farm loan board. I sincerely hope when the new legislation is in operation the provincial government will see its way clear to raise its contribution to the point where they will pay half the interest levied.

May I also stress the point that one must not lose sight of the fact that the new legislation will be a necessary complement of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which only lately has been passed. In the province of Quebec the farmers have applied to the middle class, the rentiers, to obtain loans, but in many instances the rentiers are not much richer than the farmers. Some rentiers have loaned to the farmers everything they had, and now on account of moratorium legislation passed in Quebec since 1933 those creditors cannot get their money. At this time they cannot obtain relief from the banks or from the mortgage loan companies. Therefore it is necessary that they have at their disposal the only instrument from which they can get relief, namely the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

Therefore I urge the minister to set up as speedily as possible the required organization to provide the necessary moneys so that the farmers who this winter have made arrangements with their creditors may secure a loan as soon as possible next spring. I urge the minister, further, to appoint a large number of farm inspectors so that at the earliest possible moment farms may be inspected. I realize this will entail an expenditure of money, but it will not constitute a waste because the more money spent to inspect farms and provide loans to farmers the less money will be spent in the administration of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

For these reasons I am pleased to concur in what has been said from all quarters of the house in welcoming the resolution. Indeed it must be gratifying for the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister to know that the new program of reforms has been so well received by the opposition, because nothing by way of reform could be more practical than that which tends to ameliorate the conditions under which the farmers are operating.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take the time of the house to discuss the question of farm loans from the standpoint of their economic soundness, because experience has proven in this country and in the United States that from that point of view they have been disastrous. If I recollect aright, before the N.R.A. legislation in the United States, that country had claims against farmers for over one and a half billion dollars which were considered then a complete loss to the country; and if we consider this legislation on that ground, it certainly would be very hard to understand. But I suppose that the government in its last hour of agony has decided for once to find within its bosom one good resolution. May I hope, Mr. Speaker, that it may not prove to be one brick paving the floor of that place to which I do not wish the government to go at the next election?

I have tried to find a reason why the government is bringing down this legislation at this late hour. I have asked myself: Is it because they have tried that other legislation called the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which they passed last year, and which as a matter of fact has completely destroyed the credit of the farmer of eastern Canada?

Mr. GOBEIL: It was all destroyed before that law was passed.

Mr. DUPUIS: Perhaps the hon. gentleman finds the destruction around him so extensive that everywhere he sees nothing but destruction. But speaking for the province of Quebec, from which my hon. friend comes, he knows perfectly well that before that Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed, farmer lenders in our province relied on the credit of a farmer, because they knew that no sounder or better security was to be found in Canada than the security of our farms even since the crisis. Don't shake your head.

Mr. GOBEIL: Absolutely no.

Mr. DUPUIS: The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) says, "absolutely no." Well, I hope he will go into his riding and say that again.

Mr. GOBEIL: I certainly will.

Mr. DUPUIS: Then he has more courage than judgment.

Mr. GOBEIL: That remains to be seen.

Mr. McINTOSH: They say he will not come back.

Mr. DUPUIS: In the province of Quebec the best security was our farms before the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed, but since the enactment of that legislation there is not a single lender who would dare to lend one cent on a farm, because the farmers, good and bad, as soon as they are sued for a mortgage, now rush to the local administrator of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and seek an adjustment reducing their mortgage perhaps fifty per cent; or they may ask that they be absolved from paying interest for from fifteen to fifty years. The hon. member for Compton knows that. Who will dare to lend money on the security of the farm under those conditions? The consequence is that the farmers have their backs to the wall. They do not know what to do. There is only one recourse and it is this legislation.

Why did the government wait so long to pass this legislation? Was it because, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said in his radio addresses, the opposition deliberately opposed any legislation that the government introduced into this house in the last two or three years? I would answer the Prime Minister by saying that if the opposition did anything wrong in that particular case it was in not opposing the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Nobody said a single word against it last session, and it has proved to be the worst piece of legislation that was passed.

Mr. GOBEIL: Weren't you here then?

Mr. DUPUIS: I was here, but I had the same idea that the Prime Minister mentioned over the radio. I did not want to oppose the government too much because, although I am not a prophet, I knew that the Prime Minister, having no other argument, would try to throw something on the opposition one way or the other, so I think I showed good judgment, as did all the members on this side.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He has got you going all right.

Mr. DUPUIS: This year the government comes with this legislation, and I say it is too late. It is only a deathbed repentance.

My hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), with his fine command of English, which I envy him, said: In 1932 I said such and such a thing in favour of the farmer. Well, Mr. Speaker, if I may take the attitude of a great man as he does, may I also remind the house of what the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville said, not in 1932, but in the special session of 1930 when the government put through its unemployment relief measure:

> I would ask the Prime Minister if the last two lines of clause 2 of the bill, reading "for such purposes and under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council" are broad enough to permit of an amendment to the Farm Loan Act to reduce the interest rate from 6½ to 4½ per cent.

In that special session in 1930, when the Prime Minister was taking the money from the purse which we had left filled with forty-four million dollars before going out of office, and spending $20,000,000, throwing it away to fulfil one of his election promises because he did not want to perish in the attempt, I thought then, as the representative of a farming constituency, that it would have been proper for the government to redeem another promise and extend that relief to the farmer, and that is why I asked the Prime Minister then to reduce the rate of interest. But did they do anything about it? No, they were deaf—but not dumb. They could not do it then—it was impossible. If I remember well, the representatives of all the farmers of this country took the trouble, although they were starving, to make a pilgrimage to Ottawa, and mind you, among this distinguished delegation there were members of parliament, including the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton) and the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). They sent three delegates to the Prime Minister, who was very busy with the big lords of England, and they disturbed the tranquillity of the right hon. gentleman when they asked him to come to the rescue of the farmer. You know very well, and the whole country knows what the Prime Minister answered. He said he did not have time to meet the delegation. They then begged him to send the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), who is as a matter of fact a real gentleman, "Oh," said the Prime Minister, "the Minister of Agriculture is as busy as I am; we have no time for that." They were here for the purpose of asking this government, at a time when it was opportune, to help the farmer. But nothing was done. As regards the rate of interest, the argument was that it could not be lowered.

I see here in a Montreal newspaper, a newspaper which is always very delicate in what it has to say with regard to members of parliament—and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) knows something about this, because I see a nice article written on this subject—I see in this newspaper something about the three ministers from the district of Montreal. I will not dare to repeat what is said about these three ministers, because I am proud of my province; I am proud of the population of that province, and I would be ashamed to repeat it before the representatives of the whole country, and leave this house under the impression that the whole province of Quebec is on the level on which the three ministers of the crown from the province of Quebec have been placed. The only thing I want to point out is that they praise the Prime Minister, declaring that had the ministers from the province of Quebec been more active, had they exercised more influence with the Prime Minister, they could have obtained something that would help to rescue the city of Montreal. And to prove it they say, "Mr. Houde just applied to the Prime Minister and in one moment the Prime Minister found in England $6,000,000 at a rate of 3¾ per cent." That is all very well, but may I ask whether the influence of the right hon. gentleman could not have been used on behalf of the most important and the most interesting class in this country, the farmers who have been starving since this government came into power?

Nevertheless the intention is good and I want to congratulate the government on bringing down this legislation. It is better than nothing. We know that Christian charity obliges us to forgive even the greatest sinner in his last hour of agony, and I do not want to be less Christian than I am bound to be.

The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) tried to throw stones at the government of the province of Quebec. Well, that is his usual habit; he is used to doing that because he has no argument against the Liberals in the federal field. But may I remind him that the province of Quebec, as he said—and I thank him for being frank for once—has contributed to the extent of one and a half per cent in the rate of interest in connection with the farm loan board. That is something. But he goes further. The hon. gentleman suggested that the province of Quebec should contribute fifty per cent of the rate of interest under this new legislation. Is it because his Prime Minister has acceded to the request of the premier of Quebec to contribute fifty per cent in connection with the unemployment relief legislation in Montreal, and by so doing relieve the municipalities of their unbearable burden, that he makes through this House of Commons a petition to the government of Quebec?

I heard the premier of Quebec about a month ago make that kind offer to the Prime Minister of Canada to contribute fifty per cent. I do not know whether I am wrong, but the Prime Minister is here to say whether I am or not. At any rate, I have never heard that the Prime Minister of Canada has accepted that offer of Premier Taschereau.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not the offer.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am prepared to wait for an explanation from the Prime Minister. I should like to hear what the offer was. The Prime Minister has sometimes said that I am not clever, and I am the first to admit it. But I believe that I understand something about political economy—

An hon. MEMBER: Honesty.

Mr. DUPUIS: I will not say honesty, because the Prime Minister is an honest man. But I understand something of political economy and I know something about the meaning of words. I was there the night the premier of Quebec spoke, and the speech was broadcast. He said, "I am ready to contribute to the amount of fifty per cent if the Prime Minister of Canada is ready to contribute the same amount to relieve the municipalities of the province of Quebec of the burden which is sending them into bankruptcy." If these are not the right words I shall be glad to hear from the right hon. gentleman, but that was what I heard. The hon. member for Dorchester no doubt knows in his heart, therefore, that the premier of Quebec is a very good administrator and made a very opportune offer, because he knows very well that the municipalities in this country are all going to be ruined if they continue to contribute one-third.

Mr. GOBEIL: Ask Mr. Lacroix.

Mr. DUPUIS: You deal with the hon. member for Beauce; he will settle you, because he knows you better than I do.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I am in favour of this new legislation so far as I know what it is at the present time, reserving my right to discuss it on its merits when it comes before the house again, and I hope that the rate of interest will be as low as possible. The cost of administration is one and a half per cent for the farm loan board, and I am always asking myself why the cost of administration of the farm loan board is not paid by the government itself, because in many other commissions it is paid by the government. For instance, as regards the natural products marketing board, the railway board, the unemployment insurance board and perhaps many others, their administration is paid by the government, and I do not see why the farmers of this country are not of as much importance as those concerned with all this other class of business. I just put this question to the government. If this one and a half per cent is taken away from the rate of interest already intended to be charged, a great benefit will ensue to the farmers, and this may help to cover the bad features of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make just a few observations in connection with the resolution before the house. Perhaps the background of this resolution is somewhat similar to the background of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the National Industrial Recovery Act characterizing the recovery legislation of the republic to the south of us. One cause that brought about governmental action to help the farmers there was the disparity between agricultural and industrial prices. That disparity became very serious and action had to be taken. Legislation followed by congress adopting the administrative agricultural act and the industrial recovery act. Another cause was that the spread in prices between agricultural and industrial products broke the purchasing power of the nation and as a result the credit structure of the whole country was interfered with.

The same thing is really the cause of the resolution before the house so far as Canada is concerned. The time has come in the history of this dominion when one of our basic institutions, agriculture, as we have heard to-night on all sides, is in a serious plight, just as it was across the border, and action has had to be taken. I am not one to say that the government ought to be blamed because that action has been somewhat belated because I am one of those who believe that it is better late than never; even a deathbed repentance is good if out of it can grow some constructive action that is helpful to others, although the government repenting may not be saved. So I say that I have been pleased to see the pleasant features that have characterized this debate. It has proved at least one thing: that we can have a debate in this house in a cooperative spirit. That is, we can agree on some things. To my mind that is indicative of parliamentary progress and also an honour to members of this chamber.

A great deal of interest has been shown in this debate and we know in a psychological sense interest always arouses attention, attention arouses action and action is always typical of the character of the individual. There can be no disputing that fact. That is sound individual economy. The same thing holds true as to this resolution. The interest in the house has been satisfactory and a good deal of attention has been aroused. The whole matter now will depend upon the action by the government and the character of that action during the next year or two. In other words, the whole success of this measure will depend upon the machinery established by the government and the way in which the work is carried out. If the machinery established is unworkable and not guided by a wise personnel, then of course the results will not be as anticipated, but I am hopeful that the results will be very good and so far as the resolution is concerned I believe the more adaptable the legislation that will grow out of it, the greater the success that will characterize the government's move.

The resolution deals with facilitating and extending credit to farmers, purchasing additional bonds issued by the board and guaranteed by the government, and amending the constitution of the board. These three parts of the resolution look hopeful and lead me to believe the government back of them is sincere about it and that we may look for ameliorative action during the next year or two.

I am pleased also to notice that parallel or concurrent legislation is under way in the different parts of Canada and that the measure will be a national piece of legislation; that is, it will apply to all Canada and not to a part of it. As a member from the west, and particularly from Saskatchewan, I am gratified to know Saskatchewan will be able to take advantage of this legislation. So far as the riding I have the honour to represent is concerned I may say that during the last two years we have had splendid crops; perhaps some of the best crops in Canada were in northern Saskatchewan last year. I do not care where you may go for comparison. Notwithstanding that I believe there will be great work to do for this measure when it becomes operative and therefore I am taking advantage of the debate to-night to say a few words on its behalf.

The two main features of the resolution are: first getting debts adjusted, and, second, extending credit. The whole essence of the legislation depends upon these two features of the legislation. So far as adjustment of debts is concerned, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act of 1934 has not as yet covered a great deal of ground in Saskatchewan. I was speaking to the official receiver in the North Battleford area and he gave me to understand that only about twenty to twenty-five per cent of the debts before him were adjusted. Even twenty or twenty-five per cent means something, but that would leave about seventy-five per cent of the debts untouched and that means that in connection with seventy-five per cent of the debts coming before him for adjustment he found it impossible to get any adjustment. He said that he lacked power; he was chairman of a committee of three as it were; the creditor's representative was there, the debtor was there and he was there himself, and if they did not come to an agreement, nothing could be done. Consequently in seventy-five per cent of the cases no agreement was reached and the debt adjustment was passed on to the provincial board of review. The Saskatchewan board did not really get down to work until a month or so ago and for that reason very few decisions have as yet been handed down by it. The amendments brought in by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) will make that board of review more operative and successful and I hope now there will be more activity demonstrated on the part of that board and that many decisions in the way of debt adjustment will be made. Thus, so far as debt adjustment is concerned we have the machinery and with the act consolidated as we shall have it after we are through with it in the house, I believe good work ought to be done.

Lastly, even after the debts are adjusted, it would appear to me that the main thing is to get some credit and some money flowing into the pockets of those who need these debt adjustments. If the interest is cut and the principal is cut and the total reduced then I would say the next wise thing to do would be to refund that total at a lower rate of interest, as low as possible. To do that we need some credit. The only source from which to get it would be through an arrangement of this kind. Because of this I am pleased to see that in regard to the financial structure of the farm loan board, which was formerly $15,000,000 and last year was increased to $40,000,000, through the bonds that can be bought and the extra cash that can be got from the treasury, the total now available for the board will be $90,000,000. I do not think it is a cent too much; perhaps it will not be enough. But it will be wise to get the very best results from that $90,000,000 that can be got. The adjustment of debts should be hurried as quickly and effectively as possible, because the sooner farmers who have to have their debts adjusted get them adjusted the better for the province of Saskatchewan and the better for Canada. Then after the adjustment is effected if this board can come to the rescue and arrange the debt of each farmer so that it will bear less heavily upon him, I believe there will be brighter and better days for agriculture all over the country.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with hon. members in all quarters of the house in commending the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for bringing down this resolution. Representing as I do an agricultural constituency in Ontario I am heartily in sympathy with the proposal and commend the government for at least making some move in regard to reduction of interest on money loaned to farmers.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken to-night have said they thought this legislation has been brought down too late. While I confess it would have been better for the great basic industry of this country, agriculture, if the government had brought down this legislation two or three years ago, yet I am glad that they did bring it down in the last session. As far as I am concerned I want to go on record as saying that I will support this legislation and be willing to give credit to the government for bringing it down. To the Minister of Finance I say I think it will be a great mistake and a serious hardship upon the farmers of this country—I speak more particularly for the farmers in my own constituency in western Ontario—if the rate of interest is not brought down to at most four per cent. If I understood the minister correctly this afternoon he stated that the cost of administration of this act would probably be about one and a half to two per cent, which would increase the rate of interest. Am I right in that?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately we are not in committee. I made the suggestion earlier that it might have been wiser to go into committee where we could have had question and answer. I should like to have risen several times, but under the rules I could not. But when we get into committee I shall be glad to answer as many questions as I can.

Mr. SANDERSON: I thank the minister for his courtesy. But may I say that there has been no legislation attempted in this parliament during the last four or five years to aid the farmers. I know I may be getting very close to a discussion that would be controversial, and I do not want to do that; nevertheless, except perhaps for the attempt to get further markets for farmers and better prices, that is my opinion. I am free to admit that in the last year or two there has been a slight increase in the prices of some commodities that the farmer grows; wheat, for instance, has advanced a good deal over two years ago; the price of hogs has advanced, and so on. But even to-day the basic industry of Ontario is in dire distress. If, therefore, there is any possibility of bringing the cost of administration of this act down, the minister should do so. I go further and say that if it is not possible to bring it down so that the rate charged may not exceed four per cent, then anything above that the government and the country should pay. I say that for this reason: the farmer gets no benefit from unemployment insurance. As to unemployment insurance let me say that if the bill when it comes in meets with the approval of the opposition, speaking only for myself, I shall be glad to support it. But it affords relief only to certain classes of workers. So far as the farmer is concerned it will cost him something and he will get nothing. Even, therefore, if the cost of administration of this proposed legislation for the relief of the farmers is considerable, I think the government should bear that charge so that the rate of interest shall not be over four per cent. That would go a long way towards helping the farmers of this country.

I do not know whether the Minister of Finance is familiar with the plight of the farmers in Ontario, which is a great agricultural province. The part of the province from which I come, and the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house, in normal times is one of the most prosperous farming communities in Ontario. I want to point out to the minister that with few exceptions farmers who a few years ago were in a comfortable position, with either no mortgages or small mortgages on their farms, and in many cases with resources laid up in the way of investments or money in the bank, now find themselves right up against it. In almost every case the resources which were laid up for a rainy day have disappeared. I am not going to blame that condition on this government, but it is a condition that exists. If the government knew the plight of the farmers in this province and understood their difficulties they would realize that unless a rate of interest of four per cent or less is secured on loans to farmers, this legislation will not be of much help.

This afternoon the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) read some statistics with regard to the earnings of farmers throughout the dominion. If I understood him correctly the hon. member said that for the calendar year 1933 the average earning of the farmer amounted to something over $600, while in 1934 that average had increased to something over $700. How is a farmer with a family, with a mortgage on his farm and with taxes to pay, to navigate financially with an income of less than $800 a year? I quite agree with the statement made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Golding), that if the basic industry is not prosperous there can be no prosperity for anyone. The farmers have the buying power; they have the largest spending power of any industry in Canada, and when that spending power is curtailed or almost cut off, as it has been for the last four or five years, they find themselves in dire distress. So I would urge the Minister of Finance to do everything possible to get the rate of interest down to four per cent.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that in the county from which I come many farms that have been perhaps handed down from father to son, or owned by the one family for many years, have been practically taken away during the last four years because the farmers have been unable to pay either the interest or the principal of the mortgages. If you go around the rural sections of Ontario, and particularly western Ontario, you will find many vacant, deserted farms, with taxes and interest arrears accumulating, representing a condition that is almost intolerable. If this legislation will give the farmers any relief I am all for it, no matter what may be the cost of administering the act. Just here I might say to the minister and to the government, in regard to the cost of administration, that the governmental machinery of this country is too expensive. In almost every department there is duplication as between the federal and provincial governments, which only adds to the cost. I am not saying this in a critical or offensive way, but there are too many members of the outside civil service travelling up and down the country. It is costing too much money, and in the final analysis the consumer has to pay for it. In connection with this legislation the minister might well set a good example by not having too many officials and thus curtailing the expense of administration.

I do not think I have a great deal more to say, Mr. Speaker. Local boards were referred to several times this afternoon. In my opinion the setting up of local boards will only add unnecessary expense, and if it would mean any saving I would recommend that the minister cut out the local boards in order to reduce expenses to the bone and set a good example to the other departments.

There is just one other point to which I should like to refer. I said many farms in the province of Ontario were vacant, but there is another side to the question that I do not think has been considered as yet. Back in 1918, 1919 and 1920, when conditions were what we called prosperous, when farmers were receiving big prices for everything they had to sell and when trade and commerce was expanding—and expenses were expanding as well—many well to do farmers in my part of the country, like other business men of that period, branched out and added a second and in some instances a third farm at prices at least double what they would have to pay to-day. In almost every case they had to borrow money and give a mortgage covering not only the second or third farm but also their home farm. To-day those men are in a terrible condition. They have not sufficient income to pay the interest on the mortgage, and they are loaded up with farm property on which, in many instances, they could not realize twenty-five per cent of the cost. I mention this to indicate to the minister the condition of the farmers in old Ontario, and to show that they need some assistance from this government. I hope this measure is only the beginning of the assistance that will be rendered by the government to the agriculturists of the province of Ontario.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the house for more than a moment. I really cannot take part in this debate because I was not in the house when the resolution was presented and explained; I was not here because I was attending the sitting of the royal commission on price spreads.

I should like to refer for a moment, however, to something said this evening by my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon). If I understood the hon. gentleman aright—and if I did not he will correct me—he blamed the government of Quebec for not having passed enabling legislation in connection with the amendments made to the farm loan act last session. I hold no brief for the Quebec government, but I think it only fair to say that one of the main amendments of last year, in fact the only important amendment, concerned the second mortgage that might be secured by a person who had already received a loan from the farm loan board. The amendment provided that the second mortgage could be secured on the land, live stock or other personal property of the farmer. Of course the hon. member for Dorchester knows very well that in the province of Quebec, under our legal system, there is no mortgage on personal property, on live stock or on chattels. A chattel mortgage is unknown in that province. Perhaps that was the reason the Quebec government did not pass enabling legislation to put into force in the province of Quebec the amendments made to the Canadian Farm Loan Act at the last session.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, unless the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act are made supplementary neither piece of legislation will be as great a benefit to the farmer as was originally anticipated. I understand the mortgage indebtedness on farms in this country to-day is about $700,000,000. I suppose most of that sum will be readjusted under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and if it is not it should be. In view of the fact that there is such a huge mortgage indebtedness in Canada—

Mr. HANBURY: Is it all on farms?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Yes, on farms only. In view of that fact I am quite convinced we shall certainly require more than the original $15,000,000 voted in this chamber, and I venture to say we will need even more than the $90,000,000 spoken of to-night. The government should be congratulated, however, upon increasing the amount from $40,000,000 to $90,000,000, because the farmers will be benefited at least doubly thereby.

Just before I left for Ottawa I met a farmer in my district who told me that provided he paid his indebtedness to the mortgage company they were willing to reduce his debt by thirty-five per cent. The nigger in the woodpile lies in the fact that he is absolutely unable to get credit to discharge that indebtedness. The only way he could get it would be through the farm loan board, at a lower rate of interest and on more reasonable terms. I agree with hon. members who say that the interest rates should be reduced to four per cent. Very few people realize what a reduction of one per cent means to a farmer; in many cases it means the difference between success and failure. I believe these two pieces of legislation should be complementary, otherwise the farmers will not derive from them the benefit that they should.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in the few moments at my disposal—

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member for Queens spoken before?

Mr. MYERS: No, not on this question. I am sorry to have to speak now, and I can assure hon. members I should have had no notion in the world of doing so had it not been for one remark made by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), a remark which to my way of thinking was not only contrary to the facts but was quite unfair.

He said that during the last four years there had not been a single thing done in this House of Commons to aid the farmers. I like to see a debate conducted on a fair and square plan. I recall the very first act of this government, at the first session, was to pave the way for the Ottawa conference agreements. I have in my mind, too, legislation for debt adjustments, the marketing act and the wheat bonus.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MYERS: The hon. member has spoken. Almost everything that has been done in this House of Commons during the life of this parliament has been done with the aim and object of aiding our farmers. Let me say further that I do not know of one piece of legislation passed by this government to aid farmers which was not strenuously opposed by almost every member on the opposite side of the house.

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. member made his speech last night on the Ottawa agreements.

Mr. MYERS: I did not speak last night on this motion, and I have the right to say something at the present time. The hon. member who has just interrupted is one of the worst objectors in the house; he objects to everything which would benefit or alleviate conditions under which the farmers are operating.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bury in the chair.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that we could introduce the bill to-night and thus avoid practically a week's delay. I have sat here for six solid hours and have not had an opportunity to say a word, because according to the rules I have no right to reply on the motion to go into committee. I am making no complaint; I am merely stating that I feel it my duty to reply to certain observations which have been made. Under the circumstances I shall move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 4, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS ASSEMBLY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): In answer to an inquiry by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) I have to advise that the report of the fifteenth assembly of the League of Nations for 1934 was printed in English and French when I tabled copies on January 24 last. I understand there was some delay in the distribution office, but the report had been printed when I laid copies on the table.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

IMPORTS OF BUTTER

Mr. MULOCK:

1. What were the quantities of butter exported to Canada during the years 1931 to 1934, inclusive, by: (a) New Zealand; (b) Australia?
2. What were the prices of the butter each month during the above mentioned years at the Canadian port of entry?
3. What were the duties, dumping penalty, or other taxation imposed per pound each month during the above period?

Mr. BENNETT: There might be a little difficulty in connection with this question. Perhaps the hon. member would change the words "exported to" to "imported into". What may have been exported from these countries and the destination of which may have been changed we could not control, but we can give information as to actual imports into the country.

Mr. MULOCK: Quite satisfactory.

Question stands.

PROCLAMATION OF STATUTES

Mr. BRASSET:

What are the statutes adopted at the last session which were to come in force on proclamation and which have not yet been proclaimed?

Mr. BENNETT: It has not been usual to ask members of the administration to answer a question of this character which the hon. gentleman can answer for himself, as every member receives copies of the statutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

EMPIRE MIGRATION POLICY

Mr. STEVENS:

1. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to an answer given in the British House of Commons on November 13, 1934, by the Secretary of State for the Dominions to Brig.-General J. J. H. Nation, regarding the empire migration policy?
2. Did the Prime Minister receive a dispatch from the Secretary of State for the Dominions in regard to the subject?
3. If so, on what date was such dispatch received?
4. Has a reply yet been sent to this dispatch?
5. If so, will a copy of said dispatch and reply be laid on the table of the house?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Yes.
2. A dispatch was received from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, transmitting copies of a report of the United Kingdom Interdepartmental Committee on Migration Policy and intimating that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom had not had an opportunity of considering the report.

A further dispatch was received requesting any observations which His Majesty's government in Canada might wish to make thereon.

3. On September 14 and November 24, respectively.

4. The report was referred to the departments interested for consideration from the Canadian point of view. The general position of the Canadian government on the subject of migration had previously been set forth in personal discussions in London. A draft official reply to the second dispatch has been prepared, but has not yet been sent, pending further consideration of the bearing of conditions in the drought area and of urban unemployment upon the possibilities of land settlement and increased migration generally.

5. In accordance with the usual procedure, the consent of the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs for tabling his dispatches is being requested, and copies of these dispatches and of the reply of the Canadian government will be furnished as soon as they are available.

SHIPMENTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Does the Post Office Department allow the shipping of goods to Russia by parcel post?

2. If so, must an invoice be placed in each parcel?

3. Is it necessary to get a licence from the Soviet authorities for all the parcels shipped in trading with Russia?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Yes—parcel post being routed through England or France.

2 and 3. Yes.

MARKETING ACT

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. What moneys have been expended, if any, by the federal government with respect to the Natural Products Marketing Act?

2. For what purposes were such moneys, if any, expended?

3. Have any moneys been expended on the organization of provincial boards?

4. If so, how much has been expended in each province respectively?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. $3,493.62 as at 31st December, 1934.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. LAURIN:

Did the Quebec government make a formal proposal to the federal government looking to an agreement in relation to unemployment with a view to exempt municipalities from contributing to unemployment relief expenditures?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

CATTLE—TUBERCULIN TESTS

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald):

1. In what municipalities in Manitoba were tuberculosis tests of cattle made during the year 1934?

2. What dates were tests started?

3. What dates were tests completed?

4. Are any additional municipalities to be tested during the coming year?

5. If so, what are the names of said municipalities?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. Under the restricted area plan—none.
Individual herds tested under other policies in all parts of Manitoba.

2. See No. 1.

3. See No. 1.

4. Yes.

5. Morris and Louise.

INCOME AND SALES TAX COLLECTIONS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What was the total amount collected by income tax in the last fiscal year?

2. How many paid income tax with incomes below the following amounts: (a) $3,000; (b) $20,000; (c) $50,000; (d) all others?

3. How much was collected by sales tax during the last fiscal year?

Mr. MATTHEWS:

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TEXT OF GENEVA CONVENTIONS TO BE PLACED ON ORDER PAPER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before we proceed to the next order I should like to inform the house that it is my purpose in order that business may be expedited to have printed after each of the resolutions standing in my name on page 12 of the order paper the conventions to which the resolutions refer so that they will appear on the order paper to-morrow with the conventions. I find that only a few copies remain for distribution. This will render it possible for all the members to read the conventions to which reference is made in the resolutions.

NATIONALIZATION OF BANKS

PROPOSAL THAT CREDIT AND CURRENCY SHALL BE CONTROLLED AND ADMINISTERED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, all banking facilities, including both the chartered banks and the central bank, should be nationalized as speedily as possible.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this question of nationalizing the banking facilities of Canada has been put forward in this corner of the house for many years. In fact, I think it was in the first speech that I was ever privileged to make here that I offered the suggestion. Since that date it has been moved or discussed at almost every session since 1922. Perhaps the most notable attempt to have the house adopt this principle was in 1932 when on April 27 of that year a resolution moved from this section was voted upon. I shall have occasion to draw the attention of the house to that discussion later, but my object in making mention of the number of times this question has been discussed is merely to say that I do not propose to cover the old ground of argument. It is sufficient I think to draw the attention of hon. members once more to the main principle involved in the resolution and to seek the endorsation of the house for that principle. The principle of the resolution is that the financial instruments of the nation and the social credit by and through which such instruments operate should not be controlled by individuals for private ends but that currency and credit should be in the hands of the government and administered by a body responsible to the government and to parliament. This principle I venture to suggest is growing in favour.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I find it just the least bit difficult to hear at this end of the chamber.

Mr. IRVINE: The pressure of the tragic effects of the past few years has made some limping minds make haste in regard to their consideration of this question. My conviction is that the Canadian people would very readily endorse this principle were they given an opportunity to vote on it directly. Unfortunately all questions such as this, being included in the programs of the various parties, when they go to the people are entangled by partisan considerations and it is seldom if ever that the people have an opportunity of voting directly on a measure that they might otherwise endorse. If this question were submitted to the people by referendum I would be surprised if this question were submitted to them by referendum if it were not carried by a tremendous majority.

The government of the day has to some extent acknowledged the principle of national ownership. If we take note of the central bank act which was passed last session we shall find that a considerable number of restrictions are placed there against private operators doing what they please with the national credit, principles of restriction which we do not find in any other bank act which has ever been passed in Canada. This would seem to indicate that the government is well aware that it is not safe to entrust to private corporations without any control by the government, the whole financial structure and facilities of the country. But I would draw the attention of the house to a direct statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) when discussing the bill on its second reading. I am quoting from Hansard of 1934, page 826 where the minister, having described the functions of the central bank, made this statement:

> It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the exercise of these functions lies outside the power of any single commercial institution or groups of commercial institutions. No purely profit-making institution operating in a competitive system can afford to place social interests before its own in regard to credit policy.

That statement embodies the whole question at issue in the discussion of this resolution. It is frankly there admitted that the very pressure of competition would preclude a private enterprise from taking an unbiased view of certain financial issues. When with that we consider the fact that those who control our banking facilities are in the business for their private profit, we have there an additional reason why they should not be entrusted with the powers which they to-day have both in the central bank and in the chartered banks.

I am glad that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was so explicit in his statement regarding this principle. I regret of course, as I said last year, that the Bank of Canada was not socially or nationally owned at its inception, but although it was not taken over by the government last year I know no good reason why it should not be taken over this year, if the house has changed its opinion. I hope that both the hon. gentlemen to your right, Mr. Speaker, as well as hon. gentlemen to your left, will rise in their seats and vote for this resolution when the time comes. I know that the principle of financial control and ownership by the government has been very strongly advocated by certain left-wing Liberals; I have been much cheered by hearing them advocate it, in the west especially, in the last four years. These left-wing Liberals have advocated the nationalization of finance, and have stated over and over again that that is part of the Liberal policy at this time. I hope that is true. If it is then of course we are going to receive for this resolution to-day much greater support than it has received at any other time in this house. I should like to see this resolution accepted, I hope the government will accept it, but if the government does not accept it I hope that at any rate every hon. member to your left, sir, will support it when the vote is taken.

Mr. HANBURY: We will not.

Mr. IRVINE: An hon. gentleman says he will not. I wish he would write a letter to Mr. Gerry McGeer and tell him that. I wish he would inform the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) that he will not vote for this. Then we should at least know where we are and whether the Liberal party does or does not stand for this principle. If nationalization of banking has become a part of the Liberal policy it has been adopted quite recently. Of course, there is no harm in that; I do not see why the Liberal party should not have the privilege of changing its mind, but I refer back to the debate which took place on this very question on June 27, 1932, to which I referred in my opening remarks. At that time the C.C.F. had moved for the nationalization of our banking facilities and the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the Liberal party, had this to say on the subject:

> May I in the first instance ask this question of those who have moved this subamendment: If our financial system is to be nationalized, whom are you going to entrust with that work? Are you going to entrust the government opposite with it? Are you going to entrust hon. gentlemen opposite, who have dealt with the tariff in the manner in which they have, under the freedom which has been given them, to nationalize the finances of this country? Yet that is what this amendment is suggesting, because it is addressed to parliament as it exists at the present time. May I ask another question? Were a Liberal administration in office would you entrust a Liberal administration with that task? May I ask still another question? Were you in office yourselves would you undertake the work of nationalizing the finances of the country? I do not believe that any group of persons who have given thought to these matters would attempt a task of that kind in Canada at this time. And, if we ourselves would not undertake a scheme such as this, what would be thought of Canada by other countries if it were announced to-morrow that this House of Commons had attempted any such task as the one indicated in the subamendment?

That was the position taken in 1932, and I have not heard any statement from the leader of the Liberal party in this house contrary to the position he took then. I know he made a statement last year on this issue, which was not as clear as it might have been, and he quoted it a few days ago in a debate in this house. I shall quote it again. He said:

> Liberalism believes that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to the average citizen. It stands for the immediate establishment of a properly constituted national central bank, to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue, considered in terms of public need. A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people; and also to deal with the problems of international commerce and exchange.

In the first part of that statement it seems that the right hon. leader of the opposition was leaning towards the principle of socialization of finance, but I must query the meaning of "a properly constituted national bank." If my memory serves me right the right hon. gentleman gave some explanation last year of what he meant by a national bank, namely, that it should be national in the sense that all stock should be owned by Canadians. That, it is true, is one kind of national bank. Another kind of national bank is one that is just called a national bank. Another kind is a private corporation such as we have in the Bank of Canada, which has been given by this parliament statutory authority to deal with the credit policy of this country. What I would like to know is whether the leader of the opposition meant by this statement that the Liberal party stands for properly consituted, nationally-owned and nationally-controlled banking and credit facilities in Canada. That is what I should like to be sure about. It seems, I say, that the Liberal party is coming towards the acceptance of that view, and I sincerely hope it is. I know that the left-wingers have come to it. The statement of the leader of the opposition a few days ago, which I have just quoted, would seem to indicate that he has some inclination that way. I am glad to have the opportunity of putting this question before the house in the hope that the Liberal party will rise and vote for this resolution and make it a real issue in Canada. In view of the very general endorsement which the principle has received from the people themselves, in view of the fact that the government in some small measure has recognized the principle involved in this resolution in the restrictions imposed upon the central bank, and in view of the statements of Liberals on the hustings and the rather veiled statement of the leader of the opposition, it would appear that the principle is pretty well accepted that no individual or private corporation should be entrusted with the management, ownership and control of banking and credit facilities in Canada. If that principle has been as universally adopted as certain statements would indicate, then I see no reason why we should hesitate to take action commensurate with our acceptance of the principle.

The house will note that the resolution calls for the nationalization of financial facilities, which include not only the central bank but the chartered banks of Canada as well. The chartered banks, of course, are the means by which the policy of the central bank may become effective. There is no other machinery and there are no other facilities by means of which the central bank can effect its purpose in the control of credit, and I think the house will agree when I say that the chartered banks have it within their power, if they so desire, to render futile any policy of a nationally owned central bank, so that it would be entirely inadequate and indeed, I would say, foolish for this parliament to stop short of nationalizing the whole financial system. It is not sufficient that we should advocate the socialization of the central bank alone; we must have the socialization of all the facilities that are essential in the handling of our financial system.

We in this corner of the house believe that both the central bank and the chartered banks should be nationally owned and controlled. I am not advocating the taking over of the chartered banks with their capital stocks and their huge, palatial buildings on the most expensive corners of the various cities. I am advocating the nationalization of the facilities, the taking from the bank of the power they now have of dispensing credit. That power was granted to them by an act of this parliament; that power can be taken from them in the same way. As to the details of dealing with them in the taking over process that is a matter of comparatively little consequence. I do not see why the property of the banks should not be treated as the property of any other corporation is treated, which has been superseded by a more effective institution or which has become defunct for any reason whatever. Of course the equipment of the banks may be taken over, if the government needs it, at the replacement value, and probably the banks would be very glad to make any arrangement of that sort. I merely want to indicate that any difficulty which might be encountered with the banks after we had taken out of their hands the facilities which they now administer would be a small matter compared to the great question of the control of credit by the nation in the interests of the people.

Now I should like to spend a few moments on the main object of the nationalization of finance. To nationalize our banking system and to go no further would not help us at all. It will be clear that we could nationalize the banking system and continue the same system that we have now, under national control. That is not the objective we have in view, of course. We ask for the nationalization of our financial facilities because finance must be reorganized on the exclusive basis of public service, and while these institutions are in private hands we are not allowed to reorganize them on that basis. But when we have nationalized them we will have an opportunity to regain access to the social or national credit in order that it may be used properly, scientifically and safely in the interests of the people as a whole. In the next place, if we secure control of these institutions we will be free to reorganize the whole financial structure on a goods and services basis instead of a theoretical metallic basis, which, although largely discarded throughout the world, still limits the operation of finance in this country. I think no one will deny that to-day finance is the most important instrument of reform that the government may find at its hand. Our financial instruments have been and still are handled in a manner which has very effectively defeated the object of industry. Those of us who last year read time and again of the vast quantities of goods destroyed by capitalistic administrators throughout the world, while on the other hand in all those countries there were millions of people in dire need of the very goods so wantonly destroyed realize just how important money is to the economic life of the people. I do not think anyone will deny that if the people had money in their pockets it would not be necessary to destroy much of our goods. I do not think anyone will deny that this is economic waste; it is worse, it is economic insanity for an industrial concern to engage in the production of goods and then proceed to destroy those goods instead of having them go to the consumers, which was the only reason for their production.

I have said that we hope to regain access to social credit. That social credit is the belief in the power of the people of Canada to produce the goods and services that are necessary for the well being of the Canadian people, and the willingness to finance both production and distribution to the extent of our capacity to produce these goods and services. If that financing principle is adopted very soon we will find little difficulty with our distribution. To-day our difficulties centre largely around this question of distribution. Behind all financing, is social credit which to-day the banks have sole authority to use to any extent they desire or which they may refuse to use if they are so disposed, and for which they do not hesitate to charge the people of Canada a high rate of interest whether it is required for personal use or for social use. That social credit we want to get control of, to take out of the hands of private bankers, whether administered by a central bank or by chartered banks, and to use particularly in the solution of the distribution problem. I believe that there is a tremendous source from which we may draw financial assistance in the distribution of goods. Everyone realizes there is no use in having a well equipped system of production, one capable of producing immense quantities of goods, unless the people are permitted to use it. Whatever theory of economics we may hold I believe all of us must agree that if people have money in their pockets, and if goods are on the shelves of the warehouses of our country, those people will not starve. If we have access to social credit and are in a position to monetize the real wealth created, and find an adequate means by which that may be distributed to the consumer, then we have at least in part solved the greatest and most difficult problem which modern civilization presents. I shall not develop that point any further, for the moment, more than to say that it is with a view to creating a condition whereby the social credit resources of this country may be available to the people themselves, without restrictions imposed either as a result of superstition, the lust for profit or the incapacity of private corporations, that this resolution is moved.

Whether or not hon. members agree with many of the economic views expressed by my associates and myself, I conclude my remarks in the hope they will agree that the nationalization of finance is not only a necessary move but that now is the opportune time to make it, and that it is a move which has become so acceptable to the general public that we need not hesitate voting for its adoption.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I trust the fact that nobody, except the mover, desires to speak upon the motion does not reflect the views respecting its merits held by hon. members at large. At all events, I regard the motion as one of great importance, involving as it does an assertion of principle of great national import, and one which obligates me at least to make clear the attitude of the government with respect to it. The resolution in question reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, all banking facilities, including both the chartered banks and the central bank should be nationalized as speedily as possible.

In other words it asserts the principle that the government of Canada should own, operate and control all our banking facilities. Although that is the most important, in fact the only principle contained in the resolution, the hon. member spent a considerable proportion of his time in a discussion of economics, and a discussion of various systems of banking and financial theories. May I suggest that while such discussion may be interesting, with all due deference it has no bearing upon the resolution. It has to be assumed that the system of banking adopted in this or any other country is that system best designed to serve the purposes of the country and at this stage any attempt to compare the relative merits of this financial or economic system with the merits of other systems is entirely beside the question. I should prefer to deal with the clear assertion of principle outlined in the resolution, namely the nationalization of banks and banking facilities in this country.

Mr. HANBURY: The socialization.

Mr. RHODES: I have noted one reference the hon. member made concerning my observations of last year when moving the resolution which preceded the introduction of the bill to incorporate the Bank of Canada. The words quoted, and to be found at page 826 of Hansard, are as follows:

> It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the exercise of these functions lies outside the power of any single commercial institution or group of commercial institutions. No purely profit-making institution operating in a competitive system can afford to place social interests before its own in regard to credit policy.

Then, if you please, sir, the hon. member proceeded to draw the conclusion that it followed we must have national ownership and control.

Mr. IRVINE: I should like to point out that I did not draw that conclusion from this statement. I quoted the minister to show that in that statement he had admitted the principle.

Mr. RHODES: I certainly accept the statement the hon. member makes, although I clearly drew the inference that he asserted my observation was proof that we must have national ownership and control. I will not admit that the contention of the hon. member is correct, or that he can properly make it. The assertion I made, which I have pleasure in reasserting, has reference to the fact that we required a central bank to exercise those functions, and the manner of the set-up of that bank, the policy adopted in setting it up, the legislation surrounding it and the safeguards with respect to it, are entirely different matters.

The main question is this: Is the central bank as set up capable of performing the functions outlined in the paragraph I have quoted, and to which reference was made by the hon. member. My contention is that all of those safeguards are to be found in the set-up of the central bank, as we have it to-day. I do not purpose covering the ground I traversed either on the occasion of the introduction of the resolution preceding the bill incorporating the Bank of Canada or upon the second reading of the bill. Hon. members who are interested will find my former remarks in volume 1 of Hansard for last session, beginning at page 823. My observations on second reading begin at page 1291 in the second volume.

What does the hon. member mean by nationalization? I take it beyond question that it means complete and unfettered ownership and control and operation.

Mr. HANBURY: Socialization.

Mr. RHODES: Socialization, in other words, of our banking system, of our whole financial system, including the chartered banks. Let me say just here, lest I forget it, that my hon. friend in discussing the taking over of the chartered banks said this: I do not mean that we should take over their enormous capital structure nor their palatial bank buildings; all I mean is that we who legislated these banks into existence shall take over these facilities. Does he mean that he proposes to take over the properties of the banks without compensation? Does he mean compensation or confiscation, because it follows that if his resolution were adopted and the method he proposes were followed we should add to the national debt of this country some hundreds of millions of dollars, and that circumstance must not be lost sight of.

I do not propose, as I said before, to traverse this subject at length, much less do I propose to traverse the whole ground covered in my speeches of last year, but I do desire to emphasize this circumstance, that there is a great deal of loose thought and confusion of mind in many quarters in distinguishing between national ownership, operation and control, on the one hand, and the using of a private instrument, if I may so term it, and setting up a quasi-public trust for the purpose of accomplishing under government supervision the objects we have in mind in operating the Bank of Canada. On that point let me indicate this: While it is true that the capital for the Bank of Canada is provided by the public, it must be borne in mind that if the government itself provided all the capital, it in turn would have to borrow that capital from the public, so from that angle it matters not whether you issue bonds bearing 4½ per cent interest or offer stock upon which you pay 4½ per cent interest. It is true that the rate of interest varies, but while the maximum amount which will ever be paid to the shareholders of the Bank of Canada is 4½ per cent, it must be borne in mind that we are not far removed from the day when the government itself in borrowing money had to pay more than that to the people of Canada from whom it borrowed it.

In the first place the shares of the Bank of Canada cannot be held directly or indirectly by a bank or any bank director, officer or employee. Second, the stock must be held by British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada, and the holdings under the statute are limited to 50 shares per person; whereas, as a matter of fact, the applications for the shares were so numerous that in order to divide the shares among upwards of 12,000 people who applied for them, the maximum holding is only a fraction of the original limitation imposed.

There is also no voting by proxy, as does take place in the ordinary banks, and which makes voting a perfunctory performance, the proxies being lodged in the hands of nominees prepared by the directors of those institutions. Not that I find fault with that practice; I am merely indicating that even in this respect every safeguard was exercised, as all proxies must pass through the hands of the Minister of Finance who alone is responsible for voting at bank meetings for those who are not able to be present.

Again, the governor, the deputy governor and the assistant deputy governor are in the first instance appointed by the governor in council, and in the case of all subsequent appointments, the appointments must receive the approval of the governor in council.

Furthermore, it will be recalled that there were two important amendments introduced to the bill after it was brought into the house last year. One, which was brought in at the instance of my hon. friend, the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), provided that the governor or, in his absence or incapacity, the deputy governor, shall have a veto power over any action or decision of the board. That places an enormous responsibility in the hands of the governor, but it does at the same time prevent an undue possibility of control which might not be in the public interest on the part of the board of directors, conceding that such a situation might arise.

The second important amendment adopted was this, that the Deputy Minister of Finance is ex-officio a member of the board and of the executive committee. That certainly gives as close a contact between the government and the Bank of Canada as it would be possible to provide, making the government of the day familiar with the whole proceedings and policies and practices of the institution itself.

Then as I have already pointed out it is provided that the returns to the shareholders of the Bank of Canada is limited to a maximum of 4½ per cent, and that all profits in excess of that sum revert to the treasury of the country as provided in the act.

Lastly, but of tremendous importance, is this circumstance, that the by-laws of the board of the Bank of Canada must in all cases before they become operative be approved by order in council.

Now I submit that under these circumstances there is as complete a measure of control as it is possible for a government to have over an institution of this character. I am not going to traverse the ground that I covered last year indicating why it was that the government had come to the decision that this set-up of the Bank of Canada was preferable in the public interest, other than to say this, that by this method of control we have all the advantages of complete government operation, with none of those numerous disadvantages that would flow if the government attempted to operate a bank of this character subject to those influences, as it would be, I submit with all deference to those who may disagree with me, which I have not the slightest doubt in the world would wreck the institution from the start, if you attempted to run the bank in the public interest and surrounded by all the deadly dangers which would flow, not so much from the small questions of patronage, but from the larger questions involving the government in questions of bank policy.

I will use the simple illustration that I used last year. We had a condition in 1929 when the world was mad with the imaginary millions it was making out of the inflationary boom which occurred on the stock exchanges of the world at that time. If we had had a Bank of Canada at that day it would have been the bounden duty of the bank to have started a year prior to that time to restrict credit and to curtail it so far as it lies within the power of the central bank to prevent such a perfect maelstrom of inflation and speculation as occurred at that time. What would happen if we had a Bank of Canada owned and operated and controlled by the government of the day in view of the fact that we are only a few months removed from a general election? On the one hand you have the plain duty of the government to apply the brakes. On the other hand, you have the government faced with a general election and faced with a choice which might jeopardize its political future.

Mr. HANBURY: You might speak for your own political party.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will be good enough to rise and ask any questions that he has, I shall endeavour to answer them as best I can. In the meantime, if my hon. friend cares to discuss the question I will listen to him courteously as I would ask him to listen to myself, only asserting the right of any member of parliament to express his views so long as he does so in parliamentary language. Let me say this, in view of his interjection, that when I spoke of government I had no reference to the government of that day; I used the word government in the larger sense, and if it will please the hon. gentleman I will say this to him. Governments are composed of men; they are individuals, they are only human, and there never was and never will be a perfect government in this or any other country in the world. We must take men as we find them, and there would be that irresistible temptation to the government of the day, whether Liberal, Conservative, Co-operative Commonwealth Federation or what not, and the major interests of the country would inevitably suffer under the circumstances I have related. That circumstance alone is sufficient to indicate the force of the argument which we used at that time for the setup of the bank as we find it to-day.

One other thought before I conclude, because I do not intend to discuss this matter at length. Let us assume for the sake of discussion that the Bank of Canada as we have it set up to-day is not the proper type of setup for an institution of that character in Canada. We are a young country, and we are embarking upon a new venture fraught with great possibilities of good, we hope, and possibly of ill, but nevertheless a tremendous venture having regard to the financial future of the country. Is it not the part of wisdom in these circumstances to profit by the experiences of other countries that have traversed the same ground during the last ten or fifteen years which we shall have to traverse in the next ten or twenty? We have not only the consensus of opinion of students of finance but the results of practical experience to teach us almost overwhelmingly the fact that the type of institution which we require is one similar in character to that found in the Bank of Canada—in other words, that we should get away from the type of government owned, controlled and operated institution. Be that as it may, however, we are profiting by the experience of other countries and other peoples in the way in which we have set up this bank. Next year, two years, three years, four years hence, we may find that we have been mistaken. I do not think we shall. But it would be far wiser for us to profit first by the experience of other countries and secondly by our own experience here before embarking upon a radical policy which runs counter to the experience of other countries in relation to central banking institutions. I leave that thought with the house, whether, we are not wise, now that we have set up a central bank, with its present status approved by parliament, to give that bank a chance to operate, and then we shall have our experience to guide us in the future.

I propose to leave my remarks at that, except to say that for the reasons I have indicated, among numerous others which I might point out; and for the reasons I gave in much more extended form in the two speeches I made, first on the introduction of the resolution and again on the second reading of the bill last year, I would ask the house to reject the motion.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): May I say at once that I had no intention of taking part in this particular debate but for some of the statements made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes).

Mr. RHODES: Naturally.

Mr. EULER: Sometimes, indeed rather frequently, resolutions are brought up in this house with parts of which we may agree and with other parts of which we may not entirely concur, and this is a resolution of that kind. The resolution calls for the nationalization of the Bank of Canada and also for the nationalization of the chartered banks of the country. As the house knows very well, and as I think the country knows, though the people may just as well be reminded of the fact for fear of misrepresentation afterwards, we on this side of the house were last year almost entirely in favour of a publicly owned central bank, though we may not be inclined, at least now—I am speaking for myself—to go as far as the nationalization of the chartered banks of Canada.

In the banking and commerce committee last year, when the renewal of the bank charters was under consideration, and also the formation of a central bank, I heard the Prime Minister say that originally he was in favour of a publicly owned central bank but that upon consideration he felt it was not in the public interest to have a publicly owned institution of that kind. The reasons he gave for that view were startling to myself, because it was a reflection not only upon himself but upon his government, upon members of parliament and upon governments in general. He gave as his reason why the central bank should not be publicly owned the suggestion that it was too dangerous, that governments could not be trusted to administer the affairs of a central bank if it were publicly owned.

With that view I wish to take issue entirely, as I did at the time. We have fifteen or sixteen ministers in charge of portfolios, charged with the responsibility of spending hundreds of millions of dollars each year. I do not think the public is particularly alarmed at any thought that members of parliament, members of the cabinet, are not to be trusted in the administration of the country's business, and I for one wish to take distinct issue with the casting of reflection on governments, even this government, and the suggestion that it could not properly carry out the duties that would devolve upon officials of a central bank merely because a general election was in sight. I am quite willing that the Prime Minister should speak for himself and his government, but as an actual fact it is not a fair criticism to make of governments in Canada in general, and certainly it is not borne out by the history of governments in this country in the past, no matter what party they represented.

A moment ago I referred to the fact that the bank charters were renewed last year, and this thought occurs to me. Now that we are entering upon certain reform policies, with most of which I am in entire agreement, inasmuch as they accord pretty well with what I have said in the last two years in this house—what I sometimes call my socialistic speeches—and now that there has been a change of heart on the part of this government and more particularly of the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that the government is now practically nationalizing the loan companies in the legislation that has just been brought down and will be brought down, I am wondering whether, if they had experienced this change of heart a year ago, they might not have been in favour of the resolution which is now before us. So much for the central bank.

I want to put myself on record, and I speak for most of my colleagues on this side, that we are still in favour of a publicly owned central bank. I have no such fears as the Minister of Finance has expressed, and other fears perhaps ill founded, that though we have given to what is after all still a privately-owned bank such tremendous powers as we have handed over to the central bank we could not give those powers to a publicly owned bank. I need not refer to all the arguments that have been advanced in this regard. We are handing over all our own gold and all the gold of the chartered banks to this privately-owned bank and the privilege of issuing currency, though not as much as they should have; moreover they have the control of credit in their hands. I for one do not think that power should remain in the hands of a privately-owned bank. I might point out this, as it was done last year I believe more particularly by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), that through the creation of a privately-owned central bank we are now actually subtracting from the powers that were formerly exercised by the government of this country. In former days we had under the Finance Act to some extent the credit-issuing power through the treasury board which is really a committee of the cabinet. That power has been taken away from us and been given to a privately-owned central bank.

So far as the chartered banks are concerned may I say this:—I have said it in the house and before the banking committee last year—the power to issue currency should not remain with the chartered banks and I am sorry that the government, instead of taking only a portion of that authority away from the chartered banks, has not taken the whole of it. As the matter now stands, the chartered banks will be deprived of the privilege—and it is a privilege—of issuing currency during a period of some ten years, but even then they will still have the power to issue currency to the extent of 25 per cent. I would ask the Minister of Finance if I am right.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Personally, I think the government should have gone the whole way and taken the entire power of the issuance of currency away from the chartered banks and given it to the central bank.

Mr. RHODES: Will my hon. friend object to one question?

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend of course keeps in mind this fact—and I am quite sure he would not wish the question to be a long one—although it is true the 25 per cent will still remain at the time of the next decennial revision, it was left there for the purpose of being dealt with at that period, and he also is aware, I take it, there is no implied suggestion that that should continue.

Mr. EULER: Ten years is a long time and I cannot for the life of me see why if we adopt the principle that the government or the central bank should in future have power to issue currency we should take that power only to a degree and only from year to year. I have never heard any good argument advanced why, if we adopt the principle that that power of issuing currency should be taken away from the chartered banks we should not take it to the full one hundred per cent and I do not think it should take ten years to subtract that authority from the chartered banks.

I did not intend to take up so much of the time of the house and did so for only two reasons: first, the aspersion—and I think I may call it that—which was cast by the Prime Minister and again by the Minister of Finance upon the integrity and strength of character that ought to animate any government that has the interests of the people at heart, in suggesting that they could not properly and honestly administer the functions that naturally belong to a central bank. In the second place I want to put myself on record that I have not retreated and I do not think those on this side have retreated from the position we took last year that we are entirely in favour of a publicly owned and controlled central bank of Canada.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I did not rise immediately after the speech of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) in deference to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) who I thought would like to answer directly the statements made by the hon. member. I have listened to the minister with a great deal of interest. I was somewhat surprised to hear him say that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin had rather rambled, though he did not use that word, on the various money systems, I thought the hon. member for Wetaskiwin kept fairly close to the present banking system but suggested how it might be used for better purposes. The Minister of Finance spent most of his time in referring to one part of the resolution, that dealing with the central bank. I have no complaint with regard to that except that I believe we would have been very glad had he said something about the possibility of taking over the other banking institutions.

So far as the institution of a central bank is concerned, I think this is a very big step in the right direction; I said so last session. On the motion for third reading I moved a resolution which I will read to the house and although it was defeated, I felt the central bank as placed before us was so much better than no bank at all that I supported the measure on the third reading. On the motion for third reading I moved this amendment:

> That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power to amend so as to provide a stable currency and credit system based on goods and services, limited only to the needs of industry and social services and not by gold; to make available the national credit at cost for governmental services, and so lighten the terrific burden of debt.

Had that been passed I believe we would have been in a better position than we are at present. However it was not passed. The position we were placed in was either to vote against the third reading which would mean that we did not want the bank at all and that we were playing into the hands of commercial banks who did not want a central bank or, on the other hand, to vote for it which would mean that we felt we were taking at least one step in the right direction.

I noticed that the Minister of Finance in referring to the capitalization of the central bank said that practically all the shareholders had was the privilege of supplying the money for its capitalization. He went on to say that even if the government had subscribed that capital they would have had to borrow the money from the public. Surely the Minister of Finance must think the members of the House of Commons know very little of the money and banking system and of finance when he makes a statement of that sort. He must know quite well—and I am sure he does—that the effect of every bank loan is the means of putting new money into circulation to the amount of the loan. That being so, the government would not have had to borrow money for the capitalization of its bank but would have done exactly as the banks do to-day: when making a loan they would have written that much money into the existing structure based on the credit of this dominion. Before sitting down he made the statement that we must be very careful before starting anything of a radical character. I would like to remind him that nearly every single plank of the new reform program that is being put forward so ably to-day by the Prime Minister and his associates was looked upon for many years, indeed, prior to twelve months ago, as radical measures.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Which one is radical?

Mr. SPENCER: The motion before us calls upon the house to nationalize our banking system. If it were giving every satisfaction, there is no doubt that resolution would not be moved. One reason why the present banking system—and I particularly refer to the private banking system—is not satisfactory is that it is carried on for a profit motive. I have a statement in a very interesting memorandum by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) himself, which I think was sent to all hon. members. Referring to the central bank, he said, on page 10:

> Definite and drastic limitation of profits removes any possible danger which otherwise might attach to private ownership of shares. The Bank of Canada, however, is an institution expressly created for the purpose of safeguarding the public interest with regard to our monetary and banking system. This feature clearly sets it apart from all ordinary financial enterprises, which, of course, exist for the purpose of making maximum profits for their owners.

That is a statement with which I think we all agree. It is because of that fact, that the private commercial banking system is carried on for profit, for maximum profit, that in many cases it is not carried on in the interest of the people at large. Hon. members know perfectly well, I am sure, that the chief way by which money is put into circulation by the banking institutions is either by making loans or by buying securities in the open market; and the way money is taken out of circulation is largely by the cancellation of loans, or the sale of securities. The old idea that a money system dealt chiefly with coin and currency is entirely out of date. Some outstanding bankers admit that only about six per cent of our whole monetary medium consists of currency and coin; the other ninety-four per cent is brought into being in the way I have mentioned, by ledger entries drawable by cheque. Those ledger entries are made by the banks upon taking good security from their clients. I support this statement by the authority of four men of world eminence. Mr. J. M. Keynes, the famous economist says:

> There can be no doubt that all deposits are created by the banks.

I might remind the house that every loan that is made creates a deposit of an equal amount, and when loans are cancelled, in the same degree the sum total of deposits is reduced.

Then I refer to a statement by Hon. R. McKenna, chairman of the Midland Bank, and one time Chancellor of the British Exchequer. He said:

> I am afraid the ordinary citizen will not like to be told that the banks can, and do, create and destroy money. The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or decreasing deposits . . . they who control the credit of a nation direct the policy of governments, and hold in the hollow of their hands the destiny of the people.

Although we have gone a considerable way towards controlling Canada's central bank we have not gone nearly far enough in controlling the actions of the private commercial banks. It is because of the powers they have at the present time that this resolution was moved.

Then may I refer to the British Macmillan report of finance and industry, which states:

> It is not unnatural to think of the deposits of a bank as being created by the public, through the deposit of cash representing either savings or amounts which are not for the time being required to meet expenditures. But the bulk of the deposits arise out of the action of the banks themselves, for by granting loans, allowing money to be drawn on an overdraft or purchasing securities a bank creates a credit in its books, which is the equivalent of a deposit.

Then we have a very interesting statement by Sir R. Kindersley, at one time a director of the Bank of England, which also supports the statement I made a few minutes ago:

> Deposits of the commercial banks—

He is referring to Great Britain:

> —amount to about £2,000,000,000 but this large amount has not, of course, been created by the deposit of actual cash, but has resulted in great measure from credit created by the bankers by the lending of money. The difference between the actual cash in its own till . . . and the total of the deposits represents approximately the extent to which the bank may be said to have manufactured deposits by the creation and sale of credit money.

It is through the power of the banks to create money at will and to call money in at will that the extraordinary fluctuations that have taken place in recent years, and the differences in price levels that have interfered with trade so badly in this and other countries have been brought about. May I for a moment refer to the fact that the total of loans made by banks in Canada amounted in 1926 to $1,229,000,000. At that time trade was on the upward trend, values were increasing and the banks thought it safe to make loans as fast as they could and were vying with each other in putting new money into circulation in that way. The result was that we had a steady rise in the loans made by the banks and the price level, until in 1929 they had out in loans no less than $1,864,000,000, an increase over 1926 of $635,000,000. Naturally prices rose. Then in 1929 came the collapse, the banks were afraid of their security dropping below the amounts loaned, so they began to call in loans in every direction, with the result that very soon business was left prostrated. Looking at the figures for 1932 we find that instead of having $1,864,000,000 they had reduced loans to $1,291,000,000, a reduction in those three years of $573,000,000. By the next year, 1933, the reduction from 1929 was no less than $704,000,000.

It is because of this enormous power which the banks have in regard to increasing or decreasing the amount of money in circulation that we put forward this resolution today. If the banks did only what some of them claim, just loaned money placed with them, it would not be so bad, but instead they use the private or national credit, or both, in increasing the money from time to time when they think it is safe to do so.

The Minister of Finance in reply to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin referred to what happened in 1929. He said the world was mad. But correcting that madness was left entirely in the hands of the private banking institutions, which left the country prostrate, as we know; a condition from which we have not yet recovered. The finance minister thinks that the present central bank will be strong enough so to regulate our credit and currency in the future that that sort of thing will not happen again. I hope his judgment is correct; however I very much doubt whether, even with the powers we have given to the central bank, it will be in a position to regulate the banking system in the real interests of the people. I say without hesitation that, from the point of view of encouraging or sustaining the great industry of agriculture, for many years the banking institutions of this country have been absolutely useless. I say that because in the early days they encouraged people to get in debt in the worst way, yet when the people were in debt the banks gave probably less sympathy and consideration to agriculture than they gave to any other business in this country. I find that so particularly in western Canada, which I know much better than I know the east. We find that interest rates always have been too high, that terms have been always too short, and that renewals have been always too uncertain.

With these three factors facing agriculture a farmer has run great risk indeed in attempting to do business through a bank. He has had to turn over his commodities from six months to three years. Usually the bank regulations have required that notes be renewed every three months. I hold in my hand a statement sent me a few days ago by a man who borrowed $1,000 in a certain year at eight per cent interest. This loan, with interest compounded about every three months in five years developed into a debt of $1,560. I know of other cases which I need not mention at this time, but I am quite sure that many other hon. members could give similar instances.

It is refreshing to find that people other than those interested in agriculture are taking a keen interest in the matter of banking reform. Not only those engaged in industry but, in many instances, the bankers themselves are taking a vital interest in what is being done and what should be done. It gives me great hope when I read statements by such men as Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, who places the situation with regard to banking economics very openly and freely before the public. I was interested also to read a statement by Sir Thomas White in his book Wartime Finance, to this effect: "During the war Canada surprised not only herself but the world when her people subscribed for war bonds twice as much money as there was in Canada, and then we had ample money left with which to carry on a growing business." Sir Thomas White knew, as everyone who has studied the subject knows, how that is done; it is through the banks making use of the national or social credit. In view of that fact we are asking that proper use should be made of our national credit through both the central bank and the commercial banks, so that the people can take advantage of their own credit instead of allowing the commercial banks to monopolize it for private profit. I say that not only people engaged in industry and in farming realize the great changes that must take place; people engaged in banking also realize that if certain changes are not made the outlook may become very serious indeed. I should like to take this opportunity of placing on record a very important resolution passed at the fourteenth annual meeting of the Bank Officers' Guild, held in London, England. It reads as follows:

> That this annual general meeting of the Bank Officers Guild desires to direct the attention of the directors of British banks to the increasing body of opinion that the present system of currency and credit control is unsuited to modern requirements. It considers that unless drastic scientific reorganization of that system is undertaken voluntarily by the banks, such a course is likely to be forced upon them by public opinion and economic pressure. It is generally accepted that modern production with the existing abundance of natural products, if properly organized, is capable of giving to our people a high standard of comfort, and the opinion is widespread that the present system of money and credit control is an obstacle in the way of a better distribution of commodities.

That resolution strongly supports the statements made a short time ago by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, who introduced this resolution. The hon. member pointed out that our problem to-day is not one of production but one of distribution, which can be solved by a proper reorganization of our monetary system. It is with the hope of having our monetary system so reorganized that it can be made to function efficiently, so that we will have no further difficulty in our distributive system, that the resolution is introduced to-day.

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, it was not until I heard the remarks of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) that I decided to take part in this debate. I enjoy listening to the hon. member, because he always contributes something to the debates of this house. He speaks without passion, and always speaks to the subject under consideration; he is moderate, and usually reasonable. As his reason for speaking this afternoon, however, the hon. member said he felt that he should rescue the reputation of the members of this chamber from what he regarded as the aspersions of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), which were more or less repeated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) this afternoon.

The hon. member for North Waterloo stated that in his opinion the Prime Minister had impugned the honesty and integrity of members of parliament. I was a little disappointed with that remark, because it did not seem up to the usual standard of my hon. friend's addresses in this house. I do not think he intended to be unfair. He may have construed the remarks of the Prime Minister in that way, but I do not think that is a reasonable construction to put upon them. I do not think anything said by the Prime Minister in speaking to us in the railway committee room could be taken for a moment as attributing to members of parliament any lack of honesty or integrity. The Prime Minister was pointing out that in times of abnormal prosperity—

Mr. EULER: He said before an election.

Mr. BEYNON: Quite so, but he also said that in a time of abnormal prosperity great pressure is brought to bear upon those who have control of credit and finance. I think we are all agreed as to that. The Prime Minister said that no administration, no matter how honest it might be or how irreproachable its integrity might be, could possibly resist that pressure during a great financial boom. I need only refer to what is known particularly by hon. members from the west, in regard to the local councils; they were actually compelled by public opinion to spend money like drunken sailors when they knew they were doing wrong However public opinion was so strong, people were so optimistic and the boom was at such a height that it was impossible to resist the pressure.

We have another example of this and in what I am about to say I anticipate hon. gentlemen opposite will think I am trying to be political. I assure them however that I am not. I urge these observations as an extenuation rather than a criticism. At the time this government took office the Canadian National Railways had been subjected to very extensive commitments which, under the circumstances, this government felt were too great. I do not think there is an hon. member on either side of the house who for one moment would impugn the honesty and integrity of the Minister of Railways in the late government. For the time being at any rate he is out of public life and we may speak frankly and freely about him. His honesty and integrity have never been impugned. But there was a time of great prosperity, and in the very height of the boom the ministry of that day, and the Minister of Railways in particular, could not withstand the pressure. I do not think for one moment the minister entered into the commitments for election purposes. I would not however say that all the members of the Liberal party were as free from that charge. A great deal of pressure was brought to bear upon him by people who for political purposes wanted the commitments, but I would exonerate the minister himself from any such charge. I would not refer to it now, because I do not wish to enter into a political discussion, were it not that it seemed to me a very forceful example of the very thing with which the Prime Minister dealt, an illustration of the tremendous pressure brought to bear when an election is pending and when, as in that case, the world is in a state of boom and prosperity.

I do not think the hon. member for North Waterloo intended to be unfair, but I do say he misconstrued the statement of the Prime Minister. I prefer to hold that belief because I have a very high regard for the hon. gentleman and for his wish to be fair and impartial. I do not think however that for one moment the words of the Prime Minister could be construed as impugning the honesty and integrity of public men. He was simply dealing with facts as he found them, with the fact that these forces are at work and that humanity has its weaknesses. We recognize those fralities not so much in our public men as in the men who send those public men here. That is, if one could have the public act as individuals I do not think the result would be the same; but we are dealing with mass psychology. That is what governs in times of prosperity and boom, and particularly with an election pending. I do not think it is fair to charge that in anything they have said the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance impugned the honesty or integrity of public men. I believe they have as much confidence and as much faith in our public men as any hon. member in or any person outside of this house.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Beynon) has come to the defence of the Prime Minister. In his radio speeches the Prime Minister has urged the necessity for regulation. He has urged that we have come to the present pass because there has not been proper regulation. May I observe that until the central bank was set up there was very little regulation of the banks, and if we have got into trouble through faulty administration it is not because of the pressure of governments but because of the stupid mistakes of the financiers themselves.

It seems to me the question must be whether we will allow those who have personal interests in these matters to go on in their own way or whether we will put in charge people who are fairly directly responsible to the people. The Prime Minister has been urging reform. I venture to suggest that if instead of bringing in reforms with regard to unemployment insurance he had brought in some reforms to the financial system, such as have been suggested by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) we would be a great deal nearer the recovery which he has stated is so desirable. Some time during the past fourteen years—

Mr. ARTHURS: Is the hon. member opposed to reforms in the social system?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, but I would like to get real reforms, far-reaching reforms, fundamental reforms.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Instead of running up rabbit tracks.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some hon. members in this corner during the past fourteen years have sometimes found it somewhat difficult to continue putting forward certain proposals which we felt were meeting with very indifferent reception. However I think that within the last few months we have taken courage because we have seen that a Conservative government is at last recognizing that public opinion is supporting the policies we have been setting forth. I do not know how far the Prime Minister himself has thoroughly grasped the significance of some of the statements which he has been making. I venture to say however that had the Prime Minister not recognized the insistent demands of the public for some very great changes in policy we would not have seen the proposals outlined in the speech from the throne at the present session.

I hope the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) speaks for the Liberal party. Some of us have been wanting to know just where that party stands with regard to public ownership and control of the banks. We were not very sure about that when we heard the Prime Minister speaking. I hope the hon. member for North Waterloo spoke not only on his own behalf but on behalf of the whole Liberal party. I am sorry to say several members of the Liberal party have been going throughout Alberta and British Columbia saying that we in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are opposed to public ownership and control of a central bank. I believe it is a rather regrettable circumstance when for party reasons men will descend to misrepresentations of that kind. It is quite true a majority of hon. members in this corner of the chamber voted in favour of the bill. I was one who did, and I have no apologies for so doing. Both in committee and again on the third reading of the bill, we did as we had done on its second reading, namely we did our utmost to get the government to stand for public ownership and control. When we were unsuccessful in getting the government to alter the measure to that extent we were faced with the alternative either of permitting the unrestricted and unregulated private ownership which has existed up to the present, or adopting the bill the government brought down. On the whole I thought it was best to support the bill. I had two reasons for doing so, the first being that I thought it was a step in the right direction. As the minister has said, there is in that legislation a measure of government control. It seemed to me, further, that in years to come it would be a bit of socialistic machinery which might very well be fitted into a larger socialist program. But when we voted in favour of that bill we did not do so because of its private ownership or control features. I think that is abundantly clear to anyone who has known our position in the house during a number of years. I think it was in 1925 that I myself brought in a resolution to the effect that the issuance of currency and the control of credit were functions too important to be left in the hands of private institutions. I believed it then ten years ago, and I believe it just as strongly, if not more strongly to-day.

I am frank to admit that the first steps taken in the organization of the new central bank do not give one a very great deal of confidence in what the future may be. It may be that the board of directors will not have a very great measure of control, but I would remind the house that the board of directors as chosen consists entirely of the slate that was put up by the chambers of commerce, so that so far as the board of directors have any influence, it is the chambers of commerce bank to-day. I am inclined to think that with the board of directors so nominated, and with the private ownership features, with the governor and his deputies appointed in the way they are, it may very well be that the central bank may fail to function. I say that for two reasons. First of all in stabilizing the general price level very very frequently a central bank is called upon to go absolutely counter to the prevailing trends of the day. When the tendency is towards inflation the bank should take rigid steps to restrict credit. On the contrary, when there is a period of depression they should make money easier. Now when the directorate is composed of men drawn from banking circles, nominees of the chambers of commerce, and when there is a certain amount of private gain involved, I cannot quite see how that bank is likely to go counter to the prevailing tendency of the day.

Further than that it seems to me that the central bank ought to develop some very radical changes in our whole monetary system, but I cannot very well believe that a body so appointed is likely to introduce any very fundamental changes in our monetary system, and without such changes I for one do not believe we are going to get very far.

The resolution as introduced by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) not only calls for the nationalization of the central bank, but also that all banking facilities, including those of the chartered banks, should be nationalized. Now while the central bank may be able to maintain a general price level —I think that is its fundamental purpose— I would point out that it is the chartered banks that decide to whom credit shall go. The central bank to a certain extent can determine the volume of credit, but the chartered banks decide whether credit shall go in this direction or in that, whether it shall go to this class of industry or to that, whether it shall be concentrated in the east or go to the west. All that power is to-day still in the hands of the chartered banks, and, Mr. Speaker, I do not think such tremendous power should be left in the hands of private corporations.

We talk about different kinds of money, and their effect. Gold, for instance. We know that is practically negligeble to-day. Then paper currency. A great many of us centre our attention upon that. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to-day pointed out that before very long the central bank will have to issue the greater part of the currency. That is all very well as far as it goes, but as my hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) noted this afternoon, something like 94 per cent of the entire purchasing instrument of this country does not consist of gold or of currency or of subsidiary coin, if you like to put that in, but rather of certain deposits or loans —credits, if you like to call it that. I noticed a characterization of that kind of money in the annual report of the Bank of Commerce. They used the phrase—money created by trade. I think that a very good phrase—money created by trade. That class of money constitutes the great bulk of the money in circulation to-day, and that class of money is still entirely in the hands of the chartered banks. It is only very indirectly indeed that the central bank can control that class of money. Certainly it does not control the particular avenues through which it will pass. Through interlocking directorates we have the possibility of a very small number of people, a score or more of people, being able very largely to say in what direction the credits of this country shall go. A great many people suggest that the capital held by the chartered banks is widespread. They point out that there is a large number of shareholders, and further, that although the dividends are fairly high they need not be considered exorbitant. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the great advantage which the chartered banks possess does not come through the dividends paid to the shareholders. The great power that they have is in being in a position almost to monopolize the credit of the country. That is where they have the advantage. If I were a director of a bank I would not care in the slightest whether I held any stock in the bank or not. My financial success would not be dependent upon the stock in the bank. I would rather utilize my position as a director in order to turn credit here, there or yonder. That is the power the banks have. My hon. friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Beynon) suggests, men are human. That is true, so human that I think there are very few of them that would not use the credit which they control for their own advantage or for that of their friends. Someone interjects that the bankers are also human. Yes.

An hon. MEMBER: And politicians.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Politicians are human too. I do not think they are any more susceptible to influence than the bankers; it is a different kind of influence. What I do object to is the tacit assumption by the Minister of Finance, I think, to-day, and by a great many people of what I might term the divine right of bankers. The Minister of Finance wondered how we could possibly buy out the banks and thought it would almost beggar us to do so. Well, a year ago the banks came to us asking for a renewal of their charters. Supposing that we in this parliament had simply said to the banks: We shall not renew your charters. I am not suggesting that that would be good policy. I have never put that forward as the policy I would advocate, but I say, suppose this parliament had simply said to the banks: We will not renew your charters. Where would the banks have been? I would like to know what would have been the value of their capital under those conditions, and what would have been the value of their bank premises. I have said before, I do not know whether it was in this house or not, that the bankers have no more moral right to their charters than a peddlar has to his licence, none whatever. If we choose in a little town to take away the pedlar's licence we do not find him going around whining for compensation. We give charters to the banks, or have done so in the past, because we believed that was the best way of administering the credit of this country; but just as soon as we come to the conclusion that it is not the best way of administering the credit of the country, then we are free to adopt whatever method we please. You may say that it is dealing rather hardly with the banks. Well, possibly it may be a hardship; and yet, if I may give another illustration, when some years ago the bartenders had their trade taken away from them, I do not know that there was any particular compensation granted them in consequence. In almost every line of development certain people have been left behind. When the railway came in the stage coach people were left behind and they suffered a good deal of hardship. When the motor cars came along the railway people began to suffer and they are suffering now. And one of these days, I suppose, when the airplane becomes a commercial success it may very well be that those interested in motor cars will suffer hardship. That seems to be the penalty for all progress. Possibly in an ideal state we might see that those people upon whom hardship falls because of progress should be looked after; I would vote for that. But I know that is not so in relation to the labouring classes, who because of improved machinery are turned loose, receiving possibly a little unemployment relief, which is all they get.

I cannot think that the banks have any divine right to what is practically a monopoly, the giving of credit in this country; and it seems to me that, from the way in which they have behaved in the past, it may very well be that we have reached the point where we are free to conclude that there are better ways of handling credit. The Prime Minister said there was a possibility that politicians or governments would not be able to stand pressure. Well, I would ask whether bankers have been able to stand the pressure. What happened when there was a great deal of gambling going on in the stock exchange in New York? Did not our own banks lend money for gambling purposes on the stock exchange? And what about the pulp and paper industry? Did not the banks, some of the directors of which were financially interested, lend large sums to that industry? Of course. They have not stood the pressure, and I hate to think that they should be elevated to the position in which they are considered and consider themselves so much superior in their judgment and morale to the rest of the people. Not a bit of it.

After all, notwithstanding what was said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, I submit that the hon. member for North Waterloo is right when he says that the Prime Minister did more or less cast a reflection upon parliament—I think, upon the fundamentals of democracy. If parliament is not the agency through which the rights of the people may be protected and public affairs administered, then let us get rid of parliament and find some better institution. But so long as parliament exists, so long as it even inadequately represents the people, then retain power in parliament. I think we are very well advised to set up commissions which may be to a certain extent removed from the day to day interference of politicians. That may be desirable. For example, I do not know enough about railroading to fuss around and interfere with all the details of railway management; I do not think that can be expected of the ordinary member. But I do think that the great policies of the railways should come before the house; that is another matter. If parliament proves unable to deal with these things, let us get another sort of institution that will more adequately carry out the democratic ideals which we have all cherished.

A great many people think that if we nationalized our banks depositors would lose. I cannot see any need of that. I might remind the house of a little incident of two years ago—I think I have mentioned it here before. In my own province we had a provincial savings office. The premier of Manitoba, rather hard pressed to carry on the business of government, took some of the ready cash for carrying on public affairs and replaced it by provincial bonds. I presume that those bonds would some time have been good, but certainly they were not ready cash, and there was a threatened run on the banks. Mr. Bracken came to the Prime Minister and said, "Will you guarantee our provincial bonds?" The Prime Minister answered, "No, I cannot do that; that is a matter for the banks." Premier Bracken had to go to the banks and they ultimately agreed to take over the savings office, on condition that the government would go out of the savings bank business. Then we called for the papers and we learned that the Prime Minister had given to the banks the guarantees that he had refused to give to the province. I personally learned a great lesson from that. I had a savings bank deposit. When I went back after the session I found the savings office closed; the windows were all shut, the bank having moved out. My desposit however was not lost; I found it in one of the chartered banks, quite safe. Without my knowledge or consent my private account had been transferred from a public savings office to a private chartered bank. I would suggest, as the lesson I have learned, that it is just as easy for an account to be transferred from a private chartered bank to a public savings bank or a national bank.

I do not need to go over the ground covered by my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin. We in this corner have for years been trying to bring home to this house and the country the necessity for public control over some of our major industries and some of our major utilities. We have been misrepresented and lampooned in every way possible. But whether or not the house understands us, the country is beginning to understand the necessity for something of this kind, and the development in the financial and economic world is forcing the issue. I think we are undoubtedly on the right track when we say that the next step that lies before us, perhaps one of the greatest steps, is the nationalization of our whole financial system. Until we accomplish that we are not in a position to control the industry and the commerce of the country.

I would commend this resolution to the government. It seems to be very much in harmony with some of the fundamental principles stated by the Prime Minister, at any rate those stated in his earlier addresses on the radio.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): My good friend and colleague (Mr. Euler) has put the position of the Liberal party fairly before the house on this important matter. Perhaps I would not have said anything but for the remarks of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who said that throughout Alberta and British Columbia he was being lampooned—he and his associates—for their action in connection with voting for the central bank. I must confess I am one of those who lampooned him if that is the case, and the explanation given by the hon. member this afternoon has not cleared up the matter so far as I am concerned. I cannot understand their attitude. This may be unfortunate on my part, but if they are opposed not only to the principle of the central bank but to the management and then vote for it and say that they did so on the ground that it is a step in the right direction, then I must be convicted of having misrepresented these hon. gentlemen. This afternoon we have a motion from the same hon. gentleman asking us to support the nationalization of banking in its entirety, taking over the private institutions and nationalizing this very institution that we objected to because it was going to be privately controlled. That also is a change of heart on their part this year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I feel quite sure that the hon. member for West Edmonton does not want deliberately to misrepresent us.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In that case I beg him to admit that there has been no change of heart on our part. If he will read Hansard, which shows what we said, he will come to the conclusion that there has been no change of heart whatever.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have to judge individuals not by the statements they make but by the votes they record, and it is upon the recorded vote that I take my stand. I voted against that motion. Had I not done so I should have been subjected to criticism. In the main I am in agreement with the provisions governing the central bank, but I am certainly very far from being in agreement with its ownership and control, and on that ground, as has been stated by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), I voted against it.

My hon. friend takes the other ground that it was sufficient on his part and that of his colleagues to support the bill on the basis that while discussing the matter on the floor of the house they opposed it. I agree with them in that, but I could not go to the extent of voting for this measure because in my remarks I had opposed it. Either they are wrong or I am, and I do not think I am.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. gentleman permit one other question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly; I will permit a dozen questions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Suppose the hon. member voted against the resolution of my colleague the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine); would he like us to go throughout the country and say he was opposed to the nationalization of the central bank?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is exactly what my hon. friends will do anyway; I have to take my chance on that. I do not like to insinuate, but I think hon. gentlemen in that corner have found themselves in a somewhat difficult position with reference to their registered vote on this matter. One or two of them at all events felt the same as I did and did not support the government in foisting on this country private ownership of a central bank.

The hon. gentleman also said that their attitude might influence the government in connection with what they were going to do with the bank. The government could have passed that legislation without a single vote being registered from that corner of the house; they did not need my hon. friends' votes to register the popular opinion of this house as indicated by the government majority. I must defend the position I took last summer—and I took it wherever I spoke—that I did not understand the attitude of hon. gentlemen on this question, and I do not yet. I merely say that either I was wrong in registering my vote against the bill, or they must be wrong in the attitude they took.

We still stand, as the hon. member for North Waterloo has indicated, for public ownership and control of this central bank. We believe that is the agency through which we can properly regulate this institution. Hon. gentlemen will disagree, and they have a right, if they see fit, to do so on this particular matter. We feel sufficient control can be exercised over the operations of the private banks to give the people of this country with whom they have business a square deal. I am not even going to blame the private banks for the condition in which we find ourselves to-day. What is the trouble with the Canadian people to-day in common with those of every other country? We have had too much credit. Neither the members of the government nor the banks can escape this responsibility. Both have been guilty. I have heard the statement—and it is an expression we can all understand—that we spent money like drunken sailors, both governments and banks. Every institution did the same thing until we reached the stage that my hon. friend has so ably depicted this afternoon. We now find ourselves in a very unfortunate position. Let me put my attitude very clearly. I am not going to say that I am opposed to nationalization of banking, but I want first to nationalize the central bank and see how far that control can go. I do not wonder my good friend in believing in what he was voting for last year is disappointed. He freely admits that; he says that there is every evidence of it. The evidence is growing that private control is going to dominate the actions of this institution, and that is exactly what we felt and feared would happen. But at the same time I for one am not in a position to say that nationalization of private banking will cure the situation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) put his finger on the spot when he said: We are all human and we are doing the very best we can, what in our judgment is in the best interest for ourselves and for the public whom we serve. I do not believe if we had had our banks nationalized to-day we would have been saved from going into the morass of debt in which we now find ourselves. I can understand a situation where we would abolish interest altogether, what my good friend McGeer calls usury. Then the incentive disappears; this would take money out of the position of being a commodity and we would use it merely as a medium of exchange. I can understand that situation, but to say you are going to permit the usury system to continue and to transfer it from a private corporation to a publicly owned one and thus cure the difficulty in which we find ourselves, is something with respect to which I have very grave doubts, because while different men will be in control they will be human beings just the same.

I do want to be definitely understood as going to the extent of having control exercised publicly, nationally, of the central bank. I will go with my hon. friends a long distance in the way of restraint and restriction upon the operation of private banks. Possibly I will go the whole distance of nationalizing them if it can be demonstrated that the first step is a success and that the second is also a success. It may be all right to transform overnight the whole financial and banking institutions of the country from private to public ownership, but I would not care to take such drastic action without a little more consideration than we are giving the matter at the present time. That is the only difference between them and me. We want the central bank to be publicly owned and controlled; we want that step to be taken. I doubt if my hon. friends over there would go to the extent indicated by the resolution moved this afternoon, the complete nationalization of all the banking institutions. I do not believe any system is perfect; I agree with the minister when he says that as long as we have human mentality administering the business of this country, we shall have mistakes. I do not agree that either by private or by public bodies they are made with the intention of having a harmful effect upon the public generally. But mistakes are made, and the government will have the same mentality, whether there is public or private control. But I agree thoroughly with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the parliament of Canada cannot escape responsibility for the policies which will govern. We have a right to control these institutions which get from parliament the right to do business. In that I am at one with my hon. friends. But I regret that I cannot be with them in their attitude of last session in supporting what I consider a privately owned institution.

I am not going into details as to the central bank itself; I simply content myself with making my position clear on the question immediately before us.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have ever ventured to speak in this house before on a question of finance. We have so many financial experts in this corner that perhaps it was not necessary; besides, it is a rather dangerous proceeding for a person like myself. I should not have risen on this occasion had it not been for a statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to the effect that in 1929 we were in a world gone mad. That statement is not very strange in itself, but it is strange if the implication is that we are at the present time in a sane world. In 1929 we had gone mad to the extent that we thought we could all get rich by buying bonds from each other or from the numerous bond salesmen. Now we believe that we must remain poor and in fact suffer privation because we connot find enough money to distribute the commodities that we can produce in such abundance. If the Minister of Finance suggests that that is an indication of sanity, then we differ in our definition of sanity.

What is the purpose of the resolution? It is to nationalize the banking facilities of Canada. Why do we want to nationalize the banking facilities of Canada, or what does nationalizing them mean? It means the transfer of the banking facilities from private to social control. It means taking out of the hands of private owners an important factor in production, and vesting the ownership in the community or the state, whichever term you may care to use. Why should we wish to do that? Because we feel to-day—I think everyone, even the Minister of Finance, will admit it; the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has admitted it—that private ownership of the means of production leads to their use for the benefit of the owners always, and not in the interests of the people of the country. All that we are suggesting is that we should transfer these instruments of production and distribution from private ownership and place them in the hands of the community in order that they may be used for social benefit. Is there anything wrong with that? There is no other possible way in which that end can be accomplished except by transfer of ownership.

There is one point on which I think I must differ from the mover of the resolution. He stated that the control of industry by finance prevented industry from fulfilling its purpose. I can see what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) meant by that; he takes it that the purpose of industry is to carry on production, to produce commodities to meet social needs. But that is not in fact the purpose of industry under private ownership. Under private ownership the purpose of industry is to produce property rights for the owners of the means of production. To-day the control of industry and of finance is in the same hands. If we do not use the nationalization of finance as the means of socializing and nationalizing industry we have not accomplished anything by socializing finance.

What gives a bank its value? What gives the Bank of Montreal its value, what gives the Canadian Bank of Commerce or the Royal bank or any bank its value? The fact that the community uses its services; that is what gives it value. If the community ceased to use its services the value of the bank to its shareholders would disappear. It is the community, the social organization of society, that gives to every economic and financial and business organization its value. The moment that institution is transferred into the hands of the community it is of no further value to the interests that formerly owned it, except in so far as they are part of the community; then they obtain value from it only in equal measure with the rest of the community. That is the primary reason why we seek to socialize not only our banking facilities but all our industrial processes as well; for if the community gives the value then the community should own and control and appropriate that value. That is impossible as long as we maintain the present basis of private ownership.

Now may I say a few words in regard to the action of some of us in this corner in voting for the Bank of Canada bill last year. The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) tried very hard to justify his position, but it was not very convincing to me. The Liberal party, or at least a section of the Liberal party—and I am not sure but that it is only a section that is now advocating national control and ownership of the central bank—had been advocating that for quite a number of years before they came into office. At the Liberal convention of the western provinces, held in Winnipeg in 1917, a resolution was passed unanimously which read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this convention, the time has arrived for the reorganization of the barking system of Canada, so as to bring it more nearly within the democratic spirit of proper regulation and control by the people, and with this object in view, be it resolved—

This is what they resolved:

1. The banking system of Canada should be placed under the control and regulation of a banking commission invested with plenary powers in all matters pertaining to banking, currency, coinage and credits, and, in particular, to regulate and control:
(a) the issues of public currency;
(b) the coinage of gold and silver;

And so on. That was in 1917. They came into office in 1922 and remained in office until 1930, but not one step was taken to make this policy operative. Furthermore the bank charters came up for revision in 1922. My friends in this corner who were here at that time tried to get the government of that day to put some of these policies into effect. I believe the hon. member for West Edmonton was a member of the government at that time. These are some of the things they were to regulate and control:

(a) The issues of public currency.
(b) The coinage of gold and silver.
(c) The purchase of bullion produced in Canada.
(d) The amount of call money loaned outside of Canada.
(e) Interlocking directorates.
(f) The supervision of credits.
(g) The capitalization of banks.
(h) The payment of dividends.
(i) The relations of subsidiary trust and money lending concerns to banks.
(j) And generally, all such matters that are necessarily incident to the proper regulation and control of banking and currency.

I believe the present government have put paragraph (c) into effect. All those other financial activities ran rampant while hon. gentlemen to my right were in office, but not a line was put on the statute books to regulate or control any part of the system.

Mr. DAVIES: What is my hon. friend reading from?

Mr. MacINNIS: From a copy of the resolution forwarded to me by the man who moved it in committee and later, I think, on the floor of the Liberal convention, held in Winnipeg in 1917.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not see why hon. gentlemen should laugh because this was passed at a Liberal convention held in Winnipeg. The resolution proceeded:

Be it further resolved in connection therewith there should be established a national bank of Canada as a central reserve institution, upon whose board of governors should also sit, amongst others, ex officio, the members of the said banking commission; the objects of said national bank to include inter alia the primary responsibility of marshalling and mobilizing the gold and silver reserves of the nation, and the ownership and control of the issues of public and national currency.

It seems to me rather late in the day, having had this program before them for seventeen years and having been in office for nine years without doing anything to put it into effect to find fault with those who are seeking to do so.

Mr. VALLANCE: Was that a federal or a provincial convention?

Mr. MacINNIS: That was a convention of western Liberal delegates. I have no doubt my hon. friend from South Battleford was there.

Mr. VALLANCE: I can assure my hon. friend that I was not there.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then I am sure the convention was that much worse off. When the hon. member for West Edmonton was lampooning and criticizing those of us in this corner during his speaking tours last summer, I wondered if he read to his audiences the amendment moved to the central bank bill by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). I should like to read it to the house once more. This is the amendment moved by those who were in favour of a nationally owned and controlled bank, on the third reading of the central bank bill on June 27 last:

> That the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with instructions that they have power so to amend it as to provide that the Bank of Canada shall be either,—
> (a) Government owned and controlled;
> (b) Government owned; or
> (c) Government controlled.

Those to my right, Mr. Speaker, may be able to see this with perfect clarity, but I cannot understand what kind of bank the Liberal party really wanted when they moved this amendment. I find that in the first place they are in favour of a government owned and controlled bank. Then, if they cannot have that, they are in favour of a government owned bank and presumably, since the amendment contains nothing to the contrary, a privately controlled bank. Then, if they cannot have a government owned and controlled bank or a bank government owned and privately controlled, they want a bank government controlled and privately owned. The more I read this amendment the more I am convinced that they did not know at that time what they really wanted. To support this contention I should like to quote from the speech delivered by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) when this amendment was moved. He said:

> Speaking for myself, may I repeat that I can see wherein the question of public ownership of a state bank may well be a debatable question. I regard it as debatable for the reason that there is much to be said on both sides.

There you have a perfect reason for refusing to make a decision; because you can say something on this side and something on that side, because you can say something for it and something against it, when you put both together you stay where you are.

Mr. MUNN: That is what you did.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, that was not what we did.

Mr. MUNN: You hit on both sides.

Mr. MacINNIS: We did nothing of the kind, and let me tell the members of the Liberal party that we now have the national bank bill on the statute book, and it will require only a minor amendment to make that bank nationally owned and controlled. The point that I took into consideration was this: Suppose my vote would have the effect of preventing the creation of a national bank; would I vote for or against it? It was a step in the right direction; there was at least some control, and all the private bankers in the Dominion of Canada were opposed to it, so I supported the bill. My hon. friends to my right talk about the money power, yet they voted directly with those opposed to the central bank, those who wanted to keep the money power in their own hands.

I do not think I need say more on that phase of the matter. All I want my Liberal friends to do, when they go about the country accusing us of supporting this measure, is to read to their audiences the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. It was not until we in this corner moved a further amendment deleting the alternatives that they were compelled to declare themselves in favour of a nationally owned and controlled bank. These are all matters of record already, Mr. Speaker, but I wished to put them on record again.

I must say that it makes me laugh every time I hear in this house of the dangers of political interference in connection with the central bank. Our bankers raise their hands in holy horror of government ownership and control, for fear of political interference. What do they mean? They just fear that someone else may get a finger in the pie instead of themselves; that is all. They are only afraid that someone else will get a hearing; they have had all the breaks so far, and they are afraid that someone else may get ahead of them. Shortly before I came east I was talking with one of the new members of the provincial legislature of British Columbia. He was elected for the first time in 1934, and he said that what amazed him when he went to the session of the provincial legislature was the number of interests who were lobbying the government. He said the mine owners had a lobby and the lumber operators had a lobby. Everyone a person could imagine had a lobby—except the workers and farmers. They did not have lobbies. Of course the bankers have their lobbies and that is the reason they are opposed to political control, to government ownership.

Let me repeat that unless the ownership, the socialization or nationalization of our financial institutions is used as a means of socializing or nationalizing means of production it will not be worth anything to the people of this country. Believing that that is what the hon. member for Wetaskiwin had in mind when he moved the resolution, I am prepared to support it.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) have led me to believe that the Liberal leopard has not changed its spots, but that in the future it will continue to win its way back into power by stealth, rather than by coming out in the open. The Edmonton Bulletin, of June 30, under the heading, Great Betrayal, declared in its leading editorial that seven United Farmers of Alberta, one Progressive member from Saskatchewan and two Labour members lined up at the eleventh hour with the government policy to vote down the proposal that the central bank be publicly owned. They called it the great betrayal. The hon. member for West Edmonton on many occasions, according to his own words, referred to the so-called great betrayal of the group sitting in this corner.

So far as I know the leader of the party to which the hon. member for West Edmonton belongs has on no occasion, either in this house or out of it, stated that he was in favour of the nationalization of the banks, or even the nationalization of the central bank. It does not make any difference what the hon. member for West Edmonton or any other member in his party has to say, until we definitely know what the right hon. leader of the opposition has to say about this matter of banking; otherwise whatever the hon. member for West Edmonton has to say will be as sounding brass and tinkling cymbal; for the policy of the leader is the policy of the party. On no occasion have I heard of any alternative policy being offered by the official opposition either in this house or outside of it.

In all his speeches the hon. member for West Edmonton states, "If we get back into power, through the instrumentality of low tariffs, restoring old markets and finding new ones, we will bring back prosperity." And the exuberance, the extraordinary optimism, the extravagant hopefulness he has shown, and that shown by other hon. members behind him, would almost lead one to believe that when the official opposition got into power strawberries would grow on stinkweed, grain on sow thistles, bananas on poplar trees and other luscious fruits on a lot of other obnoxious plants which spread so profusely in western Canada. Such is the dream, but what is the reality? But never mind, O Canadian people; for the wizard leader of the opposition will lull you into sweet and opiate forgetfulness through the policy that the hon. member for West Edmonton has so eloquently promulgated throughout the length and breadth of the land. And when the autocratic Hitler sees the democratic King emerge from the valley wielding the big club of negotiation, fear will seize the great German nation and the hills and the valleys which were made to produce golden grain will go back to producing hops and grapes as before; and the bread that was made to feed German mouths will henceforth be made out of good Canadian wheat. And when Il Duce hears of the recent provincial victories as well as the federal one he will have a fit of panic before this new international cave man, and shiploads of wheat will wend their way to the land of macaroni and spaghetti as hitherto. And the economically planned United States, seeing the condition of affairs in laissez-faire Canada, when the official opposition gets into power will send aeroplanes into the air which will throw bombs to destroy the artificial barriers existing between Canada and the United States. The French republic, with equal consternation, leaving well enough alone, will employ her farmers in the production of perfumes, cosmetics, bric-a-brac and other delicatessen instead of letting them produce grain. That is the impression they intended to create throughout the west, and that is the impression the hon. member for West Edmonton has often tried to create right here in this house. There is no question about that.

So far as the resolution moved by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) is concerned there can be no doubt about its alphabetic stupidity. It was no doubt drafted with the feeling that it might be heaven, hell or purgatory that his party would share, so he thought it very well to make friends everywhere. I did not intend to speak on this motion, but it would seem that to-day we appear to be running in a circle. One hon. member will get up and say, "Well, I would not have spoken had it not been for the hon. member who preceded me." I am afraid I am in the same position as three or four other hon. members who have just spoken about this banking question.

Yes, I was one who voted for the central bank last year, and I do not care whether a hundred members for West Edmonton go into the Vegreville constituency to decry the facts; I am quite prepared to tell the people in Vegreville why I voted how I voted and where I voted. There is no doubt that the central bank can be made nationally owned at any time, and if the official opposition gets into power, as the seer, the dean and the patriarch of the house, the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) predicted only a few days ago, and if they are serious about making the central bank a national bank, I shall be prepared to give them not only one vote but, if I had them, one hundred votes.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have just listened to the speech of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich). He has not answered the question I put to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation two years ago, namely in February, 1933, concerning the nationalization of the banks. If you, sir, would kindly allow me to adjourn this debate until eight o'clock I would have sufficient time to get Hansard of 1933 and read those questions to the members in the corner of the house, and in that way we would learn whether or not they are ready to answer them.

This is no time to make jokes about macaroni, spaghetti, sausages, delicatessen and so on. If the hon. member's stomach is empty, then he may go to dinner and have sausages, macaroni, spaghetti, tripe, gravy and anything like that. Let him eat pork, beef, or what he will; but that is no argument upon which to exercise one's brains. I expected some thought to come from so genial an hon. gentleman, but what did we have? We had a most indigestible menu, something that one could not eat, even with H.P. sauce. He recites the bill of fare in the midst of a dignified discussion of one of the most important problems of the day. We have these gentlemen with us who say: Let us nationalize the banks, nationalize the deposits which have been entrusted to the banks by the people of this country. Sir this is a matter of great concern to everyone who has a dollar in the banks. Would it be any better if the state owned and controlled all the money which has been deposited in the chartered banks of this country? That is the question, and it is one of momentous importance. It has already been discussed in this house, and discussed throughout the country. Not later than last fall there was a by-election in the city of Toronto, and a gentleman whom I know well was a candidate of the group who sit in the extreme left corner of this house. What was the result when the matter was submitted to the intelligent people of Toronto? It was this: the man who was the candidate of that group or party to my left, call them what you like, got a minority vote, but his minority vote helped to elect the Tory candidate.

There is one difference only between the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Woodsworth); one is clean-shaven and the other is not. That is the only difference between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). Two years ago in the month of February I asked fifty-five questions of the hon. gentleman who sits to my left, and I got no reply from any of them. They were all dumb—just as dumb as if they were ministers of the crown. No answer; and now the only answer we get, after two years in which they have had time enough to think over the matter, is jokes like those we have just heard or invective against one or other of the parties in this house. They cannot answer the questions that I asked, questions which were based on their program; and instead we hear jokes. It is all right, sir, to promise the moon. It is all right to say that someone will go up into the sky—the sky is the limit—and bring down the stars and offer them to the hon. member for Vegreville, but I say to the hon. member for Vegreville: while he may be a star, he is not a star from heaven, judging by the materialistic speech which I have just heard him deliver. It proved quite otherwise.

Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that the widow with all her savings in the bank would agree to the nationalization of the banks, would agree to having her all which she has put in the bank controlled by such a gentleman as the hon. member for Vegreville, or by such an economist as the hon. mover of this resolution (Mr. Irvine), or by other gentlemen of that group? Their minds are full of theories from people who have had no practical experience. As I said last year to the house, everything that is written has their respect; they worship type. Their hero is Gutenberg, the inventor of printing. I am sure that they must meet in the cellar of a printing house. They do not admit anything that is the subject of discussion. They believe only in type and in what is typeset, and they upset us with that, sometimes. They are not serious. They think they are serious but they are not. What they say is incredible, impracticable, unrealizable, and they know it. If they do not know it, I am sorry for them. It is always the same story with them. The state must take control of all the wealth of Canada because one day they hope to take power and use it for the great benefit of this country. That is their utopia—a utopian thought for them to think the people of this country will put them into power. But, Mr. Speaker, my electors are soundminded; the electors of any constituency are soundminded, and surely these hon. gentlemen to my left were not elected on speeches like the one we have just heard. No elector in this country would take seriously a man who speaks of such an important matter in such a childish way. He proves only one thing, that he does not at all realize the importance of the subject he is discussing, and I can only feel sorry for him.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: The resolution before us reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, all banking facilities, including both the chartered banks and the central bank, should be nationalized as speedily as possible.

I told my hon. friend from Vegreville that he had great respect for books and typewritten matter and for that reason I bring to the house to-night a big book in which I find fifty-five questions which have been put to the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation in this house. These questions were put to them two years ago and have not yet been answered. One quotation from their sublime orations is this:

> Major services and utilities and such productive and distributive enterprises as can be conducted most efficiently when owned in common (should be owned—and controlled) by public corporations responsible to the people's elected representatives.

On this, the following question was asked:

> What would happen: (a) to the amounts of money deposited in chartered banks by private individuals; and (b) to life insurance held by them?

There are two motions relating to the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and appearing on to-day's order paper—one already mentioned and another one in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in which he summarizes the program of his group. There is also one in the name of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) with regard to the Peace River railway.

It would be rather difficult for me to read the fifty-five questions already put to the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation group two years ago, but I have read one. There are many others however which I think should be read to the leader of that group when his resolution comes up. But let me tell my hon. friend in the faraway corner how I understand the learning of the banking business from the point of view of members of parliament. The first thing would be to read the old Bank Act and the amending act of last year and to compare the two. This is elementary; it is the basis of learning. They would learn much more about Canadian banking by reading the laws which they have helped to pass than by reading Sir Arthur Salter's great theory of banking, or Schatt's theories, or the theories expounded by all the learned economists who know nothing about the laws which have been enacted in this country by all of us, including the hon. member who has not time to read the legislation which he himself has voted upon. It would also be very useful to my hon. friends—it would complete their education in this matter—to read the annual reports of the banks published in every daily newspaper as well as in the Canada Year Book, which was distributed free to us in years gone by. Another most interesting publication in regard to banking in this country is the Canada Gazette. I would suggest to my hon. friends that they also read the reports published by the Department of Finance showing the amount of money in the banks, in savings accounts, current accounts and so on. If my hon. friends can spare a moment from their scientific experiments in connection with foreign bankers, I commend to them very highly, first, the reading of our own bank acts and a comparison of them, then the annual reports of the banks, which are available to all and are published in the newspapers—if they asked the general managers of the banks for these reports I am sure they would receive them—then the official gazette, which comes from the king's printer. There are also reports each month under the signature of the Minister of Finance and they too are most interesting. If they will look at the last annual report tabled at the opening of this session by the Minister of Finance, they will find it very instructive. They should read all these reports going back to confederation and learn them by heart; I am sure they would enjoy reading them.

These various publications form the basis of banking knowledge, and though one may forget the exact figures one will remember in the main what has been said by these leading bankers. There is one thing which my hon. friends have discussed from a different angle, and that is reduction in the rate of interest. I did not listen to their speeches this afternoon because I know it is always the same story—they ask for a reduction in the rate of interest. A distinction should be drawn. There was a reduction of one-half of one per cent in the rate of interest the year before last, and last year another one-half of one per cent. Why? Was it at the request of the people at large in this country? Was it at the request of those who deposited money in the banks? It was not the request of the depositors but at the request of the bankers themselves. They took advantage of what had been said by my hon. friends at the extreme left of the house, to come and tell the government that it was most important to have a reduction in the rate of interest on deposits in order to give an opportunity to the banks to make credit more available. If my hon. friends will look into the annual reports of the banks, the official gazette, and the monthly reports of the Minister of Finance, they will see that the amount of savings in the chartered banks at the present time is about the same as it was five years ago, with the exception that there is a little more inflated money in circulation now, at their request, than before. It is nearly the same amount of money, but the interest rate has been cut by one-third. What was the amount that was in the savings accounts in the chartered banks? It was $1,400,000,000. My hon. friends know that very well. One per cent on that amount is $14,000,000; the first cut of one-half of one per cent meant $7,000,000, and another similar cut followed. To cover their losses, the banks took advantage of what was said by my hon. friends to bring pressure to bear on the government—the Minister of Finance will not deny this because it is the fact—to allow them to pay less to the depositors. The result is that that amount, the difference in the rate of interest, has not been given to the customers of the banks, the depositors; it has been kept by the banks themselves to cover their losses. My hon. friends know very well; it is public knowledge, that when a bank lent $12,000,000 on a man's own signature some years ago, that man never paid back to the bank what he got from it. The reduction in the rate of interest has been enjoyed by the bank, and its customers, the depositors, have suffered an equal loss.

Is the government adopting the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—no profit? Does the government intend to curtail that very legitimate profit that comes from the rate of interest on deposits made in the chartered banks? When I said that there was only this difference between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, that the Prime Minister was clean-shaven and the other was not, I think I was right. I am not saying that as a joke; I say that seriously because they have arrived at the same conclusion. We hear the Prime Minister repeating all the time: Our banks are safe; they are solid; we have nothing to fear about the future of our banks. That is all right. It is why people invested their money in the banks. But if, owing to the reduction in the rate of interest, this brings people no legitimate profit. they will take their money out of the banks and put it into unsound investments to get supposedly easy money, to make easy profits, and then, as has happened in the past, they will lose their money.

A tremendous responsibility rests upon the shoulders of the Minister of Finance. He was in the chamber a minute ago; I am sorry he has left. By virtue of the old Bank Act he had all the power that is now given to the central bank to control banking in general in this country. He could make every bank tremble; he was boss of finance. I remember very well—and every member should remember this—that not long after the minister had been sworn in as minister of finance, someone from this side of the house asked him about a change, saying: What is the reason for that change? The minister's answer was: I have been advised so and so by the officials of my department. I did not say anything at the time but I was very sorry for the hon. gentleman, for whom I have a great regard, that he could not give a better answer to the house. What was his answer? It was: "I do not know; the officers of my department do that." Are we to live any more in such a state of bureaucracy? Is a minister of the crown to be led by third-rate clerks in his department? Every time a question of such importance as that is asked, we are answered with a smile. A smile is a nice thing, but from a minister of the crown it is no answer. I am sorry to say this because I have a high regard and respect for the hon. gentleman, but apparently he has not studied the whole matter so as to be able to give a satisfactory answer to members of parliament.

Let me go further. In a most interesting report published in December, I see that the general manager of one of the banks said: We are generous; we pay much more interest to the depositors than we pay to the shareholders. Is it possible that people can say such a thing as that? That man should know; everyone knows that the number of shareholders is much less than that of depositors. On the other hand the rate of interest paid to the depositors is only two per cent while the rate paid to shareholders is twelve per cent. I do not put the blame only on the Minister of Finance; I put it on the whole government for letting men of outstanding character in this country make such silly statements in order to deceive the people. This will cause more prejudice against the bankers than even the losses sustained by the banks, because people will say: men like that are not serious.

Is it necessary to nationalize our banks? I do not believe so. I believe in the old order; I believe the act was well enough drafted to permit the Minister of Finance to have absolute control over the banks. He had the power to send in his inspectors to check the banking, to know what was going on, to check the collateral securities. Is it because the minister and the government were afraid to take such a step that they created that new organization which is called the central bank? I have been in the main at one with the policy of my party, but in my humble opinion the fact that the minister did not take the responsibility that he should with regard to banking is the reason why the central bank was necessary; it was necessary because the minister was saying in the house that he was acting in accordance with the views of the officers of his department and also because he did not and the government did not dare to take the responsibility of checking those sharks of finance that we have in Montreal and Toronto and of whom everyone knows. That was the point. Is it fair, because a man has got under false pretences a sum of $12,000,000 from the banks; is it fair because bankers lacked judgment in lending so much money to him, that all the depositors in the banks should have first one-half of one per cent and later one per cent less interest in order to cover the banks' losses and the shareholders receive twelve per cent while the depositors get only two per cent? Is that fair? Is it just? When the Prime Minister comes along afterwards and says: Our institutions are sound. He says, "Ready, aye, ready," when they come to him for such favours. The shareholders are the privileged few; they get the high rate of interest of twelve per cent, and in order that the banks might continue to pay that twelve per cent to the shareholders the government, after hearing what the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group said in this house and outside, reduced the rate of interest paid to the farmers, paid to widows, paid to men in industry, paid to anyone who has a dollar in the bank. First they reduced it by half of one per cent, and then to two per cent. The indictment should not be against the bankers; it should be against those who sit on the treasury benches and who have not the courage, have not the guts to stop the bankers from exploiting the people and doing things like that. The responsibility lies with them. When the Prime Minister says our system has a sound foundation, his very acts are the dynamite that blows up that foundation of confidence in our institutions. That is why I regret the step which has been taken by this government, which cannot be justified either before this house or before the electorate of this country. It is not for me to give names; everyone knows about it. The shareholders of the banks get a rate of interest of twelve per cent; the depositors get two per cent, and it may go down to one and a half per cent or to nothing —no profit, the Cooperative Commonwealth theory. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the government will kiss each other and not be ashamed of themselves. They will be able to say: We are going to socialize now; the government have adopted socialist views, thus destroying the confidence of our people in our institutions, depriving the people of legitimate income and exposing them to the lure of unsound investments because they cannot get reasonable interest from the banks. This is the wonderful situation we have just a year after the last revision of the Bank Act.

Let me tell my hon. friends in the corner one thing. I am friendly with them; I have some very dear friends among them, and they know that. I have friends everywhere in the house. I see them now smiling.

Mr. DUFF: Beware the Greeks bearing gifts.

Mr. POULIOT: Let me tell them they would be much more interesting and would carry more weight if they based their arguments on facts found in the bluebooks and the official publications. Instead of giving us the views of Sir Arthur Salter or Sir Josiah Stamp or any foreigner, let them give us their own views, as other members do.

I hope, after what has been said from this place in the house, that the government will understand that they are taking the wrong way when they accede to the requests of the bankers for reduction in the rate of interest on deposits. I hope that very soon the former rate of interest of three per cent on deposits in savings accounts will be restored in order that the people will have more purchasing power. My hon. friends complain that trade is poor because people have no money to buy. The purchasing power of many people is curtailed to a large extent on account of that reduction in the rate of interest on savings deposits.

May I tell my hon. friends one thing more? It is that they should not try to impress us with words. They would impress us more with sound arguments. And let me ask any one of my hon. friends who sits in the government benches to tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that before they accede to the requests of the bankers for a further reduction in the rate of interest to cover losses sustained by the banks they should listen to the views of the depositors. As the government has been told the truth I hope that in the future such a thing will not happen again.

I am glad to see my hon. friend the Minister of Finance returning to his seat now. I was about to conclude my speech; I have just a word to say to him. He knows I have regard for him, but what I was very sorry for was the reduction in the rate of interest paid by the banks to depositors. The minister knows that the depositors get only two per cent, while the shareholders get twelve per cent. The depositors had their rate of interest cut from three to two per cent, while the shareholders had twelve per cent. I said the bankers went to him in his own office to ask a reduction in the rate of interest, taking advantage of what was said by the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, and thus the bankers saved $14,000,000 last year. I said that before the minister was here; I repeat it now he is back in his seat. Last year, in reply to a question put by an hon. member on this side as to why such a change was made, I repeat the following answer was given: "It was recommended by the officials of my department." Surely the minister was not serious in that. He should be the boss; he could make the banks tremble. He was the boss under the old legislation. Because a thing is recommended by a third-rate clerk is no reason why it should be acceptable in the national interest. Let him use his own judgment; it is much better than the opinion of his clerks. They may give him information and facts; that is all right, but he should draw his own conclusions, in order to be able to defend his policy in this house. This is most important. I do not say that in an offensive way, but it could not be repeated too often. May I tell him also that I regret very much that we have now a central bank, for this reason; that before, under the old act, the minister had all power; he could send the inspectors of his department to every bank to check what was done. Will it be so easy for him to do that now? The central bank was first asked for by hon. members on the extreme left for the purpose of getting easy credit. But that proved to be impossible. It is now being looked upon not as a source of credit but only as a means of control, because the Minister of Finance did not take advantage of the control he had at his disposal.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is I think unnecessary, and certainly it is far from my intention, that I should discuss at any length the provisions and meaning of the resolution now before the house. Those provisions and that meaning have been discussed and amplified this afternoon by men more competent than I to discuss such matters. It might not be out of place, however, for me to suggest that if the principle upon which this resolution is based is accepted by the house or by any part of the house, then the resolution itself, in terms, becomes essentially logical, and its logic is inescapable.

The principle, as I see it, is that finance, using the word in its widest possible sense and with all its implications, should be considered rather as a public utility than as a private industry, that it should be operated and controlled by the state for the use and the good of all the people within the state rather than operated and controlled by individuals or groups of individuals for their private profit. If this principle is accepted then I think it must follow as an inescapable conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that in order to put this principle into effect the instruments through which the principle is applied and the medium through which finance is controlled and distributed also should be under the complete ownership and control of the people of this country. I think no one in this house would suggest that in the case of the water supply, say, of some great municipality such as Ottawa, the water itself should be considered a public utility and that it should be the duty of the municipality to furnish that water in ample quantity and of clear and excellent quality to all the citizens, yet that the municipality should permit the machinery and the pipes conveying that water to the citizens to be owned and controlled by private individuals for their private profit. To my mind the cases, while not wholly similar, certainly are somewhat analogous. And that principle, Mr. Speaker, which for many years has been urged from this corner of the house, which has come to be looked upon with favour by a large percentage of the people of Canada and which has been finally accepted by the Liberal party, I believe is a principle which should be endorsed by this house and, if endorsed, should be carried into effect by the acceptance and carrying out of this resolution.

I did not rise, however, so much to discuss the resolution itself as to make some comment on what has been said by others. In this I am in somewhat the same position as others who have spoken, many of whom have stated that they had not intended to speak but that some remarks made by other members had forced them to their feet. I find myself somewhat in that position; it was largely because of certain remarks made by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) that I rose to-night. When the hon. member spoke I noted that he was inclined to be, I shall not say indignant but surprised, grieved and a little disappointed at the vote cast by the majority of the members in this corner of the house last session in respect of the central bank bill. I was not surprised at the hon. gentleman's attitude. In the first place he has not had the advantage we in this corner have had, of sitting as a minority group in this house during nine years of Liberal and four years of Conservative rule; he has not been taught by long and bitter experience the great necessity of toleration and some degree of willingness to accept half a loaf rather than have no bread. During all these years we have learned that such is the case; we would have made no progress and nothing would have been accomplished had we not been ready to go step by step, taking each time the step which might be taken, hoping it would lead to better things, insisting only that the step should be such as would truly lead onward rather than backward. Again I was not surprised because history will show, and experience has taught, that there is no zealot so intolerant and uncompromising in his zeal as the recent convert. We have all met with and experienced this situation, that the man who rushes forward, offering you no alternative save the koran or the sword, that you must believe with him or perish, is the man who only recently has seen the light. Under such circumstances it is usual for those zealous for the truth to insist that no compromise is possible, that no jot or title of the truth, the whole truth, must be pared away, but that we must accept every single beauty in that Mohammedan paradise if we are to go to paradise at all; that no diminution in that harem must be permitted but that the entity, in all its perfection, must be accepted or rejected as the case may be.

That has not been our course, Mr. Speaker; as I have suggested before, had that been our course such progress as has been made in the past would have been impossible. Last year when we reached the time for the final vote to be taken on the third reading of the central bank bill; when all amendments had to be discarded and all alternatives left aside; when we came to the point that we must vote for a central bank, privately owned indeed but largely publicly controlled, or vote against it and in favour of retaining the system exactly as it was before, we believed our course was clear. Generally speaking, we would not take the course which I suggested was consciously or unconsciously the course of those who opposed that legislation, of aligning ourselves consciously or unconsciously with every force and every interest in this country that has continuously opposed the idea of any state control, any centralized authority, or any central bank of any kind. We believe this is a step forward, as we believe that legislation was a step forward. We believed not only that the immediate situation would be improved but that, in that improvement, we would have created the machinery, with centralized control and authority, which at any time at the will of this parliament might be converted into an entirely publicly owned institution. I can only say that the people whom I represent are at least as ardent in their support of public ownership of the central bank as are those supporting any hon. gentleman to my right. In spite of their weakness in sending me here as their member they are not unintelligent. They fully understood both the purpose and the sanity of our vote, and the purpose at least of those who have criticized us so severely.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I have fulfilled the purpose for which I rose. I desire first to associate myself with those who consistently, in season and out and before the idea itself became popularized, have held that finance in its essence, in its utilization, is a state function, a public utility, and that in order to utilize it to the full in that capacity the instruments and the conduits by which it is administered and through which it flows also must be public institutions. I wished only to make some comment on the criticism which has been offered, and having done that I shall leave it to hon. members better qualified than myself to continue the debate.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, the arguments which have been put forward against the resolution have been answered so completely and effectively that I do not desire to take the time of the house in attempting to do what has already been done better than I could do it. I believe the argument of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was answered fully and completely by the hon. member for Winnipeg-North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and I think that was the only argument we have had in the matter.

The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) told us that if we had only left the chartered banks out of the matter and if this had been done last year he would have voted for it.

Mr. EULER: I did not say that.

Mr. IRVINE: That was what I understood. Am I right in my first statement, that if the chartered banks had been left out the hon. member would have supported the motion?

Mr. EULER: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misinterpret what I said. I said that possibly if the government had had last year the change of heart they have had this year, they might have supported it. I did not say I would have supported it.

Mr. IRVINE: That makes it worse. I am glad the hon. member corrected me, because it now appears that there are a number of "mights" about it, and that the remark applied not to him at all, but to the government. I am clearer, however, on what the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) said. I do not think he left any doubt in the minds of hon. members. In addition to adding two or three other "ifs" he said that if the chartered banks had been left off and if the motion had been made last year he would have voted for it. Of course we have to take the word of an hon. member of this house, but we do not have to believe, do we?—or is that part of our duty, also? I certainly do not believe the Liberal party would have voted for the central bank if it had been socialized or nationalized, or anything else you wished to call it, through and through and through. I do not believe they have any intention to vote for that. I do not believe if they were in power to-morrow they would touch it. The central bank as it now stands, a privately owned institution with a measure of government control, is one of the best central banks of its kind in the world, but at the same time I am not satisfied with it. I wanted it nationalized last year, and I want it nationalized now. But who prevented us last year from even getting a vote on nationalization? The Liberal party did. Apparently they were afraid it would come to a vote and they would have to say which way they were going.

Mr. VALLANCE: We voted for it in committee.

Mr. IRVINE: There is no publicity in committee.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is that not a record of the house?

Mr. IRVINE: There is no publicity in committee. When the measure reached the house, and when we moved an amendment to the motion for second reading, who was it that rushed around with the rule books to find some method of having it ruled out of order? Who was it that raised the question of order on the floor of the house? It was an hon. member belonging to the left wing of the Liberal party, the right hand man of Gerry McGeer who has stated throughout the country that the Liberal party wanted to socialize the banks. When it came to the third reading of the bill, and the Liberal party had the right of way in moving an amendment, what did they do? That amendment I am sure should be preserved in the archives or sent to the museum so that future generations may study the tactics of politicians in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and thirty-four.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Send it to Punch.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not think Punch would take it, because it is too tragic. It was an amendment which said, "We want either a government owned and government controlled bank, or a privately owned and privately controlled bank, or a privately owned and government controlled bank." They got the last; it is a privately owned bank with a measure of government control. But even then, although that was in the resolution, they voted against it. I say that the sincerity of the Liberal party in this matter has been well tested. All hon. gentlemen to my right had to do was to move a simple amendment cutting out the chartered banks and leaving the national bank to be socialized. Then they could have voted for it. Why did they not do that, if they were so much interested in having the national bank socialized? I do not believe they were interested in that question at all.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to think that this resolution will now be accepted by the house and receive the support of the government.

DEEP SEA FISHERIES

FACILITIES FOR REFRIGERATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF BAIT

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester) moved:

Whereas the deep-sea fishermen of the Atlantic coast, and especially those in the Northumberland straits, the baie de Chaleur and gulf of St. Lawrence, are seriously hampered in their work by lack of means of obtaining an adequate and seasonal supply of bait, especially for the cod fishing branch of the industry;

And whereas it is beyond the means of private initiative to provide the necessary facilities for the procuring and distribution of such bait, as well as its conservation;

And whereas the establishment of such facilities at central points would greatly enhance the importance of the fishing industry by an increased catch;

And whereas such increase in the industry would provide work for a very large number of fishermen who are now idle because of the difficulty in securing bait;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government should take into immediate consideration the establishment at important centres of a number of refrigerator plants of such dimensions as the Department of Fisheries may consider adequate to meet the needs of the industry, and at the same time give consideration to the best method of distribution of the bait required.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have heard in the last few days a great deal of discussion touching the hardships that the farmers of our country have been called upon to undergo during the last four or five years in this period of world wide depression. May I be permitted, sir, to-night to say to the house that the farmers of Canada are not the only ones who have suffered in their industry during this period of depression. The fishing industry of the Dominion of Canada is a very important one; I think we occupy the third position in the world in regard to the deep sea fisheries.

The fishermen of the province of New Brunswick—I speak for that province because I am better acquainted with its fishing industry and the needs of its fishermen—have suffered from various sources during the last four or five years. True it was not the depression that brought about the losses by storms and other losses that were suffered at sea by our fishermen, but these only added to the hardships that they had to undergo during the period of the depression.

The low prices which our fishermen have been forced to accept for the products of the sea during the last four or five years have been such that unless they are aided in some way to overcome their overhead expenses, thereby lessening the cost of production, they will have to go out of business.

Last week we had a bill before the house providing for a lower rate of interest on loans to farmers, a movement which I am pleased to be able to say I supported. It was pointed out then that a lower rate of interest would aid the farmers by reducing their overhead expenses and thus in some degree compensate them for the low prices they are receiving for their products. It was also pointed out that the products of the farm had been reduced in price to a greater extent than the products of any other industry. I beg to differ from that statement, Mr. Speaker. It is true that the prices of farm products have gone down very considerably, but they have not gone down in comparison with the very low prices which are being received by the fishermen for the products of the sea. To-day the product of the sea is sold at prices that really place the fisherman in this position, that he has to choose between starvation and giving up the industry and seeking employment in some other line. That condition, in my opinion, can be remedied; and since the government is paternal enough to assist other industries I feel it my duty to invoke their aid in behalf of the fishermen.

In this resolution I suggest the establishment of refrigerating plants to provide means whereby the fishermen may obtain bait by a process easier than that through which they now get that necessity. So far as the fishermen in my county are concerned, we have a fleet of between two and three hundred vessels engaged in fishing. They leave their homes on Monday, remaining on the banks of Northumberland straits and other places throughout the week and returning on Saturday or sometimes Sunday morning. They have no time to get bait between their arrival and their departure on the next fishing trip.

In the past, in Gloucester county, we were able to obtain the clam in very large quantities as bait for cod fishing, but to-day the clam is becoming scarce. It costs a great deal more to procure clam bait than it did in the past. One reason is its scarcity, and another is the establishment of clam canning factories in the county. In Gloucester to-day there is the largest clam factory in the world, and the price is such that it no longer pays the fisherman, as it did in the past, to buy clam for bait. Indeed, he has not the means to do so even if he wanted to buy clams, with prices as they are now.

The question may be interjected—why was this movement not made sooner? Why was it not made seven or eight years ago? Well, up to the time this depression struck the industry, prices for fish, especially for cod, were very reasonable and our fishermen could then afford, at the prices received six, seven or eight years ago, for dry salted and semi-pickled cod, to purchase the bait necessary to carry on their industry. To-day, at the reduced price which they receive for their fish, which is almost $2.50 or $3 per quintal less than it was seven years ago, they cannot afford it. They require some assistance, and I was going to suggest the establishment of small refrigerating plants in several central districts of northern New Brunswick or any other part of the Atlantic coast. I am speaking especially for the fishermen of northern New Brunswick, but in this regard I do not wish to be understood as being sectional in my views.

I suggest the establishment of small refrigerating plants under the absolute control and management of the government. Why do I put emphasis on that point? I do so because refrigerating plants under the cooperative system, owned in part by the government and in part by the fishermen as shareholders in the company, have not been a success. Too many jealousies arose. There was too much favouritism and the consequence was that these plants disappeared. Under previous arrangements, under the cooperative system as between the government and the fishing industry, the government paid so much per cent and the fishermen subscribed so much, and after a period of years the government's share in the undertaking would disappear and the fishermen could buy out the whole business. The result was that certain large fish dealers got into their heads the notion that they would buy out these plants, and in order to do so they bought up shares held by individual fishermen. In consequence, these large shippers of fish became the sole proprietors of the refrigerating plants and the fishermen no longer derived from the undertaking that benefit which it had been intended they should obtain.

Another reason why these plants failed in the past was that we were under the old system of ice freezing. We used ice houses. Ice was cut in the winter and hauled into these buildings and used for freezing during the summer. Improvements have been made since that time, and under the new system now in practice in certain parts of Canada there is no need to resort to the ice freezing process at all.

Now this is not an experiment that I am going to propose; it has been tried and found successful. The government of Quebec, owning and administering their own fisheries, have inaugurated the system of establishing small refrigerating plants. On the bay of Chaleur is to be found, on the north side, the coast line of the province of Quebec, and on the south side we have the coast line of New Brunswick; and here we find on the north side the fishermen being provided with the means of conservation for their bait, while on the south side no means whatever are provided for the fishermen of the counties of Gloucester, Restigouche, Northumberland and Kent.

I have been looking carefully into this matter and have obtained plans and specifications. I have received, not estimates but actual prices of these refrigerators which have already been established, some in Prince Edward Island, I believe, and others in the province of Quebec. I find that a freezer that will freeze one ton of bait per day, and having a storage capacity of from fifteen to twenty tons, will cost, actual cost, $4,600 fully equipped. One that will freeze two tons per day, with storage capacity of from twenty-five to thirty-five tons, will cost $6,000, and one that will freeze three tons, with a storage capacity of from fifty to eighty tons will cost $10,000.

I do not intend to recommend the $10,000 process; I believe that the second process, freezing two tons, with a storage capacity of from twenty-five to thirty-five tons, and at a cost of $6,000, will meet all the requirements, at least so far as I know, in the county I have the honour to represent. And on this point there is something I would direct to the attention of the government. I would ask them to investigate the matter and to have the officers of their department go over the whole situation. Have them visit the various districts or have representatives of the fishing industry from those various districts meet them at some point where they can discuss the matter fully, take into serious consideration and report to the government.

I think I have explained this matter so that it will be readily understood by everyone; it is not necessary for me to take up any further time of the house. I hope the resolution will meet with the approval of all hon. members. I am not asking for the expenditure of public money; I am asking that the matter be looked into, and if it is found feasible, then the government in its wisdom may decide upon the amount of money it will expend in aiding the fishermen.

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspé): I want to add a few words on the subject of the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). We have in Quebec a very important fishing industry, notably in the counties of Gaspé, Bonaventure, Matane, and on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. The government of Quebec has established there several refrigerating plants for bait. It is true that the administration of fisheries belongs to the federal government, but I do not see why we should not have cooperation between the two governments. This matter was discussed at length last year and two years ago, and I think the fishermen of Quebec, being taxpayers, should benefit to the same extent as the rest of Canada in respect of the facilities afforded to them. The refrigerating plants built in Quebec are not well equipped to meet the situation. The government should establish in those counties in that province refrigerating plants such as have been asked for by the hon. member for Gloucester, and I should think in most of those places small plants would meet the requirements. An expenditure of from $6,000 to $10,000 would build refrigerating plants that would meet the situation, and the fishermen would benefit a great deal. From July 1 to September 1, I have seen fishermen all along the coast of the lower St. Lawrence idle because they cannot get bait. If refrigerating plants were established so that they could get their bait requirements, those fishermen would not be idle but would work all summer long and would not be on the dole as they are at present.

In the Magdalen islands, which is part of my constituency, the fishing industry is under the control of the federal government. There the government of Quebec, although they have nothing to do with the fisheries of that part, aid the fishermen by giving them boats and money to help the industry. I do not see why the federal government should not do the same thing for the rest of the province of Quebec. Therefore I strongly favour the resolution moved by the hon. member for Gloucester and I hope the government will take steps immediately to investigate the matter and give it proper attention.

Mr. G. M. McDADE (Northumberland): May I be permitted to make a few observations with regard to the resolution of my hon. friend the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot). We have on the east coast of New Brunswick what is admittedly the best dry salt cod fishing in the maritime provinces. Along with lobster, salmon, smelts and oyster fishing, this industry serves to employ a large proportion of our people, and on the north shore of New Brunswick, particularly what is known as the Miramichi district, in numbers employed fishing is second only to our great basic industry.

With the terms of the resolution as drafted one must be in reasonable accord, but it is to be regretted that those engaged in the fishing industry have not seen fit to take advantage not only of the regulations already existing in respect to the matter of bait but particularly of the legislation adopted at the last session of parliament when the Natural Products Marketing Act was placed upon the statute books. Unfortunately the fishing industry on the east coast of New Brunswick, as is well known to the hon. member for Gloucester, is really as to ownership and marketing facilities concentrated in the hands of a few large firms, who, I may say with great respect and deference, are not doing justice to the fishermen so far as the price for their catch is concerned. Take for instance the price paid for smelts to-day—and in this connection I may say with some considerable satisfaction that the Miramichi is the greatest smelt fishing river in the world. The price to the fishermen is only five cents per pound on the ice, while in the towns, the local domestic market, the price exacted is fifteen cents per pound, and smelts, as is well known, demand a high price on the Boston and New York markets. Therefore I say in all sincerity, and I am sure hon. members will agree with me, that those engaged in this industry should take advantage of the provisions of the marketing act. In this connection a campaign of education is essential. Members from Nova Scotia will appreciate the importance of the work accomplished in 1929 by Doctor Coady in his capacity as organizer in forming various cooperative societies in that province. Unfortunately the work of organization in New Brunswick did not commence until the winter of 1929, and due to transportation facilities being unfavourable at that time Doctor Coady was forced to abandon the work, which has not since been prosecuted.

May I commend to the acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Stirling) the advisability of studying, if he will, the question of organizing cooperative societies among the fishermen along the east coast of New Brunswick, and particularly of the county of Northumberland. I notice in the estimates a vote of $4,050 to the United Maritime Fishermen's Association, subject as to expenditure to provisions to be enacted by the governor in council. May I suggest that a fair and equitable proportion of this vote might be well expended in the promotion of a campaign to organize cooperative societies on the north shore of New Brunswick. In this connection, if his services are easily obtainable, as I believe they will be, I know of no more outstanding and eminent authority than Doctor Coady, who did such excellent work along that line in Nova Scotia in 1929. At the same time I should like to pay tribute to Mr. McInerney, a former north shore boy, who is now acting secretary of the United Maritime Fishermen's Association. I should like also to congratulate the minister upon the good work achieved by the officials of his department, notably Colonel A. L. Barry, who is the supervisor on the north shore. However, I believe that a great deal of the difficulty our fishermen are experiencing could be solved by cooperative marketing. I am confident that if a campaign of education along this line were undertaken, excellent results would follow. It would at the same time furnish the opportunity of educating the people as to the necessity of respecting the existing regulations, because between illegal fishing and the lack of cooperative marketing the great fishing industry is suffering severely.

I do not know that I favour the idea of the department establishing a number of refrigerator plants, I believe that if private enterprise were properly directed—I mean the larger fishing concerns—they would make the necessary expansion. But as to the condition of those engaged in cod fishing, I concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester. I would respectfully urge upon the department the necessity of instituting some campaign along the lines indicated, and particularly of adding a rider that part of the proposed vote of $4,050 for the United Maritime Fishermen's Association be applied towards the expense of the organization of cooperative societies on the north shore of New Brunswick.

Mr. WILLAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): As a seconder of this motion perhaps I need not say I am very much in accord with the sentiments thereof. The matter of bait for fishermen is very important. The fisheries of this country depend to a great extent upon whether or not the fishermen are able to obtain bait or not. Perhaps I had better deal with the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. McDade) before I deal with the subject matter of the resolution.

The hon. member stated that the fishermen —I assume he was speaking of those of his own locality—did not take advantage of the marketing facilities provided for in the act passed last year. Then he went on to say that the smelts now being caught in the Miramichi river and elsewhere in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were sold to private individuals and brought the fishermen only a small price. Let me say to my hon. friend that there is no reason why the fishermen cannot sell their smelts directly themselves either on the Boston or the New York market. There is no need to sell them to Tom, Dick or Harry in Bathurst, Chatham, or anywhere else in New Brunswick. In Nova Scotia, for instance in the counties of Pictou, Lunenburg and other counties, the fishermen sell their fish in Boston and New York—

Mr. McDADE: That is because they are organized.

Mr. DUFF: It is not because they are organized; they do it individually. In regard to taking advantage of the marketing act of last year, some of the fishermen of the maritime provinces have been organized and have been marketing their own product ever since I came to this country forty years ago. They do it voluntarily, and without compulsion. In every part of Nova Scotia and parts of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island the fishermen have marketed their own goods when they thought it was to their own advantage. I agree with my hon. friend that Doctor Coady, who is one of my constituents and a distinguished member of the university in Antigonish, has done a great work in regard to cooperative marketing. Doctor Coady was appointed by the federal government in 1929 and for several years did great work in organizing the fishermen, especially in the eastern part of Nova Scotia. All credit is due not only to Doctor Coady, but to the clergymen in the counties of Guysborough, Antigonish, Pictou and several counties in Cape Breton for taking such an interest in the fisheries of their district and the people whom they serve by organizing voluntary cooperative associations. I think that very much more would be accomplished by voluntary effort than by forcing them under the marketing act passed here last session to go under a marketing board whether they want to or not.

My hon. friend is not very consistent. In discussing the bait freezer question he said that instead of the government building these bait freezers and providing bait for the fishermen this might well be done by private enterprise. If in the opinion of my hon. friend it is better for private enterprise to build bait freezers and provide bait for the fishermen why cannot the same private enterprise handle the product of the fishermen and put it on the market, whether in fresh or salt condition? So my hon. friend is not very consistent.

However, as I have said this is a very important question. It is one in which I have been interested for the last forty years. I agree with the hon. member for Gloucester that there is great need for some arrangement by which the fishermen of the Atlantic coast, Northumberland straits, baie des Chaleurs and gulf of St. Lawrence should have means of obtaining an adequate and seasonable supply of bait not only for cod fishing but also for their other kinds of fishing. We live in an age in which large amounts of money are being expended by governments, federal and provincial. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Brasset) told us that the Quebec government was spending money to establish bait freezers. This government is also spending large sums in different ways. For instance a day or two ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) moved a resolution to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act. We were told that a sum of $90,000,000 was to be provided. I have no objection if that sum is necessary in the interests of the farmers, but it seems to me that if this government and the taxpayers of this country are going to raise $90,000,000 to lend to farmers the government should also take into consideration the necessities of the fisheries industry, for which a comparatively small amount of money would do a great deal.

In that regard I am reminded of a statement made by the Prime Minister in the election of 1930. No doubt he was in earnest and sincere; no doubt he had the best interests of the country at heart when he made certain statements at meetings in different parts of this country. He said in the city of Halifax that "he would throw the whole financial power of the state behind the fishing industry." That was a very wide statement for a gentleman to make who desired to be returned to power as prime minister of this country. But what has the Prime Minister done in the last four years, what has his government done in the last four years to "throw any financial power of the state behind that great industry?" That industry has far greater possibilities than any other natural industry in this country; the surface has been hardly scratched, and it does not cost the people of this country a cent. If you take the mines, once the ore is taken out nothing is left but holes in the ground. When you take off the wheat, potatoes or other crops from the farms you have to cultivate and fertilize before you can grow anything more. If you go to the forests and cut down trees it takes twenty or thirty years to produce a new crop. There is no doubt that the fisheries of this country offer greater opportunity to put more men at work than any other industry in Canada, yet this government has done nothing to aid that industry.

I do not blame this government altogether. I have been in this parliament for eighteen years, and during that time the fisheries of Canada have been the rag-tag and bob-tail of practically every department of the government. I do not object to my hon. friend from Yale (Mr. Stirling) being the acting Minister of Fisheries; as my hon. friend from Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) would say, he is a personal friend of mine, and in anything I say I hope the minister will not think I am referring to him personally. But even before I came here the fisheries of this country were not getting a square deal, and they have not had a show since then. The fisheries department has been tied up to some other department. First it was tied up to the militia department, from 1917 to 1921 or 1922. Then it was put in with the marine department, until a number of hon. members on both sides of the house, including my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short), succeeded in showing the importance of this great industry. After a number of years we got the government to see that the two departments should be separated, which was done in 1930. We know what happened then, and we know what has happened since. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was returned to office he appointed a minister of fisheries, but within two years in his wisdom he again amalgamated the departments of marine and fisheries. Today there is no minister of fisheries, and the department has gone back to the Department of National Defence. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that my right hon. friend is not carrying out the pledge he made to the people of Halifax in 1930, when he said "he would throw the whole financial power of the state behind the fisheries industry."

With regard to the matter of bait for the fishermen, away back in 1906, when Mr. Fielding was the minister from Nova Scotia, the Liberal government voted some money for the purpose of establishing what were known as ice and salt bait freezers. A number of these freezers were erected in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the government paying fifty per cent of the cost and the fishermen raising the other fifty per cent through cooperative efforts. I regret to say, however, that after one or two years jealousies and other difficulties arose with the result that these freezers were not a success. Another reason for their failure was the fact that in those days fresh bait was much more plentiful than it is to-day, and as everyone knows who is interested at all in the fishing industry, fishermen will not take frozen or salt bait when they can secure fresh bait. As a result, although the government of the day was sincere in its efforts to supply proper bait facilities, these bait freezers were not a success.

Later the government arranged, through the Department of Agriculture, to grant one-third of the cost of what were known as ammonia freezers. Several of these freezers were established at different points in the maritime provinces, on a large scale. It was found impossible, however, when these freezers were established at central points, for the fishermen in the outports and the villages along the shores to obtain bait from those central freezers. So, while these freezers did a great deal of good and a number of fishermen were able to obtain bait from them, it was found that the scheme did not entirely fill the bill. In 1927, if I remember correctly, after I became the representative of the constituency of Antigonish-Guysborough—the best constituency in Canada, I might say—I realized that the people in my district were far removed from both the bait freezers and the market. I endeavoured to impress upon the government the necessity of arranging not only for a bait supply but also for a method of marketing the fish. Steamers were therefore chartered by the government to convey bait to the fishermen and also to take away their catch to central points.

Since this government came into power a steamer, which was arranged for in 1928, still goes around Chedabucto bay carrying bait for the fishermen of Canso and vicinity, and also for the fishermen of Richmond county, but that is not sufficient. It is true that for a number of years there was a large bait freezer in the town of Canso, but the company ceased operations, with the result that the fishermen of Canso, Whitehead, Port Felix, Fox island, Queensport and other places are not able to obtain bait at certain seasons of the year. Their only chance at present is to secure bait from this small boat which is put on by the government in the summer season, or to secure the bait direct from the traps when the herring strike. Following the closing of this bait freezer the result has been, so far as Canso is concerned, that what was once a great industry is now practically wiped out. Hundreds of men in Canso to-day are either on relief or barely able to make a mean living due to the fact that there are no bait facilities available which would permit them to fish whenever they were willing to go out on the Atlantic ocean to the fishing grounds. So I say this resolution is very important, and a large freezer and cold storage plant should be erected at Canso.

Several years ago the government decided that a large bait freezer and cold storage plant should be erected in Halifax. I believe that was in 1927, and if I remember correctly some $670,000 was granted to a company which built the plant at a cost of some $2,500,000. That plant ran for several years, but to my surprise it was taken over by the harbour commission last year for something like $2,000,000. I do not think that was a good business deal. The harbour commission might have waited and made better terms, because the private corporation was anxious to sell. Instead of paying $2,000,000 for the plant, I believe it could have been bought for a great deal less. Certainly if the government, whether this government or the preceding government, could spend first $670,000 and then an additional $2,000,000 for a cold storage and bait freezing plant in Halifax, they could arrange in view of all the circumstances to spend money to encourage the fisheries and effect improvements along the coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, so that the fishermen in the different villages may have the facilities to procure bait for the purpose of catching fish in the summer season.

Not only did the government take over the plant at Halifax but I notice in Bill 138 of last session an amount of $286,000 was voted for the construction of bulkhead and pier, 195 feet and 200 feet respectively, to provide site for two fish processing plants adjacent to the cold storage plant. Then there was another $354,000 voted for the construction of buildings for fish processing plants adjacent to the cold storage plant. Instead of spending about $600,000, in the city of Halifax I should think that amount could have been used to better advantage out where the people catch fish, and could have been given to help the people who need bait. In view of the fact that the amounts I have mentioned are not yet spent, and the further fact that there is no necessity for the expenditure at the moment, may I suggest the $600,000 mentioned in the act might be better transferred to the scheme I have in mind whereby bait freezing plants would be established in different parts of the province of Nova Scotia.

I was very sorry indeed to notice that when the Prime Minister, who made very strong statements in 1930 regarding the fisheries, visited Halifax six weeks ago in company with two of his colleagues, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), who is from Nova Scotia, and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), they did not say one word about the fishing industry, either in their speeches at the luncheon given them at noon or at the public meeting held in the evening, although all three of them spoke about wheat, farmers and manufacturers. I believe that goes to prove that until such time as this or any other government realizes that the fishing industry of Canada is worth not only preserving but developing, and until such time as practical men, either officials in the department or ministers, are put at the head of this great department, the fishermen and the fishing industry of Canada will not get a square deal.

I say therefore that in my opinion the resolution moved by the hon. member for Gloucester is timely, due to the fact that the government is at this time endeavouring to spend money to help the people of the country out of the difficulties in which they find themselves at the moment. The government is spending a great amount of money on public buildings. In my view it would be much better to spend a million dollars to build bait freezers for fishermen than to spend a million dollars on buildings in different parts of the country. While in good times such buildings may be necessary, it seems to me that careful consideration is not given to what would help the people of the country and help to maintain a great industry. I say therefore that when the government votes $40,000,000, as it did last year, and when we find there is not one dollar for fisheries in that large amount, and when we look at the estimates for fisheries in the present year or any other year—not only under this government but under previous governments—and find that practically nothing is set aside to extend the fisheries or help the fishermen to catch more fish, and when we see no effort being made to encourage the young men growing up in fishing villages to prosecute the industry—when we see all these things we have cause for complaint.

[Mr. Duff.]

I repeat that this government has had the greatest opportunity to do something for the fishermen. Let us see what has been done in other places. I notice that only a few days ago Walter Runciman made the statement that the British government was voting £10,000,000 to help the shipping industry of Great Britain. Due to the fact that under depressed conditions investors in the industry have lost a good deal of money, the British government realized that in order to get the shipping industry on its feet it was necessary to help it by voting a large sum of money. Surely, sir, in this great country, this new country with vast resources, we can afford under present economic conditions to support our industries. If the British government could vote £10,000,000 to help its shipping industry surely this parliament can vote money not only to build bait freezers but to bring the fishing industry back on its feet.

In addition to Great Britain doing something for the fishermen let us see what the little island of Newfoundland is doing. In spite of all the talk we hear about that island, and in spite of the reports about its financial condition, we notice in one of the Newfoundland papers that the government is giving a bounty to people who will build vessels for the fishing industry. I hold in my hand a newspaper giving the names of some seventy-four people who are building vessels in different ports of Newfoundland. The government is giving bounties to these shipbuilders to encourage them to build ships, and according to tonnage the bounties range from $750 per vessel to $6,000.

Some years ago when the fishing industry of Nova Scotia was not as prosperous as it might be, due to foreign markets being taken away because of tariffs and other restrictions, I urged upon the government of that day—and I believe I have urged upon this government—the necessity for giving bounties to fishermen to encourage them to prosecute their industry. I suggested that not only should bounties of so much a quintal be given to fishermen, but that bounties should be given to encourage the people of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island to build small boats or fishing vessels to develop the industry.

When I came to this country some forty years ago I remember we had 150 sail out of the town of Lunenburg, the town I have made my home during those forty years. To-day that fleet is reduced to about 30 ships. Surely, sir, that industry is worth saving. Again I say I am not talking politics and am not blaming this government particularly, but I should like to add that never since I have been in parliament has any government given the care and attention to the fishing industry which should be given to it. I know from my personal and practical experience in that great industry that if the government had come to the assistance of these men when they were in difficulties and downhearted and had said, "If you will keep on in the industry and build new vessels we will give you a bounty of so much a ton for every vessel you build," conditions would have been different. But no person encouraged the fishermen. No encouragement was given to the industry because, as I said a moment ago, the fishing industry is only the tail end of several other departments and nobody seems to care about it. I say that a bounty should be given for the catching of fish, or loans to build boats or vessels, so that the fishermen would have some encouragement to catch fish and bring new money into the country. For a great many years the government of France paid 10 francs, at the time when the franc was worth twenty cents, or $2 a quintal, for every quintal of fish landed from the fishing vessels of that country, and to-day they are paying the equivalent of $2 a quintal. However nothing has been done by this country to encourage our great industry.

I am not objecting to this government giving so much a bushel for the production of wheat; I am not objecting to this government giving another sum of money for some other reason or for the encouragement of some other industry, but I do say the government has been negligent in its duty as far as the fisheries is concerned. However I must add that I do not blame the government as much as I blame the Department of Fisheries. Someone has fallen down on the job. The fishing industry was worth saving, but no one has taken the opportunity which was at his very door to save it and to encourage the fishermen to catch more fish.

In my own county of Guysborough, as I said a few moments ago, the town and fishing port of Canso is the nearest point to the fishing grounds of the Atlantic ocean. When I first went there thirty years ago there would be 140 to 150 boats from 5 to 30 tons sailing out of that port for the fishing grounds. To-day those boats are all worn out; the fishermen cannot afford to build new ones, and the result is that men are lying idle on the beaches because they have no fishing boats or fishing gear with which to prosecute the industry. I say to this government and to this parliament that there you have the greatest chance to do more for a particular industry and a particular people than anywhere else in the province of Nova Scotia. If the government are going to bring in reform policies, let me say, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a question of reform, it is a question of business, where every dollar that the government spends to aid the fishermen in building boats, providing gear and bait and establishing bait freezers, will come back not tenfold but a hundredfold. The government could help the fishermen to build boats and take security on the boats. If the government would do as I have suggested, then in the years to come, in Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, all along the shores of the Atlantic ocean, you would have a happy and contented people instead of the conditions you have to-day where the boys leave home for the cities to find work; but if these boys had fishing boats and fishing gear they would stay at home and man the boats and bring in from the deep sea valuable cargoes of fish which would bring new money to this country.

Therefore, I say Mr. Speaker, that the government could not do better than accept the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Gloucester and arrange before the session closes to help the fishermen of the maritime provinces, yes and of the Pacific coast, in the ways I have suggested. You would then find more men going into this industry than there are at present, once they had the boats and gear with which to carry on this great industry.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I must heartily agree with a great deal that my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has said. But I think it is a matter of regret that the hon. gentleman was not quite so vocal when his party was sitting on this side of the Speaker.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, I must challenge that remark. I want to say to my hon. friend that in season and out of season I spoke on behalf of the fishermen of the maritime provinces, and no one knows it better than my hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald). In this parliament, in the fisheries committee, and in interviews with the minister, I always stood by the fishermen not only of my own district but also of the district represented by my hon. friend.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I quite agree that the hon. gentleman, if I remember rightly, was chairman of the fisheries committee, and I remember too that some of the recommendations that were sent up from that committee were hopelessly mutilated when they reached this house, but the hon. gentleman never raised his voice in protest against that.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, I did. Did my hon. friend raise his voice?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): I must agree Mr. Speaker, with much that the hon. gentleman has said as to the importance of this question. Next to agriculture it is I believe the most important question affecting the interests of the people of the maritime provinces.

With regard to the motion itself the only trouble in my opinion is that it does not go far enough. We have been doing too much fiddling around this question. It has been approached from too many angles, and too many people have been coming along and making suggestions as to what should be done to help the fisheries.

The fisheries that surround the maritime provinces are very extensive. There are over 15,000 square miles of fishing grounds entirely within the control of the dominion government surrounding the maritime provinces. Following the good example of my hon. friend, without saying anything of a political nature, I want to call his attention to the fact that those fisheries fell behind year after year while the late government was in power, and if the hon. member was as vocal and as insistent then as he says he was, his efforts certainly were not rewarded with any degree of success.

Mr. DUFF: I admit that.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): Because I notice that from the year 1923 to 1927 the fisheries of the Nova Scotia coast, fell from 1,370 hundredweight to 734 hundredweight, or about one-half, and the population engaged in the fisheries fell in even greater proportion. I notice that the numbers in Richmond county, for instance, fell from 1,838 in 1922 to 1,374 in 1927.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend must be wrong in that figure of 1,370 hundredweight. That is practically nothing.

Mr. DUFF: It must be wrong. That is only 137,000 pounds of fish.

Mr. MacDONALD (South Cape Breton): You will find it on page 11 of the report of the Royal Commission on Fisheries.

[Mr. F. MacDonald.]

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the condition of the fishermen in the province of Nova Scotia is very deplorable, and something must be done to improve present conditions.

With regard to the efforts that have been made along cooperative lines, while we are in favour of that, it is simply nibbling at the edge of the question, if you are going to improve the fishing industry of the maritimes you have to approach it in a much larger way than has been suggested in this house. There are thousands and thousands of fishermen in the maritime provinces who twenty or twenty-five years ago were in fairly comfortable circumstances but who to-day are destitute. Now, what can the government do? What is to be the particular benefit to be derived from establishing bait stations? Certainly they will be of some help in catching the fish, but what are you going to do with the fish when you do catch them?

Mr. DUFF: Sell them.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Where are you going to find a market for them?

Mr. DUFF: In the United States.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): My hon. friend knows too much about the fish business to expect for one moment that the shore fishermen would be able to sell their fresh fish in the United States.

Mr. DUFF: Not their fresh fish in the outlying districts, but salt fish.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): We have surrounding the coast of Cape Breton a number of these cooperative societies which are all working and doing well, but they have some difficulty in selling their fresh fish. My hon. friend knows too much about the industry to think that we are going to make a success of it in that way; the future of the industry lies in the disposal of fresh fish.

Mr. DUFF: Not at all, you are wrong.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): Possibly my hon. friend may know more about the salt fish industry—

Mr. DUFF: I think I should.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): —but I venture to say that the future of the fishing industry will lie along the line of supplying fresh fish to the markets of the world. And how will you do it? The idea put forward by the hon. member for Gloucester simply means the establishment of bait houses along the shore, and that is of very little value. It is of some value, but the fact is that you have to equip these fishermen along the shore not only with bait but with all the other appliances they need; you have to finance them from the ground up. And, I repeat, how is that to be done? I quite agree with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. It may be all right to give $90,000,000 to the farmers of the west, but let us give $9,000,000, one-tenth of that sum, to the fishermen of the east, and we shall be quite content.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear; that is what I said.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): For fifty years we have been playing with the fisheries question—I quite agree with that—and we are in a worse position to-day than we were before. It is about time we shifted our ground and explored the subject from a new angle. Last year and the year before I brought before the house the question of utilizing the amount of the Washington award now lying in the treasury of this dominion and which has been distributed in dribs and drabs through the medium of fishing bounties which are absolutely of no value to the fishing industry. I suggested then, as I suggest now, that this amount should be capitalized and distributed in the form of a fund through a commission for the purpose of financing the fishermen of the maritime provinces and enabling them to get on their feet. My own idea is that the fisheries of the maritimes will have to be placed under a commission. I believe that the solution of the difficulty in connection with the whole question that faces the maritimes lies in that direction. The industry should be placed under the control of a commission who would have the expenditure of this $4,000,000.

I agree with many of the remarks of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, and the only complaint I have to make is that we are simply beclouding the issue; instead of directing our attention and all our efforts towards putting the business on a good, sound basis, we are fiddling away, spending our efforts in trying to establish bait stations along the coast. Otherwise I am heartily in favour of it.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): This afternoon we had a long discussion on banking and credit and this evening we are having a discussion on the fishing industry. I confess at the outset that my ignorance of banking is profound, and my ignorance of the fishing industry is just as profound. But that is perhaps a good excuse for me to get up and speak after those who have preceded me. I want to say a word or two however in support of the resolution. I congratulate the mover (Mr. Veniot) and the seconder (Mr. Duff), as well as all those in the Liberal party who intend to support the motion; I congratulate them on the right about face since nine o'clock. In this resolution we are told that private initiative has failed. Fancy the former Postmaster General and those associated with him in this resolution speaking of the failure of private initiative, the very thing which they voted to approve of an hour ago. They voted their approval of private initiative, which they declared had been a success, and now they condemn it as a failure.

They want to supply the fishermen with bait. I wonder what kind of bait it is. Will it be Liberal or Conservative bait or C.C.F. bait?

Mr. DUFF: No, suckers.

Mr. HEAPS: It seems to me however that this is a very good resolution; it is one that supports the platform of those with whom I am associated in this house, and because it does so I want to support the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member who seconded his motion. I find that they intend to establish government owned warehouses along the coast and I should like to see this result in increased catches for the fishermen. But I also want to see the fishermen find a market for their fish after it has been caught. The most important thing to-day is not to provide machinery for production in this dominion. We have all kinds of facilities at our disposal for producing either fish or other commodities. Our whole problem is one of distribution of the commodities produced, and that is where this resolution fails. However, I am glad to find that the mover and the seconder of the resolution realize at any rate the failure of private initiative on the Atlantic coast, and I hope that in the future, when resolutions embodying the same principles come from this corner, we shall have support where formerly we had opposition.

Mr. H. B. SHORT (Digby-Annapolis): Being deeply interested in everything connected with the welfare of the fishermen, and of the fishing industry, I am thoroughly in accord with many of the remarks made by my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) and I am fully in accord with the resolution which the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) has brought forward. I think the time has arrived when we should do everything possible to assist the fishing industry, which during the past four years has experienced conditions which it has not known for many years previously. Less has been done for the fishing industry than for any other industry, though it is one of the greatest natural resources we have in the maritimes and capable of the greatest expansion. Off the coast of Nova Scotia we have one of the greatest fisheries in the world, but the trouble is, we need a market. That is what we need more than anything else. There is no question about production; we can produce all the fish the country requires. Unfortunately however we are up against it for a market. I have brought up in this house a number of times, being on the Canadian Fisheries Association, the advisability of a grant through the government for the purpose of advertising our fish. We are not selling the quantity of fish in Canada which we should; the people are not buying the quantity they should buy.

Mr. HEAPS: Why?

Mr. SHORT: Because they are not educated up to it.

Mr. HEAPS: They have not the money.

Mr. SHORT: The people in the interior of our country do not know anything about fish. If we spent a sufficient amount of money in advertising our product and educating the people up to eating fish; if we increased the sale of fish in this country by but ten pounds per capita, it would mean an additional 100,000,000 pounds, which would be of great assistance to our fishermen in the maritime provinces.

The resolution before the house is, I believe, a good one, and to carry out its terms would not cost the country a great deal of money. Every facility should be given to our fishermen to prosecute their industry in the best possible manner. I do not know that this government has spent very much, but previous governments spent quite large amounts of money in erecting throughout the dominion bait freezers which, as was explained by two hon. gentlemen opposite, were not a success. If modern freezers can be built at the prices mentioned by the hon. member for Gloucester, this is something to which the Department of Fisheries could give very serious consideration, and I believe if the matter is taken up in the committee on fisheries, there discussed and recommendations made to the department, every attention will be given to them. That is what I understand my hon. friend is asking for and I believe the government would be well advised to carry out the recommendations in reference to freezers.

But in connection with the fishing industry there are many other matters that are much more important than the freezers. As the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has stated, every assistance has been given to the farming industry but very little has been given to the fishermen. I think some scheme can be worked out whereby loans can be made to the fishermen on easy terms so as to enable them to equip themselves with better facilities for operating the industry. The fishermen today are up against it for new equipment. Their old equipment is worn out; they have no money with which to replace it. Some arrangement can I am sure, be arrived at for making loans to our fishermen in order to enable them to supply themselves with modern equipment. I believe the Department of Fisheries will do everything possible to assist the fishermen if this matter is brought before them in the proper manner, and the proper place to discuss it is before the committee on fisheries. Therefore I suggest that the question be taken up by that committee and a report presented to the house, when we can discuss the problem further.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. MEMBER: Another fisherman.

Mr. MYERS: Yes, another fisherman. I was just going to remark that some hon. members may think it rather peculiar that a farmer, one who is always proud to declare himself a farmer, should rise on this occasion to say a few words with reference to the resolution now before the house. I wish however to remind hon. members of what to my mind are two very important facts. The first is that on the Atlantic seaboard, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick do not wholly comprise the maritime provinces. I come from Prince Edward Island, the smallest province it is true of the three, but I did not make it; it was made by a higher power than I, and the reason it was made so small is that it was made so good. Another reason I have for raising my voice on behalf of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) is the fact that fully twenty-five per cent of the people in the riding of Queens, which I have the honour to represent, earn their living on the sea.

I can assure the house that I am most heartily in accord with the resolution. I was just glancing over it and at first I thought I would commend it for the modesty of its contents. I notice in the first place it acknowledges, as the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has so very nicely pointed out, that private initiative is not sufficient to cope with the present needs of the fishing industry. I quite readily admit that. As to the last paragraph, I commend the hon. member for Gloucester for his modesty, a quality that he rarely displays in the house. He says he is willing to leave the dimensions and the cost of such plants to the good judgment of the Department of Fisheries, but I feel rather inclined to agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) and the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) that this resolution does not go far enough.

I am quite in earnest when I rise to speak on a motion of this kind. This government had gone a long way to aid the farmers of the dominion, both east and west, in carrying on the operations of agriculture. We have been bonused with reference to the price of wheat; we have been assisted on many occasions to secure seed and feed, and the federal government is operating at great expense to this country but, I believe, very wisely, experimental farms in every province. The government is giving a great deal of assistance to the farmers with reference to live stock. On two occasions in my province the federal government sent down inspectors from the department here who tested all our cattle for tuberculosis, and I understand a similar test is to be made during the coming year. I am not saying that the farmers of Canada are receiving any too much attention. This is good. It is true that farming is the basic industry of the dominion, yet at the same time I am quite in earnest when I say that similar or at least suitable assistance should be given to the fishermen on our sea coast who earn their living in such a hazardous manner. With the establishment of centres for the collection and preservation of bait around the shores of the maritime provinces I am in hearty accord. I live near a fishing village and when I go to the village I often say to the boys, "How are the fish this morning? How are you getting along to-day?" Very often the reply is, "There are lots of fish, but we are out of bait." I suppose hon. gentlemen who live inland and do not understand so much about the fishing industry as hon. gentlemen who have preceded me—and let me say they know very much more about it than I do—

Mr. VENIOT: Or the hon. member for North Winnipeg, who knows nothing about it.

Mr. MYERS: Well, he was getting a little dig at you, and I do not blame him for that. I was going on to say that at certain times in the season they have what we call a run, of herring or other fish suitable for bait. If they put the nets out they can catch great quantities in a short time, a few hours, or half a day perhaps. But then the question arises, how are they going to preserve them? After a while the school passes and perhaps for weeks there will not be another run. It seems to me that, as the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) have so well pointed out, if some means were adopted whereby this periodical run of bait could be cared for in a proper manner so as to be available for the use of the fishermen at all times, it would help them greatly. I heartily agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough that a number of smaller plants suitable for this work widely scattered along the shores of the maritime provinces, would serve the fishermen best at much lower cost. Suppose for instance a large bait collecting and storing plant were established at some centre to serve a great mileage of sea coast; you can see the expense the fishermen would be put to to get the bait from that plant to their little ports and stages along the shores where they want to use it. It does not matter whether it be shipped by train or motor truck or whether they have to go for it themselves in their gasoline boats; gasoline costs money, and when they have to go a number of miles for it you can see how it adds to the cost of their operations. So I heartily agree that a number of smaller plants would meet the needs of the fishermen better than a few larger ones.

The marketing of fish is a large question, the most important and most vital question of all. It is the same as with agriculture. You can leave agriculture to us; don't worry about production—we are here, Johnny-on-the-spot all the time, and all you have to do is give us the price and we will look after the production. So with the fishermen around the sea coast; if you can assure them a reasonable price for the product of their toil you can leave the production to them. I agree with everything that has been said, especially by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short), with regard to the desirability of the government or the Department of Fisheries spending some money to advertise the fish of the maritime provinces, and British Columbia as well, in the central parts of Canada. You know I am very human; I am very kind-hearted, and often when I sit down at home to a magnificent dinner of fresh cod or mackerel—

Mr. VENIOT: That's the stuff!

Mr. MYERS: Doesn't he know it? Fresh codfish and new praties—can you beat it?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, and salt herring and potatoes is a good deal better.

Mr. MYERS: Well, you see the difference between you and me is that your're a herring choker and I am not. But what I want to say is that when I sit down to that fine dinner of new potatoes and fresh codfish right out of the sea, how I wish you people living in central Canada, in Ontario, that grand old province—how I wish you too could enjoy the luxury that we enjoy so plentifully—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MURPHY: Maritime rights.

Mr. MYERS: Well, that I shall not enter into, but—

Mr. DUFF: And maritime brains.

Mr. MYERS: Oh, I was just coming to that —something that is universally so highly valued and that can be obtained only by eating fish out of the Atlantic ocean. So I am in hearty accord with every move that may be made to advertise our fish not only through central Canada but in every part of the world.

One more thing I wish to say. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough made some observations about the selling of fish. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. McDade) said something for which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough took him to task. Well, that is part of the game. While I am not a smelt fisherman, yet I live right by a river where smelts are caught in great quantities, and I have often talked with the fishermen. It is true, as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough said, that they sell this fish very readily themselves. I have seen our men pack the finest smelts in nice clean white boxes, iced, everything done as well as it could be done, and then ship them on consignment to the Boston market and often get good returns. But many times they get back scarcely enough to pay the expenses, and I have seen a bill come back for the express and duty and consignment charges. That has happened time and again. It seems to me a great pity that such an industry, carried on by the best and hardiest of our race, could not by some cooperative means, whether under the marketing act or by cooperation among themselves, be organized so that they might secure a price in keeping with such arduous toil. I have seen in my own riding the finest codfish that ever came out of the water selling at the boatside or on the stage for three-quarters of a cent a pound, yet I have seen that same fish selling at the markets right in our own province at eight or nine cents a pound. It does not seem fair that the men who bear the burden and the heat of the day and toil in the chilly night should have to sell their fish at such a starvation price.

Then around the shores of my province we need, besides bait freezers, accommodation for the protection of our boats. The north shore of Prince Edward Island faces right out into the gulf of St. Lawrence, and a north wind there kicks up a terrible sea. In some places we have harbours, in others there are none. In many places the fishermen have to haul their boats out at every tide and launch them again when they get out to sea. It seems to me that the Department of Public Works, if they want to spend a little money, could very well spend it around the shores of Prince Edward Island, and I presume—I am more charitable than my hon. friends on the other side of the house—around the shores of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as well, to see to it that the fishermen of the maritime provinces are accommodated as well as the finances of the country will permit with breakwaters and wharves at which they can land their boats.

I have just one other thought in mind. We are doing a great deal for the labouring men and for the farmers, but I think I am correct when I say that the unemployment insurance bill does not provide for fishermen. Well, I suppose we must creep before we walk. The unemployment insurance measure is a new departure; I have no doubt it is right and I intend to give it my hearty support, but if it works well for the labouring man who is engaged in industry I can see no reason why, with a little more light on the subject, a little later on the benefits of this bill might not also be extended to those who go down to the sea in ships and labour on the great deep. At the same time let me put in a word for the farm labourer—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Bring in a new bill.

Mr. MYERS: I am a free lance; I speak my mind when occasion arises. I see no reason why a labourer who works on the same farm for many years should not come under this measure. I have had men working for me for seven and eight years at a stretch, and I cannot see why, in a short time, we could not extend the provisions of this bill to include the farm labourer and the fishermen as well. I hope that with these remarks the gentlemen in the far corner will not consider that I am going over to their ideas.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Be careful.

Mr. MYERS: I suppose one must be, but I feel it my duty to make these remarks.

I was nearly forgetting one other thing; I wish to join with the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, in the wish that assistance might be given our fishermen in regard to their equipment. This equipment and their fishing boats cost money. It is true that in Nova Scotia they use larger boats than we have in Prince Edward Island, yet a fisherman's boat, engine, traps, gear and equipment of all kinds, run into a good deal of money. I have seen men in Prince Edward Island set out in the spring of the year with a splendid equipment of lobster traps, each costing in the neighbourhood of $2.50. I have seen them start out with from one hundred to three hundred traps, and perhaps they would not be in the water more than a day or two before every trap would be ashore, smashed into a hopeless wreck, and the fisherman would have to do all the work again and go to a great deal of additional expense. So I would recommend to the department and to the government that they take steps to bonus our fishermen in the construction and repair of their boats and equipment.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this resolution. I am somewhat in the position of the hon. member who just resumed his seat (Mr. Myers); I am neither a farmer nor a fisherman, but I happen to represent an agricultural and fishing district in the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Conditions in my district may be a little different from those obtaining on the Atlantic seaboard, but in my trips through that part of the country I have come in contact with the fishermen, who have told me of their difficulties in getting bait and keeping it in good condition.

I am proud to support this resolution; I think it should receive the serious consideration of the government. I was rather surprised to hear the remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) a few moments ago; he did not seem to attach much importance to this resolution and seemed to make light of the hon. member who moved it. I think, however, that may be due to the fact that he lives very far inland and may not be familiar with conditions in the fishing industry.

All the recommendations contained in the latter part of the resolution are being carried out in the good old province of Quebec. The government of that province have come to the assistance of the fishermen in providing refrigerating plants at various places along the north shore of the St. Lawrence. As I was visiting my constituents last summer, at a place called Havre St. Pierre they were erecting a refrigerating plant with the money of the provincial government, with nothing contributed by the federal government. At another place called Thunder River a refrigerating plant was built a few years ago by the provincial government in order to aid the fishermen of that district.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the provincial government pay the full cost?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I believe so, because the plants were erected under the supervision of the government. The fishermen of those districts are not in a position to contribute to the cost of such plants, as they would be required to do if the plants were constructed by this government. I know this question has been discussed here at Ottawa, and we have been told that the government are willing to provide these plants if the fishermen pay their share, but the fishermen are not in a position to do that. I should be rather surprised to learn that the federal government contributed anything toward the improvement of the fishing industry in the province of Quebec.

I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that the provincial government has given further assistance to the fishermen in the way of bounties to aid in the construction of boats and new equipment, as the last speaker mentioned, and the fishermen in that part of the country have been greatly encouraged by the aid they have received.

I heartily approve of this resolution, and I hope the government will give it very serious consideration. I believe in order that the conditions of the fishermen, more especially in the district from which I come, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, should be improved, there should be more cooperation between the provincial and federal governments. Three years ago in this house I had occasion to bring in a resolution asking the present government to cooperate with the provincial government. At one time it was suggested that a certain school be established in the Gaspe peninsula in order to help the fishermen, but up to the present I do not think this proposition has been materially advanced. I know it is a difficult question, but the provincial government have done their share to develop the fishing industry of the province. The government have spent their own money, since they have control of the fisheries, but with more help needed to-day the provincial government are not in a position to contribute what is needed in the circumstances. For all these reasons I wish to support the motion of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). I congratulate him, and I hope the government will accept the motion and grant the request.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I will not delay the house for very long. I just wish to congratulate the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) for having brought in this resolution. I consider that the time that has been devoted to the discussion of this question has been spent very profitably, since it has brought to the attention of parliament and the country the deplorable condition of the fishermen, particularly in the maritime provinces. I believe, with another hon. member who has spoken, that the resolution does not go quite far enough. I think it should have further consideration and should be thoroughly discussed before the fisheries committee. Following that a report could be presented by that committee to parliament and some action taken by the government looking to the improvement of conditions generally among our fishermen.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) brings to the attention of the house his suggestion for the improvement of conditions in the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast. He suggests the establishment at important centres of a number of refrigerator plants adequate to meet the needs of the industry, and at the same time he desires that consideration be given to the best method of distribution of the bait required. In his remarks he has explained that he wishes this to be done entirely at the expense of the taxpayers. He did not make it clear whether that applied to the distribution required as well as to the building of the refrigerator plants but it is obvious that if the refrigerator plants are not dotted along the coast at close intervals the distribution necessary will be much more expensive.

The policy of the government as illustrated by its introduction of the Natural Products Marketing Act—which covers products of the sea as well as of the land—has been to show a readiness to assist the producer when he has shown himself able and willing to assist himself. In the past, governments in Canada have made attempts to handle the bait problem, and difficulty has been experienced because of the fact that bait is not available every month of the year. As a rule there is a scarcity in the fall and a plentiful supply in the spring, and the difficulty is that facilities are not easily provided for caring for the surplus obtainable in the spring so as to make it available during the fall months. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) referred to one series of attempts made nearly forty years ago with respect to the provision of bait freezers using ice and salt. They were to be built on a fifty-fifty basis as between the dominion government and the associations of fishermen. The system fell down for one reason because sometimes there would be years when bait would be plentiful, and on such occasions the fishermen did not see fit to store the ice, so that the bait was not put into storage and when bait became scarce there was no supply in the freezers. That policy was changed some ten years later, and other attempts were made by the dominion government over a course of years to provide freezers to overcome the bait difficulty. In 1929 and 1930 a determined attempt was made to overcome the difficulty, and as a result regulations were formulated which I shall summarize in this way: Where associations consisting of not more than twenty fishermen, who spend at least three months at sea fishing each year with baited hooks, would be formed, they would be assisted in the establishment of bait freezers to the extent of seventy-five per cent of the cost, and would also receive a bonus on the bait frozen for the first five years of $5 per ton, up to twenty tons. The associations were required to give a bond for $1,000 that they would carry on in accordance with the regulations. These provided amongst other things that the association would employ and pay a competent man to operate the plant and to deliver bait to the fishermen as they might call for it.

Only three freezers have been built so far under that arrangement. The first one, in Halifax county, operated only one year; the second was in Inverness county and is still operating, and the third, which was completed only last fall, is in Richmond county. In June, 1930, the late administration saw fit to give considerable assistance by way of a money grant for the building on a very large scale of a bait freezer at Yarmouth.

The plant cost in the neighbourhood of $100,000, the contribution by the federal government being $63,750. There were many who gravely doubted whether a large bait freezer could be made to pay, one of the great difficulties being the consistent and continuous distribution required from that one spot to the many points all along the coast where the bait was needed. The plant went out of operation in two years. An appeal was made to the present government to permit the closing of the plant, and permission was granted on the understanding that it would be reopened on demand.

Mr. DUFF: Would the minister allow me to say that one of the officials of his department recommended the purchasing of the plant in Yarmouth, a plant which never should have been purchased?

Mr. STIRLING: There was a recommendation that if the government asked the company in question to build a plant at Canso within a year, the plant would be built, presumably under the same arrangements. As the original plant was not successful, the one at Canso was not built. Probably that was a mighty good thing.

Hon. members speaking to the resolution have wandered rather far afield by suggesting its expansion to provide fishermen with boats and gear, marketing facilities and all sorts of things that do not come within its terms. I believe the best way to handle the matter would be to refer it to the select standing committee on fisheries, and with that in mind I would move, seconded by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart):

That at the end of the resolution should be added the words "and that the resolution be referred to the select standing committee on fisheries for consideration and report to the house."

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, evidently we cannot finish this debate to-night, and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Tuesday, February 5, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the honourable the Speaker and Messieurs: Barber, Bertrand, Bourassa, Boyes, Butcher, Campbell, Carmichael, Charters, Chevrier, Cotnam, Dubois, Dupuis, Factor, Ferland, Fontaine, Fortin, Fraser (Cariboo), Gagnon, Girouard, Guthrie, Irvine, Jones, Laflèche, Larue, LaVergne, MacMillan (Saskatoon), Macphail (Miss), Marcil, McGillis, McGregor, McIntosh, McKinnon, Mulock, Peck, Perley (Sir George), Pouliot, Quinn, Rhéaume, Short, Smoke, Thauvette, Thompson (Lanark), White (London), Wright, a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the library of parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the members of the select standing committee on printing, viz., Messieurs: Anderson (Halton), Baribeau, Belec, Boulanger, Bourgeois, Brasset, Charters, Desrochers, Dubois, Embury, Esling, Factor, Fortin, Girouard, Gott, Gray, Hay, Heaps, Howden, Lucas, MacLean, Maloney, Marcil, Matthews, McKenzie (Assiniboia), McLure, Mills, Moore (Châteauguay-Huntingdon), Munn, Murphy, Parent, Peck, Perras, Pickel, Porteous, Price, Quinn, Rhéaume, Rinfret, Roberge, Robinson, Rowe, Ryerson, St-Père, Short, Simpson (Simcoe-North), Spencer, Spotton, Taylor, Tétreault, Verville, Wilson, Woodsworth, Wright, will act as members on the part of this house, on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the honourable the Speaker and Messieurs: Ahearn, Barrette, Beaubier, Campbell, Cantley, Carmichael, Garland (Carleton), Hanbury, Howard, Laflèche, Macphail (Miss), McKinnon, Mills, Mullins, Ryerson, Senn, Spence, Sproule, Taylor, Thauvette, a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a joint committee of both houses on the restaurant.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSAL TO BRING COASTAL SHIPPING UNDER JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act (Traffic by Water).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. NEILL: The rules do not at this stage require anything but a short statement of the purport of the bill, which is to bring the coastal shipping trade of Canada as regards routes, schedules and charges under the supervision of the board of railway commissioners in exactly the same way as that body now has control over the same items in connection with railways. In the bill "coastal trade" is defined to exclude operations on the great lakes, and there is also a provision that it shall not apply to vessels under twenty tons burden, in order to prevent small ferries operated by gasoline launches and the like, from being harassed by unnecessary restrictions.

On the second reading of the bill I shall endeavour to explain the reasons why the bill should become law.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: The first four subsections of this proposed bill are the same as the provisions of section 180 of the old insurance act, chapter 101, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. These provisions would make it necessary for life insurance companies to maintain a policy in force as long as the cash surrender value of the policy is sufficient to cover the premiums shown to be due. It would also add a new subsection to control the rate of interest charged by insurance companies to policy holders.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: The purpose of this bill is exactly as explained for the other bill. There are two insurance companies acts, one referring to foreign insurance companies and the other to Canadian and British companies, so that to effect the desired purpose for all life insurance companies it is necessary to introduce these two bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GENEVA CONVENTIONS

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I stated yesterday that for the convenience of the members of the house the conventions referred to in the five resolutions which I submitted to the house would be printed in the orders of the day. I supplied the material from which it was to be done, but unfortunately by an error much more material was printed than is required. In fact a very large number of recommendations and matters of that sort which are unnecessary were included in the printing. Therefore I should like these resolutions to stand until to-morrow when the orders of the day will be revised and will include the printing of the conventions to which the resolutions refer.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if he could indicate to us, possibly not at the moment, but before the day is over, what will remain?

Mr. BENNETT: The ones that will remain are those referred to in the five resolutions that were on the order paper, page 12 yesterday; the rest will be stricken out. Roughly I can say, at the top of page 8 of the orders of the day, article 23, the words at the end will disappear, that is the attestation clause. On page 10 the attestation clause will disappear, because that is not any part of it. On page 19, article 24, the attestation clause will disappear, as well as the paragraph at the foot of page 19. The whole of page 20 goes out, and of pages 21 to 31 and the top of page 32. Pages 35 to 39 disappear, and half way down page 40. The top of page 46, convention concerning unemployment, disappears with the pages from there to the end of page 62.

I am very sorry about this. It was no fault of mine, the documents were handed in with the pages marked, but instead of paying attention to the notations on the top of the page they just went ahead continuously.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do I understand these will have precedence to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: No, I say they will be properly printed in the orders of the day tomorrow I want the house to have opportunity to study these conventions.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) a question. Owing to heavy ice conditions in Northumberland strait between Tormentine, N.B., and Borden, P.E.I., the car ferry S.S. Charlottetown has been delayed in making her regular trips. My question is, in case the present boat now operating there is delayed so as not to be able to make continuous connection with the railway trains, or in case of accident to the S.S. Charlottetown, is the old car ferry S.S. Prince Edward ready to carry on the passenger and freight traffic at these important points?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to tell me yesterday that he was going to ask this question and I made inquiry and find that the answer is in the affirmative, namely that the Prince Edward, the old ferry, is ready to be put into commission at once, and if any trouble occurs it will be put into commission at once.

AUSTRALIAN TRADE COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Sydney Morning Herald of Sydney, Australia, in its issue of December 29 last, carried a news item that Colonel L. M. Cosgrave, the new trade commissioner from Canada to Australia who is succeeding G. H. Ross, arrived on the S.S. Niagara yesterday, and reports him as saying:

> I am an imperialist, and a Canadian afterward.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Shame!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to ask if the government agrees that the work of the trade commissioner is to promote an imperialist program, or to secure trade for Canada?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, inquiries will be made as to the accuracy of the statement.

PRIVILEGE—MR. DUPUIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, February 1, referring to unemployment relief, I said, according to Hansard at page 438:

> I heard the premier of Quebec about a month ago make that kind offer to the Prime Minister of Canada to contribute fifty per cent. I do not know whether I am wrong, but the Prime Minister is here to say whether I am or not.

The right hon. gentleman said:

> That was not the offer.

The premier of Quebec handed a copy of the letter to the Canadian Press—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman is rising to ask a question I would ask him kindly to do so.

Mr. DUPUIS: I rise to a question of privilege, because the Prime Minister suggested that I made a statement that was not true. I just want to rectify that statement and to ask the right hon. gentleman to rectify himself also, with all due respect to him. As I was about to say, the premier of Quebec gave a copy of his letter to the press, and in the newspaper I hold in my hand there is a copy of his letter sent to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) under date of January 7. This was the second letter to which no reply was received. I wish to read only one paragraph, which I think will be sufficient to prove the accuracy of my statement.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Surely, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member cannot read from a newspaper what purports to be a letter from someone. Surely that is not what is called privilege in this house. In England they do not permit the reading of newspapers at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman wishes to correct something which has been said in parliament, well and good, but he should not read something contained in a newspaper.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is my point, your honour. The right hon. gentleman suggested that I was speaking an untruth. He did not say so in words, but it was the same as saying, "You are a liar."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sure the hon. gentleman did not quite mean that. I am sure he knows that in rising to a question of privilege it is not proper to quote from a newspaper. If the hon. gentleman wishes to bring up a question of privilege I would appeal to him to state his case briefly and clearly.

Mr. DUPUIS: I just want to quote from a letter written by the premier of Quebec to the Minister of Labour; if this is not an accurate copy of the letter the Minister of Labour is here to say so. The paragraph is as follows—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should not read from a newspaper in connection with a question of privilege.

Mr. DUPUIS: Then I need not read it at the moment; a little later on I hope to obtain a copy of the original here in the house, but the letter is to the effect that the premier of Quebec offered to pay fifty per cent of the cost of unemployment relief if this government would pay the other fifty per cent, in order to relieve the municipalities. I ask the right hon. gentleman to rectify himself right here.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is unnecessary to make any observations with regard to any such statement quoted from a newspaper. I am rather surprised that the hon. gentleman should attempt to quote from a newspaper, which is forbidden by the rules of the house.

Mr. DUPUIS: The right hon. gentleman has read from newspapers more than once.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec-East): May I reiterate my question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) as to Canada's seat on the governing body of the international labour bureau, and as to whether the minister has any information to give the house or any correspondence to table in the matter.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I had hoped to have a statement ready to give to the house with respect to this matter. I think I will be able to make that statement to-morrow.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, 1928.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in previous sessions of this parliament very little opportunity has been given at any time for discussion of the conditions of unemployment and distress throughout the country. Almost without exception the estimates of the Department of Labour have been held until the very end of the session or until a period immediately preceding a recess, when an endeavour has been made to hurry them through as rapidly as possible. As hon. gentlemen know the best opportunity that can be given the house to discuss questions of unemployment and relief is when the estimates of the Minister of Labour are before the house. I believe the fact that we have never had a chance really to discuss the government's policies with respect to unemployment except at the last moments of a session, as I have said, is responsible for the circumstance that the government's policies have changed as much as they have, and that there has been very little consistency between what was expressed at one session and what was proposed at the next with respect to meeting conditions of unemployment and the situation as regards relief.

I would hope that at this session an early opportunity would be afforded to discuss present conditions. The government has indicated a program of social and industrial reform, but from what has been presented thus far and from what we have been told about the remainder of the program it would appear that it relates not to present conditions but to the future, that it will not come into operation until after the general election and that even then whether or not it is to come into operation will depend upon circumstances as they may then present themselves. We on this side of the house have endeavoured as far as possible to facilitate the introduction and the immediate consideration and discussion of these measures, because we think they are important, and whatever in them commends itself to us will continue to receive our support. But we feel very strongly that any program of social and industrial reform should not be permitted to sidetrack an immediate consideration of present problems in our country.

I might say that there is a further reason —which is but one of many reasons—why there should be an immediate discussion in this parliament of the measures to be taken to meet the existing situation, and it is that throughout Canada the provincial governments are much perplexed as to what the federal government is going to do in the matter. Some of them are hesitating with respect to measures of relief which they should immediately bring in, waiting to hear what this government proposes doing. I am speaking now of the program to meet immediate distress. The municipalities, the provinces and the dominion must be fully informed as to what each is doing and proposes to do. Obviously if we wait until Easter to consider what is to be done by the federal government all municipalities and all provinces will be embarrassed with respect to their particular programs.

Already the house has been once moved into committee of supply, but when we were in committee it was not the labour items which were called but an item with respect to the Department of Justice. The estimates for that department may all be important, but their consideration at the moment is not as important as that of the estimates of the Department of Labour, particularly in the light of the situation existing throughout Canada to-day.

The other evening when mentioning the house would be moved into committee of supply later, the Prime Minister indicated two or three departments which would be called. He did not however mention the Department of Labour. Holding as we do the very strong opinion that the questions of unemployment and existing distress are the major problems in Canada to-day, and that during the last five years they have been the all important questions, we feel that the matters pertaining thereto ought to be the subject of discussion and consideration in this parliament at the earliest possible date. I therefore move, and I hope the Prime Minister will accept the amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be struck out, and the following substituted therefor: "That this house is of the opinion that when it is moved into committee of supply priority should be given consideration of the estimates of the Department of Labour in order that opportunity may be afforded for an immediate discussion and consideration of conditions of unemployment and distress at present existing in all parts of Canada, and of the measures required to cope therewith."

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I assume the right hon. gentleman, like every other hon. member in the house, is aware of the fact that if the amendment carries the house will not go into supply at all. This is a vote of want of confidence in the administration. If it were to pass it would merely mean that the committee would be discharged and the Speaker would not leave the chair. Just why the right hon. gentleman should make a proposal of that kind instead of rising in his place and making a suggestion as he might have done when I mentioned the other evening in the house that we would go into supply, I do not know. If he had suggested that he desired to take the labour item I would have been glad to have said we would take labour. If he had suggested anything of the kind I would have been glad to accede to it. If I accept his amendment and the Speaker does not leave the chair, the committee of supply is dissolved. It has to be reconstituted. He knows that as well as any hon. member in the house, and I think perhaps better.

On the next point, the one he raised first, namely that there has not been ample opportunity to proceed upon and consider certain matters, it is only necessary to refer to the journals of the house and the discussions which took place on the unemployment relief and farm relief measures of 1934, 1932 and 1930, and to the very tedious discussions, if I may use the term without offence, which took place in this house, I believe a reference of that kind would rather negative his suggestion of to-day.

So that on neither count it seems to me does the right hon. gentleman succeed, and his one suggestion is rather destroyed by the records themselves. I can only think that in moving his amendment going into supply he had in mind that possibly we might say we would accept it, in which event having done so the committee would be dissolved and we would be out of business. That may have been the object in his mind but I am bound to say we have had a few years of experience and are not caught by that kind of argument or plan. I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that if he withdraws his amendment we will agree that the next item in supply after the ones to-day shall be labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, what I had in mind when I said to the right hon. gentleman that I hoped he would accept my amendment was that he would say exactly what he has said—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —that he would say that if I would withdraw the amendment he would then have the house moved into committee of supply to consider the Department of Labour estimates. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall read what it says:

That this house is of the opinion that when it is moved into committee of supply priority should be given consideration of the estimates of the Department of Labour in order that opportunity may be afforded for an immediate discussion and consideration of conditions of unemployment and distress at present existing in all parts of Canada, and of the measures required to cope therewith.

The Prime Minister, having said that priority will be given to the Department of Labour estimates, once the house is moved into committee, the purpose of the resolution—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. I said we would have to dispose of the items we have to-day when we get into supply. We will have to dispose of the items we have to-day, but when we move into supply to-morrow or next day or whatever day it is, we will agree that the labour estimates be considered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the house is moved into committee of supply to-day, this item is to be called?

Mr. BENNETT: On three departments, in order that the house may have something to deal with.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; my amendment will have to stand if that is the case, because if that is so it would simply mean the government will seek to get three or four departments opened up in order that the time of parliament may be taken up in discussing those departments instead of discussing more immediate questions. In that event my amendment will have to stand.

Mr. BENNETT: I am compelled to take the point of order that it is out of order to instruct the committee of supply and that an instruction to a committee of supply cannot be moved. Nothing can be brought on in committee of supply of which notice has not been given in detail in the estimates laid before the house.

Mr. DUPUIS: I would suggest that the Prime Minister put this amendment in his reform—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROWE: You have been out of order already to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am of the opinion on the authority to which reference has been made by the Prime Minister that the amending motion is out of order. I find in May, 13th edition, page 524, the following: "An instruction to the committee of supply cannot be moved." It seems to me that is the effect of the present amendment. I therefore declare the amendment out of order.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BENNETT: Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, when we have concluded with getting before the committee the items in question we shall give priority to the labour estimates after we have disposed of the matters now standing. In other words, when the committee is seized of supply with respect to the three departments I mentioned the other day we shall then give priority to labour estimates for detailed discussion.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Publications, $32,197.60.

Mr. McPHEE: Would the minister kindly explain the increase in this item?

Mr. SWANSON: I would ask the Minister of Agriculture if the government have any plan under consideration for the rehabilitation of the farmers of the dried-out areas in the west and also for the conservation of water for the ranchers in the same area?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member gave me notice that he was bringing up this matter, and I have had prepared a short statement which I shall give to the committee.

A great deal of work has been done since 1930 by the federal Department of Agriculture in studying the drought situation in the three prairie provinces. In addition to information obtained from this study, there has also been collected and analyzed, as far as possible, information obtained from similar conditions outside of the dominion. Based on the knowledge gained from the information obtained, the federal Department of Agriculture intends to carry on an extensive program of demonstration and further research, in an endeavour to assist the great body of farmers in this area in not only meeting as far as possible the difficulties caused by the continued drought, but in planning for the future to avoid a recurrence of the conditions in which they found themselves in the last five years, and also to protect themselves if there should be a recurrence of these conditions.

It is generally conceded that this area should be divided into three regions, one suitable for ranching, one suitable almost entirely for the growing of wheat, and the intermediate region lending itself to a mixture of the two.

It is proposed to select a number of fairly large areas in each of these regions for the purpose of demonstration and research. Because these areas are under the ownership of many individuals, it will be necessary to receive the whole-hearted co-operation of the farmers within the areas selected, this co-operation, by agreement, to extend over a period of years.

The basis of this plan will be our knowledge of the soil and for what it is best suited, the availability of grasses best suited where there is a minimum of moisture, cultural practices for the preventing of soil drifting, and the conservation of moisture, the use of dams for conservation of surface moisture, and the use, where suitable, of blocks of trees as an aid to agriculture. The fundamental aim of this policy is to demonstrate as far as is known in what way farmers or ranchers can plan to provide for their subsistence on the land.

This policy will be administered by the federal Department of Agriculture. In addition, there will be set up an advisory committee, consisting of some of our most successful ranchers and farmers in these areas, together with some business men.

For the benefit of those hon. members who have not had the opportunity of obtaining first-hand knowledge of what is at stake in the drought area, the following is a short picture:

The total crop acreages, by provinces, in the Dominion of Canada in 1934, were:

Province	1934 Acreage
Prince Edward Island	473,000
Nova Scotia	554,800
New Brunswick	906,300
Quebec	5,950,300
Ontario	8,999,900
Manitoba	6,000,900
Saskatchewan	19,771,820
Alberta	11,971,500
British Columbia	406,900

The combined acreage of field crops in the four provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia in 1934 was 2,341,000 acres.

In the three prairie provinces the number of acres, in each of the last four years, yielding less than five bushels per acre, were:

	Acres
1931	9,178,000
1932	7,876,000
1933	11,435,000
1934	8,642,000

In Manitoba, the drought area yielding less than five bushels per acre for a period of four years has been in the neighbourhood of 372,000 acres.

In Manitoba in 1934, 196,000 crop acres yielded on an average of one-half a bushel per acre, with a return value of 32 cents an acre. This area for years was one of the most prosperous areas in Manitoba, with some of the finest homes and best types of farmers.

In Saskatchewan, in No. 3 crop district, the average return value per acre, per year, from 1931 to 1934 inclusive, from three and a half million acres, was $1.60 an acre. This small area had, in the past, yielded an average of $30.42 an acre for one year or a total of over $66,000,000, when wheat was at 77 cents a bushel.

In each of the years 1933 and 1934, the acreage in Alberta, yielding less than five bushels per acre, was over 1,300,000 acres; 68·6 per cent of the total crop acreages in 1934 were in the three prairie provinces.

In 1927 the value of wheat alone, harvested in the three prairie provinces, was $445,547,000.

That is a short statement, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Maple Creek.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, it is customary when the first item of a minister's estimates is called, for any hon. member to take the opportunity to make a general statement regarding it. There is nothing very controversial about this item that has been called, dealing with publications, but I notice that in nearly every item of these estimates for agriculture there is an increase, which would seem to indicate that the government has reached the very bottom of its reductions in the past and persistent starvation of agriculture. Ever since the estimates of 1931, this government has systematically reduced the vote for agriculture. One would think that a government that claims to be doing such a stupendous amount for agriculture would manifest it in some other way than by starving the vote for agriculture. To such an extent have the estimates been reduced that many of the services have been largely crippled. I know what I am speaking about, and when we come to the items I have in mind I shall give my reasons for so stating. It is I suppose a matter for commendation to know that the worst is over in this respect. Of course, it is only a coincidence that we find that the worst is over and that a return for the better is just before an election. However, it is better late than never. It seems to me extraordinary that the very foundations of our nation, the bulwark of the country, agriculture, should have been so crippled all these years and that there should then be a great legislative splurge made all along the line and also in the estimates for agriculture. Are we going to be asked to forget the dismal past? It will be recalled that in the last century the forties used to be and are still known as the "hungry forties." Well, in this century and under this government's administration this period will be known as the hungry thirties all over Canada, not only in agriculture but in almost everything else. And my hon. friends have contributed towards that hunger and the decimation of agriculture by persistently reducing the estimates for agriculture year after year, until those reductions aggregate the sum of over $4,000,000. I was very much disappointed in the minister in other years when he tried to defend that policy, first, by declaring that the services were not materially impaired and then, getting bolder, telling us that they were not impaired at all. I took the ground last year I think that if any minister could administer the department with $4,000,000 less than it had previously taken—from $11,000,000 to $7,000,000—he should be kept in perpetuity as Minister of Agriculture; for I have never met anyone who could perform that impossible feat. But he was stringing us; he was telling us bedtime stories when he said that the services had not been impaired. All I have to do is to refer to the health of animals branch as an indication of that impairment. I do not know that the government is open to a great deal of congratulation, because these increases would need to aggregate $4,000,000 for the great occupation of agriculture before my hon. friends could deserve an commendation; they would have to do as well as the government that preceded them did in that respect. I recall this, because I remember that when I had the honour of presiding over this department the estimates were at one time very low—about as low as they are now—and it was after a long struggle and an effort in which my right hon. leader and others assisted me very greatly that I finally arrived at the point where the estimates for agriculture received recognition relatively with those of other departments. I do not know whether my successor and his colleagues will be accorded sufficient public confidence to remain in power as long as we were in order to get the department back to where it was. At all events, he has made a start, and there is nothing controversial about this publication vote. I did not quite understand the dissertation my good friend gave with regard to the drought area, but whatever it was I presume it was good and will seek another time to discuss it. But how it was associated with publications I did not quite gather. I have nothing further to add at this time. I understand that the minister is merely going into committee and going out again, and therefore I leave to a later time any further observations I have to make.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. VALLANCE: I did not catch the first remarks of the minister when he read the statement that he did, but like the previous speaker (Mr. Motherwell) I notice this item is publications. Why should the minister avail himself of the opportunity to read what he has just read to us, very interesting as it is? Is there in this item anything that would suggest to me as a member of this house that some of this money is to be taken for the purpose of publishing the findings of this research body or commission? Is it going to indicate what the minister outlined in connection with the various areas? I should like the minister, had it been possible, to have made available the information which he has just given us in order that we might have discussed it more intelligently. He gave figures that are very interesting to me. As he well knows, I represent at least a portion of what might be designated a dried out area, and the mass of figures he gave would be exceedingly interesting once we were in a position to digest it so that we could intelligently discuss it. Like the ex-Minister of Agriculture, I have also looked upon the lowering of the estimates for agriculture year by year with a great deal of apprehension. I have before me now the five years' estimates from 1930-31 to 1935-36 inclusive, and I find that every year the estimates for agriculture have been lowered until this year we do notice a few slight increases, though even at that there are a few decreases for 1935-36. We find three decreases and about eight increases. I had hoped that the minister would show greater increases in some of these items than appear in the estimates for this year, because when you go back over past years and realize the service that was rendered by the various branches of the Department of Agriculture at the then cost, no Minister of Agriculture nor any member of this house can convince those of us who are engaged in the industry that it is possible to give to agriculture the service which is being attempted with such low estimates as we find for this year.

I am sorry that in the confusion in the house we were not able to catch the minister's introductory remarks when he first got on his feet. While I believe that what I did hear is very necessary and should be done, I think at the same time that a survey should be made of western Canada. I do not know a great deal about the east, and possibly there may be sections there that need a similar survey. When you consider that there are 300,000 farmers west of the lakes who have been more or less farming promiscuously, I think you will agree that one thing they need as much as anything else is some direction from the department, some lead to show them just what particular branches of agriculture they should take up. I can hear someone saying, "But you have the experimental farms." Yes, we have, and they have rendered great service to the farming communities in the west. But they are not numerous enough and I do not think that the experimental farms perform some functions which in my opinion they should. We should enlarge the functions of the experimental farms, because we have on many of these farms some of the best technical agriculturists probably on the North American continent, and we could utilize the services of these men to a greater extent than we have done in the past. I should like to see short courses established during the winter at each of the farms. I should like to see it made possible for young men living within any reasonable distance of an experimental farm to attend short courses in agriculture, because it is becoming more difficult as time passes to keep the young people on the farms. Unless therefore the government wakes up to the situation it will soon be impossible to retain on the farms even the sons of the farmers themselves. The whole trend of legislation to-day is to drive the man off the farm. We have had that manifested in some of the reforms suggested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). In spite of the great unemployment that exists at present in urban centres, it is still very difficult to get men who will be content to go on to the farm and some of the legislation that has been suggested by the Prime Minister in his reform program will I think merely intensify our problem. I hope before we get through with the agriculture estimates we shall have ample opportunity to read the statement of the minister and probably discuss it at some future date.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At the outset I would repeat what I stated during each of the past years in discussions on these estimates. I do not think anyone would consider fair the mere statement that the reduction in the estimates is wrong in itself. Each year I have challenged the members of the committee and asked for criticism to show me how any services have suffered by the reduction in these estimates. I repeat what I have said on previous occasions: If we have been able to reduce these estimates and at the same time to give equal if not greater service, I think that is something of which we should be proud. To-day, I made a statement before the committee for the purpose, among other things suggested by the hon. member for South Battleford, of affording hon. members an opportunity to read and to bring up questions, if they so desired, with reference to the information given by me to the committee. I availed myself of the first opportunity to make this statement.

With reference to short courses at experimental farms, I agree wholly with the hon. member for South Battleford. We have instituted such courses during the past two or three years. One that has been particularly successful is that held at Indian Head under the superintendent, Mr. Gibson. At the experimental farm at Fredericton, New Brunswick, there has been in operation for a number of years a more elaborate short course. There has been included in the public works program the erection of a dormitory to make it more convenient for the boys to come from the farm and to study at that experimental farm. The agricultural colleges with their associated courses do a great work, but I believe what the boys on the farm need more than perhaps a study of physics, chemistry and a number of the subjects that are given, is a more practical course from which they will benefit more, and as far as possible the boys attending these schools will do the actual work at the experimental farms because only in that way can they benefit most from the course.

As hon. members know, the purpose of opening these items to-day is simply to get a number of estimates before the committee and I would therefore move—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Before the minister makes his motion, may I ask a question or two with reference to his statement this afternoon?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The first one is this: Is that statement intended as a definite policy so far as the government is concerned in connection with the treatment of drouth areas?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then it is intended that the survey shall be made by officers of the department. That is what I gather from the statement of the minister.

May I suggest to him that in that survey—and this is no reflection on any officer in the department—he associate with the staff of the department some men who have considerable experience in the treatment of similar areas. My difficulty with officialdom is that they have very definite ideas; that in my opinion they do not pay enough attention to experiments of the past, and in this report which will be presented for the consideration of the government I hope at least some of the experiments that have been tried will be given a thorough inspection by the officers who are delegated to do this work. I am speaking in the light of some difficulties I have had in former days.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I understood the minister to move that the committee rise.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I asked for the minister's consent to my putting these questions and making a few remarks dealing only with the statement the minister read to the committee this afternoon. What I suggest first is that he will associate some outside individuals with the officers of his department and that they will make a very careful inspection—I say this in order to clarify what I mean—that in the area known as the Tilley area many years ago we adopted a similar scheme to the one suggested in the statement made by the minister this afternoon. Personally I am not familiar with the result. I take it that the low price of live stock has made it somewhat difficult to make a success of that venture, but I know from personal experience all through that territory there are areas in which farming has been carried on somewhat successfully. Even in Alberta, south of the Cypress hills, there have been very few failures, yet north of that area I am convinced from twenty-five years' experience that a great deal of that territory should revert to ranching. That briefly, is what I mean in making these observations. The situation is very serious and it is one that must be dealt with. Let us have the very best advice possible in order that we may make up our minds what course we shall pursue.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate what the hon. member for West Edmonton has stated. In the statement I gave to the committee we recognize fully what the hon. member has suggested. That is why an advisory committee is to be set up consisting of the largest as well as some of the smaller and most successful practical ranchers. The same thing applies to wheat growing areas. There will be on this advisory committee some farmers in that area who even under these difficult times have been most successful, because no one appreciates more than I do the importance of the information and the knowledge that these men through the years have gained in the practical operation of their ranches or farms. There will also be associated on this advisory committee some of the outstanding business men throughout these districts who have carried the load almost equally with the farmers and ranchers during the past four or five years and who are just as vitally interested in the rehabilitation of or in discovering to what extent we can rehabilitate these districts. The survey itself has been pretty well completed.

The hon. member in his few remarks referred also to the Tilley district in the southern part of Alberta. I believe it was in 1922 that that was abandoned. A good deal of it has since come back to pasture. An interesting thing in this connection is that the sandy lands came back first with a native grass called sand grass, but even the lighter soils have come back with a better covering of grass than the original one. The best illustration of what can be done is in a district about seventy-five miles south of Medicine Hat where an experiment was started in 1927 in an area, now occupied by the Gilchrist Brothers of Manyberries district which had been settled, homesteads proved up and then abandoned because the people could not make a livelihood. It had to a certain extent been regrassed by nature, but a development was started there to demonstrate just what could be done in the conservation of surface moisture and in using domestic grasses to regrass this area. For example, a dam was constructed not where there was any stream but just to catch the runoff of water in the spring. In 1927 when prices were much higher than they are now this cost only around $400. Yet with that expenditure there was created a five-acre pond of water irrigating forty-five acres with a volume of thirty acre feet of water. This shows what can be done at very little cost.

For the reason I stated before I move that the consideration of this item be deferred.

Item stands.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Grant to Canadian Legion, B.E.S.L., $9,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister explain this item?

Hon. DONALD M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): This item has been in the estimates for a number of years, formerly it was $10,000, and with the ten per cent cut was reduced to $9,000, at which amount it has remained for three years.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is it for?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is in the way of assistance for investigation and helping soldiers prepare their cases for presentation to the various soldiers' courts. It is given on consideration that they raise in their own way at least an equivalent sum, and before this is put in the estimate it is found by the auditors that they have complied with that condition.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Can the minister tell us who are the various lawyers in different parts of the country, by provinces, who render these services to the soldiers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That does not come under this item. This money is given to the legion to administer. The lawyers employed come under the commission and under the pension appeal court.

Mr. GERSHAW: How does this grant and the use made of it dovetail into the ordinary organizations for dealing with soldiers' claims? In other words is this grant used to further the claims of those only who belong to the legion, or has a man who does not belong to the legion the same opportunity of getting advantage therefrom?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think it has been the policy of the legion from its inception not to ask those seeking their aid whether they are members of the legion, nor is it a requisite for their assistance that applicants be members. It is open to anyone; they are ready to help any returned soldier to proceed with his case and endeavour to get justice.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Public Works—harbours and rivers, under contract, Saint John—channel improvements, $90,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister give some explanation as to the amount and how it is to be appropriated?

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): This amount is required to complete the dredging at the entrance to Saint John harbour, which was provided for in a contract awarded in July, 1930. There have been some extensions of the areas and of the time for the completion of the work. It is expected that it will be completed during the year 1935-36.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the estimated total cost?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is thought this will complete the work. The appropriations have been made over a number of years and the revised estimated total cost is $1,229,200.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When was the work commenced?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The work was authorized by order in council on July 14, 1930, and was commenced shortly after that. In 1930-31, $117,000 odd was the amount expended; in 1931-32, $293,000 odd; in 1932-33, $291,000 odd; and in 1933-34, $308,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When was the contract awarded and when was the work started?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The order in council was passed July 14, 1930, and the contract awarded immediately after, I believe.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How much was done during the year 1930-31?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There were 215,696 cubic yards moved. The inspection and surveys added to that made an expenditure of $117,904.92 in the year 1930-31.

Mr. MULOCK: What was the estimated cost of that work in 1930?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The description of the work under contract was to dredge 600,000 cubic yards class B at 59 cents, and 80,000 cubic yards of class A at $8.75 per cubic yard place measure. Then the quantities were revised on a survey, and the revised quantities were; class A, 78,061 cubic yards, and class B, 785,073 cubic yards. This includes extras authorized on March 8, 1933, 40,000 cubic yards and on November 2, 1934, 145,000 cubic yards class B.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope that the government will use its best efforts to see that the work is completed before 1935 expires.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Thank you, I think it will.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is this being done under unit prices?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Has there been any change in the unit prices since the original contract was let in 1930?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No changes in the prices, just the quantities increased.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understood there was some revision of price.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, not of price, of quantities. A re-survey was made and quantities found greater than those estimated.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is all the work going to be done by the government and not under the control of the harbour commission?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, this work is in the channel, and the St. John Drydock and Shipbuilding Company have the contract.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Do I understand that this contract has been carried on at so much a yard since 1930?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The contract was awarded in 1930 and has been carried on ever since at a fixed rate per cubic yard for the two classes of material.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): It seems to me that the cost of doing work of this kind in 1930 must have been materially higher than the cost of the same work to-day, and it does seem to me that some of these contracts properly might be revised instead of being carried on at the higher rates in effect in 1930.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The contract fixed the price for the work that was to be done, and you could not change the terms of a contract that was awarded for the whole work.

Mr. MULOCK: Does that apply to extras also?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, these contracts provide that any extra work in connection with the undertaking shall be at the same unit prices as are stipulated in the contract.

Mr. McPHEE: Has the minister the substance of the contract that was entered into in 1930?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not a copy of the contract, but it was for the removal of a number of yards, an estimated quantity, of course, of the two classes of material at fixed prices.

Mr. McPHEE: A moment ago the minister admitted that the number of yards excavated had been increased under this government. I should not think the contract price would apply to the increased quantity.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The contract provides that any quantity taken out in that area shall be paid for at the prices stipulated in the contract. There was not a fixed quantity at all; the contract was for the removal of the rock in a certain area, whatever quantity might be found, and the price is provided in the contract.

Mr. McPHEE: That is all the more reason, I think, why we should have the contract before us, because there seems to be some division of opinion between the minister and hon. members on this side as to what actually has transpired in the last four years.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have no objection whatever to producing the contract. As I have pointed out it was entered into before this government assumed office; it was an obligation that we inherited and that we have endeavoured to carry out.

Mr. JACOBS: You have been blasting your way through ever since.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, it is blasting.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Was the contract awarded to just one company?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, the St. John Drydock and Shipbuilding Company.

Mr. McPHEE: I might say that many contracts entered into by the former government may have been mutilated by the present government.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I would point out that there has been no mutilation in this case. I do not know whether or not there should be, but there has not been any. I have no objection whatever to producing the contract; it is not here, but I am quite prepared to let the item stand until I produce the contract for the information of the committee.

Mr. JACOBS: Might I ask how many people are employed on this work at the present time?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I could not tell you. It is dredging under contract, and we have no record of the employees of that contractor.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): How much money has been paid under this contract to date?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There had been expended to March 31, 1934, the sum of $1,011,200.14. It is estimated that when all the returns are in for 1934-35 the total amount expended in that year will be $130,000. This year it is estimated that $88,000 will be required; there are some expenses for inspection, and that is why we are providing $100,000 to complete the work.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was there any period set out in the contract within which the work should be completed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What was the period?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think it was three years, but it is a difficult area in which to operate, owing to tides and storms, and the time has been extended.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Can the minister say what wages are paid the workingmen?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot say, but I assume they were fixed at the going prices, at the time the contract was entered into. Every year the rates are fixed by the Department of Labour; I think that was done under the former government also. The schedule of wages is attached to the contract, and the contractor must pay those wages. In view of the request for further information, Mr. Chairman, I move that further consideration of the item stand.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if, when the minister is getting the information that has been requested, he would also let us have the unit price estimated by the engineers and the unit price at which the contract was let and which has been paid during the time the work has been carried on. I should like to know whether there is not in that contract a clause providing for the revision of the unit prices from time to time.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have no objection to supplying that information.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

AMENDMENT TO FACILITATE AND INCREASE THE EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO FARMERS

The house resumed from Friday, February 1, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Morand in the chair:

That it is expedient to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act to facilitate and increase the extension of credit to farmers, to authorize the Minister of Finance to purchase additional bonds issued by the board and guaranteed by the government, and to amend the provisions relating to the constitution of the board, the purchase of capital stock, the rate of interest, the amount of outstanding bonds, and supplementary advances.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, when the resolution was under discussion on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair, certain observations were made to which, under the rules of the house, I was precluded from replying. It may be that I may overlook some references which were made; if so I would be quite content to proceed by question and answer at a later stage, but I think one or two observations call for some consideration at this stage. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer), for example, in the course of his remarks said:

> We are informed in regard to the unemployment insurance measure the government proposes to carry the cost of administration. If that is to be done in order to help those in the cities who are receiving insurance relief would it be too much to ask the government to carry the cost of administration of this act in order to help out those who earn their livelihood in the country.

May I point out to the hon. member that this question was determined when the original act was passed in 1927. By reference to section 7, subsection (e), the hon. member will find the following:

> The interest rate on loans under this act shall be such a rate in excess of the interest rate yielded at the time of issue by the last series of farm loan bonds issued by the board as shall be sufficient in the judgment of the board to provide for the expenses of operation and for the necessary reserves for losses or, if no such bonds have been issued, such a rate as in the judgment of the board will be yielded by the farm loan bonds when issued, increased by provision for expenses and reserves as aforesaid.

So that it would appear the policy pursued by the board is one which was laid down when the original act was passed. So far as the act as at present constituted is concerned, that disposes of the question raised by the hon. member for Battle River. I say at once quite frankly that whether the government or parliament should decide to adopt a policy of loaning money to the farmers at its actual cost, and that provision might be made that the cost of administration be borne as part of governmental expense is a fair subject for debate. I say that is a subject with respect to which further discussion might be had when the actual sections are being considered in committee of the whole, and after hon. gentlemen have had an opportunity to see the bill. However, I do not wish it to be considered that I desire to shorten the discussion. I believe it was the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) who raised the question as to the cost involved to the farmer in securing a loan under the Farm Loan Act. In the first instance the hon. member complained that the cost of appraisal was too high. That may be so, and it is a fair subject for discussion. I would point out however that the Canadian farm loan board has charged a uniform rate of $10 for appraisal, and a comparison may be made when I state that the Ontario agricultural development board charges a fee of $12 for the same service, while the United States farm loan board charges $11. It will be seen that even if the amount charged is too high it compares favourably with charges for similar services made by the boards I have mentioned.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would the Minister of Finance permit a question? Are the appraisal charges the same, no matter what the amount of the loan may be? That is, would the same charge be made on a loan of $6,000 as would be made on one for $20,000?

Mr. RHODES: I believe, it is uniform, and I can understand why it would be so. It is not so much a question of the time involved in having the appraiser make the actual appraisal; the major portion of the cost is in transportation of the appraiser. In many instances he has to move long distances, and under such circumstances my hon. friend will readily see that an appraiser going to a farm in a remote section might have greater expenses than one making an appraisal in an area very close to his home.

Mr. JACOBS: If the loan does not go through, what happens?

Mr. RHODES: The provision is that it has to be paid, just the same. The hon. member for Gloucester complained further about the legal costs involved in perfecting security for the loan, in other words in determining the validity of title. In all the provinces except Quebec the board has arranged a flat tariff of fees, based on the size of the loan granted, such tariff covering all services exclusive of disbursements and additional conveyancing required to perfect the chain of title. The hon. member gave an illustration as to cost of perfecting a title in connection with a comparatively small loan. The sum he mentioned was very large and out of all proportion to the amount of the loan involved. I cannot speak for other provinces, but I can speak for the province of Nova Scotia when I say that the size of the loan has no connection with the cost of searching titles. I know, because at one stage I had anticipated following the legal profession and one of my earliest experiences was to spend ten solid working days in the registry office, at the end of which period I was not so sure that I had secured a title to a piece of land which was not worth as much as the cost involved in securing the information I sought.

Mr. JACOBS: Why did you not use the Torrens system?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: So you decided to go into the ministry.

Mr. RHODES: I suppose the question by the hon. member for Cartier is a fair one. At one stage in the province of Nova Scotia we endeavoured to introduce the Torrens system, and found it a long and painful process However, I do not know that we should pursue that subject any farther, except to point out to the hon member for Gloucester that he cannot jump at conclusions when there are circumstances such as I have indicated.

Mr. GRAY: Is there a different system in each province?

Mr. RHODES: I am speaking only of those fees which, as I understand it, are the same throughout Canada. There is a schedule, which does not include the province of Quebec of which I shall speak in a moment. In the matter of searching, in view of circumstances such as I have indicated, a basis of fees cannot be set up. It can be limited by a per diem rate, or something of that nature, but the amount must be elastic, depending upon the amount of work involved in searching certain records. The tariff in all provinces under the board is substantially less than the general tariff for similar services recognized in those provinces. To the extent to which the board has been able to control and reduce legal costs, that has been done.

In the province of Quebec the costs of perfecting titles and conveyancing is governed by a tariff of fees fixed and approved by the lieutenant governor in council. This type of legal work in that province is entirely in the hands of the notarial profession, and for that reason the board has no control over the tariffs charged. It has been the endeavour of the board, however, to see that the tariff is adhered to and that no overcharges are made. May I point out that by virtue of provincial legislation passed last year which had for its object the lessening of costs in these cases, the provincial government appointed an official in the person of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) whose duty it is to act in assisting borrowers to prepare their titles. The board has been and is at the moment prepared to cooperate with him having in mind the object of reducing to the lowest possible point the costs to the farmers.

Sir EUGENE FISET: May I ask the minister if the provincial machinery will disappear when the new act comes into force?

Mr. RHODES: The provincial board will disappear, yes, and there will be only one board. There will be appointed one chief representative of the board in each province, and if the practice is found desirable we may, under the terms of the bill which will be brought down, have the advice of an advisory board, which will not be a full time or a paid board as was the case previously.

I just wish to say, and I say it in all sincerity, that it was a matter of delight to me to note the tone of the debate which was held upon the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair for the house to go into committee for the purpose of considering this matter. The debate was conducted on a high and non-partisan plane. There were, however, one or two discordant notes which possibly cannot be avoided from time to time, and to one or two of those which slipped into discussion I feel in duty bound to take some slight exception.

One was the statement by an hon. member that this legislation was death-bed legislation. Another hon. member said that at last the government was making an attempt to deal with the forgotten man who, he said, was the farmer.

Well, whether the government has done its full duty by the agricultural interests of this country or not may be a fair subject of debate, but I do submit that those two remarks were not warranted by the facts of the case nor by the record because, as a matter of fact, whether hon. gentlemen agree with the full tenor of the empire agreements or not, I may say that their going into effect had very largely in mind the advantage which would accrue, and I think has accrued, to the agricultural interests of Canada, and that was one of the earlier major measures which were brought down by this administration.

I do submit this, sir, and not by way of inviting controversy, but simply as my humble belief, that no measure at any time brought down in this house has been fraught with so great possibilities for good and of assistance particularly for the farmer as has been the case with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and that bill became law, as is well known, last year. In order to assist in the more complete and effective operation of that act there was an amendment passed last year to the Farm Loan Act, which had for its object the making available of a very much larger sum of money by way of loan to the farmer than was the case under the original act.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can the minister say how much of that was used last year? Was any of that increase drawn upon?

Mr. RHODES: I have not those figures before me but I shall be glad to give them, if not in committee on the resolution, when we are in committee of the whole on the bill, and if I may I shall come back to that point in a moment.

This legislation is no new idea. It is with a view to carrying out still further the intent and purpose of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and bringing this into complete harmony with that act, that we have to-day this further and wider and I hope more acceptable amendment, bearing in mind the general tenor of the discussion the other day, which will materially improve the Farm Loan Act.

I might mention also in this connection the fact of our having passed a Marketing Board Act. I merely mention that as indicating that that measure also was designed largely, if not entirely, for the purpose of assisting the agricultural interests of this country.

So I submit, sir, in those circumstances it is not a fair criticism to say that this measure is a death bed measure, nor that we are attempting at this long last, at this late day in the life of this parliament, to deal with the forgotten man who is said to be the farmer.

I may say to my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) that I did not anticipate questions in complete detail which I would expect to have put to me in committee of the whole house, but I shall have the information available when we are in committee on the bill.

There are many reasons which I shall not give now but at a later stage why there were comparatively small loans made under the amending legislation of that year. It was due to a multiplicity of reasons, many of which had reference to ancillary action which had to be taken by the several provinces, some of which deferred their action to as late as the month of December, if my memory serves me right, and some have not yet even taken action. Furthermore, having been projected into the winter that is the season above all others when it is most difficult to make farm loans because the difficulties of inspection which must precede the making of a loan are in some cases insuperable, especially in those areas where we have a very heavy fall of snow.

I have no doubt that there will be other questions, but I thought I should touch briefly on these main points of criticism, and quite proper criticism, and as to which I find no fault whatever, which were made when the motion was under discussion that the Speaker do leave the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the minister given any consideration to the question of shortening the term of the loan?

Mr. RHODES: I am very glad that my hon. friend has raised that point. He will recall, having been in the house when the original act was passed, that the whole idea of the original Farm Loan Act was to make for long term loans. The short term loan the farmer could more readily secure in the market at that day, but in order to obviate the necessity of his having to refinance himself, at cost to himself, at stated periods, it was his desire to have a long term loan, and the tendency certainly was under the legislation of that day that he should get the money for at least one and a half per cent less than he could in the open market. That was true even with the high rate of 6½ per cent that the farmer had to pay, because the prevailing rate throughout the country at that time was something like 8 per cent. But conditions to-day are strikingly different, and I can see that there may be certain instances where the farmer is engaged in a particular type of farming when he would not wish to obligate himself for a long term loan, and it may be to the advantage of the farmer and for the convenience of the farm loan board to make a short term loan. I do not mean short term in the ordinary accepted sense, but a short term of say five years, as contrasted with a period of twenty-two years.

This question of the hon. member for West Edmonton reminds me of another criticism which was made in the course of the discussion the other day, namely, that there should be some provision to enable the farmer to anticipate his payments. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that the hon. gentleman who made that inquiry had not made sufficient inquiries outside because I can assure him that the farm loan board like most individuals is only too anxious to receive repayment or prepayment or advance payment or anticipated payments of a loan before the period when they look forward anxiously to find out whether they are going to get any money back at all or not. As a matter of fact, in practice the board has always accepted, and been glad to accept payments in advance either in whole or in part.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would suggest to the minister on the question of the attitude of the provincial board that I am afraid he will find that one of the chief reasons why greater advantage was not taken of the provisions of the amendment of last year was because of the peculiar temperament of some of the provincial boards at least. I have no hesitation in informing the minister that they have been utterly ruthless in their method of dealing with those who have come under the operation of the act. They have been ruthless to a degree which perhaps the minister is not aware of. In my province there have been borrowers under this act who have been compelled, as a result of the attitude of the board, to seek at least temporary relief under the debt adjustment provisions of the provincial act in order to escape the predatory character of the provincial board's attitude. Furthermore, a practice had grown up there of compelling those who had borrowed under the board to insure against crop failure. While that may be a very good method of protecting the creditor, it has been mighty tough on the borrower in the last four years. I make particular reference to this fact because in my province all of the other mortgage companies refrain from compelling those who are under them to take out hail insurance if the borrower feels that he cannot afford to pay and is not prepared to do so. But the provincial farm loan board decided to go ahead with their characteristically cruel action. It was therefore a pleasure to me to know that the proposed amendments provided for the abolition of the provincial boards as such, and I can only sincerely hope that when the administrator or the advisory officer under the new provisions is set up in each province, there will be in my province at any rate none of the members of the present advisory board who will even be considered for that position. I have particular reference to Mr. Murray. One might as well know that there is no more unpopular, no more inconsiderate person in that province in matters of this kind.

Mr. JACOBS: Has Mr. Murray given the hon. member permission to refer to him this afternoon?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I come now to the second point. The minister has raised the question of administration costs and I was glad that he suggested that the question was debatable. I think his attitude is one we may be glad of. The question is debatable for many reasons, including those cited the other day when the subject was up. The farmer to-day in the west, in the aggregate, cannot pay 6 per cent. I doubt whether he can pay anything in the way of interest, in the aggregate. There are conditions which perhaps may make exceptions possible, but 6 per cent is too high still; and if the government really wants to aid agriculture through the expansion of credits, it will undertake to absorb the 2 per cent administration cost and let the farmer have the money at 4 per cent. That will not be all that he will have to pay, because under the three system method of amortization provided for in the long term rural credits legislation, an amount will be extracted each year additional to the 4 per cent to enable the retirement of the loan in whatever time the borrower selects as his method of amortization. It is particularly important that this be done not only in the interests of agriculture, but because the government might very well set an excellent example to all other creditors in the country with respect to this question of interest rates.

I come now to a point which I do not recollect having been raised before. The minister referred to the fact that the amendments that were coming in would provide first of all for the abolition of the 5 per cent cash payment by the provinces on the amount of bonds outstanding in regard to loans made in the province, and that the government would refund that 5 per cent to the governments. Is the government going to refund the 5 per cent to the borrowers or, if it is not going to refund it in cash, will the government take into consideration the advisability of allowing a credit for that amount to go back to the borrower in connection with his loan? I think it is worth considering, and I suggest that the minister take it under advisement.

In regard to the farm creditors arrangement legislation, I am not sure that I share the rather over-eulogistic references made by the minister to the act as it has operated so far. It is true it has been of indirect advantage to the west, which is the only part I can speak of. There is no doubt it has made the creditor a little more amenable to reasonableness; but as to the farmer having been able to take very much advantage of the act itself, I happen to know that he has not done so. And he has not been able to do so for this reason. If a farm debtor goes to his chief creditor, the mortgage company say, and asks them to take into consideration a plan for a compromise of his debt, reduction of the principal or reduction of interest or both, in almost every case the minister will find that the creditor will ask, "What cash settlement are you prepared to make?" If the farmer is able to make a cash settlement there is no question whatever about his being able to secure favourable terms under the act. But the farmers have not been able to get money even under this act. They have not been able to get it from private lending corporations nor from individuals, for the very reasons which the minister himself and, I believe, the ex-Minister of the Interior indicated in discussing the question the other day. I would therefore strongly recommend a change in this act to provide that wherever a compromise between the farmer and his creditors had been arrived at and agreed to by the board of review, certified to by the board of review, the necessary funds to make that compromise effective should be mandatory upon the farm loan board; in other words, that the farmer should be able to go, with the board of review's decision, and borrow the amount to liquidate his present commitments. If the government will make such a change in the act I can assure them that the act will be a thousand times more effective than it is now, and it will have opened up a real avenue by which the farmer could reach, possibly, a satisfactory position and through which there would be a reduction of debt something in line with his ability to pay at the present time. This proposal I have just made to the minister is in my opinion the most important amendment that could be moved, involving as it does the farm credit arrangement legislation, and I most earnestly urge the minister to take such an amendment into consideration.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend from Bow River will realize, of course, that I am not in a position to speak offhand and to commit the government in a matter of major policy. I may say to him at once however that his last suggestion does not appeal to me at all favourably. I think it would be a grave mistake for parliament to set up a board for the purpose of administering farm loans and then, by deliberate amendment to the act, parcel out to nine separate bodies throughout the dominion the right to commit Canada to untold hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars. It will be far better if here and there a case of injustice to an individual farmer may arise rather than that we should not keep control under our own hands of the administration and trusteeship of public money. That is only how I react to the suggestion made by my hon. friend. At the same time it is a suggestion I have never heard from any other quarter at any other time. I do not find fault with it on that account; I mention that merely as a statement of fact. I will give the matter consideration. I have no hesitation in giving my hon. friend the immediate reaction I have to a suggestion of that character.

My reference to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act a moment ago was not for the purpose of discussing that act but was merely in rebuttal as to a statement made with respect to things which had not been done designed to benefit the farmer, because it will be borne in mind that we have at the present moment standing for second reading a bill to provide certain amendments to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and when that bill is under discussion, its detailed discussion would more properly come at that time. But lest an improper impression go abroad because of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bow River, let me say this: Notwithstanding the fact that he lives in Alberta and is so to speak on the ground, we have absolute record here as to the manner in which that act is functioning, and I may say to my hon. friend that there have been not dozens but hundreds of settlements in his province under that act, yes, more; there have been under the act many settlements which have not been recorded as such, which have been effected by the farmer debtor and the creditors merely because there was this machinery which could be made available.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I said that.

Mr. RHODES: For that reason the creditor has been far more amenable in effecting settlements and we are gathering together statistics with respect to a large number of settlements of that character. Let me point this out further: while in many cases there will have to be resort to fresh borrowings and new loans and possibly resort to the farm loan board as a result of settlements arising under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, it by no means follows that that is a major factor in the successful functioning of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, because there have been prior to this date actually on record in the head office here upwards of 1,000 settlements effected under that act which have been the means of reducing the debt of farmers by tens of thousands of dollars and in not one case has there been resort to fresh borrowing from either the farm loan board or other boards, although in instances we have record of the fact that creditors themselves have not only reduced the debt obligation, the interest charges, but voluntarily given to the debtor an advance in either cash or kind to help him on his way. No act will ever do all that is expected of it, but with the records before us, and having in mind the limited time in which that act has been in force, I believe it has been amazingly successful, far more, I may say, than the most sanguine expectation of its sponsors. Having said this much, let me say that when the bill to amend that act is under consideration I shall expect to go into the discussion of it in detail and give facts and figures of settlements or of applications now before the board and other data in extenso.

My hon. friend raised a question as to the methods adopted by the provincial boards in their ruthless treatment of farmers who sought loans. I do not know that any good purpose can be served by discussing what is past, but I can assure the hon. member for Bow River that there are very few complaints with respect to this act which do not reach my office and I have heard numerous complaints of the character he has indicated. I make reference to that only for the purpose of saying this: We are now starting a new method which will mean centralized administration, one place where responsibility can be fixed, at Ottawa, and so far as I am concerned—and I speak for the government in this respect—while we do not wish to throw away public money and there must be reasonable protection of the public purse, if we err at all we shall endeavour to err upon the side of generous treatment to the farmer rather than in a niggardly safeguarding of the public funds. In other words I believe within bounds, even if we lose a substantial portion of these loans, as may inevitably be the case, by and large we shall be far better off by having contented farmers on the land than we shall be if we husband our money and allow the farmers to starve. So, as far as I am concerned—and I speak for the government in this respect—it will be our endeavour to administer this act in a generous spirit, always bearing in mind the public interest, but with the sole object of endeavouring to assist the farmer to remain on the land.

Mr. GRAY: The government will still expect the farmer to pay back the loan.

Mr. RHODES: Assuredly, and there is no good reason why he should not. I do not think any self-respecting farmer wants charity; all he wants is a reasonable opportunity to make good.

The hon. member for Bow River submitted another question and quite a proper one. He said: If you are going to return to the provincial governments five per cent contribution under the old act, because it will be recalled that in the new bill we have no five per cent contribution, what about the farmer? Well, it has always been a provision in the original act that the farmer shall have credit for that five per cent on his obligation. The only qualifying feature has been as to the time when he will get his five per cent. Heretofore it has been when the transaction has been closed out. There is a disadvantage there to the farmer inasmuch as he has been paying interest on five per cent of money that he did not secure and it may be the part of wisdom so far as the old contracts are concerned to give him immediate credit. That is a fair subject for discussion and we can deal with it when we are in committee on the bill, but in any event I want to make it clear to the committee that the farmer always secured a credit for that five per cent.

Mr. VALLANCE: When this measure was before the house on a previous occasion I had something to say on it. The suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River, one to which I have given considerable thought, was that the farm loan board, once a farmer had asked for an adjustment, should if at all possible extend the loan in order to enable the farmer to get a better deal in the adjustment of his debt. I immediately proceeded to secure some information regarding my own province to see just to what extent the farmers on the lands of Saskatchewan had mortgages on their holdings. I find this, which I think will prove to my good friend from Bow River the utter impossibility of the federal farm loan board, with $90,000,000 at its disposal, taking care of the suggestion he made. I am going to deal briefly with the facts concerning my province. The statistics are as follows:

Number of occupied farms, 136,472.

Farms occupied by owners or part owners, 115,428.

Percentage of farms occupied by owners or part owners, 84·6 per cent.

Average size of farm, 407·95 acres.

Total value of farm lands, $781,124,800.

Amount of mortgage indebtedness, $177,620,800.

That is mortgage indebtedness alone. When the farmer comes for an adjustment that is not all his debt. In many instances you will find that the mortgage on the land of the Saskatchewan farmer is less than fifty per cent of his total indebtedness. So when we come to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bow River these figures make it quite apparent that it would not be possible for the government with $90,000,000 to accept that responsibility.

The number of farms reported mortgaged in Saskatchewan is 56,587. The percentage of owners and part owners reported mortgaged is 49, and the average mortgage on the average farm of 408 acres is $3,139. So that the province of Saskatchewan is not so badly involved as many people seem to indicate. With the average Saskatchewan farm as 408 acres and the average mortgage as $3,139, the average indebtedness per acre to the mortgage companies is $7.69. With interest at eight per cent the yearly amount due on the average farm on this count would be $250.82. I should like to endorse what has been suggested by the hon. member for Bow River—I suggested it myself the other day—that if the government can see fit to make the interest rate as low as four per cent it would greatly help. The average rate in Saskatchewan to-day is eight per cent, which amounts to $250.82 on the average farm mortgage. If the rate were reduced to four per cent the interest would be $125.41, and that saving would just about meet the taxes on the average Saskatchewan farm. Some communities have a higher rate of taxation than others, but I think on the average the taxes could be paid out of the saving of four per cent.

At present interest works out at an average of 61 cents per acre. No Saskatchewan farm land can pay that in these times. This is one reason, although not the whole reason, why we find the farmers of Saskatchewan getting into such deep water; the interest is eating them up. If the minister could see his way to lower the interest to four per cent it would at once cut the mortgage interest from 61 cents to 30½ cents per acre. By itself, this interest does not look like an overpowering burden, were it not for the necessity of making payments on the principal. With an average crop the farmer should be able to carry that interest. I think the history of Saskatchewan mortgages proves that to be true in normal times. But it must be remembered that in some parts of Saskatchewan we have had total crop failure for five and six years, yet even to-day with all those things that we have had to combat the picture is not too bad. At the same time that 61 cents per acre is a substantial part of the cost of production.

The valuation placed on western farms by the census seems unduly small. The average farm of 408 acres was valued at $5,724. I do not think that there is any mortgage company which would advance $3,139 on a valuation of that amount. I do not know how this federal farm loan board would act in Saskatchewan. As I stated the other day, we have had a provincial farm loan board, and the federal board has not been operative. I was called out for a few minutes this afternoon, and when I came back I gained the impression from the discussion that the provincial farm loan boards will now be absorbed by the federal board. Am I correct in that?

Mr. RHODES: No, they are abolished.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is it the position that the provincial farm loan boards will no longer carry on business, but the federal board will take all the new business?

Mr. RHODES: All business, new and old.

Mr. VALLANCE: It will take over the existing business of the old provincial farm loan board?

Mr. RHODES: Not the provincial farm loan board, but the federal board which has been established in provinces other than Saskatchewan, Ontario and Prince Edward Island. I made that clear on the first occasion.

Mr. VALLANCE: So now the federal board will be operative in these provinces?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: And it is made possible by concurrent legislation through the provincial legislature?

Mr. RHODES: No concurrent legislation is necessary.

Mr. VALLANCE: The statistics I have placed before the committee, which are given to me as accurate and I suppose can be checked by the statistical bureau, show that if funds are available there can be a great measure of relief given to the farmers of Saskatchewan under the federal farm loan. I shall be quite frank, it has been a great pleasure to me to see this legislation brought in. I am not going to accuse the minister of a death-bed repentance, we are only too glad to see it, and I hope the farmers will not be disappointed when they make application for loans by finding that no funds are available.

Mr. HACKETT: I think there is little criticism arising from foreclosures in the province of Quebec; I have not known of a single case, there may have been some. The difficulty in Quebec is from another source; it is that the board has not made loans, or when it has made loans it has applied a low standard of valuation. It has applied the standard of the private lender. Due to difficulties largely attributable to the loss of the market, prices of farm lands have sunk to the lowest point we have known in generations. It has been very discouraging to the farmer to find that he could get a loan only of an amount which a lending company would advance. If the farm loan board is going to lend money only on a basis acceptable to a private lender then I fear it is not going to achieve very much to assist those who are in need. That seems to me a most important question, and one which will have to be determined before we can expect any substantial relief from this source. This probably is not an opportune time to discuss details. I recall to the minister that in the province of Quebec the law does not permit a lender to take a chattel mortgage. That may be a good thing; it may prevent the farmer from pledging his movables; it may be protection for him, but the fact remains that a farmer in Quebec is denied a certain amount of credit that is available to farmers in other parts of the country. I have read that it is intended to make loans available at a higher percentage of the value of the land in those provinces where movables can be pledged than in those provinces where they cannot be, and there remains a disadvantage under which the necessitous farmer in Quebec must labour.

There have been some annoying features of administration which I hope the minister will seek to remove. For instance there is the interminable delay. An application is made to the board. The farmer has not the facility for writing many letters; possibly he has not the inclination to write, or the training for it; the correspondence drags on until he is sick and weary of it and wishes he never had the misfortune to attempt to milk the farrow cow. Moreover I think there should be some decentralization with regard to inspection. It may be well to have centralization so that there will be uniformity of policy, but I think it unfortunate that there should be only one office in a province, especially when provinces are large and the borrowing areas are far apart. It happens not infrequently that the need is urgent, and the application should be disposed of within a reasonable time; delay is sometimes worse than a prompt refusal. There is also the question of cost. Frequently farmers are told, "You want only $200, $300 or $400. The cost of having the title to your land examined, of getting a mortgage, of having that mortgage registered and of putting up the necessary deposit to have it radiated, is going to bring your rate of interest, regardless of what the interest itself may be, up to 15 or 20 per cent." Whether or not it is feasible to devise a method of advancing small sums of money for a few months without going through all the formalities and incurring all the expense of hypothecation, is a matter for the government to decide. In Quebec hypothecation is a rite that is enacted with great ceremony, form and expense. The cost of registration in Quebec is very high. These deeds have to be prepared with the utmost care, and no professional man wishes to prepare a deed until he has examined the title to make sure that it is free not only of anterior mortgages or hypothecations but also of privileges, some of which are not registered. I need not worry the house with this series of privileges registered and unregistered, that exist in Quebec; my hon. friends opposite know that interminable litany probably better than I do, but unless these details are considered by people who are familiar with them and who can assist the government in working out this scheme we will have legislation which, so far as Quebec is concerned, will be like the last act, unworkable and incapable of giving relief to those who need it so much.

In Quebec the interest rate was not quite as high as it was elsewhere, because for a time the provincial government contributed one and a half per cent towards the interest exacted by the federal board. Whether or not it will see fit to continue that practice under the new dispensation is a matter for conjecture into which I shall not go. But delay, expense and the impossibility of getting a small loan—because if you take all the expenses into account the rate of interest becomes prohibitive—are three matters which I think should be carefully considered in framing any amendments to this legislation.

Mr. RHODES: If I may I should like to say just a word in reply to the hon. member for Stanstead. I do not desire to call into question any of the representations he has made; I assure him that what he has said will be given most careful thought, not only when the bill is before the house but when the question of administration comes up. But my hon. friend rather left the impression in my mind that these difficulties which he mentions have restricted the amount of lending in the province of Quebec, which would have been enlarged but for the difficulties to which he refers. I should like to point out to the hon. member that as a matter of actual fact, whether we have loaned a large or a small sum in the aggregate, of all the loans made up to the present time in all Canada, under the old act, one-third have been made in the province of Quebec.

Mr. HACKETT: They were not made recently.

Mr. RHODES: I am speaking of the existing loans in all Canada, amounting to some $9,000,000; one-third of those loans have been made in the province of Quebec. I merely wish to cite this one fact, lest the unfortunate impression might be created that our friends in that province have been unjustly dealt with.

Mr. HANBURY: When I saw my hon. friend from Stanstead rise to his feet I had hoped that we would get his views with regard to some of these contemplated actions of the government. I go back to the question of the Canadian National Railways; I well remember the impression made upon me by the hon. member for Stanstead when he pointed out to the members of this house the serious situation that was confronting the people of Canada by virtue of that degree of socialization, and when I saw my hon. friend rise to-day I hoped that he would draw some such inference from the legislation forecast in the resolution now before the committee.

This afternoon the minister was grieved to think that any person would suggest that this was deathbed legislation. To me this has a tinge of that. Perhaps this was not brought to light for the first time in the broadcasts by the Prime Minister; it even may be part of the reform program, as stated by the minister to-day, which was foreshadowed by the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. This government is showing a tendency to go so far in socializing everything in Canada that it is doubtful whether they will listen to any suggestion such as I have in mind, but after all it should not be forgotten that we have in Canada certain vested interests. We have in Canada people and companies who have been established for generations and throughout the length and breadth of the country have the facilities necessary to investigate values of farms for purposes of loaning money. Throughout the past years these companies have not been able to loan money, and I think every hon. member knows the reason they have not been in a position to loan it.

I suggest the primary reason is that the provincial governments have moratorium legislation. Yet this bill does not take into consideration the possibility that that moratorium legislation should be raised in the various provinces.

As a matter of fact to-day the minister has taken considerable credit to the government for its operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I am here to say frankly that I am not altogether in favour of that act because I believe it is more legislation tending towards socialism and socialization in Canada. I suggest to the minister that we have companies which have operated for years, companies having servants and officers familiar with the loaning of money, and I say there should have been some consideration given, if there has not been, to the use of those services. If the government wishes to give money at a price below that which is economically sound or at a price below that which the individual or the company would loan money, I would be quite prepared for it to subsidize loan companies. I should like to see some of the established interests used. I would like to have the government use those people who have made it their business properly to conduct the business of loaning money. Yet we have under consideration a governmental institution set up to loan money, an institution which will put every mortgage and loan company in Canada out of business, and one which must do so within a very short period.

I shall ask the minister if any consideration has been given to the use of any of the existing agencies or institutions capable of putting money out to the farmers of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: I do not quite follow the question.

Mr. HANBURY: In my few remarks I suggested to the minister that in Canada we had established institutions which have been set up for the purpose of loaning money to farmers. I suggested further that those institutions could have been used for the purpose of carrying out duties such as contained in this legislation. If it is necessary, to give a farmer cheap money it could have been done by way of subsidizing the loan companies. I ask the minister whether any consideration has been given to using any of the established institutions for the purpose of loaning moneys to farmers.

Mr. RHODES: The Farm Loan Act has been in existence since 1927. I am not aware that the proposal of the hon. member has ever been considered; certainly it has not by me. I may go a little farther and say that to the best of my recollection I have never had such a suggestion made to me. I may say to him—and I speak for myself only, and on the spur of the moment, the question having been put to me only a moment ago—that the proposal he makes does not appeal to me. The Farm Loan Act as originally set up is designed to cover an area, not entirely but at least a part of which hitherto had not been covered by the loan companies. Let me say by way of interjection that I do not purpose pursuing this subject to any great length in the present instance, because I believe it should be done when the bill is under consideration, but when the Farm Loan Act was originally introduced it had the effect of making money available to farmers at one and a half per cent less than he could obtain it from the private companies.

There are many government agencies we could utilize. There are very efficient employees connected with the soldiers' settlement board whose services would be available. It does seem to me however that the general principle, namely that the government in dealing with the loaning of money should do so through the medium of machinery which it has set up, should apply. It strikes me that the policy of bonusing private companies which would have to do with administration is unsound. The mere suggestion of it does not appeal to me, and I have no doubt in the world that the hon. member would not be able to convince the loan companies to accept a system of that type, unless it involved a guarantee from the dominion for the security of the loan. Of course to my mind that proposal is unthinkable. However I just describe to the hon. member the reaction I have experienced at the moment, and I shall be happy to give careful thought to the proposal at a later stage. At present however it does not appeal to me.

Mr. HANBURY: I suggest seriously to the minister that in connection with this legislation the government should consider the moratorium legislation in effect throughout the various provinces.

Mr. RHODES: With respect to that phase of the matter, surely the hon. member does not suggest that this parliament can pass overriding legislation which will have the effect of repealing provincial statutes which have been passed within the orbit of the jurisdiction of a provincial legislature? If that is not what the hon. member means I am afraid I do not understand the nature of his suggestion.

Mr. HANBURY: I appreciate the point the minister has made, but I suggest to him that this parliament can pass legislation forbidding the loaning of money in the way which has been set forth in the provinces where moratorium legislation exists.

Mr. RHODES: We do not need legislation for that.

Mr. HANBURY: That is what I am asking the government to consider. I should like to know whether they shall not provide in this legislation that in provinces where moratorium legislation exists such legislation must be lifted before any farmer may take advantage of the loans offered by this legislation.

Mr. RHODES: I accept the suggestion made by the hon. member in the spirit in which it is given. While I say to him it would not be possible, through the agency of its farm loan board, for the dominion government to wield the big stick, yet I can assure my hon. friend we will endeavour so far as possible to exercise such reasonable influences as may be open to us to see that legislation of the kind to which he refers is if not removed at least reduced to the minimum, and certainly that it will not have a detrimental effect upon the policy of the dominion government in its desire to assist the farmers in the provinces to secure money by way of loan.

Mr. HOWARD: The statement has already been made and I repeat that the Farm Loan Act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act should so far as possible work together. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has at the present time practically destroyed the credit the farmer enjoyed by reason of his being able to borrow from loaning companies. If a system could be worked out whereby the two pieces of legislation could work in harmony or cooperation, one with the other, I believe a great deal would be done towards the restoration of credit.

Further, I can understand where one body should have absolute control over the legislation, but on the other hand I believe inspectors should be segregated in certain districts and that their recommendations, as men knowing the conditions in different parts of the country, should bear a great deal of weight in the circumstances. I am thinking of it this way: I do not believe the minister wants to put on the statute books again legislation that will not be workable. I believe he is sincere in wanting this legislation to do something for the farmer, but in that case it seems to me he will have to go a whole lot further than he seems to be going in this legislation.

I am almost ready to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River. I believe that where a compromise is forced on a farmer, it is only forced on him where there is no other way. There is now a moratorium in the province of Quebec, and he cannot relieve his credit situation. He has certain assets and a great many liabilities. He goes to the referee appointed under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and they go into the whole situation in the fullest detail, figuring out what the earning power of the farm is and what the farmer's liabilities are. We will say for the sake of argument that he makes a settlement on a fifty per cent basis. The creditor is going to tell the referee the best side and the debtor the worst side, and when this arrangement is made and the referee makes his report to the court, I believe it ought to be almost compulsory that the farm loan board should advance the money necessary to clean off the debts and put the farmer on his feet. You may say that that is extreme legislation, but you are dealing with an extreme case. This legislation concerns a farmer who has to, or may have to, get off his land for good and all.

As to the neighbouring farmer who has a small mortgage on his farm but whose revenues have dropped because everything he has to sell has gone down to an exceedingly low point, it is just as vital to say to that man, who cannot now pay his taxes and other obligations on account of the high rate of interest, that you will cut his interest rate from seven to five per cent; you would thereby assist the farming communities and help to put the farmers on their feet, if that is the real object of this legislation. This money would not be coming out of the government or out of the taxpayers. It would mean a reduction in interest rates; in some cases for people who could afford to stand it, and in other cases for those who should take a reduction in interest rates. I cannot emphasize too strongly that the working of the Farmer's Creditors Arrangement Act puts the farmer who legitimately wants to borrow one or two thousand dollars and who can easily carry the load in a position where under no consideration can he borrow money from a loan company in a province where the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement legislation is in force.

Mr. RHODES: I rise only for the purpose of avoiding any misunderstanding with regard to one or two remarks made by the hon. member for Sherbrooke. I took down his exact words. He said that he was almost inclined to favour the suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River that it should be compulsory that a loan be made by the farm loan board in the case, he said, where you force a compromise on a farmer. Those are the exact words of my hon. friend.

Mr. HOWARD: For the benefit of the farmer.

Mr. RHODES: Let me say to my hon. friend that if force is used it cannot be a compromise, and if there is a compromise there can be no force. I am not quarreling over verbiage. I am simply analyzing a statement of my hon. friend that will not bear analysis. If what my hon. friend meant to say was something different, he certainly did not say it. I could not conceive of a set of circumstances whereby the farmer would be forced to his own disadvantage. Does my hon. friend mean to suggest that if a farmer has a mortgage of $1,000 the board could say he owes $1,500? Not at all. The very essence of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, which is not under discussion at the moment, is compromise and conciliation. But where the board of review exercises the authority which it possesses under the act, in every instance the man who will have to make a contribution will be the creditor, not the farmer, unless you are going to conceive of the absurd situation that the court would say that the farmer owed more than he contracted to pay. As a matter of fact, in every instance the farmer will be the beneficiary. It will be only a question of degree.

So far as the question of interest is concerned, my hon. friend must realize that that in turn is a matter of compromise and conciliation under the terms of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Well, if he does not realize that, he ought to read a book, because that is the fact.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Apparently it is no good.

Mr. RHODES: I said, read a book, not put it in a book. As I say, that is the fact unless the board of review decides to hand down a decision, which it is competent for it to do, to the effect that the interest shall be reduced as well as the principal.

Mr. HOWARD: I think it is only right that I should answer the minister. I did not intend to get into a controversy. Let me give him a concrete case. Suppose a farmer who owes $5,000 cannot meet his obligations, and because of his financial situation he cannot go any further. Surely the minister knows what working capital means to the farmer or in any other business. Well, finally the farmer has to avail himself of the facilities under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. The referee goes over his assets and liabilities, estimates his future earning power, and decides that he has a right to avail himself of this legislation and settle with his creditors on a fifty per cent basis. After that is done I say to the minister that the farmer still wants liquid working capital. Where can he get any credit to carry on his business of farming? He must have working capital to start again.

I still maintain that the suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River is not a bad one. Suppose the amount in question is $5,000, and the settlement is on a fifty per cent basis, which would make it $2,500. Then if the farm loan board—if the loan was not in the hands of a mortgage company—had to advance the necessary money to clean off that balance of $2,500, and say $500 working capital, you would reestablish that farmer and make him a real asset not only to the province but to the whole of Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I think I shall have to come to the defence of my own proposal, because I am afraid in some quarters it may be misinterpreted.

In the first place may I say to the minister that my only object in referring to what I regarded and referred to as over eulogizing of the effect of the scheme was not to minimize in any degree the possibilities of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, but rather simply to state what was the fact, and the minister himself has not disabused my mind in that regard.

Mr. RHODES: I would not expect to.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): When he tells me that there were a thousand cases I have no doubt that there were. But one thousand out of 782,000 farms most of which owe money is after all not something to talk about very loudly. Let us be fair. I am satisfied that if the act has not made greater progress it has been due to two factors. First it has not been operating long enough, and the provincial boards of review did not go into operation quickly enough. There may be no blame to be placed on this administration in that regard. I have no doubt they did their best to expedite business, but they did not start until quite late. Secondly, compromise under this legislation can be best effected if the farmer is able to say to his creditor that he is prepared to meet him in cash. There is no doubt about it. I went to one of the mortgage companies in Calgary and put my own case to them this fall. I said, "I should like to arrive at a compromise with you. I do not want to come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act unless it is absolutely necessary; I want to reach an agreement with you outside the act." The answer of the man I interviewed came at once, "Mr. Garland, what are you prepared to put up? How much cash can you give?" I told him I was not in a position to make any cash payment and he replied, "That's all right, old man, Will you drop in some time when you have cash and we will talk it over." The effective compromise that will benefit the farmer to the greatest possible degree can be obtained only if the farmer is reasonably certain of being able to secure cash with which to meet the claim. I therefore suggest to the minister that, in dealing with this farm loan act, he might take into favourable consideration the possibility of an amendment which would be so framed—

Mr. RHODES: I heard it before. I heard the hon. member the first time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I hope the minister understood it, though. The proposal was that an amendment might be introduced to provide that, in the event of the board of review having come to a decision as to the maximum capacity of the farmer to meet his obligation, every factor being taken into consideration, that settlement should entitle the farmer to borrow from the farm loan board the amount necessary to make the compromise effective. That is my suggestion.

Mr. RHODES: I heard the hon. member the first time. It did not require a great deal of mental application to understand what he said when he first said it, and I think I understood it on that occasion. I cannot say more now than I did on the first occasion; my feelings are precisely the same. But I did conclude by saying that his suggestion would be carefully considered, and that is all I can say. So far as the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is concerned, I think the committee will endorse the suggestion that I should await the bill which is now before the house dealing with that measure before I give any details. When the proper time comes I shall be glad to traverse in detail the ground which my hon. friend has covered.

Mr. POULIOT: May I make two suggestions. First of all, why does the government intend to lend such a large amount of money to farmers? Is it not because the farmers have no money? And why have they no money? Is it because they have no farm products? No; it is because they cannot sell their products. And why can they not sell their products? Is it not because they have no market? Therefore would it not be a good thing for the government to consider a reduction of the tariff so that the farmers might eventually be able to sell their products, instead of being obliged to borrow money from the government? That is my first suggestion and I make it in all earnestness.

The second suggestion is this. The farmers have lost a good deal of money not only in consequence of a decrease in external trade but also because of a decrease in the home consumption of farm products, so much so that the amount which is mentioned for the loan is but a small fraction of the losses sustained by the farmers. These losses are very considerable, and I would refer the committee to Hansard of June 6 of last year. I will not repeat the facts set out there, but the decrease in value of fourteen farm products in the year 1932 compared with 1930 has been $440,000,000. The humblest farmer has lost at least $50 a month as a result of the decrease in trade and the decrease in the sale of farm products. Would it not be possible and desirable for the Prime Minister and the member for Argenteuil, who are two of the richest men in this country, to give of their wealth for the benefit of the farmers who have suffered so much on account of their policy? I make this suggestion in good faith, and if they will accept it they will prove their good faith. Mr. Baldwin did something of this kind in England and he was praised by everyone as a good citizen. I suggest to the Prime Minister and the member for Argenteuil, two of the richest men in the country, that they follow Mr. Baldwin's example.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

The house resumed consideration in committee of resolution to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act—Mr. Rhodes—Mr. Ross in the chair.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I listened this afternoon with a great deal of attention to the debate on the amendments to the Farm Loan Act. Let me point out that there are some factors which we must not lose sight of while examining the necessity of farm loans. In dealing with this question, perhaps it would be well to consider somewhat the conditions of agriculture and the reasons which prompt us to amend the Farm Loan Act, as well as all the laws tending toward the protection of agriculture in Canada. There is no doubt that the difficulties of later years prevented the farmers from meeting their obligations and that the amount of their debts generally increased, in spite of a reduction in the cost of living. However, operation costs have not been reduced in the same proportion as the price of farm products. That is the cause of the farmers' embarrassment. Although there were Dominion farm loan acts in operation in all the Canadian provinces, except in Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island, and Ontario, provinces who have their own farm loan laws, they could not meet the precarious condition in which the farmers found themselves during these years of depression. The various provinces, besides the Farm Loan Act, have had to consider moratorium measures in order to keep the farmers from losing their lands, and save the farming industry which we like to consider and which has been considered throughout the whole history of Canada as the basis of our economic structure.

Through the farm moratorium acts either the payments of the farmer's debts were deferred or the exigencies of the mortgage deeds made ineffective. This did not improve the precarious condition of the farmer to which I referred a moment ago. Last year, this parliament passed a bill called the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to facilitate arrangements between the farmers and their creditors. We were aknowledging thereby the fact that the farming industry was perhaps in a worse condition than it had been in for a long time and that something had to be done, something very urgent in the form of legislative measures.

At the present time the farmer is unable to pay and that is why the Arrangement Act that was passed last winter and that is now in force, is beginning to operate throughout the country and the requests will be far more numerous in the near future. At present, the farmer wonders what will become of the cases now under consideration by the receiver, and which, failing an agreement before the receiver, are finally referred to a judge and two representatives of the parties, who have to decide how much the creditor must lose on his loans to the farmers, to what extent the debts must be reduced and how much the farmer will have to pay or try to pay pursuant to such compromise.

I was pleased, Mr. Speaker, to hear the minister himself say this afternoon that the Farmers' Creditors' Arrangement Act and the Farm Loan Act should be considered jointly in order to secure legislation which would be easy to operate and effective in its results for the welfare of the farming industry, as a whole, and specially to keep the farmer from losing the land on which he lives.

This Farmers' Creditors' Arrangement Act ought to be fair to the farmer as well as to the creditor. Allow me to review the effects of the various applications for a compromise which have been made in that part of Ontario where I live, and which are about to be decided upon. In the county of Prescott, which I have the honour to represent, a few of these applications will be examined at Ottawa by Judge Hope, on Thursday and Friday of this week. We are awaiting these decisions with some anxiety. Some decisions have nevertheless been already rendered upon which an intelligent study of the legislation might be based, and which permit us to offer our best suggestions to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, in order to help the farmers, must be easy to operate and bear results.

There is no doubt that the farmers who are applying now for a compromise with their creditors are those who have trouble in meeting their obligations, or are unable to meet them at all, in many cases because of the accumulation of these obligations. For instance, we see some farmers who not only have been unable to pay any interests for one or two years, but who also owe tax arrears, bills at the stores, the blacksmith, the baker, and even promissory notes on implements, because the moratorium allowed them an extension of time to pay them, when they applied for it to the county judge. The latter granted them a delay of six months to help them out, and then another extension of time at the expiration of those six months, thus accumulating the debt which compels them to-day to ask for a compromise.

I cannot help making two particular suggestions to the minister, because the farmers are not all in the same position. It is absolutely necessary to amend the Farm Loan Act, so that when a farmer makes a reasonable offer to the receiver, the latter may have the power to instruct the Dominion Board to lend the necessary amount to facilitate the arrangement. I heard the minister of Finance say this afternoon in reply to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), that you could not instruct the Farm Loan Board to make a loan. But if you want to keep the farmer on his land, that is what you should do and the case would be settled. There is another suggestion I wish to make. The Dominion Board should be empowered to lower the rate of interest as much as it may be necessary in order to reduce the payments to be made by the farmers and thus allow them to remain on their land without causing too great a loss to the creditors.

I shall revert to my first suggestion that the receiver or those who have to deal with the case should find the necessary funds. And here is the reason why I am making this suggestion: There is no doubt, in some cases at least, that the farmers owe more than their land is worth, and their revenue is too low for them to make a living, to pay their debts and their interests and to provide for the upkeeping of their farms. Therefore, they ask for a reduction of their whole debt, they propose not only to reduce their mortgages, but all their other debts, offering to pay a certain percentage in five, ten or fifteen years. Here is what happens, Mr. Speaker. As soon as a farmer applies for a reduction of his debt and a certain delay within which to pay it, nobody will sell to him on credit any more. Now in several parts of the country, and specially in the Ottawa valley, the difficulties of which I have more specifically studied, the farmers can obtain money only once a year from their crop. Let me explain. During the summer, the sale of milk in later years did not yield enough to provide for the upkeep of a family, and also to pay taxes and interests. Therefore, they must wait until the crop is sold, whether it be clover or timothy seed, hay or grain. It is quite logical, for you cannot draw practically any other revenue out of these lands. As soon as the farmer makes his application, he cannot get anything on credit at the store, he cannot buy on credit any more, neither feed for his cattle, nor the commodities which he does not grow himself. He cannot secure any credit anywhere, and therefore his operations are stopped. Being unable to get credit anywhere, the farmers are compelled to sacrifice what is left, either their live stock or their implements, to provide for their families. Therefore, being deprived of the necessary means of production in the future, how will they be able to pay the amount required by the compromise? If the farmers had the opportunity to effect the settlement in cash, they would protect their credit, the people would rely on their being able to operate their farms, and they would not be in the precarious position in which they are now.

It must be realized that farmers who compromise with their creditors, being unable to make any further purchases on credit, will find it difficult to carry on their farming operations and will therefore be doomed to a second failure. The hon. Minister of Finance may tell the house that this act has given good results, and he may produce figures to that effect, but the facts contradict his assertion, for if the farmer is unable to borrow from the Canadian Farm Loan Board to meet the amount of his arrangement with his creditors, he will be unable to find money anywhere, and, without money, he will be unable to operate his farm in a normal manner and his returns will suffer. That is why I say that he will be doomed to a second failure.

Should the present situation continue, lenders will find themselves forced to take back farms in bad condition, poorly fenced, with neglected buildings and with soil impoverished by lack of fertilizers, and not only will the farmer find himself in a bad state, but the farming class will have lost its credit. May I say by the way that this arrangement act, as it stands at present, will make it impossible for young farmers to buy land, because they will find it impossible to borrow. In my district, loans to farmers are made not by companies, but usually by retired farmers who lend their life-time savings to the younger generation. Their savings are not large and they need them for their subsistence. If, in order to protect the farming class, we make them lose part of their savings, these old people who thought they had laid aside sufficient money for their declining years, will find themselves forced to apply for old-age pensions and will thus become public charges.

When an arrangement is effected between farmer and creditor, what could be more just than to pay in cash the amount involved? Having paid his debts, the farmer would retain his credit and would be able to continue operating his farm. The creditor, on the other hand, having received his money, would be able to invest it elsewhere to the best advantage.

It will be said that the farmer agrees to pay interest on the amount compromised for. How will he be able to pay more next year than this year if his income has not increased? Even if you reduce to $4,000 a debt of $8,000, if the real value of the farm is at present $2,000, the farmer will be unable to meet his interest, with taxes as they are to-day in Ontario. I mention Ontario because, living there, it is the province I know best. With the high cost of living and the heavy cost of operating a farm, the farmer will still be unable to meet his obligations if he has to continue paying interest rates as high as those he pays to-day.

In such cases it would be much fairer, it seems to me, for the receiver to effect a compromise by which the rate of interest would be reduced, but the principal of the debt left at its original figure. The rate of interest should be brought down to the level of the paying capacity of the farmer, even if it meant lowering it to 1 per cent, but the principal of the debt should be left intact. We all hope to see the return of normal years, and when they come, these farms will be back to their normal value.

Take, for example, the case that I mentioned just now, of a farm that had cost $8,000 and on which the debt had been reduced to $2,000 by means of a compromise effected for a period of ten years. When the borrower repays the lender at the expiration of the ten years, should the farm have regained its normal value of $8,000, he will have recovered possession of his property for the sum of $2,000, and if he can sell it for $8,000, he will make a profit of $6,000. Now, the farmer is not in the habit of making money in this way; he is used to earning his money honestly and by hard work. It would be most unfair to the lender, who would lose $2,000 by the fact that the working of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act reduced his loan of $4,000 to $2,000. This act therefore works to the detriment of the retired farmer who lends out his savings to make it possible for the younger generation to acquire land.

If this act is to be worth anything, it will be necessary, in urgent cases, to make use of the Farm Loan Act, in order that the amount compromised for may be settled in cash, that all debts may be paid and that the farmer may be placed in a position to continue operating his farm.

And in the particular cases where that is not possible, it would be better for the receiver or the judge to have the power to reduce the rate of interest, in order that farmer and lender may each contribute his share of sacrifice. It would be better to have the rate of interest made low enough to enable the farmer to keep his land and, when better times come, he would continue to pay interest at the current price of money in Canada. In that way, the lender would not lose his claim and, especially, people will not be told that we, in this country, do not pay our debts.

Our farmers still wish to pay their debts. It is considered in certain quarters that this Arrangement Act allows farmers to go bankrupt in the same way as other classes who have in the past caused losses to the people by selling them worthless securities and have then escaped their obligations by resorting to bankruptcy.

If we allow our people to get the idea that the farmer also may have recourse to bankruptcy, I say quite frankly that we will never again have settlers like those of old, who cleared the land in this country so as to make it possible to draw therefrom the agricultural products that have so greatly contributed to the wealth of our export trade.

The government should give serious consideration to these suggestions before definitely introducing a bill relating to farm loans and to arrangements between farmers and creditors, in order that these measures may be of real advantage to agriculture and that they may not, like this Arrangement Act, threaten to destroy the farmers' credit and to bring about a second failure. We should seek to protect agriculture instead of taking the risk of making farming almost impossible. Especially if farm products remain at their present price level, it is absolutely impossible to earn a livelihood on the farm. It is not so much the present generation that we are thus detaching from the land, as it is the younger generation that we are preventing from taking up farming. For it is generally recognized to-day that the younger generation cannot establish itself on the land with any hope of making a living.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to express my approval of the proposed amendment to the Canadian Farm Loan Act. From the general agreement expressed in all quarters I think there is no doubt that these amendments will carry. First it is provided that there be an increase from $40,000,000 to $90,000,000 in the amount placed at the disposal of the board for loans. That will widen its field of operations. The amendment to the act last year increased the amount available from $15,000,000 to $40,000,000 and required the provincial governments to subscribe five per cent and the borrower five per cent. This legislation was more or less complementary to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I was pleased with and I endorse the statement made this afternoon by the Minister of Finance in respect of that act; I think it is one of the finest pieces of legislation, the most far-reaching and important, that has passed this house. It has been the means of putting new heart into the farmers in western Canada, giving them new hope and encouragement to rehabilitate themselves and make a fresh start.

During the discussions last year the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance made it very plain that the amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act were complementary to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. But it was clear that when a farmer had taken advantage of the debt compromise arrangements with his creditors, unless he had some capital with which to carry on his position was not much better than before. So it was provided that the farm loan board should come to his help and could lend to the farmer fifty per cent of the appraised value of his land, twenty per cent of the appraised value of his buildings and fifty per cent of the appraised value of his chattels, in order to give him some ready money to make a new start. It would enable him to consolidate his liabilities.

One of the first and most important things to be considered is the interest rate. It must be as low as possible. The Minister of Finance stated that he thinks a spread of one and one half per cent will be necessary between the amount charged the board by the government and the rate the board charges the farmer. If one and a half per cent is necessary that is all right. But this government within recent months borrowed money at three per cent and three and a half per cent, and I think we are all of the opinion that it is desirable that the rate to the farmer should not exceed five per cent, and should be lower if possible.

I am very much in favour of a dominion board, one board to handle farm loans throughout the dominion. This does away with provincial boards, so that there will no longer be the passing of the buck to some other organization or "an alibi" as mentioned by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis).

The method of operation of the loan companies in the years prior to say, 1925, was this —and I know whereof I speak: they were out seeking loans in the west. They had an agent in every town. He would go to the farmers; he would pick his men, and endeavour to place the money for the companies. Where a farmer might talk of a loan of $2,000 or $3,000 to make some improvements on his farm or pay an instalment on the purchase price of another quarter section of land, the agent would say to him, "Your property will stand a loan of $5,000 or $6,000," In other words, they encouraged farmers to borrow more than they required. A great deal of the present debt in western Canada is due to operations of that kind; farmers have loans of $5,000 or $6,000 that they never would have had had they been left to their own discretion. To-day the situation is that no loans are to be had. The loan companies have practically withdrawn from a large part of the western provinces. I can cite cases in my own constituency of farmers who after three or four years of adverse climatic conditions are in need of a loan. But owing to that condition the loan companies refuse to make loans. This amendment will make money available for such farmers.

Then there is another class to which I think reference was made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Beynon) and the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury); that is those in the west who have retired from their farms, some on account of age, some on account of physical disability, and who are living in the towns. They may be operating their farms by hired labour, or may have their farms rented. These are as fine a class of citizens as there is in any part of Canada; they are the pioneers who came west in the early days, and who put all they had into the development of the country. But I do not think they come under this act. I think the Minister of Finance would be well advised to give consideration to the suggestions already made by the previous speakers concerning them.

The farmers need this relief immediately to assist them to carry on. It should be based on their ability to pay over a long period of years. I have no doubt at all that the west will come back, and if there is a system such as this to help them over their present difficulties it will go a long way to rehabilitate the west and restore its capacity of producing new wealth, if climatic conditions are favourable.

In closing I wish to refer briefly to one or two statements made this afternoon. There was a question concerning the cost to the farmer of getting a loan. I have no particular objection to the cost as outlined by the Minister of Finance this afternoon, but what I have heard many farmers complain of is the annual or biennial inspection by the loan companies and by the inspectors of the provincial farm loan board. For this there is generally a fee of $10. This is all it amounts to: the agent of the company drives out and asks the farmer how many acres he has in crop, how many acres in summer fallow and so on. In about fifteen minutes he drives away again, but in the annual interest notice the farmer finds an item of $10 for inspection. I trust that will not be the case under this board.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) stated that now the loan companies were prepared to compromise, that if a farmer would go to a loan company and offer a reasonable amount of cash the company would be prepared to compromise and accept that money. I should like to ask when the loan companies began doing that sort of thing. That has been the case only since legislation similar to that now under consideration has been on the statute books; I refer to the adjustment act of last year. Three or four years ago you never heard of the loan companies doing anything of the kind. They are doing it now only in order to keep the farmers from taking advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

The west will come back. This afternoon I was interested in the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) with respect to what the government propose to do in rehabilitating that part of the western provinces commonly spoken of as the drought areas. I think the government is on the right track in pursuing a policy that will re-grass that portion of the country and conserve the moisture. I have no fear of the future if matters are handled in the proper way. Again I wish to express my very great approval of this measure, and I know the farmers of western Canada in particular will approve of it also, because many of them are waiting to take advantage of the provisions of this measure when the bill is passed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, it is rather surprising to me, as I am sure it must be to the minister, to find so much unanimity in regard to this matter and yet we linger over it for so long. It has occurred to me, however, that possibly there is a side to the question that has not been dealt with as yet, and that all will not be plain sailing unless we go about this in the right way.

It was an entirely new doctrine to many of us that the way to get out of a hole of indebtedness was to climb into a deeper hole, that the way to get out from under mortgaging was to get into more mortgaging, especially when that is associated with the restriction of exports as in the case of our wheat last year. We wonder what order we have entered; are we in the C.C.F. or what? Do not mistake me; it is because everyone else has fled from the field of lending to agriculture that the government is left alone, the only source from which farmers can borrow. As one who never has been enthusiastic about either provincial or federal governments going into the lending business, I fear the ultimate results of this legislation if we do not handle it right.

May I, as an elderly farmer, give some reminiscences of my youth when old Ontario, especially east from Kingston to the Ottawa river, was relatively nearly as heavily mortgaged as it is to-day, and there semed to be almost as much difficulty in getting out. The difficulty was not so great then, of course, because we had not acquired our expensive habits at that time; there were no motor car and radio obligations to eat us all up. I remember that day quite well, and the way out that was invoked was very different from what we are proposing now. Perhaps it is not altogether fair to make a comparison, but it will do no harm to mention the methods that were employed away back in the seventies, part of the eighties and the early nineties, by which we did succeed in getting out of debt to a large extent. How was that done? Well, we turned to dairying for one thing. The cheese factory business began in earnest about sixty years ago, providing some cash revenue for the farmers. Then the bacon and poultry industries were speeded up also as well as other lines. The farmers at that time were not looking for more leisure or for shorter hours; they were devoting themselves to hard, persistent and intelligent work, and they were practising thrift. How old fashioned these terms sound, but some old fashioned things must become new fashioned, and this is the time for it. I hear people talking about how much leisure they should have on the farm. Believe me, I have never seen much leisure on the farm except an occasional day that is simply taken off, If one is forehanded enough of course he can have some leisure, but you must not sit by and count your hours of work as compared with your leisure days and object because there is not more leisure. That was not the way we won the war, I am sure, and it is not the way we will get agricutural conditions on a better footing, although, like the last speaker, I believe the industry will eventually come back, but it will be a severe grind.

In what respects do conditions to-day differ from those of these old days? Should we disregard all those old methods of getting back on our feet? The Minister of Finance is a maritimer; he was brought up, as I was, to abhor debt and mortgages, though I fell into it slightly, together with nearly everyone else in the west. Let him that is without sin in this respect cast the first stone; I am not going to. But we are here, and the government is the only medium through which money can be borrowed on farm property.

As I look at it this bill must be tied up with the debt arrangement act of last year; that is to say, if our credit is down enough we can have our debts adjusted at possibly fifty cents on the dollar or less. A man who is in fairly good standing, however, will be expected to pay his creditors in full, and in time no doubt he will do so. As I understand it, however, this measure, together with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, is to be a sort of refunding of the debtor's indebtedness. Perhaps the term "refunding" should be applied to the creditors rather than to the debtors; I think it should be. At any rate, the indebtedness is written down as low as possible and then, to use an illustration, instead of owing a private corporation say one dollar the farmer will owe the government fifty cents. If I am wrong in that illustration of what it amounts to I hope the minister will put me right, because it is hard for a layman to understand all the intricacies, not of this resolution but of the creditors rearrangement act.

I think if we could just look upon the government as a private lender there would not be so many dangers in legislation of this kind. But mark what I have said; the government is now the sole medium through which money can be borrowed on farm property. When times get a little better and you expect ordinary private lenders to reenter the field, the question naturally will arise whether or not they will enter the field and compete against the government. When we consider the history of mortgages in the last quarter of a century in Canada we find we first exhausted all we could get from the private lender, then all we could get from mortgage company or insurance company, then all we could get from the banks, then all we could get from the provincial governments and, after we had milked them dry, all we could get from the federal government. I wonder if there is any higher authority? Yes, we know that in company with the federal government the imperial government have given loans to Newfoundland.

I cogitate on these facts because I think the government is responsible for not being more candid as to the limitations of this measure. They know perfectly well the dangers involved in lending money and how horribly poor the average government is as a collector. There is no doubt about that. I hate to think of it. Speaking of the west, because I am not as familiar with conditions in the east as I was when a youngster, I would say that unless we associate this increased borrowing or rather rearrangement, with better farming practices, more seeding down of both grass and clover and keeping our soil at home, which we are not doing at the present time, no amount of borrowing will help us very much. On the other hand if the government will admit frankly that this is not a panacea, if they will just get out of the ether waves and admit that this measure is only a makeshift or stand-over, and that it is only a means to tide over the situation until we get our footing and our breath, we may get somewhere. I believe in the aggregate mortgaging has done agriculture more harm than good, because moneys frequently have been unwisely loaned and pressed upon an inexperienced borrower.

May I refresh the memory of the committee concerning the very limited supervision which in the past lenders have had over money loaned on farm mortgages. This applies not only to private corporations and individuals but to governments. Theoretically every loan made by way of a mortgage indebtedness should be in a position to pay itself back by way of a sinking fund provision plus interest. The purpose is eventually to wipe off the debt in a given number of years. Can any hon. member tell me of any time in our history when farm mortgages were given on that basis? A great deal of the mortgaging in the west was done without the farmers realizing it. They slipped here and slipped there, buying horses, buying more land and buying greater equipment, but starting with nothing. After a while the mortgage company would make this proposition to the farmer: "Would it not be better to have a loan on your indebtedness which would be due to one corporation rather than to eight or nine individuals and thereby liquidate all these smaller debts?" But that kind of mortgaging meant that the money was gone before it was borrowed; it was used in paying for dead horses. Very little of it was spent in productive enterprises which would have had any likelihood of paying back at least part of the debt.

I would urge the minister—and I am sure he must entertain some slight misgiving such as I have described—to invoke some stricter regulation to supervise the expenditure of these moneys. Of course, I do not know whether or not there will be any overages to spend. I know that ten or twenty years ago one could not tell the average borrower how to spend the money he borrowed; he would not stand for that. He would simply go to another company that would not impose conditions. The time has come however when even the borrower is glad to have the advice of an experienced lender as to how he may best administer the proceeds of a loan.

As a result of a general laxity in the supervision of loaned money we have to-day a vast array of insurance company and mortgage company representatives supervising farms. Those men are trying to establish the farms along better lines of farming and, I believe, are doing good work. But with this experience before us I wonder if we are asking too much when we ask this parliament—not the government alone, but all of us—to cultivate more of the old fashioned anti-mortgage attitude, more of the anti-mortgage mind, in place of the attitude which has obtained in former times. I suppose no hon. member of the government or the house is any more conscious of the dangers in this measure than the Minister of Finance, if we may judge from his remarks regarding the nationalization of our commercial banks. So far as his observations applied to the commercial banks I felt he was not far wrong. When the government once enters the field of lending on farm mortgages they will for a certain length of time keep other people out. There can be no doubt about that. We will then be adopting a system of borrowing and lending by federal government alone, which we have never had before in Canada. I am so averse to state socialism that I fear unless great wisdom is exercised a great deal of farm land will go back to the government and it will then be in the position of having to administer it socially. Is that the thin end of the wedge of C.C.F'ism? I am quite sure it is not the intention of the government to play that part. If we are not to play that part I say it is the government's duty, a duty resting upon all of us, to do our best to point out that this business of beating down the lender on loans in poor standing and then getting from the government enough money to pay the revaluation is only a tide-over policy for some and does not in any way resemble a permanent remedy for agriculture.

I believe I have nothing further to say, unless it be that I am sure I will be misunderstood. However, sometimes at three score and ten and five on top of that, one may say things he could not say if he were younger. At least if I have spoken unwisely, I will not have as long to be exposed to the harpoons of others. If I have so spoken at least I have spoken just as earnestly and as full of belief as any hon. member about the danger I have described. I believe I heard the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) make some wise observations. I could not hear him very well, but those parts I did hear I liked. Outside of that I have not heard many notes of warning. I have lived through a period in the seventies when people in spite of their mortgage troubles got on their feet by the methods I have referred to, not by shorter hours but by hard work, intelligently applied, although some have been worked to death. It does look now as if the only way to get a breathing spell is to go a little further into a rearranged debt. That is a horrible admission to make, and the government of all places to borrow from. I do not know what government first started this policy of lending money, but there is a responsibility on their shoulders. I have had the misfortune of being in two governments that adopted the policy of lending money, and I am prepared to take my share of the responsibility therefor, but I hope that this government will learn from the mistakes of the past. They are now amending an old bill of ours of 1927, and I hope they will take their courage in their hands and say what I am saying, only say it better if they believe it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But they cannot say it any better.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They can, I feel sure, say it better. The Prime Minister can, and so can the Minister of Finance, and I would like to hear them say it. Then they will get all the good out of this measure, that there is in it, and as little as possible of the bad.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, with much if not all that the hon. member for Melville has said I am in entire agreement. May I say at once to him that I appreciate the sincerity and frankness with which he has spoken. I rather marvel at his raising the question whether this is the thin end of the wedge of a new policy, and I rather wonder at his query: who is responsible for this new incursion of the government into the lending field. I do not say this with the slightest intention of making the tu quoque argument or of evading the full responsibility of this government for the legislation with which we are now dealing; but may I point out to my hon. friend that he was a member of the government which—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I admitted that.

Mr. RHODES:—which introduced the thin end of the wedge, and the responsibility for its initiation must be shared by the government of which he was a member.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Sure.

Mr. RHODES: I do not find any fault with that. I believe it was brought about by reason of a set of circumstances The government was confronted with a set of facts, not of theories, and the real reason for the introduction of that policy in the first place I believe was that there was a dearth of mortgage money for the farmer, coupled with the circumstance that such money as was available to him was available only at an exorbitant or unduly high rate of interest, or at all events a rate of interest which was higher than the farmer could properly afford to pay at the time. I find no fault with that.

The occasion for the bill in question is an extension of that thin end of the wedge brought about by reason of the fact that there is not merely a dearth of money for the farmer but an almost entire absence of money from private sources, coupled with the fact that if we are to make of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the complete success that we hope to be able to make of it, there must be available some source from which loans can be made.

Let me say at once to my hon. friend that I share with him the misgivings he feels with respect to the government entering into the lending field. I believe that the government in the nature of things is an inefficient instrument for that purpose, and must of very necessity be so. It is rather a case of what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and the difficulty is to get the type of man to deal with the business of the government as he would deal with his own if he was a prudent man. But even if in the last analysis there is lost a certain amount of the principal sum, which I have no doubt will be the case, though we exercise, as we will, the utmost care, it would be far better on balance that that circumstance should arise than that thousands of deserving farmers throughout the country should be denied the opportunity of being rehabilitated and of getting back their courage and their opportunity to succeed and to thrive and to remain as satisfied citizens upon the land.

My hon. friend put forward the suggestion that the farm loan board acting on behalf of the government should be cautious as to the manner in which the money which the farmer secures on loan shall be expended. I agree with him entirely, and as a matter of fact in practice the farm loan board did lay down in the past and at the present time is laying down conditions as to the manner in which the money loaned shall be expended. They require from the farmer a statement as to what he requires the money for and so far as possible they see that the money reaches the destination intended in the first instance.

My hon. friend from Melville put the direct question to me whether a farmer who had been able, under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, to make a compromise with all his creditors at fifty cents on the dollar would in that event be able to go to the farm loan board and secure a loan which would consolidate his position. The answer is yes, but with this qualification: it does not necessarily follow that because a settlement of that character is effected, ipso facto he can come as a matter of right to the farm loan board for a loan. In other words, it is the purpose that each loan shall be considered upon its merits and that there shall be taken into account not only the question of security but what I think is one of the most important considerations of all, the one which I would have in my own mind if I were lending money either on my own behalf or on behalf of the government, and that is the character of the man to whom the loan is made. Is his integrity, his industry and his ability such that he is likely to succeed in the business of farming? I have seen farmers who under the most favourable circumstances would starve to death on fertile land contiguous to one of the finest markets of the country; and on the other hand I have seen farmers on poor soil, badly located, handicapped with debt, who by their courage and determination, their energy and ability, have succeeded in thriving, prospering and bettering their condition under adverse circumstances. Such are the considerations which must always be taken into account, and subject to those conditions and having regard to the facts in each individual case, the farmer under the circumstances outlined by my hon. friend from Melville will be able to go to the board and secure a loan. But I want to enter this caution. I have a fear, and I state this with the utmost frankness, that we shall find this situation arising, that lenders, whether they be individuals or companies, anxious to secure some if not the whole of their money that is locked up in what might be termed a frozen mortgage, will spur the individual farmer on in an effort to secure government money. Now if that type of lender has the idea that this farm loan act is intended to bail him out of his position he is very greatly mistaken, and I hope the good sense of the farming community in the country will not lend itself to such purposes. If this money could be made available to meet individual cases where, if money were loaned, it would have the effect of rehabilitating the farmer and placing him on his feet, it would go a very long way. But if any mistaken policy were adopted of handing it out in the way that has been suggested the act would prove largely abortive. I hope that such a condition will not come about.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am pleased to learn that my conjecture was right, that the minister and I were two old fashioned individuals so far as borrowing and mortgaging are concerned, and I am proud to be associated with those of that type. But with reference to the fact, already admitted, that I had been associated with a government at a time when governments loaned money not because they were the only medium of loaning, but because they were trying to lower and control interest rates by corporations, everyone recognized that eight and nine per cent could not be paid on farm mortgages, and yet that was being charged and in some instances a higher rate. Provincial governments were induced by demands on all sides, both provincial and federal, to be a competitor in the loaning business at a lower rate, thus having a tendency to bring down rates generally. But even with that possibly laudable purpose in mind, it was fundamentally a mistake, in my opinion, for Canada to go into the loaning business through its government. However, we are in; that is the point, and the question is—How are we to get out? There is a theory to-day that if your interest is low enough you will be able to pay your mortgage back. Possibly you should be. But I recall quite well that many years ago I bought a quarter section of school land from the government. The interest was then only three per cent, and it was the government that I owed; that fact was always in my subconscious mind. If I had greater pressure from creditors whose money was carrying eight per cent I paid them first and let the government whistle for a little while for their money. Was I wrong? Will you not pay for the loan carrying the higher interest first? I remember also one occasion—I do not care to say how far back it is—when we were using what we called a sweep horse power. A number of us clubbed together and bought a threshing machine. It was a secondhand machine and after we had got it partly paid for we had to get repairs costing $72—I shall never forget the amount. How were we to get the repairs? We could not thresh until we got the repairs and we could not get the repairs until we threshed. I was the only one in the company that was not doing much that particular day. We had to have a joint note and we went to the private bank, because there were no chartered banks there then, and a neighbouring farm woman and myself went down in our buckboard to the bank and borrowed money that figured out at 36 per cent, and we were glad to get it. We stuck the repairs on the machine and got it going, and believe me we did not let that loan run overdue. This convinces me therefore that sometimes a rate of interest that is quite low has an effect the opposite of what we anticipate and so with the 36 per cent previously referred to. Therefore, no kind of farm mortgage is good unless one adopts the principle of taking as little as one can get along with and getting rid of it as quickly as possible.

Mr. VALLANCE: The Minister of Finance made a statement that brings me to my feet, because there are many farmers, especially in the west, who feel that they will use the farm loan board for the very thing which the minister says it cannot be used for. Mortgage companies are carrying them to-day at eight per cent, which is the average, and they take the view that if they can get it from the board at six per cent, or as low as four per cent, as we suggest to the minister, they will be able to get from under the load they are now carrying. The minister says that is not the purpose of the bill. If that is so I will tell him frankly that eighty per cent of the mortgages in the west will have to stay as they are now; and if the farmers cannot get an adjustment, not being able to come under the provisions of this act, if that is to be the policy of the board, then I am bound to say that the act will not perform the function I think it should. Let me paint a picture, taking the minister back twenty-five or twenty-eight years ago to western Canada, a wilderness—and some of those people are still in that country. They went there without anything. They had no accommodation of any sort, neither highways, railways, towns nor villages, and they built the country up. They have all these conveniences to-day, but in the creation of them they find themselves saddled with a heavy mortgage indebtedness. They are faced with this indebtedness in spite of the fact that they have built up the country, and notwithstanding all the wealth they have created, which has been of real advantage to the dominion, billions of dollars. I have listened to the Prime Minister as he has spoken of the new wealth created there each year, and yet these people are sitting to-night with little equity in their land. Unless this act brings some measure of relief to these people, then eighty per cent of it will be futile so far as the west is concerned.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has not interpreted my remarks as they should have been, but if I have not made my position clear the fault is possibly mine. My hon. friend from Melville put a specific case and I said that the act would be available in the case he mentioned, but not of necessity. What I had in mind was this. It would be a misfortune if the farmer were used as a catspaw by loan companies and individuals who have mortgages to enable them, to use the vulgar expression, to get out from under and saddle the government with mortgages, because it must be borne in mind that the maximum that can be loaned under this measure is $90,000,000, and the loans on farms in this country run into hundreds of millions. This act would not serve the purpose for which it was intended if it were used immediately to absorb existing mortgages to that extent; it would soon be gone, and the individual farmer in difficulties would not be able to avail himself of its provisions. But if there is a settlement, either by way of compromise or by way of a decision by the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and if it is in the interests of the farmer to have a loan to consolidate his position, the farm loan board, dealing with that specific case on its merits, and considering the surrounding conditions of which I have spoken, would be justified in giving the loan to consolidate his position.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this $90,000,000 to be available only for new loans? If it is available only for new loans, I would point this out. The individual who to-day is availing himself of the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is the very one, at least as I gather from the minister, who cannot avail himself of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. It is the man who to-day is indebted to the mortgage companies, the banks and the machinery companies who needs the full protection of the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and if it is not applicable to him, the whole thing is futile so far as that type of farmer is concerned.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend in the calm of to-morrow will read in Hansard what I have said, I submit to him in all fairness that he cannot place upon my words any such interpretation as he is endeavouring to make. I will repeat the statement I have made twice in the last twenty minutes, namely, that each individual loan will be considered upon its merits, and the decision of the farm loan board will be made with respect to the merits of each individual case. There are no limitations imposed upon that statement.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the minister a question? Last year parliament put upon the statute books the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, thereby creating machinery whereby the farmer who is indebted may go before a receiver, put in a statement of his affairs and make a proposition as to what percentage of his indebtedness he thinks he will be able to pay. This naturally would be based upon the whole production of his land. If the creditors and the debtor cannot agree to readjust the indebtedness, then the farmer makes application to the board of review, which is another piece of machinery created by parliament in order to readjust the debt of the farmer. The board of review is composed of responsible men, one a judge, one representing the farmers and the third representing the creditors. After the creditors and the debtor fail to agree, suppose the board of review arrive at a composition of the farmer's debt and say it is to be reduced forty or fifty per cent—and as I understand the matter, when that composition is registered or accepted by the court, it becomes binding—does the minister not think, after the board of review has readjusted the debt of the farmer and this composition has become binding on all concerned, the farmer, under the provisions of the bill which will be founded on the resolution we are discussing here to-night, which is another piece of machinery created by this parliament to effect a readjustment of farmers' debts, should be able to come to this farm loan board and say: This is my debt that has been adjusted by the parliament of Canada; am I not entitled to get a loan to cover this indebtedness as it has been adjusted by the board of review? That impression was created by the acts passed last summer. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act created the impression in western Canada that a farmer could get his indebtedness readjusted provided that he put his cards on the table and was honest about the matter. The impression prevailed also that by the amendments of last year to the farm loan act, after an adjustment of the farmer's debts had been made either voluntarily by the creditors and debtor before the receiver or by the board of review, he could go to the farm loan board and get this money. That impression prevails in western Canada to-day. I am not criticizing what the minister said to-night. Probably he is sound in what he said, but what he said to-night is certainly going to disappoint many people who were expecting a great deal. Whether they were expecting too much or not, I do not know. That impression however exists in western Canada and after these amendments are made to the Farm Loan Act increasing the amount available to $90,000,000, the impression will be even stronger than it has been in the past.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Provencher is no doubt cognizant of conditions in his constituency and its immediate neighbourhood. He may be accurate when he states that the farmers with whom he has had contact were of opinion that there was a sort of pool of credit or of money into which they could dip freely. But let me point out to him this fact, which has been very widely overlooked, namely, that under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act actual settlements have been made not in dozens but in hundreds, including some in the constituency of my hon. friend, which did not call for a dollar of new money and which were made with the full concurrence of the debtor and of the creditors.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will my hon. friend say—

Mr. RHODES: Will my hon. friend be good enough to retain his seat and allow me to answer one question at a time? Apparently I find it difficult to make myself clear, although I had hoped my knowledge of the English language was sufficiently good to enable me to do so. My hon. friend is in error in assuming that of necessity a settlement by the board of review under the Farmers' Creditor Arrangement Act involves fresh borrowing. In the great majority of cases fresh borrowing will not be required at all; this settlement means that after the board of review has adjusted a debt upon a basis which it feels is fair to the debtor and creditors, that farmer is in a far better position than he was in before. If, by virtue of that settlement, new money is required which is not available from the debtor himself, in that event he can resort to the farm loan board and as I said before, whether he secures the money or not will be dependent upon the merits of the individual case. I am inclined to believe that in such circumstances the board will sympathetically consider applications of that character. But may I point out to my hon. friend that I have known cases where settlements to the satisfaction of all parties, have been effected before the official reeciver, which have resulted not only in a compression and a consolidation of the farmer's debt position but in a situation where the creditor himself has advanced either in cash or in kind a sufficient amount to place the farmer on his feet. It is my hope that this legislation will be resorted to only in those cases which cannot be met along the lines I have indicated. I trust in these observations I have left my position abundantly clear, having stated for the fourth time that the question whether a loan will or will not be advanced will be dependent upon the merits and the needs of the case according to the judgment of the farm loan board.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am sorry the minister when he replied to my remarks did not smile as he did in answering every other hon. member. I certainly do not want him to think any remarks of mine were intended in any way as criticism. I was trying to point out to him the impression which was created and which probably will be strengthened after the amendments are made to the act increasing the amount available. I agree with him that many adjustments were made before the receiver without recourse to the board of review and without any need for loan. Indeed, I know of some of them myself. Nobody has been more interested in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act than I have since last session. But that impression, as I intimated to the minister to-night, certainly prevails in western Canada. I was and still am of the opinion that the machinery created by this parliament to do certain things must work in conjunction with machinery created to do other things, and the money to be provided by this bill should be available to take care of cases where money is needed whether the farm loan board or its advisory committee thinks so or not, after these readjustments have been made. The readjustments surely are going to be based on the present prices of commodities and the conditions under which we are living to-day. Where loans are needed in western Canada to consolidate the debts of the farmer at a lower rate of interest I still believe that this Canadian Farm Loan Act should take care of such cases.

Mr. MILLS: I wish to refer to a situation that exists in my immediate neighbourhood. About twelve years ago a neighbour of mine bought a farm at $13,000. A good down payment was made, and $7,000 has now been paid on the principal. In principal and interest the total paid to that landlord is nearly $11,000. There is owing on the farm $6,000 principal and about $1,100 arrears of interest. Taxes have been paid up for 1934. For some reason the purchaser was not keeping up his interest payments; therefore the landlord had to take proceedings to get an adjustment. The farmer has applied to the referee under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the referee has stepped in. That neighbour came to me a week ago last Sunday and was talking the matter over. He thought he should get settlement by paying $5,000 on the principal, the interest to be foregone. I said to him, "suppose you could get such an adjustment, could you get the $5,000 to clear up the mortgage." He said, "No, I don't know where I can at the present time." The following Monday the meeting of creditors was held, and I understand the man who holds the mortgage was the only creditor. The point I want to make is that if the government does not come forward and keep such men as that on the land, a good energetic farmer, where is there any chance for him to get the money? He cannot get it from private sources. Surely a farm that was worth $13,000 twelve years ago is a good risk to-day for $5,000; for I think all will agree that farm values now are at the lowest point in history.

That is only one of several cases I could give of farmers in my immediate neighbourhood who will have to leave their farms if they do not get some assistance. I appreciated very much the statement of the Minister of Finance that each case would be dealt with upon its merits. I agree that there are some farmers who would starve on the best farms and others who would do well on any kind of farm, and I think every application should be judged upon its merits. But I strongly recommend that farmers who are deserving be enabled to get a loan, and I hope some arrangement is made between the dominion and provincial governments that the rate of interest will not be over four per cent.

Mr. RHODES: As to the case cited by the hon. member for West Elgin, it must be borne in mind that the Canadian Farm Loan Act is not and never has been operative in Ontario. It will become operative there only when the present bill, if it is permitted to be introduced, is introduced and passed by this house. In the meantime inquiry must be addressed to the Ontario farm loan board, which operates under the laws of the province of Ontario. That is the only recourse he can have in that province so far as government borrowing is concerned until the Canadian Farm Loan Act is in operation there.

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a few words to the remarks of the hon. members who have addressed the house this afternoon on this measure. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has explained the resolution he moved last Friday, and the press of the country has published his explanations. A representative in each province, a reduction of interest to four per cent, the elimination of the five per cent that the borrower had to invest. Yesterday morning, a farmer said he had read in the press about the advantages the amendments to the Farm Loan Act of 1927, would bring to the farmers. With those amendments, the provincial boards are to disappear and the whole business will be centralized in Ottawa. One could not find anything better to increase delays, and our friends will, I think, have plenty of time to expound on the hustings, during the election, the advantages those amendments to the law will bring to the farmers.

I have often endeavoured to obtain loans under this act. In one case, where I thought I had made good progress, it took a little over eight months. I know of a case where they came across after fifteen months. And, no doubt, with the proposed amendments, the number of applications will increase. The inspection of the farm cannot take place before the first days in May and, as applications will be numerous, delays will result. In the meantime, our good friends will travel through the country, before the election, and say: See what we have done for the farmers!

Last fall at a meeting of farmers at Contrecœur, the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau), told those present of the advantages this government had brought to the rural people; the famous Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the amendments to the Farm Loan Act. But those who tried to get a loan under the terms of the amendments of 1934, did not get a cent.

Last summer I received a dozen applications for money. I see my good friend from Compton (Mr. Gobeil), who said in his remarks on Friday last, that many farmers were complaining of their requests being refused because politics had something to do with it. I must say that in St. Jean-Iberville, Conservatives are scarce. Out of the twelve who made applications for loans, I think eleven were Liberals, and not one got a cent. In one case, one farmer wanted a loan of $5,000 on a 240-acre farm, one of the richest in the province of Quebec, and he was turned down immediately. In another case, on a 120-acre farm, with a good brick house, good outbuildings and situated at a quarter of a mile from the village, without church or road fees, $3,000 were asked. Refused; the man was a Liberal. In another case, half a mile from the village, $2,500 were asked. Refused.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Who was to blame?

Mr. RHEAUME (Translation): I don't know. However, a moment ago I heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) say, in answer to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien), that a farmer must be very highly rated to obtain money with which to settle his debts under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. When you wish to find fault with somebody, nothing is easier. I understand that the Minister of Finance is a good lawyer; he is in that respect about the equal of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett): he never commits himself. His answer, to my mind, is very wise; if the farmer's standing is very good, if he is a first class man, the board will probably consider his case. But he did not commit himself.

I read in the newspaper La Presse that, in the province of Quebec, one can get but 60 per cent of the assessed value of his farm while in the other provinces, one can obtain two-thirds. When the bill is before the house for consideration, I hope the Minister of Finance will tell us why the farmers of the province of Quebec can obtain but 60 per cent of the valuation of their farms.

On what will the hon. minister base his valuation? On the municipal valuation or on that of the board's inspector? I know personally that, in a few cases, the inspector for the St. Jean-Iberville district, a man of high standing, had fixed the valuation of a farm, a valuation that met with the approval of the Quebec government, but which was refused by Ottawa. An inspector of the central board was sent to fix the valuation; the loan however was refused.

When you talk of lending 60 per cent, I ask you: On what valuation? If you take the inspector's appraisal, and if, in a number of cases, he values the land at $15 or $20 an acre, 60 per cent on that will not amount to much: from $9 to $12 an acre. It would mean that, on a 100 acre farm, a farmer could borrow under this great piece of legislation from $900 to $1,200. When the bill is introduced, I hope the Minister of Finance will give us some explanation. If you take the inspector's appraisal, I can predict that the act will be a failure, as in 1934. I do not think there are five members from Quebec in this house who can say that two thirds or 50 per cent of the applications have been granted. In the electoral district of St. Jean-Iberville, eighteen applications have been made but not one has been granted. And we were told the new arrangement would give farmers a chance to borrow money! If there is nothing in the act by which the lending of a fixed amount of money is authorized, and if you leave that to the inspector's discretion, I think there is no sense in that. Inspectors appointed may not be any better than their predecessors.

The Canadian Farm Loan Act passed in 1927 proved to be very advantageous in 1928, 1929, 1930 and 1931; it was of some use in 1932; but since that time, it has rendered no service at all. A few loans have been made in the electoral district of St. Jean-Iberville at $40 or $45 an acre, which was a reasonable amount. But, when you come to lending 60 per cent on the basis of a valuation made by an appraiser who values the land at $20 or $25 an acre, I say the thing is perfect nonsense and you waste the time of this house by discussing a piece of legislation under which the decision is left to the discretion of inspectors who are, in a great many cases, political appointees.

Now I would like to touch upon that great Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Much has been said about it. The Minister of Finance has just given notice that the period will be extended from 60 to 90 days. A lawyer practising in St. Johns, who has quite a number of cases before that tribunal, was telling me yesterday: "That is not of much importance; I have a case pending since last November; no tribunal has yet been organized; I asked for a postponement of 60 days and it was granted."

With this precious arrangement act, the government has absolutely killed the farmer's credit. No farmer is able to get $100 from a bank, but, before that act, two farmers could go to a bank and borrow money on a promissory note endorsed by one of them. What I am telling you now, I learned from three managers of our banks in St. Johns, where we have branches of the Banque Canadienne Nationale, the Royal Bank of Canada and the Canadian Bank of Commerce. The managers have received instructions not to lend a single cent to farmers. The farmers' credit has been completely ruined.

I know the proposed amendments may have their good points; but, if you want practical legislation, you necessarily must fix a minimum valuation per acre. Otherwise, your legislation will be worthless, because, if you leave the valuation to the discretion of inspectors, it will certainly be a failure, like all the rest.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the fact that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) has not appealed to the honourable minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), is very unfortunate. If the government is really anxious to help the farmers, I think that the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farmer's Creditors Arrangement Act should necessarily supplement each other.

As it is now, the Farmer's Creditors Arrangement Act operates as follows: a farmer appears before the receiver appointed by the government and files his statement of affairs. A meeting of the creditors is called for a certain date. If the creditors cannot come to an agreement, a compromise is out of question and then the farmer has the right to ask that his terms be submitted to the board of review. That board of review, as far as I know, has not yet operated in the rural districts of the province of Quebec, although the law is in force since the 1st of October, 1934.

The board of review has the power, under the provisions of the act, to compel the creditor or the debtor to accept the compromise that the board sees fit to determine. The board is composed of three members appointed by the government. The point raised by my hon. friend, the member for Provencher, is as follows: supposing that a compromise is arrived at and that it is approved by the board, where will the debtor find the necessary amount of money if it is agreed that a certain amount should be raised in cash? The only people a farmer can apply to in order to raise the money is obviously the Farm Loan Board. Without a Farm Loan Board, the only compromise a debtor could offer would be by way of instalments. The farmer having come to terms, and being compelled to make some payments at a more or less distant date, I am afraid he will not be in a position to do so and, under the act, if he does not comply with the terms of the arrangement, that failure is tantamount to bankruptcy and his property is sold by the receiver. Consequently, the necessity of giving the farmer the means of raising money by way of loans and to come to terms on a basis of a cash payment, which is of course a much better arrangement than an instalment plan, is apparent. As I have already said, the Farm Loan Board, and nobody else, can supply him with the necessary amount of money. I respectfully submit that, if the government wishes to see those two acts fairly and efficiently applied, the honourable Minister of Finance should amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act so as to compel the Farm Loan Board to advance to the farmers the amount required under the arrangement approved by the board of review.

Mr. HOWARD: Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD: However, it is my own opinion. And, judging by the cases that came to my notice, in my district, such is the only practical way to be fair both to the creditor and the debtor.

If you will allow me, Mr. Chairman, I will mention a case to the minister of Finance. I think it was the only case, in Drummond-Arthabaska, which was settled by the receiver. I am ready to admit, however, that there might have been arrangements which did not come to my notice. A farmer went to the receiver's office; he had debts to the amount of $1,500. His creditors accepted a 50 per cent arrangement, payable in December 1935. At that time, that man will have to pay $750 to his various creditors. If he does not pay, that will be a case of bankruptcy under the act and his property will be sold by the receiver. If this farmer is to avoid ruin, Mr. Chairman, there must be an organization which will lend him the amount needed to keep him on his farm.

Cases similar to this one are quite numerous, and I was glad to hear the suggestion made by the hon. member for Provencher. I wish I could be satisfied that these two acts are not on our statute book purely to remain there inoperative. Our farmers are actually in need of money, they must have credit, and if the government is willing to give them that credit, it is absolutely necessary to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act, as I was saying, so that the Farm Loan Board would be obliged to make necessary advances when an arrangement is made and approved by the board of review.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: The minister mentioned three factors which would have to be considered before loans could be made, namely the character of the applicant, the productivity of his land and the value of his assets. I believe he mentioned the further factor regarding the applicant's ability to pay. I understand the purposes for which money would be loaned would be to pay off existing liability, to fence, to drain, to improve and to buy new lands and other purposes to which the board may agree.

In trying to explain the act a member of parliament is placed in a difficult position, because while hon. members may think they know all the sections, when they are asked by their constituents to make explanations they find themselves unable to do so. The minister said each case would be dealt with on its own merits. A statement such as that may be comparable to some of the replies we receive from the departments in the form of stereotyped phrases such as, "We will take the matter into our serious consideration." I once wrote a letter to a department and received that reply. I have waited three years, and I suppose they are still taking the matter into their very serious consideration.

I know about a farmer who has two sections of land, and owes only about $300 on it. I believe he owes about $130 arrears in taxes. The man told me that when he went to the farm loan board in Edmonton he was told that unless his debts were $1,000 or over he would not be given a loan, under the act. I notice a section in the act which states that loans may be made to farmers in good standing. The question is: Which farmers are going to get the loans? The act is so enshrouded with mystery that people like myself have found it very difficult to gain any information which might be of benefit to our constituents. I should like to know what loan the man I have mentioned could get under the farm loan act. I find myself in very much the same position as other hon. members have described, namely, that I have not sufficient information to advise my constituents who ask for loans.

Mr. RHODES: May I say in all kindliness and without any desire to offend that we have discussed this resolution two days and we have not had an opportunity to introduce the bill so that hon. members might consider it. I submit in all fairness that questions might be asked to greater advantage when the bill is before the house and hon. members have had an opportunity to peruse it. It will be better to have the bill introduced than for hon. members to be putting hypothetical cases to me before its introduction. I am not finding fault with the hon. member, but I cannot answer the hypothetical question he has answered. He has said he was told a certain man went to get a mortgage and received the reply that he would have to borrow $1,000. I cannot be responsible for what a man is told, by whom, I do not know. All I can say to the hon. member and to the committee is that there are loans of $500. In the past the farm loan board has not desired to make loans smaller than that amount, although I do not know there is any prohibition or any actual fixation of amounts. The hon. member will understand that in the very nature of things the costs of inspection, costs in matters of title, costs for bookkeeping entries and so on, are as high in connection with a small loan as they are on larger loans. A loan of $500 is not so attractive, from the standpoint of administration; nevertheless there are those smaller loans. The hon. member will realize we are now amending the farm loan act and he must not draw conclusions with respect to the manner in which the act should be administered, when the dominion board is solely responsible, from circumstances which arose at a time when there was divided authority through the operation of provincial boards.

Mr. REID: The other day when the matter was under discussion I made some general remarks regarding the application of the act in British Columbia and at that time made some suggestion as to changes which I believed should be made to the act as it affected the farmers in the lower Fraser valley. I rise at this time for two reasons. This afternoon when the minister made reply he omitted replying to one or two of the suggestions I had made, and which I feel are vital to the people in that part of the country. Of course, I am not finding fault.

First of all I should like to deal with some of the statements made by the minister this evening. I do not wish to misquote him, but I gathered from his remarks that he was endeavouring to tell the committee it was the man himself who was viewed as to his ability to pay and as to whether or not he would be a good risk. I cited two cases in my previous speech and I am going to mention another now in an endeavour to show the minister that the man in this case did not enter into it at all.

A man with a $9,000 mortgage on his farm from a loan company was told that if he could put up $4,500 cash they would call it square. He applied to the official in charge at New Westminster, but owing to the regulations of the board he could not come under the farm loan act. I am going to repeat what I said on a previous occasion, because it is very important. In British Columbia it takes between $250 and $400 to clear one acre of stump land. It is probably not worth that much after it is cleared. But is the government going to take the position through the board that after a man by his own labour and capital has cleared it, the total valuation of that acre shall be only $100, and on that total valuation a loan of fifty per cent shall be made? That occurred in the case of the $9,000 loan. The man did not enter into the picture. I am endeavouring to bring to the attention of the minister this fact, that unless some change is made whereby the valuation is raised, the present amendments to the act will be of no material benefit so far as the lower Fraser valley is concerned.

The minister also spoke of the numerous applications that had been made for loans.

I took it upon myself to visit the official a few times to find out how the act was working. I might say I was very much in accord with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act at the time, and told many farmers who had asked me for my opinion of it that I believed it would bring them relief. Well, Mr. Chairman, the official in charge informed me that ninety-eight per cent of the applications made to him before I left for Ottawa should have gone direct to the farm loan board. That is his statement, and when the minister says that he has thousands of cases that have been settled—

Mr. RHODES: No, I said hundreds.

Mr. REID: Well, let us take it at that, hundreds of cases; it will be interesting when we consider the bill to hear how many cases in the lower Fraser valley have been settled. I know the act has been in operation only a short while, and I am not over-critical on that account, but I would urge upon the minister that the peculiar circumstances in the lower Fraser valley should receive some consideration, and amendments should be made to the act to care for the farmers there.

I well remember when such a measure as this was being discussed in the various farmers' institutes in 1927. It was thought desirable at that time to advocate such a measure, and pressure was brought to bear upon the then government to have such a measure introduced in the hope that it would take care of many of the small men, the five or ten acre men. Now it is hopeless for men in that class to obtain a loan from the board. They are told that they are not farmers. I think that situation should be looked into. I discussed this very question at the last session when the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was being put through and the word "farmer" was being defined. But there is not the same definition in the farm loan act, and speaking on behalf of those farmers in the lower Fraser valley I think the minister should consider an amendment so that small holders may be brought under the farm loan act and be able to take advantage of its provisions. I do not think that is an unfair thing to ask, because, as I have pointed out, the conditions there are peculiar to that province. Again I would urge that the valuation be raised, especially in British Columbia. A valuation of $100 is far too low and excludes many farmers.

I dispute the minister's statement that the man himself is considered, and not his assets. In conclusion, I would again ask the minister to consider seriously these aspects of the question which I have raised as affecting the part of the country from which I come.

I was pleased to hear the minister speak about the five per cent stock, and to hear him say they were going to consider giving that back. In a meeting in which this question was discussed prior to my leaving home, when some twenty-five farmers who had loans met together, it seemed to be a very sore point with them that they should have to pay interest on capital which they had never received, and I do hope that some credit will be given to the farmers on that account. I would point out in passing that these men felt it was unjust that they should be asked to pay interest on money on which the board itself had not paid interest; because it will be remembered that for the first few years after the act was introduced, the board received loans of money from the dominion government on which it was not called upon to pay interest. I do hope that before the bill comes down the minister will give his careful consideration to these questions I have raised.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend from New Westminster was good enough to say that he disputed my statement. Of course, he is at liberty to do so, but he is not at liberty, I submit, to attempt to prove he is right by a set of facts that have no bearing whatsoever on the minister's statement. He is dealing with past conditions; I was dealing with the administration of the new farm loan act under the new set-up, and therefore I say that my hon. friend is on ground that is untenable. It will be time enough to dispute my statement after the act has been in operation and it is seen whether it works out in conformity with the statement of the minister.

My hon. friend's first complaint was with respect to valuation. That does not require an amendment to the act at all. It is purely a question of administration.

I told him of the attitude that one should assume with respect to the character of a risk, and I repeat that the moral character of the applicant is of far greater importance than the physical value of his assets in land, buildings and machinery. What I said was that if I were lending money, that was the attribute to which I would attach most importance, and I believe any well regulated farm loan board and any official operating under it would have that in mind. My hon. friend has also complained that the definition of farmer is not wide enough. It is an old maxim that hard cases make bad law, and you cannot make amendments to this act sufficient to allow every man who poses as a farmer of sorts to crawl within its four corners. That would do far more harm than good. There will always be borderline cases even if you embroider the description of farmer. Having said so much, I am not averse to considering a different definition of farmer, if that should be thought desirable. As a matter of fact I am inclined to think that the definition of farmer in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is a better definition, and as at present advised I would not be averse to considering an amendment to the definition when we introduce the bill, if we are permitted to do so during the present session. When we get into committee on the bill I shall be very happy to consider a revision of the definition. The term "farmer" is defined in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act as follows:

"Farmer" means a person whose principal occupation consists in farming or the tillage of the soil.

I think that is a very fair definition and one which on the whole is calculated to do far greater justice to the farmer than if an attempt were made to refine language to the point of including this, that and the other person, and by so doing exclude, under the well known rules of construction this, that and the other person, who might not be specifically designated but who under a general description would be more apt to be designated as a farmer than not.

Mr. POULIOT: Reading the paper to-night, I saw an article signed by Mr. Albert Rioux. I understand he is one of the commissioners appointed under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and the Minister of Finance should remember his appointment. Now, if I am not mistaken the commissioners are acting rather in a judicial capacity.

Mr. RHODES: We are not discussing the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but my hon. friend was speaking about it, and these matters are all connected, so much so that this commissioner under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act writes articles in regard to farm loans. He is a very fine fellow and I wrote him a letter congratulating him on his competence, though it was as to his theoretical competence; I did not go further than that. It seems to me that there is a want of dignity in a man who holds an appointment from this government to act in a judicial capacity to be writing articles in several papers for propaganda in regard to the farm loan business, and I do not know whether he does so under the instructions of the Minister of Finance. Did the hon. gentleman give him authority, after his appointment, to take advantage of his high function to write some propaganda favourable to the government? This I should like to know. I have no objection to his appointment, but I have the greatest objection to his writing articles with political tendencies when he receives a salary from the crown to act in a judicial capacity. The Minister of Finance, who is a lawyer of very high standing, having appeared very often before the bench, will surely admit the soundness of that proposition—I mean mine, not his. As Minister of Finance, as guardian of the exchequer of the country, he will not tolerate for a moment, I am sure, that a man whom he has appointed to act in a judicial capacity should canvass anyone through the press or otherwise on behalf of this government. It is exactly the same as if a judge appeared on the hustings making political speeches. Everyone would object to that, and I object to the practice of this gentleman. I repeat, I do not object to the appointment of Mr. Rioux, though he has very strange views upon certain matters; but I do object strongly to the kind of articles he writes in the press, and there is no reason why that should continue. If he wishes to write articles in the press, let him resign, as my hon. friend from Charlevoix-Saguenay rightly says. He is free to do so, but so long as he holds an appointment with a salary from this government he has no right to use his high function to canvass the people of his province on behalf of this or that party.

May I say to the minister also that even if this gentleman, Mr. Rioux, were writing on behalf of the Liberal party, notwithstanding the fact that he holds his appointment from this government, I would strongly object because it would derogate from the dignity which we expect in a magistrate who has to settle the difficulties that exist between farmers and their creditors.

There is something else. The amount which was supposed to be loaned to the farmers was previously $15,000,000 and now it is $90,000,000, six times as great. Is it because the farmers' position is now six times worse than it was a few years ago? Is it because the farmers have six times less money that we have to lend them six times more than we lent them before? I said a word or two just before adjournment in this connection.

Let me quote again some figures for the information of the Minister of Finance. He is not making a gift to the farmers and he knows it very well, because he said that they would have to refund the money advanced to them. It will not be a gift; it is just a life-buoy that he is throwing out to them until better times come. Last year some figures were submitted to the house—official figures—with regard to the decrease in exports of farm products. Those figures are astounding. The external market has been lost to the farmers of the country. The Prime Minister has said very often, "We have retained our local market; the farmers can trade within the high walls of the tariff which I have erected around this country". Very well; what was the decrease? In home consumption of farm products in one year as compared with another, in the year 1932 compared to the year 1930, we find that it amounts to a loss of over $440,000,000 to the farmers. They have lost money on all their sales, and more than that, they have no market. No one can buy their products, and in my constituency I know some farmers who have hundreds of bushels of good potatoes which they have to sell at fourteen cents a bushel because there is no market. Why have they no market? Because the people have no money. They have not money to pay even fourteen cents a bushel, and if the farmers sell potatoes at that price they get no benefit from it. One farmer told me that if he raised calves in accordance with the instructions given by the departments of agriculture both federal and provincial it would cost him $15 a calf, and he would receive only $5 from the butcher, or a net loss of $10. Is it surprising that the farmers asked for protection? They were promised protection in 1930, when the then leader of the opposition said, "We will protect you, working men and everyone else". What sort of protection did he give them? He gave them an umbrella with bare wires, but that is no protection against rain. And now that the farmers' trade has been destroyed by the insane policy of the government, my hon. friends are giving them a raft on which it is impossible for all the farmers to find a place. That is all there is to it, but in the election I am sure the Tory candidates will say to the people, "Look how generous this government have been: they are lending you money to help you through this awful crisis which is international, and which came upon us in spite of the efforts of the Prime Minister and his wonderful government to save you from despair. Cheers." They know and they judge more fairly than the government can do. They know their own business and they know very well the government cannot do enough for the farmer. What the government should do is to put the farmers on their feet not only by lending them money now but—and this is an obligation on the government—by giving them a chance to trade, by giving them an opportunity to sell their products at a reasonable price. The Minister of Finance knows this very well. Everyone on the other side as well as everyone on this side knows it; everyone in the country knows it. This should have been done, yet it is not done. Why? On account of a lack of courage because Canada has been following a policy which is silly, which has destroyed the free flow of trade, and the government will not change its policy. I know very well if the Minister of Finance were left to himself he would decide differently. He comes from a broad-minded province, a beautiful province on the Atlantic, dear old Nova Scotia, and he knows very well in that dear old province free trade is very popular—free trade with Boston. He knows very well there are lines of steamships between Yarmouth and Boston, Halifax and Boston, Nova Scotia and the United States. Those people want to trade; they are ready to buy from others provided those others buy from them. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance, for whom I have great regard and respect, as he knows, has not the courage to do what he should. Why does he not throw this policy overboard and give an opportunity to the Canadian people, to the farmers, to sell their products, to trade not only within Canada but with the outside world?

Mr. MULLINS: It is not my intention to speak at length on this matter because the farm loan act is quite satisfactory to those of us in western Canada who are not sitting in the opposition. I have had a farm in the west for more than fifty years, and I know something about farming conditions. From where I am standing here I saw, until a few minutes ago, a farmer who sold his crop last year for over $20,000. He was a farmer. I am glad the minister has defined as a farmer a man who lives on the land and works on the land—not an agriculturist. I do not know whether the previous speaker is an agriculturist or a farmer. An agriculturist is one who lives in the city and spends his money out on the farm. I served on three boards in the city of Winnipeg and when we passed on a loan we passed on the ability of the man to pay and on the ability of the farmer to farm. A man who left his threshing machine out all winter with the result that it was in such shape that in the spring he had to pay $72 for repairs would not get a loan. I would like the ex-Minister of Agriculture to listen to this. He made the statement that before he could thresh he had to pay $72 for repairs to his threshing machine. If he left that threshing machine out all winter and it was in such a dilapidated condition as he describes, that is like the situation on some of the farms that I have seen in western Canada; people who will do that sort of thing are not farmers at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The machine was in a sod shed.

Mr. MULLINS: Half of such people are not farmers at all. If I were to serve in an advisory capacity to the minister, unless a man had an implement shed I certainly would not make a loan to him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This machine was in an implement shed.

Mr. MULLINS: I shall not say what I was going to say in regard to Melville and the hon. member's farm. I shall keep that back; at my age, I do not think it is policy for me to say anything personal, because we are both getting along in years and I would not like to say anything derogatory. But there are poorly kept farms in western Canada. If you drive up to the doors of some of the farms you will find the hog pen in the front of the house; they believe in sociability. If you look around you will see the machinery scattered all over the farm. I would say to the minister: No, I would not make a loan to that man under any consideration. One has to be an expert to study and judge a man and to look over his farm as to the weeds and his ability to farm before granting a loan, and I was glad to hear the minister make the statement he did.

We want some relief from the high rate of interest that we have been suffering under in the west. I say this emphatically; I left three boards in the city of Winnipeg for the simple reason that they were extracting eight and nine per cent from the farmers. I told them that their loan was of very little use; that some day they would pay the price, and to-day they have quite a number of those frozen assets on their hands. A moderate rate of interest, five and a half or six per cent, will help the farmers of western Canada, and any true westerner who is not sitting over there merely for the sake of opposing will agree with what I say in that regard. I am sure that there is an honest endeavour on this side of the house to do what is right by the farmer. I will stay with a man when he is right and I will quit him in a minute when he is wrong; so I am in agreement with the purpose of the legislation now before us in regard to the farm loan board.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): Mr. Chairman, at this stage of the discussion on the amendments to the Farm Loan Act, I think it is my duty to add a few remarks. The government, by this resolution, wishes to increase the amount loaned to farmers and to reduce the interest rate. In principle, I certainly do not oppose those amendments, but I think it is a premature step. Has the government taken into consideration the opportunity to answer incessant requests, not only from members of the opposition, but from our financiers, economists, bank managers and, shall I say, from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) himself, who to-day moved this resolution to amend the Farm Loan Act? It is proposed to decrease the rate of interest to 5 per cent, if I am not mistaken. The former rate of interest was 6 or 6½ per cent, but has the reduction in the rate of interest been proportioned to the decrease in the price of agricultural products? To-day, when the farmer is lucky enough to sell his products, he gets 50 per cent of what he was receiving 5 or 6 years ago. The rate of interest should be proportioned to the prices he obtains for the sale of his products. If the government wanted to be really obliging to the farmers, he should offer them money at 3 or 3½ per cent, and that would be more in proportion to the profit which the farmer gets from the sale of his products.

On the other hand, the amount made available to the farmers is raised from 70 to 90 millions of dollars. But have you considered that the sum thus made available will have to be paid back? How is the farmer going to pay this money back? He will have to raise this money on his property and pay back capital and interest sooner or later. If, in the meantime, the government follows the policies to which it adhered these last few years, in what condition will the farming community be in five years,—assuming that the present government is still in power, though I hope they will not be. The farmer will neither be in a position to refund the capital, nor to pay the interest. And, on this point, Mr. Chairman, I will direct my remarks.

I read with a great deal of attention the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance before the Young Men's Canadian Club, on December 29 last. According to the French report, here is what the minister said:

> ... although international trade was still stagnant, Canada's foreign trade for the year just ended had amounted to $1,150,000,000.

I infer from the minister's statement that he considers there is enough trade to sell our products in Canada. The hon. minister did not see fit, on that occasion, to draw the attention of his hearers upon the fact that a loan to the farmers would help them greatly and would enable them to face the depression and to overcome the difficulties in which they are now. The hon. minister says that international trade is stagnant. Yes, trade is stagnant. And why? Because foreign markets are not open and do not allow us to sell our products.

The hon. Minister of Finance is not the only one to hold that opinion. I am going to quote the statement made by the general manager of the Bank of Montreal, at the 117th annual meeting of that financial institution, the most important in Canada:

> The bank deposits could easily finance a much larger amount of business. Until the tendency toward restrictive legislation on business is more clearly defined, and until the uncertainties in connection with international relations have disappeared, business will improve somewhat slowly.

It would seem as if the hon. Minister of Finance and the general manager of the Bank of Montreal had consulted each other to fix a very short delay and that they both have the same idea about the present condition of the country, namely, that "international trade is stagnant and that business will improve somewhat slowly," so long as there will be no markets.

That leads me to say, Mr. Speaker, that before proposing to lend money to the farmers at a low rate of interest and making them believe that they are waiting for them with open arms and that they are ready to help them, the government ought to increase the purchasing power of the people. In the second place, the government, through the medium always expressed in this house and elsewhere, ought to give some work to the people, that is to the industrial workers, in order that they may earn, and thereby have a purchasing power that would facilitate the sale of farm products at more remunerative prices than at present.

Furthermore, we must increase the purchasing power of the farmers themselves, by providing them with the means of selling their products at higher prices.

How, I repeat, will the farmer be able to meet his obligations and pay his interest charges so long as he remains in the situation where he finds himself to-day? Before offering loans to the farmers, we should seek to restore his income.

Figures are not always pleasant to listen to, but it is absolutely necessary to place figures before the people of this country in order to show that we are to-day in an abnormal situation by reason of the policies heretofore followed by this government in bringing down measures unsuited to the present state of affairs and neglecting more suitable ones which should be introduced immediately. As I have just said, in order to bring back a normal situation, it will be necessary to increase the purchasing power of the people employed in our factories. In 1929, the working class of Canada drew $813,000,000 in salaries and wages; to-day they draw only $500,000,000. If this difference of $313,000,000 returned to circulation, retail trade would benefit, the farmer would sell more of his products and there would be less privation in the homes.

How is this working class to find revenue and how is the purchasing power of the people to be increased?

We must find markets abroad. It has often been said, and it is still often said, that the Ottawa agreements have been a great improvement. I am not prepared to say they have not improved the situation, but have they brought it back to normal? If we look at the situation with respect to our trade with foreign countries, that is to say with countries outside the British Empire, we readily see that, in spite of the improvement due to the Ottawa agreements, our world trade is not fifty per cent of what it was in 1929, when conditions were normal and world markets were open to us. At that time, the sale of farm products was more profitable; farmers were in a poistion to meet their obligations and the government of that day would not have thought for one moment of offering them loans.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that, even supposing that these loans will be very useful to a number of our farmers, only those farmers who own land of a certain value will be in a position to benefit thereby. Half of our population are farmers. Has the minister made a survey of those who might be able to take advantage of that act? I think not half of our farmers will. Then the act will be of any assistance to only fifty per cent of the people who are supposed to be benefited under the act. Farmers having lands of exceptional value will benefit, but the government will say to the less fortunate that their application will not be considered and those farmers will derive no benefit from this act. But we ought to be able to assist the great majority of them.

We must accept the principle of this bill, but I think the Minister of Finance might have suggested to the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet the necessity of bringing down a bill which would have changed the present situation by opening markets abroad, so that our farmers could sell their products at better prices, and be in a position to meet their obligations, and repay principal as well as interest on the loans they are now offered by the government.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is just a word that I should like to leave with the minister for his consideration. First let me refer to the point that was touched upon by the hon. member for New Westminster, namely the question of small farms. The part of the country which I represent contains a number of these. I think there should be provision, either in the regulations or by a change in the bill, by which an applicant making application for a small loan on a small farm should have to pay less for appraisal and expenses than would be charged on a larger loan.

As to the question of anticipated payment, I take it that that is practically covered by the act is it stands. If it is not, I ask the minister to leave no doubt with regard to the right of the mortgagor to pay off the principal without notice and without bonus at any time.

Then as a final word at this stage—because I expect to have an opportunity of saying something on the second reading—I suggest that the act be amended where it now provides for long term loans. I believe that better rates can be obtained for short term loans. If I read the act correctly the only power given as it now stands is to lend for long terms. I suggest that serious consideration be given to revising that clause so that short term loans may be provided for. I might say that in the mortgages I have drawn, and I have drawn a good many in my time, five years was the usual term, and they all contained the proviso that any amount of principal could be paid off on interest dates. That is a wise provision and I hope the minister will see that such a provision is contained in this bill.

There is no doubt about the fact that you cannot lend money to everyone who wants it, or in the amounts that may be requested. I quite agree that the character of the applicant is many times more important than the security on which the mortgage is placed. But I again urge the minister to have some provision in the mortgage that whatever interest is charged above four per cent, if any, shall be forgiven provided payment is made promptly. I do not think you can insert a provision for penalty for not paying promptly, but if payments are made as they fall due there will be little if any loss to the country by lending to reliable parties at four per cent.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend will appreciate that I would not wish to assume the responsibility of stopping the passage of this resolution now; therefore I shall reply to what he has said in committee of the whole.

Resolution reported, read the first and second times and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Rhodes the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, February 6, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

BULLION TAX—PROCEEDS

Mr. CAMPBELL:

What is the amount of revenue received from the bullion tax levied on the gold producers in each of the provinces each month since the tax was put into effect?

Mr. RHODES:

Date	Ontario	Quebec	British Columbia
1934—	$	$	$
April	96,035 56	14,661 57	—
May	536,130 08	38,936 77	21,147 66

	4,867,702 35	733,974 57	282,034 28

The above totals are subject to adjustment in respect of income tax.

LA BAIE DES HA! HA! QUE., HARBOUR MASTER

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. Who was the first harbour master of the harbour of la Baie des Ha! Ha! county of Chicoutimi?
2. On what date was he appointed?
3. On what date was he dismissed and for what reason?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. James W. Foster.
2. August 31, 1921.
3. He was not dismissed. On April 9, 1925, he tendered his resignation and it was accepted.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE PATROL BOAT

Mr. DUFF:

1. Were tenders called for by the government in 1934 or 1935 for a patrol boat for the R.C.M. Police?
2. If so, to whom was the contract awarded and at what price?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. Yes.

In 1934.—(a) Patrol boat Acadian. Contract awarded to W. C. McKay & Sons Ltd. Shelburne, N.S., $6,148.

(b) Birmal boat Advance—Contract awarded to the Crude Oil Engine and Engineering Co., Montreal, who hold the Canadian licence from the Birmal Boat Company, England, for building this type of boat. Boat built by the Canadian Vickers, Montreal, P.Q., $4,950.

In 1935.—Improved Acadian type (now building)—60 foot. Contract first awarded to Wm. Heisler, Indian Point, N.S., the lowest tenderer, but as he could not fulfil the terms of the contract, it was then awarded to the Shelburne Shipbuilders, Shelburne, N.S., the next lowest tenderers. Price $12,720, including sales tax.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. How many miles of the trans-Canada highway remain: (a) unconstructed; (b) partially constructed?
2. Of such, how many miles remain to be completed: (a) in Ontario; (b) in British Columbia?
3. What is the total estimated cost of completing the trans-Canada highway?
4. Of such total cost, what is the estimated cost in: (a) Ontario; (b) British Columbia?

BUTTER IMPORTS FROM NEW ZEALAND AND AUSTRALIA

Mr. MULOCK:

1. What were the quantities of butter imported into Canada during the years 1931 to 1934, inclusive, from (a) New Zealand; (b) Australia?
2. What were the prices of the butter each month during the above mentioned years at the Canadian port of entry?
3. What were the duties, dumping penalty, or other taxation imposed per pound each month during the above period?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

BUILDING OF NEW ARMOURY IN MONTREAL

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Has the federal government made an offer to the city of Montreal for the construction of an armoury in Baldwin park in the east end of that city?
2. If so, when was such offer made, through whom, and was it accepted?
3. Was the offer made subject to conditions?
4. If so, what are the conditions?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NOTRE-DAME DE L'ISLE-VERTE, QUE.—WHARF ROAD

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of correspondence, reports, deeds, plans, sketches, relating to the building of a fence by the Department of Public Works last year, on the property of Mr. Dionne, on a road leading to the wharf at Notre-Dame de l'Isle-Verte, Quebec.

INVITATION TO THE U.S.S.R. TO ENTER LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of the telegram addressed on or about the 15th September, 1934, by Canada and several other countries to the U.S.S.R. inviting it to enter the League of Nations, and of the signatures which were affixed to it.

RIVIÈRE-DU-LOUP, QUE.—WHARF

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, reports, plans, concerning the extension to the wharf of Rivière-du-Loup, Quebec, since 1931.

PUBLIC WORKS, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. MICHAUD:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents, exchanged between the dominion government or any member or any department thereof and all other persons relating to the following items of schedule "A," chapter 59, 24-25 George V, the Public Works Construction Act: Item 19, Campbellton, New Brunswick, wharf repairs; item 32, Dalhousie, New Brunswick, post office; item 41, Escuminac, New Brunswick, breakwater extension; item 49, Fredericton experimental farm, New Brunswick, new dormitory; item 75, harbours and rivers (New Brunswick only); item 98, Moncton, New Brunswick, public building.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman who makes the motion is not in the house. I wish to speak to him in regard to certain requirements.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

BEAM TRAWLERS

PROPOSAL THAT PERMITS BE NOT GRANTED OR RENEWED IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in the interests of the fishermen of Nova Scotia, no permits should be granted or renewed with those who own and operate beam trawlers in the province of Nova Scotia.

He said: Mr. Speaker, although I am deeply interested in the subject matter of the motion standing in my name I do not know whether it would be parliamentary for me to proceed with it at the present time, because of the fact that it has been given very close attention by the committee on price spreads and mass buying, and on account of the fact that the question is somewhat controversial. All I desire is to have the question brought to the attention of the select standing committee on marine and fisheries, where I and every other hon. member will have the opportunity to discuss it fully and frankly.

Those of us who have given some thought and study to the historical background of the Canadian confederation realize that at the preliminary meeting held at Charlottetown in 1864, when the province of Nova Scotia was asked to join the Canadian union it was made a sine qua non by Sir John A. Macdonald that the control of the fisheries of the province should be vested in the central or federal power. That may or may not be generally known by hon. members, but it is a fact.

That was strenuously opposed by Sir Charles Tupper of Cumberland, who did not desire to have the control of what was then, and what still can be made, one of our most important industries vested in the federal power. Sir John A. Macdonald, however, with his prophetic vision, saw the possibility of a Canadian union. He looked ahead to the time when British Columbia would enter confederation; he knew, as we all know, that in dealing with the problems pertaining to the fisheries of British Columbia and Nova Scotia there would be divergent interests, and he considered it prudent, in a national sense, that the fisheries should be controlled by the central power. Eventually Sir Charles Tupper agreed with him and after the consummation of confederation the control of our fisheries was vested in the central power.

I realize that this is a controversial resolution; I realize that there are Conservatives and Liberals who will oppose it, but the fact is that so far as the fishermen of the island of Cape Breton are concerned their condition is worse than that of the industrial population of any other part of Canada. I make that statement advisedly, because I know whereof I speak. Only a few months before I went to the hospital I was in the county so ably represented by my tolerant friend from Richmond-West Cape Breton, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), which was represented many years ago by my grandfather, first as provincial secretary in the legislature and later, after confederation, in the federal House of Commons. I found that in one district, where the people depend entirely upon the fisheries industry for the maintenance of life, there was dire distress on every hand. We hear a good deal about the right of workingmen to a living wage, but the most fundamental right of all is the right to live. I found that in that district they were not able to support a school, because the company that has control over these beam trawlers in the province of Nova Scotia has a monopoly. We might as well be fair and frank about it; they have a monopoly of the fishing industry in the province of Nova Scotia. There may be those who are spineless enough to disagree with me, but I think whatever may be said of me when I quit public life it will be agreed that I always had the spunk to say what I thought, whether a Conservative liked it or a Liberal liked it. To-day the fact is that we have a monopoly of the fishing industry of the province of Nova Scotia, and a United States controlled monopoly at that. These people dictate the prices of fish to the shore fishermen, when they can sell their fish, and in many cases they cannot sell it at all. Along the shores of the county so ably represented by my hon. friend from Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Johnstone) last summer the price of hake was 35 cents a hundred pounds. I would be casting pearls before swine to talk about fish in this part of the country, but I can tell hon. members that you cannot get anything better to eat than hake. The fishermen go out at three o'clock in the morning and bring back two hundred pounds of hake, for which they do not receive enough to pay for the gasoline for their motor boat. That is a fact, and the same condition exists all along the coast of Inverness and Richmond. The very essence of a monopoly is the power to fix prices, and in Nova Scotia that power is vested in a United States controlled corporation.

I say there is an obligation on the part of this government to take some action. Something was done by the previous government; in 1927 a commission was appointed, consisting of eminent men, to investigate the fishing industry of the maritime provinces. I believe they went into this question fairly, dispassionately and without prejudice of any kind, and four of the five members of that commission agreed that the beam trawler should be abolished. Even Judge Maclean, although he dissented from the view of his colleagues, did not do so very strongly. It was proposed by the then government that a duty should be levied on beam trawler caught fish landed in Canadian waters, and that was done. Unfortunately it was by order in council, and that order in council ultimately was held by the courts to be ultra vires.

As a private member it is not open to me to move that a duty be imposed on beam trawler caught fish; everyone familiar with the rules of this house knows it is not competent for a private member to do so, but I would point out that after this commission heard evidence in different important fishing centres of the maritime provinces their findings were endorsed by Liberals, Conservatives, Progressives, Labour men, and everyone else. On consulting the record I find that petitions were presented to the commission, urging the abolition of beam trawlers, from many communities in both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I know this is a controversial question, and I want to say frankly that I am not a socialist. I do not believe in the confiscation of private property. The fishermen of the maritime provinces believe to-day that by curtailing for a time the operations of the trawlers they would derive great benefit, and I believe it is the duty of the government to make arrangements with the beam trawler owners whereby operations of those boats may be suspended for two years. Give the shore fishermen of the maritimes a chance to live; that is all they are asking. They are not looking for doles, but are anxious and willing to work. They have a product which is needed right here in the city of Ottawa, in Toronto and in Montreal, one which is not produced on a competitive basis, as is coal, or some other commodities. If they are given any chance to make a living I will say that those fishermen in the maritimes will not want doles, or anything else. They are looking to this government, just as they have looked to previous governments for the right to live. I agree with what the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) said only a few nights ago, namely, that never since the maritimes entered the Canadian union have the interests of the fishermen been considered, whether by a Liberal or a Conservative government. There has never been a proper appreciation of the importance of the industry to the people of Nova Scotia. The time has come when we should consider earnestly the measures to be taken to give these people a chance to live.

In my observations I do not wish to be provocative because I know there are those who will oppose the resolution. However if they become too strenuous in their opposition I shall reserve my right to reply. May I say frankly I am not looking for votes but have spoken in all good faith. I have no interest whatever in the fishing companies of the province of Nova Scotia, but I have a very keen interest in the fishing hamlets of that province. I say the population in those hamlets has in the past forty years been reduced by 47 per cent. It is time something was done by those under whose control the fishing industry was placed when the maritimes became part of the Canadian union. They should try to do something to see that these people are given their rights, and the right not only to work but to live. They can earn a profitable living if they are given the proper encouragement and opportunity, and if they have a chance to sell their fish.

I submit the house should consider carefully this question relating to the licensing of beam trawlers, and I would urge that the fishermen of that province can earn their own living without the dole or any other assistance if they are given the opportunities they were promised when in good faith the province of Nova Scotia entered the union.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, with very much that the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) has said I am in accord. His resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in the interests of the fishermen of Nova Scotia, no permits should be granted or renewed with those who own and operate beam trawlers in the province of Nova Scotia.

The matter of licensing or permitting trawlers equipped with what has been known either as a beam or an otter trawler is one about which there has been a great deal of controversy during the last few years. To-day however it seems to me that there is not so much reason as there has been in the past to fear this method of fishing.

In the beginning may I make my position clear. For some forty years I have consistently and without change opposed the method of catching fish by what is known as either a beam or an otter trawl. I have never changed that view, and my reason for opposing such methods has been that because of the operation of these trawlers a great deal of fishing gear belonging to ordinary deep sea fishermen has been destroyed, and in my view the feeding grounds of the fish have been harmed because the beam trawl runs along the bottom of the ocean. Then, in the operation of the trawls large quantities of small fish are either caught and brought to land to be used in the fertilizer plants or are thrown overboard after having been picked out from among the larger fish on board the trawler. Most of those fish are dead when they are thrown into the sea. Then of course there is the interference with the market of the offshore and inshore fishermen.

However, as I said a moment ago, I believe that at this time we have not as much cause for worry as we had a number of years ago. In his motion the hon. member asks the government not to renew licences to those who own and operate beam trawlers. I do not wish to criticize the manner in which he has put his motion, but I would remind him that there is no such thing as a beam trawler now being licensed by the federal government. I agree with him that when speaking about these vessels he no doubt had in mind the fact that the ordinary term used is the term "beam trawlers"; but they are not beam trawlers, they are what are known as "otter trawlers".

In order to clear the situation perhaps I may be permitted to give the history of this particular way of catching fish. I do so because there has been a good deal of talk among people generally and a great amount of worry among the fishermen regarding this method of catching fish.

As far back as 1839 the first vessels were equipped with what are known as beam trawls. These vessels operated in the North sea and adjacent to England and France. An arrangement was arrived at between the French and English governments whereby these vessels could fish only under certain regulations. At that time only sailing vessels were used to carry on this particular type of fishing. The beam trawl consisted of a large net at the mouth of which was a beam about forty feet long. As I said a moment ago, in those days only sailing vessels were used, and had not the beam been used it would have been impossible to keep the mouth of the net open to catch the fish.

Later, I believe in the year 1880, the fishermen of England and Scotland decided to improve the method of fishing, and as a result a man named Otter devised what is known as the otter trawl. That is the trawl now used by the steam vessels or trawlers running out of Nova Scotia and licensed by this government. The otter trawl still has the bag to catch the fish, but instead of having the beam or long piece of wood to keep the mouth of the trawl open it has two boards, and as the steamer steams ahead these boards keep the mouth of the trawl open so that the fish may come in. Although the hon. member mentions beam trawlers in his resolution I am sure he means the method of trawling adopted by certain vessels now licensed by the federal government.

Mr MACDOUGALL: It is a synonymous term.

Mr. DUFF: Fishing by this method has been developed to a great extent not only in Great Britain but in a number of foreign countries. The ships which fished in the first instance in the North sea have not confined their operations to those particular waters. After a few years fishing became so intensive that they were compelled to go further afield in order to get catches. These vessels now under the British flag, the Portuguese flag and the flags of other countries not only go as far as Iceland, but also come over on the grand banks of Newfoundland and other banks where our Nova Scotia sailing vessels operate during the spring and summer season. To show you, sir, the extent of the fisheries in those foreign countries, may I say to you that at present there are 1,229 large steam and motor trawlers operating out of England or under English registry; 347 from Scottish ports; 154 from Irish ports, 236 from Holland; 17 from Portugal; about 250 from France; 50 from Belgium; 1 from Denmark; 335 from Germany; and 184 from Sweden, making a total of 2,976 steam and motor trawlers. So you will see, Mr. Speaker, that in those countries this method of fishing is carried on to a very appreciable extent.

Now on this side of the water this method of catching fish by beam or otter trawl only started in 1905. During the years from 1905 down to the present, certain vessels have been operating, and they were first chartered by three or four companies in the province of Nova Scotia, being vessels owned in the old country which were operated here in the early spring and then returned to their English owners some time in the fall.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question, for information? Do any of these foreign trawlers come to our shores?

Mr. DUFF: In reply to the Prime Minister I may say that they only come to our shores for supplies. I think my hon friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) and my hon. friend from Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Johnstone) will agree with me when I say that when these vessels come to Sydney or North Sydney for coal supplies or salt they leave a good deal of money in these places, but of course, as the Prime Minister knows, these vessels can only fish in international waters, and the only effect which these trawlers have on the Canadian fishing industry is that they destroy the gear of the ordinary fishing vessel anchored on the banks, because these trawlers operate by night as well as by day and cannot see where our vessels have their trawls moored; and they also help to destroy the feeding grounds where the fish come to the banks and where our fishermen go to secure their catch.

As I said a moment ago, in 1905 both Canada and the United States decided to adopt to a certain extent this particular method of fishing, and only last year there were 115 of these trawlers operating out of Portland and 49 out of Boston.

Our position to-day, I might say to my hon. friend from Inverness, is rather an enviable one. I want to say again that I have always opposed this method of fishing, and if I had my way there would be no trawlers operating from the province of Nova Scotia; but still, as my hon. friend from Inverness admitted in the last of his remarks, if something were done to prevent these trawlers from getting a licence, their owners should be compensated for the money they have invested in the industry. I agree with him as far as that goes.

For several years, as I have said, trawlers were brought from the old country and operated by Canadian firms. Several delegations came to Ottawa to interview previous governments in the matter. A delegation came to the Conservative government, I think in 1920, came from the county in which I live; and about three years ago another delegation came here protesting against the use of this method of catching fish. But if we look at the statistics, Mr. Speaker, we find that although there were some twelve trawlers in operation in 1908 and up to about 1930, there are now only two operating. Four licences were granted last year, but only two of these trawlers are operating.

Mr. SHORT: Three licences were granted last year.

Mr. DUFF: Three licences were granted last year, but only two trawlers are operating. The reason for that in my opinion is that the people of Nova Scotia have endeavoured in the last two years to look after this danger in their own way. I remember discussing this matter with a good many people. My hon. friend from Inverness said that he was not interested in the political aspects of the thing, nor did he have any money invested in the industry. I am interested and am looking after both aspects, because to a small degree I have a financial interest in the industry in the province of Nova Scotia. In discussing this method of catching fish by beam trawler with the people with whom I am interested, I used the argument that was adduced by the hon. member for Inverness. I said that the people in these various countries had invested their money in foreign trawlers from Great Britain, Portugal and other places that came to the banks adjacent to Nova Scotia to catch fish, and I said that as long as people from these other countries could use their trawlers there for catching fish there was not much use in trying by restrictive methods of this parliament to refuse licences to two or three trawlers owned or operated by Canadians as far as deep sea fishing is concerned. I suggested another method of control, and I think that method has borne fruit; I believe my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis will agree with me in that. He knows that previous to the year 1929, the deep sea fishing fleet of Nova Scotia was operated by sail only. The vessels left home in the middle of March and fished, most of them, until about the first of October. They did try to fish during the winter months when there is a big market for fresh haddock and fresh cod, but travelling by sail alone, when they gave up the salt fishing about the first of October, they found that the winter fishing for fresh fish did not work out very well because in stormy weather, if they did not get back to port a short time after catching their fish, the fish would not arrive in very good condition. But due to the co-operative methods that were adopted, and adopted voluntarily by a certain class of people in the province of Nova Scotia, and particularly in the county in which I live, these people decided that if they were to carry on the fresh fish business and compete with the trawlers they would have to put diesel engines in their vessels so that they could go out on the banks and get back to port with their catch as quickly as possible. The result has been that in the province of Nova Scotia we have built up a splendid fleet of fishing vessels of a particular type manned by the hardy fishermen of Nova Scotia, than whom there are none better in the world for deep sea or off-shore fishing.

I hold in my hand an article from the Canadian Fisherman, which gives a picture of one of the latest models of sailing and diesel powered fishing vessels. This vessel was built in my own town last year, and equipped with a 300 horsepower engine. To indicate to you, Mr. Speaker, the cooperative methods that we follow in Nova Scotia you will perhaps not think me egotistical or boastful when I say that I own one sixty-fourth of this vessel in which I have a five hundred dollar interest. That is the way we carry on our operations in the part of the province from which I come. To-day there are some twenty-three vessels equipped with diesel engines and they can take their place practically with these otter trawlers, which fish in a different way. As you no doubt know, Mr. Speaker, these sail and diesel engine trawlers do not operate the beam trawl but the line trawl. It is true, and I agree with my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short), that under certain weather conditions the fishermen on the sail and diesel engine trawlers cannot fish in the same way as the otter trawler can. But knowing the fishermen of Nova Scotia as he does, knowing the men on these vessels that sell goods to his own firm, he will agree I think that it is but seldom that the fishermen on these vessels cannot go and catch cod just as the fishermen on the otter trawlers can.

In view of that fact I do not think the danger is so serious as we are sometimes led to believe. In my opinion, the people who own the two or three otter trawlers will not buy new ones if anything should happen to those they now own, because at the moment these twenty-three diesel boats can bring in all the fish and more than all the fish which the Canadian people are consuming or will consume for a number of years.

We did make an attempt in this parliament to regulate this method of fishing. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis, the then hon. member for Cape Breton South, Mr. MacDonald, a gentleman who is now in the other chamber, and I, were a subcommittee of the marine and fisheries committee in 1929 to deal with this very matter. There was an agitation at that time to have beam trawling discontinued and we met and submitted certain recommendations. These recommendations were embodied in a bill now known as chapter 42, an act to amend the Fisheries Act, which was passed on June 14, 1929. As a believer in freedom, I could not see my way at that time to recommend to the Minister of Marine that we should lay down the principle that these vessels should not operate at all, but we did make certain recommendations. What are they? Subsection 4 of section 69 reads:

> (4) The minister may determine the number of such vessels that shall be eligible to be licensed.
> (5) Regulations may be made under the provisions of section forty-six of this act,—
> (a) prescribing the form of licence;
> (b) specifying the evidence to be submitted with an application for a licence;
> (c) fixing the conditions under which a licence shall be issued;
> (d) making any other provisions respecting licences.

In these suggestions, which were afterwards put into law, I think we went a great way, because I felt, as I think my colleagues on that subcommittee felt, that if the Department of Fisheries were of the opinion that more fish were being caught by these otter trawlers than should be caught, and that if their operations were a detriment either to the deep sea fishermen or to the inshore fishermen operating in smaller boats than those I have mentioned, and that these people would be materially affected to their disadvantage, the department would have power either the next year or at any time to restrict or prohibit the granting of licences. In other words, under this act they could grant one licence or several licences or none at all, and the fact remains that since that time in 1929 the department has granted very few licences to otter trawlers.

I say therefore that although I am strongly opposed to the method of fishing in this way I do believe that the people of Nova Scotia, perhaps with some help from this parliament in the way of bounties on fish, or in the way of loans to shipbuilders or owners of vessels or those wanting to build ships, as I suggested in my speech on Monday, could build up a sufficient fleet, either a deep sea fleet or shore fleet to operate off the coast of Inverness or off Cape Breton or Guysborough or Halifax or Lunenburg or as far west as Yarmouth, and that in a very short time the owners of these beam trawlers would realize that the cod fish caught by these vessels operated by sail and diesel power are much superior to those caught by the otter trawler with the net dragging along the bottom of the ocean for three or four hours. The fish caught in that way are not equal to those caught by the other method.

I am opposed to the otter trawler method of fishing, but I do not think we have anything to worry about. One reason why the people who operate these boats wish to have them continued is the consideration of continuity of supply. There is something in that argument—not a great deal but something, or there was a few years ago. With the type of vessels which Nova Scotians are building to-day, the high powered vessel of three hundred horsepower, equipped with diesel engines that can operate in almost any weather; with the cold storage plant which my hon. friend's company has at Halifax; with the plant taken over by this government a short time ago; with the splendid cold storage plant in Lunenburg and the cold storage plants at Liverpool, Shelburne and Yarmouth, there is no danger so far as continuity of supply is concerned. Indeed, the trouble is that we can catch more fish than the market will absorb, so far as fresh fish is concerned, and I do not think we need fear very much the one or two otter trawlers now licensed. I know from my own experience that these vessels have never paid. The sailing vessels and the diesel operated boats, except on rare occasions, have paid a fair dividend, and they are more economically operated than the otter trawlers. Personally I do not see much danger. However, I will say this to my hon. friend. If he would like to have the matter discussed, if he or any other member of the fisheries committee thinks that there is danger to the fishermen of Nova Scotia, I do not think I need assure him that my interests have been and are both financially and politically with the boat fishermen of that province, whether they are the deep sea or inshore fishermen, and I desire that they get the greater consideration.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I presume that most hon. members will think me ill-advised if I attempt to controvert the arguments brought forward by hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject. Be that as it may, and though my county is not a fishing county, except in regard to two branches of the industry, lobster fishing and winter smelt fishing, it appears to me that we might as well go back to the days of the spinning wheel and destroy all the power looms and resort to the old method of pioneer days as to refuse to make progress by modern methods of fishing. The world does move and we have to move with it.

The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) referred to the effect of the trawlers in British waters. May I remind him that a British commission investigated that whole question some years ago. My reading is not that their fishing grounds were depleted but that they were improved by the action of the trawlers. The statement that they were depleted by the trawlers is not correct. My hon. friend who represents Antigonish-Guysborough shakes his head, but that is the fact. It had been found that the trawler stirs up the bottom of the ocean and that due to this an additional quantity of fish food is made available.

Another fact of some importance is this: there have been operating for years on the coast of Nova Scotia forty, fifty or sixty French trawlers. What is the use of talking about curtailing or stopping our own trawlers when we are powerless to deal with foreign trawlers operating within three miles of our coast? Those foreign trawlers are protected by a French government gunboat which comes out in the beginning of the season and remains with them until they return home in the latter part of September.

Mr. DUFF: And a hospital ship.

Mr. CANTLEY: Yes, quite so. These foreign trawlers have three seasons: one in the bay of Biscay; one on the east maritime coast of Canada, and one in the north sea off the coast of Norway. They are thus occupied practically the entire year.

There is still another fact of some importance, that of our coal used in bunkering. These French trawlers take practically forty thousand tons of Nova Scotia coal each season. I remember one boat coming in to the Scotia coal docks at North Sydney on a Wednesday to replenish its bunkers. I said to the captain: "Are you nearly full?" He replied, "Yes; I will be back on Saturday with my cargo completed and I will fill up my bunkers to take me home." On Saturday morning he came back completely filled up with fish, and after filling up his bunkers he went home. In view of these facts, what is the use of attempting to control the most efficient method we have to-day of fishing? In my judgment what we want to do is this. The difficulty of my hon. friend who moved the resolution is that his people are poor fishermen. I do not want to say this in a deprecating way, but the fact is that their boats are not efficient or well constructed. In my judgment perhaps the best thing the government could do for the fishing industry in Nova Scotia would be to subsidize or otherwise aid in the building of a fleet of forty or fifty so-called baby trawlers of about sixty or seventy tons, equipped with diesel engines, and give them to the fishermen of Nova Scotia on delayed terms of payment. I commend that to the consideration of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, the hon. member for Inverness, and the government as well.

I shall, I know, be followed by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) whom we all regard as an authority on the fresh fish business of this country, which I am not. As I stated at the outset I cannot see the advantage of opposing improved conditions whether they be in the fishing industry, the iron and steel industry or in any other in this country, and I believe the best thing this government can do for the fishing industry in my province is to proceed along the lines I have indicated and help them to get efficient fishing boats, well equipped for carrying on their business in the most effective way.

Mr. H. B. SHORT (Digby-Annapolis): This trawler question is one that has been before the house a number of times When it was last discussed on July 15, 1931, I thought it would be practically settled for some time because the government at that time announced their policy in connection with it. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), who was then Minister of Fisheries, made this statement as reported in Hansard of July 15, 1931, page 3790:

> I am satisfied, and I wish to state very clearly that I accept it as beyond reasonable doubt at least, that if we are to enlarge our production of fish in Canada to cover this market, and to supply large quantities to the United States, we must have the trawler as an adjunct to our industry in order to take up the slack of which I have spoken.

That was the policy of the government in July, 1931, and I do not think it has changed since. As the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) stated, a recommendation was made by the fisheries committee to the last parliament in June, 1929, that the matter of licensing these trawlers be left to the discretion of the Minister of Fisheries. At that time they decided that six trawlers were necessary to give us a sufficient supply of fish for our Canadian market. Since then the number has been reduced. Two years ago four licences were issued; last year there were only three and part of the time only two of those three trawlers were fishing. It is ridiculous to think this country is going to prohibit the use of trawlers when the country to the south of us have 115 large and 137 medium ones and their medium ones are about the class of the three that are fishing in this country. They fish practically the same grounds as we do and we are not allowed to fish with three, as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough stated. As to the number of trawlers that other countries are using, I have the same figures as my hon. friend has given so I will not repeat them. But during the summer months and late into the fall we have on our grounds some forty to fifty French trawlers three times the size of the ones that we use and they are allowed to fish on the same ground that we do. We cannot prevent them because the ground is international Moreover, they can come in and fish within three miles of the shore while there is a restriction on Canadian trawlers that they cannot fish within twelve miles of the shore.

I presume the only reason why this matter is being brought up again is that it is suggested that the trawling companies have a monopoly of the fishing industry of this country. The hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) made that statement to-day. The trawling companies have no monopoly whatever of our fishing industry; there are many other large concerns besides them. The Maritime National Fish Company is the only company operating trawlers in Nova Scotia but there are many other large concerns operating there as well. The total catch of fish during the season 1933-34 was 212,000,000 pounds and the Maritime National Fish Company handled 32,000,000 pounds. Is that a monopoly? My hon. friend speaks about this interfering with their fishing in Cape Breton. It does not do so in any way, shape or form. The island of Cape Breton could not in the winter time supply the markets of this country if they had them all to themselves. They have not the fish there at this season. They are now bringing in fresh cod from Newfoundland; these are coming into the island of Cape Breton right along. Only last week 55,000 pounds of fresh cod were brought in to North Sydney, Cape Breton, processed and shipped from there to other parts of Canada. That interferes with the markets much more than the trawler The company that operates trawlers never would have gone into the trawler business if they could have secured sufficient supplies from the boats and sailing vessels, because catching fish by trawler is a more expensive operation than catching them by vessel or hand line boat. That was proven in 1931 I think it was, when a conference was held by the department with the vessel owners and boat fishermen and those interested in the trawlers; it was shown that trawler-caught fish cost considerably more. We had no market for our fresh fish in this country prior to 1910 when the first trawler was operated in the fresh fish business. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough speaks of trawlers coming in in 1905, but they were brought here by a salt fish concern, Robin, Jones and Whitman of Halifax and Gaspé; I think they were the first who brought an English trawler out. I do not know just the date, but a company in which I was interested afterwards bought that trawler in 1910. We bought it because we found we could not get from the boat fishermen a continuous supply of fish for the markets of the west. Prior to 1910 our fish markets in Montreal, Toronto, and the large centres in Canada were supplied from Boston, Gloucester and other United States fishing centres; not a carload of fresh fish came from the maritime provinces, because we could not supply the markets with fish on the days they required it. In the old days Friday was the only day in the week on which people ate fresh fish, and if you could not get your fish there for the Friday market it was a loss. They tried to get the producers in the maritimes to supply them, but sometimes they missed getting them there for the Friday and the dealers said, "We cannot depend upon you"; the result was they got their supplies from the United States.

Furthermore, that company is the largest purchaser of fish from the boat fishermen. The trawlers do not begin to catch all the fish they sell. I have figures here that were supplied to me the other day, showing the purchases of fish by this octopus of which the hon. gentleman speaks, this great American concern that monopolizes the fishing industry of Nova Scotia. During the year from April 1, 1933, to March 31, 1934, they purchased from the trawlers 18,617,000 pounds and they bought from the hook and line fishermen 14,365,000 pounds. That is, they purchased outside nearly as much fish as they caught themselves. For the nine months ended December 1, 1934, they purchased from the trawlers 11,984,000 pounds and purchased from the hook and line fishermen 14,242,000 pounds; that is they purchased from outside fishermen nearly 3,000,000 pounds more than they caught themselves. Therefore I say they are the biggest help that the boat and vessel fishermen have. In addition to their three trawlers they have had under charter this winter ten of the large Lunenburg schooners, so they have given employment not only to their own men but to outsiders. In their plant in Halifax they employ 150 to 200 men processing these fish. Most of these men are married and have families, so that a great deal of money is disbursed in labour.

Then as to their purchases. I have figures showing what this octopus has done for the province of Nova Scotia during the past five years. Their expenditures for the five year period from 1928-29 to 1932-33 were as follows:

Fish purchases	$4,386,754
Packing materials	1,093,884
Freight and express paid	866,883
Refrigeration and storage	364,213
Payrolls including salaries	1,831,079
General expenses, including taxes	475,710

In addition to the amount here shown as freight and express paid, probably three times that amount is paid to the railroads for goods sold f.o.b. I wonder if these figures are of interest to the fishermen of Nova Scotia. I wonder if that expenditure is any benefit to the country. There is not another industry I know of in which the money is so well distributed as in the fishing industry.

I am not actively in the fish business now and have not been for the past three years, but I still have the interests of the industry at heart, and I think I have done as much for the fishing industry and the boat fishermen of Nova Scotia as anyone in the industry. One section of the county which I represent is interested largely in fishing, and I feel that I have as many friends in that section of my constituency as in any other. I am certainly considered not as an enemy of the fishermen in any way, but as one of their best friends. If we are to continue to hold our Canadian market, I feel that it is absolutely necessary to have a certain number of trawlers, in order to ensure continuity of supply. This matter has been dealt with pretty fully before the price spreads and mass buying committee; as the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) said, they have not yet made their report, and I think this is an inopportune time to discuss the matter here. It should have been left until the commission's report is received and we see what conclusions they come to concerning it.

Before I close I should like to put on record the attitude of the government in connection with the trawler situation in 1931. On July 15 of that year the then Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes) made this statement in regard to compensation as reported at page 3791 of Hansard:

If we pass a regulation to provide that all trawlers shall be built in Canada, and those now here be disposed of, the government will have to compensate. A fairer method would be to license the trawlers we now have, deciding that hereafter any trawler to be licensed must be built and owned in Canada. I may say to my hon. friend that, with that reservation, I am prepared to recommend to my colleagues in the government that as a matter of policy this be adopted with regard to the trawler question.

If their trawlers are to be put out of business there is no question but that the company will be entitled to compensation, and if this government is prepared to compensate I feel sure that the company operating these trawlers would be only too glad to hand them over to the government and take their chance of getting their supplies of fish from other sources. They went into this business when conditions were different from the conditions of to-day. At that time we had not the heavy motors in the fishing vessels that we have to-day. Then in the winter season we could not get our supplies except by steam trawlers, and that was why this company went into the trawler business. We now have sailing vessels with heavy motors, and under ordinary conditions we could get a fairly good supply of fish. So if the government are prepared to compensate the company for the trawlers they now have I believe they would be glad to go out of the trawler business, because it would be cheaper to get their supplies from the other vessels. But while they have this investment in these trawlers which they brought out from the old country in good faith, and for which they were given Canadian registry, I see no reason in the world why the trawlers should not be operated.

I understand that my hon. friend wants this matter referred to the committee; I presume it will come up for discussion later on, so I do not propose to say anything further at present.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I shall take up the time of the house for only a few moments in connection with this resolution. My own views with regard to the matter are on record in Hansard for 1932. I appreciate, as all hon. members do, the amount of controversy which has been waged in connection with this vexed question, and I know that regardless of the arguments which may be made in favour of the trawlers by the trawler companies there is a deep rooted conviction in the minds of the fishermen that the trawlers are damaging their business and their livelihood. There may be a difference of opinion as to whether that belief is well founded. The commission, to which the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) has referred, recommended by four to one that the trawlers should be abolished. The fifth member, the chairman, recommended in effect that trawlers should be maintained only so long as they were necessary reasonably to supply the market. Mr. Justice Maclean, in the report of the royal commission investigating the fisheries of the maritime provinces, at page 115 said:

> The number of trawlers in use should not exceed that number which will produce from time to time, the market requirements in excess of boat and vessel production.

That seems to be the question most discussed to-day and the real question of fact at issue. The fishermen say the trawlers glut the market, or in other words that they put too many fish on the market and thereby reduce the price. The trawler people say that the trawlers are absolutely necessary to maintain a continuity of supply, to preserve the market and the demand for fish. I suppose that question of fact will exist as long as these two methods of fishing prevail. Two years ago I submitted to this house that, on the information I had before me, it would seem that the condition laid down by the minister, which was read by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short), namely that the trawlers would be licensed only so long as they were required to take up the slack, had been complied with, and that the time had come when the shore fishermen could supply the market.

My suggestion at that time was not accepted. I put on record then certain evidence which I had with regard to the conditions of the fishermen, and I suggested that the best thing this government could do in the interests of the fishermen, as I understood their position, was either to refuse licences to trawlers entirely or to reduce the number of licences to the point where boat fishermen would have the first chance to supply the market. Nothing was done at that time, but in another year, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis said, one trawler less was licensed, and in a subsequent year still another licence was dropped so that now there are only three licensed trawlers with only two in operation.

Now we come to the situation to-day, and I should like to put on record the history of trawler regulation, which is very short. In 1928, I think, four members of the Maclean commission reported in favour of the abolition of trawlers, with the chairman making a qualified recommendation to the effect that trawlers should be maintained only as long as they were necessary in order to supply the market. Following that, in the fall of 1929, the then Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) made a tour of the province of Nova Scotia, particularly; he visited every fishing community and heard the representations of the fishermen and the fishing companies with regard to trawlers and other phases of that industry. After mature consideration a regulation was passed by order in council, by which it was provided that a tax of one cent per pound would be imposed on fish landed from foreign built trawlers, and a tax of three-quarters of a cent per pound on fish landed from Canadian built trawlers, with the further proviso that no licences would be issued to foreign built trawlers after April 1, 1932. That was regarded by the trawler companies as a very drastic step; I know my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis felt it very keenly, as did the company with which he was connected.

Mr. DUFF: It was provided in the 1929 regulation that no vessels other than those of Canadian registry should operate.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not give a date, but my hon. friend is right; the order in council was passed late in 1929, after the visit of the then Minister of Fisheries to the province of Nova Scotia.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, there was a good deal of feeling about that regulation. The trawler companies thought it was exceedingly severe. They claimed, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis has said, that the trawlers were already operating at an expense greater than that to which boat fishermen were put in the matter of the cost of production, and this regulation imposed a further expense by way of a licence fee of one cent per pound, which they said practically put them out of business so far as operating trawlers was concerned. The reply was that they could use Canadian built trawlers and thus save at least a quarter of a cent a pound. Instead of going out of business, however, as they threatened, they preferred to resort to the courts, and the order in council was set aside by the Exchequer Court of Canada on the ground that it exceeded the provisions of the statute on which it was founded.

No action was taken by the present government to reinstate that order in council; the act was not amended in order to validate it. Instead the policy to which my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis has referred this afternoon was laid down by the succeeding Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes). That policy was this: We are not going to impose a licence fee on trawlers by way of a poundage charge. We are going to impose a flat licence fee of $500 a boat. That is one thing. Then we are going to licence as many trawlers as we think fit; but we lay down the principle that the number of trawlers to be licensed is the number necessary to make up for any deficiency in the supply of fish by the shore fishermen. We are also going to see that the trawlers shall be marked in such a way as to make it more certain that they can be recognized and identified in case damage is done to the gear of the fishermen. The other provision to which the hon. member referred was probably set out by the minister in his speech; I do not remember that it was included in the order in council, but it was to the effect that no new licences would be granted except to Canadian built trawlers.

That is the regulation which has been in effect, to which my hon. friend from Inverness is directing his remarks this afternoon. I say that the question to-day is which way that condition of fact, raised in Mr. Justice Maclean's report and mentioned in the present order in council, is to be decided. If the shore fishermen are getting sufficient quantities of fish to supply the market, then there is no need for trawlers. If the shore fishermen are hurt in their business and their prices reduced on account of a glut on the market produced by trawlers, then no licences should be granted. If on the other hand to maintain the fishing industry and to maintain the market it is necessary to have trawlers to supplement the supply of shore caught fish, then there is ground for maintaining a certain number of trawlers.

Instead of putting this matter to the house this afternoon my hon. friend has very wisely, I think, proposed referring it to a committee for the purpose of having the point considered. But let me say now that if I had been asked to vote on the question this afternoon I would have voted for his resolution on the assumption that the shore fisherman can handle the situation.

Let me point out to the house however that this matter has been referred to the Maclean commission, it has been referred to the Jones commission, it has been discussed from time to time by the government, as the government has been dealing with licences; it is now before the price spreads commission and the hon. member now proposes to refer it again to the fisheries committee. I would say that at that rate we are not making much progress in connection with this matter of trawlers. However if my hon. friend wishes it I am quite willing to support the motion sending the matter to a committee for purposes of consideration of all the facts. That will give no immediate relief. But I should like to urge something which can and will be of immediate benefit and which is a matter of immediate urgency.

These men who are fishing in opposition to the trawlers and who claim to be affected by them are fishermen of the province of Nova Scotia. At certain seasons of the year they engage in catching cod, pollock, haddock, hake, etc., and in the other seasons they are lobster fishing. I have made representations to the Minister of Fisheries and I have no doubt other hon. members have made similar representations with regard to the great losses which have been recently suffered by those men through loss of lobster fishing gear due to the extraordinary storms which have lately prevailed upon the Nova Scotia coast. I wish to take this opportunity to urge upon the Minister of Fisheries that which I have already urged upon him by way of letters, and to urge upon this house the immediate consideration of the claims of those men for loss of boats, traps and equipment due to the storms which prevailed upon the Atlantic coast only a short time ago.

I have before me newspaper clippings showing that in many cases from 50 per cent to 80 per cent of lobstermen's gear has been lost. As I said these lobstermen are the same men we are dealing with in the present resolution; they catch ground fish through the summer and lobsters in the winter and spring. Fifty per cent to 80 per cent of their gear has been lost. Those men put their gear in the water in December, and then a storm comes along and destroys it. They have prospects of going out fishing again as soon as the rough winter weather subsides, probably about the middle of March. A great many of them will find themselves not only without gear but without credit, and I submit no more helpful action could be taken on behalf of the fishing industry. This is the way to prevent unemployment: it solves the relief problem. These men want to be self dependent they do not want relief if they can get some sort of grant to help them fit out and pay their own way.

I could mention that long ago, in 1882 I think it was, a grant was made to fishermen of the province of Nova Scotia for the purpose of assisting them in the restoration of their gear which had been lost by reason of an unprecedented storm. I have under my hand a letter referring to the loss of two boats at the Hawk, Cape Sable island, not only the gear but the boats themselves. At Wedgeport besides loss of quantities of gear eight boats went to the bottom, and worse than that, four men were lost from that one little town. That was a storm which will be long remembered by the fishermen in that part of the country.

I want to urge upon the minister as strongly as possible not the protracted but the immediate consideration of the claims of all these men, because he gives twice who gives quickly. In this same connection I received a telegram this morning, and I believe the minister received one similar to it. It came from the secretary of the Yarmouth board of trade. That body has considered the matter serious enough to bring it to the attention of the authorities. It is addressed to myself and is as follows:

Following is copy of telegram to Premier Macdonald and Minister of Fisheries. Please use influence carry recommendation into effect. Representatives five fishery communities on behalf two hundred fishermen in dire need direct relief to-night petitioned Yarmouth board of trade for financial assistance. Extreme stormy weather destroyed lobster equipment and fishermen unable provide replacement. To prosecute industry necessity for fishermen to obtain financial assistance. On behalf these two hundred fishermen and some three hundred others whose petitions coming in daily urgently request governmental assistance as whole communities dependent on welfare of industry. Yarmouth board of trade unanimously passed resolution to-night favouring direct relief for fishermen by proper governmental authority. Kindly place matter before department to end that investigation may be made and relief available and fishermen thus assured of credit to further prosecute lobster industry earliest possible moment.

I do not think one could add much to that businesslike telegram except to say that those of us who represent fishing communities know well the hardships which are experienced in connection with it. I believe every hon. member representing a fishing district will have some knowledge of incidents such as this, where a fisherman goes out into the Atlantic eighteen miles from Cape Sable island to Seal island, locates there with his family and puts out in his little boat day after day in the wintry winds and storms which blow around that bleak and isolated spot in December and January weather. Those men have lost practically all of that which they call capital. To operate in the cod and lobster industry they have to have from $600 to $900 a year in cash in order to prosecute their calling, and they are asking this country for assistance to stake them to a new outfit to replace what the unprecedented storm has taken. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that assistance is given to others engaged in primary industries, the very insignificant amount which would be needed for the purposes I have mentioned ought to be readily granted.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in some ways I regret that the hon. member for Inverness should have brought this matter to the attention of the house at the present time. This has been a most contentious question, but as has been pointed out by some hon. members who have taken part in the debate there are indications that those who were extremely opposed to each other are showing some signs of nearing an agreement.

When one remembers that 50 or 60 years ago steam was first applied to the fishing industry and steam trawlers first came into existence in Europe, and that at that time this same sort of controversy raged for many years it makes one wonder whether or not this may be a problem similar to that which existed when the internal combustion engine was applied to vehicular traffic. It was not until 1910 that the first steam trawler appeared in Canada. By 1912 there were two, and in the next year there were five. Had it not been for the intervention of the war undoubtedly there would have been a greater number of trawlers operating on the Atlantic coast. In 1926, however, the number had increased to eleven. Then in the post-war depression the agitation against the trawler method of catching fish became extremely violent, and it was necessary for the government to give close attention to the question. It was brought to its attention with such force in 1927 that a commission was appointed to take into consideration the matter under dispute. As the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) pointed out, the majority were in favour of the abolition of steam trawling, and the chairman held the view that it should be permitted under certain circumstances. That report was submitted to the select standing committee on fisheries, and as a result of the consideration given to it the Fisheries Act was amended in 1929, and certain regulations were passed under those amendments which were subsequently put into operation. Those regulations contained the proviso that the trawlers should pay a fee of one cent a pound but when in the subsequent season, with five of them operating, four refused to pay that licence fee, the case came before the court and the court ruled that the regulations were ultra vires, and the regulations had again to be amended. They were so amended in 1931, and instead of the licence fee being collected on the poundage of fish taken, a licence fee of $500 was imposed on the trawler. In the order in council authorizing that regulation appears the following clause:

> That the applicant for such licence shall furnish the Minister of Fisheries with evidence that will satisfy the said minister that he cannot obtain an adequate supply of suitable fish to enable him properly to conduct and develop his business from the hook and line fishermen, and that if the licence is granted, the extent of his purchase of fresh fish from the said fishermen will not be adversely affected.

Following that, four licences were granted. One of the companies, however, which had a licence went out of existence, and consequently only three were operating. Again market conditions had not improved and the question had to be reconsidered. A very strong agitation came from boards of trade and associations as referred to by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall), and their representations were opposed as strongly by the board of trade of Halifax and the mayor of Halifax who desired this small number of licences to be retained. The matter was again reviewed, and I should like to draw the attention of the house to some of the points which it was necessary to consider.

The trawlers were procured when there was no law restricting their number or regulating their use. Hence, refusal of licences would be largely tantamount to their confiscation.

It is generally conceded that it costs more to land fish with trawlers than by hook and line. Hence their need is to maintain a continuous supply and also because they catch much larger quantities of haddock proportionately than do the hook and line fishermen, which fish are mainly desired on the fresh fish markets, and particularly in the United States markets.

Because the fish cost more, it is not the trawler-caught fish that fix the price on the markets, but rather the hook and line caught fish.

If the trawler licences were refused there is no assurance that the place that their catches now take on the markets would be filled by the inshore fishermen. Apart from sales to the United States, whenever it would be more convenient for the Montreal and Toronto wholesalers to obtain their supplies from the nearby United States ports, there would be nothing to prevent their doing so. The much smaller transportation charge from these nearby ports would in a measure offset the import duties.

The schooner has become more competent in recent years owing to the installation of the diesel engine, and the plain fact seems to be that it is doubtful, if conditions keep on as they are, whether trawlers can very long stand their competition.

The trawler operators are amongst the largest purchasers of fish from the hook and line fishermen, and they maintain that this is possible only because of having the trawlers and keeping a continuous supply on the market.

The main landings by the trawlers are during the late winter months when the hook and line fishing is reduced to a minimum. If it were not for the necessity of holding trained crews together, trawlers would probably be laid up during the summer months.

Then to emphasize what I said at the beginning with regard to the introduction of steam in the fishing industry, I would draw the attention of the house to the fact that no other country is restricting trawler operations. Out of European ports about 5,000 trawlers are operating, while out of United States ports usually there are about 300. These latter trawlers as well as a large number from France and sometimes from other European ports fish on the banks adjacent to our coasts, so that even if our trawlers were withdrawn it would decrease the amount of trawling on these banks by a very small proportion only, and so far at least as the United States markets are concerned it would make competition therein more difficult.

After the consideration given to the whole matter it was decided to limit the number of licences to the Maritime-National Fish Company to three, and that the licence to the Leonard Fisheries would be renewed, but as the latter company ceased to operate there have been only three trawler licences issued, and they are still in operation.

Owing to the fact that this question, contentious as it is, has been before the price spreads commission and in that sense is subjudice, the government at present awaiting the report of that committee, it seems to me not undesirable that this resolution should pass to the select standing committee on fisheries where it could be held pending the receipt of the report of the price spreads commission and for such longer time as is necessary for the government to consider the report so brought in.

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the motion introduced by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) I have very little to say. It does not affect my riding to any very great degree. We have a number of fishermen in my constituency and yet I have never had a complaint from any one of them with regard to the trawlers, which do not interfere with them to any great degree so far as I have been able to judge. The trawlers come into our ports and get their supplies and coal in the port of North Sydney.

I agree with the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that something should be done to relieve the conditions now existing among the fishermen. I was sorry I was not able to take part yesterday in the discussion that was held recently in regard to the establishment of refrigerator plants and bait warehouses for looking after the curing of fish and the supplying of bait. Those are two very important questions, but to my mind they are of minor importance in comparison with the larger question of relief for the fishermen. Only to-day I have a letter from some fishermen in my constituency asking me to do something in the way of a breakwater so that after they come in from a hard day's fishing they would not have to jump out of their boats and stand waist high in the cold water in the month of October to haul their boats ashore. Through the kindness of the Minister of Public Works I have succeeded in getting four or five hauling engines installed in different places along the coast of Victoria county and they have been a great boon to the fishermen. One can imagine what a hardship it is for fishermen to have to drag in their boats standing in cold water after coming in from a long fishing trip, but with one of these hauling engines all they do is to step ashore and start the engine and the boats are hauled ashore. That is one of the few things we have been able to do. I had a letter last year from a merchant asking me whether it was possible for the government to provide a sum of money for the purpose of helping the fishermen in the spring or in the fall when they go fishing, because, he said, they were destitute; they had no proper equipment, neither rubber boots nor boats. Their lines were crippled and their boats destroyed. This all happened after a very heavy storm in Victoria county. Now, I think that there should be something in the form of a government loan to those engaged in the fishing industry, which is a very important occupation in this country. The farmers of Canada, judging from the bills which are before the house to-day, are largely protected, but apparently the fishermen are excluded from these loans which are being given to the farmers. I think it is up to the government and the members of this house to see that fishing, which is an industry second almost to none in this country, should receive proper care and attention.

I am sorry that this subject did not come up before. I do hope however that before this house gets through we shall be able to go to the fishermen and say that we have done something for them and that this talk has not been all useless. I hope that we shall be able to tell them that we have evolved a practical method by which the fishermen can be assisted, not only in connection with bait and refrigerator plants, but by means of a loan which will enable them to obtain boats and to get whatever equipment is necessary. This is a serious matter with them, because I know that to-day there are people who cannot go fishing because they have not the materials—lines, proper clothing and often boats. I am very glad that the subject has been brought up. I feel responsible for not having introduced it before but I am glad of this opportunity to say something on behalf of our fishermen.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): I have a perfectly open mind on this question, not being particularly interested from a sectional point of view, as to the desirability of continuing trawlers. On this as on the other question which we have already discussed, I think the matter must be approached on a wider basis. If we have to deal with this question at all, and if it is to be referred to the committee on fisheries, no doubt it will receive proper attention there. But in my opinion if we are to discuss the fisheries in the way they should be discussed, and if we are to give the industry that assistance to which it is entitled, we shall have to deal with the matter in a larger way than is contemplated either by this resolution or by the one that preceded it.

I may be mistaken—and in this I have the misfortune to differ from my friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), who I confess knows very much more about the fishing industry than I do, and who is more deeply interested in it—but I must say that the little consideration I have been able to give the matter convinces me that the future of this industry lies along the fresh fish business. My own ideal would be that for every car of fresh meat that goes from Ontario down to Nova Scotia there should be sent back a car of fresh fish, or more than one car if necessary. I believe that there is a market in Canada sufficient to absorb all the fresh fish that we can catch in the maritimes. But two or three things are necessary. As has been said, we must make the people of upper Canada fish conscious. There ought to be some way of putting before them the desirability of this food. Those of us who live in the maritime provinces and who have eaten fish caught fresh from the salt water, and who have also had opportunities to eat the choicest meats that come from the other provinces, know that as a palatable article of diet a fresh fish caught from the ocean is far superior to any choice piece of meat that can be obtained from any animal.

It is of course a matter of regret that the present condition of our fisheries is so deplorable. The fishermen are destitute. One would hardly believe that in the short space of twenty-five or thirty years there could be such a lowering of the standard of living among our fishing population as has taken place in the maritime provinces. At that time there were numerous little fishing villages scattered all along the shores, and the men engaged in that business, although they worked only in the summer, could live through the winter and enjoy all the comforts of the home. To-day some of these villages which were most prosperous in the early days, are living on relief, and if one were to believe the stories that come in during the winter months, it is almost inconceivable that such conditions could exist.

In addition to educating the people of upper Canada to the value of this food, very many other things are necessary. The fishermen of the maritimes must be lifted out of the condition in which they now find themselves. This government can be very generous to the farmers of the west, and with that we have no quarrel. We in the east realize that the great wealth of Canada comes from the western plains and that the large exports from that territory furnish the chief source of wealth in this country. A very considerable and laudable effort is being made to help the destitute farmers of the west, but I venture to say that their destitution is not more severe, nor are their conditions more serious than those in which the farmers and the fishermen of the east are placed to-day. And if we are to treat those farmers in the west so generously—and we are all heartily in favour of that—we should certainly extend equal generosity to those hardy men who go down to the sea in ships. Further, those fishermen must be fitted out with equipment and plant because they are engaged in a very hazardous occupation. As the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has pointed out, this year the winter has been a particularly severe one on the fishermen, the result being that many of them have lost their entire plant, boats, nets, lobster traps, all of which have gone, and they have no resources left with which to set themselves up in business again.

In addition to the fishermen being equipped to catch fish there must be the secondary stage of equipping them with the necessary facilities for processing their fish, keeping them fresh, thus enabling them to put their fish in a proper condition on the Canadian market because that is the one to which I look for the efficient development of Canadian fisheries. There must also be given to them cheap transportation as is now given to the Toronto packers who are supplying us with meat products. Transportation cost might very easily be lowered, for example if a car that came east with meat went back loaded with fish.

We have first the catching of the fish, the processing of it, the creation of a market through education and lastly the transportation and the placing of that fish on the market in the best possible condition. How are we going to do this? What is the best method of doing it? For my own part I am satisfied that there is only one method that will ever be successful in dealing with the whole question of fisheries, and that is the creation by the government of a commission that will handle the entire problem. A large amount of money may be necessary, but it is available. The commission should consist of a number of persons who would have full charge of the production, processing and transportation of the fish, and the education of the people of the west in the eating of it. That I am convinced is the solution of our troubles and it is the one idea I have in mind, feeling as I do the great necessity for doing something. Looking over our past history and seeing that we have done nothing all these years while the fishing industry has been steadily deteriorating, I think it would be very well if when we come to consider this question in committee—and I presume it will be referred to a committee—we consider the much wider and more important question of dealing with this problem in the way I have indicated through a commission composed of experts who can deal with the matter of the fish from the time they leave the sea until they reach the tables of our friends in western Canada.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): As previous contributors to the debate have already stated, this question of the competition of the beam or otter trawler with the shore fishermen has been a contentious one for many years. Perhaps a useful purpose will have been served by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) in bringing the resolution before the house this afternoon; if no other advantage can be gained he will have at least the satisfaction of bringing to the attention of hon. members some of the deplorable conditions of the maritime provinces.

To give the house an idea of how difficult it is for hon. gentlemen to arrive at a conclusion as to what is best in dealing with the resolution now under consideration, may I point out my particular situation? Just a few minutes ago we had read to the house by the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Stirling) a statement that only a few years ago this government or the preceding one was petitioned by the Halifax board of trade and also by the mayor and council of that city to permit a certain number of trawlers to operate. That is the expressed opinion of those in control of the city of Halifax, but the constituency which I represent includes the city and county of Halifax, and the inhabitants of the county of Halifax, east and west along a shore line of 142 miles, are chiefly engaged in the pursuit of fishing, being called, as has already been stated, shore fishermen, those who fish in small boats out of the different harbours and coves along the shore. All of those fishermen are opposed to the beam trawler competition which they have to meet. I need not elaborate or try to explain the operation of the beam trawler as against that of the shore fishermen because the matter has been very clearly defined by previous speakers and particularly by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). But this is the position we are in; the question is a contentious one and it is very difficult for parliament to decide just what to do.

I was particularly interested in the statements of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) who knows as much about the fishing industry as does any other hon. member. I paid especial attention to his remarks in refutation of the statement that the companies operating these otter trawlers held a monopoly of the fishing business in Nova Scotia. He quoted figures to disprove that statement. I was not aware of them and they were very interesting to me. Another statement made by the same hon. member which was rather interesting—and I thought perhaps that statement should settle this question and prove that there was no necessity for any further discussion in the matter—was that the company in which he had been interested or is interested and which operates these two steam trawlers was willing to discontinue its operations provided it was recompensed for the capital invested in these trawlers. I thought that was a fair statement, and I think if that suggestion were carried out it would settle the argument once for all. But since it seems to be the general opinion that the whole matter should be left in the hands of the special committee on fisheries I concur in that suggestion. I think it is the proper body to deal with the question. I hope the committee will give it the consideration to which it is entitled and will bring in a recommendation as to the operation of beam trawlers, and, if they are to be discontinued, as to how the companies who own and operate them should be recompensed for the capital invested in these trawlers.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): The fisheries question is often referred to as something of interest primarily to the maritime provinces, and sometimes British Columbia. But there is a part of the province of Quebec which is also interested, that is the three counties of Gaspé, Bonaventure and Matane. I am glad my colleague from Gaspé (Mr. Brasset) said a few words the other night on the motion of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) in regard to bait. I was much interested in the suggestion made to-day by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) that there is a broader view to be taken of this fishery question, not confined to beam trawlers but extending to the condition of the industry and the fishermen as a whole. The position in which the fishermen of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick find themselves to-day applies equally, or to a greater degree, to the fishermen of Quebec, because our fishing season in Quebec is much shorter than in those provinces, especially Nova Scotia where they have winter fishing. Our winter fishing is practically confined to the upper ranges of the baie des Chaleurs and to smelt fishing. There is no doubt there has been a great deterioration in the fishing industry of eastern Canada, and that something should be done to restore it. I heartily support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) that this matter be referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries. I hope that the question raised by the hon. member for Gloucester will be again taken up by that committee. Some twenty-five or thirty years ago I voted for and upheld the proposition made by Sir Louis Davies, who was then one of the outstanding representatives of the maritime provinces, to establish a system of bait freezers throughout Canada. That became law and we had experience of that not only in Quebec but I understand in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as well. Unfortunately the system was based upon the cooperative idea, but the fishermen did not seem able to agree about the operation of the freezers, they gradually disappeared and the whole scheme fell down. Now the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) suggests that the government should start over again and re-introduce the system. Without bait the fisherman is of course handicapped at every turn. In Quebec at present the local government have undertaken to establish a number of bait freezers in the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and I suppose Matane as well, for the purpose of furnishing the fishermen with the bait which is indispensable.

It is unfortunate that in that maritime part of Quebec province there is any conflict of jurisdiction, but there always has been. Away back in 1897 when I had the honour of being a candidate for the legislature of Quebec against the then premier of the province that was a burning issue. The provincial government contended that the fisheries of the province, especially the salmon fisheries, were under the jurisdiction of the province; the federal government took the opposite view. The privy council on one occasion gave authority to the province as regards the issue of licences for salmon fishing, which as the house knows is one of the important industries of Bonaventure and Gaspé counties from which come the famed Gaspé salmon, second to none in the world. To-day the fisheries of Quebec are under provincial jurisdiction, but there has been a steady appeal made during the last three or four years by the fishermen of Gaspé, who take a very active interest in this matter, that there should be more cooperation between the federal and the provincial governments concerning fisheries. Public sentiment in those two constituencies is very strong that some of the federal benefits which are extended to British Columbia and the maritime provinces should also be extended to the maritime parts of Quebec; that we should have biological stations and other means of helping the fisherman to carry on his calling. The fishermen of Quebec, although under provincial control except as regards seasons and other regulations, contribute their part towards supplying the fishermen of the maritime provinces and British Columbia with the assistance which the federal government gives them. I was glad to hear the former Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes) declare that he is prepared to give all the federal assistance that can be given to the fishermen of Quebec. I hope the minister now in charge of that department (Mr. Stirling) will take that same view, because after all this is a national industry, and the prosperity of one part of Canada affects all parts. If one great national industry is stagnant in one province it reacts upon the whole body.

I think the suggestion of having this matter referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries is a good one, but I hope it will not be confined merely to looking into the matters of beam trawlers and bait, but will take into consideration the whole industry. Ever since I have been in this house we have been helping the west. When I came first there was practically nothing in the west. We have been developing it. I voted for all the transcontinental railways and every other railway built in the west. We looked on the west as the great granary of the world. Sir Charles Tupper and Sir George Foster and those other great leaders that the maritime provinces sent to the parliament of Canada laid before us an entrancing view of the future of that western country. We created two or three new provinces out there; we gave them all they wanted, all they asked, and now when they are being tried sorely we are willing to come to their assistance. But we must not forget that the fishermen of Canada were the pioneers of this country. Our first fishermen came from Brittany and the channel islands and they settled in the maritime provinces and in Quebec. We have in Paspebiac, in my constituency, the old firm of Robin, Colas et Cie, which is now controlled by Robin, Jones and Whitman of Nova Scotia. This was the first company in British North America to obtain a British charter to go into the fishing business after Canada came under British jurisdiction. A few years ago, in company with Sir Henry Thornton, I had the pleasure of visiting their old office in Paspebiac where I was shown the original documents of incorporation, which indicates that this industry was started when the west and Ontario were wildernesses, and when the province of Quebec was inhabited merely along the rivers. At that time Canada was only in its inception; the province of Quebec and the provinces by the sea constituted Canada.

We must not overlook the fact that something is coming to the fishermen of the maritime provinces. After this question has been considered by the fisheries committee and the government, this or any other government, I hope the suggestion that has been advanced this afternoon will be accepted and a body of competent men appointed to develop this industry as it should be developed. Our fisheries, along with farming, mining and lumbering, constitute the basic industries of the country. When our fishermen and our farmers are prosperous our railways will be prosperous, our factories will be busy, our workingmen will be employed and everything in the country will boom. I believe we have overlooked the fisheries; they have not received the attention or the consideration they deserve, and I think the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) should receive the thanks of this house for having directed attention to this question. I want to assure our colleagues from the provinces by the sea that the members from Quebec are prepared at all times to aid any efforts they may put forth to restore the fisheries to a sound position. To-day the situation of these fishermen is precarious and very alarming. In my own constituency the catch has been poor, the prices low and transportation costs high, and the industry has suffered a very great deal. Anything that can be done by the fisheries committee, by the government or by a permanent commission to aid that industry will meet with my hearty support, and, I hope, the general support of all members.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I do not intend to speak at any great length after the discussion we have had this afternoon. I should like to tell hon. members, however, that when I placed this resolution on the order paper I did so because I considered it one part of a general scheme for the improvement of the fisheries of the maritime provinces.

I listened to the remarks of the acting minister, who suggested that this resolution be referred to the fisheries committee. I am quite in accord with that suggestion, because it will give an opportunity to certain people who are particularly interested in the primary producers to appear and give their views in regard to the operation of beam trawlers and their effect on the fishing industry.

This afternoon the old argument has been repeated, that in asking for the abolition of beam trawlers you might as well ask people to return to the old spinning wheel. Well, in some parts of the country it might be a good thing to return to the old spinning wheel. I might point out, however, that the underlying principle in regard to the installation of machinery in industry since the industrial revolution has been that it would better the conditions of mankind. When we come to the point where the man-made machine is putting the God-made man out of work, as the beam trawler is doing in the province of Nova Scotia to-day, I say we must curtail and curb the activities of that machine.

Hon. members have said that the abolition of these trawlers would not help the fishermen. Let me tell my hon. friends that last year 18,000,000 pounds of fish caught by beam trawlers were landed and sold in the province of Nova Scotia. What would that have meant to the fishermen if there had been no beam trawlers? To furnish this quantity of fish would have required ten Nova Scotia-built power vessels during the winter months and a total of 250 fishermen, with a fleet of several hundred small vessels during the summer months. It would have required a bait supply of from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 pounds, which would have furnished employment for scores of net fishermen along the shores.

As I have said this is only one part of a general scheme to improve the condition of the fishermen in the province of Nova Scotia. I want to say to hon. members of this house, irrespective of their party politics, that the people of Nova Scotia are wholly in earnest about this matter, and that constructive steps must be taken by the Department of Fisheries here, who have control over the fishing industry of our province. If they cannot control that industry then in the name of God let them hand it back to the province of Nova Scotia, and we will find men who can control it.

I accept the suggestion of the minister, and accordingly I move that this resolution be referred to the fisheries committee.

By leave of the house, motion (Mr. Macdougall) referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSED RESTRICTION OF CERTAIN EXEMPTIONS TO CANADIANS OR BRITISH SUBJECTS

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government should consider the advisability of amending the income tax exemption clause to read as follows:—

That in all cases income tax exemptions as applied to married and single persons should not apply to others than Canadians or British subjects.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my ambition is to help the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) secure more revenue. During the 1933 session I introduced a resolution which the minister gallantly accepted, and I do not think he has regretted that step because I feel sure it has brought in quite a large amount of revenue.

Before proceeding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to amend my resolution by adding the words "resident in Canada for five years" after the words "Canadians or British subjects." If people from foreign countries after living here five years have not shown any intention of becoming naturalized I do not see why they should be allowed tax exemption similar to that given Canadians and British subjects. I am of course referring to the ordinary tax exemptions whereby a man in receipt of an annual income of $2,000 or $3,000 is permitted a certain exemption, and the remainder is taxed.

In my view this suggestion should be put into effect. Through its operation I believe a greatly increased amount of taxation would be collected from people who can well afford to contribute. I should have mentioned in the resolution that the persons indicated should not be allowed tax exemption after five years' residence in Canada and under the conditions I have outlined. With this amendment I shall be content to let the matter stand without entering into a lengthy discussion. I simply offer the matter for consideration.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had an appointment this afternoon which occupied my time until only a very few moments ago. I had not anticipated this resolution would be moved to-day, in view of the fact that there are on the order paper a number of resolutions which in the ordinary course of events would have been considered before it was called. Had I known it would be reached to-day I should have been better prepared to make a complete statement of my views.

Had the hon. member supported his resolution with argument and presented facts which would warrant the acceptance of the resolution by the house, I should have been better pleased.

Mr. MUNN: We do not need any argument.

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member has contented himself with moving the resolution, and nothing which he has said so far as I am concerned calls for a reply. However, having regard to the circumstance which I mentioned, namely that I had not anticipated a discussion of the subject this afternoon, I shall proceed to make some general observations.

Mr. MUNN: May I tell the minister that I did not expect the resolution to be reached this afternoon.

Mr. RHODES: My answer would be that there is only one minister of finance but there are numerous hon. members each of whom may move his resolution when he chooses and each of whom has plenty of time in which to prepare any statement he may wish to make.

There is a very grave objection to the acceptance of the principle contained in the resolution, namely that it would invite retaliation on the part of other countries. The whole tendency in taxation matters has been that there should be reciprocal arrangements between the different countries so that credit may be given in one country when in fact income tax has been paid in another, an arrangement which exists between Canada and many other countries. If we were to put into effect the resolution before the house we might expect retaliation from the United States.

Mr. YOUNG: Do not provoke them.

Mr. RHODES: It is but fair to point out that beyond question there are many more Canadians resident in the United States than citizens of the United States resident in Canada. I make special reference to the United States because of the fact that this resolution applies only to foreign countries; it does not apply to British countries. In effect its application would be confined to the United States.

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. RHODES: If as the hon. member apparently assumes it would involve an increase in revenue there might be some virtue in the suggestion, because if I mistake not the hon. member's idea is to assist in increasing the revenues, as he had advocated at previous sessions. If the resolution were carried in its literal terms and taxation were imposed as provided by it, all the income of foreign residents in Canada would be involved; because he specifically states that the income tax exemption shall not apply. I take that to mean that he would tax the wages and small salaries of those who would be affected by the application of the tax. Information I have received from the income tax branch is to the effect that the machinery which would be required to deal with the collection of incomes now exempt, namely incomes in the smaller brackets, would involve an expenditure which would be greater than the amount returned to the treasury. In the lowest bracket of those who pay income tax in Canada there were in the year 1932-33 63,276 persons who paid income tax amounting to $416,776.46. That sum is exactly 1·5 per cent of the total amount collected from individuals. These figures would indicate that from the large number of persons in the lower brackets we received only a small percentage of the total tax collected. One could only hazard a guess as to how many thousands might be included among those who would be called upon to pay income tax if the government were to accept this resolution and to bring down legislation based upon it. But I submit that even if it meant many thousands, their income in the main would be in the lower brackets, because my hon. friend would remove the exemptions; and the amount of money therefore which we would receive into the treasury would be only a fraction of the total income tax collected. As I have said, the officials of the income tax branch advise me that the probabilities are that the costs of collection and the machinery of collection which it would be necessary to set up in order to deal with it would involve a greater outlay than the treasury would receive in income as a result of its application.

I might point out further that with respect to the number I have given, those who are in the lower brackets represent forty per cent of the total number of income taxpayers in Canada, and yet, as I have indicated, the amount collected from them represents but 1·5 per cent of the total income tax collected. I do not stress that angle, although I think it is fair that we should respect the advice given to us by those whose business it is to deal with the collection of income tax.

Should the resolution be adopted and the principle it asserts be put into operation, not only would we be certain, as I have indicated, to invite reprisals on the part of our friendly neighbour to the south, to the detriment, on balance, of Canada and Canadian citizens because of the reasons I have given, but I would point out that at the moment we are in negotiation with our friends to the south in matters of trade, and it would strike me as being a very inopportune time to take a step of this kind while those negotiations are in progress. I do not know that I would stress that phase of the argument, but I do submit that it certainly is not good neighbourliness and it would not be good tactics, bearing particularly in mind the fact that a similar attempt has not been made by the United States to deal similarly with Canadian residents in that country.

Mr. MUNN: In other words, be very careful you do not offend them at the present time.

Mr. RHODES: No, that is not the argument at all, Mr. Speaker. I just leave it to the common sense judgment of the house whether, when you are in the midst of negotiations, it would be good judgment to take legislative action by parliament directed against practically only one country in the world, namely, the United States. If it were a matter of general application applying to all the world, and arguments could be made in support of the resolution, that would be one thing; but in fact it applies, and it might as well say so in terms, to one country so far as any value to the treasury is concerned, and to one country only, namely our neighbour to the south. I should be the last to subscribe to the doctrine that Canada should not legislate for itself, but I do say that if we expect to conduct negotiations in a friendly manner with a view to a successful issue between Canada and the United States we would be very ill-advised at this time to take a step such as is suggested, which could be open to only one construction. I do not stress that point. I mention it incidentally, but I do think that on the merits, on balance Canada would be the loser if we were to attempt to pass this resolution and to base upon it legislation bringing it into effect.

I should have dealt more completely with the subject and given more facts and figures, as I have indicated, had I had the slightest idea that this resolution was coming up to-day. But I trust that I have given to the house sufficient indications that we would be very unwise to accept this resolution or the principle which it embodies, if not at any time, certainly at this moment, and I trust therefore that in the judgment of the house the resolution will not be accepted.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) said that he had not been able to give that attention to this motion that he would have liked, and apparently someone in his department furnished the information on which he largely rests in his remarks. Whoever drew up the brief or prepared the data appears to have gone upon the idea that, if he could not produce one good argument against the proposition, the next best thing to do would be to produce a lot of poor argument hoping that the cumulative effect of six poor arguments would be as great as one sufficient argument. The Minister of Finance himself said from time to time as he brought forward the various arguments that had been placed in his hands, evidently feeling compelled by his sense of fairness and his sense of logic: "I would not stress that point." The idea seemed to be that by giving a number of poor arguments it would result in the same force as one substantial argument, which is not I think logical.

The minister asks someone to produce a reason for this resolution, to advance some argument in favour of it. I would suggest this, that it would encourage people to naturalize, a very good thing indeed in this country. We have only to think back to the war, when I saw men who had been in the country far beyond five years and who were deliberately not naturalizing because they could draw eight or nine or ten dollars a day while Canadians at the front were getting $1.10 a day. The old age pension law requires people to be twenty years in Canada before they can get a pension, and I know of people who had lived many years in Canada and became naturalized only a few weeks before they applied for a pension. Some had lived in Canada for twenty years without thinking Canada good enough to become a citizen of it in that time, but when it was a question of getting an old age pension then they rallied around and sought to be citizens of this country.

This resolution would encourage people to become naturalized. Some people deliberately do not naturalize in order to evade their responsibilities, and it is not desirable to have in any nation a large body of aliens standing aloof from the interests of the country which has supported them for ten or fifteen years. If they were encouraged to naturalize they would probably come, as men will, to take more interest in the country and more interest in its government. On the other hand, if they do not naturalize, then this resolution if adopted and carried into effect would produce some revenue for the Minister of Finance.

I suppose we are in the habit of thinking of immigrants as poor people, the man with the sheepskin coat, and so on, who would be drawing only a few dollars in wages, and as the minister says, the cost of collecting the small amount would not pay. But rich aliens also come to this country and stay in it for many years, people with large incomes who do not bother to become naturalized. The trouble that the minister suggests in regard to the cost of collecting from men drawing a small wage could easily be got rid of by having an exemption of, say, $500. But I think that the proposition which the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Munn) had in mind was rather to take the exemption off the man who had a good income. If a man had $5,000 or $6,000 and you took the exemption of $2,000 off, the last $2,000 of his income would be dealt with much more lightly than if that exemption remained, and it is in such cases that the crown would benefit from increased revenue. Of course, as the hon. member said, it would be necessary to put in a provision that it would not apply to aliens for the first five years, because that would not be fair. But after they had completed the period within which they could qualify for naturalization, then I ask the minister or anyone else, why should they not naturalize? If the country is good enough for them to make a livelihood in, if they get the protection of our laws, why should they not naturalize? There is no reason that I know of which can stand investigation. The minister spoke about retaliation and said that we had a working agreement, so to speak, that the foreigners in each country should not be taxed on their incomes. I think that applies particularly to Britain.

Mr. RHODES: Surely my hon. friend must be aware of the fact that I made no such statement. I did not say that they were exempt from taxation but that they were given credit in one country for the tax paid in the other. The hon. member likes to be accurate, according to his own assertion. He is assuming that foreigners are not to be taxed. They are taxed. But this resolution calls upon those to pay taxes who otherwise would be exempt because of the exemption clauses.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but there is an exemption of one or two thousand dollars, and for their children four or five hundred, and the motion proposes to take these exemptions off so that they will pay more seeing that they choose to live in the country without becoming citizens of it. The minister says it would apply almost entirely to the United States and would be regarded as an unfriendly action. That is not so. It would apply to every nation, and whether in its working out there might be more Americans here than nationals of other countries, that is a matter of detail. But no nation takes umbrage at such action unless it is deliberately directed against itself.

Mr. RHODES: I did not say it was an unfriendly act; I did not use such a word or such an expression

Mr. NEILL: I think I am justified in putting such an implication on it, when he said that it was an undesirable time to take such action because there might be retaliation.

Mr. RHODES: That is a different matter.

Mr. NEILL: Well, something that provokes retaliation would naturally be unfriendly. My point is that a nation would naturally take offence at a resolution such as this if we made it apply to that nation exclusively. If we made it apply only to the United States they would certainly take offence, but when we say that it applies to everyone in the whole world they cannot take umbrage. And the actual details would not concern them. The suggestion was made that it might provoke retaliation against Canadians living in the United States, and it was pointed out that there are more Canadians living in the United States than there are Americans living in Canada. I do not know that it would be a dreadful thing if Canadians in the United States did pay more income tax. At any rate we are legislating for Canadians in Canada and not for Canadians in the United States, and I do not think it would do any harm particularly. I would also point out to the minister that after all the resolution only proposes that the government should consider the advisability of the matter, and if he allowed the resolution to pass it would be open to him after thorough consideration of it to decide against it if he came to that conclusion. But seeing that it has not had full consideration, seeing that he himself states that he would like to have given it more consideration, I suggest that he might let it go through and it would be left to his own judgment to deal with it as he saw fit after thorough consideration.

Mr. MUNN: I did not intend this to be personal in any way, and I do not think the Americans will stand the heavy end of the penalty. I was not after the fellow in the lower brackets in particular. A good many people in Canada who are not Canadians or British subjects are earning from five to ten thousand dollars a year and are subject to these exemptions, and they are the fellows I am after. I have not in mind those receiving six or seven or eight hundred dollars a year. But that is a detail that could be taken care of.

The minister says that his officials tell him that if this were put into effect the results would not meet the extra expense. I doubt that statement very much; I do not think it has been carefully considered. I discussed the matter with one of the best tax auditors in Canada, one of the very best, and he calculated that if it were put into effect by the federal and provincial authorities it would bring in at least another million dollars in taxation throughout Canada.

I do not want to antagonize anyone. The minister says that he does not wish to adopt the motion at the present time, and I shall be pleased to withdraw it and let it stand at that. But it is something which the tax officials might keep in mind. There is a leakage, because there are taxes which we should get and are not getting. With the consent of the seconder I beg to withdraw the resolution and let the matter stand.

Motion (Mr. Munn) withdrawn.

BRITISH IMPORTS OF RUSSIAN TIMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. F. AHEARN (Ottawa): I wish to ask the government a question based upon a dispatch appearing in the Montreal Gazette, of to-day's issue, February 6:

Canada To Lose Lumber Trade Deal Concluded Between Great Britain and Soviet 50 Per Cent of Canadian Export to Britain in 1935 Threatened
(By The Canadian Press)

Vancouver, February 6.—Contract between British Timber Distributors Ltd., and Soviet Russia has been signed, including the "fall clause," H. R. MacMillan, president of the H. R. MacMillan Export Company, Ltd., reported to-day upon receipt of a cable from London to that effect.

Closing of the deal between British Timber Distributors Ltd., and the Soviet Union means that eastern Canada and British Columbia will lose 50 per cent of their market for lumber in Great Britain, according to an estimate made by H. R. MacMillan in Montreal on January 11, in discussing the British-Soviet negotiations which were then in progress. Canada exported nearly one billion feet to Great Britain in 1934.

My question is: Has the government been informed that such an agreement has been concluded?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the dispatch in question but I will bring the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as Minister of External Affairs, or of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and it will be taken as notice of a question.

On motion of Mr. Rhodes the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Thursday, February 7, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

FARM LOAN APPLICATIONS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What were the total applications for loans made to the farm loan board up to December 31, 1934, or nearest date available?
2. How many loans were granted to the above time?
3. What was the aggregate amount of these loans so granted?
4. What is the total farm mortgage indebtedness in Canada?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Number of applications received up to March 31, 1934, 17,985.
2. Number of applications approved for loans up to March 31, 1934, 5,117.
3. Amount of loans approved to March 31, 1934, $10,692,250.
4. The total farm mortgage indebtedness in Canada as at June 1, 1931, was $726,026,500, as reported by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

RELIEF CAMP NO. 3—SEEBE, ALTA.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. What provisions are made in relief camp No. 3, project 155, Seebe, for purposes of personal bathing and the washing of clothes?
2. What is the nature of the water supply at this camp?
3. Are the men in this camp called to work when the temperature has been 20 below zero?
4. Had there been complaints that clothes hung close to the wall are sometimes found frozen to the wall when morning comes?
5. What arrangements are made to receive and deal with complaints by the men, either in their own behalf or that of others?
6. Have men been ejected from this camp for having registered complaints?
7. When men are dismissed from this camp are some of the clothes they have been using taken from them?
8. Are men who have been ejected from one camp refused entrance into any other camp?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Accommodation is temporarily being provided by using two contractors' tents, one for ablution and the other for laundry purposes, containing ablution basins, twelve wash tubs, one hand washing machine and two vacuum washers. Regular ablution hut now erected and fittings being installed.
2. At present hauled from spring by team in forty-five gallon drums. Gravity system from spring 1,000 feet away under construction.
3. Yes, cutting fire wood.
4. No complaints received; but during cold spell inside walls of all huts were very cold.
5. Any man has the right to lay complaints before foreman, assistant engineer, or any official and, if not satisfied, the matter is referred to headquarters, military district No. 13, Calgary.
6. No.
7. Men leaving camp are allowed to retain essential articles of clothing on loan.

8. Yes, unless the district officer commanding is satisfied that there is reasonable probability of their behaving properly in future.

FLOUR IMPORTS

Mr. REID:

1. What quantities of flour were imported into Canada during the calendar year 1934?
2. What were the various quantities from each country?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. Canada's total quantity of wheat flour imported during the calendar year 1934 amounted to 178,175 barrels.

2. Canada's total quantities of wheat flour imported from various countries, during the calendar year 1934, were:—

Imports from	Barrels
United Kingdom	105,431
United States	3,338
Alaska	1
Australia	69,380
Hong Kong	25

MARKETING ACT, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. NEILL:

1. In British Columbia, how many schemes have been proposed under the Natural Products Marketing Act?
2. What is the information as to each in the following particulars: (a) name; (b) present standing—whether sanctioned by the dominion marketing board, or application pending; (c) head office address; (d) names of proposed members of the local board; (e) proposed salaries to be paid such members?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. Nine, received by the Minister of Agriculture.
2. (a) 1. British Columbia tree fruit marketing scheme.
2. British Columbia salt fish marketing scheme.
3. British Columbia red cedar shingle export scheme.
4. Milk marketing scheme of the lower mainland of British Columbia.
5. Western halibut marketing scheme.
6. British Columbia (interior) vegetable scheme.
7. British Columbia coast growers' vegetable marketing scheme.
8. Doors manufactured in British Columbia.
9. British Columbia sheep and sheep products.

Note: Fruit export marketing scheme for Canada is applicable to British Columbia.

(b) 1, approved; 2, approved; 3, approved; 4, approved; 5, under consideration; 6, under consideration; 7, under consideration; 8, returned; 9, returned.

(c) 1. Kelowna, B.C.; 2, Vancouver, B.C.; 3, Vancouver, B.C.; 4, Vancouver, B.C.; 5, Prince Rupert, B.C.; 6, Kelowna, B.C.; 7, Vancouver, B.C.; 8, Vancouver, B.C.; 9, No information.

(d) 1. W. E. Haskins; O. W. Hembling; G. A. Barrat.
2. Hugh Dalton; K. Kimura; T. Matsuyama; R. Nelson, F. E. Burke.
3. British Columbia Red Cedar Shingle Export Assoc. (Agency).
4. Hugh Davidson; W. T. McArthur; Wm. J. Park.
5. Geo. Fritz; D. Ritchie; Geo. Anderson; E. Greenstrand.
6. T. Wilkinson; F. W. Hack; R. B. Homersham.
7. Arthur Swenson; A. H. Peterson; Joseph Maxwell.
8. Names not given in scheme.
9. No information.

(e) 1. $250 per month.
2. Chairman—$3,600 per year.
3. Salaries not given in scheme.
4. Salaries not given in scheme.
5. No salary authorized under scheme.
6. To be fixed by growers' delegates.
7. No salary authorized under scheme.
8. No information.
9. No information.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

Mr. JEAN:

1. Are there any accurate statistics as to the number of unemployed in Canada?
2. Who compiles such statistics?
3. In what manner are these statistics compiled?
4. On what sources of information are the statistics based?
5. What was the number of unemployed in Canada on December 31, 1934, or at the earliest possible date?
6. What was the number of unemployed, by province, at the same date?
7. What is the total number of dependents of those unemployed?

PICTOU, N.S. WHARF LUMBER PURCHASED

Mr. BRASSET:

1. Has a certain quantity of lumber been sent from Pictou, Nova Scotia, to the Magdalen islands for wharf construction?
2. If so, what quantity has been purchased and how much has been forwarded?

3. From whom was this lumber purchased and were tenders called for the purchase of same?
4. What price was paid for this lumber?

HORNBY SETTLEMENT PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, on January 24 I directed a question to the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon). He was not in the house, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) promised to direct his attention to the question. I should like to repeat the question, in order to give the minister a chance to answer it or at least give us some information in regard to it. Will the minister lay on the table of the house copies of the scheme for local settlement under the Hornby plan in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr Speaker, I have delayed answering the question because the plan of General Hornby, which I believe has been discussed by him with certain counties and probably with many individuals, never has been outlined in complete form to the department, I have written General Hornby, or had my officers write him, in the hope that he will outline to me the complete details of the scheme he has in mind. I have heard a good deal about it, but not being in possession of the complete plan he has in mind I thought it desirable to wait until he answered by communication. Then I will speak to the matter again.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) inquired with respect to Canada's permanent seat on the international labour organization, and I promised to give the answer as soon as I had the information. With the permission of the house I would like to read a short statement.

Part 13 of the treaty of Versailles, which established the international labour organization, provided that its governing body should consist of representatives (a) of member states; (b) of employers' organizations, and (c) of workers' organizations. The states represented on the governing body were to be the eight states of chief industrial importance among the members of the international labour organization, who were to have permanent seats on the body, plus a number of states, first four and now eight, elected by the international labour conference for a three year term.

The question of determining which were the eight states of chief industrial importance presented difficulties from the inception of the organization. The first provisional list prepared in 1919 was challenged by a number of governments which thought they should be included in the first eight. It was not then known whether Germany and the United States would become members of the organization, and it was thought inexpedient to proceed to the establishment of a list which, everyone recognized, would require reconsideration if either of these great industrial states joined the international labour organization. Subsequently Germany decided to join the organization in 1920, but the United States deferred its application to enter until the summer of 1934.

In 1922 the council of the league to which the question had been referred decided that the eight members of the international labour organization should be Germany, Belgium, Canada, France, Great Britain, India, Italy and Japan. This list was prepared on the basis of seven criteria, namely:

(1) total industrial population (in the strict sense of the term) including the mining and transport industries;

(2) the proportion which the industrial population bears to the whole population;

(3) total horse-power (steam and water power), not including locomotives and vessels;

(4) Horse power per head of population.

(5) Total length of railways;

(6) Length of railways per thousand square kilometres of territory;

(7) Development of the mercantile marine.

The list thus established has been in effect since 1922. Last year, however, the entry of Russia into the League of Nations, which involved its accession to the international labour organization and the decision of the United States of America to adhere to the international labour organization, created a new situation which was further complicated by the withdrawal of Germany from the league and the international labour organization—subject to two years' notice of denunciation—which will elapse in November, 1935. It was clear to everyone concerned that this new situation would require the preparation of a new list of the eight members of chief industrial importance.

It was the view of the Canadian government that the determination of the eight states of chief industrial importance was, in the first instance, the function of the international labour conference—a body on which all members of the organization are represented—and which appoints three-quarters of the governing body, and that, consequently, the governing body itself was not warranted in assuming that function. From a careful study of the treaty and of the decisions affecting its interpretation we were led to the conclusion that whatever authority was competent to determine the list of eight states, this list should only be revised when the three-year term of the elected members of the governing body had expired. Finally, the question arose as to the criteria to be adopted.

These problems, primarily of a legal and constitutional nature arising out of the interpretation of the relevant parts of the treaty of Versailles and of the opinions expressed on earlier occasions in the council of the League of Nations, have been the subject of careful consideration by the government. They were discussed with representatives of the international labour organization in Geneva by the Canadian delegation to the last assembly of the league. We have since kept in close touch with the discussions which preceded the last meeting of the governing body, at which it was decided to revise the list of eight states of chief industrial importance, and bring the revised list into force at the first opportunity. Our concern in these discussions has been to see that the international labour organization remained constant to its constitution as it was laid down by the labour articles of the treaty and has been interpreted by the competent authorities established for that purpose.

The legal and constitutional questions raised in the course of the consideration of this question are of importance to the smooth functioning of the international labour organization, and the government are considering the advisability of requesting that steps be taken to clarify and place on a definite and unmistakable basis the procedure to be followed in determining at what periods and in what manner the list of eight states should be revised in future.

At the session of the governing body which ended on January 31, the governing body adopted a revised list of eight countries of chief industrial importance, namely the United States, Great Britain, Germany, France, India, Russia, Italy and Japan, and voted unanimously to accord Canada and Belgium seats on the governing body as deputy members until 1937. This solution of a difficult question has the great merit of securing the close cooperation and responsibility of the United States in the work of an organization with which Canada has been associated from the beginning and to which it is the policy of this government to give unwavering support. Nevertheless the constitutional administrative question cannot be said to be satisfactorily settled.

The correspondence that passed between the government and our representative at Geneva I regret to say I will not table because in the past it has never been the practice to table communications of that character, as they have been held to be confidential communications between a government and its representative.

BRITISH IMPORTS OF RUSSIAN TIMBER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, last evening the junior member for Ottawa (Mr. Ahearn) directed the attention of the house to a report in a newspaper respecting trade arrangements made between Timber Distributors Limited of Great Britain and the Soviet Union. I observe he placed upon the record a clipping from the newspaper which reads:

> Deal concluded between Great Britain and Soviet. Canada to lose lumber trade. Fifty per cent of Canadian export to Britain in 1935 threatened.

It is difficult to understand just why any newspaper should make any statement of the kind which is not borne out by the article in question. No deal or contract has been made between Great Britain and the Soviet Union. Timber Distributors Limited is a joint stock company operated, as I understand it, in Great Britain. Its members are largely dealers in timber. They have for a period of years made contracts for the delivery of supplies of timber from Russia to their yards in Great Britain which they, in turn, have sold to customers. There has been inserted in such contracts a provision known as the "fall clause," and under the provisions of an article in the Ottawa agreements the Canadian government is given the right to protest to the British government if as a result of the introduction of that clause into the contract the preference which is granted to Canada under the Ottawa agreement made with Great Britain is prejudicially or injuriously affected.

Last year we did protest against the so-called "fall clause" and other terms of the contract made between the private enterprise known as Timber Distributors Limited and the Russian Soviet. As a result the board of trade determined on a middle course, and the obnoxious clause was eliminated, with the result that we secured a market for a very large quantity of timber in Great Britain. Of course we have nothing to do with the contracts which may be entered into between a private enterprise and the Soviet Union. They may make any contract they wish. But having made the contract, if it prejudicially affects the interests of Canadian shippers we then call upon the British government to take such steps as may be necessary to remedy the injury which may be done. Great Britain has secured for the executive from parliament the power to enable them to deal with the situation when necessity arises. We have already filed with the board of trade a statement indicating what the position of Canada is with respect to any contract which contains the fall clause or prejudicially affects the interests of our country in connection with the export of timber.

PELEE ISLAND COMMUNICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). Connected with the constituency I have the honour to represent there is an island known as Pelee island which has enjoyed three sources of direct communication, namely by cable, telephone and aerial services. All services seem to be out of commission. I should like to know if the minister can give me any assurance that the services will be restored as soon as possible.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): This is the first I have heard about the interruption of the services to which the hon. member has referred. I assure him without hesitation that inquiries will at once be made and communication reestablished.

EMPIRE TRADE AGREEMENTS

PROPOSED APPROVAL OF OPERATION OF AGREEMENTS CONCLUDED AT IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE, 1932

The house resumed from Thursday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris (Toronto-Scarborough):

That, in the opinion of this house, the operation of the trade agreements concluded at the imperial economic conference held at Ottawa, 1932, merits the approval of this house.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the resolution presently before the house calling upon us to endorse the Ottawa trade agreements of 1932 was, I have no doubt, put upon the order paper at the instigation of the government. Certainly it was put there with the government's hearty approval.

The purpose in putting this resolution on the order paper is abundantly clear. It was no doubt expected that it would greatly embarrass the members of the opposition to vote against the motion, but for my part, Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest hesitation in accepting the challenge.

The objections that were urged against the Ottawa trade agreements in 1932 still hold. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made it abundantly clear that those fundamental principles underlying these agreements to which we objected in 1932 are still there, and still open to all the objections that we urged at that time. In my judgment a great opportunity was missed at that Ottawa conference. It is not given to every man to have the opportunity to correct his blunders, but there was given to the Prime Minister the opportunity to correct the great blunder that he made at the first conference to which he went in England in 1930. But instead of embracing that opportunity he continued still to blunder, and the result was that the Ottawa agreements were built upon an utterly unsound foundation.

I had the pleasure of listening to the speech that was made by the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin at the opening of the conference. I was sitting in a garage in a little town out in Manitoba at the time, and when I heard Mr. Baldwin's speech it filled me with delight. Stanley Baldwin expressed the hope that the agreements would be based upon reductions of tariffs rather than upon increases, but unfortunately the attitude of the Prime Minister of Canada was entirely different. He insisted that the agreements should be based upon an entirely different principle, and it is an open secret that on more than one occasion the Ottawa conference was on the verge of collapse. I have not the slightest doubt that had it not been for the spectacle which Great Britain and the dominions would have presented to the world if the imperial statesmen had gone home without an agreement, that actually that would have been the result, but it was simply impossible that the conference should disband without some agreement at least being arrived at; and so, Mr. Speaker, instead of calling those agreements, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) did, the bulwark of our trade, I say that they are a house built upon the sand rather than upon the solid rock of good will. There is no issue that I would welcome more heartily, no issue on which I would more gladly conduct a campaign in my constituency than the Ottawa agreements and the difference in the attitude of the two political parties on the question of an imperial preference.

I wish to discuss these agreements from two aspects; first, their effect on the revenue and the burden of taxation; and secondly, the supposed effect of the six cents preference on wheat. But first I should like to make a few general remarks.

It is a false assumption that everything that has happened since the Ottawa agreements has been the result of those agreements. It is a very common thing for people who do not reason closely to say that, because such and such a thing was done, therefore this is the result. I know that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) is well aware that the most common fallacy that is known in logic is "post hoc, ergo propter hoc." It is the most common fallacy to assume that because such and such a thing happened or was done that everything that subsequently followed was the result of that preceding event. It has been pointed out by the right hon. leader of the opposition that we have that fallacy to-day, the assumption that because certain things have happened in connection with our trade they are necessarily the result of the Ottawa agreements. But, Mr. Speaker, there are many other factors that have entered into the problem and these must be taken into account. Every factor must be given due consideration in endeavouring to come to a conclusion on questions such as these.

I might also point out that very often we have an entirely wrong use made of statistics. It is one thing to quote at length statistics that may be right or wrong—we will admit that they are right—but it is another thing entirely to draw correct conclusions from those statistics. It is one thing to recognize facts, and an entirely different thing to draw the proper conclusion from those facts. We have had statistics presented to the house but we found that the conclusions drawn from them were entirely wrong. Let me give a simple illustration that we had in this house not very long ago of how entirely wrong conclusions can be drawn from certain facts.

The Prime Minister undertook to paint us a picture of the result of the by-elections. It was a picture very different from what some others of us might paint. The Prime Minister is evidently an expert at extracting sunshine from cucumbers, and it would be quite easy to show that the conclusions that can be drawn from the facts are very different from those which the Prime Minister drew.

I would like to say a word in commendation of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am glad to congratulate him on the high office to which he has been appointed and to which I am sure he will do honour. I should like to quote a few sentences from his speech in this debate. He said:

> I believe Mr. Fielding's chief claim to fame in history—and I desire to accord to the memory of that very great gentleman that which was his due—will be the fact that he brought in the British preferential tariff. But I also believe that Mr. Fielding and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, if they had confessed what was in their inmost hearts, would have admitted that when they made that gesture for empire trade, they also held the firm belief that the government of the United Kingdom would reciprocate. But this did not occur.

May I congratulate the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce upon the moderation he displayed in making that statement. No one can object to a statement like that. It may or may not be true that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding had in their inmost hearts the hope that there would be reciprocal preference. Whether that be true or not we do not know, but there was no harm at least in the Minister of Trade and Commerce saying that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At the imperial conference of 1897 Sir Wilfrid Laurier specifically asked for it.

Mr. ROWE: And in 1902 and in 1907.

Mr. BROWN: I am afraid that I shall have to withdraw some of the compliments that I have passed on my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You will have to revise your own information.

Mr. BROWN: I expressed my appreciation of the language that was used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day when he said he believed that these two eminent statesmen had in their inmost hearts the hope that there would be reciprocal preference. If the Prime Minister would be as moderate in his language as that, one of our chief complaints against him would be removed. But he does not content himself with saying that he believes that these men in their inmost hearts hope for reciprocal trade. What he undertakes to do in season and out of season is to show that the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and of Mr. Fielding was the same as his own policy, and he tries to do this by partial quotations, by taking statements here and there apart from their context, and without any regard to the circumstances under which they were spoken. By so doing he has again and again tried to impress upon the people that Sir Wilfrid Laurier's attitude was the same as his own. It has been an entire misrepresentation of the attitude of the Liberal party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member allow me a question? If not I will sit down.

Mr. VALLANCE: Remember, you are in the ministry now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the hon. gentleman read the report of the imperial conference of 1926 in which his leader asked for reciprocal trade?

Mr. BROWN: Let me tell the difference between the attitude of the Conservative party and the attitude of the Liberal party. The attitude of the Liberal party, as I understand it, has always been that if Great Britain saw fit to concede preferences we were willing to accept them; and there is no question that at one time, when the British government did impose duties, Sir Wilfrid Laurier did ask that in that case Canadian products might be exempt from those duties. There is no question about that fact. But that is an entirely different thing from demanding that Great Britain should change her fiscal policy for our benefit. Sir Wilfrid Laurier knew perfectly well that Canada would greatly resent any suggestion from Britain that we should change our fiscal policy to benefit her, and he knew, as we knew, that it would be regarded as an impertinence for us to suggest that the British government should change its fiscal policy in order to give us preferences. There is all the difference in the world between these two policies, and if anyone has any doubt on this point I would commend to him a reading of the speech made by the Prime Minister in defending these agreements in 1932, and after that a reading of the speech made by the leader of the opposition, who completely demolished every argument advanced by the Prime Minister.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): There is a limit to all things.

Mr. BROWN: It is somewhat unfortunate that hon. gentlemen opposite are unable to differentiate between two things so essentially different that even kindergarten children would be able to distinguish between them. I said I would discuss this question from the standpoint of the effect on the revenues and I will call two witnesses.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I always knew there were Grits.

Mr. BROWN: I do not object to these interruptions; I rather delight in them, only I do not want them to use up too much of my time.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Thank heaven they were on your side.

Mr. BROWN: As to the effect on the revenue, the first witness I will call is the Minister of Finance, and I want to say to him that I am discussing these Ottawa agreements as a part of the general tariff policy of the government. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Myers) made the statement the other day, which is quite correct, that the foundations of these agreements were laid in the short session of 1930; so that when we consider the Ottawa agreements, from the standpoint of their effect on the revenues, we must consider them as part of the tariff policy of the government. I believe it was in his first budget speech that the Minister of Finance made a statement something like this, in referring to the fact that the customs revenue had been reduced; he said that it was in part attributable to the policy of this government in encouraging home trade. Because of that reduction in customs revenue, brought about by this policy, he had to impose other taxes. There was the tax on sugar, there was the 3 per cent excise tax, so called, and there was an increase in the sales tax. I will call another witness, this time the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis). The hon. member for Souris seems to have been acting as spokesman for the Conservative members from the prairies. Throughout the west he has been making speeches, and the whole attempt of these hon. members is to try to show that the burden of taxation was increased under the late government. I have here a copy of the Winnipeg Free Press in which there is a report of a speech made by the hon. member in Winnipeg. The Free Press printed it very fully, and the only criticism I have to make is that it was not placed among what children call the funnies. The hon. member was trying to show these people in Wininpeg—he did not seem to have a high estimate of their intelligence—that the former government had increased the burden of tariff taxation upon the people. Point No. 3 says—

Mr. WILLIS: Read 1 and 2; they are good too.

Mr. BROWN: I cannot deal with the whole speech.

Point No. 3 was the Free Press assertion that under Mr. King "there were reductions in tariff taxation and in the sales tax, which was almost wiped out." Of this Mr. Willis said:—

Listen to this:

"The peak of tariff taxation was reached in the year ending March 31, 1929, when the King administration obtained more than $200,000,000 from the people, whereas in 1933 tariff taxation netted only $65,000,000."

What does the Minister of Finance think of that? While he is deploring the fact that the revenues have been reduced to such an extent that he deems it necessary to impose a sugar tax, a sales tax and a three per cent excise tax, the hon. member for Souris goes through the country taking satisfaction from the fact that the revenues had been reduced from $200,000,000 to $65,000,000. What sort of argument is that to put to the people? I am perfectly right in saying that it ought to be placed among the funnies. The unfortunate thing is that he is not alone. I understand that hon. members from the prairies are making the same statement. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking he referred to the fact that the Liberals had adopted as a matter of policy a reduction in the tariff and I am reported as having said: "Tell that to the western provinces." What I did say was: "Tell that to the western Tories," for they have always been contending that the burden of tariff taxation was greater under the Liberals than it had been previously.

Let me give an illustration and see whether hon. gentleman can understand it. Supposing I buy a suit of clothes from England at a price of $50 and there is a duty of 30 per cent; that suit would cost me $65 and the government receives $15. Next year I happen to be a little more prosperous and I find I can stand the purchase of two suits of clothes. In the meantime the tariff has been reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. In that case I have two suits of clothes for a price of $100 and the government has received $25 in revenue, or an additional $10. Under the peculiar reasoning of hon. gentleman opposite I have had the extra burden laid upon me because I have been able to buy two suits of clothes and contribute more to the revenue. That is the same kind of argument as was used by the hon. member for Souris.

We have heard something about a certain study club that was supposed to study these questions and a famous document was prepared for that club. I heartily commend the idea; it is badly needed, and I hope the Minister of Finance will undertake to instruct that particular club in some of these very elementary principles of tariff taxation. They might be instructed that it is sometimes possible to have a low rate of duty and a largely increased revenue. They might learn above everything else that the amount of tariff taxation that is seen in the customs returns is only a part and often a very small part of the total burden that is laid upon the people by the tariff.

There is another item in that speech to which I wish to refer. The hon. member undertook to answer the statement that the sales tax had been reduced. Listen to what he said:

Reductions in the sales tax are claimed, whereas in the fiscal year, 1923-24, $100,000,000 was obtained, the highest on record.

Why does the hon. gentleman go back to 1923-24? Does he think that answers the statement that under the then Liberal government the sales tax was being reduced? In common fairness ought he not to have taken more recent figures than those? We know the history of the sales tax. When the Liberal government came into power the sales tax was imposed at three different points, the tax being I think two per cent at each point. Some say two and a half per cent and I am not sure just which it was but it does not matter. First it was applied to the importer or manufacturer, then to the wholesaler and then to the retail man. It was found in the actual working that, in the pyramiding, it amounted sometimes to as much as eight per cent. That method was found to be rather cumbersome and the Liberal government consolidated the tax at six per cent which was really a smaller tax than had prevailed under the Conservative government. The Liberal government gradually reduced that year after year until in the last full year of the Liberal government—

An hon. MEMBER: Pre-election.

Mr. BROWN: Do not talk about pre-election. From the bureau of statistics I learned that the sales tax had been reduced to $34,936,375.98 on domestic sales and $9,922,-325.22 on importations. When Mr. Dunning delivered his budget speech in May, 1930, he indicated that the sales tax was to be cut in half, that is, reduced to one per cent. I think I am right in saying that in the short session of 1930 no change was made in the sales tax so that for all the fiscal year ending March 31, 1931, the rate still held and for that year the figures were $16,586,975.30 on domestic sales and $4,196,968.85 on importations. I again ask the house: Is it fair to the people of Canada for hon. members to use an argument of that kind? I will leave it to the house to characterize it for itself; I might fall foul of the Speaker were I to attempt to do so.

I am now going to deal with the supposed effect of the six cent preference on wheat. In the same speech the hon. member for Souris said:

> Under the Ottawa agreements, the six cents per bushel British preference on wheat has resulted in increased sales to that country.

That is his statement; it is a very general one, but it cannot be borne out by the facts. There is not a tittle of evidence to support it; indeed, all the evidence is to the contrary. I have before me a statement which I received from the bureau of statistics just the other day in answer to a request. In 1932, the year of the Ottawa agreements, the proportion of British imports that were supplied by Canada was 44·35 per cent; in 1933 it was 40·55 per cent, and in 1934, 34·8 per cent. Does that show that the Ottawa agreements resulted in an increase in the imports from Canada into Great Britain? It indicates rather the reverse. I shall however be more fair than the hon. member for Souris is in this matter. I am willing to say that the 34·8 per cent seems to represent over a period of ten years about a fair proportion of the British imports that went from Canada and I have the figures under my hand. I have also the quantity of wheat that was exported via Canadian ports and via United States ports to Great Britain. There is this interesting fact that when we consider the value of those exports, via Canadian ports it amounts to 77·39 cents per bushel and via United States ports to 77·069 cents per bushel. I presented similar figures last year when I was able to show that wheat shipped via United States ports to Great Britain brought a slightly higher price than wheat sold via Canadian ports. I could not give an explanation of that. I asked for one and the then Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that it might be because wheat going via United States ports is of a higher grade. I have made inquiries as to that and there is no reason to believe wheat going via United States ports is of any different grade from that going via Canadian ports. There is the situation. I maintain there is not a tittle of evidence as regards either quantity or price to show that any benefit whatever has been received from the six cent preference.

There is another matter that I want to clean up in connection with the wheat situation. I have to come again to a speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He made a speech in Saint John, N.B., a short time ago, of which I shall read a few sections. Again I can congratulate the minister upon his straightforwardness in expressing the government's attitude in regard to this six cent preference on wheat going by American ports, as contrasted with the somewhat evasive attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens).

> Efforts to defeat the plan to benefit Canadian ports through the empire trade agreements by shipping Canadian grain to the United Kingdom from New York and still obtaining preferential tariff treatment have been unsuccessful so far, Minister of Trade and Commerce R. B. Hanson said at a banquet here in his honour Friday night.
> Recent increases in the movement of Canadian grain through United States ports had been made up of grain destined for foreign countries, and Canadian ports were handling the wheat bound for the United Kingdom.
> "From time to time efforts have been made to overcome and defeat the preferred position we have received in the markets of the United Kingdom, and to obtain the preference for Canadian grain stored in Buffalo," said the minister.

Remember, the minister is speaking to a maritime province audience and is trying to convince them that this particular agreement was a benefit to their ports. That seems to be what he had in mind. He goes on to say:

> Very recently and since coming into the department, my attention has been directed to the fact that between August 1, and November 23, a very substantial quantity of Canadian wheat had been shipped out via the port of New York.
> "Being fearful a portion of this grain was being shipped to the United Kingdom and accorded the British preference—

Think of that, "being fearful" that some Canadian grain was being accorded the preference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Via American ports.

Mr. BROWN: We do not care about whose ports.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad you said that. That will crucify the next Liberal candidate in Saint John.

Mr. BROWN: All right, I shall have more to say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope you will, go right ahead.

Mr. BROWN:

—I took steps to ascertain the facts, and I find that while in the period in question 9,146,000 bushels of Canadian wheat were exported to Europe via the port of New York, not a single bushel of this huge quantity went to the United Kingdom;

He further says:

So I think we can safely say that so far as the matter can be controlled, either by the Canadian government or by the United Kingdom government, Canadian grain for consumption in the United Kingdom is now being exported via Canadian ports.

Now let us have some facts. I am not going to dispute the figures the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave, because he reports the New York shipments, while my figures refer to American ports in general, so there may be some discrepancy. But during those months he refers to, if I draw the correct inference, in September at least 1,560,560 bushels must have gone to Great Britain from American ports. We shipped via Canadian river and sea ports 4,597,833 bushels, and the total exports of wheat to the United Kingdom from Canada were 6,158,393 bushels. So the difference must have been made up by that part of the cargoes which went from American ports, shipped to the old country for orders. No other explanation can be given for that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are all wrong.

Mr. BROWN: Then there is this further fact, that in December on the same calculation almost 2,000,000 bushels were shipped via American ports.

Going back to May and June we find shipments in May of 7,479,281 bushels and in June 7,752,227 bushels. That was before the present minister came into office. But here is the situation. The minister was telling his maritime audience of the great benefits to their ports by reason of the actions of this government, but these figures show that there is not a bushel more going via Canadian ports than there was formerly, or a bushel less going via American ports. So hon. members from the maritime provinces may take this as conclusive, that as far as protecting the trade via their ports is concerned this preference does not amount to anything, nor does it as far as the price we have received or the amount of wheat we have shipped are concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? Is he able to say, on the authority of any official communication that he has, that any wheat going via American ports has been accorded the six cents preference?

Mr. BROWN: No, I do not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But you tried to leave that inference.

Mr. BROWN: No, I am distinctly disclaiming that. I say the minister is to be congratulated on having made a clear and straightforward statement of the policy of the government. We suspected some time ago, when this thing was up, that that was the policy of the government, but the evasive answers that we got from the Prime Minister and the former Minister of Trade and Commerce left us not knowing where we were. Now I think it is for the government to make a clear statement that that is and has been the policy of the government. If it had been candidly avowed before this the country would have had a better understanding of the whole situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Page the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Michaud).

Mr BROWN: I am not concerned with that at all. The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska and the other maritime members can take these figures, and I shall show them that in spite of the claims of the minister these particular agreements have not been worth a hoot to them.

Mr. ROWE: Would you be in favour of rescinding them?

Mr. BROWN: You can rescind the preference as soon as you like as far as I am concerned, because it never amounted to anything, never did a particle of good. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to give us any figures proving that we get any benefit.

Mr. TURNBULL: Would you rescind the whole treaty?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Lisgar a moment ago permitted an interruption; had it not been for that I should have intervened some time since.

Mr. BROWN: I have no objection at all to interruptions.

Mr. TURNBULL: I have no intention of interrupting without the hon member's consent, but I ask if he would be in favour of rescinding the whole treaty.

Mr. BROWN: I am going to say this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer the question.

Mr. BROWN: It would be a strange treaty indeed that had no bright spots in it, but I say without hesitation that I have not the slightest fear that any modification that might be made or proposed by the Liberals would prejudice or have any ill effect on our exports to the old country. Our attitude to Great Britain has been infinitely more acceptable to them than the attitude of the Conservative party. Did we ever hear of recriminations before this treaty came into effect?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You gave everything and got nothing.

Mr. BROWN: There was nothing but good will. Did we ever hear the expression "humbug" in relation to any proposition we made?

Mr. WILLIS: Tell us about the Hawley-Smoot tariff.

Mr. BROWN: I have not the slightest fear that any modifications we might suggest in regard to this treaty would have any prejudicial effect upon our exports to Great Britain.

Mr BELL (Hamilton): But do you speak for your leader?

Mr. BROWN: I think so. He is able to speak for himself, but I have confidence in the leader of my party to that extent, that he will neither make nor seek any modification that will have any prejudicial effect upon our exports. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think my time must be pretty nearly exhausted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BROWN: Again I wish to state that I will have no hesitation whatever in voting against this resolution.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now under consideration calls for an expression of opinion to the effect that the operation of the trade agreements concluded at the imperial conference held in Ottawa in 1932 merits the approval of this house. I think I can say that I have closely followed the speeches already delivered in this debate, and I think I can safely say also that with the exception of the last speaker, who has stated quite clearly that he welcomes this opportunity of voting against the resolution, all those who have spoken have left the impression, though not one has stated that these agreements do not merit the approval of the house, that they intend to vote against the resolution.

First I should like to refer to the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) who spent almost an hour and a half trying to convince the house—and I imagine this side of the house in particular—that while for several weeks he opposed this legislation and voted against it, together with his party, he really favours the agreement. Yet, while he now states more clearly than ever that he is in favour of these agreements, apparently he is going to vote against the resolution. I must say that the right hon. gentleman did not convince me that this was the right attitude to take, and even if he had done so it simply would have meant that he has not the full support of the hon. members who sit behind him.

In my opinion there is one hon. member who deserves congratulations; I refer to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). The hon. member certainly put a great many words in his speech, which indicates that he is a great worker, and I should like to congratulate him on the labour he devoted to his address. I am not going to traverse the ground the hon. gentleman covered, except to say that many of his comparisons were not fair. For example, many of his comparisons were made in dollars. The hon. gentleman knows very well, as every hon. member knows, that because of the general decrease in commodity prices throughout the world comparisons in dollars are not fair and do not give a true picture of the situation. Others of his comparisons were between different years, which always leads to wrong conclusions. In my opinion the only fair way to pass judgment on these agreements is to compare the trade of other countries with that of Canada from 1930 to 1932 and again from 1932 to 1934.

Before I state why I think this house should pass this resolution I should like to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard). I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not in his seat, but since I am not responsible for his absence I intend to proceed with my remarks. In his speech my hon. friend painted a very dark picture of the business situation in his city. I was very much surprised to hear that, because according to my memory, and also according to the document I have before me, not more than two months ago the same hon. gentleman made a very different speech in his own city in regard to business conditions there. What is the reason for this change? Is it that the hon. member, when he speaks in his own city, has a different point of view than when he is here? Is the truth not the truth everywhere? I have before me a copy of the Sherbrooke Tribune of November 27. Every hon. member who was present the other night heard what the hon. member had to say about the business situation in Sherbrooke, but in great headlines running the full width of the newspaper I read:

Sherbrooke Knows Feverish Activity in Industry.

This is not an article written by the newspaper men; it is the report of a speech delivered by the hon. member for Sherbrooke. Here is what I find:

In a comforting report made to the chamber of commerce, Mr. C. B. Howard reveals that our silk industries are running at full time at one hundred per cent capacity, and are closely followed by the Paton manufacturing company and all the iron and steel manufacturers. Three thousand more men at work.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that this is the report of the hon. member for Sherbrooke to the chamber of commerce. Further on I find this:

The situation is sensibly improving in our city. The business activity is increasing. The commerce is more stable, and unemployment diminished. This is the encouraging declaration that Charles B. Howard, member for Sherbrooke at Ottawa, contained in a message to the members of that chamber last night in submitting his report on the activities of the industrial committee, of which he is a member.

This may give the house an idea of the degree of sincerity we may attach to the speeches made here by the hon. member for Sherbrooke. Then the hon. member for Sherbrooke went on to talk about dairy products. I do not intend to follow him in everything he said, but he made two or three observations upon which I should like to comment. He referred first to butter and other dairy products and then to cattle.

First of all I should like to correct an observation I heard him make, and which appears in Hansard to the effect that under the King administration the duty on butter was four cents a pound. The remark may have been unintentional, and if he were present I should be quite willing to accept his denial. The hon. member knew very well however that under the King administration the duty on foreign butter was only one cent per pound, and if he was mistaken I think he should have made a correction in Hansard.

I protest further against the affirmation made not only by the hon. member for Sherbrooke but by many hon. members to your left, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister and the Conservative party generally, during the campaign of 1930 promised the Canadian farmers that if that party were returned to power the farmers would receive from 50 to 60 cents per pound for their butter.

[Mr. Gobeil.]

I absolutely deny that statement, and I deny it every time I have a chance. I never made it, and throughout the whole election campaign I never heard the Prime Minister make it. I believe I may state safely that he never made it at any time. What I heard him say and what I said was that if the Conservative party were returned to office in 1930 the government would see to it that the Canadian farmer and the Canadian dairyman obtained the Canadian market for themselves.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You promised butter at 45 cents a pound.

Mr. GOBEIL: That market was obtained. The arguments advanced by hon. members opposite are not worth anything, The only just and fair comparison is to compare Canadian prices for any commodity with the prices obtaining in other countries. Then the hon. member for Sherbrooke went on to say that we promised we would stop importations of butter, and indicated that during 1934 we imported about 2,000,000 pounds. I have not his exact figures before me, but I believe I am about correct. But he did not say why we imported it. I wish hon. members would tell us why, because I am prepared to tell them. Why did we import any quantity—for the sake of argument we will say 2,000,000 pounds—in 1934, if in fact we did import it? Will any hon. member opposite deny that on every pound of butter imported during 1934 there was a duty of five cents per pound and a special tax of three cents, making a total of eight cents per pound? They will not deny it, because it is a fact which cannot be denied. How is it that New Zealand or any other country exported butter to Canada? We know that the people of New Zealand had a free market in England for their butter, and if so why did they export to this country? Why? There was only one reason, and that is that the Canadian market price for butter was so much higher than the price in Great Britain that New Zealand could export to this country, pay the duty and bring more money to their farmers than they could by shipping to England.

If instead of taxing eight cents per pound we had taxed only one cent would the Canadian farmer be in any better position to-day? Where would the Canadian farmer be to-day if there had not been a duty of eight cents a pound on butter? There would have been only one result: Our price would have been reduced by eight cents; the Canadian price of 23 cents per pound would have been only 15 cents, had there been no protection. Further, if in 1933 and 1934 the Canadian farmer had operated under the conditions which existed in 1930 under the King administration he would not have received millions and millions of dollars which in fact he did receive.

Instead of hon. members opposite saying, "Butter was selling at from 30 cents to 35 cents per pound in 1930 and it sells for only 20 cents or 22 cents to-day" they should bear in mind what would have been the condition if we had not been protected by a tariff. Their argument means nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GOBEIL: I repeat: Their argument does not mean anything except this, that if hon. members opposite had been in office from 1930 to 1933, instead of receiving 22 cents per pound our Canadian farmers would have received only 15 cents or 16 cents. Do hon. members imagine that the government or that I do not regret that butter is not selling for 30 cents or 35 cents? We certainly do regret the circumstances, but we say that due to governmental action our farmers are receiving anywhere from five cents to eight cents more per pound than they would have received had a Liberal government been in office.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke went farther. He had the audacity—is that term parliamentary?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. GOBEIL: He had the audacity to ask the government, "What did you do when you found that the American market was closed to us?" Why did he not finish his observation by saying that without a word of protest the Liberal government allowed the Canadian farmer to be excluded from the American market, because that government would not act for fear of provoking the Yankees. Does the hon. member for Sherbrooke realize what the Canadian farmer lost when the American market was closed to him? Does he really know what it meant? I do not think he does, because if he had such information he would not dare mention the subject. In the twelve months previous to June, 1930, the fresh milk and cream made into butter and exported amounted to 25,000,000 pounds. That is what we lost. That market was not lost through any fault of this government but through the fault of the previous administration. If someone is to be blamed it must be hon. members opposite. Owing to that market being closed, in the twelve following months the Canadian market had to absorb 25,000,000 pounds of butter which previously had been shipped to the United States. That is what we lost when we lost the American market.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke also mentioned cattle. Again I ask him, does he realize what it meant to the Canadian farmer to lose that market, and again I say, under the King administration. It meant that while in the twelve months previous to June, 1930, we exported to the United States almost 300,000 head of cattle, in the following year we exported less than 10,000 head. Was that the fault of this government? No, nobody will pretend that it was the fault of this government. Is it any wonder that the situation of the producers of beef and cattle in Canada was almost desperate when we lost such a valuable market without a protest—or at least without any protest that the citizens of this country know of? Those are only two items, Mr. Speaker. I could go on and mention almost every farm product against which we found the doors absolutely closed to us in June of 1930, and for that hon. members opposite are now trying to hold this government responsible, but they are mistaken. Is it possible that hon. members opposite so misjudge the good common sense of Canadians as to think that the people will believe them when they say that this government has closed the avenues of trade? Do they believe that the Canadian people will believe that without specific instances being given without mentioning at least some countries that have raised their tariffs against us since 1930? No, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite are greatly mistaken if they think they are going to be taken at their word.

What else did it mean when the American market was closed to us? What other signification did it have? What were the results in the following months? What was the balance of trade between Canada and the United States in the fiscal year 1930-31? We lost the American market only in June. The result was this, that in that fiscal year we had an adverse balance of trade with the United States of over $300,000,000. Do hon. members opposite believe that such a situation could go on indefinitely? When the hon. member for Sherbrooke asks this government "What did you do?" I reply that this Conservative government took means to correct that adverse balance of trade against Canada. It had to be corrected, and as a result of the efforts of this government instead of having an adverse of balance of trade of over $300,000,000, that had been reduced in 1932 to $87,836,456, and in 1934, last year, it had been reduced further to $49,127,522, and that was done because of the imperial agreements which give us a sheltered market in the United Kingdom for the products of the farm that we could no longer ship to the United States.

My hon. friends opposite have another argument, and it is this. They say that these agreements prevent trade with other countries, and I have heard them say that they make impossible a trade treaty with the United States, for instance. I shall not have time to make any extended remarks upon that, but let me just quote from an American newspaper to show what the people over there think of the possibilities of trade with Canada, despite the Ottawa agreements. I quote from the Boston Sunday Advertiser:

> The Ottawa empire agreements, contrary to general belief, leave ample room for Canadian-American trade. There is nothing in them to prevent Canada selling the United States more of her cattle, more of her fish, more of her milk and of copper and lumber, and so on and so forth. That is the opinion of the Americans, but that paper goes further and, referring to the Ottawa agreements, says that, not only have they been beneficial to Canada but that they have brought to Canada more industries and given Canadians more employment. In other words, if it had not been for those agreements unemployment would have been much more severe than it is. This newspaper goes on to say:

> In 1932 American branch factories established themselves in the dominion at the rate of two each week.

They crossed the border, Mr. Speaker, to escape the Canadian tariff or to secure the benefit of the empire preference, and the loss to the United States in work and wages must have been enormous. This paper goes further and says:

> To-day there are something like 1,500 of these United States branch plants in Canada, representing an investment of nearly two billion dollars and giving employment to scores of thousands of Canadians.

That is not my statement, Mr. Speaker, nor that of a member of this government, but the opinion of our neighbour to the south.

I can quite understand that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not see with any very great pleasure this resolution on the order paper. We can all understand that. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, even if the right hon. gentleman had succeeded in convincing me, despite his opposition to the legislation and his vote against it two years ago, that he was in favour of these agreements to-day, that would only demonstrate one thing and that is the lack of unity among his followers. I shall try to give one or two illustrations. Every member of this house must have noticed the change of tone in the speeches of the right hon. leader of the opposition with respect to these agreements. It is quite clear to anyone that he is now more in favour of these agreements than he was in 1932. Is it a spontaneous conversion, or is there something behind it? I have it in my mind that it might be something else than spontaneous conversion because I remember that in June of 1933 a Liberal organization with a pompous name, I believe it is called the Twentieth Century Young Liberals Association of Canada, or something of the kind, met in Ottawa for two or three days and passed some resolutions among which was one which did not seem to be quite in accord with the opinion expressed by the leader of the Liberal party in 1932. I would refer hon. members to the Montreal Gazette of June 3, 1933. The convention turned down the resolution submitted to it, that the Liberal party should do its utmost to abrogate the treaties entered into at the Ottawa conference. That Liberal convention, in my view, passed a resolution disapproving of the opinion that was expressed in this house by their leader in 1932.

Now, speaking of unity of sentiment and of the endorsation or the disapproval of the Ottawa agreements by the Liberal party I am going to remind the house of some of the statements that were made by hon. gentlemen opposite. First, I will quote from page 355 of Hansard of 1932 to show what the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) said in reference to hogs, when he was discussing these agreements:

> But they started out in the face of hogs selling at about 2¾ cents a pound—

What does he think of the price of hogs to-day?

> —trying to start a campaign to bring about greater production, based on something by way of restriction that may never materialize.

Apparently it has materialized.

> It is stated by the Prime Minister that in ten years we will have a potential market for 500,000 hogs, but those same potentialities extend to other countries. We would need to eat little but bacon and ham if we were to consume the products of a campaign such as this.

Then he went on to say this:

> It is the greatest piece of nonsense that was ever promulgated,—

What does he think of it now?

> —the greatest flimflam ever attempted to be put over on a suffering people. There is no more comfort in it than there is in a block of ice in midwinter.

I am afraid the block of ice has melted. Further on, at page 356, he said:

I did not think there was an aggregation of men in the world, either inside or outside a mental hospital, who would promulgate such a nonsensical proposition as this hog proposal as set out in the agreement.

What does he think of it now that hogs are selling at 8½ or 9 cents a pound, representing an additional $7,000,000 going into the pockets of Canadian farmers, who are receiving altogether around $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 of added money since 1932? I will quote another hon. member opposite. At page 605 of Hansard of the same year the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) made this statement:

Is there a single commitment in that article, Mr. Speaker—

He was referring to hogs.

—which obliges his majesty's government in the United Kingdom to increase the purchase of Canadian bacon and ham? This provision is surrounded by ifs and whens and hows, and in any event nothing can be done until the report of this commission is brought in. I want to make this prediction,—

Let me remind him now of the prediction he made then, and ask him what he thinks of it.

—that if in course of time the export of Canadian bacon and ham should reach the figure mentioned in article 6, the farmers all over this dominion will go into hog raising on a large scale, and instead of increasing the price of hogs the price will decrease. The price is $3.75 now, and it may go even lower.

That was the price in 1932 when we were discussing the agreements. Apparently we have not yet reached the stage referred to by the hon. gentleman, when the raising of more hogs results in a decrease in price.

Now, so far as unity of thinking is concerned, I wish to quote some words uttered by the leader of the opposition—always with reference to the imperial agreements. The house will remember that the leader of the opposition spent at least an hour telling us how dreadful it was for the present Prime Minister to have terrorized Englishmen to the extent that he had done, until they had to yield to his whip. It seems to me that was rather a compliment, though the right hon. gentleman was far from thinking that way. Let me quote some of the phrases he used as reported at page 266 of Hansard of that year:

If we have reached the point in our history where the thought of public men not only in this country but in all parts of the empire is to be terrorized by the Prime Minister of Canada, it is time that some of us should speak out and let the people of Great Britain know that the people of Canada are just as proud of an independent expression of view as are the people of Great Britain.

And on page 267, referring to the Prime Minister, the right hon. gentleman said:

He said to Great Britain, "You must change your fiscal policy before I will negotiate with you." He now says to us, "You must change your principles or you cannot support this agreement," Apparently they have changed their principles, because they support the agreement now. He went on:

The fiscal policy of Great Britain has been changed. Whether the right hon. gentleman was responsible for changing it is a matter of indifference; the fact remains that it has been changed.

The leader of the opposition was very much exercised over the fact that, according to him, the Prime Minister had imposed his will on Englishmen and terrorized and coerced them. That may be all very well in this house, but not in the country. The board of strategy, or the leader of the Liberal members from Quebec—sometimes they refer to the hon. member for Quebec East as their leader—evidently decided that these phrases were not very popular in that province, that they would not get them anywhere, and apparently therefore they deputed someone to make a different declaration, with the result that we find the following statement coming from the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), ex-Secretary of State, as reported at page 376 of Hansard:

In my opinion articles 12, 13, and 14 dealing with the tariff board are most extraordinary. I say this is the first time any other country, even if it be the United Kingdom, has been given the right by means of a commercial treaty to dictate to the government of this country concerning certain Canadian matters.

How do my hon. friends reconcile these different expressions of opinion? The hon. gentleman went further and made this statement:

Under the provisions of these articles we are being dictated to—

The leader of the opposition declared that the Prime Minister had terrorized the English at the imperial conference, but the hon. member for St. James says:

—we are being dictated to by an external government and it makes no difference whether this dictation comes from the government of the United Kingdom, of France or any other country. We are being dictated to ... I may be all wrong about this, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is abominable that the government of Canada should be told in a trade agreement by another nation, that they shall do certain things of a local character.

What does my hon. friend think of these two statements?

The next move I suppose on the part of Great Britain will be to have what gentlemen they want on that board. That would not be any worse.

And further on:

Have I read that aright, Mr. Speaker? If so, not only are we being dictated to by another government to appoint a board entirely local in its character, but here are the instructions by which the board is to be bound.

And he goes on. I am stating this not particularly that the house may know because we have already heard it, but that the citizens of Canada may know the policy of the Liberal party, their disagreement among themselves on Canadian policies or the policies of their leader.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the resolution which stands on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris), we are having a further discussion on the empire treaties. It opens up another discussion on some of the principles for which members of the house stand and it is in regard to those principles that a difference of opinion exists in connection with these particular treaties. I think it is generally agreed that we are all in favour of empire trade, but it is on the basis upon which this trade is formed, the regulations surrounding it and its effect on world trade that there is a distinct difference of opinion. I do not think for a moment our hon. friends opposite will suggest that we on this side are not in favour of empire trade, nor do I believe they will suggest that had the Liberal party been returned to power in 1930, we would not have had empire trade agreements effected; I do not think that is the contention. I would like to point out that in 1930 the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) certainly did succeed in making the Canadian people believe he had definite plans and policies which, if put into effect in this country, would solve all our problems, that markets would be secured for our basic products and prices for those products would be increased. Notwithstanding what the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) has said, the fact of the matter is that the Prime Minister went up and down this country telling the people that prices of all farm commodities and other products would be increased. I would like my hon. friend to visit the village of Exeter in my constituency and ask the people there what the Prime Minister had to say about increased prices. Other promises of the right hon. gentleman may be cited. For instance unemployment was going to be ended, and as a matter of fact all our problems were going to vanish like the melting snows on a sunny morn. I think it was generally believed he based his hopes on changing the tariff structure of this country in order to bring about these improvements. It is a fact that the present treaties are founded on the principles upon which the Conservative party hoped to fulfil the many promises given to the electors at that time.

The extent to which the increased barriers to trade were brought into effect as a result of these treaties, restricting our opportunities of promoting trade with other countries, I think is a fair question for debate. We on this side of the house believe mutual trade, and also our prospects of promoting trade elsewhere, were thereby affected. That too is a fair subject for debate. Holding that view, we opposed the treaties in 1932 and we are still of the same opinion. We feel that these treaties under their present set-up with the existing regulations will affect trade and therefore we believe they are not operating in the best interests of Canada. The hon. member for Compton suggested that we should name some countries that have raised their tariffs since these treaties have come into effect. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) in one of his speeches put on the records of the house the fact that thirty-seven countries had raised their duties against Canada.

We recall the promises that were made in 1930 and now we are told that conditions are improving. We were told the same thing in 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934. I am willing to admit there is some improvement in trade, but a similar condition exists in every other country and we are glad it does. Notwithstanding that all these promises were made in regard in promoting trade and solving our problems, what is the situation confronting us to-day? I suppose if there is any improvement, it will be credited to the empire trade agreements. It is rather amusing to listen to some of the statements, some of the addresses that have been made in connection with these treaties and some of the propaganda that has been circulated. One would think this government two years ago discovered a brand new market, one that did not exist before.

As a matter of fact that market was free to Canada long before many of us saw the light of day and in all probability it will continue to be, I will not say a free market, but a market, whether these treaties are modified or amended or in the years to come discarded altogether. But what is our situation at the present time? It is simply this, that there is not one problem that was facing this country in 1930 that is not still our problem. One can go right down the list and I think my hon. friends will agree with me when I say that all the problems that were facing us at that time are still confronting us. Take the problem of our trade. Does anyone in the house suggest that the problem of finding markets for our exports has been solved? Take the problem of our taxation and debt. Does anyone suggest that it is solved? We all know it is more serious now than when this government came into power. Take our unemployment problem, that is one that was going to be definitely ended; but a few days ago the Prime Minister admitted that there are now 400,000 unemployed, while the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) says there are at least 600,000, and the Prime Minister admits that when they came into office the number was 117,000.

Then we have the railway problem. Is that solved? What about the problems with which our farmers and wage earners are faced? It seems to me that the difficulties of our farmers during the lifetime of this government have been more serious than at any other time in our history The very fact that for a whole day here recently member after member arose to ask help for the farmers in their distress is surely evidence enough that that problem has not been solved. The fact that the government find it necessary to bring down a bill to provide $90,000,000 to assist the farmers shows how far this problem is from solution by the government and the Prime Minister who definitely promised to end unemployment and cure all the ills of the farmers. That is the situation, I venture to say no one will dispute it. I fully appreciate the fact that all of us have hopes and ambitions to accomplish certain things, and may have definite plans and ideas for doing it, but difficulties may arise which shatter those hopes and plans. That is the position in which the present government find themselves. Probably they did have some plan or idea by which they hoped to solve our problems. But after four and a half years of fair trial, facts and figures showing that they have absolutely failed, I cannot for the life of me understand how they expect hon. members of this house or the people of the country to believe that further experimentation with or application of those plans is going to do what they have failed to accomplish during the last four and a half years, or in fact at any time they have been tried since confederation. It seems to me the government would strengthen their position if they frankly admitted that the plans with which they hoped to cure the ills of this country have failed, and would now adopt some other method.

In regard to this present resolution, and the address given by the Prime Minister in Brockville early in December—I link the two together because I think that address was just a forerunner of this resolution—I have something to say. I read the report of the Prime Minister's speech with considerable interest. He intimated that one of the major issues in the coming campaign would be the empire trade agreements. Perhaps I should not put it just that way, but should say that the attitude of the opposition towards those treaties was going to be a major issue. Well, I am like the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) I welcome any discussion of these treaties in my constituency.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You were elected in opposition to them.

Mr. GOLDING: I think it is well known that the by-election held in South Huron at which I was elected was the first by-election held in Canada after these treaties had been negotiated by the government; it was even before they had been ratified by parliament. An effort was made by members of the government and by private members who sit opposite who spoke in my constituency to make these treaties the major issue in that campaign, notwithstanding that they were not yet in effect. Promises were made to my constituents as to how their position would be improved as a result of these treaties, efforts were made to make them believe they were already feeling the beneficial effects, when as I say the treaties were not in effect at all. That was just their way of trying to fool the people. The hon. member for Compton was one of the speakers sent up to try to defeat me in that contest. In the polling division at Drysdale where my hon. friend spoke the Conservative candidate got seven votes. If my hon. friend will come up when the next contest takes place—

Mr. CASGRAIN: They will get no vote at all.

Mr. GOLDING: My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), who was the first minister of the crown to come into the constituency, made a very dramatic appeal. I rather enjoy hearing him. He told the people that the eyes of the whole empire were on South Huron, and appealed to them to vote their approval of these treaties. One would have thought that the existence of the whole country hung upon them. He asked them to forget politics for the time being and vote approval. That is the sort of appeal which was made to the electors in my constituency at that time. The result of that contest did not indicate that they were very enthusiastic about these treaties.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They were wise people.

Mr. GOLDING: Since that time there have been a number of by-elections held in different sections of the country, and in each and every one the ablest speakers on the government side have tried to present the case for the government,—and I admit that they have very able and excellent speakers; indeed I wish I could express myself as forcibly and clearly as some of my hon. friends.

Mr ELLIOTT: You have a better case.

Mr. GOLDING: At any rate they tried to present the case for the government in the best possible way. But notwithstanding their best efforts they met with reverses in every constituency but one, that is in the city of Toronto where there were three candidates in the field. One must be an optimist indeed who thinks the electors can be whipped into line in regard to these treaties by any amount of oratory.

I think it ought to be clearly understood that as far as we on this side are concerned we oppose these treaties, on various grounds. But one of the grounds was that the duties against British goods were far too high, and those against foreign goods were absolutely ridiculous.

There is another thing I should like to mention. I think it would be quite impossible for anyone to read the Prime Minister's introduction of these treaties in this house without noticing the provocative and boastful language he used on that occasion. After that language his invitation to the opposition to unite with the government in passing these treaties struck me, as a new member, as rubbing it in a bit, especially in view of the fact that every hon. member on this side of the house was elected on a policy of lowering duties and extending the preference to Great Britain. When we compare that with the policy adopted by the government of raising duties on British goods to unprecedented heights, of raising them still higher on foreign goods and then, under these treaties, slightly reducing the duties on British goods and raising them still higher on foreign goods—well, I only wonder at anyone asking members on this side to support a policy of that kind. One cannot help but question the sincerity of anyone making such a request.

I think at that time every member of the official opposition had in mind the action of the government in raising duties to such heights in 1930 and 1931, and again under these treaties, as well as pegging the duties on a great many articles for a period of five years, together with all the other frills such as specific duties, excise duties, dumping duties, arbitrary valuation for duty purposes and all the other things that have helped create the difficulties and restrictions in connection with trade. I think there is another thing we should remember, and it is that the Liberal party introduced this preferential policy in the first place while the Conservatives at that time opposed it. We ought to remember also that the Dunning budget, which was so favourably received by the British press, was introduced by the Liberal party. I am not going to discuss the contents of that budget except to say that the gist of it knocks galley west, if I may use that term, the argument that we on this side of the house are not in favour of empire trade, and by the way that argument is being used on our back concessions. I think every Canadian citizen hoped that as a result of the 1932 imperial economic conference trade barriers would be lowered. It was not only Canadians who expressed that hope; I should like to quote the words of Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, who said:

> There are two ways in which increased preference can be given—either by lowering barriers among themselves or by raising them against others. The choice between these two must be governed largely by local considerations, but subject to that, it seems to us that we should endeavour to follow the first rather than the second course. For however great our resources, we cannot isolate ourselves from the world. No nation or group of nations, however wealthy and populous, can maintain prosperity in a world where depression and impoverishment reign. Let us therefore aim at the lowering rather than the raising of barriers, even if we cannot fully achieve our purpose now, and let us remember that any action we take here is bound to have its reactions elsewhere.

That was the position taken by Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, but it was not the position taken by our representatives, and as a result of their action and of these treaties there is no question that trade has been restricted and our opportunities for promoting trade lessened. I think we should ask ourselves this question, which I think is fair and reasonable: Supposing our delegation had accepted the suggestion of Mr. Baldwin and the conference had agreed to lower trade barriers. Would it not have had the effect of stimulating trade not only within the empire but with the whole world? Further than that, when the whole world was trying to raise tariffs, if the empire had set the example and lowered tariffs would it not have had the effect of opening up channels of trade in many other countries? Let us look at the other picture. The very fact that the British empire agreed to raise trade barriers had its effect on trade both inside and outside the empire; it had the effect of making every country cover up, and the vicious circle continued. It seems to me that we could have done a great deal more effective blasting, if that is the term you want to use, by lowering trade barriers at that time than we have been able to do by raising them. Further than that I cannot see how we can expect to gain access to markets by shutting out goods from those same markets, by publicly admitting that certain actions were taken to shut out the foreigner, and by openly stating that every nation wanting to do business with the British empire must pay tribute for that privilege. It does seem to me that these are damaging statements, and that it will take a good deal of scientific blasting to overcome their effects.

Now I should like to refer to some statements made by the Prime Minister when he introduced these treaties. He said:

> I have not yet touched on that farm commodity which is at the moment of most immediate importance to this country. Finding wheat and flour markets is the great problem facing our wheat growers to-day.

Then he went on to tell us that we had secured free entry for wheat as against a duty of six cents a bushel against foreign countries, and that on flour we had secured free entry as against a ten per cent duty against foreigners. Then he added:

> Our secured place in the British flour market means that British domestic millers can only compete with the Canadian flour if they use Canadian wheat standards.

If anyone will take time to look up our exports of wheat and flour for the past few years he will find exactly what has happened in this regard. In 1934, 178,175 barrels of flour were shipped to Canada, of which 105,431 barrels came from the United Kingdom. That is the situation we have to-day. I have before me the figures showing the value of exports in certain commodities. The following table will serve to indicate the value of the total exports of fruits, vegetables, grains, milled products, seeds, tobacco, animals (living); meats, milk and its products, and wool; and the value of that portion which went to the United Kingdom in the years mentioned:

Fiscal year—	Total exports to all countries	Exports to the United Kingdom
1929-30	$368,000,000	$199,000,000
1933-34	207,000,000	133,000,000

In 1930 our total exports of all commodities were valued at $1,145,000,000, while in 1933-34 they were valued at only $585,000,000. While in the year 1928-29 the exports of all commodities to the United Kingdom were valued at $431,000,000 we are told that that is the market which was discovered only two years ago. Between the fiscal years 1920-21 and 1929-30 the average value of our total exports to the United Kingdom was $368,000,000 per year, while in the year ending December 31, 1934, our total exports to the United Kingdom were valued at $270,000,000. I know I shall be met with the arguments used by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), namely that it is not fair to compare values of 1930 with those of 1934. I frankly admit that under ordinary circumstances that would be quite true. The difference however is that our farmers were promised that the prices they were getting in 1930 would be increased, and this government secured thousands of votes because of that promise. In view of that circumstance I believe I am quite within my rights when I make the comparisons I have made.

I should like to refer to another statement made by the Prime Minister. A few days ago he suggested that if there was any dissatisfaction in the old land in connection with these agreements the Liberal party was responsible for it. Let me state right here and now that I think that was a mighty small thing for a big man to say.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He is small, sometimes.

Mr. GOLDING: Speaking about the trade agreements on October 12, 1932, the Prime Minister said:

> On wheat we have secured a preference of two shillings per quarter. Article 4 of the agreement makes the continuance of this preference, as well as the preferences granted in respect to copper, zinc and lead conditional upon empire producers of these commodities being able and willing to offer them a first sale in the United Kingdom at prices not exceeding the world prices and in quantities sufficient to supply the requirements of the United Kingdom consumers.

I am not going to labour this point, but I wish to ask hon. members opposite if they think Canada is keeping that agreement with the United Kingdom in either the letter or the spirit.

A Canadian press dispatch from Victoria, B.C., dated October 5, states:

"New Zealand is getting tired of the way in which Canada is carrying on" according to David Jones, chairman of the Meat Producers' Board of Wellington, New Zealand, who passed through here on the R.M.S. Niagara early to-day. "Unless the spirit of the Ottawa agreements is more liberally interpreted in this country, it will not be long before we will be compelled to adopt measures which will be more to our advantage," Mr. Jones told newspapermen.

I submit in all fairness that if there is any dissatisfaction with the agreements it has been caused by the government themselves.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They are no good.

Mr. GOLDING: It seems to me that on everything we sell to the United Kingdom we manipulate and manœuvre in order to keep the prices above ordinary prices, and against everything they have to sell to us we have tariffs, dumping duties and many other obstacles placed in the way. The result is that appeals have to be made to the tariff board; we have complaints of all kinds, and a growing sense of dissatisfaction which certainly cannot do any good to a treaty.

Hon. members opposite talk about our entry into the British market. I am satisfied our market there to-day is more restricted than it has been at any other time, and I am further satisfied that as time goes on it will become more restricted. Hon. members opposite have persuaded the United Kingdom to adopt the policy of protection, a policy which in the very nature of things promotes restriction. I submit the agricultural self-containment policy being pushed by the Minister of Agriculture in the United Kingdom is a more serious threat to our markets over there than anything which has happened heretofore, and something which every hon. member must consider.

At page 135 of Hansard for October 12, 1932, the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that a preferential position in this market will be of immense advantage to Canada in maintaining our great wheat growing areas—

[Mr. Golding.]

And he added:

—while world sources of supply are being compelled to adjust their acreage to market requirements.

That was a beautiful picture to hold before the western wheat grower. After reading that observation any person exporting wheat would naturally come to the conclusion that his position was secure. Certainly he would not assume that within a year and a half the same Prime Minister would be back asking him to sign an agreement to curtail his acreage and production. That is exactly what happened, and the disappointment the wheat farmers have experienced is in keeping with the disappointments so many people have experienced in connection with the trade treaties.

So far as I am concerned, and I believe I am voicing the views of hon. members on this side of the house, I welcome trade within the empire and trade with any other country. The most important objective any Canadian government could have at the present time would be to try to promote trade through lower rather than higher trade barriers. I wish to state as emphatically as I can that I object to high tariffs because they take from the farmer or the producer a large portion of the product he produces and give him nothing in return. I was more than pleased to hear the Prime Minister a few days ago tell this house, as appears in Hansard:

I have never believed in high tariffs.

That came as rather a shock to me, I must confess, although I have listened to so many statements from the Prime Minister that I really should not have been shocked at that. I think the only difference between the Prime Minister and myself so far as tariffs are concerned is that he has in season and out of season advocated and voted for high tariffs.

An hon. MEMBER: And still higher.

Mr. GOLDING: Yes, and higher tariffs; whereas since I have been privileged to be a member of this house I have spoken and voted against high tariffs, and I intend to continue to vote against high tariffs.

My right hon. leader a few nights ago outlined the situation in connection with certain tariffs to which we strongly object. Here are nine items that are used in every Canadian home: Dyed or printed cotton fabric, white cotton flannelette; wool piece fabric, wool overcoating, wool high grade suiting, wool suiting of a cheaper grade, wool hosiery, wool blankets for the household, and Axminster carpets. I shall not quote the rates of duty on each, but assuming that we buy one thousand dollars' worth of each of these articles—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Stanley): The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. GOLDING: I shall be through in a minute, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry I have not another half hour. I was about to say that on these nine articles, if we imported one thousand dollars' worth of each, we would pay about $2,100 more in duty at the present time than we would have had to pay in duty under the Liberal government in 1930. That I submit is a serious situation. I want to tell my hon. friend from Compton and the members on the other side of the house that I shall have no hesitation at all in voting against this motion, and I shall not be the slightest bit afraid to go back to my constituency and meet every one of my electors.

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a very few observations I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) for having moved this resolution. I really believe that in so doing he was prompted by the thought that is in the minds of the majority of the people of the Dominion of Canada, and that is a desire to know definitely where the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his party in this house stand with reference to the Ottawa agreements.

I listened to the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition the other night. I thought it was an able speech, considering the subject, and I have read it and reread it since; but I cannot for the life of me tell definitely what his attitude is towards these agreements or what he would do in regard to them if he were prime minister of this country.

I should also like to compliment the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) for his industry in going through a long list of exports and imports to select a few specified ones such as rice and the odd carload of barley to show that there was not an increase in our export trade in all commodities. It is not necessary for me to deal with what the hon. member for New Westminster said, because his argument could not have been more completely annihilated than it was by his right hon. leader in the first few minutes of his speech, in which he said, not simply that trade had increased since the Ottawa agreements, but that in the last year alone, from October 31, 1933, to October 31, 1934, our trade with the United Kingdom had increased in the neighbourhood of $90,000,000.

I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard)—and I am sorry he is not in his seat to-day, not because I wish him particularly to be present for my congratulations but rather that in his absence I do not feel like making some remarks I would otherwise have made—I should like to congratulate him on making one of the best efforts that could be made in denunciation of the policy of his right hon. leader during the period of nine years when he was Prime Minister of this country, particularly as regards a market for our live stock and dairy products.

The right hon. leader of the opposition stated at the commencement of his address that he felt it would be fairer for purposes of comparison, rather than to take the low point of the depression, 1932, and compare it with the present, to make the comparison between the time he and his government went out of power and the present time. To show you how fair the right hon. gentleman was in those remarks, and also that we may have a clear picture of the situation that confronted this government with reference to markets for our agricultural products, I should like to put on record as shortly as possible what did happen as far as the restrictions of our trade is concerned during the period of nine years when the present leader of the opposition was head of the government in this country; and I shall deal in this connection only with agricultural products. I want to show the restrictions and barriers that had been set up against our trade in agricultural products during the nine years, from 1921 to 1930, that the Liberals were in office—and they were barriers just as insuperable as though stone walls had been built without gates in them between the United States and this country. May I add that I fail to find record of any protest, however slight, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite against the action of our neighbour to the south in thus shutting their markets to us, or any effort on the part of the Liberal government to have those barriers removed. Here are the figures:

	U.S. tariff in force to May, 1921	U.S. tariff June 18, 1930
Wheat	free	42 cents bushel
Cattle—
Under 700 pounds	free	2½ cents pound
Over 700 pounds	free	3 cents pound
Sheep	free	$3 each
Beef	free	6 cents pound
Bacons and hams	free	3¼ cents pound
Pork (fresh, chilled or frozen)	free	2½ cents pound
Other pork (prepared or preserved)	free	3¼ cents pound
Lard	free	3 cents pound
Butter	2½ cents pound	14 cents pound
Cheese	20 per cent	7 cents pound
Eggs	free	10 cents dozen

That duty on cattle in force on June 18, 1930, means a duty of $30—on a 1,000-pound steer—a prohibitive duty.

No record even nearly equalling that can be written against any other government that ever was in power in this country. While the Liberal party was in power insurmountable barriers were imposed against the export of our agricultural products to the United States which furnishes our natural market for those products; and because that market was closed entirely to our agricultural products we found ourselves in this position. In 1927, 283,000 head of cattle were marketed from this country in the United States; in 1928, 242,354 head, and in 1929 there was marketed a little over a quarter of a million head. We find ourselves confronted, then, with this problem—not only to market what had hitherto been the normal quantity of live stock but, on top of this, this great weight of a quarter of a million head, that we had been able to lift off, year after year, turned back and weighting down our live stock market. That was our first problem and one of the greatest, but it was only typical, so far as markets are concerned, in connection with our agricultural products. It was typical of the whole heritage which we received when we took power in 1930.

In the face of this one cannot conceive how it is possible for hon. members opposite to go up and down the country singing their favourite song, "We want wider markets; we will give you wider markets, lower tariffs, freer trade." Yet that is the record of hon. gentlemen opposite. As regards finding further markets for our live stock, we explored and investigated every possibility. In the first place, we took steps to give the Canadian market to the Canadian farmer. Immediately afterwards negotiations were entered into with the United Kingdom and with the other dominions in an endeavour to get a preference in those markets for our live stock, and we were successful in getting an entry for our cattle under the Ottawa agreements, without the restrictions that had been against them for years and which successive governments had tried unsuccessfully to have removed. In addition to that, we were most anxious, during the process of the negotiations in connection with the Ottawa agreements, to get every advantage we could in the way of a further market for our live stock. That was why we were exceedingly anxious, so far as our bacon and hogs were concerned, to obtain every possible advantage which we felt would raise the prices of these commodities. And we were successful to this extent, that there is less bacon eaten in this country now, with the result of a greater consumption of beef. In that way we have secured a double advantage in raising not only the price of bacon but, as well, the price of our cattle.

Under the Ottawa agreements we obtained the advantage of shipping into the United Kingdom, free of any tariff, a quota of bacon each year for five years of 280,000,000 pounds. Hon. members opposite have said that this market was always free for our bacon and hogs. The fact is however that it was no longer to be free after the report of the pig commission in the United Kingdom. Much has been said in this house with respect to the statement of Mr. Baldwin at the opening of the conference; that it was not the policy of this government but the policy of the British government, acting on the report of this pig commission, that they would not keep out these products by tariffs—because it was felt that the tariff could not be raised high enough, when you compare living conditions in the old country with conditions that prevail in competing countries. If anyone has any doubt with regard to the effect of the British government's policy, in restricting imports of bacon to the United Kingdom, on the increase of prices of bacon in this country, I do not think that any fair-minded person will dispute the evidence that can be submitted to show that there is a direct connection. And I propose to submit that evidence.

The evidence that I will give the house will show that, as the United Kingdom increased restrictions against bacon entering that country, their price went up, and our price month by month, with scarcely an exception, went up step by step with it.

Mr. YOUNG: What raised the price in Denmark?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The same thing. In November, after the agreements were ratified and this policy put into effect, the price of select bacon at Toronto was $1.42 per hundredweight. The rate of restriction which the United Kingdom placed against foreign countries increased from fifteen per cent gradually to fifty-six per cent; and when fifty-six out of every hundred pounds had been shut out, the price of select bacon in Toronto increased from $5 to $10.17, which is in line with the increase in price of bacon in the old country.

I will ask hon. members this. If we had not obtained that advantageous market for our products, what other force existed to raise the price of bacon, when we consider the great additional quantity of cattle for which we had to find a market. Take the number of inspected slaughterings of live stock from 1931 to 1934—not estimates, but actual slaughterings in the inspected packing plants. There was an increase in 1934 of over 1,000,000 head of live stock—cattle, calves, hogs, sheep and lambs. Had it not been for this outlet to the United Kingdom, surely no fairminded person could defend any argument to the effect that there would have been an increase in price in any event. Could there have been such an increase had it not been for this advantage which we received? And it was because of the increase in the price of hogs and the decrease in the price of beef, in comparison, which had caused less bacon and more beef to be consumed, that there has resulted in the past three years an increase in the price, at the end of each year, not only of bacon but also of cattle. For the week ended December 22, 1932, the price of choice steers in Toronto was from $3.90 to $4.50 per hundred; for the week ended December 22, 1933, it was $4.50 to $5.50; and for the week ended December 22, 1934, it was $5 to $5.65, the reason for the increase being as I have stated.

What has been the effect in dollars and cents of this increase in our hog prices in the dominion, admitting that the only factor that has increased the price of hogs has been that preferential market which we have received? Here are the figures. In 1933 the public hog marketings amounted to 3,205,418 head and the average dominion price was $5 per hundredweight. In consequence of the Ottawa agreements there was an increase of $1.05 per hundredweight or $2.10 per head over 1932, or a net increase in total value of $6,731,378. In 1934 the public hog marketings amounted to 3,006,111, the dominion average price being $8 per hundredweight, showing an increase over 1932 of $4.05 per hundredweight or $8.10 per head, or a total net increase in value of $24,349,499. And taking the two years, 1933 and 1934, we have a total value of price improvement amounting to $31,080,877. But the public marketings, that is marketings through inspected abattoirs, are estimated to be approximately one-half of the total amount, and there is an increase in the price of the hogs that are marketed, outside the packing plants by the local butchers, because this price is set by the world price, so that double the amount of holdings means double $31,000,000, or approximately $60,000,000. I should be glad if hon. gentlemen could give any other reason why hog prices and cattle prices in this country have increased in view of the fact that we had to find a market for so many more live stock because of the lack of any effort on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to prevent our products from being shut out entirely from the markets of the United States.

With reference to dairy products, if the duty against butter coming into this country from Australia and New Zealand was reduced to what it was when this government came into power, what would happen? The leader of the opposition stated in the house that one of his first objectives, if returned to power, would be to put the tariffs back to where they were when his party went out of office. He does not say that they will do this; it is an objective and that objective may be so far in the distant future that they may not be called upon to do it at all. The fact is that the price of Canadian butter on the Montreal market of a quality equivalent to Australian butter was the same as on the London market. That is, if we did not have the tariff of five cents under the treaty, or eight cents under the British preference, New Zealand and Australia could ship butter to Montreal and Vancouver for the same price as that at which it could be delivered in London, and with their difficulty in finding an outlet for their butter, there is no doubt it would have been delivered in Montreal and Vancouver at this price so that the result would have been disastrous to our dairy farmers. In 1933, if this duty had not been against butter, it would have enabled New Zealand and Australia to dispose of their butter in our country at a duty of only one cent a pound, and the following would have been the result. I am taking butter in the months when production is at its highest. In 1933, therefore the net increase due to our tariffs has been:

May to December inclusive:	Net increase
Creamery butter	$5,254,067 88
Dairy butter	2,335,141 28
Total	$7,589,209 16

The figures for 1934 are as follows:

May to October inclusive:	Net increase
Creamery butter	$ 9,058,081 71
Dairy butter	4,025,814 09
Total	$13,083,895 80

That is, through our policies that much more money was turned back to the farmers engaged in the dairy industry. The reason why I have dealt with these two items is that they were mentioned especially by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, and in both cases, if any government was responsible for the loss of markets it was that which sat for nine years under the present right hon. leader of the opposition. The effect of the tariff raised by the United States against the dairy and creamery products of this country was such as to prevent the shipment of them into the United States and to deprive us of a market that formerly absorbed as high as 52,000,000 pounds of cheese in one year, or the equivalent which is, 26,000,000 pounds of butter; or the equivalent quantity of fluid milk was thrown back to be absorbed on the markets of this country or otherwise disposed of. At the same time during the regime of the hon. gentleman opposite there had been allowed into Canada from other dominions, New Zealand and Australia, a quantity of butter in the neighbourhood of 30,000,000 pounds.

In connection with fruit I had hoped to be able to give more detailed information but this has been made unnecessary to a great extent by the excellent presentation that was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Compton. He covered the field so thoroughly that there is really little left except to fill in a little more of this information. I quote the effect of the Imperial conference agreements. As a result of the conference agreements, Canada's exports to January 2, 1933, to the United Kingdom, showed increases of 133 per cent on barrels and 11 per cent on boxes, while United States exports to that market declined 64 per cent on barrels and 32 per cent on boxes. This is from our own statistics. I would like to quote what R. G. Phillips, Secretary of the International Apple Shippers' Association, Rochester, New York, has to say in a brief on the export apple situation. He makes the following comments:

(a) Re export developments in Canada and the United States.

From the 1928-29 season to April 1, to the 1932-33 season to April 1, the records show as follows:

Canada gained 38 points: The United States lost 38·6 points. Canada has been broadening her field by reciprocal trade treaties and free entry into Great Britain, while United States outlets are being rapidly curtailed.

Canada is broadening her export markets by commercial treaties including Germany, France, et al, and under the Ottawa accord, while the United States sits by and sees its markets curtailed. That curtailment will be more pronounced from now on, unless something is done.

(b) Re economic conference agreement and exchange situation.

The net result of these trade barriers and disruptions was that United States' exports of apples to Great Britain (our best customer) declined 38 per cent this present season to April 1, 1933.

That is the report of an outside, impartial authority on the effect of the Ottawa agreements on apples so far as Canada and the United States are concerned.

The tariff agreement with Germany providing a reduction in duty on Canadian apples effective January 1, 1933, has had a wonderful effect on Canadian shipments to that country, yet hon. gentlemen opposite state that as a result of the Ottawa agreements it has been impossible for Canada to make a trade agreement with any other country. The total shipments from April 1, 1933, to January 3, 1934, to Germany amounted to 47,350 barrels as compared with 843 during the preceding fiscal year.

Protective measures of the Canadian tariff have resulted in a marked reduction in imports from the United States. A marked reduction in exports to the United States cannot be attributed to higher tariffs. Imports of apples from the United States are as follows:

Year	Barrels
1929-30	150,549
1932-33	64,742

Thus a much greater market in apples was given to those grown by Canadian apple growers.

During the fiscal year to January 4, 1934, 1,629,639 barrels of Canadian apples were sold in the United Kingdom as compared with 700,512 barrels for the corresponding period of the year before, and 1,600,003 boxes as compared with 1,442,361 boxes the year before, or increases of 133 per cent and 11 per cent respectively.

Those are three of our major commodities. Time will not permit me to go into detail in connection with others, but I would like to place on record the following summary of Canada's exports to the United Kingdom for the twelve months ended December 31, 1932, 1933 and 1934:

CANADA'S EXPORTS TO UNITED KINGDOM

	12 Months ended December 31st

Mr. POULIOT: All farm products!

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the minister trying to get through before six o'clock?—because I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, I shall not finish until after recess.

The right hon. leader of the opposition the other night selected two articles to demonstrate the effect of tariff increases by the present government under the Ottawa agreements. No doubt he had surveyed the field very carefully before he picked out these two. One can almost see in it the handwriting of a gentleman who has devoted years to this special work of just picking out enough to give the picture he desires. He set out clearly the effect of the increased duty and left the inference that the result was a decrease in trade. But here are the actual results: under Liberal tariff in the calendar year 1930 Canada purchased 32·4 million square yards of cotton cloth, while under the Conservative tariff, in 1934, Canada purchased 63·8 million square yards, or twice as much. Not only is that true, but while the price of woollen tops from which blankets were made had gone up, yet the price of the finished article had gone down. Another point is that in 1930 Canadian workers in the woollen industry had only 22·8 per cent of their home market, foreign mills having 20·4 per cent and British mills 57·8 per cent; while in 1934 British mills had 41 per cent of the Canadian market, foreign mills 1·3 per cent and Canadian mills 57·7 per cent, with a decrease in the price of the article.

I intended to put on record the decrease in the price, but I shall not take time to do so; if anyone wishes to look it up the figures are available. Or with the permission of the house I can put it on Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister is asking to put some of this on record without reading it; I strongly object.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is quite correct, they can go on Hansard without being read only by permission of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: I object; read the figures.

Mr WEIR (Melfort): These figures are taken from the Price and Price Indexes of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics:

	In 1932 drop from 1930	In Dec. 1934 drop from 1930
Blue denim	9.6c. per lb.	7.7c. per lb.
Cotton sheeting	3.6c. per lb.	1.0c. per lb.
Balbriggan underwear	53.0c. per doz.	43.0c. per doz.
Woollen cloth	20.0c. per yd.	10.0c. per yd.
Botany cloth	25.0c. per yd.	24.0c. per yd.
Middling cotton	6.3c. per lb.	0.5c. per lb.
3-4 blood wool	7.3c. per lb.	3.0c. per lb.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, when the house took recess at six o'clock I had dealt with one of the major arguments presented by the right hon. leader of the opposition. Nothing could be better evidence of how difficult it was for the right hon. gentleman to find arguments than the fact that he was forced to select the arguments he did, because they vindicate the stand taken by the manufacturers before 1930 that if they were assured of some tariff stability they could produce goods more cheaply and secure wider markets.

The next argument presented by the right hon. gentleman is an even better demonstration of how difficult he found it to discover anything to say against the Ottawa agreements. He had to travel all the way to the state of western Australia in an endeavour to find an argument against these agreements. He suggested that western Australia asked for separation from Australia because of these agreements. The referendum on the subject of separation was granted to the people of that state by a Conservative government and the vote was held in 1932, so the Ottawa agreements had nothing whatever to do with it. Although the referendum was carried the government that granted the referendum was defeated while the party that took a stand against the referendum was returned to power.

The right hon. gentleman next criticized this government for taking to itself the rights of parliament. This I deny absolutely. This government never has taken any step without having received the sanction of parliament, but what was the record of my right hon. friend when his government was in power? I hold in my hand a copy of an order in council dated at Government House, Ottawa, September 26, 1925, which reads:

Present
The Deputy of His Excellency
The Governor General in Council

The Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, is pleased to order that under the provisions of section 5 of The Australian Trade Agreement Act, 1925, and subject to the provisions of the said act, the rates of duties set out in schedule 2 to the said act shall be and the same are hereby extended to goods the produce or manufacture of New Zealand when imported into Canada.

Without even bringing the matter before parliament the government of the right hon. gentleman changed treaties to such an extent as to make a complete new treaty.

Then the right hon. gentleman dealt at some length with the attitude of the Prime Minister during the conference. In reading from the statement by Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin my right hon. friend was careful to read only that part that suited him. I should like to read what Mr. Baldwin said at the conclusion of the Ottawa conference:

Over that conference it was fitting that your own Prime Minister, the Prime Minister of Canada, should preside, and fortunate have we been that in Canada's Prime Minister we have a man so admirably qualified for that difficult task. He possesses a power of drive given to few, which is an essential element in the conduct of business of this kind. He has a grasp of detail which is astonishing, and yet with all, when one realizes what a grasp of detail involves, I have been struck all the time by his accessibility, that he has always been ready to discuss points as they arise with any delegation at any hour and in any place.

Nothing could more completely contradict the case which the right hon. gentleman and his followers have endeavoured to build up since that conference, to the effect that the Prime Minister had taken a dictatorial attitude at that time. I venture to say that when the minor details of that conference have been forgotten, the memory that will be outstanding in the minds of those who attended will be the particular characteristics of the Prime Minister that made it a success, as stated so well by Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin.

The other day in his address the right hon. leader of the opposition stated that he sat in the gallery and listened to the opening remarks of Mr. Baldwin. I think it only fair to the people of the country, and especially to hon. members of this house, that I take this opportunity of putting on record, by way of contrast to the attitude of the right hon. gentleman now, a verbatim statement given by him and appearing in the Toronto Daily Star of September 28, 1932, in an interview with Mr. R. E. Knowles:

"I observed you, Mr. King, at the conference's opening, sitting in the gallery, beside Sir Robert Borden. Did you and he suffer much? I mean, did you exceedingly long to be in the game? Did you not feel you could have done it better yourself?"

Mr. King only stroked the dome of St. Paul's, afore referred to, and laughed. "It was a great relief," he said—

In this you have the picture of a man who for nine years was prime minister of the country, clearly stating his great relief at being out of it all, with no urge, no thrill, no call of duty to see what contribution he could make. He was glad that it was possible for him to escape the effort.

The right hon. gentleman stated that Conservative members of parliament have been going around the country suggesting that if he is returned to power he will cancel the Ottawa agreements, and he has intimated that this is not correct. I should like to quote from one of the most partisan Liberal newspapers in western Canada, the Moose Jaw Times of October 19, 1933, which says:

We venture to predict that one of the first and major matters that Canada will expect of Mackenzie King and the Liberal party—when returned to power so soon as Premier Bennett provides a general election—will be a cancellation of the Bennett trade agreements—

This resolution has been placed before the house, Mr. Speaker, so that the people of Canada may know just where the right hon. gentleman stands in connection with this matter. He has stated that he has not changed his attitude since the Ottawa agreements were signed in 1932, and I should like to put on record what his attitude was at that time. I quote from Hansard of October 17, 1932:

How can we be expected to support them, and still preserve our self-respect in the matter of supporting our own principles? . . . I say the principle imbedded here is wholly indefensible and is undeserving of any support from any part of the British empire.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am glad hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear," because following the discussion of these agreements, and before the vote was taken, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) moved an amendment, which asked that the Canadian dollar be placed on a parity with the British pound. So the house was asked whether or not it was in favour of the Ottawa agreements, with the added condition that the dollar be placed on a parity with the pound. The right hon. gentleman and, I believe, all his supporters, voted for that amendment, but what is the position at the present time? To-day the dollar is on a parity with the pound, but they refuse to take the stand they took at that time.

I have carefully read the statement of the right hon. leader of the opposition as to his stand on these agreements. In one-half column there are six if's, a number of and's, but's, maybe's, whether's, whether or not's and unless's. Plenty of loopholes have been left, and in addition he said he reserved the right to make a decision on such changes as might be desired. I must say, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, that this, from the standpoint of a speech which purports to make a statement, is not a speech at all; but rather it is a cross-word puzzle.

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, when before six o'clock I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) read into Hansard multitudinous statistics I recalled an incident which took place in this house when there was a passage between Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir George Foster. Sir Wilfrid, after listening to Sir George read page after page of statistics to prove that Canada was prosperous, rose in his place and said, "When the party I have the honour to lead comes into power it will not be necessary for one to read statistics to prove that he is prosperous. I will ask every artisan, merchant and farmer in the country to put his hands in his pockets, and there he will find the evidence of his prosperity."

In placing these statistics on Hansard the minister was simply imitating his leader's actions in the year 1931. We well remember that on April 21, 1931, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said, respecting western Canada, that these great provinces had produced $1,900,000,000 worth of new wealth in two years. He said he knew from bank reports that there were tens of thousands of farmers in western Canada who had bank balances, that he knew the farmers in western Canada had $300,000,000 worth of automobiles which in the previous year had cost them $9,000,000 or $10,000,000 in running costs and registration fees.

After hearing what the Prime Minister had to say and after listening to the Minister of Agriculture to-night I wondered whether or not we might be mistaken with regard to our prosperity, and I thought that perhaps, after all, these figures read so glibly might indicate that we are prosperous. But what are the hard facts? Never before in the history of Canada has agriculture in all its phases sunk to such a low level as it has during the regime of the right hon. gentleman opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: That is a wonderful argument.

Mr. McPHEE: I will give you the details of the argument later on.

Mr. SANDERSON: You can't take it; that's the trouble.

Mr. McPHEE: The minister read statistics to prove that the cattle business is prosperous, that the hog business is prosperous, and compared the prices for those commodities with the prices of 1932. Why did he not go back to 1930? That is the year his leader said agriculture in Canada was suffering, and that the panacea needed was simply his return to office, in which event the people of Canada would have all they required. Why did not the Minister of Agriculture tell the house and country that bacon and hams were worth $24 a hundredweight in 1930, while in the peak of the year 1933 they were worth only $11 per hundredweight? Why did he not tell them that, instead of putting on Hansard thousands of figures which can be of no use? I should like to place side by side with those statistics quoted by the minister the figures appearing in the statement I hold in my hand.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. McPHEE: My hon. friend is a small individual and the person to whom he refers is a large one, and I would not begin to compare them. I do not interrupt when the hon. member is speaking; as a matter of fact I do not interrupt anyone. I want the Minister of Agriculture to take notice of the facts I am about to place on Hansard. I notice he has one of the highly respected cattle men of western Canada sitting beside him, and I wish he would take the advice of that gentleman. On November 4, a farmer of Stornoway shipped 26 head of cattle and 20 hogs to Winnipeg. The hon. member about whom I have just spoken has no doubt on many occasions shipped cattle to Winnipeg. On November 5, 1934, he received a statement from Winnipeg indicating that the cattle and hogs had been sold for $490.75 and after paying freight and other charges amounting to $108.75 the sum of $382 was coming to him. The result was that he received only $382 for 26 steers and 20 hogs. These are the hard facts, so far as agriculture in Canada is concerned.

I believe the figures I have given bear out my statement that never in the history of western Canada has agriculture reached such a low ebb as it has during the last five years under the supervision of the present government.

Mr. SANDERSON: The same applies to eastern Canada.

Mr. McPHEE: The question of the endorsement of the trade agreements reopens the whole matter of trade with Great Britain, and the preferences which Canada has given Great Britain in our markets. We go back to 1897, when the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced a preference which gave Great Britain a 25 per cent preference in the Canadian market. That amount was afterwards increased to 33⅓ per cent. What was the attitude of the Conservative party of that day concerning the subject of the British preference? Now they throw out the challenge, "Would you interfere with imperial conference agreements if your party came into office?" Let us go back to 1897 and see what their record was.

An hon. MEMBER: Would you cancel the agreements?

Mr. McPHEE: Yes we would, and restore the Liberal policy; and believe me we have already said so, from the Atlantic to the Pacific in four provincial elections and in half a dozen by-elections. I will deal with that before I am through.

Let us go back to 1897 when the British preference was introduced, and examine the attitude of the Conservative party of that day. These great loyalists of to-day, what were they then? Speaking in the House of Commons in the year 1897 Sir Charles Tupper, then leader of the Conservative party, said this about the British preference:

> What is the result? The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence. While hon. members gloat, vindictively gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries, I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail, of those industries in the Montreal Gazette, where one manufacturer after another declared that their industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return to the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the house was in charge of the fiscal policy of this country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.
> I deplore from the bottom of my heart the ruin that is going to be inflicted upon the best interests of Canada.

So said the Conservative party of 1897. Three or four years later the preference was increased to 33⅓ per cent. This country derived great benefits from its trade with Great Britain; the volume increased by leaps and bounds. The Minister of Agriculture gave some figures showing our trade with the United Kingdom since the agreements became effective in 1932. Let me go back to the three years before 1930 and compare the trade in Canada with the United Kingdom in that period with our trade with the United Kingdom in the last three years. My hon. friend picked out the lowest year in this series of years of debt, deficit and decay. He took the year 1932 as the criterion. But let us go back to 1929, 1928, 1927, 1926, 1925, 1924, 1923, 1922, those prosperous years of empire trade, and see what are the figures.

In 1927 our imports from Great Britain amounted in round figures to $163,930,000, and our exports $448,000,000, or $285,000,000 more of exports than imports. In 1928 our imports from Great Britain amounted to $186,000,000, and our exports to Great Britain, $412,000,000.

Mr. LOUCKS: What was our export of wheat in 1929?

Mr. McPHEE: I will come to that in a minute, and I thank my hon. friend very much for reminding me of it; but let me complete these figures first. In 1929 our imports from Great Britain were $194,000,000, and our exports to Great Britain, $431,000,000. There was not a year previous to 1930 that our exports to Great Britain were not anywhere from two to three hundred million dollars more than our imports from Great Britain. But what about the years since 1932? In 1932 we imported from Great Britain $106,000,000 worth of goods as compared with $194,000,000 in 1929, and we exported to Great Britain $174,000,000 as compared with $431,000,000 of exports in 1929. In 1933 we imported $86,000,000 worth of British goods—a marked drop—and we exported $185,000,000 worth, as compared with $431,000,000 in 1929. In 1934 we imported from Great Britain $113,000,000 worth of goods and exported $270,000,000, as compared with $448,000,000 six years before that. Why did not my hon. friend take the years 1929, 1928, 1927, or preceding years and make his comparison with any of those years before 1930?

My hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) spoke about wheat, and I am mighty glad he mentioned it because there were some promises made in 1930 about wheat, and I want to go into that matter.

For the last two fiscal years for which we have the figures, what have been our shipments of wheat to Great Britain?—and remember that we are supposed to have a preference of six cents a bushel in the British market for our wheat. For the year ended March, 1933, Great Britain imported 133,000,000 bushels of wheat, and for the year ended March, 1934, 132,000,000 odd bushels—not very much difference. In 1933 Great Britain imported 75,000,000 bushels of our wheat, and she imported from the United States 2,000,000 bushels; from the Argentine 15,000,000; from Australia, 26,000,000; from Russia, 3,900,000, and from other countries, 10,000,000 bushels. But last year the United Kingdom imported from Canada only 46,000,000 bushels of wheat; from the Argentine, 29,000,000; from Australia, 28,000,000; from Russia, 14,000,000, and from other countries, 13,000,000 bushels, proving conclusively that during the year 1934, notwithstanding our preference of six cents a bushel in the British market, we sold 29,000,000 bushels less of wheat than we did in 1933, and that amount was taken up by the Argentine, Australia and Russia.

To complete the record of the Liberal government with regard to Canada's trade with Great Britain, let me say that every concession that was given by Canada to Great Britain was the result of Liberal administration of affairs in this country. Take, for instance, the first 25 per cent preference in 1897; then the increase to 33⅓ per cent some four or five years later. The next preference to be extended to Great Britain is in what was known as the Dunning budget. I want this house and the country to realize the condition that was created in the mind of the British purchaser as a result of nine years of Liberal rule in this country under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition in this house. In one of the government publications published in the summer of 1930 there is this report of conditions obtaining in England with regard to Canadian produce. It is headed, "Canada Week in Bristol, England," and reads:

May 1, 1930—"Canada Week" designed as part of the publicity campaign that is bringing to the notice of British people the immense variety of Canada's products has just been successfully held in Bristol, England.

Five hundred leading stores gave up their windows to attractive displays of Canadian goods and tens of thousands of the public entered for a competition based on the varying popularity of what they saw or purchased.

Importers and wholesalers report a marked increase in demand and it may be said that Canada is definitely on the map so far as the west of England is concerned.

The lord mayor and city council gave the "Canada Week" the fullest civic support. Premises were taken in the heart of the city for the headquarters of the campaign to "boost" Canadian products and here thousands of samples were sold every day.

That was the condition of Canadian trade with Great Britain in 1930; but what happened in 1930?

An hon. MEMBER: The Hawley-Smoot tariff.

Mr. McPHEE: I will deal with that later. In 1930 we had a promiser go up and down this country. Notwithstanding that Canada then was prosperous, so prosperous that to-day Conservative speakers will not compare their record with that year or the years before it, we had a promiser go up and down this country saying: What you want is high tariffs in Canada. And now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the subject of wheat. "Listen, you agriculturists of western Canada and the rest of Canada"—I am going back to June 10, 1930. "Listen, you agriculturists of western Canada and the rest of Canada, you who have been taught to mock at tariffs and applaud free trade; tell me when did free trade ever fight for you. I will make tariffs fight for you. I will use tariffs to blast a way into the markets of the world." Those were the effervescent statements that won the election of 1930; and while my hon. friends opposite may gloat over the fact that numerically they have a majority in the house to put this motion through, I challenge them to appeal to the acid test of public opinion in Canada and see what will be the result.

At the time those statements were made by the present Prime Minister, Canadian wheat was selling for $1.10 a bushel, on June 10, 1930. What is the price to-day? The price to-day Mr. Speaker, is 60 cents a bushel, and it is pegged at that. Coarse grains went down last month from 17 to 20 cents a bushel, and yet we hear talk about a prosperous Canadian agriculture!

Mr. CASGRAIN: Never under the Tories.

Mr McPHEE: One of the cartoons my hon. friends opposite used in our western country in the election campaign of 1930 showed a Canadian wheat farmer standing in the middle of a wheat field shouting to a diminutive picture of the then leader of the government, "What are you going to do for my wheat?" Well, if he had the same concern about doing something for the farmer with wheat at $1.10 a bushel, what is the situation now with wheat at half that price?

High tariffs were to be the panacea that was going to cure all the ills of the country. The first imperial conference took place and the Prime Minister went to Great Britain and told the people of that country that they must maintain an open market for us, that they must impose a duty of ten per cent against the rest of the world so that we might have a preference. He was turned down. The Minister of Agriculture quotes the final message of Mr. Stanley Baldwin to the present Prime Minister of Canada as Mr. Baldwin was leaving this country. Naturally, an Englishman is a gentleman, and in leaving the country Mr. Baldwin wanted to pay as nice a compliment as he could to the man whose guest he had been. Why did not the Minister of Agriculture quote what Mr. Thomas said? Why did he not quote what Snowden said? Snowden said, "If you adopt the ten per cent tariff, then we are on the slippery slope that will lead to the bottomless pit." And there was Mr. Thomas with his "humbug."

The first imperial conference proved a fiasco, and at the second imperial conference we were supposed to get a preference of six cents a bushel on our wheat. Is there anyone in this house who will raise his hand and say that as a result of that agreement he got one cent of an increase in the price of his wheat, let alone six cents a bushel? But we did get something else out of that agreement. We again got a dose of high tariff which put us further into the mire than we had been in before. We are told in the schedule attached to the agreement that Canada would give a preference to Great Britain in connection with a certain number of articles, and here again I want to pay tribute to the astuteness of the British bargainer. What do you suppose some of these articles were? What were some of the concessions which we gave to Great Britain in return for the supposed six cents a bushel on our wheat? To begin with, mickey mouse periodicals, No. 171 of the schedule. If any of my hon. friends opposite have any doubt about it let them refer to the article. Then we find automobiles from Great Britain, free of duty. There are two kinds of automobiles we could import from Great Britain, the millionaire's car and the little baby Austin, and I should like to see the baby Austin in operation on some of our sideroads in this country.

Mr. DUFF: What about the Bennett buggy?

Mr. McPHEE: I think I have some photographs in my desk. The millionaire automobile is admitted into Canada free of duty under the pretence of giving Canadian farmers a preference of six cents a bushel on their wheat, but if you want to import a bicycle for your boy or a baby carriage for your child you pay a duty of thirty-five cents on the dollar. Another item is ladies' long elbow length kid gloves; these are free of duty under the pretence of a benefit of six cents a bushel to Canadian farmers on their wheat, and which they never did get. But if you want to import babies' socks you pay 35 cents on the dollar and in addition seventy-five cents on a dozen pairs.

An evening or two ago, at the close of the session, I went down to get my mail and I got a government publication published under the auspices of the Minister of Public Works—a government report. I opened the book and in the dim and dismal light surrounding the post office I saw the almost nude picture of a man. I wondered whether it was Mussolini or Hitler or the rotund figure of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. When I got to my room where there was a light I found that it was a picture of Job, the title being "Job in his Misery." Well, we are all familiar with the biblical story; we know what misery Job suffered, and we would be a hardhearted generation if we did not sympathize to the fullest extent with him in his affliction. But there are human boils and economic boils, and I do not need to tell the farmer and the labouring man of Canada that this country has had economic boils during the last five years. And what are some of the boils it has had? Tariff ruination for one thing. I have here a statement in connection with western agriculture which I should like to put on record. These are authentic figures. The Minister of Agriculture put some figures on Hansard and they may be authentic too, but it would take a generation to read them over and compare them.

In the United States a Ford truck can be bought for 595 bushels of potatoes; in Canada it would take 3,200 bushels to buy the same truck. A turkey rancher in the United States can buy a Ford truck for 2,795 pounds, whereas it would take 6,600 pounds of turkey in Canada to buy the same truck here. In the United States a cattle man can exchange six steers for a Ford truck whereas his brother the Canadian farmer would have to sell thirty Canadian steers at the price in this country if he wanted the same truck here. And if wheat is sold in the United States to buy the truck, the United States grain grower can get the Ford truck f.o.b. Detroit for 468 bushels of wheat, whereas the Canadian wheat grower would have to give in exchange, for the same truck in Canada, 1,082 bushels of No. 1 northern Canadian wheat.

Mr. GOTT: I suggest that the minister's figures are more discernible to people than the hon. gentleman's.

Mr. MacLEAN: Put it in onions and he will understand it.

Mr. McPHEE: We don't grow onions in our part of the country.

Mr. GOTT: They are brain builders.

Mr. McPHEE: If they are brain builders they sent a very poor sample of the product to this house.

The Minister of Agriculture in 1930 in conjunction with his leader, in order to encourage Canadian agriculture, Canadian wheat growing, said: "Tariffs are the panacea", and a ten per cent duty was put on barbed wire coming into this country that came in free of duty from 1897 down to the date of this agreement we are supposed to ratify on behalf of the Canadian agriculturists. Further, a duty of 25 per cent was put on cream separators. That is the way in which the Minister of Agriculture was going to help the dairymen—charge them 25 per cent duty for the machines which they required to separate the cream from the milk. Now we are called upon to endorse the agreement which imposes that further iniquity upon the Canadian agriculturist. I say that already Canada has pronounced judgment on this sort of thing. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil) said: "Let us take a vote on this; we will show what the people of this country think of this agreement." Anyone can see that a vote in this house with the party opposite with an effective majority would mean a majority for the government. But what about the country? People all over this country from the storm-girt shores of Nova Scotia to where the province of British Columbia bathes its feet in the placid waters of the Pacific, have already pronounced judgment upon these agreements.

Do my hon. friends think that the election in Nova Scotia was not fought upon these agreements? Well, the Conservative party in that province was almost wiped out of existence. What about the old province of Ontario? What about the first by-election that was held there after these agreements became law, the by-election in South Oxford, when the man who ran there on behalf of the Liberal party discussed nothing but these imperial conference agreements? What about Ontario, as I say, when my hon. friends opposite, entrenched as they were, were almost wiped off the map? What about Saskatchewan, the province from which the Minister of Agriculture comes? Do hon. gentlemen opposite think these agreements were not an issue in that election? They were.

Mr. SANDERSON: The only issue.

Mr. McPHEE: The minister went out to that province to discuss these Imperial conference agreements. So did the hon. member for Rosetown. Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Anderson, the ally of the Prime Minister and the political godfather of the Minister of Agriculture, stood side by side with the Tory party, he and his friends were wiped out, horse, foot and artillery; they had not a man in the legislature to support them. That election was fought on these agreements. What about the election in British Columbia? These agreements were an issue there and the same fate befell the Conservative party in that province, with the one exception that one poor Conservative was elected and he had to change his designation before he got into the legislature. That is what happened in British Columbia. Now my hon. friends opposite say: "Let us put this thing to the test." Yes, put it to the test in this house where numerically by the effervescence of 1930 they have a majority. My hon. friends hold on until the last minute. Why did they not put this to the acid test last fall? Why did the government not go to the country last fall at the end of four years as in public decency they should have done? No, they did like their allies, Mr. Anderson of Saskatchewan and Mr. Henry of Ontario; they held on until the last minute to the fleshpots of their political Egypt. Bill Nye, the great American humourist, in his address to bachelors, makes this statement:

> Remember boys that the fellow who stands on the brink of the river frightened to jump into the water is ten times more apt to catch cold than the fellow who tumbles in head first.

Mr. Anderson of Saskatchewan and Mr. Henry of Ontario stood on the brink of the river of public opinion, shivering, and what a chill went down their spines when on June 19 last they went into the frigid waters of public opinion in this country! And the same thing will happen to the right hon. gentleman who leads the government. Let him bring on the election. He may in those fireside chats of his, communing with the spirits, talking over the radio, think he can dress up the old Tory party in a new crazy patchwork garment, but let the time come—and let it come soon—and the public intelligence of the electors of Canada will carry that old party to the grave of its political incapacity, unwept, unhonoured and unsung.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) through the mass of material that he delivered in the last forty minutes, because through it all he has not yet told us whether in his opinion this treaty merits the approval of the people. He talks about the crazy patchwork garment that was according to him put out in the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), but he forgets that his leader was very anxious all through this session to have that program that went over the radio put into effect, so much so that we could not even have private members' days; we could not even vote any supply—there was this great eagerness to put into effect throughout Canada the social reform program that my hon. friend calls a crazy patchwork quilt.

The election in Saskatchewan was not won on the question of the empire treaties. It was won on the solemn promise of Mr. Gardiner to tear up $10,000,000 of relief notes which Mr. Gardiner did not have and never will have to tear up. It was won on the promise that no more relief notes would be asked for from the people for the relief they were getting, a promise which was broken within twenty-four hours of the time Mr. Gardiner got into office. It was won on the promise of dollar wheat, and my hon. friend says that after a few months of Liberal rule in Saskatchewan wheat is now sixty cents a bushel. It was won in my hon. friend's constituency by the letter he sent to some of his foreign speaking supporters telling them that from private information he had obtained in this house there were rumours that the foreign speaking people of Saskatchewan were going to be disfranchised.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. McPHEE: Will my hon. friend permit a question? Is it not a fact that this was in the original bill?

Mr. TURNBULL: He said that there was a rumour that foreign speaking people would be disfranchised.

Mr. McPHEE: It was not a rumour at all; it was a reality. I have the proof before me, if the hon. member wants it.

Mr. TURNBULL: This parliament did not disfranchise them.

Mr. McPHEE: But the bill was introduced here.

Mr. TURNBULL: In addition to that he says it may not be true, but make the best use of it. It will set the heather on fire in Saskatchewan. To one of these foreign speaking residents he said: "Use this to the best of your ability and ask everyone in Saskatchewan to register a vote against the Tory government of Saskatchewan"—because of something that was to be done here in Ottawa.

Mr. YOUNG: It was in a bill brought down by the government.

Mr. TURNBULL: He quoted some figures with respect to wheat. On June 4, 1930, the price of wheat at Fort William was $1.52 a bushel, and on September 4, before we passed any legislation here at all, it had dropped to 82 cents. If my hon. friends are prepared to take responsibility for the drop of 70 cents we will take it for whatever drop there has been since.

As far as the discussion of these treaties is concerned we have not got very far in learning the opinion of our friends on the other side. We have had some statements by the leader of the opposition with which we agree. He says they desire to trade with all countries; so do we. He has a desire to abolish all unwarranted tariffs; so have we.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TURNBULL: But my hon. friends opposite are very careful not to say what tariffs are unwarranted. If they did they might have the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) objecting to the abolition of the duties on motor cars and rubber overshoes. In 1932 he was the gentleman who objected to these millionaires' motor cars coming into the country free, because they wanted to build some in Kitchener.

Mr. EULER: We do not build them there.

Mr. DUFF: What about the babies' rubber pants?

An hon. MEMBER: You will need them.

Mr. TURNBULL: The right hon. leader of the opposition says they are ready to trade on a reciprocal basis; so are we. A few years ago he was not prepared to trade on a reciprocal basis; he was prepared to give Great Britain a fifty per cent preference, getting nothing in return. That is not a reciprocal basis. My hon. friends say it would be good for this country to give Great Britain a fifty per cent preference, on the old theory that you cannot sell unless you buy. If we should give it to Great Britain on that theory surely we should give it to the United States on the same basis; and if it would improve our sales in Great Britain surely a fifty per cent reduction would increase our sales in the United States, and in Germany, and in France, and all over the world. But my hon. friends do not urge that. They urged a fifty per cent reduction in 1919; the leader of the opposition then said that by that pledge he would stand or fall, but for nine years the only thing he did towards putting it into effect was to move in the opposite direction, finding it necessary to require that textiles should have a fifty per cent empire content instead of thirty-three and a third. The old content was restored by this government when they came back into office, and the British people appreciated it.

As the leader of the opposition said the other night, it is of no great advantage to quote figures unless the proper inference is drawn from them, because, he said, world factors have affected the whole course of world trade as well as trade between Great Britain and Canada, and would have affected it if there had been no trade agreements. That is true; there have been world factors that affected trade. That is the trouble with all the arguments put forward by my hon. friends on the opposite side. They forget that in quoting the 1930 figures they are quoting figures with respect to what happened before they allowed the United States to shut our goods out of their markets. They forget also that they are quoting figures of what happened before they allowed Europe to shut wheat out of their markets. There has been something said with regard to the sales of wheat since this government came into office. Wheat should be discussed on the basis of the crop year, not the calendar year nor the fiscal year. The year for the wheat business is from July to July, the crop year. What is the record? I have here the figures from the Grain Trade of Canada:

Crop year:	Exports bushels
1928-29	344,000,000
1929-30	148,000,000
1930-31	220,000,000
1931-32	178,000,000
1932-33	240,000,000
1933-34	170,000,000

Note that the figures for the crop year 1929-30, ended July 31, the very time the Mackenzie King government went out of office, show that our sales of wheat had dropped to 148,000,000 bushels. In no single year since, at least, as far back as 1926, have we sold less wheat than we did for the last crop year that the Liberals were in office.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is that to Great Britain or to the world?

Mr. TURNBULL: To the world. My hon. friends are very much worried about tariffs. They are in opposition now, which explains it all. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said not long ago, that after forty years of experience of the Liberal party he had come to the conclusion that the Liberals always talked free trade out of office and practised protection in office.

Mr. SANDERSON: What did he say about the Conservative party?

Mr. TURNBULL: He did not have the inside knowledge of them that he had of the Liberals. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been making some comparisons with regard to the loss of exports as compared with 1930. I agree that there has been a loss of exports, measured in dollars. I agree that there have been world factors that influence things in this country. Apparently they do not admit that, except when they want to use the argument to their own advantage. But if we are to be responsible for some of this loss of trade then I say let the Liberal party take the responsibility for their share.

An hon. MEMBER: We will in a few months.

Mr. TURNBULL: According to the Dunning budget speech made on May 1, 1930, we lost in that year $243,000,000 of our export market, of which the greatest part was grain, the commodity that the hon. member for Yorkton is so much concerned about. I took the trouble to find out the loss until the end of September, 1930, which should also be credited to the Liberal party. Our loss in exports for six months of that year was $138,000,000. So when you compare 1930 with 1932 you should attribute at least $380,000,000 of the drop to the Liberal party, because it took place when they were in office.

Now, let us see what these world factors meant. It is true there was a drop in the dollar value of our trade; it is equally true that that drop took place all over the world. The exports of Great Britain declined just the same as ours; the exports of the United States declined just the same as ours. While there may have been a tariff party in the United States strangling trade, as my hon. friends say, there was none in Great Britain between 1930 and 1932, but the trade dropped just the same, because of world conditions. The drop started under Liberal rule and continued under Conservative rule until we succeeded in arresting it. Part of the drop in trade was a drop in volume; another part was in value. In order to find out how much was volume I took the trouble to get the Canadian trade figures for exports converted into 1926 values, as follows:

Fiscal years:	Declared value	1926 value
1926	$1,315,356,000	$1,315,356,000
1929	1,363,710,000	1,548,000,000
1930	1,120,258,000	1,255,496,000
1931	799,743,000	1,097,832,000
1932	576,344,000	1,007,261,000
1933	473,800,000	975,283,000
1934	579,343,000	1,054,661,000

So if you give us to the end of the fiscal year which closed on March 31, 1931—because up to that time the Dunning budget had been pretty well in effect—on the 1926 valuation basis our drop from 1930 had been somewhere in the neighbourhood of $250,000,000, while our drop from 1931 until the present time has been $43,000,000. So the bulk of our drop has been in volume.

The situation when this government came into office was that the markets of the world were closed to our wheat. The hon. member for Yorkton says there was prosperity in the country. I happen to know that delegations of unemployed people paraded to the legislative buildings in Regina as early as 1929. They were promised nothing, but their leaders were arrested and put in gaol as vagrants. At that time we had started down the hill of depression. During the course of that campaign Mr. Dunning said that the only market we had left was the market in Great Britain. Speaking in Ottawa on July 22, 1930, the right hon. leader of the opposition declared that our trouble was that we were not able to sell our wheat. In 1929 we had only half a crop, but we were not able to sell it and he said that was the cause of our trouble in 1930. He was merely repeating what Mr. Dunning had said in western Canada. Mr. Dunning realized the position; he knew we had only one market left for agricultural products, but he did not believe he could get a reciprocal treaty, because he said the British people would never tax foodstuffs. Believing he could not get a reciprocal treaty and a real preference he tried for the next best thing, a sentimental preference, and in order to do that he reduced the duty on a number of articles coming from Great Britain and increased the duty on similar articles coming from the United States and other countries.

The right hon. leader of the opposition objected because increases in the tariff were set out in these treaties. There were increases in the tariff under the Dunning budget, put through for the very same reason the tariff was increased under these treaties, to divert trade now going to the United States, who would not buy our goods, to Great Britain, who would buy our goods. Duties were increased under the Dunning budget just as they were under these treaties; they were fine in the Dunning budget, but they were anathema when put through by a Conservative government. The right hon. gentleman will remember that on one occasion he made a treaty with Australia, and in order to give Australia a preference on raisins he raised the duty on raisins coming into this country from the United States and other countries to three and a half cents per pound, or a duty of forty per cent. There are occasions when you cannot give a preference unless you raise the duties in the intermediate and general schedules. For instance, we had no duty on ethylene glycol prior to these treaties, but in order to give Great Britain a preference we imposed a tariff of 15 per cent in the intermediate and general tariffs, leaving it free from Great Britain. That was what we did in connection with cream separators, to which my hon. friend from Yorkton referred. They were free across the board when we came into office. We imposed a duty of 25 per cent under the intermediate and general tariffs with free entry from Great Britain, and the country from which they come free is the country that fixes the price. The prices are lower to-day than they were when we came into office.

It was the Liberal policy of 1930 to give a sentimental preference in the hope that thereby they would reap some benefit. That was on the theory that you must buy in order to sell. When I was a boy I was taught that I must sell in order to get the money to buy. My Liberal friends, as usual, have things upside down and do the buying first. Let us examine this proposition of buying in order to sell. Suppose we had given Great Britain the complete Canadian textile market, had closed up all our own textile mills and prohibited the importation of textiles from any other country, so that Great Britain would have all the business. Then, having done that, suppose a British miller started out to buy a cargo of wheat for his mills, knowing he had to sell his flour in competition with the rest of the world. Suppose he was offered a cargo of Canadian wheat at $1 a bushel and a cargo of Argentine wheat of comparable quality at 99 cents a bushel. Which would he buy? We all know that he would buy the Argentine wheat, just as you or I would, and that is a complete answer to the argument that you must buy in order to sell. I think it is a complete answer to any onesided arrangement. As the right hon. leader of the opposition said in his younger days, when he was a little more obstreperous than he is now, if I may use the expression, trade cannot be a jug-handled proposition; it must work both ways. That was when he was talking about reciprocity with the United States; he did not want reciprocity in those days. He told hon. members in the far corner of the house that with the United States duty as it was, shutting our goods out of their country and perhaps pressing more heavily on the part of the country from which the Progressives came than on any other part, he was not prepared to lower our duties against the United States, that trade was a two way street and there was not any jug-handled proposition about it. That is what has gone wrong with our Liberal friends; they talk free trade, but when they do that they do not mean it; they mean free imports, and free imports and free trade are two entirely different things.

A fifty per cent preference to Great Britain under the Dunning budget would not have induced any further purchases from that country, and did not induce any. We took the position that a trade agreement had to be a two way agreement. Referring again to the opening speech of the right hon. Prime Minister at Winnipeg, in 1930, he said:

> We pledge ourselves to foster and support a plan for greater empire trade to be based on mutual advantage.

The imperial preference treaties were a fulfilment of that pledge, a pledge upon which the people of the country returned the Conservative party to power in 1930. The great difference between the two parties at that time was that the Dunning budget was a preference in return for a hope, while the Conservative program called for a preference for a preference. The people preferred the latter, and under the leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister they got it, in spite of the fact that very few people, either within or without this house, thought that could be accomplished.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the house is rather indebted to the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) for giving us the opportunity of pronouncing once more upon these agreements. If some hon. gentlemen opposite will take the trouble to look through Hansard of 1932 and 1933 and read some of the remarks they made about these treaties at that time I think they will welcome this opportunity of taking some of their words off the record, of saying a good word for the treaties for which all the rest of the people of Canada have a good word, and of putting themselves right with the Canadian people just as they have in connection with social reform. The right hon. leader of the opposition objected to the treaties because they were based on Conservative tariff policies, and, he said, would further aggravate conditions that were already pretty bad. He said that we had abandoned the principle of control of our own fiscal policy and had supported another equally vicious, namely the principle of imperial control. He said that the abandonment of our fiscal freedom was a principle we ought not to support. Later on the right hon. gentleman said that it was a Tory conspiracy, a protectionist zollverein, and that it was going to extend like a ring of iron around the British empire as a whole. Then, as the Minister of Agriculture said this afternoon, having established all those principles which he could not possibly swallow he seemed content to swallow them all if we would just place the dollar on a parity with the pound—and all his friends on the other side of the house swallowed them with him.

Mr. Hepburn was afraid it would provoke another trade war. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) thought the whole world would be smothered in hogs. The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) thought our national status was very badly affected, and that an attempt was being made to depart from the principle of self government within the empire. They seemed to be afraid of a danger of creating ill feeling, but all their speeches reeked with dissention and ill feeling.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) was quite sure the treaties would not be of the slightest benefit to the lumbermen of the maritime provinces. The hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) was sure it would lead to a military alliance, that it was part of a scheme of imperial defence, and that our autonomy was seriously affected. The hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Dubois) thought it would be very much better and much to our advantage to trade with the entire world, but especially would it be to our advantage to trade with the United States. The hon. member said that the agreements were no more or less than economic imperialism, and that there would be military imperialism. Then, the chief whip of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) was sure that we would have to build a navy or contribute to the defence of the empire. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) set the heather on fire again with the idea of building up a military caste to enforce the tariff policy. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Blair) would not sacrifice his birthright for a mess of pottage. Now that the terms of the treaty were disclosed his farm was for sale, because, he said, there was nothing in it for the farmer. I wonder if his farm has been sold. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) broke out in Winnipeg while on his way west, and has not recovered from it yet. He outlined fourteen different objections to the treaty, the principal one being that we had locked the door and barred the gate. He ventured the prediction that unless the Canadian people through the Canadian parliament inside of five years altered the agreements they would witness a complete destruction of the lumber industry in the province of British Columbia.

I think perhaps I shall be a little more kind than usual to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), and I shall let him off.

Mr. SANDERSON: Go ahead.

Mr. TURNBULL: I do not believe he would like to hear what he said. We heard parts of it this afternoon. However, if he wishes to hear some of it, I will say he said the following:

> The fact is, we have never had a piece of legislation like this in this country, and I hope we never shall have anything like it again.

After all that I should think hon. gentlemen opposite would welcome an opportunity to place themselves on record before the Canadian people after having seen the treaties in operation for two years.

One of the greatest objections to the tariff was that it was protective. I have already quoted observations made by the hon. member for Labelle concerning the question of protection. I have quoted the objection of the hon. member for North Waterloo. He has objected that the treaty reduced the duties on motor trucks and allowed rubber overshoes in free, and that that action has had the effect of discriminating against industries in his town of Kitchener. I have the information also that at a certain stage of proceedings in the House of Commons he expressed approval of the Prime Minister's policy regarding protection. The hon. member's words were:

> That statement apparently gives some comfort to my friends opposite. And I have no apologies to make for it. In fact I was going to say in regard to that that the leader of the government and myself in my modest way were in substantial agreement.

So far as I can see, the view of the Liberal party is that they do not disapprove of the treaties quite as much as they did in 1932, but if brought into office they will modify them. I say to them that is no reason for voting against the treaties, because the agreements contain a clause providing that they may be modified or varied from time to time as the parties may decide. For that reason we could modify them inside of five years without waiting until the five years have expired. On that ground hon. members opposite should vote for the treaties, instead of opposing them, because there are provisions for modification.

At this point may I interject some observations to correct the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) on some of his figures. I do not know whether all his figures were as incorrect as the ones to which I shall make reference, but I hope they were not. He said Canada exported 86,000,000 pounds of butter in 1932. When I heard it I was amazed at the success of our exporters, but unfortunately I discovered he had quoted ten times too much.

Mr. REID: I got the figures from the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. TURNBULL: The figures were correct when my hon. friend found them, but he made a mistake in converting them from hundreds to pounds.

Mr. REID: I dispute that statement.

Mr. TURNBULL: The leader of the opposition—

Mr. REID: It is incorrect, and I dispute that statement.

Mr. TURNBULL: The right hon. leader of the opposition has made the statement that if his party is returned to office his first objective will be to bring the tariff of Canada back to where it was at the time he left office. I do not know what these objectives mean, because only a few days ago the right hon. gentleman said that one of his objectives was to have free trade in automobiles. He has not yet reached that objective, and I do not think he ever will. However he has stated that one objective is to put the tariffs back to where they were when he left office. He states he never said he would cancel the treaty. I will tell him he cannot put the tariffs back where they were when he left office unless he does cancel the treaty. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) rose in his place the minute after the leader of the opposition sat down and put upon the right hon. gentleman's words the interpretation every other hon. member put upon them, namely, that they could only mean he intended to abrogate the treaties.

I have in my hand a statement containing sixteen pages of items with respect to our tariffs in which the rates are lower than they were when we took office. These pages contain 219 items and parts of items, and 167 of those items and parts of items are on the British free list which formerly had tariff protection of from 7½ to 25 per cent. Thirty-five of those items are free to the world. If the right hon. leader of the opposition does as he says he will, namely, put the tariff back to where it was when he left office, he will have to change some of his so-called anti-protectionist principles. He will have to raise the tariff on each of those items; he will have to take 167 items off the free list so far as Great Britain is concerned and put them back on the list bearing duties ranging from 7½ per cent to 25 per cent. The opposition applauded when he made that statement.

An hon. MEMBER: Put the items on the record.

Mr. TURNBULL: Some question has been raised with regard to our exports of hogs. I have before me figures for one western constituency which indicate that in that constituency in the year 1929, 21,000 hogs were marketed. In 1932 there were 70,000 marketed, or three and one-third times as many. In 1929, 1,151 of those hogs were selects, and in 1932, 6,023 were selects, or five and one-half times as many. Of bacon hogs there were 3,000 selects in 1929, whereas in 1932 there were 22,000 or more than seven times as many. Of course that may not be attributable to the treaty. I have before me a record from the Canadian Packers' Association indicating that in 1932 Canada produced about 6,000,000 hogs, and that in 1933 about the same number were produced. The difference between the 1932 and the 1933 price was an average of $6.36 per hundred pounds, or $12.72 per hog. That was the time my hon, friend from South Perth thought that the $3.75 price would drop far lower because the world would be smothered with hogs.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. TURNBULL: Certainly.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would ask my hon. friend whether he is prepared to say that the increase in the price of hogs and the sale of hogs was entirely due to the Ottawa conference?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sure.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am asking the hon. nember for Regina.

Mr. TURNBULL: I am of the opinion that the greatest part of the increase, if not all of it, was due to the empire agreements, and the agreements were not all eyewash, as my hon. friend said they were. As a result of the agreements the producers of Canada received over $28,000,000 more for their hogs in 1933 than they did in 1932.

With respect to cattle, the Hawley-Smoot tariff was put into effect in June, 1930, and our sales of 232,000 head of cattle in 1930 fell to 5,600 head. We found some sort of market for them in the old country. Our exports to the United Kingdom were none in the fiscal year 1930, but were 50,000 head in 1933. If we had not had an opening in Great Britain for these cattle, shut out of the United States market as we were, we would have been in a rather difficult position.

My hon. friends opposite are in favour of freer trade. The figures of the bureau of statistics show that in 1925, when my hon. friends were in office, of the goods we imported from Great Britain 17·5 per cent were free; in 1929, 20 per cent were free; in 1932, 25 per cent were free, and in 1934, 45·7 per cent of the goods coming from Great Britain entered this country free. Now if my hon. friends opposite are in favour of freer trade they ought to vote for these treaties because they gave us freer trade. We have had increase in trade not only with Great Britain but with all countries. Our exports to all countries in 1933 amounted in round figures to $160,000,000; in 1934 they were $231,000,000, an increase of 44 per cent. Our exports to foreign countries increased from $85,000,000 to $117,000,000, an increase of 37 per cent, while our exports to the United States increased from $51,000,000 to $82,000,000, an increase of 61 per cent; and our imports increased accordingly. That shows that by our tarff agreements we have succeeded in getting freer trade with other countries, and having got it, and thereby increased the purchasing power in our own country, we were able then to buy and sell more goods in our own country.

But there are other benefits that arise from the treaties that have not yet been touched on so far as I know. The first is that by these treaties we escaped the British Import Duties Act. It did not need any act of the British government to make those duties effective. The act was passed in the spring of 1932 and automatically was to become effective in November of that year unless a treaty was made. If the treaty had not been made our goods going into Great Britain would have been subject to a duty of ten per cent or higher in all those lines of agricultural products that we have been selling to Great Britain since then. That alone is sufficient or should be sufficient to obtain the support of all members from all corners of the house.

But in addition to that fact there was a clause in the treaty which prevented dumping on the British market. That clause is so important that I intend to read it in full. It is article 21 of the treaty, as follows:

> This agreement is made on the express condition that if either government is satisfied that any preferences hereby granted in respect of any particular class of commodities are likely to be frustrated in whole or in part by reason of the creation or maintenance directly or indirectly of prices for such class of commodities through state action on the part of any foreign country, that government hereby declares that it will exercise the powers which it now has or will hereafter take to prohibit the entry from such foreign country directly or indirectly of such commodity into its country for such time as may be necessary to make effective and to maintain the preferences hereby granted by it.

This was the article that was invoked by the Canadian government to prevent the agreement being made by the British Timber Distributors Limited, the agreement that was under discussion in the house here to-day. Every member of this house knows what happened in 1932. Russia having ruined her ruble for foreign purposes by inflation, and desiring foreign exchange, was under the necessity of selling something to some other country in order to get foreign exchange to pay for her five year plan. The result was that she elected to take wheat as one of the articles that she would sell. She took it from her people to the point of starving millions of them to death and dumped it on the English market at whatever price she could get for it, driving the price of wheat down to the lowest level that it had reached in England for years. As a result we in western Canada were getting about 20 cents a bushel at the shipping point for first class varieties of wheat. That was the condition that prevailed in 1932. But article 21 of the agreement, which I have just read, prohibits that sort of thing, and if anything of that kind does happen all we have to do is appeal to the British government and have them put into effect article 21 with regard to the dumping of that product into Great Britain. The result has been an increased value for our wheat in the British market, and in that one item alone the treaty has been of immense value to the western farmer. We have had an increase in the price of our wheat from 43 cents to as high as $1 a bushel. The price is a little depressed at the present moment by reason of a case with respect to gold that is now pending in the United States courts.

Under these treaties we increased not only our business with the United Kingdom but our business with the other countries of the empire. I have here the figures of our exports by calendar years, for 1932 and 1934, and I take those years not because 1932 was the lowest year, but because 1932 was the treaty year, and from the treaty year we start. The figures are as follows:

Exports—By Calendar Years

Country	1932	1934
United Kingdom.. ..	$178,000,000	$278,000,000
British South Africa.	4,400,000	11,500,000
Irish Free State.. ..	2,500,000	3,800,000
Australia..	7,100,000	16,870,000
New Zealand..	3,400,000	6,800,000
British India..	2,700,000	4,600,000
Newfoundland..	5,600,000	6,600,000

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, several days ago a member of the Liberal party moved a resolution which in reality amounted to a motion of lack of confidence in the government, and it was moved ostensibly that we might get along with the business of the house more quickly. Some of us felt that the object sought was not being attained in that way, that that resolution so presented was delaying our getting down to the real business of the house, so notwithstanding the wording of the resolution I declared that I would vote against it. I do not believe the house should be held up by purely party motions of that kind. To-night we have a similar exhibition from the government side. What is the resolution that has taken up a second day of the time of this house? It is as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the operation of the trade agreements concluded at the imperial economic conference held at Ottawa, 1932, merits the approval of this house.

That is, it is a vote of confidence in the government, moved by a supporter of the government It is a most extraordinary thing, and if there were such a thing as ruling a motion of that kind out of order it should be ruled out of order. Since I cannot do anything else in the matter I propose therefore, irrespective of the terms of the resolution, to vote against it. That is the only way we can make a protest against such purely partisan resolutions. Either we have to walk out, which is one possible course, and refuse to vote on such resolutions, or else we must vote them down until such time as both the old parties understand that there are at least a few people who are not to be played with in this way.

What is the business of the house? We were told that the government was prepared with a reform program, and we had some twenty major reforms listed in the speech from the throne which, if they are to be carefully considered, will require all the time of this house from now until July; and yet a supporter of the government comes forward with a resolution of this kind relative to an action of the government of three years ago. Are we to be compelled in this house to go on, over and over again, threshing the old straw of three years ago? I think it is about time we cut out this thing. It has been a splendid field day for the old party politicians and they have taken full advantage of it to put upon Hanasrd a lot of the old party stuff which no doubt will be repeated on a great many of the hustings in the days to come. But I regard it as purely a party manœuvre; and further than that, I resent—I am not a new member—the futility of so-called debates of this kind. It is easy for one member to get up and read a set of statistics which the rest of us have not seen; they may be right and the member may get away with it. And then another member gets up and reads another set of statistics which may also be correct. But what good is this performance? True, the member may send his speech back to his constituency, but I claim that this procedure is a waste of time and money. If we have to make such speeches let us adopt the American principle and not go to the trouble of speaking on the floor, but hand our copy over directly to Hansard, allowing each member to place so much material on the record.

I do not propose to go into the details of the previous speeches. I confess I thought the member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) very well answered the Liberal party when he held before them the Dunning budget; I do not see that the Liberals can have a very good answer to that. On the other hand, in urging that trade had to be a two way agreement, the hon gentleman really made out that there was no such thing as sentiment in business with the old country; buyers would buy in the cheapest market regardless of imperial sentiment. Well, if that is correct, and I think it is, why should we set to work to limit our trade because of imperial sentiment by committing ourselves more or less to one country, when we might have a dozen countries with which to establish trade connections? The only time I ever voted in favour of imperial agreements in any form was when I suggested that we should have an imperial preference as a first step towards wider free trade. That is the only ground on which I can justify anything in the way of imperial preference.

The hon. member for Regina has shown considerable interest in turning up old files of Hansard. I was glancing over the discussions of 1932, and I find that when the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) was presenting his case he urged that the factories should be kept at work; and when my colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) called attention to the very low wages paid in the textile factories the then Minister of Trade and Commerce said this:

> My hon. friend asks me also: Do I think it is fair that the rate of wages which he quoted should be paid in Canada? I would not wish to subscribe to the statement that it is fair, I have not given the matter specific study. I think it ought to be very carefully studied, and I believe it will be. But after all that is a matter which comes under provincial jurisdiction, because the minimum wage law is a provincial law. For the sake of the discussion here I am assuming that the provincial authorities in Quebec have examined this matter and are satisfied.

I am very glad indeed that the former Minister of Trade and Commerce has given this matter study; I am very glad that he has revised his ideas and come to the conclusion that this is not merely a provincial matter but one that should be dealt with by the federal government. I am glad too that the government itself, of which he was then a member, has also changed its tactics and decided that minimum wage legislation is essentially a federal matter. As one looks back even three years one does find progress along certain lines, even though it is a bit streaky.

I would call attention to the atmosphere that prevailed at the time of the imperial conference. We were told that this imperial conference was really the big thing which would solve our great economic problems. We waited almost with bated breath for the results of the conference. Well, we all know that it was considered a dismal fiasco. Then we had brought down to us a few of the little agreements which came out of it. But I do not want anyone to forget the spirit with which the government went into the matter. The Prime Minister in his Calgary speech said this:

> Nations outside of the empire would be asked to pay some tribute for the privileges of trading within the empire.

That is to say, the idea was not to secure freer trade, as one might almost infer from the speech of the hon. member for Regina, but rather to stabilize a high tariff. That was essentially the idea behind the agreements; and we were asked to do that in the hope that it would very largely solve our economic problems. I tried to point out on that occasion that these agreements would make it more difficult for us to secure international trade, and I think that on the whole that has been the result. It is all very well for us to say that it has been of assistance to our apple shippers or our hog raisers. It is easy enough to select one or two specific commodities; I have no doubt that there are certain ways in which we might say the agreements have been of benefit. But that is not the way to estimate them; we must think of the entire trade of the country: that is the only fair way of gauging it. We must think too of the conditions as they exist to-day. A number of speakers talk as if they could think only in terms of these agreements, and that whatever has happened is the result of these agreements. But anyone with the merest smattering of logic will see how fallacious such arguments are. Do we not know that in addition to tariffs we have had quotas and foreign exchange fluctuations of all kinds? Surely these are just as important as tariffs. And then there have been the great world movements all about us. The government, quite rightly I think, resents the criticism of members on this side when they try to blame its policies for all the disasters that have befallen Canada in the last three or four years. I agree with the government in that; On the other hand it is ridiculous that some supporter of the government should rise in his place and say that because hogs have brought a little better price, the government's policy has solved the whole problem and that the agreements are satisfactory. Nothing of the kind; such a statement is ridiculous. We do not get any further in this country by maintaining such a position.

When the empire agreements came up three years ago I pointed out that it would be more difficult under these agreements for us to secure international trade. Further, we representing labour tried to emphasize the point that there was absolutely no protection for the wage earners. There might be help for a few factories or a few classes of industry, but there was no protection for the workers even in those industries. I think the Stevens investigation has absolutely proved the truth of the contention we made at that time. In addition to that, some of us tried to point out that whilst you might for a moment centre attention upon this or that industry, we had to think of the consumers generally, because while a very considerable proportion of our population consists of producers, there are other people who are not technically producers. Whether a man is economically a producer or not, every man is a consumer and we have to look at this matter from the standpoint not merely of some one particular producer but of all the producers and certainly of all consumers. That matter has so far not been very carefully discussed in the present debate. I would say that even as far as we have heard the discussion the case is not proven. That is all I can say, and as long as it is not I do not see how we can be expected to vote in favour of it.

May I read a paragraph of the statement I made three years ago as recorded in Hansard, 1932-33, at page 433, as follows:

> It may be that one or two factories may employ a few more men; it may be that a few apple growers will sell a little more fruit, and to that extent I suppose this agreement is an advantage, but those are very small matters especially when we consider that those who benefit are doing so largely through other arrangements which are loading an even heavier burden upon the consumers of this country. I revert to the primary matter of which I spoke. It was hoped that the conference would help in the solution of one of our great economic problems,—unemployment—but at present we are facing unemployment to a very serious extent, and apparently nothing is ahead of us in the nature of a solution. We cannot very well support an agreement of this kind when it makes no provision for bettering the lot of the common people of this country. We are not voting against every particular item in it; let no one make that statement. We are forced to say yes or no, and looking at the matter in a large way, from a Canadian standpoint, we must say no; looking at the matter from the international standpoint, we must say no.

Just one more word. I said a little while ago that the Imperial conference agreements were brought forth with almost as much—

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Eclat.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, "éclat" is not the right word; perhaps "ballyhoo" would be a better word—with almost as much ballyhoo as the present reform program of the government. Certainly we were given to believe that the imperial conference agreements were going to be the solution of Canada's greatest problems. Has it solved them? I do not think any member of the government will dare to say that it has. The best witness that I can produce is the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself who comes forward now and tells us that we are in a very bad way; that we have been sick unto death and that the only possible way to get out of our troubles is by adopting an altogether new type of program. I agree with him that we are to have a new type of program.

Miss MACPHAIL: A change of medicine.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, we are to have a change of medicine, a new line of treatment. All I want to suggest here is that entirely irrespective of this or that particular industrial or local benefit that may have come through the imperial trade agreements, those agreements did not to any large degree solve any of the major economic problems of Canada. I think that must be admitted. Further than that, I would appeal to the government that they do not bring forward or permit their supporters, if they have control over them, to bring forward any more of these time wasting resolutions, but that we get down to the reform program we were promised at this session.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, for the first two weeks of this session every party in this house made a very sincere effort to abstain from partisan political strife, and in most cases the effort was successful. We made unprecedented progress with the business and the debates were kept upon a high plane. Then the hon. member for Toronto Scarborough (Mr. Harris) was prompted to bring in this motion and by so doing he pulled the plug out of the boat. The flag of truce came down with a run and the House of Commons was suddenly transformed from a legislative body into a political hustings. So it will continue to the end of this debate.

I feel strongly tempted to follow the example of the last speaker (Mr. Woodsworth), and say that I will vote against the motion just for that reason. The introduction at this time of this resolution was totally uncalled for. The agreements are not on the legislative program of this session; they are not up for revision or alteration in any sense. If the government wish to get a verdict on their actions in that regard, they will get a verdict from the people at the polls. The fact that this motion is passed by their usual large majority will not affect the issue one iota in the country, and we are wasting a great deal of time when we should be getting on with more important business. The hon. member who introduced the motion began mildly and in general terms, but he had not got into his stride very far before he turned it into a political appeal of a partisan character to the people at large. The introduction of the two flags at the close of his remarks gave just that nice touch of political patriotism without which some people seem to think no speech is complete when presented to the people of Canada.

The motion as introduced is a trick. It demands yes or no to a specific question which is not capable of being intelligently answered yes or no. It is like the old gag of asking a candidate if he had stopped beating his wife, or of the curate who, embarrassed by discovering when he was the guest of his bishop that he was eating a bad egg, said that it was good in spots. This is a similar matter; these treaties are good in spots. It would be very remarkable if they were not. I presume they had some good effect in connection with apples and hogs. I take the word of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) for that rather than my own knowledge, because these matters have not cut any issue in the district which I represent. I will take his word for it that they have been productive of good on those particular types of industry. Then as regards lumber they also have been of some benefit, helping us get an alternative market to that destroyed by other policies. I am willing to give credit for such benefits, although I regret to say that they did not produce much improvement in the district in which I live.

The hon. member who introduced this motion, and indeed every speaker on both sides, has played up statistics; they can prove anything by statistics, more so at the present time than ever before I think, because there was a distinct drop in prices and trade and then a distinct uplift. It is therefore easy, by taking either two succeeding years or months, or going back two or three years to produce any result whatsoever from the same set of figures quite sincerely without any manipulation of them except in the way they are presented. I have here a string of instances by which I could prove that while no doubt the statement as to increased trade with the empire is correct, in many cases you find that it was accompanied by still greater increases in our foreign trade. I am not going to press that because as I say with figures you can prove anything. I am going to quote only one instance. I shall take it, as I suppose other hon. members take their information, from the bulletins of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I call this to the attention of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson); I am sorry he is not in his seat. I do not accuse him of any wrongdoing; I simply call his attention to it and suggest that he should instruct his deputies and clerks to be more careful. This stuff that is got out from day to day and from week to week is I think intended largely as propaganda on behalf of the government, and I do not object to that provided the figures are accurate. This is from the bulletin of Tuesday, January 22, 1935:

Canada's Imports
December, 1934..	$11,081,000
December, 1933..	10,988,000
Difference..	$ 93,000

This difference is said to represent eight per cent, and it is not a clerical error, because the word eight is written out. But if any hon. member will check that I think he will find it is not eight per cent but ·8 or eight-tenths of one per cent. That is just one thing I picked up casually the other day. If they are all no more reliable than that, what is the use of quoting statistics? And while it says there has been this increase in empire trade of less than one per cent, in the case of foreign countries it was fourteen per cent. I could give a lot of other instances such as increased imports from the British empire of one per cent and from foreign countries of thirteen per cent; or decreased imports from the United Kingdom of over one per cent while from the United States they increased twenty per cent. But as I say I am not going to press that; I am merely giving it to illustrate that you can prove anything from figures. The real fact is that these increased figures that everyone is quoting to his own advantage result from the general improvement in trade and not solely from the Ottawa agreements. If they were due solely to the Ottawa agreements then the increase in trade would be reflected in the trade with the British empire only, whereas I could give half a dozen instances in which it is shown to a far greater extent in trade with foreign countries.

I turn back to some notes of a speech I made on October 25, 1932, dealing with this subject—a rather rash speech; I was taking upon myself the role of a prophet and trying to foresee conditions as they would happen in years to come. However I am not greatly dissatisfied with the result; while perhaps I exaggerated in one respect there are other things I did not foresee that have turned out to be a disadvantage to the district I represent. I see I said:

> We will all hope it turns out better than we believe it will—but always looking forward to a world conference.

I was emphasizing that what I hoped for was a satisfactory outcome of the world conference; that it failed was not the fault of this dominion or of the Prime Minister. I stated that on butter there was to be a preference of ten per cent but that it was largely nullified by the fact that the same privilege was given to New Zealand and to Australia; that these countries were our principal competitors and that it would be practically impossible for us to meet the competition of New Zealand and to some extent that of Australia. I said I did not altogether blame the government for this, but that the preference given us was immaterial because our biggest competitor got it also. In regard to eggs I said that the preference was about eight to ten per cent, but unfortunately because of our distance we could compete only with storage eggs, and we have to compete with eggs from Denmark, situated close to the English markets, delivered fresh daily, and that owing to the fact that at that time they depreciated their currency to the same extent as Great Britain they had a preference of twenty-five per cent over us. That particular factor has now passed away. In connection with eggs I also referred to the much greater benefit it would have been if the government had given us relief in connection with freight rates on grain to British Columbia. I give the Prime Minister credit, for I believe it was entirely due to him, that since then we have got a small measure of redress for that grievance, but not to the extent we should, and only on a small part of the traffic.

Then we come to the question of fish and lumber, and I see I said that Mr. Tolmie, the premier of the province, understood that fish and lumber were to get a twenty per cent preference, but when he heard that Great Britain refused to give more than ten per cent because Canada held back on textiles he wired to Ottawa emphatically protesting against the two basic industries in the west being sacrificed on account of secondary industries in the east, and I gave him credit for so doing.

As to lumber, we did not get a preference on props or lumber for shipbuilding, and while we may or may not have got a preference on shingles—I forget if we did—it was of no use anyway because of course the British people do not use wooden shingles on their houses. The ten per cent was not sufficient, although I frankly admit that the results were better than I expected. We received some little help from the fact that the exchange was favourable to us, but we have now lost that. What I think helped us more than anything was the very unusual situation that arose because Russia took it upon herself to arrest some British subjects and put them in gaol, and Britain stayed by her subjects and promptly put an embargo on all trade with Russia, a thing that would not happen again in a hundred years. That switched the trade to Canada, and British trade once directed into any course has a way of staying put. Of course they had some lingering antipathy to the Russians for the way they had acted, which was very largely the cause of our getting a foothold in the lumber market of Great Britain. But it is uphill work; it is a long haul. There is a handicap against us of about $10 per thousand feet on the haul. Then there is the fall clause always hanging over our heads, and section 21 has been discovered not to be as effective as we supposed. A great basic fact is that Russia is an enormous buyer of goods from Great Britain, and Britain is first and last a salesman; she wants to sell, and Russia cannot pay gold for everything she buys, therefore she has to sell goods; that is a large factor at the back of the desire you see in Britain to buy lumber from Russia.

The trade we lost to the United States—I am not going to give figures; they have been given in the house before—was not compensated by the trade we got from Britain.

Then as to the fish business, I see I said that the canners wanted a specific duty because that would help them best in competition against Japan, which had an enormous advantage over us because their yen was badly depreciated. But the canners did not get a specific duty. They then asked for twenty per cent; they got ten per cent, which was not enough. And here are the results:

> In spite of the Ottawa preference Canada sold Great Britain only about one-third as much canned salmon in February, 1933, as in February, 1932. Both Russia and the United States increased their sales greatly. There must be a reason.

Then in the bulletin of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which I assume to be correct in this case, I find that in 1933 Canada was third in the imports of canned salmon into Great Britain, with 45,833 hundredweights. The United States was first with something over 161,000 hundredweights and soviet Russia was second with over 91,000 hundredweights. Two years ago Canada was first with over 80,000 hundredweights, but under these so called preferential advantages we have dropped to 45,000 hundredweights.

Now I come to a situation which particularly concerns the people whom I represent; I refer to coal. I can hardly be expected to hold up both hands in wild enthusiasm for the treaties when the coal miners whom I represent have been badly hit in connection with the import of coal. It is now possible, and in fact it has been encouraged under the treaties, to import coal from Great Britain, the mining of which has been subsidized by the British government. We cannot put on any duty or any dumping duty because of these treaties. It is brought out practically as ballast in ships coming to Vancouver to load wheat; part of it comes in free and part at a reduced rate of duty, but because of the provisions of the treaty we cannot put on a dumping duty. Another grievance in this regard is that the tariff board, which is a faint but expensive echo of a few autocratic gentlemen in the customs department, has ruled that the production of 900 tons of coal does not constitute production in Canada. Therefore they have ruled that we could not put a dumping duty on that coal brought here from Great Britain in that way. But when it suited them to do so they put a high duty on tin for the benefit of some manufacturer in eastern Canada. Our cannery men in the west cannot buy their tin from that plant because of the long rail haul; they have to get their tin either from the United States or from Great Britain by water, and consequently they have to pay the duty. An opportunity arose for some relief in that regard because a certain class of tin was not being manufactured in Canada, but the manufacturers were on the alert. They started what I was going to call a two by four factory, but it was not that big; it was a little one horse concern that could have been put in a chicken house. They turned out a few cases of these tins and that was considered to constitute production in Canada. But the production of 900 tons of coal did not constitute the production of coal in Canada. So the cannery men should not be expected to support the operation of these treaties.

Then I come to the question of wheat. I am not going into that matter in detail; men better qualified than I have dealt with it, but I must say that we appear to have made one grand mess of the wheat situation if this statement is true:

> The spread between Canadian and Argentine wheat prices has not only kept Canadian wheat and flour out of importing countries but it has been so wide that British millers import the Argentine product, mill it in Britain and in the first nine months of this year have shipped 50,425 barrels of it back to Canada for domestic consumption.

Is that not a remarkable thing, that Argentine flour milled in Britain should be imported into Canada? Possibly it is being used on our prairies, when we cannot sell our own wheat. This article also states that we imported 60,000 barrels of Australian soft wheat flour brought in via the old country. In the meantime we are losing the European market

I have another objection to these treaties. I understood that we were going to ease up on our restrictions on British goods, but we are not easing up at all. Time and again I have had retailers complain to me of the conditions under which they import goods from Great Britain. They have shown me the invoices and the customs memorandums. They never know, when they buy something from Great Britain, what the ultimate cost will be; weeks and sometimes months after the goods are sold and paid for the customs people come along and rake up some new change or ruling and the retail men have to pay up. They have no remedy. Trade will never increase under conditions like those; the British people and the Canadian buyers get disgusted.

If I might digress for a moment I should say that we have too many rulings and regulations in Canada. We are not governing here in this house; the country is governed by the men in the government offices, the customs offices and these other places, who make the rules and regulations. We are being governed by an autocratic body of officials who are not responsible to God or man. That is what we are suffering from. Someone once said "Allow me to write the poems of a nation and I care not who makes its laws." I could say, "Let me make the rules and regulations and I care not who makes the laws," because to suit myself I can make rules and regulations that are not justified in carrying out the purpose of the act, and that are practically acts by themselves.

The hon. member who introduced this resolution said, at page 356 of Hansard:

> ". . . and in another fifty years' time history will tell that the standard of living of the people in the Ukraine, Roumania, Bulgaria, will be raised by the consumption of the manufactured goods from the industrial part of Europe."

That was what someone had told him, and from that he drew the inference that these pacts would be all right. Well, fifty years is a long time hence, and I wonder if the hon. member knows that in regard to many of the articles included such as cheese, butter, milk products, poultry and so on, the treaties expire this year, and that with regard to the other commodities they expire in two years. So there is not much for the Balkans to acquire a new standard of living. Already we have got down to quotas. The British Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Elliott, has gone in for protection and, like the British people, he is doing it thoroughly. He is going to make Great Britain self sustaining agriculturally as far as possible, and he has a very good weapon to his hand. There is an enormous bonus on wheat, for example, and when he has managed to encourage the production of wheat or beef or butter, as the case may be, to the point where there is danger of a poor market, he can provide a good market by a wave of the hand. He can simply say to Canada and New Zealand, "Ship in less; put on a quota" and that will provide his market, but we will have to pay the price. The boast has been made that the Prime Minister induced Great Britain to go in for protection. If that is so I think he has a good deal to answer for, because I think it has been the curse of the Canadian agricultural producer; we are losing the best market we ever had or ever will have.

Let me give you a homely illustration of how quotas work. Last year, in the height of the depression, when I went home I told a good friend of mine that I was going to buy, and I did buy, thirty ricks of firewood from him; but I did not buy all I wanted from him; I bought ten or fifteen ricks from somebody else. It would be a suitable comparison if I went to my friend this year and said, "I am going to make a treaty with you which will be very much to your advantage. I am going to give you all my business in firewood this year; I am not going to buy from anybody else, but I am going to buy a good deal of coal and I am only going to need eight ricks of wood." Would he prefer to sell me thirty ricks in an open market, in open competition, or would he be gratified to be told that he was going to have a complete monopoly of my trade, but could sell only eight ricks? I think that is a fair illustration, even though it is a humble one.

I am not deprecating trade treaties with Great Britain. I was born there; my forebears lie there, and I am not likely to take the attitude that we should not have trade treaties with Great Britain. But I should like to do business in Mr. Baldwin's way. He sat not many feet from where I am standing now and urged that the measure of preference given to Great Britain should not be obtained by raising high tariffs against other nations but should be secured by reducing tariffs against British imports. That is what must be done if we are to get on a satisfactory basis. We want treaties not only with Great Britain but with the whole world, but as a result of these treaties we are unable to make agreements with other countries because the tariff in the intermediate column is so high they do not want to do business with us, and we cannot give them the British preference because that is confined to Great Britain alone. Consequently we have nothing to offer, and these agreements stand in the way. I believe I speak for the province of British Columbia when I say that we want to sell our fish, lumber, copper and our coal and we want to sell it in the best market, namely the nearest market. At the same time we want to be free to deal with the whole world in exactly the same way and in the same spirit as that in which Great Britain has dealt with the world. Great Britain always has wanted and I believe always will want to deal with the whole world. That is the policy that has made Britain great, and has made the British empire the greatest in history. That policy has made Britain great and prosperous, and I believe if we follow her example we too will become great and prosperous.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion of the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris). Before proceeding to any further observations I may have to make I should like to deal with the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Neill). As a farmer and probably because I am a new member in this chamber I am mystified when I hear hon. members quoting only the figures which suit themselves. That is the practice the hon. member who has just taken his seat has followed. He talked about canned salmon, and quoted the 1933 prices for that commodity. I observed, however, that he was very careful not to quote the prices for 1934. For his information I should like to give a comparison of the figures. In 1933, $1,985,000 worth of canned salmon was shipped from Canada, while in 1934, $2,600,000 worth was shipped. Why did he avoid quoting the figures for 1934?

Mr. NEILL: I did not get the 1934 figures.

Mr. LOUCKS: The hon. member was careful not to get them. I suppose if he had been referring to apples he would have avoided the 1934 figures.

Mr. NEILL: I did not quote the 1933 figures for apples.

Mr. LOUCKS: I know you didn't, because you were careful not to. There was a very decided increase.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: I am not interested in apples.

Mr. LOUCKS: The hon. member just quotes what suits him. I shall give him the figures for apples, because he should be concerned about the apple growers in his province. In 1933, 1,677,000 barrels of apples were shipped, while in 1934, there were 3,057,000. In 1933, the value of the exports was $6,930,000, while in 1934 they were valued at $11,400,000. I wonder why the hon. gentleman did not mention apples.

Mr. YOUNG: What was the price per barrel each year?

Mr. LOUCKS: I shall not take time to give that.

Mr. YOUNG: No, he will not do that.

Mr. LOUCKS: My figures are sufficient in themselves; the hon. member can get more if he wants them.

When I listen to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I cannot help wondering what kind of leader he would make for the farmers. He rises in his place and criticizes the government for permitting the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough to bring in the resolution now under consideration, a resolution which makes it possible to show some of the benefits the farmers have derived from the trade treaties. It seems to me that every time the hon. member speaks—and I cannot criticize him too severely for it—his whole thought is for the unemployed. The unfortunate part is that this hon. member who leads the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation does not seem to realize the fact that if the conditions under which the farmers are operating were improved, the unemployment difficulty would vanish. There can be no contradiction of that. I could refer him to any manufacturing concern he may wish to name, and I believe he would be told the same as I am telling him. If conditions were as they should be among the farmers of Saskatchewan, that province alone could take care of 1,000,000 unemployed. The whole thought of the hon. member seems to be with the unemployed; it would seem that he has not grasped the importance of bringing the farmer to that point of prosperity where it would be possible for him to deal with the unemployment situation. Further, I believe hon. members on both sides of the house will agree that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had no hesitation in ridiculing the government and the members who support it for taking part in this debate. While listening to him I was wondering what condition would be disclosed if we were to go through the volumes of Hansard for the last four years; who has taken up the most time in the house? I believe Hansard would clearly indicate that the hon. member has taken up more time in the deliberations of this chamber than has any other hon. member.

As a farmer I should like to make two or three observations. Much has been said about bacon being shipped to Great Britain and the profits derived from that trade. In this connection I should like to quote some figures in which I believe hon. members from Saskatchewan will concur. In 1932, the average price for bacon hogs was two and a half cents per pound. What is the price to-day? I notice that in the Saskatoon yards the price is now quoted at $7.60 a hundredweight. What does that mean? In 1932 a hog weighing 200 pounds would net to the farmer $5. To-day—I am giving quotations laid down at the Saskatoon stockyards—the farmer receives $15.30 for a 200 pound hog in the Saskatoon market, making a difference of $10.30. I wonder if some hon. members opposite would come up to my constituency and try to convince the farmers that they have not derived great benefit from the empire trade treaties so far as the bacon hog is concerned. I am afraid they would have a difficult task ahead of them

I should like to give a comparison of the figures for bacon and ham. In 1933 we shipped to the United Kingdom bacon and ham valued at $3,430,000, whereas in 1934 we shipped $12,360,000 worth. I wonder if any hon. member will dispute the fact that we have derived something from the empire trade treaties; certainly no hon. member will. Any hon. member, no matter from what side of the house he comes, who would go in to the Rosetown federal constituency and try to convince the farmers that they have not derived benefits from the treaties, would have great difficulty in doing so.

A great deal has been said by hon. members opposite about wheat. In 1932 the price at my nearest station for No. 1 Northern averaged 25 cents a bushel.

Mr. YOUNG: Thirty-two cents.

Mr. LOUCKS: Not at my station. To-day what is the price? At the same station the price is 63 cents for the same grade of wheat. I think we may attribute a great deal of that increase to the fact that under the treaties we received a preference of six cents. I hold in my hand a newspaper which was printed in 1930 at the height of the election campaign. The heading reads: The Saskatchewan Issue. On the front page appears the picture of the gentleman who makes the statement appearing in the paper; I refer to the Hon. Mr. Dunning. This paper was printed on July 14, 1930, in the city of Regina and published by the Saskatchewan Liberal Association. Mr. Dunning asks the following question:

> Where and how will Saskatchewan market its wheat? The Dunning budget contains the answer.

This is what Mr. Dunning said on July 14, 1930:

> All major European markets are now closed to us as a result of prohibitive tariffs following the war.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it again.

Mr. LOUCKS: Yes, I shall.

> All major European markets are now closed to us as a result of prohibitive tariffs following the war.

When I hear hon. members from Saskatchewan who sit opposite attempting to show that this government is to blame for loss of markets in Europe, I cannot understand them. Here is something else he said:

> Only one market remains, the British market.

That is what Mr. Dunning said in July, 1930. Was he right or wrong? That is what he said when hon. gentlemen opposite were still in power. He went on:

> If we lose it, there is no other market left. Losing it, Saskatchewan farmers would be ruined.

He was right. Mr. Dunning went on to ask:

> Are we in danger of losing it?

I hope that hon. members of the opposition will get this reply of Mr. Dunning. He said:

> Yes, as 1929 proved, unless we act, and act now. How can we hope to secure and hold the British market? There is only one answer, only one way, and that is by buying goods from Britain who in turn will buy our wheat.

Mr. Dunning said that there was only one way, and that was to get a treaty with Great Britain as quickly as possible, and that our only hope was the British market. This government got that British market. The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) ventured to-night—he is very venturesome anyway—to use the word "humbug" in his speech, but there are not many members opposite saying much about humbug to-day so far as the present Prime Minister is concerned. True, the Prime Minister went over to England in 1930. True, the western farmer knows he went over and said things to the British government at that time, and it is also true that there was a change of government in England after he was there. True, the Prime Minister was responsible for bringing the imperial conference to this city of Ottawa in 1932, something which had never happened before. True, it is also that he got results from that conference in the shape of the trade treaties. In other words, Mr. Speaker, he carried out at the conference just what Mr. Dunning in his famous budget was advocating.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LOUCKS: Certainly he did.

Mr. SPOTTON: And that was Grit campaign literature in Saskatchewan in 1930.

Mr. LOUCKS: Yes. I do not pretend to be a debater, Mr. Speaker. I am just an ordinary farmer, but I throw out a challenge to the hon. member for Yorkton, lawyer as he is, to come up to Biggar in my constituency of Rosetown and I will debate the treaties with him on any platform—a dirt farmer against a lawyer. I will go further and say that I will entertain the hon. gentleman if he will come. I would like to coax him to come up there, and I would like to see how far he will get in debating the treaties with just an ordinary farmer in the rural constituency of Rosetown.

I am sorry the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke) is not in his seat. He was not successful in winning his nomination. Last spring he spoke on the marketing bill in this house, and apparently he sent the Hansard report of his speech to one of his supporters, a farmer, from whom I received a letter in which he says: "I want to compliment you, Mr. Loucks, on your speech. Watch and see what will happen our member from Humboldt in the next election." Well, Mr. Speaker, he did not have to wait till the next election because the hon. member did not even get his nomination. The hon. member for Humboldt replied to me that my career would be very short as a member of parliament, but I would like to say to him that he never got to first base; he could not get the nomination. What was the reason? I am told that the Liberals in Humboldt constituency have said: Because our member has opposed the treaties and the marketing bill we cannot elect him in this constituency. That is the reason why I believe he did not get the nomination. What about the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance)? Was he successful in getting his nomination? No, he was defeated; he could not get the nomination. I have it on very good authority that the Liberals in Kindersley were saying the same thing, that the fact that their member had opposed the marketing bill and the treaties meant that Liberals in the constituency would not support him. I think I am right in what I am saying. I got it from reliable Liberals from that part of the country.

What happened in my own constituency at the nomination meeting on the tenth of August? Why bless you, Mr. Speaker, to my surprise we had over three hundred delegates who had taken time off from harvesting to attend that meeting, and the gentleman who got up and nominated me made it clear that he had never been a Conservative. He said he liked the very attitude of Mr. Loucks when he was speaking, and he complimented me on the stand that I had taken, and said that it gave him great pleasure to get up and nominate me. He said some very flattering things about this government and myself in nominating me. It was a surprise to me because he is not a Conservative at all. This same gentleman, a lawyer in Outlook, informed me quite recently that when my campaign starts and we go on the hustings, "I am at your service, Mr. Loucks."

I wished to hold a meeting in my constituency some time before coming here for the session, and I went to see the school trustees to get permission to use the schoolhouse. My hon. friend from South Battleford must pass it every time he goes to Saskatoon. Here is what happened. I went to one of the trustees, knowing him to be a staunch Liberal, and asked him if I could have the schoolhouse. He said, "Certainly, with pleasure, so far as I am concerned. I have been a Liberal; in the last provincial election I thought I had intelligence when I voted for the Liberals, but I got gypped." He said that Mr. Gardiner and his bunch came out and said they would cancel the $10,000,000 in notes given to the federal government by western farmers, a matter which the provincial government had nothing to do with, and he said, "I have had all I want to do with the Liberal party." When I got to the meeting after advertising it, as I always do, I asked the audience to appoint a chairman, and they told me to appoint my own chairman. I said, "I will call on Mr. Weir." Mr. Weir was one of the school trustees, and they were surprised when I called on him to act as chairman because he was a staunch Liberal. But Mr. Weir came forward and said it was a pleasure to act as chairman for me on that occasion, because I had had the courage to speak in the house in defence of the marketing bill and the empire trade treaties. I wonder how many Liberals in Saskatchewan are feeling the same way. They have not such short memories. They have not forgotten what has been taking place here in Ottawa, and they know that the Prime Minister has carried out what was the policy of Mr. Dunning, and has put it into actual practice. Mr. Dunning meant every word of that policy, and I have every respect for him. I think it is up to the members of this house who come from the west to speak in support of these treaties. The farmers all over this country know that if it had not been for the British market which we got as a result of these treaties, we would have had no market for our agricultural products, and the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) has quoted facts and figures to prove my statement and the truth of Mr. Dunning's statement.

Sometimes I wonder whether hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere when they say they want to have this question decided by a vote. So far as I am concerned I hope they will get the opportunity because it will do me an awful lot of good in the Rosetown constituency. I am sorry the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is not in his seat at the moment. If my memory serves me aright it was in 1932 that the hon. member, for whom I have a great respect, got up and said that he had about fifty hogs, and he said, "I wish I had knocked them on the head." That was when they were worth 2¾ cents a pound. I think he must be glad he did not knock them on the head now that hogs are 8½ to 9 cents a pound. Yet the hon. gentleman gets up and tries to discredit the treaties, notwithstanding that they have increased the price to him on the bacon type by nearly 6 cents a pound.

Let me assure my hon. friends to your left, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am concerned, and I think I speak for those representing this government from Saskatchewan, the people resent the attitude of the party opposite towards these treaties and the other measures that have been brought down. I wonder when I hear the leader of the opposition expressing his anxiety to get down to business why hon. members behind him should get up and discredit all that the Prime Minister indicated in his broadcast, because that is not the attitude of the leader of the opposition himself. He would like to see these measures placed on the statute books as quickly as possible; but if they have no more merit than some of his followers can see in them, then I fail to see why he should want to have them embodied in legislation.

If I had time, there are many things which I should like to say in regard to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and its operation in Saskatchewan, but I will not weary the house at the moment with a discussion of that subject. I must confine my remarks to the resolution. I want to assure members on the other side that I have fairly good reason to know the attitude of the farmers of the west, and particularly of Saskatchewan, and I think I can safely say to-night, from what has happened in the last few months, that we shall send down from our province at the next election fifteen members on this side out of the twenty-one.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LOUCKS: My hon. friends laugh, but they will remember how sure they were of the provincial election. I have it on good authority that the gentleman who has the Liberal nomination in my constituency made this statement, "If the Prime Minister places on the statute books the measures which he promised in his broadcast to carry into legislation, then I fear for my chances." It is characteristic of the people of the west not to live to the party but to live to the policy, to live to the things that give results. If my hon. friends here think that they can go to Saskatchewan and convince the people there that the Conservatives have lost all their markets, then I say to my hon. friends, "You are missing your guess, and there is no question about that."

Again I compliment the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough on this splendid resolution, and I do not feel under any condemnation because we have spent some time indicating the beneficial results of the empire trade treaties.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I wish to associate myself with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in his attitude toward this resolution. I do feel that it is a very dangerous precedent for us to set. Are we going to go over legislation which is two or three years old? If so we are certainly laying out a good deal of extra work for ourselves in the future. It is a most extraordinary procedure for us to be asked now to approve of the operation of the treaties. The resolution asks us to say whether or not the operation of the trade agreements has been beneficial to Canada. I doubt very much whether anyone can answer that question. I think it is much too soon for us to know. There are a great many factors which we cannot weigh for a considerable time yet. If the temporary gains that have been made in hog prices—and I am inclined to think that the agreements had some effect on these prices—have been at such great cost as to lead to dissatisfaction and offence almost in Great Britain, as one is led to believe from many newspapers as well as from conversations with different people, all of which would show that there is a feeling in Great Britain not only against the treaties but against Canada because of them, then it seems to me that we are paying very dearly indeed for any temporary gains. Moreover, if by the treaties we have added to the cost of those things which we purchase from Great Britain, we have possibly more than eaten up all the benefits that would accrue. If the Canadian consumer and the British manufacturer are paying dearly for the advantage given the Canadian manufacturer, then I for one cannot say that the trade pacts have worked out beneficially to this country. I think it is quite possible, and time will likely prove it to be true, that the preferential arrangement within the empire has given offence to the world at large; the reaction of other countries to the preference within the empire will result in diverting their trade to those countries that are not involved in the agreements under discussion.

To me it is amusing—it is interesting to have something amusing in this house—to hear members of the government take so much credit for the rise in farm prices. Well, there is this you can say about farm prices now as compared with the 1932 level; they could scarcely have fallen further, because had they done so they would have fallen out of sight. If they were going to move they had to rise. If the government had been as much interested in farm prices in 1932 as they now appear to be, they would have depreciated Canadian currency and made it possible for Canada to take advantage to such extent as it could of the agreements at the time they were made. We were not able to avail ourselves of the agreements until the country to the south of us had taken such action in connection with monetary matters as brought the Canadian dollar to a parity with the pound. In other words, the government of Canada waited until another country had made it possible for this dominion to take whatever advantage it could of the British market. While the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) was shedding tears over the price the farmers got for hogs in 1932, he ought to have been willing to assume some responsibility in the matter, because the adverse exchange from which we suffered then had a good deal to do with the prices we were receiving at that time for our hogs.

As I listened to the torrent of figures which flowed from the mouth of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) before dinner, I was reminded of the broadcast of Colling and Colling over CFRB at 6.30, which I endure in order to hear Jim Hunter, who does much to justify the Telegram. As I listened to the figures which poured with such power from the minister's lips I could make nothing of them at all and I am sure that everybody in the house felt the same way. Possibly when one reads them in Hansard they may have meaning, but they certainly conveyed nothing to me as I heard them read. As I listened to the blasts of oratory from the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) I thought how very happy a position those hon. gentlemen are in; whatever their party does is right and whatever their leader does is just the thing to do. I wish I had the kind of mind that could put myself in that position. It is so happy.

There is no real assurance that the market which Canadian farm products now find in Great Britain will continue. It is well known to hon. members that the Minister for Agriculture in Great Britain, Mr. Elliott, is pursuing a policy of self sufficiency in agricultural products within that country. Whether or not he can ever achieve this is another matter, but he at any rate is trying to do so and the very moment they are able to produce within their own country those things which they require, we shall see a very rapid dropping of exports from this country to Great Britain. Therefore I feel we are building on a false premise if we believe we are going to continue to ship to either Great Britain, or, indeed to other European countries any great quantities of foodstuffs.

I believe some of the pools in Canada have approved the treaties, but if I can judge the pools from the cooperative company with which I have had something to do in Ontario, then it can be said that each pool considers the commodity which it handles, and if conditions or prices have been improved for that commodity, the pool then draws the conclusion, which is not always the correct one, that conditions have been improved for the people generally. But when we are considering a standard of living for the Canadian people—and I am thinking again of agriculture—two factors enter in, selling prices and living costs. It is true that selling prices are a great factor, but living costs are also, so if by the trade treaties we get increased living costs, that may more than counteract any increase in prices caused by them.

In closing I want to say only one other thing and that is, in my opinion it is dubious if world trade will again reach the volume of 1929. There are possibly a number of reasons for that, but certainly one of them is that to-day every country in the world is striving for self sufficiency and the success that has been attained by European countries in growing foodstuffs shows to what a degree this ideal, if it be an ideal, can be reached. If countries are going to become more and more self sufficient, then it is unlikely for a long time at any rate that the volume of trade will be again as great as in 1929.

There is another reason why trade is not increasing and that is lack of the medium of exchange. In this country we try to sell to other countries those goods which our own people would like to buy but cannot afford, and other countries are trying to sell to us their surplus goods which their own people, if they had a higher standard of living, could use but which they again have not the money to purchase. Therefore I think the root causes of a fall in the volume of trade are these two factors: On the one hand lack of sufficient money to effect an exchange of goods, and second, a growing sufficiency of all nations due in part to invention and energy and due in part to very many years of high tariffs by almost all countries in the world.

I certainly am not going to put myself in the ridiculous position of supporting a motion which is going to make us do the work of two years over again. We started this session in the rarefied atmosphere of high endeavour for a couple of weeks. To-day we fell back very far toward the bad old days. I hope we shall not stay in this particular state of mind too long, because I feel the temper of the Canadian people will not stand too much of the sort of exhibition that we have had to-day. I am going to vote against the motion because I think it is one that should not have been moved. It is one with which the house has nothing to do at this moment, and even if I agreed with it I would still vote against it, offered as it is at this time.

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should be failing in my duty if, representing the constituency of Halifax, I did not express myself while this debate was in progress, and I offer no apologies to any hon. members for doing so. I offer no apologies particularly to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) or to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I draw the attention of the house to the routine proceedings and orders of the day for Thursday, February 7, which is to-day. I find there under notices of motion, No. 5, the following:

Mr. Woodsworth—The following proposed resolution:—

That, in the opinion of this house, since the capitalist system is failing to function in the interests of the great majority of the people of Canada, it should be superseded by a co-operative commonwealth.

What is sauce for the goose is surely sauce for the gander. If an hon. member who supports the government can move a resolution of confidence in his party and his government and a leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation can move a resolution of confidence in his party, then I think we are about fifty fifty; we should call it square and forget that part of the discussion.

The constituency and the port of Halifax have certainly benefited by the Ottawa trade agreements; I should hate to go down to the waterfront in that city and venture an opinion to the contrary. One hon. member speaking from the opposite side of the house said to-night: "If you want to get the evidence of prosperity, put your hand in your pocket." That is quite correct; I subscribe to that. The year just closed has established a record in the shipping cargo tonnage of the port of Halifax. That is no accident; that did not just happen. I am sure that the increased volume of trade through the port of Halifax and through the ports of St. John, Montreal and Quebec during the past year has been mainly due to the operation of the empire trade agreements.

I listen to hon. gentlemen opposite talk about what they would do if their party was in power and what they did when their party was in power. You hear them shouting for wider markets and lowering of tariffs, but their attitude when in power is quite different from their policies when in opposition. We hear a good deal from hon. members on the opposite side about the expansion of trade while their party was in power. I thought I should like to look up the statistics of imports from and exports to the United States, therefore I got from the bureau of statistics the figures for two years, 1921 when the Liberal party was coming into power, and 1930 when they were going out. The figures are as follows:

Exports to the United States

Year ended—
March 31, 1921	$542,322,967
March 31, 1930	515,049,763
Decrease	$ 27,273,204

Where is this great widening of markets and expansion of trade of which they boast? They had nine of the most prosperous years in the history of the world; they had the greatest opportunity this country ever had to develop trade with the United States, but they went back to the extent of $27,000,000 in those nine years.

Then we come to the figures for imports:

Imports from the United States

Year ended—
March 31, 1921	$856,176,820
March 31, 1930	847,442,037
Decrease	$ 8,734,783

I think that sufficiently answers the question regarding the business developed with the country to the south of us.

If I want an opinion concerning the virtues of the Liberal party I would not go to the leader of the opposition, because I know what he would tell me. Nor would I go to the Prime Minister if I wanted to have the virtues of the Conservative party extolled; nor would I go to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to learn of the merits of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I would go to more disinterested authorities. On the day this resolution was introduced I received a book entitled The Story of Canada's Industrial Expansion. On the front page I see the statement:

> A remarkable record.
> Not only has there been notable progress during the past ten years, but even through recent years of depression this progress has continued in a remarkable way, giving good ground for encouragement and providing a cheerful outlook for the current year.
> Read the evidence in these articles on:
> New industries established in Canada in the past four years;

And so on. This is reprinted from Industrial Canada of January, 1935, and published by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. RALSTON: They are disinterested!

Mr. QUINN: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) surely will not say that E. A. Saunders, secretary of the Halifax board of trade, would broadcast Tory propaganda. I would say he is a disinterested gentleman.

Mr. RALSTON: I was referring to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. QUINN: I quote from a gentleman who is interested only in the expansion of trade, Mr. Saunders, secretary of the Halifax board of trade, not a biased politician.

> Those who consider that Nova Scotia is backward industrially, has few, if any, new industries, and is not expanding its manufacturing operations, should read this impressive record compiled by Mr. Saunders. It should be an eye opener, for it reveals the establishment of quite a number of new factories within the last few years and shows that the province by the Atlantic is making industrial progress, even in recent difficult times, as well as the rest of Canada.

I was interested in that. I take it that each of these articles would be from the pen of someone as disinterested politically as Mr. Saunders. I come to Canadian products exported to the United Kingdom, of which substantial amounts are reported. It is too late to quote figures, but I shall just run through the list of articles:

Apples, fresh Fruits, canned Vegetables, canned
Cereal foods
Canvas shoes, rubber soles
Boots and shoes, rubber
Cattle
Fish, fresh
Fish, preserved
Leather, unmanufactured
Bacon and hams
Meats, canned Poultry
Wool
Wood, unmanufactured
Doors, sashes and blinds
Paperboard
Pig iron, ingots and billets
Bars and rods
Wire
Farm implements
Wire nails
Automobiles, passenger Aluminium
Copper in ingots, bars, etc.
Nickel
Zinc spelter
Asbestos Soap.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR

DRAFT CONVENTION CONCERNING SEAMEN'S ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention concerning seamen's articles of agreement adopted as a draft convention by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations at its ninth session in Geneva on the 24th day of June, 1926, reading as follows:—

Convention Concerning Seamen's Articles of Agreement

The general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations,

Having been convened at Geneva by the governing body of the international labour office, and having met in its ninth session on 7 June 1926 and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to seamen's articles of agreement, which is included in the first item of the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a draft international convention,

adopts, this twenty-fourth day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six, the following draft convention for ratification by the members of the international labour organization, in accordance with the provisions of Part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace:

Article 1.—This convention shall apply to all seagoing vessels registered in the country of any member ratifying this convention, and to the owners, masters and seamen of such vessels.

It shall not apply to:
ships of war,
government vessels not engaged in trade, vessels engaged in the coasting trade,
pleasure yachts,
Indian country craft, fishing vessels,
vessels of less than 100 tons gross registered tonnage or 300 cubic metres, nor to vessels engaged in the home trade below the tonnage limit prescribed by national law for the special regulation of this trade at the date of the passing of this convention.

Article 2.—For the purpose of this convention the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them, viz.:

(a) The term "vessel" includes any ship or boat of any nature whatsoever, whether publicly or privately owned, ordinarily engaged in maritime navigation.

(b) The term "seaman" includes every person employed or engaged in any capacity on board any vessel and entered on the ship's articles. It excludes masters, pilots, cadets and pupils on training ships and duly indentured apprentices, naval ratings, and other persons in the permanent service of a government.

(c) The term "master" includes every person having command and charge of a vessel except pilots.

(d) The term "home trade vessel" means a vessel engaged in trade between a country and the ports of a neighbouring country within geographical limits determined by the national law.

Article 3.—Articles of agreement shall be signed both by the shipowner or his representative and by the seaman. Reasonable facilities to examine the articles of agreement before they are signed shall be given to the seaman and also to his adviser.

The seaman shall sign the agreement under conditions which shall be prescribed by national law in order to ensure adequate supervision by the competent public authority.

The foregoing provisions shall be deemed to have been fulfilled if the competent authority certifies that the provisions of the agreement have been laid before it in writing and have been confirmed both by the shipowner or his representative and by the seaman.

National law shall make adequate provision to ensure that the seaman has understood the agreement.

The agreement shall not contain anything which is contrary to the provisions of national law or of this convention.

National law shall prescribe such further formalities and safeguards in respect of the completion of the agreement as may be considered necessary for the protection of the interests of the shipowner and of the seaman.

Article 4.—Adequate measures shall be taken in accordance with national law for ensuring that the agreement shall not contain any stipulation by which the parties purport to contract in advance to depart from the ordinary rules as to jurisdiction over the agreement.

This article shall not be interpreted as excluding a reference to arbitration.

Article 5.—Every seaman shall be given a document containing a record of his employment on board the vessel. The form of the document, the particulars to be recorded and the manner in which such particulars are to be entered in it shall be determined by national law.

The document shall not contain any statement as to the quality of the seaman's work or as to his wages.

Article 6.—The agreement may be made either for a definite period or for a voyage or, if permitted by national law, for an indefinite period.

The agreement shall state clearly the respective rights and obligations of each of the parties.

It shall in all cases contain the following particulars:

(1) The surname and other names of the seaman, the date of his birth or his age, and his birthplace:

(2) The place at which and date on which the agreement was completed;

(3) The name of the vessel or vessels on board which the seaman undertakes to serve;

(4) The number of the crew of the vessel, if required by national law;

(5) The voyage or voyages to be undertaken, if this can be determined at the time of making the agreement;

(6) The capacity in which the seaman is to be employed;

(7) If possible, the place and date at which the seaman is required to report on board for service;

(8) The scale of provisions to be supplied to the seaman, unless some alternative system is provided for by national law;

(9) The amount of his wages;

(10) The determination of the agreement and the conditions thereof, that is to say:

(a) if the agreement has been made for a definite period, the date fixed for its expiry;

(b) if the agreement has been made for a voyage, the port of destination and the time which has to expire after arrival before the seaman shall be discharged;

(c) if the agreement has been made for an indefinite period, the conditions which shall entitle either party to rescind it, as well as the required period of notice for rescission, provided that such period shall not be less for the ship owner than for the seaman;

(11) The annual leave with pay granted to the seaman after one year's service with the same shipping company, if such leave is provided for by national law;

(12) Any other particulars which national law may require.

Article 7—If national law provides that a list of crew shall be carried on board it shall specify that the agreement shall either be recorded in or annexed to the list of crew.

Article 8—In order that the seaman may satisfy himself as to the nature and extent of his rights and obligations, national law shall lay down the measures to be taken to enable clear information to be obtained on board as to the conditions of employment, either by posting the conditions of the agreement in a place easily accessible from the crew's quarters, or by some other appropriate means.

Article 9—An agreement for an indefinite period may be terminated by either party in any port where the vessel loads or unloads, provided that the notice specified in the agreement shall have been given, which shall not be less than twenty-four hours.

Notice shall be given in writing; national law shall provide such manner of giving notice as is best calculated to preclude any subsequent dispute between the parties on this point.

[Mr. Bennett.]

National law shall determine the exceptional circumstances in which notice even when duly given shall not terminate the agreement.

Article 10.—An agreement entered into for a voyage, for a definite period, or for an indefinite period shall be duly terminated by:

(a) mutual consent of the parties;

(b) death of the seaman;

(c) loss or total unseaworthiness of the vessel;

(d) any other cause that may be provided in national law or in this convention.

Article 11.—National law shall determine the circumstances in which the owner or master may immediately discharge a seaman.

Article 12.—National law shall also determine the circumstances in which the seaman may demand his immediate discharge.

Article 13.—If the seaman shows to the satisfaction of the shipowner or his agent that he can obtain command of a vessel or an appointment as mate or engineer or to any other post of a higher grade than he actually holds, or that any other circumstance has arisen since his engagement which renders it essential to his interests that he should be permitted to take his discharge, he may claim his discharge, provided that without increased expense to the shipowner and to the satisfaction of the shipowner or his agent he furnishes a competent and reliable man in his place.

In such case, the seaman shall be entitled to his wages up to the time of his leaving his employment.

Article 14.—Whatever the reason for the termination or rescission of the agreement, an entry shall be made in the document issued to the seaman in accordance with Article 5 and in the list of crew showing that he has been discharged, and such entry shall, at the request of either party, be endorsed by the competent public authority.

The seaman shall at all times have the right, in addition to the record mentioned in Article 5, to obtain from the master a separate certificate as to the quality of his work or, failing that, a certificate indicating whether he has fully discharged his obligations under the agreement.

Article 15.—National law shall provide the measures to ensure compliance with the terms of the present convention.

Article 16.—The formal ratifications of this convention under the conditions set forth in Part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and in the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace shall be communicated to the secretary-general of the League of Nations for registration.

Article 17.—This convention shall come into force at the date on which the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered by the secretary-general.

It shall be binding only upon those members whose ratifications have been registered with the secretariat.

Thereafter, the convention shall come into force for any member at the date on which its ratification has been registered with the secretariat.

Article 18.—As soon as the ratification of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretariat, the secretary general of the League of Nations shall so notify all the members of the international labour organization. He shall likewise notify them of the registration of ratifications which may be communicated subsequently by other members of the organization.

Article 19.—Subject to the provisions of Article 17, each member which ratifies this convention agrees to bring the provisions of articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 into operation not later than 1 January, 1928, and to take such action as may be necessary to make these provisions effective.

Article 20.—Each member of the international labour organization which ratifies this convention engages to apply it to its colonies, possessions and protectorates, in accordance with the provisions of Article 421 of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding articles of the other treaties of peace.

Article 21.—A member which has ratified this convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the secretary-general of the League of Nations for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered with the secretariat.

Article 22.—At least once in ten years, the governing body of the international labour office shall present to the general conference a report on the working of this convention and shall consider the desirability of placing on the agenda of the conference the question of its revision or modification.

Article 23.—The French and English texts of this convention shall both be authentic.

and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not any hon. members desire to discuss this particular resolution. There are some they would desire to discuss, but if there is to be no general discussion on this one I will limit my observations with respect to it. This draft convention was adopted on June 24, 1926, at a meeting of the international labour organization, and has since been ratified on the dates I shall mention and registered at the registry office at Geneva by the labour organization's registrar. The following are the dates of ratification:

Belgium, October 3, 1927.
Great Britain and Northern Ireland, June 14, 1929.
Bulgaria, November 29, 1929.
Colombia, June 20, 1933.
Cuba, July 7, 1928.
Estonia, May 10, 1929.
France, April 4, 1928.
Germany, September 20, 1930.
India, October 31, 1932.
Irish Free State, July 5, 1930.
Italy, October 10, 1929.
Luxemburg, April 16, 1928.
Mexico, May 12, 1934.
Nicaragua, April 12, 1934.
Poland, August 8, 1931.
Spain, February 23, 1931.
Uruguay, June 6, 1933.
Yugoslavia, September 30, 1929.

Broadly and generally, in our Shipping Act we have made provision for carrying into effect the main provisions recommended by the conference. It may possibly be desirable for me to say that Canada has not a very good record with regard to the ratification of draft conventions which have been adopted at Geneva. Up to January, 1935, the record was a rather unfortunate one, so far as we are concerned. The following list will indicate the number of conventions which have been ratified by the different countries:

Country—	Number ratified
Albania	4
Argentine	9
Australia	5
Austria	13
Belgium	23
Bolivia	0
Brazil	4
Bulgaria	27
Canada	4

I place this on record not in any spirit of criticism but rather to indicate that we have not taken as prompt action as some of the other countries of the world. It is highly desirable that we should ratify these convention agreements. The treaty of peace makes certain provisions to which, in connection with the discussion on one other convention, I shall refer this afternoon. The international labour organization which came into being under the treaty has adopted a number of draft conventions of which, as I have said, we have adopted a limited number.

But apart altogether from our moral obligation under the treaty to ratify these conventions, I think it is in the interests of this country that we should do so, having regard to the necessity of maintaining and improving the standards of work and of living in the other countries of the world, especially the industrial countries with which we compete. We have sometimes complained of unfair competition and of conditions of living and labour in other countries, but failure on our part to ratify certain conventions that have been made has had the effect of creating a rather unfavourable opinion amongst other countries that have adopted them. They have contended that they were led into believing that, when we accepted them at the conference, where we were always represented, they would be put into effect, and sometimes it has been difficult to explain to them that a federal confederation has divided jurisdiction as between provincial legislatures and the federal parliament. But undoubtedly the acceptance of as many of these conventions as possible will have the effect of removing causes of friction and ill-will, and will improve economic international relations. We believe that the best way in which to bring about a better understanding between Canada and the other countries of the world is, so far as it may be possible within our power, to ratify arrangements that have been made by the common consent of countries that have been represented at international labour conventions; and the standards that have been adopted in the convention are standards that will thereby have international application and, in my judgment at least, have a most beneficial effect upon the relations between the several countries of the world and our own. As a matter of fact, most of these conventions represent but minimum requirements, and there are many countries that maintain higher standards than those provided for in the conventions themselves.

The convention to which I now ask the house to give its assent is one concerning seamen's articles of agreement with respect to which, as I have said, the essential legal requirements are embodied in the Merchant Shipping Act which we passed last session. I think there is nothing further I need say with respect to this particular convention, and the only reason that I am asking ratification now is that it has been adopted by so many other countries and is in fact embodied so far as the legal requirements are concerned in our Merchant Shipping Act.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to take any exception to approving the convention which appears under government notices of motion, but rather to point out that what we are in fact being asked to do is more or less purely formal in its nature.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself has already intimated that the substance of this particular convention has been enacted into law by this House of Commons and that it appears as part of a statute which is already upon the books of this country. That being the case, it seems to me that we add nothing and subtract nothing from what we have already done, by a formal approval of the convention, unless it be a matter of some general conformity with methods adopted in some other countries.

The particular convention relates to seamen's articles of agreement, and if I am not mistaken those articles of agreement appear as part of the act respecting shipping which was assented to last year. Therefore this house is simply being asked to do again what it has already done. We had an example of that kind of thing all day yesterday when the house spent the entire day debating a resolution proposed by the honourable member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) approving of some of the trade agreements legislation which parliament had already enacted at the government's initiative. Here we are again being asked to approve other legislation which is already on the statute books, and I think it will be found with respect to the next two conventions that we shall be asked to approve that the same is true, that they also form part of the act respecting shipping which was passed as part of a consolidation, as honourable members will recall, at the end of last session.

What I do not understand is why, if we are to approve one or two or three or four or five of these draft conventions, of the international labour organization of the League of Nations, we should not approve all of them. Why single out these two or three especially for approval? It would be well I think to have placed on the record the different conventions that have been passed by the international labour conference and which have been communicated to the government; Then when parliament has before it a statement of all of the conventions we may later on discover the reason why some call for formal approval and others not. May I, however, before placing this list on the record say that I cannot agree with the statement the Prime Minister made this afternoon to the effect that Canada's record has been bad in the matter of our action with respect to these various conventions.

Mr. BENNETT: Ratifications.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister uses the word ratification. I do not wish to take exception to the use of the word ratification, but I am inclined to think the word "approval" would be the more correct one to use with respect to these conventions.

Mr. BENNETT: I was quoting from the language of the League of Nations itself—the process of ratification.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was quoting from the Prime Minister's resolution, which asks us to approve, which is I think more to the point. However, the Prime Minister a day or two ago meeting the representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress said, as reported in the evening press of February 6:

> On the matter of ratifying international conventions adopted at Geneva, Mr. Bennett admitted Canada's record had been bad. However, five such conventions were down for ratification at the present session of parliament.

Anyone reading that statement would be inclined to think that this parliament had been remiss in its duty in the past in the matter of ratification, and that Canada had not been taking a place either as high or as effective as that taken by other countries. Now the direct opposite is the case, as the Prime Minister well knows. The Prime Minister has read us a list of the countries that have ratified this particular convention. I did not get the names of all of them but I took down a few—Albania, Argentina, Austria, Brazil, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Colombia, Latvia, Esthonia, Hungary, and there were several others that will appear in Hansard. The reason that these particular countries have made it a matter of special concern to ratify is that in most cases they have not already had on their statutes the legislation that is being asked for by the convention.

Mr. DUFF: And they relate more particularly to shipping.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and as my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) reminds me, as regards this particular convention they relate more particularly to shipping.

As the Prime Minister has said, the conventions for the most part represent the minimum requirements. As a matter of fact, Canada is one of the first countries of the world in her labour standards and her labour legislation; and it is because Canada has been able to send word to the labour office at Geneva that she had already enacted most of the measures asked for by these conventions that it has not been necessary to come before this parliament and ask for any approval of them. Instead of our record being bad, it has been so exceptional that it is beyond all challenge.

However, with respect to the procedure, if there has been any laxity of procedure, may I say that what was expected of this parliament with regard to the approval of these various conventions has consistently followed what was stated at some considerable length by the Minister of Justice of the day to be the intended practice when parliament had before it the first series of conventions that we were asked to approve. They were conventions that were drawn up at the labour conference in Washington in 1919, and there were several of them. It was important, it being the first time that parliament was called upon to deal with these conventions, that a careful statement should be made by the ministry as to the proper course of procedure. It so happened that a Conservative administration was in office at the time, the administration of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, and the Right Hon. C. J. Doherty was then Minister of Justice. Mr. Doherty not only explained very fully to this house what was expected of it in the matter of the approval of these various conventions, but he read to the house and placed on the record an order in council which outlined exactly the procedure to be taken and what was expected of this government and of the provincial governments. May I read from that order in council. It is a report that was confirmed on November 6, 1920, it reads:

> The provisions of the labour part of the treaty of Versailles do not impose any obligation on the Dominion of Canada to enact into law the different draft conventions or recommendations which may from time to time be adopted by the conference. The obligation as set forth is simply in the nature of an undertaking on the part of each member within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the conference or, if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so, within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment, and in any case not later than eighteen months from the closing of the conference "to bring the recommendations or draft conventions before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action", the treaty engagement being of this character it is not such as to justify legislation on the part of parliament under the authority of section 132 of the British North America Act, 1867, to give effect to any of the proposals of the said draft conventions and recommendations, which must be held, as between the dominion and the provinces to be within the legislative competence of the latter. The government's obligation will, in the opinion of the minister, be fully carried out if the different conventions and recommendations are brought before the competent authority, dominion or provincial, accordingly as it may appear, having regard to the scope and objects, the true nature and character of the legislation required to give effect to the proposals of the conventions and recommendations respectively, that they fall within the legislative competence of the one or other.

That is the statement made by the Minister of Justice of the day, embodied in an order in council, which order in council still remains and has not been changed. It sets forth the procedure to be followed, and every government up to the present has followed it. If any mistake has been made it has been a mistake of the minister of the day, but I do not think there has been any mistake. I think the then Minister of Justice gave a true interpretation, and it will be recalled that the minister himself attended some of the conferences held with respect to these matters. Not only that however; the Supreme Court of Canada was asked as to the obligation of this parliament with respect to these matters and gave a very definite opinion on the subject. I will not discuss these legal questions; so far as this side of the house is concerned, I will leave that to the ex-Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). In passing however I should like to quote two paragraphs from the direct answer given by the supreme court to a specific question directed by the government to the court as to the obligation and duty of this parliament with respect to these various conventions.

Mr. BENNETT: Not all of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And may I point out that the opinion given by the supreme court was a unanimous opinion. One of the questions submitted to the supreme court in the above mentioned reference was as follows:

What is the nature of the obligation of the Dominion of Canada as a member of the international labour conference, under the provisions of the labour part (part XIII) of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding provisions of the other treaties of peace with relation to such draft conventions and recommendations as may be from time to time adopted by the said conference under the authority of and pursuant to the aforesaid provisions?

The reply of the supreme court thereto was:

The obligation is simply in the nature of an undertaking to bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.

The Prime Minister says not all of them, but that question and the answer covered all. So that there can be no doubt in the world as to the truth of the situation and the clarity of it.

May I say that with respect to all these conventions—I can speak only so far as the previous Liberal administration was concerned, though I think the same has been true of the government of my right hon. friend—the requirements as set forth by the then Minister of Justice and as indicated by the supreme court have been wholly and completely complied with. The procedure has been this. The conventions are communicated by the labour office in Geneva to the government of Canada, to the Secretary of State, I presume, or if sent to the governor general's office, are transferred to the privy council. At any rate, they go immediately to the Department of Justice and the Department of Justice examines the convention and decides to which legislative body having competent jurisdiction it should be transferred. If it is within the legislative competence of parliament to deal with the matter, then the convention is transferred to the minister of the department immediately concerned, and by that minister or some other minister the matter is brought before parliament. Let me say at once with respect to all these conventions that they have been brought before parliament. They have been tabled, usually about the opening of parliament, and in a number of instances where their requirements have not already been met legislation has been enacted with respect to them. If on the other hand the Department of Justice maintains that they come within the legislative competence of the provincial governments, then the conventions are sent by the Secretary of State to the lieutenant governors of the provinces to be placed before the governments and legislatures of the provinces for action with respect thereto. That has been the practice that has been followed, and I do not think there have been any exceptions to it; I think it has been followed in all detail and completeness.

I do not know that there is any necessity for me to say much more. I think it would be unfortunate if the impression went abroad that this country had been in any way behind other countries in adhering to labour conventions when as a matter of fact we have adopted to the full the procedure required and have gone far beyond most countries in the legislation which is already on the books.

To make clear what I have just said, I would point out, by way of illustration, with regard to one of the recommendations withdrawn the other day from the order paper, which the Prime Minister said had been placed upon the order paper by mistake, that as a matter of fact there was no necessity for it because this parliament had already enacted the legislation to which it refers, just as it has already enacted legislation with respect to the convention that is before us at the moment. This was the recommendation concerning the application of the Berne convention of 1906 on the prohibition of the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches. I recall representing Canada at a meeting of the international labour office at Geneva before the League of Nations was ever established, at which time the question came up of the use of white phosphorus in the making of matches, and which occasions the disease called phosphorus necrosis, a horrible and hideous disease. A convention was drawn up at the time asking the different nations to take action to substitute a process which would do away with the use of white phosphorus and its prejudicial effects. A formula with respect to a substance called I think, sesqui sulphide was given to the world to be used as a substitute for white phosphorus. As Minister of Labour in 1910-11 I brought that question before the House of Commons and discussed it very fully. Hon. members will find on the records of parliament a very full statement of the nature of that particular disease. I introduced a bill into the house to put an end to the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches; that bill passed this house, it was in I think 1911, but the election on the reciprocity issue came on unexpectedly and the course of the bill through parliament was not completed when dissolution occurred. A later government, however, that of Sir Robert Borden, with the late Mr. Crothers as Minister of Labour, introduced the bill and it was passed by both houses and became law. Indeed, it was law before ever the League of Nations was established. So far as adding anything to what has already been done is concerned, we might as well be called upon to approve that particular law to-day as to approve what we are being asked to approve by this convention. Both are already on the statute books; the purpose has been fulfilled. What Canada did when, for example, she was asked as she was about this very matter to which I have referred, that of white phosphorus, was to reply to Geneva that we already had and had had for years upon the statute books a law which covered the recommendation. What would have been the sense of asking parliament to ratify a convention on that particular subject when we already had it on the statutes? I mention that because I take strong exception to the statement of the Prime Minister that we have been behind in any particular in fulfilling the obligations into which Canada has entered as one of the members of the League of Nations, especially with respect to labour conventions. We have been ahead most of the time.

If we have not been asked to ratify many of those conventions it is because, up to the present at least, it has been determined by the legal decisions and opinions that have been given not only by the law officers of the crown but by the Supreme Court of Canada that it was not within the legislative competence of this parliament to legislate on certain of those matters. I hope we shall not be asked to approve conventions that relate to subjects with regard to which we have no legislative jurisdiction, but that is something which apparently we shall have to consider. If I understand aright that it is the view of the Prime Minister that this parliament can deal with practically all of these matters, then we have a pretty big order ahead of us. In this connection I should like to place on record the various conventions which we should then be asked to ratify. This is assuming now that the federal government hereafter is going to be called upon to deal with all these matters of labour standards. The different conventions are as follows:

At the first session at Washington in 1919: hours of work. We are to be asked this afternoon to approve that convention. Why are we not asked to approve the others that were passed at the same convention?—unemployment; childbirth; night work (women); minimum age (industry); night work (young persons). These were all passed at the same convention as the one which is coming before us a little later to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: The subject of white phosphorous was also discussed at Washington.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my right honourable friend reminded me of that, but it is not down here as a convention. At the second session at Genoa in 1920 the following conventions were passed: minimum age (sea); unemployment; indemnity (shipwreck); placing of seamen.

These are all matters that come within federal jurisdiction I think, and I imagine it will be found that they have been included in previous enactments of this parliament. Therefore there is no more necessity for asking parliament to approve those particular conventions than for asking it to approve over again the trade agreements as we have been asked to do on a private member's motion.

We come to the third session at Geneva, 1921. There was one convention with respect to minimum age (agriculture); one with respect to right of association (agriculture); one with respect to workmen's compensation (agriculture); one with respect to white lead (painting) and one with respect to weekly rest (industry). We are going to be asked to approve a convention with respect to weekly rest a little later. Why are we not asked to approve the conventions with respect to these other matters that relate to agriculture where they come within the jurisdiction of this parliament? They have all been considered. The Justice department has carefully considered the question of the particular legislative body to which they should be referred and departments of the federal government have considered those that relate to federal affairs. Why single out the convention with respect to weekly rest in industry and then omit the one that precedes and the others that follow, which are: minimum age with respect to trimmers and stokers, and medical examination of young persons at sea? I think I can explain why we are not being asked to approve these last two. They were approved by this parliament several years ago. My impression is that those particular conventions go back ten or fifteen years and that they were approved and were embodied in some legislation passed with respect to shipping at that time on a revision of the Shipping Act.

Now we come to the seventh session at Geneva in 1925 at which were passed conventions with respect to workmen's compensation (accidents); workmen's compensation (occupational diseases); equality of treatment (accident compensation); night work (bakeries).

Then the eighth session at Geneva, 1926: inspection of emigrants.

Then the ninth session at Geneva, 1926: seamen's articles of agreement; repatriation of seamen.

Then the tenth session at Geneva, 1927: sickness insurance (industry, etcetera); sickness insurance (agriculture).

Then the eleventh session at Geneva, 1928: minimum wage fixing machinery.

Then the twelfth session at Geneva, 1929: marking of weight (packages transported by vessels); protection against accidents (dockers).

Those are the other two we are to be asked to approve this afternoon. Why are they singled out of the lot? We have already enacted those that relate to the merchants shipping bill which was passed at the last session. We are now being asked formally to approve something that has already been done, but nothing is said about all these other subjects.

Then the fourteenth session at Geneva in 1930: forced labour; hours of work (commerce and offices).

Then the fifteenth session at Geneva, 1931: hours of work (coal mines).

I was going to say that later in the session we may be asked to approve these, but if so, let us have them before us as soon as possible and let them not be kept back until the very end of the session.

Then the sixteenth session at Geneva in 1932: protecting against accidents (dockers) (revised); minimum age (non-industrial employment).

Then the seventeenth session at Geneva, 1933: fee-charging employment agencies; old age insurance (industry, etcetera); old age insurance (agriculture); invalidity insurance (industry, etcetera); invalidity insurance (agriculture); survivors' insurance (industry, etcetera); survivors' insurance (agriculture).

I see that the Prime Minister has given notice of bills that he is bringing in next week with regard to the eight-hour day and weekly rest. Evidently he is going to base these bills on what is in the convention with respect to those particular matters. But he has already introduced—and we were told we would have the second reading of it this afternoon—a bill with respect to unemployment insurance which relates to other forms of social insurance. Why have we not been asked similarly to approve those particular conventions before taking up the bill that may or may not be based upon them?

I come now to the eighteenth session at Geneva in 1934: night work (women) (revised), workmen's compensation (occupational diseases) (revised), sheet glass works, unemployment provision.

Those are the conventions, but there are also recommendations. It is important to notice that the construction that the league itself has placed upon conventions that come to a federated state is that a federated state is in a different position from what is termed a unitary state. As far as a federated state is concerned the office of the League of Nations itself has decided that the conventions shall be to a federated state in the nature of recommendations, recommendations which shall be passed on to the competent legislative authority, and there the obligation with respect to these particular conventions and recommendations ends as far as concerns fulfilling the requirements of the treaty.

Let me come then to the recommendations; it will explain why I omitted the one the Prime Minister referred to a moment ago, because it comes under recommendations. The first session at Washington, 1919, dealt with unemployment, reciprocity of treatment, anthrax prevention, lead poisoning, (women and children); labour inspection (health services); white phosphorous.

Second session (Genoa, 1920); hours of work (fishing); hours of work (inland navigation); national seamen's codes; unemployment insurance (seamen).

Third session (Geneva, 1921); unemployment (agriculture), child birth (agriculture), night work of women (agriculture), night work of children and young persons (agriculture), vocational education (agriculture), living-in conditions (agriculture), social insurance (agriculture), weekly rest (commerce).

There is an interesting thing. In that particular list we have two subjects mentioned, vocational education, and weekly rest. We are going to be asked to approve a convention relating to weekly rest, but we have never been asked to approve a convention regarding vocational education. Yet as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) well knows, four sessions ago he introduced in this parliament a bill with respect to vocational education which passed both houses and is now law. We pointed out at the time that what was necessary with respect to all social legislation was to have the money available whereby it could be put into force. I told the minister at the time that I thought he would be wise to find out first where he was to get the money, and afterwards pass the bill. But after the bill was passed the Department of Labour notified the provincial government that because they had not any money, they were sorry the government could not put it into force, that money was required for other purposes, and that therefore this vocational education measure would have to remain on the statutes a dead letter. It is on the statutes now; it has been passed by this parliament but it is a dead letter. I wonder why this government do not ask us to approve the convention under which reference was particularly made to vocational education, especially when at the same session there was a convention passed relating to weekly rest.

Now we come to the fourth session, (Geneva; 1922): migration statistics.

Fifth session, (Geneva, 1923): labour inspection.

Sixth session, (Geneva, 1924): utilization of spare time.

Seventh session, (Geneva, 1925), workmen's compensation (minimum scale); workmen's compensation (jurisdiction); workmen's compensation (occupational diseases); equality of treatment (accident compensation).

Eighth session, (Geneva, 1926), migration, (protection of females at sea).

Ninth session, (Geneva, 1926), repatriation, (ship masters and apprentices); labour inspection, (seaman).

Tenth session, (Geneva, 1927), sickness insurance.

Eleventh session, (Geneva, 1928), minimum wage-fixing machinery.

Twelfth session, (Geneva, 1929), prevention of industrial accidents; power-driven machinery; protection against accidents, (dockers) reciprocity; protection against accidents, (dockers) consultation of organizations.

Fourteenth session, (Geneva, 1930), forced labour (indirect compulsion); forced labour (regulation); hours of work (hotels, etcetera); hours of work (theatres, etcetera); hours of work, (hospitals, etcetera).

Sixteenth session, (Geneva, 1932), protection against accidents (dockers) reciprocity; minimum age, (non-industrial employment).

Seventeenth session, (Geneva, 1933), employment agencies; invalidity, old age and survivors' insurance.

Eighteenth session, (Geneva, 1934), unemployment provision.

Ordinarily I would apologize to the house for taking time to read through that complete record, but I think it is all important that this country should understand why some conventions have not been formally approved, and why at this moment the country is being asked to approve five out of that total of nearly one hundred, all of which are quite as important, and most of which are more important than at least three of the number we are being asked to approve this afternoon. I think it is only right that not only this country but countries throughout the world should know that what has taken place is that when these various conventions have been sent, on the advice of the law officers of the crown, to the lieutenant governors of the different provinces, in most cases it was possible for the provinces to send word to the labour office of the League of Nations that already their requirements have been embodied in legislation which in some cases is far in advance of what is required by the conventions; and there has been no necessity for asking any formal approval. The same thing has been equally true with regard to the legislation enacted by this parliament with respect to many of these matters; the subjects referred to had been anticipated by parliament and were already upon the statutes.

In conclusion let me say that the desirability of having conventions of this kind as widely known and as generally applied as may be possible is perfectly obvious. The whole purpose of the labour office has been to try to bring about some uniformity of standards between the different countries of the world in the matter of labour legislation, realizing that unless that be done those countries which are highest in their standards will be undermined by countries having lower standards. Canada is fortunately in the position that her standards are high; not as high as they should be, and far from what we hope they will be, but nevertheless relatively and comparatively much better than those of many other countries.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), and of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) with reference to what in my judgment is one of the most important questions that has come before this parliament since confederation. I am fully conversant with the constitution and policies of the international labour office under the jurisdiction of the League of Nations. I think those interested understand generally that the conventions of the league are not mandatory, but merely sent out to the respective governments for their endorsement and to guide them in setting in motion their policies. I believe that when the history of the league is written the international labour office will stand out in bold relief from any other department of the league in its power for good, in raising the general social status of the working people of every country in the world.

The leader of the opposition quite rightly said that the tendency or driving force is to raise the living conditions and standards of those countries which are much below our own; those countries in the east, and the eastern part of Europe, which have a tendency to lower the general standards.

But what I am most concerned about is action. The leader of the opposition has said that these conventions have come before this House of Commons before. But to-day, as I understand it, this house is being asked to advance them to a position of realization, of practical application. After all, that is the most important thing. You can bring them before the provincial legislatures and nothing be done. But as I understand it to-day the convention, for instance, in connection with hours of labour—in my judgment it does not go far enough, but that is beside the point—but it can be truthfully said that if the convention is adopted this dominion will be giving leadership to the rest of the British commonwealth, because no British government up to the moment, irrespective of party, has ratified the convention of 1919 with reference to the eight hour day. I think that is a statement of fact, so I welcome the policy of this government.

I am also in agreement to some extent with the position taken by the leader of the opposition, that possibly we have not taken sufficient interest in the league so far as the ratification of these conventions is concerned, but I think it is a fair observation to say that the attitude being taken by the parliament of this country in connection with what I consider to be these very important conventions will give leadership to the world, strengthen the position of the league and add to the influence of the international labour office in its efforts to crystallize world opinion in regard to practices affecting the workers both in industry and in agriculture in the various countries. I think in the broadest sense this is a move forward which will help improve the status of the workers, not only in this dominion but also in all the other countries of the commonwealth and, in turn, all the countries of the world.

I am not particularly interested in the legal aspect of the matter. I am not unmindful of its potentiality, but I welcome this evidence that this parliament is endeavouring to meet the needs expressed in these conventions, where those needs are predominantly of a national character, through the instrumentality of this House of Commons. I think it most important that we have some centralization of policy in connection with hours of labour, one day's rest in seven and so on, and that is why I take this attitude. I am willing to take the chance of people using the courts to throw sand in the machinery, because

I think a great step forward has been taken to meet the very pressing problems of the present day in connection with industry and agriculture, in the fact that this parliament has set in motion policies, backed by the conventions of the League of Nations through the international labour office, that will make it possible to take national action on questions that we know in our souls demand such national action. That is why I say that when the history of this dominion is written, if it is proved conclusively that these very important matters come within the purview of this House of Commons it will stand out in bold relief, whether we like it or not. I have made some study of this question; I have made these few remarks extemporaneously after listening to the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, but I think this action will prove conclusively to the world in general the deep interest taken by the people of this country in the League of Nations and the international labour office which, after all is said and done, was brought into being under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden and others of this dominion. I think Sir Robert Borden's name will go down in history for the part he played in connection with the treaty of Versailles, which set that machinery in motion. In these days, when the policies of the league are sometimes held up to ridicule, I think it well that this House of Commons should give recognition to the influence for good that is possessed by the league, by the adoption of these measures.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer just a word with regard to some of the observations of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in reference to the real purpose of the resolution now under discussion. My right hon. friend seemed to be in doubt as to whether a resolution for approval of a convention was the same thing as the ratification of a convention. The resolution is for the approval of a certain draft convention submitted to this country under the authority of the League of Nations, or the labour branch of that august body. What is sought by this resolution is the approval by this house of that draft convention. Ratification is another thing altogether; ratification of a convention is the formal act, the final act, and I believe it consists in the signing of the convention or treaty either by the sovereign or by someone deputed by the sovereign for that purpose. All we seek at the present moment is the approval of the House of Commons of this draft convention. After the approval will follow the formal ratification, and then I submit that the convention becomes part and parcel of the treaty of Versailles, and we are just as fully bound by a convention authorized by that treaty and properly ratified as we are by the other provisions of the treaty.

I mention this in view of the citation by my right hon. friend of an opinion expressed in this house by the late Right Hon. Charles Doherty in 1920, at that time Minister of Justice, and also in view of a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada on the same question. When the opinion was given in this house by the then Minister of Justice all that we had before parliament was a draft convention which had been adopted at a labour conference held in Washington in 1919, in pursuance of the terms of the treaty of Versailles. At the conference in Washington a draft convention was adopted for submission to the various nations who had signed the treaty of Versailles. In due course that draft convention came before the parliament of Canada, merely as a draft convention, and a question at once arose as to the nature of the obligations, if any, which had been imposed upon the Dominion of Canada by reason of the fact that we had become parties to the treaty of Versailles. The statement made at that time by the then Minister of Justice in my judgment was accurate in every respect as a statement of the law. In 1925 this question and other questions were referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, and in the judgment of that court the opinion given by the former Minister of Justice, Right Hon. Mr. Doherty, was elaborated and sustained. In the judgment of the present right hon. chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada I find this language:

> It seems very clear that the duty arising under this clause is not a duty to enact legislation or to promote legislation; it is an undertaking simply to bring the recommendation or draft convention before the competent authority.

There was no other obligation cast upon this parliament merely by the submission of the draft convention. That was the stage the matter had then reached; that was the stage it had reached when the question was referred to the supreme court. But the situation will become entirely different if this parliament sees fit to approve and subsequently to ratify the draft convention. It then will become part and parcel of the treaty of Versailles, and as such I submit with a good deal of confidence it will come within the jurisdiction of this parliament under section 132 of the British North America Act.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve any remarks I have to make as to the last point raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) until one of the conventions which in my view falls within provincial jurisdiction, namely the eight hour day convention, is taken up further. There can be no doubt that this convention is within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. One of the reasons why this draft convention which was adopted in 1926 has not been approved by this parliament,—although I believe when the Shipping Act adopted last year has been proclaimed it will be part of the law of the country—is that the powers of parliament in matters of shipping were restricted. In 1926 and again in 1929 one of the main reasons we took the stand which ultimately led to the enactment of the Westminster statute was that so far as authority or jurisdiction in shipping matters was concerned Canada was still a crown colony. The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, which ante dated confederation by thirteen years were almost in their entirety applied to Canada. The Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 gave us the authority or jurisdiction to repeal some of the provisions, so far as their application to Canada was concerned. That authority however applied to only part of the act and our actions had to be approved by the imperial parliament. We were further restricted by the fact that we had no right to enact extra-territorial legislation, and undoubtedly to have full effect our laws relating to shipping must have such extraterritorial jurisdiction. We had no right to enact any law which would be repugnant to an act of the imperial parliament. In point of fact we stated that Canada was placed in an embarrassing position because she had no authority to enact the provisions to which she had pledged herself under conventions relating to shipping at international conferences. Since the Westminster statute of 1930 this condition has disappeared and only last year this parliament enacted a new shipping act embodying the obligations which Canada assumed at the various international conferences regarding shipping. So there is nothing very extraordinary in the resolution before the house. It is within our jurisdiction to act, and in fact we enacted the provisions last year.

There is one observation however I desire to direct to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is he sure the language of his resolution—and the same language appears in the resolutions following—is correct? He states: "That it is expedient that parliament do approve" and so on. Have we the right to speak for parliament? We are the House of Commons. I believe we should speak only for the House of Commons, and then a message could be sent to the Senate in order to obtain their approval. I do not think we have yet removed the Senate from our parliamentary system.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of the resolution, and in this instance my support is given unreservedly. Sometimes as I listen to the debates in this chamber I have a feeling that some hon. members are afraid other hon. members may bring in proposals or recommend legislation of a beneficial character. So far as I am concerned I do not care who brings in the legislation, whether it be the government of the day or hon. members of the opposition. All I want to see is good legislation and good law. I believe the adoption of this convention is a step in the right direction and consequently I support it.

I believe the purpose of the international labour organization is to consider ways and means of improving internationally the standard of living of the working classes. They take the various occupations in which the working classes are engaged and set minimum standards for them. I believe the present convention is in that class. In my opinion there could be only one reason why we could or should oppose the draft convention, and it would be that if the standards in Canada concerning a particular occupation were higher than those mentioned in the draft convention it might be more difficult for the dominion to force the regulations. However if we have dominion law covering the point and enforce it I do not think we need have any fear. I believe it essential that we should give our approval to these conventions of the labour organization in view of the fact that Canada is a member of that body, and also because to-day we have international rather than national competition. In western Canada, and I speak particularly of British Columbia, we have a great many orientals. Many people seem to feel that the fact we have so many orientals in British Columbia their competition proves detrimental. However I maintain that the competition of the orientals in China and Japan proves a much greater detriment to the people of British Columbia than the competition of the orientals in that province. My reason for making that statement in this connection is that the standard of living of the oriental and other countries is lower than ours, and anything which can be done to improve that standard and bring it up to ours, or as the case may be bring ours up to theirs, is a movement in the right direction.

Article 22 provides:

> At least once in ten years, the governing body of the international labour office shall present to the general conference a report on the working of this convention and shall consider the desirability of placing on the agenda of the conference the question of its revision or modification.

If we approve of this article but find that other countries have not approved or, on the other hand, have approved and are not living up to its terms, we may make a protest at a time of revision of the convention and in that way try still further to improve the standard of living of the working classes the world over.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just before the Prime Minister speaks on the point that has been raised as to the drafting—this is a point of order, Mr. Speaker—may I say I think the matter would be simplified and the objection fully met if the resolution were worded: "That the house do approve of the convention," placing those words at the very beginning and deleting the words, "That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention." I doubt if the house should express an opinion as to what the Senate and the crown should do. We can only speak with respect to ourselves.

Mr. BENNETT: Dealing with the last question raised by the right hon. gentleman first, it is only necessary to point out that the resolution merely indicates that it is expedient that parliament, that is both houses of parliament, and not dealing with the crown at all for the moment, approve.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It says parliament, not both houses.

Mr. BENNETT: I know what it says, and I am advised that this is the form that should be used. My first view was that we should merely say "that the House of Commons do approve," and that is all there would be to it so far as that is concerned; but as it stands, I believe it is the form that has been used on previous occasions, namely, that it is expedient that parliament should do so and so, just as we pass a resolution that it is expedient that some particular form of action be taken. At one time, for instance, a resolution was passed in this house with respect to home rule. It is quite competent for us to say that it is expedient for parliament to take this or that action. That is my understanding at the moment, but in view of what the right hon. gentleman and the former Minister of Justice have said I shall make further inquiries and satisfy myself on that point before we rise this evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the Prime Minister leaves that, may I draw to his attention that when I introduced an amendment to the motion for supply I was advised by the chair that this house could not give any direction to one of its committees. Now the resolution that I moved merely expressed the opinion that it was desirable that the estimates of a certain department should have priority. If this house cannot give an expression of opinion on what it thinks is desirable for one of its own committees to do, it surely cannot say what it is expedient that parliament and the crown shall do.

Mr. BENNETT: I am rather surprised that the right hon. gentleman should avail himself of this opportunity to indicate why he is opposing the ruling of the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not opposing it; I am supporting the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: May very clearly lays down the rule with respect to the committee of supply, which differs entirely from any other committee, and is the distinguishing reason why instructions could not be given to the committee of supply in that way because supply involves the estimates in detail, as pointed out by May. There is that distinction between giving instructions to an ordinary or special committee and the committee of supply. May makes that point abundantly clear.

I really found it difficult to understand why the right hon. gentleman twice this afternoon in incorrect terms referred to a motion that had been adopted yesterday. He said that he could not quite understand why we were discussing some of these matters because parliament had already acted. He could not understand why yesterday and on other days parliament was discussing questions on private members' motions that had already been dealt with by parliament. Now, with all respect, may I point out how erroneous that statement is. The resolution of the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) was that in the opinion of this house the operation of the trade agreements merited the approval of the house. It had nothing to do with the expediency of doing something by the house, but that the operation of the trade treaties merited the approval of the house, which is an entirely different thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The same thing.

Mr. BENNETT: It is so entirely different that the mere mention of it carries on its face the conviction that it is so. If we say that it is unwise to do something, and we do it, well and good; but when we say that the results of the operations of the trade agreements have been beneficial, that is entirely different; and the resolution moved by the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough was that the operation of the trade agreements merited the approval of the house.

Dealing with the matter of these conventions, I have only to point out to the right hon. gentleman that I think, if he will inquire he will find there has been much criticism in respect to Canadian action with respect to conventions at Geneva. I am only recording my impressions as I received them on the one occasion I was there. I was ill part of the time but I did discuss the matter with competent authorities, and all my colleagues who had been delegates came back with the same tale, that other countries, because we had accepted certain conventions, could not understand why we did not take further action with respect to them. I know I have explained that the unitary system of government, such as most of those countries have, operates in an entirely different way from the system that we enjoy, and that the distinction between the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures is entirely different from that jurisdiction which is exercised by the central authority in a federated body. I mention that not in any spirit of carping criticism but simply because it had been brought to my attention so frequently, and I thought it desirable merely to mention it, as no doubt it was mentioned to my right hon. friend by those who represented this country at various times at the international labour conferences at Geneva. It was with no intention at all of casting aspersions on my right hon. friend and his government in dealing with these matters, because I was well aware of the fact that in 1919 and 1920 when this matter was new, after the Washington conference, there was a difference of opinion among eminent jurists as to what action should be taken and a difference of opinion among members of the cabinet who happened to be of the legal profession, and finally action was taken referring the question to the Supreme Court of Canada, to determine where the jurisdiction of the province ended and that of the dominion began. I shall have something further to say about that presently in the light of later decisions by the privy council.

All I desire to say with respect to this particular convention is that it was thought desirable for reasons that I think are apparent on the face of it that this action should be taken, for last session we legislated with respect to a part of the matter, and the statute comes into force by proclamation, because it was a statute that it was hoped would have universal application in all parts of the British commonwealth. The hon. former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will recall that with the assistance of one of his colleagues and professional assistance from Nova Scotia, certain conclusions were arrived at in London in 1929, and the hope was expressed that we would have some form of established law relating to shipping throughout the entire British commonwealth. We have passed our statute. We have not brought one part of it into force because certain other dominions have not yet legislated with respect to the matter. But in the meantime, as these sections will not become operative until the act is proclaimed, we thought it was desirable to approve of this convention, and the house is therefore now being asked to take that action to-day. It is solely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. There is no question about it because as the former Minister of Justice said, laws with respect to navigation and shipping are solely within the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament.

Therefore, without going further into the matter, because I propose to discuss some of the other resolutions at some length, I make this motion, and if there is any question as to its form I shall have it looked into again at six o'clock, and if it is thought that the suggestion which the right hon. gentleman has made better meets the situation I shall make the necessary motion to permit it to be done.

Motion agreed to.

MARKING OF THE WEIGHT ON HEAVY PACKAGES TRANSPORTED BY VESSELS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention concerning the marking of the weight on heavy packages transported by vessels adopted as a draft convention by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations at its twelfth session in Geneva on the 21st day of June, 1929, reading as follows:—

Convention Concerning the Marking of the Weight on Heavy Packages Transported by Vessels

The general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations,

Having been convened at Geneva by the governing body of the international labour office, and having met in its twelfth session on 30th May, 1929, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the marking of the weight on heavy packages transported by vessels, which is included in the first item of the agenda of the session, and adopts, this twenty-first day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine, the following draft convention for ratification by the members of the international labour organization, in accordance with the provisions of part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace:

Article 1.—Any package or object of one thousand kilograms (one metric ton) or more gross weight consigned within the territory of any member which ratifies this convention for transport by sea or inland waterway shall have had its gross weight plainly and durably marked upon it on the outside before it is loaded on a ship or vessel.

In exceptional cases where it is difficult to determine the exact weight, national laws or regulations may allow an approximate weight to be marked.

The obligation to see that this requirement is observed shall rest solely upon the government of the country from which the package or object is consigned, and not on the government of a country through which it passes on the way to its destination.

It shall be left to national laws or regulations to determine whether the obligation for having the weight marked as aforesaid shall fall on the consignor or on some other person or body.

Article 2.—The formal ratifications of this convention under the conditions set forth in Part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and in the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace shall be communicated to the secretary-general of the League of Nations for registration.

Article 3.—This convention shall be binding only upon those members whose ratifications have been registered with the secretariat.

It shall come into force twelve months after the date on which the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretary-general.

Thereafter, this convention shall come into force for any member twelve months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

Article 4.—As soon as the ratification of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretariat, the secretary-general of the League of Nations shall so notify all the members of the international labour organization. He shall likewise notify them of the registration of ratifications which may be communicated subsequently by other members of the organization.

Article 5.—A member which has ratified this convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the secretary-general of the League of Nations for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered with the secretariat.

Each member which has ratified this convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this article, will be bound for another period of ten years and, thereafter, may denounce this convention at the expiration of each period of ten years under the terms provided for in this article.

Article 6.—At the expiration of each period of ten years after the coming into force of this convention, the governing body of the international labour office shall present to the general conference a report on the working of this convention and shall consider the desirability of placing on the agenda of the conference the question of its revision in whole or in part.

Article 7.—Should the conference adopt a new convention revising this convention in whole or in part, the ratification by a member of the new revising convention shall ipso jure involve denunciation of this convention without any requirement of delay, notwithstanding the provisions of article 5 above, if and when the new revising convention shall have come into force.

As from the date of the coming into force of the new revising convention, the present convention shall cease to be open to ratification by the members.

Nevertheless, this convention shall remain in force in its actual form and content for those members which have ratified it but have not ratified the revising convention.

Article 8.—The French and English texts of this convention shall both be authentic, and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: I think it well to place upon the record the dates on which this convention was ratified, not approved, by the various states represented at Geneva:

Union of South Africa—February 21, 1933.
Australia—March 9, 1931.

Belgium—June 6, 1934.
Chile—May 31, 1933.
China—June 24, 1931.
Czechoslovakia—March 26, 1934.
Denmark—January 18, 1933.
Estonia—January 18, 1932.
Finland—August 8, 1932.
Germany—July 5, 1933.
Irish Free State—July 5, 1930.
India—September 7, 1931.
Italy—July 18, 1933.
Japan—March 16, 1931.

Luxemburg—April 1, 1931.
Mexico—May 12, 1934.
The Netherlands—January 4, 1933.
Nicaragua—April 21, 1934.
Norway—July 1, 1932.
Poland—June 18, 1932.
Portugal—March 1, 1932.
Roumania—December 7, 1932.
Spain—August 29, 1932.
Sweden—April 11, 1932.
Uruguay—June 6, 1933.
Venezuela—December 17, 1932.
Jugoslavia—April 22, 1933.

The substantial provisions of the convention will be embodied in our Canada Shipping Act, which was passed last session, particularly in section 468, when it comes into force, and for the reasons I mentioned with respect to the seamen's articles of agreement, I suggest that this convention, which provides for marking on heavy packages weighing more than a ton the exact weight in order that the handling of such packages may be done with the least possible danger to those engaged in the work of unloading ships, should be approved by the house.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): With regard to this convention, the authority to deal with the subject matter of the convention under the peace treaty is clearly the parliament of Canada, and we have no objection to the approval asked for by the resolution, but my remarks on the previous resolution apply to this one also.

Motion agreed to.

PROTECTION AGAINST ACCIDENTS OF WORKERS EMPLOYED IN LOADING OR UNLOADING SHIPS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That is is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention concerning the protection against accidents of workers employed in loading or unloading ships (revised 1932) adopted as a draft convention by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations at its sixteenth session in Geneva on the 12th day of April, 1932, reading as follows:—

Convention Concerning the Protection Against Accidents of Workers Employed in Loading or Unloading Ships

The general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations,

Having been convened at Geneva by the governing body of the international labour office, and having met in its twelfth session on 30 May, 1929, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the protection against accidents of workers employed in loading or unloading ships, which is the second item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a draft international convention,

adopts, this twenty-first day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine, the following draft convention for ratification by the members of the international labour organization, in accordance with the provisions of part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other Treaties of Peace:

Article 1—For the purpose of this convention:

(1) the term "'processess" means and includes all of any part of the work performed on shore or on board ship of loading or unloading any ship whether engaged in maritime or inland navigation, excluding ships of war, in, on, or at any maritime or inland port, harbour, dock, wharf, quay or similar place at which such work is carried on; and

(2) the term "worker" means any person employed in the processes.

Article 2—Any regular approach over a dock, wharf, quay or similar premises which wrokers have to use for going to or from a working place at which the processes are carried on and every such working place on shore shall be maintained with due regard to the safety of the workers using them.

In particular,

(1) every said working place on shore and any dangerous parts of any said approach thereto from the nearest highway shall be safely and efficiently lighted;

(2) wharves and quays shall be kept sufficiently clear of goods to maintain a clear passage to the means of access referred to in Article 3;

(3) where any space is left along the edge of any wharf or quay, it shall be at least 3 feet (90cm.) wide and clear of all obstructions other than fixed structures, plant and appliances in use; and

(4) so far as is practicable having regard to the traffic and working,

(a) all dangerous parts of the said approaches and working places (e.g. dangerous breaks, corners and edges) shall be adequately fenced to a height of not less than 2 feet 6 inches (75 cm.);

(b) dangerous footways over bridges, caissons and dock gates shall be fenced to a height of not less than 2 feet 6 inches (75 cm.) on each side, and the said fencing shall be continued at both ends to a sufficient distance which shall not be required to exceed 5 yards (4 m. 50).

Article 3—(1) When a ship is lying alongside a quay or some other vessel for the purpose of the processes, there shall be safe means of access for the use of the workers at such times as they have to pass to or from the ship, unless the conditions are such that they would not be exposed to undue risk if no special appliance were provided.

(2) The said means of access shall be:

(a) where reasonably practicable, the ship's accommodation ladder, a gangway or a similar construction;

(b) in other cases a ladder.

(3) The appliances specified in paragraph (2) (a) of this Article shall be at least 22 inches (55 cm.) wide, properly secured to prevent their displacement, not inclined at too steep an angle, constructed of materials of good quality and in good condition, and securely fenced throughout to a clear height of not less than 2 feet 9 inches (82 cm.) on both sides, or in the case of the ship's accommodation ladder securely fenced to the same height on one side, provided that the other side is properly protected by the ship's side.

Provided that any appliances as aforesaid in use at the date of the ratification of this convention shall be allowed to remain in use:

(a) until the fencing is renewed if they are fenced on both sides to a clear height of at least 2 feet 8 inches (80cm.);

(b) for one year from the date of ratification if they are fenced on both sides to a clear height of at least 2 feet 6 inches (75cm.).

(4) The ladders specified in paragraph (2) (b) of this article shall be of adequate length and strength, and properly secured.

(5) (a) Exceptions to the provisions of this article may be allowed by the competent authorities when they are satisfied that the appliances specified in the article are not required for the safety of the workers.

(b) The provisions of this article shall not apply to cargo stages or cargo gangways when exclusively used for the processes.

(6) Workers shall not use, or be required to use, any other means of access than the means specified or allowed by this article.

Article 4.—When the workers have to proceed to or from a ship by water for the processes, appropriate measures shall be prescribed to ensure their safe transport, including the conditions to be complied with by the vessels used for this purpose.

Article 5.—(1) When the workers have to carry on the processes in a hold the depth of which from the level of the deck to the bottom of the hold exceeds 5 feet (1 m. 50), there shall be safe means of access from the deck to the hold for their use.

(2) The said means of access shall ordinarily be by ladder, which shall not be deemed to be safe unless it complies with the following conditions:

(a) leaves sufficient free space behind the rungs, which in the case of ladders on bulkheads and in trunk hatchways shall not be less than 4½ inches (11½ cm.), or has throughout rungs of proper width for firm foothold and handhold;

(b) is not recessed under the deck more than is reasonably necessary to keep it clear of the hatchway;

(c) is continued by and is in line with arrangements for secure handhold and foothold on the coamings (e.g. cleats or cups);

(d) the said arrangements on the coamings standout not less than 4½ inches (11½ cm.) for a width of 10 inches (25 cm.); and

(e) if separate ladders are provided between the lower decks, the said ladders are as far as practicable in line with the ladder from the top deck.

Where, however, owing to the construction of the ship, the provision of a ladder would not be reasonably practicable, it shall be open to the competent authorities to allow other means of access, provided that they comply with the conditions laid down in this article for ladders so far as they are applicable.

(3) Sufficient free passage to the means of access shall be left at the coamings.

(4) Shaft tunnels shall be equipped with adequate handhold and foothold on both sides.

(5) When a ladder is to be used in the hold of a vessel which is not decked it shall be the duty of the contractor undertaking the processes to provide such ladder. It shall be equipped at the top with hooks for fastening it on to the coamings or with other means for firmly securing it.

(6) The workers shall not use, or be required to use, other means of access than the means specified or allowed by this article.

(7) Ships existing at the date of ratification of this convention shall be exempt from compliance with the measurements in paragraph 2 (a) and (d) and from the provisions of paragraph 4 of this article for a period not exceeding four years from the date of ratification of this convention.

Article 6.—While the workers are on a ship for the purpose of the processes, no hatchway of a cargo hold which exceeds 5 feet (1 m. 50) in depth from the level of the deck to the bottom of the hold and which is accessible to the workers shall be left open and unprotected, but every such hatchway which is not protected to a clear height of 2 feet 6 inches (75 cm.) by the coamings shall either be securely fenced to a height of 3 feet (90 cm.) if the processes at that hatchway are not impeded thereby or be securely covered.

Similar measures shall be taken when necessary to protect any other openings in a deck which might be dangerous to the workers.

Provided that the requirements of this article shall not apply when a proper and sufficient watch is being kept.

Article 7.—When the processes have to be carried on on a ship, the means of access thereto and all places on board at which the workers are employed or to which they may be required to proceed in the course of their employment shall be efficiently lighted.

The means of lighting shall be such as not to endanger the safety of the workers nor to interfere with the navigation of other vessels.

Article 8.—In order to ensure the safety of the workers when engaged in removing or replacing hatch coverings and beams used for hatch coverings.

(1) hatch coverings and beams used for hatch coverings shall be maintained in good condition;

(2) hatch coverings shall be fitted with adequate hand grips, having regard to their size and weight;

(3) beams used for hatch coverings shall have suitable gear for removing and replacing them of such a character as to render it unnecessary for workers to go upon them for the purpose of adjusting such gear;

(4) all hatch coverings and fore and aft and thwart-ship beams shall, in so far as they are not interchangeable, be kept plainly marked to indicate the deck and hatch to which they belong and their position therein;

(5) hatch coverings shall not be used in the construction of cargo stages or for any other purpose which may expose them to damage.

Article 9.—Appropriate measures shall be prescribed to ensure that no hoisting machine, or gear, whether fixed or loose, used in conection therewith, is employed in the processes on shore or on board ship unless it is in a safe working condition.

In particular,

(1) before being taken into use, the said machines, fixed gear on board ship accessory thereto as defined by national laws or regulations, and chains and wire ropes used in connection therewith, shall be adequately examined and tested, and the safe working load thereof certified, in the manner prescribed and by a competent person;

(2) after being taken into use, every hoisting machine, whether used on shore or on board ship, and all fixed gear on board ship accessory thereto as defined by national laws or regulations shall be thoroughly examined or inspected as follows:

(a) to be thoroughly examined every four years and inspected every twelve months: derricks, goose necks, mast bands, derrick bands, eyebolts, spans and any other fixed gear the dismantling of which is specially difficult;

(b) to be thoroughly examined every twelve months: all hoisting machines (e.g. cranes, winches), blocks, shackles and all other accessory gear not included in (a).

All loose gear (e.g. chains, wire ropes, rings, hooks) shall be inspected on each occasion before use unless they have been inspected within the previous three months.

Chains shall not be shortened by tying knots in them and precautions shall be taken to prevent injury to them from shard edges.

A thimble or loop splice made in any wire rope shall have at least three tucks with a whole strand of rope and two tucks with one half of the wires cut out of each strand; provided that this requirement shall not operate to prevent the use of another form of splice which can be shown to be as efficient as the form hereby prescribed.

(3) Chains and such similar gear as is specified by national laws or regulations (e.g. hooks, rings, shackles, swivels) shall, unless they have been subjected to such other sufficient treatment as may be prescribed by national laws or regulations, be annealed under the supervision of a competent person as follows:

(a) In the case of chains and the said gear carried on board ship:

(i) half inch (12½ mm.) and smaller chains or gear in general use once at least in every six months;

(ii) all other chains or gear (including span chains but excluding bridle chains attached to derricks or masts) in general use once at least in ever twelve months:

Provided that in the case of such gear used solely on cranes and other hoisting appliances worked by hand, twelve months shall be substituted for six months in sub-paragraph (i) and two years for twelve months in sub-paragraph (ii);

Provided also that, if the competent authority is of opinion that owing to the size, design, material or infrequency of use of any of the said gear other than chains the requirements of this paragraph as to annealing are not necessary for the protection of the workers, it may, by certificate in writing (which it may at its discretion revoke) exempt such gear from the said requirements subject to such conditions as may be specified in the said certificate.

(b) In the case of chains and the said gear not carried on board ship:

Measures shall be prescribed to secure the annealing of the said chains and gear.

(c) In the case of the said chains and gear whether carried on board ship or not, which have been lengthened, altered or repaired by welding, they shall thereupon be tested and re-examined.

(4) Such duly authenticated records as will provide sufficient prima facie evidence of the safe condition of the machines and gear concerned shall be kept, on shore or on the ship as the case may be, specifying the safe working load and the dates and results of the tests and examinations referred to in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this article and of the annealings or other treatment referred to in paragraph (3).

Such records shall, on the application of any person authorized for the purpose, be produced by the person in charge thereof.

(5) The safe working load shall be kept plainly marked on all cranes, derricks and chain slings and on any similar hoisting gear used on board ship as specified by national laws or regulations. The safe working load marked on chain slings shall either be in plain figures or letters upon the chains or upon a tablet or ring of durable material attached securely thereto.

(6) All motors, cogwheels, chain and friction gearing, shafting, live electric conductors and steam pipes shall (unless it can be shown that by their position and construction they are equally safe to every worker employed as they would be if securely fenced) be securely fenced so far as is practicable without impeding the safe working of the ship.

(7) Cranes and winches shall be provided with effective appliances to prevent the accidental descent of a load while in process of being lifted or lowered.

(8) Appropriate measures shall be taken to prevent exhaust steam from and, so far as practicable, live steam to any crane or winch obscuring any part of the working place at which a worker is employed.

Article 10.—Only sufficiently competent and reliable persons shall be employed to operate lifting or transporting machinery whether driven by mechanical power or otherwise, or to give signals to a driver of such machinery, or to attend to cargo falls on winch ends or winch drums.

Article 11.—(1) No load shall be left suspended from any hoisting machine unless there is a competent person actually in charge of the machine while the load is so left.

(2) Appropriate measures shall be prescribed to provide for the employment of a signaller where this is necessary for the safety of the workers.

(3) Appropriate measures shall be prescribed with the object of preventing dangerous methods of working in the stacking, unstacking, stowing and unstowing of cargo, or handling in connection therewith.

(4) Before work is begun at a hatch the beams shall be removed, unless the hatch is of sufficient size to preclude danger to the workers from a load striking against the beams; provided that when the beams are not removed they shall be securely fastened to prevent their displacement.

(5) Precautions shall be taken to facilitate the escape of the workers when employed in a hold or on 'tween decks in dealing with coal or other bulk cargo.

(6) No stage shall be used in the processes unless it is substantially and firmly constructed, adequately suported and where necessary securely fastened.

No truck shall be used for carrying cargo between ship and shore on a stage so steep as to be unsafe.

Stages shall where necessary be treated with suitable material to prevent the workers slipping.

(7) When the working space in a hold is confined to the square of the hatch, hooks shall not be made fast in the bands or fastenings of bales of cotton, wool, cork, gunny bags or other similar goods (nor can-hooks on barrels), except for the purpose of breaking out or making up slings.

(8) No gear of any description shall be loaded beyond the safe working load, except on special occasions expressly authorized by the owner or his responsible agent of which a record shall be kept.

(9) In the case of shore cranes with varying capacity (e.g. raising and lowering jib with load capacity varying according to the angle) an automatic indicator or a table showing the safe working loads at the corresponding inclinations of the jib shall be provided on the crane.

Article 12.—National laws or regulations shall prescribe such precautions as may be deemed necessary to ensure the proper protection of the workers, having regard to the circumstances of each case, when they have to deal with or work in proximity to goods which are in themselves dangerous to life or health by reason either of their inherent nature or of their condition at the time, or work where such goods have been stowed.

Article 13.—At docks, wharves, quays and similar places which are in frequent use for the processes, such facilities as having regard to local circumstances shall be prescribed by national laws or regulations shall be available for rapidly securing the rendering of first-aid and in serious cases of accident removal to the nearest place of treatment. Sufficient supplies of first-aid equipment shall be kept permanently on the premises in such a condition and in such positions as to be fit and readily accessible for immediate use during working hours. The said supplies shall be in charge of a responsible person or persons, who shall include one or more persons competent to render first-aid, and whose services shall also be readily available during working hours.

At such docks, wharves, quays and similar places as aforesaid appropriate provision shall also be made for the rescue of immersed workers from drowning.

Article 14.—Any fencing, gangway, gear, ladder, life-saving means or appliance, light, mark, stage or other thing whatsoever required to be provided under this convention shall not be removed or interefered with by any person except when duly authorized or in case of necessity, and if removed shall be restored at the end of the period for which its removal was necessary.

Article 15.—It shall be open to each member to grant exemptions from or exceptions to the provisions of this Convention in respect of any dock, wharf, quay or similar place at which the processes are only occasionally carried on or the traffic is small and confined to small ships, or in respect of certain special ships or special classes of ships or ships below a certain small tonnage, or in cases where as a result of climatic conditions it would be impracticable to require the provisions of this Convention to be carried out.

The international labour office shall be kept informed of the provisions in virtue of which any exemptions and exceptions as aforesaid are allowed.

Article 16.—Except as herein otherwise provided, the provisions of this convention which affect the construction or permanent equipment of the ship shall apply to ships the building of which is commenced after the date of ratification of the Convention, and to all other ships within four years after that date, provided that in the meantime the said provisions shall be applied so far as reasonable and practicable to such other ships.

Article 17.—In order to ensure the due enforcement of any regulations prescribed for the protection of the workers against accidents,

(1) The regulations shall clearly define the persons or bodies who are to be responsible for compliance with the respective regulations;

(2) Provision shall be made for an efficient system of inspection and for penalties for breaches of the regulations;

(3) Copies or summaries of the regulations shall be posted up in prominent positions at docks, wharves, quays and similar places which are in frequent use for the processes.

Article 18.—The formal ratifications of this convention under the conditions set forth in Part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and in the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace shall be communicated to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations for registration.

Article 19.—This convention shall be binding only upon those members whose ratifications have been registered with the secretariat.

It shall come into force twelve months after the date on which the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretary-general

Thereafter, this convention shall come into force for any member twelve months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

Article 20.—As soon as the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretariat, the secretary-general of the league of nations shall so notify all the members of the international labour organization. He shall likewise notify them of the registration of ratifications which may be communicated subsequently by other members of the organization.

Article 21.—A member which has ratified this convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the secretary-general of the league of nations for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered with the secretariat.

Each member which has ratified this convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this article, will be bound for another period of five years and, thereafter, may denounce this Convention at the expiration of each period of five years under the terms provided for in this article.

Article 22.—At the expiration of each period of ten years after the coming into force of this convention, the governing body of the international labour office shall present to the general conference a report on the working of this convention and shall consider the desirability of placing on the agenda of the conference the question of its revision in whole or in part.

Article 23.—Should the conference adopt a new convention revising this convention in whole or in part, the ratification by a member of the new revising convention shall ipso jure involve denunciation of this convention without any requirement of delay, notwithstanding the provisions of Article 21 above, if and when the new revising convention shall have come into force.

As from the date of the coming into force of the new revising convention, the present convention shall cease to be open to ratification by the members.

Nevertheless, this convention shall remain in force in its actual form and content for those members which have ratified it but have not ratified the revising convention.

Article 24.—The French and English texts of this Convention shall both be authentic. and that this House do approve of the same.

He said: This draft convention, which has for its object the protection against accidents of workers employed in loading or unloading ships, was ratified by a lesser number of states at the end of 1934 than the others. Italy, Mexico, Spain and Uruguay were the only countries that had registered their approval up to the end of 1934—Italy on October 30, 1933; Mexico on May 12, 1934; Spain on July 28, 1934; Uruguay on June 6, 1933.

With respect to this matter, what has been said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not at variance with my general appreciation of the situation. In some countries existing legislation is equally as good as that suggested by conventions, and in the peace treaty itself, in those sections dealing with labour, it is provided specifically that where existing provisions are better than those in draft conventions, the convention shall not be taken, read or construed as in any way lessening the requirements provided for in the countries in question. I do not think it becomes very important in that regard, but that provision has been made in the peace treaty itself.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What I said with regard to the previous resolutions applies to this one.

Motion agreed to.

WEEKLY DAY OF REST IN INDUSTRIAL UNDERTAKINGS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That, it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention concerning the application of the weekly rest in industrial undertakings adopted as a draft convention by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations at its third session in Geneva on the 17th day of November, 1921, reading as follows:—

Convention Concerning the Application of the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings

[Mr. Bennett.]

The general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations,

Having been convened at Geneva by the governing body of the international labour office, and having met in its third session on 25 October 1921, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the weekly rest day in industrial employment, which in included in the seventh item of the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a draft international convention,

adopts the following draft convention for ratification by the members of the international labour organization, in accordance with the provisions of part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace:

Article 1.—For the purpose of this convention, the term "industrial undertakings" includes:

(a) Mines, quarries, and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth.

(b) Industries in which articles are manufactured, altered, cleaned, repaired, ornamented, finished, adapted for sale, broken up or demolished, or in which materials are transformed; including shipbuilding and the generation, transformation and transmission of electricity or motive power of any kind.

(c) Construction, reconstruction, maintenance, repair, alteration, or demolition of any building, railway, tramway, harbour, dock, pier, canal, inland waterway, road, tunnel, bridge, viaduct, sewer, drain, well, telegraphic or telephonic installation, electrical undertaking, gas work, waterwork, or other work of construction, as well as the preparation for or laying the foundations of any such work or structure.

(d) Transport of passengers or goods by road, or inland waterway, including the handling of goods at docks, quays, wharves or warehouses, but excluding transport by hand.

This definition shall be subject to the special national exceptions contained in the Washington convention limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, so far as such exceptions are applicable to the present convention.

Where necessary, in addition to the above enumeration, each Member may define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture.

Article 2.—The whole of the staff employed in any industrial undertaking, public or private, or in any branch thereof shall, except as otherwise provided for by the following articles, enjoy in every period of seven days a period of rest comprising at least twenty-four consecutive hours.

This period of rest shall, wherever possible, be granted simultaneously to the whole of the staff of each undertaking.

It shall, wherever possible, be fixed so as to coincide with the days already established by the traditions or customs of the country or district.

Article 3.—Each member may except from the application of the provisions of article 2 persons employed in industrial undertakings in which only the members of one single family are employed.

Article 4.—Each member may authorize total or partial exceptions (including suspensions or diminutions) from the provisions of article 2, special regard being had to all proper humanitarian and economic considerations and after consultation with responsible associations of employers and workers, wherever such exist.

Such consultation shall not be necessary in the case of exceptions which have already been made under existing legislation.

Article 5.—Each member shall make, as far as possible, provision for compensatory periods of rest for the suspensions or diminutions made in virtue of article 4, except in cases where agreements or customs already provide for such periods.

Article 6.—Each member will draw up a list of the exceptions made under articles 3 and 4 of this convention and will communicate it to the international labour office, and thereafter in every second year any modifications of his list which shall have been made.

The international labour office will present a report on this subject to the general conference of the international labour organization.

Article 7.—In order to facilitate the application of the provisions of this convention each employer, director, or manager, shall be obliged:

(a) Where the weekly rest is given to the whole of the staff collectively, to make known such days and hours of collective rest by means of notices posted conspicuously in the establishment or any other convenient place, or in any other manner approved by the government.

(b) Where the rest period is not granted to the whole of the staff collectively, to make known, by means of a roster drawn up in accordance with the method approved by the legislation of the country, or by a regulation of the competent authority, the workers or employees subject to a special system of rest, and to indicate that system.

Article 8.—The formal ratifications of this convention under the conditions set forth in Part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace, shall be communicated to the secretary-general of the League of Nations for registration.

Article 9.—This convention shall come into force at the date on which the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered by the secretary-general.

It shall be binding only upon those members whose ratifications have been registered with the secretariat.

Thereafter, the convention shall come into force for any member at the date on which its ratification has been registered with the secretariat.

Article 10.—As soon as the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretariat, the secretary-general of the League of Nations shall so notify all the members of the international labour organization. He shall likewise notify them of the registration of ratifications which may be communicated subsequently by other members of the organization.

Article 11.—Each member which ratifies this convention agrees to bring the provisions of articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7 into operation not later than 1st January, 1924, and to take such action as may be necessary to make these provisions effective.

Article 12.—Each member of the international labour organization which ratifies this convention engages to apply it to its colonies, possessions and protectorates, in accordance with the provisions of article 421 of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding articles of the other treaties of peace.

Article 13.—A member which has ratified this convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the secretary-general of the League of Nations for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered with the secretariat.

Article 14.—At least once in ten years, the governing body of the international labour office shall present to the general conference a report on the working of this convention and shall consider the desirability of placing on the agenda of the conference the question of its revision or modification.

Article 15.—The French and English texts of this convention shall both be authentic and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: This draft convention, adopted at the third session of the international labour organization of the League of Nations on November 17, 1921, has been ratified by appropriate action by the following countries, the dates of ratification being indicated as I proceed:

Belgium—July 19, 1926.
Bulgaria—March 6, 1925.
Chile—September 15, 1925.
China—May 17, 1934.
Colombia—June 20, 1933.
Czechoslovakia—August 31, 1923.
Estonia—November 29, 1923.
Finland—June 19, 1923.
France—September 3, 1926.
Greece—May 11, 1929.
India—May 11, 1923.
Irish Free State—July 22, 1930.
Italy—September 6, 1924.
Latvia—September 9, 1924.
Lithuania—June 9, 1931.
Luxemburg—April 16, 1928.
Nicaragua—April 12, 1934.
Poland—June 21, 1924.
Portugal—July 3, 1928.
Roumania—August 16, 1923.
Spain—June 20, 1924.
Sweden—December 22, 1931.
Uruguay—June 6, 1933.
Jugoslavia—April 1, 1927.

If it would better suit the convenience of the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who proposes to discuss the legal phases of these resolutions, I would defer discussion until we come to the one dealing with the forty-eight hour week, noting the hon. gentleman's objection, and proceeding with this without discussion. I would note that his views are as indicated.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I agree with the suggestion of the Prime Minister except to say, with respect to this one, that we had already national legislation regarding the Lord's Day, chapter 123 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and when this convention was adopted at Geneva Canada was far ahead, I should say, of almost all the countries with regard to legislation of this kind. The Lord's Day Act makes it unlawful for workmen to work and for employers to make workmen work during the twenty-four hours from midnight on Saturday to midnight on Sunday, and there is a special provision that when, because of emergency or because of a special kind of work to be done, workmen have to be employed on Sunday, the employer under the law must give those who work in that way another twenty-four hours of rest during the following week. So with that reservation I have no objection.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to add just a word to what the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has said by way of drawing the attention of the house to the manner in which the labour office of the league had been advised of the approval by the government of Canada of this convention. This convention was passed at the third international labour conference at Geneva in 1921. When the matter was sent by the labour office to Ottawa, the Hon. Sir Lomer Gouin, who was Minister of Justice at the time, brought the matter before the cabinet with a recommendation which was subsequently passed on June 27, 1922, as an order in council. In that order the following appears:

> So far as Canada is concerned, the draft convention and recommendation look to securing the twenty-four hour rest period on the Lord's Day, which is customarily, and by law required to be, observed throughout the dominion as a day of rest, and therefore, they involve legislation relating to criminal law, which is a subject within the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada. The Lord's Day Act (R.S.C., chap. 153) contains the existing legislation on this subject.

I am quoting the order in council from a record which appears in the Labour Gazette for July, 1922. The Gazette also sets forth the manner in which the authorities at Geneva were advised of the approval by the government of Canada of this convention. It was by sending to Geneva a copy of the order in council which was passed stating that this legislation was already on the statute books of this country. I have thought it well to add this much in order to make it clear that the authorities at Geneva were duly advised of the existing legislation and of the approval of the government of Canada in regard to that convention.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Just in answer to one question, I am familiar with the fact to which the right hon. gentleman has referred, with the provisions of the Lord's Day Act to be embodied in a statute founded on the approval of this convention. But the Lord's Day Act does not go quite as far as this convention does in connection with cases in which the day of rest could not be the Lord's Day. For instance, I know of cases that came to my attention within the last few months in which men have been working continuously seven days a week without any day of rest and this convention does not contemplate that being done. Intimation of the existing legislation has been given to the international labour office as the right hon. gentleman has said, in more than one case. In fact, sometimes when during my tenure of office cables have come for information relating to a particular matter one is able to refer to statutes in one's own statute books, but it does not come within either approval or ratification so far as the convention itself is concerned if there is a difference in details between the convention and our legislation, and in order that there may be no question we have gone a step further than merely advising them; we have asked the approval of this house to this draft convention.

Motion agreed to.

EIGHT HOUR DAY AND FORTY-EIGHT HOUR WEEK IN INDUSTRIAL UNDERTAKINGS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

> That, it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week adopted as a draft convention by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations at its first session in Washington on the 28th day of November, 1919, reading as follows:
> Convention Limiting the Hours of Work in Industrial Undertakings to Eight in the Day and Forty-eight in the Week
>
> The general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations,
>
> Having been convened at Washington by the government of the United States of America, on the 29th day of October, 1919, and
> Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the "application of the principle of the 8 hour day or of the 48 hour week," which is the first item in the agenda for the Washington meeting of the conference, and
> Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a draft international convention, adopts the following draft convention for ratification by the members of the international labour organization, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of 28 June, 1919, and of the treaty of St. Germain of 10 September, 1919:

Article 1.—For the purpose of this convention, the term "industrial undertaking" includes particularly:

(a) Mines, quarries, and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth.

(b) Industries in which articles are manufactured, altered, cleaned, repaired, ornamented, finished, adapted for sales, broken up or demolished, or in which materials are transformed; including shipbuilding and the generation, transformation, and transmission of electricity or motive power of any kind.

(c) Construction, reconstruction, maintenance, repair, alteration, or demolition of any building, railway, tramway, harbour, dock, pier, canal, inland waterway, road, tunnel, bridge, viaduct, sewer, drain, well, telegraphic or telephonic installation, electrical undertaking, gas work, waterwork or other work of construction, as well as the preparation for or laying the foundations of any such work or structure.

(d) Transport of passengers or goods by road, rail, sea or inland waterway, including the handling of goods at docks, quays, wharves or warehouses, but excluding transport by hand.

The provisions relative to transport by sea and on inland waterways shall be determined by a special conference dealing with employment at sea and on inland waterways.

The competent authority in each country shall define the line of division which separates industry from commerce and agriculture.

Article 2.—The working hours of persons employed in any public or private undertaking or in any branch thereof, other than an undertaking in which only members of the same family are employed, shall not exceed eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, with the exceptions hereinafter provided for.

(a) The provisions of this convention shall not apply to persons holding positions of supervision or management, nor to persons employed in a confidential capacity.

(b) Where by law, custom, or agreement between employers' and workers' organizations, or, where no such organizations exist, between employers' and workers' representatives, the hours of work on one or more days of the week are less than eight, the limit of eight hours may be exceeded on the remaining days of the week by the sanction of the competent public authority, or by agreement between such organizations or representatives; provided, however, that in no case under the provisions of this paragraph shall the daily limit of eight hours be exceeded by more than one hour.

(c) Where persons are employed in shifts it shall be permissible to employ persons in excess of eight hours in any one day and forty-eight hours in any one week, if the average number of hours over a period of three weeks or less does not exceed eight per day and forty-eight per week.

Article 3.—The limit of hours of work prescribed in article 2 may be exceeded in case of accident, actual or threatened, or in case of urgent work to be done to machinery or plant, or in case of "force majeure," but only so far as may be necessary to avoid serious interference with the ordinary working of the undertaking.

Article 4.—The limit of hours of work prescribed in article 2 may also be exceeded in those processes which are required by reason of the nature of the process to be carried on continuously by a succession of shifts, subject to the condition that the working hours shall not exceed fifty-six in the week on the average. Such regulation of the hours of work shall in no case affect any rest days which may be secured by the national law to the workers in such processes in compensation for the weekly rest day.

Article 5.—In exceptional cases where it is recognized that the provisions of article 2 cannot be applied, but only in such cases, agreements between workers' and employers' organizations concerning the daily limit of work over a longer period of time may be given the force of regulations, if the government, to which these agreements shall be submitted, so decides.

The average number of hours worked per week, over the number of weeks covered by any such agreement shall not exceed forty-eight.

Article 6.—Regulations made by public authority shall determine for industrial undertakings:

(a) The permanent exceptions that may be allowed in preparatory or complementary work which must necessarily be carried on outside the limits laid down for the general working of an establishment, or for certain classes of workers whose work is essentially intermittent.

(b) The temporary exceptions that may be allowed, so that establishments may deal with exceptional cases of pressure of work.

These regulations shall be made only after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, if any such organizations exist. These regulations shall fix the maximum of additional hours in each instance, and the rate of pay for overtime shall not be less than one and one-quarter times the regular rate.

Article 7.—Each government shall communicate to the international labour office:

(a) A list of the processes which are classed as being necessarily continuous in character under article 4;

(b) Full information as to working of the agreements mentioned in article 5; and

(c) Full information concerning the regulations made under article 6 and their application.

The international labour office shall make an annual report thereon to the general conference of the international labour organization.

Article 8.—In order to facilitate the enforcement of the provisions of this convention, every employer shall be required:

(a) To notify by means of the posting of notices in conspicuous places in the works or other suitable place, or by such other method as may be approved by the government, the hours at which work begins and ends, and where work is carried on by shifts, the hours at which each shift begins and ends. These hours shall be so fixed that the duration of the work shall not exceed the limits prescribed by this convention, and when so notified they shall not be changed except with such notice and in such manner as may be approved by the government.

(b) To notify in the same way such rest intervals accorded during the period of work as are not reckoned as part of the working hours.

(c) To keep a record in the form prescribed by law or regulation in each country of all additional hours worked in pursuance of articles 3 and 6 of this convention.

It shall be made an offence against the law to employ any person outside the hours fixed in accordance with paragraph (a), or during the intervals fixed in accordance with paragraph (b).

Article 9.—In the application of this convention to Japan the following modifications and conditions shall obtain:

(a) The term "industrial undertaking" includes particularly—

The undertakings enumerated in paragraph (a) of article 1;

The undertakings enumerated in paragraph (b) of article 1, provided there are at least ten workers employed;

The undertakings enumerated in paragraph (c) of article 1, in so far as these undertakings shall be defined as "factories" by the competent authority;

The undertakings enumerated in paragraph (d) of article 1, except transport of passengers or goods by road, handling of goods at docks, quays, wharves, and warehouses, and transport by hand; and,

Regardless of the number of persons employed, such of the undertakings enumerated in paragraphs (b) and (c) of article 1 as may be declared by the competent authority either to be highly dangerous or to involve unhealthy processes.

(b) The actual working hours of persons of fifteen years of age or over in any public or private industrial undertaking, or in any branch thereof, shall not exceed fifty-seven in the week, except that in the raw-silk industry the limit may be sixty hours in the week.

(c) The actual working hours of persons under fifteen years of age in any public or private industrial undertaking, or in any branch thereof, and of all miners of whatever age engaged in underground work in the mines, shall in no case exceed forty-eight in the week.

(d) The limit of hours of work may be modified under the conditions provided for in articles 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this convention, but in no case shall the length of such modification bear to the length of the basic week a proportion greater than that which obtains in those articles.

(e) A weekly rest period of twenty-four consecutive hours shall be allowed to all classes of workers.

(f) The provision in Japanese factory legislation limiting its application to places employing fifteen or more persons shall be amended so that such legislation shall apply to places employing ten or more persons.

(g) The provisions of the above paragraphs of this article shall be brought into operation not later than 1 July, 1922, except that the provisions of article 4 as modified by paragraph (d) of this article shall be brought into operation not later than 1 July, 1923.

(h) The age of fifteen prescribed in paragraph (c) of this article shall be raised, not later than 1 July, 1925, to sixteen.

Article 10.—In British India the principle of a sixty-hour week shall be adopted for all workers in the industries at present covered by the factory acts administered by the government of India, in mines, and in such branches of railway work as shall be specified for this purpose by the competent authority. Any modification of this limitation made by the competent authority shall be subject to the provisions of articles 6 and 7 of this convention. In other respects the provisions of this convention shall not apply to India, but further provisions limiting the hours of work in India shall be considered at a future meeting of the general conference.

Article 11.—The provisions of this convention shall not apply to China, Persia, and Siam, but provisions limiting the hours of work in these countries shall be considered at a future meeting of the general conference.

Article 12.—In the application of this convention to Greece, the date at which its provisions shall be brought into operation in accordance with article 19 may be extended to not later than 1 July, 1923, in the case of the following industrial undertakings:

(1) Carbon-bisulphide works,
(2) Acid works,
(3) Tanneries,
(4) Paper mills,
(5) Printing works,
(6) Sawmills,
(7) Warehouses for the handling and preparation of tobacco,
(8) Surface mining,
(9) Foundries,
(10) Lime works,
(11) Dye works,
(12) Glassworks (blowers),
(13) Gas works (firemen),
(14) Loading and unloading merchandise; and to not later than 1 July, 1924, in the case of the following industrial undertakings:

(1) Mechanical industries: Machine shops for engines, safes, scales, beds, tacks, shells (sporting), iron foundries, bronze foundries, tin shops, plating shops, manufactories of hydraulic apparatus;

(2) Constructional industries: Lime-kilns, cement works, plasterers' shops, tile yards, manufactories of bricks and pavements, potteries, marble yards, excavating and building works;

(3) Textile industries: Spinning and weaving mills of all kinds, except dye works;

(4) Food industries: Flour and grist-mills, bakeries, macaroni factories, manufactories of wines, alcohol, and drinks, oil works, breweries, manufactories of ice and carbonated drinks, manufactories of confectioners' products and chocolate, manufactories of sausages and preserves, slaughterhouses, and butcher shops;

(5) Chemical industries: Manufactories of synthetic colours, glassworks (except the blowers), manufactories of essence of turpentine and tartar, manufactories of oxygen and pharmaceutical products, manufactories of flaxseed oil, manufactories of glycerine, manufactories of calcium carbide, gas works (except the firemen);

(6) Leather industries: Shoe factories, manufactories of leather goods;

(7) Paper and printing industries: Manufactories of envelopes, record books, boxes, bags, bookbinding, lithographing, and zinc-engraving shops;

(8) Clothing industries: Clothing shops, underwear and trimmings, workshops for pressing, workshops for bed coverings, artificial flowers, feathers, and trimmings, hat and umbrella factories;

(9) Woodworking industries: Joiners' shops, coopers' sheds, wagon factories, manufactories of furniture and chairs, picture-framing establishments, brush and broom factories;

(10) Electrical industries: Power houses, shops for electrical installations;

(11) Transportation by land: Employees on railroads and street cars, firemen, drivers, and carters.

Article 13—In the application of this convention to Roumania the date at which its provisions shall be brought into operation in accordance with article 19 may be extended to not later than 1 July, 1924.

Article 14—The operation of the provisions of this convention may be suspended in any country by the government in the event of war or other emergency endangering the national safety.

Article 15—The formal ratifications of this convention, under the conditions set forth in part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles of 28 June, 1919, and of the Treaty of St. Germain of 10 September, 1919, shall be communicated to the secretary general of the League of Nations for registration.

Article 16—Each member of the international labour organization which ratifies this convention engages to apply it to its colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing:—

(a) Except where owing to the local conditions its provisions are inapplicable; or

(b) Subject to such modifications as may be necessary to adapt its provisions to local conditions.

Each member shall notify to the international labour office the action taken in respect of each of its colonies, protectorates, and possessions which are not fully self-governing.

Article 17—As soon as the ratification of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretariat, general of the League of Nations shall so notify all the members of the international labour organization.

Article 18—This convention shall come into force at the date on which such notification is issued by the secretary general of the League of Nations, and it shall then be binding only upon those members which have registered their ratifications with the secretariat. Thereafter this convention will come into force for any other member at the date on which its ratification is registered with the secretariat.

Article 19—Each member which ratifies this convention agrees to bring its provisions into operation not later than 1 July, 1921, and to take such action as may be necessary to make these provisions effective.

Article 20—A member which has ratified this convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the secretary general of the League of Nations for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered with the secretariat.

Article 21—At least once in ten years the governing body of the international labour office shall present to the general conference a report on the working of this convention, and shall consider the desirability of placing on the agenda of the conference the question of its revision or modification.

Article 22.—The French and English texts of this convention shall both be authentic.

and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: I gather from the observations which have been made by my hon. friends opposite that they question the jurisdiction of this house to deal with this matter. I therefore shall take some little time to communicate to the house why in the judgment of the government there is no question at all as to the position which we occupy. If I thought we were doubtful, I would at once admit that, but I do not think the question is even doubtful.

That convention to limit the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week was adopted as a draft convention by the international labour conference at its first session on November 28, 1919. Since that date at the registry at the league office in Geneva ratifications have been deposited by the following countries on the dates indicated:

County—Date:
Austria—June 12, 1924.
Argentine Republic—November 30, 1933.
Belgium—September 6, 1926.
Bulgaria—February 14, 1922.
Chile—September 15, 1925.
Colombia—June 20, 1933.
Czechoslovakia—August 24, 1921.
Dominican Republic—February 4, 1933.
France—June 2, 1927.
Greece—November 19, 1920.
India—July 14, 1921.
Italy—October 6, 1924.
Latvia—August 15, 1925.
Lithuania—June 19, 1931.
Luxemburg—August 16, 1928.
Nicaragua—April 12, 1934.
Portugal—July 3, 1928.
Roumania—June 13, 1921.
Spain—February 22, 1929.
Uruguay—June 6, 1933.

I assume it is not necessary for me to remind the house that the press has indicated from time to time that in the United Kingdom discussions in regard to a shorter than forty-eight hour week have been going on for some time and legislation may not be improbable. I merely mention that in passing. The labour unions of course are able to do much to enforce that decision in Great Britain.

It is desirable perhaps to indicate at some length the exact processes by which the government has solved the problem of jurisdiction. Article 23 of the peace treaty concluded at Versailles on June 28, 1919, provides that:

Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the members of the league:

(a) will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations;

The next subdivision deals with native inhabitants; the next;

(c) will entrust the league with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs;

(e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications. . . .

And the control of disease. That is all I have to say with respect to that particular article, article 23 of part 1. That of course is part of the covenant of the league.

Then if we turn to part XIII of the peace treaty, which deals with labour, we find that section I deals with—

Organization of Labour

Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based on social justice;

And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required; as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organization of vocational and technical education and other measures;

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries;

The high contracting parties, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity, as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, agree to the following:

Then follows chapter 1, which creates the organization.

A permanent organization is hereby established for the promotion of the objects set forth in the preamble.

The original members of the League of Nations shall be the original members of this organization, and hereafter membership in the League of Nations shall carry with it membership of the said organization.

Article 388

The permanent organization shall consist of:

(1) a general conference of representatives of the members and,

(2) an international labour office controlled by the governing body described in article 393.

Then follow provisions for meetings, and the methods by which representatives are sent to the meetings representing both labour and capital, employers and employees. We have always been represented at such gatherings. Then we come to the article dealing with draft conventions, which has already been in part quoted this afternoon by the right hon. leader of the opposition, it being article 405. And I direct particular attention to these words, in view of what I am about to say;

In the case of a draft convention, the member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the secretary-general and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of such convention.

If on a recommendation no legislative or other ation is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation shall rest upon the member.

In the case of a federal state, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

The above article shall be interpreted in according with the following principle:

In no case shall any member be asked or required, as a result of the adoption of any recommendation or draft convention by the conference, to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned.

It was to that provision that I referred a moment ago.

Now, sir, bearing in mind that article and a further article, namely 427, we submit with complete confidence that this is within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada. Article 427 sets forth the general principles that govern, and reads as follows:

The high contracting parties, recognizing that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in section 1 and associated with that of the League of Nations.

They recognize that differences of climate, habits and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the high contracting parties to be of special and urgent importance:

First—The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

Second—The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Third—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

Fourth—The adoption of an eight hour day or a forty-eight hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Sixth—The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Seventh—The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Eighth—The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Ninth—Each state should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the high contracting parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the League of Nations; and that, if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the league, and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benefits upon the wage-earners of the world.

Now I direct attention to the language I have just read, because it is an agreement to which Canada became a signatory, a party. The treaty of peace is stated to have been entered into between the associated and allied powers and the countries named; the United States of America, the British empire, France, Italy and Japan, these powers being described in the present treaty as the principal allied and associated powers; Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, the Hedjaz, Honduras, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, The Serb-Croat-Slovene State, Siam, Czechoslovakia and Uruguay; these powers constituting with the principal powers mentioned above the allied and associated powers, on the one part; and Germany on the other part.

The signatures to the treaty are in the terms I mentioned the other day; namely, the British empire signed through representatives that appeared on her behalf when the treaty was concluded. I think I should mention that in order that there may be no apprehension with respect to it as we proceed. The words from the opening of the treaty with respect to the British empire are as follows:

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of the British dominions beyond the seas, Emperor of India, by:

The Right Honourable David Lloyd George, M.P., First Lord of His Treasury and Prime Minister;

The Right Honourable Andrew Bonar Law, M.P., His Lord Privy Seal;

The Right Honourable Viscount Milner, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., His Secretary of State for the Colonies;

The Right Honourable Arthur James Balfour, O.M., M.P., His Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs;

The Right Honourable George Nicoll Barnes, M.P., Minister without Portfolio;

And, for the Dominion of Canada, by the Honourable Charles Joseph Doherty, Minister of Justice, and the Honourable Arthur Lewis Sifton, Minister of Customs.

Then follow the signatures on behalf of Australia, the Union of South Africa, New Zealand and India. So, as far as we are concerned, we signed this treaty from which I have read extracts as part of the British empire.

It is important to bear in mind that an international treaty not only involves the acceptance of obligations; it must be taken to confer benefits as well. The obligations are with respect to other countries; the privileges are the benefits that, by the signature of other countries, we enjoy in consequence of their having become parties to the treaty. So there is a measure of mutuality and benefit conferred on each country by all the others, and when you have an important treaty, an international obligation signed by practically all the nations of the world in the manner in which this treaty was signed, conferring benefits, privileges and advantages by each country upon the other, with each country on the other hand accepting the obligations and responsibilities that are incident to the execution of such a document, you should have practically an ideal instrument so far as international relations are concerned.

I pointed out that there was a clear recognition on the part of those who made the treaty that there were varying forms of government in the countries of the world. The unitary form of government presented no difficulties, for the parliament of that particular country could deal with every matter that might arise for consideration. For instance, the parliament of the United Kingdom deals with matters touching the water works of cities such as Birmingham and Manchester; with local government in small areas and communities; with parish rates and poor law rates, and also with the great problems of defence of its territory on sea and land and with questions of foreign policy concerning disarmament and the peace of the world. So a unitary system of government need have no limitations of any kind imposed upon it. But where you have a federal union or a federated state you must look to the instrument that created the state and to the constitution under which it operates to determine the extent of the power to be exercised by each of the units that comprise the state itself, and the power conferred by the constitution on the central authority.

It is important, therefore, to consider what powers have been given our provinces and what legislative juridiction has been conferred upon the central power. I do not propose this afternoon to enter into any lengthy argument in this regard, beyond saying that broadly and generally matters of a local nature are within the jurisdiction of the provinces, notably matters in connection with property and civil rights and other matters such as education, subject to limitations, and certain questions with respect to agriculture subject to the supreme power of the dominion parliament if it is exercised over the same subject matter, and questions of that kind. But when we deal with section 91 of the British North America Act we have an entirely different matter to consider. That section confers upon the parliament of Canada exclusive power to legislate for the dominion as a whole. The legislation, indeed, is prefaced by the words with which this parliament is so familiar, that is, the general term peace, order and good government for the whole of Canada, and the succeeding division of the powers by section 91 illustrates the subjects that have to be considered as indicative of the exercise of power with respect to peace, order and good government. I need not take time to run through them, because they are very familiar to every hon. member of this house. We are constantly exercising them. They relate to banks and banking; navigation and shipping; copyrights; bankruptcy; interest; legal tender; savings banks; weights and measures; sea coast and inland fisheries; postal service; the census and statistics, and matters of that kind. Therefore under our constitution which we familiarly refer to as the British North America Act, we have exclusive jurisdiction—and I should like hon. members of the house to bear in mind that the word is "exclusive"—conferred upon the legislatures of the several provinces, the words being:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say—

Then the closing sub-head, No. 16, reads:

> Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

It may be taken, therefore, that we must bear in mind in approaching this problem that there are certain matters within the exclusive jurisdiction—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not want to interrupt the Prime Minister but I think when he looks at his remarks he will see that his mind slipped rather quickly from the federal to the provincial field, without completing what he had to say about federal jurisdiction.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. The provincial power is exclusive, and I read the words contained in paragraph 16 of section 92 for the purpose of making it clear that the broad and general provision of the statute is that matters generally of a local nature in the provinces shall be within the jurisdiction of the legislatures. But when we come to deal with section 91, which as I said is the section that confers powers upon this parliament, it will be found that the words are as follows:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces—

And for greater certainty certain subjects are mentioned, such as I indicated a few moments ago. Obviously to interpret those two sections is a matter of great difficulty. You have to rely upon judicial decisions, because the point at which there may be, shall I say, an interference with the fullest exercise of its powers by a provincial legislature, by legislation of the dominion parliament, is very difficult to determine. Therefore we have a long line of judicial decisions determining the extent to which the powers of the legislatures might be exclusively exercised and the subjects over which this central parliament has power, to the exclusion of jurisdiction on the part of the provinces. We have had many difficult cases before the courts. If I were asked what I thought was the greatest service rendered to Canada by the judicial committee of the privy council I would say it was found in the fact that there can be but one judgment in that tribunal. It is not a judgment in the narrow sense of the term; it is the advice which that committee of the king's council gives to the sovereign as to how differences should be adjudicated between his subjects or between those who are litigating, sometimes not his subjects, in his courts. As there is no such thing as a dissenting judgment in that committee; as there is no possibility of there being two opinions, strong though may be the differences of opinion between the individuals during the progress of the argument or even at its conclusion; as there must be but one judgment embodying the recommendation made to the sovereign as to how the matter in question should be disposed of, I believe that makes for a measure of harmony that otherwise would be denied. Consider, for instance, the many judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada in which sometimes acute legal differences all unconsciously have brought about a division of opinion, with two members of the court finding one way and three members another, or four members finding one way and one member another. It will be recalled also that in that very vital moment in the history of the United States when the question of the validity of an election for the presidency was under consideration, the supreme court of that country divided sharply upon political lines, and it was many years before the country recovered from the shock that the public conscience received by reason of the judgment then delivered.

So I believe that one of the greatest services, if not the greatest service, rendered to this country has been that the court of last resort, the judicial committee of the privy council, in arriving at its recommendations to the sovereign as to how matters should be determined that have called for the interpretation of our constitution, has been the fact that there can be only one recommendation. I think that has been one of the greatest safeguards of our daily life. Obviously I do not propose this afternoon to address hon. members of this house as though they were a court, because that would be unfair both to them and to myself. In my own simple way I should like to indicate to hon. members the principles which during the progress of the years have been evolved to enable legislatures and parliaments properly to deal with matters which come before them for consideration.

Only a few moments ago the right hon. leader of the opposition referred to the reference made to the Supreme Court of Canada by the government of the day with respect to the constitutionality of the provision in our law which deals with hours of labour. The report of the case will be found in the 1925 Supreme Court reports, commencing at page 505. I ask the house to bear in mind the date of that decision. As I have said it was in 1925. The case was argued on June 11 and on June 18 of that year judgment was given. I think it would be well to read the questions because they may be useful to hon. members who wish to discuss the matter. The questions submitted to the court were as follows:

(1) What is the nature of the obligation of the Dominion of Canada as a member of the international labour conference, under the provisions of the labour part (Part XIII) of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding provisions of the other treaties of peace, with relation to such draft conventions and recommendations as may be from time to time adopted by the said conference under the authority of and pursuant to the aforesaid provisions?

(2) Are the legislatures of the provinces the authorities within whose competence the subject matter of the said draft convention (Copy of which is herewith submitted) in whole or in part lies and before whom such draft convention should be brought, under the provisions of Article 405 of the treaty of peace with Germany, for the enactment of legislation or other action?

(3) If the subject matter of the said draft convention be, in part only, within the competence of the legislatures of the provinces, then in what particular or particulars, or to what extent, is the subject matter of the draft convention within the competence of the legislatures?

(4) If the subject matter of the said draft convention be, in part only, within the competence of the legislatures of the provinces, then in what particular or particulars, or to what extent, is the subject matter of the draft convention within the competence of the parliament of Canada?

The unanimous decision of the court was given by Mr. Justice, now Chief Justice Duff, and the questions were answered as follows:

To the first question: the obligation is simply in the nature of an undertaking to bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.

To the second question: Yes, in part.

To the third question: The subject matter is generally within the competence of the legislatures of the provinces, but the authority vested in these legislatures does not enable them to give the force of law to provisions such as those contained in the draft convention in relation to servants of the dominion government, or to legislate for those parts of Canada which are not within the boundaries of a province.

To the fourth question: The parliament of Canada has exclusive legislative authority in those parts of Canada not within the boundaries of any province, and also upon the subjects dealt with in the draft convention in relation to the servants of the dominion government.

The sense, therefore, of the answers to the questions as they appear at page 512 of the report is that there was no obligation upon the dominion parliament to enact legislation, and that the federal power had discharged its duty when it submitted to the provincial legislatures, through dispatches to the lieutenant governors, the matters that were within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. There is one observation found at pages 510 and 511 in the judgment of Mr. Justice Duff to which I should like to refer:

> It seems questionable whether government employees, in industrial undertakings carried on by the government, such, for example, as shipbuilding, are within the scope of the convention. The point was not the subject of argument before us, and concerning it no opinion is intended to be expressed.
> It is necessary to observe, also, that as regards those parts of Canada which are not included within the limits of any province, the legislative authority in relation to civil rights generally, and to the subject matter of the convention in particular, is the dominion parliament.

Then after further discussion he gave the answers to the questions I have just read. That was in 1925. The development of our constitutional power by judicial decisions is of course not a static thing; there is constant movement and progress. Different judges have taken different views, and undoubtedly, as Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes has said, the state of public opinion, generally, influences judicial decisions not to the extent of in any sense modifying precedents, but expanding in every possible way the meaning to be given to language to meet the new conditions under which people may live. Perhaps the most striking example of that is to be found in the decision given in the House of Lords in connection with trade conspiracies. I refer to Allen and Flood. The method by which our common law has expanded to meet the demands made upon it by new conditions in our civilization is I think, as the late Mr. Justice Macready in England said, one of the most remarkable circumstances of our civilization.

But the interpretation of a statute is an entirely different matter from the adjudication of differences between litigants. Rules of construction have been framed during all the years, and the method to be applied in dealing with a given statute has usually become more or less settled by long practice and the passage of time. Only a few days ago my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) read to this chamber a summary of the rules which the present Lord Chancellor of England said he regarded as the general principles to be taken from a perusal of the cases. I need hardly point out to hon. members that over a period of sixty years it is quite impossible to say that complete consistency has governed in the adjudication of various men who have dealt with the British North America Act. For instance, there was a day when under the strong and dominating influence of Lord Watson the swing of the pendulum was towards the maintenance, at the expense of federal power, of the provincial authorities. I need hardly say there was a relaxation of that condition, and in later years there was a swing towards the supremacy of the federal power. Particularly was that so when the events of the great war indicated how essential it was that there should be a strong law making authority, or that power should be in the central authority.

Perhaps before dealing with that point it might be desirable, for the purpose of making it part of my observations, to read the rules to which Lord Sankey has referred, because they may be of value to some hon. members who will read what is taking place this afternoon. He has said this:

> While the decisions which the board has pronounced in the many constitutional cases which have come under their consideration from the dominion must each be regarded in the light of the facts involved in it, their lordships recognize that there has grown up round the British North America Act a body of precedents of high authority and value as guides to its interpretation and application. The useful and essential task of taking stock of this body of authority and reviewing it in relation to the original text has been undertaken by this board from time to time and notably, for example, in the cases of Attorney General of Ontario v. Attorney General of Canada and others; Attorney General for Canada v. Attorneys General for the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia; city of Montreal v. Montreal Street Railway Company, and in the same year Attorney General for Ontario and others v. Attorney General for Canada and another. In all these four cases the scope of the two sections was carefully considered, but it is not necessary to cite them at length because so recently as last year this board reviewed them in the case of Attorney General for Canada v. Attorney General for British Columbia and others, and laid down four propositions relative to the legislative competence of Canada and the provinces respectively as established by the decisions of the Judicial committee. These propositions are as follows:—
> 1. The legislation of the parliament of the dominion, so long as it strictly relates to subjects of legislation expressly enumerated in section 91 is of paramount authority, even though it trenches upon matters assigned to the provincial legislature by section 92.

Now I am going to venture to make this observation as I go along. Many members will recall the case of the Union Bank and Tennant, a case in which it was contended that the provision made in the Bank Act by which security may be given without registry by way of chattel mortgage, and that all the power and authority so far as the mortgagee was concerned of a chattel mortgage—that that exercise of power by this parliament was beyond its competence because it infringed on property and civil rights in the province. But the privy council said no; although it does trench upon the exclusive powers of the provincial legislature, nevertheless if it is in its essential character a part of the banking legislation, which is solely within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, it must prevail, and it did prevail.

The second principle which the Lord Chancellor laid down is this:

> 2. The general power of legislation conferred upon the parliament of the dominion by section 91 of the act in supplement of the power to legislate upon the subjects expressly enumerated must be strictly confined to such matters as are unquestionably of national interest and importance, and must not trench on any of the subjects enumerated in section 92, as within the scope of provincial legislation, unless these matters have attained such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the dominion.
> 3. It is within the competence of the dominion parliament to provide for matters which though otherwise within the legislative competence of the provincial legislature, are necessarily incidental to effective legislation by the parliament of the dominion upon a subject of legislation expressly enumerated in section 91.
> 4. There can be a domain in which provincial and dominion legislation may overlap, in which case, neither legislation will be ultra vires if the field is clear, but if the field is not clear and the two legislations meet, the dominion legislation must prevail.

Those four principles thus stated by the Lord Chancellor are to-day the beacon lights that guide this government in arriving at its conclusions with respect to the subject matter to which I have referred. The application of them is not easy; the reading of them is simple. The ascertainment of the facts to which they apply always becomes more or less complicated, but I think I can submit to this house without difficulty that with respect to hours of labour and with respect to the one day's rest in seven, there is no possible doubt, and especially with respect to the latter having regard to the provisions of the Lord's Day Act as coming within criminal legislation, that we have the authority to legislate.

Now I shall endeavour briefly to indicate how the enunciation of those principles came into being. This country claimed jurisdiction over aviation, complete and absolute. The case was submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and decided against the contention of the dominion, and the reasons given were those given with respect to the hours of labour, only applied in a different way. It was the opinion of the court, not a unanimous opinion, but it was the opinion of a majority of the court, that aviation in its essential characteristics was engaged in by a government for the purpose of safeguarding its own properties and matters of that sort, and one judge instanced the case of a province initiating a service with that purpose in view. The case ultimately went to the privy council, and in considering that case it became necessary for the Lord Chancellor to make the statement he did. The case was argued before the privy council on the 10th, 14th, 16th, 17th and 20th days of July, 1931, and judgment was given on the 22nd day of October of the same year. I direct attention to the wording. It was those words of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to hours of labour, from which no appeal was taken to the privy council.

I shall trespass on the time of the house to direct attention to the fact that there was outstanding a convention with respect to aeronautics. I will point out that that convention was a convention under this very Peace treaty and that it was a convention that dealt with every phase of aerial navigation. Later parliament did exercise its powers and enact a statute in which regulations were set out at some length, and various other regulations were subsequently made dealing as the lords of the privy council said, with practically every phase of aeronautics. Now bear in mind that section, and I think it is desirable that I should read it at the moment. It is section 132 of our constitution, and section 132 reads as follows:

> The parliament and government of Canada—

That is the executive:

> —shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

It will probably be within the memory of my right hon. friend opposite and the former Minister of Justice that when we were considering the Sockeye Salmon treaty I inquired of the Solicitor General whether he believed we had the power to override provincial rights in a treaty such as that, and I recall his answer. That, of course, was prior to these decisions. I confess that I have doubt, as I believe every member of the profession had, as to just what the decision would be in that set of facts.

Now if hon. gentlemen have followed me up to that point, I think they will realize that in the aeronautics case we had a treaty between the British empire, Canada being a part of it, and foreign countries, and in that case the privy council decided that section 132 governed and that provincial rights must be subordinate to treaty rights under the provisions of that section. That is the sense of the decision, and as was pointed out by the Lord Chancellor it is very undesirable to attach undue importance to a word or words, but one must always have regard to the ratio decidendi, the sense of the decision itself. Said Lord Chancellor Sankey:

The Supreme Court of Canada has decided the question in its several branches adversely to the claims of the dominion, and has held in effect that while the dominion has a considerable field of jurisdiction in the matter under various heads of section 91 of the British North America Act 1867, there is also a local field of jurisdiction for the provinces, and that the dominion jurisdiction does not extend so far as to permit it to deal with the subject in the broad way in which it has attempted to deal with it in the legislation under consideration.

During the sittings of the Peace Conference in Paris, at the close of the European war, a convention relating to the regulation of aerial navigation, dated the 13th October, 1919, was drawn up by a commission constituted by the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference. That convention was signed by the representatives of the allied and associated powers, including Canada, and was ratified by His Majesty on behalf of the British Empire on the 1st June, 1922. It is now in force between the British Empire and seventeen other states.

With a view to performing her obligations as part of the British Empire under this convention, which was then in course of preparation, the parliament of Canada enacted the Air Board Act, c. 11, Statutes of Canada 1919 (first session), which, with an amendment thereto, was consolidated in the Revised Statutes of Canada 1927, under the title of the Aeronautics Act, c. 3. It is to be noted, however, that the act does not by reason of its reproduction in the revised statutes take effect as a new law. The governor general in council, on the 31st December, 1919, pursuant to the Air Board Act, issued detailed "Air Regulations" which, with certain amendments, are now in force. By the National Defence Act, 1922, the Minister of National Defence thereafter exercised the duties and functions of the air board.

No provincial legislature had enacted any legislation with respect to it but one of them had made protests against the exercise by this parliament of the powers in question. He proceeds:

The determination of these questions depends upon the true construction of sections 91, 92 and 132 of the British North America Act. Section 132 provides as follows:

"The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries."

It is not necessary to set out at length the familiar sections 91 and 92 which deal with the distribution of legislative powers. Section 91 tabulates the subjects to be dealt with by the dominion, and section 92 the subjects to be dealt with exclusively by the provincial legislatures, but it will not be forgotten that section 91, in addition, authorizes the king by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, and further provides that any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in the section shall not be deemed to come within the classes of matters of a local and private nature comprised in the enumeration of classes of subjects assigned by section 92 exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. The four questions addressed to the court are as follows:

I will not read them except to say that the answers given were to the effect that the dominion and not the provinces had jurisdiction. Now, reading from the Lord Chancellor's judgment:

With regard to sections 91 and 92 the cases which have been decided on the provisions of these sections are legion. Many inquests have been held upon them, and many great lawyers have from time to time dissected them.

Under our system, decided cases effectively construe the words of an act of parliament and established principles and rules whereby its scope and effect may be interpreted. But there is always a danger that in the course of this process the terms of the statute may come to be unduly extended and attention may be diverted from what has been enacted to what has been judicially said about the enactment.

To borrow an analogy; there may be a range of sixty colours, each of which is so little different from its neighbour that it is difficult to make any distinction between the two, and yet at the one end of the range the colour may be white, and at the other end of the range black. Great care must therefore be taken to consider each decision in the light of the circumstances of the case in view of which it was pronounced, especially in the interpretation of an act such as the British North America Act, which was a great constitutional charter, and not to allow general phrases to obscure the underlying object of the act, which was to establish a system of government upon essentially federal principles. Useful as decided cases are, it is always advisable to get back to the words of the act itself and to remember the object with which it was passed...

But while the courts should be jealous in upholding the charter of the provinces as enacted in section 92, it must no less be borne in mind that the real object of the act was to give the central government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which uniformity of legislation might be secured on all questions which were of common concern to all the provinces as members of a constituent whole.

Upon that observation we base the soundness of this proposed legislation, and these words I cannot too strongly commend to my hon. friends in this chamber:

It must no less be borne in mind that the real object of the act was to give the central government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which uniformity of legislation might be secured on all questions which were of common concern to all the provinces as members of a constituent whole.

I will not further trespass upon the time of the house with respect to that phase of the judgment, but I will read further these words:

It is therefore obvious that the dominion parliament, in order duly and fully to "perform the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof" under the convention, must make provision for a great variety of subjects. Indeed, the terms of the convention include almost every conceivable matter relating to aerial navigation, and we think that the dominion parliament not only has the right, but also the obligation, to provide by statute and by regulation that the terms of the convention shall be duly carried out. With regard to some of them no doubt it would appear to be clear that the dominion has power to legislate, for example, under section 91, subsection (2), for the regulation of trade and commerce, and under subsection (5), for the postal services, but it is not necessary for the dominion to piece together its powers under section 91 in an endeavour to render them co-extensive with its duty under the convention when section 132 confers upon it full power to do all that is legislatively necessary for the purpose.

Then his lordship summed up in these words:

To sum up, having regard (a) to the terms of section 132; (b) to the terms of the convention which covers almost every conceivable matter relating to aerial navigation; and (c) to the fact that further legislative powers in relation to aerial navigation reside in the parliament of Canada by virtue of section 91, subsections (2), (5), and (7), it would appear that substantially the whole field of legislation in regard to aerial navigation belongs to the dominion. There may be a small portion of the field which is not by virtue of specific words in the British North America Act vested in the dominion; but neither is it vested by specific words in the provinces. As to such small portion it appears to the board that it must necessarily belong to the dominion under its power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada. Further, their lordships are influenced by the facts that the subject of aerial navigation and the fulfilment of Canadian obligations under section 132 are matters of national interest and importance; and that aerial navigation is a class of subject which has attained such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the dominion.

That disposes of the aeronautics case, and it will be observed that it is only authority for one broad proposition. I have read the observations of the Lord Chancellor merely for the purpose of affording some illumination to our minds as we approach the consideration of the problem. The ratio decidendi of the case is that section 132 confers on this parliament the power to discharge every obligation under a treaty, whether it affects the dominion or a province, which we enter into as part of the British empire. It may therefore be taken that wherever, as a part of the empire, a treaty is made by the parliament of Canada, this parliament has complete jurisdiction to deal with every phase of the subject matter of the treaty to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the provinces of confederation. There remains therefore the second question, which is a more important one: To what extent has this parliament the power, when we have entered into a convention with other countries, to give effect to the terms of that convention when they clash with the jurisdiction which the provinces may have exercised or may exercise? In other words, is the question of the hours of labour per week and the day of rest a question of such importance, and so national in its character, that having bound ourselves thereto we must therefore give effect to it? I have read from the treaty of peace; I have read from the provisions of the League of Nations; I have read from the closing articles of the peace treaty the general provisions with respect to labour, and it will be observed that part of the treaty, which we signed, provides for a forty-eight hour week and for a day of rest. The general provisions are in no doubt at all but in clear-cut positive terms as part of the document which we signed as a part of the British empire, and which deals with that very subject, apart from every other consideration in the world. It deals in exact terms, and I should like to read them. The fourth and fifth guiding principles set down in article 427 of the treaty read:

Fourth—The adoption of an eight hour day or a forty-eight hour week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Therefore, when the Dominion of Canada emerged from the conclusion of the peace treaty, it had signed it, not on behalf of a province but on behalf of all the citizens of the dominion, a treaty whereby it had bound itself by every means within its power to ensure a forty-eight hour working week and a day of rest during that period. Can there be any doubt therefore with respect to the jurisdiction of this parliament? Whatever doubts there may have been are fully resolved by the next case to which I direct attention, the radio case which was decided on February 9, 1932. In that case the rights of the provinces were put forward with very great force. It will be recalled that there was a convention outstanding there too. It was not however a convention made by Canada as part of the empire; it was a convention which Canada herself had signed with other countries such as Mexico, United States and Newfoundland. The judgment in that case was delivered by Lord Dunedin who says this—and I am not going to read at great length:

> For this must at once be admitted the leading consideration in the judgment of the board—

That is in the aeronautics case.

> —was that the subject fell within the provisions of section 132 of the British North America Act.

Which I have already read.

> And it is said with truth that, while as regards aviation there was a treaty, the convention here is not a treaty between the empire as such and foreign countries, for Great Britain does not sign as representing the colonies and dominions. She only confirms the assent which had been signified by the colonies and dominions who were separately represented at the meetings which drafted the convention.

Bear in mind that the radio agreement was a convention just as this is. Then he proceeds to say:

> But while this is so, the aviation case in their lordships' judgment cannot be put on one side. Counsel for the province felt this and sought to avoid any general deduction by admitting that many of the things provided by the convention and the regulations thereof fell within various special heads of section 91. For example, provisions as to beacon signals he would refer to article 10 of section 91—navigation and shipping. It is unnecessary to multiply instances, because the real point to be considered is this manner of dealing with the subject. In other words, the argument of the province comes to this: Go through all the stipulations of the convention and each one you can pick out which fairly falls within one of the enumerated heads of section 91, that can be held to be appropriate for dominion legislation; but the residue belongs to the province under the head either of article 13 of section 92—property and civil rights, or article 16—matters of a merely local or private nature in the province. Their lordships cannot agree that the matter should be so dealt with. Canada as a dominion is one of the signatories to the convention. In a question with foreign powers the persons who might infringe some of the stipulations in the convention would not be the Dominion of Canada as a whole but would be individual persons residing in Canada. These persons must, so to speak, be kept in order by legislation and the only legislation that can deal with them all at once is dominion legislation. This idea of Canada as a dominion being bound by a convention equivalent to a treaty with foreign powers was quite unthought of in 1867. It is the outcome of the gradual development of the position of Canada vis-à-vis to the mother country Great Britain, which is found in these later days expressed in the Statute of Westminster. It is not therefore to be expected that such a matter should be dealt with in explicit words in either section 91 or section 92. The only class of treaty which would bind Canada was thought of as a treaty by Great Britain, and that was provided for by section 132. Being, therefore, not mentioned explicitly in either section 91 or section 92, such legislation falls within the general words at the opening of section 91 which assigned to the government of the dominion the power to make laws "for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces." In fine, though agreeing that the convention was not such a treaty as is defined in section 132, their lordships think that it comes to the same thing. On the 11th August, 1927, the Privy Council of Canada, with the approval of the Governor General, chose a body to attend the meeting of all the powers to settle international agreements as to wireless. The Canadian body attended and took part in deliberations. The deliberations ended in the convention with general regulations appended being signed at Washington on the 25th November, 1927, by the representatives of all the powers who had taken part in the conference, and this convention was ratified by the Canadian government on the 12th July, 1928. The result is in their lordships' opinion clear. It is Canada as a whole which is amenable to the other powers for the proper carrying out of the convention; and to prevent individuals in Canada infringing the stipulations of the convention it is necessary that the dominion should pass legislation which should apply to all the dwellers in Canada.

I will not detain the house by reading further from the judgment; that is sufficient for my purposes.

There is one word more I desire to say as to an additional ground upon which the proposed legislation is supported. It will be recalled that in dealing with the case of a federal union the treaty provides for a discretion being exercised. I particularly dwelt upon that provision. The discretion might be exercised by sending the recommendation down to a province and it might be exercised as we now propose to exercise it, by legislation in this house. That discretion which is vested in the government of Canada was exercised, it is true, in one way at one time. We now propose to exercise it as indicated in the judgments in the radio and aeronautics cases. We propose to exercise it as a matter that affects the whole of Canada in which uniform legislation with respect to hours of labour is a question not only of national interest; we cannot go behind the words of the covenant of the League of Nations which declares it to be of international concern. It is not provincial, not national, but international. Under these circumstances, how otherwise can we seriously become a party to a treaty that declares the matter with which we now propose to deal is one of interest not only to us as a nation but to other nations as well because it concerns the well-being and happiness of all nations and does something to secure and make for universal peace? It is on that principle that we support the legislation. Without going into the matter at any greater length—and I apologize to the house for trespassing so long upon its attention with respect to a matter of such vital importance—I move that we approve this convention on the basis of which we are founding the legislation, notice of which is now standing in my name.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: I must say that I envy my right hon. friend's fine power of confidence in his own views, and I should like to be as sure as he is of any opinion I may offer on a question of this kind. However, I humbly beg to differ from the views he has expressed and to say that his preliminary words to the effect that the government has resolved this question of jurisdiction are a little too hopeful. I am afraid that whatever the action of parliament on the proposed draft convention may be, nothing will be changed as to the respective jurisdictions of the provinces and the federal parliament.

May I say at the outset that I am one of those who believe in the principle of an eight hour day and a forty-eight hour week. I believe in many fields of activity the week might be even shorter, and I shall not surprise my right hon. friend when I say that conditions to-day as to an eight hour day and a forty-eight hour week are quite different from what they were when this draft convention was adopted at Washington. At that time this was the goal which labour wanted to reach, but that is not so to-day; and at the last international labour conference there was submitted a new draft convention making it a forty hour week of labour. All the representatives of labour at the convention strongly urged the adoption of that draft convention. Some of the employers objected and most of the governments' representatives were absent when the final vote was taken. I am sorry to say that the Canadian representative was one of them. I shall quote his words later. He gave as an excuse that in Canada this power belongs to the provinces. At that time he had not been acquainted with the change of view of the law officers of the crown and probably of my right hon. friend. I say that by way of pointing out that no tremendously radical change is involved, because the provisions of this convention are as a matter of fact now in force in most of the provinces of Canada, and in most of the occupations of the Canadian people.

My right hon. friend bases his contention as to the jurisdiction of this parliament on article 23 of the peace treaty, and on the various sections of the labour part of that treaty. Section 23 reads as follows—and it is very important to note the first two lines:

> Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon,—

The whole section is qualified by those two lines, "subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon."

Mr. BENNETT: International conventions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What are those conventions which are to be agreed upon? They are defined, the labour part, as the Prime Minister has said, in the labour part of the peace treaty, which provides in the main for two things: first, the organization of international labour machinery, known as the international labour office, and second, an international labour conference, that being the meeting which takes place annually or twice a year of the representatives of all the countries which are members of the League of Nations; and of late some countries which are not members of the league have joined the international labour office, I am very pleased to say, for the purpose of discussing and coming to decisions on subjects of interest to labour. How is it done? Article 405 of the treaty states how it is done:

> When the conference has decided on the adoption of proposals with regard to an item in the agenda, it will rest with the conference to determine whether these proposals shall take the form: (a) of a recommendation to be submitted to the members for consideration with a view to effect being given to it by national legislation or otherwise, or (b) of a draft international convention for ratification by the members.

It is provided that a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present shall be necessary, and so forth; and that the conference shall have due regard to those countries in which climatic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organization or other special circumstances prevail. Then it is said in the same article:

Each of the members undertakes that it will, within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the conference, or if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.

In the case of a recommendation, the members will inform the Secretary-General of the action taken.

In the case of a draft convention, the member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies—

I draw particular attention to those words:

—communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the Secretary-General and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of such convention.

If on a recommendation no legislative or other action is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies—

And again I draw the attention of the house to those words:

—no further obligation shall rest upon the member.

In the case of a federal state, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

These are the only forms of procedure devised for the international labour conference in the exercise of the functions entrusted to it by the peace treaty for the purpose of dealing with labour matters as they affect the nations of the world. As I have stated, Canada in the case of a draft convention will approve if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies; the framers of the treaty quite realizing that there are countries in which there would be different jurisdictions as to the matters with which the draft conventions might deal, and that the member, in this case Canada, has first to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies. And it is further stated that if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation will rest upon the member.

Well, what were the duties of Canada? My right hon. friend puts reliance on section 132 of the British North America Act in his argument that this comes within the power and jurisdiction of the federal parliament. Section 132 states:

The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British empire, towards foreign countries arising under such treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

Under section 132 it is the obligation that creates the jurisdiction. If there is no obligation on the part of the government or parliament, and I claim that under the sections of the peace treaty which I have read there is no such obligation, then section 132 fails to give jurisdiction to this parliament because there is not that obligation which alone creates the jurisdiction.

How did Canada act in this matter? My right hon. friend claims that all has been changed as a result of the judgments in the radio and aviation cases, with which I will deal later. What did Canada do? The views of this country were expressed by the government in an order in council dated November 6, 1920, and I wish to put part of this order in council once more on Hansard. It is P.C. 2722, and was based on the report of the then Minister of Justice. It reads as follows:

The minister further states that he is of opinion that the provisions of the labour part of the Treaty of Versailles do not impose any obligation on the Dominion of Canada to enact into law the different draft conventions or recommendations which may from time to time be adopted by the conference. The obligation as set forth is simply in the nature of an undertaking on the part of each member within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the conference, or if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within a period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment, and in any case not later than eighteen months from the closing of the conference "to bring the recommendations or draft conventions before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action." The treaty engagement being of this character, it is not such as to justify legislation on the part of parliament under the authority of section 132 of the British North America Act, 1867, to give effect to any of the proposals of the said draft conventions and recommendations, which must be held, as between the dominion and the provinces, to be within the legislative competence of the latter. The government's obligation will, in the opinion of the minister, be fully carried out if the different conventions and recommendations are brought before the competent authority, dominion or provincial, accordingly as it may appear, having regard to the scope and objects, the true nature and character of the legislation required to give effect to the proposals of the conventions and recommendations respectively, that they fall within the legislative competence of the one or the other.

That order in council also embodied the minister's opinion on the very question whether the provisions of the draft convention limiting hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, adopted at the first session of the international labour conference at Washington, came within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada or of the provincial legislatures. In the same order in council the minister reported that the proposals of this convention—and these are the words of the Minister of Justice, as contained in the order in council:

—involve legislation which is competent to parliament in so far as dominion works and undertakings are affected, but which the provincial legislatures have otherwise the power to enact and apply generally and comprehensively.

In 1923 there was a dominion-provincial conference, which I attended together with the then Minister of Labour. All these draft conventions were submitted to the delegates to that conference, and all agreed that these were matters for provincial action. In 1924 the then Prime Minister, my right hon. leader, moved a resolution which was adopted by the house, and which will be found at page 2466 of Hansard for May 23, 1924. The resolution read:

Resolved that it is expedient that a certain draft convention which was adopted at the first session of the international labour conference of the League of Nations, in 1919, limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, be referred to the select committee on industrial and international relations for examination and report, having regard to the labour provisions of the treaties of peace and to the order in council of November 6, 1920, dealing with the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures.

That committee, of which the Minister of Justice and I were members, sat and reported to the house that in spite of the order in council of 1920 and the views expressed by the law officers, the matter was of such importance that it should be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada by way of a reference.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was proceeding to indicate what Canada has done regarding the draft convention in connection with the eight hour day. I forgot to mention that from September 5 to September 7, 1922, a dominion-provincial conference was held in Ottawa as a result of which the following resolution was adopted:

That the conference has had under consideration the various proposals relative to labour which have emanated during the past three years from the international labour conference of the League of Nations. It is provided under the treaties of peace that the draft conventions and recommendations of this body must be brought to the attention of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action, and this conference is of the view that the authorities deemed to be respectively competent to deal with the matters in question should give careful and sympathetic attention to such draft conventions and recommendations with a view to enacting necessary legislation where this may be found practicable, and that the federal government undertakes on request from a majority of provincial governments to call a conference for the consideration of any aspects of these matters when this may be deemed necessary.

It was to give effect to this recommendation that the federal-provincial conference to which I referred this afternoon was called in 1923. I quoted the motion made on May 23, 1924 by the then Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) referring this draft convention limiting the hours of work in industrial understakings to the industrial and international relations committee.

That committee in turn reported to the house that although various opinions had been given it believed in order to obtain a final decision the matter should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. When the report came before the house for discussion the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) took part in the debate. Speaking on July 18, 1924, on an amendment moved by the present hon member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the Minister of Justice is reported as having said the following:

I do not think there is any doubt as to the jurisdiction of this parliament in regard to dominion labour. But there is more than a doubt in regard to our jurisdiction to apply the eight hour day principle generally throughout the dominion. I have not a doubt upon the subject; I am satisfied that the ruling of the Department of Justice is right in that respect, and that the provincial legislatures have jurisdiction in such matters; but I am just as sure that this parliament has jurisdiction in regard to dominion works, and if parliament or the government is in sympathy with the proposal of the eight hour day as applicable to dominion operations and dominion works, there is no reason why this proposal should not be supported.

Then he added:

I would not support the amendment if it proposed to extend that principle into provincial jurisdictions over which I am satisfied we have no control. But as the amendment is purely applicable to dominion works I think it is in the right direction and I shall support it.

I commend to the present Minister of Justice the opinion held in 1924 by Hon. Hugh Guthrie.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was before those decisions.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, before the decisions; I shall come to the decisions. But would it surprise my hon. friend to learn that since the decisions were given he has expressed the same opinion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, not under the treaty making powers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We will see about that later. In the same debate the then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, a former prime minister of Canada, who had much to do with the League of Nations and the international labour office, who is a distinguished jurist and who was never very anxious to make things easy for the then government, used the following language as reported at page 4763 of Hansard:

But I really think the question of jurisdiction is very well determined. I would have been content to accept the Justice department's view as to where our jurisdiction ends and where that of the provinces commences. I have my own opinions and I do not know that they differ from those of others on this subject. However, if there is something still in doubt, if particularly the Justice department has doubt, I have no objection to the submission to the supreme court. But the submission itself is not really any progress. It cannot be stated that by the submission we are taking any very effective step to carry out our undertaking.

Mr. Martel: May I ask my right hon. friend a question, not for the purpose of interrupting him, but as a lawyer? Where does he think the power rests to enact an eight hour day, in the provinces or in the federal authorities?

Mr. Meighen: It rests certainly with the federal authorities so far as federal works are concerned. I do not know myself of any sphere where else it rests. I think the rest of the spheres are the provinces, and I never knew there was any real question of doubt in the matter. But there may be some clause as to which there is doubt, and if the Justice department so holds, the submission is right, but if the submission is merely for the purpose of delay, it is wrong.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Further on at pages 4764 and 4765 Mr. Meighen said:

We have no right in the world to invade jurisdiction where provincial jurisdiction is clear, and do so under the guise of declaring this work or that for the general advantage of Canada. To do so would be the grossest abuse of the powers of this house, and I would not for one moment consider any such suggestion, no matter from what side of the house it emanated. This expresses my general idea of a most embarrassing question, and I give it, not in any spirit of criticism, but merely as my understanding of what this country is pledged to under the Geneva convention—

Mark these words:

—and as well of what we are pledged to keep away from under our obligations as a party to the contract of confederation.

Reference was then made to the Supreme Court of Canada. The dominion government was represented before the supreme court by the present Deputy Minister of Justice as solicitor and by the late Eugene Lafleur, a distinguished jurist of Montreal, and Mr. O'Donoghue of Toronto as counsel for the attorney general of Canada. I wish to quote a few words from the factum presented to the supreme court, signed by Mr. Lafleur and his associate counsel, speaking on behalf of the justice department and for himself as a distinguished jurist. Having quoted article 405 of the peace treaty, which has been recited in this house this afternoon two or three times, he said:

It is obvious that these provisions of the labour part of the treaty do not impose any obligation on the dominion to enact into law the different draft conventions or recommendations which may from time to time be adopted by the conference. This is merely an undertaking on the part of each member to bring the recommendations or draft conventions before the proper authorities.

This being the extent of the obligation, it does not justify legislation on the part of parliament to give effect to any such recommendations or draft conventions under the authority of section 132 of the British North America Act, which provides that the parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries arising out of treaties between the empire and such foreign countries. The government's obligation will be satisfied if the different recommendations or conventions are brought before the competent authority, dominion or provincial, as the case may be.

And he adds:

The legislatures of the provinces are the authorities within whose competence the subject-matter of the draft convention lies and before whom such draft convention should be brought under the provisions of article 405 of the treaty of peace, for the enactment of legislation or any other action that may be deemed proper. This, it is submitted, is the case, subject to the sole exception of the legislation respecting dominion works and undertakings, as will be explained in answer to question 4.

The subject-matter is evidently included in items 13 and 16 of section 92 of the British North America Act, inasmuch as the regulation of the hours of labour affects civil rights in the province and if confined to labour performed in a province would be a matter of merely local or private nature in the province.

This being so, the legislative jurisdiction of the province over the subject-matter must be exclusive and would not be overborne by any attempt on the part of the dominion parliament to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, conferred by the first part of section 91, inasmuch as that power is only given in relation to matters not coming within the classes of subjects by the act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. This point has been dealt with several times by the privy council, and it is only necessary to refer to the observations of Lord Haldane in the most recent case of Toronto Electric Commissioners versus Snider 1925, A.C., at pages 410-413.

As my right hon. friend is relying for the jurisdiction of this parliament, apart from article 23 and the labour part of the peace treaty, upon the residue power for peace, order and good government contained in section 91, I think it proper that I should read what section 91 says. The part of section 91 which concerns this matter reads as follows:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

As was stated by the privy council in the case of Snider of Toronto, this question of hours of labour is exclusively assigned to the legislatures by section 92, and cannot come under this part of section 91 regarding the residue of matters which may be dealt with by this parliament for peace, order and good government.

Now I come to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the reference which was submitted to the court and to which my right hon. friend alluded this afternoon. It will be found in the Supreme court reports of 1925, page 505. I shall quote only the answer to the last question, because that is the one with which we are mainly concerned, dealing with the possible jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada in the matter. The question was:

If the subject-matter of the said draft convention be, in part only, within the competence of the legislatures of the provinces, then in what particular or particulars, or to what extent, is the subject-matter of the draft convention within the competence of the parliament of Canada?

To that fourth question the supreme court answered as follows:

The parliament of Canada has exclusive legislative authority in those parts of Canada not within the boundaries of any province, and also upon the subjects dealt with in the draft convention in relation to the servants of the dominion government.

That is the jurisdiction of Canada in the matter of hours of labour. Then how can section 132 of the British North America Act apply? If there is no obligation, as was stated this afternoon, on the part of Canada with regard to this convention, where is our jurisdiction? It is the obligation towards foreign powers which gives to parliament jurisdiction to deal with a matter of this kind when bound by treaty so to do. Where are we bound? Well, it is only necessary to read section 405 of the peace treaty to find out what obligation, if any, there is on the part of this parliament or of the dominion with regard to a draft convention. It is not even called a convention; it is a draft convention, or in French, un projet de convention. There is nothing final to it. It is something which is suggested to the various members of this international labour conference for the purpose of their calling it to the attention of the authority within whose competence the matter lies to take any action regarding it which they see fit. Even the competent authority is not bound in any way. It is only a draft convention, I repeat. Then how can it be said to constitute an obligation on the part of Canada giving to this parliament under section 132 of the British North America Act authority and jurisdiction to deal with the matter? It is clear that the countries are not bound by it. Over fifty nations are members of the international labour organization. I do not think there are seventeen at the present time which have approved or ratified that draft convention, and my hon. friend claims that it is an obligation binding upon Canada. Well, let us proceed.

We were bound, so far as the employees of the dominion are concerned, by the decision of the supreme court, and it had also always been the view of the law officers of the crown in that respect. And to give effect to this obligation P.C. 670, an order in council approved by the governor general on March 27, 1930, was laid on the table of the house on March 31, as you will find at page 1082-3 of Hansard. By this order in council the dominion extended to all employees of the government of Canada the principle of the forty-eight hour week and of eight hours a day, and all the obligations by which Canada was bound were complied with when this order in council was passed by the government.

Under this administration—and this I wish to call particularly to the attention of the Minister of Justice—on February 17, 1932, at page 284 of Hansard, the then member for Kenora-Rainy River, Mr. Heenan, moved the following resolution:

Whereas, the Dominion of Canada is a signatory to the articles of peace of the treaties of Versailles, thereby subscribing to the principle of a maximum working day of eight hours: Therefore be it resolved that this house is of opinion that the government of Canada should take appropriate steps to ensure, throughout Canada, the fulfilment of our treaty obligations and conventions arising out of the peace treaty, relating to hours of work.

Mr. Heenan did not claim in his speech that this parliament had jurisdiction over the matter. He said:

In 1930, in order to carry out our treaty obligations, an order in council was passed, P.C. 670, putting all federal government employees who were working in excess of eight hours on an eight-hour day basis. On May 30 of the same year legislation was enacted, now known as chapter 20-21 of George V, placing all employees on government contracts or working at day labour on government work on the eight-hour day basis. My position in the matter is simply this, Mr. Speaker. I submit that the federal parliament having taken the mote out of its own eye, the federal government is now in a better position to approach the provincial governments with a view to having them enact legislation to carry out our treaty obligations. It will be seen, therefore, that this resolution simply calls upon the government of Canada to take appropriate steps to ensure throughout Canada the fulfilment of our treaty obligations with respect to hours of work. And I have no fear but that this house will unanimously adopt the resolution.

The Minister of Justice spoke for the government, as reported at page 286 of Hansard of the same day. He said:

The gist of the motion is that the government should take appropriate steps. As the motion was not carried during the last session of the house there were no steps to be taken, as a result of it. In fact the only steps that suggest themselves to my mind at the moment are those which were taken by the preceding government on four or five occasions, when the question was brought to the attention of the various provincial governments with the idea of enlisting their sympathies and having them pass the necessary provincial legislation to bring into force the provisions of the treaty of Versailles with respect to labour.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

In my judgment this parliament has done about all it can do in respect of that treaty. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has given a brief resume of some of the steps which have been taken by this parliament to bring our national labour service into conformity with the requirements of that treaty, but fortunately or unfortunately the dominion powers are limited by our constitutional act; there are some matters which do not lie within our legislative jurisdiction and in connection with which we have no right whatever to legislate. One of these matters is the question of hours of labour, which is largely a provincial matter, and the most this government can do in regard to the general subject is to bring that question directly to the attention of the various provincial governments and request them to cooperate.

This has been done time and time again. It was not done directly after last session because the motion was not adopted by the house last session, but if this present motion is adopted the government will take steps without delay definitely to draw this matter to the attention of the various provincial governments.

Further on, the Minister of Justice made these observations, which I commend to the Prime Minister, who this afternoon took the view that Canada had not fulfilled most of its duties with regard to these conventions:

There is this further to be said in regard to Canada and the treaty of Versailles, and particularly with respect to the question of labour. While in Geneva last fall I had occasion to discuss the question with some of those who are better informed in regard to these matters than I am myself, and I was glad to learn that Canada was not lagging behind in regard to the provisions of that treaty. We were well in the forefront. I do not think any nation in the world has carried out all the provisions of that treaty. Some have done so to a much greater extent than others, but Canada's position is a very happy one in that respect. We have gone a much greater distance than many other nations perhaps more important in one aspect than Canada, and I felt very proud of the work that this dominion had accomplished.

My hon. friend said that his former opinions were expressed before the decision of the privy council was given. Well, the decision of the privy council in the aviation case, which is the one upon which my right hon. friend bases his argument—my right hon. friend shakes his head—

Mr. BENNETT: I said that the purport of the aviation decision was that section 132 governed. The radio case went further.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would it surprise my right hon. friend to know that the radio case had been decided at the time?

Mr. BENNETT: When the Minister of Justice said that, yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Minister of Justice spoke, as I have quoted his words, on February 17, 1932.

Mr. BENNETT: The decision was February 9.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The decision in the aviation case had been delivered by the privy council on October 22, 1931, a few months before, and the radio decision had been delivered on February 9, 1932. Both those judgments were rendered before my right hon. friend expressed his opinion as he did.

I have something which is even better than that. Even the right hon. gentleman took a long time to change his views after the decisions in the aviation and the radio cases. One of those decisions was given in 1931 and the other in February, 1932. Only a few months ago, when my right hon. friend left for Europe, he sent to all the provincial premiers a letter dated August 31, 1934, and that letter was made public by the then Acting Prime Minister, the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) on September 13 last. It was published in all the newspapers of Canada on September 14 last. What was the view of my right hon. friend at that time? He says now that the question of jurisdiction has been resolved in favour of this parliament. It was not resolved in September last, because my right hon. friend in his letter, having said that it was his purpose to call a conference of the provincial premiers when he returned from the old country, stated that he wanted to place upon the agenda certain matters, one of them being the following—it was second on the list:

> Are the provinces prepared to surrender their exclusive jurisdiction over legislation dealing with such social problems as old age pensions, unemployment and social insurance, hours and conditions for work, minimum wages, et cetera, to the dominion parliament? If so, on what terms and conditions?

Mr. McINTOSH: That was their stand.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Am I not right when I say that when my right hon. friend wrote that letter to the provincial premiers on August 31, 1934, he had not reached the conclusion that we could simply say: We have the power, the jurisdiction, and we are going to exercise it? He was then of the opinion that this was the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. If it was the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces in September, 1934, it is just as much so in February, 1935, and it was so when my right hon. friend spoke over the air in January of this year. Those broadcast expressions of my right hon. friend, fine as they were, never had the effect of changing the constitution of Canada. They have not changed the constitution; the matter is still a provincial one, and if labour relies on the government's attitude for a new deal, I am afraid it will be a misdeal, because the proposed legislation will not have the validity which any parliamentary action concerning a matter so important should have.

My right hon. friend relies on the two decisions in regard to radio and aviation. Let me say first that the question of provincial jurisdiction in matters such as this has been decided by the privy council many times in such cases as the Board of Commerce Act, the fair prices act of 1929; Toronto Electric Commissioners and Snider in 1925, where the question of peace, order and good government was dealt with by the privy council. My right hon. friend says that there has been a change; that there had been a development going on with regard to our respective powers, our respective jurisdiction. Well, even at that time the question was discussed and debated with regard to aviation and radio, and the privy council delivered judgment confirming provincial jurisdiction in various matters. They did it in the fisheries case in 1929, with which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is well acquainted. They did it in connection with the Insurance Act in 1932, and I think the case is reported in the same volume of the appeal cases or the Dominion Law Reports where they decided in favour of the provinces. The only matter on which they based their decision was section 132 in both the aviation case and the radio case, but in both those cases there was no draft convention; there was a binding treaty on which the privy council based its decision. In regard to aerial navigation the treaty had been signed in 1920 with a large number of foreign powers, and my right hon. friend has read part of the judgment of the privy council. I desire to read a few words of it also as recorded on page 58:

> Their lordships do not think that aeronautics is a class of subject within property and civil rights in the provinces, although hereagain, ingenious arguments may show that some small part of it might be so included.

Surely that cannot be said about hours of work.

> Their lordships are of opinion that it is proper to take a broader view of the matter rather than to rely on forced analogies or piecemeal analysis. They consider the governing section to be section 132, which gives to the parliament and government of Canada all powers necessary and proper for performing the obligations towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries. As far as section 132 is concerned, their lordships are not aware of any decided case which is of assistance on the present occasion. It will be observed, however, from the very definite words of the section, that it is the parliament and government of Canada who are to have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or any province thereof.

To sum up, having regard (a) to the terms of section 132; (b) to the terms of the convention which covers almost every conceivable matter relating to aerial navigation; and (c) to the fact that further legislative powers in relation to aerial navigation reside in the parliament of Canada by virtue of section 91 (2), (5) and (7), it would appear that substantially the whole field of legislation in regard to aerial navigation belongs to the dominion. There may be a small portion of the field which is not by virtue of specific words in the British North America Act vested in the dominion; but neither is it vested by specific words in the provinces. As to such small portion it appears to the board that it must necessarily belong to the dominion under its power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada. Further their lordships are influenced by the facts that the subjects of aerial navigation and the fulfilment of Canadian obligations under section 132 are matters of national interest and importance; and that aerial navigation is a class of subject which has attained such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the dominion.

The decision in the radio case was given a few months afterwards, on February 9, 1932. There again it was to confirm a treaty; that is to say the legislation that was passed was passed in consequence of a treaty binding Canada, signed at Washington on November 25, 1927 by the representatives of all the powers which had taken part in the conference; and this convention was ratified by the Canadian government on July 12, 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: It was a convention, not a treaty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was a convention signed and binding and ratified, not a draft convention. There were, I think, eighteen obligations in the treaty which Canada had to fulfil. The idea pervading that judgment is that the whole subject of aeronautics is so completely covered by the treaty ratified between the nations that there is not enough left to give a separate field to the provinces as regards that subject. But let me say this: the law officers of the crown, while they were giving their opinion that the hours of work were under provincial jurisdiction, and never had any doubt in the matter, always claimed that radio and aviation were federal matters. They always made a clear distinction as between these two matters and matters which come so clearly under property and civil rights, one of the classes of subjects which are exclusively provincial.

I said this afternoon that this question of the forty-eight hour week is not such a burning question at the present time. It was such a question in 1919, but almost everywhere the forty-eight hour week of labour has been adopted. Canadian labour, as well as labour in the other countries, is no longer claiming the forty-eight hour week; they are asking for forty hours.

Mr. HEAPS: No, thirty hours.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, I did not think my hon. friend was going as far as that. But I know that all the representatives of labour at the last international labour conference in Geneva insisted on a new draft convention of forty hours a week. And the draft convention had been prepared. There had even been a preliminary conference about it, called the tri-partite conference, I think, in 1933, which had made a very interesting report on the matter and which had drafted a projected convention to be adopted by the international conference which was to take place last year. The draft convention was adopted in the committee, but when it came before the whole conference most of the delegates of the governments mysteriously disappeared; they were not there to vote, and although the draft convention carried by a pretty good majority there was not a sufficient quorum under the rules of the international labour conference to give validity to it. I was interested in reading in the record of the proceedings of that conference of 1934, on page 338, the remarks of Canada's delegate, who had been one of those absent when the vote was taken. There was a demand for an adjournment, and Doctor Riddell said:

> I rise to support the proposal of Mr. Martens for an adjournment. In connection with his statement, I might be permitted a word in explanation of our vote on article 1. The government of Canada is a federal government. The Supreme Court of Canada has declared that the question of hours is a provincial matter. The provinces have stated in their replies to the questionnaire that the office draft did not offer sufficient flexibility for them to aprove of the adoption of that draft. The amended draft went still further; therefore we had no option but to abstain.

So even the representatives of Canada, speaking for Canada at the international labour conference, were giving as a reason for their line of action at the last international labour conference the fact that under the constitution of Canada hours of work are a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. HEAPS: If I may ask a question, who was the representative who took that stand at the Geneva conference?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Doctor Riddell.

Mr. HEAPS: He was a government representative?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Acting under government instructions?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I suppose so.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he is the permanent representative at Geneva. He was not instructed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have been a delegate of Canada to various conferences at Geneva, both constitutional and as to labour matters, and as a delegate I would not have taken a stand like this without first asking for instructions from the government I represented; that is all I can say.

Now I was saying that this forty hour week of labour is not a very radical thing at the present time. I have heard it said occasionall that my own province of Quebec is sometimes backward in matters of labour legislation. That of course is not correct; for Quebec has led in many respects with regard to labour legislation. But may I call the attention of the house to an act respecting the limiting of working hours, passed by the Quebec legislature in 1933, 23 George V, chapter 40, which gives to the lieutenant governor in council the right to order the number of hours per week or per day during which a workman employed in manual labour may work; and in no case should the number of working hours be less than six per day or thirty-three per week, so that as far as possible employment might be assured for two or more crews of workmen employed at the same work. There have been proclamations under this act. On July 14, 1933, the building industry, comprising the building, repairing and demolishing of buildings of every kind, and covering especially the men employed as bricklayers, carpenters, joiners, cement finishers, roofers and so on, were all brought under this act. From and after July 1, 1933, the duration of effective labour in the building industry within the limits of the Montreal division should not exceed eight hours per day and the total hours of effective labour in the course of a single week should not in any case exceed forty, eight hours less than is proposed under this draft convention. Other trades and occupations since have been brought under the operations of that law, so this is not such a great discovery.

Mr. HEAPS: That has not been applied to the textile industry?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think so, but it should be. I am quite willing to agree with my hon. friend in that regard, and to say that it should apply to the textile industry as well.

I have spoken at greater length than I had intended, Mr. Speaker, and I do not know that I have anything to add except this: My hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), who is a good friend of mine, became very enthusiastic this afternoon over this great change, with the parliament of the dominion assuming jurisdiction with regard to draft conventions of the international labour conference. The other day I heard my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) express himself as being very much pleased, when the resolution in connection with unemployment insurance was under discussion, because at last the parliament of Canada was assuming jurisdiction in the matter. May I tell my hon. friends that the assumption of jurisdiction does not create it. I believe they respect the constitution as much as I do, and may I tell them that the safeguards and protections in the constitution are more important to the labour people than they are to those who employ them. The safeguards in the constitution are more important to the minorities than they are to the majorities. They are more important to the poor than to the wealthy, because the wealthy always find a way to protect themselves. So when there is such an obvious encroachment as this on the powers of the provinces under the constitution I say that my hon. friends may be ill advised to be pleased that parliament should go beyond and over the constitution. I think those who have at heart the progress of labour legislation, those who want reforms as much as my right hon. friend does, will think it better to achieve those reforms in a valid way. There should be no loopholes left. No one will receive anything if labour is given not an instrument which is legal and valid, but something which is against the constitution and which will not stand in our courts.

I see that my right hon. friend has given notice of a bill to enforce this provision. I sincerely hope that before this bill becomes part of the statutes of Canada the jurisdiction of this parliament will be ascertained, or at least that there will be some understanding and agreement with the provinces, whom my right hon. friend wanted to meet last September because of their exclusive jurisdiction in the matter, so that good and valid legislation may be placed on the statute books of Canada regarding hours of labour and other progressive labour legislation, which I am quite willing to support.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think in all parts of the house there will be absolute agreement that since the two decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council which we know as the aviation and radio cases the constitutional atmosphere has been a good deal clarified in regard to the jurisdiction of this parliament and of the provincial legislatures in Canada. I had occasion once before, during the present session of this house, to discuss for a few moments some of the constitutional difficulties which have heretofore confronted us in the Dominion of Canada in regard to our constitutional act, and there is no doubt that until the decisions in the two cases I have just named there was considerable conflict of judicial opinion, in regard to many difficult and intricate questions under sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act.

My hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) laboured for some time in an effort to distinguish those two cases, the aviation and radio cases, from the question dealt with in the resolution before the house. He has most fervently advanced the theory that in the aviation and radio cases Canada was bound by positive treaties and conventions. That is true, and the resolution before parliament to-day is the first step in bringing about another binding international convention, just as binding as the radio convention or the aviation treaty, which came about through the treaty of Versailles. My hon. friend from Quebec East must remember that the government now proposes, by this resolution, to adopt and eventually ratify the draft labour convention drawn up in Washington in 1919.

Reference has been made to opinions which I have hitherto expressed in regard to provincial jurisdiction in respect of hours of labour and, I think also in regard to minimum wages. Under the circumstances which existed at the time, I was correct in the views I expressed and I would not alter the opinions which I expressed on those occasions. I stick to them yet; they were right. There was no treaty or convention under consideration; there was no proposal to ratify a treaty or convention at that time. The resolution now before the house proposes the approval of a convention which makes an entirely different problem. In 1924 when I expressed myself in regard to hours of labour nothing had been done towards the adoption of the draft convention which came to us from Washington in 1919. It was an academic question we were discussing; the opinion I then presented to the house was a correct opinion, and I stand by it to-day. When I spoke in 1932—and by the way, let me interject at this point that when I spoke on February 9 to the motion moved by Mr. Heenan in regard to minimum wages—

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, the eight hour day

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, the same point was involved. When I spoke at that time I spoke without knowledge of the decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council in the two cases referred to. I think the hon. member for Quebec East at that time had no knowledge of them either.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, I had.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We get newspaper and telegraphic reports that an appeal has been allowed or an appeal has been dismissed, together with a brief summary, but the report of the case does not reach Canada until months afterwards. The information came in the report of appeal cases for the year 1932, and arrived here in mid-summer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is it not true that the Department of Justice receives copies of judgments long before the reports are issued?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not much before. We do receive them as a rule within six to eight weeks.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was there too. I know.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The radio case was, I think, decided just five or six days after I had spoken in the house. However, that is beside the point. I am now basing my opinion upon the fact that we propose to ratify this draft convention. The object of the resolution is to enable us to do so, and if the convention be ratified, as I assume it will be, then I submit that under our treaty making power in our constitutional act we have undoubtedly authority to pass the necessary legislation. If we do not intend to ratify the convention, and if it is merely to remain a dead letter as it has remained since 1919, then the opinions I expressed in the house in 1924 and 1934 I still hold. I believe they were correct. I place the question squarely before the house under section 132 of the British North America Act, and I have no hesitation in asserting jurisdiction for this parliament under that section.

But it is not only upon that ground that jurisdiction may be claimed for the parliament of Canada in regard to this resolution. There is the matter of the regulation of trade and commerce within the dominion, and the matter of foreign trade. There is the establishment of equilibrium in matters of trade between the various provinces of the dominion. There can be little doubt that in all interprovincial trade and in all foreign trade this parliament has exclusive jurisdiction. I say on that among other grounds this legislation is justified, but in the meantime I am placing the matter before the house, so far as my opinion may carry weight, solely upon the ground of our constitutional right to bind the provinces and bind Canada under the authority of section 132 of the British North America Act.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we have listened to the observations of three of the most eminent legal gentlemen in the Dominion of Canada. As an ordinary layman I can speak with very little knowledge or authority on constitutional questions; my understanding of them is limited. I did however upon one occasion have some practice in criminal law. In the year 1919, to which reference has been made so often to-day, along with six other persons I stood at the bar of justice, and while there I got a little insight into criminal proceedings. For reasons I do not desire now to explain I defended my own case, acting as my own lawyer. Most of the accused had the benefit of legal counsel. All those who had legal counsel were found guilty. Some few weeks after the trial I met the late Judge Metcalfe, whom some hon. members would know, and discussing the case he said, "Heaps, it is a good thing for you that you had no lawyer defending you; if you had you would have gone to gaol along with the rest." So when it comes to questions of lawyers and legal opinions I am sometimes sceptical of the luminaries and the stacks of books and precedents brought forward in an effort to seek something from the musty past and to adjust it to modern conditions.

I was deeply interested in the splendid presentation of the case by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I sincerely hope and trust that when he speaks about a forty hour week, or a week even shorter than that, he speaks for his party particularly in the province of Quebec. Next week when the government introduces the bill providing for a forty-eight hour week I am sure he, along with other hon. members, will have an opportunity to vote for a shorter working week than at present obtains, and that it be provided for in the bill. I sincerely hope we shall be able to cooperate in asking for a thirty hour week, or as a compromise a thirty-four hour week. I hope such a proposal will have his support and the support of many other hon. members.

An hon. MEMBER: Why work at all?

Mr. HEAPS: To-day we have heard about the radio and aviation cases, but I believe there is a case which is more important than those, namely, the case of the millions of Canadian people who are to-day looking for remedial measures and a way out of the difficulties in which they find themselves. Of course we realize the importance of our constitution and the British North America Act. At this point may I say, along with the former Minister of Justice, that I am as much prepared as he is to respect the rights of minorities, and particularly those in his own province. I will go as far as he goes in defending the rights of the people in his province. I believe a discussion of the needs of the people of Canada is of greater importance than a discussion of the British North America Act.

It has been pointed out this afternoon that the opinions of legal luminaries change with changing conditions, and I believe it was pointed out further that a recent judicial decision had changed one which had been given formerly, and made legal that which was formerly illegal. For two reasons I am pleased that the government has seen fit to bring in this legislation. First of all, assuming the legislation is legal, it will give centralized authority in the dominion, so far as hours of labour are concerned. There can be no doubt that centralized authority is essential, if we are to have anything approaching harmonious understanding between the Canadian provinces. For instance, we cannot have men and women in one part of the dominion working fifty or sixty hours a week and in another part, in similar industries, working only forty-four hours. Only this morning I received a communication which I have forwarded to the proper minister. It contained the information that a dominion contract has been called for. A western manufacturer complains that in certain eastern factories employees are working for wages as low as twenty cents an hour, whereas in the western provinces the wages are twenty-five to thirty per cent higher. Naturally we cannot have such a condition of affairs continue in the Dominion of Canada.

Then I am glad for another reason, Mr. Speaker, that legislation of this character is introduced. It shows that this parliament is beginning to recognize that the limitation of working hours is essential so far as Canada is concerned. This is the first time, I believe, that parliament has gone on record through legislation dealing with a maximum working week; it is the first recognition by parliament that such a limitation of working hours is in the best interests of the Dominion of Canada.

My good friend the former Minister of Justice spoke of labour and a new deal, and then he brought in the constitution. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the implication is that the British North America Act is of greater consequence, of more importance to the people of this dominion than a new deal. I am not for one moment arguing whether what the government is proposing is a good thing or a bad thing. Personally I am inclined very much to the opinion of the former Minister of Justice. I do not think that a forty-eight hour week begins to touch the situation, so far as the hours of labour are concerned in this dominion. Nevertheless it is a recognition of certain principles, and because of that we are compelled to support the resolution and the bill which will be brought before the house. But when my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice speaks of a new deal, and then at once throws in its way all the constitutional difficulties he can possibly think of, I would ask how are we ever going to get a new deal if we are always to put the constitution ahead of it? In other words, we can never have a new deal unless, as I have said before, we recognize that the British North America Act was made for the people of Canada and not the people of Canada for the British North America Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to misinterpret me.

Mr. HEAPS: I certainly do not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If he will allow me, what I said, and what I still say, is that this should be done but that it should be done in a proper and constitutional way. I am not throwing the constitution in the way. I said that we should make the necessary amendments or come to the necessary understanding. The thing will be better if it is well done.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. It is only a question of interpretation of the powers of parliament, and I suggest that perhaps the lawyers who have considered this legislation have given it just as much consideration as my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. Legal gentlemen may not agree upon a certain interpretation, but the members of the government feel that what they are doing is the right and proper way to proceed, and I am glad they are taking hold of the situation in the way they are; let those who oppose this form of legislation come out in the open and say they oppose it.

We talk about the rights of parliament and the sovereignty of the constitution, but when we speak of sovereignty one thing that should not be forgotten is the sovereignty of the people. The sovereignty of the people should be supreme. So in matters of this kind, while I respect the constitution and want to see things done in a constitutional way, I say we cannot ignore the demands of the people of the Dominion of Canada; for if we allow our constitution to be so rigid and inflexible, it will break down and cause no end of chaos in this dominion. To-day we find that there are representations from all sections of the country and from every shade of opinion in the country to the effect that the rights which the government are taking upon themselves at the present time should be exercised by this parliament, and that such questions as hours of labour and a minimum wage should be and probably are a matter of federal right instead of provincial.

My hon. friend from Quebec East read from certain laws that have recently been passed in the province of Quebec relating to the building industry and a forty hour week. I am glad that the province of Quebec has recognized a forty hour week, and in a sense I approve of that legislation. The reason no doubt they made it a forty hour instead of a forty-eight hour week in the building industry in the province of Quebec was that the men were not even working a ten hour week on the average, and so nobody was hurt by that legislation. But I venture to assert that the province of Quebec did not bring in any legislation providing for a forty hour week in those industries in which at the very moment we are sitting here employees are working fifty-five and sixty hours a week—such industries and trades, for instance, as have been investigated during the past few months. What conditions were found in those industries? Girls were working fifty-five and sixty hours a week; and in the whole of the province of Quebec I think the information came out that they had only one or two inspectors to enforce some of these laws. It is one thing to have laws on the statute books, but it is another thing when it comes to enforcing them. If laws of this kind are to be made effective it can be done only when you have not the competition that exists to-day as between province and province only when the whole matter is dealt with uniformly right across the dominion. If we have power to put this legislation into effect I hope that the laws that we pass will be strictly enforced by the proper authorities. But if we are going to allow the judiciary, as has been suggested, to interpret at all times what the laws really are and what the constitution of the country is, who is going to be sovereign in this Dominion of Canada? Is it to be parliament and the people, or is it to be the judiciary as it is in the United States? I for one would hate to see this country put in the same position as the United States where if a certain law is not liked by a group of individuals it has to go before the supreme court of the United States for—shall I say?—its endorsation; and in reality it is the supreme court of the United States which in the final analysis dictates what the laws are that are passed by congress. Personally I want to see this parliament supreme and representing the people. I do not like the judiciary interpreting the law too much. In fact, I do not like them at all when it comes to a question of interpreting the law. I would rather see that left to parliament to deal with, as it is in Great Britain. You do not see a great many judicial interpretations of the law in Great Britain.

I had not intended to speak on this question at all, Mr. Speaker, and I was prompted to do so only by what was said by the former Minister of Justice. However, I am extremely glad that this legislation is being brought down, because as I said when the resolution on unemployment insurance was before the house last week, I attach far more importance to the shorter working day and increased wages than to the bill dealing with unemployment insurance. I do not regard the forty-eight hour week as a panacea for any of the problems which are facing us at the present time, but if the forty-eight hour week is reduced to about a thirty hour week we shall be going a long way towards solving some of the difficulties through which this country is passing at the present time. I am glad to give this legislation my endorsation. A great many things have happened since 1919, and to-day when the house is being asked to approve of a forty-eight hour week I may say that the forty-eight hour week or the eight hour day is as obsolete in 1935 as the twelve hour day was in 1919. I hope that when the measure is brought down dealing with the forty-eight hour week, amendments will be permitted looking towards a shorter working day and a shorter working week, and that such amendments will receive the sympathetic consideration of this House of Commons.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the length of the discussion and the wide range it has necessarily taken, it may be well to remind the house that what we have before us at the moment is not a bill providing for an eight hour day, of which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has given notice, but a draft convention of the general conference of the international labour organization. It is that draft convention which this house is being asked to approve. I will read the resolution so that it will be clear in the minds of all present:

> That, it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week adopted as a draft convention by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations at its first session in Washington on the 28th day of November, 1919, reading as follows:

This afternoon we approved of four draft conventions of the international labour organization. We have approved of all of them in the light of what we believe to be the legislative competence of this parliament, and we have approved of them to the extent of that competence. We on this side are prepared to approve of the draft convention now before us with respect to hours of labour in exactly the same way and on exactly the same terms. We approve of the draft convention so far as the legislative competence of this parliament permits us to do so, in other words in so far as the jurisdiction of this parliament is concerned.

There is one thing above all else which is important in this as in all matters of public relations and human affairs, and that is for us to be at least honest with ourselves as members of parliament, honest with those whom we represent, and particularly as members desirous of promoting social reform to be honest with those whose interest we hope to be able to further by any action we may take in this parliament. There come to my mind in this connection the words of the ex-Minister of Justice, my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), when he said that an assumption of jurisdiction does not create jurisdiction. I think it is important that we should all remember that. I might change the word "assumption" to the word "assertion" and say that an assertion of jurisdiction does not confer jurisdiction. Nor does the assertion of legislative competence confer legislative competence, even if that assertion is made by the present Minister of Justice or by the Prime Minister; that does not make the least bit of difference. Legislative competence is either here or it is not here, and when the matter comes to be decided it will be decided by that branch of government which exists for the purpose of settling questions of legislative competence. The Prime Minister has repeatedly and most emphatically said that of the different branches of government he regards the judicial as the most important, and he has given as his reason for that opinion the fact that the judicial branch is the one that determines these very questions of legislative competence. So that whatever we do here is done in the light of what we believe to be our legislative competence. If I believed that the courts of the land when the competence of any of this legislation came to be decided were going to present a certain point of view, I should feel it my duty to bring that fact to the attention of those who are interested in the legislation. And as leader of the opposition in parliament it is part of my duty with respect to the legislation which has been introduced to point out any feature which is likely at present to be misunderstood or to which exception later is likely to be taken. I should be very much remiss in my duty as leader of the opposition if I did not reemphasize what has been so ably said this afternoon by my colleague, the ex-Minister of Justice, with reference to jurisdiction, if I did not reemphasize what has already been given as the opinion of all ministers of justice who have held office in this country since the League of Nations was created, as well as the opinion which have been given by the Supreme Court of Canada. I need not say more than that.

I should perhaps point out to my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), who has just spoken, that I entirely agree with him when he urges the desirability of uniformity in legislation as between the provinces and as between the dominion and the provinces. Unquestionably uniformity of labour standards is something to be desired, and it is to be desired not in the field of Canada alone, because the whole purpose of these conventions is to bring about uniformity so far as may be possible throughout the world. It is not going to help Canada, as much as we should like to see her helped, for her to have the best standards, though they may be uniform, if other countries have lower standards. Unfortunately, as my hon. friend knows better than anyone else perhaps, where there are two standards competing with each other the baser of the two is apt to prevail in the long run. It has therefore been the hope of those interested in labour matters at Geneva that they would be able to bring about such uniformity of laws that those countries with high standards would not suffer by reason of their virtue and that the mean country would not profit in virtue of its meanness. That is the whole purpose underlying uniformity. But there are two ways of bringing uniformity about.

I think the tragedy of this parliament has been that though we have been here through five sessions at a time when labour matters were to the fore and when the provinces as well as the dominion were all in a mood to work together for improving industrial conditions, there has been no conference between the provinces and the dominion that amounted to anything with respect to labour legislation. Two or three conferences have been called but they have been over night affairs; representatives of the provincial governments have come here from the different provinces to discuss certain measures and on their arrival they have been asked by the ministry what their views were with regard to certain questions, without the ministry telling them anything about its views. With respect to this very question of the hours of labour there was a conference no more recently than two years ago, and when the representatives from all the different provinces came the question was: which of your rights are you prepared to give up? We wish to know that before we proceed any further. That was the substance of the remarks addressed to them by the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. BENNETT: That was in the letter of last fall, but they did not meet.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but I am referring to the conference prior to that; the same thing occurred at the conference. They were asked what they were prepared to surrender. Some were quite prepared to surrender certain of their rights but they wanted a quid pro quo; they wished to know in the taking over of services who was going to foot the bill. Others were not prepared to surrender anything and no decision was reached. Had a real effort been made during these five years to bring into conference the different provinces of the dominion with a view to securing uniformity with respect to the shortening of the working day, there would not have been any trouble in attaining that end, and we should now have had an eight hour day and a forty-eight hour week effective in the various trades from one end of Canada to the other.

May I point out further that, as the ex-Minister of Justice said, there are different ways of going about things. We are living under a parliamentary system of government. Whatever we may be in the course of the next year, we are at present not a full-fledged dictatorship. The method by which we have hoped—some of us at least—to effect reforms in this country for some time to come is the parliamentary method. It would be an unhappy day for labour in this country if it ever began to hope for its reforms from a dictatorship. They might seemingly gain something until they themselves became members of the servile state. Once members of the servile state they would soon find out where they stood under a system of regimentation, with a dictator at the head of affairs. So long as we have a parliamentary system of government, a constitution which governs the country, there should be observance of the proper methods of procedure with respect to effecting any changes that may be necessary. Therein lies the second great tragedy, it seems to me, of this parliament's failure to proceed as it might have done in these matters. If there had been a conference, as it was repeatedly suggested from this side there should be, to consider this very question of jurisdiction, this very question of amendments to the British North America Act, what would appear to be necessary in the way of amendments to the act might have been known at least four years ago and steps could long ago have been taken to have the act amended wherein it may be necessary to amend it. Had that been done, we would not have had to-day to wait for what amendments may be necessary to the British North America Act to effect certain purposes much to be desired, for agreement between the provinces and the dominion to effect a desired result; all that would have been settled long before this.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has been one of those who along with hon. members of the opposition have urged upon the government during each of the past five sessions that the provinces be called into conference with a view to taking steps at once to have the British North America Act so amended as to give us power in these social matters to legislate as may be necessary. But his appeals and those from this side have fallen on deaf ears. Unfortunate as this may be, we have to look the facts in the face. The mere making of assertions as to what is or is not to be does not meet the situation in any way that can be at all helpful. It may help to serve the purposes of a general election, although I do not believe it will even do that. But a very serious situation for labour and the country will arise if the legislation which we are passing in this parliament dealing with great social problems should all of a sudden come to naught because of the fact that instead of building our house upon a rock we are building it upon sand, and instead of building upon truth we are building upon error. Some of us want to avoid that kind of situation. We wish to see these reforms put through, but on a solid, enduring and truthful basis; and it is on that ground alone that we are prepared to support them.

As to the eight hour day and the approval of this house, I imagine there are some hon. members who have forgotten and probably some who never knew that as long ago as 1910 this house approved the principle of the eight hour day. We had in the parliament of 1908 to 1911 Mr. Alphonse Verville, of the city of Montreal, who like my hon. friend was a representative of labour. Mr. Verville brought in on one or two occasions a bill for an eight hour day with respect to public works and undertakings of the federal government. His bill for one reason or another did not get support the first year or two, but may I say that when I had the honour of being taken into Sir Wilfrid Laurier's cabinet as Minister of Labour and Mr. Verville reintroduced his bill, I moved in the house that the bill should be referred to a special committee to deal with the question of hours of labour on public works. I was subsequently elected chairman of that committee, and I have in my hand a copy of the report of its proceedings: proceedings of the special committee on Bill No. 21, an act respecting hours of labour on public works, comprising reports, evidence and correspondence, December 9, 1909, to May 3, 1910. This, as one may see, is a voluminous compendium, comprising between 700 and 800 pages, but as I recall the matter, and as the proceedings record, we had not concluded the taking of evidence at the end of that session. Next session, when Mr. Verville reintroduced his bill, instead of having the committee go over the matter further, the House of Commons passed the bill through its different stages. I supported it very strongly, maintaining the principle of an eight hour day for labour on all federal government undertakings or on whatever might come within the legislative competence of this parliament. As I have said, the bill passed the House of Commons. Therefore this house approved the eight hour day principle at that time. The bill went to the Senate; it passed its first reading and its second reading there, so that the Senate approved the principle of the eight hour day. After second reading in the Senate the bill was referred to a committee. As happened in respect to another measure of which I spoke this afternoon, dissolution took place suddenly on the reciprocity issue before a report had been made by the Senate committee, and the legislation was not enacted at that time. But as a result of the discussion and of the action taken then, the government from that time on—I am speaking now of Liberal administrations, although I think the same is true of the administration that followed that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier—construed the fair wages resolution which had been passed by this house, and which related to wages and hours on government work, as one which should fix as a maximum number of hours for work, the eight hour day. I speak subject to correction, but my impression is that the Labour department gave that construction to what was meant by a fair day's work—an eight hour day—and the schedules that were attached to the various contracts fixed the day at eight hours.

Mr. BENNETT: Not until later.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister says: "Not until later." He may be right, because as all hon. members know, after 1911 we passed to the decade which was the period of the war, and certainly during the war it may well be that in some cases longer hours were permitted. But after the war I think the eight hour day principle was pretty generally observed. At any rate I can speak for the administration of which I was the head from 1921 to 1930. Throughout that time the Labour department felt itself bound by the fair wages resolution as we interpreted it and by orders in council as we passed them, to give effect to the eight hour day with respect to government work. As has been referred to this afternoon by the ex-Minister of Justice, our government did not stop at public works and undertakings—and it will be noticed that this draft convention relates to industrial undertakings—the government took in the public service generally in its endeavour to further the principle of the eight hour day. I think I should read the order in council that was passed. It was referred to by the ex-Minister of Justice, but I think it should be placed on record in full because it shows to what extent the late Liberal administration at any rate was prepared to support the eight hour day principle generally. It is P.C. 670, approved by the governor general on March 27, 1930, and was laid on the table of the house on March 31, 1930, as reported on pages 1082 and 1083 of Hansard:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 19th March, 1930, from the Minister of Labour, submitting as follows.

May I say that this and one other order in council summed up what there had been in the form of regulations during the previous years and put them in the form of formal orders in council.

1. That it was recognized in the labour part of the treaty of Versailles and the corresponding provisions of the other treaties of peace, that the wellbeing—physical, moral and intellectual—of industrial wage earners is of supreme international importance, and that although differences of climate, habits and customs, economic principles and industrial traditions, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment, there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

2. That approval was expressed in the peace treaties of the principle of the eight hour working day.

3. That a draft convention was adopted at the first session of the conference of the international labour organization (League of Nations) in 1919 to limit hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight hours per day.

4. That the draft convention above mentioned was referred in 1924 to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations of the House of Commons of Canada for examination and report.

5. That on the recommendation of the committee on industrial and international relations of the House of Commons, approved by the House of Commons, the draft convention on hours of work in industrial undertakings was referred by order in council to the Supreme Court of Canada with a view to determining the jurisdiction of the federal and provincial authorities, respectively, on this subject.

May I point out that this is the very draft convention which is before us at the present time. It was referred to a select committee of the house, and the committee, of which I think my hon. friend was a member, on which at any rate all parties in this house were represented, were unanimous in their decision that the matter should be referred to the supreme court for an opinion. And the members were unanimous as well in their approval of the principle of the eight hour day. So again this house approved in that manner the principle of the eight hour day. The order in council continues:

6. That the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada contained the following declaration: "The subject matter is generally within the competence of the legislatures of the provinces but the authority vested in these legislatures does not enable them to give the force of law to provisions such as those contained in the draft convention in relation to servants of the dominion government, or to legislate for those parts of Canada which are not within the boundaries of a province."

7. That a report from the Civil Service Commission, which was submitted to Your Excellency in Council under date of February 16, 1925, showed that the standard daily hours of work of monthly rate employees in the government department are from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m., with an interval for luncheon and a half-holiday on Saturday, and that the standard hours of prevailing rate employees, numbering 1,576 in Ottawa and 18,264 outside Ottawa (of whom 12,247 were postmasters paid on percentage basis), are 44 hours per week, based on an eight hour day for five days, and 4 hours, or a half day, on Saturday. Certain exceptions to these standard hours of work were also noted in the report of the Civil Service Commission.

8. That request has been made to the government for the granting of the eight hour day to its own employees.

9. That it is desirable that the principle of the eight hour day should be applied to any branches of the public service of Canada in which it is not now observed.

The minister accordingly recommends that, except in cases where the work of employees is intermittent in character, or the application of this rule is not deemed to be practicable or in the public interest, the hours of work of any employees of the dominion government who are still required to work more than eight hours daily be reduced to eight hours daily, with a half holiday on Saturday.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

That order in council was approved, and as I have pointed out it extends the principle to the public service as set forth in its provisions.

But the late Liberal administration did not stop there. One of the last measures that was enacted before we went out of office was the passing of an eight hour day act. I have in my hand the text of the measure;

An act respecting fair wages and an eight hour day for labour employed on public works of the Dominion of Canada.

1. This act may be cited as The Fair Wages and Eight Hour Day Act, 1930.

2. In this act the expression "minister" means the Minister of Labour.

3. (1) Every contract made hereafter with the government of Canada for construction, remodelling, repair or demolition of any work shall be subject to the following conditions respecting wages and hours:

(a) All persons in the employ of the contractor, sub-contractor, or of any other person doing or contracting to do the whole or any part of the work contemplated by the contract shall be paid such wages as are generally accepted as current from time to time for competent workmen in the district in which the work is being performed for the character or class of work in which they are respectively engaged; provided that wages shall in all cases be such as are fair and reasonable;

(b) the working hours of persons while so employed shall not exceed eight hours per day except in such special cases as the governor in council may otherwise provide, or except in cases of emergency, as may be approved by the minister.

Then there are other particulars which help to make more definite that provision, and there is one which says;

The governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, may make regulations with regard to wages and hours herein provided for and without limiting the generality of the foregoing may provide by regulation for—

And a series of provisions or sections are set out all of which are intended to ensure the carrying out of the letter as well as the spirit of that legislation.

So I may sum up by saying that as long ago as 1910, this House of Commons approved the principle of an eight hour day to the extent of its legislative competence and authority; that again by its interpretation of the resolution respecting the payment of fair wages and the application of hours and fair conditions in connection with public works it has approved it, and that by order in council and by legislation, as I have already stated, it has approved it. So far, therefore, as this resolution is concerned as it comes to this parliament from Geneva via the government, in the light of orders in council read this afternoon, which still stand, because they have not been repealed, I think this house should have no difficulty whatever in approving the draft convention. Certainly those of us who belong to the Liberal party are only too ready to approve it in those terms.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Listening to this discussion reminded me of the story told about Galileo, who, tortured on the rack for saying that the world moves, recanted, but in an aside said that it moves for all that. I am inclined to agree with Galileo, that the world does move. The right hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that his government began the agitation for the eight hour day in 1910. In 1919 the international labour organization took it up, and now almost sixteen years later it has come up here for approval. Surely we are making progress! As the right hon. gentleman said, I cannot see at the moment what particular useful purpose our approval can serve, unless it be for election purposes. But I noticed, when he was telling us of the achievements of the Liberal government, that the order in council he read was passed on March 27, 1930, just a short time before the dissolution of parliament. So I presume that the present government has learned something from the government that preceded them.

The eight hour day is obsolete to-day. I have before me the legislative program of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada placed before the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and members of the cabinet in 1932. In the paragraph referring to hours of labour I find this:

For the past ten years requests have been submitted seeking compliance by Canada with the eight hour day convention of the international labour office.

Then it goes on to point out that this has been submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada for decision. Now for ten years, that is ever since 1922 when the Liberal party came into office, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada have been trying to have this convention approved. There is no reason why we should oppose this resolution, but unless we do something more than just approve we are not doing anything. For the last four or five years the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada at their conventions have gone on record in favour not of the eight hour day and the forty-eight hour week but of the six hour day and five day week, which as a matter of fact has been adopted already in some instances. If we are going to put the unemployed workers of this country back at work; if the unemployed workers in all the industrial countries of the world are to be employed again, we will have to go further, possibly, than the six hour day and five day week.

Looking in this direction the right hon. leader of the opposition stated that labour had nothing to gain from a dictatorship. I should like to point out to the right hon. gentleman that if and when a dictatorship comes in this country it is far more likely to come through the owning classes than through the labour movement. If there is any movement in this dominion that is opposed to a dictatorship I would say it is the labour movement. That is not only true of Canada; it is true of other countries as well. The people who have financed the dictatorship in other capitalist countries have been the owning and the ruling classes of those countries, so the right hon. gentleman need not concern himself with whether or not we are in favour of dictatorship.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not understood me at all. I have always gathered that labour was not in favour of a dictatorship, and I was warning labour against a dictatorship in this country, which may come a little sooner than some expect.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is quite right, but I would say that my right hon. friend gets his greatest support from the place where the danger in that regard is greater than it is anywhere else in Canada to-day. We must work for a shorter day, a shorter week, a better regulation of our hours of labour and a division of work if the people of this country are to benefit from their great heritage here.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know just why so much heat and feeling should be introduced into this debate. To me it is the discussion of a matter of very great interest, which should not arouse any animosities and which should not be the occasion for the expression of so much bitterness.

In the first place objection was taken with regard to the form of the resolution. I said that I would look it up this evening at recess, and I find that my recollection was correct. When the resolution was being prepared I suggested that it should be in the terms of the resolution introduced by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) when dealing with exactly the same situation in 1928. In the journals of that year I find the following:

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King (Prince Albert) it was resolved,—That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the slavery convention signed at Geneva on the twenty-fifth of September, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six, and which was signed, on behalf of Canada, by the Canadian representative duly authorized to that effect;

And that this house do approve of same.

That applied also with respect to two other resolutions, one with respect to an international sanitary convention and the other dealing with another matter. I mention these because I thought it desirable that we should have a uniform form of resolution—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree.

Mr. BENNETT: —and I am responsible to that extent for the resolution being in its present form. I still think it was better to follow the form used by the right hon. gentleman than the form which was suggested this afternoon. On further consideration I think it is correct to say that it is expedient that parliament should pass it and that this house should take the necessary action in that direction.

So much for that point. May I again suggest to the right hon. gentleman that he is hardly fair to himself when he suggests that during the last few years an interprovincial conference might have been held at which these matters might have been disposed of. The right hon. gentleman was in power in prosperous times, when the difficulties of the great depression were not overhanging all government activities. Yet from 1921 to 1930 I find it difficult to discover anywhere in the record anything that would indicate that unity or unanimity was secured as between the provinces and the dominion with respect to any matters of this character. I am not unmindful of the fact that an interprovincial conference was held; I am not unmindful of the fact that it laboured for many days; I am not unmindful of the fact that the results were negligible.

I also have to remind this house that I have never thought it necessary that a long time should be taken in disposing of conferences. We called the conference to deal with the statute of Westminster, and let me remind this house that had that statute been passed in the terms suggested by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) it would have done violence to the rights of a part of this dominion. In consequence of the objection of the provinces, commencing with Ontario, at the conference of 1930 I asked that section 7, dealing with the Canadian situation, should be allowed to stand until I could send over a draft of the section. On my return to Canada a draft section was prepared in our office, with the assistance of others as well as of myself, and we called a conference. That conference met at ten o'clock in the morning. The next day the initials of every premier of Canada had been appended to the section in approval; in one case it was the representative of the premier, but that included the premiers of Quebec and Ontario. That was done in less than thirty-six hours. If you have prepared something; if you know what you want to do and have an opportunity for a frank and full discussion, there is no reason why it should not be done as it was on that occasion. At every conference we have held since 1930 we have had definite proposals to submit to the provinces when they attended. They have expressed their views and we have been prompt in signifying our approval or disapproval of their suggestions, and the conferences have terminated. Always they have sat just as long as it was desirable to sit in order to do the business. No purpose is ever served by having conferences last longer than is necessary to dispose of the business with which they have to deal.

May I further remind this house that the matter to which the right hon. gentleman referred, namely insurance, was a matter about which there had been grave differences of opinion. Following the Citizens Insurance Company and Parsons case back in the early days the privy council had determined by a long series of decisions that the business of insurance was under the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces. Yet three of the provinces at the conferences we held expressed not only their willingness but their desire that we should take over insurance from them, because they felt they had neither the machinery nor the revenues with which adequately to deal with the matter, having regard to the magnitude of the business itself. But the older provinces were not so inclined, with the result that the discussion did not bring about any fruitful result. Nor will such discussions bring about any fruitful result so long as the greater provinces, and particularly the largest of all, believe they have quite as much ability as we have and have the legislative competence to deal with insurance, and continue to do so.

I mention that in passing because there was also another matter under discussion, namely companies. We did agree, and I am happy to say that it was unanimous so far as the provinces and the dominion were concerned, that we should have a uniform Companies Act. But when it came down to terms there was such a difference of opinion that it was impossible to arrive at any uniform act which was acceptable to all.

With respect to other problems with which we had to deal we were able to arrive at conclusions very speedily. I do in all fairness submit to this house that if during these long years of toil and depression, where we have been able to bring about a measure of agreement with the provinces in connection with so vital a matter as the statute of Westminster and with respect to other matters with which we have had to deal, arising out of the depression, we are hardly censurable compared with those who had ten years or thereabouts to deal with these problems and bring about a solution of them by unanimous agreement with the provinces.

I might also say that when the case to which we have been referring this afternon with respect to hours of labour was argued before the Supreme Court of Canada the position taken by the province of Ontario was a very simple one. They said this:

> Edward Bayly, K.C., appearing for the Attorney General of Ontario, argued that the dominion parliament has exclusive power to sanction ratification of the draft convention of the international labour conference, and that if a draft convention is formally ratified, thereupon becoming binding upon the dominion, a further obligation will rest upon the dominion authorities to take whatever action is necessary to make its provisions effective. In the absence of ratification of the eight hour day convention by the federal authorities, it was contended on behalf of the province of Ontario that its subject matter is probably within provincial legislative control.

So that if we are to apportion blame on the basis of non-intervention by way of effective effort it will clearly appear that within the argument made by the province of Ontario before the Supreme Court of Canada the lack of attention was on the part of the federal government for not ratifying the convention and thereby making it a federal law. That in itself explains not only why it has not heretofore been regarded as a federal matter, but also why we are now seeking ratification before following it with a legislative enactment, notice of which appears on the order paper.

I do not propose to do more than make one observation with respect to one statement of the former Minister of Justice. I refer to the letter which I sent to the provinces last year. Of course he realized when he was reading it I was putting before the provinces the position which they had taken. We have had frequent discussions about this at various conferences, informally. I was surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman suggest that in any sense we were endeavouring to compel them to do anything. There were informal discussions with respect to the legislative capacity of the legislatures in connection with social matters as distinguished from the power of the parliament of Canada. Frequently that was the discussion in general terms. The letter which I sent out in August or the early part of September, 1934, to all the premiers was predicated upon putting before them the position which I understood they took and which I believe is really the position which many of them did take, although I do not think the province of Ontario did take it as strongly as has been suggested, namely that they claimed exclusive jurisdiction. It has always been a subject matter of discussion as to the terms on which they were willing to part with it—and I refer to old age pensions and matters of that kind. I was not endeavouring to express an opinion in that letter, because my opinions have never been expressed to them in those terms.

But there was another matter which arose. A conference was to be called. During my absence an effort to raise issues was made by the premier of Quebec, and again in an editorial in the Vancouver Sun; and at the meeting at which the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) accepted his nomination he said that we were going to endeavour to raise racial and religious issues at that conference. When I came back and asked the various premiers—I do not wonder the hon. gentleman smiles—whether they were prepared to meet in conference, one of them said he could not come before Christmas, and I advised by telegram every one of them, and made a statement in the press that such action had been taken. I would deprecate any effort to raise the issues mentioned in the editorial in the Vancouver Sun, or the warning given at his nomination convention by the hon. member for St. Boniface. I mention this in passing—

Mr. HOWDEN: I do not remember any such warning.

Mr. BENNETT: All he has to do is to read his speech when he accepted nomination, and if he will do that I will make it right for him in this house if he does not find that what I have said is correct.

To proceed further: There are three propositions I desire to make to this house. The first one is this, that on the issue as to the question which we now submit should be decided in the affirmative, as to the jurisdiction of this parliament, the Journal of Comparative Legislation and International Law of November, 1934 contains an article upon the constitutional capacity of Canada to give effect to an international labour conference. Mr. Jenks, in his article, refers to the observations of Mr. Justice, now Chief Justice Duff, in dealing with the question of jurisdiction. Mr. Justice Duff after dealing with article 405 made this reservation of some importance:

> No question is submitted as to the duty of the member arising under the succeeding clauses of the same article in the event of the competent authority or authorities giving its or their consent to the recommendation or draft convention; and upon this no opinion is expressed.

Mr. Jenks proceeded in his discussion to point out that no question was asked of the Supreme Court of Canada as to the competence of this parliament. He said:

> The direct question: "Is the dominion competent under any provision of the British North America Act to enact legislation giving effect to the convention?" was never properly before the court.

And it was not. Then arguments were lodged in favour of the dominion jurisdiction, and at one point, as an instance of the strange anomalies of life, the dominion joined with the province of Quebec and argued against its own jurisdiction. That is disclosed by the record.

I am not concerned about the arguments; I am not concerned about the theories; I am concerned only about one thing, namely the practical question. I think one can speak to it without any difficulty. I could not help but think in the Socratic method: as the hon. gentleman was arguing: Did the government sign on behalf of the British empire the treaty of peace? With the provisions with respect to labour that I urged this afternoon the answer to that must be yes. That is clear.

There is just one further point to which for some reason the hon. gentleman this afternoon would not refer. Article 405 in the treaty reads in part:

> In the case of a federal state, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

Therefore there was conferred upon the government of the day a discretion. That discretion the Liberal government exercised by making recommendations to the provinces and ultimately making a reference to the courts in which, as Mr. Jenks said, the direct question was never settled. This government proposes to exercise the discretion in the opposite sense. We propose to exercise a discretion by exercising our legislative powers and passing legislation after ratification of the convention. That is all there is to it.

I do not think that the problem of law is as obstructive and as difficult as might be suggested. The only reason I read from the judgment this afternoon was a very simple one, namely so that members of the House of Commons who are interested in reading these matters, and many of them are, might at least have before them the decisions of the court in that regard. They would have before them the statements made by the judges in arriving at their conclusion and the reasons which governed their action.

Now, Canada claims to be a nation; Canada signs conventions; Canada makes treaties. The ex-Minister of Justice, who spoke this afternoon, signed the Halibut treaty as a minister, and as the Minister of Justice for Canada. We have claimed, and rightly claimed, that under the powers conferred upon us we have become a nation. If we are a nation there must be somewhere in this national government—and I do not use the term "national government" in the sense in which it is sometimes used—in this national federal government there must be somewhere a power to speak for all the citizens of Canada. That being so, as Lord Sankey said, certainly no one province can do it. Certainly you cannot piece it together by saying that in the aggregate all the provinces can do it. But the body corporate, the entity, is the Dominion of Canada, and that dominion speaks through this parliament with respect to matters to which we have bound ourselves by our treaty obligations.

I submit with deference that the former Minister of Justice has confused the words "obligation" and "power". The question of power is the question of jurisdiction. The question of obligation is the acceptance of responsibility. The dominion does not accept the responsibility except through the execution of a treaty. If it accepts that responsibility in the exercise of a discretion then the power is conferred by section 132. When the obligation is accepted the power is conferred by that section 132. It is so simple. It is like an ordinary everyday agreement. If a man is willing to accept an obligation it follows that he has the power to do it, or the obligation should not be made.

Now the treaty of Versailles provides for two things: (a) the renunciation by taking action of a national obligation, or in the case of a discretion (b) the acceptance of the obligation If the nation accepts the obligation, then the power is found in section 132. Side by side with the responsibility marches the jurisdiction to exercise it. That jurisdiction may or may not be exercised, but there is the power to exercise it. During the last sixteen years this parliament was not asked to ratify the convention. It might have been; it was not. What was done was to pass an order in council dealing with part of it, and to refer to the terms of the peace treaty itself, in article 405, to what labour meant and to all that concerns its wellbeing; but every word and every line of that obligation is national in its character. It is not divided into nine parts. It does not concern nine provinces. It concerns them in the aggregate, and in the aggregate they become the Dominion of Canada, and therefore the obligation is national, and not provincial. The sum total of provincial obligations can never be exercised with respect to a national matter in connection with which the country as a whole has bound itself by treaty, by piecing together piecemeal the legislation of the provinces. It must be a national exercise of the power, and that can be done only by this parliament. That is the point I desire to make and which I think concludes the question that was raised by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Let me say this The hon. gentleman was somewhat cynical with respect to the conclusions at which lawyers arrive, and he was uncertain whether or not an opinion was held at this moment or at that moment. I do think it was unfair to suggest that a letter asking for a conference and dealing with the problems as put forward by the provinces, and what their attitude was, represented the attitude of the one who had extended the invitation. Obviously that can never be so. The subject matter of the discussion does not indicate the opinion of the person who extends the invitation. It would be ruinous to any conference if that were so; that is quite clear.

There is just this to be said. I did say that law was a progressive science in dealing with the construction of our constitution. I did not for one single moment mean, as was suggested, that opinions of lawyers differ merely because they happen to be different men. But the development of civilization broadened the attitude of mind towards judicial decisions, and I quoted from the language I think of Mr. Justice Wendell Holmes, who said that common law was based not on logic but on experience. The interpretation of statutes is still governed by the same general rules to-day as it was three hundred years ago; but the broadening of the attitude of mind and outlook in the light of present day civilization is well represented by the method in which this constitution of ours has been slowly evolved and developed.

I did say that I have arrived at a conclusion, which the hon. gentleman suggests is erroneous. I am always willing to say it may be, but as far as my mind is concerned I have no doubt, and I am just as apt to be right as the hon. gentleman. I had a very substantial experience in the practice of my profession and with respect to the framework of the constitution, if he will look at the law books he will find that the position I took was supported by the privy council in all cases in which I had the privilege of arguing before them. I can say that with some degree of confidence.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not in the Nadan case.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not arguing the Nadan case on that point at all. That was the dominion. I drafted the Alberta act, with the assistance of Mr. Farley, of Edmonton, and the attorney general of that province, when the question of its constitutionality came up in the Nadan case, entrusted me with the responsibility of defending my own statute. What happened was that the dominion intervened and claimed that there was no right of appeal to the privy council. I was acting for the province, to sustain the conviction which had confiscated a Cadillac car costing about five or six thousand dollars and likewise its cargo of liquor. In the event the privy council decided the conviction was valid, the car properly confiscated to the crown, and likewise the contents, which went to make happier the lives of some individuals. But so far as the constitutional point was concerned, that was settled by counsel representing the dominion. The present Lord Hailsham appeared for the attorney general of England. My memory is that the dominion was represented by Mr. Greene, although I am not quite certain as to that. Perhaps my hon. friend will remember.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I am sorry I do not.

Mr. BENNETT: At any rate I was appearing in the interests of the province of Alberta.

You have here, Mr. Speaker, a question of first importance. We are going to enact legislation based on the ratification of a treaty, of an agreement, of a convention, and that raises a single, simple question: Did Canada under the peace treaty assume obligations? If she did, was there a convention made pursuant to that? Did Canada ratify it? If she did, in my judgment, there is no power except the parliament of Canada to deal with the question with which we are concerned.

I think it is unfortunate that we should get into a discussion as to the attitude of this party or that, or of this member or that member, with respect to these matters in the past, except as one is compelled to make answer to observations made by those opposite. This is a problem partly legal, partly social, but in any event national; and if it is national, if there should be uniformity of law, as is agreed upon by all; if there should be no conflict between provinces with respect to the terms and conditions under which they prepare goods for export; if there should be uniformity in hours of toil and cessation from toil so that there will be equality as between the provinces when goods are sold on the markets of the world, and if there should not be a mad competition in invitations to induce manufacturers to set up their factories in this province or in that because in a particular province he may work his labour longer hours than in another—if that is wrong, as everyone agrees it must be, there is only one method by which it can be dealt with, and that is by uniformity of law. That uniformity cannot be secured by piecemeal legislation, to use the language of the books, by one province enacting an eight hour day law and another a nine hour day; by one province making limitations of this character and another of another. Rather there must be placed upon the statute books of our country a broadly conceived statute that will ensure uniformity and equality in the work with respect to the matters in which the workman is interested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What does the Prime Minister claim as regards the draft convention respecting hours? Does he claim equally with respect to all the other draft conventions?

Mr. BENNETT: I explained, without going into details this afternoon, that there are some of them that are so clearly not covered by the principles to which I referred that they might be regarded as purely provincial. And that was mentioned by Lord Sankey in the judgment I referred to this afternoon. I will say this, however, that each one of them, so far as we are concerned, will be dealt with on its merits as it arises. But what we are inviting this house to do is to enact legislation that will provide that a forty-eight hour law is valid in every province of confederation. I agree with what has been said, that conditions have greatly changed since 1919. Never were opportunities better to enact legislation than then. Never was the opportunity greater than at that time and following the war, during the period that my hon. friend was in office. Never, I say, was there a greater opportunity. Let us see what happened in relation to the so-called Lemieux Act. That act was passed and put on the statute books and remained there twenty odd years before it was attacked in the court. But I think it was the opinion of nine lawyers out of ten that it was invalid as it stood. At least, that was always the opinion whenever we had friendly discussions respecting the validity of statutes, and it was not until the Snider case was taken to the court of last resort that the matter was cleared up. It was suggested that we should refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. But what did the privy council say? The privy council has said that the opinion of the supreme court in the matter is no better than the opinion of the law officers of the crown; and Lord Loreburne said that an opinion should not be asked for because the thing to be determined is not the validity of a hypothetical question but the validity of a concrete statute that may be enacted by the legislature, whether it be parliament or the provincial legislature. That was dealt with at some length, and Lord Sankey took this view. He said, "We cannot be draughtsmen for the Dominion of Canada. We cannot have submitted to us the whole of a statute and be asked to say what is good and what is bad therein." And in any event, the view has been held that such an opinion is no better than that of the law officers of the crown, being advisory only. He points out, further, another reason which I think is so sound that merely to mention it carries the conviction necessary in the case. Other people are bound. This is an international obligation, and when other nations and other peoples are affected by advisory opinions and they are not before the court, it is inadvisable that such opinion be given, because it affects in any event only your own people and cannot be better, as has been said, than that of the law officers of the crown.

I was glad to hear the closing observations of the leader of the opposition that he proposed to support the passage of this resolution. One would hardly think, from the clamorous manner in which opposition was received by his adherents this afternoon, that they were anxious that anything should be passed emanating from this government. It is always one of the misfortunes of party strife that parties are unable to see that something may be beneficial to the country even though it emanates from Nazareth. The old cry, "Can any good come out of Nazareth?" was beautifully exemplified by what took place this afternoon—loud cheers and counter cheers when words were uttered against the efficiency of the legislation or the validity of the resolution—and then winding up with a magnificent display of rhetoric about undying devotion to a great cause, and the shortness of hours, so that one could hardly count the time between going to work and ceasing from work; and declaring, "We will support the measure with all our might."

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to authorize the Minister of Public Works, on behalf of His Majesty, to enter into an agreement with the corporation of the city of Ottawa to extend the period of the existing agreement with the corporation for one year from July 1, 1934.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

BAHAMAS AND LEEWARD ISLANDS—COLLECTION OF DUES TO APPLY TOWARDS MAINTENANCE BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT OF SHIPPING SAFEGUARDS

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for the collection by the dominion government of dues to be applied towards the maintenance of the lighthouses and buoy erected or placed by the British government on or near the coasts of the Bahamas and Leeward islands, from ships arriving at and departing from ports in Canada which derive benefits from the said lighthouses and buoy.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

HUDSON BAY ROUTE

MARINE INSURANCE RATES ON HULLS AND CARGOES OUT OF CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): I wish to ask the government a question based on the report of the imperial shipping committee for 1934, on the subject of marine insurance rates on hulls and cargoes out of the port of Churchill, Manitoba. On page 6, section 13 of this report there appears the following:

In our opinion, the evidence, which has now been accumulated by us and which has been published in our reports, tends strongly in the direction of the view that during the open season of navigation for a well-found vessel the risk of casualty is little, if any, greater on the Hudson bay route than on the voyage to Montreal by way of the St. Lawrence.

My question is this: What steps is this government taking to have these rates, which are now five times greater than those from Montreal out of Churchill, brought somewhere near a parity with those prevailing out of the port of Montreal?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman's question will remain as a notice. The fact is that the imperial shipping committee has been dealing with this matter under the chairmanship, I think, of Sir Halford Mackinder, who is thoroughly familiar with the question and made a report last year. The committee will make another report before navigation opens for 1935. The question, as the hon. gentleman put it, was as to what the results of the season's operations indicated with respect to casualties on the route, and the suggestion is that if there were no casualties then the rates should be revised downward. That is the position, but it will be looked into carefully and an answer given by the Minister of Marine.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

PRIVILEGE—MISS MACPHAIL

On the orders of the day:

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): I should like to offer an explanation of a statement made by me in the house on January 24, when we were discussing the resolution of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) with respect to the establishment of a federal health policy. In reply to the contention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, that the country was in the main well provided with hospitals, I said:

I know there are splendid hospitals and doctors and nurses, but what does that matter when the people cannot get into the hospital without guaranteeing payment, and when they have not the money to pay for care in the hospitals? In the city of Owen Sound people have actually been kept waiting on the steps of the hospital until the hospital authorities could be assured there was going to be full pay for their hospitalization. Everyone in this house knows of innumerable instances where people have not been able to secure hospital treatment or the care of a nurse in their own home simply because they could not afford to pay for it. There are hundreds and thousands of nurses out of work in Canada who would be only too glad to take care of the sick, as the sick would be only too glad to be taken care of. But there must be dollars to bridge the chasm between unemployed nurses and uncared for sick.

I believed that the statement made by me at that time was correct, but the name of the hospital was used inadvertently. I had not intended to use the name but I did believe that the statement I made was accurate. If I may be allowed to do so, I should like in support of the statement I made, to refer to the Public Hospitals Act, 1931, passed by the Ontario legislature, a copy of which I received this morning. I would refer to the provision contained in section 18, subsection 1, on page 7. I shall not read it. It is an amendment that was offered in 1933, which leads me to believe that there was difficulty as regards the admission of indigent patients without delay into hospitals. I had conversations with two reeves of rural municipalities last week end who said that until recently hospitals did communicate with either the clerk of the township or the reeve before admitting indigent patients into the hospitals with which those two reeves had to deal. Since that time however I received from the president of the General and Marine hospital board, Owen Sound, a letter, the tone of which I appreciate. He points out—and I want to put his statement on record—that my statement was unfair to the Owen Sound hospital. I am giving only two or three paragraphs which deal particularly with the matter. He said:

> This notice came to me as a shock that anyone could imagine such a thing could happen, or any person ever had to wait admission on account of funds. The first duty to patients entering the hospital is to take care of the sick; rich or poor are all treated alike; no patient delayed on account of funds.

This is his statement. I would not go so far as to say that rich and poor are treated alike, but I am reading the statement he made. The next paragraph reads:

> There is a necessary chart to fill out when entering, which can be done by relatives or friends if not at patient's bedside. In this chart the question of payment is asked, but all are treated alike.
> I can say to you that in my experience of fifteen years as president of the Owen Sound General and Marine hospital and some years before that as member of the trustee board, I have never known of any patient being delayed in entering the hospital on account of funds. Many cases have been entered when we knew the prospects of payment were not good, also foreigners from whom we had no chance of collecting.

I said that that would be all, but there is really one other paragraph which should go on record. It is as follows:

> This hospital is rated as an A-1 standard hospital, a rating that we jealously guard, and if anything happened as stated above we would lose the high standing that we now enjoy.

The letter is signed: J. R. McLinden, president. I want to be fair to the Owen Sound hospital and state that I do regret, and that I did regret the moment after I finished speaking, not having verified the statement which I used at the time and which I then believed to be correct.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. HOWDEN

On the orders of the day.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Before the orders of the day are called, may I say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in discussing the resolution before the house a few moments ago intimated that on the occasion of my nomination I had referred to a provincial conference that was sitting at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. Look and see what I said.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He did not speak about the hon. member at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I did.

Mr. HOWDEN: I understand that I am accused of having made remarks tending to arouse racial prejudice.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. HOWDEN: I caught just the tail end of the remarks, but I believe that was the gist of it. So far as my last nomination is concerned, it was an acclamation and my speech was exceedingly brief and merely one of appreciation of the nomination. I have a very clear and definite recollection of the speech that I made at the convention of 1930, and I believe I am justified in giving an unqualified denial to any statement that I raised racial prejudice at that time or at any time. I represent a constituency where French Roman Catholics and English Protestants are well represented—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member has quite covered the point of order. As a matter of fact he should state the words of which he complains and then argue the point of order, but he does not seem to be very clear on that point.

Mr. HOWDEN: I have not the printed text before me and am speaking from memory, but since I am not going to be allowed to speak, then I desire to give an unqualified denial to the statement of the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that I would look up the newspaper and read to this chamber the report of the speech made by the hon. gentleman in which he warned his constituents of certain possible results that might come to them.

Mr. DUPUIS: But the right hon. gentleman is not allowed to read newspapers, and the hon member may have been misquoted.

Mr. HOWDEN: The Prime Minister may read a report of a speech from a newspaper, but I insist that in all my career I made no such remarks in any speech.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I stated yesterday that we would endeavour to take the order dealing with unemployment insurance. I am prepared to proceed with it but I cannot complete the second reading in the time available. I said that we would then take supply. We are prepared to take a few items in supply in the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All right; take supply.

SUPPLY

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Employers' liability compensation, $40,000.

Mr. GRAY: Will the minister explain this item?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): It has been the custom for a number of years for the dominion to become responsible for workmen's compensation claims if pensioners in receipt of a pension of twenty-five per cent or over are employed. One can easily see that it might be possible that such workmen might be more liable to accident on account of being incapacitated to the extent of twenty-five per cent by war disability, and therefore it has been the custom for a number of years for the federal government to be responsible for such workmen's compensation.

Mr. GRAY: How much was claimed by way of compensation during the year 1934?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Prior to December 31, 1934, there were twenty-seven claims in Alberta totalling approximately $4,000; one in British Columbia, approximately $100; thirty-eight in Manitoba, approximately $1,670; one in Nova Scotia, $100; seventy in Ontario, $5,300; nine in Saskatchewan, $201 and five in Quebec, $2,388.

Item agreed to.

Sheltered employment, $50,000.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This is in connection with the vetcraft shops. We maintain at Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and Victoria, what are called vetcraft shops. They were started after the war, with the idea of giving sheltered employment to soldiers who were not able to hold their place on the open labour market. It is not being followed quite as much now as in those days, but still we have the shops in those five cities. Of course they are not self supporting. They manufacture certain articles very well indeed, but their rate of production is not equal to that of men who are one hundred per cent efficient. This is to make up the loss on those shops.

Mr. HOWDEN: Are these men able to earn anything at all from what they produce?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Oh, yes. The proceeds from sale of products that they made last year amounted to $118,004. Since I have been in the department I went through the vetcraft shop at Montreal and was quite favourably impressed with the way they were getting on. In that shop there were about 28 men working, and they seemed happy. I looked over the goods, talked with their sales agent, and it seemed to me it was being operated very efficiently.

[Mr. Gray.]

Mr. HOWDEN: The reason I asked is that we had one of these shops in Winnipeg. Unfortunately it was burned down two or three years ago, by accident no doubt, and I think some thirty men were thrown out of employment. Although many appeals were made to the government to reestablish this shop, they did not succeed. Is it the policy of the government to continue these shops, and if so, is there any possibility of re-establishing the shop we had in Winnipeg?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, I do not think it is the policy to start any new shops. It is not an efficient operation, but it does give employment to a number of these men. But it is my judgment, and that of the department, that no additional shops should be established.

Mr. HOWDEN: Do I understand that any shops that might by accident be destroyed will be discontinued?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I could not give a definite answer to a hypothetical case. I hope nothing will happen; if it should, it would have to be considered on its merits.

Mr. HOWDEN: It is not fair to these men in Winnipeg. I understand they were doing very well and turning out excellent goods. The building was destroyed by fire one night, and all attempts to have it reestablished have failed. I appeal to the minister to give the matter consideration, even at this late date, and if possible to do something for these men.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. SANDERSON: What is the total number employed in these shops?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: On December 31 last there were 10 at Halifax, 20 at Montreal, 47 at Toronto, 17 at Hamilton and 28 at Victoria, British Columbia.

Mr. SANDERSON: There is no shop at London?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No.

Mr. SANDERSON: Was there not a shop there at one time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Not in my day.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What kind of men are employed in these shops? Are they partially disabled?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Oh yes, they are all pensioners with twenty-five or thirty per cent disability, and as a rule men who have lost a good deal of their vim and energy; although in some cases when they get the chance to work without being pressed as they would be in ordinary commercial life they get along fairly well. Many of them are able finally to get out and take their places in industry.

Mr. GRAY: How does a veteran obtain employment in the vetcraft shops?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Our officials in these centres throughout Canada are in close touch with the returned soldiers; for instance men seeking relief or in need of medical attention on account of their pension disability come into the office. There are not many vacancies, but when one occurs whoever is in charge of the vetcraft shop intimates the fact to our official; he keeps his eye open and recommends a suitable man whom that occupation would help; and the man is taken on.

Mr. GRAY: Does the minister think the work might be extended in order to include unemployed veterans?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not think it will. It filled quite a gap in the years after the war, but it is not an economical undertaking.

Mr. DUPUIS: I received this morning a letter from a war veteran at Coronach, Saskatchewan. He had about 800 acres of land in the drought area, I understand, and he is completely ruined. He has four children, and, having been one of my schoolmates at Normal school in Montreal years ago, and hearing that I was a member of parliament, he wrote and begged me to try to obtain something for his family. I frankly admit that I should have seen the minister, but as the case might be general enough to deserve a public answer I thought it appropriate to put it before him now. This man has nothing except $48 a month pension. He said he borrowed three or four thousand dollars to buy what he needed, and his crop last year was absolutely nothing. I am sure that the minister will give me the proper information which I can send to him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: What I suggest in a case like that is that the hon. member come down to the department and see me, and I will put him in touch with the proper official. It is hard to make a statement here on an individual case. There are many of these cases in respect to which some suggestion may be made to help. If the hon. member would see me it would be much the better plan.

Mr. DUPUIS: I shall excuse myself again; I knew this answer would be given. But these veterans were allowed after the war to go farming if they were able to do so, and hundreds of them went on the land; I thought there must be many cases like this one.

Mr. BENNETT: Not with 800 acres.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is the administration of the vetcraft shops directly under the department, or under the civil service commission?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is directly under the department.

Mr. McINTOSH: When did these shops commence operation—immediately after the war?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes.

Mr. McINTOSH: What has been the amount spent under this item since the commencement, as compared with the item we have to-night?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: For the years for which I have the figures, they are as follows:

1930-31	$95,056
1931-32	23,000
1932-33	6,000
1933-34	16,000

Item agreed to.

Grant to Last Post fund, $60,000.

Mr. GRAY: I note an increase in this item. I presume that is due to the fact that many of the veterans who are unemployed are dying without resources. The minister might explain what call is being made upon this fund. I think we are all heartily in accord with the vote, and we are sorry to see the necessity for an increase.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: That is the case; it is necessary to ask for an increased appropriation this year because of the number of burials expected, which it is estimated will number about 621.

Item agreed to.

Pension appeal court, $19,800.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would ask the minister to let this item stand.

Item stands.

War veterans' allowance committee, $14,400.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: This is merely the salaries.

Item agreed to.

National health: the administration of the acts respecting food and drugs, opium and narcotic drugs and proprietary or patent medicines, including the laboratory of hygiene, $130,000.

Mr. HOWDEN: I would like this item to stand. It is a large item, and I am not prepared to discuss it to-night.

Item stands.

Pensions payable to men on active service, Northwest rebellion, 1885, and general pensions, and civil flying $21,000.

Mr. GRAY: Would the minister give the number of men receiving pensions in the various branches?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At the present time there are 46 pensioners and six dependents receiving pensions under this vote.

Mr. GRAY: How are they divided?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There are twenty-four pensioners in regard to the Northwest rebellion, 21 privates, one sergeant, one warrant officer and one lieutenant. There are 21 general pensioners. These are made up of men belonging to the permanent force who were in receipt of pensions before the great war, men who were hurt in militia camps or in some other way. They are still being paid pensions, some of them under this heading.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and National Health: salaries, $149,390; contingencies, $30,300.

Mr. GRAY: Would the minister explain the increase?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The increase comes about in this way: There are three employees, one clerk grade 4, one clerk grade 3 and one stenographer grade 2, who formerly were paid out of the salary vote which we have not yet touched. Their work is more on the health side, and they are being transferred to this vote. Their salaries total $4,740. Offsetting that there are three positions that were provided for in last year's estimates which are not provided for this year. Those salaries total about $3,600, leaving a net increase of $2,150.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the minister for a little more detailed information. Just what officials come under this vote?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Just the officials in the health department who have to do with the administration of the Pure Food and Drugs Act, the Proprietary and Patent Medicine Act, the Quarantine and Leprosy acts, the Immigration Act, and a small number under the Sanitary Engineering Act. None of the officials having to do with pensions are under this vote.

Mr. GRAY: Do we still maintain medical officers at European ports in connection with immigration?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Yes, we have some, but they do not come under this vote. They come under the vote that was allowed to stand.

Mr. GRAY: They do not come under this item?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Not those in Europe.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 11, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1934.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. MacINNIS: The purpose of this amendment is to extend the privilege of voting by absentee ballot to the men in the unemployment relief camps on the same conditions granted in the case of other occupations enumerated in the act. The only change proposed is the addition of a definition of "unemployment relief camp worker," and the insertion of the words "unemployment relief camp workers" in section 2 of subsection 99.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

Some hon. MEMBERS: explain.

Mr. REID: The purpose of the bill which I am asking leave of the house to introduce is to prohibit the catching of salmon by the use of purse-seines in the waters adjacent to the mouth of the Fraser river, with the object of preventing the further depletion and destruction of the great salmon fishing industry in that river, and also to protect the livelihood of thousands of gill-net fishermen.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ELECTRICITY INSPECTION ACT

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the Electricity Inspection Act, 1928 (French version).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The proposed amendment is merely to correct a clerical error in the act as it now stands. On the translation of the act from English into French certain words were inadvertently omitted, and the amendment is to insert those words in the French version.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I desire to point out that on Friday last I directed attention to the fact that the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) had given certain warnings at his nomination convention. I did that on the strength of a statement that said the warning was given and indicated that he had used the language at his nomination meeting. I have since investigated the matter with great care, and I find that the Winnipeg Free Press of October 22, and the Winnipeg Tribune of the same day, make reference to his nomination. It was incorrect for me to say that the hon. member for St. Boniface had made the statement in question. It was made by the president of the Liberal Association of Manitoba. I quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of October 22:

> John Caswell Davis, president of the Manitoba Liberal Association, warned that the Conservatives probably would introduce a "false issue" into the campaign to separate the people of the dominion on a racial and nationality basis.

That is all that is said. The report in the Tribune is this:

> Referring to the Stevens commission, J. C. Davis, president of the Provincial Liberal Association, stated that, so far, only "hand-picked" concerns had been investigated. The "big fellows" were still untouched. He also warned the electors against possible attempts on the part of the Conservative government to so juggle amendments to the British North America Act as to stir up racial feeling.

I express my very sincere regrets that I did an injustice to the hon. gentleman on Friday last when, in consequence of the dispatch to which I had reference—which was neither one of these—not mentioning who was responsible for the statement, I attributed the statement to him. That was an error and I offer him my apologies for having done so. But the statements in question were made by the president of the Liberal association in the province of Manitoba, who was speaking presumably in the presence of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I have nothing to say in the matter, and I appreciate the Prime Minister's action in this regard.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COMMITTEE

Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Is the international wheat committee, or the continuing subcommittee thereof, still functioning?
2. If so, in what direction?
3. Has the attention of the government been directed to a statement made on page one of a monthly review of the wheat situation, issued on the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, under date of January 23, 1935, which reads as follows: "Stocks of wheat in Canada continue at a higher level than a year ago. On January 11, 1935, the Canadian visible supply amounted to 257,000,000 bushels as compared with 237,000,000 on the same date a year ago"?
4. If so, what is the government's policy in relation thereto?

Mr. BENNETT: I may say to the hon. gentleman, who is an experienced parliamentarian, that part of his question it would be difficult to answer, while part of it is improperly on the order paper. The answer to the first is, yes. The answer to the second would be, in the direction of success. The answer to the third would be, yes; and the answer to the fourth is that the question should not be on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: As to the first three, answered; as to the fourth, dropped.

FREDERICTON, N.B., POST OFFICE

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. What was the total cost of painting and other repairs of the post office at Fredericton, New Brunswick, from January 1, 1934, to January 1, 1935?
2. Was the work for painting and carpentry done by contract or day's work? If by contract, who was, or were, the contractor or contractors? If done by day's work, who was the supervisor, and what rate of wages were paid to men employed on such work?

Mr. STEWART: Leeds):

1. $1,652.

2. For the following items local tenders were invited and lowest accepted as follows: painting, Jas. Coy, $1,175; repairs, Jas. Coy, $165; electrical work, R. L. Hazlett, $104.50. For small emergency items amounting to $207.50 the district resident architect who supervised the work had different firms in Fredericton do the work and render accounts for same. No information re wages paid.

FIRE INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. COOTE:

1. In the case of fire insurance companies holding Dominion licences, what was the total of the net amount received for premiums during the years 1919 to 1933, inclusive?

2. What was the net amount paid for losses during said years?

3. How many fire insurance companies operated under Dominion licences in 1933?

Mr. RHODES:

Answer 1 and 2: Fire Insurance in Canada

Year	*Net premiums written	Net losses incurred
1919	$40,031,474	$16,679,355
1920	50,527,937	21,935,387
1921	47,312,564	27,572,560
1922	48,168,310	32,848,021
1923	51,169,250	32,142,491
1924	49,833,718	29,186,904
1925	51,040,075	26,943,089
1926	52,595,923	25,705,975
1927	51,375,637	20,831,931
1928	54,826,851	25,544,664
1929	56,112,457	30,209,839
1930	52,646,520	30,427,968
1931	50,342,669	29,938,409
1932	46,911,929	30,068,923
1933	41,573,986	21,655,460
	$744,469,300	$401,690,976

*After deducting all reinsurance premiums in the case of Canadian companies and all reinsurance premiums paid to licensed companies in the case of British and foreign companies.

Note.—For the years 1919 and 1920 the figures shown represent net cash received for premiums and net losses paid.

3. 240 companies.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

Mr. LAFLECHE:

1. How many farmers from the county of Richmond-Wolfe have made application in connection with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act?

2. How many of those cases have been settled to date?

Mr. RHODES:

1. In the province of Quebec official receivers are appointed for judicial districts. The county of Richmond-Wolfe is in the judicial district of St. Francis. As reported to the end of December there were 485 interviews by official receivers in the judicial district of St. Francis.

2. The number of settlements reported by the official receivers in the judicial district of St. Francis is 27, but in the great majority of cases proceedings are still pending.

PROVINCIAL DEBTS

Mr. EULER:

What is the amount of the debt of each of the western provinces to the federal government?

Mr. RHODES:

Debts of each of the western provinces to the dominion government February 7, 1935
(Department of Finance)

	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta	British Columbia
Loans under relief acts	$12,433,629	$36,864,254	$11,977,000	$14,514,234
Treasury bill re overpayment subsidy	....	....	468,750	....
Housing loans	1,095,000	....	....	1,701,500
	$13,528,629	$36,864,254	$12,445,750	$16,215,734

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. DUFF:

1. How many applications for loans under the Farm Loan Act were made by farmers in the province of Nova Scotia during each of the fiscal years 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934?

2. How many of said applications were granted during each of the said years?

3. What was the total amount of loans asked for during each of the years 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934, in Nova Scotia?

4. What was the total amount of loans made in Nova Scotia during the years 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934?

Mr. RHODES:

1, 2, 3 and 4.

Nova Scotia

Year ending March 31	Applications received	Amount of loans applied for	Loans granted No.	Loans granted Amount
1930	242	$516,095	95	$154,900
1931	140	291,505	43	68,100
1932	132	261,230	36	55,100
1933	115	193,150	33	36,200
1934	87	125,355	9	14,700
	716	$1,387,335	216	$329,000

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. How many applications for loans were received under the Canadian Farm Loan Act in Skeena riding, British Columbia, during the years 1930 to 1934, inclusive?
2. How many loans were granted in the said riding during each of the above years?
3. What are the names and addresses of those to whom loans were made, and what amount in each case?
4. What are the names, addresses, positions and salaries of the present officials connected with the said act in the Skeena riding?

Mr. RHODES:

1 and 2. The records of the Canadian farm loan board are not kept by constituencies and the information asked for is, therefore, not available.

3. Transactions between the board and borrowers are regarded as confidential and it is not considered in the public interests that information revealing the names of persons who have obtained loans should be given.

4. None resident in Skeena riding.

MACPHERSON WHARF, P.E.I.

Mr. MacLEAN:

1. Was MacPherson wharf, in King's county, Prince Edward Island, repaired in 1934?
2. If so, how much money was spent on this wharf?
3. How much money was paid out in wages?
4. How much per day did the foreman receive?
5. How much per day did the average labourer receive?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes (MacPherson's Cove wharf).
2. $3,364.16.
3. $1,498.46.
4. 60 cents per hour.
5. 30 cents per hour.

EMERY FLEURY

Mr. DUBOIS:

1. Is one Emery Fleury, of Saint-Leonard, Nicolet county, employed in the Department of Agriculture?
2. If so, what are his duties?
3. What is his salary?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. Yes.
2. Record of performance inspector for dairy cattle.
3. $1,134 per annum.

AGRICULTURAL LOANS IN QUEBEC

Mr. TETREAULT:

1. How many applications were made in the province of Quebec for agricultural loans, from 1927 to 1930?
2. How many of these loans were granted?
3. What was the total amount of these application for loans?
4. How many of these farms have been taken over by the farm loan board, from 1927 to 1931?
5. What is the amount of arrears, capital and interest to date in connection with farm loans made in the province of Quebec?

Mr. RHODES:

1. From inception of operations in Quebec in 1929 to March 31, 1930, a total of 1,865 applications.
2. 350.
3. $5,738,990.
4. To March 31, 1931, none.
5. As at close of last fiscal year, March 31, 1934, principal arrears $52,963.84, interest arrears $107,568.95.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What was the number of delegates of the several nations, present at the fifteenth assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva in the month of September, 1934?

2. Which members of the other delegations did the Canadian delegates meet officially?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Fifty-four members of the league were represented throughout the fifteenth assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva in September, 1934; the number of delegates from these states was 140. Two other states were admitted towards the close of the assembly.

2. Such members as participated in the work of the several committees.

IMMIGRATION 1930-1933

Mr. BRADETTE:

1. What was the total number of immigrants that came into Canada from every country of the world during the years 1930, 1931, 1932 and 1933, respectively?

2. What number from each country?

Mr. GORDON:

1. 1930, 104,806; 1931, 27,530; 1932, 20,591; 1933, 14,382.

2. Statement follows:

CHAPEL POINT, P.E.I. WHARF

Mr. MacLEAN:

1. Was Chapel wharf, in King's county, Prince Edward Island, repaired in 1934?
2. If so, how much money was spent on this wharf?
3. How much money was paid out in wages?
4. How much per day did the foreman receive?
5. How much per day did the average labourer receive?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes (Chapel Point wharf).
2. $2,978.66.
3. $1,264.55.
4. 60 cents per hour.
5. 30 cents per hour.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DEBT ADJUSTMENTS

Mr. REID:

1. How many requests have been made for debt adjustments or compromises in the province of British Columbia since July, 1934, to the end of 1934, under the act to facilitate compromises between farmers and their creditors?
2. How many were adjusted during the same period?
3. How many requests have been made for debt adjustments or compromises, under the above act, to the official at New Westminster, British Columbia, up to the end of 1934?
4. How many adjustments have been made during the same period?
5. What was the total amount of the debts of those applying, in British Columbia, for adjustment under the act, up to the end of the year 1934?
6. What were the total reductions made in the compromises which have been effected during the same period both in the province and in the district of Westminster?

Mr. RHODES: Return tabled herewith.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. ROBERGE:

During the years 1933 and 1934, what sum has the federal government paid for direct relief, without the provinces or the municipalities having been called upon to contribute, to the following provinces: (a) Ontario; (b) Manitoba; (c) Saskatchewan; (d) Alberta; (e) the Yukon Territory; (f) New Brunswick; (g) Nova Scotia; (h) Prince Edward Island; (i) Quebec?

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

Mr. MacLEAN:

1. Who has been appointed as official receiver in each county in Prince Edward Island under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and what salary does each receive?
2. Do any of those so appointed hold any other office under the dominion or provincial governments? If so, what office and what salary is attached to it?
3. Who has been appointed registrar under this act for Prince Edward Island and what salary does he receive?
4. Has a provincial board of review been appointed under this act for Prince Edward Island? If so, what are the names of the chief and other two commissioners, showing the salary each of them receive and indicating the one who represents the creditors and the one representing the debtors?

Mr. RHODES: Return tabled herewith.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TRANSLATORS' SALARIES

Mr. BRADETTE (for Mr. Perras):

For a statement showing all salaries of the 91 translators who, according to the explanatory notes to Bill No. 4 (an act respecting the Bureau for Translations passed by the House of Commons, May 28, 1934), receive the aggregate sum of $252,000 annually, as on January, 1934.

REPORTS TABLED SINCE OPENING OF SESSION

Mr. BRADETTE (for Mr. Perras):

For a list of all reports published in English and tabled in the House of Commons since the opening of the present session, and also for a list of all reports published in French and tabled in the House of Commons since the opening of the present session, with the date on which each of such reports was tabled.

GREEN RIVER—RIVIÈRE VERTE STATION, N.B. MAIL SERVICE

Mr. MICHAUD:

For a copy of all documents, letters and telegrams, exchanged between the Post Office Department and any other person or persons, from June 1, 1933, to February 1, 1935, relating to the carrying of the mail between Green River post office and Rivière Verte station in the county of Madawaska, in the province of New Brunswick.

ST. JOHN RIVER INTERNATIONAL BRIDGE PAINTING

Mr. MICHAUD:

For a copy of all documents, letters and telegrams, exchanged between the Department of Public Works and any person or persons from June 1, 1934, to February 1, 1935, relating to the painting of the International bridge on the St. John river, between Madawaska, Maine, and Edmundston, New Brunswick.

ROTHESAY, N.B. MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. MICHAUD:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, exchanged from June 1, 1933, to January 31, 1935, between the Post Office Department and all other persons, relating to the contract for the carrying of mails between post office Rothesay, New Brunswick, and the railway station.

MARKETING ACT

Mr. MacLEAN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents that have passed between the government of Canada or the central board appointed under the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, and any person or persons, provincial governments or incorporated companies, asking for or relating to a scheme for the marketing of potatoes from or in the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and/or Ontario, under the Natural Products Marketing Act, since the passing of the said act to date.

C. STANLEY VAN ALSTYNE

Mr. CAMPBELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the government, regarding the discharge of C. Stanley Van Alstyne from the penitentiary at Portsmouth, Ontario, during the years 1933 and 1934.

PETITE RIVIÈRE AU RENARD, QUE.—WHARF

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of the paylist in connection with the works at the wharf of La Petite Rivière au Renard, county of Gaspé, during the year 1931-32.

COULOMBE, DORCHESTER, QUE. POST OFFICE

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports in the hands of the government, concerning the change of the postmaster at Coulombe, Dorchester county, since August, 1930.

ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 463

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of order in council (P.C. 463), dated February 27, 1931.

PUBLIC WORKS CONSTRUCTION ACT

Mr. MICHAUD:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents, exchanged between the dominion government or any member or any department thereof and all other persons relating to the following items of schedule "A", chapter 59, 24-25 George V, the Public Works Construction Act: item 19, Campbellton, New Brunswick, wharf repairs; item 32, Dalhousie, New Brunswick, post office; item 41, Escuminac, New Brunswick, breakwater extension; item 49, Fredericton experimental farm, New Brunswick, new dormitory; item 75, harbours and rivers (New Brunswick only); item 98, Moncton, New Brunswick, public building.

Mr. BENNETT: It is this motion that I asked a few days ago to have stand until the hon gentleman who makes the motion was in his seat. He is asking for the typewriting of almost, I should say, several thousand documents. In every department of the public service various people have written to the ministers in connection with matters of this kind. The minister informs me that the files in his department are available to the hon. member if he desires to see them at any time, but that to take time to copy all the items involved in the words "and other documents, exchanged between the dominion government or any member or any department thereof and all other persons" would be to prepare a very, very voluminous return, and cause a very great deal of labour. If the hon. member desires to see the files they are available for him.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am glad to accept the suggestion of the Prime Minister, and shall be satisfied if I am allowed to inspect the files of the department at any time I suggest, regarding the correspondence only.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion might stand.

Mr. BENNETT: No, he accepts that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

PEACE RIVER OUTLET

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAY FROM DISTRICT TO PACIFIC COAST

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I introduced a similar resolution on the last day of February, last session. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) at that time moved an amendment to the resolution making it read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the Peace River country should be connected by a direct outlet to the Pacific coast when circumstances permit.

He commented as follows:

This amendment is not moved with any desire of blocking the resolution, but rather to call attention to the necessities of the present financial situation. . . . I suggest therefore that the hon. gentleman accept the amendment on the understanding that it means exactly what it says; that when circumstances permit, which we trust will be in the very near future, every consideration will be given this project.

Throughout the year we have had I believe a very general improvement in Canada, in Great Britain, in other countries of the empire and also in the United States. It is only a few months ago that in the United States the recovery program was endorsed by an overwhelming majority, showing, I think, that in the opinion of the vast majority there had been a distinct improvement in that country. A few days ago I read in the press a statement coming apparently from the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin in which he was reported to have said that Britain was leading the world in recovery. Of course we had the radio addresses of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett) assuring us that the ship of state was well through the storm and that the time for definite action toward permanent reform had come. There is no doubt that anyone who is conversant with price levels, farm prices, railway freight conditions, railway earnings and even I think unemployment figures, will concede, whatever opinions he may have about the system under which we are living, that there has been a very definite improvement in the last twelve months.

I want to say a word about the form of my resolution. I have always introduced this resolution in pretty much the form in which I am introducing it to-day, but the Peace River railway problem is not merely one of an outlet; it is an outlet with the necessary connections within the country itself. It is a problem comprising some mileage that might be considered main line and a large percentage of branch lines that will serve local territory throughout the Peace River country. Sir Henry Thornton appearing before the Duff commission in 1931-32 made the statement that in his opinion that commission was appointed about thirty years too late; in other words it was appointed to try to straighten up certain troubles that had developed in connection with the railways of this country instead of having been appointed thirty years ago when it might have prevented a number of these troubles from developing. The Peace River did have its investigation at the beginning of the thirty years and not at the end, and in 1927 a very complete survey of the Peace River country as a whole was made with reference to the 10,000,000 acres suitable for settlement and readily available. I think it may be said that the plan was studied with a view to serving that whole territory, gradually building up the railway system and providing ultimately for over 1,000 miles of railway without one mile of duplication. We have railway unification in the Peace River because the Peace River railways are to-day jointly owned, so I do not think it can be said that we are going to have any troubles from duplication such as exists in the rest of Canada.

Whenever we speak about railway development the natural tendency seems to be to bring up this question of the railway problem. What is the railway problem of Canada? It has been exhaustively studied by commission after commission and by railway experts, but I do not think that anywhere has it been suggested that either in the interests of the railways themselves or in the interest of the country generally branch lines properly laid out are anything but an asset. So I am going to argue that branch lines, or any railway that may serve local territory suitable for settlement and already settled, cannot be any part of Canada's railway problem. In the Drayton-Acworth report of 1917, in section 7 of the summary of conclusions and recommendations, I find the following:

> The development of Canada justified two transcontinental lines. It did not justify three. The Grand Trunk and Canadian Northern should have been amalgamated.

There is no suggestion throughout the Drayton-Acworth report that branch lines properly built and properly located had anything to do with creating the railway problem of Canada.

Then we have the Duff commission report, which goes into this matter somewhat extensively and from which I wish to make a few quotations. At page 41, dealing with the duplication of railway mileage it says:

> The duplication of railway mileage in Canada is of two general types:—
> (a) the lines of railway constructed by various owners, which lines, when they came under common ownership and operation, were found to a considerable extent to be duplicative of one another;
>
> (b) the directly competitive sections of the two principal systems which, because of unwise rivalry and lack of cooperative spirit, were separately constructed, whereas joint construction and operation, or agreement as to running rights over lines already constructed, would have served all necessary requirements and prevented much waste of public and private funds. Related to this group are lines which are functionally duplicate although not located in the same territory.
> These problems relate to both branch and trunk lines. Of the lines in group (a) it has been possible, since the consolidation of the Canadian National system in 1923, to eliminate a certain amount of duplicate mileage.

It then refers to the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk between Edmonton and Red Pass Junction and between Napanee and Toronto. Then it continues:

> The principal duplications of type (b) involve main line mileage of considerable length, with long-established services.

On page 19 we find this statement:

> An outstanding feature of this large expenditure is the amount spent on branch lines.

The two railways expended, during the nine year period, $162,451,546 in the construction and acquisition of branch lines totalling 5,018·60 miles. A policy of cooperation would have avoided a considerable part of this expenditure, probably one-third. This mileage is equivalent to the provision of a line of railway extending from Halifax to Vancouver and back again to the Manitoba boundary.

Then on page 21 it is said:

On behalf of the Canadian Pacific it was stated that the company had been forced to anticipate the building of branch lines, the construction of which might have been deferred without injury to the public, and that protective lines had had to be projected under a threat of invasion by the Canadian National.

The Canadian National stated that to refrain from branch line construction would result in the system being deprived of any opportunity for reasonable and proper development. Strategic territories, contiguous to their main lines, would be entered by their rival and, while admitting that they entered upon the construction of lines not immediately required, they defended this policy on the ground that to open up new territory in anticipation of settlement and immigration, and to maintain the company's relative position with regard to the rival transport enterprise, was in the long run justified.

The only criticism is with regard to duplication; duplication of branch lines and duplication of main lines, both in the Drayton-Acworth report of 1917 and the Duff commission report of 1932.

I have before me two speeches made by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Mr. E. W. Beatty. In the speech made in Toronto on January 16, 1933, he said:

Canada has a population of about ten million people. It has approximately 42,000 miles of railway, or 236 people per mile of railway. In other words, it has fewer people per mile of railway than any other civilized country. It has several thousands of miles paralleled by other miles, serving the same territory and reaching the same terminals. This constitutes our greatest individual item of waste. Why should we maintain something we do not require and maintain it at tremendous loss, and can we afford to do so?

The point in all these statements is parallel lines; two railways being built where only one was required created the problem. I argue that inasmuch as in the Peace River country the projected lines have been located so that such a situation cannot arise, railway construction there should not be held up because of any recommendation that has ever been made to the House of Commons so far as I can see by any authority competent to speak on the matter. I am willing to admit that Mr. Loree did say something about lines having light traffic, but anyone who understands the railway situation in Canada knows that branch lines on the frontier are as necessary to main lines as are the branches or roots to the trunk of the tree. They act as feeders, without them the main lines would not have the traffic necessary to make them profitable. Mr. Beatty said in respect to branch lines that they are an asset to the railway as well as to the country, railway construction must proceed if a new country is to develop and progress. The only essential is to keep that construction within reasonable bounds, which are governed by economic principles and the application of intelligence.

I think I have made that point clear enough. One cannot study the history of railway development in Canada without being struck by the tremendous swing from increasing mileage by thousands of miles annually down to practically nothing. I have before me a statement showing the number of miles of new construction coming into operation each year since 1900. I see that in 1922 we had 3 miles, in 1915, we had 4,783 miles. The average for the thirty-four years from 1930 to 1933 was about 750 a year. It was true that the vast mileages built in one year were in what has been called periods of prosperity. But I think that railway construction, the investment of new capital, was a cause as well as a result of prosperity. It is very difficult to unscramble cause and effect in a matter of that kind.

When the depression struck Canada—and I am now coming to part of the financial side of my argument—the first reaction of governments and businesses everywhere was to economize by cutting out capital expenditure, but we very soon found out that this kind of economy was creating about as many problems as it was getting us away from. People refused to invest money; government estimates were cut down; public works were not proceeded with. These were all temporary expedients, but there is not a government in Canada that has not been forced to review the problem in an altogether different way. In 1930 in this parliament we had a vote of $20,000,000 to provide for unemployment relief. Since that time I believe the government of this country has provided for the same purpose something like $111,000,000. Last year in this house we passed a bill providing $40,000,000 for the construction of public buildings. Within the last few days the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) introduced a resolution advocating a housing program in Canada, and I think the statement made by the Prime Minister in connection with that debate was very significant. The right hon. gentleman said that the purpose of a good deal of this sort of legislation was primarily to provide employment, and that the secondary effect would be to create other employment throughout the country.

In introducing this resolution this afternoon I want to say that in my judgment it can be viewed from the standpoint of the relief of unemployment and the provision of housing accommodation in the pioneer settlements of the Peace River district, and I think it is just as capable of being considered from that standpoint as from any other. The railway problem of Canada is related to the whole economic problem of the country, and it seems to me that if we can relieve unemployment by constructing public works, by investing public money or in other ways, and at the same time do work that is really necessary or that will be necessary in the very near future, we will be doing something really worth while. I believe the settlement of the Peace River country is permanent; I do not think there is a single thing about that country to indicate that in a short time it will be farmed out, or that it will be affected by drought or anything else that will drive settlers away. From my twenty-three years' experience in that country I can say that it has all the elements of permanency so far as weather and soil conditions are concerned. I do not believe you can have a permanent agriculture without live stock, and you cannot have live stock without suitable conditions to produce grass and feed. There is no place in the Peace River district, so far as I know, where these things cannot be grown, whether it is alfalfa, grain or any kind of grass. In that country we have timber, and I think the records for the last twenty-three years will show that the rainfall always has been ample. With all these advantages, together with the fact that ground fruits may be grown at any point, I think we can expect people to come there and make permanent homes in that district.

So, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I am asking the government seriously to consider commencing in the near future the construction of at least some railway mileage to serve that settlement which is already in existence. I am asking the government to build railways that will fit in with all the plans that have been worked out for an outlet to the Pacific coast and which, in the meantime, will serve a settlement that has all the elements of being permanent. To-day we have settlers trying to establish themselves twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty and eighty miles from the railway. A few years ago the Alberta government sent Doctor Wyatt, of the Alberta research council, to the Peace River country to make an intensive survey of soil conditions. He made a survey of about 3,000,000 acres, and as a result we know that the soil is suitable for settlement. It is not all first class, but a very large proportion of it is. I should like to put on record the winnings of the farmers of the Peace River country at some of the big fairs during the last few years. I am quoting from the Grande Prairie Herald, old timers' historical section, issued about two months ago:

Eighteen World Championships Won at Chicago in Last Eight Years

Winning a total of thirteen championships in grain classes at the International Hay and Grain Show at Chicago within eight years, and in addition taking so long a list of first, second and third prizes in all classes of grains both at Chicago and at the Royal Winter Fair at Toronto and at other shows throughout Canada, farmers of the Grande Prairie district have succeeded in firmly establishing this district as the greatest grain growing area on the North American continent.

Championship wheat was first sent out of the Peace River country as far back as 60 years ago, a priest of the mission at Fort Chipewyan won a world championship at Philadelphia with wheat grown in the mission garden at the far northern outpost. Again in 1893 the late Rev. Gough Brick captured the world championship at Chicago. Then for 17 years Canada did not appear in the list of big prize winners, and the Peace River country did not undertake competition until 1923, when Herman Trelle of Wembley, exhibiting for the first time, took third prize in spring wheat, and went back to Chicago in 1926 to win the double championship in both wheat and oats.

From that time onward, the Wembley district of the Peace River country has established itself firmly as the outstanding grain growing area of the continent, with a record of five world championships in wheat, five in oats, four in peas, two in timothy and one each in rye and flax. World champion grain growers of the Wembley district since 1926 include Herman Trelle, 13 championships; Erich Andersen, two; John Allsop, one, and P. U. Clubine, one, with Robert Cochrane, of Grande Prairie, taking one. The final bid for fame was made by Wembley grain growers this season, when three young members of the junior grain club, John Allsop, Paul Sebastian and Justyn Rigby captured respectively championship and third and fourth prizes in spring wheat class, while Herman Trelle took championship in oats. Others who have figured in world championships are Erich Andersen, former oat king, and Robert Cochrane, who has swept the board at Chicago in timothy seed, of which he was a few years ago classed as the largest producer on the continent.

I think this record shows that in the Peace River we have a country with very rich soil. I believe the yields in the Peace River country over a period of years have shown that the climate is proper for purposes of production. The records show that settlement is fairly well developed along the route of the proposed outlet, and that the railway would traverse a region as rich as any in western Canada. I have mentioned before and I should like to repeat that according to the surveys there would be 6,000 economic acres of land per mile of railway in the Peace River district, while there are only 5,000 in the rest of the prairie provinces.

What would be the significance of the construction of a certain mileage of railways, probably fifty or sixty or whatever it may be, from the standpoint of unemployment relief or that of enabling settlers to establish themselves? I believe the division would be about as follows, so far as the providing of work on a railway costing about $30,000 per mile is concerned:

	Per cent
Labour on the spot	.38
Rails and fastenings	18.5
Camp supplies, groceries, etc	9.0
Freight on materials	9.0
Forest products, i.e. bridge timber, piling, fence posts, planks, lumber, etc	6.0
Steel products, i.e. culverts, fence wire, telegraph wire, bridge iron, iron for equipment, repairs, etc	5.0
Rental of work equipment	4.0
Miscellaneous manufactured supplies	2.4
Horse feed supplies	2.2
Land purchased	2.0
Gasoline and oils	1.5
Coal steam and domestic	1.2
Interest on money borrowed for investment	1.2
	100.0

This is a matter of significance not only to settlers who without reasonable railway transportation would be unable to settle properly, but to the rest of Canada. A purchasing power would be put into circulation which would affect not only steel rails, groceries or other commodities, but would have a tendency to keep in circulation the economic wealth of the dominion.

A good deal has been said as to whether or not branch lines pay, and in this connection the Northern Alberta Railways have been mentioned. I know that all railways in Canada are to-day having their difficulties. Speaking before the Senate committee Mr. E. W. Beatty, chairman and president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company stated that the branch lines built by that railway were not losing any more money than were the main lines. I quote the following from Mr. Beatty's statement before the standing committee of the Senate on railways, telegraphs and harbours:

> Industrial and commercial enterprises also entered new fields, and for all these, railway service was necessary. These settlements and industries owed their existence in a very large masure to the colonization and development work of the company, and it was but natural that it should look forward to a share of the traffic which they might yield. As has been said, the orderly progress of its program was affected by the action of the rival system, but the future of the company could not have been protected if it had refrained from following the march of settlement. The traffic returns of the new lines up to 1930 fully justified their construction, and the falling returns of subsequent years have been no more characteristic of the new lines than of other parts of the railway.

I have been preparing some figures in connection with operating ratios of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Northern Alberta Railways. It is not possible to take one comparison and be certain that one has been fair. I believe however that a comparison of operating ratios would be a fairly safe guide as to just what a railway is doing. Having in mind the fact that all railways find it difficult to earn not only operating but additional charges, I should like to place some figures on Hansard. I find that in 1933 the gross earnings per mile of railway of the Canadian Pacific Railway amounted to $6,111; on the Canadian National Railways it amounted to $5,700 and on the Northern Alberta Railways, $1,621. The following table will serve to show the percentages of the three railway companies to earn a dollar in the years mentioned:

Company	1931	1932	1933	Average for three years
Canadian National Railways	95.69	95.96	96.74	96.13
Canadian Pacific Railway	79.36	80.70	78.29	79.45
Northern Alberta Railways	80.72	79.13	79.86	79.90

Hon. members will note that the percentage for the Northern Alberta Railways is almost the same as that of the Canadian Pacific Railway. These are figures I have taken from Canadian railway statistics issued by the Dominion bureau of statistics.

I do not believe we can have sensible and economic construction of railways by alternating between tremendous programs of construction and no construction. If we are to build railways economically we will have to do so gradually and steadily. Professor Jackman at page 30 of his book Economics of Transportation shows how the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway cost far more than was originally estimated because at the time of its construction there was an extensive construction program throughout Canada resulting in much higher costs for rails and material than had been originally estimated. That is inevitable if we are going to have booms and depressions. It seems to me the time has come when we ought to face our problems squarely, without fear, in the full belief that Canada must develop and that we must develop it steadily. It has been said if we cannot cut off the tops of the booms and the bottoms out of the depressions we can never have stabilization.

I believe the time has come when we must face the problem about which I have been speaking. In my judgment the Peace River country must be settled. Because of weather conditions in the southern part of the province settlers will be driven to the northern areas. The Peace River area is rich in natural resources, and in this connection we must not forget what the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) said last year about the resources west of the mountains as well as the fertile country to the east. As undoubtedly this railway will ultimately be built I believe we ought to start right now, because there is a need for additional purchasing power, and an opportunity would be afforded settlers who otherwise might be in the bread lines to establish themselves. The time has come for some action towards the building of at least lines which to-day may be branch lines but which would work into a permanent scheme for future railway service for the Peace River country.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I do not purpose to cover the ground as thoroughly or from as wide a viewpoint as has the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). He has, in fact, covered the situation so well from the general standpoint that I think it could not have been better done. There is one remark that he made during the course of his address with which I heartily agree, and that was that the government of this dominion, in providing for the relief of unemployment through the construction program which they have in mind would do well to provide work for these pioneers living on the outskirts of civilization so that they could maintain themselves without having to go on the dole. That is one very good reason I think why the construction of this railway would justify itself many times over.

My hon. friend from Peace River mentioned that there were people in the Peace River country who had to go sixty miles to get to a railroad, but in the British Columbia area of the Peace River I think my hon. friend knows perfectly well that there are many people living to-day who have to go a great many more miles than sixty to get to a railway. As a matter of fact, some of the residents of the district that I have the honour to represent are attempting to produce crops and earn their livelihood as far as one hundred miles away from the railway.

There was another remark made by my hon. friend from Peace River with which I also fully agree, and that is that the construction and completion of this railway outlet for the Peace River country should be undertaken gradually and steadily. I am going to suggest that at least a start might be made on the construction of this railway to serve the people who are already located in the area and who are a great distance from the end of steel. That construction would be of very great benefit to these people. I refer to that part of the Peace River territory which lies on the north side of the Peace river and within the province of British Columbia.

In order that the general public may understand the situation may I say that the Peace River country, speaking generally, is about one thousand feet in elevation above the level of the Peace river, and that the people living north of the river in the British Columbia section of the Peace River territory have to haul all their supplies and production from that height of land down one thousand feet to the level of the river, and then cross the river, and climb up again to the same height on the other side of the river. It must also be remembered that during at least two months of the year the river is impassable on account of ice conditions, when the ferries are not able to operate. I am going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that those people who live on the north side of the river should be supplied with railway facilities at as early a date as possible.

The northern Alberta railway lines are at present built to a place called Hines Creek, and to reach the area which I have been speaking of you have to go about one hundred miles west of Hines Creek; and 150 miles from Hines Creek would bring the railway to Hudson Hope, to the canyon of the Peace river. I suggest that as a matter of unemployment relief it would be good business for the government to provide two or three million dollars to construct that part of the line from Hines Creek west to Hudson Hope, or as much of it as that amount of money would construct. I do not think that is asking a great deal from the government, and I think the government would find that it would be money very well spent, because it fits absolutely into the scheme as outlined by the hon. member for Peace River for the construction of the western outlet for the Peace River country. It would remain for all time as part of the main line of the western outlet, and let me remind the house and the country that both the government and the opposition are on record in favour of providing the Peace River country with a western outlet. To make a small start such as I have suggested would be a very good thing in times like these. In that area north of the Peace river we have a population at the present time of four thousand people; I am talking now altogether about the British Columbia end of the Peace River country. There are in the Peace River area of British Columbia a total of about ten thousand people, four thousand of whom are on the north side of the river, and who, as I have explained, have to transport their supplies and production from one side of the river to the other.

Mr. MANION: How many people would that branch that my hon. friend suggests serve?

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): About four thousand people at the present time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to put on record some resolutions that I have received. The first is from the board of trade of Fort St. John, as follows:

Moved by Mr. Finch, seconded by Mr. Bruce: That in view of the fact there is no likelihood of a coast outlet in the near future and the district lying north of the Peace, being separated from the railroad by the said river, which for at least two months in the year is impassable and,

Whereas the majority of land lying between Fort St. John and Hines Creek is good agricultural land, and is in a district where a railroad could be built economically.

Therefore we respectfully urge that the railroad from Hines Creek, Alberta, be extended to the Beaton river, British Columbia, at the earliest possible date.

The Beaton river is in the centre of the area which I have described. Here is another communication from the Fort St. John Farmers' Institute, addressed to myself, under date of January 29:

Naturally we are very interested in a railway outlet for the country on the north side of the Peace river and we are writing you, respectfully requesting you to represent to the proper authorities the great need of this particular part of the country for better railway transportation.

As you are aware, at present agricultural products must be taken by truck, on roads only fit for their use during part of the year, or by the much slower means of sleigh or wagon for a distance of about sixty miles to the railhead at Dawson Creek. That is the distance from Fort St. John, it being considerably greater from other important parts of this large and fertile agricultural area. You of course also know that at certain times of the year it is not possible or practicable to get freight across the Peace river—this being a serious problem in the matter of delivery of farm produce to the railhead.

It has been stated that this country is not ripe for a railway and probably some estimate, in support of that contention, has been made of the freight at present available. Are the farmers expected to raise crops and stock to full capacity without really adequate means of shipping and with no hope of obtaining those facilities within a reasonable period? We think that this is a point that is often lost sight of. You of course have information at hand showing the extent and potentialities of this country and we are not forgetful of representations you have already made.

An extension of that branch of the N.A.R., which is on the North side of the Peace river, into what was known as the "Block," would, we think, greatly help the farmers on the north side by shortening their road haul.

Respectfully yours,

.. ..

President.

.. ..

Secretary treasurer.

I have another resolution from the North Pine Farmers' Institute, which is in the same area, as follows:

Whereas the immediate and pressing need of the western portion of the Peace River country is railway transportation facilities and more especially that vast section of newly settled country lying north of the Peace river and extending west from Hines Creek, the logical and ultimate need of the whole Peace country being a Pacific coast outlet directly west to tidewater,

And whereas the proposed Obed route is entirely inadequate to all but a small section in the southeast,

Therefore be it resolved that we, the members of the North Pine Farmers' Institute in general meeting assembled, unceasingly press for the immediate extension of the railway from Hines Creek westward to tap the Peace river block of British Columbia, to be extended eventually, as circumstances warrant, to the Pacific coast.

And now I wish to quote from a letter written by R. T. Elliott, and printed in the Grande Prairie Herald as Dawson Creek news in June of last year:

Referring again to the construction of the first section of the coast outlet railway, your correspondent received the following personal letter from Mr. R. T. Elliott, K.C., of Victoria re his recent reference to this problem, viz.:

Victoria, B.C.,
June, 3, 1934.

Many thanks for the Grande Prairie Herald of May 25. Delay in building to Finlay Forks is a crime. The trouble is to get truth into the east. People there cannot realize the comparatively small investment necessary to bring a new great west into buying power.

That is signed R. T. Elliott.

The editor goes on to comment on this letter in the following terms:

If that is the trouble—and we agree it may be, in part—then it is up to every public body interested in the early construction of a coast outlet to keep on bombarding the east with "the facts" regarding the economic soundness as well as the desirability of this road. That the argument no longer rests upon the agricultural traffic which would move in that direction but in addition there would be made available at once immense mineral areas which as Mr. Elliott says would bring "a new great west into buying power." We are convinced that of the many speeches made at Ottawa on the coast outlet resolutions, none made a deeper impression than that portion of John A. Fraser's address where he quoted "facts" regarding the Finlay Forks area. Various speakers following, expressed their surprise and deep interest in the "new angle" he had introduced to the government. Surely this offers some hint as to the spot where the political ice is the thinnest, so let us pile on the truth till the ice breaks in all directions.

That is a comment on the address which I had given in which I attempted to lay before the house some facts in connection with the potentialities of Peace River. I am going to put on record some additional facts. I may not be able to get them all in on this occasion and I did not put them all on record when I spoke before. I have here a clipping from the Peace River Block News of August 31, 1934, in which the following statement appears:

The refusal of the railway company to extend their line from Hines Creek in to the north of the Peace River block may be excusable but it means that a large crop of grain which is being harvested in that fertile area will have to be hauled overland to Dawson Creek. . . . All supplies for the north and west have to be hauled by road from end of steel or the wholesale house at Dawson Creek and all grain and stock shipped out the same way. Surely the thousands of people depending on the roads for their very existence are deserving of some consideration.

That by the way is a criticism of the effort of the British Columbia government to keep the roads in condition. In other words, not only have they long distances to haul but the condition of the roads is hardly fit for travelling.

On many occasions the possibilities of the Peace River have been indicated and it is not necessary for me to put on the record any further facts in that regard, because they are now pretty well accepted. Last year I mentioned the mining possibilities in the area, and I would ask the house to bear in mind that the construction of the line from Hines Creek to Hudson Hope would assist mining operations in that district. But I did not then include all mining operations, because I said little about coal. I outlined what was possible in connection with the precious metals as well as in copper, zinc and lead, but I scarcely touched on coal. Now I want to give a reliable estimate of the amount of coal in the Peace River area. This area lies at Hudson Hope and the particular area in which the coal lies—that is, the coal to which this estimate refers—is on the south side of Peace River. A strip seven miles long and one mile wide southwest of the canyon contains a definite estimated quantity of 85 million tons; that is the definite estimated tonnage. It has been looked over, surveyed and estimated by competent engineers and that is their estimate. Another strip seven miles long by one mile wide south of the first strip gives double this estimate, though this latter estimate is not definite. This gives you some idea of the quantity of coal available at Hudson Hope, and I suggest that there is opportunity for the distribution of that coal through the construction of the railway.

In addition to this we have possibilities of water power development in the canyon itself. Tributary to and along the river in various places we have large quantities of timber which could be made available for manufacturing purposes. The canyon itself is eighteen miles long and there is a drop in that eighteen miles of 270 feet, and the river itself is 200 feet wide. For that eighteen miles it goes between two walls of solid granite and is only 200 feet wide and, as I say, it drops in that distance 270 feet. If the whole flow could be utilized at one or more stages of development a minimum of 81,000 horse power could be developed, with a maximum of 245,000. That will give you some idea of the other potentialities of the district. All this is tributary to the Peace River and within the area which I am attempting to have served by further railway construction. I do not think I am in any way extravagant when I ask that the government give some attention to this matter at a very early date.

In order to show that things are moving in the district and that development is taking place, and to show that there is a certain amount of production, I want to quote from the Peace River Block News of January 25, 1935:

During the past year 356 carloads of settlers' effects were forwarded from Edmonton over the entire N.A.R. system, seventeen of these being unloaded at Dawson Creek (end of steel in B.C.), one at Pouce Coupé and one at Tupper.

In addition to these cars, many settlers trekked in with wagons, etc. There are thousands waiting for conditions to pick up, so that they can raise enough money from the sale of surplus stock and equipment to make the trip, to what one writer terms "The Glamorous Peace" and make a fresh start.

Although a wet fall affected the yields in the "Block" considerably it is estimated that between three-quarters of a million and one million bushels of grain will be shipped out during the 1934-35 crop year. To date about 300,000 bushels have already passed through the elevators.

As stated in a previous issue about $50,000 worth of cattle, sheep and hogs were shipped from the district. In addition eight carloads of horses have also been sent out, bringing in approximately $12,000 net to the sellers.

I could quote other statistics to show that a very substantial production is going on in that area from year to year, and that with the extension of railway service that production would greatly increase. My hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) indicated that the northern Alberta railways seemed to be economically operated. They are operated at about eighty per cent of the revenue which they earn, and while not paying all the costs of interest on the money invested in these roads they still do earn a substantial amount.

For my part I think it is reasonable to ask that a start be made on the construction of this road from the point of view of the employment it would provide not only in the area itself but from the standpoint of the assistance which it would give to business throughout the country as a whole. I submit that, both political parties having definitely and sincerely promised the people that this outlet would be built, the time is now opportune for a start to be made on it, continuing from year to year until an outlet is provided to the Pacific coast.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): I would like to associate myself again with the mover of this resolution (Mr. Kennedy, Peace River) and with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) who has so ably supported the suggestion. I am not in the position of those two hon. gentlemen of being wholly familiar by a long residence in those districts with all of the different points which might arise in this discussion. I cannot, like them, describe in detail the varied needs, the varied resources, the potential and actual wealth of that great area, but as one coming from a different part of the west, from central Alberta, I would like to indicate the feeling which exists among the inhabitants there toward their more northerly brethren. I would like also to place particular stress upon two points which seem to me to make the immediate commencement of this project an urgent matter, and to point to the fact that this is indeed the logical time to make that commencement.

One aspect which is becoming of increasing importance and urgency is that which has relation to the great drought problem of other parts of Alberta and of the west generally, and to the fact that increasingly during the last years the Peace River country has been the mecca of those who have found themselves unable to continue in agriculture in the dried out areas. Thousands to my knowledge have set their eyes upon that district; thousands have already moved there and thousands now contemplate leaving the barren areas where they now reside and commencing a new life in that newer country. I might point out, as has been indicated so well by previous speakers, that in the Peace River area you find the last great west, the last great fertile district which is at present but scantily served by transportation facilities. You find in it the last great area of agricultural land which is well supplied by nature with moisture, where the soil is of a fertile character and where real opportunity is afforded not only for the production of new wealth but for something which I think is of still greater importance—the creation of permanent homes. The eyes of people from the less fortunate areas have been directed there. Many have gone and they have found that the greatest handicap which they must overcome is, first, their distance from the railroad, a distance which must be experienced to be appreciated, for one who has not lived under such conditions cannot possibly realize what it means to be attempting to raise farm or any other products fifty, sixty or a hundred miles from the nearest railroad. I must confess that my recollection of that situation is not of recent years, but I have a very vivid recollection as a young man of central Alberta, for I had the dubious pleasure of going there when no railways had been built north of Calgary and when we were depending for our supplies upon a railway a hundred miles away and for our mail upon an occasional stage coach. I think I can still in memory appreciate the situation of settlers in the Peace River area.

Then too, they are facing another handicap: the excessive cost of shipping their products to the markets. It is true that arrangements have been made, which under all the circumstances are perhaps somewhat fair, so that the entire additional cost of shipping their stuff back the hundreds of miles to Edmonton and then again westward to the coast is not borne wholly by the settlers; but the additional cost is very heavy; I think it averages perhaps five to five and a half cents a bushel on wheat and when you subtract from the prices other farmers have been receiving during the latter years that additional four and a half, five or five and a half cents a bushel which those settlers must pay, you will see that additional subtraction from the low price of their product may mean the difference between success and failure. Many are now rather deterred from entering that country because of fear of inability to settle within reasonable distance of a railway and because of the cost they must incur in shipping out their grain.

There is another aspect which to my mind makes the situation exceedingly urgent. Those of us who remember, as many of us do, the real opening up and the large settlement of western Canada in the beginning of this century will recall that development rested mainly upon two certain factors. The first was the free lands, the homesteads that were offered and the opportunity afforded to men to establish themselves in agriculture at relatively little cost. Most of them however were without funds and the second factor was the one which assisted them in making their settlement; that is, that the beginning of the century was marked not only by the opening up of a great west but by a tremendous program of railway construction. Thousands and tens of thousands of those settlers were able to finance themselves and to tide over their first hard years by working on the railways, by assisting in constructing the right of way. That is a matter which should be before the members of the government at the present time. To-day and during the past months and years in the Peace River hundreds of settlers have gone there, forced perhaps from their own farms by despair and failure, starting again under more favourable auspices, but without funds and compelled to rely upon relief for subsistence during those hard years. I suggest that under those circumstances it would be the part of wisdom were a program of construction moderate in cost and degree to be carried on which not only would bring to the people of that country the transportation facilities to which I among many believe they are entitled, but would provide work for those who are making a fresh start and enable them to avoid being placed on public relief, thus maintaining their own morale, their self-respect and enabling them to pay back in the form of useful work and construction which would be of value during the coming years, the money which was paid to them.

In consideration of those two points and in consideration of the development which is only just commencing, of the opportunities afforded and of the drought problem which requires relief, I believe this is an opportune time to make at least a commencement upon that work to which every political body in Canada is committed, a work which every economist has declared sound, in order to provide for that last great railwayless area in the west the transportation facilities which will make it in the future a prosperous country, a country of homes and wealth producer for this dominion.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): I wish to say just a few words in support of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) and so ably supported by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman). The government in power at Ottawa is, as we all know, under certain obligations to the Peace River country; that is an old story. I am not advocating that this government or any other government enter upon an extravagant expenditure, but this matter must be kept before any government that is in power. In the special session of 1930 I advocated that something be done in this connection as unemployment relief, and each year following I have said a few words in the house in support of this resolution, recommending that the unemployed start work on the road at one end or the other. It is not necessary for me to enlarge upon the natural resources of that country, we all know about them. Those of you who have not visited that country have read about it; there is no question that we have there perhaps the finest wheat land out of doors. I am going to make a suggestion. This government operates under the Department of National Defence unemployment camps. I am told that in those camps there are about 8,000 homeless men getting 20 cents a day together with indifferent board and clothing, for which they are expected to do some work. To my mind that is a disgrace to the people of Canada, and an insult to the intelligence of the men in those camps. I have visited some; I have three or four of them in my riding. After the last session I wrote the minister suggesting that instead of carrying on that disgraceful plan those men be paid a minimum wage for a short working day and in co-operation with the British Columbia government put to work to finish the Pacific Great Eastern from Burrard inlet to Prince George. I am not advocating that this government buy that road.

Mr. MANION: Will the hon. gentleman give the points again that he mentioned?

Mr. MUNN: From Burrard inlet, that is from Vancouver to Prince George. At the Vancouver end there is about thirty miles to complete. Then from Quesnel to Prince George there is something like eighty miles graded and on which a good deal of work has already been done. If this government in co-operation with the government of British Columbia would put these boys to work, give them a short day, minimum wages, decent treatment and the tools to work with, they would have that road built in a very few months. Then there would be that part built as a Peace River outlet, something like five hundred miles. As I said, I am not trying to unload that road on this government. British Columbia has it. It is a white elephant at present, but the road is there, it has to be maintained and will have to be extended some time. This government could arrange for running rights or something over it as compensation for the assistance that might be given at this time. Any government which is in power in Canada is obligated to the people in that country. Many of them went there depending on the promises made by both the major parties, and I think by my hon. friends to the left, that there should be a Pacific outlet from the Peace at the earliest possible date. I have therefore, Mr. Speaker, very great pleasure in supporting the motion.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have as usual listened with a great deal of interest and sympathy to the speeches made by the hon. gentlemen supporting this resolution. I have always been impressed by the remarks made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) who are so directly interested in the proposition. I made it my business to check up, and I find that the hon. member for Peace River from 1922 to 1935 has in each year, a total of fourteen sessions, brought up this subject in the house, and brought it up exceedingly well. And the hon. member for Cariboo on all the occasions since he came into the house has been of the utmost support and assistance to the hon. member for Peace River in this matter. I also listened with interest to the other speakers, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) and the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Munn). In regard to the latter I must say that his proposal, while perhaps worthy of consideration from the standpoint of unemployment, would not help the people in the Peace River at all; his proposal was to extend the Pacific Great Eastern northward to Prince George but until there is some connection with the Peace River section that would be of no present help to the Peace River district.

Mr. MUNN: It would be a start.

Mr. MANION: Yes, it would be a start, but from the wrong end. I think the people in the Peace River territory would prefer to have it start at the other end.

The hon. member for Cariboo made a suggestion which strongly appeals to me, provided the financial condition of the country were such that the government could carry it out. He suggested building from Hines Creek to the Beaton river. The resolution which he read to the house was also submitted to me some time ago, I presume by the same people. But that project would only serve four thousand people, and would not help the other thirty-five or forty thousand, although it would at least be a start in the right direction.

The trouble again is the question of finances. I understood him to say, and I think he was correct, that it would mean about one hundred miles. I think there has been little railway built in Canada that has cost less than $30,000 a mile. The hon. gentleman whispered to me that this could be built for $20,000, but with all respect I doubt it, because the cheapest railway ever built in Canada for any distance was the old Canadian Northern, and I think it cost about $30,000. It may be that this line could be laid on the ground very cheaply, but as ordinary highways cost from $20,000 to $40,000 a mile of paved road I doubt if this could be built for less. Even taking it at $20,000 it would mean an expenditure of $2,000,000 to serve about four thousand people. That shows the difficulty of going on with the large order of providing a western outlet to the Peace River territory under the conditions that we are enduring to-day.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I think the hon. member for Cariboo was referring to the people in British Columbia, but there are people scattered along the north side in Alberta, in addition to the four thousand.

Mr. MANION: Well, that may be correct. I say that the proposal appealed to me, and I say this as sincerely as anything I have said in this house that I should like to see the government of Canada do something as a start to serve those people in that last great west and north. It is true that all parties, certainly the two major parties through their leaders I am told, have promised that something should be done, and I have no doubt that both leaders made those promises in good faith, thinking that conditions were either going to continue in an upward trend or come back very rapidly. But, of course, the whole difficulty has been that the world condition through which we have been passing has placed Canada, together with the rest of the world, in such a position that it has been a very serious matter to consider an estimated expenditure ranging from $13,000,000 to $80,000,000 according to the number of branch lines that might be built. I understood my hon. friend from Peace River to say to-day that branch lines are more important than the outlet at the present time. I may have misunderstood my hon. friend, because I was interrupted a number of times by hon. members submitting other matters to me and I was not able to listen to all that was said, though I was here all the time.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Any outlet that may be built will be composed of branch lines serving local territory connected with the present system.

Mr. MANION: But the direct outlet itself, if it were built, would mean that a great many branch lines would have to be built in order to give the people proper service.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Ultimately.

Mr. MANION: Yes. My hon. friend read from the report of the royal commission on railways regarding their opinion as to branch lines, but I thought he left out one paragraph that perhaps should have been read. I am not mentioning this with any desire to refute his argument or to oppose his personal attitude, but when my hon. friend read a number of quotations I think perhaps he might have read the concluding sentence of paragraph 55, at page 21 of the report, which states:

> Your commissioners have questioned the representatives of both lines as to justification for the construction or acquisition of this additional mileage.

That is, speaking of the branch lines.

> The explanations given are not such as to convince us that this policy has been sound or wise.

I do submit with all due respect that there were too many branch lines built, perhaps by both parties. I am not discussing the political side of the question at all, but I believe that both railways, in the heyday of prosperity, went too deeply into the construction of branch lines throughout the west.

I shall not take very long, but if I may I should like to review the whole question very briefly. My hon. friend from Peace River and the hon. member for Cariboo felt that they had dealt with this question so often that they merely brought forward new material, and I think both hon. gentlemen presented splendid arguments. They did not review the situation, however, and in a few words I should like to mention the different propositions. There have been proposals in regard to four outlets from the Peace River district, the Aggie-Obed route, which would link up with the Canadian National on the east side of the territory; the Monkman pass route, the Peace pass route and the Pine pass route. Just before the crash of 1929 the two railways were leaning rather strongly towards the Peace pass outlet, which would connect up the Peace River territory with the Pacific Great Eastern railway, which was mentioned by my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat. But when the crash came the two railways, headed at that time by Mr. E. W. Beatty and the late Sir Henry Thornton, took the attitude, which they have maintained consistently since, that they could not afford to go into any expansion of this kind. They took the position that if branch lines or outlets were to be constructed from the Peace River territory the country would have to do it alone, with no assistance of any kind from the railways except perhaps in connection with operation. They took the attitude that at least ten times the present traffic would be necessary to make the outlet by the Peace pass pay.

There have been four investigations into this question. I should like to refer to the last one, the investigation of 1932. I have in my hand Hansard of last year, from which I should like to quote the report in connection with that investigation, because it puts the whole situation in a concise form. That commission was made up of Mr. Gzowski of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Fairbairn of the Canadian Pacific Railway and Mr. Crysdale, who was recommended by the province of British Columbia. I should like to read three paragraphs from their conclusions:

> In view of the above, our conclusions are:
> 1. No western outlet is justified for the present, as the existing railway furnishes the most economical route. It will take many times the present traffic to justify another railway outlet.
> 2. The Obed route —

To which I have just referred.

—for a western outlet is the most favourable from a railway economic standpoint, considering the present phase of the railway situation.

While it is not mentioned it must be admitted by those who understand the territory that the Aggie-Obed route, to which I have referred, would mean a considerable amount of back haul.

3. We recommend that the matter of a final route be decided when the question is a practical one, believing that by the time the volume of traffic has reached a point where a western outlet is justified, general and possible local conditions may have materially changed. When the decision is imperative, the whole situation should be reviewed, in order to appraise all the contributing factors, including the potential traffic which may accrue from the lines beyond the definite areas included in this report.

That is a summing up of their report. It may be added, as I pointed out last year, that not only did Mr. Beatty and Sir Henry Thornton agree with this report, but Mr. Brownlee, then Premier of Alberta, appeared before the royal commission and took very much the same attitude. As a matter of fact Mr. Brownlee went so far as to say that in his opinion, and in the opinion of the government of Alberta, it was not so much an outlet from the Peace River district that was required as it was more branch lines. That was his conclusion, after giving the matter a good deal of study, and I must confess that I never saw Mr. Brownlee here in Ottawa at any of the interprovincial conferences without being impressed with the fact that he was one of the sanest and ablest of the western men attending those conferences.

I merely add this word, that the total program is still out of the question; I am quite frank about that. The people of Canada simply have not sufficient money at the present time to embark on a program embracing anything like the complete Peace River project, which would cost anywhere from $13,000,000 to $75,000,000 or $80,000,000, according to the number of branch lines required. Speaking personally, however, because the matter has not been discussed at any length, I must say that I am impressed with the proposal of the hon. member for Cariboo, in association with the hon. member for Peace River, that something should be done looking to the ultimate construction of a westerly outlet from the Peace River area. I may say quite sincerely that so far as I am concerned I shall endeavour to have this matter given fair and reasonable consideration.

It must be pointed out, as well, that since this section became settled the rates have been brought down very materially. For example, in 1921 the rate on grain from Grande Prairie to Fort William was 63½ cents per hundred pounds. In 1925 the rate was reduced to 35½ cents, not much more than half the former rate, and that is the rate in effect to-day. In 1921 the rate on grain from Grande Prairie to Vancouver was 58½ cents; it is now 28 cents, or less than half the previous rate. While some aid has been afforded in that way, it does not, of course, assist the settler who is 50 or 100 miles from railway service of any kind; I am quite free to admit that. It is true that world conditions are improving, I think with reasonable rapidity, and as the hon. member for Peace River has pointed out conditions in Canada have been improving as well. Last year the two railways combined, namely the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways, took in of gross revenue about $27,000,000 more than they did in the previous year. I believe the hon. members for Peace River and Cariboo, and other hon. members who may be interested to a lesser degree, may feel that there is more hope at the present time of something being done than there has been for some years. At the same time we must remember that even last year, with increased traffic, the Canadian Pacific Railway earned only sufficient to pay its bonded indebtedness, and the Canadian National Railway is still about a million dollars per week short of paying the interest charges on its bonded indebtedness.

I am going to take the liberty again—and I hope the hon. member will accept my suggestion—of moving the same amendment I moved last year. I assure him most sincerely that I do not move the amendment with any desire of stalling his proposal, but I do it entirely from the standpoint of honesty. It is possible that the house could accept the hon. member's motion just as it stands, but it seems to me that with the addition of the words I suggested last year, namely "when circumstances permit" the expression of the house could be made a little more honest. Otherwise, an acceptance of the motion as it now stands would be merely a pious hope and would perhaps give a greater amount of encouragement than I, in my innate honesty, desire to give. As amended the resolution would read:

That in the opinion of this house the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast, when circumstances permit.

In moving the amendment I have not in mind any desire to delay the purpose the hon. member has in mind, but it is moved so as to be quite frank with the people in that section of the country, with the hon. member and

hon. members who supported him. I would add merely this that at least I feel quite impressed with the idea that something might well be begun at the present time not only to assist the people of the Peace River section and to give them hope for the future, but as a method of assisting in unemployment relief. I assure the hon. member and other hon. members that I shall endeavour to bring about something in the shape of assistance along that line.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

COOPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH

PROPOSAL THAT CAPITALISTIC SYSTEM BE SUPERSEDED BY A SOCIAL ORDER IN WHICH THE PROFIT MOTIVE WOULD BE SUBORDINATED TO PUBLIC SERVICE.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, since the capitalist system is failing to function in the interests of the great majority of the people of Canada, it should be superseded by a co-operative commonwealth in which the profit motive would be subordinated to that of public service and ruthless competition replaced by collective ownership under democratic control.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a few days ago when the trade agreements were under discussion the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) commented on the fact that I had protested against the time being spent on a discussion of matters which had been dealt with several years ago, and that the suggested motion was simply one of confidence in the government. He very ingeniously suggested that I should be the last person to protest because the resolution standing in my name was in effect a vote of confidence in the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. In one respect he is correct, but he failed to catch my point, namely, that in the resolution then being discussed we were asked to endorse a decision which had been made three years ago. In this resolution we are asked to endorse certain principles which we trust will be accepted in years to come.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You did the same thing two years ago.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Three years ago my proposal along these lines seemed to some rather academic. However two years ago when I introduced a similar resolution I was in a position to call attention to the formation of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Last year matters had advanced to a stage where we were able to present a carefully considered program. After the past year and a half we are in a position to report still further advances, because in the three provincial elections, namely in British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Ontario, some 300,000 votes were polled for the candidates of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. I interpret that fact to mean that 300,000 people have endorsed the resolution I now have the honour to move. In the provinces of British Columbia and Saskatchewan the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is now the official opposition. Recently in the cities of Winnipeg, St. Boniface, Windsor and Toronto men identified with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have been elected mayors. For these reasons I submit the matter before us is no longer academic.

Before we may bring forward a suggestion of a new social order it is necessary to convince the general public of the bankruptcy of the old order. To-day I have very great pleasure in calling as my chief witness no other than the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself. I regret that at the moment he is not in his seat, but I believe we owe him a debt of gratitude for his radio speeches in that for the first time a Prime Minister of Canada has frankly recognized that the present system is no longer sacrosanct and has himself taken the lead in condemning that system. The Prime Minister expressly suggests that the capitalist system should be judged on its merits. In my view that is an excellent statement. In his first radio speech he said, "The economic system will be examined without prejudice," and further, "If it has failed we must change it." That has given me courage to suggest in what ways it should be changed.

I would call attention to the fact that in their comments newspapers seem to have had the idea that we of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation want to abolish capital. According to the economist capital is simply that wealth which is used to produce new wealth. Our capital consists of our mines, our factories, our railways and so on. No one wants to abolish capital, but what we do suggest is the abolition of the capitalist system, namely the system under which wealth is largely concentrated in the hands of a few. In its modern form at least, that system is of comparatively recent origin. It has grown up in the last one hundred and fifty years, since the introduction of machines into Great Britain, with the resulting organization of industry, commerce and finance. We desire, then, to abolish a system whereby the control of those means of production is so largely centred in the hands of a few.

The Prime Minister further has recognized that the capitalist system did serve a useful function. I quite agree with him in that. He says:

> The old system served you well, but it ended in a nuisance. Is that so or not. It ended in a condition under which there has been universal depression and unemployment and poverty in the midst of plenty.

If that is true, and I quite agree with the Prime Minister, then it is high time that we began to ask ourselves whether we cannot discover some system which will lead us out of our difficulties.

The Prime Minister also very thoughtfully discussed the question that bothers a good many, and that is: If the system worked well in the past, why should it not continue to work? I quote the Prime Minister again:

> Possibly some of you will maintain that because the system has served us well in the past there is a presumption in favour of its continuing to do so in the future, but clearly there is no proof that it will do so. Indeed present conditions are surely proof that it will not.

And he goes on to say it should be reformed. Now I would go further than the Prime Minister went in this regard. I believe that the present system cannot work much longer. It worked in England a hundred years ago because her surplus products were exported to other countries. At first it was merely commodities that were exported, but later on we find the export of capital goods, and then when the system was set up in other countries there came about that extreme rivalry that led to a great many international complications and that finally I believe was the basic cause of the world war. Those who had been our customers became our competitors, and we have now reached the stage when nearly all the more forward nations have adopted the capitalist system. Japan is the last great nation to adopt it, and to-day we know that owing to their efficiency and their lower standards of living, and perhaps to the depreciation of their currency and other financial factors, the Japanese are able to outbid some of the older capitalist countries in the markets of the world.

Now we face the fact that nearly all countries are attempting to get these outside markets. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is elementary that goods must be sold either at home or abroad. Until recently we have had an expanding foreign market, but to-day that market has ceased to expand and in fact it is beginning to contract for every country. No nation can hope to have the same opportunities that it had before.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

What about our home market? Here is where we get into difficulties because under this capitalist system the people have not the consuming power to buy back what is produced; that is the real difficulty to-day. The government faces somewhat the same difficulty when they find it next to impossible to pay the interest on their bonded indebtedness and at the same time to extend social services. If they could extend social services, undoubtedly that would help to lift the depression, but they cannot do that and at the same time pay the interest on their bonded indebtedness. Industry is in much the same position. If it were possible for employers of labour in Canada to double their payrolls in every direction it might be possible to get things moving and to recover prosperity again, but I venture to say there are very few employers to-day who are in a position to increase their payrolls and at the same time meet their interest charges and overhead expenses. So that governments and the industrial world alike are prohibited from doing the very thing and the only thing that would save the situation. There is the anomaly that faces the world.

I have said before, and I repeat it, that years ago when I was trying to read some social economics I could not understand the phrase that was often used, "the inherent contradictions of capitalism," but I think we have reached the period when the inherent contradictions are beginning to manifest themselves. I submit that what worked a hundred years ago when only one nation had adopted the system is not working to-day when almost all the leading nations of the world have adopted this system. I could not get a better witness than the Prime Minister to testify to the evils which have developed under capitalism. I quote him:

> Many faults and injustices in the capitalist system . . . child labour, sweat shops, slave wages, crushingly long hours, inequality of benefits, low prices to the primary producers, high prices to the ultimate consumer.

The Prime Minister must surely have been reading the evidence given before the price spreads committee because that is a very fair summary of the evils revealed in the evidence there. The Prime Minister goes on:

> The selling price . . . . sometimes influenced by unconscionable monopolistic purchasers or by certain types of middlemen and distributors, some of whose activities would properly include them within the class of economic parasites.

I always like the Prime Minister's phrases. "Economic parasites" is a good phrase, and I have no doubt it will be re-echoed on a great many soap boxes across the country. In fact, I rather think the Prime Minister caught it from some soap box orator.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I got that from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly; I quite agree. I am glad that what I have said along these lines has not been without certain results. The Prime Minister goes on to talk of:

> Men whose mounting bank rolls loom larger than your happiness, corporations without soul and without virtue.

Again:

> Behold the sad and idle multitudes throughout the world. If the system is functioning as it should, why are there so many unemployed?

That is the question I should like to hear asked again and again. If the system is functioning why are there so many unemployed?

The Prime Minister concludes on this point:

> The real answer is that there is something wrong with the system.

Mr. POULIOT: He spoke as if he were your disciple.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I should be very glad to have him as my disciple if he had been truly converted.

Mr. POULIOT: Then you would have to apply discipline.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister goes on to say:

> Many fail to realize what unemployment means. It is a visible expression of the inherent defects in the capitalistic system.

Again I like the phrase—the inherent defects in the capitalist system. I think that is our trouble to-day. It is not a question of this or that small defect. It is a case of our having to face the inherent defects of this capitalist system which has grown up in the last hundred or hundred and fifty years. I quote the Prime Minister again:

> Canada on the dole is like a young and vigorous man in the poorhouse. The dole is a condemnation, final and complete, of our economic system. If we cannot abolish the dole we should abolish the system.

I heartily concur. If we cannot abolish the dole, then let us abolish the system.

Mr. HANBURY: He said, "if."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, he said "if," and I would like to ask if the Prime Minister is taking any steps to abolish the dole.

Mr. BAKER: Unemployment insurance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Unemployment insurance does not touch the question. Unemployment insurance will not assist anyone now on the dole.

Mr. BAKER: We are on the way.

Mr. POULIOT: It will not even assist the baker.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know it might be possible for the federal government to transfer this matter to the provinces, to have an unemployment insurance scheme to which certain classes would be asked to contribute and from which certain classes would receive benefits. That is all very well, but it does not touch the half million people now out of work, who together with their dependents number over a million. What does the Prime Minister propose to do with them? So far there is no answer, and I think we have to admit that since the right hon. gentleman is the Prime Minister of the country, since he earlier recognized that unemployment was a national problem, he must either abolish the dole or, if we are to use discipline, we insist that we abolish the system.

I am glad to say that the Prime Minister, for the first time as far as I am aware, has also frankly recognized that the trouble does not lie in the weaknesses of individuals. A great many people say that if a man is out of work it is his own fault. Or that if a man is overcharging or exploiting the public you have to deal with him; because he has not the love of God in his heart he should be curbed in some way. The Prime Minister sets out clearly the real situation:

> Individuals did not cause the faults in the system: Growth and change in the system were primarily responsible for that:

I agree; it is not a case of dealing with individuals, of getting rid of a few greedy or shiftless people. We have to deal sooner or later with the system itself. The Prime Minister gives us a little review of capitalism:

> The industrial machine became more efficient, more powerful, more concentrated.

Again:

> Only since the war has there been that turbulent advance, that frantic development, that terrific concentration of business, that overcapitalization of industry which had an ending, at least of a certain sort, in the crash of 1929.

In another paragraph he tells what that crash meant:

> What we called the crash of 1929 has been the crash of the system which has broken down under the conditions under which the capitalistic system was born.

In other words, in these earlier addresses of his the Prime Minister recognized clearly, or he tried to make us believe that he recognized clearly, that the system was done for. He then proceeded to outline some of the more recent developments of the system. He was at the time suggesting that Liberalism had not kept pace with the development, and I quite agree with him, for it is the worst indictment of Liberalism that its program has not kept pace with the economic developments. The right hon. gentleman outlines these developments in some very fine phrases:

> The practices of business men were modified . . . the fine theory of the open market place disappeared . . . laissez faire weakened and died . . . concentrations of business increased . . . monopolies grew more threatening . . . capitalism became more dominant . . . the profit system did less and less toward an equitable distribution of the benefits of the system.

That is a splendid characterization of the later development. The evils, he said, flourished—> —in the times when capitalism ran itself, ran the people, ran the state.

I submit that while the Prime Minister spoke of those conditions as being in the time of the Liberal regime, those conditions have existed for some considerable time and they exist to-day. Capitalism is to-day running itself, running the people and running the state. We have had to a very large extent unregulated capitalism. I submit that if there is anything wrong with us to-day it must be admitted that the big business people have been in control, hence they need not try to put the blame on the interference of the state. The big business men have been given a free hand; they have been given carte blanche and they have taken full advantage of it. So that if we are in a bad way to-day, big business is to a great extent accountable for the situation.

Further, we have reached a stage which might very well be described as economic slavery. There are very few people who are free to-day. A man is not free to speak in this city of Ottawa if his speeches are likely to prove unacceptable to the powers that be. Very few people are free to speak out for fear of losing their jobs. We have a species of economic slavery, and my Liberal friends can talk until they are black in the face about freedom won by the Liberals of the past, I tell them that until a man is free economically he is not really free, and political freedom has become a mere sham. The state has been and is to-day, in my judgment, an instrument of capitalism. I could have wished that the Prime Minister would do the heroic thing and break the grip of capitalism. I do not know that I have ever had any strong hopes, although the first addresses he gave really made one wonder what might be coming. The Prime Minister finishes his outlining of the devolpment of the system:

> A generation of strife; death in foreign lands, at home the fearful struggle for wealth, the dreadful siege of adversity, the march of the breadlines, the resistance of brave hearts against the prospect of unchanging want—

A scathing denunciation. But I think I have the right to ask the Prime Minister this question: What does he propose to do about it? So far the only measure he has brought down is the unemployment insurance scheme; that is all. I do not want to anticipate what may come later in the session, but that was said to be the biggest part of the social program to be brought down—an unemployment insurance scheme that does not touch the most needy, the unemployed, a scheme that will be restricted to a very small group, a scheme that excludes the farming and fishing communities, the lumbering communities and the casual workers who are in very great need, a scheme which, if carried out 100 per cent, will only bring us into line with Great Britain under the Lloyd George regime. As the Prime Minister himself said in introducing the resolution, a great many of the nations of Europe have adopted similar legislation. It may alleviate conditions here and there but it will not do anything to get at the fundamental evils of the system.

Mr. POULIOT: Scheme is the word.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wonder sometimes as I have read and re-read these addresses of the Prime Minister—does he really know the meaning of words? Does the Prime Minister really know the meaning of these phrases he has been using? I do not think we can allow the Prime Minister merely to declaim; we must ask him, since he is in that responsible position, what he means by these phrases.

One more quotation or so and I am through with my chief witness. The Prime Minister recognizes apparently that this system is doomed. Listen to this:

> In the crash and thunder of toppling capitalism . . .

Does that mean anything? Again:

> The old order has gone. It will not return.

Does that mean anything? He goes further in that than I could possibly go. I should say that the old order is getting pretty shaky, but I do not think it has gone yet; I wish it were. And take that last address which he gave not many weeks ago in Montreal. After he had very gracefully paid his tribute to the influence of Mr. Litvinoff, John Strachey and Sir Stafford Cripps, he said:

> The social ideal must be the determining factor in the future as the individualistic ideal was in the past.

I agree with the Prime Minister. In that regard I find myself at the opposite pole to many of my Liberal friends. The Prime Minister's position however is a far cry from the rugged individualism he has been asserting and, I would go further and say, from the individualism embedded in our laws and in our public practice. What about the relief camps? Is that project dominated by the new social ideal?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Call your chief witness.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I do not call my chief witness; I call to my witness the thousands of young men who to-day are being demoralized under that system, the loggers, lumber workers and people throughout the country that are all being demoralized. I call the large numbers of people in our cities who are eating in soup kitchens to-day and are being demoralized. I call the families such as the one I mentioned in my opening speech of this session, where there was a tragic suicide simply through discouragement. Are we—and this is too serious to make party capital out of—any of us now trying to work out a new conception, a new social ideal?

What about the distribution of wealth? I have in my hand a study recently made of the estimated distribution of income receivers other than agricultural workers and their incomes for the census year 1930-31. The table is as follows:

Size of income for the year—	Number of persons	Per cent of total	Per cent of total income
Under $1,000	1,526,000	56.2	25.4
$1,000-$1,500	643,000	23.7	25.9
$1,500-$3,000	448,000	16.5	28.8
$3,000-$10,000	85,000	3.2	12.9
$10,000 and over	11,000	0.4	7.0

As long as income is so poorly distributed as that, surely we have not begun to catch a glimpse of what it means to have a new social ideal.

The Prime Minister suggested that under the circumstances we should reform, which according to him means regulate. If we in this corner are correct in our studies, I would say that it is impossible to reform the present system; that it is impossible effectively to regulate it and the only thing to do is to work out a new system. That is why we have gone forward with our idea of a cooperative commonwealth.

An hon. MEMBER: Words.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Somebody says "words." No, not words; it represents a new ideal. Whether hon. members agree with us—and I would frankly admit that this is a matter for discussion and I cannot hope they will all agree with us—I contend that it represents a new ideal, one that is now being held by a very large number of people throughout the world, and one that is gradually crystallizing in the form of political parties. Undoubtedly the elections, if not the one to be held next summer, will in the near future be fought on this issue of reform and regulation or, if you will, stabilization, on the one hand and on the other the establishment of an entirely new economic system.

We suggest two things that must characterize the new system. First of all the profit motive must be subordinated to that of public service. The Prime Minister would I think be the first to admit, and certainly the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) will admit, that under our present system the profit motive has run wild. But this is not because of the fault of the individual; it is because the system is so arranged that the big prizes go almost automatically to the most unscrupulous or those who to-day are occupying positions of special privilege. We say that the whole conception of making profit must give way to the new one of giving service to the public. That means reorganization in a great many ways. I am not one of those who suggest that we have to have a highly bureaucratic system of state socialism. I do not want that; I think there are always dangers connected with such a system. If we look at the situation as it exists in Canada, I fancy certain things will naturally be carried on by the federal authorities. We already have our railroads, one of them in name publicly owned, though the Prime Minister told us last year that it was owned not by the people but by the bond holders. Some day I hope the railroads will be publicly owned not only in name but in reality. That is one move. To-day even the Liberals or at least a certain number of them are committed to the public ownership of banks.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of the central bank.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; I was giving them credit for altogether too much—to the public ownership of the central bank. At least if the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) takes that position, his leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) has not so far expressed himself very clearly on the matter. Undoubtedly the federal parliament will have to control our banking system and certain other things that are essentially general in character. There are other matters that may be taken over by the provinces, such as not merely the distribution of liquor as we have it in Quebec, Ontario and most of the other provinces at present, but possibly the distribution of bread and milk and coal and other essential public services. That can be done through the provinces.

Other things could be managed by the municipalities. We already have in my city the public hydro. In Toronto they have the public transportation system. In all these matters the difference between private and public ownership is this: that private ownership is concerned with making as much profit as possible while under public ownership we are seeking to give as great service as possible. That is true even though we have the competition of privately owned corporations with our publicly owned systems—more than that, even though most of us are obsessed with the profit motive. Some of these days we will get rid of many of these hampering ideas inherited from the past. Further than that, we would like to work toward the free development of a large number of cooperative institutions. Some time ago we had producers cooperation exhibited more or less in the wheat pools in the west and I think that principle was sound. We would have consumers' cooperatives. If I am rightly informed, about one-third, if not more of all the families of Great Britain are now members of their various consumers' cooperatives. I should like to see similar cooperatives fostered and established in this country. I should like to see the government take a strong stand in the matter of giving these cooperatives a chance, and curbing the private competitors that now make it so difficult for them to do business. Along these and kindred lines we seek to develop the cooperative principle under which the profit motive would be subordinated to the public service.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the hon. member be kind enough to tell me when it will be convenient for him to answer the fifty-five questions which I have asked him?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no thought whatever of answering the fifty-five questions. I have not even read them. I shall answer questions that are relevant to the matters in hand and that have not been dealt with.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. POULIOT: Then may I ask the hon. member to define what he means by the word "profit."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not time; I have only a few minutes left. The hon. member can find the definition in the dictionary.

Mr. POULIOT: But I have not my hon. friend's dictionary.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Further than that, under a cooperative commonwealth we shall get rid of ruthless competition, which will be replaced by collective ownership under democratic control. We have nearly all been born and brought up under an individualistic system. Many of us are children of the pioneers of this country, and we naturally like to think of carrying on each man by himself. But to-day the world has been swept into a position in which very few people are carrying on their own affairs in their own ways; we are living in the midst of a collective system. We travel on a great railway system—there are only two in this country to-day; we deal with banks—there are only some ten of them in this country to-day. We cannot start our own little individual business. The trouble is that the collective system under which we are living is under the control of a very small group of people who are using that system to feather their own nests rather than give service to the public. Under these more or less monopolistic conditions we believe that we must take the next step forward; this collective machinery should be used for the public benefit, and that can be brought about only by some real measure of democratic control. I do not mean that everything must be governed by a parliament such as this; parliament as it is now constituted is hardly fit to carry on the business entrusted to it, much less to carry on a lot of detailed business such as would be involved in taking over a number of enterprises. But we can have commissions appointed—

Mr. POULIOT: Bureaucracy!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it is not bureaucracy. On those commissions would be represented the people engaged in the industry, which is an altogether different situation from what we have to-day.

Mr. POULIOT: Who will appoint them?

An hon. MEMBER: The U.S.S.R.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, someone says the U.S.S.R.—the old cry. I thought we might at least get through one debate without having something of that kind dragged in.

An hon. MEMBER: Litvinoff.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I perceive that these gibes are being directed not against me, but against the Prime Minister.

Only last Saturday we had a meeting of the council of our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and I was very glad to have that council draw up a statement of our position in view of the Prime Minister's so-called reform legislation. This was not a preelection manifesto, as the papers had it. I should like to read a few paragraphs—it was in some of the papers this morning:

In the opinion of the National Council of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation the program of the federal government is entirely inadequate to meet the situation.

Reform or reconstruction; that is the issue.

That capitalism has broken down even the old parties now agree. Debt, unemployment, insecurity, the hopeless position of youth, are signs of an economic system in decay. Their persistence and the failure of reform measures in all countries confirm the repeated declarations of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in respect to the economic problem.

The old parties tell us that the system can be patched up by "reforms." But if reforms have not solved the problem in other countries how can the same reform solve it in Canada?

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes that capitalism can be neither reformed nor restored: Profit for the few and prosperity for the masses are incompatible. The only permanent solution of our problems is to get rid of capitalism and replace it by a new social order, the cooperative commonwealth.

Effective reconstruction must begin where human suffering is greatest. We therefore propose the following as the first steps towards the cooperative commonwealth:

(1) Finance:

Socialization of all financial institutions so as to secure control of prices and production and to finance socially useful public works and services by national credit.

(2) Agriculture:

(a) Adequate minimum income for the farmer as a first charge on his production.

(b) Statutory reduction of the farmer's debts, with prevention of forclosure and eviction.

(c) Planned extension of markets for farm products.

(d) Bringing the price level of what the farmer sells into line with the price level of what he buys.

(e) Encouragement of producers' and consumers' cooperatives.

(f) Socialization of packing and other processing plants.

(3) Labour and Social Services:

(a) An immediate large-scale program of socially useful public works, including housing financed by public credit.

(b) A national minimum wage to give every family a standard of living commensurate with the nation's capacity to produce wealth.

(c) Protection and encouragement of trade unions and workers' organizations, and an effective voice for the workers in the management of industry.

(d) National non-contributory social insurance with adequate benefits against unemployment, sickness, accident, old age and death.

(e) Socialized health services.

(f) The six hour day and five day week, to be increased or decreased according to social need.

(g) Abolition of relief camps.

The carrying through of even these proposals will, of course, involve extensive socialization of industry and social planning, as outlined in the Regina manifesto of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BAKER: If I may ask the hon. gentleman a question, is his desire for revolution instead of evolution?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You can call it what you like. Ask your own Prime Minister what he means by reform.

Mr. BAKER: I am asking the hon. member.

Mr. POULIOT: Who will pay for all this?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who pays for all things to-day? The people.

Mr. POULIOT: But if they make no profit it would be impossible for them to pay.

Mr. R. K. ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in his presentation of his case. I notice, however, that he has considerably changed his policy from that of a year ago. He is coming towards the Conservative policy as enunciated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the speech from the throne. For the first time he has put on Hansard the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, we did it last year.

An hon. MEMBER: This is a new policy.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): It is a new policy, then, because it is not the same policy as before. The hon. member objected to the discussion in this house on Thursday last of the empire trade agreements. I am going to discuss these empire trade agreements because they are part of the Conservative policy and we are discussing at the present moment the policies of political parties. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation presented their case to the country in the last two or three provincial elections, and got considerable support; consequently they feel entitled now to take their place as a real political party. The hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) presented a resolution—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I submit that at the moment we are discussing a specific proposal and it is hardly fair to divert the discussion to an altogether different matter, one that is already on the order paper, one that has been discussed and presumably will be discussed again. I suggest that the hon. member is entirely out of order.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): We are discussing political parties and their policies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): The hon. gentleman has presented the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and the policy of the Conservative party has been put on Hansard—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I press my point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): —in connection with the empire trade agreements.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no question about the point of order raised. There is already on the order paper, in the name of Mr. Harris, a motion with respect to the operation of the Ottawa agreements, and I think the hon. gentleman will be quite out of order in discussing them on this motion.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. Those agreements were part of the policy which led up to the program enunciated at the opening of this session in the speech from the throne, and ever since he took office in 1930 the Prime Minister has been leading up to the proposal now before the house in connection with the relief of unemployment. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has given the house his policy in connection with the relief of unemployment, but that policy has been greatly changed since he first presented it here. He has also changed the name of his party by leaving out the word "federation." Evidently he is being educated by what he hears in this house, and is changing his attitude accordingly.

I should like to refer to a statement issued by the North American Life Association Company as the result of an investigation conducted by them. They take one hundred men at twenty-five years of age, and show that at the end of forty years, when most of these men have reached the end of their earning ability, sixty-one will be living and thirty-nine will have died. Of the sixty-one still living, fifty-two or more than fifty per cent of the original number, will be living on charity or will be dependent upon the assistance of friends and relatives, leaving only nine who will be independent. Of the nine, five will be working for a living, while four will have earned and set aside enough for their old age. This would seem to indicate that under present conditions it is very difficult for the average man to lay aside sufficient during his working years to take care of his old age, which would seem to show that something is wrong with the system under which we have been operating up to the present time. This depression has caused great distress throughout the country, and I should like to read the solution suggested by the ex-kaiser with regard to this point:

1. Unemployment cannot be cured by material means alone, for it is "spiritual distress."
2. While it is true that the machine threatens our entire economic life, yet the mind of man, which created the machine, will also "find ways and means of effectively meeting the excesses of technics."
3. One effective way of meeting unemployment is that of taking industrial workers out of the big cities and away from the machine-dominated factory, and "putting them to work at building streets and canals, or cultivating waste land, or colonizing them" as small farmers.
4. For the machine, as for business, certain regulatory laws must be promulgated "so that its planless, inorganic multiplication and use may cease."
5. This regulations must come about "by international agreement."

In his seclusion in Holland the ex-kaiser has been able to view what has been going on in the rest of the world.

The proposition advanced by my hon. friend is simply a socialistic program. Socialism has not been a success in the world. I should like to quote from a very pertinent article written by a Toronto man named Frederic Davidson. I do not know who he is, but his remarks go right to the point. He says:

Socialism would socialize initiative—and slay it; would submerge the gifted who alone bring forth all that makes life worth living here below. Socialism takes from those who have, by reason of their initiative and self reliance, and gives to those who have not, who never could have otherwise, without these qualities. Socialism thinks it can get nothing without taking what belongs to others. And in this it sees clearly, for socialism is sterile, non-productive.

Socialism never has produced anything in the world and never will, because it takes the people in the mass and not by the individual. The individual who has initiative.

courage and ability has always produced what has made the world better. The London Morning Post recently contained a very interesting article, from which I should like to read a few sentences:

"The moral and intellectual wealth of a nation," says Galton, "largely consists in the multifarious variety of the gifts of the men who compose it, and it would be the very reverse of improvement to make all its members assimilate to a common type. . . . "Civilizations," says Gustave Le Bon, "have been created and directed, not by crowds, but by a small intellecual aristocracy. . . . Nor can education make men equal, since it confirms the inferior mind in its inferiority while strengthening the superior mind in its superiority.

Evolution, then, does not equalize; it differentiates, and not only in individuals, but in classes. Man is said to have emerged from a primitive communism, in which all enjoyed the cold and precarious equality of the cave-level; but he has been sorted out in the course of ages into classes and vocations, every one the complement of the others, and now lives in an ordered society, highly complex and infinitely differentiated. By an atavistic impulse the socialist would obliterate all class differences and reduce mankind to its original state.

In other words socialism would reduce all classes to a common level, and all classes would be controlled by the state. Eventually there would be only two classes, the governors and the governed, and in a few generations we would be back where we were many centuries ago. Then the old fight for freedom and liberty would have to be fought all over again. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says we have no liberty of speech in Canada to-day. I say we have in Canada to-day the greatest liberty of speech the world has had at any time. At the present time a man can say almost anything he likes so long as he does not advocate violence against the state. If Mr. Tim Buck comes to Ottawa he will have the privilege of addressing any number of people he can get to listen to him, if he will simply keep within the law.

Capitalism has been blamed for all the ills of life. The hon. member moving the resolution said that capitalism has outlived its usefulness, and that it must be done away with. I want to say that capitalism has been a great success, and in essence it is sound and will prevail. The capitalist is the only fly in the ointment. He is the man who has caused all the distress of the world, and he must be eliminated—not the capitalist system, but the capitalist himself. Capitalism has produced a superabundance of all the necessities and luxuries of life, and at the same time it has eliminated the sweat from the brow of man. It has made this system the greatest and most wonderful in the world's history. To talk of scrapping a system which has given such service is plain insanity. I say that to the hon. member, and any man who talks about scrapping the capitalistic system must have a loose cell in his brain and ought to have a surgical operation to cement it into place.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the hon. member undertake to do the job?

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Probably in the case of the hon. member it would be a little dangerous. Any system which can produce such overabundance with so little labour can and will distribute its benefits to all classes of humanity, if it is given time to adjust itself to our changing needs.

I emphasize again, as I did two years ago, that the change must come gradually and imperceptibly. Impatience would create an upheaval which would destroy the system and the people themselves. We are moving rapidly enough towards a socialistic state. During the last few years we have been going in that direction very rapidly, and if we continue to follow that course we will have a socialistic system unless we bolster up the capitalistic system. I am not advocating a policy of laissez-faire, but I am supporting the policy enunciated by the Prime Minister in the speech from the throne. I would recommend eliminating the defects in the capitalistic system and bringing it up to date. The utopia envisioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre cannot function to-day; it cannot function until the human heart has been purged of greed and selfishness. That has been the cause of the downfall of the capitalistic system.

I have but a few more remarks to make, because I realize my voice is not in good condition to-day. Two years ago I advocated that the government would be wise to set up a system whereby certain of the unemployed men eligible for such work could return to small acreages of land. The idea was to take many of these men out of the towns and put them on small acreages, give them some assistance in the building of their houses, and instructions as to how to work their property. As a result they would have a stake in the country, and I believe in a few years they would be in a position to pay back what they had borrowed from the government. Some who are now discontented would be satisfied; they would have something to do, and would not be standing about on street corners and criticizing other people.

A few days ago I read in the Ottawa Journal an article written by a man from Gatineau, Quebec, who signs himself "J.J.F." Although not formerly a farmer his statement indicates he would like to get back to the land. These are his words:

> To one who, like myself, looks over his shoulder at the forty-years-old dead line, the question obtrudes itself "Whither goest thou?" The answer always is: "I do not know." And there are many who must make the same unsatisfactory reply.
>
> There could, however, be a different one. There is a solution for such as I. Merely the agency to give it effect is lacking. It is a modified "back-to-the-land" movement. Not back to the farm—I have never done farming on a large scale—but back to the land nevertheless: To the large garden and the raising of fowl, etc. These things I have done, and could do again. It is no royal road to riches but it is a highway to a living, to peace of mind, to self respect and to the lost luxury of work. It would put back the "dead line" another twenty years.
> There must be, I am sure, many suitable locations for such an enterprise, which are now either temporarily vacant or abandoned. The only immediate needs are two to five acres of land, a house that can be made habitable and water. Given such a location free for one year, I would guarantee to pay rent thereafter and eventually to buy. There are many others, I feel certain, who would take advantage of such an opportunity.

That is one way to employ the unemployed. From the Chicago Daily News I have extracted the following to indicate the cost of employing the unemployed in public works undertakings:

> There is no costlier form of relief than public works. Take one point of the new program, the elimination of grade crossings. The New York Times has made a study of the elimination last year of a grade crossing at Great Neck, New York, half by the state, half by the Long Island Railroad. The job gave direct employment to 185 men for eleven months at an average cost per man of $3,500. Direct relief for each man would have cost $432. To employ these men, in this case, cost eight times as much as direct relief would have cost.

That is a most interesting commentary on the expensive proposition of giving employment to unemployed through a program of public works.

In the reconstruction program proposed I would ask the government not to forget the largest class in the dominion, namely the middle class. If we are to judge by the present attempts being made towards reconstruction it is obvious the middle class will get the worst of it. They do not get any benefits from government relief. They are too wealthy to obtain relief from the government, but they are not wealthy enough to obtain the services given to labour, services which the wealthy can quite easily pay for. When they reach old age these people are dependent upon the money they have invested in bonds, stocks and securities of different kinds. The tendency to-day is to reduce the interest rates on those bonds or stocks. In a few years these people, who are now self-sustaining and would be in a position to maintain themselves in their old age, will be on the list of unemployed and will have to receive relief. I should like to ask the government, municipal authorities and industrial concerns to have consideration for and help to keep solvent that class which has paid by far the greatest amount in taxes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in support of the resolution now before the house, I may say that I shall not take very much time to answer the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) who spoke just before the dinner recess. I can assure him that the party to which I belong has changed neither its program nor its name, although he may think so. As a matter of fact what he really thought was a change on our part was that he was hearing advocated in other quarters some of the policies we have been advocating for years, and becoming more familiar with them he does not now think them so wild and terrible as they appeared to him two years ago. The change really has been in himself and not in us.

The hon. gentleman made certain statements which he himself proceeded to answer. He said that socialism had never been a success anywhere. Then he told us that we were proceeding as rapidly as possible towards socialism, which from his point of view cannot be a desirable thing. Then he told us that capitalism was an unqualified success, and from statistics went on to prove that about eighty per cent of the people under the capitalist system died in poverty, leaving no property, not even enough to bury them. With that I agree.

I should like to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) as to who is going to pay for all these social improvements we are suggesting. Who is going to pay for all these improvements in human society? As a matter of fact, I think it is fairly easy to tell him who is going to pay for them. Wealth can be and is produced only by applying human labour to natural resources. Then those who are going to pay for everything are those who apply that labour. When we look around us and see the wealth on every hand—our great cities, our farms, our great industries, our railways—that is the wealth of the world, and that has been created by human labour. The reason we are in the depression we are in to-day, Mr. Speaker, is because labour did not get enough for producing that wealth, and that is the answer to my hon. friend's question as to who is going to pay.

The thought in this resolution is the most important question before the people of the civilized world to-day. It is the topic of conversation wherever a few people are gathered together. That is, can the present capitalist system be reformed, or what are we going to put in its place? These are the questions that are uppermost in the minds of thinking people to-day, and anyone who does not consider that question important is dead from the chin up.

Two years ago when a similar resolution was moved in this house there was a great deal of opposition to it, of course, and no doubt there are a great many people to-day who will not accept the thought embodied in the resolution. However, regardless of the reception which the resolution may receive, I am quite satisfied that the ideas which we are putting forward are making progress and are meeting with a more and more favourable reception every day.

I have said that almost all thinking people the world over who are giving any thought to the questions of the day are inquiring and thinking about these changes that must come about. I recollect that last session the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) touched on this subject in his speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. At page 612 of Hansard of 1934 he said in part:

> If I may take just a few more minutes I should like to conclude with a few observations upon a subject which I regard as of even greater importance.

That was of even greater importance than the question he had just been discussing. He went on:

> I believe that by legislation of some sort, by planning or by some adjustment, there should be brought about in this country a condition whereby the spread between the return to labour and the return to capital should not be so great. I have made that statement before in this house. I do not know whether it is the enunciation of a socialist doctrine, but I believe that if the man who produces, who labours on the farm, in the factory—and perhaps I am thinking more particularly of the factory—in the mine or elsewhere does not receive enough money in return to enable him to buy back that which he produces, you are bound to have depression.

That is very clear, and as I said a moment ago, the reason we have this depression to-day is that those who have produced the wealth of the world have not received sufficient for producing it to enable them to consume or use it. The hon. member for North Waterloo went on:

> I am not going to say just how that is going to be brought about. My friends in the corner say that it can be done only by entirely scrapping the present system. I am not ready to go so far as that; I do not believe my hon. friends in the corner of the house are ready to take hold of matters and bring all these things about. If we did anything of that kind I fear we might end in chaos, a condition which would be worse than what we have to-day.

Of course, whether it would be better or worse would depend altogether upon the person who is speaking. I know a great many people in this dominion who think that their condition at the present time could not be any worse than it is now. I am doubtful if the hon. member for North Waterloo realizes what we mean when we say that this system must be scrapped or abolished. I hope he has not in his mind the idea that we wish to destroy the capital or industrial equipment that we now have. That is not what we mean at all, and no sensible person who gave the matter a moment's thought would suggest that we were thinking of anything of that kind. Capital is not so much a material thing as it is a social relationshp, and it is that social relationship and the purpose for which we now use capital that will have to be abolished or scrapped—whichever word you prefer—and not the equipment itself. When we have changed the purpose of production, that is, when we begin to produce things to meet the needs of the community and not for the purpose of making profits for the owners of the machinery of production, then we have abolished capitalism; but we have not abolished the equipment and the instruments of production, which is altogether a different thing.

I should like to quote an authority who has been quoted in this house on previous occasions, if the hon. member for Témiscouata will bear with me in this. Sir Arthur Salter, who has also been on the air recently, makes this statement:

> We cannot restore the old competitive system. We must recognize that there must be increasing socialization and increasing control of such activities as are not completely socialized.

Two years ago Sir Arthur Salter would not have gone so far as that, but he has been thinking. He has been observing the development of economic conditions, and he has come to the conclusion that there is no solution for our problems except more and more socialization, more control of the means of production and distribution.

The resolution now before the house is in two parts. The first contains a statement of fact, that the capitalist system is failing to function in the interest of the great majority of the people of Canada. There is not the slightest doubt about that. The second part of the resolution recommends that since the present system is failing to function it should be replaced by a system that will function. Although the resolution does not say so explicitly, the implication is there that the system is failing to function because it is based on the profit motive. Consequently the resolution asks that the present system be superseded by a system from which the profit motive will be eliminated, so that instead of competing for rewards we should cooperate for social benefit.

What should be the objective of any rational system of production—any economic system? The rational objective of any economic system should be the supplying of the social needs of the people as fully and on as equitable a basis as possible. Measured by these two reasonable and attainable ideals, our present system, everyone must agree, has broken down and the opponents of the resolution must admit the failure of the system or else in some logical way justify the glaring paradox of our time, poverty in the midst of plenty. Those who disagree with the resolution virtually maintain that property rights are more important than human rights; that on the one side are the few with property and on the other side the many with their needs, and that they are going to stand with the few and with property. There is no middle course whereby each should have consideration. If we follow profit then we must leave the road that leads to social service, and vice versa. I have here a copy of a pamphlet which I believe each of the members has received. It is a report of the findings of a commission which was appointed by the United Church of Canada in 1932. After considerable study the commission embodied their findings in this report, the title of which is Christianizing the Social Order, and the report is signed by Sir Robert Falconer and Doctor W. T. Brown of Victoria College, Toronto. In a paragraph dealing with the defects of modern industry they say:

> Despite the enormous gains made possible by the employment of modern science in the service of human needs, we are confronted with a new fact—dire want in the midst of plenty. Production is deliberately restricted and produce is destroyed, not because it is not needed, but because that procedure promises higher prices. Human energy is often diverted from the production of the essential needs of life to socially undesirable or useless ends. Both in towns and rural areas people are compelled to live in dwellings which lack the ordinary conveniences of modern housing, or are so overcrowded as to make decency and health almost impossible; yet the material for building and the energy of builders are available in abundance.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

I have read from this report because, on looking over the Parliamentary Guide, I find that a great many of the members of the house are members of the United Church of Canada, and I would ask them to take this report and study it closely. If they do so I am sure they will find that it goes a long way in the direction of what we have been advocating in this house for the last five years.

I wish to quote very briefly once more from the report of the commission, but before doing so I must touch on another point. We have sometimes been accused of stirring up class antagonisms and engendering class hate. To this we plead not guilty. These class antagonisms and this class strife were already in existence, created by the very conditions that create classes. If we have referred at any time to classes we have referred to them only as a physician might refer to a condition he found after examining his patient. We found certain conditions prevailing in human society; we found want and misery in the midst of abundance and consequently came to the conclusion that that want and that misery, side by side with abundance, could not possibly exist except in a society where there were classes. So that we are therefore no more responsible for what we have found than the physician is responsible for the disease he may find after he has diagnosed his patient's symptoms. In this regard I would quote the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). He has been quoted several times to-day, but I will put one or two more quotations on the record. In his radio address on January 4 he said:

> Let us first examine income. To do so, I think it is helpful for the purpose of their discussion, to divide all recipients of income, from whatever sources, into two broad classes: non-producers, and producers or workers. . . . The non-producer does not work for his income. It is his invested money which works.

He goes on to say:

> Now, we may divide the producer or worker into three basic classes: the rural and urban worker, the agriculturist, and what is sometimes colloquially called the white collar worker. This latter class shares in common with their brethren in agriculture and industry, the hardships of these times. Their problems are essentially the same and they stand in need of the same measure of relief from them.

All that is necessary to make that statement complete is to say, "Workers of the world, unite; you have nothing to lose but your chains. You have a world to gain."

To quote once more from the pamphlet to which I have already referred, Christianizing the Social Order:

> The strife between classes and groups growing out of the social stratification based on income, and the economic struggle for a larger share of the product of industry, is a factor of increasing significance both in national and international life. The struggle enters the international field when national groups of producers or financiers seek privileged access to raw materials or markets. This economic nationalism has now become more perilous than at any other time, for those who seek privilege within the nation tend to influence governments and to evade control; and then in their exploitation of new fields they veil their private interests in the garments of national honour and glory. When they succeed in this the economic conflict passes over into international war.

The division of the country into classes, based on ownership or income, or the access to the means of life, leads therefore to strife. Not only does it create strife within the nation; it leads to strife outside it as well, and it leads, as the report says, to international war.

I will give a further example of this class division by referring to the United States. In the United States in 1933 was commenced a program which is sometimes called the Roosevelt experiment. All of us remember the extent to which when the present president of the United States came into office on March of that year, the industrial collapse had gone in that country; the whole economic life of the nation was almost paralyzed and the capitalist class there had no idea what to do to get out of the mess in which they found themselves. Mr. Roosevelt began putting his program into effect and at the beginning there was no obstruction whatever; the capitalist class of the United States were so discredited that they did not dare to raise their voices. Mr. Roosevelt began to use the nation's credit to start the wheels of industry going, and improvement began to take place. But the moment that was accomplished the resistance from the owning class of the United States began. That resistance has continued until to-day so that the new deal is in a state of collapse. Let me assure the Prime Minister that if he goes ahead with a radical program that is worth while, that will improve the conditions of the masses of the people of this country, he will receive the same obstruction and opposition from the owning class here as President Roosevelt has received from the owning class in the republic to the south of us.

A short while ago I read in a book a statement—I believe the mover of the resolution (Mr. Woodsworth) made the statement to-day—that profits for the owners of capital and prosperity for the masses were entirely incompatible. Of course that is one reason why the present economic system cannot be reformed or restored. May I put the situation in this way: the necessity of making profits precludes the possibility of solving our problems under the present system. That is so because the capitalistic system is based essentially on the law of supply and demand; in other words, the law of supply and demand of goods and services is the governor which regulates business activity. Society itself is not supposed to take thought as to how its needs are to be supplied; that is left to the desire for gain which is inherent in all of us. No wonder we are in the difficult position in which we find ourselves! The theory is—and I believe it is correct—that where there is a demand for a commodity or service, people who have capital to invest will invest it in the production of that commodity or service. When the supply exceeds the demand, prices will fall and then capital will desert that particular field of production and seek a field in which the demand exceeds the supply. But when prices fall for the reason mentioned, profits also decrease. Therefore it becomes clear that in order that these people may continue making profits, the demand must always exceed the supply; that is, in order that profits may be made, we must have scarcity. The moment we enter into an age of abundance, such an age as we are living in now, at that moment profits become impossible. Man's ingenuity, his inventive genius, along with the kindness of nature has ushered us into an age of abundance, an age in which there is no scarcity, and consequently unlimited profits such as were made in the past are quite impossible.

An hon. MEMBER: Except by creating an artificial scarcity.

Mr. MacINNIS: Except by creating an artificial scarcity. There is however a very definite limit to that. The development of capitalism has created such a large industrial organization that large numbers of workers are divorced from all contact with their means of livelihood and consequently have to be taken care of out of the earnings of industry in some way or another.

Some of our opponents are opposed to our policy because they say it will interfere with private property. That may be true in a sense, but the freeing of the chattel slaves also interfered with private property; yet will anyone say that that was not a step in human progress? The situation in which we find ourselves to-day is that we have slavery of another kind—the ownership of the means of production in the hands of a few and the great mass of the people without access to those means of production except on the terms laid down by their owners. Consequently they are just as much slaves as were the chattel slaves; all the freedom they have is to work, if any is available, on the terms laid down by the owners of industry, or to starve.

Property is of two kinds; there is property in the means of production, corporate property, which cannot be said to-day to be private property in any true sense of the term. No one can put his hands on the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Bank of Montreal or any of those large institutions and say: That is my property. It is corporate property. That kind of property has value to the people who say they own it or are the shareholders in it, because the community uses it. The moment the community ceases to use any kind of corporate property, it ceases to have any value. The railway companies complain about the competition of motor bus and motor truck transportation. What are they complaining about? What they are complaining about is that the community, the people of Canada, are transferring their patronage from the railways to the motor buses and trucks and consequently are taking the value out of the Canadian Pacific and putting it into the other form of transportation. What I think is quite a logical conclusion to come to is that if the people of the nation, because of using an institution of any kind, give value to it, the nation or the community should own it and use it and appropriate the proceeds of it, whatever they may be.

I would have liked, had there been time, to mention other objections that are sometimes raised to socialism, or to a cooperative system, whichever term one cares to use. One of the objections I have heard on many occasions to socialism, is that it would break up the home. At home yesterday morning I listened to a service broadcast from one of the United churches in Ottawa, and I heard the pastor pray for the homeless single men in our unemployment camps. It is strange that under a system of society that was going to preserve the home we should have in a great rich country such as Canada a class that we call homeless single men, or homeless men of any kind. It means that these men's homes have been broken up, that they have been deprived of their homes. To break up the home is one thing that socialism will not have to do; capitalism has already done it. A little less than a year ago the child welfare committee of the League of Nations took up the matter of the condition of children in poor homes. A report in the Vancouver Daily Province of April 18, 1934, says:

> Alarm over the disastrous effects of the depression everywhere is strongly expressed in the draft report of the league's child welfare committee made public at its meeting.
> Struck by the serious character of psychological effects produced by depression upon children, and of the strained and discouraged family atmosphere which is inevitable in homes suffering from unemployment.
>
> The committee emphasizes the necessity of removing children from the pernicious atmosphere of their own home during the greater part of the day and sending them to nursery schools, recreation centres and reading rooms in order that they may enjoy quietness and freedom from care and irritation which are essential conditions to their development.
> The committee recommends all governments to reexamine their legislation with a view to safeguarding better unity of the family, assuring the child's development and protecting his self respect.

We agree with that. But I think we also agree and maintain, at any rate I do, that while under certain circumstances and for a certain part of the day a child should be in school or kindergarten from an early age, yet the child who is deprived of the love and care that it should receive in a proper home is forced into society under a handicap that he will never overcome. Even if for no other reason than that, it is time we considered our social organization. These young men in our unemployment camps will carry all their lives the scars of their present circumstances, but we should at least begin to make provision for the children yet unborn, the future citizens of this country, that they may be able to build up a country of which they may be proud, although we cannot be proud of the present conditions. But we are hoping for something better. It is because of the conditions that we find about us, for which capitalism has no answer, that we ask this house to take into consideration the immediate changing over of our economic system in order that the machinery of production may be released from the restrictions placed upon it by the profit motive, allowing us to use it to the utmost to provide people with food, clothing and shelter and give access to a full cultural life for every citizen of this dominion.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouta): First, Mr. Speaker, I shall answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He said this afternoon that he had not read the fifty-five questions that the member for Témiscouata had put to him on February 9, 1933. I admit the hon. gentleman may not have read them all, but he has heard a few of them, because they were recited in an audible voice in this house when he was here. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) said, as reported at page 1950 of Hansard:

> Would the hon. member permit me to inform him that his questions are so hot that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has left the chamber.
> Mr. Heaps: In deference to the hon. gentleman who has left the chamber, I think my hon. friend from South Essex ought to have first found out why he left it.

Then the member for Témiscouta continued:

> I do not discuss that viewpoint. I simply wish to put my questions on record in Hansard in order that everyone may take cognizance of them. My next question follows—

Sir, it is very easy to understand what has been said in plain language in this house. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre heard about half the questions I directed to him, and then instead of staying to the end he left the house, a thing that he very seldom does. I am sorry that he left the house when I was not through asking him questions in very polite language. Those questions were not based on quotations from Sir Arthur Salter or from the United church or from a book whose author has not been named before by his son-in-law. They were based on pure logic. Logic is something with which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is not familiar; that is the main trouble with him, he has no logic. He has not the faculty of analyzing facts. He knows certain facts, but he does not distinguish between the system and the individual. I admit that capitalists have often been wrong. Widows who have in the bank the proceeds of insurance on the life of a husband now deceased are legitimate capitalists. In a different class of capitalist is the man who took advantage of the fact that he had supported the present government to request the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to increase the tariff, insinuating that trade might be increased thereby, who lied to the government in telling them that if the tariff was raised he would employ more men and pay them better wages. That is one fault I find with capitalism—no, not with capitalism, but with certain capitalists. We have sharks in this country, I admit that; but from that are we to conclude that everyone who has property of some kind is to hand it over to the control of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre and my hon. friend from Vancouver South? Would it be safe for them to entrust all their investments and property to those who, though men of good faith, know nothing about the business of this country? That is not a harsh statement; I will prove it.

If all the bills these two hon. gentlemen have presented to this house had been adopted, do you think the capitalist system would have disappeared from this country? What did they do in this house to alter the laws on our statute books, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) since 1921 and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) since 1930? What is their record with regard to legislation? It is nil. They cannot even boast about getting the house to change section 98 of the criminal code; it was done by the Liberal party. If our social order is so bad why did not my hon. friends come to this house and do something to change the order? What are they doing to-day? My hon. friend from Vancouver South has introduced a bill to change the elections act. What has he tried to change in the social order of this country? It is all humbug and deceit. Was that intentional or was it not? Perhaps it was unconscious; the hon. member is here to say. Those hon. gentlemen come here with the shoes of the actors in Roman theatres, one pair for comedy and another pair for tragedy.

I hear these hon. gentlemen speak about the troubles of the workingmen in this country. I have a right to speak about those social matters, because when I was on the other side of the house I was the first member to quote figures with regard to employment and low wages in the province of Quebec; my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre remembers that. My hon. friend from Vancouver South will not remember, because he was not in the house then. Before the labour members did anything with regard to working conditions in my native province I gave figures, which are on record in Hansard, showing how the workingmen of my province were paid in comparison with the workingmen in other provinces. I was a humble man, a lawyer, not a tram conductor, not a man working on the wharves of Vancouver but a lawyer who meets people and tries to do his best for them. I was and am a humble man, but a man of sincerity and a man who knew where he was going. I worked for a long time with the officials of the Department of Labour, and from the bottom of my heart I thank Hon. Peter Heenan, who was Minister of Labour at the time, for the help he gave me on that occasion. What was the result? A year later legislation was introduced by the Minister of Labour in the Mackenzie King government regulating the wages and hours of labour of the men employed by the federal government. Thus a lead was given the provinces, and if that lead has not been followed it is not our fault. But may I say, sir, that what was done at that time by the member for Témiscouata should have been done a long time previously by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who never thought of it. He was busy reading this and that.

Well, sir, enough of that. If I were one of the electors of the constituency of Vancouver South, after listening to what my hon. friend has just said I would say to myself, "He may be sincere, but where is he going? He does not know his way." His leader, who preceded him, spoke about party capital. Does he forget that party capital is one form, perhaps the worst, of capitalism? That is what I wish to tell him. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, "No Litvinoff,; no Russia;" he does not like us to speak about Russia or Litvinoff. I should like to see him prevent me from comparing him with Litvinoff; I should like to see him prevent me from telling him that the only difference between the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and Gandhi is the goat and the spinning wheel. I am a free man, and I am here to say what I sincerely think about his policies. He comes here with a resolution so vague that he cannot explain it. That is why these hon. members have not brought in any sort of legislation to change the social order; they do not know what they want. They come with a spot-light like those who kill game in a forbidden way. They come with a spot-light to blind the eyes of the people; but God forbid that those policies ever should be adopted in Canada. They never will be, because like castles in the air they have no foundation.

These hon. gentlemen have not taken time to think over the real conditions in this country. They accept hearsay evidence all the time because they cannot form their own judgment on the facts available to them. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he had not read the questions I put to him. I will prove, sir, that he is greatly mistaken, and to do so I need only refer to another big book, the Hansard to which I referred a few moments ago. It is a wonderful book with 2,354 pages. It is a most respectable book on account of its size, and I am sure my hon. friends in the extreme corner are delighted to have such an imposing volume shown to them. We have heard something about a change that is coming in our social system, in regard to profits. Plato published a book also, and I might tell my hon. friend from Vancouver South that Plato is a man who has been buried for quite a number of centuries. He published a book called The Republic, in which he described an ideal state, something like the lost paradise, something wonderful, but a state which never existed in the world. Let us come to Plato, who describes the state conceived by my hon. friends, but to which they have not yet given birth. It is an ideal state where no one can make profit, but where taxes will be imposed upon the people. When I asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who would pay for the enormous expenditures, he said that the people would. The people will have to pay for that, while making no profit. It is a mystery. And whether or not the hon. member for Vancouver South quotes Salter, or quotes or misquotes the United church or the other churches, or quotes the book he had a few moments ago the author and title of which he did not mention. I do not see how he can explain how people will be able to pay taxes to anybody if they do not have more money than is strictly required for food, for clothes, or for lodging. If they have more money than is required for those purposes, is that not profit? It would be profit. Therefore, in the state they advocate profit will be necessary, and not only profit, but a higher profit than there is now, because taxes will be higher.

How many people are to-day unable to pay the municipal taxes on their land? If one looks at the official gazette for any province he will find it is much thicker than it was before. Why? Because so many lands are being sold; people cannot pay their taxes; they have no money now. My hon. friends will advocate this garden of Allah; it is very fascinating, but it is just a cross word puzzle, a jig saw puzzle, something extraordinary. Under their system people will make no money, make no profit and pay more taxes. I am reminded of the story about the ship which was 300 feet long, 35 feet wide and had a displacement of 10 feet. There were 400 people on board, together with a crew of 40. The ship had three funnels, two masts and two screws. What is the age of the captain? And, sir, I know a man who worked on that problem for two nights, and he found that the age of the captain was 56 years, 2 months, 3 days and 4 hours. I am sure that gentleman must have been either the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or the hon. member for Vancouver South.

I have before me what was said about profit on another occasion by my hon. friends the dreamers and utopians in the extreme corner of the house. It is different now. I can see the influence of the timid questions put by the hon. member for Témiscouata. Here is the definition which was given on a former occasion:

A federation of organizations whose purpose is the establishment in Canada of a cooperative commonwealth in which the basic principle regulating production, distribution and exchange will be the supply of human needs instead of the making of profits.

We have heard it. When the production is greater than the consumption it should cease, automatically. My hon. friend took the same viewpoint as the Prime Minister, if we may judge by the right hon. gentleman's action in decreasing the acreage of wheat. A decrease in production, that is it. When the production equals the consumption, it would cease automatically, and therefore people would make no profits. That is their ideal state. What about exports?

But now there is a little change in the gospel of Vancouver South and Winnipeg North Centre. We find that no longer is the supply of human needs instead of the making of profits the basic principle regulating production, distribution and exchange. It is that no longer. That is no good. The social system is changed. We have a change in their own social system made by those dreamers and utopians. They have changed it themselves. What is the necessity for the government to change the social order? Hon. members in the corner of the chamber have changed it. They have had enough of their program, the same as people have enough of a motion picture, and it has to be changed in the middle of the week. The change we now have is this:

Resolved that in the opinion of this house, since the capitalist system is failing to function in the interests of the great majority of the people of Canada, it should be superseded by a cooperative commonwealth—

Which is a euphemism for communism,

—in which the profit motive—

—would be subordinated to that of public service and ruthless competition replaced by collective ownership under democratic control.

In the first place there was no making of profits,—the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may rise in his place and deny his attitude if I have not stated it correctly. He must remember what he said at other times. But he has now changed his mind. It is no longer a question of making profits. Profits are now permitted, under the autocratic rule of Winnipeg North Centre and Vancouver South. They say:

It should be superseded by a cooperative commonwealth—

Alias communism—

—in which the profit motive would be subordinated to that of public service.

Subordinated by whom? Subordinated by Winnipeg North Centre; subordinated by Vancouver South. They will be the czars of Canada; they will restore the old order of Russia. That is why they are so angry when we mention Russia. They are czarists. They believe in autocracy. They believe they are the repositories of revealed truth, and they will decree by their own powerful will that the profit motive shall be subordinated to that of public service.

What do they mean by profit? I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to define the word "profit" and he tells me to look at the dictionary. It is not for me to look at the dictionary. The hon. member will recall the words in the Latin grammar, sapiens nihil affirmat quod non probet—the wise man does not affirm anything which he cannot prove. Those are the words of wisdom. They are not Litvinoff's; that is a maxim of truth based on the experiences of the centuries. I will tell my hon. friends, for whom I had respect until now, that if they do not clearly explain their program and their scheme—because it is only a scheme—if they do not explain it in a satisfactory way I will say that it is a contempt for the House of Commons to ask hon. members to listen to such talk as they have uttered. I will tell them that first of all they should go to the basic foundations of social life. Although not covered by section 98 of the criminal code it is really a criminal offence to deceive the Canadian people by telling them that the group in the corner of this chamber will do this, that and the other thing. Those hon. members know very well that without imposing additional taxation it would be impossible for any government to fulfil the foolish promises they have made. It would be impossible to do what they have promised without making greater the burden of taxation which falls upon the shoulders of the good citizens of the country. I will give them one last chance. I will give them the benefit of the doubt. But, Mr. Speaker, I say they should be more serious, and when a member asks them politely for information about their own plans, which they must know, because they are supposed to have conceived them; if they will give no answer at all, I am free to form my own judgment upon them and to tell the electors in my constituency in the province of Quebec and the electors of any other constituency in this wonderful country which is Canada that these gentlemen at the extreme left of this side of the house are not serious, that they are just trying to make party capital, when telling those poor people who are suffering acutely: Follow us; we will give you anything that you wish; put us in power and see the marvels that we shall do in this country."

The candidates of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have received a minimum vote in all the by-elections since the last election. It is true that the Labour member for the city of Hamilton was elected. He visited Russia not long ago and has seen and learned about communism, and the description that he gave to the press of the conditions in Russia was entirely different from the picture which is given of the co-operative commonwealth by our friends to the extreme left. They do not even dare mention the word communism now. But you, Mr. Speaker, are a student, and if you will analyze the social system in Russia, on one hand, and the social system advocated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver South, on the other, you will see that they are one and the same thing, and that the difference is only in the name. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre is of United Empire Loyalist stock just the same as the Prime Minister of this country. He has been brought up in the British traditions of democracy, but I am sorry that he and the Prime Minister have forgotten the teachings of their youth. I regret it from the bottom of my heart. But let me tell you, sir, that although I have no English blood in my veins, just a little Irish blood—

Mr. McINTOSH: Have you no Scotch?

Mr. POULIOT: Not now; nevertheless I say that I am truer to the principles of British democracy and of British government than my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister.

What we hear, sir, is but a deluge of words from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his supporter the hon. member for Vancouver South—a perfect deluge of words. He says: I have compassion for the multitude. This was said by one who was not the Man of Nazareth, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre always says, but it was said by our Lord. There is not a man in this house who, unless he has a heart of stone, can listen unmoved to the sufferings of the poor, but if my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have something better to offer than the present system let them come forward boldly with public bills to amend the laws of this country. Let them tell us where there is injustice from their viewpoint. They must be familiar with the laws of this country. They often say: We are not lawyers, we are not hair-splitters. No, but there is the law maker's intent; there is the intention of the law maker, which counts; and will my hon. friends deny any responsibility for the laws which they have voted for since they have been here? What are their intentions with regard to amending or changing the social order? I hope that they will tell us that or tell us what they have done in that regard Let my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre tell us about the amendments that he has had enacted to change the social order, and then we can judge what would be the result if he could put his will into force and have his ideas enacted into law.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker; I have spoken about these hon. gentlemen for a time, and now through you I am speaking to them. I cannot speak on behalf of the government; I am against them on a matter of principle. I do not dare to speak on behalf of my party, but I can speak for myself as one who has listened to the hon. gentlemen of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and as one who has taken the trouble to read their program—which is no mean task—and to try to get something rational from it. So far as this resolution is concerned there is a missing link between the first part of their argument and the conclusion—not a missing link in the Darwinian sense, but there is a link missing just the same; and I should like to have some more explanation from them. I have put questions to them, and if I am not to receive any further explanation, then when the time comes to discuss this matter once more, or several times more, whether in this house or out of it, we will tell the people that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Vancouver South were not serious and were just playing politics when they brought in their resolution about the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The people of this country in an indignant mood will tell them: You are not going to fool us any more; and then the candidates of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation will not receive even a minority vote, or enough votes to give a chance to any Tory candidate to be elected.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, a resolution similar to the present one but not exactly the same was moved in this house in 1932 and another in 1933. I believe the resolutions of 1932 and 1933 were identical. But when the resolution was moved again in 1934 there was a change in it, and there is a change again now in 1935. I opposed the former resolutions and I rise to oppose this resolution also. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in his address took a good deal to his party when he described the mayor of Toronto as a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation mayor. The mayor of Toronto is a capable gentleman with a great deal of ability, but in the last election, like Joseph, he wore a coat of many colours, one of which was the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. In his support were many well known and staunch Conservatives and many well known and staunch Liberals, and his principal support came as I understand it from the independent Labour party. So the hon. member cannot claim the mayor of Toronto as an out and out C.C.F'er.

The hon. member quoted many articles from the press in which he purported to show that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) had denounced the capitalist system. Well, I listened very attentively to the Prime Minister in all his speeches except the first one; I was not at home on that occasion and had not the pleasure of hearing the speech as it was delivered, but I read it carefully afterwards. My memory is that he denounced the abuses and the violations that had crept into the system and intimated that he and his government would reform the system and cut out the abuses.

The hon. member said further that nobody wanted to abolish capitalists, but I cannot see where that coincides with the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, which was apparently adopted again on February 10, and one item of which reads that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation believes that capitalism can be neither reformed nor restored. So that if capitalism is to be wiped out, of course capitalists go with it. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) said that the program advocated by this resolution of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had not been changed; but I find a change in the resolutions that have been moved except the first two. In 1932 the expression is used "a large number of" in referring to the people, and in the present resolution it says "great majority." In the resolution of 1934 the word "masses" is used whereas, as I say, in the present resolution the people are referred to as the great majority.

I find a slight swinging to the right in the present resolution as compared with the former, because in the present resolution we have the words "by a cooperative commonwealth in which the profit motive would be subordinated to that of public service." Subordinated merely means being on a lower plane. This is the first resolution my hon. friends have moved in which, I take it, from the resolution itself, there is some justification of the profit motive; otherwise the word "subordinated" would not be there but perhaps there would be the words "wiped out" and in that regard it would be on a par with the former resolutions. There is, I say, a swinging just a little to the right from the extreme left position of a few years ago, and in this the mover of the resolution and those supporting him are in line with what is being done in Russia. There is a slight move in Russia towards the right. I have here an associated press dispatch from Moscow under date December 30, 1934, quoting one who I presume is the head of the republic, the Hon. Joseph Stalin, in an address to the metallurgical group of industry. Apparently the iron and steel industry is not making that headway which it would like to see, although it is making progress, and to encourage the men working in the plants producing iron and steel to do better Joseph Stalin is quoted as using the slogan, "Technique without men is dead." And further down:

> Higher pay for efficient technical men was one of the means Stalin suggested to directors of the Soviet iron and steel industries for improvement of their technique.
> "Organize wages so they will strengthen the decisive links of production and prompt people on to higher skill," Stalin urged. "This is what we need in order to create a large army of industrial technical cadres."

That is quite a move to the right, because in all the arguments that have come out of Russia we were given to understand that there was to be equal pay for similar work. So that we find them swinging slightly to the right over there; and our friends in the opposite corner, leaving in their resolution the two words "profit motive," merely putting it on a lower plane, are also swinging slightly to the right.

Reading over the resolution, and remembering what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said in the press—it may not have been a correct report—giving his views in endorsing some if not all of the proposals of the Prime Minister in his radio addresses, I thought that if a resolution were moved by the opposite corner this session it would be more or less in these words. This is just a suggested resolution: "Resolved, that in the opinion of this house, since the capitalistic system has been prevented from functioning as it should do in the interests of the people of Canada, as a result of the failure of governments in past years to stop the introduction of the abuse and gross violation of its true principles, this house endorses the courage of the present government in its projected legislation designed to eradicate and cut out the abuses and violations of the capitalistic system and supports its determination, at this session, to enact the necessary remedial legislation to achieve in the best interests of the people this laudable objective." That would be very good and to the point.

This is my fifth session in this house and I have yet to hear—or I cannot remember having heard, I will put it that way—any constructive suggestion from the opposite corner of this house looking to the providing of sound employment for the unemployed. We have had several speeches to-night, one or two at any rate from the opposite corner, and not one thing has been said in the way of providing sound employment for the large number of unemployed in the country. Before I sit down I shall try to show what the government has done in that regard and what it proposes to do. Let me refer first of all to Count Nicholas Ignatieff, an exiled Russian nobleman, now a professor in Lansing, Michigan. Speaking at Orillia to the Canadian Institute on Economics and Politics, he made two or three significant statements in reference to Russia and the cooperative system in vogue there. He said:

> The peasants fought collectivization desperately and almost fought the government to a standstill. They slaughtered stock, destroyed grain and starved themselves rather than submit.
> What does it mean? Just this: collective man is the latest product of man's hallucinations—

I believe the hon. gentleman who just sat down referred to something that was said as being like an hallucination. This is from a Russian nobleman who knows what hallucinations are:

> —there is no such thing. Man is primarily individual and his happiness and his most important functions are individual.

If this country is to have inflicted upon it—if that is the proper word—the abolition of the capitalistic system and to have substituted for it cooperative commonwealthism, then individualism will be destroyed. My experience over a long period in association with many thousands of men, observing them work and produce from their heads many splendid and successful inventions, has convinced me that if you eliminate the opportunity of the human race to aspire to produce and to conceive ideas and profit therefrom, you will eliminate from this world much of that which is to its advantage. Continuing, Count Ignatieff says:

> True cooperation starts with the individual. The right to private property is recognized. The individual is free to do whatever he will with his share of his earnings, accumulate wealth and leave it to his children.
> Collectivism, on the other hand, seeks to submerge the individual in the swarm, in the herd—it negates every aspect of individualism and recognizes no human inequalities. It sets up the tyranny of the swarm over the individual.

But as I said at the outset, there is a slight wheel from the doctrine of "all are equal in Russia" to the doctrine that those who labour hardest and produce the most shall receive some extra consideration for their efforts.

I am not one of those who believe the cause of all our troubles is the capitalistic system, but I do believe what I understood the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to say in his radio addresses, namely, that the abuses and violations of the capitalistic system are partly if not wholly responsible for the troubles through which we are passing. The capitalistic system is founded on sound doctrine. We all know the fourth commandment refers to the fact that man shall work not more than six days a week. Well, legislation that is before the house this session is designed to provide one day of rest each week for all workmen, and in that particular the capitalist system of this country is going back to that principle and that doctrine of the fourth commandment.

Another principle of the capitalist system is the practice of thrift, and here again we are encouraged by the Holy Book to practise thrift. I have in mind the parable of the talents: three different servants were each given talents; one buried his, the second doubled his and the third increased his five to ten, and on the return of the lord of those servants the latter two were commended for their thrift. The practice of thrift is one of the doctrines of the capitalist system, and I do not know how thrift is to be incorporated in the theories advanced by hon. gentlemen in the far corner who are sponsoring this resolution.

Then we have another doctrine of the capitalist system—the reward for labour. I am in accord with that; I believe those who work hardest should receive the most; that is if two are labouring in the same line of business or profession, the man who is willing to deny himself and work hard is surely entitled to consideration for his determination to advance in his work.

Then we have the doctrine of the reward for skill. Why should a man not be rewarded for his skill? In support of this we have the head of the Russian state arguing before a group of iron and steel manufacturers in Russia that they too must depart from their former doctrine of equality of men to a doctrine of reward to those who do the most, achieve the most and produce the most.

Another principle of the capitalistic system is that individual effort should receive consideration, another, that men should live uprightly. I am strongly in accord with that, that those who live uprightly and endeavour to do the most good in this world, do the most for humanity.

Then we have the doctrine to treat others as we would be treated. Well, there have been violations of all those doctrines or principles. It has not been a question of violation this year or last year, but it has been a question for years of progressive violation, progressive abuse of the capitalistic system. On Friday night last when on the debate in connection with introducing the eight hour day we were told by those who opposed the resolution that this government could not bring about the eight hour day; that that, so they alleged, and other kindred subjects are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Perhaps that is one of the reasons, the fact that there are nine provinces and nine provincial governments, why the capitalistic system has been violated and abused in this country as it has been.

Then we have the further doctrine of being honest and paying our accounts. When the Pharisees, seeking to tempt Our Lord in reference to money matters, asked Him if they should pay tribute to Caesar, He asked them to show Him a coin. He then asked them whose image and superscription was on the coin, and they told him that it was Caesar's; whereupon He said to them: "Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's." The trouble is that in this country and, indeed, throughout the world, accounts have not been paid that should have been paid. These and many other doctrines followed by the capitalist system have been violated and abused. Along come the government of the day proposing reforms. They have the courage and the determination to do it, and the Prime Minister in his addresses said that he would remove abuses. I believe he will, and I believe the house will support his legislation to do away with the violations and abuses of capitalism. If a ship sails the seas for years without being taken into dry dock it will become covered with barnacles; therefore ships are taken into dry dock periodically and the barnacles scraped off. We should not condemn the ship because it did not travel as well before the barnacles were scraped off as after. The capitalistic system is cluttered up with a lot of barnacles of one kind and another; this government is going to scrape them off, and the abuses and violations will be eliminated.

Mr. IRVINE: But there is a hole in the bottom of the ship; what are you going to do about that?

Mr. MacNICOL: Plug it. In 1932 a committee of the United States senate investigated one of the great abuses of the capitalistic system that is, stock market abuses, which prevailed, incidentally, not in the United States only but in Canada as well. It was not investigated in Canada, and that is why I refer to the United States investigation. These were nothing short of outrageous and never should have been permitted. But we cannot say that the capitalistic system was responsible for that. Now they have been eliminated, and the government of that country is to be congratulated upon what it has done in that regard. I shall give one example of the gross abuse of the capitalistic system that took place there, and no doubt there were similar cases in Canada also. The committee reported that stocks were boosted by false statements, that the public were rigged—that was one of the most outrageous abuses practised on the public. Then there were bear raids, bull raids, short selling and long selling, and stock splits. I have read of stocks that were split not once or twice but four, five, six, seven, and eight times, without any new capital being added. That is a violation of the capitalistic system, and never should have been permitted. I am sure this government will deal with any situation like that if it has control of the matter and the provinces do not act. Then there were wash sales, and selling against the box, and buying and selling at the same time. In 1929, when the first crash came, stocks on the New York stock exchange shrank $29,000,000,000, and in 1930, there was an additional fall of $20,000,000,000, or a total of $49,000,000,000 within a year. Stock promoters and market manipulators never should have been permitted so to violate the principles of honesty, thrift and fair play that are the foundations of the capitalistic system. However, the government of the United States have enacted new legislation designed to prevent such exploitation in the future. Think of Radio stock, which in 1921 stood at $105,000,000; in 1929, without addition of further capital, rose to $1,400,000,000; and in 1930 after the crash it dropped to $175,000,000, a shrinkage of $1,225,000,000. That was an example of the great abuses and violations of the capitalistic system, but abuses of the kind will be eliminated both across the line and in this country. I hope the Canadian governments will rise to the occasion and by whatever methods they may adopt prevent in future any such stock exploitation as has taken place in the past. Of course the stock market people offer the defence that during the war people were educated to buy bonds and stocks, money was plentiful and people learned to buy, and that is one of the causes that made this exploitation possible. But the governments of this country must enact legislation to prevent this and other abuses of the capitalistic system.

Then there are other violations; sweat shops—the Prime Minister has already announced that he will eliminate sweat shops. Some may say he has not the power; but I doubt very much if any hon. member will oppose the elimination of sweat shops or oppose giving the government power to eliminate them. Sweat shops are not a necessary part of the capitalistic system; they are a violation of the system and never should have been permitted to exist. Neither should the seven day working week. The government by its eight hour day and forty-eight hour week legislation is going to stop such abuses. Then as to mergers, I do not say that in no case should mergers be allowed, but there were altogether too many of them; the great flood of mergers was not a legitimate feature of the capitalistic system but a violation of it.

Then will anyone say that the outrageous waste, not only in Canada but in the republic to the south, such as the slaughter in the United States of several million hogs, the destruction of millions of acres of corn and cotton, was any true part of the capitalistic system? They were violations of it. We all know, too, that the great war was responsible for much of our trouble. Certainly the abolition of war is the desire of every hon. member of this house, but I cannot understand how war can be attributed wholly to the capitalistic system; I call it a heinous violation of the system.

Then we have rampant partyism. This parliament is in its fifth session; during its life the country has been going through the worst depression in the world's history, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will admit that the government has at least done its best to bring the country through. Yet how often have we found them forgetting partyism and rallying to the support of legislation enacted for the advancement of this country? Surely partyism should not be carried to such a length that we must denounce everything that our opponents advance. Surely our opponents are sometimes right, and when that is so I believe in admitting it.

What do the government propose in order to eliminate the abuses of the capitalistic system that now exist? We have the proposed establishment of the eight hour day, one day's rest in seven, and unemployment insurance. Someone said something about unemployment insurance to-day; when that resolution is under discussion again I propose to speak on it, but for the moment I will content myself with saying that in spite of what has been said the unemployment insurance measure will do a great deal of good and will fill a long felt want in this country. In addition we have proposals along the lines of national health, controlled speculation and minimum wages; it is proposed to abolish sweatshops, and finally steps have been taken by the government to provide work. One of the hon. members from Winnipeg said the government was not doing anything to provide employment. I devote a good deal of my time to matters pertaining to labour; in the course of the recess I come in contact with many hundreds of men who are employed in industry, and I speak without fear of successful contradiction when I say that the government has done a very great deal, through legislation, to provide new employment in this country. The government has not received very much support in that regard from hon. members in the far corner, among others, but it has enacted legislation that has resulted in a great deal of new employment.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre returned from a trip to Japan he gave an interview, which appeared in the Toronto Mail and Empire of January 14. The hon. gentleman is reported as decrying Japanese cheap labour, and as saying that Japanese goods are cheap partly because of low labour standards but largely because of downright efficiency. If we pass the resolution now before the house, in what way shall we be protecting Canadian workmen against either Japanese efficiency or Japanese cheap labour? As the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said, we have to deal with realities; we have to look at things as they are, and we have to consider our country in the light of what is going on in all other countries. Certainly this is no time for Canada to take up some new-fangled idea, or rather an old idea revamped. With the serious situation in which we find ourselves this is a time when we must face things as they are and look at realities, and certainly I cannot see how any resolution such as this will help the situation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that resolutions similar to this have been before the house on four or five occasions previously. I think if I had moved a resolution that had been thrown out by the house four or five times, I would not bother introducing it again.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I think it a tragedy that we should have such discussion as has taken place within the last hour and a half; it would indicate a failure to appreciate the Prime Minister's words, "the crash and thunder of toppling capitalism."

The previous speaker (Mr. MacNicol) dealt with the alleged reforms of the present government and expressed regret that there was not more wholehearted support from this section of this house in regard to that legislation. He asked, "Why do we not look at facts and realities?" In his speech he did not face one fact or one reality; he did not even approach a consideration of the problem. We have misery, destitution, poverty, and unemployed millions here and throughout the world. We have a hopeless outlook for youth with education of no value, so far as entrance to the economic field is concerned, and the government comes along with shreds and patches that have been tried out in other capitalist countries, and which have left them in the same morass that we are in. Yet the government wonders why we are not enthusiastic about the program.

They tell us that prosperity is returning, and that therefore this legislation is going to be all right. Again they do not face facts or estimate realities. The Wall Street Journal of comparatively recent date points out that in the first six months profits in 56 industrial corporations of the larger type had increased by 174·6 per cent over the previous six months. That looked like returning prosperity, and my hon. friend who has just sat down would so describe it. Hon. gentlemen opposite and to my right would describe it as such, and would be content to place that fact before the public. Continue; analyze a little closer, and you find that while profits increased by 174·6 per cent sales increased by only 51 per cent. In other words profits increased three times as fast as sales. Exactly the same thing is taking place in Canada and has begun to take place in Great Britain. It has been accompanied by this further phenomenon, that whilst profits and sales increased, wages continued to go down. At the very time the Wall Street Journal published the statement to which I made reference, Miss Perkins, Secretary of Labour for the United States of America, had the great courage to publish a statement relating to the situation. In that statement, with the official imprimatur of the Department of Labour, she stated that during that period factory payrolls went down 6·8 per cent, or a decline on the average of $10,460,000 a week. So we find profits going up at the expense of the wage earning and producing classes.

How long do hon. gentlemen think their system can continue with that going on? How long can they hope to carry on a system that shows such a mad, illogical, untenable and uneconomic condition? But that is not all. This government now proposes legislation which already either in part or in whole has been adopted in other countries. Yes, in whole—all of it has been adopted in many countries, such as Great Britain. A far wider experimentation has taken place in the United States. It is of value to us to-night to consider just what the results have been in the United States, in order to ascertain whether or not we may draw conclusions therefrom. I would suggest that the last speaker (Mr. MacNicol)—it would be of no use to suggest it to the one who preceded him (Mr. Pouliot)—should analyse what has taken place in the United States under what is called the new deal. The actual level of wages in that country in July, 1934, was up 8·5 per cent as compared with the level in July, 1933, followed, as Miss Perkins noted, by a decline. However they were up at one stage, and we shall deal with that picture for the moment. Wages were up 8·5 per cent. Prices during the same period were up 9·6 per cent. At a moment's consideration hon. members will realize that the effect is obvious. The net effect is that the purchasing power was decreased 1·1 per cent. Surely that was not the purpose of the new deal; I believe its purpose was the very reverse. In my view it was the sincere intention of the government of the United States, just as I believe it to be the sincere intention of this government, to increase the standard of living and the purchasing power of the people. But under the present system it cannot be done. It has been tried out in the United States to a far greater degree than this country proposes to try it, and in that country it has failed.

These actual figures dealing with the purchasing power of the American middle class are significant, and I ask hon. members to take them into serious consideration. In 1933 the incomes of the middle class ranging from less than $10,000—a substantial sum—down to nothing were decreased by five per cent as compared with their revenues in 1932. On the other hand individuals having incomes of a million dollars or more per year saw an increase in revenues ranging from twenty to forty-six per cent. An analysis shows that while in the aggregate middle class incomes were being reduced, higher incomes were being enormously increased. Surely that was not the intention of the new deal. Yet that was the effect of the attempt to regulate capitalism—and we will find that the same results will follow in this country under the present proposals.

I turn now for a moment to a consideration of conditions in Europe. What is the lesson we may learn from the experiments over there? In western Europe general industrial production, despite the rigid state regulations of many nations is about fifteen per cent less than it was in 1913, and in addition to that fact we must consider the further one, namely that between 1913 and to-day there has been an enormous increase in population. Therefore in Europe they had an increase in population together with a fifteen per cent decrease in production. Capitalism has not justified its existence, has it? Regulation has not shown effective results, has it? In 1922 fascism came into existence in Italy, and at that time many promises were made to the masses of the people. In 1933 the wage rate in Italy was seventeen per cent less than it was in 1929, and unemployment had increased from 293,000 to 1,057,000. That is a fact worth while considering. And so we find that fascism has not separated Italy from the general capitalist collapse which has affected all the world. We should profit from their twelve years of experience. In Germany since 1930 the workers have suffered a decline in wages averaging sixty-three per cent, and the decline is said to be worse among the agricultural classes. In that time the level of the so-called upper classes has remained relatively constant in all those countries. Yet we propose to patch and scratch in this country.

Yes, you know, people do draw conclusions, very final conclusions, from very strange premises. I was frankly amused when I read in a newspaper what purported to be a report of an alleged interview with the Prime Minister while in England not long ago. He is quoted as follows:

> I was delighted in London to see such evidence of increasing prosperity.
>
> Evidence of increasing prosperity.
> Well dressed people on the streets, crowds in the shops, and the spirit everywhere apparently indicated that England is leaving the depression behind her.

Yes, and that same day I walked down the main street of the city of Calgary. I saw well dressed people on the streets; I saw them in the shops; I even saw individuals smoking cigars; I saw ladies and gentlemen greeting each other with smiles, but I did not come to the conclusion that prosperity had returned. Did the Prime Minister take the trouble to examine the broken industries of Bradford? Did he go to Lancashire? Did he go out to the slums of Stratford east and Bow road? Did he look at the herds of hopelessness in England? Did he listen even to the Prime Minister of England who about that time said that there were millions who never again would be employed, millions whom Ramsay MacDonald described as "human scrap"? Of course those people will never be reemployed under capitalism. It cannot be done. There is no place for them any more than there is for our youth, under capitalism. Did the Prime Minister take the trouble or has any hon. member who assumes a returning prosperity simply because profits have gone up in spots taken the trouble, to ascertain the fact that in Lancashire there are 16,000,000 idle spindles, and that a committee appointed by the British government has been investigating the matter? Do they know that the committee has already made an interim report in which they propose scrapping 7,000,000 spindles? That is a recommendation to create an artificial scarcity, such as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) has described. Unless we create a scarcity capitalism cannot continue. Unless the Canadian people and the people of the world are to be content with a lower standard of living, this present system can neither be regulated nor continued.

Sometimes institutions which have their very foundations in the system unwittingly confess its total and absolute failure. The insurance companies of Canada are supposed to be the sheet anchors of capitalism, the sheet anchors of the thrifty, and all that sort of stuff. In order to get business they advertise extensively in the newspapers. In 1928, when there was what is termed a capitalist boom, one of those insurance companies published an advertisement in the Canadian newspapers in an endeavour to secure the money of thrifty investors. The Canada Life Assurance Company asks the question—and here we see the appeal to fear, the psychology of modern advertising: "What happens to one hundred average men of twenty-five years of age upon reaching the age of sixty-five?" Out of the vast compilation of statistics that are at their disposal as a result of their actuarial research covering many years, they are able to make this accurate statement, and no one questions it; no one has counter-statistics to offset it: One of the hundred will be wealthy; four will be well to do and able to enjoy some comfort and recreation; five will be still working for a living, with no prospect of relief from drudgery; fifty-four will be dependent upon friends or relatives or charity; and thirty-six will be dead. So to one hundred young men of twenty-five years of age this intelligent, highly to be appreciated capitalist system has nothing better to offer, even in days of prosperity so-called, than that four out of the hundred will have some security in old age; five will be still working for a living with no hope of escape from drudgery at the age of sixty-five, and the remainder of the one hundred will be either dead or relying upon friends or relatives or charity. If there be hon. members of this house who desire to sustain a system so self-condemned as that, frankly I cannot understand their mentality or their logic, and I dissociate myself from them.

I pick up statistics of this government's own departments, data available to every member of the house, and I find facts that should shock hon. gentlemen of this house even if the investigations before the mass buying committee have not sufficiently done so. I find, for example, in a census bulletin published under authority of Hon. H. H. Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce, a departmental bulletin entitled, Earnings Among Wage Earners for Canada and the Provinces, the following facts.

In the coal mining industry in my province there are employed 5,474 persons, and their average annual earnings according to the bulletin amount to $652. They are employed 27·51 weeks—27 weeks—out of the year. But, you see, the poor devils have to eat for fifty-two weeks, and they have to clothe themselves and pay rent and light and fuel and all the other things for the whole year; and so we find that they had to live fifty-two weeks on an average of $12.50 a week, or $1.78 a day. Is it suggested they ought to be very enthusiastic about the system? Would I if I were in their position be hurrahing for it and for those tinkering with it until even the Prime Minister would be gratified?

Now take the earnings of all wage earners in Canada. According to this same bulletin, pages 12 and 13, I find that the average yearly earnings for all employed in Canada is $743. Male earners secured on the average $927, and female earners $560. By the way, it is a significant thing that in this interesting man made system of ours you will find, if you check the figures, that in every case the women work more weeks and usually longer hours and in every case receive less pay than the men.

Miss MACPHAIL: That is chivalry.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, it is capitalism.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I think it is thriftiness on the part of the women.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The average yearly earnings for all employed in Canada is $743, and the average earnings received by agricultural workers is $293 per year.

An hon. MEMBER: That is their keep.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, they get that out of killing a few hogs or chickens. That $743 amounts to $14.30 a week or $2.07 a day for all Canada. That is what capitalism has to offer them so far.

Take another side of the picture. Keep in mind, please, the figures I have just given, the average yearly earnings of $743. I wrote to the Department of Labour to ascertain what they regard as an adequate annual budgetary maintenance, and I find that by the industrial relations committee a few years ago an investigation was made into this question and a compilation made by the bureau; the Labour department have brought the figures up to date to August, 1934, and they are as follows:

To maintain a poverty level of existence in Canada you require $661.16 per year. A minimum subsistence level would require, according to the department, $1,069.16. But the average earnings per year in Canada are only $743. Therefore the average earnings in Canada are less, by nearly $300, than the minimum subsistence level set out in the tables of the Department of Labour. The health and decency level is $1,328; and the comfort level $1,867.

Now contributory unemployment insurance, taking into consideration all these facts, can only bring you to the conclusion that its chief effect will be to reduce at least during this time the available purchasing power of the masses of the people. I am not opposed to it for that reason, but I just desire to point out facts, especially to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. If these poor beggars have to carry on with average earnings per year of $743 and are expected to pay any contribution at all, it can only lessen the total volume of purchasing power and in the long run have but little effect. Certainly it can have no other effect until there is another depression, if we ever get out of the present one, and we are not out of it yet.

Then we have the other side of the picture. The concentration of the control of the means of life is one of the major developments of the last century under this capitalist system Everybody admits that to-day, and everybody is beginning to apologize for it, including the last speaker. The Mellon family, for example, a family that conducts business in Canada as well as in the United States of America, provides probably one of the best examples of how wealth, and with it the destinies of millions of people, have been concentrated in a few hands. While the masses of the people were suffering in the penurious condition I have stated, this family fortune was being built up until to-day the Mellon family has a fortune estimated at eight billions of dollars, or, to be exact, $7,990,425,178. Now, that is a pretty substantial fortune. That is capitalism. That is capitalism because it gave the opportunity to a predatory type to take the fullest and grossest advantage of the system that encouraged predatory characters.

I would like my hon. friend who made some reference to the fourth commandment, or something like that, to take that into consideration. The whole philosophy of competition is contrary to Christ and to the teachings of Christ, and the very principle of competition in a capitalist society is utterly incompatible with the teachings of Him to whom he referred.

Then take even their own newspapers. Just about Christmas time this advertisement appeared on behalf of the Calgary Albertan, published in the city in which the right hon. the Prime Minister represents the west riding:

It said:

> Feeding many on little. Is this your problem? The Albertan will help you solve it. Economical but nourishing and attractive meals can be prepared for your family cheaply. We will show you how to prevent waste; how to make tasteful meals from cheaper commodities; how to utilize to the utmost all the food properties of your provisions.

Yet at that moment we were selling cattle at destructive prices to a government in order that they might be turned into fertilizer. But our capitalist newspapers will advertise, in the face of that, this sort of thing to unfortunates who are expected to live on an average of five cents per meal on relief in our cities—advertising how they may be able to put life into their bodies by economizing in those things of which to-day we are able to produce in such vast abundance. Just think of the stupidity of the system. Does anyone think that these things can be remedied by regulation? There comes to my mind one classical illustration which I heard not long ago from a gentleman whom the Prime Minister has quoted, certainly without disagreeing with him, so far as I could ascertain from the newspapers. I refer to Mr. John Strachey, who told this interesting story in my hearing. One of the best illustrations of the insanity of the present system is to be found in the experience which two countries in Europe have recently had. In order to relieve unemployment conditions in Holland the government of that country decided to start great public works with a view to employing the unemployed, and the object of these public works was the reclamation of the Zuyder Zee. They were to erect dykes and drain the water off the land They had previously ascertained that the land itself was fertile and would be productive, and so they employed their unemployed. After the land had been restored they placed the unemployed on it, producing. They then found that they were producing so much wheat that they created a surplus wheat condition in the local market, and the government that had encouraged the development of that enterprise was then compelled in turn to buy the surplus wheat. Having bought the surplus wheat they attempted to find a market and, not being able to find one at remunerative prices, they finally sold the wheat at cost to the Danish government in order that it should be fed to hogs there. The Danish government fed it to the hogs, with the result that there was an increase in the production of hogs, which threatened the market; and to avoid the collapse of the hog market the government of Denmark took over the surplus hogs. They could not tell what to do with these hogs and so they in turn converted the hogs into fertilizer. Then, finding that Denmark was so well provided with productive land and that production was so high, they had no market for their fertilizer in Denmark but succeeded in selling it back to Holland, so that they could spread it on the reclaimed Zuyder Zee to create more wheat to feed more hogs to be converted into more fertilizer, and so on. That is capitalism. My friends do not like it. They speak of the sacredness of the home, while around them they see their own people daily dispossessed of their homes, daily evicted from their homes. And who owned those homes—the home dwellers? You will find an exact parallel in other countries to the situation I now portray to you. I take four of the leading industrial states of the United States and according to a census of recent years we find that there were 4,828,000 dwellings in those four states, and of that number 4,115,000 were rented. Did private initiative, private enterprise and courageous loyalty to capitalism enable those people to buy homes and hold them?

Mr. Speaker, this movement, to which I have the honour to belong, has for its purpose the establishment of the sanctity of true private property and its extension, and we seek to have every person own his own home as an inalienable right and not as a matter of sufferance or charity. And it can be done. We have the man power, the scientific attainments, the artificial power, the raw materials, the willingness to work and the capital—it is all there. All you have to do is to bring these things into harmony. Capitalism lived—for I think it is dead—so long as the workers were able to feed the capitalists. But capitalism failed, to use the mildest term, just so soon as the capitalists had begun to feed the workers; and the more the capitalist has to feed the workers the more certain it is that the destruction of the system has been accomplished.

The proposed unemployment legislation is to make the workers feed the capitalists and their unemployed brethren as well. That is what this type of unemployment insurance does. It makes the employed feed the capitalists—for they will always pass on their costs to the consumer—and in addition to that the employed has to feed his unemployed brethren. You cannot solve an economic problem of this magnitude by anything of that sort. It cannot be done, and that is so obvious that one does not need to stress it.

Hon. gentlemen to my immediate right believe, as I myself believed for many years, that all the present horrible muddled condition can be remedied if only we will restore the free market, free, unregulated competition. If only we will do that, they think, everything will be splendid. Well, I have changed my views in that regard; I no longer believe that position to be either tenable or possible of attainment. To do this, let us find out what we should have to do. We should have first to restore the normal flow of commodities by levelling the tariff and by the reversal of the policy of administrative protection—in other words, world free trade or as near an approach thereto as possible. Secondly, it would be incumbent upon any government holding these views to break down the trusts and monopolies, for they interfere with the free movement of internal exchange just as effectively as tariffs interfere with the international movement of goods. Next, they would have to reverse the entire tendency towards the establishment of social services and of state and trade union protection for the wage earner; for social services and static wages are progressively freezing one of the most important variables of the law of supply and demand. In fact restoration of the free markets in labour would have to be accomplished if restoration of the system were to be accomplished. In addition, it would be incumbent upon them to establish some form of monetary control on a world scale which can attempt—and I use the word "attempt" advisedly—the task of mitigating world crises. In fact, restoration of the stability and continuity of international exchange must be accomplished if those hon. gentlemen are to make good their protestations. How could those reforms be brought about, even if they were advisable, in our present developed state of society? How are you going to level or diminish the existing tariff barriers of the world? Who is to do those jobs?—for if those tariffs are disastrous to the world market as a whole, they are of enormous benefit to particular capitalists. In short, the general enrichment that free trade would bring about could be achieved only at the cost of a gigantic redistribution of wealth among both individuals and communities. Individual capitalists would be ruined and whole industrial sections laid desolate. The free trader given power to scale down tariffs will also by that act be given power to bestow great wealth, to deal destruction here, to bring ruin there, and so he will be opposed by every powerful and organized force of the entrepreneurs of every state fighting for existence. Try to do this, Mr. Speaker.

Second, they have to break the trusts. Who will inform the Holts, the Mellons and the others that they have to divest themselves of their present privileges and relinquish them to the will of the state? Why, as somebody suggests, there might be a great difficulty in securing campaign funds in the next election, if such action were taken.

Mr. HOWARD: Oh, no.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friend accompanies that "no" with an ironical laugh which does justice to his negative. I should like to know who is to do this, because these people not only control vast corporations with tremendous powers but are interlocked with financial institutions as well. You cannot break the trusts and monopolies to-day. As a matter of fact trusts and combines are inevitable under capitalism; the competitive system itself compels that sort of aggregation in order that profits may be higher and security more assured to the people who are participating in the system. In short, not only would they have to take Sir Herbert Holt, Andrew Mellon and other people by the throat—and I am quite certain my hon. friends to my right do not intend to do that—but in addition they would have to release the existing state monopolies; for every one of them is an interference with free exchange. They would have to release Hydro in Ontario; they would have to release all social services that have so far been established; they would have to release government control over civil aviation and government control over radio, certainly the commercial side of it. All these things would have to be done if those hon. gentlemen think their philosophy is the correct one. Yes, the government or the state would have to free itself from interference with business of all kinds, except that form of interference that might be required to prevent combines and monopolies from coming into existence, and that is going to be some job.

Next, the free traders must, having challenged the greatest interests in capitalism, proceed to take away from the workers everything they have gained in a century of organized effort. It is of little use to restore freedom of exchange of commodities both internationally and at home and leave trade in one vital commodity, human labour, hedged about by every restriction and restraint. The free market can operate successfully and automatically only when all its interconnecting parts are movable; for if one of those parts sticks, the whole jams. It therefore would be essential that the price of human labour should vary freely in its relation to supply and demand. Further, as some social services provide, through the intervention of the state, income for labour in addition to that secured by wages, the existence of the legislation definitely retards the tendency of the price of labour to find its natural level; and hence it is important of course to the free trader that all such gross interferences with the freedom of the market, such as trade boards, old age pensions, health insurance and other forms of direct contribution by the state should cease. No laissez-faire system, no system of free competition could continue.

Finally comes the need of establishing international monetary control in order to prevent the wild fluctuations in international exchange that will hamper the movement of commodities in a free world market. The establishment of such a monetary control implies inevitably the setting up of a super power international in character, a bank that would have such control as to be able to determine the necessary steps and controls to be taken in order to regulate all exchange rates as between nations so as to avoid any clog in the system. Obviously that is incompatible with national sovereignty. So world tariff levelling, world tariff trust-busting, world trade union smashing and finally the inducing of French bankers, United States senators and all those other people to deposit their gold in some central bank in Geneva or wherever it is thought convenient, is the pleasant task of the free trader.

The system is gone and we might as well realize it. When we do we shall turn our efforts to the setting up of a cooperative social system in this country that will enable the harmonious functioning of the factors I mentioned earlier, man power, artificial power, resources and factory equipment, in order that we may be able to satisfy fully the needs of the people of Canada.

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the advocacy of this great cause which has come from hon. members to your left in the corner, but I must say that I am entirely unconvinced; I am a doubter still. When I listened to the eloquence of the last speaker, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who on every occasion when he rises in this house really preaches a prose poem,

I was amazed that the Divine Creator had given such a great gift for such a cause manifested in such a way, which can be nothing other than speech wholly and utterly divorced from all reality, not taking into consideration for an instant the glaring facts of life, the real nature of man and the complex problem which he has to solve.

I have not prepared my address for this occasion, so the house will pardon the imperfection of my efforts. This may be the last speech I make in this house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): —but I want to say what a privilege it has been for me as an independent Conservative—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I maintain that my utterances in this house show me to have been the most independent party man in the house.

Miss MACPHAIL: Still a party man, though.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Still a party man, yes, because I believe in cooperation, because I believe in joining what energy and power I have with the power that moves in a real sphere in the real universe. The last speaker began by speaking of realities. He told the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) that he did not face one single reality. I ask the last speaker if he really approves of the resolution that is before us. I followed the development of every point in his discourse. At the end he spoke about world socialism, but this resolution has to do with conditions as we find them in Canada. Let me remind the hon. member here and now that in the debate on the marketing bill during the last session, on April 26, 1934, he said, as reported in Hansard at page 2559:

> I am not a socialist; I have never been a socialist; I have never read any work of Karl Marx except what paragraphs appear in current digests or magazine articles.

I ask the hon. member now if he really supports the resolution, or if he has become a world socialist?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have no hesitation in answering both questions at once. The answer to the first is yes, and to the second, no. I have not discussed international socialism, and I did not mention it to-night.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): The hon. member talked about control of credit, about the freedom of world trade.

An hon. MEMBER: That is Liberalism.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): What was he talking about if not about world socialism? he was utterly lost in a litter of language.

Miss MACPHAIL: Read it to-morrow and see.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): He attempts to cast contempt on this party and on the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his policy of reform; he talks about the shreds and patches of the reform policy. I say to this house and to my constituents and to the people of this country that I honestly believe that the most radical prime minister we have ever had in Canada is the Right Hon. Richard Bedford Bennett, and that his policy of real reform is the only hope of the suppressed masses in this country. He is the man who has not been afraid to grapple with circumstances as he found them in a real way. The hon. member held up the United States and President Roosevelt as having failed. What of the billions that they have poured into circulation? Is he greater than Roosevelt?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am too modest to answer.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): If Roosevelt has failed and is continuing to fail, how does he hope to succeed? How does he hope to persuade the people of Canada that his leader, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), can save the nation? With a gesture of contempt he said, "How long will this system go on?" I tell my hon. friend that this system existed before he was born, and it will continue to exist long after he is dead and gone, after every one of us is dead and gone. His leader spoke about the necessity for something new, as if he were espousing a new cause. Years ago when I was a student at Queen's university we learned that Plato talked about socialism and communism. Why, this is as old as mankind; it is a relic of society in its most primitive form—it is not new. The hon. member spoke about the purpose of the new deal in the United States; he said it was to increase purchasing power. They poured out billions and billions and are pouring out billions still in the United States; and have they increased purchasing power? He says they have not. What then is his alternative? The hon. member is perfectly right when he says that there are conditions existing in society which are absolutely cruel. No one can approve of a system that alternates from the peaceful pursuits of civilization to the savagery of war; certainly we agree with his condemnation of the system. But what is his alternative?

Not content with analyzing the situation in the great republic to the south, our eloquent friend took us on a Cook's tour through Europe. He spoke about Italy and gave statistics regarding wage reductions there. Are he and his companions greater than Mussolini? "Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed that he is grown so great?" This is a question I might reasonably ask of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). If he were in the house now I would ask him if he would kindly invite me to dinner before I rise again to address the house. I imagine he must feed upon dynamite.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The Prime Minister's dynamite.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): It is dynamite to some of the Liberal party I am afraid, or perhaps even nitroglycerine and gun cotton.

But let us take a look at Europe. Look at the situation in Russia. I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will pardon my making reference to Russia, because I have never classified my hon. friend as a revolutionist. I believe the hon. member who leads the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is a man of the highest motives. I believe he is a great idealist. I believe the suffering of humanity has so deeply marked his heart that he cannot forget it. I believe that his purpose in this house and throughout his life is to make the bread of life a little sweeter for the poor, if I may put it that way. I also believe that there are many men in this house who have the same ideal, even men in the Conservative party. But when I analyze this resolution I realize the lack of logic in it. Let me read the resolution in order that we may see just how much truth it contains. It is very much like the Declaration of Independence, which started with a lie, that all men are created free and equal. I think that was one of the most poetic lies ever penned by our political philosophers. The hon. member says in his resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, since the capitalist system is failing to function in the interests of the great majority of the people of Canada—

When you postulate the fact that the system is failing to function in the insterests of the great majority of the people you mean that more than half of the people of Canada are in a condition approaching destitution or poverty, and I do not think that is correct. There is enough suffering in Canada, God knows, without starting your resolution with an exaggerated statement which, upon its face, certainly is not true.

When we talk about the failure of the capitalistic system I wonder if we ever recognize its virtues and merits. What has the capitalistic system done for us? It has lessened hours of labour; it has lightened the drudgery of toil; it has harnessed the power that is leaping in the cataracts and the rivers. The other day, as I looked at the river here and saw that magic array of lights along the shore, I was thinking that if an Indian who, living in the north in seclusion, and not having heard of the inventions of modern society and the great privileges we now possess, came down the river and saw this array of lights, he would think the stars had fallen from heaven and were dancing up and down upon the hills. The capitalistic system has done nothing? Even in this House of Commons the capitalistic system has permitted the great amount of freedom and liberty. It has enabled you and me, men born of poor parents and without monetary resources or power, to come here in the name of the people and, in the temple of the people, to speak against all the power that ever was or ever will be with the voice of freedom and love. There is no good in the capitalistic system? Look back to the days of Queen Elizabeth. Remember how they lived then, when they had no sanitation, when they had not discovered glass, when there was practically no pottery or porcelain, when they knew nothing about the modern science of medicine; when they feasted and drank together in palaces in which there was nothing but a litter of straw for a carpet, where they flung their despised bones to the dogs. To-day I, a mechanic's son, and you, are rich, with more freedom and more luxury than Queen Elizabeth on her throne ever had or ever dreamed of having.

I remember once, when I was a lad, looking at Eaton's catalogue. That was a long time ago; Eaton's have been in existence for a long time, like the capitalistic system. I was about six years of age, and I remember that on the cover of the catalogue there was a picture of the horseless carriage. I looked at my aunt and said, "Is that a horseless carriage, Aunt Laura?" She said, "Yes, Jim." My hon. friend said the Prime Minister does not know the meaning of words. I think he is very wrong. I think if my hon. friend wants to learn the meaning and magic of words all he needs to do is listen a little more to the Prime Minister, and he will be able to preach the greatest sermon he ever dreamed about. But I said to my aunt, "Horseless means without a horse, does it not?" And she said, "Yes, Jim." I said, "Will it go without a horse?" And she said, "It will go without a horse." "Will it go up hill," I asked. "Certainly it will go uphill," she replied. Then I said, "Well, I don't believe it, Aunt Laura; I don't believe it will go without a horse." Then we had that fairy tale about Cinderella and Prince Charming, and the glass carriage with the four horses. What have we to-day? We have a little instrument that has the power of sixty or a hundred horses.

What has capitalism done? It has ransacked the ages and spoiled the climes. It has solved the problem of production, and beyond the dreams of avarice, beyond any conception that any of us ever can have, the future will be even more glorious than the past.

Now look at the next section of this resolution. After starting on its way by stating what I claim to be a falsehood, it says that the capitalistic system should be superseded by a cooperative commonwealth in which the profit motive would be subordinated to that of public service. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre was a preacher of the gospel in which the ideal of unselfishness and public service was the keystone. For 1,935 years the Church of Jesus Christ has been alive in this world. The best educated, the most fearless and the best men we have are the priests and the preachers of our churches, but have the truths of the Christian religion penetrated to the core of society? Are they the dominating motives of men? Is unselfishness absolutely on the throne? Is it all powerful? How can we hope, by a resolution of this kind, to change the very nature of mankind? How can we hope, by dressing a criminal in a new suit of clothes, to make him a saint or a gentleman? How can it be done? Let us look at this problem from a philosophical standpoint. I have often wondered just why it was such good politics for a man to become a sort of socialist now and then.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I am telling you the truth, sir, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. When we get our feet around the old stove or before the fireplace and light our pipes, we pat ourselves on the back and suddenly we are all socialists. Is it not funny? But this is what struck me the other day, in thinking over this problem: Truth, as one of the great writers has said, is a jewel of many facets, and if we are to appreciate the whole truth we must be able to observe the beauty reflected from all the facets. Men have a very hard struggle to make a living. They have a harder struggle to attain independence or comfort; and when you seize upon this one condemnatory element in the system; when you abuse it, when you criticize it, when you damn it, you are at one with man in his despair. He agrees with you, because like most of us and unlike a few of us he knows that he cannot comprehend the sum total of reality, and that he will never discern all the lineaments or all the aspects of truth. You are certainly hitting upon one element of truth, but only one. Be very careful—and I say this in all kindness—be very careful that you do not unconsciously capitalize discontent—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I said "unconsciously," and I did not say it unkindly. We have to be very careful that we do not capitalize the forces of discontent and cause mankind to turn away from its true friends in a divine frenzy for beautiful abstractions which can mean nothing more than anguish.

Miss MACPHAIL: We had some beautiful abstractions in 1930.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Miss MACPHAIL: People turned to some beautiful abstractions in 1930.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): I do not think so. However, the hon. member may have her own opinion, and I shall respect it as I always do. Perhaps I may ask the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) this question: Is she at the present time a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation?

Miss MACPHAIL: Ask the U.F.O.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Ask the U.F.O.? Well, "by indirections find directions out." I should like to ask the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) if he is a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I rise to a question of privilege. I am the member for Hamilton.

Mr. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I was falling into the fatal error of looking at that jewel of truth and perceiving the wrong facet.

Let us go on with the resolution. We find in it the expression: "Ruthless competition replaced by collective ownership under democratic control". That is a mouthful. Is that communism? The resolution refers to ruthless competition which is to be replaced by collective ownership. The only collective ownership I could conceive would be ownership by the state. Does the expression "collective ownership" mean that the state shall own everything? And then we find the words "under democratic control". I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in referring to democratic control this afternoon said that this House of Commons, organized as it is, is incapable of realizing what he had hoped it would realize. What does he mean by democratic control? What does he mean by collective ownership? How is he going to attain collective ownership? Is there to be utter and immediate confiscation by the passage of law, so that all property shall be vested in the state? If there is not to be confiscation will there be payment for the property which the state will vest in itself? If there is to be payment, what kind of payment will it be? How much will the payment be, and in what way will it be paid? What does the resolution mean, anyway?

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution, like all Gaul, is divided into three parts; but where one can find more gall in one part than in the other is very difficult for me to state—although I think it is in the first part.

I agree with the mover of the resolution when he states that the system under which we live is not an ideal system; but I ask him what is his alternative? What is the argument derived from history, and what do we learn from our contemporary experience? Let us analyze the situation in Germany to-day. Germany is a country which does its business under a greater degree of state control than obtains in any other country, with the exception of Russia. I read an article a short time ago in Current History stating that when one goes down the main street of Berlin he sees all the glory and all the pageantry of pre-war days, but if he should get off the main street he would find that the condition of the people is bad beyond description. In those side streets he would find families going out day after day to beg for their bread. That is an example of state control. Let us go back to Russia. The hon. member does not like me to refer to Russia; however I shall tell about a young man who came back from Russia to my constituency. This young Polish chap had learned to make tractors in Henry Ford's factory, and had been persuaded to go to Stalingrad to assist the Russians in the manufacture of automobiles. He was supplied with everything in the way of clothes and food, and was given adequate police protection. In the Chase National bank of New York $180 was placed each month to his credit. Notwithstanding all this he came back to the constituency of Selkirk to live with his peasant father and mother. Speaking to the boy directly—because I did not obtain my information from any intermediary source—I said, "Why did you come back to this country where no doubt some months will elapse before you can obtain a position? Why did you leave that new country with all the privileges it held for you?" He said, "Mr. Stitt, I was afraid to go outside the compound at night." "Why were you afraid?" I asked. He replied, "The Russians were so poorly clad I was afraid they would murder me for my clothes."

As it is eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 12, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, of the Hon. Murray MacLaren, member for the electoral district of St. John-Albert, by acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

I accordingly issued my writ to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

RESIGNATION OF MR. T. L. McEVOY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk has received the resignation of T. L. McEvoy, Esquire, a committee clerk, House of Commons, which has been accepted, subject to ratification by the house, and that I have directed the clerk to lay upon the table the correspondence and my recommendation in relation thereto.

HUDSON BAY ROUTE

MARINE INSURANCE RATES ON HULLS AND CARGOES OUT OF CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): On the orders of the day, on February 8, at page 668 of Hansard, the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) asked the following question:

What steps is this government taking to have these rates, which are now five times greater than those from Montreal out of Churchill, brought somewhere near a parity with those prevailing out of the port of Montreal.

The Prime Minister in reply stated that Mr. Stitt's question would be taken as a notice and, after giving the position of the imperial shipping committee with regard to the matter, he further stated that it would be looked into carefully and an answer given by the Minister of Marine.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Nelson quoted only part of paragraph 13 of the fifth report of the imperial shipping committee on Hudson bay marine insurance rates for 1934. The last sentence of section 13 of that report, reads as follows:

We recognize, however, that underwriters conduct their business on the basis of recorded results and it must be admitted that, as long as the route is used by comparatively few vessels, a total loss may more than account for the whole profit of a season.

Section 15 of the same report reads as follows:

At his annual interview with the chairman of the joint hull committee, our chairman pointed out that the disparity between the rates for the suspension of warranty in respect of Montreal and Churchill would still be considerable in the coming season, but the chairman of the joint hull committee urged that, owing to the loss of the Bright Fan the loss ratio on the Hudson bay route was such that a further reduction in the rates of premium was not feasible for the present. The chairman of the joint hull committee, however, indicated that, if a considerable number of vessels visited Churchill during the 1934 season and there was no serious loss, the joint hull committee would be prepared to give favourable consideration to the question of a further reduction in the rates of premium.

During the 1934 season of navigation to and from Churchill, thirteen different cargo steamers used the route. Two of them made two voyages each making fifteen voyages in and out of Churchill. All ships made good voyages and the logs of the ships furnished by themselves do not record any accidents or casualties in Hudson bay and strait this year.

The Marine department's report on the navigation conditions in Hudson bay and strait during the season of navigation 1934, has just been completed and copies of it have been transmitted to the imperial shipping committee and a letter has been sent to the High Commissioner for Canada in London, who is Canada's representative on the imperial shipping committee, requesting him to have the committee do all possible to obtain further reductions in Hudson bay marine insurance rates.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFUNDING OF MATURING AND CALLABLE FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the refunding of maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of substituted securities therefor, guaranteed by the dominion, in an amount not exceeding $200,000,000.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

VANCOUVER CITY BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would like to ask either the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister whether the press dispatches are correct that representations have been made by the British government to this government with respect to the attempt that is now being made to lower the rate of interest on outstanding bonds of the city of Vancouver.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The British government through the usual channels asked this government for the facts with respect to the situation. We advised them that the provinces were autonomous and they have taken such action as they thought advisable. We have had no communication other than through the usual channel, the High Commissioner, who inquired what the facts were so far as this government was concerned.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In view of the proposed legislation on unemployment insurance, as the second reading of the bill is fixed for to-day may I ask the Prime Minister to lay on the table of the house the draft convention adopted at the international labour conference at Geneva last year with regard to a scheme of unemployment insurance.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I assume that the hon. gentleman has seen the draft convention which comprises many matters in addition to unemployment insurance. I have not it beside me, but I will lay it on the table.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There are fewer matters in the convention than there are in the bill of the right hon. gentleman; there are only twenty-three sections as against forty-five in the proposed legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the appropriate time to enter into a discussion, but surely the ex-Minister of Justice knows the details of legislation in each country are not entirely the same as those contained in the draft convention.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely the Prime Minister knows when he introduces legislation like that, he should give to the house the draft convention regarding it.

USE OF DRUG HEROIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Have any representations been made to the Minister of Pensions and National Health regarding the prohibition of the importation and use of the drug heroin. Has he any statement to make in regard to the matter?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I was not very clear as to the question, but I shall read it and give the hon. member an answer to-morrow.

MARITIME RIGHTS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Has the government received a report from the commission headed by Sir Thomas White with regard to maritime claims, and if so, when will the report be made public?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): No such report has been received.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ACT

APPOINTMENT OF COUNSEL TO REPRESENT FARMERS BEFORE PROVINCIAL BOARD OF REVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Finance. It arises out of a communication from Mrs. S. Ferguson, secretary of the rural municipality of Great Bend, No. 405, Saskatchewan. In the letter there is this resolution endorsed by the council of that municipality:

> That we recommend to the proper authorities that a capable lawyer be appointed by the government to represent farmers in cases of applications for debt adjustment brought before the provincial board of review.

My question is as follows: In view of the fact that loan companies and other corporations in every debt arrangement case passed on to the provincial board of review will be represented by able legal counsel, will the minister, to avoid placing farmers in a position of disadvantage and discrimination, consider the advisability of providing them with competent counsel before the board?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): This matter was brought to my attention some two or three weeks ago by wire from one of the larger agricultural organizations in western Canada. I advised them immediately in reply to the effect that if it was demonstrated in practice that solicitors for the farmers were required to be appointed, they would be, but that until such time as it was demonstrated that they were required, they would not be. I may say that this is a matter that I cannot discuss at this stage on the orders of the day, but when we are discussing the details of the farm loan measure I shall be glad to go into the matter at greater length.

HOUSING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): On January 24, the Prime Minister, on the discussion on a proposed national housing policy, said that at a later date he would state whether a special or a select standing committee should be named to consider the matter. Is he in a position to say when this question will be brought up?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I gather from inquiries made that the house will be satisfied with a select committee and it is proposed to appoint a committee of fifteen. I have asked the government whip to confer with the whips of the other parties for the purpose of securing the names of their representatives on the proposed committee.

ELECTRICITY INSPECTION ACT

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the Electricity Inspection Act, 1928 (French version).

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN UNEMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to establish an employment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 8 standing in my name, the second reading of which I now have the pleasure of moving, has been printed in English and in French for some days, and ample opportunity has been afforded to members of the house to make themselves familiar with its provisions. Our rules do not contemplate the discussion of sections of the bill seriatim on its second reading, but rather a discussion of the principles underlying the measure submitted to the house for its consideration. Therefore I shall content myself with endeavouring to keep within the rules, and shall confine my observations to the general principles of the measure.

It will be observed that the words used are "unemployment insurance." Therefore it is well at the outset to realize that this is an insurance measure, and not a relief measure. Insurance means that on the payment of a sum of money, usually called a premium, and most frequently paid in advance, the person paying such premium is entitled to a benefit if certain events happen or certain contingencies arise. The right to that benefit is dependent usually upon the insured person satisfying certain requirements. That is the essence of unemployment insurance; a sum paid for the purpose of securing a future benefit. In this instance the sum is to be paid by the employer, by the employee and by the state jointly, the sum total of these contributions constituting the premium which actuarially ensures to the beneficiary the benefits mentioned in the measure. To that extent it is not materially different from an ordinary insurance policy, which contemplates the payment of stated sums to the person named as the beneficiary upon certain contingencies or events happening, such payments to be made on conditions named in the insurance policy itself.

The discussion therefore is narrowed down to a consideration of what may be regarded as the basic principles upon which this insurance benefit is to be paid. I have already indicated that the premium is to be paid by three contributors, and that the benefits accrue upon the happening of certain contingencies, and on the condition that the insured has met certain requirements.

Leaving that for the moment, the question of administration becomes of paramount importance. Is an insurance plan of this character to be administered by the state itself, or is an organization to be set up clothed with the powers necessary to discharge the functions of administration? We have followed the British system in many of the provisions of the bill, but as far as administration is concerned the scheme provided by this bill, as will be observed by hon. members who have read it, is to be administered by a commission. The commission will consist of three persons. They will represent the great mass of employees, the employers, and the government. The provisions that enable labour and the employers to be represented are set out at length in the measure. In addition there is to be set up an advisory committee, which in essence is to be the watchdog of the fund. The function of the advisory committee is indicated by its name. It is expected that there will be a measure of voluntary service, and it has been found in most countries that there are, citizens so well-disposed towards social problems as to render their services gratuitously, but whether gratuitously or otherwise I am not at the moment concerned, beyond saying that the advisory committee will consist of a body of men of the highest possible type, to ensure that the fund is maintained in its integrity and that in every respect the terms and provisions of the statute are observed. In practice I think it will be found, as it has been found elsewhere, especially in England, that such a committee will ensure the commission discharging its duty free from any political considerations.

Then going a step further, it will be found that local committees for advice and assistance are to be provided, and on all these committees both employers and labour will have representation. The bill itself sets forth how these details are to be worked out. Section 36 is important in explaining the functions of the advisory committee. There are three great divisions with respect to administration, namely the commission, the advisory committee and the local committee. The purpose is that, subject to the sufficiency of the fund being maintained, which of course is a matter guaranteed by the membership of competent persons upon the advisory committee, benefits can be either high or low as the premiums paid may ensure. That is, the benefits may be larger if larger premiums are paid, the benefits may be diminished if the premiums are less than those mentioned in the measure. In other words it is the duty of the administrative bodies to see that the fund is maintained in its integrity, that it is sound actuarially, and that the benefits paid are such as the premiums paid by the insured will purchase.

[Mr. Bennett.]

The next question that might be asked would be, who are to be insured under this measure? The first part of the schedule indicates clearly who are to be insured; I do not think it serves any useful purpose to read the provisions at length, beyond pointing out that they are set forth at page 31 of the draft bill:

Employment within the meaning of part III of this act,—

(a) Employment in Canada under any contract of service or apprenticeship, written or oral, whether expressed or implied, or whether the employed person is paid by the employer or some other person, and whether under one or more employers, and whether paid by time or by the piece, or partly by time and partly by the piece, or otherwise.

(b) Employment under the dominion, or under any province of Canada with the concurrence of the province, or under any municipal or other public authority, other than any such employment as may be excluded by special order of the commission.

(c) Employment outside of Canada, or partly outside of Canada, for the purpose of the execution of some particular work, by persons who were insured contributors immediately before leaving Canada, for an employer resident or having a place of business in Canada, being employment which if it were employment in Canada, would make the persons employed therein employed persons within the meaning of this act; subject however, to any prescribed conditions, modifications or exceptions.

I read that as indicating the persons included within the purview of the measure. Then in part II the excepted employments are included. It is hardly necessary to point out to this house that all are not insured under this act. There is no measure in any country that insures all persons who may be employed. That, of course, is elementary; it need hardly be mentioned to bring it to the attention of hon. members. The excepted employments are:

(a) Employment in agriculture, horticulture and forestry.

(b) Employment in fishing.

(c) Employment in lumbering and logging.

About that I shall have something to say a little later.

(d) Employment in hunting and trapping.

(e) Employment in transportation by water or by air, and stevedoring.

(f) Employment in banking, mortgage, loan, trust, insurance or other financial business.

(g) Employment in domestic service, except where the employed person is employed in a club or in any trade or business carried on for the purposes of gain.

(h) Employment as a professional nurse for the sick or as a probationer undergoing training for employment as such nurse.

(i) Employment as a teacher, including teachers of music and dancing, whether engaged in schools, colleges, universities or institutes or in a private capacity.

(j) Employment in the permanent active militia, The Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

(k) Employment as a member of dominion, provincial, or municipal police forces.

(l) Employment,—

(i) in the public service of Canada pursuant to the provisions of the Civil Service Act; or

(ii) in the public service of Canada or of a province or by a municipal authority upon certification satisfactory to the commission that the employment is, having regard to the normal practice of the employment, permanent in character.

(m) Employment as an agent paid by commission or fees or a share in the profits, or partly in one and partly in another of such ways, where the person so employed is mainly dependent for his livelihood on his earnings from some other occupation, or where he is ordinarily employed as such agent by more than one employer, and his employment under no one of such employers is that on which he is mainly dependent for his livelihood.

(n) Employment otherwise than by way of manual labour and at a rate of remuneration exceeding in value two thousand dollars a year or in cases where such employment involves part time service only, at a rate of remuneration which, in the opinion of the commission, is equivalent to a rate of remuneration exceeding two thousand dollars a year for full time service.

Provided that any person in respect of whom contributions have been paid as an insured contributor for not less than five hundred weeks may continue as an insured contributor notwithstanding anything in this paragraph contained.

(o) Employment of a casual nature otherwise than for the purpose of the employer's trade or business.

(p) Employment of any class which may be specified in a special order made by the commission, and declared by the commission to apply for the purposes of this act, as being of such a nature that it is ordinary adopted as subsidiary employment only and not as the principal means of livelihood.

(q) Employment in the service of the husband or wife of the employed person.

(r) Employment for which no wages or other money payment is made, where the person employed is the child of, or is maintained by the employer.

The list is long, but in reality it may be divided shortly into two classes. One class is composed of those who, by reason of their employment, are assured of certain benefits; that is, those who are in the civil service and who are entitled to allowances or those who are employed in the militia or the police forces of the country, using those as illustrations. The second class includes those whose employment may be classed as more or less casual and therefore not such as might be anticipated to be within the provisions of an unemployment insurance act. With respect to the latter class, I referred to persons engaged in the logging industry. In some parts of the country that is a very seasonal employment, and it would not be possible for employees to be engaged continuously for a sufficient number of days to bring themselves within the act. But apart from the fact that it may be desirable, during the progress of the bill through committee, to amend its provisions in that regard, I think I should point out that in one part of Canada the occupation of logging extends over the whole year, in which event provision might be made to meet such a case. But apart altogether from the power to amend in committee if it is thought desirable so to do, section 7 contains one of the most important provisions in the act. It enables the commissioners to propose plans or schemes that will enable those who do not come within the purview of the act to be brought within its operation either directly or by means of a special scheme. That is, if on inquiry it is found that, from an actuarial standpoint, the employment is such as would warrant provision being made for that class of employees to which I have referred, then under section 7 provision is made by which that may be done.

Those are the general provisions as to those who may and those who may not come within the operation of the act. It may be a matter of interest to ascertain what the numbers were according to the census of 1931. I use the census figures because there has been so much doubt and conjecture as to the numbers in other cases, and I think it desirable to accept the census of June 1, 1931, for the purpose of indicating to the house the numbers that will be affected by the measure, as indicated by those census figures. The total employees in Canada as shown by the census returns, as of June 1, 1931, were 2,566,001, of whom 2,018,334 were male and 547,667 female. Within the industries that I have just mentioned under part 1 of the act, according to the census figures of 1931 the total number affected by this bill would be 1,701,834, of whom 1,406,930 would be male and 294,904 female. According to the same figures the number excluded would total 864,187, of whom 611,404 would be male and 252,763 female. Itemized, the figures from the census bureau are as follows:

Excluded Males

Agriculture	200,468
Fishing and trapping	10,379
Logging	41,480
Finance	57,627
Miscellaneous, and excluded occupations in included industries	301,450

In the finance division 24,822 were female and 227,941 were included in the miscellaneous and excluded occupations in included industries, making a total of 252,763, which added to those males employed in the industries I previously indicated gives a total of 864,167 not included. It will be observed, therefore, that this measure does not include those employed in banks, insurance companies, trust companies or loan companies or under the general designation of finance; those are not included under the operation of the bill, to the extent of the number I have just given.

Having indicated those who are included and those excluded from the operation of the bill it might be thought desirable to ascertain what premiums they must pay; ordinarily that would be the next question that might be asked. That will be found at page 33 of the bill in detail.

In order that there may be a clear appreciation of contributions, I shall call attention to them as I go along. If a male employed person is aged 21 years or upwards, the employer will pay 25 cents a week, and the employed person himself will pay 25 cents per week. A woman would pay four cents per week less, and the employer would also pay four cents less each week. If a young man between the ages of 18 and 21 years is employed he will pay 18 cents per week and the employer will pay a similar sum. A young woman between the same ages will pay three cents per week less, or 15 cents, and the employer will pay the same amount. Between the ages of 17 and 18, which is the lowest class except one, which I shall presently mention, the boy will pay 11 cents per week and the employer a similar amount. Girls will pay nine cents and the employer nine cents per week. Boys aged 16 years but under 17 will pay seven cents per week, and the employer will pay seven cents. Girls of the same age will pay six cents, and the employer of those girls a like amount.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Then if hon. members will turn to page 35 in the bill they will find what the payments of those premiums, plus the amount paid by the state, will enable the people affected to secure by way of benefits. A man aged 21 years or upwards will receive $1 per day or $6 per week. A woman will receive 85 cents per day or $5.10 per week. A young man aged 18 but under 21 will receive 70 cents per day, or $4.20 per week, while a young woman of similar age will receive 60 cents per day or $3.60 per week. Under the classification of 17 years and under 18, boys will receive 45 cents per day or $2.70 per week, and girls 35 cents per day or $2.10 per week. A boy aged 16 years and under 17 will receive 30 cents per day or $1.80 per week, and a girl 25 cents per day or $1.50 per week. There is a provision also for dependents. An adult dependent will receive 45 cents per day or $2.70 per week, and a dependent child 15 cents per day or 90 cents per week.

Those are the benefits to be derived from the payment of the premiums I have indicated. I have already stated that the employers and employees do not make the complete contribution. There is a contribution made by the state, and those who are interested will observe in the measure that the administration costs are to be paid by the government of the country. They will find at page 24 of the bill that the contribution by the government in addition to administration costs, is to be 20 per cent or one-fifth of the sum paid by the aggregate deposits from time to time made by the employers and employees. That sum is to be deposited to the credit of the fund by the Minister of Finance. We propose to keep the closest possible record of the costs of administration. It is but fair to say that in England the cost of administration has been about 12½ per cent. To what extent that may be lessened in this country it is difficult to say, but I should say that having regard to distances it would be highly improbable that the cost would be less, and in my judgment it will be more.

Perhaps at this point some hon. members may be interested to know the benefits paid under the English plan, converted into our money at the proper rate of exchange, plus 25 per cent which is supposed to represent the difference in living costs between this country and Great Britain. Whether or not that is an accurate statement I cannot say, but that is the figure which economists and actuaries are prepared to support. The table is an interesting one, and although it is perhaps not desirable to take too much time to read it at length, I shall read a portion of it at any rate. I shall place the complete table on record, and deal in greater detail with those parts which I believe are of interest. The table is as follows:

NOTE.—The benefits shown above in Canadian currency are the equivalent of the benefits in English currency increased by 25% to allow approximately for the increase in the cost of living.

This table shows the weekly rates of benefits from time to time paid under the British unemployment insurance scheme, converted to Canadian currency at the rate of $4.86⅔ cents to the pound, and increased by 25 per cent to allow approximately for the difference in the cost of living. On the bottom line of this table are shown the benefits as they would be under the bill which I now submit to the house. I need hardly say that commencing with the year 1913 there is a steady increase in the benefits payable under the British act. When the act began operation in 1913 men between the ages of 18 and 64 received the amount of $2.13; as I have said this money is converted into our currency and 25 per cent added. Women between the ages of 18 and 64 received the same benefit. Boys under 18 received $1.06, and girls received the same amount. Adult dependents did not receive anything in England when the act originated, and in fact did not receive anything until 1921. Nor were there any provisions made for dependent children until that year. After the amendment of 1919 men between the ages of 18 and 64 received $3.35 per week, and women of a similar age received the same amount. Boys under 18 and girls under 18 received the same benefit, namely $1.52 per week.

Then there was the further amendment in 1920 as a result of which men between the ages of 18 and 64 received $4.56, and women received $3.65. Boys under 18 years received $2.28 per week, and girls at that time suffered a lessening, as compared with the figure then paid to men, by being reduced to $1.82.

In 1921 there was a further amendment which brings the sum payable to men between the ages of 18 and 64 up to $6.08 per week, in our money, there were then no dependents' benefits. Women receive $4.87. Boys of 18 and under $3.04 and girls $2.43. Then came the later amendment of 1921 whereby men between the ages I have indicated, namely 18 and 64, reach $4.56 and women $3.65. Boys under 18 received $2.28 and girls $1.82.

Then for the first time provision was made for dependents, and adult dependents are shown at $1.52 per week, and for dependent children there is a further payment to the family head of 30 cents per week. This continues until 1924 at which time there was a further amendment regarding benefits. In that year benefits are brought to $5.47 for men between the ages of 18 and 64 and $4.56 for women. There was no change with respect to boys or girls under 18 and no change with respect to dependents except in the case of children. It was then provided that for each dependent child there should be paid an additional sum of 61 cents—not 30 cents per week.

Then came the amendment of 1928, at which time there was a change with respect not only to ages but to benefits. In that year those who received benefits under the act and were between the ages of 21 and 64 would receive, if men, the equivalent of $5.17 each week, and if women, the amount is $4.56. In the same year boys under 18 receive $1.82 and girls $1.52 per week. The benefits for adult dependents are raised to $2.13 per week, while those payable with respect to dependent children remain at 61 cents as before.

Further and special provisions were made in that year for those of the ages eighteen, nineteen and twenty, for as I have just pointed out under the act of that year provision was made for those between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-four, and not between eighteen and sixty-four; and so special provisions were made for those of eighteen and nineteen and twenty. Boys of eighteen received per week $3.04; nineteen, $3.65; twenty, $4.26; girls of eighteen received $2.43; nineteen, $3.04, and twenty, $3.65.

The law thus remained until 1930 when it was again amended, there being no changes however with respect to men and women but a slight change with respect to those of the ages of eighteen, nineteen and twenty, who were lumped in one class and received a benefit of $4.26 per week for the young men, and the girls received $3.65.

Special classifications were made of those of seventeen, and under, both for the boys and the girls. The boys under seventeen received $1.82, and $2.74 if seventeen years old. The girls of seventeen received $2.28, and under that age $1.52.

There were also certain changes made that year with respect to the benefits payable for adult dependents, the amount being increased to $2.74 per week in our money.

In 1931 there was a further amendment to the statute so that men between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-four entitled to benefit received $4.64 per week, and the women $4.11; the men between eighteen and twenty, $3.30, and the girls between eighteen and twenty $3.27 per week. There were special provisions for girls of seventeen, and under seventeen, the former class receiving $2.05 and the latter $1.37 per week, while boys of seventeen received $2.43, and those under seventeen $1.67 per week. The adult dependent rate was decreased to $2.43 per week.

In 1934, that is last year, the final amendment to the act was made consequent upon the report of the royal commission which investigated the whole question, to which report I referred a few days ago. In that year parliament once more legislated and provided that men between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-four entitled to the benefits would receive in our money $5.17 per week, and women $4.65; the young men $4.26 if between the ages of eighteen and twenty, and the young women between eighteen and twenty $3.65 per week. Boys of seventeen received $2.74 per week and under seventeen $1.82; while girls of the age of seventeen received $2.28, and under that age $1.52. Again the adult dependent rate was increased from $2.43 to $2.74 per week.

Comparing the figures under the British act of 1934 plus an increase of 25 per cent to offset the difference in living costs between the two countries with the figures under Bill No. 8 now submitted to the house it will be observed that the benefits under the Canadian bill for men between twenty-one and sixty-four are $6 per week as against $5.17 under the British bill of last year, and $5.10 for women as against $4.65 for women under the British bill of last year; and for men between eighteen and twenty $4.20 per week in Canada as against $4.26 under the British bill, and for females between the ages of eighteen and twenty $3.60 per week here as against $3.65 per week in Great Britain, converted into Canadian funds. For boys of the age of seventeen the rate in Canada is $2.70 and $2.74 in Great Britain at par of exchange. For boys under seventeen, $1.80 in Canada and $1.82 in Britain; and for girls $2.10 in Canada as against $2.28 in Britain; $1.50 for those under the age of seventeen in Canada and $1.52 for those under seventeen in Britain. The dependent payment to adults in Canada is $2.70 per week as against $2.74 in Britain, and the payment for each child in this country is 90 cents per week as against 61 cents under the British act.

Mr. BOURASSA: May I ask the right hon. gentleman if with these changes in the benefits in Britain the rates of contribution were changed in proportion?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has asked a question about which the royal commission had to make most careful inquiry in Britain because it will be within the memory of my hon. friend from Labelle that the British fund owing to abnormal unemployment had to borrow large sums from the state, and the rates of contribution were not sufficient to enable the benefits I have indicated to be paid. Therefore the British bill was entirely revised and rearranged, and the contributions placed upon a basis that was believed to be such as could be maintained and be actuarially sound under the bill of 1934. That is the reason it has taken considerable time to prepare carefully the measure now before the house and have the actuaries perfectly satisfied that the contributions made will without question pay the benefits provided. I do not know that I could do better perhaps than to read one or two sections from the report of the royal commission which reported on this question. I noted them as being important perhaps from the standpoint of the house, although the report is in the library. The report touches upon the very question which the hon. member for Labelle has just raised, beginning at paragraph 407, which reads:

> 407. We have considered the desirability of reintroducing the principle of directly relating the period for which a claimant should be allowed to draw benefit to his contribution record. The weakness of a fixed limit of benefit for all contributors is that there is no discrimination between the worker with a good employment record over many years and the worker who has paid only the minimum number of qualifying contributions. If the risk of unemployment to which different persons were exposed was entirely free from influences within their control, it might be justifiable to allow all claimants an equal maximum period of benefit, though even then there would be a strong case for favouring the claimant with the better record. As we have stated, this is not the case, and it is necessary to devise practicable safeguards which will at the same time do justice to the general body of insured persons.
> 408. The alternatives are either (a) as at present to allow a short period of benefit on a uniform basis for all contributors; or (b) to find some automatic method of selecting the claimants who may reasonably be given a title to a longer period of insurance benefit. The second alternative is the one which, in our view, is preferable. As a general proposition, the claimant with the better record of employment in the past is less likely to make unreasonable claims than the claimant whose contribution record is hardly more than sufficient to pass the qualifying test. We are, accordingly, in favour of restoring the principle of relating the period of benefit to the record of insurable employment over a recent period. For administrative purposes, it is desirable that the period to which reference is made should not extend beyond five years or some such period.

I might make some short observations as indicating the general operation of the English act, as reported in Glen's Unemployment

Assistance, which at page 112, answers perhaps in a single word the question that the hon. member for Labelle has asked with respect to the English provisions:

(1) An insured contributor who is between the ages of sixteen and sixty-five years and is unemployed shall, if he proves that the statutory conditions are fulfilled in his case, and if he is not disqualified under the Unemployment Insurance Acts for the receipt of benefit, be entitled, subject to the provisions of those acts, to receive in a benefit year, benefit—

so and so and so. I shall not take up time in reading it all.

In Canada we have followed the same principle, and the contributions, we are informed by the actuaries, will produce the benefits provided.

It will be observed that there is also a provision whereby the person who is continuously employed and who later finds himself out of employment may be entitled to additional benefits. That is, by his contributions he has earned additional benefits under the provisions of the statute. His good record of employment, so to speak, has operated to increase for him the number of payments that he is entitled to receive under the statute.

I have indicated what benefits are paid, and the next question to ask is this: What are the conditions under which benefits are to be received? Just as in the case of accident insurance one has to ask oneself, looking at the policy, what the conditions are under which benefits are received in the event of suffering accident, so in the event of suffering unemployment we must ask whether or not the conditions imposed by the statutory policy have been complied with. They will be found in section 20 of the bill. It is provided first of all that contributions for not less than forty full weeks—exclusive of any unemployed days for which he is entitled to a refund of contributions paid by him—shall have been paid in respect of him while employed in insurable employment during a period not exceeding two years immediately preceding the date on which a claim for benefit is made. Secondly, he must have made application for unemployment benefit in the prescribed manner, proving that since the date of the application he has been continuously unemployed. And in the third place, he must show that he is capable of and available for work but is unable to obtain suitable employment. There must be a combination of these three factors to enable him to become a recipient of benefits under the policy he has. The details I do not propose to amplify on the second reading of the bill because they are rather numerous and it will take some time to deal with them.

I have thus stated, without going into a mass of details, the conditions under which benefits accrue or attach to the insured person; the sum he is entitled to receive per week for payment of premiums he has made; and the conditions under which and the period for which he will receive benefits. The next point is: How will his claim be settled? The provisions for settlement of the claim are set out in the act, so that the claim can be settled on the spot locally by the insurance officers.

Then there is provision with respect to a board of referees and ultimately the umpire. There is a provision here, to which the trades and labour council indicated the other day they were opposed, for appeal to the exchequer court, not for the purpose of determining the amount to be paid, but questions of law that may arise as to the status of a person under the act. If it is thought desirable when the bill is in committee that such a provision should not be made, I am quite content; but it is placed in the bill in order to ensure judicial interpretation, if doubt arises, as to the insurability of any one affected by the measure. Sometimes judicial determination of the meaning of a section becomes of the utmost importance to maintain uniformity in the interpretation of any measure. I remember that once in my more youthful days, when visiting London, I heard argued in the House of Lords a case that involved a small sum of money, but it was important from the point of view of determining the meaning of a statute in order that it might be applied to all cases that might arise; and the acute differences of judicial opinion made apparent to me at once the necessity for judicial interpretation, which sometimes is highly desirable in dealing with certain matters. The provision is inserted in the statute to enable judicial interpretation by the exchequer court to be obtained. If the house in committee thinks it undesirable to pursue that course, it is quite satisfactory, so far as we are concerned, that it should not be proceeded with.

The provisions with respect to settlement of claim will be found in section 27 and succeeding sections of the act. There is one other provision contained in this bill which I think is of very great importance. It is one which in a measure we have acted upon since 1919-20—that is, the setting up and maintenance in efficiency of unemployment exchanges. Obviously, in a country of great distances such as this, it is difficult if not impossible to move labour, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. gentleman from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) said that one might be in Halifax to-day and in Vancouver to-morrow. It is not easy to move labour from one part of Canada to another, though it is not difficult to shift it from one part of a province to another; and the maintenance of labour exchanges throughout the country is therefore one of the most important provisions of this legislation. It is intended thereby to ensure that where there is a surplus of labour at one point and a deficit of labour at another, the surplus labour may be made available for supplying the point at which there is a deficit. In my judgment, a complete exchange system in this country will be of the utmost value. I do not desire in any sense to overestimate it. It will be necessary to subdivide the country. Just as in England, Scotland and Wales, with a population of forty millions, there are seven divisions in connection with labour exchanges, so there will have to be divisions here; though in a country such as Canada, where distances are great, it will be for the commission to determine what is a reasonable number. I do not think that as large a number as seven is at all necessary or desirable; but that these labour exchanges can and will discharge a most useful and salutary service goes, I think, almost without saying.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will they interfere with provincial services?

Mr. EULER: I was going to ask whether this was intended to supersede the offices now in existence in the various towns.

Mr. BENNETT: They are maintained partly by the provinces and partly by the dominion, and it is contemplated that so far as possible the same shall continue. But the responsibility with respect to the maintenance of the offices will rest with the commission, operating of course in the closest cooperation with the provincial authorities. It would be idle to express an opinion in anticipation as to the success with which that cooperation will take place. But if the offices of the commission are governed by the rules set forth in the statute I have no doubt of the earnest desire of the provinces to cooperate with them; and on the other hand, with the knowledge which the provincial authorities must have, it is obvious that their cooperation is of the utmost importance with respect to the successful administration of the act itself.

I do not propose to trespass longer upon the time of the house in dealing with this measure beyond saying this, that clearly, in the very nature of things, it must consist of many sections of detailed provisions for administration. In the main the principles of the British act have been followed. Obviously, there must be many changes in comparison with a country where there is a unitary form of government as distinguished from the form in this country; and there must be many differences in administration, having regard to the sparse population on the one hand as compared with the very large population on the other, as in Great Britain. The numbers receiving insurance benefits in Great Britain are many millions; in this country those who would receive benefits are of course much more limited in number.

I do not desire for a moment that there should be any misapprehension on the part of hon. members of this house as to the nature of this legislation. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) yesterday attributed to me words which I cannot find that I ever used; but inasmuch as he indicates that I have no knowledge of the meaning of words, it is possible that they may have been used without my having an understanding of their meaning. I can find no evidence of it, looking through the record. However, I desire to make it abundantly clear that this is intended as a measure of reform and not of relief. Not for a single moment do I suggest that this will relieve the position of unemployed men at the present time. I have never done so. I have other ideas as to how that may be dealt with, but I want to make it abundantly clear—

An hon. MEMBER: After four years.

Mr. BENNETT: Someone suggests four years. If the hon. gentleman had been through the four years I have been through, he would not be talking about anything other than the conditions that obtained during those four years.

I might make it clear that if during the years preceding 1930, from 1922 to 1928 or 1929, we had had a measure such as this, we would by reason of the conditions prevailing in a new country as distinguished from an old, have an entirely different situation from that which we find in an older civilization. I need hardly point out to every hon. member that in a new country with the development of its resources, with employment steadily mounting and increasing, the contributions would also have been mounting and becoming greater and as the claims upon the fund would be fewer because of increased occupation, the surplus which would have developed would have been very considerable. But we have faced a situation in which we have paid out very large sums of money for the purpose of assisting the provinces in the discharge of their obligations. Through the provinces we have assisted the municipalities and there has been no fund from which the unemployed have been able to draw excepting by way of relief. I repeat: this measure is not submitted as a relief measure; it is submitted as an earnest effort on the part of the government to provide machinery whereby the condition which has obtained will not again prevail, that such measures as those which have been taken in other countries to meet the situation to which I have referred will be available in Canada, and that by the joint efforts of indvidual workmen, their employers and the state, a condition will be created that will make it impossible to have a recurrence in this country of what we passed through during the last four years. It is for that reason this measure is submitted to the house and without detailing it at greater length I invite in committee a careful scrutiny of its provisions and an examination of its sections so that by constructive efforts made by members on either side we may be able to ensure that the legislation meets the conditions with which we are faced and will be able, as I say, to prevent the recurrence in this country of the sad conditions through which we have passed during the last few years.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is now before us for second reading is entitled:

> An act to establish an employment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

I should like my first word to be that with respect to the principle underlying social insurance, I am most heartily in accord. I would like also in particular to say that I am heartily in favour of the principle underlying a national system of unemployment insurance. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the concluding part of his remarks asked why it was that we had not introduced a similar measure some years ago, or rather he put it in a more pointed way, so far as hon. gentlemen on this side are concerned, when he said that, if we had placed an unemployment insurance measure on the statutes some time between 1922 and 1928 or 1929, he would not have had to be meeting the difficulties of the present situation. I shall take advantage of the Prime Minister's remarks in that connection to place before the house the situation with which the Liberal administration was confronted when it came into office, its attitude toward social legislation at that time, and the reason why in regard to the enactment of social legislation it was not then possible to include a measure providing for a national system of unemployment insurance. I think if the house will bear with me for a short time, it will find that a measure of unemployment insurance could not very well have been added to the other measures of social insurance which were introduced while the late Liberal administration was in office.

In order to make perfectly clear the position and attitude of the Liberal party towards social insurance and unemployment insurance in particular, I should like to go back to the time at which I was chosen leader of my party and to give to the house the resolution which was adopted by the National Liberal convention in August, 1919. That resolution was as follows:

> The National Liberal convention accept in their entirety as a part of the Liberal platform, in the spirit they have been framed and in so far as the special circumstances of the country will permit, the terms of the labour convention and general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace.

Then there followed several items that are set forth in the League of Nations document. The Liberal convention adopted in addition the following resolution:

> Also, that in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces: and that on matters pertaining to industrial or social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

Hon. members will see that in the resolution regarding social insurance the National Liberal convention was careful to point out the need of recognition of conditions as they might exist in the country for some time to come. It recognized as well the federal character of the dominion, also the difficulties that might be encountered in seeking to give full expression to the program of social insurance which it was hoped might come into being in the course of a few years.

The first of the conditions to which attention was directed was the financial condition of the country. May I say that I regard that as an all-important consideration in dealing with these questions of social insurance. Social insurance, in the nature of things, involves a large expenditure of public money, and while that should not be a reason for a government hesitating to bring forward measures of social insurance, it is a reason why in bringing them forward it should be in a position to state exactly how the revenues are to be raised which it will be necessary to have in order to put any proposed scheme into force, and also the extent of the outlay which the scheme will probably occasion in relation to the expenditures of the country generally. That was for us a very important consideration when in 1921 the Liberal government came into office; It is a very important consideration to-day. In order that I may not be misunderstood, may I make clear that if we are to economize, as I think we shall probably be compelled to do all around, the last place at which I think economy should begin is with respect to social services. I think great care should be taken to see that those persons in the country who are less fortunate than their fellow men are the ones to receive the first concern of the government.

I shall now speak of the conditions as they were in Canada when the Liberal administration came into office, having before it this resolution with respect to social insurance, and having a strong desire to give expression to that resolution in its fullest terms. I do it for this further reason, that I think the situation to-day in many particulars is more or less parallel with that which existed at that time. When the Liberal government came into office in 1921 the country was going through a time of great depression. Deficits were being added to deficits in the public accounts; taxation had to be increased almost to the limit to which it could be borne by the people. The government of the day was obliged to take account not only of the continuous increase in debt and in taxation, but also of the new obligations that had suddenly come upon this country to an extent the like of which it had never known before. It was the post war period, when for the first time Canada's debt had been so very greatly increased, when the interest on the public debt alone had reached an amount equal to that which at one time would have met the entire yearly expenditures of government. There were pensions to be paid to soldiers who had served overseas, an entirely new obligation amounting, and certain further to amount, to increasingly large sums as the years passed. There were expenses in connection with the reestablishment of returned men in civil life. Added to that were large outlays necessitated immediately for purposes of relief, because then as now hundreds of thousands of people were unemployed, and the dominion was called upon to assist the provinces and the municipalities in providing unemployment relief. Hon. gentlemen opposite will recall that when the government of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen was in office it inaugurated the system of the dominion supplementing the expenditures of the provinces and municipalities in the matter of relief, as the best scheme to meet that immediate situation. When we came into office we carried on as a temporary measure the system that had been inaugurated by hon. gentlemen opposite. We believed, however, that the only effective cure for unemployment would be found in policies which would serve to revive industry and trade. We felt that once some of the many trade restrictions which then existed were removed, and other policies put into force, we should find that trade and business would revive and that unemployment relief would no longer be necessary.

The situation worked out exactly as we had expected. But for the first four years the government of the day was obliged to supplement from the federal treasury the funds of the provinces and the municipalities for relief purposes. It will hardly be contended that during those first four years, 1921 to 1925, any government dealing with the problems with which the then Liberal government was called upon to deal would have received any real support from parliament in an endeavour to put through at that particular time new measures of social legislation. But may I point this out, that there had come as a first obligation and for the first time, in the pensions that were to be paid to returned soldiers, what was in the nature of social legislation. Pensions, whether paid to soldiers or to civilians, fall within the class of legislation to be described as social legislation; it is making provision for those who have incurred sacrifices or who for certain reasons are unable to make provision for themselves, or who cannot be expected to make adequate provision. So that when the Liberal government came into office it was immediately carrying out, to the extent of the payment of pensions at least, the beginning of a scheme of social insurance.

That there may be no mistake as to what the outlays were that the government of the day had to consider, I should like to put the figures on record. But before doing so may I remind the house of what took place yesterday as recorded in the votes and proceedings. A motion was introduced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) to the effect that:

In the opinion of this house, the Peace River country should be connected by a direct railway outlet to the Pacific coast.

That resolution was amended by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) to read as follows:

That the following words be aded to the said proposed motion: "when circumstances permit."

And the house accepted that amendment. Now in so doing the government and the house were simply facing realities. My hon. friend wanted, as we all want, to see the Peace River country connected with the Pacific coast. But to suggest that that should be done at this session evidently was in the opinion of the government going too far. It was received as one of many things that will have to wait until circumstances permit.

Now I want to state the circumstances which did not permit an immediate introduction of some measures of social reform which the Liberal government of that day would have liked to put into force at once if it had been in the position so to do. The entire cost of the war, as hon. members know, was borne by the federal government. It amounted to something like $1,460,000,000, all of which was a federal obligation; none of it an obligation shared by the provinces. It was a new obligation, unforeseen prior to the time of the war. The annual interest charge on the interest-bearing national debt through the war was increased from $14,687,797 in 1914 to $136,007,667 in 1923. The expenditures incurred during the fiscal years 1920-21-22-23-24 on soldiers' civil reestablishment alone totalled over $111,000,000. Up to the end of the fiscal year 1923-24, $94,733,548 had been disbursed by the soldier settlement board on behalf of soldier settlers. The total liabilities for pensions increased from $7,273,728 in 1918 to $30,421,766 in 1923. The total expenditure for pensions on account of the war to the end of the fiscal year 1923-24 amounted to $151,751,591.

It will be observed that I have given the figures up to 1924 only. Many of the corresponding figures would be much higher in the years following that period because, for example, the amount paid in pensions rapidly increased as time went on. I have taken that year, however, because that was the year in which the immediate objective of the Liberal party when it came into office was reached, that is, the balancing of our budget. We felt very strongly that before we launched on new schemes of social insurance the country would expect that we should balance our budget, and that by doing so we would be in a position gradually to reduce taxation, to reduce the public debt and be thereby free to incur new obligations such as might be involved in a general social insurance scheme. I remember very well how the late Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, stressed over and over again in this house that unless we balanced our budget the country's credit would be gone, and if the country's credit was gone everything would be gone with it. I need not remind the house that when we came into office, the public debt had been increased in 1920-21 by $92,000,000. In 1921-22, there was an addition of $82,000,000 to the public debt. In 1922-23 the addition was brought down to $32,000,000. It was not until 1924 that the budget was balanced. I do submit that, as regards those four years, in taking on the great obligations that accrued immediately after the war the government was assuming all that could be expected of it at that time.

But may I again point out, Mr. Speaker, wherein we recognized a special obligation in the matter of social legislation. While it was accepted by the previous government and by our own administration that the provinces and municipalities should become primarily responsible for relief, the Liberal federal government took upon itself the obligation of the entire provision for unemployed returned men, as well as other expenditures incidental to their well-being. Just to show what these additional expenditures in regard to the returned men amounted to let me give a few figures. War pensions for the fiscal years 1921-22 to 1929-30, the period during which the Liberal administration was in office, totalled $234,000,000. This helps to account for the fact that we had to move a step at a time. Unemployment relief to war pensioners during the same period amounted to $3,900,000, and as I have said the Department of Pensions and National Health took over the obligation of providing for the relief of unemployed war pensioners, giving them direct relief, clothing, fuel, and shelter. That, Mr. Speaker, in adidtion to the other obligations with which we were faced, is why up to 1924 we had not found it possible to bring in any specific measure of social insurance, other than measures of the class I have indicated.

There was a second condition, it will be observed, to which attention was drawn by the National Liberal convention, with regard to all matters of social insurance. The convention resolution pointed out that, having regard to Canada as a federated country these matters would have to be considered in conjunction with the provinces. I think that view was at the time accepted by everyone. Certainly we accepted it, and we still believe it is the only right and proper method of proceeding. Beyond all question the provinces have jurisdiction with regard to these matters, and it is essential, in connection with any legislation that is to be made workable, that the provinces should be brought into relation with the dominion so that whatever is done should be done if possible as a matter of agreement, or in other words in a way which will not make for division in this country. After all what advantage is it going to be to those who are to receive the intended benefits if, as a result of legislation which is enacted either by the provinces or by the dominion, there is created some major issue of conflict and confusion between the two, with as a consequence the business of the country brought into an even more chaotic condition than is the case at the present time? I want to stress very strongly the importance of avoiding confusion in anything in these days. Business is sufficiently uncertain and disturbed at the present time, and if, before this session of parliament is over, the country begins to wonder even more than at present just what its new obligations are, how they are to be met, and what authority is really governing, we may have a condition affecting business which will precipitate a very serious situation in Canada. That is something that has to be considered, and a possibility of the kind was foreseen at the time the Liberal convention met in 1919. Then, as now, there was a period of depression in which these contingencies naturally suggested themselves to the minds of those giving thought to these subjects.

It was however clearly stated by the Liberal convention in the resolution I have read that while the question of jurisdiction might enter into a matter of this kind, it should not be permitted to stand in the way of a satisfactory solution. I want to make that very clear, and I should like therefore to read the words appearing in the resolution passed by the convention:

> On matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces by effective cooperation between the several governments.

That is exactly how the Liberal administration proceeded. As I shall show a little later, when we did introduce our first large measure of social legislation it was brought about and brought in as the result of conference between the provinces and ourselves, in a manner which left no doubt as to what each was prepared to do, and raised no question as to either having invaded the jurisdiction of the other.

May I mention a further circumstance which I should have mentioned previously; that is, the total amount which during those years we were obliged to give the provinces in the matter of relief. The figures are not comparable to the amounts being paid out to-day, but it is worthy of note that in the fiscal years 1922-23 to 1929-30 over $1,000,000 was paid by the federal treasury to provinces and municipalities in aid of relief. All circumstances taken together I think made it perfectly clear why, with its other obligations, the government of the day in the four years of which I am now speaking could not have gone further than it did go in connection with these matters of social legislation.

May I also point out, Mr. Speaker, that there were major problems of importance then, as there are to-day, and that on their solution depended not only what this dominion could do but what many of the provinces could do. On their solution depended the extent to which it might be possible for the government of the day to lift the country out of depression into a period of prosperity and, thereby, make possible and effective not only social legislation in the federal arena but also more in the way of social legislation in all the provinces. And the provinces, regarding this matter of social legislation as one coming within their jurisdiction did at that time extend the scope of their laws with respect to old age pensions, the allowances payable to mothers, widows' pensions, accident and invalidity, and other matters of social legislation. Unless the whole position of our country had been improved by our trade and commerce being revived, the provinces, without the aid of the dominion, would not have been able to begin to do what they did in matters of social legislation.

Looking at the question of social legislation it is necessary to take a bird's eye view of the whole. Considering what was done by the provinces as well as by the dominion by way of social legislation between 1921 and 1930 one must realize that what the provinces could do depended more than anything else upon the dominion's policies with respect to trade and those other policies which had to do with the revival of industry and business. To restore prosperity was the great objective which the Liberal government had before it.

Then there was the question of railways To-day we have a most embarrassing railway situation. We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the railway problem is a very great one, but may I tell them that it does not begin to compare with the railway situation with which the Liberal government was confronted in 1921. However, we succeeded in organizing the national railways and bringing them to a point where they became the envy of the world as a publicly owned enterprise. What was done by way of restoration of confidence in the national railways system and in promoting the progress of those railways had a great effect upon the general business conditions of the country and the attitude of mind of persons in provincial and federal parliaments who had to deal with social questions.

Then there were important matters affecting the relationship between the dominion and the provinces, matters which for a long time had been outstanding. For instance in the west there was the question of the return to the prairie provinces of their natural resources, and in the maritime provinces claims respecting maritime rights. From one end of Canada to the other there were differences between the dominion and the provinces which had come as legacies from the past and which had been the causes of friction and disunion. To clear up those difficulties was one of the main objectives of the government of that day, in the belief that only as this country was united, and as there was good feeling between the provinces and the dominion, could there be hope of that degree of cooperation between the provinces and the dominion so essential to federal enactments with respect to social legislation. These are only some of the matters which were dealt with satisfactorily, but which have to be considered when we are asked to reply to the question: Why did you not do more in a particular line?

I believe I have shown conclusively that at least up to and including 1924 no government would have been justified in attempting to launch any extensive scheme of social insurance or in fact any social legislation involving any large amount by way of expenditures.

In bringing forward another reason I wish to repeat the phrase used yesterday by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in his amendment to a resolution before the house, namely, the phrase "when circumstances permit." It is one thing to be in a position to bring in extensive schemes on any subject when as prime minister one has behind him a majority of thirty or forty members who at a nod will do as he wishes; it is an entirely different thing to attempt the passage of such measures when a prime minister has for himself and party a majority of only one, or no majority at all. I hope hon. members will bear in mind the fact that from 1921 until 1925 the Liberal government had a majority over all parties in the house of only one, and that from 1925 until 1926 it was in fact in a minority. Those are not circumstances which lend themselves to the launching of great measures, and which afford the degree of opportunity the present administration has, due to its large majority.

May I point out the further fact that to become law legislation has to pass both houses of parliament, and the Liberal administration of which I was the head had to consider with respect to all legislation the reception which would be given it in the other chamber. In a moment I shall show how actual legislation was received when placed before that chamber in the years 1925 and 1926. If in the earlier years we had attempted anything more than we did I do not know what would have happened. I purpose to show that when we did bring in a measure which we considered of greatest importance, a measure of social legislation having to do with old age pensions it was vigorously opposed by the Conservative party in this chamber, and was eventually thrown out by a Conservative Senate. It was not until the legislation was reintroduced and passed, after an appeal to the people which made a definite pronouncement with respect thereto, that it was possible to obtain concurrence of the upper chamber.

A day or two ago I came across a comment made by Mr. Asquith, the late Lord Oxford, upon a criticism of Mr. Gladstone's government of 1892. The criticism was very similar to the one the Prime Minister has directed against the late Liberal government, namely that it did not do as much as it should have done. Mr. Asquith observed:

> Our legislative opportunities were severely circumscribed by the smallness of the government majority and the vigilant and uncompromising hostility of the House of Lords. Within these limits we gave abundant proof of a high order of administrative talent.

I believe I may claim the same for the Liberal administrations between 1921 and 1930. Especially was it true between 1921 and 1927.

Let me now proceed from 1924 to subsequent years. I quote from the statement made by the Prime Minister only a few days ago to a delegation of the trades and labour congress which waited upon him:

If between 1924 and 1928, years when Canada was prosperous, some scheme of unemployment insurance had been initiated, the depression would have found this country with the best accumulation of money with which to face it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear."

Mr. LAPOINTE: Wait a minute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the trades and labour congress as well as any other body would be more ready to thank a government which is able to give prosperity in great measure than a government which is only able to offer legislation the possibility of the enforcement of which remains to be seen. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have forgotten that the most important social legislation so far enacted in Canada was enacted in those very years. I should like to know whether any government before completing one scheme of social legislation would have been justified in attempting to go on with a second. I know my right hon. friend is trying to do everything at once, but he is in a class by himself in that regard. In a few months we shall have a general election. It may be that by taking on a greater load than can be carried everything may yet come to grief. It might be just as wise for him to proceed one step at a time, and above all to make sure that every undertaking is capable of being carried out.

Going over in one's mind the whole scheme of social insurance may I ask where in the order of things is the natural and proper place to begin? As I said a few moments ago social legislation is a type of legislation intended to assist those who, were it not for the legislation passed, might find it difficult or be unable to get along. Of all classes in society which then is the class we ought first to consider? The Liberal administration gave the preference, as I believe any administration in Canada would have done, to the men who have served their country overseas, and to the dependents of those who lost their lives or were incapacitated in the great war. That obligation was accepted by the country and always will be I hope as the first of all the obligations of a social nature. Next to that all important portion of our population there come those who because of advancing years find themselves either unable to earn sufficient to satisfy their essential needs, or who are thrown out of employment, not through any fault of their own, but simply because of that which we have been discussing so much of late, namely the high rate of pressure at which industry is carried on, the new inventions, the machinery used and the like. Men and women who have given their lives to acquiring skill in a particular industry may find themselves, just because of their advancing years, the first to be thrown out when a period of unemployment comes. The employer, through no lack of sympathy but simply because he has to reduce his staff begins to reduce, and those he lets go first are not the younger persons, not the more active and alert, but those whose years are advancing. They are thrown out of employment first. Knowing that to be so, we felt that those of advanced years were the first to be looked after in any scheme of social insurance. The Liberal administration of the day accordingly brought in an old age pension scheme. In connection with that scheme we had carefully to consider, as I have pointed out, the three factors I have mentioned this afternoon—first, the financial condition of the country and where the money was to come from. That we had settled by 1924 by getting our budget balanced, and for six successive years thereafter having surpluses instead of deficits. The second question was how could the scheme be brought into effect with the cooperation and good will of the provinces among themselves and towards the dominion. It was that consideration which necessitated in the first place the careful consideration of each and every scheme in deciding which should be the one attempted. There was the third all-important consideration, the question of jurisdiction, which had to be solved. We felt that there should be no doubt left in the mind of anyone as to jurisdiction, and that if there were problems related to jurisdiction we should find a way to meet those problems.

How did we proceed with respect to the old age pension legislation? In 1924 in the month of April, I moved that a special committee be appointed to make inquiries into an old age pension system for Canada. This was for a national system of old age pensions. The committee was appointed. The members went into the question carefully, and they agreed with the view, that it was essential to get the views of the provinces before reporting to the house, and so between 1924 and 1925 the various provinces were communicated with. In 1925 on May 1 a special committee was again appointed, and on June 16, 1925, the special committee recommended in favour of setting up a scheme; also that an effort should be made to receive cooperative action on the part of the provinces. Up to that time some of the provinces had expressed themselves as favourable to a scheme of old age pensions. Others had said that they were not in a position to consider an old age pension scheme, and gave as a reason that the financial conditions with which they were confronted would not permit them to take on further obligations. In 1926, after much debate and criticism from the then opposition, this house adopted the bill for old age pensions. The bill went from this house to the Senate, and in the Senate, as I mentioned a moment ago, it was defeated by a majority of 45 to 21. If the records are looked up it will not be difficult to see the party complexion of that majority.

The measure of social legislation that was introduced here and passed by this House of Commons having been thrown out by the second chamber, does any hon. member say that up to 1926 when that occurred a measure of unemployment insurance could have gone through this House of Commons with any hope of passing the Senate and becoming law?

That is a complete answer in itself if there were not further reasons which make it clear that such a measure could not have been proceeded with sooner. But in the general election of 1926 the question of the rejection by the Senate of the old age pensions bill was discussed throughout the country, and a Liberal government being returned with a substantial following it was possible with the hope of greater success to reintroduce the bill in 1927. The bill was reintroduced in identical terms by the then Minister of Labour, the Hon. Peter Heenan, and after considerable discussion passed both this house and the Senate and received the royal assent on March 31, 1927. There is the record up to March 31, 1927. I think I can say that up to 1927, having in addition to what I have mentioned, put on the statutes this national scheme of old age pensions, the government of the day had done all that could possibly have been expected of any federal government with respect to social legislation.

But did we allow matters to rest there? Did we at that time say: This is the end of our social legislation? On the contrary we immediately proceeded to the next form of social insurance we deemed of most importance, namely, a national system of unemployment insurance. We had before us certain opinions as to jurisdiction which had been given by the law officers of the crown while the old age pension measure was under discussion, which opinions applied also to the question of unemployment insurance and had therefore to be taken into consideration. So it was deemed necessary to have the question of unemployment insurance dealt with in the first instance by a committee of this house.

Here may I say that a further evidence of the desire of the Liberal government of the day to further these matters of social legislation was the creation of a special committee of this House of Commons to deal with industrial and international relations. It was on the suggestion I think of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that the proposal was first made to have a committee of this house to deal with industrial questions. I pointed out to the hon. member that I thought most of these industrial questions involved international considerations as well, and also that I believed that international questions were becoming more and more interwoven with social problems, and therefore that as a beginning it might be well if we appointed one committee to deal with both international and industrial relations. That committee was established and is a standing committee of this house, thereby giving further recognition by the House of Commons to the importance of social legislation. Resolutions or measures respecting social legislation of the character to which I have been referring naturally went to that committee for consideration in the first instance.

I need not detain the house at the moment by re-quoting the opinion of the Department of Justice of May 23, 1925, with respect to the question of jurisdiction on the matter of old age pensions and similar matters of social legislation. That particular opinion has already been placed on Hansard, and I would simply refer hon. members to the report of the special committee on old age pensions appearing in the votes and proceedings of June 16, 1925, where they will find the opinion of the Department of Justice as given on May 23 with respect to the question of jurisdiction. There it was made very clear that so far as property and civil rights were concerned, they and questions related thereto came within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

I should like to quote to the house a paragraph from some remarks of my own dealing with old age pensions, in order to make clear that the government of the day regarded the old age pension measure as only a part of its general scheme of social insurance. In Hansard of March 26, 1926, at page 1977, hon. members will see that I am reported as follows:

Mr. Mackenzie King: In this country, I should like to see—

This is interesting, too, as suggesting perhaps where some of the ideas that are incorporated in to-day's legislation may have come from, but I do not even wish to claim that. I will continue with the quotation:

In this country, I should like to see the annuities plan which, as my hon. friend has said, was inaugurated by Sir Richard Cartwright, developed into a comprehensive scheme of social insurance.

But I do not believe that this can be accomplished solely by the federal government; it would have to receive the cooperation of the provinces. We must in some way establish that link between the provinces and the dominion which will conduce to the working out of a great social insurance scheme along these lines. That will not be achieved in a year; as in other countries it will require time. The old age pension phase of the question is one that has an immediate bearing in respect of people of advanced years. Surely, then, we shall not be running any great risk so far as future generations are concerned if we put upon the statutes this year legislation which will hold out an inducement to the provinces to come together in conference for the purpose of discussing social legislation generally.

Further on, at page 1978:

. . . so far as the purpose of the immediate legislation is concerned, it looks to providing a pension for men and women of the generation that is passing away, or will have passed away in the course of a very few years. That is primarily what we are considering at this moment, and in considering men and women of that category we will, I think, be taking the first necessary step to bring about that larger measure of contributory social insurance which is one of the great needs of our time.

May I point out, with regard to this particular measure of social insurance, that not only did we place an enactment on the statutes but we carried out its provisions. Not only did we make a promise to the electorate, but we fulfilled that promise. In 1927-28 the amount paid out of the federal treasury in grants to the provinces on old age pension account was $131,452; in 1928-29 it was $832,687; and in 1929-30 it was $2,806,852, or a total in those three years of $3,770,991. But I would direct the attention of the house to this further fact that while we were paying old age pensions we were at the same time reducing taxation and reducing the debt, with the result that when hon. gentlemen opposite came into office they found the public debt reduced by $244,000,000 compared with what it was at the time the Liberal administration went into office. That is the legacy we left them—not some additional burden but a lighter load of public debt, for which otherwise they would have had to make provision. In other words, we paved the way for them to meet some of the other obligations. More than that, it is a fortunate thing for my hon. friends that we reduced taxation so materially, for since they have come into office they have found it possible to increase taxes, instead of having to carry in addition to their increases the very heavy load that had existed before. The income tax had been reduced, both as to the rate and as to the number of exemptions for people with moderate incomes. The sales tax had been reduced from six per cent to one per cent; there had been the restoration of the penny postage; the cheque stamp had been reduced to 2 cents on cheques over $10; the receipt tax had been abolished; railway, telegram, and insurance premium taxes had been abolished; substantial reductions had been made in the tariff on implements of production and on articles of domestic consumption. Altogether the reductions in taxation from 1926 to 1930 represented a remission of $116,000,000, which otherwise would have been paid in 1930, had the former rates been maintained. By reduction of taxation and reduction of the debt and our series of annual surpluses we helped to pave the way for any subsequent government, either ourselves or our successors, to go on with measures of social insurance. But the Prime Minister when he took office did not proceed with any measure of social insurance in 1930, nor did he in 1931, nor 1932, nor 1933, nor 1934. We have had to wait until 1935, with an election only a couple of months away, in order to see social legislation such as it is introduced.

I repeat, we carried out our promises. How did the Prime Minister carry out his—in regard to old age pensions for example? Speaking at Chatham, New Brunswick, on July 11, 1930, he said:

"I say to you, if the Conservative party is returned to power we will provide for the payment of old age pensions from the federal exchequer, so that the provinces will not be called upon to contribute a cent and so that the provinces who now find the burden too great will be able to benefit equally with all the provinces of the dominion."

The constitutional point had been raised by the premier. "If," he said, "it is constitutional to pay fifty per cent, would it not be constitutional to pay one hundred per cent? We will pass the law to pay one hundred per cent and it will be legal."

Has that been done? Has any one hundred per cent law been passed? Has the government attempted in any way to make the contribution of the federal government towards old age pensions one hundred per cent? I say to the Prime Minister that before he begins to make additional promises to the electorate in regard to these matters of social legislation he had better begin to fulfil the smallest part of the promises he has already made. Let me point out a pertinent consideration. There are being raised at the present time by the provinces questions which when it comes to carrying out these measures will have to be carefully considered, questions namely of the particular sources of income which the provinces are to have and which the dominion is to have. We have already seen that the question of the income tax is to come up, as well as the gold tax. It is very important that these matters which affect the revenues ought at least to be satisfactorily settled before too much in the way of commitment is made in connection with further obligations. However, that is only one of many considerations, and I am not stressing it.

In what I have said I have dealt with the situation as it was up to 1927 when the Old Age Pensions Act was put on the statutes. Let me now speak of the three remaining years, the period during which the Prime Minister says there ought to have been placed on the statutes an unemployment insurance scheme. During those years, we are told, we should have inaugurated such a scheme. Just here may I say that when I come to the time during which the Prime Minister himself was in office I will quote what he said as to the impossibility of having an unemployment insurance scheme on the statute books—not as far back as 1930, but as recently as 1931, as recently as 1932, as recently as 1933 and as recently as 1934. If it was impossible, for reasons of jurisdiction, cited by the Prime Minister himself, and upon which he said every member of the House of Commons was agreed, to have an unemployment insurance scheme on the books during the years from 1930 to the beginning of 1935, how could it have been possible to have had such a measure on the statutes in the years immediately preceding? That is a complete answer to my right hon. friend when he says that we should have had this measure on the statute books. He himself at every possible turn blocked every attempt to enact an unemployment insurance measure.

As I have said, as soon as the old age pension measure was enacted we immediately took up the question of unemployment insurance; and we immediately had a conference with the provinces. I have in my hand a précis of the discussions of the dominion-provincial conference, which lasted from November 3 to November 10, 1927. That report was submitted to the house after the conference was over, and in that particular proceeding of the Liberal administration we are different from hon. gentlemen opposite; we did not have a conference and decline to give to parliament a report of what had taken place. Instead, we tabled a report as soon as parliament assembled in order that hon. members might see what matters had been up for discussion and the attitude that had been taken by all concerned. Anyone who looks at the report will see what embarrassments there were at that particular time as between the provinces and the dominion in reaching an agreement with respect to an unemployment insurance scheme. As I have said, when the resolution with respect to unemployment insurance was introduced, it was immediately referred to a standing committee of the house. It was the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) who introduced the resolution in this house on March 21, 1928. It was as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

How did the government of the day receive his motion? We accepted it. That resolution, coming from a Labour member, we accepted immediately and we carried out to the letter the request that it contained, authorizing the committee on industrial and international relations to investigate and report to parliament on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. That was at the very first session after the enactment of the Old Age Pensions Act. I think it is important to quote a little from the report of that committee of which the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) was the chairman.

Mr. MANION: What is the date of the report?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May 16, 1928. This is the final report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations. The resolution was moved earlier in the year, but the final report was made, as I have said, on May 16, 1928. At the risk of delaying the house just a little, I will read from the report what I think is pertinent.

> Your committee proceeded, as directed, to investigate the subject of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. The Assistant Deputy Minister of Labour, who was the first witness, presented memoranda of information dealing with the systems of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity which exist in various countries, also a memorandum of information relative to systems of voluntary sickness insurance and benefits which have been developed in this country. The Director of the Employment Service of Canada furnished the committee with an outline of the operations of the free employment offices which have been established by the provincial governments in sixty-four centres throughout the dominion, and which are assisted by a federal grant. Witnesses appeared before the committee on behalf of organized labour, public welfare associations, and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and expressed the views of their respective organizations on the subject matter of reference.

The Deputy Minister of Justice gave evidence on the question of the respective jurisdiction of the dominion and provincial governments regarding unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

While the time at the disposal of your committee has been too short to make as comprehensive a report as the importance of this matter demands, your committee submits the following recommendations.

These recommendations were adopted unanimously by the house and therefore I consider they are especially significant:

1. That the necessity of providing some method of unemployment insurance is one that will inevitably have to be dealt with before long, as a solution, in part, of the industrial problems of the present day.

2. That we accept and endorse the principle of unemployment insurance, based on compulsory contributions derived from the state, the employer and the employee. In this connection, we would point out that a somewhat similar decision was arrived at by a royal commission on industrial relations, which dealt with this subject in 1919.

3. That, whereas the conditions of unemployment vary so much more from province to province, than those relating to old age, it would be very desirable, for the success of any plan of unemployment insurance that several of the provinces should be willing to act simultaneously. In view of these circumstances, we are of the opinion that this matter should be referred to the various provinces, to ascertain which of them would be prepared to consider adopting legislation of this character, and to what extent.

4. On the very important subject of the cost of unemployment insurance, your committee has experienced great difficulty in arriving at any definite conclusion owing to the lack of data as to the amount of unemployment, either constant or occasional in character. There appears to be no definite method of ascertaining the unemployment at any given point for any length of time. We, therefore, recommend that the government immediately devise some means whereby the amount of unemployment, over a period of years, could reasonably be calculated.

5. That as unemployment insurance has been in operation for a number of years in Great Britain, and has recently been thoroughly investigated by a strong committee, and the system reorganized on the basis of their report, your committee would suggest to the government the advisability of obtaining, from Great Britain, expert advice on the subject, which would be of service in the formulation of a plan or plans suitable to conditions in Canada, and in arriving at the approximate cost.

6. In order that this matter might be further dealt with, your committee recommends to parliament that at the next session this question be again referred to the committee on industrial and international relations.

As I have said, that report was adopted unanimously. Hon. members who have listened to the Prime Minister this afternoon will observe that in what he is bringing down to-day he has profited, and I think very wisely so, by the recommendations of that very committee, in that he has, so he tells us, been careful to get information with regard to the schemes in Great Britain and other countries and that he has sought to get data as to the numbers of unemployed and the numbers that would be affected. Therefore, in the very period in which the Prime Minister says that we were doing nothing, a committee comprising members of all parties in this house was engaged on this very subject and going just as far as it was found possible to go at that time.

Next year, as was recommended, the committee met again; the government of the day reappointed the committee and its findings are contained in a report under date of April 30, 1929, made again by the hon. member for North Battleford who was the chairman. This report brings the situation with respect to unemployment insurance up to April 30, 1929. What is said in this report?

1. Your committee would reaffirm the position taken in the final report adopted on June 6th of last session, namely:—

That your committee accept and endorse the principle of unemployment insurance, based on compulsory contributions derived from the state, employer and employees.

That answers the whole question as to where this party stands in the matter of principle on the measure at present before the house. The report was adopted unanimously. The principle of unemployment insurance was accepted by a Liberal administration in 1929 on a report brought in by a committee that had been appointed by the house at that time.

2. Your committee recognizes that—

This is important to follow. Having endorsed the principle, the committee having given the matter careful study and consideration then undertook to lay down the procedure to be followed. Here again may I point out that this recommendation concerning procedure was approved by all parties in the house. There was no exception taken by any member of the Conservative party or any member of the Progressive party or any member of the Labour party; they all agreed that this was the proper method of procedure.

2. Your committee recognizes that, while it is highly desirable that such legislation should be uniform in all the provinces, and while social insurance has a federal aspect, nevertheless, according to the Department of Justice, under our constitution legislative jurisdiction in relation to the establishment of a compulsory system of unemployment insurance is vested exclusively in the provincial legislatures.

And the present Prime Minister may I add was a party to the acceptance of the report.

3. Your committee finds that the provinces, on being consulted by the Department of Labour with regard to their attitude towards the establishment of a general scheme, do not appear to be prepared to take immediate action.

4. Under these circumstances, your committee submits the following recommendations:—

(a) That with regard to sickness insurance, the Department of Pensions and National Health be requested to initiate a comprehensive survey of the field of public health, with special reference to a national health program. In this, it is believed that it would be possible to secure the cooperation of the provincial and municipal health departments, as well the organized medical profession.

(b) That in the forthcoming census, provision should be made for the securing of the fullest possible data regarding the extent of unemployment and sickness, and that this should be compiled and published at as early a date as possible.

(c) That the federal government be requested to bring the subject matter of this reference before the next federal-provincial conference; and your committee suggests, when the agenda for such a conference is being arranged that the provincial governments be invited to send representatives of the employer and employee to discuss the subject matter of this report.

All of which was respectfully submitted and the report carried unanimously. That brings the matter of unemployment insurance up to 1929. In order to make it clear that the government of the day did not leave the matter there, but proceeded further, I have in my hand some correspondence in reply to communications sent out by the Department of Labour to the different provinces on this matter in accordance with the recommendation of the committee. I shall read only one communication, and if the house will permit I shall place on Hansard the memorandum attached to it. The letter that I wish to read is one from the office of the premier of Saskatchewan, dated May 21, 1930, a time when that office was filled by a Conservative premier. I take this communication because it comes as near to the time at which the Liberal administration left office as any of the correspondence, showing that up to the last minute we were seeking to get the cooperation of the provinces with respect to an unemployment insurance measure. I give it to the house also for another reason; an effort has been made in a very subtle way to make it appear that objection to this parliament proceeding in this matter has been coming from certain provincial administrations that happen to be Liberal. May I point out, as I did the other day, that no one was more emphatic in respect to no interference with provincial rights than the Hon. Howard Ferguson, who is to-day the high commissioner in London for the present administration. When the present government itself was dealing with the question of the statute of Westminster, even while the matter was in Tory hands, Hon. Howard Ferguson as Conservative premier of Ontario insisted that certain safeguards should be put into that measure in order that provincial rights in Ontario might not be invaded.

Here is the communication of Mr. J. T. M. Anderson, the Conservative premier of Saskatchewan of that day:

Premier's Office
Saskatchewan
Regina, May 21, 1930.

The Honourable Mr. Peter Heenan,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Sir,—With further reference to your letter of March 10th with respect to insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity, I wish to say that I have received an opinion from our Attorney General's Department which indicates that this matter falls within the competency of the provincial legislature. It would appear, then, that while any general scheme of compulsory insurance along the lines mentioned appears to be entirely a matter for provincial legislation there would seem to be no valid reason why the dominion might not cooperate by way of legislation for a grant of a sum of money in furtherance thereof.

I would be very glad to know the attitude of your government in this connection.

For your information I am sending you a copy of the memorandum sent me by our Attorney General.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) J. T. M. Anderson.

Then if the house will permit I shall place the accompanying memorandum on Hansard. It is a memorandum of the Hon. M. A. MacPherson:

Memorandum for the Honourable
M. A. MacPherson, K.C.

Re: Legislative jurisdiction regarding a compulsory scheme of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

I have the honour to refer to the above constitutional question as outlined in the recent correspondence between the Honourable J. T. M. Anderson, Premier of Saskatchewan, and the Honourable Peter Heenan, Minister of Labour in the dominon cabinet, from which it appears that you have been requested to prepare a legal opinion as to whether legislation to this end falls within the competency of a provincial legislature.

In dealing with the subject I think it right to premise, in the absence of any bill or proposed statute containing a definite scheme, that the opinion now given is with respect to legislation following the lines as set out on page 1 (IV) of the final report of the select standing committee of the House of Commons of Canada on industrial and international relations published in 1928, namely, that embodying the principle of insurance based on compulsory contributions derived from the state, the employer and the employee.

In accordance with the dicta of the judicial committee of the privy council as expounded on various occasions, the first question to be determined is whether such provincial legislation would fall within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in section 92 of the B.N.A. Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; for, if not, it can be of no validity and no other question would arise. It is only when an act of the provincial legislature prima facie falls within one of these classes of subjects that the further questions arise, namely, whether, notwithstanding this is so, the subject of the act does not also fall within one of the enumerated classes of section 91 and whether the power of the provincial legislature is not thereby overborne. See Citizens v. Parsons, 7 A.C. 109.

Having proceeded in accordance with the above dicta to examine sections 91 and 92 of The Confederation Act, I find that the subject of compulsory insurance along the lines indicated would, in my opinion, fall directly within clause 13 of section 92, namely, "property and civil rights in the province," one of the classes of subjects with respect to which exclusive jurisdiction has been relegated to provincial legislatures. Turning next to section 91, I have been unable to find that it comes under any of the enumerated classes of that section. Further, it is now well settled that the general authority to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, which the initial part of section 91 of The British North America Act confers, does not, unless the subject matter of legislation falls within some of the enumerated heads which follow enable the dominion parliament to trench on the subject matters entrusted to the provincial legislatures by the enumeration in section 92 of the act. Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Alberta and Attorney-General for British Columbia, 26 D.L.R. 288.

In Citizens v. Parsons (supra) an Ontario act was under review, namely, 39 Vict. Ch. 24. It dealt with policies of insurance entered into or in force in Ontario for insuring property situate therein against fire and prescribing certain conditions which were to form part of such contract. The judicial committee declared it to be valid legislation applicable to the contracts of all such insurers in Ontario, including corporations and companies, whatever might be their origin whether incorporated by British authority or by foreign or colonial authority. At page 111 their lordships, referring to 14 Geo. III, c. 83, a statute making provision for the government of Quebec, say:

"In this statute the words 'property' and 'civil rights' are plainly used in their largest sense, and there is no reason for holding that in the statute under discussion they are used in a different and narrower one.

The next question for consideration is whether, assuming the Ontario act to relate to the subject of property and civil rights, its enactment and provisions come within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in Section 91, the only one which the appellants suggest as expressly including the subject of the Ontario act is No. 2 'the regulation of trade and commerce.'"

It was held, however, that the words "regulation of trade and commerce" include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of parliament, regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern, and it may be, general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion; but do not include the regulation of the contracts of a particular business or trade such as the business of fire insurance in a single province, and, therefore, do not conflict with the power of property and civil rights conferred by section 92, No. 13.

It appears to me to be clear that legislation setting up a scheme of compulsory insurance against employment, sickness and invalidity, requiring contributions from the state, the employer and employee would of necessity deal directly and primarily with the property and civil rights of individuals in the province affected, and while the constitutionality of legislation covering this particular species of insurance has not been directly determined by the courts, I see no reason to doubt that the principles adopted in Citizens v. Parsons would apply. I am accordingly of the opinion that the exclusive jurisdiction to enact compulsory insurance legislation of this nature rests with the provinces.

Again, in Attorney-General for Canada against Attorney-General for Alberta and Attorney-General for British Columbia (insurance case) (supra) their lordships of the privy council held in effect that it was within the exclusive competence of provincial legislatures to legislate regarding the business of insurance. At page 292, 26 D.L.R. (supra) their lordships, in answer to the argument that the dominion had jurisdiction under section 91 of the B.N.A. Act, "trade and commerce" say:

"No doubt the business of insurance is a very important one which has attained to great dimensions in Canada, but this is equally true of other highly important and extensive forms of business in Canada which are to-day freely transacted under provincial authority. Where the B.N.A. Act has taken such forms of business out of provincial jurisdiction, as in the case of banking, it has done so by express words which would have been unnecessary had the argument for the dominion government addressed to this board from the bar been well-founded."

Turning now to a consideration of the question of insurance as viewed from the aspect of its relation to unemployment and sickness, the first of which would appear to come within the scope of legislation regarding labour in industrial undertakings, and the latter of which would appear to fall within the category of public health, the legislative jurisdiction in regard to these matters also in my opinion belongs primarily to the province.

In a reference by the Governor General of Canada to the Supreme court in the matter of legislative jurisdiction over hours of labour (1925), S.C.R. 505, the court held, inter alia:

"That the matter of labour in industrial undertakings in Canada is primarily within the competence of provincial legislatures, but parliament can legislate as to labour in territories not yet organized into, or forming part of, a province and as to labour of servants of the dominion if these are within the scope of the draft convention."

It appears to be only necessary to explain that the draft convention referred to was that adopted by the International Conference of the League of Nations in 1919 limiting the hours of labour in industrial undertakings.

Reference may also be made in this connection to In re the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, 1919 (1922) 1 W.W.R. page 20, in which case the privy council held the enactment of the above two acts to be ultra vires the dominion parliament. They were designed to prohibit undue combination and hoarding and the committee held their provisions to be an interference with the power to restrict the "civil rights" of the inhabitants of a province, a power exclusively relegated to provincial legislatures by the B.N.A. Act. See page 24 of the report (supra).

I would further refer to the judgment of the privy council in two cases which have particular application to the subject in hand, namely, "In re Reciprocal Insurance Legislation (1924) A.C. 328; (1914) 2 W.W.R. 397, and Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider et al (1925) 1 W.W.R. 785. In the case last referred to their lordships held the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act 1927 (Ch. 20, Dom.), ultra vires of the dominion parliament declaring it to be a law relating to matters as to which section 92 of the B.N.A. Act gives exclusive jurisdiction to the provinces. It was also held, approving the board's ruling in In re Reciprocal Insurance Legislation (supra), that the said act could not be justified as an exercise of the dominion's powers under section 91 of the B.N.A. Act with respect to criminal law, or with respect to the peace, order and good government of Canada. It was further held that the mere fact that legislation is for the general advantage of Canada or is such that it will meet a mere want felt throughout the dominion does not render it intra vires of the dominion parliament if it cannot be brought under the heads specifically enumerated in section 91 of the B.N.A. Act unless it is passed because of some extraordinary peril to the national life as a whole, such as a war or, perhaps, an epidemic of pestilence and that the evidence in the case at bar did not show such.

Again, the subject matter of public health appears to me clearly to fall within provincial legislative competence under the heading "property and civil rights" and might also be so claimed under item 16 of section 92 of the B.N.A. Act as being a matter of a local or private nature. There is also item 7 whereby exclusive legislative jurisdiction is conferred on the provinces respecting the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, etc., other than "marine hospitals" jurisdiction with respect to which has been specifically conferred upon the dominion by item 11 of section 91, namely, "quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals." I am unable to find any other express heading of section 91 which would support the contention that public health generally is a matter of exclusive dominion jurisdiction. With regard to the opening words of section 91 conferring upon the dominion jurisdiction to enact laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, as has been shown, these words do not, unless the subject matters also fall within one of the enumerated heads of section 91, enable the parliament of Canada to trench on matters exclusively relegated to the provinces under section 92.

For the above reasons and on the above authorities, in my opinion the power to enact compulsory legislation with respect to insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity rests with the provinces.

I might add, however, that while any general scheme of compulsory insurance along the lines indicated appears to be entirely a matter for provincial legislation there would seem to be no valid reason why the dominion might not cooperate by way of legislation for the grant of a sum of money in furtherance thereof.

Alex. Blackwood,
Law Officer.

The point I wish to make clear is that this correspondence indicates an objection raised by a Conservative premier of one province saying that the dominion was invading its jurisdiction in seeking, as regards an unemployment insurance scheme, to do other than make a contribution to the province. Should we not have raised one of the greatest issues ever raised in this country if we had attempted to do what the Prime Minister to-day is attempting to do, if we had sought to defy those provincial governments with respect to their rights? We felt that whatever was to be done, to be effective, should be done in the right way and in accordance with the jurisdiction of parliament as it is known to exist.

I think I have made fairly clear why the government or any government between 1921 and 1930 could not have gone further than we did in the matter of social legislation, and in particular, with respect to any scheme of unemployment insurance. We had moved steadily ahead, we had carried all parties in this house with us every step of the way. There was as regards procedure no difference of opinion between Liberal, Conservative, Progressive or Labour; all were united in the steps we were taking. By advancing in that way we were taking a course that in the long run promised both certainty and security.

Now we come to the period when the present Prime Minister came into office. The first question I would again ask is: Why have we had to wait until 1935 to have some further step taken, some measure of social insurance introduced? Well, the Prime Minister gave one reason, I do not think it is a very good one, in his second radio address on January 4:

> Now that we have achieved some measure of control over economic conditions and can operate without fear of imminent disaster we are going to do away as quickly as possible with emergency relief measures and put in a permanent system of sound and scientific insurance against unemployment.

He has not done away with any emergency relief measures as yet. I agree with the Prime Minister that the question of unemployment insurance is an entirely different matter from the question of relief. Unemployment insurance as introduced to-day relates to the future, to a time considerably in the future; unemployment relief relates to the present, and it is the present about which the people are concerned. What the people are demanding from this government is that present conditions shall be remedied, knowing full well that unless they are remedied no legislation in the world with respect to unemployment insurance is likely ever to become of any service to anyone. But when the Prime Minister undertook to say that he was not able to deal with this matter until he got control of the economic situation, I think he was going a little too far. Has he got control of the situation yet? Has he got control of the econmic conditions of the country? Is everything prosperous and going ahead? I do not believe the public share any such view. There was nothing in the situation from 1930 to prevent his going ahead with a national unemployment insurance scheme except the reasons he himself gave and which I shall quote in a few moments.

May I point out what attitude we of the official opposition took? Did we say, We think that because this is a period of depression we should not touch any social legislation until we get out of this period? Or did we say: This is the time of all times to settle these questions as to procedure and jurisdiction so that when the moment does come that we have reached an understanding with the provinces which will permit of the introduction of a system of national unemployment insurance no time will be lost in getting it placed upon the statute books? Did we not state over and over again that we believed that what in part was needed for dealing with unemployment as it might arise in the future was a national unemployment insurance scheme? We took the ground always that along with any measure of the kind there would have to be policies which would serve to revive industry and trade, and that in the meantime as long as we had the problem of relief on our hands it would have to have immediate attention, the permanent as contrasted with the temporary measures going along parallel with them if you like. The point we stressed over and over again was that, while we were in a period of depression, we could at least settle the question of jurisdiction, we could at least bring the provinces into conference and work out something, and that that was the way in which the government should proceed. In 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934, every one of these years, we urged that a national unemployment insurance scheme should be introduced. We had been working on such a scheme, as I have shown, before leaving office in 1930. I shall not quote to any extent from what was said, only enough to verify the statement I have just made. In the House of Commons on April 29, 1931, at page 1113 of Hansard I am reported as follows:

> As unemployment is incidental to industry as it is carried on to-day, I believe some system of insurance against unemployment is absolutely necessary and should be provided.

That was in 1931. Then on the next page:

> —having regard to the problem of unemployment before us at the moment, a problem that we know is going to recur from time to time, the government should immediately consider how a system of unemployment insurance can be made applicable to help meet such a situation.

Not consider in 1935, but "immediately" consider. Then further:

> We have at the present time a federal system of annuities. I see no reason why the administration should not consider whether some advantage might not be taken of the annuity system already in existence as a federal system so to extend it as to make the moneys paid in as premiums available at times of unemployment, as unemployment insurance to those who make contributions towards it. It might be so extended as to make the system available to its contributors as insurance against sickness or invalidity. There is an opportunity for an immediate step to be taken by the federal government to provide a measure of unemployment insurance. No question of constitutionality can be raised with respect to it. I submit the government might well consider whether the system of providing annuities which now for many years has been administered by the federal government, might not be so extended in its bearing upon social problems, as to make it available to meet other risks that arise from industry.

There, I submit, was a constructive idea and suggestion. The Prime Minister says he has met with nothing but opposition from this side of the house. Has he listened to what we have been saying over and over again, from year to year urging the very sort of thing he now says he is trying to do in the bill he has introduced, but which should have been done only in a different manner five sessions ago or at any one of the sessions that have intervened?

In 1931 we saw very clearly that the considerations I have mentioned, with regard to financial jurisdiction, conference with the provinces and the like, would have to be considered, together with the necessity for the amendment of the British North America Act. Those factors we brought to the attention of the government. The amendment of the British North America Act was one point that was clear from the start. We have all seen, understanding the jurisdiction to be as we all along have believed it to be, that, if a national scheme of unemployment insurance was to be drawn up, it could be done only in one of two ways. One way was by agreement with the provinces whereby they would act within their jurisdiction and the government of Canada would contribute grants in aid, as has been done in the case of old age pensions; the other way was by amending the British North America Act in a manner that would enable this federal parliament alone to deal with the question. We always said that a conference with the provinces, if properly carried on, would enable us to reach agreement on an amendment of the British North America Act, but five years have been lost in the holding of any conference of the kind. I say here that we will yet discover that such a conference must take place; we will yet discover, before any legislation of this character comes within the jurisdiction of the federal government, that it will have to be by the path of some conference between the dominion and the provinces, and through agreement reached as a result thereof. I pointed out the desirability of a national scheme in dealing with old age pensions as part of a social insurance scheme:

> . . . we believe old age pensions should be a part of the social insurance scheme of this country. But we think it should be a national scheme; it should be administered nationally, 100 per cent of the money raised and the entire scheme administered by the federal government.

We as Liberals were not seeking to be rid of an obligation in connection with a national insurance scheme; we were claiming that as with the case of old age pensions this parliament should be placed in a position to take it over.

> We say that the present government ought immediately to take steps to have the British North America Act amended so as to make possible federal administration so that when the time comes to pay the old age pensions 100 per cent, we shall not be met with any constitutional obstacle to the administration of the scheme in its entirety by the federal government.

That was with regard to old age pensions. I have quoted from Hansard of June 2, 1931, at page 2265. On the same date, at page 2266, I am quoted as follows:

> . . . I say the British North America Act should be amended so as to make it possible for the federal government to undertake the administration of that scheme.

That was the old age pensions scheme. If the act had been amended in that regard an amendment could have been secured easily with regard to unemployment insurance as well.

> . . . the time has come when the federal parliament should seek to have the British North America Act amended so as to make it quite clear that it will be within the jurisdiction of this parliament to administer an old age pension act . . .

That was as long ago as 1931; that had been stated before, and I have stated it continually since. On November 22, 1932, I dealt with the same matter again, namely, an amendment of the act but specifically in relation to unemployment insurance. Here are my words, as reported in Hansard of November 22, 1932, at pages 1458 and 1461:

> We have always recognized that, if there was to be a national scheme of unemployment insurance, or a national scheme to deal with any phase of social insurance, it would have to be by agreement between the provinces and the dominion, or possibly by an amendment to the British North America Act which could be made as a result of such agreement. Taking that view, we advocated two years and more ago that the government should then and there appoint a commission to deal with the question of unemployment and kindred matters, so that once the necessary data had been secured as a guide to the measure to be drafted, whatever steps might be necessary in the way of an amendment to the British North America Act in order to permit a national scheme of insurance to go into effect could be taken at the earliest possible moment.

At that time, from something the Prime Minister had said, I thought he was going to come round in favour of a national scheme, but apparently he then had something else in mind, evidently what he is attempting to do to-day. In my innocence I took him as meaning he was going on at once with a national unemployment insurance scheme, and said:

> We shall I trust be able to work in harmony and cooperation with them. We commend them for their action, but at the same time, we cannot but regret that so long a period has gone by which might have been turned to good account in furthering and advancing such an all-important measure.

There was an acceptance of what at that moment seemed to be the intention of the government, to introduce an unemployment insurance measure, but one that it would be within the competence of this parliament to enact.

I have referred at different times to the formal statement of Liberal policy with respect to different matters; the position of the Liberal party in regard to some present day problems, which I made in this house on February 27, 1933, and which sets forth the Liberal policy with respect to these questions of unemployment and unemployment insurance. I will place this statement of policy on record again, so that there can be no question in the mind of anyone as to where we all stand on the matter of unemployment insurance:

> Unemployment of First Concern
>
> The Liberal party believes unemployment is Canada's most urgent national problem. It would deal with the present emergency conditions through a representative national commission, which would cooperate with the provinces and municipalities in the administration of unemployment relief and in an endeavour to provide work for the unemployed.
> As permanent measures the Liberal party is pledged to introduce policies which will serve to provide employment by reviving industry and trade; and to introduce a national system of unemployment insurance.

That is our position. Let me conclude, Mr. Speaker, by pointing out what has been the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite towards that position. I think I have made it very clear that all through this parliament we have been urging—and we started to carry out our endeavour in a preceding parliament—that there should be a national system of unemployment insurance. But every time we have discussed that matter we have been met by objections from hon. gentlemen opposite, and there has been no one whose objections have been stronger and more emphatic than those of the Prime Minister. Let me read what the Prime Minister said about the power of this parliament to deal with this matter and why nothing had been done up to that time, further, why nothing could be done, in view of what the Prime Minister said. I quote from Hansard for November 22, 1932, at page 1452, with regard to unemployment insurance. At that time the Prime Minister referred to what he had said in 1931. I will refer to 1931 a moment later, but I am taking 1932 because he emphasized his position then in no uncertain terms. Here is what the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> It will be within the memory of most hon. members that on the 29th of April, 1931, I made a statement with respect to the question of unemployment. In the course of that statement I discussed at some length the question of unemployment or of social insurance that might become the subject matter of legislation to deal with the question of unemployment and allied problems. I pointed out why the government of Canada could not introduce legislation to deal with that matter. Roughly the reasons are two. One is purely a constitutional or legal reason; the other is an economic reason because of lack of information with respect to the subject matter then under discussion.

Can anything be more definite than that? The government, the right hon. gentleman intimated, could not proceed with an unemployment insurance scheme for two reasons. One reason was the economic one of not having the information. I think they were to blame for not having it, but we will let that pass for the moment. The other was the purely constitutional or legal reason which the Prime Minister urged then, had urged before and kept urging at every subsequent session. Further he said:

> The first reason—
>
> The first was the constitutional or legal reason.
> —has been so fully stated to this house on so many occasions that I shall not do more than refer to it very briefly.

Then he does refer to it at some length. What does he say? Let me quote only one or two parts of his observations:

> But the fact that the second largest province in the dominion has made it abundantly clear that it would not tolerate interference on the part of the federal authority indicates clearly that all the federal parliament can do by way of legislation is to assist the provinces in the discharge of their constitutional obligations.

As I said, there was an effort to reflect on one province—

> Mr. LAPOINTE: What date was that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: November 22, 1932. I have made it clear that objections came even from those emphatically Conservative provinces of Ontario and Saskatchewan. Then he states:

> That is the judgment of the court of last resort so far as we are concerned.

Then, listen to this in regard to jurisdiction —oh yes, and my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Justice points out that that was a year after the aviation case on which the Prime Minister now rests his authority.

Mr. BENNETT: But the aviation case was not the radio case.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And even the radio case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Listen to this, on the matter of jurisdiction:

The question of jurisdiction—

This is very interesting.

—therefore is at the bottom of all relief which is of a permanent character.

It is not hon. members on this side of the house who have raised the constitutional issue; it is the Prime Minister himself. These are his own words:

The question of jurisdiction therefore is at the bottom of all relief which is of a permanent character. Any legislation that may be enacted to deal, for instance, with social insurance problems must have the support of the provincial authorities. I made that abundantly clear on more than one occasion here, and it was agreed to I think by every member of the house who had taken the trouble to consider the question. Now pressure has been brought to bear by various organizations throughout the dominion to ensure the passage of what is known as contributory unemployment insurance legislation.

That is what we have in this bill.

That legislation, to be effective in this country, with jurisdiction divided between the provincial legislatures and the federal parliament, could have validity only, if it had the sanction both of the legislatures and of parliament. That I think has been conceded but that difficulty is one that can be overcome. It can be overcome rather readily if the provinces will agree to such an amendment to our constitution as will clothe parliament with the appropriate authority.

But the Prime Minister has given them no opportunity to confer with him at any length to work out the means to that end. Then further:

There are other questions to consider besides those affecting social insurance and social problems. There are problems with respect to taxation. There are problems with respect to the Companies Act.

And so on. Recognizing that there are other obligations as great, he continues:

The British unemployment insurance legislation was predicated upon actuarial computation. The difficulties arose because it was found in practice that the fund had to borrow to enable it to discharge its obligations, and the borrowings became so great that, in the language of the government of the day, it threatened the very solvency of the state itself.

That was another reason that was given why they could not go on. Then the preceding sentence in the right hon. gentleman's observations:

I take it that the judgment of the house, broadly speaking, was that any measure of social insurance should be contributory in its character, that it could not be otherwise.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Then he speaks about the difficulties about raising money for contributory purposes, and goes on to say:

If in the language of one hon. gentleman who has spoken in this discussion we are to derive any benefit from the knowledge of the past, it can only be because we can rely upon it to enable us to go forward with plans and proposals that will not be shipwrecked because they are based upon guesswork. I pointed out then that the census would be taken in 1931, and I further pointed out that when the census was completed we proposed to have the figures disclosed by the census so analysed as to enable us to deal with the subject, assuming, as we did, that we might be able to make a satisfactory arrangement with the provinces. I therefore desire to make it perfectly clear that in pursuance of the statement which I then made and which I shall now read, it is the purpose of this government to have a conference of the provinces to determine what action may be agreed upon with respect to this and other matters.

As I have said, that conference never took place. I was going to quote from Hansard for 1931, but as I wish to conclude before six o'clock I shall omit any further extracts with the exception of one. At the time to which I have made reference a motion was before the house which had been moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) to the effect that immediate attention should be given to the matter of unemployment insurance. Speaking on the motion the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 1099 of Hansard for 1931:

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose this afternoon to traverse at length the ground covered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Heaps). I desire only to point out two or three problems which must be dealt with before this question can be determined.

Before.

First there is the question of the respective jurisdiction of the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures which has to some extent been determined by the law officers of the crown. As has been pointed out by the provincial Premiers, there is no reason to doubt that with the joint action of the provinces and the dominion some satisfactory solution of this problem can be found.

Then he made a reference to the Minister of Labour of that day and stated that the then member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan)— —suggested the other day that this matter might have been discussed at the recent dominion-provincial conference. I can only say—

And this is apropos of what the Prime Minister said to me a day or two ago, when I expressed the view that a conference to be of any value would take a little time, and he replied that there was no necessity to take time, that it could all be done in a day.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Not as bad as that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not more than a day, anyway. But here is what the right hon. gentleman said in 1931:

I can only say that the question could not be dealt with at any such conference in one or two days, or in half a dozen days; there are questions which involve consequences of the most far-reaching effects in every possible way so far as the body politic is concerned.

And so on, and so on. Then elsewhere he said:

First it suggests that the government should take consideration the immediate establishment of a federal system of insurance. I do not think my hon. friend is well advised in leaving the word "immediate" in his motion for the simple reason and obvious reason that it must be known to him and to every hon. member who has read any book upon the subject—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

—or who has given time or consideration to the problems involved that it cannot be dealt with in three weeks, six weeks, one month or several months. So far as that feature is concerned, I would suggest that he delete the word "immediate" from his resolution. I suggest also that after the word "federal" and before the word "system" he add the word "contributory," thus making it a federal contributory system. Then I will suggest that the words "after satisfactory arrangements have been made with the provinces" be added at the end of the resolution.

He continued to emphasize that point.

Mr. BENNETT: The other part is very important, if you do not mind reading it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to conclude my remarks by six o'clock. My right hon. friend may read it later on, if he wishes.

An hon. MEMBER: Why did he change his mind?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Someone asks why did he change his mind. I think, from his references to others, that the Prime Minister's mind may be easily understood. On April 26, 1932, when the Prime Minister came across some literature which was issued by the League for Social Reconstruction he tried to make it appear that the zeal shown by those who favoured unemployment insurance had arisen from motives of advantage in electoral campaigns. I have before me his observations, as they appear at page 2404 of Hansard for 1932. Dealing with the document I have mentioned he said:

The document I have before me is not entitled "the policy of the Liberal party," but at the end I find the words: "The League for Social Reconstruction."

Then I shall read one paragraph from the document the right hon. gentleman quoted, a paragraph which has a familiar sound today:

The present capitalist system has shown itself unjust and inhuman, economically wasteful and a standing threat to peace and democratic government.

That paragraph was contained in the statement issued by the League for Social Reconstruction. There are set forth a number of measures which are said to be part of the policy of the League for Social Reconstruction, number 4 of which reads as follows:

Social legislation to secure to the worker adequate income and leisure, freedom of association, insurance against illness, accident, old age, and unemployment, and an effective voice in the management of his industry.

The vesting in Canada of the power to amend and interpret the Canadian constitution so as to give the federal government power to control the national economic development.

The Prime Minister commented on that as follows:

I commend that to the members from Quebec. There go your provincial rights, there go your provincial constitution.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I continue the quotation:

Mr. Casgrain: Not at all.

At that time the Prime Minister had it in his mind—how it came there I don't know—that Hon. Vincent Massey was responsible for this League for Social Reconstruction and that as president of the National Liberal Federation this policy had been brought forward for election purposes. Now I ask the house to listen to this; hon. members will see why we are getting this unemployment insurance scheme at this moment. I quote again from Hansard of April 26, 1932:

Mr. Bennett: I commend this new declaration to the consideration of the house because it indicates that change for which we have all been waiting, namely, an effort to take advantage of what may be described as the unrest and the distrust incident to the present economic condition and to capitalize it for party advantage through the oblique attack of the establishment of social reconstruction.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There, Mr. Speaker, I think is the full explanation of why we have this measure brought down at the present time.

May I say to the Prime Minister that he knows better than anyone else that the final authority that settles these questions of jurisdiction is the courts, and that he cannot by assertion or by assumption give to this parliament any power to deal with these matters which it does not now possess. That is the reason, and the sole reason, why hon. members on this side bring to the attention of the government, as is their duty, and why as leader of the opposition as is my duty I stress the point, that we believe, proceeding as he is, he has adopted a course which will not commend itself to the courts when this legislation comes eventually before them for final decision. In order that I may do the Prime Minister full justice in the matter of the importance he attaches to the judiciary with respect to the interpretation and effect of all legislation, I want to read his words which I have before quoted indirectly, and which I quote directly now. He was speaking at Toronto on February 18, 1932, on the occasion of being called to the bar of Ontario and being made a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of February 19, 1932:

> Marking centenary celebrations of Osgoode Hall, home of the law courts of the province, was the induction of the Prime Minister of Canada as a barrister at law of Ontario.
>
> "I think the judicial branch of government is the most important," said Mr. Bennett, addressing the convocation of benchers of the Law Society after he had been introduced by W. N. Tilley, K.C., treasurer of the Law Society, and sworn in by Clarence Bell, assistant registrar.
> "The legislative branch is very important, the executive tremendously so, but in the final analysis the judicial branch of the government is the one to which most attention should be paid. It interprets the acts of the legislative and executive branches, and upon the collective judgment of those we appoint for this purpose depends not only life, liberty and freedom, but the enjoyment of property and all that is thereby involved."

Mr. Speaker, this legislation most certainly will eventually come before the courts for decision. I should like to have seen an unemployment measure passed by this house in accordance with the recommendations of the standing committee on industrial and international relations, a course that would have made the legislation unanimous and would have removed all possibility of doubt as to its validity. When this legislation is passed, there will still be the doubt as to whether it has any validity at all.

[Mr. Bennett.]

In the circumstances, I say to the Prime Minister that in these days of stress and anxiety and suffering for the mass of the people, they are crying for bread and he is giving them a stone. They are crying for fish and he is giving them a serpent; because in addition to their distress and their suffering, when this legislation is found to be ultra vires there will be the sting of bitter disappointment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to amend the Interest Act.

He said: The principle of this bill is to place in the Interest Act a maximum rate which may be charged or collected on any agreement. The present Interest Act, being chapter 102 of the Revised Statutes of 1927, provides:

> Except as otherwise provided by this or by any other act of the parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever, any rate of interest or discount which is agreed upon.

It is these particular words to which I take exception, "any rate of interest which may be agreed upon." The Money Lenders Act, which applies of course to persons engaged in the lending of money, fixes a maximum of twelve per cent as the rate that may be charged; and in the Bank Act there is set a maximum rate of seven per cent that may be charged by the banks. The Interest Act sets no limit. Why place a limit on the rate that may be charged by money lenders but set no maximum rate which may be charged by others? I think we all agree that our experience shows the advisability of placing a limit on the rate that may be charged by money lenders as well as by banks, and I feel it is just as necessary to place a limit on the rate which other persons may collect.

If a limit should be set, what should that limit be? If the banks are limited to seven per cent I can see no reason at the moment why that same rate should not be set for those engaged in general business. Therefore I have drawn this bill, the new section 2 of which fixes a limit of seven per cent. It is a common practice, in western Canada at any rate, to charge rates as high as eight, ten and even twelve per cent per annum. I know that thousands of machine company notes have been drawn carrying a rate of eight per cent until due and ten or even twelve per cent per annum after they are due. Millions of dollars have been paid in interest at these rates, but that is impossible now, with prices as they are. There are millions of dollars owing by retailers to wholesalers, which have been carried on their books for years at the rate of eight per cent, and in many instances the interest is made up and compounded every three months and a draft issued on the retailer. In some instances retailers have told me that they calculate they are paying at least nine per cent per annum in this way, and a general limitation of seven per cent such as I suggest would afford considerable relief to such people. And now that the banks are limited to a rate of seven per cent chargeable to wholesalers, I think this provision I suggest is a very necessary one. Section 3 of the present act provides that when interest is payable on any contract, sale or agreement, and no rate is specified, the rate shall be fixed at five per cent. The new section 3, provides that the rate shall be four per cent. I have proposed that change because it seems to me that at the present time all rates should be lower. In section 4 the rate is reduced from five per cent to four per cent. This is where the rate of interest is not annual but is fixed weekly or monthly. A new subsection 5 (a) in the bill fixes a rate of four per cent which may be collected on any mortgage on real estate or any agreement for sale of real estate. I have suggested a rate of four per cent because I believe that the general opinion in this house, as expressed in the debate last week, is that four per cent is probably the maximum which farmers can pay. Certain members however have suggested that this is too low a rate and that if it were fixed at five per cent I should probably get more support for the bill. I may say frankly that it is the principle of establishing a maximum which I am asking for, and if the bill is allowed to have second reading I will move that it be sent to the banking and commerce committee, if that is the wish of the house, and the rate can be decided there. I hope we shall be able to do that.

I do not want to take up too much time, but I feel I should advance a few facts in support of my contention that the rate on real estate mortgages should be lower than it is at the present time and that a maximum should be fixed. So far there has been no limit, and there are to-day some mortgages outstanding at ten per cent, many more at nine per cent, and the bulk in the west at eight per cent. Though in the past many farmers have paid off mortgages bearing such rates of interest, that cannot be done to-day. The farmer pays interest out of the products of his farm. In olden times, I believe, he could pay in corn, wine, oil and cattle, but to-day he promises to pay in money and he has no way of monetizing his products; that is done by someone else. To-day, on the average, it takes fifty per cent more of his products to pay his interest than it did at the time he contracted the debt. Further, the farmer can pay only out of his surplus revenue. There are expenditures which he must meet if he is to continue farming, and it might not be out of place to bring before the house a few facts to illustrate the farmer's ability to pay.

Taking the average price of field crop commodities in 1926, the index figure being then 100, we find that in 1930 the index was 57·8; in 1931 it was 46·9; in 1932 it was 43·1; in 1933 it was 52·7, the average for these years being a little less than fifty per cent of their value in 1926. In 1933 the gross value of farm products was only forty-three per cent of what it was in 1928, and by 1933 the average farm income, which had stood at $1,600 in 1928, had fallen to $640. This is the average farm income, and probably half the farms in Canada had a lower income than that shown by the average.

Let me give two or three figures to illustrate the ability of industry to pay interest rates compared to its ability in 1929. In 1929 the gross value of production of the manufacturing industries was $4,029,000,000, and this had fallen in 1933 to $2,086,000,000. I am told that when we speak in terms of millions in this house it goes over the heads of the people; they do not realize what millions mean, but this is another way of stating that for each $1,000 which the manufacturer had for the value of his product in 1929, he had only $500 in 1933. His ability to pay interest had been much more than cut in two. The total amount of wages and salaries paid in the manufacturing industries in 1929 was $813,000,000 and that had fallen to $465,000,000 in 1933. Perhaps I have said enough to indicate that neither the agricultural nor the manufacturing industry can continue to pay rates of interest such as they have done in the past.

There has been a steady depreciation in the money value of all commodities and at the same time for the past five years there has been a steady appreciation of the monetary unit. The holder of money or fixed income bearing securities has found his purchasing power or real income in some cases doubled and in nearly all cases increased by thirty or forty per cent. This has created a grave injustice to debtors; payment in many cases has become impossible and this has resulted in what in olden days would be described as usury. I quote from Mr. Woodlock writing in the Wall Street Journal. He says:

> Stated in its simplest form, the prohibition of usury in the middle ages extended to all loans at interest, the use of which did not produce a profit sufficient at least to meet the interest demanded for the loan, or in which the risk or sacrifice on the lender's part was not such as to require legitimate compensation. Probable profit to the borrower, or loss to the lender, justified interest; otherwise in detail that was the rule respecting usury.

If we view the matter in this light, it seems to me that a large part of our debt to-day is usurious and interest thereon has become usury. If the debt cannot be written down, some relief can be given to the debtor by reducing the rate of interest. The country's economy is built on a credit structure. It is quite evident that the structure can be preserved only if the creditor class will make some sacrifice. As Mr. Woodlock says:

> It is surely historically true that loans which do not produce the means for repayment are in the long run not repaid.

And high rates of interest in the long run are not in the true interest of even the lender.

I would like to give just this one further quotation from Mr. Woodlock. He says:

> In the historical perspective of business and industry, when all mistakes have been taken into account and all the changes in the methods and plants duly authorized, it becomes very clear that nature in fact will pay but a very small rate of interest on money-capital, if indeed, in the final book-keeping, she will pay any interest at all.

Two questions are involved in regard to mortgages, that is mortgages already existing and those that may be entered into in the future. I believe the bill as drawn would refer to both classes and personally I am more concerned with mortgages that are already in existence than with those that may be entered into in the future. I realize the question of federal jurisdiction may be raised in regard to this and I think it is only fair to have the bill go to the committee where that question as well as others relating to the bill may be threshed out.

In conclusion I would just like to say that the principle of the bill as I have introduced it is to establish a maximum rate of interest. It may be, as I have said, it is too low; it may be it is too high, but I would just like to say again that if the house would be good enough to give this bill its second reading and allow it to go to the banking committee I am quite willing that the rate of interest be determined at that time.

Mr. EUSEBE ROBERGE (Mégantic) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly interested in the bill that has just been presented to the house under the title: An Act to amend the Interest Act. Bill No. 11, sponsored by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) in order to lower the rates of interest, will certainly tend to better the situation of our agricultural and working classes.

Mr. Speaker, if adopted, as it ought to be, this bill will be of great advantage to anyone who, in our country, must borrow money. It will have the effect of establishing a standard rate of interest so that all will pay the same interest, 4 per cent per annum, whereas the present rates vary sometimes between 5 and 20 per cent. It is only fair and reasonable that rates should be lowered, considering that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has authorized the banks to lower the interest paid to savings depositors, first, from 3 to 2½ per cent, and later to 2 per cent. The rate of interest paid to depositors having been so lowered, it is a matter of justice that the interest charged by money lenders, on all loans made in our country be reduced to 4 per cent. Banks will still make a hundred per cent profit, as they pay only 2 per cent to depositors. Very few business men are making a profit of 10 per cent nowadays. Farmers who are selling their products at 50 per cent of what they were getting, will be in a position to take advantage of this reduction in the rate of interest. As for companies, trusts and individuals who make loans by the week, by the month or by the year, at rates ranging from 8 to 20 per cent, they have been robbing the public long enough and they are in part responsible for the present depression because they have withdrawn from circulation big sums of money by way of charging excessive rates of interest.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the government to put this act into force as soon as it is passed by the house. If the government is really willing to give assistance to our farmers, as they seem to be if we are to judge by the farm loan bill the object of which is to increase the assets of the commission from 70 to 90 million dollars, then let the government lend money to farmers at 4 per cent in order to enable them to get through the present depression, the worst crisis our country has ever experienced. Then every provincial government will be at liberty to pay a part of the interest, as it is already done in the province of Quebec. This province contributes 1½ per cent of the interest due the Dominion farm loan board and, according to news items published in the press, the Quebec provincial minister of agriculture is about to raise the contribution to 2½ per cent per annum. Quebec farmers would then borrow money from the dominion farm loan board at 4 per cent and would receive 2½ per cent from the provincial government. Consequently, they would get loans at 1½ per cent and that is about all the farmer is in a position to pay at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, our farming community is in urgent need of assistance from the government. It is not only pledges as they got in 1930 and since this government came into power that our farmers must have to maintain their financial situation. This government could not possibly make a finer gesture than to lower the rate of interest on farm loans to 4 per cent per annum, abolish all duties they have put on agricultural implements and all other taxes farmers and workers are forced to pay since 1931; to abolish the 6 per cent tax put by this government on all essentials of life, taxes which had never been imposed by any government even in war time. I am mentioning only a few of the taxes which this government has imposed and which they should abolish in order to assist the farming and labouring classes, because it would take too much time to mention them all.

In order to make up the amount it would sacrifice by reducing to 4 per cent the rate of interest on farm loans and doing away with all the taxes I have mentioned, the government would only need to double the income tax on incomes ranging from $10,000 to $1,000,000. On the basis of the answer to a question I asked in 1933, the doubling, for the duration of the depression, of the tax on salaries and incomes from $10,000 to $1,000,000 would provide the government with the handsome amount of $78,267,145.74.

On April 20, 1933, I asked the minister the following question:

1. What amount did the government collect by way of income tax, in 1932, from individuals, companies, corporations and others declaring incomes between $10,000 and $1,000,000?

Hon. Mr. Ryckman (Minister of National Revenue):

1. Individuals, $21,753,463.37; corporations, $35,749,230.32.

Following up this inquiry, on May 2, 1933, I asked the following question:

1. What amount did the government collect by way of income tax, in 1933, from individuals, companies, corporations and others declaring incomes from $500,000 to $1,000,000?

Hon. Mr. Ryckman (Minister of National Revenue):

1. $20,764,572.05.

The government thus collected from individuals, companies and corporations enjoying incomes ranging from $10,000 to $1,000,000 a total sum of $78,267,165.74.

As I suggested in 1933, and as I suggest again this year, the government should double the tax rate on incomes of $10,000 to $1,000,000 and thus increase its revenue by at least $78,000,000 a year, by collecting 78 millions of dollars from people who can well afford to pay it, the government could certainly do away with the above-mentioned taxes and reduce the rate of interest on farm loans to 4 per cent a year. The government would thus be able to provide the labouring and agricultural classes with the aid they so greatly need, while the recipients of large incomes would still have enough left to keep them from poverty.

Before I conclude, will you permit me, Mr. Speaker, to move the following amendment to Bill No. 11. I have had this amendment drafted by a legal man, as I am aware that, in order to amend an Act, one must proceed in legal fashion.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Desrochers):

That Bill No. 11, an Act to amend the Interest Act, be amended as follows:

1. Section 1 is amended by striking out the last lines, after the words: "and the following is substituted therefor."

2. Sections 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the said bill are replaced by the following section:

3. Sections 3 to 11 inclusively of the said act are repealed, and the following is substituted therefor:

4. No creditor may require any debtor to pay a rate of interest exceeding 4 per centum per annum.

5. This act shall have retroactive effect.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to advise the hon. member that his amendment is out of order as the house is not in committee and amendments to a bill by striking out sections thereof are not in order on second reading.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, before the minister replies acceding to the request of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), may I be permitted to say a few words in support of the principle embodied in this bill. I say the principle advisedly, because I wholly concur in the suggestion of the hon. member that this bill be sent to the committee on banking and commerce, where, if the principle itself is accepted, the actual rates of interest might be determined.

That principle as I see it is of a dual character; that this parliament should where possible impose a maximum rate of interest which may be charged, and that that rate shall be such as to bear some relation to the ability of the borrowers to pay and to conditions as at present they exist in this country. I think it will be accepted as a fact by all that interest rates are in process of reduction, and that that lowering has become manifest in the sale of government bonds, the interest paid to bank depositors, and in other ways. But there is one point which I should like to stress for a moment; it was brought forward and fully developed in the work of the committee two years ago, which went extensively into the question of debt and interest. During what we usually term normal times, that is times of prosperity—I am speaking of them as normal times for the purpose of argument—I think it will be found that the various divisions of the individual and national income are about equal; that is a certain proportion will go to management, a certain proportion to labour, a certain proportion to invested capital. So long as those various parts hold a reasonable balance one with another, and each absorbs only a fair proportion of the individual and national income, so long the machine will run without undue vibration. But at the present time the situation reminds me somewhat of that form of internal combustion engine which derives its steadiness and power from the smooth running of a very heavy fly wheel. Most of us have seen that form of engine. As long as the wheel is in balance and each section corresponds in weight to the other sections the engine will run and perform its functions and not be subject to undue wear and tear. But if for a moment we try the experiment of overloading one section of that wheel until it weighs twice as much as the other sections, only one result can be expected; the wheel, the engine and the building in which it is situated would be scattered to the four winds and with it the unfortunate men who were attempting to carry on its operation. So far as I can see, Mr. Speaker, our situation is somewhat similar to that unbalanced wheel. The income of the nation and of the individual has been greatly lessened, perhaps by half, but that proportion of it which is expended in the payment of capital charges remains much as it was before, and is completely out of balance with all the other factors. It now bears no relationship whatever to the amount of the income which goes in other channels, and to my mind the system in which that is revolving is in the same danger as an internal combustion engine would be if its wheel was off balance.

I believe not only that it is fair but that it is sound economically that the principle of this bill should be accepted. It has been argued that in certain loans and certain forms of lending a higher rate of interest should be charged because of the risks involved, yet I would point out that the element which, above all others, increases the risk of a loan is the charging of a higher rate of interest than the invested money can earn. That is what makes a loan risky; that is what makes repayment doubtful or impossible, and because of that principle I believe the acceptance of this bill, with the determination so far as it is within our power and jurisdiction of the maximum rates which might be charged under those conditions, would be a sound move and one which would be of great assistance to those in debt as well as a stabilizing factor in society itself.

I should like to say just a word about those who are in debt. I remember once attending a meeting of some of the financial fraternity, and I listened with great interest as they propounded two theories, and I call them theories advisedly. One was that the investor was a public benefactor; everyone within hearing and everyone who might read those addresses was urged to save up money and invest it, because in investment lay the strength and life of the nation. But on the other hand they were urged never on any account to go into debt, because debt was something abhorrent and an outrage to nature. I wondered in my inner mind at that time whether they really grasped the significance of this fact, that the two are the same thing viewed from opposite sides, and that you cannot have investment without debt. Not one dollar could be invested unless someone in some way was prepared to go in debt to the amount of that dollar. So the debtor is just as necessary a part of our civilization as is the investor; neither could function without the other. That being the case, and if both are equally important and equally essential, I believe the state should make it a business to see that there should be fair play and fair dealing as between those two classes.

I strongly support the principle of the bill for another reason. We in this corner of the house have been urged again and again from both sides to abandon some of our visionary ideas and take note of the realities of life. I know of nothing more real, more drastic, more pressing and more demanding of immediate solution than the reality of interest payments upon debt. So in dealing with that question I believe we are dealing in a very practical way with one of the most important realities of life as we face it at the present time. I hope and trust, therefore, and in fact I have every confidence, that the minister will accept this suggestion, permit the bill to receive second reading and then have it sent to the committee on banking and commerce, where its details may be discussed, its scope considered and its application tried out.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a word in connection with this bill because I am very largely in sympathy with the objects that are proposed to be served by it, and more particularly because in at least one of its clauses, that with regard to the proposal to reduce interest on mortgages, it applies to one class of people who have not received a great deal of consideration in this parliament during the last few sessions.

I am not prepared to say whether the rates proposed in the bill, reducing the interest on mortgages to four per cent, should be made retroactive or whether we should enter upon repudiation; I am not much in favour of repudiation. During the last week we discussed in this house a bill intended to relieve the farmers, and particularly the farmers of western Canada. We have had our friends in the corner, as well as hon. members in other parts of the house, year in and year out making a plea on behalf of the farmers, particularly of western Canada and I have no objection at all in that regard. Just a few days ago, in a bill that was before the house, an appropriation of something like $90,000,000 was proposed in order to help the farmers of Canada. I have no particular objection to that, although I am beginning to be a bit apprehensive as to just where we are going to find the money for this particular bill and also for the reform measures which have been proposed by the government. In passing I may say that with regard to unemployment insurance, as with regard to the other measures, one of the vital points to be considered and one of the matters in connection with which I think the house should be taken into the confidence of the government, is just how these moneys are to be raised. It goes almost without saying—and in this I am suppported by what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) said the other day—that of the $90,000,000 which is to be appropriated a fairly large sum will be lost so far as the country is concerned, and the federal treasury will have to shoulder the burden.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. EULER: I think my hon. friend did say something to that effect.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. EULER: I am quite sure I can find it in Hansard, but the minister can speak for himself.

Mr. RHODES: Nothing approaching it.

Mr. EULER: I have every sympathy for the farmers of Canada, and I do not want anything I may say to be construed as suggesting that I am opposing the doing of everything possible for them. The farmer has been described as the forgotten man, but I think there is another forgotten man in our industrial towns and cities. In former days the city of Kitchener, from which I come, was known as the city of homes. I am afraid it is not the case now, but in those days seventy per cent of the people owned their own homes, which it seems to me is a very desirable state of affairs. Of late years, with the unemployment that has come to our artisans—and most of our people are employed in industrial establishments—it has become utterly impossible for these men to pay not only the debt instalments on their mortgages but even the interest and the taxes. They have no work; they have no income, and in the last year or two many of these people in my city, as in other industrial cities of this country, have been losing all they have invested in their little properties. In my own city there are still 4,500 people on relief to-day, more than there have been in three years. I believe it will be conceded that Kitchener is one of the very best towns in Canada, with people noted for their thrift, their enterprise and their intelligence. So far as principal payments are concerned they are protected by the moratorium, but that moratorium does not protect them so far as payments for interest and taxes are concerned. I rise only to say that when the government brings in its reform measure, or perhaps when it has an opportunity to consider the bill in the standing committee, I hope it will not lose sight of those men in our industrial towns and cities who are pressed just as hard as any other class in Canada.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, under the rules of procedure in debate the discussion on second reading is confined to the principle involved. On occasions however it is very difficult to discuss the principles of a bill without referring, possibly for purposes of illustration, to the sections of that bill. I know of no bill which has come up for consideration which in a more marked degree required consideration of the individual sections than the measure now before us for second reading. For that reason I am of the opinion that the suggestion made by the mover, namely that the bill be referred to the committee on banking and commerce, is a sound one. The committee will have time to consider the details, and will be in a position to hear all the interested parties. When the bill is brought back to this house its provisions may more accurately reflect the general views of hon. members than if it were debated at length either on second reading or in committee of the whole house. Under the circumstances, and without prejudice, and reserving to the house the full right to take exception both to the principle and to the details of the bill itself, I believe it would be wise to send it to the banking and commerce committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSAL TO BRING COASTAL SHIPPING UNDER JURISDICTION OF RAILWAY COMMISSION

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Railway Act (traffic by water).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill is a very simple one, and is almost self explanatory. It is customary for those who oppose a bill to allege that there is lack of precedent for it. However in the present instance I can point to precedents which have run back for twenty-nine years. Section 358 of the Railway Act reads as follows:

> The provisions of this act shall, in respect of tolls, tariffs and joint tariffs, so far as deemed applicable by the board, extend and apply to the traffic carried by any railway company by sea or by inland water, between any ports or places in Canada, if the company owns, charters, uses, maintains or works, or is a party to any arrangement for using, maintaining or working vessels for carrying traffic by sea or by inland water between any such ports or places.

I would emphasize the fact that that section has been in existence for twenty-nine years, but has no relation whatever and conveys no suggestion of its being applicable only to through traffic, carried so far by land and so far by water. It is entirely applicable to carriage by water alone. I might best explain the bill by saying that its provisions are the same as those in the section I have just read, except that I would leave out the word "railway" and the expression "by inland sea", the idea being to make it apply to any company owning vessels and carrying traffic, either passengers or freight, by sea. I do however desire one or two slight changes which should be given in detail.

In the first place I make the section apply to vessels other than those owned by a railway company. In other words I make it apply to all vessels carrying freight and passengers by sea. Although I do not include the great lakes, I have no objection to the section applying to the great lakes, if the committee to which the bill may be referred to desires. However, I am not familiar with the conditions on the great lakes, and I do not wish to raise issues about which I do not know. I make it apply merely to coastal waters of both coasts. I ask that the routes and points of call should be supervised in exactly the same way, and by the same body as is now done under the board of railway commissioners in connection with the points of call and routes of railways. I also make an exception of boats under twenty tons burthen, so as not to require that small ferries should come under the restrictions or conditions of the provision.

Apart from that the section would apply to all vessels, the system which now applies to all vessels owned by a railway. If it is right and proper that it should apply to vessels owned by a railway I cannot see why it should not apply to another company which may probably or possibly be competing with a railway company, but which does not happen to own a railway. I believe the provision would be beneficial to all parties concerned. Communities served by the boats in question which may believe they have been overlooked or are not receiving the service to which they are entitled, or the rates they would like to have, could apply to the board of railway commissioners. On the other hand there is distinct and absolute protection for a shipping company from, we will say, political pressure. Perhaps some member of parliament may want a particular coastal boat to call at his summer home or that of his friends, and for that reason exerts the pressure necessary to have that done. Perhaps directly or indirectly the hint is thrown out that if the suggestion is not complied with there may be difficulty in having a subsidy renewed. That would not be a desirable condition.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this apply only to ships sailing from one Canadian port to another Canadian port?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, from one port in Canada to another port in Canada.

Mr. DUFF: The coasting trade of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I just wanted to know that.

Mr. NEILL: Points of call, from one point in Canada to another point in Canada. The section would create a judicial body which would give fair, even handed justice and full consideration to all claims. No one would suggest that it would be desirable to do away with the board of railway commissioners. Yet at the time of its formation it was bitterly opposed. A railway company is to-day absolutely liable to the conditions I have named, provided they own the vessel. It does not need to be a through port of a journey partly by land and partly by water. On the Pacific coast it is just as applicable to a trip from Vancouver to Victoria as if it were on a ticket from Montreal to Victoria.

If it is asserted that the provision would raise issues with which the technical officers of the board of railway commissioners are not familiar, I would point out that they now have control of bridges, tunnels and the traffic, rates and charges thereon. They have control of the express companies and their charges, telephone companies and their charges, telegraph companies and their charges, and the fees charged for conducting business over cables. Under section 374 there is provision whereby the board of railway commissioners may control the price—the price, mind you—and the supply of water generated into power, a thing which certainly has no connection with railways. They have power to set the price that shall be fixed and to prescribe the manner in which the power shall be generated, and so on. So it is quite clear that the board has full power and scope and precedent for dealing with anything of that kind, and I would suggest that as all these railway bills go to the railway committee the minister might see his way to allowing this bill to be read a second time with the understanding that it will go to the railway committee.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): Mr. Speaker, this matter came up in the house ten years ago. Railways and the telephone and express companies are subject to regulation by a board created by this parliament known as the board of railway commissioners, and I see no reason why shipping companies engaged in the great lakes and also in the coastal trade should not be subject to regulation in the same way. I was chairman of the Toronto harbour board for a great many years when the waterfront and harbour development was going on in Toronto, and I know something of the labour conditions on the vessels that ply out of that port and on the great lakes. The labour conditions are an absolute disgrace to the people of this country. Men are working on those boats night and day until the fall of the year bringing down the grain on its way from the west to the seaboard, and there are not adequate life saving facilities and life saving stations. As I said in this house in the sessions of 1922 and 1923 these vessels crossing lake Superior have to depend on an American wireless station, and almost every year there are disasters on the great lakes. Such conditions would not be permitted in any other line of business. Manufacturers, for instance, cannot work their men the way these men are worked on these boats on the great lakes. I do not wish to be harsh in my criticism because I know that shipping is in a precarious state, but I have seen men going out on these ships under conditions that defy all the known laws of hygiene, away down in the bottom of the hold of a vessel twenty or thirty or forty years old, and at night it is worse than the black hole of Calcutta. The health officer of Toronto complained to me about conditions on these ships twelve years ago when I was chairman of the harbour commission. I think that the principle of this bill should be considered by parliament because labour conditions on the vessels on the great lakes demand reform at the hands of this parliament. I would not take the responsibility of defeating this bill by talking it out. I am supporting the principle of proper labour conditions on the vessels on the great lakes, and I would like to see the principle of this bill considered by a committee of this house with a view to action being taken by parliament.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, it is almost nine o'clock, and I cannot make the few remarks I have to make within the three minutes or so remaining. While I do not intend to suggest that the bill should be voted down at this stage, and as I desire to make a few remarks, if the house is willing I would ask you, sir, to be good enough to call it nine o'clock and then on Friday evening when the bill comes up again I can go on, if that is satisfactory to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private and public bills having been exhausted—

PATENTS OF INVENTION

Mr. BENNETT: Before proceeding to the second reading of Bill No. 8, Mr. Speaker, I move that we revert to the order for motions to enable me to make a motion for the discharge of the second reading of Bill No. 7, relating to patents of invention.

Motion agreed to, and the house having reverted to the order for motions:

Mr. BENNETT: I move, Mr. Speaker, that the order for the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend and consolidate the acts relating to patents of invention, be discharged.

The purpose of this motion is to enable the bill to be gone forward with in the other chamber, leaving the resolution standing as it is, because there has to be an antecedent resolution. Then when the bill comes back from the Senate the money sections will be added to the bill. That has been done before and I believe is sound practice in cases of this kind. This motion is to enable the Senate to be seized of the subject matter of the bill, except the money clauses, and the committee can then consider the bill, and then when it comes back to us we can, if we so desire, have it dealt with by our own committee too.

Motion agreed to and order discharged.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, while on motions I omitted to move one this afternoon. It is merely for the appointment of a committee on the subject matter of a resolution which was under discussion a few days ago. I move:

That a select committee consisting of Messrs. Cowan, Guthrie, Turnbull, Ernst, Gagnon, Lapointe, Mackenzie (Vancouver), Ralston and Woodsworth be appointed in accordance with the resolution passed by this house on the 28th of January, 1935, to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in their scope;

[Mr. Manion.]

And that the said committee shall have power to report from time to time and to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 8, to establish an employment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at six o'clock the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) had just finished a lengthy address on the bill now before the house. If I may say so, his speech was divided into two parts, the first dealing with the constitution and the constitutional difficulties standing in the way of the enactment of this legislation, and the second giving a sort of résumé of the activities and efforts of the Liberal party in regard to social legislation between the years 1919 and 1930. The right hon. gentleman laid particular stress on the Old Age Pensions Act that was passed under the Liberal administration. The greater part of his remarks had very little reference to the bill now before the house. I do not wish to follow him in all that he said, but I would like to make one or two observations with respect to some of the matters dealt with in his address.

The right hon. gentleman laid much stress on the constitutional difficulties and the rights of the provinces, but very little stress on the rights of the federal parliament. After all, if this parliament or the provincial legislatures all took the attitude that they were going to stand by the very letter of their rights under the British North America Act, then government in this country would become almost an impossibility. I believe that the members of this house as well as the members of the provincial legislatures ought to take a broad view of the situation as it exists in Canada; for if we are to take a narrow view then progressive legislation will become almost impossible. In the past few years this government, as governments previously have done, has assisted the provinces in the matter of unemployment, and if the federal parliament took the stand that the question of unemployment was entirely one for the provinces, then the provinces to-day would indeed be in a very bad position. However, since this bill has been introduced I know of no province which so far has taken any objection to it; in fact, I know of a number of provinces that have hailed with a good deal of satisfaction the introduction of an unemployment insurance bill in the House of Commons.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition, in discussing this measure, hinted at the rights of the provinces with particular reference to Ontario, and he indicated that that province was at the present time investigating its own rights in regard to certain taxation which the federal government was levying there. That sounded rather strange to me, for I read in this morning's paper that the Premier of Ontario had used the following language—it is to be found in a Canadian Press dispatch:

> There won't be work unless the federal government assist us. . . . We are not able to do it ourselves.

That is rather strange, I say, coming from a government who, it is claimed, will stand entirely upon their provincial rights. Then we were told something about the legal obstacles that stand in the way. Unfortunately we are compelled to leave these legal difficulties in the hands of the lawyers, and I presume we must allow them to fight the matter out.

Another objection raised by the leader of the Liberal party to this legislation was the fact that the provincial governments had not been consulted in the matter. I wondered whether, when the old age pensions legislation was passed in 1926, the provincial governments had been consulted in that regard.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Some of my friends to the right say that the provinces were consulted. Well, I was in the house at the time that legislation was under consideration and one of the objections of the Conservative party was that the provincial governments had not been consulted. And if you will look at the records of the house you will find that when the old age pension legislation was introduced no provincial governments were consulted.

Mr. GRAY: It was not effective until the provincial governments had passed enabling legislation.

Mr. HEAPS: That is not the point. The provincial governments had a responsibility under that act, whereas under this bill they have no responsibility. Under this legislation the provincial governments will be relieved of certain responsibilities, whereas under that act they were asked to assume heavy obligations. But the party in power at that time introduced the legislation without consulting the provinces, just as the present government has done in connection with this bill. I cannot see therefore that the argument of the present leader of the opposition has very much to commend it when he urges that the government should have consulted the provinces before introducing this legislation.

The leader of the opposition also complained about the Senate having thrown out the old age pension bill in 1926. It is quite true that the Conservative majority in the Senate threw out that measure in 1926, but I notice that only twenty-one members voted in favour of the bill, one of whom I believe was a Conservative. There were more than twenty Liberal members in the Senate in 1926. Where did the others disappear to when the vote was taken?

If I wanted to go back into the dim and distant past to look up what had been said by one party or the other I could find a great deal to be said against both parties. I remember that in 1927 when a motion was introduced in this house to have submitted to a committee the question of unemployment insurance we heard language which does not now commend itself to those who used it on that occasion, such as this, for instance:

> Whosoever becomes the victim of unemployment, in this country, does so because he has no desire to work; he really refuses work.

It was one of the Liberal members who said that, when we were discussing the question of unemployment insurance on March 16, 1927, as will be found at page 1277 of Hansard. Another member said this:

> How is it possible to imagine that the government can grant every request of the country —among others tax reduction—and at the same time establish pensions for old age, the blind, workmen and destitute people over the whole country? I consider it absurd.

I could go on quoting at great length along this line but it serves no useful purpose and I do not intend to do so. It is more the part of true statesmanship to think of the present as well as the future and to deal less with the past. I have no objection to prime ministers and leaders of oppositions, even the opposition in this corner, changing their minds. It denotes at times not only good tactics but sound common sense when, in view of changed conditions, they are prepared to change their own particular opinion. This afternoon we had a speech from the Prime Minister. Now the Prime Minister is a very able lawyer; in fact, if ever I wanted a lawyer to defend me on some particular charge my first choice would be, in spite of my dislike for lawyers, the present Prime Minister. But the right hon. gentleman made one significant admission which I think is unusual for our Prime Minister. He said that he had other ideas for relieving the unemployment situation. Possibly it was a slip of the tongue; he evidently had something in his mind, and I think myself that before he introduced legislation dealing with unemployment insurance we should have had from him what is after all his remedy for unemployment. It is far more important to deal with the problem of unemployment than with the problem of unemployment insurance, and if the government have any remedy now for the most important problem parliament has to deal with, then I suggest that this is the time for the Prime Minister to give us his ideas in the matter. I do believe that before we start on the question of unemployment insurance we ought to deal first with the fundamental problem of unemployment itself. I submit that it will be almost an impossibility, with things as they are, for us to deal in any comprehensive way with the problem of unemployment insurance.

When the bill was introduced in the resolution stage I claimed that with conditions as we have them now, with the numbers of people who are out of work, it would be almost impossible to have what one might term an actuarially sound system of unemployment insurance that would give relief benefits to even a small number of those who unfortunately find themselves out of work at the present time. The figures submitted by the Prime Minister this afternoon showed that at the time of the census in 1931 there were 2,566,031 people who were employed in that year. He claimed that there were affected by the present bill 1,701,834 persons, the vast majority of whom were male employees. But some rather significant omissions present themselves in those figures given by the Prime Minister this afternoon, for in the census figures of 1931 information as to the number of unemployed was not given. We do not know how many of those approximately two and a half million people are out of work now and we do not know how many of the approximately one and two-thirds millions who, it is claimed, might be affected by the bill, would actually come under its provisions.

[Mr. Heaps.]

I would venture to assert that tremendous reductions would have to be made from the figures given by the Prime Minister this afternoon to indicate exactly or even approximately how many people are affected by the proposed measure.

Since these census figures were taken, our unemployed army has grown to a considerable extent, and further there is in the bill a very important provision which states that those who are casually employed would not become beneficiaries under the proposed legislation. I do not know how they are going to define the term "casual worker." For the past five years numbers of men employed in railway shops have been employed only part of the time. Let me take for instance the Canadian Pacific shops. The men employed in those shops are working and have been working fourteen days a month since, I believe, the end of 1929 or some time in 1930. At fourteen days a month, or less than three and a half days a week, on an average throughout the year those men will not have worked twenty-five hours a week. Under the provisions of the bill would those men be termed casual employees? The chances are that if a legal interpretation were given, they could not be called permanent employees because they are working only three and a half days a week and they might quite possibly come under the category of part time or casual employees. This would almost immediately debar from the operation of the measure a vast number of men employed in both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National shops, for what applies to the Candian Pacific in the number of hours worked applies in almost the same way to the Canadian National shops as well.

I have had protests from some of these railwaymen's organizations in regard to the bill. In fact, so far as the bill itself is concerned, I have had up to now more condemnation than I have had commendation from the workers in different parts of the dominion, for we find that to a railway employee or to almost every other casual employee, that is one who is employed only part time, this would mean that he is expected to contribute to a scheme of unemployment insurance almost the equivalent of one cent an hour of his wages. I would like to remind the Prime Minister, although he is not in his seat at the moment, that when the resolution was before the house he promised to give us certain information in the form of printed matter, namely a report of Mr. Andrew D. Watson and Mr. Hugh H. Wolfenden, actuaries, who worked on this bill for quite a considerable length of time. I think he promised hon. members that the printed report of those two gentlemen would be available before the second reading of the bill was taken up. Personally I was waiting for the submission of that document in order that I might have a better idea of the conclusion those gentlemen had arrived at and the reasons for certain financial provisions of the bill.

Reference was made this afternoon to the act in Great Britain, the statement being made to the house and the impression probably being given to the country that the proposed legislation to a very large extent followed the act as they have it in the old country. To a certain extent that may be true, but it is true in only a very limited sense, for in England at the present time the legislation is so all-embracing that it covers, I would say, more than one-quarter of the whole population of that country. In Canada I do not think the provisions of the bill will cover ten per cent of our population; that is, assuming we have 1,000,000 insured—and I do not think that figure will be reached for a great number of years—then only shall we have ten per cent of our population covered as against more than twenty-five per cent under the British act. Further, the unemployment insurance act in Great Britain has a definite purpose in view, which is to provide for men and women who are out of work. In this country our bill does not provide for them at all. We start on a completely different basis; we select a number of insurable risks and all the uninsurable risks are discarded until such time as they become insurable risks. The consequence is that we are going to take the good risks that probably do not require insurance, while the poorer risks that require more insurance than the better ones will have to go without insurance at all.

Moreover, the unemployment insurance act in Great Britain has been widened in its scope over a great number of years until to-day, as I said, it has become so all-embracing that very few men or women in the old country are outside its provisions. In Canada where for a number of years we have had such a huge army of unemployed and semi-employed, these men and women will unfortunately be altogether outside the provisions of the bill. That is brought about because the government intend, as was stated here by the Prime Minister this afternoon, to have an actuarially sound system of unemployment insurance. If we are to have a bill that is worth while we cannot have it actuarially sound, for the simple reason that so many men and women are out of work, there is such a vast army of unemployed, that substantial contributions from the state, far greater than anything contained in the bill, are required in order to give benefits approaching anything worth while.

Second, are we likely in the immediate or even the distant future to be able to have a bill that will include within its scope the numbers of men and women actually engaged in industry in this dominion? I remember the first session I came to this house one of the questions I raised was that of unemployment insurance, and practically every year until 1931 without exception I brought that matter up on the floor of this house—advocating some form of unemployment insurance to cope with the problem that was then confronting us. But from the year 1931 on I have not been half so enthusiastic for unemployment insurance as I was prior to that time; not because I did not want provision to be made for the unemployed—quite the opposite—but because I believe that if we are to attack the problem of unemployment successfully we have to attack it from an entirely different angle than mere unemployment insurance. Again, if we are to have a scheme of insurance that will take care of the unemployed, the numbers of unemployed in Canada will have to be reduced very greatly in order that the scheme may be actuarially feasible.

Why do I say I am not so enthusiastic to-day for such a measure as I was a few years ago? In 1927, 1928 and 1929 I introduced motions in this house, feeling that some form of insurance might be introduced that would take care of the problem in some effective way. In 1931 the Prime Minister was good enough to accept the motion. He stated that during the lifetime of this parliament a bill would be introduced dealing with the question. I have no doubt that it is pursuant to that pledge that we have this bill before us to-day. But when I advocated unemployment insurance in this house the number of unemployed was small compared with the number we have at this time. I was not as wise as some other people; I thought that the depression which struck us in 1929 and continued through 1930 and 1931 would pass away as other depressions have, and that we should again enter a cycle of better times, when the number of unemployed would be reduced. But the depression continued; the army of unemployed has grown larger, and to-day I venture to say that in this country it numbers approximately 600,000 people, in spite of the figures given by the Prime Minister. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) mentioned this afternoon the vast number of men and women on relief in Kitchener. I was told that in Toronto there are now more people on relief than there ever have been, that the number has reached a peak, more being on relief this year than last. With such a great number of people on relief I cannot understand how we can still claim that the number of unemployed has been cut in half since 1932. However, as I say I thought that the acute condition that prevailed in 1929 and 1930 would abate. Such has not been the case; we still have to-day what some refer to as an abnormal condition. I am wondering whether such conditions have not really become normal; for in addition to the vast numbers who are completely out of work we have other vast numbers working only part time, yet the industrial machine is running n the regular manner. So if the present conditions, these so-called abnormal conditions, are really more or less normal, then we must attack the problem from an entirely different angle.

Last year I brought in a resolution on the question of shorter hours and increased purchasing power for the masses of the people, and again I was thankful when the government accepted the motion and it passed the house unanimously. But I was very much disappointed when probably as a result of that resolution a bill was brought in this year for a forty-eight hour working week. If that is the best the government can do I am afraid that the lot of the unemployed is not going to be helped. In fact our army of unemployed is going to become a permanent thing in this country. I should like to see an attempt made to deal with the question in a far more radical and fundamental way than anything proposed by the government up to the present time.

As far as this bill is concerned it demands from the employer and the employee a contribution of twenty-five cents a week, while the government is to assume probably from 10 to 22½ cents as its share. No doubt this arrangement is somewhat similar to what prevails in other countries, and the benefits proposed somewhat similar to those given in other countries. But in other countries unemployment insurance was introduced a good many years ago, and we are beginning now on an extremely limited scale. I think we should look at this bill in a cold, logical way to see what it really will do.

In the first place I think it is generally admitted that as far as unemployment is concerned it does not begin to touch the question at all. It merely attempts to form a fund out of which benefits could be paid, and we are not sure as to the amount of those benefits, for the Prime Minister told us this afternoon very distinctly that a committee or commission would be set up to administer the act and that the benefits given might vary from time to time according to the actuarial condition of the fund. For instance at a time when a large number of the insured were unemployed the benefits to be paid might be less than those now set out in the bill. At the present time those out of work do receive certain relief. Responsibility for that rests upon the federal and provincial governments and the municipalities, each contributing about one-third. I venture to say that in a general way the amount of relief granted to persons out of work is about equivalent to the benefits proposed to be given under this bill. If such be the case, what does it mean? It means that what is now a responsibility of the province, the municipality and the federal government is to become a responsibility of the federal government, the employer and the employee; and those who subsequently find themselves in the ranks of the unemployed and who come under the provisions of the bill will not be taken care of by the provincial and municipal administrations. In other words the share now borne by the province and the municipality is to be loaded upon the employer and the employee.

I have said that I have no objection to the principle of unemployment insurance. I did hope, however, that when a bill was introduced the government would have been far more generous, and actually in some way undertake to care for the unemployed in Canada. I know it might be rather a tall order to ask the government to take care of the unemployed men and women at the present time; nevertheless they have to be taken care of in some way, and when we are offered a bill which will have the effect of taking out the good risks and leaving the bad ones to take care of themselves as best they can, we are doing a great injustice to a large proportion of the men and women who still hope to be employed in industry at some time in the future if not now.

Parliament has not, and could not have, any greater responsibility than that of dealing with the problem of unemployment, and whether or not I like it I have to compare the bills now before the house with the impression created throughout the country by the radio speeches of the Prime Minister. I heard those speeches and read them in the press, and when the newspapers asked me what I thought of these new ideas, this new deal or whatever you may call it, I was one of the first to say that I congratulated the Prime Minister on his conversion. The only reservation I made in giving my congratulations was that I wanted to see the measures themselves when they came before the house.

I must confess to a certain amount of disappointment in both the present bill and the measure concerning hours of labour. The people of this country expected something more and something better from the government than is contained in either of these measures. You cannot place measures of this kind before the workers of this country and make them believe that they will improve their standard or help their lot in life; after all what the average person wants is a feeling of security, and neither the forty-eight hour week measure nor this unemployment insurance bill will give them any more security than they have at the present time. As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, what I expect from this or any government is that they will get down to fundamentals in dealing with the problem confronting them, and which is likely to confront any government even after another election. We want to see them deal with the problem of unemployment, not only by means of an unemployment insurance bill but also in a more fundamental way than is expressed in the terms of this measure. I expect that about three-quarters of a million people will come under the provisions of this bill, and those men and women will be the people who least require this sort of insurance, for if a person is employed at the present time, under present depressed conditions, he is not likely to be out of work one or two years hence. So I think in this parliament we should have before us those other ideas at which the Prime Minister hinted this afternoon, in dealing with the problem of unemployment.

I confess openly, Mr. Speaker, with regard to this unemployment insurance bill, that it is hardly wanted by those who favoured it and is not wanted by those who opposed it. It is so negligible in the benefit it is to give the working people of the country that I think we will disappoint a great many of them, and I feel that it is almost an injustice to pass this measure unless its scope is made much wider than is the case at present. Perhaps before the bill is through the house the Prime Minister and the government may be in a more generous mood; perhaps the provisions of the act may be widened and the government may make larger grants than have been suggested up to the present. I do not want to be too harsh in my criticism; I would far rather be able to stand up and say to the government, "Thank you for what you have done in providing a measure that will be worth while," but a measure of this kind, so limited in scope and in the benefit it is to give, I am afraid will not be received with much enthusiasm by the working people of Canada.

As I have said already, Mr. Speaker, the problem of unemployment is more important than the question of unemployment insurance. I would far rather have heard from the government the proposals they have in mind to deal with the question of unemployment; then, assuming that their proposals could not entirely absorb those who are out of work, an unemployment insurance bill might be a valuable addition to their program, because it might take care of the limited number of unemployed. A program of public works is not a cure for unemployment; desirable though it may be to tide over a temporary situation, it cannot be regarded as a permanent cure. So I hope that before the bill receives third reading we may have from the government a further declaration as to what they intend to do to meet the unemployment situation in this country and what they intend to do for the army of unemployed who cannot now and probably never will be able to become absorbed into the industrial life of this country. Perhaps if they do submit to the house something worth while we might be able to feel a little more enthusiastic about this unemployment insurance measure than I feel at the present time.

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with curious interest to the address of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). There can be no argument against the government dealing with unemployment as best it can; there can be no argument against the obligation which the people of Canada owe to those unemployed in industry, but I cannot understand or justify the hon. gentleman and others who confuse the consideration of the question of unemployment insurance with the question of granting relief to those who cannot receive benefits under such an insurance scheme.

The problem of unemployment is unquestionably a problem which belongs to industry as a whole, and in that I include the obligation which the governments of our country owe because of their association with industry. Unquestionably the hon. gentleman is quite correct when he asserts that unemployment is not the result of choice on the part of the workman himself. Nor are those right who assume or imply, speaking in general, that the people who are unemployed are in that position because of a lack of energy or prudence or because of laziness on their part. That, of course, is the absurd argument we hear at times. The fact of the matter is that there is a distinct weakness in the system of industry as it has been carried on in this and other countries in that it has not provided for the continuous or steady employment of workmen associated with industry. The hon. gentleman would indicate that we must deal with relief on the one hand or with insurance on the other, and that the presentation to this parliament of a bill to deal with unemployment insurance means that no measures will or can be taken for the relief of the unemployed. Of course that is neither a fair nor a reasonable contention. To my mind there is no reason why tradesmen either within or without the unions should not be able to make their contributions along with others associated in industry who are helping to provide an insurance fund to enable them to carry on their work with reasonable security. The hon. gentleman is quite correct when he states that the workman's greatest need is a reasonable sense of security. The ideal to which he strives is that he may be self-supporting, and by that I mean that during his working years he may be able to earn enough to provide for the maintenance of his family during his whole life. The same should be said regarding industry as a whole; it should be self-supporting in the sense that during the twelve months of the year it will be able to fulfil its obligations to the human element connected with it. There has been a lack of organization which has been more marked in the last four or five years, but which existed even before the depression.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg contrasted what is recommended in Bill No. 8 with measures which have been in operation in the United Kingdom. I shall not discuss the matter in detail, but I will say that there are differences. One does not have to be satisfied that Bill No. 8 includes all the virtues of the legislation in Great Britain in order to conclude that there are virtues in it. We realize that the general principle of the bill before us is the principle which has been followed in the old country for the last thirty years. The details have varied, and improvements have been made there until it reached a point where in 1934 a distinct advance was shown over the legislation which had been in force during preceding years. What has been the result in the old country? I do not think anyone would doubt that there has been a distinct change in the psychology of the public in general, and in that I include not only the employees but the employers—industries, governments, trade unions, and the population in general—until to-day, and in fact it has been so for a considerable number of years, we find no real opposition to the principle of insurance. If one were to study the report of the Blanesburgh committee he would find through it expressions of confidence and of approval from all sections of the public. At one point the committee reports:

> Nobody has suggested to us that the principle of unemployment insurance should be abandoned. It has been recognized by all who have appeared before us, and we ourselves share the view, that an unemployment insurance scheme must now be regarded as a permanent feature of our code of legislation.

When we in this chamber undertake to introduce this form of social legislation we are accepting the principle set forth in the report of the Blanesburgh committee. In 1924 the national federation of employers' organizations —and I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that it is an association of employers' organizations—set out their approval in the following terms:

> Whatever be the defects of the emergency measures, the experiment of compulsory unemployment insurance, as initiated in 1911, cannot be adjudged a failure in itself. On the contrary, experience since 1911 has proved that it is practicable in normal times to make provision, by way of insurance, for assisting the bona fide workman over periods of temporary and unavoidable unemployment.

Then, passing on down one comes to the Melchett-Turner group which gave its hearty approval to the scheme. Then the Liberal industrial inquiry gave its approval, and again later the Balfour committee appointed by the board of trade expressed the opinion that—> —both from the point of view of general social welfare and from that of industrial and commercial efficiency, establishing of unemployment insurance in Great Britain had been amply justified, adding that they would find it difficult to imagine how the country would have fared "had not the insurance machinery been available in its time of need." Indeed, as they say, it is a subject of constant comment that "so deep and prolonged a trade depression has produced so little actual suffering in comparison with the experience of far slighter and more transient periods of depression before the war," a condition which they attribute in large part to the unemployment insurance scheme.

And so we have various bodies representing all sections of the public giving their hearty approval to the general principle. I realize that there may be criticism of the details, but in Canada we have reached the point where social legislation of the type before us is being demanded by the general public. I have no doubt the trade unions of Canada will approve the principle of contributory insurance as it is contained in Bill No. 8, and I have no doubt they will support the measure despite the endeavour on the part of some to confuse a legitimate insurance scheme with a program of unemployment relief. I believe such insurance in this country is not a form of charity; it is not a gratuity, but it is good business. In my view when we provide for the human element in industry we are just using ordinary, common, everyday business tactics. As it is organized to-day society has reached the point where it recognizes that industry cannot survive unless it is prepared to take its part in bringing about social legislation such as that we are now considering.

If one took the time to review the legislation of the old country, he could go through the various amendments that have been made, showing that they did experiment during the years. For example, during the six years from 1920 to 1926 there were sixteen different enactments changing the application of the insurance principle. I think, however, it is safe to assume that the legislation as they have it now is fairly well fixed and that it is a permanent acquisition to the needs of industry in that great country.

What has been taking place in the old country? What has been changing the psychology of their people? During the last thirty-five years the expenditure on social services in the United Kingdom has increased from $180,000,000 to $2,500,000,000. Even since 1908 the expenditure on social services in the United Kingdom has multiplied five times, and the remarkable feature to my mind is that less than one-eighth of the total amount spent on their social services consists of relief extended under the poor laws or as relief itself.

Much has been said in regard to armaments, and it is very interesting to note this fact. In 1914, just before the war, Great Britain was spending on armaments about $350,000,000 a year, a sum equal to that which she was spending at that time on social services. Last year they were maintaining about the same quantity of armaments, at a cost of $575,000,000, about half as much again, but instead of spending $350,000,000 on social services that expenditure had multiplied to $2,500,000,000. While this was going on in the United Kingdom, showing the change in the attitude of the public towards social services there, France had multiplied her expenditure on armaments by six, Italy by five, Japan by five, and the United States by three. In the United Kingdom when unemployment there was at its worst, in 1929, between two-thirds and three-quarters of the number of those insured were persons who were regularly employed, and the average unemployment amongst the men was 140 days and amongst the women 93 days.

Coming to the bill before the house, as the Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett, pointed out this afternoon, this is an insurance bill. It provides for cash contributions by way of benefits for cash paid in by way of premiums, and that of course is an insurance proposition. Granted that it is insurance on an actuarial basis, I think it should be remembered that the bill goes beyond the matter of insurance pure and simple and provides machinery to give thought and organization to the whole question of unemployment as it is to be related to this insurance scheme.

One of the dangers of unemployment insurance which has been spoken of heretofore is that it may steer employers and employees away from the obligation which they have of organizing themselves to keep employment more regular and continuous. The labour exchanges which are to be set up under this bill are a very important feature in the carrying out of any unemployment insurance scheme. The bill provides for the regular and systematic placement of labour; it provides for the mobility of labour, which industry unquestionably requires; it provides also that the commission shall have authority to investigate, take evidence, and keep in touch with the movement of labour so that the proper measures may from time to time be taken to provide for the mobility of labour and the placing of men where their services are required. That means that thought is being diverted to the proper channels to assist in overcoming the difficulties of unemployment in our country.

I do not assume for a moment that this legislation is to be regarded as a measure for relieving the present emergency of unemployment in this country, but I do say this, that when you have the insurance scheme organized, and when the commission is set up with thought and organization behind it, then beyond the actual contributions provided for in this legislation the scheme will assist by serving as a prophylactic, if I may call it such, as a preventive of unemployment which might otherwise be thrown on the labour market. The scheme as we have it before us not only provides through its insurance facilities for the assistance of the men who are employed, but it provides for that thought and organization of which I have been speaking, and it does help to provide the government and the people of this country with an organized system looking to regular employment, which must undoubtedly be of benefit in the years to come.

May I say one word more in regard to these exchanges, and I do not think this point has yet been brought out except that it has been mentioned that it is necessary for cooperation between the provinces and the commission to be set up under this legislation. To my mind there must also be the utmost cooperation between the workmen on the one hand and the exchanges on the other. There must be on both sides that feeling of confidence, that spirit which will help in coordinating the obligations which belong to the exchanges. That cannot be emphasized too strongly because unless the cooperation be such that the employees on the one hand and the employers on the other have the utmost confidence in the competence of the exchanges to perform that task of placing labour, of making it more mobile, then one of the most important features will be defeated.

May I bring up this point, which I think is a refutation of what the hon. member for North Winnipeg has said, that the exchange must be for the placement of labour, not as a detective agency, not as a semi police force, not as an agency for the distribution of relief or for the administration of relief measures. To my mind that should be removed entirely to the proper authorities and organizations; that work does not belong to the exchanges which will be set up under the provisions of this bill.

Further, the bill provides preventive measures. Section 7 (c) provides, practically speaking, for juvenile training, one of the most important features of the bill. It gives power to the commission to take whatever steps it may see fit to attain the knowledge and, having attained the knowledge, to apply it for providing preventive measures, the training of the young men. This is to salvage young people particularly from that part of labour which is most overcrowded. And that part is the unskilled labour. In the old country it is shown that ninety-three per cent of the men who drew their benefits under the insurance act were those who had left school before the age of fourteen. There is food for thought in that little bit of information; and if the provision of the bill gives to the commission the authority to use their intelligence, their conscience, their thought and their organizing ability to train the young to a more profitable form of labour, where labour will not be so overcrowded, then it will have done a great work in that line alone.

The bill provides for national health in part 4, which is also of very considerable significance. It is a wise intitial step to be taken before any systematic and really effective measures can be pursued for the further extension of social health insurance.

Beyond the immediate active provisions of this bill, section 7 (a) provides for what has been termed in some of the old country discussions the second line of defence—those who have exhausted their benefits of the insurance scheme. Section 7 not only empowers the commission but it puts upon them the obligation to use their time, their ability and their every opportunity to adopt measures that will assist in meeting this particular form of labour problem comprising those who have exhausted their benefits under the provisions of the bill. Then it goes a step further and gives them the authority to consider the whole question of unemployment. That does not bring the unprovided for unemployed under the benefits of the bill, but it does the very thing which the hon. member for North Wininpeg contended, which is that men who have the opportunity, an official body who have the authority, should give the best consideration to the great question of unemployment in a national way. And the measure so provides.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the other day did suggest that insurance and relief should not be separated. I think that those who have looked into the question of unemployment insurance will take the opposite view, that that is the very thing that should not happen, and that relief should not be grafted on to insurance in any way. If that is done the result will be of course that the employed worker will be contributing to the assistance of the unemployed citizens of the country. In other words, we shall be taxing employment to extend relief to those who unfortunately are on relief in this country. No one contends that nothing should be done for the unemployed. No one contends that the governmental and other agencies should not use their utmost power and thought in meeting that problem. On the other hand, no wise person would suggest that that part of the unemployment distress in this country should be provided for by the contributions which will be made by employed workmen into the insurance fund. That would be at once disastrous to the insurance undertaking; it is one of the things that should not be done. To my mind, this bill should provide, and it does provide for a dignified insurance contract, and that should not be confused with any relief dole or relief contribution. On the one hand we are legislating for insurance, and on the other, when there is suitable legislation, we are providing for relief. But the insurance bill itself cannot be a mongrel measure, mixing up relief for the unemployed who do not come under the insurance scheme with the insurance benefits extended to those who do come under it.

One of the potential virtues of this bill is that the community as a whole will benefit through the sustaining of the purchasing power of our workmen in all the various classifications under the bill, during twelve months of the year, particularly during those months or weeks when it is impossible for a section of them to find work. It also sustains the morale of that part of our industry throughout the length and breadth of our country; it also prompts our employers to employ more labour. But in addition it has its danger, and that is the danger of demoralization. So often we hear of the demoralization of the employees, but there is not very much danger of demoralization of the employees who come under the measure. The greater danger is of demoralizing the employers or the government or the trade unions or those who may by reason of the smooth working of the legislation refuse to give that careful attention, that organization, which should be continued for the proper working of industry throughout the dominion.

I listened with considerable interest to the address delivered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon. It was a speech of defence and excuses. I am quite willing to allow him that privilege; I shall endeavour to be magnanimous enough to excuse him for his excuses, but after all one has no particular inclination to discuss political platforms of years gone by. As a matter of fact I do not know very much about, nor am I particularly interested in the platforms of the various parties in years gone by. I am not concerned very much with the professions of political faiths, but as we stand to-day, I am concerned with action translated into legislation on the statute books of our country. That is what the Canadian people are interested in; the justification of former contentions or the glorifying or the condemnation of political platforms of years gone by is of very little interest. I agree heartily with the hon. member for North Winnipeg that we are not interested in those matters and that it is no sin for any politician or statesman to change his mind. I do not know nor do I care whether there have been any changes of mind, so long as to-day, when we are considering the question of unemployment insurance, we get a bill which will extend to the workmen of our country the insurance which they have been seeking.

The leader of the opposition may be quite content with the negative policy which he has presented and which he contended had been in existence for so long in the platform of his party, but I must congratulate the government on its positive policy incorporated in Bill No. 8 now under consideration. I presume the right hon. gentleman for the present is opposed to Bill No. 8; I could gather nothing else from his argument, although he did not so state in so many words. But whether the opposition comes by reason of some constitutional argument or by reason of some other argument in regard to principle, is of no significance in the result; if it means opposition to the legislation, if it means an endeavour to defeat the practical scheme comprised in Bill No. 8, then the right hon. gentleman and his party have done their share to oppose what labour in general in this country has been demanding for many years past.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): The title of the bill promises us a good deal more than does the bill itself, which proposes to enact only two things. One is an extension of the employment offices now in existence and the second is a very limited scheme of unemployment insurance. Dealing first with the employment offices, I anticipate it is the design of the government to extend the existing system. I believe there are sixty-six such offices now. I have no doubt that this will be a good policy; it will cost a good deal of money, but I think it will be worth it. I see one point that might cause trouble. Under section 14 the commission has power to make regulations to make advances by way of loan for the fare of unemployed men to some point where they have secured work, and it states that such advances will be a debt due to the commission and recoverable by process of law. It might well be that that would take the form of a lien on the men's wages and we might have this situation: two hundred men at Vancouver might be sent to the wheat fields in Alberta with a lien on their wages. It would take them at least two months to earn enough money to pay off that lien. They might then be thrown out of work and have no money with which to return to British Columbia. Some provision would have to be made to safeguard against a situation of that kind. But the general principle of that feature of the measure is sound and I will gladly support it.

The second phase of the bill is the unemployment insurance. I have advocated this for many years and I must support the bill although I am disappointed at the limited extent of it. I accept the principle of contributions because I have always realized that without contributions it would not be an insurance system; it would be merely a dole. It is evident that those who are now out of work and unable to qualify under the insurance system must be taken care of in another way, but the insurance principle by building up a reserve in good times would help to soften the blow of unemployment when times became bad. Even a much more limited scheme, that of old age pensions, has taken 86,000 people off the labour market during the last few years. While I say that I shall vote for the bill, I wish to offer some criticism that I hope may lead to some alterations in the bill in committee.

I object first to the limited scope of the bill. Four-fifths of the people I represent will have no part or lot in it except to pay their share of the expense. Fishing, lumbering in its various branches, coal mining, pulp and paper mills and farming would include the bulk of the people I represent. The fisherman, the individual who owns his boat and gear, and the farmer on his own land, would not come under this bill, because it would be difficult to regard them as out of work employees. In a sense they are capitalists, although I hesitate to apply that name to them; it has become such a term of opprobrium. But when it comes to the lumber workers, those in the logging camps and the saw mills, I cannot understand why they should not be included; they are purely and simply workers. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was kind enough to suggest that he might take the temper of the house on that matter in committee, and perhaps allow them to come in. I hope he does so.

I wish to refer for a moment to the excepted employments, those which do not come under the bill. The first is employment in agriculture, horticulture and forestry. I do not know why agricultural workers should be cut out. The second exception is employment in fishing. That is ambiguous; I suppose it would cover not only the fisherman with his own gear but a man working in a cannery or reduction plant for wages. I see no reason why they should be excluded while people working in fruit or vegetable canning factories are included. I think that is an injustice. The next exception is employment in lumbering and logging. I do not know whether the word "lumbering" would include saw mills, but I am rather afraid it would, and if so a change should be made there. Then another exempted employment is in transportation by water or by air, and stevedoring. There is a large body of men on the Pacific coast, I suppose running into thousands, who make their permanent living working on boats. They are a decent organized body, mostly married men, and live in the towns from which the boats sail. And the same applies to stevedoring; there was a time when it was a most casual form of pick-up labour, but that is not the case now. These men are well organized, have their homes and stay by their job, are fairly well paid, and I see no reason why they should not be included. They cannot be regarded as casual labourers. One would think, if the idea is to start in a safe way and keep within the recommendations of the actuaries, that the more people involved the better; because it is well known that if you spread the risk over a larger number of people it can be calculated more accurately and you are better able to meet the demands.

Another exempted employment is banking, mortgage, loan, trust, insurance or other financial business. Why is a clerk in a hardware store or a real estate or lawyer's office or a wholesale grocery to come under the act while a clerk in a bank or insurance company remains outside? Surely the odium that apparently attaches to bankers nowadays need not attach to their often underpaid employees. Then employment in domestic service is excepted unless the employed person is employed in a club or in any trade or business carried on for the purposes of gain. That means that a girl in a café or hotel who has an opportunity to augment her wages by tips may come under the act but her less fortunate and lower paid sister in a private house is left out. I see no justice in that. Nurses are also excluded; I see no justification for that.

I do not want to be nasty, but it looks to me rather as if this bill had been framed—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): "Framed" is right.

Mr. NEILL: —with a very significant eye upon the eastern industrial worker, the man who works in a factory or foundry or textile industry, while we on the Pacific coast and down by the Atlantic are to be left to shift for ourselves, in the same way that the manufacturing interests in eastern central Canada are taken care of by the tariff at the expense of us in the west and those in the far east.

The largest body of men among my constituents who would come under this act would I presume be the coal miners, but I am a little doubtful if even they will qualify. They work intermittently, they are not fired but are simply laid off, and by that means a much larger number of men get the work spread amongst them. It is quite common for them to draw only three days' pay a week; I have known them to draw only three days' pay a fortnight. It is questionable whether they would qualify under this bill. It might be held that they are not out of employment because they are still working, although in this intermittent manner, and there is a provision that no man can get any unemployment benefit until he has been idle nine days. These men in fact are not idle nine days, although they may work only two or three days a week. There is another aspect of it that rather alarms me; it may be positively harmful to these men and others employed by large concerns both in the east and the west. Any large company, but particularly those I have in mind, coal mining companies that operate on this intermittent system, might fire half their employees. Suppose a company employs four hundred men and they are only working three days a week; the company has to pay for every man, and that would be $4,800 a year. If they fired half of them and employed the other half six days a week they would have to pay only half that sum, so that the company would save $2,400 a year. And that would apply to the big companies in the east, such as Simpson's and Eaton's, perhaps to an alarming extent. Companies often carry people not working full time just in order to keep them going.

I notice also the employer must pay for exempted people. Why draw a distinction between excepted employments and exempted people who are exempt under three specified conditions? But the employer must pay for those exempted people although the man himself is exempted and does not draw any benefit. It does not seem fair that the employer in that case should have to pay for the days he works.

Now a word as to the procedure, which seems to me complicated to say the least; and when procedure is complicated it means trouble. There are two routes by which one may proceed. Under section 27 there are five subparagraphs which cover most of the ordinary points on which disputes are likely to arise in connection with a man's employment or unemployment. These are subject to decision by the commission. Failing settlement by the commission or as an appeal from the commission they can go to the exchequer court. There are no details as to how the employee is to get there. Going to the exchequer court is a costly thing. The exchequer court comes to the coast only at long intervals. Can you imagine a man having a dispute about $6 a week going to the exchequer court? There are no provisions to say whether the man is to have his expenses paid. The Prime Minister promised some consideration on that point. Then there is another route, a parallel one apparently; I do not seem to be able to fit the two into each other, but it would seem that he can take one or both. The other route begins with section 28. Let us begin at the ground floor. There is a local insurance officer; he is the local man. Then there is a court of referees, provided with a specially appointed chairman. Then there is a panel to be constituted from which these referees are to be drawn. Above them there are deputy umpires and then an umpire, and above them under subsection 4 we come to the appointment of an unemployment and social insurance commission of three, of whom the Prime Minister spoke this afternoon. One would suppose that was almost enough machinery to run a petty little one-horse insurance scheme like this, but turning to section 36 you find provision made for an unemployment insurance advisory committee, consisting of a chairman and six members. They are not to be paid, but section 37 provides that they may receive an indemnity, which may amount to about $20 a day, and they will be able to run up to about $1,800 or $2,000 a year. This is not to be an unimportant thing: subsection 6 of section 37 states:

> The minister may assign to the committee from the public service of Canada or otherwise such professional, technical, secretarial and other assistance as the committee may require . . .

So evidently they are going to operate on a considerable scale. What are they going to do; what is to be the work of this advisory committee? They are to advise the commission, and they are to report on the fund administered by the commission. That is found in subsections 1 and 2 of section 36. But why do they need to do that? We have a board of railway commissioners, a pension board, a radio commission, a biological commission and others; they do not need advisory committees. For the life of me I cannot understand why this commission should need such a committee. Then if you turn to section 43 you see that the commission itself, quite properly, is required to make a report to the government every year. Then why do they want someone to make a report on them? I cannot see it.

Then if we turn to section 38 we find the inevitable provision that is in all our acts nowadays, giving complete and arbitrary power to this commission to make regulations, or really to make laws. If you will turn to subsection (i) you will find that this commission of three have power to prescribe punishment for the violation of any regulation, including maximum and minimum fines not exceeding $50, and terms of imprisonment not exceeding three months. If that is not illegal it ought to be. Here is a body of men; we have not the slightest idea who are to compose it. They need not be lawyers, but they are to be given power to frame up a little criminal code of their own. They are not limited to the imposition of fines not exceeding $50, and in default imprisonment for three months; they can spread themselves and give anybody, for any offence however imaginary or trivial, of their own conception and defining, three months in gaol as well as a fine. I say that is wrong; I have no hesitation in saying so. I do not care whether or not it is legal. We are getting too much in the habit of turning over these arbitrary powers to these commissions.

Now I should like to say a word as to the benefits. After the man has paid in 25 cents a week for forty weeks and his employer has paid another 25 cents and the government 10 cents, because the government is obligated to pay one-fifth plus the cost of administration, the workman may get thirteen weeks at $6 a week for himself, $2.70 a week for his wife, and something for his children. I suppose those sums have been indicated by the investigation of the actuaries. But there is a benefit year prescribed, and it is provided that a man cannot get more than thirteen payments in any one year. The benefit year begins when he receives his first benefit, and he has to pay in for forty weeks before that. That will be almost a year, because at odd times he may be sick or he may have to go to his mother-in-law's funeral or something of the kind. It will take him almost a year in which to qualify. Then in the second year he may receive benefits for only thirteen weeks, and thereafter he must pay in for thirteen weeks more before qualifying for any further relief, but he can get only thirteen weeks' benefit in any one year.

That is the end of these two enactments. Again I turn to the title and quote the other things promised.

. . . for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

[Mr. Neill.]

Now I turn to subsection 1 of section 7, which provides that this commission shall try to formulate schemes for the insurance of the excepted classes, for the assistance of people now unemployed who are not eligible under the act, for training them and so on. This might have been and should have been the very crux of the act; it is the most important part. Why has not this been done already; why are they starting only now with instructions to investigate, when this legislation has been in process of incubation for three years? Why were they not devoting their energies to the formulation of a scheme to deal with unemployment, which is more important even than the scheme under consideration? Why do they not put this other advisory committee to work and have them start at once to devote their whole time to this question?

That is enough of that. Sections 39 and 40 deal with national health, and the duties of the commission in this connection could be performed by a competent stenographer. They are to assemble reports, publications, information and data concerning any scheme, and pass it around to anyone who wants it. There is no suggestion that they do anything practical, and I understand that this is due to the fact that as the legislation referred to in the preamble does not apply to health matters because there is no treaty in that connection, it is recognized that this question can be dealt with only through the provinces. I am not finding fault with that; I am merely directing attention to it.

I should like to conclude with just one general criticism, and it applies to both the employment section and the insurance section. It is that all these appointments are to be political. At page 278 of Hansard the Prime Minister said it was his intention to make this measure non-political so far as possible. I believe that if it were left entirely to him and he had everything under his own notice that would be the case to a large extent, but unfortunately these things are not done in that way. Local political associations and so on make recommendations. It is true that the umpires must be judges, but other than that this measure presents an opportunity to make a widespread political machine. Not a single appointment is to be made by the civil service commission. Let us begin with the employment officer. He is a local man, and he is to have a local committee to guide him. See section 13. Right there you have the danger of the office being run as a political machine, or the still greater danger of having it referred to as such. Every man who has a job he does not like or want, or any man who does not want a job, will say, "I was discriminated against because I was not on the right side of politics. Otherwise I could have found a better job." Any arrangement about which it is possible to make such remarks is going to be fatal for the men trying to find work under the scheme, fatal to the success of the office and eventually fatal to the government that would take advantage of such an opportunity. I am not making any discrimination as between one political party or another.

Dealing with the unemployment side of the bill, this unemployment advisory committee is going to be appointed and paid by the government. Then there is this commission under section 4, which is to be chosen by the government and whose salaries are to be fixed in the same way. The umpires are to be chosen by the government as well, but they are to be judges, and they are not to be paid. Then there are the chairmen of the courts of referees, who are to be chosen by the government, not even by the commission. Then we have the panels to be chosen to represent employers and contributors, but mark you this: it does not say they are to be chosen by the employers and contributors. They are to be chosen to represent them, and who is to do the choosing? It will be done by the political commission, of course. The panel gives the thing a nice sound of fairness; the panel is to be chosen to represent the employers and contributors; these panels are to be constituted, whatever that means, by the commission and from them shall be chosen the men for the courts of referees. That makes it possible to have a very fair panel, but a real political choice. It would not matter how many men were put on the panel provided the commission were wised up as to whom they should pick out of that panel. That would give a fictitious air of fairness to the thing, yet it might be political from beginning to end. I notice that the chairman and the referee courts are to be paid at the discretion of the committee. Now we come to the insurance officer, another political appointment, but curiously enough under section 28 of the bill no provision has been made to pay him at all. I suggest the section will have to be altered when we reach the committee stage. With the exception of the umpires, all these appointments are to be political. This is simply asking for trouble. The bill we are now discussing is a new departure, and a great deal depends on getting off to a good start, and the way it is handled in the early days of its operation. By attaching to it right at the start this odour of politics it is badly handicapped. I suggest that throughout the country the measure would meet with greater approval if some of those appointments, in fact all of them, were put under the control of the civil service commission.

I hope the government may see fit to amend in committee some of the features I have criticized. Otherwise, on the general principle of the measure, I am prepared to vote for the second reading.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that, apart from the views expressed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) who said he would support the bill, the views expressed by the other hon. gentlemen opposite this afternoon and evening in opposition to the bill are not the views of men at present working in industry. On Saturday last while at home I took the opportunity to speak to foremen of quite a number of large industries in the city of Toronto, a number of which are running twenty-four hours a day. The foremen told me that the men under their charge appear to be heartily in accord with the unemployment insurance proposals offered by this government.

In his observations the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that the recommendations of several committees which had sat during his term of office and had discussed the question of unemployment insurance could not be adopted because of certain circumstances which he indicated. May I say to him however that during the same years in which the right hon. gentleman held office a number of countries throughout the world, some of which may have been labouring under conditions far worse than those obtaining in Canada, did adopt unemployment insurance legislation. Queensland, in Australia, adopted unemployment insurance legislation in 1922, Russia in 1922, Italy in 1923, Poland in 1924, a number of cantons in Switzerland in 1924, Bulgaria in 1925 and Germany in 1927. Each of these states has adopted a compulsory and contributory scheme. Two other countries adopted voluntary schemes, namely Norway in 1922 and Spain in 1923. If those countries in the years I have mentioned could adopt unemployment legislation I cannot see why Canada could not have taken a similar course. I was associated with business between the years 1921 and 1929, and I have knowledge of the fact that a considerable amount of money was made during that time. During the last two or three years in which it held office the late Liberal government permitted certain companies which had made enormous profits to split their stocks. I am not finding fault with the fact that some made profits; but I maintain that if some extra consideration had also been given the workers in those industries the results would have been more advantageous, and perhaps at that time a system of unemployment insurance could have been set up on their behalf.

I shall not give the names of companies, but will be content to say that in 1929 company No. 1 split its stock twenty to one; in 1929 company No. 2 split its stock eight to one; in 1928 company No. 3 split its stock six to one; in 1928 company No. 4 split its stock four to one; in 1929 company No. 5 split its stock four to one, and again in 1929 company No. 6 split its stock four to one.

I was associated with industry for a long time and I have been of the opinion that the men working in the plants were entitled to more than they were getting out of what they were producing. Long ago I concluded that unemployment insurance would be one method by which the workman would receive more than the actual wages he received for his work. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) said, in effect, that the number who would be affected by the bill is not very large. In making that observation I suggest the hon. member should have remembered that at the time the first unemployment legislation was adopted by Great Britain only 2,250,000 were affected out of a total working population of 15,000,000 or 16,000,000. This government undertakes to cover 1,701,834 workers out of a total working population less than twice this number. I say that in that regard this government at the outset has gone much farther than did the first government, namely that of Great Britain, which adopted unemployment legislation.

Lest I forget I should like to refer to something mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) this afternoon, something which filled me with hope. He made reference to taking care of those who are not protected by this measure, and alluded to the fact that he was considering the people not covered by the bill, and to whom reference was later made by the hon. member for North Winnipeg. After all, this bill is essentially an unemployment insurance bill; it is not a relief measure. It is designed to take care of men and women employed in industry who may have to suffer temporary periods of unemployment. In my humble opinion the act covers that situation satisfactorily.

It is a well known fact that in all civilized countries the worker's only source of cash supply for the maintenance of himself and his family in health and comfort is his wages, and that when his wages are stopped because of his being thrown out of work he and his family are at once in economic jeopardy. The average worker in industry and in other vocations has to face not only the menace of being thrown out of work because of lack of work to do, but three other major economic menaces. He may be thrown out of work because of old age; he may be thrown out of work because of invalidity; he may be thrown out of work because of illness. It is for this reason that, in my opinion, on the continent of Europe—because there has been little or no advance in this kind of legislation on the American continent—the great nations help to sustain the purchasing power of their people, as I shall show later, by means of four major acts of social relief. The first is old age pensions, which I shall not discuss because we have the old age pension in this country. But this bill does provide machinery for consideration of factors affecting the national health and perhaps invalidity, and certainly it does take care of the fourth factor, namely, unemployment that results from there being no work for the workers to do.

On motion of Mr. MacNicol the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 13, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

RESIGNATION OF MR. T. L. McEVOY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the recommendation of the Honourable the Speaker with respect to the resignation of T. L. McEvoy, Esquire, a committee clerk, House of Commons, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. EULER:

1. What is the amount of the national debt?
2. What is the amount of the debt of the Canadian National Railways: (a) to the public; (b) to the government?

3. How much, if any, of the amount in the answer to (b) of question No. 2 is included in the national debt given in the answer to question No. 1?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Net debt as shown by transactions passed through the books of the Department of Finance to December 31, 1934, $2,764,964,294.

2. Debt of Canadian National Railways at December 31, 1934 (preliminary figures subject to verification by company's auditors):

(a) To the public		$1,246,330,439
(b) To the government:
Loans	$672,307,663
Accrued interest on loans	459,486,186
Cost to government of Canadian government railways turned over to C.N.R. for management and operation	404,279,909
		$1,536,073,758

3. All of the amount of $1,536,073,758 has been absorbed in the net debt of the dominion with the exception of $42,529,129, made up as follows:

(a) $26,780,208 of loans advanced for capital and refunding purposes in the years 1932, 1933 and 1934.

(b) $15,748,921 included in the cost of Canadian government railways which represents the amount (less repayments) of the open and stores accounts of the Canadian government railways at the time of their transfer to the Canadian National Railways for operation.

Both these items are treated in the public accounts as active assets and are deducted from the gross debt in arriving at the net debt.

BRITISH COLUMBIA RADIO BROADCASTING

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. How many radio licences were collected in British Columbia during the years 1931, 1932, 1933, and 1934?

2. How many broadcasting stations are licensed in British Columbia, of what power and wave length are they, and what are the names and addresses of the respective licensees?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Fiscal year

1931-32	55,534
1932-33	61,368
1933-34	55,978
1934-35, to end December, 1934 (9 months)	67,715

PELEE ISLAND CABLE

Mr. GOTT:

1. When was the cable laid between Kingsville and Pelee island?
2. On whose recommendation?
3. What was the cost of installation?
4. How long was it in service?
5. How many times was the service disrupted while the cable was supposedly in use?
6. Has the Kingsville Pelee island service been abandoned?
7. When was the cable taken up?
8. What was the cost of raising the cable?
9. What was the total cost, including all expenditures, of the Kingsville Pelee island cable?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. October 2, 1927.
2. Assistant general superintendent of government telegraphs.
3. $614.
4. October, 1927, to June, 1933.
5. Nine.
6. Yes.
7. Taken up during summer of 1933 and placed in service on Quebec division.
8. $271.
9. $7,116.07.

PICTOU, N.S., CUSTOMS HOUSE CARETAKER

Mr. DUFF:

1. Has any appointment been made to the vacant position of caretaker of the customs house building at Pictou, Nova Scotia?
2. When were applications to fill this vacancy asked for by the civil service commission?
3. What date was fixed for the receipt of applications by the civil service commission?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. No. Due to the illness of the late incumbent of the position, the department selected a person to carry on the duties of the position temporarily. This was approved by the civil service commission in the absence of eligibles or lay-offs for assignment. Upon the death of the incumbent of the position, the department requested the commission to fill the vacancy. Consequently in order to secure a qualified candidate a competition has been advertised.

2. Posters advertising the competition were sent out on January 25, 1935.

3. February 2, 1935.

BAIE DES HA HA HARBOURMASTER

Mr. ROBERGE:

1. Who was the harbourmaster of the harbour of la Baie des Ha! Ha!, county of Chicoutimi, from 1926 to 1931?
2. On what date was he appointed?
3. On what date was he dismissed and for what reason?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

1. Mr. Georges Henri Lavoie.
2. August 22, 1925.
3. February 23, 1932; for political partisanship.

KAMLOOPS, B. C. POST OFFICE

Mr. HANBURY:

1. Were tenders called for painting the old post office building, Kamloops, British Columbia, during 1932?
2. If so, were such tenders advertised, in what papers, and on what dates?
3. Who were the tenderers, and what was the amount of each tender?
4. Who was the successful tenderer?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes, tenders invited for painting and repairs in November, 1931.

2. No, tenders were invited from: W. J. Moffatt, Pinchbeck & Pinchbeck, Johnston & Company, W. J. Ellis & Company.

3. W. J. Moffat.. .. .. $662
Pinchbeck & Pinchbeck.. 694
Johnston & Company.. 1,135

4. W. J. Moffat.

In July 1932 the resident architect was authorized an amount estimated at $161.50 for painting and repairs to caretaker's quarters. Of this amount the estimate for painting was $108.

BUTTER PRICES

Mr. DUGUAY:

What was the price of butter in England and in Canada, during the months of May and June of the years 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, and 1934?

CHICOUTIMI, QUE. UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. DUGUAY:

1. Has the provincial government paid to the federal government a sum of money spent by the city of Chicoutimi for unemployment relief?

2. If so, what is the amount, and why was it paid?

Mr. GORDON:

1. The federal government received from the province of Quebec repayment of a sum of money on account of relief expenditures made by the city of Chicoutimi.

2. $4,831.72 representing amounts irregularly included in certificates of expenditures previously rendered to and paid by the federal government.

*BLINDNESS AMONG EX-SERVICE MEN

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Has the attention of the government been directed to cases of blindness now developing amongst ex-service men as a result of being gassed during the war?

2. If so, will the government consider the advisability of establishing a specialized medical section of the Department of Pensions and National Health to develop preventive and curative measures as far as possible in such cases?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I can answer this question shortly. The attention of the government has been directed to the possibility of this being the case and they are quite willing to do everything possible that is necessary under the circumstances.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

BRITISH COLUMBIA RELIEF CAMPS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. How many relief camps are there at present in the province of British Columbia?

2. How many single homeless men are there at present in such camps?

3. What was the total cost of operating such camps in 1934?

4. What are the main divisions of such total costs and percentages thereof under headings of food, clothing, supervision, etc.?

5. What is the average per diem per capita cost of operating such camps?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Return tabled herewith.

TRADE SPECIALISTS

Mr. BOULANGER:

What is the number, classifying them by trade as much as possible, of the labourers, tradesmen, foremen, managers, superintendents or directors of factories who have been admitted into Canada in the capacity of specialists in their trade, and for the reason that such specialists were not available in Canada, since the 7th of August, 1930, to date?

QUEBEC FEDERAL AGRICULTURE EMPLOYEES

Mr. FAFARD:

1. What are the names, addresses and the duties of the employees of the federal Department of Agriculture, in the province of Quebec?
2. What is the salary of each?
3. What are the names of those who are bilingual?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Return tabled herewith.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. How much money was appropriated for public works, under the Building and Construction Act of 1934, for the province of British Columbia?
2. What contracts have been let to date, what are the names and addresses of the respective contractors, the amounts of their contracts, the nature of the work and locations of said works?
3. What work has been done by day labour, at what rate of wages per hour in each instance, and at what places has the work been done?

LAND SURROUNDING LÉVIS, QUE., FORTS

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Has the government received offers from private individuals for the rental or purchase of land surrounding the three forts at Lévis, Quebec?
2. If so, from whom?
3. For what amounts?

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What amount has been voted to Mr. O'Meara, chairman, and the two commissioners of the Quebec harbour, in lieu of automobiles taken away from them in the month of August, 1932?
2. What amount was paid for repairs to the Packard automobile used by Commissioner LeBlond, from January, 1932, to August, 1932, either in paint, accessories, mechanism, tires, etc.?
3. How many gallons of gasoline and oil were used from January, 1932, to August, 1932?
4. How was the sale of the Packard automobile used by Commissioner LeBlond made?
5. What amount was paid for same by Commissioner LeBlond?
6. Was the difference in the price of the licence from August, 1932, to February, 1933, reimbursed by Commissioner LeBlond?

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

7. Has the insurance to the amount of $363 been reimbursed by Commissioner LeBlond?
8. Since August, 1932, what quantity of gasoline has Commissioner LeBlond received from the commission?
9. What amount was voted to Commissioner LeBlond for a voyage to Saint John, N.B., on the 27th February, last?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think this question should stand as an order for return and I shall table the information received from the harbour commission.

PENSION APPEALS

Mr. MULOCK:

1. How many appeals for the granting of pensions or for increased pensions of ex-service men remain unheard?
2. If any, how many of the said appeals have been pending for the following lengths of time: (a) three to six months; (b) six to nine months; (c) nine to twelve months; (d) over twelve months; (e) over eighteen months; (f) over twenty-four months?

EX-SERVICE DISABILITY PENSIONS

Mr. MULOCK:

By what amounts have payments on account of ex-service men's disability pension been reduced during the fiscal years 1931 to 1934 inclusive, by reason of, the discontinuance of 6,851 pensions: (a) by reason of death; (b) all other causes?

Mr. MULOCK:

By what amounts have payments on account of ex-service men's disability pensions been reduced during the fiscal years 1931 to 1934 inclusive, by reason of 30,245 pensions being reduced during that period: (a) by reason of death; (b) all other causes?

WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES

Mr. MULOCK:

By what amounts have payments on account of war veterans' allowances been reduced by reason of 2,130 war veterans' allowances being discontinued during the fiscal years 1931 to 1934 inclusive: (a) by reason of death; (b) all other causes?

Mr. MULOCK:

By what amounts have payments on account of war veterans' allowances been reduced by reason of 929 war veterans' allowances being reduced during the fiscal years 1931 to 1934 inclusive?

FARM INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. FERLAND:

1. How many persons own and operate farms in each of the provinces of Canada?
2. What is the total municipal assessment in each province?
3. What is the total amount of mortgage debts on farmers' lands, in each province?

4. How many farmers have borrowed under the Canadian Farm Loan Act, in each province, during the past four years?

5. What amount has been loaned under the said act, in each province, during the past four years?

Mr. BENNETT: I think this question might stand as an order for return.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT—QUEBEC OFFICIAL RECEIVERS

Mr. LAFLECHE:

What are the names of the official receivers appointed in the various judicial districts of the province of Quebec, pursuant to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and what is the postal address of each and the name of the county where they reside?

Mr. RHODES: Return tabled herewith.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DOCTOR DAIGNEAULT

Mr. GAGNON:

For a copy of all documents, letters, telegrams, memoranda and reports, exchanged and submitted between the Department of Agriculture and the different offices of the said department in Montreal, Ottawa, and elsewhere, and any other persons, from July 1, 1930, to February 1, 1935, relating to Doctor Daigneault, an employee of the Department of Agriculture in Montreal.

GRANDE RIVIÈRE, QUE., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BRASSET:

For a copy of all accounts for materials, including stone and iron, and of the paylists in connection with work done by the Department of Public Works at Grande Rivière, Gaspé county, during the years 1932, 1933, and 1934.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS

PROPOSED ROMOVAL OF CUSTOMS DUTIES TO REDUCE PRICE TO FARMERS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the best interests of Canada demand that the burden of customs taxation be lessened on the instruments of production in the agricultural industry and to this end, farm implements and machinery should be free from customs duties.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the house at any length on the introduction of this motion. I think however it would be of interest to recite briefly the history of customs duties as applied to farm machinery, and to point out their detrimental effect upon the farming industry of this country. I do not think there will be any disagreement with the statement that agriculture is the most important occupation of the Canadian people. Nearly half the population of Canada are engaged in agriculture, and if agriculture is not prosperous no industry in the country can be prosperous. Those statements I think will go without challenge. Agriculture has been considered Canada's basic industry, and without giving hon. gentlemen opposite undue credit, all political parties, including hon. gentlemen in the corner, have repeatedly made statements of that character in this house and on the public platforms of the country.

Then I think I am safe in saying that at no time, at any rate since the days of confederation, has agriculture suffered more severely than it has during the past three or four years. I think the anxiety exhibited by the government at this session to try to meet this situation is evidence that they too realize the serious situation in which the agriculturists of Canada find themselves. I do not for a moment agree that the remedies which the government seek to apply are going to bring the necessary relief to agriculture; on the contrary I think that some of their policies are responsible for conditions in which the farmers now find themselves. So far as I have been able to discover there has been no time when there was a wider spread between prices in the secondary industries and agricultural prices than there is now. I am not going into a discussion of tariffs at this time, there will be opportunity for that at some other time. But the effect of the excessive protection granted to secondary industries in the session of 1930-31 has been to widen the spread between the prices of agricultural products and of industrial commodities to an extent never before experienced. Consequently, the prices of goods that the farmers have to purchase in order to carry on their business are far out of line with the prices obtained for the products of the basic industries, and while that statement is true of perhaps all basic commodities it applies in the highest degree to those of agriculture.

This has been an acute political question in Canada ever since I have been interested in politics. Going back to the days of Sir John A. Macdonald—that is a considerable distance—I well remember his enunciation of the national policy; that in the interest of the industrial life of Canada it was necessary that secondary industries be given some protection from products of competing industries outside. At that time the farm machinery business was assisted, if it can be called assistance, by increased tariffs for its protection.

In those days the manufacture of farm machinery was well distributed in the old province of Ontario in which I was then living.

Many of our little towns grew up as a result of the manufacture of farm machinery, and became prosperous communities. Farm machinery is essential to the life of the farm, we are forced to buy it, we cannot carry on our avocation without it. But gradually through the application of that protective policy its manufacture has become concentrated, and the amalgamation of the manufacturing companies has taken place. That was the beginning of the difficulties we are experiencing to-day, not only in connection with the manufacture of farm machinery but also in almost every other avenue of secondary industry. We have had the concentration of wealth and activity, through combines and combinations of those engaged in these industries, in large centres, and gradually the small towns have been deprived of these industries. That is true of other industries as well as the manufacture of farm machinery, and it is becoming even more apparent to-day. I believe implicitly that the application of high tariffs for the protection of these industries has been one of the primary causes of this situation, and has resulted, as it must result, in communities like Toronto, Montreal and other cities growing until they became very large centres of population.

What has been the result? Undoubtedly excessive taxation has been imposed upon these manufacturers in the large cities, because invariably as population increases taxation and living costs go up. I do not believe, for example, that an artisan in the Massey-Harris plant in Toronto can live as cheaply to-day as he could when basic commodity prices were at almost the same level that we find them now. Living costs are higher largely as a result of his residence in communities of this character. I am willing to admit that costs have gone up a little, but the farmer has received no appreciable return for his increased costs in this connection. During the past two or three years he has received the lowest prices known in this country, except in the period from 1890 to 1893. I have a very good recollection of the prices of farm commodities at that time, and they compare rather favourably with the prices of to-day.

Excessive tariffs in connection with secondary manufacturing industries were applied during the regime of Sir John A. Macdonald in order to encourage and protect infant industries, and we were told at that time that as soon as these industries were on their feet they would not require this protection. I believe the statement made at that time by the Conservatives who imposed these tariffs was quite true, as I think it is true to-day, but what has been the result? Not imperceptibly but gradually these combinations have grown and have spread into every avenue of secondary industry in the country while the farmer, despite his efforts at organization and cooperation, finds himself, so far as price levels are concerned, in the position he occupied back in 1890. There does not seem to be very much hope for him. We see his markets being closed daily, and why? The answer is obvious. If we do not buy we cannot sell, and his hope of widening his market and raising his price level does not seem to be very bright either now or for the future. Undoubtedly during the next decade at least we will have a surplus of farm production in this country; no one will deny that. You cannot take half the agriculturists of Canada and tell them they must cease the production of wheat, of cattle or of dairy products, the three most important items of farm production in Canada. No one will deny that this country was made prosperous by the very fact that we did produce these commodities in abundance, and were able to sell them. Hon. gentlemen say we cannot sell them now, that we cannot go into prohibited markets, that we cannot enter markets with higher tariffs than we have, that we are being shut out. Certainly we never will go into any market unless we are prepared to take goods in exchange, and in my opinion that is the rock upon which my hon. friends opposite are wrecking the ship of state to-day.

I should like to take a moment or two to point out the price spread now existing in order to show how it varies with the application of excessive tariffs. Taking the year 1926 as 100, in 1930 farm products stood at 82·3, while manufactured goods were 87·3. In 1931 the price level of farm products dropped to 56·3, while manufactured goods were 74·8. In 1932 farm products dropped again to 48·4 with manufactured goods dropping also, but only to 69·8. In 1933 there was an improvement, and in fairness I must say that there was an improvement again last year, although I am not in possession of the figures. In 1933 farm products went up to 51, but there was a corresponding increase in manufactured goods to 70·2. My argument, Mr. Speaker, is that unless you keep the spread much smaller than is indicated by the figures I have quoted you are bound to have difficulties in the agricultural industry.

Let me give a little personal history, and I will speak only of the years 1907 and 1908. In both those years I was employed as a salesman for the Massey-Harris Company. Wheat in western Canada was selling at 90 cents a bushel for No. 1 hard. We were not getting an excessive price for our wheat. Cattle were bringing about five cents a pound and dairy products were reasonably priced. I was able to sell, and the farmers were able to buy, a Massey-Harris binder for $160 cash, and I am sure any farmer in this house will agree that a Massey-Harris binder of that day was very little different in its construction, its weight, or the contents entering into its manufacture, from the binder of to-day. Corresponding prices prevailed for all the other tillage machinery. It is true that during and after the war prices of farm machinery went up tremendously, almost as high as they are to-day. I do not want my hon. friends to think for a moment that I am going to blame the Conservative government for those increased prices, nor can they blame them on the Liberal party. I simply wish to quote facts in connection with the manufacture and sale of farm machinery. The explanation given at that time was that due to the terrific losses incurred by the farm machinery companies during the war and to the excessive cost of labour, they were forced to increase prices. But, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me that we as agriculturists were in a much better condition to buy, because we had a corresponding price level in the goods we had to sell. During that time, immediately after the war, I sold wheat for $2.40 per bushel. Naturally in those days we did not have the difficult conditions we have to-day. I mention these facts merely to show the exact situation.

I bring the resolution forward to-day for this, among other reasons, that in almost every other line of manufacture there have been drops in the selling prices of goods. Perhaps in some lines there have been slight increases, but generally speaking, with the single exception of farm machinery, the price of goods has dropped. I am not permitted to discuss a matter before the price spreads commission but I believe you would permit me, Mr. Speaker, to observe that the statement made before that commission only a few weeks ago by the representative of a firm manufacturing farm machinery did not lend very much hope to the agriculturists of Canada, and gave them no reason to believe there would be any reduction in the prices of farm machinery. Surely the time has come—in fact, I say the time has long since passed—when there should be a reasonable reduction. The purchaser of an automobile can go into the market to-day and purchase a product much better constructed than the car that was offered in 1926 or 1927 and containing about the same amount of material. I believe hon. members will agree with me that the purchaser of that automobile would enjoy a 30 per cent or 40 per cent reduction, as compared with the prices obtaining in the years I have mentioned. I use this illustration because it more nearly corresponds with the manufacture of farm machinery. A few moments ago I quoted the price of a binder in 1908, and may I say that that price of $160 continued with very little change up until the time we entered the war. What are we asked for the same implement to-day? We are offered a product almost identical in construction, containing no more material than in former days, and are asked well over $280. Hence my desire to bring this matter to the attention of the house.

Then, I have one other reason for speaking at this time. May I observe in passing that I believe the government has done very well, so far as the farmers in the drought stricken areas of western Canada are concerned. I believe they are to be commended for their action. I must say however that they have made a tremendous expenditure of money. Tremendous expenditures have been made for the relief of other agriculturists who are not in circumstances quite so unfortunate, but who, despite all that may be said, are very rapidly approaching bankruptcy. I am not so familiar with the situation in the east, but I believe western members will agree with me when I state that in western Canada we cannot carry on very much longer with our old implements. I defy any hon. member to go to a farm of any size in western Canada which has not long since passed the stage where it should be replacing worn out implements. They are not being replaced, and for the very good reason that the farmer cannot buy them. This year, next year and in following years if the farmers are to till their land at all and if they are to carry on business they will have to buy heavily. It seems to me that by insisting upon excessive prices which they ask of the farmers both in eastern and western Canada the implement companies are standing in their own light. Those farmers are the least able to pay, and I have not hesitated to make that statement.

It may be that hon. gentlemen opposite have in their minds some scheme whereby they will regulate the industry. I do not know about that. Even if the duty were taken off to-morrow I do not believe it would make very much difference to the farm machinery companies. They are so well organized that they are pretty well beyond control, and some other means may have to be taken to control prices. I am willing frankly to admit that. But why does the government persist in leaving those companies behind a 25 per cent tariff which results in placing a burden, and an extreme burden, upon the purchaser? Do not be misled by the statement that on every occasion they do not add the protection. If hon. members wish to have evidence as to that may I point out that the year before last the government put into effect an increased duty on parts. We were buying parts, for the very good reason that we could not afford to buy new machinery. But the moment that order went into effect, up went the price of parts to a point just within the amount of protection afforded. I am asking the government to consider the possibility of removing the duty. It may be that they will have to take some other step, but I can assure them that the added burden of the high cost of machinery will finish the job of breaking the backs of our farmers. If some change is not made there will be bankruptcy right and left.

I do not believe the help extended to the manufacturers of farm implements has done them any good, beyond that of maintaining prices. An investigation of the figures showing the result of the application of duties on farm implements indicates that those duties do not tend to give employment, as hon. members opposite fondly hoped they would. Naturally that must be the result, because they are not doing the business. The following table which I have secured from the bureau of statistics will I suggest serve to indicate it cannot be claimed that by the application of the policies adopted by this government we have helped the employees or the implement companies.

Agricultural Implements Industry

	Employees	Salaries and wages	Gross value of production
1930	7,405	$9,564,069	$26,902,139
1931	4,471	4,997,732	11,175,404
1932	2,758	3,097,975	5,510,078
1933	3,039	3,047,501	5,326,416

The fact is that the business is not to be had. The objection I take is that the manufacturers do not need and never did need the protection they are being given. They were always able to compete. It is a well known fact that farm machinery was sold in Germany and in foreign countries cheaper than it was sold to the Canadian farmer. I do not say that condition exists to-day, because I doubt if there is very much exportation of farm machinery at this time. The farmers feel they should have some relief along these lines, and for that reason I have brought the matter to the attention of the house hoping that there is foundation for the rumours I have heard—probably one should not listen to rumours—to the effect that hon. members opposite are about to change their minds in this connection, and that there is to be a right about face. I hope it is true, because they will have my unqualified support if it is, and that there will be some relief afforded by way of reduction in the duties on farm machinery and the implements of production of other basic commodities. That is to be devoutly hoped for. So far as this particular industry is concerned, looking back at its history and conditions at the present time, for the life of me I cannot conceive that it requires any protection of any sort. I have presented the facts, Mr. Speaker, as briefly as I could, and as I understand that other hon. members are to speak on the motion, I now leave it to the judgment of the house.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at an earlier stage of the session in dealing with a matter touching our relations with another country I put forward the suggestion that it is not the part of wisdom to deal with matters touching our relations with another country when we are in the midst of negotiations with that country. On that occasion my remarks were construed in some quarters to emanate from fear or a feeling of subserviance. As a matter of fact there is nothing further from my mind and nothing could have been further from the mind of the government. The attitude of the government with respect to its full right to take such action as it may deem proper in the interests of Canada in its relations with other countries was plainly manifested by the action that it took in the autumn session of 1930, when there was no hesitation on the part of the government in taking such action by means of the tariff as the government thought wise, and without reference to any repercussions elsewhere. Furthermore, similar action was taken following the empire conference when the agreements were implemented in the autumn session of 1932.

What I had in mind at the time was that to deal with matters which would have a repercussion in another country when you were not in negotiation with that country was one thing, but to do so while you were in the midst of negotiations was an entirely different thing. If the action was in any sense adverse it might very well be regarded as a matter of sharp practice. On the other hand, in disturbing the status quo that existed at the time you entered the negotiations you disturb the situation to the detriment of one party or the other, and I submit that under those conditions you do not make for that happy approach to the problem which ought to be the approach of two parties seeking to effect an agreement which is mutually advantageous.

Having said so much, I do not lean upon the circumstance that my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) in one of his opening remarks indicated, but from another angle altogether I say that it is not the part of wisdom to go into this matter at this time. In one of his opening sentences my hon. friend said: There will come a time when we can discuss tariffs fully. May I submit that while my hon. friend from West Edmonton is entirely within his rights in moving this resolution, he has moved it with reference to a specific article and at a specific time. I submit in all deference that apart from the earlier question which I raised, the proper time to deal with matters of this kind is on the budget, when we are dealing with tariff items.

But there is another consideration. My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has upon the order paper a resolution in very similar terms dealing with the subject of fish, and in the votes and proceedings of to-day there is a notice of motion in similar terms to be moved by my hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell) with respect to the mining industry; and we might go on seriatim. As a matter of fact there would be nothing to preclude every member of the house from moving a specific resolution with respect to every item in the tariff—all to no purpose as far as the accomplishment of the object they had in mind was concerned, and certainly it would impede the business of the house to a very marked extent.

I hope this remark will not be misunderstood. I do not say it in any censorious spirit, but my hon. friend from West Edmonton in the earlier portion of his remarks referred to the circumstance that this has been a political question for many years. It has. But there are two types of political questions. There is the political question in the narrow or party sense, and there is also the more important political question in the wider or national sense. I do say this, that while it may be good party politics to deal with this subject in this manner at this time, in all deference I say that it is poor national politics to do so when it has reference to a trading position concerning our relations with another country.

For the reasons I have indicated I do not propose to deal with the merits of this question. If it is thought desirable that that should be done at this session, it could be done on the budget. Much less do I intend to traverse the ground that has been covered by my hon. friend from West Edmonton, and my reasons will be apparent when I move the amendment to the resolution which I now move without further discussion. I move, Mr. Speaker:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the first line be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> In view of the negotiations now in progress between Canada and the United States with the object of effecting a trade agreement between the two countries, this house is of opinion that public discussion of the rates of duties on the instruments of production in the agricultural industry is untimely and inadvisable.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit with deference that the amendment is completely out of order. It consists of two portions. One is a complete and direct negation of the motion that has been moved by my hon. friend from West Edmonton, and the second portion purports to give reasons for that negation. Now, although it mentions the reason for the amendment I submit that the reason given, the negotiations now proceeding, is no justification for an amendment by way of negation to a resolution properly moved.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, may I submit that this amendment is not a negation. It amends the original resolution and calls for an expression from the house that at the present moment we should not take certain action with respect to a certain subject. I do not propose to traverse the ground because I submit the amendment conforms entirely to the definition of an amendment which says that an amendment must amend. We do amend by leaving a portion of the original resolution and we alter the sense of the expression of the house with respect to the subject matter by the character of the amendment itself.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not rise to speak to the amendment except to say to my hon. friend that if it will assist the discussion, which is bound to follow if this motion is declared in order, and if the Minister of Finance believes that it will be detrimental to any negotiations pending to continue the discussion, we are quite willing to forego our desire for a discussion at this moment, and we will move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. RHODES: I appreciate exceedingly the suggestion made by my hon. friend and I think he is approaching the matter in the spirit in which I think it should be dealt with and in which I should desire to see it approached, from the point of view of the public interest. Of course, the amendment would not preclude discussion; the debate could proceed. It is not necessary, so far as that point is concerned, for His Honour to give an immediate ruling on the point of order; but I submit, in view of the suggestion made by my hon. friend, that of necessity, in our negotiations with the United States, we shall be dealing with tariff items which must have reference to the numerous articles which would in all probability be covered in a discussion of these various resolutions dealing with these matters. And in the nature of things, if discussion must be had upon it, it would be far wiser to have it after these negotiations had been concluded than it would be to prejudice their successful conclusion in advance. It does not preclude the matter being fully discussed by parliament and such action being taken as might be deemed best; but it does, I suggest, in the national interest, cause us to pause and ask ourselves whether it is wise for us to negotiate, as it were, with respect to certain articles in the open market place under these conditions. It would be good judgment, I think, bearing in mind the circumstances that there will be plenty of opportunity, on the budget or otherwise at a later stage, to discuss the matter, not to continue the discussion now.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is our desire on this side of the house to assist the government in every way possible. We reserve the right to be critical, of course. That is our right, and we have a perfect right to place on the order paper motions that are in order and to discuss them. That we intend to do. At the same time, if the minister feels, as he has just now announced, that it will be prejudicial to any pending negotiations which will be of benefit to the Canadian producers—at least, I should hope they would be—then I am content to ask my seconder to adjourn the debate; that is, on the understanding that the minister withdraws the amendment.

Mr. RHODES: It would be competent to adjourn the debate, with the amendment attached. It is not necessary to dispose of it now, but I am content to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) and withdraw the amendment, reserving the right to move it again, on the understanding that the debate on the main motion be adjourned at the present time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How can this matter be discussed on the budget if this motion and the amendment are on the order paper?

Mr. RHODES: There need not be any difficulty on that point, because if it is deemed wise to discuss the matter at that stage we can have the order discharged, and I should be content to have that done, bearing always in mind the main consideration of which I have spoken, namely, the question as to the status of the negotiations at that time.

Amendment withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. McKenzie (Assiniboia) the debate was adjourned.

MOTOR VEHICLE ACCIDENTS

PROPOSED AMENDMENT AND RECONSTRUCTION OF FEDERAL LAWS TO PROVIDE FURTHER SAFEGUARDS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto) moved:

In view of the very rapid and appalling number of accidents, deaths, and injuries, on Canada's highways from motor vehicles;

And whereas many recommendations and resolutions are being passed by judges, magistrates, coroners, and grand juries, and the press all over Canada calling for reforms and action by parliament and for more drastic regulation and legislation to safeguard the public;

And whereas these annual losses are a direct challenge to modern civilization and social and industrial society;

Therefore be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house an adequate inquiry and survey as aforesaid should be made immediately with a view this session to a rewriting and reconstruction of existing federal legislation, and to have clauses placed in the criminal code to help check and stop this great loss of life.

He said: The object of this resolution is the same as the purpose of a bill which I introduced in the session of 1929-30, to amend the criminal code, having regard to the terrible loss of life on the highways of this country.

In my opinion there should be a department of transport in Canada. Six years ago in Great Britain a committee of both houses of parliament was appointed to study the same question over there and they sat for three sessions, going fully into the matter, with the result that a ministry of transport has been established. There they have been introducing some reforms. It seems to me that, in view of the wide stretch of territory in the provinces, there should be a dominion department for the whole country, because we have at present many provincial departments dealing with this question and the laws are all different, as are the returns. No united effort is being made to cope with the question.

No one of independent mind will doubt for a moment that the condition of motor traffic in Canada on our highways is as discreditable to this country as were the effects of prohibition in the United States, which led to such politics and lawlessness in that great country. I submit that this problem of motor statistics must be approached with an open mind, and I doubt whether any hon. member in this house has examined the statistics as they should be. If he did he would be horrified at the disclosures. No doubt hon. members have studied the problem, but I do not think that generally speaking they appreciate its importance. If we do not look at the facts with an open mind we are not likely to see the truth in its real gravity.

It is one of the commandments of God that no one shall kill or do murder, and there is a second commandment with respect to one's duty to one's neighbour, and these commandments have been violated. So there is the question of selfishness. Pope says "Worth makes the man," and human life should be respected on our highways. Many men of real worth, through selfishness and carelessness, have violated the laws not only of God but of man as well in motor slaughter. No other invention has contributed more to the education, pleasure and enjoyment of the people than has the motor car, but its use is one thing; its abuse is another. As with every great invention, use and abuse are two distinct things. During the past century scientific discoveries in medicine, preventive medicine, chemistry, biochemistry and physics have resulted in untold good to humanity, but the abuse of some of these discoveries, for instance in chemistry, biochemistry and physics, has in war proved a curse to mankind, and so to-day the abuse of the motor car is a curse to humanity. On looking into this question one finds that it involves terrible annual losses in deaths, accidents, injuries and financial losses as well. It causes untold sorrow and suffering, intense pain and grief exceeding anything the human imagination can conceive. The only evils which have equalled it are plague, pestilence and famine, battle, murder and sudden death. When I read in the papers of the terrible occurrences on our highways I begin to doubt whether I am living in a Christian country, and the same applies to England and the United States because the deaths that are caused are unjustifiable homicides. I have seen in some of our homes the widows, the orphans and the fatherless suffering and they cry out to this parliament to do something to relieve this situation. Disasters of this nature happen in every constituency in this country. I am not here to decry the motor car industry. It would be misleading and mischievous to attribute all the blame for all the ghastly horrors that are occurring on our highways to those who drive and use motor cars, but pretty nearly fifty per cent is due to motor car owners who misuse their cars. There is no dispute about this because facts are facts and one has to study the records to know the facts. As I study the record of thousands of cases of deaths in this country I am driven to the conclusion that beyond dispute a large portion of this is to the discredit of motor car owners. This small minority appear to have exploited for their pleasure or profit the generous tolerance of others by using their cars in an irresponsible, careless, cruel, and, I might say, unchristian way. Their fault is grievous and they can have no ground for complaint if they are to be put under further restraint so far as the criminal code is concerned. Ignorance and thoughtlessness are but small palliation. Obedience is the only reparation they can make and it is long overdue.

I should like to quote what the late Chief Justice Meredith of the common pleas division said while addressing a grand jury at the assizes at London. He had been forty years on the bench and one of the ablest judges; he presided over more jury trials in Ontario than any other judge. The present provisions of the criminal code are inconsistent. Everyone knows that sections 284 and 285 of the code, which for some years have been the law of Canada with regard to motor accidents, are too uncertain and inconsistent to secure a verdict in any court in this country. Justice Meredith said in charging the grand jury:

> And as now nearly everyone is a car owner and car driver, young and old of all sorts and conditions, it is difficult to get justice in even a civil action. Car-driver-jurors have nearly all the speed fever; and self preservation instincts are so strong that they will not be persuaded to decide against drivers who have been no more unlawful than they themselves often, if not commonly, are.

What then is the remedy? I think it should be: make the laws plain and reasonably severe and enforce them; and cancel licences freely.

And at the other end of the matter: Give no licence to anyone who is not proved to be mentally and physically, and from experience and a knowledge of the highway laws, thoroughly capable.

As I say, it would be far better if this were entirely a federal problem. All we can do here is to put sections into the criminal code. That is the trouble with the British North America Act. No problem in Canada can be solved as long as that act remains in its present state. As I said in the house the other day, it is nothing but a passing-the-buck act; that is all it ever was and ever will be. We want the British North America Act for the living and not for the dead.

One feature of this particular scandal of the slaughtering on the highways of this country of men, women and children is the general public indifference to the matter. Apart from the official collection of data on the subject, efforts to check the evil are a glorious fiasco; the net result is indifference. I find it hard to explain this. The people seem to lack interest. Human life on our highways should be sacred.

May I refer for a moment or two now to three countries: the United States, England and Canada. In the city from which I come the number of people knocked down since the first of the year would fill up the whole House of Commons, two hundred and forty-five seats. I have seen people knocked down on the streets of my city. I was chairman of the board of police commissioners of Toronto for seven years and a member of the council for seventeen years, and the enforcement of traffic takes up about sixty per cent of the time of the police force, leaving about forty per cent of the men to look after protection of life and property in their ordinary duties to protect society. That shows how acute this problem is. In the newspapers one sees a great deal about a trial down in New Jersey in connection with a terrible tragedy involving the kidnapping and death of a young child, with all its sorrow and grief to a splendid family and all its advertising on both sides of the line. In the United States in five years 125,000 people have been killed and nearly 4,000,000 people injured on their highways. Twice the number of people killed in the war in the United States expeditionary force have been killed on the fine highways and roads they have in that country.

[Mr. Church.]

I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in the house; he has been most capable in trying to secure through his department relief for this problem. A return entitled Highways and Motor Vehicles in Canada, prepared by our bureau of statistics, shows the different provinces have different laws and administer them with varying degrees of strictness. We have the returns in better shape than have the provinces, but the figures do not tally; they put some people in as injured who have afterwards died. This shows the necessity for a federal department.

I pass now to England, which is supposed to have the finest highways in the world for tourist traffic. In England in the last five years 34,484 persons have been killed and 973,782 injured in accidents on their roads. As the years pass by the tendency is for the evil to increase, notwithstanding the great amount of attention directed to it, unless a drastic reform is brought about in that country. They have had a committee of both houses studying the problem for weeks and months, and the committee brought down a recommendation as to measures that should be taken for the protection of the public. The first duty of a government is to look after the health, safety, peace and prosperity of its people. If a foe invaded this country we would not sit around talking about it but would mobilize all our resources and equipment to drive the invader out. At the battle of Queenston Heights only eighteen men were lost, while in the city I come from sixty-four were killed last year alone, almost four times the number killed in the battle of Queenston Heights. The tables indicate that in England there is an annual slaughter of seven thousand, and two hundred thousand more are maimed. Such a situation is intolerable to any sane and civilized nation. Yet it has been going on for more than a decade. I have here the figures for the years 1929 to 1933:

Year	Number killed	Number injured
1929..	6,696	170,917
1930..	7,305	177,895
1931..	6,691	202,119
1932..	6,667	206,450
1933..	7,125	216,401
Totals.. ..	34,484	973,782

I have been impressed with the fact that with the rapid increase in the number of motor vehicles in the past ten years there has been an accompanying increase in the number of accidents. Yet one finds little or no interest in the matter among motor drivers. It is said that accidents are inevitable, we are told they are the outcome of modern progress and the desire for speed. It seems that everyone has got the speed fever except the House of Commons, and probably the Senate, although they wake up and get the speed fever in the last week of the session. As Chief Justice Meredith said, we live in an age when everything is on the rush. You go down the street and you see a sign, "One Minute Lunch." Something is needed to strike the imagination of the people, to make them realize what is going on. For instance the figures I gave relating to England for the five years equal forty-seven per cent of all the men killed in the great war on the British side, almost half of all the men of the British expeditionary force killed on land and sea and in the air. One of the leading reports to both houses of parliament in the transport cases says that the number of injured would suffice to line the route from London to Bournemouth in ranks two deep on each side, and to furnish driver and guard to every bier in a funeral procession which would occupy the whole route in double column; and there would still remain two armies of twenty thousand each, to take care of strategical points. The same report also stated that a modest estimate of the personal damage inflicted in the five years would be well over £50,000,000. A situation such as this calls for united effort from the church, the press, parliament, the legislatures and boards of trade and chambers of commerce and all public bodies. The privation and sorrow, the broken lives and shattered homes resulting from such a holocaust are just as real as at the time of the nation's supreme trial in the war. They are hidden and suffered in silence, but how long will that continue to be so?

There are three features that appear to dominate in the conduct of motor traffic, namely a domineering indifference to the convenience of others, excessive speed, and congestion. Ever since man learned to direct a machine more powerful than himself he has asserted his superiority of force over his neighbours. "Make way or take the consequences" has been his cry. Yet this indifference to others is limited to a small number of motor drivers. The motor leagues of the provinces make the same complaint, it is a small number out of the large body of drivers who transgress, ninety-nine per cent of them respect and obey the law. The majority of motor drivers have only a hazy knowledge of the mechanism of their machine, yet if perfect control is to be assured the only condition in which a car is fit to be driven at thirty miles an hour is perfect adjustment and condition. Even so the machine is potentially as dangerous as a loaded gun and must be handled with equal care and vigilance. A moment's inattention may be fraught with dire results. Every motor vehicle is a dangerous implement even when controlled by the most expert, and requires incessant vigilance in all circumstances, especially at speeds above thirty miles an hour. Intense congestion on the roads, especially in the large towns and on main roads during holidays, has greatly increased the risks for all users of the roads.

In France there are 3·9 motors per mile of road, in Germany 6·3, in the United States of America 8·8, and in England, 13. As the bulk of the traffic is concentrated about the large towns the density in those neighbourhoods is still greater.

Coming to Canada, I just had time to look at one province in particular. Ontario has the largest number of motor vehicles, and I think the returns would surprise any hon. member. The figures show the ages of the deceased and of the person who caused the accident, the month, day and hour at which the accidents took place and many other features. A study of such returns would enable legislation to be improved. I shall not weary the house by going into them at length; as I say the records should be studied. In Ontario in one year there were 9,241 accidents and 525 deaths. More than twice the number of members of this house were killed in Ontario in one year. Six accidents resulted in death to one or more persons; thirty-four accidents resulted in injury to one or more persons. More than half the accidents in this province occurred in cities, but less than one-third of the fatalities resulted from accidents occurring in cities. The king's highway accounted for 32·8 per cent of all fatal accidents and for half of the deaths resulting from the 9,241 accidents in Ontario. The accidents were divided as follows: In cities, 5,160; in towns, 518; in villages, 99; on the king's highways, 2,049, and on township roads, 515. Of the deaths 165 occurred in cities, 37 in towns, 16 in villages, 172 on the king's highways, 77 on cement roads and 58 on township roads. Of the 9,241 accidents 5,777 occurred on urban roads and 3,464 on rural roads. Of 4,159 accidents studied in Ontario, 881 resulted from speed too fast for road and traffic conditions; 1,069 from driving on the wrong side of the road; 663 when the driver did not have the right of way; 240 from cutting in; 50 from passing a standing street car; 40 from passing on the curve of a hill; 30 from passing on the wrong side; 141 from a failure to signal; 22 from cars running away, and 1,023 from drivers going off the travelled highway.

From this study it will be seen that approximately 67 per cent of all accidents reported were attributable to drivers. Driving on the wrong side of the road, driving off highways, driving too fast and cutting in were the main causes. Of 2,989 cases I investigated the causes were as follows: Crossing at street intersections with signal, 75; against signal, 105, and where there was no signal, 350; crossing between intersections, 559; waiting for or getting off street cars, 97; standing in safety zone, 4; getting on or off vehicles, 58; children playing on street, 884; men at work on highway, 76; riding or hitching on vehicles 63; walking on highway, 143; coming from behind parked vehicles, 286; crossing highway, 129, and while on the sidewalk, 107. In my own city of Toronto the other day one of our leading business men was walking along the street; a car ran up on the sidewalk and knocked him down, and he was killed instantly. It will be seen from the figures I have given that one of the greatest causes of accidents is the practice of letting children play on the street, or allowing children to dart from behind a parked car or cross between intersections. Where there are no sidewalks pedestrians generally walk on the left side of the roadway, facing the traffic, and accidents are fewer. Poor visibility is also a contributing factor to many accidents.

Then just a word as to the time when these accidents occur. The peak of all accidents on highways is from five to six o'clock in the afternoon, and about twenty-five per cent of the accidents occur between five and eight o'clock in the evening. By the days of the week accidents are evenly divided from Sunday to Friday, with a sharp rise on Saturday, especially in the summer time. There are more accidents on Saturdays and Sundays between six and seven o'clock in the evening, while pedestrian accidents are more frequent on urban roads on Saturday. These accidents occur more often on rural roads on Sundays, while during the summer the greater proportion of the accidents occur over weekends. The late Mr. Justice Hodgins, in his report on compulsory insurance, recommended compulsory, adequate and uniform methods of accident reporting; the collection and analysis of accident and traffic statistics; the study of accident causes and trends, and of traffic problems and regulations. What he meant was that the acquisition of knowledge must be the basis of intelligent regulation. He urged the following reforms:

(a) Education, embracing definite causes of accidents, and the need of preventive action on the part of the individual, and of law enforcing.

(b) A better means of observing and aiding the effectiveness of various restrictive measures.

(c) Better attention of highway employees on existing highways and their connections.

(d) Safety education and advertising, by advertising billboards, and safety teaching especially in primary and secondary schools, teaching the rules of the road and safe driving to those of the children who are approaching or who are of driving age, and maintaining and endeavouring to stimulate public interest in the accident situation.

The 9,241 accidents, resulting in 525 deaths, occurred during the following months:

	Accidents	Deaths
January	462	17
February	411	30
March	380	22
April	626	36
May	839	42
June	857	55
July	877	36
August	1,022	72
September	973	57
October	1,026	55
November	821	56
December	947	45

These accidents occurred at the following points:

Street intersections	3,084
Detour streets	2,442
Rural intersections	358
On straight road	2,103
Private driveway	239
Curve	465
Hill	277
At level railway crossing	157
On bridge	115
Not stated	1

In 98·5 per cent of these accidents road conditions were said to be good. More than half of all accidents occurred during daylight; 8·7 per cent occurred at dusk and 34·4 per cent at night. Of the drivers involved in 13,336 accidents in Ontario, 12,561 were male and 775 female. The ages of the drivers in these accidents were as follows:

Under 18 years	273
18 to 24	2,492
25 to 54	6,097
55 and over	642
Not stated	3,832

The experience of the drivers involved was as follows:

Less than 3 months	168
3 to 6 months	135
6 to 12 months	65
1 year or more	8,651
Not stated	4,317

The condition of the drivers involved was as follows:

Intoxicated	137
Physical defects	13
Extreme fatigue	49
Normal	13,137

The fact that 98·25 per cent of the drivers were reported normal at the time of the accident suggests that accident causes are mainly mental rather than physical, and the need of sobriety when driving cannot be too strongly urged especially now that in Ontario we have so many beverage rooms. Many firms who see the hazard of mental and physical fatigue limit the daily mileage and hours of work of their drivers. If private drivers would follow this example accidents would be fewer, and I believe there should be a federal law to this effect. In the nine years from 1923 to 1931 there were 3,654 fatalities in Ontario. In 1931 there were 571 fatalities, classified as follows:

Motor vehicle drivers	122
Motor vehicle passengers	152
Pedestrians	255
Motor cycle drivers	15
Motor cycle passengers	5
Bicyclists	18
Other persons, and drivers of horse drawn vehicles	4

Two types of accidents occur more frequently than others, that is, collisions with pedestrians and collisions between motor vehicles. It is very evident that the human element is the preponderant factor in motor vehicle accidents, and education must be largely depended upon to improve the situation. Transportation should be a means to an end and not, as has become fashionable now, an end in itself. When it is remembered that there were over 200,000 accidents in England, with more than 6,000 people killed, I think it will be agreed that it is time for legislation. I think the time has come for this parliament to have a survey made of the whole situation, and I would advocate such a step being taken. I am only speaking as a private member, but I have seen the horror of mothers and little children when men have been brought in from the morgue, and something should be done. As I have said, we should have a federal department to deal with this problem, a department which in Canada has been long overdue. How we have managed thus far to get along without one I do not know.

There is one other feature to which I should like to refer. Mechanical road transportation is bankrupting the great Canadian railway systems and exterminating legitimate and highly economic horse transport, not on its merits, but because it has rendered the public highways unfit for horses. Mechanical road transports and aerial transports are enormously subsidized, not only by the public at large but by those competing forms of unsubsidized transport which are being reduced to bankruptcy by subsidized competition on the roads, by the increase in their rates, and taxes for the reconstruction and maintenance of the roads.

Millions of tons of heavy goods are being moved uneconomically by foreign oil, instead of economically and without the aid of public funds by British and Canadian coal. Few people will dispute that the foregoing evils have very definitely attached themselves to the post-war world of transport, and few will regard it as an exaggeration to describe as chaos the state of affairs that is developing under our very nose. How are we meeting the situation, which will soon reach the state of emergency? Stated shortly, we will meet it by experiments, palliatives and increased road subsidies. Each interest involved advances proposals which will leave their own particular interests unaffected even though they are not definitely advanced. Thus we have the clamour for more and bigger roads, involving countless millions of dollars in construction and future upkeep. Some go so far as to advocate the conversion of certain railway tracks into motor speedways. Others urge the compulsory dismissal of all but motor vehicles from the public highways, and as a cure for the growing congestion and rising death rate an increase of speed and the removal of all restrictions. Others again suggest an increase in traffic signallers, and even a special traffic police force at the expense of the public, so that the regular police may attend to their proper duties.

I urge that we should have a federal department, because we are competing with our own national railways. I suggest the law in point is set out in sections 285 and 286, and the amendments made in 1930 have created greater doubt than ever before. It is almost impossible to convict a man to-day. One may go out on the highway, kill a man with his motorcar, and after the trial walk out of the court scot free. Judges and juries are complaining, and I believe the time has come when we must give some protection to the people of all the provinces in the dominion. If some action is not taken we will continue to have these thousands and thousands of people killed, or wounded and placed in hospitals. Now is the time to take the action I have suggested. Due to the loss of life for which motor traffic has been responsible, together with the personal injuries and damages which have been suffered and the financial losses sustained I say that we have in this motion one of the most important problems of these days.

In the session of 1930 I introduced a bill to bring our law in line with the law of the United States, and particularly that of the state of New York. In that state they have an offence known as involuntary homicide and I suggested we should accept their law. Even a person operating a car may not have been altogether liable, and although the man who was killed may have contributed to the accident, the driver of the car may be convicted of this offence, and for the past ten years the offence of involuntary homicide has been known in the state of New York. Under the penalty he may be forbidden to operate a car not for fifteen or twenty days, but for two or three years. In that state they are trying to do something to curb this long list of motor fatalities.

It may be that the government would not consider sending this matter to a house committee. We have very capable ministers who would do well to take notice of the report which I now hold in my hand. This is the report of police officials in Canada, and is signed by General Draper of Toronto, Chief Joliat of Ottawa and Mr. Barnes of Montreal, together with Inspector Grant of the provincial police in Toronto. This report contained in thirty pages makes suggestions which would be sufficient to cope with the situation. If a house committee has not time to consider the matter I suggest a royal commission could be appointed and instructed to make findings regarding this problem.

In my native city of Toronto I have been in homes when the bodies of bread winners have been brought in, and I have witnessed the suffering of the women and children. The bread winner may go out in the morning to attend to his work, and before six o'clock he may be brought home or be lying on a slab in the morgue. No wonder the city of Toronto has had to enlarge the city morgue. Then we must consider the expense to which the municipalities are being put to enforce traffic regulations. Sixty per cent of the time of police officials is taken up in the enforcement of traffic regulations. I live in a residential district where we do not have occasion to see many policemen—it may be because we are law abiding people—but it is altogether possible that those policemen are doing their duty on traffic work. Hardly any time is left for the enforcement of other laws and for protecting the life and property of the people of the city.

[Mr. Church.]

In this House of Commons we have to-day a government of reform, a progressive government, a government which is ready to get down to business, and ready to get a new deal for the average man. I should like to hear where the Liberal party stands on this particular question, and it would be interesting to know how hon. members in the corner of the chamber receive this resolution. Steps should be taken to protect the life of the average citizen. I am not here to attack the motor industry; I am a protectionist of protectionists. I believe the motor industry is a credit to our country, and has made a great contribution to the general education of our people. But the abuse of the privilege of operating motor cars has resulted in one-half of one per cent of the people on our highways going out and committing murder, because that is all it is. It does not make any difference how the man is killed; he dies, anyway. What is the difference whether he dies from a motor car accident or from a pistol shot fired by a burglar; he dies, anyway.

We are twenty years behind the time in our laws respecting motor cars, and we are suffering the penalty. I am of the opinion there should be some reforms in our jury system; about one-third of the jury should be women. I believe they would be more competent than some of the men I have seen on juries. The time has come for jury reform. Women may now sit in the high court of parliament and in the Senate. Probably the Senate would be the proper place to consider this matter. Certainly the Senate in Washington got some relief from many of the evils. The matter should not be left to over-worked cabinet ministers who sit on the front benches, and who are working day and night to relieve the situation under which our people have been placed.

Since 1930 this government has been investigating the problems affecting the people. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has been most active, and so has the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I have been asked to bring this matter before the House of Commons, and I promised three or four widows in my constituency, after seeing the condition in which they had been placed, that I would place the matter before this chamber, as I did on former occasions in 1928, 1929 and 1930.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the speech which has been delivered by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) is a tribute to his industry and public spiritedness. I am glad he has seen fit to bring to the attention of the house the appalling situation which has existed for a number of years throughout the world in regard to accidents upon the highways of various countries. I sincerely trust his remarks and the statistics he has placed before hon. members will come to the knowledge of the attorneys-general of the various provinces of the dominion, in order that they may study the situation in the light which the hon. member has pictured it to-day.

There can be no doubt the situation is serious beyond words, and we regret that in each succeeding year it becomes more serious. In every civilized country the question has been carefully studied with the view of improving the alarming situation. But it is rather disconcerting to learn that notwithstanding all the efforts which have hitherto been put forth, the record of accidents shows an increase rather than a decrease. Fortunately or unfortunately there are limitations placed upon this parliament in regard to dealing with such matters, and as the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) has very pertinently pointed out, practically the only remedy which can be applied by this parliament is in regard to enactments in the criminal code. All highway traffic in Canada is directly under the control of the various provinces of Canada, but the punishment of offences which are in the nature of crime is under the jurisdiction of this parliament. I waited patiently through the remarks of my hon. friend from East Toronto to see if he had a practical suggestion to offer for the amendment of the criminal code in respect to negligence or in respect of accidents arising from the result of negligence in regard to highway traffic, but the only suggestion I gathered from his language was that the various clauses of the criminal code should be stiffened up, as he put it, and that a new system should be introduced whereby women should be permitted to serve upon the juries. Well, these suggestions are worthy of consideration, but I may tell my hon. friend that in other countries where experiments have been made in increasing penalties under the criminal law beneficial results have not followed. Unfortunately, notwithstanding the heavy penalties imposed in various countries, the record of accidents shows a substantial increase year by year.

The provisions in the criminal code in my judgment are fairly adequate at the present time, but I do not believe that such accidents can be greatly lessened by penal legislation. I believe the only improvement that will ever come about will be by a process of education. That is the view taken in the United States by many men who have made a close study of the question, and that is the view of the committees in the British House of Commons. We know that a campaign of education in regard to motor traffic is going on at the present time in various countries in the world. They utilize moving pictures for the purpose; they utilize sign-boards for the purpose; they also deliver lectures for the purpose; but at the present time this educational process has not produced any very marked result.

The criminal code in this country provides by section 284, which was cited by my hon. friend from East Toronto:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, by any unlawful act, or by doing negligently or omitting to do any act which it is his duty to do, causes grievous bodily injury to any other person.

That is a very broad and general section, applicable to all kinds of negligence which causes grievous bodily harm to any person, and the penalty prescribed is a penalty of two years imprisonment. Does the house think that if the penalty were made five years imprisonment or ten years imprisonment it would improve conditions on the highways? I doubt it very much.

The next section of the criminal code is 285. This pertains particularly to motor car traffic. It provides a penalty of two years imprisonment in the case of anybody who is found guilty of wanton or furious driving, or racing or other wilful misconduct, or who by wilful neglect, does or causes to be done any bodily harm to any person, and subsection 4 of this section is the one which is so frequently before our courts. It provides additional penalties for anyone in control of a motor car who is intoxicated or under the influence of any narcotic drug.

I have heard it argued that these penalties should be increased, some people say up to life imprisonment. We have a clause in the criminal code which permits a charge of manslaughter to be laid in case of accidents through negligence which result in death. In any case where in the opinion of the crown prosecutor the facts are such as to warrant an indictment for manslaughter, that indictment is laid under the present law as it stands under the criminal code. But in many cases crown prosecutors feel that it would not be proper to lay a charge of manslaughter where the facts in regard to the accident or the happening would not warrant such a charge. When a man is charged with manslaughter and found guilty of the offence judges in our country have a very wide discretion as to the sentence which they may impose. A man may be convicted of manslaughter and the judge may fine him a shilling or send him to penitentiary for life.

There is a very wide discretion left to our judges in that respect, but under sections 284 and 285 which I have just read to the house the charge is not one of manslaughter but merely one of criminal negligence, and under sections 284 and 285 the majority of charges are laid in regard to highway accidents. It does not require the death of the unfortunate person to found a charge under sections 284 or 285, but if death ensues, charges may be laid under these two sections where the penalty is only two years' imprisonment. Would it, in the opinion of the house, serve any useful purpose to increase these penalties? I doubt it very much. I would not be adverse to trying it out, but I am told that in certain parts of the United States where the penalties have been increased there has been a constant increase in motor car accidents, and so it has proved in England. They have tried in Great Britain to remedy the situation by alteration of the speed limit laws; they have permitted the speed limits to be increased and decreased, but year by year the accidents increase, notwithstanding the changes that have taken place in the law. It is for that reason that I am rather driven to the conclusion that only by a process of educating the public, by teaching motor car drivers the use of care and caution and the courtesy of the road as it is called, will any improvement eventually take place.

It is appalling, it is worse than appalling, to contemplate the number of deaths that are taking place every year in our own country from motor car accidents—550 deaths in the province of Ontario from motor car accidents last year. It is appalling, and some remedy must be found for a situation of that kind. But when one has regard to the fact that all traffic laws are under the jurisdiction of the province, that all the licensing of motor car drivers is under the jurisdiction of the province, that all questions of speed limit, crossing regulations and the like are under the jurisdiction of the province, there is not much which this parliament can do save by increasing the penalties under the criminal code.

We have done what we can in investigating the causes of accidents. The statistical branch of this government has gathered very valuable statistics in regard to accidents on Canadian highways, and I assume it was from this report that my hon. friend quoted to-day. The railway department is carrying on a very serious investigation in regard to accidents at railway crossings, but their jurisdiction is limited in that respect. Then in those provinces in which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have any authority, in the six provinces in Canada where they are entitled to operate, they make a very close study of the question of motor car accidents and highway traffic; but in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia that force has no such authority. If I thought that any good would result from an investigation before a committee I would welcome the proposal in this resolution that this matter go to a committee. I cannot see anything that this parliament can do save to amend the criminal code, but if any practical suggestions are made for an amendment to the code I shall be glad to consider them with the idea of including them in an amending bill this session. I must say however that my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Church) has not advanced in concrete form any suggestion for amendment to the code which to my mind has any practical value. I should like the discussion to continue however. Something may develop upon which we may seize before the discussion is concluded. I am quite open to receive all suggestions for amendments to these motor traffic clauses of the criminal code if any satisfactory amendments can be suggested.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I quite agree with what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has said, but from my observations I am inclined to think that the first thing to be done is to stiffen the law as regards automobiles crossing at level crossings, because that is where the greatest danger lies. We read of accidents to buses carrying children to and from schools and carrying workmen. The other day in British Columbia a number of workmen comprising a relief gang were travelling in a bus which was struck by a passing train. These accidents happen daily.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is where the provinces pass laws.

Mr. MARCIL: But is there no possibility of placing in the code some provision that will make it an offence for anyone in charge of an automobile not to stop at a crossing? That is where the difficulty lies at the present time. If you could compel people to stop at these crossings, if you could compel them to observe the law, the number of accidents would greatly diminish.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): This question, as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) indicates, trenches upon the railways, but I do think that the proposal which he brings forward is entirely provincial. At the present time the province of Quebec has a regulation which provides that motorists shall stop at railway crossings, and I assume that the enforcement of that injunction is in the hands of the province. So far as I know, that is the only province in which there is such a law.

I think the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) deserves the appreciation of the house and its support for this resolution, because the loss of life not only in this country but throughout the world is appalling in consequence of motor traffic, whether the vehicles are privately or publicly owned. The other day I observed in the press that the number of deaths in the United States in the past year was, if I remember rightly, 33,000. That struck me at the time, because I happened to remember that in the battle of Marengo, Napoleon had 30,000 men. In other words, his entire army was 3,000 less than the number of people who had been killed in the United States in one year in motor accidents.

I wish to make just two observations which may be of interest to hon. members, because this whole question concerns us all. These observations refer to level crossings and to the interprovincial conference which was held in Ottawa a year ago at my request to consider questions relating to motor traffic. Let me first discuss the question of level crossings, because after all a great many accidents take place throughout Canada at these level crossings, of which there are about 30,000 that have neither an overhead bridge nor a tunnel. This dominion in 1909 instituted the level crossing fund, to which the dominion government has been contributing $200,000 per annum, a fund which is administered by the board of railway commissioners, its purpose being to assist in the elimination of level crossings. Unfortunately, for the first few years of its existence, very few cities took advantage of the fund, with the result that a considerable sum accumulated. Suddenly however cities throughout the country learned about the fund—apparently they had not previously been aware of its existence—and they began to apply in such large numbers that to-day the fund is over-spent, or over-promised if I may use that term, so that $200,000 per annum is found inadequate. Since this government came into power it has twice advanced increases. In 1931 we advanced an additional $500,000 towards the fund, under the unemployment relief legislation and in 1932, we advanced another $500,000.

Mr. SPENCER: What percentage does the federal government contribute towards these undertakings?

Mr. MANION: There is no fixed percentage; it depends on the allotment made by the board of railway commissioners after inquiry. They can give up to forty per cent and as high as $100,000, but not higher than that sum, for one elimination. The amount used to be $25,000 up to 1929, and then it was raised to $100,000; and it is since the allotment has been raised to the latter figure that the fund has been found to be inadequate. Twice since this government has been in power we have increased the allotment by $500,000, making an extra allotment of $1,000,000, and the government is seriously considering at the present time, at the request of the Prime Minister himself, increasing the allotment this year.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Does the application come from the provincial government or from the cities?

Mr. MANION: It may come from the province, but more usually it comes from the municipalities and sometimes from one of the railway companies. The application then goes before the board of railway commissioners, who adjudicate upon the matter, allotting so much to be paid by the railway company, so much by the city and so much by the dominion government from the railway grade crossing fund.

The other point I wish to touch upon has reference to the interprovincial conference of December a year ago.

Mr. COOTE: Is the dominion government empowered to make an advance to help to pay the cost of electric warning signals?

Mr. MANION: Yes; that is all taken into account in connection with the elimination of level crossings, and in some instances the fund has paid the whole cost of the wigwag system. Some of these undertakings have unfortunately run into considerable costs in some cities, such as Toronto, London and Hamilton. Some of the amounts are very considerable and this has tended to consume the fund.

The other point to which I wish to refer —and this is as much for the information of hon. members as for any other purpose—is in regard to the conference held in December 1933, a conference which was called at my request, after consultation with the railways, to deal not so much with accidents as with the whole question of motor traffic as it impinges upon the transportation situation in Canada. The conference dealt largely with common carriers rather than with the private car, though it is true that so far as passenger business is concerned, private vehicles, both in this country, in the United States and England, do interfere more with traffic on the railways than do public motor conveyances. At that conference the nine provinces were represented, and as anyone who has attended an interprovincial conference knows, it is not easy to get the nine provinces to agree unanimously on any subject. We did, however, succeed in having a series of nine resolutions passed, all unanimously, dealing largely with these common carriers. I will read four of the resolutions, which are very brief. They were submitted from this conference back to the provinces themselves in the hope that the provinces would put them into effect inasmuch as they come within provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Were the provinces represented by ministers or by expert engineers?

Mr. MANION: Nearly all the ministers of highways from the various provinces were present, and for the most part they brought experts with them. The conference was quite successful; we had a very fine attendance and a good cooperative spirit was shown. The four resolutions which I shall read are as follows:

3. This conference endorses the principle that common carriers of persons and property shall be suitably insured.

That would not particularly assist—in fact it might do the reverse—in checking the accidents spoken of by my hon. friend, but at any rate it would take care, at least to a certain extent, of the financial worries of people who were left as dependents of persons who were killed.

5. The conference recommends that legislation be enacted limiting the mileage or hours of labour of operators of passenger vehicles.

That is merely to prevent what was occurring on the public highways to a certain extent, that is drivers from being compelled to drive for sixteen, eighteen, or sometimes a greater number of hours without proper rest.

6. The conference agrees that, in the interests of public safety, a standard of fitness should be required of all public vehicles used in the transportation of passengers.

7. This conference agrees that operators of public passenger vehicles should require a medical certificate of physical fitness to operate such vehicles.

[Mr. Manion.]

Since those resolutions—there were three others that have not so much bearing upon the resolution of the hon. member for East Toronto and I shall not read them to-day—were passed, it was our desire that the provinces should enact them and place them upon the provincial statute books. In some cases this has happened. I have not a complete report because at the time it had been the intention of the government to have another interprovincial conference last autumn, when this subject would again be discussed by provincial representatives who would come here for the purpose. But as the house knows, the interprovincial conference which was to have been held last autumn was suspended or postponed, for various reasons which I shall not discuss at the moment. The chief reason I mention these resolutions to-day is that in view of the serious loss of life, the serious damage that has been done to even the morale of the people of this country, I think it is the duty of all of us as members representing the different constituencies in Canada to educate the people of our own sections in this important matter and also to impress upon the various provinces the advisability of putting into effect some or perhaps all of these resolutions which were unanimously passed by the provincial representatives last year.

Not only would the putting into force of these resolutions have the effect of lessening the number of accidents at least to a certain extent, as is obvious from the terms of the resolutions, but it would also have the effect of putting upon a more nearly even basis the competition between motor vehicles on the one hand and the railways on the other. No one realizes more fully than do hon. members the very serious problem of the railway situation in Canada. One of the great causes of that railway problem is the fact that there is such a heavy competition between motor buses, motor trucks and private automobiles on the one hand and railways on the other, and the fact that motor competition has been carried out on a basis, to a certain degree, of unfairness to the railways, inasmuch as railway rates, operations and schedules are all regulated by the board of railway commissioners, whereas on the other hand motor traffic is not so regulated. These resolutions were passed to some extent for the purpose of giving, by their enforcement, a fair deal to our great transportation systems in Canada, because this country could not possibly get along without transportation by railway.

I have nothing further to add. Again I say that I think the hon. member has done a public service in bringing such a question as this before the house. We sometimes discuss questions which to my mind are of less importance than the one he has brought up.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How many level crossings have been eliminated in Canada in the past year?

Mr. MANION: I cannot give the figures offhand, but I shall be glad to have the information for my hon. friend the next time my estimates come up; perhaps to-morrow.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): While the minister is in his seat, there is just one other point I want to mention and that is the matter of the elimination of accidents at level crossings. The minister will remember, as no doubt other hon. members will, that on at least two prior occasions I have urged that it would be advisable as part of our employment relief scheme to do anything that could reasonably be done in certain districts to eliminate some of the more dangerous level railway crossings. I think in every section of the country we have had our attention called to very serious accidents at such crossings. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has directed attention to some such accidents that have happened in Quebec. Last year I called attention to a serious accident that happened in the county of Elgin at West Lorne. Unfortunately these were not exceptions to the rule; many accidents of the kind occur. I think the regulation in effect in Quebec with regard to requiring all motor vehicles to come to a full stop on coming to a railway crossing is a very sound one.

Mr. BENNETT: Did they not repeal that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was not aware that they had.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is still in force.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know the practice prevails in Quebec; you see practically every motor vehicle stop as it comes to a railway crossing. Unfortunately in some of the other provinces we do not follow the rule very well. In connection with the conference with the nine provinces I was wondering whether the minister could tell us whether the question of a uniform law of that kind throughout the different provinces had been discussed and what the attitude of the various provincial representatives was toward that subject if it came up.

Mr. MANION: I do not think that question came up. I believe it is worthy of discussion.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a very serious question. I urge particularly upon the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that as part of our unemployment relief scheme, or under whatever heading the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the members of his government may see fit to have some regulation made, something be done to eliminate many of the more dangerous level crossings that still are altogether too numerous throughout Canada and make a greater contribution to motor vehicle fatalities than any one other cause.

Then there is the question referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) with regard to amendments to the criminal code. Of course that is within federal jurisdiction. The other matter is under provincial jurisdiction. I refer to the question whether the minimum penalty is large enough. I do not think anybody will argue that the maximum penalty as now provided by the criminal code is not a proper one, and perhaps the best evidence of that is that very few judges give anything like the maximum penalty. In saying that I am not criticizing the action of the judges, but a minimum penalty of practically nothing where a jury has found a man guilty of manslaughter is a very mild penalty for the offence. I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not here in the chamber at the moment; I was wondering if his department were considering the advisability of increasing the minimum penalties provided in the act. This is a most important question, and I think the house should appreciate the efforts of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) in bringing it up and submitting the mass of data which he has collected.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the provinces, which after all are in control of highway traffic, would thank the members of this house for offering them any advice in regard to a matter that is within their jurisdiction. I gather from the discussion that perhaps the only points with which the federal government could deal are the penalties provided under the criminal code for negligence in cases of automobile accidents and in respect of accidents which take place at railway crossings. I am sorry I did not hear all that was said by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church), but it occurred to me that it would be well to know the relative percentage of accidents taking place at railways crossings and on highways generally. I judge that the number of accidents in general traffic on the highways must be much larger than those at railway crossings.

With regard to what the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) said as to the contributions made by the federal government towards the elimination of level crossings, I would say that the sum of $200,000 a year is utterly inadequate to have any appreciable result—

Mr. BENNETT: We increased it to $500,000, and as Hon. Mr. Dunning pointed out when he was Minister of Finance, no one seemed to want to go ahead with the elimination of grade crossings.

Mr. EULER: I did not know that the amount had been increased to half a million dollars. But in view of the fact that we have, as the Minister of Railways stated, some 33,000 level crossings in Canada, even half a million dollars is almost negligible for the substantial elimination of those crossings. In my own city of Kitchener, we have a level crossing of the Canadian National railway which practically, though not entirely, cuts through the heart of the city, where traffic is quite congested between the two towns of Kitchener and Waterloo. To eliminate that crossing alone would require literally hundreds of thousands of dollars. I have sometimes suggested that its elimination be undertaken largely as a matter of giving employment, but as the municipalities are required to pay a substantial part of the cost they simply cannot afford to do it in these days. I think I can say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that that is one of the reasons why the municipalities are not taking advantage of the amount that is placed at the disposal of the board of railway commissioners for that purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: They did not do it before the depression.

Mr. EULER: Even before the depression the municipalities were pretty hard up. When the tax rate goes up to 42 mills, as in my town, they cannot spend much in that way. For my part I should like to support a larger appropriation for that purpose.

To my mind the chief causes of highway accidents are two—and here perhaps I am going into the provincial field. First there is excessive speed, and in that regard I refer not so much to the passenger automobile as to the buses. I know on the main highways in my district buses will pass the ordinary automobile and run at fifty to fifty-five miles an hour. It has been a marvel to me that with these cumbrous vehicles operating on our roads in Ontario we have not had more accidents than we have. They are exceeding the speed limit all the time. I often wonder why the authorities in my province permit these buses to operate at speeds much in excess of the speed of the ordinary automobile and of the limit fixed by the law. In Quebec there is a regulation that all automobiles must stop at railway crossings. In Ontario we have that law with regard to buses. I have a suspicion, however—perhaps I shall be corrected by my Quebec friends—that in that province as far as passenger automobiles are concerned, that rule is more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh no, it is not.

Mr. EULER: Then I shall correct my statement; I speak only from a very limited experience.

Another main cause of accidents on the chief travelled highways in my province, and I believe this applies perhaps even more in Quebec, is that the highways are too narrow and have too many curves. The trouble as I see it, and I do a good deal of driving, is the practice of cutting in. If the highways were wide enough to enable three cars to run abreast, many of these accidents would be eliminated. Of course we come there to the question of expense; our provincial and county and city authorities will have to decide whether it is worth while to spend the amount necessary to widen the highways so as to make them safe, as compared with the loss of life that takes place. I do not flatter myself to the extent of believing that what we say here is going to have any appreciable effect on those really in control, that is the provincial authorities. Be that as it may, certainly the prevailing loss of life and injury is to be deplored. I believe I have stated the chief causes of accidents, namely speed, especially on the part of the buses, and the narrowness of the highways, which leads people to try to cut in, not realizing the speed at which the car from the other direction is approaching.

Mr. I. D. COTNAM (North Renfrew): For a number of years the loss of life as a result of automobile accidents on the highways has been appalling. Seeking the causes, it has seemed to me that in Ontario we have been altogether too easy-going in issuing drivers' permits to irresponsible persons. Many of the people who get these permits are young boys and girls; it is not at all unusual to find boys of sixteen and seventeen years of age driving automobiles. Most of them know nothing about the mechanism of the automobile, and permits are issued without adequate examination to discover whether or not the holders are capable drivers. That has been my observation in our part of the country, and I think it is true of most sections of the dominion.

It has seemed to me also that for a number of years past the Minister of Highways in Ontario has been doing too much cajoling and coaxing of the public to observe the Highway Traffic Act. It would appear that the time has come when he should take off his kid glove and use the iron fist a little. When a driving permit is issued the recipient should be handed a copy of the Highway Traffic Act and made to understand that he is supposed to know its provisions and is responsible for observing the rules of the road. The situation has become so serious that I think any word spoken in this house or any action that might be taken that would help in any way to strengthen the hands of the provincial authorities would receive consideration, and the penalties should be made even more severe than they have been in the past.

To my mind the licence of the man who is caught driving a car while intoxicated should be cancelled for at least a year, if not longer. Many individuals do not mind a fine of $10 or $12 when they are caught breaking the motor vehicle law; some of them do not even care if they have to go to gaol for a short period, but they do not want their permits cancelled. I have thought many times that if a man is guilty of causing injury or damage by an accident on the highway, instead of imposing a nominal fine which may not bother him very much his permit might be cancelled for three or six months. Then he would take a very serious view of the situation. If after his permit is renewed he is again caught breaking the law, his permit might be cancelled more or less indefinitely. I think by doing so we would go a long way in preventing many of the accidents that are occurring at the present time.

It is a strange thing, Mr. Speaker, that even with the heavy traffic, the high powered automobiles and the high rates of speed, after all most of the accidents are due to the human element. I think if more drastic action were taken to enforce the highway traffic acts the accidents would become fewer. It is a common occurrence in most sections of the country to find horse drawn vehicles on the roads at night without lights, and the danger is exceedingly great when an automobile, travelling at thirty, thirty-five or forty miles an hour, comes on one of these unlighted vehicles without warning. Many trucks draw off the road just a little and then stop, and in many cases they have no warning light on the rear. Drivers who are travelling at thirty-five or even forty-five miles an hour come on these trucks without warning at all, and serious accidents result. So I believe a real enforcement of the highway traffic acts would go a long way towards eliminating many of the accidents on our highways. The feeling has grown among many operators of automobiles that it is not a very serious matter to break the motor vehicles act, that the sentence is light and does not amount to very much. When we see what has been happening all over this country, however, it would seem that the time has come when we must take more efficient steps to see that the acts in the various provinces are better observed, which will help us eliminate many of the tragic accidents that are occurring daily throughout this dominion.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, there are three types of drivers to whom I object very strenuously. The first is the road hog, the second is the intoxicated driver and the third is the habitual offender. I have had quite a good deal of experience with the road hog, and from my experience I believe that appellation is an insult rather to the hog than to the driver. Many times I have seen these drivers hog more than half the road, forcing other drivers into the ditch in order to avoid accidents. I think, with the last speaker, that possibly the best way to deal with these people is to report them and have their licences suspended.

I am also very much against the granting of licences to habitual drunkards. I believe many accidents have taken place because the drivers were addicted to strong drink. I know of accidents at cross roads in which both drivers were intoxicated, and in some instances both drivers were killed. I think perhaps our penalties are too light, and that if you made them more severe it might have a good result. I also believe that the penalty for a second offence should be much greater than the penalty for a first offence, and I heartily agree that the most practical way to deal with this problem is to suspend the licences of drivers such as I have mentioned.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has stated that there are some 33,000 level crossings in Canada. I think it might be well to have an investigation made to decide how many of these crossings should be eliminated. In the prairie provinces there are hundreds of railway crossings which I do not think should be eliminated. If overhead bridges were built it would simply mean that in the winter time the snow would blow off and teams drawing sleighs would be unable to cross. If subways were constructed they would fill up in the winter time, so in many cases I do not think it would be desirable to eliminate the crossings. Undoubtedly in many cities and communities throughout the country level crossings might be eliminated with great advantage, in order to afford the public a greater degree or safety, but I do not think that is the case on the prairies.

It has been suggested that all motor vehicles be required to stop at all railway crossings. I appreciate the fact that in the east, where sometimes the view of approaching trains is not very good, such a law might be very desirable, but it would seem rather absurd to enact a law requiring motor vehicles to stop at railway crossings where you can see right and left for miles. Here again I think some body might determine what are the dangerous crossings, and perhaps signs might be erected at such crossings calling upon the drivers of motor vehicles to stop, look and listen. I can imagine that if a general law were passed, applying to our part of the country, requiring drivers to stop at all level crossings, if some driver did not obey that law it might become the occasion for some vexatious prosecution. I think if we could decide on the level crossings it is really desirable to eliminate we would be able to approach the whole question with a little better knowledge.

I am in hearty accord with what has been said about the drunken driver. Further, I have had the experience described by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) namely that of meeting a road hog who will not give any more than the very smallest part of the road to which one is entitled. If anything could be done to penalize a man who deliberately raced a train to the crossing, certainly it should be done. He is not only a fool but he is a criminal and should be dealt with with the utmost severity. By his foolish action he is risking not only his own life and the lives of the people in his motor vehicle, but the lives of the people in the train. I believe we would do well to make some of these matters subjects of investigation, and by doing so we would approach the whole problem with a better understanding of the facts.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a word on this resolution. It is evident that hon. members are agreed as to the principle involved. In my view the resolution is somewhat drastic and radical in its expression of opinion, and I am not sure whether or not we should adopt it in its present form. It seems to me that a complete inquiry into and survey of the matter is perhaps hardly necessary. There is no doubt however that although much has been done by way of education we have not yet reached a satisfactory state, so far as the motorists are concerned. In several of the provinces there are safety leagues which have done excellent work. We have one in the province of Quebec, and I have no doubt it has informed a large number of people of the necessity of being cautious on the road. Unfortunately however it has not succeeded in convincing a small minority of motorists who must be penalized and who do not exercise proper caution in the driving of their motor cars.

I agree with former speakers who state that a certain class of motorists should be severely penalized, and perhaps it would be possible to effect an amendment to the criminal code making the penalty more severe for the damage they cause. I do not wish to go over the arguments which have been presented, but may I observe that it might be worth while to have a more drastic application of the existing regulations. I believe it is within the knowledge of any public man, whether he be a member of the House of Commons or a city alderman, that the case most frequently brought to his attention is one where there has been a breach of some motor car regulation. Although this resolution deals with highways I believe by way of analogy one may allude to what takes place in the cities. Hardly a day passes in the city of Montreal when people in their offices do not receive calls not only from friends but outsiders who have been given notice by a policeman that they have been guilty of disregarding either parking regulations, regulations governing the operation of traffic signals, or some other traffic bylaws. We are asked to write letters or to make telephone calls in an effort to free them from the small penalties their offences merit.

For about two weeks last fall one would read in his paper every day that a pedestrian had been killed or that cars had collided. The press began to take notice of the situation and did very good work in bringing to the attention of public authorities the fact that accidents had become very frequent on the streets of our city. Municipal and provincial authorities gave orders to their officers to disregard any demands for clemency made by people who had not obeyed the rules. For a number of weeks motorists who through friendships or otherwise had been able to escape penalties had to pay them. The movement had the desired effect, and although it may have been a coincidence the fact is that since that time we have had much better order in the handling of our motor traffic.

I believe the same principle might apply to the highways, and that this house might endorse the opinion that we should have more drastic application of existing regulations. My concluding observation will be that any person who has been in public life must know no favour is asked more often than the favour to free someone from a penalty he has incurred through his neglect to follow traffic regulations. I am not suggesting an amendment, but perhaps I may be pardoned for having added this small touch to the discussion. I would suggest that when we give assent to this motion we at the same time confirm the opinion that not only stricter regulations but more accurate application of existing regulations are needed.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to urge the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to see that ample provision is made this year for assistance to the grade crossing fund. In my constituency there have been several very bad accidents in which several people have been killed at grade crossings. Those accidents were in municipalities where there are twenty-four hour electrical services and where electrical warning devices might have been erected to save those lives. I have been told such a device may be installed at a single track crossing at a cost of approximately $1,800. Only last month a young man was killed in my constituency, and I am sure a warning device at the crossing would have saved his life. The accident occurred on a very cold night, when the side windows in the car were covered with frost, making it very difficult to see the approaching train. An electrical warning signal would have saved a life which, I know, would have been worth more than the $1,800.

I have taken this opportunity to urge the minister to see that ample provision is made for the grade crossing fund. There are thousands of level crossings where it is almost impossible to construct overhead bridges or subways, but where electrical warnings could be installed. The costs seem so reasonable that I believe they would be warranted, and especially in these times when we are attempting to create employment. At the same time we would be taking a precaution towards the saving of life and the preventing of accidents. Enough has been said on the resolution in connection with the enforcement of better conduct on the part of motor car drivers. I believe that is a matter with which probably the provinces will have to deal. I do believe however that this government might protect a great many level crossings where accidents have occurred in the past and are likely to occur in the future. I have in mind one crossing in my constituency at which, since I have been a member of this house, there have been several accidents and several people killed. I believe a proper warning device would have saved those lives, and if installed would prevent accidents in future.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) for having brought this resolution before the house. The number of accidents from motor cars in Canada is really alarming. In my own province of Quebec, if you go before our courts, especially in Montreal, you will find that half the time of our civil courts —I am not speaking of the criminal courts—is taken up in the hearing of cases arising out of motor car accidents on our highways and streets. I think this is a problem that deserves very careful consideration, and something should be done to reduce as much as possible the casualties on our highways and streets. There is no doubt that eighty per cent of accidents are due to the negligence of the driver, and in nine out of ten cases when two cars collide I would say that the accident was due to the negligence of both drivers. That has been my experience before our courts.

I was interested in the remark made by my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), who stated that one of the causes of so many motor car accidents was the narrowness of our streets and highways. I think there is a great deal in that. In my own constituency, for instance, there is a well known road called the Chambly road, a section of the Sherbrooke highway leading to the Jacques Cartier bridge. You cannot go over that road at any time without seeing at least one or two motor cars in the ditches, five or six feet deep on both sides of the road. Why? Because the traffic is heavy on that road, and it is too narrow. This is a matter that deserves the attention of our provincial authorities. As a matter of fact I have drawn their attention to that state of things. I do not say this in any critical sense but only to indicate that our provincial authorities should see to it that proper roads are provided where there is very considerable traffic. I believe that in doing so a great number of accidents would be avoided.

I have nothing to add, Mr. Speaker, except to say once more that I am pleased my hon. friend from East Toronto has brought this matter before the house and given every member the opportunity to express his views on this question. What has been said to-day will be very useful both to this house and to the authorities in the different provinces in Canada on account of the publicity given to the debates in this house.

Mr. J. H. STITT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, before this debate closes I would like to express a few ideas that have occurred to me during the discussion this afternoon. I think every man who has had experience in the criminal courts recognizes that one of the reasons why we are not getting the number of convictions we ought to get in these criminal cases is because the law of criminal negligence has not been clarified. If the law regarding criminal negligence were clarified, there would certainly be more convictions under this portion of the criminal code.

I had the experience in an action for damages of proving that there was negligence and obtaining judgment for a large amount of damages, and then I had the experience of defending the man who was the negligent party in another action in a criminal case and he was acquitted. Now clearly there is something wrong in the law when we have an administration which says, on the one hand, that there has been an act of negligence, and on the other hand, that there has been no act of negligence.

Another idea that has occurred to me is that many of the judges sitting alone on a case of this kind are reluctant to make a conviction, and most juries, if you have a case in which you can evoke a certain amount of sympathy, will not convict. It has occurred to me this afternoon during the course of this discussion that an improvement might be worked in our jury system in regard to criminal cases arising out of automobile accidents, and I make this suggestion for what it is worth as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) has asked for suggestions. Would it be proper to amend the law regarding criminal procedure in such a case so that the attorney general might ask the chief justice of the province to appoint a jury composed of county court judges and police magistrates? We would then not only protect the operation of the law from a too sympathetic judge or a too reluctant jury, but we might have a more reasonable administration of the law. This whole question of criminal negligence is one of the most vexatious questions that the courts have to determine.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Another method that might be adopted would be for the government to ask the Supreme Court of Canada to pass upon the question as to just what amount of negligence constitutes a criminality in criminal cases. Any lawyer who has had any experience in the courts knows that any jury certainly, and a great many judges, have really not made up their minds as to just what degree of negligence constitutes criminality.

I think the suggestion which has been made for the passing of a dominion act providing that every operator of a motor vehicle should be forced to stop before coming to a railway crossing would have a most salutary effect, notwithstanding as has already been stated in the house, that it might leave room for vexatious prosecutions.

I do not think we should achieve anything by stiffening up the penalties in the code. The difficulty lies in getting a clarification of what constitutes criminal negligence and in getting an administration of the law that will be free from human frailty. It has struck me, in view of the appalling loss of life which is occurring in motor car accidents every year in this country, that this is a question of sufficient importance to be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations.

I must thank my hon. friend from East Toronto for bringing this resolution before the house. It is something that certainly can be improved by legislation, by changes both in the substantive law and in the law regarding criminal procedure.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, in closing the debate I want to thank the members of the house for the way in which they have received this resolution. The Minister of Justice has asked for practical suggestions by way of amending the criminal code. We have now before us the report of the Chief Constables' Association of Canada, the members of which include Chief Draper of Toronto, the police chiefs of Montreal and Ottawa, and representatives of the provincial forces, and they recommend amendments to the criminal code. One of the amendments which I think ought to be adopted is the one which is to be found at page 2756 of Hansard of 1930, which is the law of England. It provides in effect for dealing with anyone driving a motor vehicle or automobile under the influence of intoxicating liquor. This point was referred to by the hon. member for Lisgar and the proposed amendment in this regard he supported in 1930 when I had the matter before the house. I believe that the report of the chief constables' association and the amendments I have suggested, as well as amendments with regard to those who are allowed to drive cars after they have killed someone, should all be adopted. I submit that we should create a new offence, involuntary homicide, and people of this class should not be permitted to drive a car for two or three years at any rate. Then there are those who drive without a permit; something must be done to deal with such people. Another matter which I have brought up before is the damage that results from accidents for which tourists are responsible. A tourist from the United States may kill a man, or he may injure somebody's car, and he gets bail and skips out of the country and civil damages cannot be collected. It seems to me that the law relating to bail should be amended.

This whole subject was discussed for two sessions in the old country, and when the general statutory amendments are under consideration I hope that the Minister of Justice will favourably consider the suggestions which are now before him and the many reforms that may be proposed. This is not a matter of law but one of policy, and no private members can furnish the facts. It cost a good deal of money in the old country to gather all the information for a proper report; thousands of pounds were spent summoning witnesses. It would be impossible for me, a private member, to deal at all adequately with a matter of this kind, which is one of policy, and one for all parties in this house to study. Moreover, the question ought to be taken up in the Senate. I have a letter from the chief of police in Hamilton who expresses the opinion that in the great majority of instances accidents are caused by carelessness on both sides, and he thinks that if the legal speed limit were enforced these accidents would be very largely eliminated. But so long as the demand for speed is not opposed but catered to accidents will continue.

As I have said, I am not opposed to the motor interests, for I believe that the responsibility is fifty-fifty. There are many people who have not been properly educated to show due consideration for others when they use the highways. The whole question is one that is very much involved. The Minister of Justice is willing to have it referred to the committee on industrial relations, but I doubt whether that committee can properly deal with a problem which, as I have pointed out, was under consideration in the British parliament for the space of two sessions. At any rate, it is a problem that has to be faced, whether now or in the future, and I do not think that the time of the house has been wasted to-day in the discussion that we have had. I am willing to withdraw the motion in the hope that the amendments that have been suggested will be placed before the Department of Justice with a view to having many of these reforms written into the code. In view of the discussion we have had this afternoon I am ready to report progress on the resolution, but I can assure hon. members that if I am returned to this house again I intend to continue bringing this question up session after session until the people are given some relief from the present intolerable condition. We must legislate against motor manslaughter and motor murder until it becomes less fashionable. I suggest that the government take the matter up in the recess in conjunction with the provinces and have an elaborate report prepared for presentation to parliament. When the criminal code is under consideration I shall suggest one or two recommendations which I brought forward in 1930, and in the meantime I beg to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ACTUARIAL REPORTS OF MESSRS. WATSON AND WOLFENDEN TABLED

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): When the resolution with respect to unemployment insurance was being considered I indicated that the actuarial reports prepared by Messrs. Watson and Wolfenden would be available for the house. I found, when they were finally completed—they had not been then—that they were somewhat longer than I thought the house would desire to incur the expense of printing. So I lay two copies of each on the table, and if the committee think, after analyzing them, that they should be printed, very good, but as they deal with purely actuarial matters I did not think the expense of printing was warranted, unless the house is more interested than I think in purely actuarial computations.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS AFTER MONDAY, FEBRUARY 18

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday the 18th of February, 1935, and every Monday thereafter until the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I have no objection to the motion, but the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) told us when he was speaking on the address that opportunity would be given to vote on the motion of the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) with respect to the operation of the Ottawa Imperial Conference trade agreements. I hope the Prime Minister will see that that opportunity is given, and not cut off by this method.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wonder if the Prime Minister would concede another day to private members. He has given notice of motion to cut off Wednesday as well, and it is not customary to cut off both days at once. I have a notice on the order paper that has not been called at all, and it is not one of these academic stunts, it is a matter of practical importance.

Mr. BENNETT: After yesterday's debate I gave notice in the evening of intention to suggest to the house that Wednesday should become a government day. We have not yet reached that, and as I have frequently said, if the view of the house is that private members should have another day of course it will always be available. That has always been the principle on which we proceeded, but having regard to the condition of the order paper I placed that notice on the order paper last evening.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MARKETING BOARD—EGGS AND POULTRY

Mr. YOUNG:

1. Did the dominion marketing board on January 2nd, write to F. J. G. Cunningham, representative of the Saskatchewan Egg and Poultry Producers Protective Association, to the effect that as soon as the order in council with reference to the marketing scheme for eggs and poultry had been passed the board would furnish him with copies of the approved scheme?

2. Were these copies ever forwarded, and if so, on what date?

3. On what date is the vote on the said scheme to be taken?

4. What sum of money was advanced by the dominion marketing board for the purpose of promoting the marketing scheme for eggs and poultry in Saskatchewan, and to whom was it advanced?

5. Was any sum advanced by the dominion marketing board to any association opposing the said scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. Yes.

2. No. No order in council has been passed approving the marketing scheme for eggs and poultry in Saskatchewan.

3. February 16 to February 23, inclusive.

4. No sum.

5. No.

*LEAGUE OF NATIONS—SOVIET UNION DELEGATES

Mr. POULIOT:

What are the names of the delegates of the U.S.S.R. who were members of: (a) the first committee; (b) the second committee; (c) the fourth committee; (d) the fifth committee, and (e) the sixth committee of the fifteenth ordinary session of the assembly of the League of Nations, held in Geneva in September, 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: (a) M. B. Stein, (b) M. M. Rosenberg, (c) M. B. Stein, (d) M. M. Rosenberg, (e) M. M. Litvinoff.

*LEAGUE OF NATIONS—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

Mr. POULIOT:

How many sittings of each of the committees, upon which Canada was represented, were held during the whole length of the fifteenth ordinary session of the assembly of the League of Nations, held in Geneva, in September, 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: 1st committee, 6 sittings; 2nd committee, 9 sittings; 4th committee, 12 sittings; 5th committee, 13 sittings; 6th committee, 17 sittings.

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Between the 10th and 27th of September, 1934, have there been, in Geneva, plenary sittings: (a) of the assembly, and (b) of the council of the League of Nations?

2. If so, how many sittings did the Canadian and Russian delegates attend together; what were the dates of such sittings, and what was the purpose of each one?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. (a) yes; (b) yes. Canada is not a member of the council.

2. Two sittings, (1) September 18, of which the purpose was to decide upon the admission of the U.S.S.R. in the league. After this had been approved, delegates of the U.S.S.R.

took their seats in the assembly; (2) September 25, when the business dealt with was the admission of Afghanistan.

Mr. BENNETT: Questions Nos. 5, 6 and 7 refer to the same matter. I have looked into the questions. I might say with respect to them that the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has placed upon the order paper several questions regarding the relations between Canada and the Russian delegations to the last assembly of the League of Nations. He seems to be particularly anxious to ascertain the part taken by the Canadian delegation in the invitation to the Soviet union to enter the League of Nations, and also whether the Canadian delegation had officially met Mr. Litvinoff and had made any arrangements with the Russian delegation. The situation is very simple, and I shall endeavour to satisfy the hon. member's desire for information by a brief and direct statement.

The Canadian delegation believed that the movement for the entrance of the Soviet union into the League of Nations, which was initiated by France and supported by the United Kingdom, was in the interest of the League of Nations and of world peace, and it shared in the steps necessary to bring that about. In response to an order of the house moved by the hon. member a copy of the telegram of invitation, signed by the delegates of some thirty members of the league, including Canada, has been transmitted for tabling. The Canadian delegation did not have any official meeting with the Russian delegation, and did not discuss or enter into any agreements. Owing to the fact that the Soviet union did not enter the league until nearly the end of the session, their delegates took practically no part in the work of the committees. The only plenary meeting of the assembly at which I was present and which was attended by the Russian delegates was the session on September 18, when the business before the meeting was the admission of the U.S.S.R. into the league; after this had been approved the Russian delegates took their seats in the assembly.

Mr. SPEAKER: Questions 5, 6 and 7 answered.

Mr. POULIOT: The answer is not complete.

L'ILE-AUX-GRUES, QUE., TELEPHONE EXCHANGE

Mr. FAFARD:

1. Who is in charge of the telephone central at l'Ile-aux-Grues, Montmagny county?
2. What is the salary of this employee?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Captain Hector Lavoie.
2. $50 per year.

NEW BUILDING, OTTAWA—EXCAVATION

Mr. FOURNIER:

Are the excavation works for the new building to be erected on Wellington street, Ottawa, being done with excavators or by manual labour?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Work being done by usual methods, both being employed.

EMIGRATION TO UNITED STATES

Mr. DUGUAY:

How many Canadians left Canada for the United States, during the years 1922 and 1923?

Mr. GORDON: As the dominion government has no officers employed recording emigration but only immigration there are no figures available showing the emigration from Canada in any year. To record emigration would involve the employment of many additional officers particularly on the international boundary.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPLICATIONS BEFORE BOARD OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS TO ABANDON BRANCH LINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I wish to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) how many applications are now before the board of railway commissioners to his knowledge in regard to the abandonment of branch lines on the Canadian National railway system.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I do not think I can answer that question at the moment, but I read in the press that there are a number of applications before the board. Of course the two railway companies have the privilege of applying to the board of railway commissioners to abandon lines, they do not have to ask our authority in any shape or form. However, I shall look into the question and inform the hon. member correctly as soon as possible.

USE OF DRUG HEROIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, the day before yesterday the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) asked a question with regard to the drug heroin. At Geneva a convention was passed limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotic drugs, and the following recommendation was adopted:

The conference, recognizing the highly dangerous character of heroin as a drug of addiction and the possibility in most, if not all cases, of replacing it by other drugs of a less dangerous character, recommends that each government should examine, in conjunction with the medical profession, the possibility of abolishing or restricting its use, and should communicate the result of such examinations to the secretary general of the League of Nations.

In accordance with this obligation, therefore, the Department of Pensions and National Health placed itself in communication with the various medical associations, provincial and dominion. So far replies have been received from eight, and as yet no replies have been received from three, so until these replies are received no definite action will be taken. Resolutions have been received from certain rotary clubs, including that of St. Marys, Ontario, and the hon member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) made representations on behalf of a body in his district.

NEWSPRINT INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, whereas two revolutions of the earth have taken place, and whereas not twenty-four but forty-eight hours have elapsed since the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) promised to table in due course the return with regard to the newsprint industry, may I ask him first if the file has been sent out of Ottawa to be combed by someone, and second, if the file will be tabled—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am asking a question, and I want yes or no for an answer. The second question is, if the government is waiting until after the legislation regarding the eight hour day—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a minute.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. gentleman kindly proceed to ask his question and direct it to the proper minister?

Mr. POULIOT: I am asking, as a second question, if the government are waiting until the legislation regarding the eight hour day and the minimum wage is passed before tabling such correspondence. May I add that such legislation will not pass until this correspondence is produced.

[Mr. Sutherland.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to bear in mind the rules of the house in regard to asking questions. No hon. member is more familiar with the rules in that respect than my hon. friend. He knows that what he has added to his question is not proper, and I would ask him to be good enough to observe the rules when asking questions.

Mr. POULIOT: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker; I submit my two questions, and I withdraw the warning.

STORM IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). Has the attention of the government been directed to the terrible destruction which occurred recently in British Columbia due to a storm in that province, with damage amounting to approximately $2,000,000? If so, is the government considering the advisability of rendering some financial assistance to those who have been affected?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The premier of British Columbia has intimated that the storm had caused much damage, but no details have been indicated as to what the damage was.

BRITISH COLUMBIA RADIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if any steps have been taken by the radio commission to ensure better radio reception in central and northern British Columbia. The minister is familiar with the problem; in that territory it is impossible to hear any Canadian broadcasts. According to my information some steps have been taken to improve that condition, and I should like the minister to say what has been done.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I understand that some steps have been taken by the radio commission to improve the situation in that district. I will communicate this question to the commission and will gladly give its answer to my hon. friend.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that private members' days have been taken by the government I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when he intends to proceed with the organization of the committee to consider amendments to the British North America Act.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): The committee was appointed yesterday. I do not know that it is my duty to call it together, but if it is I will be glad to call it together without delay.

MARKETING BOARD—ADVANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): In regard to question No. 1 on the order paper, paragraph 4 reads:

> What sum of money was advanced by the dominion marketing board for the purpose of promoting the marketing scheme for eggs and poultry in Saskatchewan, and to whom was it advanced?

The answer is "No sum". I have in my possession a telegram from Regina stating that pool speakers have publicly admitted that they have received $20,000, which is being used to send ninety-five speakers throughout the province. Will the minister say there is no truth in that statement?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): I would ask the hon. member to let this question stand as notice.

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). I have received telegrams from the Lloydminster board of trade, dated February 11; from E. Whitlaw, mayor of Ruddell, dated February 11; from F. Wright, commissioner of the North Battleford board of trade, dated February 8; from the Lashburn board of trade, dated February 9; from William Wilson, overseer of Waseca, dated February 9, and from George Wyatt, secretary treasurer of the council of the village of Paynton, dated February 13, asking for the bridging of the North Saskatchewan river at a point called Ceepee, forty miles west of Saskatoon and sixty miles east of North Battleford. I understand the Saskatoon board of trade are backing the project also. I should like to ask the minister if he can make any statement to the house and country as to whether this important project will be included in any government public works program for this year.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, some representations have been made in the past in this regard, but I am not able to state what is the intention of the government. I suggest that my hon. friend will have to await the legislation that may be brought down, or the estimates.

Mr. McINTOSH: I hope when the answer does come down it will be satisfactory.

INQUIRY—MR. POULIOT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I am not going to repeat the two questions I put to the government a short time ago, but I would ask the government to answer them. Silence.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): On February 4, at page 444 of Hansard, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Laurin) put the following question to the government:

> Did the Quebec government make a formal proposal to the federal government looking to an agreement in relation to unemployment with a view to exempt municipalities from contributing to unemployment relief expenditures?

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) answered "Yes". May I ask the minister to lay such correspondence on the table of the house?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I will be very glad to table the correspondence that passed between myself and the premier of Quebec. I think two communications were addressed to me; the matter was considered, and I replied to those communications. I will table the letters tomorrow.

MONTREAL POSTAL TERMINAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): According to the press contracts have been let in connection with the Montreal postal terminal. I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) if these are only partial contracts or if they will ensure the completion of the work.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): The contracts that have been let will ensure the completion of the work.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFUNDING OF MATURING AND CALLABLE FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the refunding of maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of substituted securities therefor, guaranteed by the dominion, in an amount not exceeding $200,000,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The committee is aware no doubt that from time to time in the past the practice has obtained of taking the power through what might be termed an omnibus bill to refund and to fund the direct obligations of the dominion. This bill is designed to take the same course with respect to the guaranteed obligations, or in other words the obligations of the Canadian National Railways which bear the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada. We are asking authority up to the extent of $200,000,000. As a matter of fact there are maturing this year a limited amount of obligations, of which I shall give the exact amount in a few moments. But there are callable provisions in connection with a number of the issues which would enable us, if the market conditions warranted, to refund in the course of the present year not less than $172,000,000. Of course we would ask for the added sum, in the event of our being able to do the same thing with respect to callable obligations which might arise at the end of the year. I do not think I need dwell upon the wisdom of our refunding where possible and in that way reducing the interest charge in consequence. As a matter of fact in the latter part of last year we had two issues of the Canadian National Railways amounting in all, in round figures, to the sum of $20,500,000. which were re-financed in the month of December. We were able to refund those with an issue of three per cent securities which, in that one transaction alone, will save the railways and to that extent will save the Dominion of Canada not less than $200,000 a year in interest.

To-morrow there falls due an issue of $17,000,000 of four and a half per cent guaranteed Canadian Northern Railway bonds. We have made arrangements temporarily to refund those upon a two per cent basis. But as the market presents an opportunity we will fund those for a longer term, saving a substantial sum in interest as against the rate which the maturing issues bear. It is necessary of course to secure this authority in advance, because there is not only the question of parliament being in session only for a limited period but the other point, namely, that the majority if not all of these issues are payable in the alternative, either in London, New York or in Canada, at the option of the holder. It would be dependent upon conditions from time to time as to whether a favourable opportunity will present itself.

To show how important it is that we should refund in terms of dollars, may I say that if we are able to refund the total amount which we can refund through the callable provisions, and also because of the obligations maturing to-morrow, during the course of the year, upon a basis comparable to the existing interest rate, we will be able to effect a saving in interest alone of, in round figures, the sum of $2,500,000 a year.

Mr. EULER: I should like to ask the minister whether the government has considered the advisability of refunding not only the callable maturities but those which actually do mature. Instead of refunding only the ones he has mentioned, I should like to know whether or not they have in mind the possibility of refunding at a lower figure the balance of about a billion dollars, payable on account of the national railways. It will be desirable to have that done, if possible.

Mr. RHODES: I entirely agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) as to the desirability, but we must take first things first. Of course we must deal with the maturing obligations.

Mr. EULER: Quite so.

Mr. RHODES: Then it remains open to us to deal only with those maturities which have a callable provision. Of course if after that arrangements could be arrived at whereby all the holders would be content, despite the contract, to accept a lower rate of interest, needless to say we would all be only too happy to accept such an arrangement.

Mr. EULER: Would it not be worth while to try?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister state whether or not there is any provision being made for an overhauling of the whole capital structure of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I do not know that that question arises at the moment. Certainly it is not one I should like to discuss at the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister referred to refunding $17,000,000 due to-morrow. I presume he has in mind the paying off of the $17,000,000 and financing on short term for the funds in the meantime.

Mr. RHODES: We have made arrangements on short term financing for a temporary refunding at the rate of two per cent interest.

Mr. RALSTON: On call?

Mr. RHODES: No, for a short term.

Mr. RALSTON: In Canada?

Mr. RHODES: Part in Canada and part in the United States, because a portion of the securities are held in New York. But of course we will refund them as and when the market conditions warrant.

Mr. RALSTON: If the minister has a list before him of the issues which will fall due this year, could he give me some idea of the premiums, if any, which would be payable?

Mr. RHODES: There is an issue of $60,833,333.33 of Grand Trunk Railway four per cent perpetual guaranteed stock which is callable at 100. I have not the data before me, but my recollection is that that is payable in England. However, of that fact I cannot be sure at the moment.

There is an issue of Canadian National Railway 4½ per cent thirty-year bonds, due September 15, 1954, amounting to $26,000,000, which is callable at 102; a Canadian National Railway issue of 4½ per cent forty-year bonds, due December 1, 1968, amounting to $35,000,000, which is callable at 103; an issue of National Transcontinental Railway Branch Lines Company 4½ per cent first mortgage bonds due October 1, 1955, amounting to $2,541,000, callable at par; Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company Limited 5 per cent first mortgage bonds due April 15, 1970, amounting to $952,893.33, callable at 105; an issue of Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada 7 per cent debentures due October 1, 1940, amounting to $23,740,000, callable at 102½; Canadian Northern Railway Company 7 per cent debenture bond issue due December 1, 1940, amounting to $23,779,000, callable at 102½. The total of the various issues I have just given aggregates $172,846,226.66.

Mr. RALSTON: Did I understand the minister to say that there were no other issues falling due this year except this $17,000,000?

Mr. RHODES: The $17,000,000 issue falling due to-morrow is the only issue falling due this year. The list I have given is the complete list of those issues which contain the callable provision enabling us to call them this year.

Mr. RALSTON: At what rate was my hon. friend reckoning interest when he mentioned a possible saving of $500,000?

Mr. RHODES: In round figures 3½ per cent.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, it was formerly the practice I think for the national railways to issue these obligations on their own account, guaranteed by the federal government. In view of the fact disclosed before the parliamentary committee on national railways and shipping that bonds issued direct by the government could be sold just a little more advantageously than those issued by the national railways direct, and guaranteed by the government, I would like to ask whether it is the intention of the government to have this issued as a direct obligation of the federal government, and charged I presume against the national railways, instead of being issued by the railways, as formerly, and guaranteed by the government.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, that is a very large question. I would not wish to shield myself behind the usual and quite proper formula that the intention of the government can only properly be made known when it has arrived at a decision. I do not take that ground at all. I would point out that it is a large question of policy as to how far it may be wise for the government to add direct obligations in place of their present indirect obligations, especially bearing in mind the circumstance that, while it is true there is a margin of difference in the rate on a direct obligation and a guaranteed obligation, the tendency is for that margin to narrow very closely. That is particularly so in Canada. The tendency heretofore has been for that margin to be slightly larger in Great Britain and in New York, but on the whole the tendency has been for that margin to narrow to a very small point. At the moment I would not like to express an opinion whether, on balance, if it were possible, it would be the part of wisdom to stand directly under the whole load at the present time.

Mr. EULER: If I am not mistaken the committee I think included in its report a recommendation that in future the bonds be issued on the direct responsibility of the government. I may be wrong in that but I am inclined to think that that was the recommendation of the committee and that its report was adopted and accepted by parliament.

Mr. RHODES: That may be so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has the government any intention of undertaking a revaluation of the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways so that it will bear some relationship to the actual replacement value of the present assets?

Mr. RHODES: I would not undertake to answer that question at the moment, certainly not in connection with this measure.

Mr. HANBURY: I would like to suggest to the minister that he place on Hansard a statement of the bonded obligations of the Canadian National Railways and its affiliations.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend will refer to the budget speech of last year and the year before, and the year before that again, he will find them there in complete detail, and also in the annual report of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. HANBURY: The minister in referring to some issues that were maturing stated that some were payable in New York and some in London. I would like to inquire whether it is the intention of the government, where possible, to make all future issues payable in Canada only, or whether the old policy will be continued.

Mr. RHODES: I did not get the latter part of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. HANBURY: I asked whether in future all issues of a similar nature would be payable in Canada only, where possible, or whether the old policy of having them payable both in London and New York, or one or the other, would be continued?

Mr. RHODES: The answer to that question would be, which is the more favourable market when an issue is being made? We cannot project ourselves into the future. All I can say is that the policy we have pursued has been so far as possible to confine our borrowings to the Canadian market, but there may be, and no doubt will be occasions when it may be more advantageous to borrow in other markets.

Mr. RALSTON: Do I understand that it is the intention to make all of these new refunding issues callable?

Mr. RHODES: Every one of the issues that we have made recently has had callable provisions.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. RALSTON: And that is the intention here?

Mr. RHODES: That is the intention with respect to the future.

Mr. RALSTON: The bill will no doubt disclose the answer to the question asked by my hon. friend from North Waterloo, whether it is intended to undertake these as direct obligations of Canada or as guarantees. I suppose the minister cannot now indicate what authority will be given in the bill.

Mr. RHODES: The bill will be in the terms of similar bills which have been introduced, and it will provide in the alternative either for direct obligation or for guarantee.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, may we take it for granted that none of these new issues will be made payable in foreign funds except such as are renewals of maturing issues now payable in foreign funds?

Mr. RHODES: I have already stated that where we can we will refund in Canada, and certainly in Canadian funds. But when it comes to a question of refunding maturities which are held outside of Canada the question of repatriation arises, and it is a question then of what is on balance the wiser policy to pursue.

Mr. HANBURY: In connection with the minister's last remarks I submit that it is better to pay the Canadian people a higher rate of interest and maintain your obligation in Canada, where it is possible to do so, rather than enter into an obligation in some foreign country. I believe the minister would get the support of this house for a policy on that basis. We know that there is considerable money for investment in Canada to-day, even although the banks have invested in government securities over 50 per cent of the savings of the people. I think the government should give very serious consideration to the issue of Canadian obligations, where it is at all possible, even if the rate of interest may be a little higher at the time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May we take it that the statement of the last speaker indicates that the party to which he belongs has abandoned the policy of free trade in finance?

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19 respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of maturing and callable financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BAHAMAS AND LEEWARD ISLANDS—COLLECTION OF DUES TO APPLY TOWARDS MAINTENANCE BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT OF SHIPPING SAFEGUARDS

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide for the collection by the dominion government of dues to be applied towards the maintenance of the lighthouses and buoy erected or placed by the British government on or near the coasts of the Bahamas and Leeward islands, from ships arriving at and departing from ports in Canada which derive benefits from the said lighthouses and buoy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The purpose of the resolution and of the bill which will be based upon it is to authorize the collection in Canada of lighthouse dues in respect of certain lights situated in the Bahamas and the Leeward islands. There are twelve lighthouses and one buoy in this service, which is administered by the board of trade of the United Kingdom. The lights were originally erected by the British government many years ago, and by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1898 the cost was transferred to the general lighthouse fund, which derives its revenue from lighthouse dues collected in the ports of Great Britain, Northern Ireland and the Irish Free State. The burden of the general lighthouse fund with respect to these lights has averaged £51,516 per annum for the last four years, part of which was for the improvement of the lights to put them in first class condition. Of course, the improvements are beneficial to the shipping interests of all nations who have occasion to take advantage of the lights, although up to the present time the cost has been borne by the general lighthouse fund through contributions received mainly from ships that derive no benefit at all from them. It is sought now to have the burden involved in the improvement and maintenance of the lights shifted upon the ships that benefit by them, and our customs officers, by this legislation, will become the collecting agents of the board of trade for the British general lighthouse fund. Similar legislation has been adopted by the Commonwealth of Australia and the Irish Free State, as well as India, and I am informed that New Zealand will introduce at its next session a measure with the same object in view.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): It is impossible for us to obtain full information before the resolution goes into committee regarding the payment of dues by Canadian or Australian or other vessels that benefit by the lights in question. I suggest we go into committee so that the minister can give us some details.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. MacDonald (South Cape Breton) in the chair.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): With whom did this idea originate? Is it the result of an agreement arrived at by an imperial conference in London; is it by agreement between the dominions and Great Britain; or whence has the idea come which is embodied in this resolution?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Dues for the use of the lights in question have been collected in England for very many years, but up to the present time the cost of maintaining the lights has been contributed to by a large number of ships that have derived no benefit whatever from the service. Years ago the fact was recognized that ships navigating between the dominions of the empire and benefiting by the existence of the lights were contributing nothing to the service, the contributions being made only by all the ships calling at the ports of Great Britain or Northern Ireland or the Irish Free State. The British authorities thought that it would be more equitable if only the ships that derived benefit from the lights contributed to the fund for improvements and maintenance of these lights. I do not think the question of our becoming agents for the collection of dues has ever come before a conference; I am not sure, but I do not think so. But Great Britain has asked the dominions to collect in their ports dues from ships that benefit by the lights, which as I say cost so much to the British government—about £50,000 a year. In becoming agents we shall probably receive a percentage of the collections, and these collections will be returned to the general lighthouse fund in Great Britain.

Mr. RINFRET: I understood the minister to say that the other dominions would adopt similar legislation. He mentioned Australia—

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. RINFRET: And South Africa, I thought, and he even mentioned India. Does the minister mean that these dominions or possessions or whatever they are called have ships that pass through that particular territory covered by the resolution?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say offhand whether those countries have ships deriving benefit from the lights by passing through the Bahamas; but if a ship, British or foreign, navigates in that neighbourhood and thus derives benefit from the lights and does not visit any port in Great Britain, Northern Ireland or the Irish Free State, that ship will not contribute to the maintenance and improvement of those lights although it has benefited from them. That is why the British authorities have asked the dominions to collect dues for the general fund from those ships which do not visit ports on the other side but which visit dominion ports before or after having benefited from those lights; according to regulations it is one penny per ton of registered tonnage of each ship.

Mr. RINFRET: My point is this—perhaps the minister cannot supply the information—but I would like to know if it intended that the other dominions are to enact legislation covering the Bahamas and Leeward islands, or is this to be restricted to Canada? I do not think Australia is interested in it.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have already stated that all the dominions and colonies were asked to adopt similar legislation, that is to provide for the collection in their ports of dues for the British general fund. I have just stated that the Commonwealth of Australia, India and the Irish Free State have already adopted and probably New Zealand at its forthcoming session will adopt similar legislation; that is, they will become collecting agents for the British general lighthouse fund.

Mr. CARDIN: Is this proposal not going to bring about a very serious change in the system which prevails in Canada so far as lighthouses and buoys are concerned? It is very well known that vessels coming into Canadian ports at present have no dues to pay in connection with the maintenance or repair of lighthouses and buoys. According to this resolution if the proposed legislation is put into effect, vessels entering Canadian ports will have to pay to Canada dues which they are not at present called upon to pay. This is a material change and I am afraid it is opening the door to a new policy here which may lead us sooner or later to the establishment of the system which prevails in England and other countries with the exception of Canada and the United States. Is the minister not somewhat afraid that this bill will create a precedent which may prove harmful to our ports later on?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I told the house a minute ago, these dues are for the British general fund, not for our own. We are not legislating for Canada; we are legislating only to give power to our customs officers to collect for Great Britain dues from ships which do not visit their ports on the other side but which derive benefits from those lighthouses, and visit the Canadian ports. This is only the enforcement of a British law in a British possession, the West Indies; that is all. We are only becoming the collecting agents. No principle in regard to our own legislation is involved. We have no lighthouse dues in this country and so far as I can see we do not intend to impose any dues for lighthouse maintenance. This is to help the British general fund by collecting its lighthouse dues.

Mr. CARDIN: Vessels entering Canadian ports have not so far been called upon to pay any dues even to England or to any other country for the maintenance of these lighthouses and buoys, but when the proposed legislation is put on the statute books vessels will have to pay in Canada dues that they formerly were not asked to pay.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not for our lighthouses. Our officers are only the collecting agents of Great Britain.

Mr. CARDIN: If I understood the minister aright a moment ago, he said that possibly part of these dues will be for our benefit.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I said that perhaps Great Britain will pay us a certain percentage of these dues to cover the expense of collection. That would be only fair.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Has any request been made of the United States government in turn to share part of the expense in the maintenance of these facilities for the same reason the minister gives for asking us, namely that their ships use those ports and receive some services from those lighthouses and buoys? The proposal seems to me eminently fair that one pays on the basis of the service secured, but to be fair it must apply to all parties participating in the benefit. If Canada, Australia and New Zealand are to assume their share of the burden without any foreign countries also sharing, that is not an equitable distribution of the cost. Has the minister any information on that question?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not aware that the United States ever asked for contributions for their lighthouse services, but I can say that United States vessels navigating through the Bahamas and Leeward islands, if they do not visit a port in Great Britain or Northern Ireland or the Irish Free State but visit a port in Canada, they will be asked by our officers to pay these dues.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But they will not necessarily visit a port in Canada. They may be plying between United States ports and ports in the Bahamas. Why should they not in turn be required to pay part of the cost? Why should the United States customs authorities not be induced by voluntary arrangement to collect just as we are now being asked to collect some share of the cost?

Mr. DURANLEAU: So far Great Britain has asked only its dominions and colonies to help it in the collection of these dues.

Mr. CARDIN: This is going to be to the detriment of Canadian ports. After this proposed legislation is passed, vessels entering Canadian ports will have to pay these dues. If the same vessels visit United States ports, they will have nothing to pay for the use of these lighthouses and services. That appears to be a system which will operate against our Canadian ports.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There may be a loss to the British general lighthouse fund if they have no agreement with the United States for the collection of dues in the ports of that country, but at the present time Great Britain is asking the aid of the dominions and colonies only in the collection of these dues.

Mr. CARDIN: I quite understand that what we are creating here is a collecting agency for England, but I am afraid it is going to operate to the detriment of our Canadian ports. It is going to impose dues on all vessels visiting our ports.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Vessels which have derived benefit from those lights.

Mr. CARDIN: Certainly, but vessels also deriving benefits from those lights going into the United States will have nothing to pay.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They will not be encouraged to come to Canada, they will go to the United States.

Mr. DUFF: I think the best thing the minister can do with this resolution is to let it stand. It is quite evident that he is badly advised either by the British government or by his officials in putting this resolution on the order paper. I could understand it if, following the Prime Minister's wish regarding conventions about eight-hour days and minimum wages and other matters for the whole British empire, or the whole world, the British government were putting forth a proposition that all lights in the British empire should come under one general fund. If that were the proposal then I could understand why ships coming into Canada or going from Canada should pay into that fund. But why in the name of heaven should any ship either coming to or going from Canada pay for lights in the Bahamas or the Leeward islands? Do the Bahamas pay for our lights in Canada? Do the Leeward islands, the Windward islands, does Australia? And the minister tells us that the Irish Free State has agreed to pay; have they any shipping? You might as well say that Switzerland or Alberta is willing to agree to collect for these islands.

Mr. McINTOSH: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. DUFF: Or Saskatchewan. The thing is ridiculous. The minister knows that the Canadian taxpayers pay for all the lights on both our coasts and on the great lakes. We do not ask the Bahamas or the Leeward islands or Australia or the Irish Free State or even Great Britain to help pay for these lights. Not only does Canada pay for all the lights in Canada but also for some in Newfoundland as the minister knows. These are lights of a particular kind and placed in positions of particular advantage for Canadian and other shipping. But why should the Canadian vessel owner or taxpayer pay for lights in the Bahamas or the Leeward islands? Take for example the Empress of Britain, she makes perhaps twenty trips to Quebec in a year. If this resolution passes, every time she enters at Quebec she will have to pay lights dues for lights, where? Down at Nassau. The only time the Empress of Britain goes to Nassau is perhaps once a year; when liquor gets scarce in Quebec and she takes a number of passengers down to Nassau. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion or resolution is ridiculous. I say seriously to the minister that when Great Britain comes forward with a proposition that all the lights in the British empire should be maintained from one fund that will be time enough to ask Canadian shipping to help keep up lights in the Bahamas or on the coast of England or elsewhere.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would be opposed to that.

Mr. DUFF: So would I, but I am putting that forward as a much better proposition than the one the minister asks us to adopt now. I ask the minister to have the committee rise, so as at least to give time for more consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: I look on the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) as the admiral of the Canadian navy. I trust the day is not far distant when Canada may realize its duty to the British fleet, and be ready not only to contribute to aids to navigation but to make a proper contribution by the people of Canada to maritime freedom. We do not know what we owe to the British fleet. When the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough was sitting on this side of the house he will remember the Petersen contracts in which it was proposed to pay thousands of dollars by way of subsidy to a concern with no control over ocean rates at all. I hope the day is not far distant when the people of Quebec and of all the provinces will take a broad view of this matter, because I believe in the principle on which confederation is based, the principle of all for one and one for all. My friends on the other side are always talking about more overseas trade. We have the Canadian merchant marine and it is necessary no doubt to maintain these contributions and collections as aids to navigation, and they have not been opposed in the past by hon. members opposite. I maintain that not only should there be a contribution towards aids to navigation, to avoid disasters and loss of life, but it should be made willingly. I hope the day is not far distant when these aids may be extended and increased to the head of the great lakes, where there have been many disasters through lack of proper lights and signals and aids to navigation. I commend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) for the resolution. Hon. members of the opposition should be consistent.

I have never gone to sea but if I went I should feel safe with such a sea admiral as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough.

Mr. POWER: It took a great deal of circumlocution or circumnavigation and ingenuity for the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) to reach the point where he could wave the flag and sing Britannia Rules the Waves. But with all respect to him I think we have a perfect right to object to this resolution until at least we have more information. The minister has told us that the Irish Free State and Australia and India are proposing to pass similar legislation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They have passed similar legislation, they are collecting these dues.

Mr. POWER: He has not yet told us who asked this country to do so. Was it by a letter from the British government, a letter from the collectors of the lighthouse fund, or is it a matter of agreement, one of these conventions that we are ratifying now, or did it originate in the minds of officials in his department? We want far more light, but we do not want to pay for it unless we have to. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) referred to the tax on vessels such as the Empress of Britain. The Empress of Britain I think is a vessel of about forty thousand tons. I understood the minister to say that the tax would be a penny a ton each time this vessel comes into Quebec?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand the tonnage of the Empress of Britain is forty-two thousand tons, and the tax is a penny a ton on the registered tonnage.

Mr. POWER: That would amount to $420 each time this vessel came into Quebec.

Mr. DUFF: It would be £750 every time she come into Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be $840.

Mr. POWER: I am not surprised that the Prime Minister needs an economic council, when the whole House of Commons cannot make a simple calculation in multiplication. I am inclined to agree with the Prime Minister that it is $840. Therefore that is what it would cost the Empress of Britain every time she came into the port of Quebec if the explanation given by the minister is correct. And she comes in something like ten or twelve times a season.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, twenty times.

Mr. POWER: It has been pointed out that the Empress of Britain may conceivably go to the Bahamas once a year with one of those ocean cruises, and for that she would have to pay something like $8,000 or $9,000. The thing seems absurd on the face of it. As has been pointed out by some of our friends from the prairies it seems absurd that we should carry the burden of these duties when the United States, our next-door neighbour, is exempt. And particularly may I say that it is with a certain amount of regret I see this government, of all governments, imposing such dues on vessels coming into Canadian ports. One of the principal articles in the program of this government was free ports, though I must say that in the application of that term I fear those who preached that we should have free ports in this country neglected to look up either the dictionary meaning of the term or the meaning generally accepted in maritime countries. However, they left the impression with the people of this country that free ports meant ports with lower dues, but here one of the first pieces of legislation with respect to ports will place our ports at a disadvantage as compared with those of the United States.

And for whose benefit is this being done? It is for the benefit of ships trading in the Bahamas, for the benefit of ships, I would say, largely owned by Americans. I do not know what the proportion is, but I would say that far more ships of American registry ply in those waters than ships of Canadian or even of British registry.

Mr. DUFF: We have only two ships in Canada that go to the Bahamas.

Mr. POWER: Apart from bootlegging vessels we have probably only two Canadian ships that go to the Bahamas. My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough tells me the only two vessels are the Lady Rodney and the Lady Somers. It strikes me that the whole proposition is very much like having the American government ask us to impose an income tax on our citizens, the proceeds of which would be devoted to keeping up the highways or bridges of the United States, and more than that, it would be the imposition of a tax on people formerly exempt, because in this case vessels coming into Canada, as has been shown here this afternoon, are exempt from dues in connection with our own lighthouses. I cannot imagine anything more extraordinary than asking the Canadian people, who have contributed largely over a period of years to the cost of lighthouses and other aids to navigation, and who do not charge that cost to vessels entering Canadian ports, now to suffer in any way or make any further sacrifices in order to keep up the lighthouses of any other country. I cannot understand why this legislation should be introduced, and after mature consideration I think probably the minister will withdraw it.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the minister explain how these dues are collected now? How does the British government get any revenue from vessels using or deriving benefits from the Bahamas islands lighthouses?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The collection is made when a ship that has benefited by those lights visits a British port, and similar laws have been adopted by Australia, India and other parts of the British empire. If a ship does not visit a British port before or after having derived benefits from those lights but lands in a Canadian port, under the proposed legislation the collection will be made at this port. That will be the practice in Canada if this legislation is adopted. At the present time if a Canadian ship derives benefits from those lighthouses on its way to Great Britain, for instance, she pays these dues on her arrival in the British port. We are only asking now that these dues be collected in Canada for the general fund of Great Britain from ships deriving benefits from these lighthouses, visiting a Canadian port instead of a British port. There is nothing extraordinary in this measure. We are only adopting a regulation in force in Great Britain for the maintenance of their lighthouses. It is quite true that we have not the same policy in Canada, but since we are not doing this for our own benefit but are acting only as collection agents for Great Britain I think this is fair legislation.

Mr. VENIOT: Can the minister inform the committee what constitutes deriving benefits from these lights, which would entitle the British government to collect dues? What would be considered deriving benefit? Would a vessel have to enter a port of the Leeward islands or of the Bahamas group?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No. According to the regulations—

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps the minister will let me finish. Would the vessel have to enter one of those ports, or would it be taxed for going along the sea coast and being guided in the trip across the ocean by the lights it might see along the coast? What entitles the British government to collect those dues for benefits derived by such vessels?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand there are British regulations stating the zones and routes within or along which ships derive benefits from those lights, even though the ships do not visit a port in the Bahamas. If the ship passes within a certain distance of the lights, so that it must have those lights in order to obtain its direction, it derives benefits from the lights and is supposed to pay the dues. I might say to my hon. friend from Quebec South that the Empress of Britain, which voyages from Quebec to Southampton, does not pay any dues for these lighthouses. These dues would be collected only if the Empress of Britain went to the West Indies, for example, or passed through the Panama canal. On voyages from Quebec to Southampton no dues would be collected in connection with those lights.

Mr. DUFF: Does my hon. friend mean to say that a vessel going through the Panama canal and not calling at Nassau or Jamaica would have to pay something to this fund when it returned to Canada because it might happen to see the lights whilst thirty, forty or fifty miles away, on a fine night?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No. When it is considered, according to the British regulations, that the ship has derived benefits from the lights or when it has been guided by the lights, it is supposed to pay dues.

Mr. DUFF: Who is to decide when the ship derives benefits?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Regulations have been adopted by the British authorities setting out certain zones.

Mr. DUFF: We would like to have those zones. The minister must realize that the Bahamas and Jamaica are in an entirely different position from Canada. Canada is a self governing country, and while we are under the British flag and part of the British empire we are in an entirely different position from either the Bahamas or Jamaica. If the British government would come to the Minister of Marine or to this government and say, "Let us pool our lighthouse and buoy interests in the British empire; if you will collect from ships arriving in Canada we will collect from ships coming to Liverpool and London and other British ports, and from that general fund maintain all the lights." If that were done I could understand that there might be some sense in the resolution. But surely the minister or the government is not going to compel the ship owners to do what is asked in the resolution. Goodness knows there are few enough ship owners in Canada now; most of the ships have been driven away from this country, first because of the shipping act of last year, and secondly because of the act which was on the statute books previous to that. We have driven our ships to Newfoundland, or to some other place, for registration.

Surely the minister will not compel the ship owners of this country to pay for lights in the Bahamas or Jamaica. Canada is paying for her own lights. Ships coming from New York or any other port of the United States get the benefit of those lights. This country does not ask United States ships to pay light dues when they arrive at Halifax, Vancouver or any other Canadian port, nor does the United States ask us to pay light dues on our ships travelling from Halifax or Sheet Harbour to the ports of New York or Boston. So far as that is concerned there is a reciprocal arrangement. Simply because the Bahamas are a crown colony, and Jamaica is practically in the same position I cannot see why our ships should pay the British admiralty or into a British fund for the purpose of keeping up lights either in the Bahamas or Jamaica. It is not right, and I demand of the minister that he ask this committee to rise and report progress, and that he should not try to force this resolution through parliament. It was bad enough last year when the minister forced the Shipping Act through the house. It has been on the statute books a year, and the minister has never dared to put it into effect. Here is another matter coming along to make it harder for the ship owners of this country, a provision which will compel them to pay money to the British treasury for lights in the Bahamas and Jamaica. It is neither fair nor right and I demand of the Prime Minister and the government that the minister be asked to move that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to ask the minister whether or not the intention behind the resolution would be that of having the Canadian government collect fees for Trinity House. Hon. members who know the sea will know that most of the international lights, and the matter of developing lights in harbours, has been brought about by an institution in Great Britain known as Trinity House. It is possible that the lights may have been placed in position by Trinity House for the purpose of guiding international navigation. I should like to ask the minister whether or not the imperial government are collecting money for Trinity House through the instrumentality of this federal government.

Mr. DURANLEAU: According to the information I have and the correspondence which has taken place between British authorities and my department, I believe that is not the situation. These lights were placed years ago by the British government and at the expense of the British exchequer. Only in 1898 was the original cost and maintenance of the lights transferred to the general lighthouse fund of Great Britain. I understand that at the present time the board of trade of England is in charge of the administration of the lights.

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe that if the minister looked into the matter he would find that Trinity House is an independent organization which has been given power by the British government to collect dues and fees for the lights. I believe if he went into that aspect of the matter he would have no difficulty in answering the observations quite properly made by hon. members on this side of the house. Most of the lights in the world —and I am speaking in a broad and general way—are maintained by the organization I have named which, to all intents and purposes, is quite independent. The British government merely gives it power to erect the lights. In many places where there are lights there are no governments which could be responsible for the maintenance of such lights. No doubt the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) knows about Trinity House.

Mr. DUFF: Would the hon. member allow me to answer the question? Whilst in the old days there was a fund known as the Trinity fund, such fund applied only to lights in the British Empire, and before several British states obtained their autonomy. For instance, the Canadian ratepayers pay for the lights in the strait of Belle Isle. We pay for the light at Cape Race; we pay for the one at Cape Ray, we pay for the one at St. Paul's island, and the one at Anticosti island. Any vessel of any nationality may use those lights without paying light dues. If Canada has been good enough to provide lights for the shipping of the world and for vessels coming from the Bahamas, she should have like privileges extended to her. Of course we know no shipping comes from the Bahamas or from Jamaica to Canadian ports. As I said a moment ago, the only Canadian ships which use the ports of the Bahamas or of Jamaica are the Lady Rodney and the Lady Somers. Our lights are open for shipping from Jamaica; we have lights in place to protect any shipping there may be from the Bahamas, and I say it should be a reciprocal arrangement. The only reason the British government has asked is because the Bahamas are crown colonies. Surely there is no need for this country to pay light dues to keep up lights in the Bahamas. With the exception of the island of St. Pierre the Bahamas are the most prosperous islands in the world. On account of the liquor trade those islands have prospered—and I do not say they should be accused of conspiracy. The treasury of the Bahamas is full to overflowing, and I cannot see why we should be asked to pay for lights around those islands. The same applies to Jamaica. Jamaica is in a much better financial position than is Canada, and I cannot see why this poor country which is keeping up the lights on the Atlantic coast, on the great lakes, on the Pacific coast and around Newfoundland for the benefit of international shipping should now be asked to pay for lights in the Bahamas and Jamaica.

It is a most unusual proposition when we find the minister or the government asking us to take such action. They are not well advised in placing this resolution before parliament and in asking the taxpayers and the ship owners to give effect to it. I respectfully ask the Minister of Marine to move that the committee rise, and I would suggest also that before he proceeds—if he does proceed—he secure some further information to put before the committee.

Mr. DURANLEAU: What information do you want?

Mr. DUFF: I do not want any, but the minister wants some.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He needs it.

Mr. DUFF: The minister is at sea. He is not only in the dark and in the fog, but he is at sea. I would advise him to get more light on the subject before he asks parliament to tax the people and the Canadian ship owners to keep up lights in the Bahamas and Jamaica.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think we should have any further discussion without more detailed information from the minister. As I understand the situation, the resolution would have the effect of placing a burden on ships coming to Canada. That point has been indicated by the hon. members for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) and Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I am afraid such provision as is now indicated would have the effect of taking away more of the trade of Canada, because vessels from any port in the United States going to the points indicated would not have the dues to pay. The result would be that we would lose some of our shipping. As has been pointed out—and I know because I visited that part of the country only last summer—the Canadian government pays for the lighting around Newfoundland, takes care of repairs and maintenance and pays the salaries of officials. Now if in Canada we maintain lights and seaways for all the vessels that come to our waters from all parts of the world, I do not see why we should be called upon to pay a tax upon the vessels coming to this country. I do not think it is fair. The minister may have good intentions. He wants to help other parts of the world, and to help the fund in England and to help those organizations that are looking after the collection of these dues. But charity begins at home, and we should not be doing anything in this country that is going to be injurious to the interests of Canadian shipping. I think the minister has the interests of Canadian shipping at heart, that he means well, but he has lots to do and he has not in his department a deputy minister to advise him. He has an assistant deputy minister, but for the last three years he has not had a deputy minister. Formerly he had a deputy minister who was well versed on all these questions, and it may be that if the minister had had a deputy who had been in office for a couple of years and familiarized himself with all these questions he would not now be presenting this resolution to parliament. As I say, I think the minister is sincere but perhaps he does not see the bearing of the legislation that he is asking the house to accept. He means well, but of course he is not a shipping man although no doubt since he has been Minister of Marine he has learned something about shipping; but before that he had not touched even the fringe of the shipping business.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the suggestion that has been made that the committee rise and report progress so that the minister may consider the matter more fully and be in a position to give the information that has been asked for by my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), for instance, is a very reasonable one.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have no objection to that.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then when the resolution comes up again and we have all the information before us, and when the minister himself is in a better position to answer questions and to give the house full details and give this whole question more careful study himself, he might not be willing to press the resolution any further.

Mr. DURANLEAU: What details do you want?

Mr. DUPUIS: In my opinion details will not suffice. I speak humbly because I am not a mariner nor an admiral, although I am an admirer of the department of the hon. minister. But as I see this question, if the minister cannot convince this house that this legislation will not put this country at a disadvantage compared with other countries of the world, all the details in the world will be useless. I do not see why this legislation was brought down. I understand that this government are heartily in favour of imperialism, but in this legislation they are working quite to the contrary end. It may be that it will help the British empire to pay a few dollars for lighthouses, but on the other hand the results will be disastrous because it will prevent ships coming to our own country, which is a part of the British empire. I do not see why this legislation was ever brought in when it was admitted that this country pays all the expenses of its own lighthouses and even those in Newfoundland. I am not sufficiently conversant with shipping laws to be sure that shipping from the United States coming to Canada would have to pay lighthouse dues, but I think not; I think there is no international agreement to that effect. If that is so, may I be allowed to fancy that the hon. minister has another thought in the back of his head, that in passing this legislation he will induce ships to go to the United States instead of coming to Canada, and that he will then have to dig out the Chambly canal and that his real reason may be that he wants to give the government a good reason for digging it up. If that is his reason I am all in favour of the minister, but otherwise I would suggest that consideration of this resolution be postponed until we are convinced that it will not be to the detriment of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the collection of an admitted liability of a ship is what is aimed at, but inasmuch as apparently the lack of knowledge has not proceeded from the minister but from those who have criticized him, possibly it will serve a useful purpose if the committee rise and report progress, and afford those who have been criticizing an opportunity to realize what the measure really is for.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to stand for that. There is no man in this house with such little knowledge of shipping as the Prime Minister, and indeed about a number of other things. He should not set himself up to criticize myself and other people for trying to get information about this matter from the minister. I have been very fair, and I am not going to allow the Prime Minister or anybody else to make any insinuations such as he did a moment ago.

I think I made a fair proposition to the minister when I suggested that he have the committee rise and report progress. May I say to the minister that if this country is paying for the upkeep of lights in the Bahama islands and Jamaica, we should ask Great Britain if they are willing to pay for the upkeep of lights in Canada, because there is no country in the world whose shipping uses Canadian lights more than Great Britain. If we are to pay Great Britain for the upkeep of lights in the Bahamas and Jamaica we should inquire of Great Britain whether they are willing to pay for our lights, and especially the lights at Belle Isle, Cape Race, Cape Ray and the lights off St. John and Halifax, and in the St. Lawrence river. That is a fair proposition. I believe in reciprocity, as the Prime Minister knows. I am a stronger advocate of reciprocity than the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Finance, and I repeat that if this country is going to pay for the upkeep of lights, perhaps not in foreign countries, but in British colonies scattered all over the world, the British government should help pay for the upkeep of lights in the St. Lawrence and on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada. That is a fair proposition. Again I say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not going to stand for the insinuations of the Prime Minister that we on this side of the house do not know what we are talking about.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty is that it is not the country that pays any part of it, as any hon. member knows who knows anything about this resolution. It is the ship that pays the dues, and it is an admitted liability, and this legislation is merely to provide that as a matter of courtesy we will collect it, the same as Australia and New Zealand are doing. The liability is admitted. It is not a question of the liability of Canada or of the taxpayers of Canada. The ship pays the light dues if she uses the facilities; that is all.

Mr. DUFF: That is a very wise and smart remark of the Prime Minister, very wise indeed. A country is made up of individuals, whether they are ship-owners or captains or mates or sailors or prime ministers or ministers or anybody else; we are all the people of this country. My hon. friend the Prime Minister, perhaps not to-day, but not so very long ago, owned shares in ships. I know that at the convention in Winnipeg he was going to lay his all on the altar to serve Canada, and get rid of his holdings in ships and everything else. But thousands of people have shares in ships belonging to Canada, and they are taxpayers of this country. While technically the Prime Minister is right in saying that the ship pays, actually the owners of the ship pay, and not only the owners of the ship but the owners of the cargo also pay, and not only the owners of the cargo, but the consumer also pays. Consequently the Prime Minister is wrong and I am right.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not desire to take up the time of the house. I never owned shares in any ship; that is unfortunate but it is a fact. May I further remark that the Canadian Pacific ships to which reference is made are registered either in London or in Liverpool and not in Canada.

Mr. DUFF: Does the minister not own shares in the Canadian National ships as a ratepayer of Canada?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not want to prolong the discussion except to say that my hon. friends are wrong when they contend that this legislation would discriminate against Canada. The ships of all the countries of the world which will derive benefit from these lights will have to pay dues, so that there is no discrimination against this country. However, in order to enable my hon. friends to study the whole matter and to be better posted the next time, I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN UNEMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 8, to establish an unemployment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Toronto Northwest): When the house adjourned on Tuesday evening I had just stated that the four major economic risks that confronted workers were these: first, unemployment owing to the infirmities of old age; second, unemployment owing to invalidity; third, unemployment owing to sickness; and fourth, unemployment owing to there being no work for them to do. I just wish to say a word or two with respect to the first three of these economic risks.

In regard to old age pensions, which will come up later on, all I have to say is this: When the present depression began, many men had reached the age of about sixty and under ordinary circumstances they would have remained in the employ of the companies for which they were working because of faithful service, but now as a result of the depression they are out of work and have attained the age of sixty-five, and they may never again in this lifetime receive a steady job. In view of this fact, I believe that perhaps the time has come to lower the age limit with respect to old age pensions from seventy years to sixty-five.

In reference to invalidity, I am not sure whether the proposal which the government has in the bill to inquire into the question of national health insurance covers invalidity, but I assume it does. And as regards sickness, I believe that the proposals in connection with national health will in due course cover this contingency. Certainly provision to meet the sickness of workers, and to provide unemployment pensions for layoffs of workers who are sick, is a matter which is complementary to an unemployment insurance measure.

May I allude for a moment to something said in the earlier part of the debate, namely, the suggestion that the reserve fund accumulated as a result of collections in connection with unemployment insurance would not be material. I have been investigating the course of events in Britain between the passing of the legislation there in 1911 and the year 1920, and I find that in Britain they accumulated a reserve amounting to $100,000,000. At first, in Britain, only 2,250,000 persons were covered, and about the year 1916 some 4,000,000 were covered. Therefore between 2,000,000 and 4,000,000 working men, between 1911 and 1920, on the basis of a contribution of 5 cents per week from the worker, 5 cents from the company and 3½ cents from the government, a reserve was accumulated of $100,000,000. The legislation now before us contemplates contributions of 25 cents from the worker, 25 cents from the company and 10 cents plus cost of administration from the government. It would strike me therefore that, had the same rates been in operation in England for the nine years between 1911 and 1920, instead of $100,000,000 there would have been laid up approximately $500,000,000, with the result that what has been called the dole for British unemployed would not have placed the unemployment reserve fund in debt to the extent of $500,000,000. Had the Canadian rates been in force in England in those nine years the fund laid up in that period would have apparently been sufficient to take care of what is known as the debt resulting from the dole.

I am not a new convert to the principle of unemployment insurance. I have made a wide and extended investigation over a number of years and covering the situation not only in Great Britain but in continental Europe, and I have also made inquiries in the United States wherever I could obtain any information on the subject. As a consequence I am a convinced advocate, looking at the matter from the point of view of the man who works within the four walls of a plant, that this measure will be beneficial to the Canadian worker. I have heard it suggested that the man with a steady job may be opposed to the bill on the ground that he may not profit from his contributions. But once the act is in operation and has been in force for a year or two I believe we shall find the same situation here that developed in England: every man engaged in industry will have become a strong advocate of the act, because by that time many men will have benefited from the legislation.

I cannot see how a uniform act of unemployment insurance, an act operating uniformly in each of the nine provinces, can do anything but give eminent satisfaction; and as regards effects on the costs of production, inasmuch as the act will be uniform throughout the nine provinces there will be no discrimination in favour of one province and against another. In my experience, extending over many years and in which I have come in contact with thousands of working men, I have seen many men laid off, many temporarily and many permanently, and I am sure that no one who has had the unpleasant duty of informing a man that his services are not required even for a short time, and more especially for a long period, will fail to agree with me when I say that it is generally a serious state of affairs for the man who is so notified. I can say this, as regards employers —for my experience enables me to say this with respect to the great majority of them, and in fact I am not aware of any who do not conform to what I am about to say—that they are generally Christian, God-fearing men who, when it fell to their lot to give any man such notice, felt almost as greatly affected as the man himself.

As a sort of background to what I am saying I will mention five instances I know of. No. 1 worked for a corporation for thirty years; No. 2 worked for a corporation for twenty-nine years; No. 3 worked for another corporation for twenty-seven years; No. 4 worked for an old family company for twenty-six years; and No. 5 worked for another company for twenty-one years. In the shuffle of business, taking good times with bad times, these five concerns either merged, sold out or simply went out of business, and in every instance each of these five men lost his position and was faced with unemployment. Now, one might ask why these men had not laid by a sufficient sum to take care of themselves. Well, industry is so organized that these five men to whom I refer did not, any of them, have forty weeks' work per year; and considering that fact, together with average sickness and layoffs, they were not able to do more than put by a little, not sufficient to provide against unemployment. Unemployment insurance would have been of great benefit to these five men, as well as thousands of others.

It has been intimated by hon. members opposite that unemployment insurance has not been adopted in this country because the British North America Act prevented parliament from doing so as a federal matter and the provinces have not enacted such provincial laws. But we know that technical education, old age pensions and certain other matters that were formerly recognized as coming wholly under the jurisdiction of the provinces, have been dealt with by the federal parliament and I believe the time has come for the enactment of federal legislation in regard to unemployment insurance so as to make for uniformity in the nine provinces and to eliminate the possibility of haphazard legislation of this kind. I am happy indeed that the government has found a way to bring this about.

It is now generally recognized that matters of this kind, particularly in a federal country, should be dealt with by a federal government. I have made inquiries and I find that in 1931 the United States chamber of commerce made a most exhaustive investigation throughout the forty-eight states and recommended to the national government that any legislation in regard to unemployment insurance should if possible issue from Washington and be uniform in each one of the forty-eight states.

Again, the governors of six of the main states of the eastern United States; that is the governors of Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Massachusetts, met in 1931 and made an exhaustive inquiry in the several states, in connection with the same subject, that of unemployment insurance and they recommended that it should not be purely a state question but should be enacted for uniformity, by the national government.

Then Bill No. S 2616, introduced in February, 1934, in the United States congress was a national bill. It did not pass congress, but I am informed that this year another bill is to be introduced which again will provide for a uniform federal scheme. This goes to show that the federal union of the United States, after an exhaustive inquiry, had reached the conclusion that unemployment insurance should be a federal and not a state matter.

The experience in Switzerland, which is a federal union, should be a good guide in this connection. In that country nine cantons have now compulsory unemployment insurance; fourteen cantons have voluntary unemployment insurance and the remaining two of the twenty-five cantons have none. If such a situation as that were to prevail in Canada, with one province having unemployment insurance and another not having it, anyone can see that that would not have a very beneficial effect on the people of this country. The experience in Switzerland strikes me very forcibly as a reason why legislation of this nature in a federal union should be a federal matter.
