As regards the subject of unemployment insurance, I believe it had its genesis as far back as 1601 in the guardian poor laws of Great Britain and then on down through the centuries to the last couple of decades of last century and the first decade of this century when the great labour unions of Great Britain, Germany and other continental European countries adopted what they called "out-of-work benefits." I might go back too to 1831 when a great printer's union of New York state adopted an out-of-work benefit scheme. It is a remarkable fact that in 1911 when the British government adopted its first unemployment insurance act—and it was the first government in the world to do so—the royal commission that reported on the question based a great deal of its report in recommending unemployment insurance on the achievements of the out-of-work benefit schemes that had been effected in Great Britain by the great labour unions of that country. Following the adoption of unemployment insurance by Great Britain in 1911, seven continental European countries and the state of Queensland, Australia, adopted compulsory contributory unemployment insurance schemes after the manner of the British law, and eight other countries in Europe adopted voluntary contributory acts.

On the continent of North America practically nothing was done by governments until about a year ago when the state of Wisconsin adopted an act, but that act is only, at present, building a reserve. They expect to start paying unemployment insurance benefits on July 1, 1935, but outside Wisconsin no other state has adopted anything of this nature. It is true that Ohio made an investigation into the matter and introduced a bill, but it was not passed. On the other hand several of the great industrial groups in the United States have adopted unemployment insurance schemes and they have had them in operation for some time. The electrical union adopted a scheme known as the N.E.M.A. scheme. There are about three hundred companies in that union and the scheme has been in operation for a few years. I went especially to Schenectady to see originators of the scheme, the General Electric Company, and discussed the plan with them. There are fourteen companies in Rochester that have had for several years what is known as the Rochester plan. Then there is the Case plan and all of these are different one from another, so that I am still further convinced that in a federal union the course now being taken by this government is the right one. Only two states, Wisconsin and Ohio, of the forty-eight in the republic to the south have introduced in their legislatures measures respecting unemployment insurance and only one of the two, Wisconsin, has adopted an act. The bills in these two states differ in many particulars, convincing me still further that in a federal union the law should be a federal one so that there may be uniformity.

I am going to make a comparison in a general way of some of these measures with the one now before the house. The whole theory of unemployment insurance can be boiled down to four plans. There is the plan on which the English Act is based, of compulsory contributions by the state, the employer and the worker. A similar plan is in vogue in eight countries of continental Europe, although differing in details. For instance, in Italy the government contributes nothing, according to my information, it is a two party scheme, with contributions from the employer and the worker. In Russia the plan, although I believe it is not now in operation, called for contributions from the state and from the employer but not from the worker. In Germany it is principally also a two-party plan, the worker and the employer contributing equally and the government paying a subsidy towards the cost. The best of all is the British plan because it is tripartite and is fundamentally sound. The American plan of which I spoke, the Wisconsin plan, was designed from another angle altogether, its purpose was to encourage stability of employment, and that part of the Wisconsin act I like. It was designed for stabilization. Any company guaranteeing employment for forty-two weeks in the year for not less than twenty hours a week is exempt from the Wisconsin act. Apart from its stabilizing effect I do not like the Wisconsin plan, because I wonder what will happen to employees of companies that give the guarantee and then go out of business. I am in favour of a plan such as that proposed by this government, to which the state, the employer and the employee contribute, which is based on fundamentally sound principles and backed by the government.

I do not intend to discuss the N.E.M.A. plan or the Rochester plan because both are purely company plans, and I am not in favour of company plans, but I am strictly in favour of governmental operation in a matter of this nature.

Travelling to England I had a very concrete example of what the British act means to the average worker. Everyone who travels on the ocean knows how on the first day you are out your steward comes to you perhaps once and calls you for your bath in the morning. The second day he not only does that but he might flick the dust off you once or twice. The third day he gives you a lot more attention, brings you a cup of coffee in the afternoon, and so on, but as you get closer to the British coast he attends to you very frequently. On my voyage my steward told me his ship was going to be laid up when it reached Liverpool, thus working on my sympathies, the result being that from my cabin he received two pounds. He said, "Well, it won't be so bad, because on landing I will collect my book from the company and go down to the labour office and deposit it there and after being unemployed for six days I shall start to draw." For himself and his wife and his four children his benefit would amount to $8.29 a week. I remember what the Prime Minister said that to-day adjusting for exchange rate and so on it amounts to about twenty-five per cent above the figure I have just quoted. I remember the steward's remark quite well, he said, "I can live on that until this old tub sails again."

While in the old country I made a very thorough survey of the subject. I found men in the great factories were enthusiastic supporters of the principle of unemployment insurance, that convinced me that the idea is sound.

I have here a statement showing the characteristics of unemployment insurance acts in a comparative form which I believe is of interest. It will be noticed among other things that the rates proposed for Canada are certainly favourable:

A digest of these figures, Mr. Speaker, will show that the act proposed by this government, as compared with the acts in operation in other countries, should be efficient and satisfactory, and I am happy indeed to support it.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, first I must say that I am a supporter of the principle of unemployment insurance. I, with other members on this side of the house, have always approved of it every time the question has been discussed or raised in this house. Unemployment insurance is no new move; it did not come as a bolt from the blue as the result of a certain atmospheric commotion one fine evening last January. It has been in force in many countries for different periods of time. The World Economic Survey for 1934, published by the League of Nations, mentions that this form of insurance is now in force in seventeen countries. In nine countries it is a compulsory system, while in eight countries it is voluntary. The United States magazine, Review of Reviews, in its January edition mentions that at present unemployment insurance schemes are being discussed in forty-eight states in the world, as well as in the congress of the United States.

In England unemployment insurance was established in 1911, after a few years of work. There it constituted part of the chain of social policies launched by the late Mr. Asquith when he was Prime Minister, after the elections of 1906, and it was presented to the House of Commons in England by Mr. Lloyd George, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, after a thorough study of the question in Germany, where the system was already in force. Indeed, it was a part of their social program of reforms, which included old age pensions, health insurance, factory acts, a companies act, and wage regulation acts. All these were put on the statute books of Great Britain by the Asquith government, which tends to show that those men, the Liberals of Great Britain, who are sometimes charged with being adepts at the policy of laissez-faire, are those who put most of the social legislation of England on the statute books of that country.

This is no radical change in the capitalist system, I assure you. Some of the nations which have the system in force are the strongest bulwarks of capitalism, and Canada is far ahead of them in the matter of advanced legislation. Nowhere has it cured unemployment; especially has it not solved the problem of a depression unemployment, such as exists at the present time. This measure cannot help those who are unemployed in Canada to-day. The government are rather unfortunate in their chain of reform legislation. They introduce the eight hour day bill at a time when the workers of Canada would like to work one day a week if they could; they introduce a bill to enforce a day of rest every week when the workmen would like to have an enforced day of labour weekly, and they introduce an unemployment insurance bill which may give something in the future to the labour men of Canada who at the present time can afford to contribute to the fund, which most of them cannot. It is, I admit, a sop to discontent. Accompanied by other legislation which would deal with the present distressing problem of unemployment this legislation would be desirable, and because I am in favour of it I wish we might have this system as a valid, constitutional instrument, and not merely what is proposed by the government to-day.

Let me tell my hon. friend who has just taken his seat that I agree with him that it is desirable that this should be a national system. There would be objections to various different provincial schemes of unemployment insurance instead of a national scheme. For instance, it would disturb the equilibrium of industrial relations in the various provinces. Labour naturally would be inclined to go to the provinces where such legislation was on the statute books, and on the other hand it is possible that employers would prefer provinces where they would not be forced to contribute to such a scheme. So it is desirable that it should be a national scheme. I agree with the view taken by members of the government until they changed their opinion in January last; a national scheme should be reached by either an amendment to the British North America Act, by some enabling legislation on the part of the provinces or by some understanding with the provinces in order to establish a scheme which would be acceptable to everyone in this country.

A constitutional aspect was raised on various occasions in this house by the members of the government. There was the question of property and civil rights, which no one can deny not only enters into the discussion of this matter but is the mainstay of the whole proposal. The scheme relates to relations between employers and employees, and more so when it is a compulsory scheme, as the one which we are discussing to-day.

How has the government tried to get around this difficulty? I was hoping my right hon. friend opposite would give some further explanations when he moved the second reading of the bill. When speaking on the resolution he said that he did not want to anticipate the longer explanations he would give when the bill was under discussion. My right hon. leader has raised the question, and I was hoping some member of the government would give the house the reasons upon which they base their new found claim to jurisdiction in the matter. However, not having received that, I must rely on the preamble of the bill, a very long preamble in which the government tries to find justification for the legislation mainly on two points, first on sections 23 and 427 of the treaty of peace and secondly on the provision of peace, order and good government of Canada.

As I am limited to forty minutes in my observations I am afraid I have not the time to make complete quotations. However article 23 states that the members of the league:

(a) will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations;

But they do not specify the manner of doing so. Subsection (a) is preceded by two lines which qualify the whole article:

Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon.

The article I have read is subject to the qualification that the whole arrangement is subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon.

Then article 427, the last article in the labour part of the treaty, merely enunciates a principle. It states:

The high contracting parties recognizing that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in section 1 and associated with that of the League of Nations. They recognize that differences of climate, habits and customs of economic opportunity and industrial tradition,—

—enter into a consideration of the case. I have not the time to read it all. Then they continue:

But holding as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Then they indicate nine goals as being desirable to reach,—the eight hour day, the weekly day of rest, the abolition of child labour, and so on. But unemployment insurance is not even mentioned in the goals which are outlined to the nations of the world as being desirable. The article concludes by stating:

Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the high contracting parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the League of Nations.

And so on. Where do we find there an obligation to enact employment insurance legislation? I do not wish to enter upon the same line of argument I used a few days ago in connection with another matter, but I repeat that it is only the obligation which creates the jurisdiction in favour of this parliament.

Section 132 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

There must be obligations binding on Canada as a result of conventions or treaties with foreign countries which bind Canada. I am surprised to find the following words in the preamble of the bill:

And whereas it is desirable to discharge the obligations to Canadian labour assumed under the provisions of the said treaty.

To discharge obligations of Canada to Canadian labour is a noble act, but it is not covered by section 132. What gives jurisdiction to this parliament is the obligation of Canada towards foreign countries, not towards any class of the population in Canada. It is not stated in the preamble that Canada had any obligations towards foreign countries as a result of sections 23 and 427 of the peace treaty. My hon. friends cannot even argue that there is a draft convention, as they did in connection with the eight hour day. There are draft conventions but for a reason better known to the Prime Minister they have not been approved by the house, have not been laid on the table of the house and can give no authority or jurisdiction to parliament. I need not deal with that part of the question at all.

How could Canada be bound to an unemployment insurance scheme? There are 50 member nations of the League of Nations who are obligated by the peace treaty, 66 per cent of whom have no unemployment insurance schemes. I repeat that there is nothing binding, but that a goal has been shown to the members as being desirable.

Then there is the further point, namely the jurisdiction resulting from peace, order and good government. Although I do not wish to repeat what I said a few days ago I should like to read part of section 91 of the British North America Act:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

And in most of the decisions of the privy council regarding jurisdiction which have gone against the contention of the federal parliament it has been specially stated—and the matter is so clearly expressed in the section there can be no doubt—that those laws for the peace, order and good government must be in relation to matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned to the legislatures. Surely property and civil rights are one subject which is specifically assigned exclusively to the provinces under section 92 of the British North America Act.

I shall not refer again to the various decisions of the privy council except perhaps to the Snider case in 1925 where one of the tests of provincial jurisdiction was that the matter of industrial disputes was one that could be dealt with separately by any province, and however desirable it would be to have national legislation with regard to it the fact that it could be dealt with by any province took away the claim to jurisdiction set forth by the federal parliament. Is it not the same in this matter? Does anybody claim that the provinces would not have the right to have an unemployment insurance scheme of their own? Obviously they have that right. Nobody can challenge that, and because of that, the thing cannot be changed into a federal matter merely by a stroke of the pen here, by the will of the government.

My hon. friends opposite rely on the two aviation and radio cases. The judgment in the first was delivered in November of 1931, and the judgment in the second on the ninth of February, 1932. I do not want to discuss this thing over and over again except to say that in both cases there was a binding convention; there was a treaty in respect to aviation, and there was a convention in respect to radio signed by ninety countries and ratified by His Majesty the King. Canada was bound by the provisions of those two treaties, and those were the reasons for the judgments that were delivered.

I do not want to quote any of the remarks of the judge except one. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, at page 642 of Hansard of February 8, 1935, quoted the remarks of the Lord Chancellor in the aviation case, but obviously he was led astray by the officers or the secretaries who looked up the quotations for him because between two paragraphs there has been eliminated a most important one which changes the whole complexion, and I should say the whole meaning of the quotation. I am going to read what was eliminated and I hope that anybody who reads my right hon. friend's speech that was delivered on Friday last will insert these words in the quotation on page 642 at the bottom of the second column where the three dots are. The quotation I am going to read is more voluble than the three dots:

> Inasmuch as the act embodies a compromise under which the original provinces agreed to federate, it is important to keep in mind that the preservation of the rights of minorities was a condition on which such minorities entered into the federation, and the foundation upon which the whole structure was subsequently erected. The process of interpretation as the years go on ought not to be allowed to dim or to whittle down the provisions of the original contract upon which the federation was founded nor is it legitimate that any judicial construction of the provisions of sections 91 and 92 should enforce a new and a different contract upon the federating bodies.

That disposes of the claim that because Canada in common with the rest of the world has widened her activities and developed tremendously, it follows that the British North America Act also has widened and developed and should be changed. It is true that Canada has developed and has widened her activities. But the British North America Act is as it was, and until it is amended in the proper way, which I do not oppose, I say to the government that the only way for this legislation to be enacted as they are trying to do, without the cooperation of the provinces, is by an amendment to the British North America Act. But so long as that act remains there, it is our constitution, and there is no widening process nor development that can change it without new action on the part of those who agree to changing it.

The right hon. the Prime Minister in introducing the resolution said that the law officers of the crown are of the opinion that this legislation is within the jurisdiction of this parliament. Well, if that is so, they have changed their minds, for on the tenth of May, 1928, in the committee presided over by my hon. friend from North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Edwards, was heard, and I quote these three words from his remarks:

Mr. Heaps: If I understand the statements here this morning correctly I would interpret your remarks to mean that the federal government has not authority to impose dominion-wide legislation, or has not authority to impose compulsory unemployment insurance, or sickness insurance?

And the answer of the Deputy Minister of Justice was:

Yes, that is correct.

On April 23, 1929, the same Mr. Edwards, the Deputy Minister of Justice, was again heard by the same committee, and he referred to his evidence of the preceding year and stated that he adhered to what he had said at that time.

Now I come to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who is the head of the law officers, and I am going to quote from his remarks in this house on March 22, 1933, and my hon. friend will not be able to say now that he held these views because he had not received or read the judgments in the aviation and radio cases because this was more than a year after the radio case and eighteen months after the aviation case. I quote from pages 3294 and 3295 of Hansard of March 22, 1933:

Mr. Guthrie: As the department over which I have at the moment the honour of presiding is and has been for some time looking into this question of unemployment insurance, may I say a word in regard to the matter. The difficulties in the way of a federal system of unemployment insurance are very serious if such a system is to be carried out on a contributory basis which, I believe, is the only method which would be approved by parliament, that is, contributions by employees, by employers, by the federal treasury and perhaps as well by the provincial treasuries. To inaugurate and carry out a scheme of that kind without provincial consent and without an amendment to the British North America Act would be impossible. Parliament cannot force employers to contribute nor can it force employees to contribute. These are matters entirely within the jurisdiction of the various provinces, and unless the provinces are willing to surrender some of their rights, their powers, it is impossible without an amendment to the British North America Act to carry out any scheme under the jurisdiction of this parliament. I noticed the leader of the opposition stated in his opening remarks that it would be just as easy to carry out an unemployment insurance scheme as to carry out on old age pension plan.

Mr. Mackenzie King: No, I said the very reverse; I said that it would not be as easy to carry out an unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. Guthrie: That is the corrected opinion of my right hon. friend after the Minister of Labour had spoken.

Mr. Mackenzie King: No, it is not. With all deference to my hon. friend, if he will look at the record, he will see that I said that the same questions of jurisdiction and methods of procedure arise in each case.

Mr. Guthrie: The same questions do not arise. In the old age pension scheme the question was simply this: the federal government will contribute certain money and the provincial governments will contribute certain money. The difficulty was overcome by a dominion act and a provincial act. That was all there was to the matter. This plan of unemployment insurance involves not only the question of government contribution, but compulsory contributions by employers and employees, which is a matter of purely provincial jurisdiction. I am disclosing no secret when I say that at the conference the provinces were not prepared to give up those rights nor to agree to any amendment to the British North America Act for that purpose. Very serious discussions took place, and while the question was advanced, it certainly was not advanced to the point of agreement, no agreement being reached on the subject. Until we have a solution of these two questions: the power to assess the employer and the power to assess the employee, I do not think there is much hope of a federal unemployment insurance scheme. If we can overcome those difficulties; if we can reach an arrangement upon those two questions, then I think the field is fairly clear and satisfactory legislation can be formulated. But until we have those questions cleared up, I do not think very much advance can be made.

That was the opinion of the Minister of Justice, expressed in March, 1933, and the leader of the opposition has quoted statements to the same effect, made by the Prime Minister on two occasions, on April 29, 1931, and on November 22, 1932—all, except the 1931 remarks, after the two judgments on radio and aviation. But there is more than that on the part of the Prime Minister. There is his letter, dated August 31, 1934, to the provincial premiers, in which the question of unemployment insurance is raised. I will read three or four of the first paragraphs of that letter:

As I indicated at the meeting with the provincial premiers in July last, it is my purpose to call a conference of representatives of the governments of all the provinces to meet at Ottawa before the end of the year to discuss with the federal government the following questions and such other matters as may be placed upon the agenda after I have been advised of the views of the premiers of the several provinces:

1. What steps can be taken to reduce the evils of duplicate taxation and provide a more logical allocation of sources of revenue now available to dominion and provinces?

2. Are the provinces prepared to surrender their exclusive jurisdiction over legislation dealing with such social problems as old age pensions, unemployment and social insurance, hours and conditions for work, minimum wages, et cetera, to the dominion parliament? If so, on what terms and conditions?

3. Is it desirable to endeavour more clearly to define the respective jurisdiction of the dominion parliament and provincial legislatures with respect to health and agricultural and other matters in which there is a duplication of effort by federal and provincial authorities?

I have not time to read it all, but my right hon. friend said the other day that when he wrote paragraph 2 he was speaking—

Mr. BENNETT: No, the whole letter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, the whole letter then—he was speaking for the provinces; he was stating the case of the provinces. My right hon. friend in paragraph 2 says:

Are the provinces prepared to surrender their exclusive jurisdiction over legislation dealing with such social problems as old age pensions, unemployment and social insurance, hours and conditions for work, minimum wages, et cetera to the dominion parliament?

And in paragraph 3 he makes this statement:

Is it desirable to endeavour more clearly to define the respective jurisdiction of the dominion parliament and provincial legislatures with respect to health and agricultural and other matters in which there is a duplication of effort by federal and provincial authorities?

Paragraph 2 was referring to matters which are exclusively under the provinces, and No. 3 was referring to concurrent matters on which both the federal and the provincial governments have authority. I invite you, Mr. Speaker, I invite every member of this house, I invite the Dominion of Canada to read this letter and say what other meaning can be attached to what the right hon. gentleman said. And while he was writing that, only a few months ago, my right hon. friend, having stated at almost every session that the matter was purely a provincial one, made the statement on the radio in January that this program of reform he had been unable to deal with because of the storm which had prevailed during these last four years, in which he had to steer the ship. Well, was it the storm or the British North America Act which was the obstacle in the way of this reform legislation? It appears, by every declaration, not only by the Prime Minister, but by the Minister of Justice, by the Deputy Minister of Justice and by other members of the cabinet, by the Secretary of State, that the constitution was the obstacle that was in the way. The Secretary of State, who is a very distinguished lawyer, spoke in Montreal before the Young Men's Canadian Club at the Queens hotel in November last, when he absolutely took the stand that these matters are exclusively under the jurisdiction of the provinces. The Secretary of State uses energetic language at times and I like him for that. Let me read his concluding words:

On the other hand, there are political and social propagandists—blind leaders of the blind—who are persistent in their efforts to procure the dominion parliament to pretend to appropriate and illegally to exercise powers which are exclusively vested in the provincial government. One of these, to whom I recently suggested that a certain course of action was unconstitutional, made reply: "To hell with the constitution!"

I apologize to you, Mr. Speaker.

In these days of social unrest, when people who are suffering are insistent on reform and impatient of delay, those who believe that evolution is more effective than revolution must again and again and persistently demand that municipal authorities assume their full responsibilities in municipal matters, provincial authorities assume their full responsibilities in provincial matters, and dominion authorities there full responsibility in dominion matters.

It is a proper matter for intelligent discussion as to whether the exclusive power of the provinces in matters of social reform should be considerably curtailed, and the powers of the dominion correspondingly extended. Meanwhile, until the British North America Act is amended by constitutional methods, no good purpose can be served by either the dominion parliament or the provincial legislatures attempting illegally to exercise powers now fully vested in the other or others of them.

This is from the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, November 27, 1934. Of course I admit that I have the greatest admiration for my right hon. friend; he is, as we all know, a distinguished jurist, but I have an admiration for his opinions as expressed last year, the year before and the year before that rather than for the one he expresses to-day on the eve of a general election in order to promote a new program of reform.

The other day I heard the Minister of Finance, replying to a motion for the nationalization of banks and explaining why the Bank of Canada had not been made entirely publicly owned, say there might be danger on the eve of a general election; the temptations might be great. He said: Governments are composed of men; they are human and might yield to certain demands to which they would not yield at other times. Perhaps the nearness of the elections has something to do with this new move on the part of the government.

But let me ask this question of my hon. friends opposite. We all say it is desirable that this should be a national system. What if some of the provinces, not having been consulted, not having been asked to co-operate, this scheme not having been submitted to them in any way, decide that they will enact their own schemes of unemployment insurance? Nobody will deny that they have the right to do so; nobody can say that they have not the right to do so. What will be the consequence? There will be chaos, confusion; and will that be advantageous to labour and to the industrial situation of Canada? The government cannot plead emergency on questions of present relief. We have unemployment all over the land. Yesterday I received a letter from the officers of the council of my own city of Quebec pointing out that the number of people on relief is just as large as it was last year at the same time. We have a problem of relief, and the government might argue that there was an emergency as regards relief for unemployment, but not an emergency for a scheme of unemployment insurance which will be operative only in future years and when probably times will have become normal, more particularly because with such a scheme you cannot solve a problem of unemployment created by depression but can solve only a problem of temporary unemployment created by social conditions or changes in factories where people are employed

My right hon. friend said to the board of trade in Montreal the other day that before he changed his mind on many of these questions he had had conversations with Mr. Litvinoff of Russia, Sir Stafford Cripps and Mr. Strachey.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not correctly reported. I had not conversations with Sir Stafford Cripps, but I said that Sir Stafford Cripps and Mr. Strachey had made speeches in Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I hope my right hon. friend is not taking his inspiration from Sir Stafford Cripps.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MITCHELL: Why not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Because Sir Stafford Cripps has preached in Great Britain that the only way for those who are within his group to put into effect their social legislation will be to suspend the constitution of the old country the very day after the election. He said so; he wrote it, and I will show it to my hon. friend, although I have not time to do it now. Sir Stafford Cripps was repudiated by labour at the annual meeting afterwards. If he goes too far for labour in Britain, I am sorry that my right hon. friend should take his inspiration from him on questions of this kind.

Mr. BENNETT: That is hardly fair. The hon. member surely does not wish to misrepresent me. I said that Sir Stafford Cripps had spoken strongly on the socialistic side. I did not give my approval. On the contrary I said that I was wholly opposed to it and I said that very clearly too.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am pleased my right hon. friend so states, but once again he has been misquoted in the press.

Mr. BENNETT: Those who were present will tell my hon. friend what I said.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I repeat that the only way to deal with this question properly would be either by an amendment to the British North America Act in order to have valid legislation or by passing our legislation after having had an understanding with the provinces by way of enabling legislation or otherwise.

I am sorry my time is short. I should have liked to place on Hansard a quotation from what the Secretary of State said when some hon. members in the far corner in 1932, two years ago, preached that this dominion should simply assume jurisdiction as to the water powers of the province of Quebec and deal with them as if we had jurisdiction. This is what he replied:

> It is not for me to say that that contention is valid until it is finally passed upon by a judicial court of final appeal. But when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests that we should take that property and that right, leaving the province to contest our taking of its property, that is simply making the appeal which the ordinary burglar makes when he enters a house and takes property which he knows does not belong to him, leaving it to the householder to put the burglar out and to protect his chattels. I feel sometimes in sympathy with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he suggests, in regard to the protection of labour in this country, certain social improvements, but that proper end cannot be attained by burglary and theft such as he has advocated in this house to-night.

That is exactly what the government is doing now. The government know there is a considerable body of public opinion in Canada which says that this is a provincial matter. In addition they know the law officers of the various provinces claim that this is a provincial matter, but they simply say, ego nominor leo—my name is lion; I assume the authority; I am passing the legislation. That is the same psychology as that of a lynching mob—to assume powers, even when one does not know whether he has them or not. I am sorry I cannot conclude my remarks at this time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his address the other day gave a number of reasons, or alleged reasons, why he had not proceeded to do during his regime what he so strongly urged this government to do immediately after they took office. The first of those reasons was the financial situation: I shall touch on that very briefly.

The right hon. gentleman said it was necessary to balance the budget and to take care of the obligations of the government before venturing upon any new scheme. The budget was balanced, he tells us, in 1924. From that time on he had various other reasons for not proceeding, to which I shall presently refer. It is remarkable, however, that while the party opposite could not proceed with social legislation because of financial conditions, in the last year of their term of office they were able to authorize the Canadian National Railways to spend $205,000,000. That authorization is remarkable in view of the statement made by the right hon. gentleman on Tuesday last, when he said the following, as reported on page 737 of Hansard:

> In order that I may not be misunderstood, may I make clear that if we are to economize, as I think we shall probably be compelled to do all around, the last place at which I think economy should begin is with respect to social services. I think great care should be taken to see that those persons in the country who are less fortunate than their fellowmen are the ones to receive the first concern of the government.

That was the right hon. gentleman's view on Tuesday last. But he could not launch such a scheme as this in 1929, although he could authorize the Canadian National Railways to spend $205,000,000. The next reason he offered was want of jurisdiction. I shall refer to that briefly at the conclusion of my remarks: I pass it for the time being.

The next reason he offered was somewhat akin to the first. He said that very difficult matters were pending between the provinces and the federal government; that in the western provinces the question had arisen respecting the return of the natural resources to the provinces, and while that was pending he thought it unwise to launch any scheme that would involve a question of jurisdiction as between the dominion and the provinces. He said also that in the east there was the question of maritime rights that had to be settled, and for that reason also he was not prepared to launch any new scheme of social services.

The fourth reason he gave is more remarkable still. He said that during the years 1921 to 1925 he had practically no majority in the house. He said he had a majority of but one. The balance of power then was held by hon. gentlemen who sit to the left of the official opposition, and he said that with that small majority of one it was unsafe for him to launch any measure pertaining to social services. So apparently the responsibility rested upon hon. gentlemen sitting to the left of the official opposition; he did not feel that he could depend upon their support for his social legislation. It is remarkable, though, that the only resolutions dealing with social services during that period, the only moves that were made along that line, emanated from those hon. gentlemen who held the balance of power. Yet while they were urging these resolutions and forcing them upon the attention of the government he was afraid to bring in measures such as these for fear hon. gentlemen to the left of the official opposition would not support measures which they themselves had suggested! It is interesting to note what he said on that subject. At page 740 of Hansard the right hon. gentleman said:

> It is one thing to be in a position to bring in extensive schemes on any subject when as prime minister one has behind him a majority of thirty or forty members who at a nod will do as he wishes; it is an entirely different thing to attempt the passage of such measures when a prime minister has for himself and party a majority of only one, or no majority at all.

From that remark I gather he expects when he has a majority of thirty or forty they will obey his will at a nod. Yet we have heard them time and again in this house complain that the government party stands behind its leader, whom they accuse of being a dictator, a Mussolini and all that sort of thing, just because the members who sit with him on this side of the house are prepared to stand behind him to put through the program which the government initiates.

The next reason given by the right hon. gentleman was a yet more remarkable and more vital one. He said, If I did pass this legislation I did not know what the Senate would do. I refer to page 740.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it good practice that we should quote from Hansard of this year?

Mr. BENNETT: It is in the same debate, not another debate.

Mr. BEYNON: The right hon. gentleman said:

> May I point out the further fact that to become law legislation has to pass both houses of parliament, and the Liberal administration of which I was the head had to consider with respect to all legislation the reception which would be given in the other chamber. . . . If in the earlier years we had attempted anything more than we did I do not know what would have happened.

Then he quoted an English statesman as having been fearful of the reaction of the House of Lords. Now that simply means that while there was a Conservative majority in the Senate the right hon. gentleman felt he was not safe in introducing in this house any reform legislation. The situation we have to-day is that the Conservative party has a majority of twelve in the Senate, and there are some twelve or thirteen appointments to be made. I think I am fairly safe in saying that the majority of those appointed will be Conservatives, so that when this house is dissolved the Conservatives should have a majority of some twenty-five in the Senate. Therefore I think it important that before the people of this country go to the polls they should know that as the Senate is then constituted the right hon. gentleman will not feel safe in bringing in any reform legislation for the next twenty-five years.

Mr. McINTOSH: We shall abolish the Senate.

Mr. BEYNON: The situation will be such therefore as not to warrant the right hon. gentleman in introducing any reform legislation at all.

Mr. DUPUIS: The abolition of the Senate will fix that.

Mr. BEYNON: We did hear something before about reforming the Senate, and all the right hon. gentleman had to say at the end of nine years was that the Senate was so bad that he could not do anything on account of it.

The right hon. gentleman made a mistake which is frequently made when a man is making out a case, that of making out too good a case. He said that as far back as 1931 he urged upon the Prime Minister that he should take immediate steps in this matter of unemployment insurance, that he should call a conference of the provinces and try to get them to agree, and that he should proceed to consider amendments to the British North America Act and to settle once for all the question of jurisdiction. I ask hon. gentlemen to note that that was the right hon. gentleman's first year in opposition. Let us see what he had to say in his last year of power, just a few short months before he made that speech in 1931 to which he referred, in which he urged upon the Prime Minister what he ought to do. I quote now from Hansard of 1930 at page 106. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the Prime Minister regarding unemployment insurance, which he made yesterday to a western delegation, will the federal government take the initiative in calling a special conference to consider this problem?

That was a straight question, and the reply was rather remarkable. The Prime Minister of that day, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said:

> Perhaps the hon. member will intimate what that statement was.

Almost twenty-four hours had passed and he had forgotten what he had told the delegation from the west. Then the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said:

> As I understand the statement, it was to the effect that the federal government was very much concerned in the matter of unemployment and believed that one of the solutions was a system of unemployment insurance and that the government would be willing to take any steps possible towards bringing about an understanding between the provinces and the federal government. I want to know if the government will be willing to undertake the calling of a special conference so that this matter can be expedited.

Following that we have the last official pro nouncement by the leader of the opposition when he was in power, as to what he proposed to do in regard to unemployment insurance. Here it is:

> My recollection is that a special committee of this house considered this question last session and brought to the house a report to the effect that unemployment insurance was necessarily a matter with which provincial governments rather than the federal government would have to deal. I think I expressed the view yesterday that in my opinion a system of unemployment insurance would be a constructive way to deal with the unemployment problem—

That is a little different from what he is saying to-day.

> —to which system not only the employer and the governments concerned would contribute but the worker also.

This is what he proposed, however, and this is very interesting in view of the wonderful advice he gave the Prime Minister in 1931, a few short months later, as to what should be done:

If the provinces make a move in this matter and it appears that the federal government can be of assistance—

You see, first the provinces were to move, not the Prime Minister.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes, but—

Mr. BEYNON: I shall be obliged if the hon. gentleman will just keep quiet and let me continue:

If the provinces make a move in this matter and it appears that the federal government can be of assistance in helping to bring about uniformity as between the provinces of any plan proposed, or can cooperate in other ways in any discussion on the subject, we shall be glad upon invitation to take the matter under consideration.

That is the extent to which the right hon. gentleman was prepared to go in 1930, the last year he was in power. Neither he nor his party intended to make a move; they were leaving it to the provinces to formulate a plan and to invite him to come in and, by discussion, help them cooperate between themselves, and he would only come in upon invitation. That is the man who, a few short months later, found that there was a great obligation on the part of the Prime Minister of this country to call conferences, to investigate the jurisdiction in order to settle that question forever and, if necessary, to amend the British North America Act.

I was rather struck with the very fervent and rather poetic peroration of the right hon. gentleman which appears at page 754 of Hansard for this year. Referring to the bill brought in by the Prime Minister the right hon. gentleman said:

In the circumstances, I say to the Prime Minister that in these days of stress and anxiety and suffering for the mass of the people, they are crying for bread and he is giving them a stone. They are crying for fish and he is giving them a serpent—

Those words sounded rather familiar to me; I thought perhaps I might have heard them in some former incarnation, but I discovered that I had heard them in this house. In 1932 the right hon. gentleman made a similar peroration, and at the end of his address in connection with the unemployment and farm relief measure, he said:

The women and children who are suffering in this country to-day have asked the Prime Minister for bread, they have asked him for work, but he has given them not even a stone or a serpent; he has given them an extinct enactment, he has given them a dead statute.

That was at page 704 of Hansard for 1932. I might suggest to the right hon. gentleman that a man who sees serpents so frequently is in rather a critical state of mind. I might also suggest to the right hon. gentleman that when he made that statement in 1932 he was belittling the statute then before the house to reinstate the farm relief and unemployment measure of the previous pear. My right hon. friend made the very dramatic statement that the Prime Minister was giving the people a dead statute when they wanted bread. I should just like to recall to his mind the fact that the dead statute fed and clothed many hundreds of thousands of people in this country. At that time he said the Prime Minister would not even give the people a stone or a serpent. In his speech on Tuesday he admitted that the Prime Minister now is giving them a stone and a serpent. Well, if the dead statute so far exceeded the expectations of the right hon. gentleman what may we not expect from the stone and the serpent?

There is one other point I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. gentleman complains that the Prime Minister has offered a stone and a serpent. I ask any member of this house or any electors throughout this country to read the speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman in 1930 and see if they can find out what he intends to give the people as a substitute.

One other thing struck me very forcibly in the remarks of my right hon. friend, as well as in those of the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon. That hon. gentleman dealt at very great length with the constitutional question. Every word of that address and a great part of the address of the right hon. leader of the opposition, was predicated upon the assumption that, immediately this statute is passed, the people of this country are going to try to destroy it. It seems to me that the members of this house ought to represent pretty well the views of the people, and when every party is claiming the honour of having fathered this legislation it is a strange assumption to make that the people whom they represent are going to set out to destroy it. Why, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) were almost vying with each other as to who originated this scheme, and we have no fault to find with that. But it must seem strange to the people of this country that all parties in this House of Commons should vie with each other in commending this legislation, in supporting the very principle behind it and declaring that if it is to be effective it must be national and not provincial. That is the one point upon which all are heartily agreed, and yet we are told that the people whose views hon. members of this house are supposed to represent are going to set out to destroy this measure. And it is not merely this particular measure, with any faults the opposition may think it has; if they destroy it they destroy the whole principle. If they attack its constitutionality they make the enactment of any statute of the kind utterly impossible. I do not believe the people of Canada will tolerate that attitude on the part of any political party or group. I believe they will insist that hon. members who have supported the measure, their followers and their lieutenants in the provinces, continue to take the same stand, namely that this legislation is for the benefit of the Canadian people, and I believe the Canadian people will not tolerate any attempt to destroy it.

This afternoon the ex-Minister of Justice made a very strong plea for the constitution. He said Canada had grown and developed but that the constitution had stood still. Every constitution in the world is subject to two dangers. One is the reckless and thoughtless disregard for the constitution. I do not believe any party in this chamber can be charged with that. I am sure all hon. members will agree that the constitution has never been endangered by the introduction of legislation for the masses of the people. The second danger, however, to which every constitution is subject is that of holding so rigidly to its letter and form that it becomes subversive of all measures for the amelioration of the wants and needs of the people. To my mind that is the greatest danger which can threaten any constitution. So long as it meets the needs of the people and brings relief where relief is required, the danger is not great, because there is a sufficient body of sound and sane opinion behind it. But the danger is very real when we hold to the letter and form to such an extent that the constitution becomes not a bulwark of the liberty of the people but simply an obstacle to all progress and all reforms tending to alleviate suffering. That I believe is the only real danger facing our constitution to-day. I should be interested to know who throughout the length and breadth of the land are so completely out of touch with the general sentiment in Canada—because either they or every hon. member in the house is out of touch with it—that immediately the statute is passed they will rush to the courts in an attempt to destroy it.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow in detail the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Beynon) further than to say that when he talks about the importance of unemployment insurance between the years 1922 and 1930, when the Liberals were in power, he is not talking sound sense, for the simple reason that in those days there was very little unemployment in Canada about which to talk, or which necessitated putting into practice a measure of this kind.

Mr. SHAVER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McINTOSH: Also, Mr. Speaker, if between the years 1922 and 1930 the question of unemployment insurance was not of paramount importance in the practical politics of Canada—and it was not—then it ill behooves the hon. member for Moose Jaw to rise in his place and attempt to indicate that because unemployment insurance legislation was not introduced in those years the Liberal party, and my right hon. leader, were loath to introduce it. When there is no necessity for a measure, why introduce one, and especially at a time when there was being carried out in this country a great policy of industrial and railway development involving millions and millions of dollars?

Mr. SHAVER: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McINTOSH: No, I have the floor and my time is short. Further, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who preceded me made the statement that the country and the electorate would come to the support of the Conservative party because the members of that party sitting in parliament are supporting this Bill No. 8. Well, if they do, they will show an entirely different disposition to that which was shown in any of the by-elections during the past four years.

Mr. ROWE: That is getting old.

Mr. McINTOSH: No, it is not. With these remarks I shall proceed to discuss the bill before the house. As chairman of the industrial and international relations committee which sat between the years 1922 and 1930 I find it refreshing to see ministers and hon. members to the right of Mr. Speaker rising in their places in this house and espousing the cause of unemployment insurance. It is an attitude vastly different from the one they took for eight years in the history of this Canadian House of Commons. Before I have completed my observations this evening I shall show that from a parliamentary standpoint their position on this question is anything but sound, is not historic and is not encouraging.

An hon. MEMBER: Anything else?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes. When one recalls the political somersaults hon. members opposite have taken in the last four years one cannot help but think of the biblical quotation: can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots? If one were actually to believe that the attitude of hon. members opposite is sincere he would have to come to the conclusion the answer is that the Ethiopian can change his skin and the leopard his spots. I believe however that the Canadian people will have some doubt about that, and for that reason I think the matter is worth looking into very carefully.

When one comes to a discussion of unemployment insurance and like matters it is well to consider whence the Conservative party has come.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where are they going?

Mr. McINTOSH: That is very important too.

Mr. COTNAM: It is where we are going that counts.

Mr. McINTOSH: In the words of the poet, whither are our friends going? In the historic Conservative party of Great Britain the word "Conservative" was the most dominant. The party was supposed to be a Conservative party in opposition to the subversive policy of the Whigs. Then at a later time the Conservative party took on the name of the constructive and positive party with regard to constitutional reform as opposed to the radicalism of the Liberals. There is their basic history in a constitutional sense. In other words they were—and are still—the party of laissez-faire. They wanted to conserve and stand on the same platform politically forever and ever almost, while the Liberal party was ever going onward, making progress and putting through radical measures on behalf of the people.

In regard to the basic social and political policies of the Liberal party as the British party of parliamentary reform, all we need to know is that the Liberal party has always stood for a policy of peace, retrenchment and reform. These principles have always been fundamental in the evolution of the party and they are as fundamental to-day as ever. The Liberal party has always stood for international peace and justice based on national honour and national self-respect. In a reform or retrenchment sense Liberals have ever stood for lowering government expenditures, cutting down the national debt and the national interest and lowering taxation. And the Liberal party stands by these policies yet.

In the way of constructive reform all one has to do is to read British history from 1800 to 1832 and onward through the times when Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel, Palmerton, Gladstone, and later Asquith and Lloyd George piloted the Liberal party in Great Britain. The Liberal party has continually stood for civil and religious liberty; for a belief in human personality; for a belief in the value of human energy; for the state creating conditions which would be more satisfactory for the average worker; for standing by the mastery of each individual's capacity, as well as for establishing a real policy of equality of opportunity. Down through the period of British history this policy of sound radicalism or sound reform on the part of the Liberal party was continued—right down to the war and subsequently. Liberal policy was at the back of practically every article of the treaty of peace. The Liberal party stood for fair and humane labour conditions for men, women and children abroad and in their own country; for the just treatment of the natives of territories under their control; for the supervision of the traffic in women and children; for the supervision of the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs; for supervision of the traffic in arms and ammunition; for taking a stand on behalf of controlling international disease and ill health The physical and intellectual welfare of industrial workers in Great Britain and in the world was likewise espoused, and the necessity was urged for action on the fundamental causes of national and international unrest. That is why the Liberal party later gave all its support to the labour portions of the peace treaty and took the stand that labour should not be looked upon as a saleable commodity. Liberalism was constantly upholding the right of free association for employers and employees; a reasonable standard of living; the eight hour day and the forty-eight hour week, and a weekly day of rest. It stood further for equal remuneration for work done by men and women, and for equality of treatment for all workers; for the rigid inspection of factories in which industrial employees were working.

The Liberal party in Canada has also a substantial policy in the way of peace because its plank in that regard is as follows:

The Liberal party will seek to further wherever possible those courses in international relations which make for peace and good will among nations, and promote friendly intercourse between them. It will seek to further the work of the League of Nations.

Mr. COTNAM: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I submit that the hon. gentleman is reading his speech. That point of order was raised when I was speaking a few evenings ago.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. gentleman read his speech for forty minutes the other day, and I think if he had spoken for forty hours he would have surely read on for forty hours.

Mr. SPEAKER: On the point of order, the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) knows what the rule is, but I think he is just following his own notes.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is right. I was just saying what the policy of the Liberal party was on the questions of international peace and national retrenchment. The Liberal party stands for a policy that has been the policy of the Canadian people from decade to decade, for it seeks to effect a retrenchment in public expenditures and a reduction in the principal and interest on the national debt, and by selling goods cut down taxation and balance the budget. It has also been the party of reform throughout Canadian history.

In passing may I just say that I have a book here entitled Porritt's Evolution of the Dominion of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McINTOSH: Mr. Speaker, although the hon. gentlemen do not understand the contents of this book, that is no reason why they should not listen to what I say about it.

Mr. COTNAM: It would be all right to read it if you could read it well.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am not going to read from the book, Mr. Speaker, but may I point out that throughout Canadian history the Liberal party has been the party of reform. It is the party of reform to-day and will be the party of reform to-morrow. Some of the reforms which the Liberal party stood for in days gone by have been: the simplification of procedure before the courts of law, a very important reform; the repeal of all laws conferring special privileges upon the church, another reform that abolished all idea of having a state church in Canada; reform in the sale of crown lands. The Liberal party stood for the election of the governor; for the election of the legislative council by the people; for representation by population, and for the secret ballot. Later, it stood for the right to negotiate commercial treaties with other countries of the world, a right that we have to-day. The Liberal party has stood stoutly for these things year by year throughout Canadian history.

These are only a few of the reforms for which the Liberal party has stood. It has stood for the upbuilding of responsible government and for the control of revenue by parliament, and I submit that the history of the Liberal party has made this bill possible.

Let me discuss for a moment or two the industrial and international relations committee report presented to parliament on May 23, 1929. I wish to show the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite on this question of unemployment insurance. In presenting the report on that date I tried to indicate, as chairman of the committee, that the committee had done its best to obey the mandate of parliament to investigate and report upon this very intricate and technical question. In analyzing the report I went on to show that its adoption was vital inasmuch as it was in the direction of industrial and universal peace, which is based on international justice. I emphasized the importance of the report both nationally and internationally. It was pointed out that the question could not be dodged, that the time had come for action, and the report embodied the endorsation and the affirmation of the principle of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. It also supported the principle of a contributory system involving the employer, the state and the employee, and it went on to discuss a comprehensive national health policy as well as the securing of further data after the taking of the census. It proposed a conference between the provinces and the dominion in order to bring about the necessary cooperation without which this important problem could not be approached effectively.

When the committee's report came before parliament an amendment was moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and an important debate ensued on the question. The hon. gentleman expressed the opinion that the report should be referred back to the committee for reconsideration and further report and that there should be something more tangible, more concrete. He held that the report was really a step backward. The question of jurisdiction then came up in consequence of this amendment. The amendment itself was to the effect that the report should be sent back to the committee and that the provinces should be requested to pass the necessary legislation giving up their jurisdiction with a view to having the matter dealt with nationally. That gave rise to considerable debate in the house, and I think it is necessary to run through that debate in order to indicate the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite on this very important problem.

At page 2776 of Hansard of May 23, 1929, I find the following statement by the present Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) on this question. He quoted the amendment, which was:

That the said report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations be not now concurred in but that it be referred back to the select standing committee on industrial and international relations with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding thereto a clause recommending that all the provinces of the dominion be requested to pass legislation under which the jurisdiction in relation to legislation providing for unemployment, sickness and invalidity insurance, based on compulsory contribution and which is now claimed to be within or subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, be vested in the dominion government.

The hon. gentleman followed that up by saying:

Does the hon. gentleman suggest that, when specific jurisdiction is vested under the constitution in the provinces, the provinces by any conceivable legislation could revest that jurisdiction in the dominion parliament? It seems to me to be the most extraordinary suggestion I have heard for some time.

That was the point of view of the Secretary of State on that occasion. But the hon. gentleman also made this statement:

That being admitted, why should the parliament of Canada express a gratuitous opinion upon a public matter which is not within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament or the administrative jurisdiction of the government responsible to parliament? Why should we in this parliament, who have very extended duties and obligations to the public, set ourselves up as the judges of the duties and responsibilities of members of the several legislatures, and attempt, by adopting a report of a nature which I have read, to superimpose our gratuitous opinions upon the legislatures of the provinces and the governments which are responsible to those legislatures? Even if we adopt the report of the committee in its present form, we are going far outside of any jurisdiction committed to the parliament of Canada.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

There we see the hon. gentleman, who is a member of the present ministry, taking the stand that it was an insult to the provinces, an insult to any provincial government in Canada, that even an opinion should be expressed at that time in the House of Commons on this question. Well, as I have said, it is a long distance between an attitude of that kind and the attitude which we have demonstrated on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite on the present occasion. Then the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), then representing Vancouver Centre, made the statement that the report was all eyewash; that was his attitude. And a little further on at page 2787 we have the point of view of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on the amendment which was before the house. These are his words:

While Bourinot's opinion was as Your Honour has quoted, nevertheless it is pointed out in May, as in the rules of the house, that when the matter is clearly a subject that this house should not pronounce upon, it should not be asked to do so, because by so doing the house would be pronouncing on something over which it has no jurisdiction. The last part of the amendment asks that the legislative powers—the legislative powers, mark you—of the provinces, which are defined by section 92 of the British North America Act, shall be vested in the dominion government.

In other words, the right hon. gentleman was of the opinion that there should be no pronouncement whatsoever on the subject. His attitude was practically the same as the Secretary of State's, for that hon. gentleman said that no gratuitous opinion should be advanced on that report because it was purely a provincial problem.

On the other hand, we find that the attitude of the Liberal party on this question has been sound throughout; you will find it so in that very debate. The then Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) took the view that the matter was entirely one for the provinces; it came within the ambit of provincial jurisdiction. He cited the danger of interfering in a matter of this kind; there was no doubt in the minds of the law officers of the crown, nor was there any doubt about the constitution in that regard. For instance, he quoted, as reported on page 2777 of Hansard of 1929:

17. The parliament of Canada cannot under colour of general legislation deal with what are provincial matters only, and conversely provincial legislatures cannot under the mere pretence of legislating upon one of the matters enumerated in section 92, really legislate upon a matter assigned to the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

18. If the dominion parliament or the provincial legislatures have no power to legislate directly upon a given subject matter, neither may they do so indirectly;

These two statements were taken from Lefroy's Canada's Federal System. That is the stand which hon. gentlemen opposite took with regard to that matter when it was before the house, and to-day we have them taking an absolutely different stand. For instance, I want just to touch upon an article that appeared in the Ottawa Journal on May 23, 1929. I take it that that article clearly represented the attitude at that time of the Conservative party. It was absolutely Conservative opposition opinion and I am reading it not because I always disagree with the Journal, because I read the Journal I think once a day and the Citizen also once a day; as far as these two newspapers are concerned they are among the brightest and best in Canada. But this is the point of view of the Ottawa Journal on that date on this very important question which was before this standing committee of the House of Commons. The editorial goes on to say that a small committee of the House of Commons "blithely shoulders the huge task of looking after industrial and international relations." Then it states that the committee has reported to parliament that it endorses the principle of state insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity and that it favours compulsory contributions by the state, employer and employee. Then the editorial adds:

It is, perhaps, fortunate for the country that neither the committee nor parliament possesses authority to give effect to the principle so "lightly endorsed."

That was Conservative opinion in 1929. Then when the report goes on to deal with the matters I have already mentioned, the Journal makes the statement that these provisions of the report would be enacted into law if something did not arise to block the committee's main purpose—the committee with the portentous name that is out to do something.

Further on the same editorial deals with the report and investigation at that time in this language:

It is absolute nonsense. The country has no more need of unemployment insurance than it has of polygamy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is that a Tory journal?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes, it is. The editorial goes on to say:

In England there is something to be said for unemployment insurance because there the industrial and economic conditions are entirely different.

But it says that there is no reason for it in Canada because this country is sparsely settled, lacks population and is passing through an era of tremendous development. It continues:

The proposition, therefore, to ensure our people against unemployment is absurd. The natural result will be to add to cost of government, produce more bureaucrats and discourage thrift and industry that are the real safeguards against unemployment.

A little farther on it says, in regard to the national health recommendation:

Nor can we ever see anything sensible in this recommendation.

According to the Journal there is nothing sensible in it. It asks:

What is wrong with our health anyway?

The editorial goes on to say that there is nothing wrong with our national health and there should have been no provision in the report about a national health policy. Then it makes this further statement:

This work belongs to the provinces.

That is, the work of unemployment insurance or insurance against sickness and invalidity belongs absolutely to provincial jurisdiction and the Journal does not hesitate to say so. It continues:

The federal government is but duplicating provincial activity and adding to the cost—

—when it makes any movement in the matter whatever. It reiterates that the committee and Liberal government action in the matter means little more than to "pile up expenditure." Further on it says:

Even more fussy and futile is the suggestion that in the coming census provision be made for securing data on unemployment and sickness and have same compiled and published at the earliest possible date.

Yet that part of the report was carried out in 1931 and it constitutes part of the foundation upon which the present legislation has been founded. Further on the editorial says that there are two federal organizations getting this unemployment and health information and that it is not necessary because by the time the information would be needed, the situation might be entirely changed. Fancy!

Lastly, the editorial says that there was not the slightest danger of this report being adopted; that it was but an expensive frill, and that if it were done it would but prove that any organized minority in Canada that makes enough noise could get its point of view accepted by parliament. It winds up by saying that there is "too much paternalism," and damns the report endorsed by parliament in the way the Journal can so forcibly do.

My contention is that that point of view by Tory journalism all over Canada built up a menacing volume of public opinion at that time detrimental to insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity. That opinion was emphasized in this house—as I have shown—excepting to the right of the Speaker, that is on the part of the government of the day. Such opinion had an adverse effect upon the provinces. There was a division of opinion on this important question all over Canada because of the attitude of the Journal, as shown by the attitude the provinces took in regard to it. At that time there was no volume of public opinion in favour of this question outside members of the Liberal party in the house and out of it. There is no doubt about that at all. The Conservative party was quite hostile to the question of social insurance in the house; they poured cold water on it every time they could; they never spoke a word in favour of it and they discounted it whenever the opportunity arose.

The report of the industrial and international relations committee was sent to the different provinces, and what do we find? We find that there was no cooperation shown by the provinces with regard to this report, consequently no action was possible in connection with the question of unemployment insurance in 1929. I have before me the report from Nova Scotia. At that time the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was Prime Minister of that province and to-day he is in the ministry and is, I am told, whole-heartedly for unemployment insurance. What was his attitude in 1929? Did he say that his province favoured it? Did he say that his province would support it? Did he give any aid to the then Liberal government to evolve a policy that would later meet unemployment all over Canada? He never said a word in favour of it. This is the letter dated August 3, 1928, from Halifax:

Dear Sir:
I have your letter of July 31.

This is in answer to Mr. Heenan, then Minister of Labour, who sent out this report to all the provinces.

The whole subject matter will have to be studied with great care by the government, and for that purpose we will await the printed report of the minutes of proceedings and evidence.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Meantime I have to point out that while the government is sympathetic toward all modern measures of similar character which have for their object the betterment of living conditions, the limiting factor in the province of Nova Scotia is that of finance.

The very argument used by my right hon. leader when the matter was before the house a few days ago, that finance is an important limitation. Note the word "sympathetic." Then he goes on:

For practically fifteen years this province has not had a balanced budget, and before we can take up the subject matter of industrial and international relations we are immediately confronted with a very heavy obligation which would arise with the adoption of the old age pension system.

Yours very truly,
E. N. Rhodes,
Premier.

There is not a word in that statement by the present hon. Minister of Finance to the effect that this is a national matter. He accepts the report of the committee that it is entirely within the provincial jurisdiction. But to-day we have the Minister of Finance and the other ministers of the crown and those sitting back of them taking the stand that constitutionally this question belongs to the dominion, when the whole evidence before parliament is absolutely against that contention. As far as the Liberal party is concerned we are consistent in the matter; we are simply holding to the view we held before, which is also the view of the law officers of the crown and of the courts of justice.

We have also a statement from the former premier of the province of New Brunswick, another Conservative leader in eastern Canada. Writing to Hon. Peter Heenan, then Minister of Labour, on August 3, 1928, he said:

My Dear Minister:

Your letter 31st ult. received with reference to insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

Of course I recognize the desirability of some such provisions as these, but I think you will understand that, faced with the question of old age pensions and what I regret to say seems to be the probable withdrawal by your government of the assistance to technical education, it is utterly impossible for a province with such limited means as New Brunswick to consider, at all, the subject about which you write. These things are simply matters of financial ability to do things, and when we have not got the money we cannot, and should not, undertake the responsibility.

Yours sincerely,
John B. Baxter.

There is another statement by a provincial authority in New Brunswick that the money was not on hand, but there was no question at all raised as to jurisdiction; it was accepted that the matter was one belonging to the provinces and had nothing whatever to do with the dominion.

I might go on to read statements from all the provinces and prove by them that in not one instance was the statement of the committee that the matter of unemployment insurance came under provincial jurisdiction challenged. It has remained for the dominion government to come forward six years subsequently, with an unemployment insurance measure entirely national in scope not based upon provincial cooperation, and, it would appear, not upon sound justice.

May I say that the Liberal party wants to see unemployment insurance put upon the statute books; but it wants something more than that: it wants this measure to become effective as soon as possible, and we are anxious to cooperate with the government in that regard, but—

Some hon. MEMBERS: But!

Mr. McINTOSH: —but if we are to have a measure that will never go beyond the statutes, which is not sound in jurisdiction, and which can never be effective industrially, then the time this house is spending on this bill is largely wasted. We hope there will be real advancement made with this legislation; that even yet the government will institute the closest scrutiny with regard to the legality of this measure, and see to it before it is too late that when the bill becomes law it will be constitutionally sound and that litigation will not render it void and useless.

In closing I should like to refer to the part of the present bill which deals with national health. To my mind if the term "eyewash" was ever applicable to any part of any bill introduced in this house it may well be applied to that part of Bill No. 8, because while we have national health talked about there is nothing effective in the bill in regard to a real national health policy, not a thing. There is not one word more in that bill with regard to a national health policy than was in the report of the industrial and international relations committee of 1929, which was endorsed by the house, and in which a comprehensive national health policy was advocated.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): I was amused at the observation of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Beynon) that everyone was claiming the fatherhood of this child. What the working people are most concerned about is who is to be the mother; they are desirous that this legislation shall not be stillborn through the instrumentality of the constitution. We have here what might be called an inverted case of the Dionne quintuplets. In that case we had a marvel in medical science, a mother giving birth to five children. In this house we have—

Mr. COTNAM: A five year plan.

Mr. MITCHELL: —we have 245 members claiming responsiblity for one child. Now, it can't be done. Many men have been mentioned in this house who have used the constitution as a barrier to progress, and the thought crossed my mind that it is a good thing there is not a constitutional Guy Fawkes around.

I think it is fair to say that governmental institutions in their fundamental concept should deal with the major risks of life from the viewpoint of the great majority that make up the working force of this and every other country. I think those major risks can be boiled down to three. One is sickness and the obligations arising out of sickness; another is unemployment, the worry, the trials and the tribulations of men and women who are anxious to work and unable to get the opportunity to earn a livelihood and provide for themselves and their dependents; and a third is the problem of old age and the fear of destitution. These are three fundamental problems in the life of the nation, simply stated; and since the dawn of history mankind has been wrestling with them. I think also one may safely say that we have moved very slowly towards their solution. In the material sphere enormous progress has been made in the last century, progress of a kind and on a scale unexcelled in the history of the world. In fact we have almost invented ourselves out of a way to earn our livelihood. We have been so clever that we have forced millions of men and women on this continent to walk the streets owing to the introduction of the machine. I would like this to be considered by the government, that notwithstanding this legislation they are setting in motion, they should not lose sight of the great responsibility confronting them under present day conditions, concerning the problem that we almost forget about because of the depression, that of being too old at fifty-five to obtain gainful employment. That problem existed even in the most prosperous times. Then there is the problem of technological unemployment. The other day I saw figures which have not been disputed, showing that even with the depression, if the productive forces of the United States were on the 1929 level, with the reduction of the working day to six hours they still would have an army of unemployed in that country numbering 6,000,000. You cannot wish yourself out of a jam like that. If private employers will not give leadership and adjust their business structures to meet the crying need for employment then in my judgment the duty lies with the government to provide that leadership. That is what I have always maintained. I think the test of any society, industrial or agricultural, is its ability to insure the membership of that society against the economic hazards of life, and I think that should be the pressing force behind the legislative functions of government. Security must be the cornerstone of any nation if progress is to be made. I think the test should and must be the degree of security given the individual in the form of productive employment and protection against such hazards as I have mentioned.

At the moment, Mr. Speaker, we are merely dealing with the principle of the bill; we are not dealing with the sections. I think the principles boil down to two questions, is the bill constitutional, and shall we have contributory or non-contributory unemployment insurance. In the few remarks I make I am going to discuss the bill from that standpoint. This afternoon I listened to the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who discussed the constitutional aspect of the measure. He pointed out very clearly the clauses of the treaty of Versailles affecting the working-people of the nations engaged in the war. He pointed out the solemn obligations under that treaty of peace that pledged the nations to move in a certain direction in order to meet pressing problems as they affected the daily lives of the people in the respective countries at the close of the war. I was in the war; I was in England at the conclusion of the war, and I have a very vivid recollection of the cry of Lloyd George, "Make this a country fit for heroes to live in," and so on. I believe the men came back from the war with faith—almost a divine faith, I might say—that the promises contained in the peace treaty would be implemented by both the victorious and the defeated nations, but in this dominion it has taken fourteen years for us to carry out the promises incorporated in the treaty of Versailles.

So we have the constitutional question brought up in connection with this matter. I know the opinion of the average workingman; I think I can reflect it as well as anyone in this House of Commons. I came from the workshop to this house, and when my constituents are through with me I will go back to—

Mr. HEAPS: The workhouse.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) says I will go back to the workhouse, and there may be more truth than fiction in that statement. The average workingmen are not greatly interested in the constitutional question. They want to get something done; they are asking, "When do we eat?" The average man in the street is saying, "For God's sake give us an opportunity for productive labour, so that we can meet our obligations and look after our families without need of charity." That is the cry of the man in the street to those having leadership in this dominion.

We are accustomed to this constitutional argument; it has been the barrier that has stood in the way of most social reform. I had a great deal to do with the propaganda carried on in this country for the establishment of an old age pension scheme in Canada. I remember the way that proposal was bandied from one government to another; eventually, of course, we did get a system of old age pensions. Then I have a vivid recollection of the opposition to these schemes that have been advocated by labour for many years. I would like to ask these provinces to come out in the open and say so if they do not want a system of unemployment insurance. Let them be frank about it if they do not want these very necessary reforms that must be carried out if the problems of mass production and modern industry are to be met. I have not heard them; I do not think any member of this house has heard them make that statement. Let us be frank about it; let us come out and say so if we are opposed to these things. I object very strenuously to any man in this country mixing up the rights of minorities with the obvious necessity of moving in the direction in which this legislaton goes. There is no man in this house or in this country who is more fixed in his opinions as to the rights of minorities than I am, but I do not believe that the rights of minorities should be used as a smoke screen to prevent the passage of legislation of this description and its practical application in this country. If the contention of the hon. member for Quebec East is sound, this bill is not worth the paper it is written on. Let us be frank about it; let us tell the people of Canada that if the constitutional position taken by the hon. member is sound, this House of Commons is wasting its time.

I know the western provinces do not care much about the constitutional aspect of it. Last year in this house I quoted a statement by the then Premier of Alberta, Hon. J. E. Brownlee, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of January 21, 1934. Mr. Brownlee said that all the western provinces had agreed to give up their constitutional rights in order to make such legislation possible, and he said the dominion government was working on a measure along that line. That was in answer to a question by the executive board of the Alberta federation of labour, asking the government of that province to lend its aid to the institution of an unemployment insurance measure in that province.

I also think we should be very frank with the working people of this dominion, and disabuse their minds of the belief that this legislation can meet the problem of unemployment. I know that in the propaganda stage that precedes the launching of any legislation of this kind statements are apt to be made by enthusiasts that would lead people to believe more than is actually the case. That is a fact that one encounters in connection with all legislation, whether it be social or otherwise. Extravagant statements are made as to what can be done by legislation similar to this. I think it should be made clear that the government must initiate policies to take care of the tremendous unemployment problem in this dominion, and no attempt should be made to lead the people to believe that this legislation can be a solution for that problem. It should be made clear also that this does not relieve this government or any government of its duty to supply food and shelter for those who at the moment are on relief. That is a problem that must be met until those unfortunate people are able again to take their part in the industrial or agricultural life of this dominion. Neither do I think it does us any good to say why someone else did not do this, what somebody said in 1896 or 1902, or whether somebody has changed his mind in the last two years. After all is said and done a man who cannot change his mind —well, he never had one. I am not interested only in a recital of the achievements of the group to which I belong, or to a discussion of the achievements of other political parties. I am most concerned about the passage of this legislation in the broadest possible form and in terms through which the greatest number will derive benefit or advantage. It is a great tragedy that suffering has always been the midwife of progress. I believe it is fair to say that ten years ago no government in Canada would have taken the chance of passing legislation of this kind. Notwithstanding the fact that a large body of public opinion pressed for such legislation I do not believe opinion was strong enough to command the notice of any government. We have to be fair about it, and that is why I make that observation.

It would be easy for me to say that I have advocated this legislation for a lifetime, and in that way get some kudos out of it. It would be easy to say that hon. members in this corner of the house did so and so, but I believe we have to be perfectly frank about it. I question very much whether the average man or woman of ten years ago had any interest in unemployment insurance. At least that was my experience, and I believe if there had been any interest in the matter we would have an entirely different situation to-day. There would have been a scheme in force, broad in its application, one which would have lightened the mental strain and burden suffered because of the great depression.

We now come to a discussion of contributory and non-contributory unemployment insurance. Frankly, I believe in the contributory system, the system advocated by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, and I make that choice without any equivocation. I hold the view that no nation which gives the people something for nothing can endure; we might as well be honest about it. Neither do I believe that the burden should fall too heavily upon the worker who comes under a scheme. It is my opinion that the present legislation goes too far in that direction, and that a greater burden should be placed on industry and on the government. We know that all social services, including even the salaries of hon. members in this chamber, are a charge on the living standards of the Canadian people, and any legislation involving an expenditure of money must in the final analysis have its effect on the productive forces and on the whole structure of the country. My greatest concern is that when the scheme is launched the workingman may have something to say about it. Unless a person helps to pay for a thing I question very much whether he has any right to say anything about its operation.

One feature of the bill which meets with my approval is that the responsibility for administration is placed squarely where it belongs, namely upon the workers and employers in industry. Undoubtedly the workingmen have some right to say how the payments shall be made, how the operations of the act may be broadened, and generally to watch over its development. There can be no doubt that the scheme will have to be hammered out in the laboratory of the industrial structure of our country. We shall have to do the same as other nations have done, the same as Great Britain did, namely, work the scheme out by the process of trial and error; and quite possibly that work will not have been completed in this generation.

I appreciate the fact that to advocate a non-contributory system of unemployment insurance would be the most popular stand. I have no quarrel with people who hold that view; the right to agree is the basis of human freedom. After giving the matter very careful thought, however, I have some to doubt very much whether we could have a system of non-contributory unemployment insurance without having a dictatorship. We could not have that form of protection unless the state could say to the worker, "This is the amount you will be paid; this is the kind of work you will do"—and have control of all the movements of the individual connected with the scheme. We must remember that this is to a great extent an agricultural country, and any scheme must meet the views or be capable of receiving the support of that great body of people.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: What do they do in dictatorships?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall tell you in a moment. That is why I believe a non-contributory scheme would be unsound. Someone has asked: What do they do in dictatorships? Well, my reply is that any man with a bayonet in his fist can be a dictator, so long as he does not stick it into himself. I believe that has been proved.

Frankly a non-contributory scheme would not, in my opinion, meet with the views of the average Canadian. The people in this country would rather help to administer and pay for their scheme. Believing that, undoubtedly I should take responsibility of saying so. In working out the scheme the government must take into consideration seasonal employment, and may I indicate in passing that the bill does not make provision for those who are working on a five day or even a four day week, a fault which can be remedied when the bill reaches the committee. Further, consideration must be given to the fact that many people engaged in industry are working on short time. Arrangements should be made whereby those people can meet the payments without any undue hardship on themselves, and the legislation must be elastic enough to permit the admission of such people. No man should be penalized or placed outside the scope of the legislation because of circumstances over which he has no control. Many men, particularly in the railroad industry, who would ordinarily be engaged in steady labour are working, due to the depression, only two weeks a month.

The measure contains the further constructive suggestion, namely that it will make use of the employment agencies, or as they are called in Great Britain, the labour exchanges. It will permit the mobilization and organization of labour on a much more satisfactory scale than has obtained before in Canada. To those who speak of provincial schemes I would point out the utter impracticability of a provincial scheme in legislation of this kind. A man might live in Ontario, for example, and the scheme might not be in existence in Quebec or Manitoba. That man would be frozen to working in Ontario in order to gain the benefits of the insurance scheme. Anyone who has made any study at all of labour matters knows that you should not deny the worker the right to go from one end of this dominion to the other, should the need arise, in search of employment. If you had a provincial scheme you can readily see how the worker would lose the benefits of it unless he went into the province in which the legislation was operating. We have seen that in practical application so far as the old age pension scheme is concerned. Notwithstanding the fact that that legislation has been in existence since 1927, there are still three or four provinces, Quebec for example, which have not brought that scheme into being. In connection with mothers' allowances we saw how a widow living outside the boundaries of a province where mothers' allowances were in effect would immediately move into Ontario, for instance, to qualify under the residence rule for the allowance under the act. So we have had practical experience of the unsoundness of attempting to deal with these great social problems on a purely provincial basis. I think that has been proven conclusively, and in my judgment we would be foolish—I do not say that in any critical sense—if we did not take cognizance of the very practical experience we have had in the application of measures of this kind.

When the bill gets into the committee stage I shall have a great deal to say in connection with incidentals surrounding the application of particular clauses of the bill itself. I have often said that men are the instruments of policy, and one of the most important factors in the successful application of legislation of this kind is that those in charge of its administration shall be sympathetic to the legislation. That is a very important feature that must be borne in mind by the government, that men in charge of applying this form of legislation should be sincere and sympathetic in the broadest sense, so that the law may have as wide an application as possible in the shortest possible time. So, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the government will use good judgment in selecting men who have had some practical experience in the problems of the labour men of this country, and that on the other hand they will select men who are imbued with the soundness of enactments of this character and have a vision of its possibilities for good in the lives of the working men and women of this dominion.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this is a forward step, and I would be insincere if I did not say so. There are many criticisms one could offer of the measure, but I am now endorsing the principle of the bill because it is a form of legislation that meets a crying need in any industrial country. It must be remembered that even in the midst of this depression there are tens of thousands of borderline cases who should be on relief and whom a measure of this kind will help tremendously. When the scheme gets into its stride, if we ever get out of this depression, I visualize a constructive approach to the problem of ironing out the inequalities of seasonal occupation in this country. There are also potentialities in the stabilization of working conditions and of maintaining the demand for consumption on the part of the Canadian people, the benefits of which will be reflected back to agriculture. That has been proven in other countries. In Great Britain at the moment one sees tremendous sums of money in circulation through schemes of this kind and which, under the conditions under which we are living at the moment, would otherwise be tied up in the banks and in strong boxes throughout the country.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am going to support the principle of the bill and ask for its widest application for the benefit of the working people of this dominion.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I think perhaps a word or two should be said with regard to some phases of the matter which have been covered to some extent but which might deserve a little more amplification.

In the first place let me say to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Mitchell) that I rise to support and we on this side of the house will support in principle the idea of unemployment insurance. It is not any new feature as far as those on this side of the house are concerned. It is a matter which has engaged the attention of members of this side of the house for a number of years, as has been indicated by the record which has been placed on Hansard by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe); and regardless of the fact that my hon. friend is not interested in the history of the activities of the other parties in connection with this measure, it seems to me that it is a matter of some interest to the country generally to know whether or not this measure is being brought forward at the present time by those who have consistently in season and out of season supported the principle, or whether it is being brought forward, just on the eve of an election, in the form of a so-called reform program in entire contradiction of the position which has been taken by the right hon. leader of the government and his colleagues almost right up to the time he gave his radio broadcasts.

I want to say to my hon. friend who has just sat down, and to you, Mr. Speaker, that the record of the Liberal party has been a steady effort towards putting on the statute books a comprehensive, workable and valid unemployment insurance measure. That record is indicated by the fact that it was the Liberal party which in 1926, and again in 1927, advanced the principle of old age pensions, and after their old age pension measure was defeated by the Conservative majority in another place succeeded in putting it upon the statute books where to-day its benefits are being enjoyed by the old people of this country almost from one end to the other. This it seems to me is a matter which the people of this country will take into consideration when they are considering the sincerity of those who are supporting the bill at the present time.

May I say further that my right hon. leader made a declaration in this house, not on the eve of an election, but over two years ago, indicating that the Liberal party had as a plank in their platform a national unemployment insurance measure, and the steps which had been taken and were being taken to carry that out are well known to members of this house and this country.

When I mention my leader I want to say this, that the members of this party take some satisfaction in the fact that the leader of the Liberal party has in season and out of season during his whole life been interested in social legislation—not at the last minute, just on the eve of an election in 1935, but year after year his whole training, his experience and his activities have been in the direction of social reform. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that I think we can say with considerable pride that the record of the leader of the Liberal party is not excelled at least by any statesman living or dead in Canada for his attention to and interest in matters that pertain to the social welfare of the people of this country. The other night there was put on Hansard the record of the Liberal party in connection with social legislation. It went back to the days of the establishment of the Department of Labour, which was followed by the passing of the conciliation act; with the passing of the railways dispute act; the passing of fair wages provisions, whereby employees of the dominion government received the benefit of the fair wages statute and of the eight hour day; the passing of the Combines Investigation Act; the passing of the Technical Education Act of 1919, which was the outcome of a commission that had been appointed by the leader of the opposition when he was in power; and with the passing of the Old Age Pensions Act. That is a record in which the Liberal party takes some pride, and therefore it comes as a natural step that the members of the Liberal party should support an unemployment insurance measure. But the members of that party take as much pride in the fact that its leader has not only worked through practical legislation but has devoted his life to the education of the people of this dominion and the spreading of information among them in connection with measures along this line; and I am not at all sure that the foundations of the legislation which we are dealing with to-night and of previous legislation of this kind cannot be found in the fact that the people of Canada have been informed and have had their minds concentrated upon such measures through the efforts of the present leader of the opposition and former Prime Minister of Canada.

Let me emphasize what I said a minute ago, that the peculiar satisfaction which we have on this side of the house is that the views which the leader of the opposition represents here as leader of the Liberal party are convictions which are inherent in every fibre of his being and which he has practised from the time he entered public life, and are not the result of an overnight change of coat such as took place early this year when the Prime Minister felt the dread of the wintry blasts of the condemnation of the people at the polls. My right hon. friend is able to change legal opinions as he is able to change other views in connection with his public life. It is typical of him. My hon. friend who has just spoken says that it is no discredit to a man to change his mind. That may be so, but at the same time we should expect some constancy in public men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RALSTON: I know that my hon. friends have been taught not to expect that on their side of the house. The Prime Minister is the gentleman who not long ago in this house was talking about sound money and deprecating the idea of turning on the printing press, and yet he is the very gentleman who suddenly was found, only a short time afterwards, doing a sleight of hand inflation trick—I use that term in no invidious sense—by means first of becoming a borrower from the banks, issuing treasury notes, and the next moment becoming a lender to the banks, printing about $35,000,000 of paper currency to loan against the treasury notes he had just issued. That is the gentleman who had talked about sound money. We have had in the last six months the same gentleman who talked about sound money issuing currency to the extent of between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000, carrying it to the banks and issuing cheques, notwithstanding the fact that the gold reserve has not increased; and yet he was extremely wrathy, particularly at those in one corner of the house, who talked about the possibilities of turning on the printing press. The same gentleman, two or three years ago, when the matter of a central bank came up, stood in his place and intimated that there was no need whatever of a central bank, that the Finance Act contained all the provisions necessary for the financial operations of the country; and though he did not use the word "ridiculous" he intimated that it was ridiculous to talk of a central bank in this country. And yet we find that on January 2 or 3, I forget which broadcast it was, he was boasting of the fact that his reform program had commenced and that he had inaugurated a central bank, the very thing he had opposed so strenuously. He had he said inaugurated the central bank as one of the first steps in his reform program.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not correct to say he opposed a central bank.

Mr. RALSTON: I have stated exactly what he did. On the motion of an hon. member on this side of the house he intimated that the Finance Act would probably do this country, I think he said, for a period of fifty years, so far as he knew. But the central bank was suddenly grasped as one of the measures of reform; and as a matter of fact he did not know it was a reform when he put it on the statute books, but only realized it on the first of January this year.

And then we find him dealing with social reforms. He is not one who has extreme familiarity with matters of social legislation. Only a year ago he was speaking in Toronto and he had not very much idea of these social reform measures, these social reform activities and this social reform program. He said:

I would like to promise you a spectacular move that would make you hip, hip, hurrah; but, gentlemen, you did too much of that a few years ago, forgetting that some day the bills would have to be paid. We cannot offer you anything spectacular—nothing but thrift and hard work.

That was only February 2, 1934. He did not intimate that any reform program was necessary, but a little later in the year he said:

I believe we have passed and left behind us the great depression we encountered in 1929 and 1930. We are standing on the threshhold of a greater progress and greater prosperity than we have ever known.

That was June 8, 1934, and on August 27 he spoke at Quebec of the depression "of late lamented memory." Then on the first of October in London he spoke of "the steady progress which Canada has made in the last eighteen months." And on the very day that the newspapers published the report of his radio speech there appeared an advertisement issued by his government through the Department of Trade and Commerce:

As the year 1934 passes into history, Canada can look back on a period of unimpaired progress so definitely sustained that it has brought us to the pathway that leads to sound, sensible and stable prosperity.

That was on January 1, and yet on January 2 my right hon. friend said over the radio:

The world is in tragic circumstances. The signs of recovery are few and doubtful; the signs of trouble are many and they do not lessen. The world is searching pathetically for safety and prosperity. It will find them only when each nation, resolute to effect its own regeneration, will come to a meeting place with all the others in the spirit which declares that even the most powerful among them has no real economic independence of the rest. That time has not yet come. Meanwhile dangers abound.

And a few lines further down he said:

But the facts, grave as they are, do not cast me down nor will they you. I am deeply anxious, but I can never doubt this country's coming triumph if you will range yourselves on the side of progress and reform. For then we will fight on, you and I, and we will win.

Then, although Canada was according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the way to sound and sensible prosperity, on the next page there appeared this:

Reform or no reform! I raise that issue squarely. I nail the flag of progress to the masthead. I summon the power of the state to its support.

That was stated by the gentleman who a year before had said, "We have nothing spectacular to offer, nothing but thrift and hard work." Now my right hon. friend has indicated to us what the trouble really was. He said in that same broadcast speech—and I am paraphrasing him now—"I had people coming to me asking me to put reform measures upon the statute books." Then he goes on:

I can assure you that it was not easy to say no. I had to harden my heart. I did so, but with more sorrow and sadness than I have ever known in my life before. I can assure you with equal truth that, had we said yes to those sometimes frantic pleas, Canada would not have been where it is to-day. We had to defer reform until the time for reform had come.

The time for reform came just on January 2 in the year of the election when the last session of parliament was about to be convened. What a thrill this has given our hon. friends! Some of them have said: He has turned socialist. Others said that he had turned radical. People said that he had turned reformer. I think the country knew what had happened—nothing more than that he had electionitis. We know, as we have reason to know, remembering the campaign of 1930, that when he is suffering from that fever he is liable to say almost anything. After all, in the bill that we have before us to-night, is it really a policy of reform which my right hon. friend is bringing before the country or is it a policy of "recant"? I presume my right hon. friend, if I am to judge from the citations which have been read by the hon. member for Quebec East and quoted by my right hon. leader, has decided to swallow himself in this program of reform and to repudiate, if necessary, not only principles but also some solemn assurances and admissions which he made to the provinces in September last when he admitted, in a letter which he sent out to them, that they had "exclusive jurisdiction" with regard to this question, that is all forgotten now. He did not refer to it.

Mr. BENNETT: He did.

Mr. RALSTON: In his address the other day in introducing the resolution he referred to the jurisdiction, but nothing whatever was said about the fact that he himself, eminent lawyer as he is, had no longer ago than September last indicated to the provinces that, at least in his opinion and speaking as Prime Minister of Canada, they had exclusive jurisdiction. Already, if we are to judge by the bill which is before us, the exaggerations of the reform program are plainly evident. Unemployment insurance was one of the high lights of that program, and what have we before us? We have a bill which purports to provide for unemployment insurance. The Prime Minister has quite frankly and sincerely said that it is not a recovery measure. It is not an emergency measure; it is not a relief measure; it is something which will not take effect for some time. My hon. friend who spoke last said: When will it take effect? We know a man has to contribute for at least forty weeks before he gets any benefit at all, so it means that for at least a year nobody in this country will receive any benefits from this legislation.

But leaving out the question of delay, what else have we? We have a bill which omits to make any provision whatever for those engaged in three out of the four primary industries in this dominion, although they are to be taxed to pay for the others. That is the first thing with regard to the bill. The second is that it is a bill which, as I said a moment ago, admittedly does nothing whatever to deal with the present situation. Third —and I wish I could put this in as graphic language as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) did the other night—one of the features of the bill which I think the government will surely see ought to be changed is that which appears to emphasize and glorify the bureaucratic type of government which is exemplified in other countries by the exhaustion of the alphabet in connection with the different boards, committees and commissions they have there. This bill piles commissions on committees and boards on commission in addition to referees and umpires. It adds to the burdens of the taxpayers and to the irritation of those who come under the provisions of the measure. It seems to me a pretty definite attempt by the government to honeycomb our national life with a group of, so far as parliament is concerned, irresponsible and detached bodies who function independently of any departmental responsibility and who go to make officialdom the master rather than the servant of the people of this country. Fourthly, this bill which was one of the high lights of the Prime Minister's reform program, relies for its very foundation upon the shifting sands of questionable legal validity. As I go on, I want to call to witness the Prime Minister himself, his Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and his Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) in support of that statement.

The radio speech is now under the microscope. Let us compare this bill with that radio speech. The flag of progress has not been nailed very high on the mast so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. DUFF: Halfmast.

Mr. RALSTON: Seventeen other countries have unemployment insurance. This matter is nothing new, nothing novel. My right hon. friend has not apparently gone very far along the line of reform in this the first bill which he has brought down to implement his reform program. But I am going to leave aside the matter of the scope of the measure and the question of the machinery provided in it and to deal for just a moment or two with what it seems to me is the first essential of any bill and what will be an important consideration for anybody who has to do with this measure and who expects to get any benefit from it, namely, the question of its validity. The bill will not be of very much good if, as my hon. friend who spoke before me said, it is unenforceable. As he said, in that case it is just a piece of waste paper and we are wasting our time. Under this legislation certain rights to benefits are conferred, and that is the important matter so far as the working people of this country are concerned. In addition to that and supporting it is the obligation of the employer to pay. That is imposed by the bill. In addition to that there is the obligation of the employee to pay. That is imposed by the bill. In addition to that there is a provision which gives the employer authority to collect from the employee the assessment as set forth in the bill. These are matters regarded as property and civil rights and within the jurisdiction of the provinces. If the contributions cannot be enforced or if a contribution by the central body to the beneficiary cannot be enforced, the legislation is an empty shell and a mockery.

I am not going to deal with the legal point, that is to discuss the radio case, the aeronautics case, the Snider case and others referred to by the Prime Minister at some length. I want to say just this: There has been prior to the time he introduced this bill a universal admission that such a measure was not within the legislative competence of this parliament. Until my right hon. friend spoke the other day when he introduced the resolution, neither he nor any of his ministers ever expressed any opinion other than that which was expressed by him in September last when he wrote to the provinces. Under these circumstances the situation is rather grave. My right hon. friend ought to give a fuller explanation than he has done with regard to what he considers to be the fundamentals upon which the validity of this bill can be supported. He is not an inexperienced counsel; he is a most experienced one; he has had experience in the privy council in constitutional cases; and when a man of his standing at the bar, a former president of the Canadian Bar Association, expresses an opinion on a legal matter, it is to be taken with a good deal of weight; and he has expressed this opinion in the house more than once on previous occasions. But we are left in the dark—except as far as my right hon. friend mentions treaty provisions—we are left in the dark as to the reason for the fundamental change that has taken place in his opinion and in the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie)—who by the way has not favoured us with any address at all or any explanation on this rather important point as to the validity of the bill. Well, we have the preamble, and as was referred to by my friend the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) the preamble purports to support this legislation on the ground that it falls within article 23 and article 427 of the treaty of Versailles. The hon. member for Quebec East mentioned article 23 this afternoon and put part of it on record. The first part of article 23 indicates in the clearest terms that the whole undertaking, whatever the undertaking may be in that article, is:

Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon. . . .

Where is the international convention in connection with this subject? Has it been agreed upon by this parliament? It has not. It has not even been brought down. Yet article 23 is being relied on by the Prime Minister as having created an obligation whereby section 132 of the British North America Act comes into play and whereby this parliament is given jurisdiction to enact legislation to carry out that obligation. But we must first have the obligation, and quite apart from the rather important introductory words I have quoted is there any definite obligation regarding unemployment insurance in the body of the article? As my hon. friend from Quebec East pointed out, I should think the only possible clause which might include unemployment insurance is to be found, if found at all, in the general words of subsection (a):

(a) will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations.

Those are pretty general terms. To found jurisdiction in a field which is as competitive as that of provincial and dominion legislation it would seem to me that we ought to have more specific words than are there in order to establish that an unemployment insurance act is intra vires of this parliament. That is quite outside the first point I make, which is that whatever undertaking there is must be subject to and in accordance with—note those words particularly—an international convention, and such international convention has never been approved by this house or agreed to by Canada.

Then the other article invoked is 427. Well, that is even more nebulous. With all respect to those who drafted the treaty and to those who signed it, that article merely expresses a pious hope.

The high contracting parties, recognizing that the well being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in section I and associated with that of the League of Nations.

They recognize—

No obligation yet.

—that differences of climate, habits and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the high contracting parties to be of special and urgent importance:

And then they go on to enumerate a number of principles not one of which would seem to touch unemployment insurance. Now it does not require a lawyer to appreciate—the veriest layman can realize it, reading that—that there is no obligation contained in article 427. Yet we have gone to the trouble of reciting that as containing an obligation which entitles us to invoke section 132 of the British North America Act and gives us jurisdiction to enact this legislation.

The other provision referred to is the peace, order and good government provision of section 91, which was dealt with in the Snider case to which my right hon. friend referred, in which it was laid down that you could not invoke the general residuary powers contained in the words "peace, order and good government" in connection with any matter that fell strictly within the express subjects referred to in section 92. Property and civil rights are contained in section 92, therefore it would seem as if peace, order and good government would not be sufficient ground on which to base the validity of this legislation.

My right hon. friend has invoked an entirely new principle. I suppose he says he has the authority of the judicial committee of the privy council for it. The judicial committee did, as my hon. friend from Quebec East said, in the aeronautics case and again in the radio case intimate that there was jurisdiction to carry out a treaty. But in those cases there was a treaty, as my hon. friend from Quebec East said—a binding treaty in each case. Here there is no treaty, not even a committal. Assuming there were some kind of a treaty, I am not sure that my right hon. friend is quite justified in going the length of assuming that Canada can enter into any treaty obligation at all, no matter how far it invades provincial jurisdiction, and still legislate to carry out that treaty under section 132. Let me give an instance. It will be said that it is far-fetched, but my right hon. friend's reasoning has to carry him that far. I have said that property and civil rights are within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces. Public lands are within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and employment of labour is within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Let us assume that the Dominion of Canada saw fit to make a treaty with Siam, under which Siam would agree to admit our fish free of duty—I am sure the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) will agree that that is highly desirable.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: In return for what? The Dominion of Canada says, We will do two things; we will give Siamese residents in Canada a preference in the labour market—that is rather shocking, but suppose the dominion says it will do that. Or it says: We will give Siam certain crown lands in the province of Quebec. Now there is the treaty. Is there any limitation? Does my right hon. friend think the dominion has the power to compel employers in the various provinces to give Siamese labourers that preference or the power to hand over to Siam provincial crown lands without the consent of the province concerned? Is that what section 132 means? Yet my right hon. friend's reasoning must carry him that far, if he is simply going to invade provincial jurisdiction and say that any treaty the dominion sees fit to enter into can be implemented, no matter if it takes provincial lands or invades the realm of provincial jurisdiction. My right hon. friend in his statement the other day intimated that he thought it went that far. He said, as reported at page 643 of Hansard:

The ratio decidendi of the case is that section 132 confers on this parliament the power to discharge every obligation under a treaty, whether it affects the dominion or a province, which we enter into as part of the British empire. It may therefore be taken that wherever, as a part of the empire, a treaty is made by the parliament of Canada, this parliament has complete jurisdiction to deal with every phase of the subject matter of the treaty to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of the provinces of confederation.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the privy council said.

Mr. RALSTON: The privy council did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, just those words.

Mr. RALSTON: I am saying those are not the words of the privy council.

Mr. BENNETT: I am saying they are.

Mr. RALSTON: I am saying that is the extreme position to which my right hon. friend is carried. But there is no convention at all. The Minister of Justice, in getting out of rather a bad hole in which he found himself in regard to having expressed an opinion on the invalidity of the eight hour day convention, indicated that he had expressed that opinion before there was any convention; but now, said he, there is a convention and of course I change my opinion.

I point out that in this case of unemployment insurance there is no convention; what is his opinion therefore in this case? The Prime Minister says that the minister believes that in this case, notwithstanding that there is no convention, there is a binding obligation on the Dominion of Canada. I leave my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to deal with that himself if he cares to. I submit that there is no obligation under article 427 and no obligation under article 23, and there is no convention. I submit to my right hon. friend that there is the most serious doubt as to the jurisdiction of this parliament to pass this bill.

Then I go one step further. Leaving all these legal considerations aside we have the declaration of the Minister of Justice who is the attorney general of the dominion, in 1933, which was put on record this afternoon by my hon. friend from Quebec East. That was after the radio and aeronautics cases had been decided, and yet my hon. friend was still asserting that it was the provinces which had jurisdiction over unemployment insurance. In 1932, again after the radio and aeronautics cases had been decided, my right hon. friend said this was within the jurisdiction of the provinces. That citation was put on record, from Hansard 1932-33, page 1452, the other night by my right hon. leader. Then we have the words uttered in 1929 by the Secretary of State, to be found in Hansard for that year at page 2776, which were put on record by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), indicating the same view. When we have that situation do not my hon. friends, and particularly those interested in labour, think the proper thing to do in the first place would be to bring down the opinions of the law officers of the crown, in order to let this parliament see whether there is a possibility of this legislation really being good? Then do they not think, in the second place, that this matter should be submitted immediately to the Supreme Court of Canada in order that we may know whether we are going to enact legislation which, to use the expression of my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell), will be worth anything at all? In that connection I should like to cite what the Prime Minister said in connection with old age pensions. I quote from Hansard for 1926, at page 1970.

> Faulty legislation placed upon the statute books the effect of which is to bring about chaos is very much to be deprecated. Anyone who has followed the course of legislation in any country, especially legislation of this character, will realize that where you rely solely and entirely upon experiments you have nothing but political action following political action and what was intended to be a great benefit has in many instances been a positive disadvantage to the very class it was intended to benefit.

Let me also remind my right hon. friend of what he said in a letter written to his former colleague, the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), as contained in sessional paper No. 99:

> In due course a committee of eleven was appointed and you were elected chairman. From that time the committee had an absolutely free hand and no effort of any kind, shape or form was made to in any way limit or restrict its activities except that on more than one occasion we pointed out to you the danger of creating in the minds of those interested, especially in the retail business, the impression that parliament could provide a remedy for the conditions of which they complained in view of the decisions of the courts as to the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures over contracts and price fixing.

I am pointing out the danger of creating in the minds of the people of the Dominion of Canada the impression that this parliament has the undoubted right to legislate in connection with the matter of unemployment insurance, in view of the legal position, and in view of the statements of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State. I say that even if this measure is only for the future; even though it will not take effect until next year, so far as practical benefits are concerned, we ought to set ourselves to do a workmanlike job in connection with it. If the Prime Minister fails to do that I submit that it will corroborate and seal the conviction in the public mind that this legislation will prove to be not a benefit but rather a gold brick and a sham, as being inadequate in its provision in that, as I said a moment ago, it omits three of the primary industries entirely and secondly in that it establishes a bureaucracy. Thirdly, and worst of all, it is a measure born not of lifelong convictions and practical activities in connection with social legislation but born of a feeling of desperation, and a knowledge on the part of the Prime Minister that he is about to face the electors of the dominion, and that he must look for something with which to obscure the promises he made in 1930.

I say to the right hon. gentleman that we will do all we can to assist in making this legislation, the sincerity of which we are bound to doubt, just as workable as possible, but at the same time we warn the people of Canada, just as he warned his Minister of Trade and Commerce, that we see the danger of a false impression being created in the minds of the working people of this country with regard to the benefits which may be received from this legislation, in view of the very doubtful validity of the measure, which doubt is supported by the right hon. Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, before the debate closes I feel bound to express my disagreement with practically the whole house in regard to this measure. I am brought to my feet by reason of an observation made by my good friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) when he stated, somewhat mistakenly, that there were 245 fathers to this bill. I disclaim all paternity.

I am not going to develop my reasons for that statement, because it would be unfair to the house and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to prolong the debate unduly. I am opposed to this measure for many reasons. First, I am opposed to it because of the constitutional aspect which has been so ably presented by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and just now by the hon member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). For the life of me, I cannot understand how a single Liberal can vote for this measure after those three speeches. Second, I am opposed to it because it offers no cure whatever for the present unemployment situation, and this was handsomely admitted by the Prime Minister in introducing this measure. Third, I am opposed to it because it offers no relief in the future for a very large class of workers in some of the most important and permanent industries of the country, as was well pointed out by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth this evening. Fourth, because of conditions peculiar to this country such as the climate, the variety of occupations and the seasonal work, it is no remedy to copy a measure suitable to a country like Great Britain in order to cure an evil which with us is different and always will be different. I see in that another form of that old colonial spirit which thought that by copying anything on the statute books of England we were answering the needs of the people of Canada.

My fifth reason for opposing the measure is that it adds again to the load which is already weighing so heavily upon the shoulders of the ratepayers of this country; and when I speak of ratepayers I do not mean the wealthy ratepayers; I am speaking of that undefined class of small proprietors in the large centres, in the towns, in the villages, and a very large number of farmers, who are already overloaded with taxes for schools and for the support of municipalities, provinces and the dominion, and who cannot bear any more taxation.

My sixth reason for being opposed to this legislation is that I find in it what I have seen growing in the last four or five years, and what evidently is going to continue to grow, whether the present government remains in power or whether my good friends here, the Liberals, come back to power. I refer to the tendency to purchase the good will of the various classes of the community by pouring public money into their pockets, favouring one class at the expense of a second, and a third class at the expense of a fourth. I have denounced it when it was a policy of high protection for industry; I denounce it now, because the effect of our whole so called social legislation is to debase the social spirit of our people, to create a fast growing class of beggars, loafers and crooked men, who expect the state to give them a living and who are endeavouring to avoid any individual or corporate effort to help save their own situation.

I am not going to deal at length with this or any other aspect of the problem. May I say that I have liberated my mind on this occasion and I may have further occasion to do it on other measures which will be presented to us. As a Canadian and as a friend of all classes in Canada, I believe we are on the wrong track towards remedying the evils that are upon us. No legislation, and especially no amount of money, will accomplish any good until we have created in the minds and hearts of all classes of Canadians a true social spirit. My good friend from East Hamilton knows about the experience in England in connection with this or similar legislation. Let me quote to him the opinion of a man who has given all his life to the welfare of the labouring class in England, a man whom I had the pleasure of knowing a good many years ago, a man who was then at the height of his popularity; I refer to John Burns. In the month of June, 1901, I met him in the city of London, after he had returned from a trip through Canada and the United States. I asked him to give me in a nutshell his impression of the labouring class in America as compared with the labourers of England. He said, in substance: "I will tell you frankly that the main difference I have found was this: The average American thinks of himself first and of his class after. We have been able to create a social spirit and bring about social legislation in England because we have educated the English working man to think of his class first and himself afterwards." When he spoke of the average American he was including the Canadian along with the workingman of the United States. He said that of course he knew if the conditions of his class were improved he and his family would receive the benefits.

After forty years of experience in public life, having acquired knowledge of what is going on in different countries, I state quite frankly that the chief characteristic of our so-called American civilization, of our so-called high standard of life, is selfishness, individual selfishness, class selfishness. Almost every farmer thinks first of himself and then of the other farmers. Almost every workingman thinks first of himself and afterwards about his fellow workers. Every class of workmen think first of themselves and of their special trade; they do not care what will become of the workers in other unions or in other trades—and likewise with the industrialists and the professional men. Of course, that is an evil common to all new countries, the individuals of which migrated from various other countries. They come to the new country for the purpose of improving their individual conditions. Their main concern was and is the acquisition of individual wealth. Then came the days of corporations which each individual joins to get as much as he can from or through that corporation, as much as he can from the public treasury and from the consumers in the country. That is the social spirit we have. If we wish to have social legislation which will accomplish good, we must first work out and make firm the social spirit of the nation. We must imbue the labourer, the farmer, the business man and the professional man with the idea that if he wants to get something from the state and something from his fellow citizens, he must be prepared to give himself, his family and his country the full benefit of his effort to ameliorate his own condition and the condition of his class, and to help remedy the conditions of his country.

The policy of spoon feeding which has developed since the war is to my mind an instrument of debasement of public virility and social spirit. Our farmers to-day in the old province of Quebec are fast losing their sense of honour and their sense of duty. Many farmers to-day are thinking of going into bankruptcy and following the example which has been set by so many industrialists and merchants, namely that of cheating their creditors as much as they can, and then getting money from the state to make good. What will they reap from going into fraudulent bankruptcy? That is the object many farmers have to-day. I have had experience with labour unions, and I have seldom found a true apostle of the proper social spirit among the labourers. At times, in the city of Montreal, I have been called upon to act as a friendly arbiter between groups of labourers and their employers. What did I find? On the one hand I found the employer thinking only of one thing, namely imposing the hardest conditions he could on his men, and on the other hand I found the men thinking of only one thing, namely, wresting from the company all they could, with entire disregard for the good of the community.

I have spoken at greater length than I had intended, but so far as I am concerned, if this goes to a vote, I shall record my vote against the second reading of the bill.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to follow the practice which is so popular at the beginning of remarks, namely to say that I had no intention of taking part in this debate. At the same time, however, since the introduction of the bill I have listened to the speeches of hon. members opposite and from time to time I have jotted down on a sheet of paper some of the illogical arguments they have used.

Particularly was I struck when to-night the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), with his ability as a master of jibes and sneers, attacked the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) because that right hon. gentleman, forsooth, had had the courage to say necessity demanded that some of the errors of the economic system of to-day must be corrected. According to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, apparently it is a greater crime to say that errors need correction and to have the vision and the courage to correct them than it is to be absolutely strict, as his leader has been, in putting into books, putting into speeches, putting into charts, putting into platforms and putting into the mouths of committees principles up to which he never lives.

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) who has just taken his seat, put his finger upon the truth when he said—I may not be using his exact words, but I believe I express his view—that if hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken had any honesty in them they could not possibly support a measure which they have opposed ever since it was introduced. The hon. member for Labelle has been honest enough to say that he is going to oppose the measure; only a few moments ago he made that statement quite frankly. He says he will not vote for the measure because he does not believe in it, as is obvious from his observations. Hon. members opposite do not believe in it. But, not believing, not one is going to be honest enough to vote against it. They are claiming that it is unconstitutional, claiming that it is inconsistent, claiming that the right hon. leader of the government is no fit leader for this country because he has changed his mind in one or two matters. Yet, claiming all that, they will vote for the measure. When we come to a vote on the second reading or third reading not one man of the whole group on the other side of the house, with the exception of the hon. member for Labelle, will have the courage to stand up and vote against it.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth stated a few moments ago that the trouble with the Prime Minister was that he had electionitis, simply because he saw the need for reform. May I ask the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth if his right hon. leader had electionitis when in the last session of parliament—in fact I believe it was after the last session of parliament and before the last election—he was responsible for passing orders in council making legal the eight hour day, and only the eight hour day, on public works in Canada, and yet did not put it into effect? Did his leader have electionitis, when just before the last election he took out of the treasury of the country tens of thousands of dollars—I do not remember the exact amount—and handed it in extra payment to the charwomen, forsooth, of the city of Ottawa, just before the election, in order to make sure of their votes? There is no doubt about the purpose of that move.

Was his leader suffering from electionitis when he travelled from the Atlantic to the Pacific and talked of Senate reform, and then never touched it in nine years when he got back into power? Was his leader and the former Minister of Labour, a colleague of my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth, suffering from electionitis when they travelled around this country and said, "We must have unemployment insurance in this country," and yet never did anything to put it into effect? The right hon. leader of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has done nothing in this house but talk of the principles which he upholds, yet did nothing to put those principles into practice when he had the power; and I say here that when the time comes the people of this country will have to judge between a man who always talks principles and does not practise them, and a man like the present leader of the government, who may at times perhaps be inconsistent in some of his statements, but who has the courage and vision to bring into effect corrections of the economic system under which we are living in order to save that system in which we believe. The whole boast of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and the other side of the house about their leader is that he has been consistent and my leader inconsistent. Somebody much greater than I once said that consistency was the bane of little minds, and I think that is probably true. I would point out that one of the names in English history which has come down to us during the last half century has been that of Sir Robert Peel, one of the greatest leaders that England ever produced, one of the greatest men that ever stood in the British parliament, and yet a man of whom it was said that before he finally went out of power he had put into effect practically everything that he had opposed earlier in his career. Is it then a crime to change one's ideas if one sees the need of change? I think it was Abraham Lincoln who said that anyone was welcome to his cast-off ideas; and my hon. friends opposite are welcome to the cast-off ideas of the present Prime Minister, or of any member on this side of the house.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. member for Quebec East, the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, and even the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) to-night in that masterly and classical manner of his, have been spending hours in this house telling the people of our country that this legislation that is proposed by the Prime Minister is unconstitutional. Well, if they are convinced that it is unconstitutional, and that it cannot be carried out, as they say—that the provinces will prevent its being carried out—should they not honestly and squarely oppose the measure instead of doing as they are doing, expressing their opposition to it in speech but pretending that they are going to support it in action? That is the attitude they are taking. They tell us that they are for this measure. Without exception hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house, one after the other, except the hon. member for Labelle, have stood up and said: I want it distinctly understood that I am for this measure, but I want it also distinctly understood that the measure is no good, it is unconstitutional. And anybody who has the sense of an ordinary workingman cannot help but realize that they will do everything they can to make it unworkable if they ever get a chance to put it into effect

The leader of the opposition the other day, in that two-hour weary and dreary speech of his, as usual, made the statement that his government could not put such a measure into effect because they had to balance the budget. Then he showed that they had balanced the budget, that between 1925 and 1930, he said, they had actually cut down the debt of this country by $240,000,000. That was the statement also made on a number of occasions by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, that they had cut down the debt of this country by $240,000,000. Well, if they were able to cut down the debt of this country by $240,000,000, were they not then in a position to do a little towards putting into force some of this social legislation that we are attempting to bring in, and was not that the proper time to put social legislation into effect, preparing for days that must come in every nation when times would not be so good as they were throughout the world between 1925 and 1930? But as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, one must not take hon. gentlemen opposite exactly at their word with regard to that $240,000,000, because, instead of cutting down the debt of Canada by $240,000,000 between 1925 and 1930, they added to the debt of the railways by $461,000,000. That is what they did. They added to the debt by $461,000,000, and if you take one from the other it leaves a net addition to the debt for which this country is responsible, although indirectly I admit, of $221,000,000 during that time. That is the actual fact.

Mr. DUFF: You have not reduced the debt since, either on the railways or anywhere else.

Mr. MANION: Certainly not, and no one knows better than the hon. gentleman, who is on the railway committee, that it was he and his friends on the other side of the house who put the railway into such a condition that they added to the debt of the railway in one year, as was so well pointed out by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Beynon) in an outstandingly able speech to-day, not $205,000,000, as he said, but almost $250,000,000.

Mr. DUFF: And you never opposed one dollar of it.

Mr. MANION: One of our members stood up and did oppose it.

Mr. DUFF: You did not.

Mr. MANION: I have admitted that in the house before. I did not understand it, but hon. gentlemen who were sitting in the government of that day, and who should have known better, permitted the Canadian National to be used as a pork barrel from the Atlantic to the Pacific, building hotels, terminals, branch lines, acquiring dead lines, building steamships and other things, to the amount of $250,000,000 in one year, or over two-thirds of the whole national debt of Canada before the war.

Mr. DUFF: And you never opened your mouth about it.

Mr. MANION: Maybe I did not open my mouth about it, but my hon. friend is very good at opening his.

Mr. DUFF: I do not put my foot in mine like you do.

Mr. MANION: Well, I could put my foot in the hon. gentleman's—there is plenty of room.

Between 1926 and 1929 there was a boom and expansion throughout the world, and the revenues not only of this country but of every country were expanding. That was the time, if ever there was a time, when this country could easily have put into effect social legislation. I made inquiries two years ago of the bureau of statistics as to what were the total wages and salaries paid in Canada in 1931. That was not the boom year, but two years after the boom broke; and I found that the wages and salaries paid in this country—not the dividends and interest paid to the richer people—amounted to $2,500,000,000. One per cent of that would have created a fund each year of $25,000,000. If, as the Prime Minister pointed out the other day, hon. gentlemen opposite had put some legislation of this sort on the statute books at that time, as they should have done, we would have built up a fund of one or two hundred million dollars with which to help bridge over the depression when it came.

Mr. CAMPBELL: You were in power then.

Mr. MANION: We were not in power from 1925 to 1930.

Mr. CAMPBELL: You were talking about 1931.

Mr. MANION: I was talking of the period from 1925 to 1930 when big revenues were coming in, and I say that in that period, at one per cent a fund could have been built up which would have helped us bridge over the depression.

Mr. DUFF: You admit that we were prosperous then.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but not because of my hon. friends opposite. It was because the whole world was booming, and there was nothing that my hon. friend and his friends did to make us prosperous. On the contrary they did everything in their power, by allowing other countries to restrict their markets to us, to wreck this country in trade and everything else.

The right hon. leader of the opposition the other day spoke for two solid hours, and his lieutenants and supporters ever since have been giving constitutional reasons of all kinds, and various other reasons, why this legislation should not go into effect. They have proven through the Liberal convention and the reports of house committees in 1928 and 1929, and even by the book that the leader of the opposition wrote twenty years ago, that he has always stood for these principles, but he has never put them into practice. It reminds me of that rhyme—I may have forgotten the exact words, but it goes something like this:

For of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: "It might have been."

Mr. DUFF: "O wad some power the giftie gie us, to see oursels as ithers see us."

Mr. MANION: I did not catch what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: Will the Prime Minister please keep quiet.

Mr. MANION: About ten years ago I compared the leader of the opposition to Mr. Micawber. When Micawber owed a debt he always insisted on giving a promissory note and thanking God that the debt had been paid, and the leader of the opposition has been apparently under the impression for the last twenty years that so long as he put in books, in speeches, in charts and platforms, principles which he never lived up to when he got into power, the people ought to be satisfied and happy. He has been on all sides of all questions, and any one of us, the humblest member, can take that book which he wrote and which I tried to plough through some years ago, being unable to finish it—and I never met anyone but the leader of the opposition himself who did finish it—anyone, I say, can take that book and prove that the right hon. gentleman has been on all sides of all questions at all times in any period in the last twenty years.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. DUFF: You have been on two sides of the reciprocity question.

Mr. MANION: I admit some of my inconsistencies; I wish my hon. friend would admit some of his.

Mr. DUFF: Mine are legion.

Mr. MANION: I know it.

Mr. DUFF: I don't have to admit it.

Mr. MANION: The greatest theoretical reformer in this country has been the leader of the opposition. If this man Hauptmann who was convicted last night—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: —had had his abilities in the line of proving an alibi—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MANION: —he would not have been found guilty.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. MANION: There is nothing to take back; I did not compare the right hon. gentleman to Hauptmann. My hon. friends are a little too thin skinned, after some of the remarks they have addressed to this side of the house.

I simply wish to point out that the Liberal party, ever since this measure was introduced, has been pretending cooperation and really opposing the measure. They have done as they have usually done with all the measures which we have introduced at any time in the last four years; they have been fault finding, opposing and offering destructive criticism. They have stood up when they thought it good politics and said, "We are for these measures;" but they put every obstacle in the way of getting these measures on the statute books. They forget that the world throughout the last four years has passed through one of the most terrible crises in its history. They forget that there have been thirty million unemployed, of which number Canada has had but a very, very small proportion, about one or two per cent. In all the industrial countries of the world there have been some thirty millions unemployed, and two-thirds of the world's trade has been cut off by the depression. But my hon. friends have deemed it sufficient for them to play politics, placing party first and the state second. Macaulay once said that none was for the party and all were for the state; but on the other side all are for the party and none is for the state. And that has been so throughout the whole four years. In my opinion the people of this country realize that the Prime Minister has had the vision and the courage to recognize the necessity for correcting the errors of our system. Anyone who is not totally blind and deaf knows that the system under which we live has very serious errors. No system under which young men and young women, boys and girls coming out of our schools and colleges, find it impossible to get work; no system under which there are hundreds of thousands of people who are willing to work and unable to get work, who cannot earn the necessaries of life for their loved ones; no system that permits that condition is a good system. The system should be corrected, and my right hon. leader, the Prime Minister, is attempting to correct these errors from within. But my hon. friends are doing everything they can to prevent the system being corrected—what for? For purposes of party politics and nothing else. The leader of the opposition says that this measure will do nothing for those who are at present unemployed and that we are not worrying about the future. That is another attempt to capitalize discontent. Have we had any support from him during the last four years, and particularly during the last year, when we supplied $40,000,000 for public works?

Mr. DUFF: Did we not vote for it?

Mr. MANION: When it was in your constituency, yes.

Mr. DUFF: There was not a dollar in my constituency and I voted for it.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend does occasionally vote against his party.

Mr. DUFF: But you said a moment ago that I didn't. Be consistent.

Mr. MANION: I was not speaking of the hon. gentleman but of his party. His whole party opposed the empire agreements—

An hon. MEMBER: And we will again.

Mr. MANION: —and to-night they have been criticizing the central bank. They have criticized the marketing act, and for weeks in this house they opposed assistance to the provinces, assistance to the municipalities, assistance to the railways, because the Prime Minister had the courage in a time of necessity to guarantee, at no cost to Canada, so far at any rate—and I do not think it will cost the country a cent—money for the Canadian Pacific Railway in relation to some of their commitments.

Mr. DUFF: We voted for it.

Mr. MANION: You may have voted for it but you talked against it. My hon. friends usually get in line and vote for what looks good politically, but they always stand up and oppose everything that is brought forward. We looked after the drought area in Saskatchewan, where there were 300,000 people on relief. This government took care of them and received little thanks from the members from Saskatchewan on the other side. We took care of camps for the young and we were accused of setting up slave camps for these young people. And we have safeguarded the credit of the country. Practically every measure of a constructive kind which this government has brought forward in the last four years, and particularly during the last year, has met with fault finding and destructive criticism on the other side—in other words, party politics. That is what we have been receiving from the other side. They have been sitting by hoping that something would turn up to keep the depression going until an election came around, hoping that they would float into power on a tide of discontent.

Mr. DUFF: What about the Prime Minister, in his radio speech, priming the pumps?

Mr. MANION: So far as that goes, the reform measures will prime the pumps of progress and prosperity. I admit that my hon. friends opposite, and I say this as one Canadian to other Canadians—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I say that they are just as good Canadians as I am; I do not question that.

Mr. DUFF: You didn't say that a minute ago.

Mr. MANION: Politically you are not. As Canadians my hon. friends are just as good as I am—

Mr. DUFF: Thank you.

Mr. MANION: —and I therefore appeal to them in this time of crisis not to talk cooperation and put up opposition, but to talk cooperation and carry it out. I admit that most hon. members really believe that it is time for them to get behind these progressive measures and to help us to put them into effect, instead of raising every objection, constitutional and otherwise, which they can think of, to delay and embarrass and obstruct the government at every possible turn. Instead of doing that I appeal to them to join with this government and assist us to put into effect legislation which will be beneficial to the country.

Mr. BENNETT: It is obvious that I cannot reply to-night—

Mr. DUFF: Ten minutes yet.

Mr. BENNETT: I am prepared to go on, but it will serve no useful purpose.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 15, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILL TO PROVIDE FOR THE APPOINTMENT OF AUDITORS

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 20 respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MANION: This, Mr. Speaker, is merely the annual appointment of the auditors of the Canadian National Railways, as called for by the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a second time?

Mr. DUFF: Now.

Mr. MANION: I think the bill will have to be printed in English and French before it can be given second reading. I am afraid someone might object if that were not done.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday the 20th instant to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Wednesday over all business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

He said: As I stated previously, the government is entirely in the hands of the house in regard to this motion. If it is the wish of any substantial number that another Wednesday should be made available for private members we are quite prepared to agree.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): So far as this part of this side of the house is concerned we do not want to put any obstacles in the way of the Prime Minister taking up all the remaining days of the session.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre):): Mr. Speaker, we are just as anxious not to put any obstacles in the way, but we would like it very much if there could be another private members' day.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Then if I may be permitted to do so I will move that the motion be amended to read the 27th instead of the 20th, so that the 20th will still be available to private members.

Motion as amended agreed to.

MARKETING BOARD—ADVANCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), based on a telegram he received, I may say that the marketing board has advanced money to organizations in western Canada, with definite conditions attached to the advancing of such money. None of these conditions state that it is for the purpose of promotion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is that?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Speak out.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): None of these conditions state that it is for the purpose of promotion.

Mr. YOUNG: Can the money be used for the purpose of promotion?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on the interpretation of the word "promotion," I think.

Mr. YOUNG: That is not very satisfactory.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPLICATIONS BEFORE BOARD OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS TO ABANDON BRANCH LINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) asked a question as to the number of applications by the Canadian National Railways for the abandonment of branch lines. The answer is: Twenty-four.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the resolution of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church) regarding automobile accidents the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) asked about the number of grade crossings which had been eliminated through assistance under the grade crossing fund. If the house is willing I will place these tables on Hansard. They are as follows:

AYLMER, QUE., WHARF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. W. PERRAS (Wright): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) to a motion for papers standing in my name and passed by the house on February 4, asking for the production of all petitions, letters, reports of engineers and other documents in the possession of the Department of Public Works and received during the years 1933 and 1934, regarding the proposed expenditure of $7,000 on a public wharf at Aylmer, in the county of Wright. Could the minister tell me when these reports will be tabled.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is probably aware, the number of requests in the current year for reports and returns from the Department of Public Works has been exceedingly high. We have had to employ additional stenographers for the purpose of preparing such reports. I shall make an inquiry and see that the information is brought down as early as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) asked me if I would table a copy of the correspondence which passed between myself and the Premier of Quebec with respect to contributions by the province and the dominion towards direct relief. I desire now to table the correspondence.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

EXTENSION OF PENSION PROVISIONS AND DISTRIBUTION OF FINES AND PENALTIES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On the short title.

Mr. POWER: Would the minister tell the committee how many men would be affected by this change. I believe on the last occasion the matter was under discussion he said there would be only two or three.

Mr. GUTHRIE: So far as is known, there are only four.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister any objection to naming them?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know the names of all, but I do know the names of two. One is a man named Bowen, a sergeant, and the other is Jennings, the assistant commissioner. I am told that there may be—it is not certain—two in the west, whose names I do not know.

Mr. POWER: Is there any reason why the principle contained in this bill should not be extended to the entire civil service? Why do we differentiate?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We did differentiate in the case of the military forces of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know that I have any particular objection to extending the measure, but it could not be done in this bill.

Mr. POWER: Why are we giving special treatment to the police,—better treatment than we give to any other branch of the service, with the possible exception of the militia? They are not civil servants, but a good many of them were—

Mr. DUFF: In some cases very uncivil.

Mr. POWER: I am told that not only are they very uncivil, but in some respects they have been endeavouring to introduce into this country some of the practices which prevail in countries in Europe, and which would not be for the good of this country as a whole.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was going to say a word on this subject when we reached sections 4 and 5 of the bill. I believe this is a continuation of a new policy which seems to militarize the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. During the past three years it seems to have been the custom to consider members of the force as military men. Their years of service in the militia count, and in many other ways they have become to some extent what people would call militaristic. I think it would be a great mistake if that was the spirit that was to prevail in the end. The police force of Canada or of any country should be kept as far away as possible from the military end of the national organization. They should act in quite a different way, but I have heard it said during the last two or three years that military methods were being introduced in the mounted police, and I am certainly not in accord with that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, in reply to my hon. friend from Quebec East I entirely agree with him that the force is not a military force, should not be so treated and should not be so considered. It was established as a police force and in order to keep it as a police force it was thought better in the early days to attach it to the Department of Justice rather than to any other department, in order that it might remain purely and simply a police force, and there it is at the present day. I know of no military operation or anything in the nature of a military operation that the force has ever been called upon to perform unless in connection with the northwest rebellion of 1885. The training is police training; the whole idea of the training and of the system is to keep the force distinctly a police force. If my hon. friend from Quebec East would mention some of the instances to which he refers I will make inquiry into them.

Mr. POWER: Only recently the newspapers carried a report of a complaint that was made by a barrister in Halifax, Nova Scotia, a Mr. McInnes, who complained very bitterly of the treatment that was meted out to one of the witnesses of the accused, I forget which, in the recent cases involving charges of evasion of the customs laws. My recollection is that very grave charges of undue exercise of third degree methods were made against the officers of the police. I think it might be interesting to the house to know to just what extent the Canadian military forces or the Canadian police are entitled to use third degree methods. Just because they are in effect in other countries, have we decided that we are going to carry on this very un-British practice of persecuting or tormenting people in order to make them confess or make statements to the police which they otherwise would not make? I think it might be informative to the house if the minister would give us a statement as to the authority of the mounted police in matters of that kind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I may say in reply to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat that I would resent just as much as he does, or anyone else would, any insinuation that what are known as third degree methods were employed by the police. I have heard statements made and I have made inquiries in regard to specific cases, and I am satisfied that there is no foundation for such charges. The police are instructed otherwise. They are a police force. I am aware that in some parts of the world what are called third degree methods are in vogue and it may be in some municipal forces in Canada, although I do not know that; but positive instructions are issued to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that no third degree methods are permissible and if any member of the force seeks to practise them I only wish it would be reported.

Mr. POWER: Is the minister aware of the affidavit or statement that was made by a Mr. Russell McInnes, a barrister of Halifax, I think, relating to the questioning of a Mrs. Carline.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot recall the case.

Mr. POWER: It was within the last three weeks.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Three weeks?

Mr. POWER: Three weeks or a month ago.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, but a number of cases have been brought to my attention during the last four or five years, and after investigation in all these cases I have had to come to the conclusion that the charges were absolutely unfounded.

Mr. DUFF: Did the minister see in the newspapers that the mail of one of the members of parliament in this country had been opened by these so-called mounted policemen?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I have never heard of that complaint.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, on the question of the conduct of the mounted police in the matter of the use of third degree methods, I brought a case to the attention of the Solicitor General last session, I think it was, and the Solicitor General promised to make an investigation. Apparently an investigation was made in an ex parte manner, if I may use the term, and the report was sent in to the department that there was no foundation for the statement. I repeat here to-day that there is foundation, that there was no proper investigation held, and I want now to go one step further.

Another case arose in my town where the mounted police, the same ones I complained of before, put a prisoner, the accused, through the third degree in the worst manner possible. The young man was accused of manslaughter. He was supposed to have been driving at night and to have struck an individual and not to have stopped when the accident took place. The man died and this young man was arrested by the mounted police. He was not put in gaol but taken before the mounted police and questioned. The officers who questioned him were not the ones who took what purported to be his confession, and those officers who questioned him told him that the car they had examined had blood on it and that one of the mudguards in front was broken and that a piece of it was found on the road, which was an absolute lie. I was present in court, and one of the mounted police was asked whether he was a party to the questioning. He said no. Then he was asked, "Were you a party to examining this car?" He said yes. Then he was asked, "If a confrere, a brother policeman of yours, made the statement that there was blood on that car and that one of the mudguards was broken, would you say that he told the truth?" "No," he said, "I would say he lied." I was present in the court and heard this. The young man, he was just a young boy of eighteen or nineteen, had gone over that road the night of the accident but said he had never struck anybody so far as he could ascertain. He did in a matter of confession, after this third degree questioning, after he was told there was blood on his car, after he was told the mudguard was broken, say, "I may have struck somebody lying down on the road but I certainly did not knock a man down." While the trial was going on before the supreme court Mr. Justice Le Blanc refused to allow this purported confession to be put in evidence because the policeman who had questioned the prisoner was not the one who was in court and he could not be found, and for that reason the purported confession was not allowed in evidence.

What happened? The jury cleared this young man but the police brought a charge against him for violent and dangerous driving, whatever the term is, before a police magistrate, and this purported confession that he had made to the police was allowed in evidence before the police magistrate and the young man was fined $50 and costs for vicious or violent driving.

I am making this statement on my honour as a member of the house. The third degree was applied to that young man, and I do not want to see any more investigations like the one that was held by Captain Salt, who is head of the police of the province. Captain Salt on that occasion came all the way from Fredericton to Bathurst, and he assisted at that inquiry by the police, and then went home. After Captain Salt had gone back to Fredericton the young man was taken before two policemen who had not questioned him but who knew the questions that he had been asked and the answers he gave, and they induced him to make a sort of confession which was used against him. Now if this is going to be allowed to go on, the worth of the mounted police will be at an end. Their authority will be no longer any good.

Take the case in the province of Quebec to which reference has been made. In that instance there was almost a forced confession, and I do not care what police force was involved in it; I am discussing the question of third degree methods. The supreme court refused the evidence. Now I submit that if the mounted police or any other police force are going to use methods of that kind to get evidence, then bringing the criminals before the court, you cannot expect to get convictions. No justice of the court, made aware of the circumstances under which such evidence is obtained, is going to allow such confessions to go in. There is a method of obtaining evidence and the police are paid for doing that work; but they are not paid for this third degree business.

Referring to the case mentioned by the hon. member for Quebec South, the McInnes case, let me call the attention of the attorney general to another case—and perhaps I am out of order in discussing it inasmuch as it is before the courts now for preliminary examination. A lady and her daughter have produced evidence—I saw the affidavit myself—showing that the mounted police went to their house and demanded to know where her husband was. Apparently she did not know at the time, whether he was in the city or not and they demanded that she go to the bank and open the safety deposit box in the name of her husband and herself. She refused, and the policeman who was there, accompanied by another told her that if she did not appear at the bank at 10 o'clock the next morning he would break the box open with an axe. At 10 o'clock the next morning she was there, and under threats she opened the deposit box and the police took out of the box all the papers belonging to these people. When the matter came up before the court the other day in Montreal, and this question of third degree methods was involved, the lawyers prosecuting refused to file the documents taken out of that box, in order to prevent this lady from going on the stand with her daughter and giving evidence. The policemen denied the affair and the court decided that the affidavits would not be taken because the individuals could be produced. The defence offered to produce the individuals and brought them there at two o'clock in the afternoon. In the afternoon at two o'clock the prosecuting attorneys refused to file the papers taken out of the box, so that these ladies could not be put on the stand as witnesses to prove that the mounted police had attempted by third degree methods to procure the documents. I would direct these cases to the attention of the attorney general. I have seen the affidavits in the Montreal case, and I was present in the court and followed the whole proceedings in the case that came up in Bathurst, so that I know that third degree methods have been applied. I would ask therefore for an investigation not by Captain Salt in Fredericton, the head of the mounted police of New Brunswick, but by a person sent from the Department of Justice in Ottawa, someone who will not play favourites with anyone but will carry out a fair and square investigation of the facts. And I will be prepared to produce witnesses because I do not want an ex parte investigation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I should be glad to grant the request of my hon. friend in regard to the New Brunswick case which he has mentioned and which has not been brought to my attention before.

Mr. VENIOT: No, I did not bring it to your attention.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member makes a complaint as to some confession which was allegedly taken by third degree methods. My idea of third degree methods is that they are methods whereby men are cajoled and threatened and tortured and exhausted, as a result of which statements are obtained from them.

Mr. VENIOT: I gave you cases.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am satisfied that nothing of the kind has taken place.

Mr. VENIOT: I am satisfied it has.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have no particulars of it yet. But it is common in every police system in the world, I think, to question witnesses or supposed criminals before they are arrested. It is the method of doing it that is sometimes called the third degree, but the mere fact of questioning transpires, I think, in every important criminal case in this country. If confessions are obtained by threats or promises the court very properly rules them out. The court in New Brunswick, according to my hon. friend's statement, did rule out the confession against this man who was charged, but subsequently when the matter came before the magistrate's court, he was fined $50 for reckless driving or something of the kind. If there is any complaint in regard to that, it cannot be made against the mounted police but against the judiciary or the magistrates of New Brunswick. We do not enforce the criminal laws in any province; the provinces enforce them, and if the magistrate has made a mistake there is recourse and appeal can be taken against his decision under the laws of New Brunswick. So far as I can see, however, no wrong has been done, nor has any injury followed. But to gratify my hon. friend, because he is always very positive in his statements, I will have an investigation made by someone outside the establishment in the province of New Brunswick. I will have it done by someone from Ottawa. I do not know about the Montreal case, and if I did I would not discuss it now, because it is before the courts. But on the statement that has been made, I see nothing to complain of in the conduct of the mounted police.

Mr. VENIOT: Surely the Minister of Justice does not mean to say that there is nothing wrong in the conduct of the mounted police, from the statement I have made. Will he approve of the mounted police lying to an individual—

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. VENIOT: —and telling him that there was blood on the car when there was not, telling him the mudguard was broken when it was not, in order to induce that individual to admit that he must have struck the man? He lied to him, misrepresenting the whole situation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the case I promise to investigate.

Mr. VENIOT: Then I will ask the minister this. When the investigation takes place, I will ask him not to have it held until I am at home after the session.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will agree to that too.

Mr. VENIOT: I ask that because I want to push this thing to the limit.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And if the hon. member will write me a letter giving names and dates, I shall have the preliminaries prepared, awaiting his return home.

Mr. VENIOT: Here is another thing about the conduct of the police. I hold a return from the Department of National Revenue in connection with the seizure of a vessel; I will not discuss that now; I will discuss the question fully when it comes up in the estimates. But I inquired what instructions were given the mounted police in connection, first, with the destruction of the vessel, and secondly, with the destruction of the liquor seized on board. The Department of National Revenue replied that they gave definite instructions for the destruction of the vessel and the destruction of the cargo. I then asked whether instructions were issued by the Department of National Revenue for the disposal of the stores found on board this vessel, and, if so, what those instructions were. The answer is, "No specific instructions." Now I want to know this. If the police received no specific instructions to destroy the stores of the ship, were they justified in taking those stores which had been seized on board the ship and carrying them to a private house of one of the mounted police, whose family were living there, and who had custody of those stores? They took them without specific instructions to take the ship's stores, consisting of pork, biscuits, flour and other provisions amounting to $600. They took these stores down to the shore, poured gasoline over them and destroyed them in the presence of hundreds of people who were on relief and who were pleading to get the stores rather than to see them destroyed. The department replied to me that no specific instructions were issued. I want to know whether the mounted police were justified in destroying those stores in that way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would very much prefer if cases of this kind were brought to my attention on the estimates of the mounted police and not on this bill. I would then have the commissioner in front of me and be able to give the information.

Mr. VENIOT: I will bring the matter up then. I just wanted to bring it to the attention of the house.

Mr. RALSTON: May I ask the minister what are the relations between the Department of Justice and the mounted police? Is the mounted police under the instructions and directions of the Department of Justice with regard to instituting prosecutions? My reason for asking the question is this: It sometimes appears as if the mounted police used entirely their own discretion as to what informations they should lay and what prosecutions they should commence, and on inquiry an intimation is given that the Department of Justice has nothing whatever to do with the matter. Is that the situation or does the minister consider himself as having control of the mounted police and as having the mounted police in aid of the civil power as vested in him for the purpose of prosecutions and the enforcement of law?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Under the statute the Minister of Justice is described as the minister in control of the mounted police; that is the official title. But so far as prosecutions instituted by the mounted police during my term as Minister of Justice are concerned, I have not interfered with those prosecutions. I am referring to prosecutions involving rights of the crown, the revenues of the crown and the like, smuggling cases, all revenue cases. When a prosecution is instituted, it is instituted by an officer of the mounted police and in the vast majority of cases without my knowledge. That is the instruction which the commissioner has in regard to such cases. That pertains particularly to the three provinces of Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia in which the mounted police has no jurisdiction outside of government cases. But in all the other provinces, under agreements made with the provincial governments, the mounted police does perform the police duties of the whole province, and in those provinces it is more or less under the direction of the attorney general of the province concerned. I am not in any way consulted about the cases in those provinces. But in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia in revenue cases, the action taken is taken on the initiative of the mounted police itself. Of course in the more important cases I am asked to nominate counsel for the conduct of the proceedings and in the majority of cases that is the first intimation I have that a prosecution is taking place. I have felt that it is not part of my duty to interfere in these prosecutions. I have time and again been requested by very able counsel, by the leading lawyers of this country, to intervene and to give them an opportunity of laying their case before me in order, I suppose, to allay or delay the prosecution or something of that kind, and I have refused to consider the question or to consult with them. Therefore to that extent in revenue cases the action taken is taken by the mounted police; they have control of the proceedings and they are very averse to any interference from any source whatever. Of course there are cases in which they do consult me, but not in regard to initial prosecution; they consult me in regard to the conduct of the case, the lawyers and the like.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to call attention to an incident which happened in my constituency. On one occasion an officer of the mounted police came there in connection with a man in charge of a vessel. I do not know whether he gave this man instructions to put up his hands, but without any interference or provocation from the man, this mounted police official started to shoot all around. I do not know what took place afterwards, whether the question was taken before the courts and what was decided, but on that occasion the people were making complaints, such as have been made here to-day, that mounted police officers in our part of the country were taking the law into their own hands and administering it in a highhanded fashion. The Department of Justice, under whose administration the mounted police force is, ought to be careful to see that the instructions given to mounted police officers, not only when they are acting in their capacity as mounted police officials but at other times as well in those districts, are very strict so that similar incidents will not occur again.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the hon. member will give me the names involved in the case he has just mentioned, I shall get a full report.

Mr. RALSTON: Following up my remarks and the reply made by the Minister of Justice, I am not talking about the matter of conducting prosecutions; what I am speaking of is the control of the minister in reference to instituting prosecutions. From some reports which have come to me, it seems that there have been cases in which the mounted police should refer to someone who understands the legal significance of the situation before the prosecution is actually commenced. In other words a report should be made to the minister in connection with revenue cases or any other cases under the dominion statutes, just as a report is made to the attorney general of a province or the crown prosecutor in a district, so that the attorney general or the crown prosecutor may give instructions and advice as to the person or persons against whom prosecution should be brought. What I am endeavouring to bring home to the minister is the idea that, it seems to me, he should not give up the control which the statute gives him over any part of the duties of the mounted police. He should not give them a blank cheque even to bring prosecutions without reference to him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suppose if the rule as suggested by my hon. friend were adopted, it would apply to all cases. In many cases which one might call the more important ones, I have had occasion to discuss with the commissioner the case itself or perhaps the nature of the prosecution that took place, but I have never interfered with what he thought right to do in prosecuting this, that or the other person. The commissioner has of necessity had to consult in many instances some legal authority and in such cases he has consulted the law officers of my department and in some instances he has discussed the matter with me also. That does not apply to the general run of prosecutions. I suppose hundreds of them take place that I never hear about and no one in the Department of Justice hears about. I received a return to-day that in the last six months there have been forfeitures declared of cars and liquor amounting to $994,000. I never heard of those cases but the prosecutions have taken place. Those are conducted by the mounted police; but if serious matters arise such as the seizure of a big vessel or a serious breach of the Customs Act, those matters would come to me through either the mounted police or the Department of National Revenue and in such cases we would advise. We do maintain general control of the mounted police, but "minister in control," as I think my predecessor will inform the house too, really means the person to represent the force in parliament, to see that the necessary supply is voted, to obtain any amendments that may be necessary to the law, and to have general charge of the force. So far as the internal economy of the force goes, I do not intermeddle at all. For instance, appointments, promotions and the like come before me as a matter of form for confirmation, but I leave these things entirely to the commissioner whom I believe to be well qualified to manage the force. In legal matters in more important cases consultations take place, but thousands of prosecutions are never heard of by the department.

Mr. RALSTON: All I want to impress upon the minister is that I submit that he should not, and I take it from his statement that he does not, treat the matter of control which is given by the statute as a purely formal or administrative matter. The police, after all, are like the military, used in aid of the civil power, represented in the person and office of the minister and for them he is responsible to parliament.

While I am on my feet, if I may refer to section 4, since we have discussed it—

Mr. GUTHRIE: As my hon. friend prefers.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to refer to sections 4 and 5, the pension sections. Hon. members who have preceded me have spoken of the objection to this legislation on the ground that it seemed to put the police on the basis of a military force. The minister states that the police are not a military force, and of course we know that legally they are not. Nevertheless I submit that the explanation that appears on the opposite page would indicate that the police have the idea that they should be treated as on all fours with the permanent military forces of Canada as far as remuneration, pay and allowances are concerned. I submit that the adoption of that principle in connection with the administration of justice in Canada is dangerous, and that it is no sufficient reason for increasing pensions to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that it happens that such and such a pension may be allowed to the military forces of Canada. The police are a civil force, their pensions are more properly approximated to the pensions of civil servants. That is the first point.

The second is, I submit that at this time when we are trying to soften a little the blows which the taxpayer is receiving, we should not rush to add further pension allowances or bonuses to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, particularly when those who would benefit by this provision are men who have entered the service under a contract which did not contain any such provision; in other words that this is a straight bonus added to pay, there is no contractual obligation of any kind, and no moral obligation, I take it, to make these payments. It seems to me that this money can be saved. The Minister of Justice may say that only a few men are involved; that does not make any difference to the principle. I feel that we ought to know, and I ask the minister if he would give us the information or get it, just how many men and how much money are involved in connection with this amendment made by sections 4 and 5. I do not think this is the time to make ex gratia payments to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or anyone else for that matter, in view of the obligations resting upon the country at the present time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I inquired this forenoon as to the number involved, and the commissioner assured me it was four. He gave the names of two and said there would be two in the northwest though he was not so sure of them, but he said that four was the maximum.

This should be borne in mind, that these pensions are not free gifts to these men from the government of Canada. If this bill passes they will only be allowed to count the time served in South Africa in computation of the number of years service, and they have to pay for all the years that are so added to their service period. The pension plan was originally formed on actuarial computations and was self-supporting. Now I am inclined to think it is not fully self-supporting, neither is the militia pension. Originally the Militia Pension Act was administered on the basis of contributions from the members and was self-supporting. It was when I was in the department some fifteen years ago, but I am inclined to think it is not self-supporting now. But the four men involved under this bill will have to pay all the arrears before they are entitled to count those years towards pension, and if the treasury of Canada is involved in the matter at all, it will be to a very slight extent. But I assure the hon. member that four is the maximum number of men.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows that this amendment would never be suggested if these men have to pay in as much as they get out.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, not as much.

Mr. RALSTON: Then it is obvious that there is a grant from the parliament of Canada, or this amendment would not be suggested. I suggest that the minister might well give us a statement showing just how much is involved and what payment would be received by the government on account of it. I presume it is a five per cent deduction for the years to be counted under this amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I can furnish that statement to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. REID: The minister pointed out that British Columbia is one of the provinces that maintain a provincial police force and in that province the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are not in charge. The municipal police and the provincial police there I think are fairly competent. My reason for rising at this time is to draw the attention of the minister to what I call a racket that has been going on in British Columbia in the municipality of Richmond this last year under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think this is a proper time to call the matter to his attention, because if it is allowed to go on it is going to be very serious for the people and residents out in that province. Having had some municipal experience, I fully realize that there are cases in which one has to hire a certain type of person if the object is to catch someone who is selling liquor for instance or otherwise breaking the law. But we had in the municipality of Richmond last year men engaged by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who deliberately went out and framed people. It was not a case of going out and asking a man if they could get a drink from him, it was a case of going and saying to him, "Would you like to make some money? If so I will provide you with some liquor." If the man fell for this story then in a short time the Royal Canadian Mounted Police came along and picked him up.

Let me lay this case also before the minister: this man has an electrical store in New Westminster. One morning there walked into his store a man with a small radio, saying he would like to exchange it for another radio. After some discussion he took another radio costing a little more and turned in this small radio in exchange. Half an hour later two Royal Canadian Mounted Policemen walked in and arrested that man for having a radio that was smuggled into the country. Where is that going to land us if men like these are let loose on the country? In the liquor case also the man was hired by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and no action was taken even when it was drawn to the attention of the officers that the man they were engaging was a fugitive from justice in New Zealand and should not be in this country at all. When the police of Richmond endeavoured to get some information they found themselves blocked by the Immigration department officers, who said, No, we cannot give any information because we are a little afraid of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; if we say or do anything we might come under their displeasure. It seems to me that all a man has to do if he commits some crime is to get hired by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and he will be immune. These matters are serious. The municipal police are endeavouring to and do enforce the law, the provincial police the same, and in an efficient manner and I do not think it is the duty of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to hire men to go through the country and deliberately ask men if they would like to make some money, and if they ask, How? Oh well, we will supply you with a little liquor and the bottles and the labels. This thing has been going on for some considerable time.

I have in my hand a court record. It has to do with a case in which a man was picked up by the municipal police and charged with selling liquor. When he was in the witness box the judge called him a blatant and unrepentant liar, and he was in the employ of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. As one who has looked into the matter I say that if this thing is not stopped and if men hired by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can go around the country, frame you and report the matter to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who come along shortly after and pick you up the lives of people will not be safe. I should like the minister to take serious note of this, also to tell the house if any of the moiety was paid to these men, and what moiety they receive.

Mr. GUTHRIE: None.

Mr. REID: I understand from the statements of the men that they were engaged at $150 a month. I realize that perhaps a certain type of individual has to be hired to do this kind of dirty work, but surely we are not going to have the mounted police stoop to engaging men who then deliberately go around doing these things, really encouraging the people to break the law. I have the case of a young man who had left Halifax and was going along one of the roads in British Columbia, destitute not knowing whether he could find work or whether he would be taken into a camp. A man came along and asked him if he would like a lift, and naturally he said he would. During the course of the ride the man asked him if he would like to make a little money. Just imagine asking a destitute man that question; naturally he said he would, so the man said, "I will put you wise to this" and fix you up. So he proposed to supply him with the liquor and the bottles and let him set up for himself, and the boy fell for that proposition. The next day the mounted police picked him up. To me it looks very much like a little racket. Either these men are getting paid for doing this sort of thing or they want to show the great activity of the mounted police in British Columbia. This is a very serious situation, and I want the minister to give an assurance that this will be looked into and investigated and an end put to this kind of thing.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Again I would suggest that my hon. friend bring up this matter on the estimates rather than on this bill. As I understand it this alleged racket is in the municipality of Richmond?

Mr. REID: Yes, it was, but it is also being carried on in other parts of the province.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my hon. friend will write me a letter or give me something definite to investigate I will be very glad to do so. His statement, which I will read in Hansard to-morrow, is very general, and I do not know just where I would start in order to investigate it, except that I could make some investigation in regard to the municipality of Richmond. As to the moiety, there is no moiety that goes to the police. Any rewards, fines or anything of the kind go into a trust fund and the men get nothing themselves.

Mr. REID: Certainly I will write the minister, but if he wants the information now I can give him all the details.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Or if my hon. friend would give me the facts when the estimates are going through I could attend to it then.

Mr. HOWDEN: It was with a decided sense of regret that I listened to the charges made against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. No one could have lived in western Canada at about the time of the northwest rebellion and since without being thrilled with a certain degree of pride in the old Royal Northwest Mounted Police. No finer body of men either physically or mentally was ever gathered together in any part of the British empire, and if they have degenerated through being brought to eastern Canada I think it is a great pity and a great shame. I sincerely hope that these charges will be thoroughly investigated and checked up, because it seems a pity that a force of men with such traditions should be exposed to such charges if they are not well founded.

Mr. VALLANCE: I made a few notes during the course of this discussion with regard to the mounted police, and I wish to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for St. Boniface. I have lived in western Canada for twenty-nine years; I know something of the operations of the old Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and the cause that suggested itself to me for these changes was the cause that has been suggested by the hon. member for St. Boniface. It must be the influence of eastern Canada, because with the exception of British Columbia we have had no complaints from those provinces where the old Royal Northwest Mounted Police were most active. It was with a great deal of disappointment that I listened to the charges that have been made. I hope the minister will investigate these matters in order to see if it is not possible to clear the name of that great body of police.

Mr. VENIOT: As a member from the east who has made charges against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police let me pay my tribute to the old force. I have not a word of criticism in regard to the old Royal Northwest Mounted Police; I only wish the spirit that actuated that old force was actuating the force at the present time, especially in the eastern part of Canada. I think the trouble is with the younger recruits, and let me say to my hon. friends from the west that when those recruits are taken into the force they are sent to Winnipeg for training, so perhaps it is the influence of the west that has led them into the wrong path on their return to the east. They are taken west for three or six months to be trained in the enforcement of law, but in spite of everything the force has been invaded by a certain number of unscrupulous individuals who are bringing dishonour upon the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They are doing that down east, but they are not all eastern recruits; some of them come from the west, as my hon. friends know. Those of whom I have complained, however, are not from the west; I am sorry to say that they are maritime men, and they are not the type of men who should be in the mounted police. I do not want to name anyone here to-day, but I could sit down with the minister privately and give him the names and records of some of these men who are being protected by certain superior officers for reasons of their own.

Mr. REID: As a western member who has made certain charges I do not want anyone to think I am endeavouring to cast any slurs or any discredit on either the old or the present force. My complaint was with regard to the stool pigeons who have been operating in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not sure that this is the proper place to make the inquiry, but on a number of occasions I have discussed with the minister the question of a few very old mounted policemen who for some reason or other did not have their pensions increased when the general pensions were reviewed. I think there are not more than twelve or fifteen of these old pensioners, and I know this matter has been before the minister for some time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was there before my time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If I am not out of order I would ask the minister now if further consideration has been given their case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is an application up for consideration at the present time, and I believe similar applications have been made for the last fifteen years. The case they make out is that they were retired when pay and allowances were less than they were when the latest pension regulations were fixed, and consequently their pensions are based upon the pay and allowances which prevailed in their time. If they had been pensioned at a later date their pensions would have been larger. Up to the present time it has not been thought proper to grant their request. We can view it rather sympathetically, perhaps, because of the hard times and the smallness of their pensions, but I do not think they have made out a very strong case for an increase in that regard. They were pensioned according to the pay they received and according to the rates of pension at the time of their retirements. Could we justify an increase in the pension now by reason of the fact that subsequently pay was increased and the amount contributed to the pension fund was greater than in former days? That is the case.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My information may be at fault, but the complaint they make to me is that they have not received the same treatment that was accorded men who served perhaps not at exactly the same time or who were retired at the same time, but who subsequently had their pensions increased. The minister's statement is correct; they are receiving pensions comparable with the pay and allowances they received when on service. Their complaint was that others were no more entitled to increases than they were. In other words, they alleged discrimination.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not believe there is any ground for alleging discrimination, but if the hon. member wishes I shall bring the application here and let him read it. I think it is based solely upon the fact that at the time they were pensioned the pension rate was lower and the pay was lower. Subsequently the pay and the rates were increased, and they seem to feel they should be included in it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not wish to prolong the discussion but is it not a fact that other retirements at a later date have received consideration. Naturally when the pay and allowance were lower the pension would be lower. They complain that their application has not received any consideration.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not aware of that fact but I shall make inquiries. If the hon. member would mention the point when we are discussing estimates I would be glad to give him the information.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I think the minister is correct in his stand. If we deal with these fifteen cases in connection with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police we will have to deal with numerous cases in the permanent force. I believe the positions are exactly parallel. We cannot apply one principle to one force and not apply it to the other.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not aware as to how far-reaching the application may be. Their contention was, briefly, that while others on a somewhat higher rate of pay had been given consideration, these fifteen cases had been refused. That is the statement which was given to me, and the one I have presented to the minister.

Mr. POULIOT: Before this discussion is terminated I should like to make a suggestion to the government. We learn from the press that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will have new quarters involving high expenditures. What I cannot understand, sir, is why the servants are lodged before the masters. The masters are the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada who still have to sit in a former stable. It is a shame to give the judges of the supreme court such poor accommodation, while on the other hand we supply the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with a new building which will cost several millions of dollars.

Mr. McINTOSH: Where is it?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know, but I have heard about it. I suggest to the government that before laying the foundations of a new building for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police there should be a new Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: There should be a new building for the judges, and I am sure it would be proper for the Minister of Justice to lay the corner stone of that building, because from his experience as a jurist he is entitled to sit on the bench of the highest tribunal of this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that a prophecy?

Mr. POULIOT: No, but a suggestion made with the desire that the supreme court judges be given consideration by this government. The Prime Minister is a leading member of the bar. For some time he was president of the Canadian Bar Association, and has always mentioned—except in his new legislation—his high regard for the judiciary. It is probably because the Minister of Justice is the best candidate for the bench that the right hon. gentleman has him sitting to his right.

To conclude, it seems that the government puts la charrue devant les bœufs—the plough before the oxen, when they suggest that there should be a new building for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police before erecting a new supreme court building. Such action has been taken in the United States. This government lacks imagination; it should take this lesson from the great country to the south. A new and imposing building has been erected in Washington for the accommodation of the supreme court judges, and I believe that was a timely expenditure.

Then, further, before we spend money on a Royal Canadian Mounted Police building, the parliamentary library should be made fire proof, a suggestion which has been offered often in this chamber. I cannot understand why the government does not pay more attention to the protection of the real treasures we have in our parliamentary library. I have had the use of the library for a number of years, and I have discovered valuable books which could not be replaced for any sum of money. The government knows that in 1848 the Quebec legislative buildings were destroyed by fire. At that time it was our only parliament—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Would it be impossible to do that work before building for the Royal Canadian Mounted police? This is the argument which exists—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I do not think the hon. member's remarks are relevant to the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it not relevant to the bill to say that the master should be lodged before the servants, and that the quarters for the servants should be in the master's house? That is why I suggest there should be a new supreme court building before we build an imposing structure for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I make the same suggestion with regard to the library, and I hope no one in this government entertains the view of Caliph Omar who had the libraries of Alexandria burned, with the books therein, because he thought no one should read books. I do not recall this historical fact to hurt the feelings of my hon. friends in the far corner of the chamber.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Of course, a discussion of the building erected for the police is not included in this measure, I will tell the hon. member however that I am very much in accord with his observations, and I shall take good care to supply Hansard to my leader in order that he may read it.

Short title agreed to.

On section 1—Publication in Canada Gazette.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I notice that under section 1 the purpose is to repeal a section of the act. On the opposite page I find an explanation, and it is indicated that under the section as it stands at present the regulations made under this part shall be published in the Canada Gazette. I should like to have some explanation as to why the section should be repealed. In my view the publication of such regulations would seem to be important.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is purely a matter of convenience. I am not particularly concerned, but it has been represented to me that there are a great many minor details on which regulations are made, and which could be included in what are known as general orders issued from time to time and circulated among the members of the force. The former provision was that nearly all such regulations had to be published in the Canada Gazette. The proposal now is to allow publication of such details in general orders, so that they may be circulated in that way. These regulations refer almost exclusively to the internal management of the force, and I do not believe they are matters of public concern. However I am indifferent as to what happens to the section in the bill; it is recommended to me as a matter of convenience.

Mr. RALSTON: I would suggest the minister should not press it. It seems to me this is the only provision we have which permits the public to know about the regulations. My hon. friend will remember that the militia orders are published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that section 1 be stricken out.

Motion agreed to.

On section 2—Trial and punishment.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to ask the minister if he has checked the lettering of the paragraphs referred to in subsection (5).

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think they are correct; (e) refers to the receiving of a gratuity or bribe; (i) refers to mutinous conduct.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think that is applicable. That is my point. I think it should be (e), (j) and (k).

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, that is right, and I thank my hon. friend for drawing my attention to it. The paragraphs should be (e), (j) and (k), not (e), (i) and (j), Mr. Chairman, and I move that the section be amended accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Application of penalties.

Mr. RALSTON: I would suggest that the same change ought to be made in subsection 2 on the top of page 2 of the bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the section be amended to read paragraphs (e), (j) and (k) instead of (e), (i) and (k).

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister allow sections 4, 5 and 6 to stand until we get the information in regard to expenditure?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no objection.

Mr. RALSTON: And section 7?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is there any information required in connection with clause 7?

Mr. RALSTON: It is all with regard to pensions, and clause 7 fits in with clause 6; I am not sure but I think it does.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then we will allow sections 4 to 7 inclusive to stand.

Sections 4 to 7 inclusive stand.

Sir EUGENE FISET: When the minister is furnishing the information that has been asked for, would he be kind enough also to give us a list of those who are drawing military pensions under subsection 9 of section 4? It reads:

> Time served with the military forces for which a pension has been granted under the provisions of the Militia Pension Act . . . shall not be included.

I take it for granted that these men are drawing their long service pension as well as the pay they are entitled to receive from the force.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will get particulars of that also, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

AMENDMENT TO FACILITATE AND INCREASE THE EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO FARMERS

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On the short title.

Mr. HANBURY: Mr. Chairman, when the resolution preceding this bill was before the house, from the acclaim with which it was accepted I was under the impression that I was attending a meeting of the farmers of Canada rather than a meeting of the House of Commons.

I should like to refer to some of the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) who, if I remember correctly, complained about the difficulty in procuring loans. His complaint was, I think, that the officers of the board either were using too much discretion or that they did not have sufficient authority to loan money in certain areas in the district which he represented. Remarks from members on all sides of the house who supported the resolution on that occasion led me to believe that their impression was that these moneys were not so much to be loaned on an economic and sound basis as they were to be put into the hands of the farmers on a basis which was probably not sufficiently sound to encourage the investment of private capital. The hon. member for Souris in his remarks, critical I may say of the administration of the farm loan board, questioned their judgment, and my impression from the remarks of other hon. members was that probably it is more a question of government policy whether the farm loan board should loan money in certain areas and as to the conditions under which it should be loaned. I would like very much for the minister to state to the house as definitely as he can his opinion as to the soundness that is going to be required in the loaning of this money. In other words, are we through this measure going to give money where it is not always economically sound to loan it? Are we going to put it into the hands of the farmers of this country as a matter of national policy? While I quite agree that that might be a desirable policy I am not discussing that at the moment, but I think we should know at this time what the policy of the government is going to be and what instructions are to be given to the farm loan board. Are they to take into consideration the necessities of the situation in so far as the development of agriculture is concerned, or are they to be a farm loan board, and not a farm gift board? I would like the minister to give us some assurance of what we may expect in this regard.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, the discussion when I moved the resolution and later in committee on the resolution itself covered a wide field, and I thought I had endeavoured to make it clear that the purpose of the board would be to deal with each individual case on its merits, the main purpose and object being to assist preferably the deserving and worthy farmer; or I might make it stronger than that and say, the farmer who after having received a loan is likely to succeed upon the farm.

The criticism that my hon. friend referred to which came from the hon. member for Souris was applicable to the policy which had been pursued through the provincial board, and my hon. friend will bear in mind that hereafter there will be no provincial boards. But even in the case of the provincial boards, as I understand it there were no areas proscribed. Naturally one would think that a prudent man would scrutinize with extreme care an inquiry for a loan in an area where crop failure had covered a period of years. But I do think that there the long view would have to be taken, and that even in those areas where, covering a period of many years, there had been on the whole good crops, the man himself being a good farmer and a good moral risk, there would be no reason why in a case of that character there should not be a reasonable degree of latitude on the part of the farm loan board. In other words, it goes without saying that the first class risk, the highest class risk in the ordinary course of events would be taken care of either by individuals or by loan companies in the loaning business. It does not by any means follow that the government must be called upon to take second and third class risks, but I do say that the government would be justified, having in mind the desirability of assisting the farmer and keeping him on the land, in taking a wider measure of risk than would be taken in the case of an individual motivated solely by the desire to invest his money profitably. I do not know whether I have covered the question put by my hon. friend; if not, I shall be glad to endeavour to answer any supplementary questions which he might wish to ask.

Mr. HANBURY: I thank the minister for his remarks, and I think we are getting close to the point I wish to have covered. Before I make any further remarks however, I should like the minister to answer this question. Is it the policy of the government that all risks must in the past have been high class risks?

Mr. RHODES: I could not answer that by a direct yes or no. The farm loan board has been in operation a number of years and has endeavoured to conduct its operations prudently. In fact, the criticism has been that it has conducted its operations too prudently; we have heard such criticism in the course of this debate. If there is any criticism against the operations of the board it is that they have been too careful in their loaning operations.

Mr. HANBURY: I am rather anxious to have this point cleared up, because although the minister stated that the criticism of the hon. member for Souris was with reference to the provincial board, I have a distinct recollection that he did also make some reference to the board as it exists in Ottawa; and I believe he went so far as to suggest that there should be changes and removals. It is for that reason that I should like to have that point cleared up. The minister pointed out to us that in the loaning of money to high class risks, there was probably even to-day private money available for the purpose.

Mr. RHODES: For the highest class.

Mr. HANBURY: Yes; private capital is available for that to-day. Consequently, if for that highest class risk money is available, then the government will have for their loans the high class or the questionable risk, and I think all members should know definitely, what the policy of the government is to be. If we are making this a farm relief act we should know it; if it is a farm loan act we should know that also. Are we loaning money or relieving farmers? Are we going to make loans on high class risks or are we going to give the board instructions that now they may consider the questionable risk on the basis indicated by the minister, that the value of equity is not to be the only consideration? I think he is justified in taking that view. In the past we have prided ourselves on such a thing as a man establishing credit, and that is something which I think should exist in this measure. But it is absolutely important to the people of Canada to know how this board is going to function. Is it going to function as a distinctly farm loan board or are we to take the question of risks into consideration and to that extent have the act function as a farm relief measure?

Mr. RHODES: It goes without saying that when this act was passed four or five or six years ago the board was established not because the government desired to go into the money lending business but because there was felt to be a need at that time for this type of legislation. I pointed that out in my remarks during the discussion of the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And because we have the balance of power.

Mr. RHODES: It is intended that the business should be conducted as a farm loan business and not as a relief undertaking. But at the same time, every hon. member knows quite well that the object in mind with the old government, as it is with this government and would be with any government, the main object in mind was to lend assistance to the agricultural interests who would be denied an opportunity of getting loans were it not for this act. The need has become greater during the last two or three years, for reasons which are obvious. I do not know that I can say anything more. I think the act will have to be administered with a reasonable degree of prudence, but no government would be wise to allow the board to operate in such a negligent way as to throw its money away. Care will have to be exercised; but having in mind the main object, namely, to assist the worthy farmer who is likely to succeed, certainly a reasonable degree of latitude ought to be allowed.

Mr. ROWE: The remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) give rise to a point in regard to which there may be misapprehension as to the credit of the farmers themselves. Some of the statements made on the resolution before the house the other day, so far as Ontario is concerned at any rate, might seriously impair the chances of the farmers of even securing loans under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. I think much can be said in favour of taking into consideration the element of personal credit as well as that of land values, as mentioned. I agree with the hon. minister and appreciate the attitude he has taken. In Ontario we are in an even more difficult position than I indicated the other day—

Mr. HANBURY: Why bring that up?

Mr. ROWE: Well, the reason I bring it up is the fact that we have had in that province for a period of over twelve years what is known as the Ontario agricultural development board which I think all hon. members will agree has been functioning not especially with a view to relief but for the assistance of the farmers throughout that province during that time. When the government changed last June, as governments often do, we had 900 applications that had been passed, inspected and approved of by the board, mortgages prepared and in many cases registered. For months these farmers waited daily for their money and 500 more in respect of which inspection fees had been paid, many of the applicants not having had their fees refunded, daily expected results. But the practice of a policy covering a period of twelve years was immediately and completely reversed. I mention that fact at this stage as there might be some misapprehension with regard to the credit of the farmers of Ontario and the soundness of that policy as it had been carried out. I say this for the benefit of those who will be administering this act, so that the chances of the farmers of Ontario to secure loans under this legislation will not be too seriously impaired. Everyone will agree I think that when a policy has been in operation for twelve years, involving a sum of over $50,000,000, so far as farm mortgage loaning is concerned, it is almost entirely removed from private corporations or individuals. The farmers therefore have little recourse other than to apply to the government, which they have been doing.

The other day some statements were made that reflect upon the soundness of that policy and might have an adverse effect upon the continuance of loaning to the farmers. I did not interrupt the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell) when he was speaking as there is a time-honoured custom that when an hon. member is making his maiden speech, no matter what ridiculous statements he may make or how excited he may get, we should not interrupt. He made a very spectacular statement; he said:

> I want to make it clear to all hon. members that prior to the month of May the interest rate on farm loan mortgages in Ontario stood at six per cent. During the election campaign, in which I had the privilege of taking an active interest—

We are quite aware of that.

> —it was announced that that rate would be lowered to five and a half per cent and it was cut to five per cent during the heat of the election.

As a matter of fact, I might inform the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington in all kindness, while his speech was fine in form, it was somewhat ridiculous in fact. The interest rate on loans in Ontario has not been six per cent for almost ten years. Some years ago the late Ferguson government reduced the rate from six to five and a half per cent. During the last session of the Ontario legislature the matter was discussed and debated there on several occasions and prior to the last election the rate was reduced from five and a half to five per cent. Before the heat of the election, as spoken of by the hon. member, the rate was reduced and became effective at five per cent, as every hon. member from Ontario knows, weeks before the election. In the heat of the election I think it was stated that if the then government were returned, they would reduce the interest rate to a lower figure. Since that time another government has been in power and immediately on assuming office it discontinued that policy entirely. The fourteen hundred farmers to whom I have referred waited daily for some relief, some assurance, something definite to know whether they would be compelled to go to private individuals or mortgage companies in order to secure the money for which they had applied and to accept the loans in connection with which inspections had been made and which the old board had passed.

I do not wish to delay the committee on this bill, but the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington further stated:

When the new provincial government took office they made an investigation to find out just how the agricultural development board stood, and they discovered that some $55,000,000 of the people's money had been loaned throughout Ontario. One unfortunate experience was that many loans had been made, not for the purpose of allowing a farmer to permit his son to purchase a farm and some new stock and start up in business, or for the farmer to improve his farm, by building a new barn or house, but rather at the instance of influential people, supporters of the late government.

I doubt if there is an hon. member from Ontario who can give one instance where political influence had any bearing. He says further:

That is a serious statement to make.

It is a serious statement to make when he follows it with the further statement that the provincial government have been making loans since. He stated that in November of last year some seventy-two loans were made, amounting to about $140,000. I challenge him to show a single loan that has been made on the initiative of the provincial government, and rather than boasting of the seventy-two loans that he says were made, he should apologize because there are only seventy-two out of one thousand four hundred, nine hundred of which were approved by the board. There are still more than eight hundred farmers whose loans have been approved and who are still waiting for some advance.

The hon. member for West Elgin also made his maiden effort and I did not wish to interrupt him, but his statements were no less reckless, though his speech was not quite so long as that of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington. He said:

In reference to that board, what were the conditions the present government found when they assumed office? They found stacks of applications that had been passed by the Henry government.

This statement is rather conspicuous merely as an insinuation that he had some inside information and it was due to political influence they had been passing the loans. As regards that feature of the matter I wish to point out to the committee that I have secured the last report of the Ontario agricultural development board and the ridiculousness of these statements is shown by the fact that in 1933, the previous year, that board had made seven hundred and forty-two fewer loans than they did in 1932, and for the first eight months of 1934 they loaned $1,600,000 less than they did in 1933, so that the loans that were being made in Ontario were evidently being lessened every year.

Much has been said with reference to the maladministration of the Ontario agricultural development board as an excuse for not helping the farmer, but may I point out that while it has been said that this board has been recklessly handled, they had a surplus in administration costs and carrying charges of $769,458.67, as shown in the report to which I refer. I have failed to see why we should apologize for the actions of the former provincial government in that regard. It was further pointed out by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Mills) that 18,000 Ontario farmers, who were evidently friends of the government, had been loaned $51,000,000 and that if those loans were liquidated to-day, they would not be worth $15,000,000. This is a point I wish to emphasize because it reflects upon the credit of the farmers of Ontario, and upon the soundness of their land holdings and it might impair the possibility of their securing loans from the duly established board under the amended act that is now before the house. I think every hon. member will agree that the statement made by my hon. friend is a ridiculous one. I ask, in all kindness to him as a new member, how he ever reached that figure. There is another time-honoured custom in this house that a member should be careful not to make statements without giving them sound thought and preparation. I see some hon. members smile and after listening to him yesterday I think I know why. If one made throughout Ontario the inspection that would be necessary to be able to make that type of statement, I will leave it to any hon. member if he would consider that a reasonable assumption, because it is a most ridiculous one. In the first place the Ontario agricultural development board's policy has been for twelve years not to loan more than fifty per cent of the farm value. It is very true, with arrears of interest, that might in years such as those through which we have passed, accumulate an obligation more than fifty per cent. The value in many cases was the value before the war, because inflated values of war time were not taken into very much account by the average inspector. In my local district as in many other parts of Ontario one hundred acre farms were valued at from $8,000 to $12,000 long before the great war. These 18,000 loans in Ontario average only $2,200 each. In exceptional circumstances they might be as high as $4,000. If this is a reasonable assumption then the insinuation seems to be that farms that were originally worth $8,000 in Ontario are to-day only worth $1,800, and farms formerly worth $4,500 are now assumed to be worth $900, and farms formerly worth $2,000 the newly elected hon. member would say are worth only $450. I wish to impress on the committee that the soundness of Ontario farm values is not so badly impaired as is suggested. If $36,000,000 of the $51,000,000 that has been loaned will be lost, as suggested, then it would be our duty not to support the second reading of this bill. In that case our agricultural situation would be next to hopeless. I do not know why that statement should be made other than to justify those who have neglected, inexcusably neglected their obligation at a time that has been very critical for the farmers of Ontario. The policy of securing money from the board has been established and now when appeal is made to private individuals applicants are asked why they do not get it from the government.

I make this statement in an endeavour to show as clearly as I can a true picture of the farm loan situation in Ontario. I wish to urge upon the minister on behalf not only of the farmers of Ontario but those of every part of the country that he should secure money for the farmers, as I feel satisfied he will, at the lowest possible interest rate. I know every hon. member who is interested in agriculture, as we all are, appreciates the fact that the farmers have had a difficult time in recent years and that the prices of many things they have had to buy have not fallen to the same degree as the prices of what they produce, so I think it is necessary for the economic soundness of the country that we should have as low a rate of interest as it is possible for the government to give in view of the cost of long term bonds, their carrying charges and the necessary reserves.

In Ontario our situation is a little different, for we have never had the Canadian Farm Loan Act in operation in Ontario. Whether it was owing to the struggle for power or for whatever reason, all parties in Ontario said they were in favour of lower interest rates. The Minister of Agriculture in Ontario not long ago stated emphatically that no matter what rate this government charged under this new Farm Loan Act, the farmers of Ontario will not have to pay more than four per cent, and the balance, if any, will be paid by the province.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: I hear an hon. member say "Hear, hear," and I am quite in agreement with him; and I am very glad that the farmers of Ontario will in no event have to pay more than four per cent in the future. May I also remind the committee that Ontario has given loans at one per cent less than the Dominion board for some time, and that is all the more justification for the remarks I have made as to the soundness of Ontario agriculture. I have heard the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) in this house and others say that the risks in Ontario have not been as great as in some other provinces, and probably that is the reason why when the late government was in power and since the Canadian Farm Loan Act was put into effect in 1927, farmers in Ontario enjoyed this one per cent advantage. The Ontario agricultural development board were making loans in Ontario at one per cent less at all times than the dominion government, and for a short time one and a half per cent less. So even if the rate in the future should be left at five per cent the Ontario farmers will still enjoy a one per cent advantage, according to the statement made by the present government of Ontario. I have not too much faith in that government but I must commend them for that statement; I hope they will keep their word. So, whether or not this government see fit to lower their rate below four per cent, which I doubt is possible, I am not particularly concerned about their action as to the rate of interest, because it is not a question of what the farmer in Ontario will have to pay, it is a question of who will have to pay the difference.

I do not wish to keep the committee longer, except to say that I think the farmers of Ontario during the last three or four years have shown what they can accomplish and to emphasize the fact to which I have already referred that loans have not been increasing as hon. members have said, for we had 742 less in 1933 than in 1932, and they loaned $1,600,000 less in the first eight months of 1934, although that was prior to an election. Therefore I think it is impossible for anyone to claim that loans were made for political purposes, or to doubt the soundness of the agricultural situation in Ontario which by all the signs of the times is at least slightly and gradually improving.

Mr. GERSHAW: The point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister has already been mentioned. It is this, that up to the present there certainly have been areas absolutely excluded from any benefit of the farm loan board. The area in which I live is one of them. When a farmer applies to that board for a loan he is told that no loans are being considered in that whole district. They do not ask him what his prospects are, or his assets, or inquire into his ability or anything. I have many letters to that effect. I should like the minister to give us some assurance that these individual cases will be decided on their merits rather than all come under one general rule.

Mr. RHODES: I have on a number of occasions endeavoured to make it very clear that each case would be considered on its individual merits, irrespective of the location of the area. It may be that the hon. member was not in the house on those occasions, and I am very happy indeed to repeat that assurance to him.

Mr. BROWN: I am glad that the finance minister has made that statement so clearly and frequently; I think it ought to have been impressed on the house by this time, that in future loans will be considered on their merits. I listened with much interest to the speech of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis), I do not always agree with him but I felt on that occasion that he was stating a very real grievance. The hon. member for Souris represents a district in Manitoba which more than any other perhaps has suffered from the drought. He pointed out, very correctly, that in that district there are large areas which in the past have produced enormous wealth, districts where they have the finest equipment and buildings, and there is no reason why many of those men should be refused a loan. I had a similar grievance, for the matter was brought to my attention that loans were being refused in what was spoken of as the dried-out area. I made a protest myself to the Manitoba authorities and also to the dominion head office, and I got word from Doctor MacLean that it was not the policy of the central office to rule out the dried-out areas altogether, but rather that cases would be considered on their individual merits. I would like to point out and emphasize the fact that while some of these districts, including part of my own territory, have suffered from drought for the last two years, that is one of the very finest countries under the sun. There is no reason why there should be any discrimination against a section of the country because, for a period of two or three years, there has been drought in that district. There are men with well established and well equipped farms who need just a little help to tide them over. We have all confidence in that country; we believe rain will come again, and that is all we need in order to produce a large amount of wealth in the future. So I say again that I am glad the minister has made the statement that each case will be decided upon its own merits.

Mr. COOTE: I was very glad to hear the statement of the minister in regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. Undoubtedly in the past some of the provincial boards have taken the attitude that they would not consider applications from certain areas. I have gone into those areas and found farmers making a decided success. It is true that they were living in so called drought areas, which had been abandoned by a good many farmers, but these men knew how to make a living there; they were making good, and I think in many cases were catching up with their liabilities. So it seemed to me a wrong attitude on the part of a provincial board to practically tell a man that he lived in an area from which they would not even consider applications for loans.

I just want to add at this time, taking into consideration the condition of agriculture and the terrible time it has gone through, the government should make provision for the granting of credit under the farm loan board at a rate of four per cent, with any cost above that assumed by the Dominion of Canada. I am not sure, but perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard will object to that. A few moments ago he spoke of first class farm loans, but many loans that were considered first class a few years ago now are far from that. That is due to conditions altogether beyond the control of the farmers. The reason for this condition has been the drop in the price level of the things the farmer produces. It might be worth while telling this committee once more the drop that has taken place in the cash income of the farmers of Canada. These figures were given in connection with a chart that recently appeared in the monthly letter of one of our Canadian banks. In 1926 the cash income of the farmers of Canada was $941,000,000. In 1932 it had fallen to $396,000,000, which was only 42 per cent of the 1926 income. It is quite evident that interest could not be paid out of a net income that had been reduced to that extent. In 1928 the income was $1,113,000,000, so there was a drop from 1928 to 1932 of 64 per cent, or in other words the cash income of the farmers of Canada in 1932 was only 36 per cent of the income in 1928.

In reality the solution of the farm credit problem is to restore the price level of farm products. No matter what we may do for the farmers in the way of credit facilities, if we do not do something to raise the price level of farm products we cannot get a satisfactory credit system. At the present time the price level is improving, but as yet it is not at a point which will allow the farmers to carry their present burden of indebtedness. The loan value of our farms is largely determined by the rate of interest charged on farm loans, as the amount of loan that a farm can carry and pay interest on is determined as much by the rate of interest as by the size of the loan. I believe the rate of interest is the important thing for us to consider in connection with this act, and without taking up more of the time of the committee I want to urge on the minister that the government assume any necessary costs of administration and so forth, so that loans may be made under this act at a rate of not more than four per cent per annum.

Mr. GOBEIL: When the resolution which preceded this bill was under consideration the other evening the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) is reported as having said:

> I have tried to find a reason why the government is bringing down this legislation at this late hour. I have asked myself: Is it because they have tried that other legislation called the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which they passed last year, and which as a matter of fact has completely destroyed the credit of the farmer of eastern Canada?

I am reported as having said:

> It was all destroyed before that law was passed.

I do not rise to withdraw a single word of that affirmation, but it certainly calls for some explanation which I could not give on that occasion. In the past, and even to-day, the farming population of Quebec have had the best credit of the whole community. They were considered, as I am sure they are considered to-day, honest as a class. There are exceptions in all classes, but I think they had and still have the reputation of being first class credit risks.

When I made that declaration I wanted to point out that the act referred to by the hon. member had not destroyed the credit of the farmer, but that his credit had been destroyed, so far as that could be done legally, by previous measures passed by the provincial government of Quebec. One of the causes of the impairment of the farmers' credit is the number of preferred debts that in Quebec have precedence over the first mortgage. Being an ordinary layman I cannot speak as a lawyer, but I am told by persons who should know that we have almost twice as many of these preferred debts as any other province in Canada. I should like to enumerate some of them. First there are the legal costs. I suppose they are preferred in every province, but I should like to point out that in Quebec they are certainly not lower and I think probably they are higher than in any other province of the dominion. Funeral costs are preferred before the first mortgage is paid, together with the expenses of the last sickness, and the cost of ploughing and seeding for the current or the last season. Then, it is only fair that the taxes should be paid. The cost of labour, material and the bill of the contractor for any buildings erected on the property or on the farm are paid before the first mortgage is considered and the wages of servants are paid. As hon. members will see, this is a long list of preferred bills which in many cases may take up half the value of the mortgaged property. In this way the credit of the farmer is further decreased. In making these observations I am not being critical; I do not say the measures are no good or do not serve any useful purpose. I simply wish to establish my contention that even before the act to which reference has been made was passed the credit of the farmer was destroyed beyond repair. Certainly his credit was very much decreased when the moratorium on mortgages was passed tow or three years ago by the legislature of the province of Quebec. It was further decreased when legislation was passed exempting from seizure certain stock, implements and cattle—going as high as ten cows—a team of horses and a complete stock of farm implements. I am not criticizing this law, but I do say it had the effect of decreasing or impairing the farmer's credit, when the lending party was considering lending money on first mortgage. The moratorium is still in effect in the province of Quebec; if interest and taxes are paid, no mortgage can be collected.

Then, there is a further factor which has had something to do with impairing the credit of the farmers, namely the privileges given to different firms selling on terms. As a layman I thought this matter was within the competence of the federal parliament, but after consulting able lawyers I was told it was a matter which had to do with civil rights, and that there could be no doubt where the jurisdiction rested. In my opinion in the last few years probably more than at any other time these privileges have done a great deal to destroy the credit of the farmer. In the province of Quebec companies selling on terms have the privilege of remaining the owners of the property sold. I do not complain about that, but when a purchaser defaults on one or more payments the selling company has the privilege of taking possession of the property. Again I do not find fault. The fault I find is this: The company repossess the article in question, whether it be an automobile or something else, and may proceed to make repairs which cost anywhere from $300 to $500. Then they sall the repossessed article for whatever figure they can get, provided the original purchaser is in fairly good financial condition, although possibly not able to make his payments. Having sold the article they may claim the balance from the original owner. In my opinion this process more than any other factor has been responsible for the impairment of the credit of the farmers. Hon. members are familiar with the tactics of what we term high pressure salesmen, and we realize that the poor farmer who is not accustomed to discussions and arguments is not proof against the sales talk. The salesman ascertains before he visits the farmer if the person he is visiting is financially responsible. In many cases these salesmen have sold to farmers against their will and against their own interests. Hon. members know how many farm implements, sewing machines and automobiles have been sold to farmers who, when the agent visited them for the first time, had no intention of buying. I say such companies should have to make a choice, when they repossess an article—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Stanley): The hon. member must confine his observations to a discussion of farm loans.

Mr. GOBEIL: I was answering the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville. However, I have completed my observations on this point. The company should either repossess the article and give a full receipt, or they should collect and not repossess. My point is—and this may not be in order, either, although it was discussed by the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville—that the present measure does not destroy the credit of the farmer, but will serve to reestablish it, to put him on his feet and in a position where he may buy something, because the man from whom he may buy will know he has been reinstated and his financial position is sounder than it had been previously. I believe the legislation will do a great deal towards putting the farmer on his feet.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I cannot congratulate the minister upon this legislation. Like the unemployment insurance bill and most of the social legislation we hear so much about nowadays, it will have the effect only of raising the hopes of the needy and then dashing them to the ground. The farm loan act was first passed in 1927, and $15,000,000 was placed at its disposal. In seven years of operation the board had loaned only $9,000,000. Last year the amount available to the board was increased to $40,000,000, and I believe at this time they have loaned out $15,000,000. Now we propose to increase the amount available to $90,000,000, and I venture to say when we come back next year less than half of it will have been loaned. It is not the amount of money you have to lend that counts, but the amount that you are willing to lend. How are the loans to be made? On appraisal. Very well, but who is going to benefit by it? Only the very best and the very worst farmers. The farmer who is in such good shape that his debts do not amount to very much will have no trouble in going to the board and getting money at five per cent with which to pay off the debts on which he is now paying seven or eight per cent. In that way they skim off the cream of the mortgage business. On the other hand, the farmer who is in such desperate shape that his creditors have no hope of getting anything out of him anyway will be able to go to his creditors and make this kind of compromise with them. They will say: We will give you a clear receipt for whatever amount you can get out of the farm loan board. They will use every influence they can to get all they can out of the board so that they can get that much of what is owing to them, and then they will leave the board to deal with the worst class of farmers.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Why do you call them the worst class of farmers? I know thousands in that situation who are not the worst class of farmers.

Mr. YOUNG: Just wait until you hear what I am going to say. The great bulk of the farmers in this country, those who are not in desperate need but who have a chance to make good if they can get sufficient money to allow them to be clear of their other creditors, will not be able to borrow sufficient from the board under this act to enable them to get clear. Being unable to give a first mortgage on their property they will not be able to come under the act at all. So I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that the act is not going to be of very much benefit to the farmers who are deserving and really need the benefit of its provisions.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I was interested in the remark of the last speaker, that only the best and the worst farmers will benefit by this legislation. Some time ago I asked the Minister of Finance a question which he thought was a hypothetical one. Even if it were, that is the only way we have of eliciting information at this time. But it was not a hypothetical question, because the case is well known to me of a farmer owning two quarter sections, with about 125 acres under cultivation, and his arrears of taxes amounted to about only $130. This man tried to get a loan and he was told by the board that if his debts were not $1,000 or over he could not get a loan. The question has been asked here to-day whether this is a farm relief act or a farm loan act. I do not know whether it is so that the best class of farmer is going to get a loan under this act, because this farmer I have in mind is one of that class, and he was unable to get a loan. There is a clause in the act which provides that loans are to be made to farmers in good standing. I should like to know whether it is the farmer in good standing or the farmer in desperate straits who is going to get a loan, and so far I have been unable to find out.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend will be good enough to let me have in confidence the name of the farmer and the locality it will enable me to make inquiry into the case he mentioned, and I shall make it my business to do so. Otherwise I shall not be in a position to give him an answer with respect to that specific case.

One assumes that all farmers, even those in the highest class of risk, are in need, otherwise they would not seek a loan. It is only a question of degree as to how badly they need it, and we cannot refine language in this committee and classify cases. I can only go back to my original statement, which I have made so many times, and say that each individual case must be decided on its individual merits.

Mr. SPENCER: I should like to support the statement made by the hon. member for Vegreville on behalf of men who I think should be able to get loans but who have been turned down. I have in mind an old man who has a good farm. He put his boys on it and went himself to the city to give his younger children a better education. He bought a house in the city with a mortgage on it, but on account of the serious conditions of the times he is not able to get sufficient return from his farm to pay off the interest on the mortgage or even to pay his taxes. He made application for a loan but was turned down, on the ground I suppose that he was not living on the farm. This man has lived on the farm for fifty years, and has made good on it up to recent years. He is really a farmer. The farm is his only means of getting a living, but his application was turned down because he was not actually living on the farm, I suppose, although his boys are there. I hope the new act will have a clause that will enable such men, even if they are not living on the farm, to get a loan when they are really dependent on the farm. This man is over seventy years of age. He is not in a position to get an old age pension because of his farm, and for the same reason he cannot go on relief, nor can he get relief from the farm loan board.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Last year when we were discussing the debt adjustment act we were given the assurance that in many cases where debts were composed there was a strong probability of the debtor being able to rearrange his mortgage indebtedness and thereby be in a position in somes cases to pay off the total of his indebtedness by a new loan secured from the farm loan board. I think I am safe in making the assertion that with at least eighty per cent of our farmers to-day the difficulty is not so much with their floating indebtedness, although that is an important factor, as with the accumulated arrears of interest that are added to the principal of his loan. I must frankly admit that the accumulation of interest added to the principal makes the total indebtedness in many cases beyond the actual selling value of the farm at to-day's prices, and the result was of course that no relief could be afforded in such cases by the farm loan board.

I am well aware, too, that the object of the farm loan board at its inception was not so much to lend large sums of money, not even up to the maximum, as to give the small farmer, the one who perhaps had the most difficulty in securing a loan, the opportunity to secure a very moderate loan. I think that policy was fairly well carried out. I believe also that the board did discriminate to some extent where larger loans were required. I am not speaking of loans up to the maximum. But this situation has arisen—I will give a hypothetical case. A debtor makes application to the registrar and gets a substantial reduction in his floating indebtedness, but when it comes to a question of adjustment with the company which holds the mortgage on present day values, there is great reluctance on the part of the farm loan board to lend the money. I am not criticizing that attitude. I admit that if the farm were sold at present day prices it would not perhaps bring the mortgage indebtedness accrued against it. But that resulted in a sort of impasse in our province in which the mortgage companies took the ground that they were not forced to compose the indebtedness unless they were to be paid off. I want to convey to the minister the difficulty of this situation. It usually meant that that loan was not settled but remained in abeyance. What I want to know is this. Have the debt adjustment board authority to force the mortgage company to take a reduction of their loan unless they are in a position to liquidate that loan and pay it off in cash? And even if they are in a position to do so, have the board authority to reduce the indebtedness of the mortgage and accrued interest?

Mr. RHODES: The discussion has taken a very wide field, though I do not complain of that. But the question just put by my hon. friend is one that would more properly come up when we are discussing the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I do not want the hon. gentleman to infer from what I now say that I have no wish to reply to him, but I should not like the scope of this discussion in committee on this bill enlarged to take in the other act, having the whole discussion duplicated on that bill. I shall be happy to give the information, especially as it gives me this opportunity to say that a considerable proportion of the difficulty of which he spoke, in the first instance which he gave, will be obviated by the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Obviated?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, obviated. As a matter of fact we have had under that act numerous settlements which have had the effect of compressing the total indebtedness of the farmer to a very marked extent, and I am very happy to say that while there will be and there are cases where fresh money will be required and possibly, in order to effect a settlement, composing the whole situation for the farmer, there may be instances where the mortgage may have to be taken over. But on the whole there has been a very large percentage of settlements made which have not required new money to be provided by way of farm loans. But in some instances I have in mind fresh capital has been supplied—sometimes by the creditors and in other instances by the vendor of the land, who has been only partially paid. That, however, is by the way; I do not wish to enlarge the discussion on that point at the present moment inasmuch as we shall discuss that phase of the subject under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. But answering specifically the latter question of the hon. gentleman, it is entirely within the jurisdiction of the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to make a binding settlement, which would involve, if in the judgment of that board it were wise to do so, a reduction either of principal or of interest or both.

Mr. GIROUARD: The minister says that the board of review has the right to make a binding settlement. When that settlement is made for cash, is there anything in the Canadian Farm Loan Act which obliges the commission to loan according to the binding settlement made?

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. GOLDING: I do not want to follow the example set by my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe and bring into this discussion provincial questions and provincial affairs. I think every hon. member from Ontario will agree with me that such a discussion is as useless as it is unwise. The detail in connection with agricultural development loans in the province of Ontario will be discussed at the proper time and in the proper place, and I think that we ought to follow the suggestion made by our good friend the minister and by the chairman and discuss the questions that are immediately under review.

Mr. BURY: I do not notice in the bill any section under which it is proposed to widen the scope of the act in the definition of those who have a right to make application for a loan. I brought to the attention of the minister, at the time we were discussing the resolution, the case of a man who was either managing his farm while he resided off it, or had rented his farm, or had sold it. I gave the instance of a farmer who had a section farm within three miles of a railway station, within one mile of an elevator, with 475 acres broken, a good house and the farm all fenced; and yet he was unable to get a $3,500 loan on that farm simply because he was not living on it. What I wish to urge on the minister is that the definition of "farmer" should be widened and that there should be brought under the scope of the act men who are not necessarily on the farm, men who are managing their farms through employees while they themselves live in the city. In point of fact, this particular man to whom I refer, who has farmed for forty-seven years, is now paralyzed and has to live in the city. I do not see why as good security cannot be given the farm loan board by a farmer who owns a farm of that kind, who is either farming it through an agent or employee while he lives away from it, or has rented it or even sold it, provided he has a sufficiently large equity and the title is still in his own name. Surely ample security can be given to the farm loan board in a case of that kind. Take the man to whom I have referred. His whole livelihood is derived from that farm, and if it has not already been sold for taxes, it is in danger of being so disposed of. And yet the man can get no relief. The point I am urging on the government is the widening of the definition of "farmer" to include men of that class.

Mr. RHODES: I need hardly point out to my hon. friend that it would be impossible so to frame a definition as to include what will inevitably occur in any law of general application, namely, borderline cases. I need not say to him that to legislate for particular cases is poor law. The definition as contained in this act may not be the correct one. I expressed the other day my view in passing, not having at the time given the matter as much thought as I have since done, that it might be the part of wisdom to use the same definition as that which is used in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. As a matter of fact, while the definition as contained in the present farm loan act would appear to be perhaps more restrictive in terms, it will be found in the interpretation clause of the original act:

> "Farmer" means any person whose business is that of farming and who owns and occupies a farm, or who proposes to acquire a farm for immediate occupation and cultivation by him.

The question as to how restrictive that definition is will be determined by the manner in which the word "occupies" is interpreted. As a matter of fact the regulations which have been in force under the existing farm loan act are as follows under the heading Eligibility of Applicants for Loans:

> 17. In determining the question as to whether or not an applicant is a farmer, the determining factor shall be whether or not farming is his principal occupation. If it is not, the applicant shall not be eligible for a loan.
> 18. In determining whether the applicant for a loan is actually engaged in the cultivation of the land offered as security for loan, it will be held that he is if he cultivates his land with his own or with hired labour.

I am informed by the farm loan board that in actual practice the word "occupation" has not been construed to mean that the farmer must actually live in residence upon the land in question; that a distinction has been made between "residence" and "occupation," and that as a matter of fact in individual cases loans have been made to farmers whom the board regard as being bona fide upon a piece of land which they construe as being occcupied in a sufficient sense to enable the farmer to qualify for a loan under the farm loan act. Whether that be a proper interpretation of this section or not, I do not profess to be in a position to give an opinion. There are in the committee many hon. gentlemen who have wide legal experience and whose opinion in that respect would be better than mine. But the farm loan board has so construed the word "occupies" as to enable that class of man to qualify for a loan. They have however made a distinct line of demarcation in the case of tenant farmers; they have refused to make loans to them in all cases. I am in the judgment of the committee; when we come to the section in question, if it is thought wise, I am quite content that the definition we use in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act shall be substituted for the definition we have in this one.

Mr. COOTE: Will the minister kindly read the definition?

Mr. RHODES: I read it the other day. It is:

"Farmer" means a person whose principal occupation consists in farming or the tillage of the soil.

Mr. GEARY: Is that the regulation?

Mr. RHODES: No, it is the definition of "farmer" as contained in the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I stated, when discussing the resolution on a previous occasion that perhaps that was a wider definition and, if the committee thought wise, I would be content to take that definition and use it in the farm loan act.

Mr. BURY: Is that the whole of the definition?

Mr. RHODES: Yes. It would appear to me that that would be capable of a wider interpretation than the section as it now exists in the farm loan act, because there certainly is implied at all events some limitation in that definition which it would not appear to me attaches to the definition I have just read.

Mr. SPENCER: If we did make that change, could a farmer, not living on his farm but farming it, get a loan?

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear me. I said that there are cases where loans have been actually made to persons not actually living on the farm but tilling the soil and farming that piece of land, that being their principal occupation.

Mr. BURY: I understand from the minister that no loan is given to a tenant farmer. If no loan is given to a tenant farmer, why may not a loan be given to the registered owner of the farm, who has the fee simple, the rent and the reversion? Surely somebody who has the major interest in the land can get a loan.

Mr. BRADETTE: I hope the minister will give a wider interpretation to the word "farmer." I have in mind more particularly the settlers in the fine rural sections of northern Ontario. They are under the impression that under the interpretation of this act they are not included as farmers. There are thousands of northen Ontario settlers who do not come under the present definition and I believe this act should apply to at least a certain number of them. It is true the land does not belong to them; it is true the title still is vested in the crown. That being crown property, the central government could get a first mortgage on it. The fact remains that in our section—and I believe the same applies also to northern Quebec and certain districts of the western provinces—a number of settlers cannot graduate from the settler into the farmer class because they have not sufficient money to buy stock and cattle or own sufficient buildings to get their deeds from the province. During the last two years at least I have received hundreds of letters from good bona fide settlers in northern Ontario stating that they regret the fact that they cannot come under this legislation. This is an injustice because this is one of the finest sections of the rural population in the whole country. On a previous occasion I made a very urgent plea to the government to try to include in the word "farmer" or "farming" the settlers of northern Ontario.

A certain quantity of land has been given to settlers in our sections, but for the last six or seven years such loans have not been given as liberally as in the past. If I interpret aright what the minister said a few days ago, it was that this was intended really to help agriculture; that it was the wish of the government that as much money as possible, within reason and in accordance with the laws of economy, should be loaned to the farmers, and surely this should include the settlers of northern Ontario and Quebec who are doing pioneer work in the newer parts of the country.

There are not hundreds but thousands of families who find it impossible to graduate from the settler into the farmer class for the simple reason that they lack not thousands of dollars but only a few hundred dollars. I think very few will be found who will ask more than a maximum of a thousand dollars. In my constituency we have studied this measure very thoroughly; we have held meetings to consider it, but so far we find in it no provision for the settlers of northern Ontario, and I trust the minister will find it possible to include them.

I listened with a good deal of attention to previous speakers who referred to people not actually occupying their farms. I am not in sympathy with the man who has a farm as a hobby or one who is a gentleman farmer to the extent of suggesting he should receive the same attention as the actual tiller of the soil, but I am in sympathy with the settlers who are trying to make a living off the land. I have no advice to give the government as regards the man running a farm as a hobby, but there may be special cases where through infirmity a real farmer is unable to manage his farm himself, and in such a case this act should apply. Speaking generally, unless a man actually resides on his farm I do not believe he should be entitled to any loan from any government. Having been a settler myself in northern Ontario, however, I feel that something must be done for that fine class of people who graduate from the settler to the farmer class.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is making a worthy plea for a very worthy class of citizens, but he must bear in mind that we are not dealing with a colonization scheme or a scheme of assistance to colonization. That is not the purpose of this measure, worthy as that purpose may be. Its purpose is to assist farmers, and the moment any individual of whom my hon. friend has spoken can qualify as a farmer there is nothing to prevent him, other things being in order, from securing a loan from the farm loan board.

Mr. BRADETTE: I appreciate the point the minister makes, but would he be good enough to indicate to the committee the line of demarcation between a farmer and a settler? This is a very important question. In our section we call a man in a colonization section settled on a new holding a farmer, although we all know the land belongs to the crown. The acreage at present on each farm is ninety acres, and the settler has to clear at least ten acres and have a dwelling house and stable or barn before he can get a deed. In hundreds in my own district the people are ready to get their deeds; they have cleared the land and wish to put up a better dwelling, but they have not the capital to do so, and I believe that is where the government should come in. I appreciate what the minister says, that this is not a colonization scheme, but I am speaking of farmers. Only five per cent of these people have graduated from the settler class to the class of farmers, for the reasons I have stated, if it means getting their deed. Will the minister enlighten the committee as to the line of demarcation between settlers and farmers, and whether a farmer actually living on the land will be able to benefit under this act?

Mr. RHODES: No, Mr. Chairman; if I wanted to get a definition of a farmer I fancy I would have to apply to the Department of Justice. Parliament has said what a farmer is as far as the Canadian Farm Loan Act is concerned. If my hon. friend will look at the definition of "farmer he will find that—

> "Farmer" means any person whose business is that of farming and who owns and occupies a farm, or who proposes to acquire a farm for immediate occupation and cultivation by him.

My hon. friend is just as capable of putting an interpretation on that as I am. Neither of us is any further ahead, because the act is administered by the farm loan board and they must be the judges as to whether an applicant comes within the definition of the act which they have to administer.

Mr. BRADETTE: The objection the board will find will be under the word "owns." He has not the title, which is still in the crown, but he is the owner in fact as far as actual habitation and work are concerned.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend would not suggest that the farm loan board would lend money to a man who does not own a farm?

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, he owns it in a sense; he has the moral right to it. There are farmers in our section that have been on their farms twenty-five years but have not a deed. No one will tell me that anyone could take those farms away from them. They have made improvements. I know the government is sincere in its desire to help agriculture, and there should be some provision to make it possible to help that fine settler population in the newer sections of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: It is obvious that we cannot make further progress before six o'clock. It is not proposed to go on with this bill this evening. I therefore move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when the insurance act was amended a couple of years ago section 180 of the old act was not included in the revised act. The purpose of this amendment is to place in the present act the provisions of old section 180. I will not take time to read that whole section; I will simply say that its provisions would make it compulsory for a life insurance company when any premium is due and not paid to apply any cash surrender value which existed under a policy to maintain the policy in force until the whole cash surrender value was exhausted.

As the act now stands it is not necessary for the company to maintain the policy in force if the premium is not paid by the policyholder; the policy may be forfeited, and in that case the insured would lose his insurance; in other words the policy would lapse. It seems to me that every policy should be carried in force so long as the cash surrender value is sufficient to cover the premium. Most policies now in existence contain such a clause, but I feel that it should be compulsory for every company carrying on life insurance business to adopt this method. I am told that some companies have made a good deal of money out of this practice of allowing policies to lapse even where there was sufficient cash surrender value to have continued the policies in force. To-day all companies are in competition with each other in the selling of life insurance, and one of the strong talking points used by their agents is the profits earned by the companies. If one should make profits out of the cancellation or the lapsing of policies where there is sufficient cash surrender value to carry them on, no doubt other companies will feel compelled to adopt a similar method so that they will be able to compete in the matter of profits.

Subsection 5 of this bill is new; it is not taken from the old act. This subsection would limit the rate of interest which may be charged by any life insurance company against any advance or policy loan to a maximum of four per cent per annum. I think hon. members will be seized of the importance of this provision when I state the figures showing the money advanced as policy loans. In 1932, which is the last year for which I have the figures, the amount of advances against policies held by life insurance companies reporting to the dominion Department of Insurance was $244,000,000. In 1933 it was $218,000,000; in 1930 it was $188,000,000 and in 1929 it was $159,000,000. I think those figures show the importance of this matter.

I might say a word as to the necessity for this section. In 1921 I had the experience personally of being charged ten per cent per annum by an insurance company on a six months' note which I tendered in payment of a premium. I refused to sign the note and secured the money elsewhere with which to pay the premium. But that shows the rates which have been charged policyholders by certain insurance companies. Just last year I found that I was being charged eight per cent on money which was automatically advanced under the provisions of the policy itself; the premium was being advanced automatically from the cash surrender value of the policy. That was carried as a loan against the policy and I was being charged a rate of eight per cent per annum. I found that by taking out a loan against the policy and turning it in as payment of the premium due and the premium previously charged against the cash surrender value, the rate was reduced to six per cent, but I think even that rate is excessive. I am told that some companies regularly charge a rate of seven per cent on loans against their policies.

The importance of this matter may be shown in another way. I have here the figures concerning four large companies doing business in Canada. The first company has twenty-four per cent of its interest earning investments in the form of policy loans. The next company has approximately twenty-five per cent, the third about twenty-four per cent and the last company about twenty per cent of its interest earning investments in the form of loans against policies. The investment folio of another company shows city mortgages amounting to $27,000,000, farm mortgages totalling $19,000,000, bonds and debentures amounting to $43,000,000 and policy loans of $28,000,000. So it will be seen that in this case the second largest investment is in policy loans.

I think the rate of even six per cent, which is the lowest of which I have heard, is much too high. The security for these loans is the best in the world; the companies are lending money to their own creditors. There cannot possibly be any loss; there is no risk connected with it. Another reason is that the next best investment of the life insurance companies would be dominion government bonds, and the rate they can now earn from those investments is considerably less than four per cent. I find that the average rate earned in 1923 by two of the largest companies was 4·08 per cent in one case and 4·09 per cent in the other, yet to my personal knowledge one of these companies was charging eight per cent on part of their loans against policies.

I think it advisable that parliament should incorporate in the insurance act a uniform rate that may be charged by these companies. As I said before they are in competition one with the other. They are all trying to make good profits, and if one company charges high rates of interest in order to increase its earnings the other companies naturally will feel that they must do the same in order to compete.

Life insurance surely is carried on for the good of the people, at least it should be carried on in the interests of the people.

All our regulation is ostensibly for that purpose, and looking at the matter from that point of view there can be no doubt that this is something which should be regulated by parliament. I earnestly ask this house and the government to accept the bill, and if it is accepted I should be glad to move that it be sent to the banking and commerce committee for further consideration. I think the bill is a feasible one, and I hope it will receive the support of the house.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): With respect to the provisions contained in subsections 1, 2, 3 and 4 of section 1 of the bill, it is a debatable question whether the proposals made by my hon. friend, notwithstanding the fact that at one time they were contained in the insuraance act, would be as favourable to the insured as the present provisions of the policies of the majority of the companies. If these provisions were inserted in the law it would mean that if a man had a high priced policy, we will say a ten payment life, the loan value applied to the premiums paid would be absorbed with such rapidity that the policy would soon be extinguished, whereas if the insured had the option of accepting a twenty payment life policy or some other class of insurance which would enable him to spread the same amount of money over premiums calling for smaller payments, he would be able to keep his policy alive over a much longer period. However I do not purpose discussing the matter at this stage; I merely make these observations on the point as to whether or not the proposals made would be of benefit to the insured.

It seems to me the question of the interest rate is a technical matter upon which the superintendent of insurance and the parties interested should be heard. So far as I am concerned I am content to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) namely that the bill receive second reading on the understanding that it go to the banking and commerce committee where discussion may be had to better advantage than in committee of the whole house. I shall be content to accept that arrangement, but of course without prejudice to the right of hon. members to take exception either to the principle or to the details of the bill.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I believe I should point out to the hon. member who moved second reading of this bill (Mr. Coote) that my understanding is that section 180 of the Insurance Act, 1927, which is to be found in the revised statutes, was dropped in the enactment of 1932 because it was considered that the federal parliament had no right or had no legislative authority in such matters.

Mr. YOUNG: Much has happened since then.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There were some very important decisions after the passage of the original section 180. One of the law officers of the Department of Justice, who has had large experience with insurance legislation and has been closely associated in the insurance cases which have gone before the privy council, has sent me a memorandum which I believe I should place at the disposal of hon. members. The memorandum deals with the question of federal jurisdiction with regard to subsections 1, 2, 3 and 4 of section 1 of the proposed bill. He points out that these subsections may constitute regulations affecting the conduct of the business of insurance, and in those circumstances it is doubtful whether we have any right to deal with them. However, he believes subsection 5, regarding the rate of interest, is within the jurisdiction of parliament, and his object in sending me the memorandum has been to acquaint the house and the hon. member with the situation.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, without detaining the house too long I should like to support the bill presented by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), second reading of which he has moved this evening.

During the last five or six years the matter of insurance has become not only one of great importance but one involving considerable risk to people who are prejudiced because of inability to keep up their premiums. In a debate which took place in this house about a year ago it was shown that due to the heavy cost of writing insurance, involving commissions, bonuses and one thing and another, premiums are essentially—and I believe unnecessarily—high. That being so we find that in years of crisis many people have much difficulty in carrying their insurance premiums.

Last year I obtained figures showing the aggregate amount of policies surrendered and dropped in three years. In the province of Alberta alone these policies aggregated a value of $66,000,000, and the figure for the whole of Canada was well over two billion dollars. I mention this fact because I believe this extraordinary situation has been brought about very largely not only because of the high cost of premiums but because of the high interest rates charged. I would point out that the higher the rate of interest the insurance companies charge on loans the greater the difficulty in carrying the policy. For these reasons I have much pleasure in seconding the bill presented by the hon. member for Macleod, which recommends that the interest rates be reduced in the manner he has indicated.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill are the same as those of the bill which has just received second reading, with the exception that they apply to foreign companies rather than to Canadian and British companies. I should be glad to have this bill sent to the banking and commerce committee.

May I say, respecting the point raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) that I have never understood this particular section of the old act conflicted with the powers of parliament. However when the matter is discussed in the banking and commerce committee I am sure the point will be carefully considered, and it may be that the wording of the act could be improved upon. All I wish to do is to protect the policyholder. In the event of there being in his policy a cash surrender value sufficient to carry it, such policy should be carried as long as possible and at a reasonable rate of interest.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the observations I made respecting Bill No. 13 apply with equal force to this bill, the provision being precisely the same. Of course the former bill has to do with Canadian and British insurance companies while this one deals with foreign insurance companies.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved the second reading of Bill No. 17, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1932.

He said: Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that this is not the first time I have brought this matter to the attention of the house, but it is the first session I have approached the problem by way of moving an amendment to the Fisheries Act. My reason for moving the amendment at this time is that after careful consideration and investigation into the whole matter of salmon fishing in the Fraser river and the waters adjacent thereto I have come to the conclusion that something will have to be done to protect not only the fishermen of the Fraser river but the great salmon fishing industry itself.

I am sorry that owing to the rules of the house I am unable to place on the records the boundaries as defined in the bill, but I have in my hand a map with the boundaries indicated thereon, and which I shall send over to the minister. The red lines show the Fraser river and the blue lines indicate the area covered in the bill, in connection with which I am asking the house to act. I will send this across to the minister so that he can follow me better as I proceed with my argument.

This question, Mr. Speaker, affects 2,366 gill net fishermen. That is the number of licences issued for the Fraser river for 1934. Actually there are more gill net fishermen engaged than that, because they come in from other parts of the province at certain seasons of the year; and there is also the extra help some use.

For the benefit of the house it is perhaps as well that I should take a minute to explain what purse seining and gill net fishing is. Purse seining is done by means of a large power boat. They go out to fish, and when they sight a school of fish they let down a net and circle the school or as much of it as the seine net allows. The net is about seventy-three feet in depth. When the fish have been circled there are cords that tighten and draw together the bottom of the net, and all the fish within the net are caught as it tightens up just like a purse. The seine is about twelve hundred feet long and, as I said, some seventy-three feet in depth.

In gill net fishing, generally speaking, there is one man to a boat, although sometimes he has a helper, a boy or another man. The nets used in these boats in the Fraser river are nine hundred feet long and in the open water twelve hundred feet long, but they are shallow in depth compared with the purse seine, being only some thirty feet deep. Not only is the net shallower, but the size of the mesh is entirely different from that of the purse seine. The mesh of the gill net which is operated by the individual fisherman must be large enough to allow only the head of the salmon to go through. If that were not so they would not catch any fish, whereas the purse seine has a very small mesh so as to catch everything that comes into it. I think that simple explanation will suffice. These two methods of fishing are better understood by those who have given study to the matter, but after this brief explanation I think hon. members will be better able to follow my argument.

May I point out that the fishing industry in this country is one of our most important industries. I should like to put on record a few figures connected with it. The total value of the fisheries for the whole of Canada, that is the landed catch, according to the latest report, amounted in 1933-34 to $27,558,053. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen to note that the total value of the fisheries in 1929 was $53,500,000, and it dropped last year to $27,558,053. In 1930 the total value of the fish caught was $47,804,216.

As to the number of employees in this industry: according to the records the total number of men employed in the fishing industry, actually fishing with the boats, in 1933-34 was 65,391; employed ashore in canneries and elsewhere there were 13,927 employees, making a total number engaged in the fishing industry of 79,328. Invested in the fishing industry is the sum of $40,907,470, of which $24,912,482 is invested in vessels and gear; and invested in canneries is a total of $15,094,988, making a total investment in the industry of $40,907,470. From these figures one can see that the fishing industry of Canada is no mean industry, and I mention that because there is genuine concern throughout the country because we have to-day no minister of fisheries. We had a minister of fisheries in 1930-31, and if I may make this personal reference we were indeed very sorry to lose the present Minister of Finance when he was transferred from his office of Minister of Fisheries to his present portfolio of finance. It is a cause for general complaint and alarm that one of the most important industries in this country has now no minister in charge of its administration. There is an acting minister, it is true, but may I say in all kindness to the present acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Stirling), and my remarks apply to his predecessor as acting Minister of Fisheries, that one cannot expect the same results when one is delegated only as an acting minister. At least that is how I believe anyone would feel if he were acting minister only, instead of the minister. The result has been that ever since the Department of Fisheries has been in charge of an acting minister he has had to rely entirely on the reports and recommendations made by his officials. I am frank to say that in my opinion the officials are practically running the whole fisheries department. No acting minister is given a proper chance to go into all matters connected with the fishing industry and so find out for himself what the actual conditions are. He is only the acting minister, and with all due deference to the present acting minister he has not yet had time to investigate the fishing industry thoroughly and he must therefore rely on what his officials tell him.

There is another complaint I wish to register. There have been no meetings of the fisheries committee except for one session since I have been a member of this house. Very important changes have been made in the regulations by order in council, and may I point out that orders in council have been passed without any previous intimation to the fishermen or to those affected. Drastic changes have been made in the regulations under the Fisheries Act, in many instances simply by order in council. I believe that before an important change is made the matter should come before the fisheries committee, which I believe should be in session every year; but as I have said since I have been here it has been in session only one year; since then everything has been done by order in council.

The area which I am asking to be enclosed by fishery regulations with a view to prohibiting seining therein was previously closed to seining for over fifty years. It was not till 1933 that an order in council was passed—at a time when the house was sitting, and without any warning being given—opening this area and permitting the purse seine boats to come into it and scoop up the fish. I know the acting minister might have different data from his officials, but the information I have regarding other districts is that seine fishing has been allowed in many areas in British Columbia until it was found that intensive fishing by purse seines depleted those areas. The result was that those operating seine boats, cannery companies and others owning these boats, looked around for new areas in which to fish and utilize their boats. They discovered one such area in the gulf of Georgia in close vicinity to the mouth of the Fraser river, and so it was opened in 1933 for these purse seine vessels. In that year sixty-five of them were allowed in that area, and last season a total of 103 of these boats were operating there. I maintain that if this is allowed to go on, the great fishing industry of the Fraser river is in grave danger of being not only depleted but eliminated in a few years. I say that in all seriousness, because that has been the experience in other areas.

When the area was opened up first, in debating the matter in the house the then acting Minister of Fisheries argued that it was a question of quality. In that area there was a run of a variety known as pinks, which come in every two years. They said it was necessary to allow the seine boats to operate, because the fish deteriorated once they started up the river. Last year it was the late run of sockeye salmon. Nothing was said in 1933 about sockeye salmon, however; it was all quality in that year. As I develop my argument further I intend to show that the opening up of the area was entirely in the interests of the cannerymen and of those who owned the seines. First of all I would call attention to this fact, that away back in 1922 a commission was appointed under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) and I have here a copy of their report. That commission studied the subject thoroughly. It was composed of many members, including some who are still in the house, and one of whom was the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie). Another member was my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). The commission went out to British Columbia to investigate the whole fishing industry, and among other things which they investigated was the question of seine fishing. This is the statement on seine fishing, which we find in the submission of the Duff commisison of 1922. I will quote from it:

> We think that an unlimited and widespread use of either purse or drag seines is a sure and quick way of depleting the supplies of salmon. But it was made clear to us that there are places on the coast outside of rivers where gill nets have not as yet been proved to be effective in catching salmon in reasonably large quantities. With this in mind, therefore, we recommend that drag and purse seines be not permitted to be operated for salmon except where their use has been demonstrated to be the only effective and reasonably economic method of catching such fish.

There was the definite statement made by that commission who investigated the matter on the ground. They heard the gill net fishermen, the cannerymen and all other interests, and after due deliberation they recommended that no purse seine fishing be allowed where gill net fishermen can operate. I do not think the acting Minister of Fisheries will take issue with me when I say that the area in which they are now operating could be operated entirely by gill net fishermen, because for fifty years the gill net fishermen did operate in that area and it was not until 1933 that these others were allowed into the area at all.

That seine fishing is the most destructive form of catching fish, I do not think there can be any doubt whatever; I believe it is even more dangerous than the traps, as someone has said. And as I have pointed out, wherever they have been in operation these areas have been depleted. As regards statements that have been made with respect to the depletion of fish in the Fraser river, I should like to read two reports which I have here, one by the United States department and one by the government of British Columbia. I have a letter from the director of fisheries in the state of Washington, addressed to me in December, 1933, after they had operated that area. He says:

> Heavy persecution of the run throughout the season both by American and Canadian fishermen resulted in the pack of about 180,000 cases which was considerably in excess of what should have been packed to guarantee a similar run in 1937.

The other report is supplied by Doctors W. A. and L. S. Clemens, Pacific Biological Station, Nanaimo, British Columbia. I quote:

> Fraser River: The prospect for 1935 is very discouraging. In 1931, Mr. J. P. Babcock, after making an inspection of the spawning beds in the Seton, Anderson, Lillooet, Harrison and Shuswap areas and receiving reports of dominion fisheries officers through Major Motherwell for other areas, stated that the total number of sockeye that spawned in the entire river basin was one of the smallest ever recorded. Egg collections at the Pemberton and Pitt lake hatcheries were relatively small.

I quote these two reports to show that intensive fishing by seine, and on the American side by seine and traps, is very detrimental and will have a marked effect on the future of salmon fishing in the Fraser river.

We hear a great deal now about quality and about finding a market for our fish. But let me point out the great catches of salmon which used to be made in the Fraser river and in years when they found no trouble whatever in selling this class of fish. I have not the time to put all the figures on record, but if one cares to go back to the year 1926 he will find that the market value of salmon was then $18,769,605. And as regards the packs of salmon in the Fraser river, in 1913 we had over 2,000,000 cases of salmon packed —fresh fish caught in the Fraser river. To be exact, the figure was 2,409,760. Now it is interesting to watch the drop. In 1933 —I have not before me the figures for 1934—the catch was 178,204 cases, compared with almost 2,500,000 cases in 1913. It was a wonderful industry employing many thousands in those days, with canneries up and down each side of the Fraser river; and at that time the industry was not bothered with anything about quality and regulations.

I mention these facts in an endeavour to prove that the salmon fishing industry is going down, and this latest move by the government in allowing purse seines to operate in this area right in the mouth of the Fraser river, which practically makes it a trap, and in an area where gill net fishermen did operate for fifty years, will result in depleting the salmon there and in the ruination of over two thousand fishermen at present engaged in the industry.

Some areas have been closed this year. A notice has been sent out from Vancouver that certain areas—5, 6 and 7—will be closed owing to the intensive fishing done with purse seines. I could mention other areas but I have taken these in particular. Ten years ago, when the seines first went into the areas which are now being closed, they caught anything from 10,000 to 20,000 per day. Their catch last year was between 1,500 and 2,000. It is no wonder the department, operating from Vancouver, has taken steps to close the area to purse seine fishing, but it is somewhat late. These people have boats and nets, and the department have said, "We will allow them to go into this last area," so they will do the same damage there as they have done elsewhere if seining is not prohibited.

In 1933 we had the word "quality" thrown at us. I wonder what excuse will be offered in regard to this past season. I have made a thorough investigation as far as I have been able to do so, and have endeavoured in every way to ascertain the facts from the fishermen. From all the figures and all the data I can get I am reliably informed that the sockeye salmon are in better condition when they come up the river than they are before they come up. I know there is some question regarding the pinks, and if I have time I shall deal with that later, but I am speaking now of the late run of sockeye salmon that were caught last season. For the information of hon. members I may say that the salmon when they come out of the salt water and first taste the brackish water, stop there and wait in those areas until all food is gone out of their bodies. Then they go upstream and so get harder and harder as they head upstream, with the result that the fish caught further up the river after they have waited for a period in the open waters are, so experienced fishermen and experts say, of better quality for canning than the late run of sockeye which is caught out in the open. This might not apply to the pink salmon caught in clear salt waters, but it does apply to the late run of sockeye.

I have not time to go into the matter as fully as I would like because I see my time is passing and I have many things I would like to draw to the attention of the minister. There is a good deal of concern and complaint regarding the inspection board. I was present when the acting minister received in Vancouver a delegation and I think that question was gone into. But when his officials tell him that the canned fish that are condemned or considered to be second quality are those which have been caught by the gill netters, and that all fish of first quality are those which have been caught by the seines, that is untrue because no man can tell after the fish are canned which have been caught by seines and which have been caught by gill netters, and the word of the cannery companies is not without bias. Might I point this out to the acting minister: I might mention two canneries, otherwise doubt might be cast upon this statement. The Phoenix cannery this last season bought all seine caught fish, and fifty per cent of their fish I believe were classed as second quality. Another, the Glenrose cannery further up the river, took all their fish from the gill net fishermen and that cannery had practically no cases condemned. I just mention those two instances.

Coming to the question of quality, I have before me something that I should like to show to the minister—I do not know that it has been shown to him—and to the house, with regard to what is taking place in connection with the fish inspection board. Many rackets have been revealed in the price spreads committee, but I will indicate a racket participated in by the dominion government; it is so striking I thought I would mention and exhibit it to the house. I have in my hand an empty one-pound salmon tin. When the salmon is first canned they place on the lid the one word "Canada." When the word "Canada" is on the lid, that is supposed to represent number one quality fish. The inspector comes along, and by the way these inspectors are also buyers, because they are brokers—this is a point on which I should like to speak a little later as these government inspectors are also in the market for fish. When they inspect the cases of salmon they may come on a case which in their opinion should not be so marked, but is second quality. What do they do? They compel the cannery to put on another lid on which is marked "second quality." Thus you have second quality, but what do some of the buyers do? They buy a lot of these second quality fish and take off the outer lid so that the tin remains with the word "Canada" on it. The result is that during the past season there has been a large demand, I understand, from buyers abroad to the brokers in Vancouver for these second quality fish because they can buy them at about half the price; the first tin remains intact with the word "Canada" stamped on it, so that they can sell it in the stores as first quality fish after removing the second quality lid. Talk about a racket! The department knows about this but no steps have yet been taken to stop it. I am not going to develop the argument further, although I should like to say more about the inspection board because I heard a good deal about it. Strangely enough there was a great demand on the brokers this year for second quality fish, which can be bought much cheaper than the number one quality.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): How much cheaper?

Mr. REID: I believe there is a difference of about three or four dollars a case. I thought it well to bring up this point because this practice should be stopped. The whole situation is a farce. I do not know whether the minister has seen this type of tin, but I am sending the whole thing across to him, because it is really worth while showing it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Are these inspectors paid employees of the government on full time?

Mr. REID: The inspectors, while they are appointed by the dominion government, are paid by the cannerymen at the rate of so much a case. The inspection board, so far as payment is concerned, is no charge on the government; the cannerymen pay it. But human nature, being what it is, brokers should not also be government inspectors; that is a situation that should be changed. It is bringing the whole industry under suspicion, because they are receiving orders from abroad, and if they are receiving orders for second quality fish and there is none in the market, well, if they wanted to they could find some, because all they would have to do if they were so disposed—and I am not accusing them—would be to turn down certain cases on inspection. I am not saying that they are doing this; far from it; I have no proof of it, but there is the possibility.

So far as quality is concerned the industry is very much alarmed also at certain statements which have been made, and in addition in regard to closing time of which I shall later speak. But with reference to the quality of the fish and the statement that it is necessary to have the seine boats catch the fish away out in the open before they get up the river, I will first read this: Major Motherwell, the man in charge at Vancouver, attended on September 12 last a Kiwanis club meeting in New Westminster, and he said at that time:

> Sixty per cent of the present run of sockeye salmon entering the Fraser river are not in fit condition for canning.

That at least is what he is reported to have said. This information comes from the British Columbian, a paper published by one of our senators and printed in the city of New Westminster. He said that sixty per cent were not fit for canning, and his statement was made on September 12, but about two weeks later the river was opened up and fish were allowed to be caught. The fishermen are asking this very pertinent question: If the fish were not fit for canning on September 12, were they more fit two weeks later? That was the point. That question is a very difficult one to answer because the argument has been advanced by the officials that fish begin to deteriorate at a certain period and therefore they close the area so as to allow spawning and also, they claim, to maintain the quality of the fish. I shall just ask the minister to take note of this matter; I think he heard something about it while he was in Vancouver.

I should like to speak about the exports of sockeye, but as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has on the order paper a resolution with reference to that matter I shall reserve the remarks I intend to make on that subject, which is very important and has a bearing on this bill. But I invite the minister's attention to the matter of the closing time put into effect on the Fraser river in the 1934 season. Fishing is closed for the week-end to all kinds of fishermen. I should like him to get from his officials an explanation of why the purse seiners were allowed to operate eight hours ahead of the gill netters. They certainly could make a cleanup in the first eight hours, because as is well known to all who know anything about the industry, the opening morning after an area has been closed to allow the fish to go up for spawning is the best time for a catch. The seiners can catch more on a Monday morning than on a Friday morning. The fishing goes down as the week passes; the fish become more scattered and do not school up in such large numbers. I think the question why the seine boats were allowed to operate some eight hours more, as they were, is worthy of the minister's attention.

As to the quality, it is a strange thing that the American cannerymen who compete with the Canadians in the markets of Great Britain can pay more for the Canadian caught pinks and late run sockeye fish than the Canadian canners offered. For the late run of sockeye in the Fraser river the United States cannerymen were offering twenty-five cents per fish when our cannerymen in many instances were afraid to take them in case they should be turned down as second quality. Putting those double lids on adds quite an extra amount of expense; first they put on one lid, and then the other. The canneryman was afraid to take a chance, and so this last season, 1934, he was not ready to take the late run of sockeye, and the majority of those fish were taken across the line where the Americans paid an average of 25 cents each for them. Last year when our pink salmon was said to be of little value the Americans were paying fifteen cents for them to the fishermen who took them across the line, when all the Canadian canners were paying was two cents per fish. Yet we are meeting their competition in Great Britain. Someone suggested that is a matter for the attention of the price spreads and mass buying committee, but I suppose it is too late for that now.

I should like the minister to reply. I have many matters that I should like to bring up in this connection. The matter is a very serious one. The whole industry is faced with disaster; many of these men are being forced on relief. The Deputy Minister of Fisheries stated that this past season the fishermen made the best money they ever made, but I deny that statement right now. He quoted figures, but in those figures he included Japanese fishermen who operate their boats the entire twenty-four hours a day. If he takes as the catch of one man that of a boat operated twenty-four hours a day it may well be said he did well. But as for the white fishermen on the Fraser river I dispute the deputy minister's assertion; they did not make as much this year as in past seasons. Besides the loss of late run sockeye, other varieties of fish were picked up by the purse seines and their catches diminished thereby.

As the hour is almost up I must conclude my remarks, but I make this suggestion to the minister. If the attitude of the government is to turn down the bill I suppose I shall have to abide by it, because they have the majority; but I appeal to them at least to let this bill go to the committee, in which case I would ask in all seriousness that representatives of the fishermen be brought from the Pacific coast to appear before the committee. It is all very well for the cannerymen who have plenty of money to appeal to the acting minister or the deputy minister, but the fishermen are not in that position, so I urge upon the minister that they be brought before the committee if the bill is referred to the committee.

Mr. G. H. PETTIT (Welland): The hon. member (Mr. Reid) referred to the alarming reduction in the catch and output of fish. Is not the chief factor in that situation the methods and the various kinds of seines and other contraptions used by the American fishermen fishing in the adjacent waters and off that point of land where the fish pass into Canadian waters—

Mr. DUFF: Point Roberts.

Mr. PETTIT: —is that not leaving very few of the sockeye for the Canadian fishermen to take?

Mr. REID: I should like to discuss that point before the committee, because the hon. member has not the right angle. Categorically I would say no, but I should like to answer it more fully in committee.

Mr. PETTIT: Would not the real solution of the matter be a treaty between the United States and Canada, assented to by the state of Washington which has certain rights under the terms of it's entry into the union?

Mr. REID: It might, but only if seines were prohibited. I should be very pleased to answer all such questions before the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not in order; the house is not in committee.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bury in the chair.

Publications, $32,197.60.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I notice there is an increase. Would the minister give the reason for it?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): There has been a reorganization of the branch, consisting chiefly of taking in the extension branch of the experimental farm with the old publications branch. There is an increase in advertising and publicity, $3,300; supplies and material, $2,725; and travelling, $3,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Does the minister mean, by taking up publications again, that he desires to go on discussing his farm rehabilitation scheme in the western prairies, or would he prefer to do that some other time?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would come better under experimental farms. I took the opportunity of making the announcement the other day, because it could be made either through the press or on the orders of the day; but I thought it would be just as well to make it on the introduction of estimates.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I was not able to hear the minister's answer to the first question. Did he say that appropriations formerly made under other departments are now included in this item, and account for the increase?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, a reorganization has taken place in the publications branch, and we hope to centralize all work of this nature. We have included under this item work previously done under the experimental farms branch.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Is this reorganization going to cost more, or what was the extra amount spent under experimental farms branch?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, the cost will be less. The experimental farms branch vote previously included part of this item, but this total is less.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Last year this vote amounted to $23,039. How much was spent for this purpose under the experimental farms vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I really have not the information at hand in that form, but I shall be glad to give the hon. member any information in that connection that I can secure. This item really covers material and staff for the distribution of publications.

Mr. BOTHWELL: If I understood the minister aright a portion of the money formerly expended by the experimental farms branch will now be expended under this item, but I notice that the experimental farms item is also increased this year, whereas, unless there is some other reason, it should be reduced by the amount included under this item.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): For purposes of administration there is a transfer; less money will be expended by the experimental farms branch in this connection.

Mr. VALLANCE: I notice that in the estimates for 1934-35 there was a decrease of $150,354 in the experimental farms vote. This year the increase on the same item amounts to $122,898. The minister is reducing the amount spent for publications under the experimental farms vote and is taking that money out of the reduced vote, though he has not yet made up what he took out last year. Last year there was a decrease of $150,000; this year the increase amounts to only $122,000, but the minister says he is extending the services. How is he doing that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is a consolidation of the work which accounts for the increase in this vote. If I understood the hon. member aright he said that last year there was a decrease in the experimental farms vote and that this year there is an increase. The increase in that vote, which will be discussed more fully when we come to that item, is due to the extended work of the experimental farm system.

Mr. VALLANCE: I am not concerned about the increase in the vote this year, but the minister says that the amount formerly expended out of the experimental farms vote for publications now is under this item. Last year there was a decrease of $150,000 in the experimental farm vote. This year the increase amounts to $122,000 still leaving a decrease of about $30,000, yet the minister is proposing to give greater service through the experimental farms vote than he gave prior to 1935. How can he do that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not a greater service in this work; a greater service in other work under the experimental farm vote this year.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like some information with regard to the distribution of these publications. Are they sent out only upon request by a farmer or someone else interested, or are they sent out by the department to those who might be interested? For instance, there are some valuable publications dealing with irrigation crops. I was wondering if they were sent particularly to people on irrigated farms. Then in connection with the experimental ranching stations, which are doing valuable work, I find that a great many ranchers know nothing about the results of the experiments that have been carried out.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A mailing list is maintained, and in addition the publications are sent out upon request. With such publications are included lists of other publications that are available. Then if a person wishes to send for any others the list is there and he can make his selections. The method of sending out publications without requests has been considered many times in the past, and it was felt that there would be a great wastage if they were sent out to others than those sufficiently interested to write for them. If persons do write, however, a list of publications in which they may be particularly interested is sent, and they are invited to mark the ones they would like and return the list. Then their names remain on the mailing list.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In 1932-33 the item for publications amounted to $7,500. In the following year it was $28,231. Last year it dropped to $23,000, but this year it is the highest of which I have record, $32,197.60. The experimental farms vote is also higher this year. I think the minister should give the committee some information as to the publications that are being taken out of the hands of the experimental farms branch and being looked after under this item, with the estimated saving to the experimental farms branch. So far we have not been able to get any explanation of this vote.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret that I do not seem to have been able to make myself clear to the hon. member. He has said that in one year there is an increase and in another year a decrease. This vote may go up or down, depending on the demand for these publications. At the end of one year, due to a lack of requests, there may be left a supply of material which will be taken into consideration in making the estimate for the following year.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I should like the minister to give us some information as to the publications that are put out. I have here the annual report of the Department of Agriculture for the year ending March 31, 1934, and at page 65 publications are dealt with. It gives the numbers of the publications issued; 28, 88, 151, 161, 162, and so on. I should like to know what publications are being issued at the present time by the experimental farms branch, what publications in future will not be issued by that branch, and what new publications are to be issued to account for the increase in this item. I think we ought to have that information.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The money in this vote is not for the printing of publications, but for the distribution of them.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does it cost that much?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister has assured us that the cost will be less this year. How can he tell us whether or not it will be less, unless he can tell us how much he will save from the vote for the experimental farms? Unless we know how much he saves on that which has been included in the experimental farm vote, the committee cannot form any opinion as to what we are saving how it is being saved or where it is being saved.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The branch has been enlarged this year, and part of the administrative work done by the experimental farm will be done by this branch.

Mr. DONNELLY: How much?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We are not in a position to say exactly how much.

Mr. DONNELLY: Then how can you tell whether or not you are saving money?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Surely the minister ought to be able to give us some idea of how many men he will employ, how long they will work, and whether he is going to have a larger number of men employed later on. He must have based his estimate for the increase on certain figures. I understand him to say that the money is for distribution. Will it be paid to new employees? If so, will they be employed by the civil service commission, or simply at the will of the minister or the officials in his department? Since the money is for distribution, I think we are entitled to have this information. I understand the postage or mailing does not cost anything. The expenditure, as I understand it, is to place these pamphlets and documents in envelopes. Who will employ these men? Is it a political move, for an election?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are no wages contained in this increase.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is it, then?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This has to do with the sending out of publications, and so on. The staff of the publications branch is appointed by the civil service commission; but this increase is a matter of—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Accountancy?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No. It is an increase in supplies, materials, expenses and travelling, as I have indicated, and certain extension exhibits which were formerly taken care of in the experimental farm vote.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has the deputy who is assisting the minister the details of the vote? The figures ought to be given to the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The increase or the total vote?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The total vote.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): For this year's vote the figures are as follows:

Advertising and publicity:
Clipping service, $600.
Newspaper advertising and radio, $1,000.
Mats for press services, $900.
Photographic and lantern slides, $800.
Temporary assistance, $1,497.60.
Supplies and material:
Metal stencils and ribbons, $850.
Mimeograph ink, $800.
Mimeograph stencils, $300.
Mimeograph paper, $8,000.
Printing, $4,500.
Stationery, $750.
Newspaper subscriptions, $100.
Envelopes, $5,500.
Replacement of duplicating machinery, $1,000.
Transportation:
Cartage, $1,100.
Postage and express, $1,000.
Transportation and travelling expenses to persons travelling, $3,500.

Mr. VALLANCE: Now that we have entered upon a discussion of this matter I think it would be wise to review these expenditures since the time the present Minister of Agriculture took over the administration of the department. Let us see what he has done each year under the item of publications. In 1930-31 we find a vote of $31,000; in 1931-32 there is a vote of $38,000. Then in 1932-33 it is reduced to $7,500. In 1933-34 it is back again to $28,231; we are climbing up. This year it is back to $32,197.60 an amount not far below the $38,000 he asked in 1931-32. I do not doubt the minister's statement of expenditures, but the point which arises in my mind is this: In the year 1932-33 the vote was only $7,500, and I am wondering if anything was done in that year, or was this particular branch of the department allowed to dwindle away to nothing? Is the minister now making an effort to catch up and leave the department in the same condition as that in which he found it?—at least I hope he will leave it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The difference is accounted for by the fact that because of lack of demand supplies have piled up at the end of one year, thereby enabling a cut being made in the estimates. If I remember correctly in the year following the one in which there was a vote of only $7,500 the amount was greatly increased due to the fact that the supplies had been almost exhausted. My information from the officials of the department is that no demand for publications has been refused.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The minister has been good enough to give us the details as to how he expects to spend the vote for which he is now asking. We would like further to have the particulars as to how the moneys voted last year were spent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am sorry I have not the figures for last year before me, but I shall be very glad either to submit them to the committee or to send them to the hon. member seeking the information.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, I have on my desk a publication outlining the poultry marketing scheme which is to be voted on next week in Saskatchewan and other western provinces. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the answers to questions which he laid upon the table yesterday. Question 4 was as follows:

What sum of money was advanced by the dominion marketing board for the purpose of promoting the marketing scheme for eggs and poultry in Saskatchewan, and to whom it was advanced?

The answer was "No sum." I objected to that answer because I had in my possession a telegram stating that the pool officials in that province had publicly admitted that they had received $20,000 which they were using to pay some ninety-five speakers who were getting $4 a day and their expenses to go out through the province promoting the scheme. The minister said he would give a better answer to-day, and to-day he told us that some sums of money had been advanced, but not for promotion purposes. When I asked him if the money could be used for promoting this scheme he replied, if I heard him correctly, that it depended on what meaning one would take from the word "promotion". I think he is not treating the house fairly. We have a right to a definite and clear answer to the question, and I trust the minister will give us a full explanation now.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I hope the hon. member does not wish to be unfair but I think he will agree with me when I finish my statement that he has been unfair. I did not state yesterday that I would give a better answer. The difficulty was that due to a disturbance in the house I could not hear the telegram or the information he read from it, and it was because of that I asked that his question stand as a notice. It was the way the question was worded by the hon. member for Weyburn, asking what sum was voted for promoting the scheme that made it impossible to give a direct answer because of the use of the word "promoting." There is no desire on the part of myself or any of my officials to avoid giving information. That would be useless even if we desired to do so because all information must be produced and submitted to the house. But the hon. member will appreciate the difficulty in giving a direct answer to a question that has in it a word like the word "promoting."

Money has been advanced by the dominion marketing board to the proponents of this scheme on the basis recommended last year when the bill was before the house, not for the purpose of promoting the scheme in the sense that the word "promoting" is usually used, but rather for the purpose of presenting the scheme to the people. Part of it is being used for that purpose and part of it for organization incidental to the scheme. The reason that made this peculiarly a problem for the dominion marketing board was the amount of misrepresentation that had taken place in the west, particularly by one section of the press. I would have preferred not to make this statement, but rather than give the impression that we were attempting to evade making a statement I have no choice but to say that the amount of misrepresentation in western Canada, particularly by one section of the press, made it impossible for the people in the west to understand the scheme. I happen to have before me to-night one example of this misrepresentation, and there are many. It is a special dispatch to the Winnipeg Free Press from its staff correspondent, Grant Dexter. The heading is, Announce Changes in Methods of Taking Marketing Plan Vote. It goes on to say:

> This plan is radically different from the one agreed to by the dominion marketing board when the sponsors of the scheme were at Ottawa early in January.

Now that is not merely a misrepresentation but an absolute misstatement of the facts. There was only one plan that was approved by the board, but the heading implies that different plans had been approved by the board and that changes had taken place in what some of the western press announced were plans approved by the board.

The problem of the dominion marketing board was this: When I, as minister having charge of the administration of this act, decided that a vote should be taken, the problem was to get a true statement before the people who were to vote upon the scheme. For that purpose copies of the scheme were sent out, and in this case in the same mail with the ballots. The board I believe considered for some time the engaging of a large staff to present the scheme to the people, because it would have taken a large staff to put this scheme before the people. I may say that I was consulted in that connection, and it was felt that if the board undertook to engage people to do this work there might be those who would try to give the impression that the government, with an election coming on, was selecting political speakers to go round the country and put this scheme before the people. Those who have been in contact with the board know that it is an absolutely non-political body, and it was therefore decided that the best way to put this matter before the people was to advance money to those who were the proponents of the scheme that was approved by the board, with conditions attached that the hire of halls and other out of pocket expenses were to be paid for. It was also set out that any person who wished to oppose the scheme was to be given exactly the same opportunity at meetings as those who were speaking in favour of the scheme. Certainly no criticism can be made that there was anything political about it with reference to the people who have been presenting this scheme, because I understand that those presenting the scheme have included Liberal organizers of quite large districts in the western provinces, the secretaries and high-up officials in the United Farmer organizations, as well as representatives of Conservative, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and in fact all political bodies. We have watched the situation as closely as we can, and any criticism that the board has received of statements being made that were not correct has at once been followed by telegrams to those responsible to check up to see if they had been correctly reported where the statements made in one or two instances were not in accordance with the facts, and the answer that we have received from each of these inquiries has been that the statements were not made as reported but that they had been misreported. An accounting is being asked for from the people who have received assistance.

I do not wish to review what I have said except to say that this is one of the problems that has given the board much concern because of misrepresentation. It was not simply a matter of difference of opinion, because no one has any quarrel with people just because of a difference of opinion. It was rather a misstatement of fact which could easily have been found out by those who made the statement to have been a misstatement.

I do wish to impress upon the hon. member for Weyburn that in view of the way his question was worded, had I stated to him the amount that had been advanced, my statement would have meant that that amount was advanced solely for the purpose of "promoting" the scheme, and that was not the purpose for which it was advanced. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Weyburn was a bit vexed that he did not receive the answer sooner, and the reason was the difficulty in answering the question as it was put. I shall be glad to send to the hon. member the conditions that were mailed to the people who did receive the money. I had not thought of this matter being brought up to-day although I had some of the information with me this afternoon.

Mr. POULIOT: We want it right now.

Mr. YOUNG: Nobody has suggested that any political speakers were being hired with this money to go out through the country. It was the minister who mentioned that Liberals and Conservatives were presenting this scheme, and we do not accuse the government of attempting to build up a political machine by this means. The question out there is this. A poultry scheme is put up and some of the poultry raisers of the west are in favour of it and some opposed. Nobody knows which party is in the majority. A vote is to be taken next week to find out. The proponents of the scheme, as the minister says, have been advanced moneys out of the public treasury to hire halls and speakers who are going throughout the country laying the scheme before the people and presenting its advantages. But those who are opposing it have no such opportunities. The minister says that they are free to go to the meetings. Yes, at their own expense, and to take whatever time the chairman might allow them, but they are not being advanced money as are the proponents of the scheme. I submit that when that is done by the government you cannot say anything else than that they are advancing money to promote the scheme.

Mr. VALLANCE: Was it the board that suggested that certain sums be given to this organization, or did the organization appeal to the board through the government asking for certain money?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The organization appealed to the board asking for money because authority had been provided in the act; and, as hon. members will recall, some discussion had taken place when the act was before the house as to the advisability of including in it provisions to advance money to assist any organization in putting forward schemes submitted by the producers.

Mr. VALLANCE: Now that we have that admission, would the minister be betraying any confidence or would he be telling us something that we are not entitled to know, if he informed us exactly how much money was advanced to this organization?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A sum of money was advanced to each of the three provinces: to Manitoba, $10,000; to Saskatchewan, $20,000 and to Alberta, $20,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: What were the names of the organizations?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The cooperative organizations that sponsored the scheme. The local boards, not yet being corporate bodies, could not receive the money.

Mr. VALLANCE: The organizations in these three provinces are responsible for holding these meetings and choosing those who are to put the propaganda across?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The sponsors of the scheme are to present it to the people.

Mr. VALLANCE: And they are responsible for the salaries?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If there is any salary for local speakers they pay it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Then there is to be an accounting by this group to the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand that those who are opposing the scheme in Saskatchewan have formed a voluntary association to fight it, and I understand also that they requested that they be given a similar grant to present their side of the case to the public. Is that so, and if it is, what answer did they receive?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is so, at least as regards one organization, the poultry protective association. One difficulty in which the board found themselves in this connection was that unless there was, so to speak, an official body that could state that that was the only money that would be required, it was felt that if they made the advance to this body a thousand requests might be received from other bodies who might indicate that they were in opposition, so that the board would be placed in an impossible position. They felt that the only way they could do what they wished to do—that is to say, to put the matter fairly before the people—was to advance money to those who had undertaken the work, as I have stated before, to place the case before the people. The money is taken out of this advance to pay for the charges of these halls, and every person is given an opportunity to make a statement.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand that the Saskatchewan poultry producers' protective association is the only organization in the province that is opposing the scheme. Has that been submitted to the minister?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is a very recent organization, and that I think is the only one from which the board has received an application. But there are other bodies opposing it; for example, the retail merchants association and the larger trade interests as well.

Mr. YOUNG: So that the position is this. The minister has refused a grant to the poultry protective association because it is feared that if they were granted a sum the retail merchants association might ask for a grant and the commercial interests might also make a request. Did this association make any other request besides the request for financial assistance?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not as far as I am aware—not this particular association.

Mr. YOUNG: Did they ask for the right to have scrutineers when the ballots were counted?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: Has that been granted?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, because neither side will have scrutineers. The whole machinery of taking the ballots and counting them is attended to by the officials of the department, and no scrutineers will be allowed either the sponsors of the scheme or those opposing it.

Mr. POULIOT: Was there a war-time elections act for hens?

Mr. SPENCER: Did the opponents of the scheme have ample opportunity to place their case before the marketing board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. SPENCER: May I ask a second question. Is the Saskatchewan protective association composed of producers or of retailers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think we have any information as to the people who comprise it. It is a recent organization.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister has said that the opponents of the scheme had ample opportunity to place their objections before the marketing board. Will he tell us when the scheme was approved and also how soon this association received copies of the scheme which were promised in the letter of January 2? They could not oppose it until they knew what it was.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The original scheme was published and had been before the public for months. Notices appeared in the press and it was felt that every opportunity had been given for representation. There had been practically unlimited time and hearings were held, and everything possible was done to receive any objections that had to be made. As a matter of fact, after the hearings had been held, and after I had returned—I had been out of Ottawa—it was felt that there were still those who perhaps did not understand the scheme or who had other objections to raise, and they were asked to come to Ottawa. A session of two days took place, the whole matter being gone into fully. I am of the opinion that these people were satisfied that they had been given every opportunity to present their objections, and everything was done to put the matter before them.

Mr. YOUNG: At this point I ought to put these questions on the record:

Mr. Young:

1. Did the dominion marketing board on January 2nd, write to F. J. G. Cunningham, representative of the Saskatchewan Egg and Poultry Producers Protective Association, to the effect that as soon as the order in council with reference to the marketing scheme for eggs and poultry had been passed the board would furnish him with copies of the approved scheme?

2. Were these copies ever forwarded, and if so, on what date?

3. On what date is the vote on the said scheme to be taken?

The answers are:

Mr. Weir (Melfort):

1. Yes.

2. No. No order in council has been passed approving the marketing scheme for eggs and poultry in Saskatchewan.

3. February 16, to February 23, inclusive.

So that this association wrote to the marketing board here asking for copies of the scheme so that they might understand it and be able to decide whether or not they were opposed to it. A letter was sent to them intimating that as soon as the order in council was passed approving the scheme, copies would be forwarded. These copies were never forwarded to them, and these people knew nothing about the matter until notice appeared in the post office stating that the vote would be taken at such and such a time.

They got into touch with the provincial Minister of Agriculture and asked him whether he had copies of the scheme. He said: no, he had not; he secured copies of them from poultry pool which apparently had copies of the scheme although nobody else had. I want to ask the minister candidly whether he thinks that is giving all interested parties a chance to understand the scheme and place their views before the public?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): First, as regards the question: Did the dominion board on January 2 write, and so forth, the answer to that was "yes," but the information that was asked for by Mr. F. J. G. Cunningham was whether, as soon as the order in council with reference to the marketing scheme for eggs and poultry had been passed, the board would furnish him with copies of the approved scheme. No order in council has been passed; this scheme has never been submitted for order in council; but it was felt that because notice of it was published in all the press—the press was filled with discussions of it in paper after paper, the time up to which persons might raise objections to the scheme was given—that was enough. It is perhaps regrettable that in the case of this individual a copy of the scheme was not mailed to him personally at the time, but I still maintain that I do not think he in any way suffered from lack of information as to what the scheme was or of ample time within which to submit any objection to it. We cannot yet supply him with a copy of the scheme as passed by order in council.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not think this man should be referred to as an individual; he was speaking on behalf of a very large association of people who are vitally interested in this matter. I would like to ask another question. The minister said that hearings were held. I presume they were held in Ottawa.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: Did the proponents of the scheme who came down to advance it have their expenses or any portion of them paid out of the public funds?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, they did not.

Mr. YOUNG: Will they be able to collect those expenses from any of the moneys advanced recently which the minister referred to a few minutes ago?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If the scheme is finally passed and approved, that question may then be given consideration.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. YOUNG: Then what chance would these others have had? The minister said that they had ample opportunity to come and make their case heard. Who would pay their expenses?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They would have to pay their own expenses.

Mr. YOUNG: Precisely.

Mr. VALLANCE: I would like to direct another question to the minister. When the hon. member for Weyburn was asking him with regard to taking this vote, the minister said that it would be taken by officials of the department. Are they permanent officials or officials appointed by the government from the department for that purpose?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Regular officials, permanent or temporary, but officials on the regular staff not appointed for this work alone.

Mr. VALLANCE: What particular function are they performing now?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are in the live stock branch, either the poultry division or other divisions. It was felt that they would be the fairest body to handle the vote.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister said that $20,000 was sent to Saskatchewan for the poultry pool. In connection with the men who were around the country promoting or talking about this part of the scheme to the poultry producers, are their wages paid out of this $20,000?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. DONNELLY: Who pays the wages of these people?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We do not know. We understand the majority of them are giving their time free.

Mr. DONNELLY: I understand they are receiving four dollars a day and all expenses.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not out of this money.

Mr. DONNELLY: The impression in the country is that this is to be taken out of the $20,000. That is why I asked the minister whether their expenses and wages are being taken from the $20,000 for the marketing scheme. Where do they get their wages and expenses?

Mr. WEIR Melfort): They do not get any wages. They do get travelling expenses and also money will be used to pay for halls, and so forth.

Mr. VALLANCE: Under this scheme what percentage of the producers have to vote in favour of it in order to make it operative?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is a responsibility that I have to take and it has not been felt advisable to set any definite figure.

Mr. YOUNG: What?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not yet. This is the first vote of this kind that has been taken, and when the result has been submitted and considered fully, the responsibility will rest on me to decide whether I think the scheme has been sufficiently supported to warrant putting it into effect, because no scheme could be operative unless it had a very considerable support. During the debate in the committee in the house on this act I stated that I felt there had to be a very considerable majority vote for this scheme, otherwise it would be useless to attempt to enforce it.

Mr. YOUNG: Does that mean that when the ballots are counted, the minister will decide what majority is required?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. TOTZKE: Will a certain proportion of the producers have to cast their vote at this election before the minister will accept it as a fair vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Substantial support. I am glad the hon. member has raised that question because it reveals one of the difficulties in deciding the matter and the reason why I felt it necessary to have the whole picture before me in order to decide whether the vote was sufficiently representative. Suppose only 8,000 out of all the producers in Canada voted for the scheme and 1,000 voted against it; there might be a question whether enough producers voted in favour of it. I would think not.

Mr. TOTZKE: That matter has not been decided?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. VENIOT: Since we are on the marketing board and the west has occupied most of the evening, perhaps I may be given a few minutes to discuss the interests of the maritime provinces. I have in my hand the Canada Gazette, extra edition, Ottawa, Friday, January 18, copy of an order in council touching the establishment of the eastern marketing board for potatoes, including Ontario, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. I find in this order in council under clause 3, subsection (b):

> The scheme has with virtual unanimity been endorsed by forty-eight meetings of producers and dealers held at central points throughout the producing areas of the four provinces.

I claim that the statement "the scheme has with virtual unanimity been endorsed" is a misstatement and should not appear in an order in council unless the minister has had an opportunity of satisfying himself as to its correctness. How many meetings were held in New Brunswick, when, and by whom?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As a matter of fact we are all out of order in discussing this question for the length of time we have; it does not come under publications. So far as the eastern Canada potato scheme is concerned; it comes under a different category. Each provincial government sent representatives to wait on the dominion marketing board with the sanction of the provincial governments behind them. One of the provisions made in the marketing act is that if representations are made by local boards from different provinces with the sanction of the provincial governments they may be considered as sufficiently representative, although in addition to that certain other representations were made.

Mr. VENIOT: What local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I might say in connection with this potato marketing board that when it came into operation the price of potatoes I believe was twenty cents a barrel, and even one of the papers that was most critical of the scheme and of the whole act admitted in its marketing news on at least one occasion that the advance in price had been due to the setting up of the board. I believe the market price of potatoes was fifty cents instead of twenty.

Mr. VENIOT: At destination, where they were sold, not at the point of shipment.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At the same destination

Mr. VENIOT: It is fifty-five cents for an eighty pound bag at Montreal, and there is no price fixed at the place of shipment. Your board has fixed no price, therefore you cannot claim the credit. But that is not the point I wish to raise. I shall discuss this more fully under the proper item, but I am asking this question now to give the minister time to get the information so that he can answer it when we come to it again. I feel that the minister cannot answer offhand and I am not pressing for a reply at the moment. But I want to know the number of meetings held in New Brunswick and where they were held, showing unanimity of potato growers in New Brunswick in regard to coming under this scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to get that information for the hon. member. I believe the committee will agree that there has been a fair amount of time spent in the discussion of this subject, which was not really in order, but for which I am as much to blame as anyone else, if not more. I move that we rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GOLDING: Before the committee rises I would ask the minister a question. There is $20,000 appropriated to Alberta, $20,000 to Saskatchewan and $10,000 to Manitoba. Has any sum at all been appropriated for Ontario? Or will there be?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Under similar circumstances, yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the committee rises I regret very much—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —that the minister has spoken so much about a "scheme," a scheme that smells like rotten eggs. We do not need any scheme; we want a policy, a policy to assist the farmers in the sale of their products. I will not insist upon saying any more about it, because I shall have other opportunities. But I wish to praise the minister for one thing, for the publication of a bulletin setting out the many uses of honey, which was issued after I had mentioned the decrease in home consumption of honey. He directed his staff to write a lot about the different uses of honey, and I congratulate him upon that. I do not say that I congratulate him upon his whole policy, but I think this was a wise move on his part, and that he should publish such pamphlets about every kind of food product grown by the farmers—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bury): I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that he is out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not insist. I am sorry that when I praise the minister he will not allow me to do so.

3. The values so established by the department in December, 1931, applied on importations from individual exporters in Germany only.

4. It is contrary to the established practice of the Department of National Revenue to give information which would disclose the business of an individual or corporation.

It is contrary to the established practice of the department to give information respecting the names of firms who furnish information to the department.

7. Investigations were made at the offices of several of the largest manufacturers of these goods in Germany who were exporting to Canada, to determine the proper value for duty as contemplated by the Customs Act.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

YOHO NATIONAL PARK MINING CLAIMS

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all correspondence, evidence, reports and agreements between the dominion government, or the Department of the Interior, and A. B. Trites et al, or Base Metals Mining Corporation Limited, relating to certain mining claims in the Yoho National Park during the period between the 5th day of February, 1934, and present date.

KOOTENAY PARK MINING CLAIMS

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all correspondence, evidence, reports and other papers and documents, passing between any member or official of the government, and any other parties, relating to the staking, recording, assessment work, or in any other way, to the Albion group mining claims, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6 in Kootenay Park, British Columbia, such return to cover the period from February 5, 1934, to date.

MURRAY RIVER, P.E.I., WHARF REPAIRS

Mr. MacLEAN:

For a copy of all correspondence, engineers' reports, and other documents, in connection with the repairs to the wharf at Murray River, King's county, Prince Edward Island, in 1934, together with a statement showing names and the amount paid in wages to each person employed, rate per hour, and the amount paid for timber and other materials; also the names and addresses of all parties from whom said materials were purchased.

MILITARY AND POLICE EXPENDITURES

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth) moved:

For a statement of all expenditures for military and police purposes since the present government came into office in August, 1930, including expenditures for the said purposes, actual or contemplated, under the Public Works Construction Act, 1934.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, if this is to include buildings that were erected for the convenience of the permanent force and the mounted police I think it should say so. So far as expenditures for military and police purposes under the Public Works Construction Act are concerned, they are covered entirely by the estimates. I think there is a clear distinction. If the motion is to include these buildings it should say so.

Mr. SANDERSON: I may say to the Prime Minister that I intended to include all the buildings.

Mr. BENNETT: The buildings are not for military purposes.

Motion agreed to.

STE. ANNE DE BEAUPRÉ, QUE., PUBLIC BUILDING

On the motion of Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, telegrams, and other documents, in the possession of the Department of Public Works, with reference to the construction of a public building at Ste. Anne de Beaupré, in the county of Montmorency, to the extent of $25,000 as mentioned in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, with reference to this motion and the following ones, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7, under the rulings of successive Speakers. they are not properly upon the paper. It has not been customary to ask for nor to supply information with respect to the current year's operations or as to the extent to which action may be taken. This motion, for instance, refers to the construction of a public building to the extent of $25,000, as mentioned in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936. We discussed this question some time ago in this house and we concluded so far as all governments are concerned that the circumstances under which the appropriations are made in the estimates should not be discussed in the house through the production of papers between the minister and his engineers and other people who make reports, because it is not possible to give effect to every report that is made by every engineer in every part of the country. Something may seem to be important and yet it may not be possible to supply the funds. I therefore suggest that these motions be reconstructed in order that they may be dealt with in the usual manner.

Mr. POULIOT: May I submit, on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and as a question of privilege, that the Prime Minister might wait until the hon. member for Charlevoix-Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) is back in the house to argue the matter with him.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the wish that these motions Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 stand in the meantime? Then the motions will stand.

Mr. BENNETT: No. 10 is a proper motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands in the meantime.

Motion (No. 2) stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN UNEMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

The house resumed from Thursday, February 14, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 8, to establish an unemployment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I do not propose to trespass at any length on the time of the house. The subject matter of the bill, the second reading of which I moved some days ago, is apparently well within the minds of most members of this house. There have been universal expressions of approval of the principle of a national unemployment insurance measure; that much at least can be gathered from the discussions that have taken place. No hon. member, so far as I could hear, except possibly one, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), indicated other than approval of the general principle that underlies the measure. In fact, only a very brief discussion took place in any part of this chamber with respect to the bill itself. There being therefore a universal approval of the measure, the question that was discussed at some length was whether or not it was within the competence of this parliament to enact this legislation.

It is an amazing thing that hon. gentlemen opposite should cheer so vigorously every possible reference to the impossibility of this parliament passing this legislation. Just why they should be so vigorous in their approval of every word that was said against it, and then suggest that they favoured it, I cannot understand; neither do I understand it yet. One would think that in dealing with a matter of this character every member of the house would be astute to discover some means by which the measure could be made operative if it is so much desired—and there has been universal expression of the desirability of enacting this legislation. I find it difficult therefore to understand just why this chorus of approval of any reference by any speaker to the impossibility of parliament passing this legislation should be coupled with such a vigorous expression of approval whenever hon. members said that they were in favour of it. What was desired in the way of leaving an impression on the public mind? That the legislation would be good if enacted by somebody else, but bad because it was suggested by this government?

The leader of the opposition suggested that there were reasons why he could not enact it during his term of office. None of these reasons had to do with constitutional grounds except one: the Senate stood in his way. That was the lion in the path. And yet I observe that that stalwart, Sir Allen Aylesworth, was one who voted against the old age pensions measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I spoke of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. BENNETT: If the Senate was the lion that blocked the pathway in those days, is it not now presumable that it would be in our power to enact the legislation if the Senate were agreeable? There were other reasons, financial in their character; the right hon. gentleman referred to difficulties he had encountered when he assumed office, and the difficulty in discharging the obligations that rested upon his party. Well, these difficulties having been removed, that lion having left the path, there was yet no evidence of any effort to introduce legislation of this kind. And the last reason, as to its being within the competence of the provincial legislatures to enact the legislation, being the explanation of the fact that his party took no steps in the matter is one which it is somewhat difficult to take seriously in view of the fact that no effort was made to amend the British North America Act which, according to statements now made, it would be very necessary to do if we were to be competent to enact this legislation.

I mention these things because it does appear very difficult to understand why in one breath hon. gentlemen should laud and approve the legislation, and in the next breath laud and approve every possible effort made to prevent its being enacted. The constitutional difficulties urged against the measure are somewhat complicated; they are complex. And yet I submit that in the end they are rather simple of understanding. Away back in 1928 when I was sitting where the right hon. gentleman now sits—I trust he will long enjoy that seat—his government introduced a measure involving the approval of a trade treaty with Spain, I think it was —I speak subject to correction as to the country—and I raised with the Solicitor General the question then as to how far under our constitution this parliament could go in infringing upon provincial rights in the making of treaties. It will be within the memory of this house that when the sockeye salmon treaty was ratified by this parliament—not having yet been ratified by the Senate of the United States—I pointed out that many of the clauses of that treaty impinged upon provincial rights; and it will be recalled that the question as to how far we might go in interfering with the exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures, by reason of the making of a trade agreement or treaty with a foreign country, was a matter about which we had no definite decision. I remember very distinctly directing attention to it, because I thought it was rather important to arrive at some conclusion with respect to the question, and I find that on April 16, 1928, I made this statement:

> That is the problem to which I direct attention, that and none other. I am not expressing beyond the casual arguments that occur to me any considered and careful opinion, because I have not had the time to look up the authorities, and I am speaking solely from memory with respect to them, but with respect to the last authority I have very peculiar knowledge, and if it follows the Tennant and the Union bank principle, that any community which is not a sovereign state may negotiate a treaty the effect of which is to deprive one of the component provinces which has exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the matters therein mentioned of the powers conferred upon it, that is a problem not yet settled, and I submit it to the committee for the purpose of engaging the attention of the law officers of the crown.

I confess I had no clear opinion with respect to that matter. I discussed it with members of the legal profession and with judges in various parts of the empire, and it seemed to be a question which was open for decision and conclusion by the court of last resort whenever a case involving the principle should reach that tribunal. And it was not until 1931 that the matter finally came up for decision.

It will be remembered that the so-called aeronautic case was one that involved an agreement made between Canada, as part of the British empire, and other parts of the world. It will be remembered that the provisions of the statute passed by this parliament are very, very detailed, embracing almost every activity in connection with aeronautics. It was contended on behalf of the provinces that that legislation was beyond our competence; it was beyond the competence of parliament because it interfered with property and civil rights. The flying of aircraft from the standpoint of caring for crown timber, crown timber lands, with respect to landing, the acquisition of landing sites and matters of that kind, were all said to be solely within the jurisdiction of the provinces and wholly beyond the competence of parliament to enact legislation with respect to them.

When the case reached the privy council the decision was that, having regard to section 132 of the British North America Act, which has been alluded to, Canada as part of the British empire was bound by obligations incurred in the agreement to which reference had been made, and it was therefore declared that the statute was within the competence of parliament. Now that settles distinctly one problem and only one, as has been pointed out. The problem that has been settled is the problem as to the extent to which this parliament can legislate when a treaty is made by the British empire, of which Canada is a part, and to which it is a party, dealing with matters that affect this dominion; and whether or not the rights of the provinces are adversely affected is not a question for consideration. For the supreme power of this parliament to deal with these matters makes it not only necessary but imperative that the powers of the provinces under section 92 shall yield to the power of this parliament.

We thus have settled beyond peradventure or doubt a principle that was acted upon by hon. gentlemen opposite when in office—acted upon with respect to treaties and trade agreements with foreign countries, Spain, Czechoslovakia and other countries—the halibut treaty for example—and the very aeronautic statute itself, which dealt with obligations incurred by the dominion and which were at variance with the exercise of its powers exclusively by the legislatures of the provinces. So let us say that No. 1 is settled: that if there is an agreement outstanding within the provisions of section 132 of the British North America Act, which I will not trouble to read again, this parliament has supreme and complete authority to deal with the matter, and not only has the power but has exercised that power; and in consequence of the exercising of the power we have the judicial decision to which I have referred, which settles, it seems to me for all time, the question of our jurisdiction in connection with such matters.

I shall not now refer, because I did so some days ago, to the reasons given by the Lord Chancellor in delivering the opinion of the judicial committee of the privy council. He summarized in four propositions the powers of the legislatures and of this parliament. It suffices to say that no one within sound of my voice on either side of the house will, I think, challenge the proposition that where there has been an agreement, where the agreement is made by Canada under a treaty or agreement as a part of the British empire with any foreign state of authority, then the exclusive powers of the provinces must yield to the dominant power of parliament to deal with the agreement in every phase, in all of its ramifications and implications.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While the Prime Minister is touching upon the Lord Chancellor's decision, will he make a reference to the particular part of the Lord Chancellor's decision which he omitted in his original address and which the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) dealt with in his?

Mr. BENNETT: I intended to deal with that because it seemed to be so absurd for the ex-Minister of Justice to refer to it. I could not understand why he went out of his way to mention it. The rights of minorities are rights with respect to language, religion and one other matter that comes within the authority of both the provinces and the dominion, namely education. It had nothing whatever to do with this matter. There are no minorities when you come to consider the question of jurisdiction with respect to matters of this kind because the majority rule in parliament prevails. It is not a question of the minority in a province and when the hon. gentleman a few days ago mentioned the point, I confess I could not understand why he was doing so except by reason of his usual endeavour to drag something of that sort into every debate in which he participates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In the absence of the ex-Minister of Justice, may I give my right hon. friend what I think was the ex-minister's reason? It was in that part of the judgment which read:

> The process of interpretation as the years go on ought not to be allowed to dim or to whittle down the provisions of the original contract upon which the federation was founded.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

> . . . nor is it legitimate that any judicial construction of the provisions of sections 91 and 92 should enforce a new and a different contract upon the federating bodies.

Mr. BENNETT: That was with respect to the rights of minorities. That was what the Lord Chancellor was dealing with and the rights of minorities under the constitution are with respect to religion, language and education. Those observations had nothing whatever to do with the question of the jurisdiction of parliament as distinct from that of the legislatures. It had to do with the question of an endeavour on the part of the federal power to whittle down the contract between the provinces and the dominion. I have heard the right hon. gentleman doubt—and I have agreed with him—as to whether it can be said that the British North America Act is wholly a contract in the sense in which that term is used. The British North America Act as it now stands is somewhat different from the resolutions upon which it is based. But it is a statute of the imperial parliament accepted by the people of Canada and has become their constitution. When we speak of the rights of minorities we speak of the rights of minorities as maintained to them by the statutes of Quebec and maintained to minorities in other parts of Canada, with respect to language as defined by an act and with respect to education having its maximum expression in what took place in the house in the year 1896.

Let us leave that proposition which I think all will agree has been established not only by competent authority but by reason, for if the British empire made a contract on behalf of Canada and Canada signed her name to that contract, obviously the draughtsman of the British North America Act when he prepared section 132 had in mind that the power to give effect to any obligation thus assumed should rest in the dominion parliament and not in a combination of the legislatures. It would be idle of course to say that this community speaking as a whole could enforce its views or maintain its obligations by each of the provinces acting even in concert, because the power is the federal power; the authority is the central authority, the national representative of the life of Canada, namely the dominion parliament.

Leaving the first proposition therefore as being firmly and clearly established, we now proceed to the second proposition whether there is within the British North America Act sufficient authority and power conferred upon this parliament to enact an unemployment contributory insurance act. I submit there is and I shall give my reasons briefly. First, a contributory insurance act is a direct taxation act and as direct taxation only is given to the provinces and taxation by any mode or form is given to the dominion, it follows that if you apply a simple test the jurisdiction must rest with the dominion. Let us apply that test. Could any province pass the bill that is now before the house? That is the first test. Could any province enact that measure? Could any province provide that there should be a contribution by the employer, the employee and the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course not. Therefore, if it is a national measure there is only one power, one authority, that can divert moneys from the treasury of Canada for the purpose of unemployment insurance, and that legislature is the dominion parliament.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What case are you discussing?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is not quite so familiar with the constitution as perhaps he should be. I shall point out to him the reasons. Let us apply this test. Here is a bill that purports to take from employer A twenty cents or twenty-one cents a week, to take from employee B twenty-one cents a week and from the treasury of Canada sufficient money to maintain the administration plus one-fifth of the joint contributions of A and B. Then it is admitted that no provincial legislature could pass that statute. It must further be admitted that no combination of legislatures could pass that statute. All the provinces in Canada uniting together could not pass that statute. Therefore there must reside somewhere the power so to do and that power rests with this parliament.

Let us look at what happened in British Columbia. In 1932 the British Columbia legislature was confronted with this very state of facts: They had competition in connection with the milk business and they found great difficulty in being able to deal with it. It was more profitable to dairy farmers in that province to sell their milk in a fluid form than to sell the products manufactured from it, so the market for fluid milk became glutted. On that state of facts the British Columbia legislature passed the Dairy Products Sales Adjustment Act in 1929, which was amended the next year and again amended the succeeding year, authorizing the appointment of an adjustment committee in any district in which the dairy farmers petitioned for one. Where a committee was appointed the farmers had to make returns to it, and a farmer selling fluid milk had to pay to the committee a levy assessed according to the quantity he had sold; the total of these levies, which together made up the difference in value of the milk disposed of in the two forms, was to be apportioned by the committee among the farmers who had sold milk products. The expenses of the committee were to be met by further levy on the farmers. Both levies were recoverable as debts.

It will be observed that in the bill before the house it is provided that the commission to be set up under the statute shall have power to obtain from the employer and from the employee given sums per week for the purposes of the measure, the contributions of the dominion being added thereto.

In the dairy case it was held:

That both levies were taxes, and, as they would tend to affect the price of commodities, they were indirect taxes, and the act was therefore ultra vires the province having regard to section 91, head 3, and section 92, head 2, of the British North America Act, 1867; it was unnecessary to determine whether the act was invalid also under s. 91, head 2, as being for the regulation of trade and commerce. The act was not in relation to agriculture so as to be within s. 95.

Now there you have the decision of the privy council, that this levy, which was made by a provincial board, was beyond the power of the province to authorize. Inasmuch therefore as the power must reside either in the province or in the dominion, and the privy council said it does not reside in the province it must therefore reside in this parliament, as it does. There can be no doubt as to the way that matter has been put by the privy council. I am not going to address a technical argument to the house, I merely point out that they held that it was a tax, although indirect, because it was a levy against the producers of milk for the purpose of creating a fund which fund should be available for the purpose of equalizing prices to milk producers.

This legislation imposes a charge against employer and employees with a contribution from the state to create a fund from which payments are to be made as provided by the bill. Now as between direct and indirect taxes the privy council for long years have laid down certain principles which govern. They laid down in the case of Bank of Toronto v. Land a certain rule adopting the language of John Stuart Mill in part as being the correct definition of the difference between direct and indirect taxation. The tax is indirect if it would be passed on and was not a charge that the individual paid and could not pass along. So with respect to this milk case from British Columbia the judicial committee held that it was an indirect tax. Now direct taxation is the exclusive power of the provinces but taxation by any form or method is the exclusive power of this dominion. Therefore the court held in the Crystal Dairy case that the legislation of the province of British Columbia was invalid because it endeavoured to create a fund through the imposition of an impost that was a tax, an indirect tax, and therefore invalid and within the jurisdiction of this parliament and not that of the province.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. BENNETT: No. Next, sir, may I direct attention to the fact that in that very case attention was directed by the judgment to trade and commerce. I therefore apply the next test, a very simple test; could any legislature regulate interprovincial trade under our constitution? Could any legislature in any way, shape or form, deal with an enterprise that had branches employing say fifty people in Saskatchewan and sixty people in Alberta and one hundred in Manitoba? Interprovincial trade under our constitution is to be free and untrammelled with respect to customs. The constitution also contemplates that it shall be free and untrammelled with respect to every measure that comes within the jurisdiction of this parliament.

Mr. POULIOT: What about the Marketing Act?

Mr. BENNETT: Applying that test to the validity of any legislation passed by a province to deal with interprovincial trade, what must the answer be? The answer surely must be in the negative. Neither Ontario nor Quebec nor any other province can undertake to deal with or regulate trade between provinces. If I heard aright the observations that were made regarding this measure from hon. gentlemen opposite—and I think they all could be contained in two paragraphs—the position is this, that it is highly desirable in the national interest that we should have an unemployment insurance measure, in the interest of trade itself, for it is undesirable that there should be attempts to attract capital to one province rather than another by saying: There they have unemployment insurance, and here we have not; it is undesirable that in one part of Canada we should have one provision of law prevail and in another part shall not have it. Therefore common agreement was expressed in this house that we should have a measure that at least was similar throughout the country in order that there might be freedom of interprovincial trade, uncontrolled as far as legislation is concerned. And legislation to treat or touch upon trade and commerce between two provinces is beyond the jurisdiction of a provincial legislature, it is solely within the power of this parliament.

The words trade and commerce have had a restricted meaning placed upon them, beginning with Citizens Insurance Company v. Parsons, but the process of interpretation has broadened during the years, and the meaning that attaches to them, as suggested in the very Crystal Dairy case to which I referred, is that there must be no interference with trade and commerce by legislation of this character which would be beyond the competence of the provincial legislature.

Now let us come to the third test. It is this. When at Paris we accepted the provisions for the League of Nations it will be recalled that a declaration was made that it was desirable in the interest not only of ourselves but internationally that we should deal with labour in the manner indicated in that treaty. I now propound this third test; Is it possible for any province to deal with international trade? Is it competent for any province to restrict the freedom of international trade? Shall this province do this and another do otherwise? That subject lies solely within the jurisdiction of this parliament. The whole problem of international trade is more or less directly involved with the question of unemployment insurance, because if one province enacts such a provision, competing with another that does not, the problem of exports and imports and international trade in the broad sense in which those words were used in the treaty of Versailles I think would be affected.

You come then to another test, which was applied in a case as old as 1897, in which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) was directly interested. The Grand Trunk Railway Company had a provision by which each of its employees contracted to free the company from liability in case of injury; that is the employee signed a contract whereby he waived his right if injured in the service of the company to claim damages from the company for the injury he sustained. Then the Railway Act was amended to provide that a railway company could not do that; that the Grand Trunk Railway Company should not be permitted to ask its employees to contract themselves out of the right to claim against the company for damages in case of injury. Well, now there was a clear interference with property and civil rights. There are few things perhaps more interesting than to observe the ease with which we sometimes seize upon words without realizing the effect of them as they have been judicially construed. Frequently both lawyers and laymen are found using words in the sense in which we use them colloquially, forgetting that they have had a meaning attached to them by interpretation by the courts. Property and civil rights include contracts, and all matters of that kind are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislatures. But there has hardly been a statute passed in this country that has not impinged upon property and civil rights. No taxing measure enacted but in some sense affects property and civil rights. In this case to which I refer the Railway Act was held to be valid, and the power exercised when this parliament took from the Grand Trunk Railway Company the right to ask its employees to contract themselves out of a right to bring an action against their employer, the judicial committee held was solely within the jurisdiction of parliament. It is one of the interesting cases that one reads. As I recall it, the railway company was defeated by the language of its own factum. The railway company was the appellant and it alleged in the factum filed with the court that if they were not allowed to make contracts by which their servants could not sue them for damages suffered in the course of their employment it might create a situation of laxness in the service and the railway company would find itself in very difficult positions. Said their lordships of the privy council, "That ends the case, because that is an admission that this very legislation in its essence is railway legislation." What is the essence of the legislation before this house? It is not railway legislation, but it is legislation to collect a fund of money—which interferes with property and civil rights—for distribution to known persons on the happening of given events under specified contingencies.

Then what about it? Is that not conclusive? If the language used by the privy council were applied to this case it would indeed be conclusive, dealing with it from the standpoint of the power of taxation or from the standpoint of trade and commerce. But there is even a larger sense in which this legislation should be dealt with, and it is that ground to which I now desire briefly to refer, the third part of the argument which I desire to make to this house. In the radio case, which was argued after the argument and before the judgment in the aeronautics case, the privy council decided that the agreement or treaty—and keep in mind the words "treaty" and "agreement", because my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred to it as a treaty but subsequently amended his language, because it was not a treaty but merely a convention—between other countries and Canada involved obligations on our part that had nothing at all to do with section 132, that did not in any sense touch section 132. Canada did not sign them or create the obligations or assume the responsibilities as part of the British empire, but assumed them on her own, her own nationality, her own personality, her own position in the world. Canada signed this convention by which she bound herself with Mexico and other countries to do and perform certain things. If the argument ever could be advanced successfully in any court, with power and with effect, it was with respect to radio.

Listen to the argument made at that time. It was that this interferes with property and civil rights in the provinces, as it does. My radio set is my property. The acquisition of it involves a contract to purchase. My setting it up involves no exercise of power with respect to the dominion. It is a matter of property and civil rights, it may be said. There yonder is the system by which we send out, by the power of electricity, these voice sounds that go to other parts of the world, but we could limit that power so that those sounds need not go so far; we could limit them to lesser distances. Then you come to the question of reception, and you ask what the dominion has to do with that. This it has to do with it, that broadly speaking there can be no reception in one province that does not in some way either travel to or pass through another province or a foreign country. So when the judicial committee had to consider the matter finally they determined what? They determined that radio was a matter that, by reason of the very meaning of it, had assumed such proportions that the jurisdiction of this parliament was to be found if necessary within the residual powers of peace, order and good government. Lord Dunedin put it on that basis, if need be, and he referred to the aeronautics case. The other evening, when the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) was referring to the power of the dominion parliament to interfere with specified exclusive points of jurisdiction mentioned in section 92 he obviously either overlooked or forgot the later decisions which decided clearly that if need be these broad residual powers expressed in the words peace, order and good government, may negative the exercise of the exclusive powers which, under section 92, are vested in the provincial legislatures. So we have the radio case, which decided that it is within the jurisdiction of this parliament, and not within the jurisdiction of any legislature, to deal with these matters.

Ah, but it went further, and it is that point to which I direct the attention of my hon. friends opposite in particular. It went much further. I was rather surprised that they should belittle the extent to which it goes, because there was a decision that completely justified the observations, for instance, made by the right hon. gentleman opposite when we were dealing with treaties. He pointed out that in 1867 no one was thinking of the treaty power. The right hon. gentleman said:

> There is just one point with regard to what my hon. friend has said. I agree with him that in negotiating any treaty the federal government should have the utmost regard for all matters reserved to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, but I think my hon. friend will agree that as to the dominion and the empire as a whole, at the time the British North America Act was drafted the position with respect to treaty-making powers was not as clear as it is to-day. It is now conceded with respect to matters of primary or exclusive concern to the dominion that we have the full right to negotiate, sign and ratify a treaty which formerly might have been held to belong to the British empire as a whole. The powers of this parliament with regard to a treaty such as we are now discussing are complete in all particulars, and are not affected by the wording of the section as it appears.

That was the observation made by the right hon, gentleman in 1928, when we were discussing in the most friendly way the relative jurisdiction of this new country, exercising new powers. As Lord Dunedin pointed out in 1932, in his judgment in the radio case, when the British North America Act was being drafted in 1867 one could not have in contemplation the exercise of the treaty power now being exercised by this dominion. He went further and said that now, under the statute of Westminster, whatever difficulties may have been experienced in the past it is now clear that the parliament of Canada has the power to deal with those matters. And if, in dealing with them, either under peace, order and good government or under the exclusive power of trade and commerce, it is necessary to impinge upon, to lessen or restrict the rights of provinces, those rights must fall for, as was pointed out by Lord Dunedin, it is clear that the great body of Canadians cannot speak through the voices of the provinces, whether they speak in unity or not; it is this parliament that speaks for and represents the people of Canada; it is this parliament, representing all the people of Canada, and not the voice of the provinces united in terms of resolutions, whether or not they agree. It is not a majority of all the provinces that constitutes jurisdiction. With respect to national matters jurisdiction is found in this parliament.

exercising all the powers that can be exercised in the fullness of the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the act of 1867, and more by the decisions that have grown up under it and still more by the customs and the practices that have grown up as well. So that applying the last test I have mentioned to this legislation I say it must be agreed that in all points it falls solely within the jurisdiction of the parliament in Canada.

Now let me go further. The main part of the arguments against this legislation had to do with opinions expressed by people from time to time, including opinions of my own that were quoted. As one of the hon. gentleman was proceeding, two cases came to my mind. I quite understand members of this chamber who are not lawyers wondering what it is all about, quoting something one man thought yesterday and something else he thinks to-day. Law is a progressive science; there is no science more so, and I am going to give two illustrations that happened in my own practice. I do so because it happens that I am able to speak with authority with respect to them. In the early thirties in the province of Ontario they passed a law dealing with chattel mortgages and the rights of those who purchased after a chattel mortgage had not been renewed. That legislation was re-enacted with some slight variations in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. About 1925, I think, I was acting as solicitor for a client who came in and said, "We failed to file the renewal statement of our mortgage, and someone else purchased the property. Have we a right to recover from him the price, on the ground that he knew the mortgage was there and that the property had been mortgaged?" The decision of one judge in Alberta was that he had no right. The decision of one judge in Saskatchewan, and ultimately of the appellate court of that province, was that he had no right. Then came the province of Manitoba, in which a full court decided he had no right. I thought that was bad law. I advised that we go ahead with the action. The chief justice decided in our favour; the appellate division decided against us. They felt bound by the decisions. I then went to the Supreme Court of Canada, and during the progress of the argument one of the learned judges said, "The judges of Ontario have decided this and we are very proud of our judges. They have decided adversely to the appellant's position. It is a very bad thing to change law that has been in force in the maritimes and in the west for sixty-five years."

[Mr. Bennett.]

Nevertheless, largely governed by a suggestion made to me by a younger associate with whom I discussed the case we pressed the appellant's case and the Supreme Court of Canada decided we were right. The result was that there was overruled, and made bad law, law which had prevailed for years.

I have used that to illustrate the point I desire to bring to the attention of the house, namely that when opinions are expressed by counsel they express those opinions because of one of two reasons, either that such and such is the law by decisions, or that "this should be the law, as I read the decisions." The client determines then as to whether or not he is willing the second course should be pursued. In the first instance you give your opinion that the decisions are settled beyond all question, and that is the end of it. In the other case you say, "I think these decisions are unsound"—and you press your case before the courts.

I had another case which was much more difficult, a case the memories of which still linger in the courts. For a few months I was Minister of Justice in this country, and during that time there came before me the necessity for appointing judges, under a statute that had recently been passed by the legislature of Alberta. Reading the statute I came to the conclusion that I had a complete and unfettered right to make such recommendations as I thought desirable. I proceeded to do so. I changed the positions of two of the judges, one being the chief justice of the trial division and the other the chief justice of the appellate division. I changed their former positions. The statement was made that my action was illegal, and when we went out of office the then Minister of Justice stated a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada. The supreme court, divided, but was of the opinion that the action was illegal. I then obtained leave from the privy council to appeal, and during the hot days of July we argued the case. In October of that year the privy council decided that we were right.

I believe I have illustrated clearly the point I wish to make here. I have no hesitation in saying to this house that with respect to this matter I gave it careful and, shall I say, continuous consideration when I concluded that we had to deal with it as a concrete matter.

Then, I should like to say a few words with respect to one other phase of the subject. I wrote a letter in September last. Of course I did. I wrote a letter inviting the premiers of this country to come here to discuss this question. It is said I referred to their exclusive jurisdiction. So I did, for that is the position they had taken. That is the position which they had taken—excepting one of them—with us on former occasions. The question which was to be considered was the very question which the ex-Minister of Justice read. My statement of it did not say that was my view. It was an indication of what we had to discuss. I have still to hold that one's views must be modified by the circumstances and facts of each particular case which comes before him, when he is dealing with a question of law. The facts were as the letter stated. The Prime Minister stated their positions as they had put them—and as I suppose some will continue to put them. Yet, when the province of Ontario presented its case before the privy council, through its deputy attorney general, it presented a view which was quite the opposite to that which was presented by some of the other provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What case was that?

Mr. BENNETT: The case in which the question of a convention came up, in which the late Mr. Bayly, acting as deputy attorney general for the province of Ontario stated his position that when a convention made by the Dominion of Canada was ratified, then the dominion had complete and absolute jurisdiction with respect to it. That is the position I desire to try to make clear to this house.

The legislation which is submitted to parliament is legislation which we believe to be constitutional, for the reasons which I have given. Then, further, I had almost forgotten to mention that we have been asked why we did not ask for the ratification of a convention passed in Geneva in 1934. The only reason is this, that the convention does not come into force—because it was drafted only in June 1934—it does not come into force until twelve months after two countries have ratified it. Therefore, so far as we are concerned, we would be dealing with a convention which was not in force. The order does not expire until June, 1935. The terms of the convention itself are those which make provision for a unitary state, but provide also for the enactment of legislation with respect to three matters of social concern. But there was another reason, namely the difficulty of separating insurance from the other branches of the convention, and the undesirability of leaving any doubt with respect to the constitutionality of the statute, upon the grounds to which I have referred.

I can only say that there are other grounds to which I might refer. There are numerous other authorities which I could draw to the attention of hon. members in this house but I believe by doing so I would be serving no useful purpose. Legal decisions are constantly expanding, in view of the various implications and various sets of facts. One set of facts involves one decision; another set of facts involves another decision. The principles that govern are eternal, but the application of those principles is as variable as time itself. There have been so many illustrations of that point I shall not do more than bring to the attention of hon. members one more outstanding case in which property and civil rights was summarily dealt with, namely that connected with the Scott Act. There you had this parliament legislating in the smallest detail under the Canada Temperance Act, known as the Scott Act. Well, the privy council held it was intra vires of the power of this parliament, and a proper exercise of its powers. Some years later we find the McCarthy Act, in which Mr. McCarthy endeavoured to enact a statute which would deal with the licensing in the hands of the dominion. When it was referred to the privy council they decided it was ultra vires and not within the powers of this parliament. So you have commencing away back many years ago, with the King v. Russell, which came from the city of Fredericton, down to to-day, an ever expanding body of law, the application and interpretations of which have been modified by the conditions under which we live, expanding at times, and contracting at times. The change has been always constant in this respect, however, that the supremacy of the central power must continue, even though provincial rights for the moment may be in the ascendency. There has always been, in every decision of the supreme court or the privy council, the realization that the voice of Canada is the voice of this parliament, and not the collective voices of its provinces. When we consider, as we must, that the collective legislatures could not enact this legislation—could not enact it—when we consider that they could not by any possibility secure a contribution from the dominion treasury, and could not by any possible stretch of their powers enact taxation legislation by collecting contributions and placing them in a pool so that the sum might be made available for the unemployed; when you go farther and realize and admit, as you must, that neither interprovincial nor external trade can be affected by a provincial act, and when you go farther and realize that property and civil rights must yield to peace order and good government, and to trade and commerce, wherever it becomes essential that the supremacy of the central power must be maintained with respect to national matters —and it is apparent that unemployment insurance must be a national matter—then I submit we must realize that this legislation is within the competency of this parliament. Under that emergency and under those conditions I submit to this house that this legislation is wholly within its power.

I realize of course the uncertainties of opinions expressed by counsel learned in the law. Only some few years ago an ex-chief justice of this country standing in this chamber expressed an opinion with certainty as to the constitutionality of the method of construction to be adopted in connection with the Calgary and Edmonton land subsidies. The courts of this country had held that mines and minerals did not pass under the grant made to the railway company, and yet the privy council a few days after that very statement reversed the decision of the court and held that the observations thus made by the law officers of the crown were incorrect. I know the uncertainties; I realize them and I appreciate them, but all I can say is that I believe that men trained in the law who take the trouble to study all the decisions, and realizing the purpose for which this legislation is now offered to this house and the necessity of having it extended to every part of the dominion, and the necessity of having uniform legislation so that benefits of the same character may be conferred alike upon the people of British Columbia and Nova Scotia, and realizing that the peace, order and good government of this country should be maintained by the paramount authority of this parliament, will conclude that the legislation is within our jurisdiction.

Just one other remark. The right hon. gentleman has said that this legislation either consciously or unconsciously was intended to deceive and delude those for whose benefit it is being enacted. I think upon reconsideration he will conclude that that is not correct. He says that they have asked for bread and they are offered a stone. I propose, Mr. Speaker, to ask this parliament to vote, whether or not those who allege that this is a stone are prepared to associate with us on this side of the house, and to declare that this is bread, and very solid bread too.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for l'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Séguin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the second reading of this bill.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Ferland). Had I voted, I would have voted for the second reading of this bill.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Toronto Northeast (Mr. Baker). Had I voted, I would have voted for the second reading of this bill.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): I was paired with the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Girouard). Had I voted, I would have voted for the second reading of this bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Bennett moves that the house go into committee on the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the motion is carried, may I give some explanation about my vote.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot give an explanation on this motion; the motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. POULIOT: In a Canadian Press dispatch published in the morning papers to-day I read that the right hon. the Prime Minister said in New York on Saturday last that reform policies without international trade might be of little use. This, sir, is the first reason why I would have voted against the bill, because so long as our international trade is blocked by high tariff walls, this so-called social legislation is of no use, although I am in favour in principle, as my hon. friend from Hochelaga said, of unemployment insurance. That is my first point.

My second point is again from a quotation from a speech delivered not long ago in this house by the Prime Minister. He said last week that this is not a relief measure; thus it will bring no help to the hundreds of thousands who are actually unemployed. It is just an insurance measure which will bring no assistance to those who are now unemployed, it cannot be called a relief measure, even the Prime Minister did not call it so. That is the second reason why I would have voted against it.

There is another reason why I would have voted against the bill although I am in favour of the principle of unemployment insurance. As it is submitted now to this house it is perfectly useless. Let us read section 132 of the British North America Act:

> The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof as part of the British Empire towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

At the time this provision was enacted Canada was not yet free to sign her own treaties. Treaties were voted upon by the parliament of Canada but they were signed by the representatives of Great Britain. For the first time a few years ago the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), then Minister of Marine, signed the halibut treaty as representative of Canada; it was the first step in that direction. But to understand the meaning of section 132 of the British North America Act we must go back to the time when it was passed. Canada did not then enjoy the freedom it does now under the statute of Westminster. I heard the Prime Minister a moment ago say that the supremacy of the central power will be recognized by the courts. A distinction should here be made. This parliament is supreme within the bounds of its jurisdiction, as the provincial legislatures are also supreme within the bounds of their own jurisdiction. There is a supremacy in each domain. There are certain things that this parliament alone can do, and there are other things that the provinces alone can do.

I admit that since this government has taken office there has been quite a mix up in the jurisdiction, either federal or provincial, in this country. But if we interpret this legislation from a strictly legal point of view, we have to consider sections 91 and 92 which give exclusive jurisdiction on the one hand to this parliament and on the other to the provincial legislatures. I am not going to repeat what has been said by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), but the point that is to be made in this regard is that it is not because a convention has been signed by Canada that the provinces are necessarily bound by it. We have the proof of this in the fact that the previous government did not take and would not have taken action on that, as was said by our leader, without consulting the provinces. The convention was signed on behalf of Canada subject to the approval of the provinces, without which approval no legislation such as that before the house now is possible. After having made a careful study of the constitution of this country and of the jurisprudence which interprets it, I have come to the conclusion that no tribunal will declare that the legislation which is now submitted to us is intra vires. Any judge, free from political affiliation, with a free mind, will hold that this legislation is ultra vires of this parliament.

Therefore, following the argument of the Prime Minister, let us take A, the employer, and B, the employee; each one of them pays so much a week during forty weeks for this unemployment insurance. Does the right hon. gentleman think for a moment all the manufacturers and employers in Canada will abide by his word when he says: Parliament is supreme and we are empowered to pass any legislation we wish, even contrary to the constitution. This legislation will surely be brought before the courts and there is no court that will declare it intra vires. But in the meantime we shall have elections and the Prime Minister, his colleagues, his supporters and his ambassadors will say: This is what we have done for the unemployed; we have given you unemployment insurance. Forty weeks! In the meantime we shall have elections. For the time this legislation will be approved by the Governor General until the election day, canvassing will have been done throughout the country. After the legislation is declared ultra vires by the courts, the Prime Minister, who will then be leader of the opposition if he succeeds in being elected in his constituency will say: This is not my fault; the judiciary have given a wrong interpretation to my legislation; but I did my best; I submitted it to the House of Commons; it was passed by the house and by the Senate and approved by the Governor General; I can do no more; it is not my fault. In the meantime it will be used as an argument for canvassing people who are in distress. The government will tell them: Get a job for forty weeks and then you will have a substantial income that will be paid to you, part by the exchequer of Canada, part by yourselves and part by the employer.

I do not believe in that sort of thing. The Prime Minister said somewhere in Montreal or over the radio: the old order is gone. This is not a new order; it is the old insurance scheme. The only difference is that it is made compulsory by the government. This is the same old story. The government which was in the farming business with the marketing act is now in the insurance business. There is no trade that is not taken on by these masqueraders. Formerly they were farmers, growing different products under the marketing act and now they are insurance agents. They tell us seriously: It is a good thing. Can we believe them?

I have another reason for opposing this legislation and it is that the Prime Minister said that Canada had reached the limit of her credit. Yet people are now going to be taxed anew for this scheme which will not be for the benefit of the actually unemployed. Had such a scheme been presented to the house in the special session of 1930 when the tariff was raised and when the Prime Minister said: We have received a promise from the employers that they will not reduce their staffs and will pay better wages with an increase in the tariff; had this social legislation, this unemployment insurance scheme been presented at that time I would perhaps have voted for it because I foresaw the ill results of the increase in tariffs. I am the freer to declare myself against this legislation because, as I have already said, at the special session of 1930 when Mr. Speaker asked the house whether the motion of the Prime Minister to increase tariffs was approved, I said: On division. I was perhaps not alone; may be one or two other members on my side said the same thing. I contend I am right now when I declare myself strongly against it. Sir, this is another instance of bluff, humbug and mirage. The government are not serious, they are angling for votes and this is bait. I look upon it as bait and I do not swallow it.

The Prime Minister mentioned a judgment of the Privy council in the Crystal Dairy case, in which there was a reference to John Stuart Mill and his views about direct and indirect taxation. At page 415 of vol. 2 of his Principles of Political Economy—a very good book which I highly recommend to members of the government—it is said that:

> Taxes are either direct or indirect. A direct tax is one which is demanded from the very persons who it is intended or desired should pay it. Indirect taxes are those which are demanded from one person in the expectation and intention that he shall indemnify himself at the expense of another; such as the excise or customs.

I wonder if that is the quotation approved by the privy council. It is a very clear distinction. May I submit that the legislation with regard to taxation has been most embarrassing for many years, because it has been a cause of widespread confusion. What I would ask of the Prime Minister and his colleagues is to submit this legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to have the opinion of the highest tribunal in this country on it. I will make no motion in that regard, but in view of the decisions which have been quoted by the hon. members for Quebec East and for Shelburne-Yarmouth I want to have the opinion of the judiciary upon this legislation. It could have been submitted a long time ago if it had been ready; now that it is ready may I insist upon that suggestion? We should have then the view of the court, and if the highest court in this country decides that this legislation is intra vires I may support it. On the other hand if the court declares that it is ultra vires then the government of the day will have to get the consent of the provinces in order to make it valid. That course would show the government's sincerity, if the government are sincere all they have to do to clear the sky is to submit this legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada. Therefore I ask the Prime Minister if he is ready to move that the committee should report progress in order that the whole matter be submitted to the supreme court and that the members of the House of Commons shall be informed of the opinion of the judiciary on that matter.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no desire whatever to enter upon the legal aspects of the matter; these have, I think, already been dealt with by the lawyer members of the house. But there are some other phases to which I should like to refer. The legislation before us is designed, I understand, to implement the terms of the treaty of peace. I notice in part XIII of that treaty this statement:

Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice;

I think it must be admitted by all hon. members of this house that although there may be many desirable features included in this legislation it falls very, very far short of conforming with the establishment or reign of social justice. That ought to be kept clearly in our minds. Further, looking at article 427 of the peace treaty, referred to in the preamble to this bill, I find this statement:

The high contracting parties, recognizing that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in section 1 and associated with that of the League of Nations.

And it goes on to speak of principles that are of urgent importance. Social insurance may be derived from one of the principles enunciated, but this legislation before us does not by any means cover the field. I should be very loath to allow this opportunity to pass without saying that all the arguments of the Prime Minister in favour of it apply equally to all these other clauses of the peace treaty. I should like to enumerate these:

First—The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

In practice labour is regarded as a commodity or an article of commerce. If there is not sufficient work to go around labour is turned off with only the dole. That is the actual situation to-day. Again in fixing the price of labour no regard is had to the conditions necessary to maintain the labourer and his wife and family in a state of well-being.

Mr. HANBURY: Even according to the government's own scale.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, even according to the government's own scale. So that in practice to-day labour is regarded as an article of commerce or a commodity. There is nothing in this legislation that would in any way safeguard labour in that regard.

Second—The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I submit that all over this country men are being discriminated against for no other reason than they attempt to belong to a labour organization. There is absolutely no safeguard. I have tried to secure the assistance of my legal friends in an effort to devise a sort of bill of rights for labour in Canada. They tell me that is contrary to the whole spirit of British legislation. It may be that in Great Britain they can depend upon the common law, but in this country I take it we ought to have some very definite statute law in order that the rights of workingmen may be protected. There is now no provision whatever in that regard. My fear is that there are certain sections of this bill, with regard to insurance being given to men only when they are willing to take work, that may very easily still further militate against their right to free association in their own unions.

Third—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

Again I would emphasize what I have pointed out again and again through the years in this house, that the average wage paid the great majority of the workers of this country is less than is necessary to maintain a decent standard of living. That was clearly shown in the figures given by my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) the other day, based on the statistics obtained from the last census, in comparison with the standards of living as laid down by the Department of Labour. There is nothing in this legislation to safeguard the workers in this regard, and since the workers are to be taxed for their contributions to the insurance fund, if their wages are already below the necessary standard this may very easily work a very great hardship upon them or their families.

Fourth—The adoption of an eight hours day or a forty-eight hours week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

I am glad to think that this standard, laid down as the minimum some sixteen years ago, at last is being regarded as a standard to be aimed at in Canada. The same thing might be said with regard to the next provision:

Fifth—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

And the next:

Sixth—The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Again I would point out that some of the revelations made before the price spreads committee are sure indications that in this country we have many industries in which child labour is still employed, and apparently there is no safeguard for the young workers. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that if it is for the good of Canada that this insurance legislation should be introduced surely it is for the good of Canada that we should absolutely abolish all child labour in this country. If it is competent for the government of Canada to introduce legislation of this kind I think it is surely competent for the government of Canada to introduce legislation that will effectively prohibit child labour in every part of the country.

Seventh—The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

There is no attempt made to observe that provision; in fact I think there are certain clauses in the bill under consideration which rather take the opposite for granted and give a smaller amount to the women than to the men. I do not know whether this is on the ground that women's stomachs may be smaller than men's, and consequently they should be given less in the way of benefits. It may be that the government will seek to get out of this dilemma by suggesting that women's work is not of equal value. It does not seem to me that this measure is in keeping with the principle.

Eighth—The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

That is not so to-day. It is not so with regard to our existing old age pension measure; it is not true with regard to the giving of certain licences to certain classes of residents of Canada while denying them to other workers.

Ninth—Each state should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

Again I would say that while we have women inspectors in certain of the provinces, such inspection is altogether inadequate, and certainly so far as I know the dominion government has not undertaken in any way to see that this inspection is carried on in such a way as generally to safeguard the interests of employed women.

I have ventured to read these clauses simply because I do not think it is generally recognized in this country, and certainly it is not recognized by the employers in this country, that we are under obligation to try to live up to the clauses of that treaty. I remember some years ago being at a board of trade meeting which was addressed by a British member of parliament. Sitting near me was an employer of labour, who simply laughed at the idea that Canada should be bound to live up to the obligations of the treaty of peace, and in practice I am afraid that has been the attitude of altogether too many Canadian employers.

We have had a good many quotations by legal gentlemen. I should like to give a brief quotation by Doctor Brodus Mitchell, associate professor of political economy at Johns Hopkins university. In the February number of Current History will be found a very interesting article entitled Social Insurace is not Enough. I thought of this article when I heard the Prime Minister stressing the fact of this system being actuarially sound. Mr. Mitchell says:

Social insurance is not enough because of fundamental defects in our prevailing mode of producing and distributing wealth. No insurance plan can be more solvent than the economic structure upon which it rests. Insurance means converting individual uncertainty into collective certainty. But when we try to include the great mass of the population we suddenly discover that there is no social certainty. In other words, when we make the sum of the risks practically identical with the social causes of those risks insurance becomes impossible.

Then Doctor Mitchell quotes from another writer who will be recognized as an authority by all social workers, Mary Van Kleek, who says:

Insurance conceived as provision in advance for needs which, though not foreseeable for the individual are measurable for the social group, breaks down when needs are no longer foreseeable on the basis of past experience but are expressed in a change of social trends.

There is the practical difficulty to-day. Our social trends have varied so greatly in the last few years that it is quite impossible for the very best actuaries to determine what are going to be the risks involved, and I submit that with the increased unemployment which is prevalent all over the world—I am not referring to local matters at all—and with the increased tendency towards unemployment, for the future no insurance scheme that is going to be of any great value to the workers can be placed on anything like an actuarially sound basis. We cannot foresee the future to that extent.

When this measure was first brought down I felt very strongly that the main objection to it was that it did not provide for the most needy of the unemployed. The Prime Minister made it very clear that this was a measure for those now in employment, that it did not touch the men and women now unemployed. I could conceive that you might consider these two as belonging to different classes, but in practice we cannot separate those at present employed from those unemployed; and indeed we should not try to separate them. The problem is quite indivisible, and we should consider it as one. This government were not elected on their promise to help out with an unemployment insurance scheme for those now employed; they were elected very largely because of their promises to help the unemployed, and this measure does not touch that very large class of our community. No misunderstanding should be allowed with regard to the scope of this legislation. Further than that, according to the Prime Minister's own statement, and as shown in the measure itself, we know that it does not touch the employed classes which most need help, those engaged in fishing and trapping in the lumber camps, in the construction camps and so on. They do not come under the provisions of this measure, yet are the people who most need help. I protest against this committee being asked to adopt a piece of legislation which, however good in itself, touches only the fringe of the problem confronting us.

The Prime Minister in one of his radio addresses said:

> However few or many unemployed we normally have no man must be left to the uncertainties of private charity or to the humiliation of government gratuity.

So far as I can judge, this measure leaves these large numbers of unemployed entirely to the uncertainties of private charity and the humiliation of government gratuity. It is quite true that so far the government is making no provision for the dole; the Prime Minister has denounced the dole. But unless the government does accept the dole, or unless the obligation is loaded on to the provinces and municipalities, large numbers of people will have to face the situation the Prime Minister described. May I be permitted to quote the Prime Minister again, because in these observations it seems he understood the larger problem:

> When because of fluctuations in industrial conditions, the worker is thrown out of employment he should not be punished when the fault is that of the machine, for whatever is the cause of these depressions, whoever is to blame for them (if anyone is to blame) assuredly it is not the workman. If he is able and willing to work, but can get no work, provision must be made for his security in a decent way.

Then he goes on to say:

> By this I do not mean the dole. The dole is a rotten thing. It is alike an insult to the worker and to those who profess to have control of our industrial system.

That was said by the Prime Minister in one of his radio speeches, and I submit the underlying principles enunciated therein are fundamentally true. That is, the workman is out of work through no fault of his own, and if so he should not be left to the dole. Provision should be made for his security, in a decent way. Under this measure, however, no such provision appears. I do not believe we ought to proceed simply to deal with the particular clauses of the bill without in some way coming to some understanding as to what is to be done for that larger number of people who are left entirely outside its provisions.

Then there is this further consideration: This is a contributory scheme. I should like to ask the government whether it would be at all possible for the great majority of the already underpaid workers to make such a contribution as is herein provided. Personally I do not think it could be done, without a great deal of hardship. How can a man who is to-day receiving less than the amount necessary to maintain a decent standard of living, the standard set by the Department of Labour itself, take weekly from his earnings an amount to be placed in such a fund as suggested in the bill. I do not think it can be done.

Further, I should like to deal with a legal point. To-day the Prime Minister admitted that a contribution of this type was in the nature of a tax; I wonder whether it is an equitable tax. Only a few days ago the Prime Minister enunciated the principle that taxation should be imposed in accordance with the taxpayer's ability to pay. But this tax, levied as a contribution, and to be paid on a flat rate, entirely disregards the ability of the taxpayer to pay. In this connection I should like to quote Mr. Homer Folks, Secretary of the State Charities Aid Association of New York, as given before the national conference of social work held at Detroit in 1933. Comparing the British health insurance scheme with a similar service supplied by a public fund, which is in reality a socialized health service, he said:

Its—

The British health insurance scheme.

—cost is carried, roughly, 40 per cent by the insured persons, 40 per cent by their employers, and 20 per cent by the government. As to the insured persons' payment (as well as the employer's), it is in no sense a voluntary contribution. Money which the government requires us to pay periodically is actually a tax; in this case it is a special tax. There is an appreciable cost in the collection of a special tax.

Both the British health-insurance fund and a public-relief fund, then, are derived from taxes. There are important differences in the incidence of these taxes, in addition to the fact that one of them is special and the other general. The British health-insurance tax is a uniform tax upon all those included within its benefits. They all pay the same amount, whether their incomes are near the maximum included or whether they are among those receiving the lowest wages. Their tax is not assessed in proportion to their individual ability to pay.

The criticism by Mr. Homer Folks as applied to the British act applies also to the proposed Canadian legislation.

The scheme as enunciated is a compulsory contributory scheme. A great many of us have felt that the time for such a scheme has long since passed. We have felt that it will not materially help the unemployment crisis, and we have been advocating what has been termed a non-contributory unemployment insurance scheme.

I frankly admit that the expression "non-contributory insurance" is somewhat a misnomer. Ordinarily we think of insurance as being contributory, and yet I have noticed that from year to year some big companies who do not insure with the standard insurance companies set aside a certain amount which they regard as their insurance. If a building belonging to the corporation is burned they draw upon the fund. It is a definite amount of money set aside and is often popularly known as an insurance scheme.

Without quibbling over terms I believe the time has come when in Canada we ought to have a scheme based not upon contributions from the employer, the employee and the state but one furnished by the state or, perhaps better still, by industry. It would be contributory, if you like, so far as industry is concerned, but non-contributory so far as the employee is concerned. In that connection I should like to place upon the record a motion passed by the city council of the city of Winnipeg and forwarded to me by the city clerk. The letter, dated January 29, 1935, quotes the following resolution, which had been passed the previous evening:

Whereas the municipal share of unemployment relief costs has grown to proportions which no longer can be met out of revenue by a large number of municipalities, and

Whereas many municipalities have completely exhausted their credit, with results that the unemployed are not properly provided for, indicating that an acute emergency exists which, in the opinion of this council, can only be met by the federal government taking over the whole cost of maintenance of all unemployed, and

Whereas, it has been indicated that the federal government intends to introduce at the next session of parliament an Unemployment Insurance Act with contributory features, which will leave all of the present unemployed out of its scope and therefore not result in any easement of the burden now so heavily resting on the municipalities for the maintenance of the unemployed, nor in any improvement in the deplorable inadequacy of their maintenance,

Be it therefore resolved, that this council goes on record of being in favour of non-contributory unemployment insurance legislation which will embrace all of the present and future unemployed within its scope, the funds for which shall be provided by the federal government and should be raised by a special graduated tax on incomes and should provide a standard of living at least equal to that set by the Labour Gazette.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we have come to the point in our industrial development where we must recognize that unemployment is one of our greatest national problems. I think even the Prime Minister recognized that in his speeches prior to the last election. Further than that, it must be admitted that the individual workman is not to blame because to-day he is unemployed. It may very well be that there are a few lazy people, but as I have suggested in this house before, the lazy people are not confined to the down and outs. There are some of them to be found in so-called high society, but the great majority of the people to-day who are unemployed simply cannot get work. I would urge with all the energy that I have that the burden of unemployment, since it is not due to the unemployed workman, ought not to fall on him alone but should be shared by the whole community. Certainly that is fundamental. What does government exist for? Surely to see that every one of its citizens is protected.

We were told that the last war was fought in order that our country should be saved. Well, I would urge that if there are fortunes that have in part been built up out of the war, that have been built up through the operation of the existing system, then those fortunes should unquestionably at the present time be levied upon to take care of the people who have suffered because of the inadequacies and maladjustments in the existing system. I think that is elementary, and that it will appeal to everybody of fair judgment, to everybody who himself is not too largely benefiting by the existing system. Just how that is to be done is a matter that may be debatable. Whether funds should be secured through special taxation as was suggested by the city council of Winnipeg, or whether it should be through a levy on industry, I do not know; but I am inclined to think it is fairer to take it out of special taxes. In the provision of work—and as long as work is the basis of remuneration it is work we need, notwithstanding all that the editor of the Ottawa Citizen may say—in the provision of work we may very well call upon the credit of the country to make the necessary advances.

But I come back to my main point, and that is that the unemployed man, whoever he may be, ought not to be the sufferer he is to-day; yet there is not one line in this legislation that will make the burden any easier for the unemployed man. Legislation of this character presupposes the system remaining much as it is, and if some of us are right in our analysis, more and more people will be thrown permanently on the unemployed scrap heap. Hence this present legislation is wholly inadequate to provide for the needs of even that class. But I will vote in favour of it for the good that is in it. It may help out a certain number temporarily and in a very inadequate way, but I do want it distinctly understood at this time, when we are beginning a discussion of the clauses of the bill, that we do not think this legislation begins to touch the main problem that is before the people of this country, nor is it an adequate treatment of the problems which face even those classes that come under the terms of the measure.

Mr. HANBURY: Before the short title carries, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I am in hearty sympathy with this legislation, and I hope that if and when it is tested in the courts it will be found to be within the jurisdiction of this parliament. Coming from British Columbia I would point out that we have there probably more social legislation than any other portion of Canada, and industry in British Columbia finds itself at a certain disadvantage as a result of that legislation in competing with other portions of Canada. It is for that reason that I am heartily in sympathy with anything that will put industry and the working people of British Columbia on a fairly competitive basis.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I would inquire from the Prime Minister what is the estimated cost of this insurance to the federal treasury for the first year of its operation, and whether provision for the amount is to be placed in this year's estimates.

Mr. BENNETT: I propose to deal with that phase when we reach the sections that deal with it. If the hon. member will please wait until then, I will give the figures in connection with all these matters.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the Prime Minister what precisely is implied in the provision of an alternative to the normal definition of "day," under clause (c), which provides:

(c) "day," means a period of twenty-four hours from midnight to midnight or such other period of twenty-four hours as the commission may for any general or special purpose prescribe.

Mr. BENNETT: Conceivably it might pass into twenty-five hours in dealing with matters of this kind. The term "day" is a familiar term to use in this connection, and this definition has been found necessary in dealing with the regulations under the British act.

Mr. HEAPS: Does this section follow closely the British act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the Prime Minister's remark apply also to clause (j) dealing with trade disputes?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GAGNON: Apparently there is no clause 3. What is the explanation?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Clause 3 appears on page 3, about the middle, but the (3) is not in large type.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Commission.

Mr. HEAPS: I would like the Prime Minister to explain what the relationship of the proposed commission will be to parliament. I see very little relating to it in the clauses of section 4, and I would like to know what jurisdiction parliament will have over the commission once it is appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: I endeavoured to explain when the bill was being submitted to the house that the bill provides for an independent commission, and like all commissions it is, of course, subject to the enactment of any legislation which this parliament may see fit to pass in derogation of its powers or supplementing or increasing its powers. Parliament, of course, is supreme.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, but we have had a railway bill fastening on parliament a form of commission of which I did not approve; in fact, the commission is placed above parliament. I do not want anything in this act, now or hereafter, to imply that a commission appointed by parliament can dictate to parliament the things it prefers according to its own interpretation of the statute. I want to know whether each year this parliament will have the opportunity of reviewing the work of the commission, and whether a special committee or parliament itself will have the estimates of the commission placed before it for consideration so that it may properly review the work of the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: Parliament has the amplest opportunity to consider the work of any of its creations. I do not know what is meant by the question of estimates, because this commission is predicated upon the assumption that the numbers of people who avail themselves of it determine the amount of money it handles, and to estimate the number would be only doing what has been done in relation to the commencing of it. In 1931 the reason we had a delay in taking action was the fact that the census figures had to be obtained and analyzed. But the power of parliament is supreme in relation to this and all others of its enactments.

Mr. HEAPS: That is quite true, but I see nothing in the act which would compel the commission to submit its report to parliament. It will submit it to the governor in council, but I would far rather see the act so drafted that each year, if parliament thinks it desirable, it could in some way review the work of the commission. That I think is very important, because after all, if this legislation is as important as it was claimed to be during the discussion on the second reading of the bill, and according to the statement of the Prime Minister about 1,700,000 persons will come under the provisions of the act, then such a provision as I suggest should be adopted. I do not know whether the whole of that number will ultimately qualify; I doubt it. But if they do, then there will come within the jurisdiction of the commission approximately one-sixth of our population, and I submit that parliament ought to have complete jurisdiction over the activities of such a commission. It should have the opportunity of reviewing the work of the commission and satisfying itself with the activities of that body. I think we ought to be in a position to express our opinions on the floor of the house. So far as I can see, the commission will report annually to the governor in council; but, as I have said, I should prefer to have the report tabled in parliament through one of the responsible ministers, and have parliament adopt it or otherwise, with an opportunity for discussing it. That is what I now ask the Prime Minister. Shall we have an opportunity in this parliament, or will a committee of parliament have the opportunity of annually reviewing the work of the commission once it has been appointed?

Mr. BENNETT: I can only repeat what I have already said. This parliament has jurisdiction over this matter, according to my conception of the situation, though there are those who think it has not. But if it has, a report to the governor in council is a report to parliament, so far as that is concerned. The mere laying of the report on the table is a different thing. Reports of various departments are made to the ministers or to the governor in council, most being directed to the governor in council; and the question of the discussion of them is for parliament to determine. It has always been open to this house, on a proper motion, to discuss any matter that is within its jurisdiction, and it has discussed everything that I can think of, from home rule in Ireland down to the smallest detail of our economic life. I can only say that there is nothing in this act that limits or curtails or lessens the power of parliament to deal with the matter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If it does not make a greater success of this than the British parliament did of home rule for Ireland, it will not be very successful.

Mr. MITCHELL: Section 4, dealing with the appointment of the commission, provides that two commissioners shall constitute a quorum. It is within the realm of possibility, in the practical application of the act, that one of the commissioners might die or be removed from office, and there is no obligation on the government of the day to fill a vacancy created by dismissal or otherwise. Now, there might be some very important decision to be made which might affect labour where the labour point of view would not be brought under discussion. Could not the government insert a stipulation to provide that vacancies shall be filled within twenty-eight days or two months or six months so as to protect all parties?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman mentioned to me, or the matter was brought to my attention, that defect as he conceived it to be, and I think a subsection might be inserted so as to provide that any vacancy that occurs shall be filled within a given time. I shall be glad to incorporate in the section such a provision as indicates the sense of the committee in that regard.

Mr. HANBURY: That could be done in the next clause.

Mr. BRADETTE: Subsection 6 provides that the commission shall have power to acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property. What would be the full interpretation of real and personal property?

Mr. BENNETT: These words have a generally recognized meaning. Real property is usually used colloquially in reference to land with its appurtenances, and personal property is—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Clothing, I suppose.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but personal property refers to that form of property which is movable and is other than real property. But there is a third branch which is known as mixed property, and that is usually the definition given a leasehold interest under certain conditions. Real, personal and mixed property are the divisions—real being fixed, and usually a term interchangeable with land and its appurtenances; personal being movable property and other than real and mixed property. The last mentioned term is hardly ever used, but it has reference to certain forms of leasehold.

Mr. BRADETTE: It seems anomalous that personal property should belong to a commission.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the section that confers upon the commission the power to own real estate or to own personal property. Part of its money will have to be invested in security, which would be personal property. It might conceivably find itself in a condition where, by operation of law and not by an act of the parties, it became possessed of real property. The investment sections are closely worded and do not contemplate risks being taken with the funds. This subsection only empowers the commission to own real and personal property.

Mr. DUFF: If the provisions of the act are to be carried out by a commission I think I am right in saying that it will cost the taxpayers a very large sum of money. It seems to me that we are getting into the habit, both in this parliament and in the legislatures, of depending too much upon commissions or outside bodies instead of having the elected members of parliament and the members chosen by that parliament comprising the government, responsible for the carrying out of legislation. This legislation, even if it were placed under a minister and under a department, would still cost a great deal of money; but if it could be worked out so that instead of having commissioners appointed, with secretaries, stenographers and so forth, we might have the work done by the Labour department—because I am of the opinion that this is legislation that should come under that department and a great deal of money might be saved to the taxpayers. When we come to the clause dealing with the amount which the employee would receive we could save, according to my finding, a quarter of a million dollars by placing this legislation in the hands of the Department of Labour instead of under this commission. That seems to me to be in the interests of the employees. I would strongly urge that the government reconsider part I which deals with the appointment of several commissioners. Of course, once they are appointed, this means that a large organization must be set up, not only in Ottawa but all over the country, which will cost the taxpayers a great deal of money and will consequently in my opinion not give the same satisfaction to the labouring people, the employees who will come under this legislation. Therefore I strongly urge that the government should consider this matter and place the legislation under a responsible minister of the crown. If that were done, as my hon. friend pointed out a moment ago, there would be no fear that the person dealing with the matter would not properly report to parliament, and parliament could approve the work of the Minister of Labour and his officials in connection with it at any succeeding session. I strongly urge in the interests of economy, to save large sums of money to the taxpayers and to give further benefits to the employees, that this commission be not appointed, but that provision be made under which the Minister of Labour and his department shall carry out the provisions of the measure.

Mr. BENNETT: I need hardly say that obviously every phase of the matter suggested by the hon. gentleman has been considered and the reasons that apply against making this a political department are so apparent that in my judgment it is scarcely necessary to consider it. It must be free from political influence, and it must be free from those other weaknesses that are always inherent in what you might call political administration. Its success or failure depends very largely upon that fact, and it will be found in the end that if the advisory committee exercises the functions that such a committee is intended to exercise, to make this board, which will be a non-political one—because employers and employees are both to be represented on it and the chairman is to be selected by the governor in council having regard to what he is to do—an adjunct or part of the Department of Labour, would destroy the purposes for which the board exists. I need hardly remind a committee such as this, every member of which has perhaps read a good deal about this matter, that one of the weaknesses of development in connection with unemployment insurance plans in some countries was the exercise of political influence in the demands that were made for certain benefits that could not otherwise be derived.

The legislation contemplates that the influences for stability, unformity of administration and the prevention of just such difficulties as have been experienced are to be found in the non-political character of the board and the assistance that the advisory committee from a high sense of citizenship will render to such a board. I am sorry, but it would be impossible to carry out this legislation on the basis suggested by the hon. member. Full consideration has been given to the suggestion he has made.

Mr. DUFF: These are noble sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister. It would be a beautiful thing in this country if we could get entirely free from political influence. But if his argument holds good with reference to this bill, then as regards every piece of legislation which we pass in this parliament or which is passed in the provincial legislatures, if such legislation is to be properly administered, a commission should be set up to carry out its provisions. Why not do the same thing with all the other departments? Instead of having a minister at the head of each one, let us appoint a commission; let us have commission government for everything. We seem to be getting away from responsible government much faster than is in the interests of the country. I am strongly in favour of responsible government. After all is said and done, whilst of course we sometimes play politics both seriously and in the interests of our party, by and large a Tory is just as good a man as a Grit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUFF: I said by and large; I qualified my statement. I cannot understand why my hon. friends object. There are just as important bodies appointed in this country as this or any other commission. For instance, my right hon. friend, who is one of the greatest lawyers, shall I say in the British empire—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. DUFF: I have heard him argue very strongly about appointments to the judiciary; and quite properly in his position as Conservative leader and Conservative Prime Minister of Canada, when there are vacancies in the Supreme Court of Canada or the supreme court of a province, he naturally appoints one of his own political friends or the friends of his party.

Mr. BENNETT: They say that he does not. That is the trouble.

Mr. DUFF: Well, judges, like other people, once they get appointments at the hands of their friends, sometimes forget them very quickly. I have seen that happen with both judges and other persons. So far as I am concerned, strongly partisan as I am, I do not have the same fear the Prime Minister has. If the present Minister of Labour for the next three or four months—and of course that will be as long as he will be in that position—has charge of this measure with his officials, I have no fear that partisan politics will enter into the matter or that the labouring man and employers of labour will not get a square deal. I am and always have been strongly of opinion that we have too many commissions in this country. Take for instance the Canadian National Railways. Parliament has practically nothing to do with that but vote money. That is not right. We who represent the taxpayers should be in a position to criticize and decide in connection with every important matter concerning that railway. Nevertheless we are tied hand and foot because under an act of parliament somewhat similar to the present bill we have given the commission or the trustees full power and taken it away from the elected representatives of the people. This is not in the best interests of the people themselves or of our parliamentary institutions. I strongly object to this or any further commission being appointed. We have too many commissions in this country. It would be much better if the duly elected representatives of the people and the ministers of the crown were to carry out the provisions of all legislation passed by this parliament.

Mr. NEILL: If this body is to be non-political, as the Prime Minister says, why not have it appointed by the civil service commission? The Prime Minister points out as evidence of it being non-political, the fact that one member shall be appointed after consultation with representatives of organized workers and another after consultation with representatives of organized employers. But that does not prevent the appointments being really political. If those appointments had been made by the parties concerned, that would have been a different thing; but they are not; they are made only after consultation with those parties. Therefore when a Liberal government is in power it will select a Liberal representative of the workers and a Liberal representative of the employers, and vice versa when the Conservatives are in power. If the spirit of the legislation is, as the Prime Minister has more than once told us, to be wholly non-political, with only a hope, and not a very strong one, of its being successful, the appointments should be put under the civil service commission. If it is suggested that the civil service commission is incapable of selecting men of the calibre required for this commission, that is a lamentable situation and I do not think it is correct. The Prime Minister should explain why this commission and all these appointments are not made under the civil service commission.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed with respect to ordinary appointments that they are to be made in the manner provided by law. I take it that the civil service commission will have control of that phase of the matter. But the commissioners will be appointed by the governor in council, and I am bound to say that under the provisions of the peace treaty and the regulations that govern, the representatives of labour and of employers at Geneva from year to year have been appointed under provisions similar to those contained in this measure. For instance it was decided in 1919—there has been some objection to it recently—that the Trades and Labour Congress should be the body representing labour for the purpose of making recommendations, and the manufacturers' association was taken as representing the employers. The representations they have made to successive governments have been embodied in the orders in council appointing the representatives who have appeared on behalf of Canada at the meetings of the international labour organization.

Mr. NEILL: Have their recommendations always been taken?

Mr. BENNETT: There were two cases, if my memory serves me aright, in which recommendations for assistants or advisers were taken from other labour organizations: one was the national Catholic workers union and the other was the All-Canadian Congress of Labour. The right hon. gentleman will recall the discussions that took place. I was not then connected with these matters officially, but I believe a great deal of discussion took place when the method was being settled as to how these appointments should be made. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would give us the benefit of his memory with respect to that. I believe the matter was settled at Washington.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I do not recall details of the discussion but what the Prime Minister has said is correct. There was a conference and some adjustment was made, I think to the pretty general satisfaction of all concerned.

While I am on my feet—I notice that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is in his seat—apropos of this matter of political influence may I draw attention to the fact that we have a national system of old age pensions, and I should like to ask the minister, as its provisions are being administered by him, whether those administering are subject to political influence and control and whether the act is being administered on such lines.

Mr. GORDON: The Old Age Pensions Act is largely administered by the provinces—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but quite largely by the dominion too.

Mr. BENNETT: No, we just pay.

Mr. GORDON: No; whether fortunately or unfortunately, we contribute seventy-five per cent of the cost, but as to the Department of Labour taking a political interest in the administration, in order—putting it in the worst light—to defeat the proper functioning of the act, that has not been done as long as I have been Minister of Labour, and as far as I am aware it was not done prior to my being minister. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman has in mind, but if he knows of any evidence of political activity in connection with the Department of Labour, calculated to do damage to the Old Age Pensions Act, I shall be very glad to know about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend misconceives my meaning. He has taken something not intended to heart. I was trying to give the impression that he was administering the act so fairly that no political influence could enter in. I was wondering whether if he had the administration of this unemployment insurance measure he would allow political control to govern. The Prime Minister was arguing that we cannot trust a department of the government with the administration because there would be political influence at work all the time. What I have seen of commissions makes me believe that there is about as much political influence exerted through commissions as through any other body. As a matter of fact where a minister is responsible to parliament there is a greater control against political influence than in any other way.

Mr. NEILL: Coming back to the remarks of the Prime Minister, he has pointed to a precedent rather than to any logical reason why these appointments should not be made by the civil service commission. The appointments he indicated are of an occasional character, strictly in the gift of the government. It is quite a different situation from that of permanent paid employees who are to be there all their lives, failing cause for dismissal. I do not think the parallel is sound. If it is desired to take nominees of the Trades and Labour Congress or other labour bodies he mentioned, and of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association as their representatives, why not say so? But under this bill it is open to pick and choose political employees, which is against the whole spirit of the Civil Service Act. If we are going to have a civil service act why not stick to it? And I look beyond this particular appointment; I think the Prime Minister is a big enough man to see that three good men are appointed on this occasion. It is not so much they I had in mind as the smaller men.

Mr. BENNETT: That is covered by section 8 of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: The government is going to have a political commission and it will appoint a political committee that will appoint a political man in the country place, and he has to have a political committee to assist him; and presently you will have people saying that the whole thing is a political machine. That as I understand is what the Prime Minister wants to get away from. Therefore why not make it non-political at the start?

Mr. BENNETT: Section 8 provides:

(1) The commission may employ such officers, clerks, and employees for the purposes of this act as the commission may determine, and all appointments of officers, clerks and employees so employed by the commission shall be made in pursuance of the Civil Service Act.

That is what I tried to make clear.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, clerks and people like that, but I am talking about the active people, the chairman of committees and so on. Then they have this panel, which is a regular play on words. There is to be a panel selected, from which the chairman of committees and referees are to be appointed —a fine sounding title. But how are these panels to be promulgated? They are to be constituted by the commission, a political body. It is a fine pretence of fairness, but still a political machine, because they will appoint ten, or twenty, or thirty men, taking in Jew and Gentile, bound and free, Tory and Grit. But the crucial point is, who does the picking out of that fine body? It will be done by a politically appointed body which will be wised up to take Tom Jones and will always take Tom Jones, he being the one favoured by the government of the day. I ask the Prime Minister if he can deny that that system permeates all these appointments. I am talking not about stenographers and clerks but about the men who have the control.

Mr. BENNETT: The words are "officers, clerks, and employees." They are under the civil service. With respect to the commission I have only to say that if one of the number is appointed after conference with the representatives of labour I do not think you will find that commissioner agreeing to the conditions to which the hon. member has referred. Neither do I believe that the representative of the employers appointed under the circumstances I have mentioned will put himself in the position of becoming a party to a conspiracy with one other to do the things that have been suggested. The majority controls. In the appointment of the panels to which reference has been made the government's nominee as chairman can be out voted in all cases with respect to the setting up of the official body to which the hon. gentleman refers. As far as I know of any way in which to accomplish it, this is the method, namely that of conferring with the representatives of labour. I will say this, that my memory is that of all those who have been appointed since we came into office to attend the international labour organization at Geneva, the majority have been opposed to this party in politics. That is my memory of the situation, though I have never checked it up. I do know that the Minister of Labour sends up to council the recommendations that have come to him after he has conferred with the Trades and Labour Congress. Mr. Moore and Mr. Bengough were the last two appointed, so far as my memory serves me, and on one occasion Mr. Cook, of the Canadian trades union, was sent as an assistant. He was a Conservative candidate in an election in western Canada, but he did not put forward his claim. His organization recommended that he be selected as an assistant, and he was the nominee of that organization. Then I am advised that on one occasion at least—I cannot speak from memory because my memory does not carry names as perhaps it should—the representative selected by the national Catholic unions was a rather strong opponent of this administration. We have taken the nominees of labour; it has not been a question of their political faith, and that clause reads as it does for the purpose of endeavouring to secure the same treatment in connection with the appointment of these commissioners as has obtained since 1919 with respect to the appointment of those who went to Geneva as the representatives of the employers and the employees. My memory is that several of those whom we appointed had been actually in attendance as representatives of employers and labour under the former administration. I cannot say with respect to employers with any degree of certainty, but I can with respect to employees.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We appointed the late Sir George Foster on one occasion.

Mr. BENNETT: That was to the League of Nations.

Mr. NEILL: Honorary temporary appointments.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to point out that representatives to the League of Nations and representatives to the labour office are entirely different. The appointments of the representatives of employer and of labour are made after conference. I think it is provided that they shall be most representative of organized labour, and we have selected them in just that way. That is why the provision is made in this way.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister considers it advisable to have the commissioners other than the chief commissioners selected after consultation with those labour organizations, why is there no such safeguard with regard to the chief commissioner, the most important appointee of all?

Mr. BENNETT: The government accepts responsibility for that appointment.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The government accepts responsibility for all the appointments, but it does not take the same precautions.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HEAPS: Before six o'clock there was some talk about the method outlined in this measure for the appointment of commissioners. Some hon. members spoke about appointing people who were non-partisan or non-political in their opinions. I have still to find a person either non-political or non-partisan. I know some people profess to have an open mind, but when I think of them I remember that some years ago Winston Churchill described the open mind as the empty mind, and I have a good deal of sympathy with Mr. Churchill's definition.

I can readily understand that if one man is appointed from the ranks of labour and one from the ranks of the employers each will stand behind his own opinions—and I assume they will have opinions of some kind. It will be difficult to say how much those opinions would or would not be influenced by political views. I have not much sympathy with the viewpoint which holds that we should always appoint people holding non-partisan or non-political views. Perhaps I do not interpret that observation the same as some other hon. members may interpret it. For instance, I observe in the report of the actuaries the suggestion that we should appoint people holding non-political or non-partisan views. I do not know why we should employ persons such as actuaries, pay them high fees for their services, and then allow them to tell parliament that we must appoint certain types of men who may have no opinions on any subject. I have no objection to appointments being made not from the standpoint of partisanship but based upon the qualifications the position may demand. If a man is to be appointed from among the employers I hope he will be capable and administer the act with the proper spirit, and I would say exactly the same concerning the person who may be nominated by the responsible labour bodies in Canada. The whole basis of the work of the commission will depend in large measure upon the chairman appointed by the government; I assume even in that instance the man who is appointed may have political bias in his ideas as to how the commissioners should do their work. I do hope any bias he may have will be on the side of the workingman and not in favour of the employers; I am frank to make that admission.

My further point has to do with the effective control by parliament of the commission, once it has been appointed. I know many hon. members, including myself, are not too favourably disposed towards commissions doing the work which ought to be entrusted to parliament. On the other hand I think the legislative work of parliament ought to be divorced from the administrative. I should prefer to see an outside body partly separated from parliament performing the functions of administration, but on the other hand I believe there is no body more likely to understand the spirit of the act than members of the House of Commons. If a commission were removed from the control of parliament, such commission might be likely to do things it would never do if parliament had some effective check upon it. That is why I stated when this matter first came before the committee that I wanted to see some form of effective control by parliament of the commission, and to have such commission placed under the control of a minister so that when the estimates of that minister were under consideration we would have free opportunity to enter into a discussion of the administration of the act. I believe no government would have anything to fear if my suggestion were adopted. It seems to me that a commission appointed by parliament would do more effective work if it knew that at certain times its work would come under the review of parliament. The Prime Minister has stated that parliament will exercise over this commission the same control it has exercised over others. To me that is not an altogether satisfactory answer; I should prefer in the act the explicit provision that the administration would come under the review of parliament. It is possible that an estimate may come before parliament providing for funds to carry on the work of the commission, in which event I realize there will be opportunity for discussion. Nevertheless I believe that in the final analysis parliament should have complete control of the whole situation.

Mr. MITCHELL: It seems to me that the question of political control is worthy of careful consideration. I hold the view which has been expressed by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Heaps), that parliament should have some control over the working of the measure. I have always felt that an efficient civil servant is necessary to any democratic form of government.

Mr. HANBURY: Or bureaucratic.

Mr. MITCHELL: Somebody says "bureaucratic." I should not like to see arise from this measure any condition such as has arisen quite recently in one of the major provinces. Civilization should have developed beyond that point sixty years ago. I am convinced that the dismissal of civil servants on the basis of political expediency is an insult to the Canadian people. When a man has devoted his life to the service of his country I do not believe his head should be chopped off because twenty or twenty-five years ago he may have voted Conservative, Liberal, Labour or any other way. That is an unfair and an unsound basis for dismissal. The appointees should be men who have faith in the legislation and faith in its possibilities. It would not be in the best interests either of industry or of the workingmen if commissioners who have properly carried out their obligations were to be changed with each change of government. The people of Canada do not desire that that should be done, and in the launching of the measure great care should be taken by the government to see to it that the men who are put in charge are public spirited, men who will carry out the full purpose behind the measure. I hope we shall never live to see the day when in this federal government we may see a condition such as has developed recently within the dominion. Fifty years may be required for the development of an efficient civil service, and I hope a federal government may never stoop to do the things which have been done recently in other places. The men charged with the carrying out of this measure should be given a fair opportunity to prove its usefulness, and politics should not enter into their appointment. I am convinced that the commission should be composed of men with an understanding of legislation such as we have before us and an appreciation of the psychological make-up of the working man. I am further convinced that the chairman should be a man with a judicial mind, one capable of weighing evidence and making decisions. I think that is the most important factor in connection with this commission. If you have the right kind of commission the legislation will work out in an entirely different manner from what it otherwise would, and should politics enter into decisions of the commission such a condition in my judgment would set back for a generation the usefulness of this legislation.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: That will be section 3, Mr. Chairman. It is section 4 now.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes, and section 5 will be section 4.

On section 5—Duration of office.

Mr. MITCHELL: I understand the Prime Minister to say before dinner that provision was to be made to take care of the case of one of the commissioners dying.

Mr. HEAPS: I think that is covered by subsection 3 of this section.

Mr. BENNETT: It is intended to make such provision, and if it is not adequate now such provision will be made before the bill goes out of committee.

Mr. HANBURY: I notice that we are to retain some of these commissioners until the age of seventy years. In view of the unemployment situation in Canada, and the fact that we have old age pensions and have also many younger men who are capable of doing this work, I suggest to the Prime Minister that he make the limit sixty years instead of seventy. He will find many people under sixty who have the ability to discharge these duties properly.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has referred to a very difficult and delicate subject. To have retired me, for instance, four years ago would have been in singular disregard of the public interest; and to retire so many gentlemen I see opposite who are perfectly willing to serve the state in an eventuality that will never happen would be much more serious still.

The problem is one that has engaged the attention of a great many people, especially in our English speaking world, with respect to judges and commissioners and with respect to those who hold positions similar to those of judges and commissioners. We have already provided that seventy-five shall be the retiring age for county or district court judges and for the Supreme Court of Canada; seventy is the compulsory age for retirement in many cases in the civil service, and civil servants may retire at sixty-five. But the difficulty in meeting my hon. friend's suggestion is this, having regard also to what was said by my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) as to the right type of man for the chairmanship: if you say he must retire at an earlier age than seventy, he may already be occupying the position of a judge and be sixty or more. So it is a matter of extreme difficulty. I think in following the provisions of the Civil Service Act as we have, we have gone as far as we should. Although I appreciate what has been said, I should certainly not like to see this changed to sixty, because I believe it would not operate in the interests of efficiency. I think it better to leave it in the terms of the Civil Service Act, which one day must be revised, probably, having regard to the conditions. This was written into the statute on the basis that the provisions of the Civil Service Act would be observed.

Mr. HANBURY: I understood that the Civil Service Act provided for retirement at sixty-five.

Mr. BENNETT: At seventy-five it is compulsory.

Mr. HANBURY: I thought it was sixty-five under the Civil Service Act. In the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, with a large labour personnel, sixty-five is the compulsory age for retirement, I understand.

Mr. BENNETT: No, even there they have extended the time beyond that. I need hardly remind the hon. gentleman that one of the officials of the Canadian Pacific died while on duty, and he was nearer seventy-five than sixty-five. Recently the banks have been endeavouring to provide more positions by retiring as many of their staff as possible between sixty and sixty-five, and large numbers of them have been retired in order that the younger men might have a chance and that greater opportunities for employment might be provided. In the railways the situation is as I have indicated. In the civil service we have extended the time beyond even seventy. There are one or two members of the service that we provide for by act of parliament, in the estimates, where the age has been extended beyond seventy-five; it would be very difficult to replace these men at any age because of their accumulated experience in the particular positions they occupy, having regard to their present keen intellect and the grasp of the problems with which they have to deal. So, Mr. Chairman, I would dislike altering this from seventy under present conditions.

Mr. HANBURY: I cannot see that subsection 3 of section 5 provides for remuneration for someone appointed to act in a temporary capacity.

Mr. BENNETT: That provision is to meet the case to which attention was directed this afternoon; that is, if only two were left and one was ill in hospital, and important matters had to be dealt with, this would enable the governor in council to make a temporary appointment. The question of payment would have to be provided for by order in council out of contingent funds or otherwise. A real difficulty did arise on one occasion through the temporary incapacity because of illness of a member of a commission, which made it impossible to deal with a problem of some magnitude. The same principle is adopted here as when we invite a judge in to one of our courts to act ad hoc.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Salaries of commissioners.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the Prime Minister indicate what salaries he has in mind for the chief commissioner and the other commissioners?

Mr. BENNETT: Frankly I am bound to say to the right hon. gentleman that I have not in mind any salary at the moment. I do not know for what salary we can secure the type of man we should like to get as chairman of this commission. So far as the commissioners are concerned I fancy that probably a salary of $10,000 or less would be satisfactory—something within that range—but I do not know whether the chairman, a man of competency, could be obtained for that sum. I have not any mind on the matter at the moment, and I should be very glad if the right hon. gentleman would express his opinion in that regard.

Mr. HANBURY: This afternoon I asked the Prime Minister if he could give some information as to what the cost of this is going to be. What will be the charge on federal funds?

Mr. BENNETT: That will come later when we reach the section.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Commission to undertake investigations.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. HEAPS: I regard this as one of the most important clauses of the whole bill, and I think we ought to have some explanation and a discussion of it. It is something new in our legislation and covers a wide territory. For instance, it gives to the commission certain powers which no previous commission has ever had in this country. In many respects I am exceedingly glad that the body which is to administer the act will have some of the powers that are to be conferred upon it by clause 7. But there is so much ambiguity about it that it is rather difficult for me to apprehend all that is implied in the bill. One of the sections provides that the commission may do something for those who are out of work and do not come within the financial benefits of the bill. If this bill is to be placed on an actuarial basis and the fund is to be administered according to such an arrangement, then I find it rather difficult to see what assistance they can give, apart from financial aid, to those who are out of work for the time being or who perhaps may be permanently unemployed. I thought however that, without going further into the meaning of this section, I might ask the Prime Minister to take the house and the country into his confidence and tell us what the government have in mind at this session of parliament in relation to those people who will not benefit by this bill when it becomes law. When the Prime Minister a few days ago moved the second reading of the bill he stated that the government had in mind some other provision to meet the unemployment situation in Canada, and I do think that now we are discussing section 7 of the bill, the Prime Minister might say, where questions of the unemployed and partially employed are covered by the bill and it is intended that those out of work shall be kept physically fit to do work when there is no work for them to do, what kind of work he has in mind. What does the Prime Minister intend to do for that large section of our population who at present are looking with a great deal of hope and expectation to the government to provide them in the immediate future with useful and productive work?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Is it the wish of the committee to take the section paragraph by paragraph?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

On section 7. (a)—Extension of insurance to excepted employments.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I was interested in the remarks of the Prime Minister a few days ago when he gave the list of those who would be exempted from insurance under this bill. My concern at the present time is for a few hundred coal miners in my constituency, because I am at a loss to know whether or not they can be brought under this bill. They are engaged as part time employees in the coal mines for from twenty to twenty-four or twenty-eight weeks in the year, and then the rest of the time they are probably on farms or working at other occupations. I was wondering whether they could be brought under this bill, and how. These miners are having a very difficult time; they have been experiencing a difficulty in the last two years in making ends meet. I am informed that the mine owners are rather concerned about this bill because they are finding it very difficult to make ends meet, to pay their taxes, their running expenses and so on without having to meet additional costs. Under this bill will these mine owners be compelled to contribute when they employ their miners only for a certain period of the year?

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion that has been going on in connection with this bill, and I have wondered whether any reason has been given so far why I should support a measure of this kind. I represent a farming community in Saskatchewan, composed almost entirely of farmers with the exception of the few hundred coal miners I have mentioned, and unless those miners can benefit by the act I do not know of any person in my constituency who can derive any benefit from it. If times were normal I do not believe our people would object very much to the passing of an unemployment insurance bill; but at the present time, when our farmers find it impossible to pay their taxes, I think it is hardly fair to impose additional taxation upon them. It is an axiom of our law that those who do not receive any benefit from taxes should not be taxed. I wonder what the Prime Minister has in mind for constituencies such as the one I represent. What does he intend to do by way of compensating adjustment for the money which those farmers will pay to make up their share of the dominion government's obligation? I am concerned for the moment for the part time employees in these mines, and I should like to know whether or not the owners will be compelled to pay a share of insurance.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. BENNETT: We shall reach that section a little later and I will discuss it then.

Paragraph (a) agreed to.

On paragraph (b)—Assistance for unemployed.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) will observe that the commission will have very large powers, but the provision that is contemplated is for those persons ordinarily employed in any of the employments excepted from the operation of part III of the act or ordinarily employed in insurable employment but who for the time being are not entitled to unemployment insurance benefit. So long as they come within the clause but do not come strictly within the provisions of the sections providing for benefits, power is given to take such action as may be thought desirable.

Mr. HANBURY: That is only to make a proposal, not to take action.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Prime Minister has stated that this bill is founded on the British act. I understand that within the last few weeks there has been appointed in Great Britain a new body known as the unemployment assistance board, which takes care of all wage earners receiving, I believe, less than $25 a week, and now it will take care of about seventeen million wage earners. Is there any provision at all in this bill to take care of those who do not appear to come under the provisions of its terms?

Mr. BENNETT: The British statute is one that deals with unemployment assistance by way of relief. I mentioned it the other afternoon, explaining the circumstances under which it came into being, but the hon. gentleman was not in the house. There is the provision in paragraph (b) to which I have referred. They make a report to the governor general in council so that the government may be seized of correct information with respect to the matter before determining what action if any will be taken. If the hon. member will look at subparagraphs (i) and (ii) of paragraph (b) of the section he will see what we are proposing in that regard. The act itself does not provide for relief; it provides that the commission may make recommendations to the governor in council on the investigations they carry forward, with the machinery at their disposal, as to persons who would ordinarily be insured under the measure, and that is all. It does not deal with other than those to whom attention has been directed.

Mr. HEAPS: It is possible that those who may be insured under the measure may be so long out of employment as to lose its benefits.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another matter dealt with later.

Mr. HEAPS: But I should be glad to hear from the Prime Minister now what ideas he may have for relieving the general unemployment situation.

Mr. BENNETT: I explained that this was not the time or the place to do it.

Mr. NEILL: This is, as the Prime Minister said, I think, the most important clause in the bill. It provides that:

The commission shall, as soon as practicable after appointment, undertake investigations—

And so forth. This is altogether a new departure in Canada. These men will be very busy for months to come organizing their own office and their own branch of the duties that have been made incumbent upon them by the other clauses of the bill. Would it not be more appropriate if those duties of immediate investigation were imposed upon the unemployment advisory committee appointed under clause 36? They do not seem to have very many immediate duties to perform and they might well get busy and do this immediate inquiry, because I am quite sure the three commissioners will be busy for many months to come getting the operation of the act organized.

Mr. BENNETT: I did endeavour to point out that as long ago as 1919, 1920, this parliament made provisions for financial assistance to labour exchanges and that the labour exchanges have during all those years been gathering certain information which has been made available to the governments of the country. It is contemplated that the information which can be derived from investigation not by these three men themselves but from the machinery connected with the commission will enable them to have a clear appreciation of the situation with respect to the matters to which the hon. gentleman has referred. But the unemployment advisory committee is not intended to deal with matters of that kind, neither is it contemplated that it should take any part in what one might call the administrative side of the matter, but rather as citizens of repute, probably serving as a matter of public service, they will be able to give their disinterested advice upon the evidence that may be accumulated by the commission or through its instrumentality. In England this has been found to be a highly desirable committee and one that has done extraordinarily good service, but in that country there is a chain of responsibility that descends to the parish and the small community through the one government that, as the hon. gentleman knows, we do not have here, and one of the difficulties in a country of such vast distances as this is to have a local body that will be able to give adequate reports upon all the matters that affect employment and unemployment. In England the labour exchanges have been regarded as the basis of the success of the operation of a measure of this kind, and I believe the labour exchanges in this country will, when they are functioning as provided by this measure, render invaluable assistance along the lines that have been suggested. I trust my right hon. friend will not suggest that labour exchanges will endeavour to deprive a commission which he proposes to set up of any power or authority in that regard. But I think whoever administers government will find the labour exchanges invaluable from the standpoint of being able to collect such definite and positive information.

Mr. NEILL: In a year or two.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think not. I should say in a very short time, because the exchanges themselves are functioning at the present time although they are not functioning to the extent which this measure provides. With the added jurisdiction provided by the legislation I think they will become of first rate importance to the country, apart altogether from the service they will render in connection with the service they will render in connection with the measure itself.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Westminster act referred to is the Unemployment Assistance Act, 1934, which was printed, according to the instructions of the House of Commons at Westminster, on December 11, 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: There are two statutes to which I take it the hon. member refers. One deals with the benefits that are called unemployment assistance apart altogether from the question of unemployment insurance. The Unemployment Assistance Act of 1934 was added to the Unemployment Act of 1932 as part II thereof. It begins of course with the very local unit of administrative power and traces up to the highest point of responsibility under that statute. The poor laws, for instance, are subject to consideration in dealing with that act. There is provision for sudden or urgent necessity in trade disputes, cases of special difficulty, suspension from the advantages of the act, and matters of that kind. That is the act to which reference was made. The Poor Relief Act, to which some reference was made, went back as far as 1601, and then there is the poor law practice before 1914. All that is the historical side of the matter. And then there is the statute which is the Unemployment Assistance Act, the one to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the right hon. gentleman. With that act of 1934, there is a lengthy memorandum explanatory of the draft made under section 32. That legislation is very interesting, but I was greatly disappointed when I read it. I listened carefully to a broadcast given by the Prime Minister. I do not mean the Prime Minister of Canada; I mean the Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald, and I have before me a clipping from the Montreal Star quoting that broadcast. This appeared the same day the broadcast was made, namely November 9, 1934. Mr. MacDonald spoke about this very legislation which has been referred to by some hon. gentlemen:

MacDonald Highlights.

That is the heading of the article.

Right Hon. Ramsay MacDonald, speaking at the Lord Mayor's banquet in the ancient Guildhall of London, England, at 4.10 to-day said:

"It has become quite clear that the unemployed problem of our generation calls for national planning and coordination.

To reclassify our unemployed we have made a new unemployment act, one of the greatest advances in social legislation and administration that this country has known.

We must never forget that they are human beings. A great majority of them are men and women whose distress is their misfortune."

He said that there was to be a reclassification of the unemployed. A good friend I have in Westminster was kind enough to send me the act and the memorandum, but I was very much disappointed in reading them because both of them contained nothing with regard to reclassification of the unemployed according to trade. This is vital. The other day I listened to the Prime Minister and he gave us figures from the census of 1931. We are now in 1935 and from the calendar on the table I see that this is February 18. What are the figures for February 18, 1935? Are they the figures of 1931? I remember distinctly that the census figures of the unemployed were not given in 1931 or in 1932; they were given by the Minister of Labour in 1933, two years after they were gathered. Is this reasonable? Are we posted as to the real situation of the unemployed? Paragraph (e) of the definitions reads: "continuously unemployed." There are some men who work part time and they may be considered as unemployed because their salary is not sufficient to cover the expenses of their living. There are many people who are being taken care of by their fathers. For instance there are farmers' sons who left for the cities, married and had children while they were working there; they have lost their jobs on account of the tariff policy of the government; they have returned home and their fathers now have to take care of them. According to this, however, they are not considered as unemployed. I defy the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour or any other of his colleagues to give the right figures about unemployment, including those taken care of by their parents or relatives. They have no figures. They come here with the figures of the census of 1931. Bluff, humbug, deceit. Was the number of unemployed the same in 1931 as it is on February 18, 1935? Those figures are out of date. They are all right to put on the blackboard for school children, but they are not the proper figures to give to members of parliament. The Prime Minister cannot object to what I say, because once I asked him the question and he was about to reply when an hon. member who did not hear my question got up and interrupted him. Afterwards I asked him in straight language: "What are you doing to classify the unemployed? What can you do to relieve unemployment unless you have reliable figures about the numbers according to their trade?" What was his answer? His answer was: "We are doing our best in that regard." I wonder what "our best" means. I wonder if it means anything. That answer was confirmation of what I had been saying for years in this house. This request is based on logic. What does the government know about the number of unemployed according to trade? Can the Minister of Labour tell me the number of white collar unemployed in any city, town or village in this country? He does not know, neither does the Prime Minister, neither do the third rate clerks who drafted this legislation, copied it from similar legislation passed in other countries without regard to the special conditions of this country. They know nothing; they have no foundations; they build castles in the air. What for? Propaganda, that is all. I said that this afternoon and I say it again: Does the Prime Minister—for whom I have a high regard, except when he makes such statements as he sometimes does; outside the house I have great respect for him—does he say seriously to this house that he can do anything for the relief of unemployment unless he knows about their number according to trade? That is essential; it is something every one should know. I am surprised that such an eminent man refuses to inform himself about that. It has been repeated time and time again that each unemployed person should be considered individually, just the same as each soldier who was wounded on the battlefield had to be looked after individually.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member were less violent in some of his observations I should be able perhaps to deal with them more promptly. I shall venture to take a little time to place upon Hansard, in order that hon. members may have it for their edification, the statement made by the actuaries upon which this legislation was based. Mr. Watson's addendum relating to this particular point reads as follows:

Having regard for the benefit provisions of the bill, more particularly the provisions for "additional days" and "the maximum benefit" limitations, it was found convenient to proceed to the computation of contributions by first computing the probability of being idle one week or more, two weeks or more, three weeks or more, and so on, from which can be obtained the probability of being idle less than one week, one to two weeks, two to three weeks, and so on. The probability of being idle ten to eleven weeks, for example, is also the probability that contributions will be made for forty-one and a half weeks on the average, so that the one set of probabilities is useful in computing both the average period for which contributions will be made and the average number of idle days in the year from all causes.

It was decided that the standard of unemployment to be provided for should be substantially that of the eleven years ending May 31, 1931. While this period was extraordinary and showed violent extremes, there may be reasons for thinking that the next ten or eleven years may settle down to as high an average level of unemployment without the extreme variations. In any event it can hardly be considered unreasonable to aim at making provision for the average unemployment of those eleven years.

The calculation of the contributions for the benefits in the bill were in the main based on

(1) Data concerning "working time lost" (all causes) as obtained at the census of 1921 and of 1931, and time lost through illness in the year preceding the census date (June 1), separately for males and females.

(2) Intercensal data compiled by the bureau of statistics, largely from returns obtained monthly from employers of labour, males and females combined, and

(3) Data concerning time lost through strikes and lockouts 1921-31, from the records of strikes and lockouts published monthly in the Labour Gazette.

All of these data were compiled by the bureau of statistics specially for the purposes of this report, having regard for industries and occupations to which the scheme of the bill extends.

"Working time lost" or "time idle" for census purposes includes (a) loss of job ("no job"), (b) temporary lay-off, (c) illness, (d) accident, (e) strike and lock-out, and (f) other causes. The percentages of time lost due to the several causes are as follows:

Unemployment and Time Lost: Wage-earners of all Industries and Occupations, Canada 1930-31
(Compiled by the bureau of statistics)

Cause of lost time	Males %	Females %	Both sexes %
No job	81.15	73.66	80.26
Temporary lay-off	12.25	14.87	12.56
Total	93.40	88.53	92.82
Illness	5.21	9.69	5.74
Accident	1.00	.39	.93
Strike or lock-out	.04	.06	.04
Other causes	.35	1.33	.47
Grand total	100.00	100.00	100.00

In compiling the unemployment data, however, by periods of unemployment, causes of unemployment are not distinguished; the data are for all idle time. These data are appropriate for computing the time for which contributions will be paid, but require adjustment to arrive at the number of days on the average for which unemployment benefits will be paid under the scheme of the bill. The 1921 census data used, reduced to the basis of 100,000 wage earners, are:

Males and Females—All Canada

Persons idle according to periods of idleness

Time idle (in weeks)	Number of persons idle
0	59,406
1–4	8,480

9½	24,076
13½	17,303
17½	13,190
26½	5,193

The following additional data relating to the 1921 census may be of interest.

	Per 1921 census data	Per 100,000 wage earners
Number of wage earners, June 1, 1921	1,225,316	100,000
Number idle at some time in year ended June 1, 1921	497,423	40,595
Number idle on June 1, 1921	145,898	11,907
Number who lost time through illness in year ended June 1, 1921	150,088	12,249
Number of weeks lost through illness in year	1,078,878*	88,049*

* Approximate.

In compiling the 1921 census data the results were tabulated for each of the weeks 5–9, and the data are thus reproduced in the above table to illustrate the possible extent of the local shiftings in the data. Curiously enough, there is no evidence of concentration on five weeks of idleness.

The following table based on the 1931 census, but mainly by four-week groups, also shows evidence of local shiftings.

The group 25–28 may be noted in comparison with the preceding and following group.

The 1931 census data used, likewise reduced to the basis of 100,000 wage earners, are—

Males and Females—All Canada

Persons idle according to periods of idleness		Persons idle for the number of weeks indicated or more
Time idle (in weeks)	Number of persons idle	Time idle (in weeks)	Number of persons idle
0	53,181	0	100,000

29–32	3,749	28½	15,618
33–40	5,278	32½	11,869
41–48	2,653	40½	6,591
49	3,938	38½	3,938

The following additional data relating to the 1931 census may be of interest.

	Per 1931 census data	Per 100,000 wage earners
Number of wage earners, June 1, 1931	1,719,834	100,000
Number idle at some time in year ended June 1, 1931	805,205	46,819
Number idle on June 1, 1931	370,966	21,570
Number who lost time through illness in year ended June 1, 1931	87,062	5,062
Number of weeks lost through illness in year	1,054,763	61,329

Perhaps the committee will remember that this is a smaller figure, actually, than is shown by the 1921 census, that figure being 1,078,898. But the actuaries pointed out that this figure could be established not actually but only approximately, whereas in 1931 special instructions were given in connection with the census. I think the right hon. gentleman had something to do with the preparations for that census, and it fell to the late Minister of Trade and Commerce to carry it through. Special endeavours were made to ascertain the exact number idle on the first day of June, 1931, and the figures were 87,062 out of the entire working population of 1,719,834.

[Mr. Bennett.]

No, those figures are not correct; I have transposed them. The number idle was 370,966, while the number losing time through illness was 87,062.

The numbers idle, per 100,000 wage earners, as shown in the final column of the 1921 census table, page A3, and in the 1931 census tables on this page, were plotted on cross-ruled paper according to the time idle in weeks, and a curve was drawn with a spline among the plotted points. From these curves were read off the probabilities of being unemployed less than one week, one to two weeks, two to three weeks, and so on. The 1921 and 1931 probabilities were not used directly in the computation of the rates of contribution, but from these probabilities and the probabilities for the nine year period, 1922-30, the probabilities for the eleven year period, 1921-31, were computed, the latter probabilities being the main basis used in determining the contributions. All of these probabilities are shown on page A8.

If it should be noted that, in drawing all of the probability curves referred to in the next preceding paragraph, the spline was sloped so as to increase the probabilities for the periods of idle time approaching zero, for it is believed that a substantial proportion of those reporting no idle time in the census year had in fact short periods of idle time. Those who had had several short periods of idle time of, say, one, two or three days, might easily forget the whole or a portion thereof in the course of the year, or might not think it worth while to report what might appear to be a trifling amount of idle time.

By drawing the curves in this manner indicated above, the average idle time as computed from the curve probabilities is larger than if the census data were adhered to more closely in drawing the curves, but there is practically no addition to unemployed days for benefit purposes, for, under the scheme of the bill, the first nine unemployed days are excluded for benefit purposes. There is a slight reduction in the average number of weeks of contribution, and this is on the safe side.

I am perfectly willing that this section should stand, but I read this so that hon. members may have no doubt as to the basis upon which the measure has been framed. Mr. Watson, the actuary from whose report I read, is associated with the actuarial branch of our insurance department, and he enjoys a very high reputation. But the government believed that the members of the house would require information from some other source, and the other day I tabled a report by Mr. Wolfenden, a consulting actuary, who has given a great deal of time to this matter.

I should like to answer, if I might, one criticism, and that is that this measure should have been introduced last year. The census was completed in 1931. In the debate that arose on a resolution presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I promised that if we were alive before we ceased to be a government—at least before we dissolved parliament—we would ask the house to consider an unemployment insurance measure. More perhaps than hon. members opposite are concerned I have been concerned in trying to expedite this measure. It has not been easy to sift out all the figures to which I have directed attention, as shown by the census. If any hon. gentleman thinks the tabulating of the returns of a census is a simple process, all he has to do is go up to the statistical branch and observe the operation of the machines by which definite information is tabulated. That information was long in preparation and difficult of computation. Then it had to be compared with the information obtained in 1921, and an average had to be made in order to be able to provide, with some degree of actuarial certainty, for the contingencies with which the bill deals, bringing the information down to 1934. So these figures have been framed on an eleven year period, which it is believed will be as adverse a period against the fund as it would be possible to conceive under ordinary conditions, for, as is pointed out by Mr. Watson, we would be unwise if we projected ourselves into the future with a too optimistic mind, and on the other hand we would be unfair if we dealt with the matter with a mind too pessimistic. So, taking the figures during the eleven year period ending in 1931, you have the result to which I have referred.

There is one further word I should like to say in consequence of the observation made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. In the very nature of things legislation of this kind can become operative only after it has been in force for a considerable period of time. The greatest social reformer of our modern times, dealing with this legislation, pointed out how unwise it is for a people to endeavour to predicate their position upon no change, and how desirable it is to try to look into the future for a period of at least two years. In the effort that is represented by this bill there has been an endeavour to look beyond the confines of today and visualize at least to some extent the conditions that may exist two years hence, at the lowest, so that the operation of the bill, if there were a recurrence or even a continuance of conditions of depression, would find the country at least equipped to meet it. The corresponding benefits, with the adjustment of benefits to the farming and labouring population, comes about through the exercise of their purchasing power on the one hand and, shall I say, so far as this is concerned, from the very earnest endeavour that has been made that even more than equally corresponding benefits should be conferred upon the agricultural population. I read this report in order that it may be before the committee, because it is difficult for all to have access to this document.

Now I think possibly it is desirable to put the following table on the record, because many hon. members are particularly interested in it:

[Mr. Bennett.]

The following is a summary of the intercensal unemployment data compiled by the Bureau of Statistics based on statistics from many sources, but mainly from monthly returns made by employers of labour.

I apologize for having taken so much time to read these figures, but I think it only fair to the committee that they should have them before them. Unless this long document were printed, dealing with matters some of which are not of very great interest to the committee, there would be no other way of giving the information to hon. members; for that reason I have taken the time to read it. If it is the desire of hon. members, further consideration of section 6 may stand until they have had the opportunity to examine the figures I have placed on the record.

Mr. POULIOT: Before it stands may I say—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The hon. member for Gloucester has the floor.

Mr. VENIOT: The Prime Minister has given the figures for 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929 and 1930. Could he give similar figures for the years 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: No, although I did give the approximate figures respecting 1932 and 1933. I cannot give them with respect to 1934. I shall look them up again and see if I have them here.

Mr. HANBURY: They could be made part of the table.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not wish to interrupt, but first of all I wish to tell the right hon. gentleman opposite that I used no violent language; I was just in an indignant mood, that is all. I am pleased to note that the hon. member for Gloucester has brought up the matter to which he has just referred. The figures which the right hon. gentleman has quoted are a vindication of the policy the Liberal government followed during the nine years they were in power. Why is that so? Because the figures he has read show only a very small number of unemployed in that time. When he goes to the country he will give the figures of the working men during the time the Liberal party was in power. Let him give the figures showing the unemployed, so that the people may be in a position to subtract that number from the number who were working in 1930. Sir, the Prime Minister has been most unfair in the manner in which he has presented his figures. I have nothing to say about Mr. Watson. He may be a very honourable gentleman, and I am not attacking him. However I have quoted figures long enough to know that figures can be digested only after they have appeared in Hansard. The Prime Minister may read tables, but who understands them? What difference does it make whether the Prime Miinster says "females, 20·5; males 30·5; both sexes 25·056"—what difference does it make? Let him give other figures. I imagine people with pencils and paper calculating these figures; they come here and say that this or that will save the country. We have had enough of that. The Prime Minister is too serious a man to give us figures of the time the Liberal party was in power, and then say to the people, "This is the number of people who will take advantage of this scheme of unemployment insurance." That is most unfair, and untrue. Why? Because there are so many unemployed now that of three men one man works, one does not work and one works only part time. The man working part time is supported by the man who works all the time. For that reason the man who works all the time has to support not only himself and his family but also the unemployed and the man who works part time. Sometimes he has many children, and the added burden is very great. To quote now figures showing conditions during the time the Mackenzie King government was in power is an absurd procedure.

The question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester was a timely one. Let them come here on February 18, 1935, give the actual number of unemployed and the actual number who are working, and then they will have to tell all the unemployed, "This insurance scheme is of no use to you." On the other hand the government will have to tell the people who are at work now, "We have a scheme for you. You will get something if you pay, and if your employer pays, and if this legislation is declared valid by the courts of this country. Otherwise you will get nothing." The Prime Minister has been very careful in his remarks. I have often heard him say: It is a move in the right direction. But he changes so often that he might change before this is put into force. He has changed about tariffs, and about many other things. He might change about this, and then the people will have nothing. But the election will be past and in the meantime his party expects to take advantage of this legislation. I mention this because it is my deep conviction that this legislation is only humbug and bluff, and we are not here to listen to humbug and bluff.

We hear hon. gentlemen opposite speak of the legacy received from the former administration. I see one of my friends on the treasury benches smile at that. He knows he has used that language. I also see another friend of mine from the province of Quebec speaking to one of his colleagues when he should be listening to this. I have heard him say over the radio: What a legacy we received from the Liberal party! Well, the legacy he received was the figures which the right hon. gentleman has just quoted about the numbers of men who were working. Let him look at the change in 1930 as compared with 1929, the small drop in the number of men who were working in 1930 at the time when the Tories were paying people to wear white buttons and parade as unemployed in order to disturb the meetings of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. That is what was done, and it was just bluff and humbug in 1930 as it is bluff and humbug now.

During the adjournment I happened to meet Rip Van Winkle, who had been asleep since July, 1930, when he heard the present Prime Minister say at Moncton, "I will end unemployment or perish in the attempt." He asked me: "What is going on now in the house"? I told him: "Unemployment insurance," and he asked me: "How is that? Unemployment should have been cured before now. Who is putting it through"? I said that it was the hon. member for West Calgary, and Rip Van Winkle asked: "Who is the hon. member for West Calgary? Surely he has been defeated, because if he had become prime minister there would have been no unemployment in this country." I replied: "No, Rip. It is a most extraordinary thing. He did not perish in the attempt, but the country has perished in the attempt, and the number of unemployed is now so great that he is afraid to state the correct number of unemployed to the House of Commons."

The Prime Minister says he will come to their rescue, but how can he when he does not know their number, does not know where they are or how they are? The only thing he knows is the amount that was paid by this government to the provincial governments, and about some schemes to give a chance to profiteers to make money out of building wharves and things like that. That is all he knows about. Let me tell him, as I have very often told his supporters, and the members of the government, that they should create a wall around him to give him time to think about the business of this country, instead of being importuned by callers who come seeking jobs. I know very well that if the right hon. gentleman had been left alone, instead of being encouraged in this policy of desperation, in this nefarious policy, by people who call themselves his friends but are not, the policy of this government would have been entirely different. But to-night I have the satisfaction of my life. I see the vindication of the Liberal party, a vindication of the Liberal policy during the ten years the Liberal party was in power, and in future when one hears any Tory member opposite say "Look at the legacy we received from the Liberal party," the reply will be, "Remember Mr. Watson's figures which were read and taken as his own by the Prime Minister on the night of February 18, 1935." Then they will be just as dumb as ministers of the crown.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, when I hear the high crescendo of the hon. gentleman I sometimes think of Tennyson's words:

> An infant crying in the night:
> An infant crying for the light:
> And with no language but a cry.

It cannot but impress itself upon one's mind in that way. I did endeavour to read the figures which were prepared by Mr. Watson, and which for purposes of computation have been used as I indicated. I read them into Hansard, so that if the committee desires the section to stand, it may do so and be considered in the light of the figures I have read.

Mr. McPHEE: Has the Prime Minister the figures on hand of the unemployed in 1931?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the figures but I will give them before we get through, from another angle altogether when we come to deal with the question of computations.

Mr. MULOCK: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say that all these people will come under this measure?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that.

Mr. MULOCK: Or is that the number of those employed?

Mr. BENNETT: They were the people employed who were reported to the office of the dominion statistician. It has been explained here on more than one occasion that the basis of contribution has at times been changed because a larger number of operating industries had reported at one time than another, and the number of people employed had increased. But those are the figures on which the actuaries proceeded in making the computations they did for the periods of time I have indicated.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If this section is to stand there is a suggestion I should like to make to the Prime Minister, and that is that he recast the section. It is a question of drafting. It seems to me that if the section ended where subsection 2 starts, and if that were made a new section, the whole thing would be a good deal clearer. I just want to leave that suggestion with the Prime Minister and see if it is not possible to clarify this section, which is pretty much involved as it stands at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the hon. member referring to the printed section 7, the renumbered section 6?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The printed section 7.

Mr. BENNETT: Now section 6. Frankly I cannot see any difficulty about that but I will look it over.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If the Prime Minister will consider it, I think he will perhaps see that it could be made clearer.

Mr. McPHEE: The figures given by the Prime Minister in connection with the unemployed in 1931 are very much at variance with the statement he gave to the house on September 10, 1930, during the special session, and I think it just as well the committee should be advised of the figures given to the house by the Prime Minister himself at that time.

The figures he gave to-night from Mr. Watson would indicate that 320,000 were unemployed in this country in 1931, while the figures given by the Prime Minister himself on September 10, 1930, indicate that only 117,000 were unemployed at that time. That is, the number had been increased by 200,000 in that one year. I quote the figures as given to the house by the Prime Minister on September 10, 1930, at page 63 of Hansard:

> I find that at present in the province of Alberta there are 5,155 unemployed; during the winter it is contemplated that that number will reach 6,650. In British Columbia at the present time the unemployed number 7,692 and it is expected that during the winter that number will increase to 14,700. In the province of Saskatchewan the present number given is 5,276 and it is expected to rise during the winter to 8,201. In Manitoba the figure is now 6,950, with a possible 9,600 in the winter. In Ontario the figure is given as 49,367, rising to 82,214.

I might interject here that in the city of Toronto alone there are at present some 26,000 families on relief. The Prime Minister went on:

> In Quebec the present number is 41,190, as against an anticipated number of 49,290. In New Brunswick the present number is 500 and it is expected it may reach 2,850. In Nova Scotia the present number is 1,800 and it may rise to 2,350.

Prince Edward Island is the only province not mentioned in the list. Later on the Prime Minister says:

> It will be observed that the present number is something over 117,000, and it is believed that number will approximate 177,000 during the winter.

Mr. HEAPS: According to the figures the Prime Minister submitted this evening it appears that there was an average unemployment, of those who were partly employed, of 18.4 weeks per year. What effect would such a condition have on the insurability of part time employees? Can the Prime Minister give us that information to-night? If not, I should like to have it when this section is again under consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: This whole plan is based upon the figures prepared by the actuaries on the bases that I have indicated to the house; and to add to or take from them would necessarily change the actuarial computations.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think I have made myself clear. The bill provides for a certain number of payments per annum for persons to become eligible for the benefits of its provisions. Now according to the tabulation given us this evening it appears that there was an average unemployment, of those partly employed in industry, of 18.4 weeks over a period of years. Let us assume that a person is unemployed for four months of the year; what would be the position of that man under the bill? Would he be entitled to its benefits, or would he be entitled if his employment were intermittent? In that event would he be debarred from the benefits contemplated here?

Mr. BENNETT: He is entitled to seventy-eight days or thirteen weeks commencing nine days after his unemployment begins, plus such benefits as may have accrued to him by reason of his having been continuously employed in a period of time up to as long as five years.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Under this section it is provided that the commission may make proposals to the governor in council in connection with various matters—extension of insurance to excepted employments, assistance for unemployed, training of unemployed, and so on. The contributions under this bill are worked out actuarially and I have been wondering where the money will come from to provide for this work under this particular section. There does not seem to be in the bill any other section that provides for the government to put up anything except its share of the contributions and administration expenses; and particularly under paragraph (c) of subsection 1 it is provided, in co-operation with educational authorities and institutions or otherwise, either generally or in certain areas for any class or classes of such persons, that there shall be physical and industrial training with a view to maintaining or increasing their industrial fitness, and so on. That has reference to unemployed who will not contribute at all to the building up of a fund. Where is the money to come from? Will it be necessary to amend the act or to make a special grant?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason the report is made to the governor in council, to determine what action shall be taken. It involves of course financial provision.

Mr. VENIOT: If I understand it rightly, the actuaries based their calculations on the figures given us by the Prime Minister to-night covering the period from 1922 to 1930. If we cannot get the details of the employment from 1931 to 1933, how could the actuaries be correct in the basis laid down for future contributions if they have not taken into consideration the years 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934 as minutely as they have taken into consideration the years from 1922 to 1930?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman did not follow the report of Mr. Watson showing how be plotted his curve on the basis of the information he had. If the hon. member will read the report carefully I will answer his questions in the light of the statements made therein and of the sections of the bill as well as of the information I put on Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did not Mr. Watson say in some report that one of the effects of such a measure might be to increase the number of unemployed inasmuch as in periods of depression employers, having to pay into a fund, might be inclined to drop some of their staff, also that others would allow employees to be carried on unemployment insurance whose services might be otherwise retained. I saw a reference to a report—I thought it was made by Mr. Watson—to that effect. Did he submit any such report?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not recall that, in either the report of Wolfenden or the report of Watson, though I recall something similar in the English report—I believe, in the report of the royal commission on unemployment insurance. I will try to ascertain the facts by to-morrow.

[Mr. Bothwell.]

Mr. VENIOT: May I call attention again to these figures. In making comparisons showing the number of employed as of June, 1931 the Prime Minister gave the figure 1,719,834. He mentioned that number at the beginning of his remarks, and when I asked the question he must have forgotten this figure because he said he did not have it for 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the hon. member said 1932, because I had read 1931.

Mr. VENIOT: There has been a misunderstanding between us.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the hon. gentleman referred to 1932, 1933 and 1934.

Mr. VENIOT: When we come to this section again I should like to have the same detailed statement for 1932, 1933 and 1934 that the Prime Minister gave for 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: It is impossible to give it in the same detail, for on June 1, 1931 the census was taken and these are census figures. But the figures for 1932, 1933, and I hope at least part of 1934, I will give to-morrow, because they are the sum total of those employed and reporting. There is a distinction between those that report and those that do not, because there are many employed in this country with respect to whom no report is made to the statistical department, as has been frequently pointed out in this house. As regards those who report, however, I will furnish the committee with particulars.

Mr. VENIOT: The figures given for the years from 1923 to 1930 are based on returns submitted to the statistical department by concerns employing people throughout the dominion. If that could be done in those years and in that way, why can it not be done for 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934 in a similar way, without reference to the census?

Mr. BENNETT: I have these figures but not beside me; I had only that part of the report that I read. But I said a moment ago that the figures for 1931 are census figures and therefore they check more fully against actual conditions as reported by employing concerns. The census figures for 1921 are also given. From 1923 to 1930 the figures were sent to the statistical department by reporting concerns; 1931 is a census figure; and 1932, 1933 and 1934, as far as I can give it, will be provided.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know what we are discussing but I am still on section 7.

The CHAIRMAN: It is section 7 as printed. We are under paragraph (b).

Mr. MITCHELL: Paragraph (a) reads:

Providing unemployment insurance for the employments excepted from the operation of part III of this act, or for any of them, either by extending thereto the provisions of that part, with such modifications, if any, as may be found necessary, or by special or supplementary schemes.

What is contemplated by the government where the paragraph reads, "by special or supplementary schemes"?

Mr. BENNETT: Just what it says, following the language that was employed in one of the other acts, amplified to some extent, that, this being a new bill, these commissioners will make their inquiries and the result of their inquiries will be made in a report to the governor in council who will then determine whether financially and otherwise such proposal will be made effective. That is what that means. The one that follows is somewhat similar, but it provides for the assistance, during unemployment, of persons ordinarily employed in any of the employments excepted from the operation of part III and those who are ordinarily employed in insurable employment but who for the time being are not entitled to unemployment insurance benefit under this legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would this take within its provisions say an insurance company that already has a scheme somewhat similar to this?

Mr. BENNETT: They are not included in the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: This does not give power to include those?

Mr. BENNETT: Not this provision. A later one may be open to that construction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have the reference to what I had in mind. In the Ottawa Journal of February 15 the following statement is made based on a report tabled by the Prime Minister. It refers to Mr. Watson:

If a high degree of stability in employment were attained, said Mr. Watson, the chief function of unemployment insurance would be to tide workpeople over short periods of unemployment between jobs.

The policy, however, has itself the tendency, for various reasons, to increase unemployment. Mr. Watson cited these as follows:

Good employers, accustomed to retaining their workers during slack periods, use the unemployment fund to carry surplus staff over these periods.

Many workers once on benefit are "not so zealous in their search for work as they would be if they had no income at all."

Unemployment insurance tends to induce an over supply of workers to seek employment in insured industries and those who lose employment are less ready to take uninsured employment.

And so forth. Evidently Mr. Watson has made a report somewhere.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in that document from which I read; I sent it to Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it in the report the Prime Minister read to-night, and if so will that appear in Hansard?

Mr. BENNETT: The whole report made by Mr. Watson has been tabled. I have read only from the part dealing with the figures which I had in my notes, and I sent it to Hansard. But I have no doubt it is in the document that was tabled if the paper says it is, because it was from that document that the paper took the extract. I think somewhat similar observations were made with respect to the English system at the time it was introduced.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): So far as this general clause is concerned, it would appear to be a direction to the commission that is to be appointed, and so perhaps it would be unfair on my part or on that of any other hon. member to draw any hard and fast conclusions therefrom. But reading paragraph (c) in conjunction with the British act I find a very close similarity in language between the two. Am I correct in assuming that most of the clauses under paragraph (c) are taken almost word for word from the British act?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That would imply, therefore, the application of some type of system in Canada eventually similar to that now operating in Great Britain?

Mr. BENNETT: Not necessarily.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I hope not. I am glad to hear the Prime Minister say that. Under the British act there is a provision which compels employers to notify the minister—in this case it would be the commission, I presume—in the case of the discharge of any young worker between the ages of fourteen and eighteen. The object of that, so far as the act seems to be concerned, is that they may be instructed to attend compulsorily some local training camp, or industrial centre, as it is euphoniously termed. If children of fourteen or fifteen years of age fail to attend, action may be taken against the parents and the parents may be fined a certain sum for not compelling their child or children to attend such an industrial centre. Furthermore, the minister can then take proceedings under the Education Act of 1921 or the Education, Scotland, Act, of 1918, or the Day and Industrial Schools Act, Scotland, of 1893, to remove the young workers entirely from the parents' control and order them to be placed in the charge of other relatives or a person named by the minister, or order their attendance in a reformatory school. In other words, the minister may order young workers to enter such a place for a period that may be three years or less, at least until they are eighteen years of age. The reason for that in Great Britain is clear. It is that the benefits under their act appear to be quite insufficient to enable the parents adequately to take care of themselves and their children. I am content that the Prime Minister is seized of the great social importance of having the children kept in the home, especially at that extremely delicate age, fourteen to sixteen, the age of adolescence, a most dangerous period for both male and female. I would suggest therefore that in the consideration of any scheme under this clause of the bill regard is had to the necessity for taking proper precautions to see that the children are not taken from the parents unless there is some other reason, for instance, criminal taint or mental taint or something of that sort. If the parents are satisfactory citizens; if they are doing the best they can, they should be assisted financially in sending their children to suitable schools in the vicinity, and even in going to high school, but the children should never be taken from under the care of the parents. I sincerely trust the Prime Minister, although he has no children, will see that the minister, if he happens to be in control, will take that fact into due consideration. I am frankly opposed to the British system in this regard.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the point is very well taken, but I think also the hon. member for Bow River will at once admit that conditions that obtain in Great Britain are not similar to those that obtain in this country. For instance, our truancy acts and compulsory attendance in schools are entirely different from what they were in England at one time; I think there has been some modification during the last two years, although I am not quite certain as to that. In Ontario I think children are compelled under compulsory provisions of the statute and of the Truancy Act to attend school until they are sixteen; that is my recollection. In Alberta we have somewhat the same provisions. In Great Britain they endeavoured to raise the age to sixteen and there was a great deal of difficulty about the matter. I do not think the hon. gentleman need fear any effort to enforce the provisions of the statute along the lines he has suggested, at least not while this government is in power.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the Prime Minister when he moved the second reading of the bill said he would have printed the reports of both Mr. Wolfenden and Mr. Watson. The very voluminous report of Mr. Wolfenden covers about thirty pages and that of Mr. Watson a little more. I still think it would be of great assistance if these reports were printed.

Mr. BENNETT: Probably the hon. gentleman was not in his place when I tabled the reports, and stated why I thought it was not desirable to spend the money to print them. If it is the desire of the committee that they be printed, it will be done, but of course it will take some time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As this subject is likely to be of importance for years to come, I think it would be of advantage to have them printed, and it might as well be done at once.

Mr. BENNETT: In that event I will take the necessary action this evening. I think one is a little longer than the other. It was in Mr. Watson's report that reference was made to what the right hon. gentleman now mentions, although not in those terms. Paragraphs 3 and 4 deal with the matter, and paragraph 1 dealt with the possibility of there being an increase in unemployment from the fact that unemployment insurance is payable. The words were:

(3) Unemployment insurance tends to induce an over-supply of workers to seek employment in insured industries, and those who lost employment are less ready to take uninsured employment.

I shall take steps to have both these reports printed.

Mr. HANBURY: This section provides only, I understand, for the commission making proposals for the consideration of the governor in council. They cannot of themselves make any of these various clauses effective. Could the governor in council make the recommendations effective without submission to parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: That would depend entirely upon what the provisions were. Obviously with respect to financial commitments in a large way they could not. With respect to regulations provided for in the statute, they might be able to authorize them. It is intended that the commission shall not of its own mere motion commit the government to expenditures that would be at variance with the general principles upon which the statute is based, but it would report to the government, which would determine as a matter of policy what action should be taken.

Mr. HANBURY: I understand then that if a change suggested by the commission were acceptable to the governor in council the governor in council could make it effective if it did not require contribution by the federal government; if the funds provided through the insurance were sufficient they could make it effective without submission to parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: The general principles of the bill determine within themselves the limits of the powers of the commission, both to initiate and to administer. With respect to initiation their powers are powers of reporting to the government. The government must determine what action shall be taken within the ambit of the bill itself. If it involves expenditures which would throw the machinery out of gear from an actuarial standpoint, obviously neither party would make such proposals effective until there had been readjustment under the statute itself to deal with the disequilibrium between premiums and benefits. The scheme could not be operated on a basis that would make it insolvent. That is the reason these provisions are very definite in their terms.

Mr. HANBURY: In that event any change would require submission to parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Was it under this section, or if not what section, that the Prime Minister promised to reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) with regard to coal miners? I am interested also; I spoke of this on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it is a later section, dealing with those entitled to benefits.

Section stands.

On section 8—Officers and employees to be appointed under Civil Service Act.

Mr. HANBURY: I think this is the item about the cost to the federal treasury?

Mr. BENNETT: No, this is not the clause.

Mr. HANBURY: Well, subsection 3 says:

> The costs of administration of this act, including remuneration of commissioners, officers, clerks and employees, shall be paid out of moneys provided by parliament.

The Prime Minister might give the information in connection with that clause.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to that subsection the estimate given varies. In Great Britain they estimated the entire cost at about twelve and a half per cent of the sum passing through their hands. If the fund were to consist of $42,000,000 the dominion would pay one-fifth of the joint contribution of the employer and the employee; in other words the dominion pays one dollar to five dollars paid by the employer and the employee, which is one-sixth of the total, plus the cost of administration, estimated at somewhere between twelve and a half and fifteen per cent. That is the figure incorporated. The expenditure for administration I am putting at possibly fifteen per cent, which would mean an expenditure of something over $7,000,000.

Mr. HANBURY: That would be in addition to the contribution of the government to the fund itself?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. HANBURY: Is that money to be provided for in the estimates?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. When the Old Age Pensions Act was under consideration it was provided that the money should be taken out of any undistributed moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. All that can be done so far as parliament is concerned in the first year of this bill will be to make an estimate. Whether or not it should be dealt with as the old age pensions provisions were dealt with, or by a special estimate, has not been determined.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Some discussion took place before recess that should have taken place on this section, as to the question of appointments by the civil service commission. I suggest to the Prime Minister that subsection 2 of section 8 is ambiguous. It reads:

> For the purposes of any investigation, or for any other purpose of this act, the commission may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, from time to time temporarily employ such persons of technical and professional attainments as the commission may deem necessary.

Taken in conjunction with subsection 1 it indicates to me that all technical and professional appointments will be made under patronage, because subsection 1 simply says that the commission may employ, pursuant to the Civil Service Act, "officers, clerks, and employees;" it does not mention technical or professional services of any kind. If the Prime Minister would change the wording of subsection 1 very slightly, as as to make it read:

> The commission may employ such officers, clerks, employees and such persons of technical and professional attainments for the purposes of this act as the commission may deem necessary—

—then the situation would be much clearer. As it stands now it would appear that technical and professional appointments can be made only under subsection 2.

Mr. BENNETT: The bill as written exactly represents the intention of the government. It refers first to the permanent employees of the commission; they are to be appointed by the civil service commission. Temporary employees, experts for any particular purpose, are appointed by the governor in council; it has been so with respect to such matters in all countries, and I suppose will continue to be. Where you do not desire to employ an expert continuously, or where you engage, as we have, the services of a professor from one of the universities, or a consulting actuary, he is treated as being an expert for a specific purpose. It will be observed that the word "temporarily" governs the whole provision—"temporarily employ such persons of technical and professional attainments as the commission may deem necessary." When the commission deems them necessary for temporary employment the governor in council must approve.

Mr. HEAPS: The question of administration was raised a moment ago, and I should like to refer back to that question. The Prime Minister pointed out that the administration cost in Great Britain was approximately 12½ per cent of the fund, and he estimated that approximately the same amount would be involved in Canada. If I remember correctly the last figure I saw, contributions in Great Britain consisted of 8d. by the employer, 7d. by the employee and 7d. by the state, a total of 22d. or 44 cents. Twelve and a half per cent of that would be approximately 5½ cents, which would represent the cost of administration in Great Britain on that basis. Under this act we propose that the employer will contribute 25 cents, the employee 25 cents and the government 10 cents plus the cost of administration; I am speaking of male employees over the age of twenty-one. Twelve and a half per cent of the 60 cents would be approximately 7½ cents. I do not know whether the cost of administration here will run approximately 40 per cent more than the cost in Great Britain. Probably we will have an opportunity of discussing this aspect of the question later on, but assuming that it will cost 7½ cents for administration for each person that would only bring up the contribution of the government to 17½ cents per person as against a contribution of 33 per cent on the part of the British government. This is one place where the government has not seen fit to follow the British precedent. Probably when the time comes to discuss the question of contributions we will refer to this matter again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the Prime Minister any idea how many officers and employees will be required for administration?

Mr. BENNETT: This starts with the labour exchange as the lowest unit, and the communities will be divided into sections having regard to the size of the country. Perhaps the maritime provinces, the two large central provinces and the west will comprise the separate units, or there may be four, five or six. The number of employees will vary, of course. At first it may require a little larger number than later, because it will be necessary to get in some collected form the information which is available from the local communities. The exchange offices already have the basis of that information, as the right hon. gentleman knows, and the extent to which it will have to be amplified will depend upon the detail with which the commission will require the information to be furnished. I have formed no estimate as to the number, because, as is known, from year to year we vote a sum of money to maintain these labour offices. That sum of money would now be made available for the maintenance of these labour exchange offices, and in large centres of industrial activity such as the two central provinces there would be a vastly greater number of employees than in the smaller industrial centres, represented for instance by the maritime provinces or by the agricultural communities of Saskatchewan or Alberta, in part, although Alberta would have a considerable number by reason of its industrial activities as a result of its mineralization and lumbering. I have not formed any estimate as to the number, but I will make further inquiries and ascertain if it is possible to form an idea as to the number that will be required.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a very important factor, because if this act is to be a federal measure it must be apparent at once that the machinery the provinces have for this purpose can be of no service whatever. In the provinces, where they have the administration of factory, mine and shop acts, they have at hand practically all that is required in the way of staff to administer many of these social measures, but if the federal government is taking it as a federal obligation it will involve, to a considerable extent, I should imagine, the creation of what is sometimes spoken of as a bureaucracy, considering that it will be all new work for the federal government to undertake; and I have no doubt it will require a considerable number of officers throughout the different provinces. Could the Prime Minister indicate in regard to the officers and employees, not the stenographers and such, but the main employees, whether the number would run to five thousand or ten thousand?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman has imagined a larger number than I have even thought of. The employment offices, for which in times past we have really supplied the money, under the reorganization will carry on a good deal of this work, and the Department of Labour, which now carries on investigations all over Canada through fair wage officers and so on, together with the inspection of the employment offices, will be able to continue that function. It is through these officers rather than through the administrative machinery of the provinces, at least in western Canada, that this work is carried on. The reports made under the factory and coal mines acts will in no sense be interfered with by this legislation; neither will there be any duplication of effort in that regard. The employment offices have been the medium through which employers have sought employees and employees have sought employment, since they were established in 1919. Now it is proposed to increase their efficiency, but not in any sense to duplicate the effort of the provinces in dealing with their social problems, just as they have relied on these exchanges since 1920 in connection with their employment difficulties. I will make inquiries, however.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will a considerable staff not be required in connection with the collection of contributions by employees and employers?

Mr. BENNETT: We believe that will be very simple. The collection is to be done by the employer, who is to send in his contribution together with the contributions of his employees. That is one of the provisions of the statute, so that should not greatly multiply the difficulties so far as the staff is concerned. I believe the difficulty they experienced in the old country in connection with administration arose from causes other than those, for instance, to which the right hon. gentleman has referred. My own view is that the number required will be very much less than may be thought by those who look at the bill casually. I will make inquiries as to how many are now employed in all the exchange offices throughout Canada, and see if some estimate can be formed as to what increase may be necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of the statute.

Mr. HANBURY: In connection with this increase to which the Prime Minister has just referred I would remind him that in answer to a question put by myself just a few moments ago he stated that the cost of administration, as I understood it, was expected to be approximately $7,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That would include everything in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. HANBURY: Accepting the figure of $7,000,000, and assuming the expenses in connection with the act to amount to let us say $1,000,000, a total of approximately $6,000,000 would be left to be distributed in salaries. If we take an average income of $1,500 a year this amount would provide for practically four thousand employees.

Mr. BENNETT: From the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. HANBURY: When the leader of the opposition suggested perhaps four thousand or five thousand—

Mr. BENNETT: No; he said five thousand or ten thousand.

Mr. HANBURY: It will provide for about four thousand employees, as I understand it.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not necessarily follow, as I have stated, that this will be the number of employees added. If the existing employees in the Department of Labour and the employment offices are utilized, it would not involve any such increase as that. As I say, the estimate is based merely upon the amount expended. I thought it undesirable to mention any sum which in view of experience might be regarded as entirely inadequate.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I thought I saw something in the bill about buying stamps.

Mr. BENNETT: That mode was in part, discontinued. There are provisions here in connection with matters of that kind, but when the act originally came into force—I believe it was in 1920 or 1921—I recall being in England when the first stamps were issued, and it was found that in part that method was undesirable. This statute deals with provisions of that kind. I could not give any estimate which could be regarded as accurate, because I am dealing only with the application of the costs of administration in Great Britain upon the circumstances in our own country, and having regard to what we have already established and what is proposed I shall make further inquiries from the Department of Labour and advise the committee to-morrow.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith Cumberland): Shall clause 9, number 10 in the bill, carry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It would be better to call the numbers as they appear in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that would be easier.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, would you mind reading these clauses?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Does the hon. member mean the marginal note, or the clause itself?

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The marginal note is enough.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland). For section 9 the marginal note is: Organization of Employment Service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest that if we confine ourselves to the numbers as they appear in the printed bill we will avoid confusion; the numbers can be changed afterwards. Section 10 of the bill deals with the matter of the commission organizing an employment service for the dominion. The Prime Minister has already stated we have an employment service which is to be taken over. Is the clause sufficiently broad?

Mr. BENNETT: As I explained to the committee, we have these offices. The extent to which they may discharge the duties called for by this bill is an altogether different question. To the extent to which it may be possible to utilize them, it is proposed so to do, but this measure gives the commission a free hand in the organization of the employment service of the country. To restrict them in the first instance might fasten upon them inefficient persons, and one of the weaknesses I have experienced in my short official life has been that there is no statutory provision for getting rid of the inefficient person; once a civil servant he is a civil servant forever. This provision would enable the commission to organize their service on a basis which they think will be efficient.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I refer to this not in any critical sense but rather to avoid difficulties later. If we have an employment service, as it is at present organized under a department which has a responsible minister and deputy minister, a department for which this parliament makes appropriations in the estimates, and we have also a commission which is given its power under a separate act and receives its own appropriations, we could hardly have those two authorities working side by side without conflict.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the right hon. gentleman will follow me when I say that people charged with a responsibility such as that with which the commission will be charged would not desire to be compelled to accept A, B and C. But it has been found in practice—at least it has been my experience—that any effort to transfer services from one direction to another does not meet with the success one would desire. The real reason is a weakness in our civil service law. I have explained on more than one occasion that the weakness is this: No matter how inefficient an individual may be, there is no provision for terminating his service, as the private employer does, except for age or for continued inability to discharge his duties. And in I would not say many, but in several cases at least that have come under my observation, had it been a private enterprise undoubtedly the employer would have indicated to the employee, because of his failure to discharge his duties, the desirability of his seeking employment elsewhere. One of the great benefits of civil service employment of which one is constantly reminded lies in that fact. I gave my opinion publicly on the point; I do not think it was accepted with very good grace, but I at least mentioned it, and it has been my observation that it was an absolutely sound statement to make, namely that once you get into the service and become a permanent employee, then the statutory increases must follow as a matter of course. Of course that is not the law at all. The law of this country is that statutory increases are based upon merit, upon meritorious service. Unfortunately the feeling has grown up that the statutory increase is a matter of right and of course, but under the provisions of the law, as I read them, that is not so. One of the difficulties in practice, and I believe the right hon. gentleman will agree, would be the transferring of services, and the possibility—and I use the word "possibility"—of making it more or less difficult for the new board sucessfully to function.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have had the impression that the immediate and ultimate aim behind the measure was to form a commission which would gradually take over all these social services, so far as the federal government is concerned, and that this body would have to do with unemployment insurance, unemployment exchanges, old age pensions and, probably, health insurance, which may be added in the course of time.

Mr. BENNETT: That is dealt with here, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And that all these social services would come under the commission, which would deal with these matters in a large way. If that is so I should think that as these services are now being performed in part by the Department of Labour there would be some provision under which the Department of Labour would be relieved of them. Surely it cannot be intended to have two bodies carrying on unemployment exchanges and two bodies administering old age pensions; there should be one body which would take the whole matter in hand, either through a commission outside the government service altogether or through a department of labour with enlarged functions.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe the right hon. gentleman's opinion and the opinion I hold are very much alike. There is nothing in the measure which discloses, as he has properly said, the manifest intention of legislation of this type, to endeavour to ensure the efficient administration of social services under a commission which would be set up for the purpose. He has fairly stated what is in the back of my mind; whether I live to see it carried into effect is another matter. But to transfer them by a section of the measure from one body to another is not in my judgment at the moment a proper way to do it. The right hon. gentleman will recall that the provincial authorities have at present a relation to the employment exchanges—labour exchanges—and it is the intention to cooperate with them for the purpose of seeing how this section, and the provisions of this measure may be brought into harmony with their own interests, as they are at present carried on under existing legislation. We supply some of the people and they supply some of them; we supply part of the money. It will be recalled it is a sort of joint enterprise. As soon as the commission is appointed it is proposed that they shall discuss the whole situation with the provinces, and, to the extent that it may be possible, bring their operations in harmony with what the provinces have heretofore done in connection with labour exchanges, under the legislation which is already upon the statute books. If it becomes desirable to make the necessary amendments they will be made in the act relating to labour—I forget the name of the statute at the moment—and in the Old Age Pensions Act. The right hon. gentleman has correctly read what was in my mind, but it is not in any sense indicated in the sweep of this measure at the moment. It depends, of course, upon the human element in making effective the provisions of a statute so as to secure if possible some system of uniformity in the administration of these social services. As I said to the right hon. gentleman this afternoon, we have had considerable difficulty in connection with old age pensions, and I doubt not that he already saw the beginnings of that. We have had to make investigations at times that were most unpleasant because of the effort made to retain a position of effective independence and at the same time to receive the benefits of the Old Age Pensions Act. That has gone on on quite a large scale in more than one part of the dominion. It is unnecessary to make any public statement with reference to it, but that has been the fact. I have in my mind just what the right hon. gentleman has said, but the realization of it is altogether a different thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The intention then is to leave all existing services as they are, enacting this as a separate measure and ultimately working towards a possible transfer of the one to the other. Inasmuch as there is some question, to put it mildly, as to the validity of the act, I think that is probably the course that should be taken. It is unfortunate that before putting through legislation to effect that end we have to wait to see whether or not the act is valid; otherwise what will now require two or three different enactments might have been accomplished in one.

Mr. HANBURY: Are the employees of the employment service referred to in clause 10 to be taken in under the provisions of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. BENNETT: All employees other than those specially mentioned are to be provided under the provisions of that act.

Mr. SANDERSON: When this commission is set up, will it carry on its work and its duties independently of any department of the government? I have in mind, for instance, the radio commission, which is under one of the departments.

Mr. BENNETT: This act is predicated on the assumption that it is not under the control of the minister.

Mr. SANDERSON: That it is not?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then who will control it?

Mr. BENNETT: Parliament.

Mr. SANDERSON: Does the Prime Minister think that will be a very good arrangement?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is the only effective arrangement possible at all.

Mr. SANDERSON: With all due respect to the Prime Minister I do not agree with him.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not suppose the Prime Minister cares; nevertheless that is my opinion.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not in any sense indicating that I have any objection to the hon. gentleman expressing his opinion as freely as I have expressed mine. I only say that it is contemplated that the commission will be under the control of parliament, and parliament will be free to take such action in the premises as it thinks fit with respect to anything that may be done by the commission.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The point has been raised that the eventual development under this act will mean the absorption of either one set of employment offices or the other, but unfortunately clause 2 of section 11 is mandatory. It says:

> The commission shall establish employment offices within each regional division at such places as they may deem expedient and desirable for the purposes of this act.

And it specifies the divisions. I am just wondering whether or not it is a question of legal phraseology, I do not quite follow the Prime Minister's former statement in reply to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: I was endeavouring to make clear what I think my hon. friend from Bow River will see in a moment, namely the distinction between the offices and the employees. On the one hand I was dealing with the desirability of one set of employees administering the social services to which I referred, but it is essential that in the first instance this organization immediately establish its offices. The personnel will be, if possible, the personnel I have referred to so far as it may be useful, and in that regard I point out that we ourselves contribute largely to the payment for these services at the present time.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does that mean that the present employment offices will be taken over or vanish?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I want to make it quite clear that there is no mandatory provision in the act to compel the commission to take over these offices, but the one or the other would be the result. I do not want to mislead the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not clear—"they will be taken over or vanish." Will there not be the cooperation of the province through the employment service?

Mr. BENNETT: I hardly put it as my hon. friend suggests, but we vote $150,000 a year at the present moment for the purpose of enabling the employment offices to be maintained. These offices are available for the purpose of enabling the provinces to use them for any purposes they may desire within the purview of the act. It is not the purpose that these employment offices shall come under the provisions of this statute, but it is the purpose of the government in this act, and it is made abundantly clear in its provisions, that the provinces may still utilize the machinery of the existing offices for the purpose of enabling them to relate the unemployed to the employer requiring the services of employees, and vice versa, to supply if possible the employers who are requiring men. I want to make it perfectly clear that there is nothing in this measure that makes it dependent on them, but the purpose of the bill is that there should be that correlation because we have that financial control, providing $150,000 per annum for that purpose at the present time, following the recommendations that were made after the treaty of peace in 1918.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is it the intention of the government then, to assume all the cost of the operation and administration of these employment offices?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: There will be no quarrel about that; there should not be, anyway.

Mr. BENNETT: When I say that, as I said to the leader of the opposition, that is the ultimate intention because there is a field which will have to be covered gradually by the federal power as regards these social services. I mentioned old age pensions, and there are the provisions of this act with relation to health and with respect to employment.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does this contemplate the abolition of private employment agencies?

Mr. BENNETT: It does not contemplate either one thing or the other with respect to them. It contemplates that such usefulness and efficiency will be established under it that it will be rather difficult for another agency to function successfully.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the Prime Minister information to show how much was spent by the provincial governments in these employment agencies?

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot give the figures offhand, but I can answer the question in this way. When the statute was first enacted the provinces expended substantial sums, but after the depression their expenditures were of course very much less. The moneys which we provided were perhaps largely, and in some provinces I might say almost wholly, the moneys that they relied upon for the maintenance of their services.

Mr. McINTOSH: In section 11 of part II regional divisions are mentioned. How many of these regional divisions will there be in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The number will be determined by the commission.

Mr. McINTOSH: Then the Prime Minister does not know exactly at the present time how many there will be?

Mr. BENNETT: At the present time the Prime Minister is not one of the members of the commission and has not means of being able to determine what the commission will regard as adequate.

Mr. McINTOSH: If we cannot find out how many regional divisions we shall have or how many offices there will be in each province, can the Prime Minister tell us about the personnel of the central office within each regional division?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman was not in his place to-day when the discussion took place with respect to these matters. This is a section that confers power upon the commission to do what is provided for under the section. Their manner of doing it must be a matter between them and this parliament. They are clothed with the authority and entrusted with the duty. Neither I nor any other member would be in a position to indicate what in the mind of the commission would be a sufficient compliance with the section.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Regional divisions: central offices.

Mr. NEILL: I have an amendment to move to this section. I want to put it on Hansard so that it may be considered over night. I would move as subsection 5:

There shall not be maintained at any employment office what is known as a "blacklist."

There is a great deal of what is called labour unrest in Canada to-day. I do not know that it is anywhere more manifest than it is in British Columbia. The unrest in the labour element is being played on by certain parties, not altogether for the public good; it is being capitalized. So far as British Columbia is concerned, I do not know whether there is a more fruitful source of that discontent than the existence of what is known as the blacklist. Its existence is vehemently denied by some employers, frankly admitted by others, and of course firmly believed in by the labour element, who claim that they have absolute proof of it. In British Columbia, quite a number of years ago, we did away with private employment offices and centralized all work of that kind in government offices. Possibly it was the only way it could be done, by simply prohibiting anyone, endeavouring to procure work for anyone else, to be paid for it. But it did not prohibit people from doing so for nothing. Perhaps they had in mind patriotic associations, or such as the Young Men's Christian Association, which might try in a voluntary way to get work for people. The employers got round the law by either individually or through associations in the particular industry, employing a man to run an employment office, and it is in the operation of these offices that the blacklist exists. They are not employment offices in the sense of the act, though they are that to all intents and purposes, because they are run by a particular company or association of companies. A man sees a position marked up on the blackboard. He knows he can fill it and he applies, stating his qualifications. He proves to be absolutely competent and experienced at the job, and the employment agent is inclined to take him on. He asks his name and then goes behind a screen or turns to a list and comes back and says, "We don't want you." The man asks why not. The agent insists that he is not wanted and takes the man standing behind this applicant, a man less qualified and less experienced. The first applicant is turned down because he is on the blacklist.

I met a number of workers a few months ago; as a matter of fact they were strikers. Some people called them red, but if they were red they were reasonably red. The conditions were such that they might have expressed themselves in violent and vehement language, but they did not; they were reasonable. Putting things together I decided that a great deal of the trouble lay in the existence of the blacklist. I told the men that I had been an employer myself and fully realized that it was impossible to say to an employer that someone else could dictate to him whom to fire and hire. I pointed out that a business could hardly be run on that basis, that the man who employed labour and furnished the money should have the right to say whether he would employ a certain man or not; and certainly he had a right to fire him. But that should not go on forever and especially should not apply to other employers in the same industry. That is where the blacklist comes in. A man may have some words with his immediate boss, a small straw boss, in the dull and cold gray light of the morning when he is rather stiff in the joints. They are both grouchy; their boots are tight; they had been working in the wet the day before. they have a few words and one says something to the other. They are both perfectly good men, but either the boss fires the worker or the worker beats him to it and says he will quit anyhow. A card is then filled out by the foreman when the man leaves, and this card gives his pedigree. One of the questions asked on the card is: "Would you employ this man again?" If he says no, that man's chance of a job in that industry—not with that employer merely but in that industry in British Columbia—is damned for all time. That is the curse of the situation.

I told these men that if the boss fired a man for cause and they proposed to force him to take the man back, they would also perhaps run up against the situation that if the employment office sent them to a place they did not want to go, they would have to go. They said they were prepared to put up with that because they had to do it now; if they refused to go, they are placed on the blacklist.

I do not propose that it should be done by drastic action; I do not think that an employer should be forced to employ someone he does not want, and vice versa. It could be done by reasonable regulation. It might be arranged that if a man were fired from a certain company he should not be sent back to the same employer within say a year, and that would give time for feelings to die down. In the meantime there would have been a change of men and afterwards there would be no friction if he went back after the lapse of a year. In the same way, if a man quit an employer, whatever the reason might be, he should not be compelled to go back to the same employer within a specified time, which should also be reasonable. Apart from that, they should be sent out in the order in which they applied and if they were qualified for the position they would have to go and be taken. In that way men would not be thrown out of a livelihood as they can be at the present time by reason of the blacklist, simply because two grouchy men get together and curse each other. I said to these men that if they would accept a thing like that it might be abused and we might find a man saying to his boss, "You can't fire me because I can appeal to the law and you will have to take me back." The answer was that it is done in other industries. They named the railway companies in which boards of appeal, composed of some of the higher officers and some of the men, pass upon these matters. There is a report every month reciting instances in which railway servants in the lower ranks have appealed on account of dissatisfaction with regard to services or wages, often in connection with their runs, and the case is decided by the board of appeal. There is no friction and the result is that for many years there has not been a railway strike. They made the further point that they themselves would work to prevent any abuse of it because it would be to their advantage to have such a system in force.

I suggest that this might be allowed to stand. It is something new I have sprung on the committee, and it might be made to apply only to British Columbia. Certainly, however, it would be an excellent thing. Some hon. member suggests that the employment agencies be done away with. I would say certainly. We have done away with them in British Columbia except in the instances I have named. It would be a good thing if it was only giving a lead in the dominion offices if they inaugurated some system whereby there would be no suggestion of this blacklist by which men, for a mere whim of somebody else, may be deprived, not of their job—that is a trivial matter; they could get another one—but of any employment at all, because the blacklist goes right down the line in the industry concerned. There is no question about that; if anyone wants instances, I can give them.

In another case, a big employer of labour —he is not in my district and I can tell the story—told me that the system they arranged was to send out a spy periodically. He did not call the man a spy; he called him an investigator. This investigator got a job; he was sent up ostensibly as one of the employees. He snooped around; of course he had to justify himself and do something for his money. The scheme worked like this: he would sidle up to a man and say: "'pretty lousy job" or "pretty lousy grub here." If the man said yes, he was reported as having said that the grub was lousy and he was dissatisfied. He would be let out within a week or two; he would not know why. He would be told: "Here is your money," and he would not get any work again in that place. That is the way blacklists get started. I would be glad if the Prime Minister could see his way clear to allowing this clause to stand so that he, his colleague the Minister of Labour and officials of that department could consider this question.

Mr. HANBURY: I would like to ask the Prime Minister this question: Under the suggested amendment, is there anything in this legislation that will require any employer to engage any labourer or workman that may be sent by the employment office to him?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. HANBURY: The Prime Minister says no. Under the circumstances as I see them, while the amendment might be placed on the statute book, I do not see any teeth in it that could make it effective.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has raised a question that is of great importance to many people. I do not however agree that the basis of the blacklist is as simple as the hon. member believes it to be; at least that is not my understanding. I think the blacklist arises from the very fundamental fact that generally employers in this country are opposed to the organization of their employees in industrial organizations or in trade unions. In certain trades such as railroading, street railway occupations and certain stabilized trades of that kind, employees have become organized; their organizations have become well established and they have agreements with their employers. Where an agreement of that kind exists, it is almost impossible to institute a blacklist. But if we take less sheltered industries, particularly lumbering and to some extent mining, employers in those industries have opposed with every means at their disposal their employees forming any kind of organization.

Mr. HOWARD: Is the hon. member referring to British Columbia?

Mr. MacINNIS: Not only in British Columbia, but throughout Ontario, Quebec and every other part of Canada. Employers are in the business for making profits and trades organizations militate to some extent against the making of profits, although in some cases where the employees have been organized for some time, employers believe it is good policy to have them organized because they consider men who are intelligent enough to organize will give better service than those who are not. But you cannot get that into the heads of the lumber barons, at least not in British Columbia, and I doubt if you can in Quebec. In the lumber industry on the Pacific coast the blacklist extends not only over British Columbia, but also into the northwest Pacific states, Washington and Oregon. As a matter of fact the employers themselves are very strongly organized but they object strenuously to their employees organizing. I have worked for employers and I have been called up before the superintendent and told, "Our investigators have made a certain report upon you. We are sorry we have to have these investigators but the management deems them essential." These men act not only as investigators but as agents provocateurs. They get the men to start organizing and when they have done so, they will report to the employer that certain men are ringleaders. These men are then called on the carpet and sent out of the camp. From then on they are debarred from getting any employment in this particular industry. I do not know whether the proposal made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, which I am satisfied was made in all sincerity, will meet the situation. But if it does not, then this government should take positive and definite steps to encourage organization among the workers in industry, because there is no other way in which legislation passed by governments can be enforced than by strong organizations of the employees concerned.

Mr. POWER: Whilst we are on this question of employment service, may I ask the minister whether he has any statement or report which he could furnish to the committee as to just how useful the employment service which is now functioning has been in the past two years in finding work for the unemployed?

Mr. BENNETT: The statistics are not here; the Minister of Labour has them in connection with his estimates. But I can say that these services have been regarded as being very valuable and have rendered, especially in western Canada, very useful service to both employers and employees. The minister has the information prepared for his estimates, and if it is thought desirable I can have it here to-morrow.

Mr. POWER: I take it, then, that the Department of Labour is satisfied that these employment offices have rendered valuable service during the time of the depression in obtaining employment for people who would otherwise be unemployed. Do I understand that from the minister?

Mr. GORDON: In my judgment the employment offices have done valuable service not only during the time of the so-called depression but since their organization. All these efforts lend themselves to improvement, but there is no question in my mind that they have done and are doing useful service.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. POWER: Has any serious attempt ever been made in Canada to assist in the migration of labour from one place where employment is scarce to some other place where there might be better chances of obtaining employment?

Mr. GORDON: The administration of the employment offices is, as the hon. member knows, under the control of the provinces. I do not say that they have succeeded as well as they might have had the scope of their activities been enlarged, but on a comparatively small scale they have assisted in the effort that the hon. member suggests.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry I cannot accept the amendment. In the first place it would serve no useful purpose. No government department operating under a commission would maintain a blacklist. It would be an insult to the commission to prohibit it from doing so. But that is not the real reason; the blacklist in any event would be maintained by the employers, not by the commission. That is not the duty or obligation of such a commission. The prospective employer would be the one with the blacklist; he would be the person who declined to take X, Y or Z whose services might be offered. Lastly, if there were any difficulty about the matter it could be dealt with by regulations, for which the bill provides in section 38, and which can be as far-reaching as may be necessary. I do not think, however, that one should contemplate the possibility of an organization of this kind maintaining a blacklist. Its job, its obligation, will be just the opposite. I think on reflection the hon. member will conclude that it is undesirable to press his amendment. On the other hand if he desires that the committee should look further into it, there is no reason why the section should not stand in order that the amendment which he proposes as subsection 5 should be considered.

Mr. NEILL: I appreciate the Prime Minister's action. Of course I did not suggest that the government office would run a blacklist; it would be the employer who would enforce it, as he said. It would be desirable to do away with all private employment agencies, as we have done partially in British Columbia; then when the government office proposes to send a man to a certain employer and he says "I will not take him because he is on my blacklist," it would be for the government to say; "You will have to." Lest there should be any suggestion that this is going to operate unfairly against the employer, may I say I am satisfied that a large number of employers would welcome it. Many of them, especially the more humane and far-seeing, even from the dollar and cents point of view, would welcome it because they know it would do away with one of the greatest causes of friction between employer and employees. We all know that you do not get satisfactory work when there is a continuous source of irritation. I am glad to accept the suggestion that the section stand over.

Mr. BENNETT: Obviously no employer would allege a desire not to employ a given individual because his name is on a blacklist.

Mr. HANBURY: Before this item stands, I think in view of the amendment suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Neill) this committee should be informed of what is probably one of the reasons for his suggesting it. I am inclined to agree with my colleague from Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) when he suggests that more encouragement should be given to employees in industry to organize themselves so that they can negotiate better with their employers. But it is accepted as a fact by many people in Canada to-day that during the past twelve or thirteen months men were sent into our lumber industry from one end of Canada to the other for the one and sole purpose of disorganizing the industry. There are many, and I am one, who think that these people were sent into this country by agents of Russia who were disturbed at the quantity of lumber that this country was sending out in competition with them. We had men sent into the industry in British Columbia and other parts of Canada who were agitating and who could not be satisfied no matter what was given them. They were not there endeavouring to improve conditions; they were there to disturb the industry. I think that is one of the reasons for the suggested amendment. True, I do not think there is any question that there are men on the blacklist in British Columbia to-day as far as the lumber industry is concerned, and I think many of these men will be kept there until they show that they are not going to be affected by these professional, paid agitators who come there to destroy our industry. And while I am quite prepared to support any organization of employees for the purpose of enabling them to negotiate with the employers, I am not going to put a weapon in the hands of agitators so that an employer can be forced to employ them in order that they may disorganize our business.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I wish to make it clear that this blacklist is not something which has been in existence only during the past year; it has existed on the Pacific coast since 1919. During the war when labour was scarce and the lumber industry very active the lumber workers built up a strong organization, but when labour became more plentiful and the employers wanted to take advantage of the state of the labour market, everything possible was done to smash the labour organizations. And ever since that time the blacklist has been in existence. While I am quite satisfied that there are a few individuals who are not interested in organizing for legitimate purposes but are possibly more interested in disorganizing, I am quite convinced from my own experience of twenty-five years in the labour movement that satisfied employees cannot be led to follow agitators of that kind.

Mr. HANBURY: I agree.

Mr. MacINNIS: If there were not a basis for agitation in the conditions prevailing in the industry, making employees ready to heed the voice of the agitator, there would be no difficulty whatsoever in the camp. In fact the workers would be the first to run these agitators out of the camp if the conditions were right.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall only say that from my observations what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) has said is fully warranted. I have not the same sources of information that he has—only the reports that come from various sources—but I certainly formed an opinion some months ago that is wholly in accordance with the statement he has just made. I believe sincerely from the evidence furnished me that in one or two cases in British Columbia there was a disturbance of industry which was directly traceable to those who would profit greatly by such disturbance. But the point I desire to make is that while agreeing wholly that harmonious relations between employer and employed are the basis of success in any industry, I cannot think that the insertion of a subsection such as this in a statute dealing with a commission that has such wide responsibility is justifiable. Obviously you cannot force an employer to take a given employee. That is the real point to which I direct attention. And as you cannot compel him to do it without violating all the rules that have heretofore governed the relations between employer and employee, I suggest that to place such a provision in the statute would do violence to our general appreciation of the understanding that should exist between the commission and the employers to whom from time to time they send those who may be seeking employment.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The Prime Minister has just stated that an employer could not be compelled to accept a given employee. Under the provisions of this measure can an employee be compelled to accept an employer?

Mr. BENNETT: If any person insured under the act declines without good reason to accept employment that is offered, then the results indicated in the statute itself follow. I should hardly like to put it that he is compelled to accept, but what may happen if he does not accept the opportunity is that he will lose the benefit.

Mr. HEAPS: There are certain exceptions under which the employee is not compelled to accept employment.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so; that is provided in the statute itself.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The clause stands?

Mr. BENNETT: I promised to let it stand if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Neill) so desires.

Section stands.

On section 12—Collection of information.

Mr. HANBURY: In the fourth line of subsection 2 "failure to comply with any such request" is made an offence against the act, but there is no time stated within which such failure to comply may occur. I would direct that to the attention of the Prime Minister. I think some time limit should be stated.

Mr. BENNETT: One of the difficulties in stating a time in any statute of this kind is that you must have regard to distances and geography. The law implies a reasonable time; that is why no such words are included. If, for instance, I asked the hon. gentleman to supply information and said if he did not supply it within twenty-four hours proceedings would be taken against him; if he was in Vancouver and I was in Winnipeg or Ottawa, that would not be treated as of any importance at all. The real implication of the law is a reasonable time, and I think the hon. member will agree that to state any length of time would be destructive of the very purpose he has in mind.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Subsection 2 of section 12 reads:

[Mr. Bennett.]

The commission may request any person to make written returns of such information as the commission may deem necessary for the purposes of this act, and failure to comply with any such request shall be an offence—

Of course this is a commission the personnel of which we do not know at the present time, nor do we know the tribunal that will try this suggested offence, but I do think that this subsection is too broad as it stands. The commission may request information which the party is unable to furnish.

Mr. BENNETT: Then he could not be fined.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, he could under this subsection. I submit that the words "without reasonable cause" should be included.

Mr. BENNETT: That is implied.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think so, under this wording.

Mr. BENNETT: I think if the hon. member will observe the language of the section he will modify his view. Subsection 1 contemplates the collection of information concerning employers requiring workers and workers seeking employment, the same to be made available to the employment offices. Then they may request returns for the purposes of this act, and failure to comply with that request is constituted an offence. If reasonable time is not given there can be no conviction; if the information sought is not information under the act there can be no conviction. So, as the law implies a reasonable time, and having due regard to the conditions that govern the whole provision, namely the purposes of the act, I submit that the section is properly drafted.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I point out that the section reads:

—such information as the commission may deem necessary for the purposes of this act—

I think we might include the words "within the knowledge of such person."

Mr. BENNETT: That is implied.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I submit not, as the section is drafted.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Why not add "within a reasonable time" since there is no time specified?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard directed attention to that point. The law implies a reasonable time. To fix a given period would be impossible, having regard to distances. I think it is quite clear, under the decisions of the courts, that the law implies that a reasonable time must be given. What is a reasonable time depends, as one judge has said, upon the circumstances of each case. If it was not difficult to obtain the information it might not be unreasonable to expect it the next day.

Mr. HANBURY: I suggest that it would be necessary to send a registered notice under that section, which would indicate that the time must be reasonable.

Mr. BENNETT: It is perfectly obvious that there could be no conviction unless it was proved that the notice had been received.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Local committees.

Mr. HANBURY: I notice that no provision has been made for the remuneration and expenses of these local committees.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true, and the hope is that these local committees may be glad to give some service to their communities with respect to these matters. But there is provision later on, in a broad and general way, by which some honorarium may be paid. It is not intended that they shall be paid officials in that sense at all.

Section agreed to.

On section 14 (as printed; now section 13) —Advances to workers seeking employment.

Mr. HEAPS: This section deals with the question of transferring men who are out of work to sections of the country where employment may be found for them. It involves a rather complicated question that may require a good deal of discussion, and I would ask the Prime Minister to call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I can see no good purpose in having this section stand, since it is a simple clause, but if the hon. gentleman desires to have that done I shall accede to his request.

Mr. HEAPS: It is eleven o'clock now, in any case.

Section stands.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

ADDITION TO MEMBERSHIP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister moved:

That the names of Messrs. Veniot, Stewart (Lethbridge) and Bourassa be added to the select committee appointed on the twelfth instant to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended.

Motion agreed to.

STANLEY PARK, VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the extensive damage that has been done to Stanley park in the city of Vancouver by the unprecedented storms; and in view of the fact that this is a national park and a national asset in every way, in view also of the very great fire hazard created there, I would ask if the Prime Minister will consider cooperating with the provincial and municipal authorities with respect to assistance in this regard.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to send me a memorandum indicating that he proposed to ask this question. I found it on my desk five minutes ago. I can only say that thus far the government, so far as I know, has received no intimation of the matter to which the hon. gentleman refers, but when the matter is brought to the attention of the government and the nature and character of the damage is indicated and its extent ascertained, the government will give its most careful consideration to any request that may be made through the provincial government in that regard.

RADIO IN SOUTHERN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): I desire to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) a question. In view of the fact that Canadian radio programs can hardly be heard in southern Alberta, and practically not at all on Sundays, and in view of the fact that many protests have been received that the radio sets are no good on account of the din and roar from some interference that cannot be located, will the minister be good enough to make an investigation?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to put this question to-day, and I asked the officials of the radio commission to advise me with regard to the matter. My information is that the commission has investigated the troubles in the southern part of Alberta, and they report that they have a program of construction under contemplation which, if it can be put into effect, will remove the trouble.

PRINCE ALBERT NATIONAL PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. F. TOTZKE (Humboldt): I would direct a question to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy). Has it been brought to his attention that owing to the protection afforded to wild animals in the Prince Albert national park, timber wolves are rapidly increasing in number and forming themselves into packs, causing great damage to trap lines and to animals protected under the game laws in the northern part of Saskatchewan; and if so, what steps are being taken to deal with this nuisance?

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): This matter was brought to my attention a few days ago, and I am now awaiting a report from the officials. When I receive it I shall be in a position to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In view of the announcement some time ago that direct relief would terminate on March 31, I would ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) when he intends to make a statement to the house in regard to the assistance to be given for unemployment relief for the next fiscal year.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I do not know that I made the announcement that direct relief would terminate on March 31, but this government is keeping in close touch with the provinces and a decision will be arrived at as to what method may have to be employed with respect to assisting them. Up to the moment we have not had any information or request from the provinces as to what assistance they may need.

TRACADIE LAZARETTO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): On January 23 an order was passed for the production of correspondence, reports and other documents, including a statement of the results of any examinations by the civil service commission during 1934, in connection with the appointment of an assistant engineer at the lazaretto in Tracadie, New Brunswick. May I ask the Secretary of State when the papers will be brought down.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I will look into the matter immediately.

IMMIGRATION OF CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Labour. According to press dispatches it would appear that the child immigration society of Great Britain intend to send four hundred children to Vancouver island to be taught farming according to Canadian methods. Is that statement correct? If so, has it the approval of the minister?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration): I was not able to hear the question but I shall read it in Hansard to-morrow.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN UNEMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

The house resumed from Monday, February 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, to establish an unemployment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 15 (as printed; now section 14) —Persons to be insured against unemployment; "employed persons" defined.

Mr. POULIOT: Yesterday the Prime Minister gratified me when reciting those delightful words of Tennyson:

> An infant crying in the night:
> An infant crying for the light:
> And with no language but a cry.

In return, may I dedicate this little poem to him:

> Year after year, day and night
> An infant cries for the light;
> But, alas! he cannot know—
> The P.M. always says "NO."

Mr. DUFF: This section deals with the persons who will come under the act, and also with those who will be exempted or excepted. I notice in part II, page 31 of the bill, the following excepted employments enumerated:

(a) Employment in agriculture, horticulture and forestry;
(b) Employment in fishing;
(c) Employment in lumbering and logging;
(d) Employment in hunting and trapping;
(e) Employment in transportation by water or by air, and stevedoring.

And so on. It seems to me that if we are going to pass in this parliament an act to take care of persons who are unemployed, giving them some protection or insurance, the measure should be broad enough to cover all classes in the community. I remember that once when I was a boy I took home from school three or four of my chums and my mother got out the cookie jar. We helped ourselves. At the bottom of the jar there was an extra cookie and I tried to get it, but she said that there were no stepbairns in our family. I submit that there should be no stepbairns in the family of Canada; everyone should be treated alike. I have no objection if all the people who work with their hands in this country come under the bill, but I do object to certain classes coming under it while others who will not benefit by it will have to pay to help those who do. In the speech delivered by the Prime Minister on the second reading of the bill, in discussing those who did not come under the bill he gave certain figures. I cannot put my hand on the particular passage in which he dealt with those who would not come under the fishing section in paragraph (b) which I have quoted, part II, but if I remember rightly he said that there were only ten thousand fishermen who would not come under the act. I have here a copy of the annual report of the Department of Fisheries and while I realize that figures differ, at the same time, in this annual report for 1933-34, the total number of persons employed in fishing is given at page 7 as 79,328, of whom 65,391 were engaged in catching the fish and 13,937 were employed on shore in canneries and fish-curing establishments. I do not know whether the Prime Minister got his figures from Mr. Watson or not, but if I remember correctly the figure he gave was 10,000. When he gave this figure I realized immediately that there was a mistake somewhere; I believe 79,000 is much more correct. I would say to the government that if this bill is to be particularly operative the fishermen have a right to come under it as well as other employees in the country, whether in manufacturing establishments or anywhere else. The fishermen are labourers; they are employees who are giving their time and labour to create business in this country and to bring new wealth into Canada. But it seems to me that these fishermen should be placed in the same position as those engaged in other callings who will come under the act. At page 728 of Hansard, on February 12, the Prime Minister gave the figure of excluded males in fishing and trapping as 10,379. If the figures the right hon. gentleman read yesterday are no more accurate than those which somebody gave him and which he quoted on that date, then it appears to me that we are dealing with this matter in the dark, and we should get further information before going on. I contend that if these people are going to pay toward unemployment insurance, the legislation should be broadened so that our fishermen may come under it.

There is another class that, I notice, is exempted. Paragraph (e) of part II of the first schedule on page 31 reads:

Employment in transportation by water or by air, and stevedoring.

Surely if people in factories and manufacturing plants are entitled to consideration or relief under this measure, stevedores should be included. I would like to know what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) has to say with regard to the fact that stevedores and longshoremen are not included in this legislation. Not only in Halifax but in Saint John, Quebec, Montreal, Vancouver and elsewhere there are hundreds and perhaps thousands of stevedores and longshoremen who earn their wages by the sweat of their brow and they certainly should come under this measure. I respectfully submit to the Prime Minister that the legislation should be amended so that paragraph (e) of part II of the first schedule will read so as to remove stevedores and longshoremen from excepted employment. In that way stevedores and longshoremen would have the benefit of this bill if it is going to be passed by parliament. I notice another class of people is not mentioned, but they may come under the class of stevedores. I refer to the men who work on the different wharves or in the different fish plants, especially in Nova Scotia. In Halifax and other centres in that province we have a large number of men who work by the day, who are paid by the hour, who certainly handle the products of this country and who should also be included. I respectfully submit to the Prime Minister that these men, both stevedores, longshoremen and labourers in fish plants as well as fishermen should be included in and receive the benefits of this legislation, because, if they are not included they have to pay their proportion of the amount which the government puts up.

Yesterday in suggesting that this legislation should not be handled by a commission, I modestly stated that perhaps an amount of $250,000 would be saved if instead it were administered by one of the departments of government. Later on the Prime Minister said that the expenses of handling this legislation by commission would amount to something like $7,000,000. This huge amount must come out of the taxpayers; it must come out of the fishermen, longshoremen, farmers and others. Although the committee adopted that particular clause providing that the legislation should be entrusted to a commission, if we can save $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 by having one of the departments instead of a commission handle the matter, I say to the Prime Minister that in view of the financial situation in which we find ourselves to-day, it would be a waste of money to spend $7,000,000 and to inaugurate and put into operation another commission with a number of unnecessary employees, to do work which could very well be done by the Labour or some other department. I protest against the fishermen, longshoremen and labourers in fish plants being excepted. If this law is going to be broad; if we are going to have a proper act to look after the labouring men and other employees in this country, every class in the community should be included instead of there being certain exceptions as set forth in paragraph (e) of part II in the first schedule.

Mr. VENIOT: In speaking to the subject now before the committee, I have no intention of opposing the clause as it stands. I have no amendment to offer, but I feel it my duty to call the attention of the promoter of this measure to the fact that I believe an injustice is being done to a large proportion of the population I have the honour to represent in this house. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has referred to the fishing industry, pointing out that the figures given by the Prime Minister are incorrect. When the statement was made by the right hon. gentleman, I was somewhat surprised to learn that there were only 10,000 fishermen in the dominion earning their living. As the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has said, the correct number is far in excess of 10,000. He referred to the report of last year of the Department of Fisheries, but I wish to refer to the census report of 1931 which shows that there are 34,340 persons gainfully engaged in the fishing industry. In the county of Gloucester there are more than 2,500 fishermen. Not all of these are gainfully employed; some are proprietors who could not come under this act and nobody would expect them to do so. But in my county alone there are more than 2,000 engaged in fishing. It is true it may be stated that fishing is a seasonable occupation, but if we are going to protect those who are engaged the whole year around on salary or wages and who are able to maintain their families, why should we not do something for those engaged in seasonable occupations? They certainly should be given a chance, if not to such a great extent, at least along the same lines as those engaged the year around.

Having said that about the fishing industry, let me now deal with the logging industry. My wish, while I am on that point, is to ask a question for the sake of information and I am going to cite a concrete case. A pulpmill in my home town works part time; the work is not carried on during every working day of the month or the year. For instance, about 300 men are employed about the pulpmill. A certain number work for a given number of days in the month; then they are replaced by another group. How can such workmen come under this measure? I take it, as this is not logging and lumbering in the sense in which I understand the term in the exemption clause, they could come under the legislation if they were constantly engaged the year round. But what will be the result? When this legislation comes into force, the men will be demanding compensation, if I may use that expression, or the benefits provided by the bill; they will be demanding to be allowed to come in under it. The result is going to be that this company instead of employing 150 for a period of a fortnight and another 150 for another period of a fortnight, is going to employ 150 regularly and the other 150 will be thrown on the street. Therefore the effect will be increased unemployment instead of a benefit.

Further, I should like to have from the Prime Minister a definition of what is meant by employment in lumbering and logging. I understand logging to refer to the operations in the bush; would it include driving down the streams in the spring? Would lumbering include men engaged in the sawmill yards, and in sawing lumber? I see no definition of that term, and I know that when I return home I shall be waited upon by the lumber interests of my county, which are very large, and asked for an explanation of this. I ask the Prime Minister to give a definition of the term "employment in lumbering and logging" as used in clause (c).

For the present I have nothing further to say except to correct the figures given by the Prime Minister the other day as to the number engaged in the lumber industry. I think the number he gave as engaged in gainful employment in the lumber industry in Canada was about 41,000. Now that figure is certainly wrong. There is one province alone in this dominion in which almost that number are employed in gainful operations in the bush, on the streams or at the mills. In order to have accurate figures before the committee I suggest that the matter be looked into more carefully. The census gives 49,960 in forest and logging operations; that census was taken in June, 1931. People were asked at what they were employed at that time, There is some lumbering going on in June, but very little in the province of Quebec and the maritime provinces. So those figures are not correct. Not that I wish to say that the census enumerators made false returns; far from it, but the census questions were not arranged in such a way as to distinguish between those employed almost continuously in lumber and logging operations and those so employed merely at the time they were visited in the month of June.

Mr. MacLEAN: I wish to support the contention raised by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). I do not know that I can go quite as far as they did as to the whole 75,000 noted as employed in fisheries coming under the act. But part 1 of the schedule reads:

> Employment in Canada under any contract of service or apprenticeship, written or oral, whether expressed or implied,

While a number of our fishermen work on their own behalf there are large numbers employed by various companies. I quite see the difficulty in obtaining and reporting the forty weeks of continuous employment in the year, still I believe that there are large numbers of them who should receive consideration, because it is their sole employment; they have no other means of livelihood. Take the lobster packing plants and other plants that employ men in the packing and shipping of fish; some of those people are given almost continuous employment, so that if other people employed in other industries are to receive the benefits of this measure it would seem fair that some consideration should be given to the fishermen who are thus employed.

Another point is that the cost of the operation of this measure will be borne by the community as a whole. Men in business can pass the cost on by adding it to their price, as they do the sales tax, so that the consuming public at large will in the long run contribute the largest proportion towards the upkeep of this scheme. For that reason alone I think that everyone who can reasonably be brought under the measure should be given consideration. I know there are difficulties, but consideration should be given to every class of the community and an endeavour made to work out a plan that will be just and fair to all.

Mr. MARCIL: I voted for the second reading of this bill on the principle that I felt it was of benefit to the wage earner. The practically unanimous vote by this house on second reading, something very rarely seen, shows that we want to extend the benefit of this measure to as many people as possible. Since yesterday I have been wondering how many people in my constituency will benefit under it. They are practically all employed in agriculture, fishing, lumbering and logging. If a man is employed by another man for ten weeks in the year, whether in agriculture, fishing, lumbering or logging, why should that man be excluded from benefit? I am sorry I did not catch the explanation which the Prime Minister must have given for excepting these various employments, but I hope it is not too late yet to have the benefit of this measure more generally extended. If I remember rightly the Prime Minister said that some 800,000 wage earners would be excluded from benefit. I would like him to give more consideration to the possibility of extending the benefits to those who are bona fide employees in these callings that I have mentioned. As it stands at present it would be unfair to large numbers in my constituency and in all constituencies situated near the ocean or in provinces where lumbering is carried on. In Quebec lumbering is one of the largest industries, perhaps the largest in the dominion. Whether in money turnover it is ahead of British Columbia or Ontario I do not know, but at any rate it is one of our largest industries. Then the fishing industry needs particular care and attention at the present time because it has been in a very precarious state for the last few years. And agriculture of course is facing great difficulties. "This country will be prosperous when agriculture is prosperous"; that has been said over and over again in my hearing during the thirty-five years that I have had the honour of representing my constituency in this house. If men are employed by others and put in their ten weeks in the year in agricultural work, why should they not be given the benefit of this measure? And why should not the same thing apply to lumbering? I know men who are employed the year round in lumbering, they are in the shanties in the winter and in the sawmills in the summer, and in the spring they are occupied in driving operations. They are employed practically the year round by large lumber firms; why should they not have the benefit of this measure? I appeal again to the Prime Minister, who has evidently given a great deal of consideration to the matter, to reconsider his decision and give these people a fair deal, because the benefits of the measure should be extended to all classes as far as possible.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am in somewhat the same position as the hon. members who have just spoken, since I represent a district in which there are farmers, lumbermen and fishermen, and I endorse the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, the hon. member for Gloucester and the hon. member for Bonaventure. Ever since this bill has been before the house I have been wondering if the Prime Minister would not reconsider his decision and try to include under it those people engaged in forestry, lumbering, fishing and farming. We were told that this measure was to help all classes of the community, and I would not like to see the people who will be called upon to pay their share of the cost indirectly, that is, the farmers, fishermen and lumbermen, get no relief. I think we should have a final, definite explanation from the Prime Minister as to why he has not seen fit to include these classes under the bill and as to whether at an early date in the future we may expect them to be so included.

Mr. HEAPS: Under the provisions of this section it appears that the commission has power to put certain industries in the excluded class, but the commission has not power to include industries which are now excluded under the provisions of this bill. It seems to be a very one-sided affair. I observe that among those excluded are some that certainly should be included. I am not going to refer to those classes that have been mentioned already, but I should like to know why bank employees should be put in a different category, together with the employees of other institutions in which at times unemployment becomes rife. I have had representations made to me by bank messengers and others who feel that they should come within the provisions of any act insuring against unemployment. According to the statement made by the Prime Minister about a week ago there are some 57,000 people employed in financial institutions who will not come under the act. I think they should come under it; I do not think we ought to give favoured treatment to banks or any other financial institutions.

There is one other point I should like to raise at this time. When the Prime Minister introduced this bill last Tuesday he said there were approximately 1,700,000 people who would be eligible to come under the provisions of the bill. I believe those figures were based on the census of 1931. I should like to know the number actually qualified at this time to come under the provisions of the bill. After all there may be a great difference between the number qualified in 1931 and the number qualified to-day. The figures given by the Prime Minister with regard to the 1931 census may be absolutely correct according to the statements given the enumerators, but I have a very strong feeling that with the vast increase in unemployment since 1931 the number who may be qualified will be very much smaller than the number stated by the Prime Minister a week ago. So I should like to know if the Prime Minister has any later figures to give the house as to approximately how many working people, men and women, would be able to qualify as participants in the proposed measure.

Mr. DONNELLY: Coming as I do from an agricultural constituency, and as the farmer receives no benefits whatever under this bill, naturally I am not very enthusiastic about it. The only thing the farmer has to do is pay the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: Who?

Mr. DONNELLY: The farmer. Since there seems to be some doubt as to who are included under this bill, I would like to ask the Prime Minister with regard to two classes, as to whether they come under this act. The first is the man operating a grain elevator. He is the agent for one of the grain companies; he buys and sells grain. Will he be considered a farmer, or will he be able to take advantage of this act? The other case is that of the man operating a lumber yard in a small town on the prairies. Is he considered a lumberman; is he brought under this act or is he excluded? I should like the Prime Minister to tell us how those two classes will be dealt with.

Mr. EULER: The debate so far this afternoon has consisted more or less of protests by certain members that certain classes of the community do not come within the operations of the bill. I have a matter of a different nature to bring up, not with any intention of urging action but simply to ask the question. I have been approached by owners of commercial establishments, stores as they are popularly known, and representations have been made to me that in an establishment employing some fifty or sixty clerks, after a check up it was found that if there had been an unemployment insurance scheme in force for the last five years benefits would have been obtained in only one instance. That may not be typical of the situation in general, but I rise to ask whether the commission which will have charge of the administration of the act could take steps to exclude from the operations of the act, if it should be found desirable to do so, such establishments as I have mentioned. I know the act provides that the commission shall make recommendations, presumably to the governor in council, for the inclusion of those who do not now come within the act, and I should like to ask whether the commission has similar power to make recommendations or actually to exclude certain classes which they find it inadvisable to include within the scope of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that members of the committee apparently have not found it desirable to read the section. We are dealing with section 15, and if the section were read I think some of the questions that have been asked would be readily answered. The section reads:

(1) Subject to the provisions of this act, all persons of the age of sixteen years and upwards who are engaged in any of the employments specified in part I of the first schedule of this act, not being employments specified as excepted employments in part II of that schedule (in this act referred to as "employed persons"), shall be insured against unemployment in manner provided by this act, and the employment in which any such person is engaged shall in this act be referred to as "insurable employment."

(2) Where it appears to the commission—

Not to the governor in council.

—that the terms and conditions of service of, and the nature of the work performed by, any class of persons employed in an excepted employment are so similar to the terms and conditions of service of, and the nature of the work performed by, a class of persons employed in an insurable employment as to result in anomalies in the operation of this act, the commission may, by regulations either unconditionally or subject to such conditions as may be specified in the regulations, either:—

(a) provide for including the class of persons employed in insurable employment among the classes of persons employed in excepted employment; or

(b) provide for including the class of persons employed in excepted employment among the classes of persons employed in insurable employment.

Just why the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) read paragraph (a) of subsection (2) and did not read paragraph (b) on the following page, I do not know. He said, in effect, "You can take them out of it, but you cannot take them in." If he had just turned over the page he would find that there is a provision for taking them in, a provision which is as clear as words can make it. What purpose is served by making a statement of that kind in this committee, knowing I would be here to answer it, unless such a misstatement is calculated to arouse prejudice in some minds that we are going to be fair to one class and unfair to another class. There it is. Anyone knows the commission may place workers in the excepted class or, if circumstances warrant, take them out of that class. Then there is the further subsection:

The commission may by regulations provide, subject to such exceptions and conditions as the commission think fit, for adding any class of employment to the excepted employments but only as respects persons who are in any week employed in that class of employment to such extent (being in the opinion of the commission inconsiderable) as may be specified in the regulations.

The question we are asked this afternoon has to do with why fishing is not included. I endeavoured to give an answer the other day, but I shall repeat it now. Fishing is a seasonal employment, and if it does create conditions such as those which have been referred to either in that industry, or in some other industry—notably lumbering—then there is a provision for bringing them within the operation of the statute.

Then the question was asked as to whether or not a man in this or that particular occupation would be classed within or without, and the answer is that at the inception of a measure such as the one before us in all countries it has been found impossible to lay down any hard and fast rules. The commission itself will after an investigation of circumstances determine to what extent there shall be any variation from the rule laid down. Behind it there is the answer which I endeavoured to make yesterday, namely that this measure is founded upon the basis of benefits being paid out of a fund proportionate to the sums that are paid into that fund. The difficulty of ascertaining what sum should be paid into the fund with respect to classes mentioned this afternoon is too great to enable the legislature in the first instance to lay down a rule. In Great Britain, under the amendment of last year, the provisions with respect to the commission bringing in or taking out are substantially the same as those now before this committee. It will be found of course that if you bring arbitrarily within the operation of this measure large numbers of people who may not be able to continue to make payments or who by the very nature of things are not employed for forty weeks in two years you might find a position in which the fund would be insolvent. This is a solvent fund; it is built upon scientific bases and is intended to be maintained in that position.

The difficulties to which references have been made, notably that of determining whether a man is a logger or a lumberman are not inconsiderable. My own judgment would be that a man who works on the sawing of logs, the planing of them and the production of the finished product of lumber is in the lumbering business, while on the other hand a man engaged in cutting trees is probably classed as a logger. It may be that when this measure begins to operate it will be very desirable to include within its provisions some of those who are not now included, and shutting out some who are now in. That however is a matter which will have to be determined in the light of the effect upon the fund itself.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the act have to be amended?

Mr. BENNETT: No; there is provision already in the measure. May I direct the hon. member's attention to the bottom of page 7 and the top of page 8, paragraphs (a) and (b), which cover the point to which he has made reference, and especially the language in subsection (2) which states that if anomalies may arise by reason of the operation of the classifications, then changes should be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With reference to paragraph (a) of subsection (2), may I say that I can see no difficulty in including employees who are now excepted, but if the commission decides to except employees now insurable would there be any compensation to those employees who while in insurable employment have made actual contributions to the fund?

Mr. BENNETT: There is a provision at a later point in the measure for taking care of that particular situation. I know the hon. member has studied the matter with a great deal of care, and realizes that there must be some method of dealing with anomalies which are bound to arise.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, by regulations, and especially upon the introduction of the measure. That is the reason the act of 1920, the first of the English acts, had to be amended nearly once a year for several years until—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thirty-six times.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I have one or two observations with regard to the number classified as fishermen. Hon. gentlemen speaking about this point perhaps know better than I do that numbers are classified as sailors, rather than as fishermen, when they are working on ships, schooners or other fishing vessels. I have made no specific inquiry as to that particular number, and I cannot say that I have given a complete explanation, but I shall be able to ascertain definitely and tell hon. members whether or not the difference in numbers arises from the method of classification. If we classified as sailors twenty men on a schooner, including the captain and officers, and did not classify them as fishermen we would have a corresponding diminution in the number of men classified as fishermen and an increase in the number classified as sailors. If they are on the articles they are classified as sailors; if they are not on the articles they might be classified as fishermen. However, I shall make inquiries and ascertain definitely with respect to the matter. I believe, however, that I have given the correct explanation. All names appearing on the articles of these vessels which go to sea are classified, under the present procedure, as sailors. That is my understanding of it.

Then there was a question asked by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). My reply is that the measure is broad enough to meet the situation he has described. I think it would not be broad enough to meet a situation of only one store.

Mr. HANBURY: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUFF: Just a minute; if paragraph (a) of subsection (2) provides for including the class of persons employed in insurable employment among the classes of persons employed in excepted employment, why is it necessary, the commission having that power under the act, to have any schedule? Why not leave out the schedule? If the commission has the full power to take in or leave out any group of persons, then it seems to me that the schedule appearing at page 31 of the bill, under part II, is not necessary. I repeat that if this is to be an insurance act it should cover every person who works—and I do not care whether he works in a factory, in a lumbering camp or anywhere else. By some means or another every working person should come under the provisions of this measure. If as the Prime Minister said a moment ago he is following an insurance act which had to be amended in Great Britain thirty-six times, surely it does not follow that there must be brought down to this parliament a measure which in the next and in the following years we will have to amend, in order to bring satisfaction to all people in the country. If this is to be proper legislation, then every person who works should come under it. For instance, the fishermen have to pay their contribution to the classes which are not excepted. The Prime Minister said yesterday that the operation of the act would cost $7,000,000.

In addition to that the employers of labour in a few special cases must pay in some forty per cent, if I remember aright, of the total funds, which would make at least another $15,000,000. That is what the employers themselves pay in. There is some $22,000,000 which must come out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country—the $7,000,000 for overhead and organization purposes, and the $15,000,000 which the employers pay in, and that $15,000,000 must be added to the cost of the goods which these employers sell to the consumers of this country. I say, Mr. Chairman, that if the fishermen or the farmers or the lumbermen or anybody else have to pay for insuring certain classes of people, this act should be broad enough so that all the workers of this country who work with their hands should come under it.

The Prime Minister, in order to substantiate a statement that he made in the course of his remarks—I am not accusing him of giving incorrect figures—said that perhaps the reason that he was given the figure of only 10,000 fishermen was because these fishermen on the articles of a ship are classed as sailors. Let me tell the Prime Minister that that is not the fact at all. A sailor is an entirely different person from a fisherman. The fisherman has articles of his own in the case of every ship over ten tons, and he must go to the shipping master and sign on as a fisherman before he can proceed to sea. He has nothing to do with the sailors. He is not a sailor; he is a fisherman. A sailor is in an entirely different class from a fisherman. In fact, on every fishing vessel in Canada there are no sailors in the strictest sense of the term. It is the fishermen who run the vessel. These fishermen, of course, are sailors as well as fishermen, but whilst they are engaged in fishing they are fishermen and not sailors. I do not know where the Prime Minister got his figures but it seems to me that if I were in his place I would want to know why somebody gave him that figure of only 10,000 fishermen, when the Department of Fisheries itself gives the figure of 78,000 fishermen, and in my opinion the number is even greater than that. In the figure which the Prime Minister gave the other day it is only fishing which includes the 10,000, fishing and trapping. Perhaps there were 10,000 people trapping.

Mr. POWER: Lobster trapping.

Mr. DUFF: That would not be lobster trapping. Whoever gave the Prime Minister that figure was not fair to him or to this parliament because the number of fishermen in this country must be at least as many as the figure of something like 80,000 which was given by the Department of Fisheries itself? I say again to the Prime Minister that these men are not sailors; they are real fishermen, men who are signed on the articles as fishermen. In the smaller boats, of course, they do not sign articles, but these 78,000 are classed by the Department of Fisheries as real fishermen and not sailors.

As far as I am concerned, I am in favour of all classes of the community who work with their hands coming under an unemployment insurance scheme in order to protect them from unemployment or sickness. I have paid in for years under the Workmen's Compensation Act in Nova Scotia certain moneys in order to protect fishermen in the case of accident and their families in the case of a fisherman being lost; and I am still willing to pay it for the fishermen or for the longshoremen or for the men who work in my own fish store and the men who are handling the fish and bringing them into the store, or packing them. I am willing to pay that as long as I am able to do so. But I say to the Prime Minister that if this act is to be a proper one and in the interests of the whole country, then every class in the community that work with their hands should come in under it, and we should not leave it to the commission now or later to decide whether John Jones or Bill Smith shall be accepted and get the benefits of the act.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, I have asked the Prime Minister two questions which he has not answered. The first one was why employees of banks and financial institutions should be exempt from the provisions of this act. My second question was whether the figures as given to this house from the census of 1931 on which this act is partly based would be even approximately correct at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: I read from the report of the two actuaries. The report of one has been printed, and the other will be completed and distributed I trust between five and six this evening to all the members of the committee so that they may have it before them. The actuaries arrived at the conclusion that the maximum number that might come under the operations of the act was, as indicated by me, 1,700,000 odd. That is the maximum. When they speak of the cost of administration of the act, their observations are based upon the fund being $42,000,000. I said that the administration had cost in Great Britain 12½ per cent, and that here it might cost as much as 15 per cent. The estimated contribution to the fund under this act, is about $42,000,000, without the accessions to it that might come in the course of time. So it is based on the assumption that the number would be as I indicated the other day, and now repeat.

So far as bringing employees of banks and financial institutions under the act is concerned, the history of the operation of such an act with respect to those enterprises warranted our following the course that had been pursued in Great Britain, and accordingly these employees were taken out of the operations of the act; that is all. It would neither benefit the act nor benefit the individuals to be included. Their problems are so different from the industrial employees who are included in it, and it is thought desirable that they should not be included. Experience teaches that that is not desirable, but if experience subsequently teaches that it is desirable that they should be brought within the act, I assume that it can be done. But on the basis of this act it is not thought desirable to do so.

Mr. GERSHAW: Would the same apply to clerical employees of municipalities?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 31 of the bill he will find before him the excepted employments. The first is (a) agriculture, horticulture and forestry. The reasons are obvious I think with respect to those. Hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon in regard to employment in fishing have indicated why in their opinion certain portions at least of the members engaged in fishing should be included. and I have pointed out that there is a provision under clause 2 (b) of section 15 as printed, whereby, if that creates an anomaly, that situation could be dealt with.

Next is (b) fishing; then (c) lumbering and logging. I indicated on the second reading of the bill that possibly where logging is followed as an avocation all the year round, rather than a seasonal employment, the commission has power at once to bring such employees under the operations of the act.

Mr. NEILL: And saw-mill workers?

Mr. POWER: Where is that provision to be found? I do not see it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have just read that the commission may do one of two things; (a) they may exclude, or (b) they may provide for including a particular class of person employed in excepted employment among the classes employed in insurable employment.

Mr. POWER: Where otherwise there would be anomalies in the act; is not that the case?

Mr. BENNETT: I will read the section:

(2) Where it appears to the commission that the terms and conditions of service of, and the nature of the work performed by, any class of persons employed in an excepted employment are so similar to the terms and conditions of service of, and the nature of the work performed by, a class of persons employed in an insurable employment as to result in anomalies in the operation of this act, the commission may, by regulations either unconditionally or subject to such conditions as may be specified in the regulations, either:—

(a) provide for including the class of persons employed in insurable employment among the classes of persons employed in excepted employment; or

(b) provide for including the class of persons employed in excepted employment among the classes of persons employed in insurable employment.

As I read the section, and it is the construction placed upon it in Great Britain, if anomalies are apparent in the administration of the act, the commission is empowered to cure them by taking one of two courses; (a) by adding to the excepted class those that are now in the insurable class.

Mr. DUFF: But they cannot go outside of schedule 3?

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend will just wait a moment till I finish my sentence—or (b) the commission may add to the insurable class those that are now in the excepted class.

Schedule 1 covers all employments. It will be observed that it is intended to cover employment under any contract of service or apprenticeship, written or oral, whether expressed or implied. Then there are the excepted employments. I had just concluded reading the third of them and I came to the fourth, employment in hunting and trapping; and as I was reading lumbering and logging the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said that lumbering should include saw mill operations. I have no doubt that if you have, as you have on the Pacific coast, continuous employment in that class of work known as saw milling or the production and manufacture of lumber, the commission would bring them within the operations of the act and determine the conditions under which they should be brought in.

Mr. HANBURY: But the conditions in the lumbering business vary so much across Canada. I was wondering whether there was any provision in this bill that would permit the commission to establish regions in the lumber business. As the Prime Minister has said, in British Columbia and particularly on the coast, there is no reason why employees in the industry should not be brought under the act, because it is permanent employment the year round, whereas in Ontario the employment is seasonal, and it is seasonal in a great part of the rest of Canada. Is there such a thing as a regional interpretation of any part of this act?

Mr. BENNETT: While there is nothing in the schedules that places a limited construction upon the language used, I should say that if it is apparent from the operation of the act that you have the anomaly to which the hon. gentleman has referred, it is clear that the act would not apply to cases where purely seasonal employment would be involved, and that by the regulation—there is no limitation placed upon it—it could be made applicable to communities or sections of the country in which you have continuous employment as an occupation rather than seasonal employment.

The point with respect to transportation by water or by air does not call at all for observation. But with respect to stevedoring, to which the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough referred and which was mentioned by one other, stevedoring has not thus far in Canada been of such a continuous character as to establish a classification for it which would bring it within the provisions of this measure on any basis we might now set up. If however, as compared with other occupations, it could be ascertained that there was employment for forty weeks continuously, and in other particulars it came within the provisions of the statute, I see no reason why the commission should not make a recommendation to council. This is drafted in the broadest possible sense to cover at any rate every occupation that should properly be brought within its operations to maintain its solvency as a fund—I desire to dwell on that point and I cannot repeat it too often—to maintain the solvency of the national fund that is being set up by the provisions of the bill. Possibly nothing would more clearly indicate that no province would have the jurisdiction to enact legislation such as this, having regard to the jurisprudence of which we have knowledge and the observation made twice this afternoon in this committee, namely, that this is a tax which would be passed on to the consumer, which was exactly the point on which the privy council decided in the Crystal dairy case, when it was held ultra vires of the province to pass any such legislation, which was therefore wholly within federal jurisdiction.

The next point is with respect to employment in banking, mortgage, loan, trust, insurance, or other financial business.

Mr. DUFF: May I interrupt the Prime Minister. In Vancouver and Halifax as well as in St. John stevedoring is a continuous employment.

Mr. BENNETT: The question is as to whether or not it is sufficiently continuous to bring it within the provisions of the section. The opinion expressed by the actuaries in the preparation of the matter was that it was desirable to put it into the excepted class in the first instance and then ascertain whether it should be brought in under the provisions of section seven or by reason of its exclusion creating an anomaly, and for that reason it was placed in that class in the first instance.

Mr. POWER: The condition under which new classes or classes at present excluded may be brought in is clear; the condition is that there shall be an anomaly if they are not brought in. Now, by the phraseology of this act we absolutely except and exempt from its operation all persons engaged in lumbering and logging, let us say. I cannot conceive of a case where there would be an anomaly in only some of these persons being excluded, that is to say, those who are employed all the year round. I would say, if I were a member of the commission and were told, "Why should not persons employed in the saw mills of British Columbia be brought under the operation of the act? There is an anomaly there"—I would say there is not an anomaly; it is not a borderline case, where you could compare them to other loggers. You could compare them to people in factories, but you could not compare them to any other loggers or to people engaged in lumbering operations. Therefore they will, because they are in the exempted class, be excluded from the act. If the Prime Minister were to say, "I will take in persons employed in woodworking establishments," and pointed out that there is a woodworking establishment in Ottawa and one in Montreal operating all the year round, then it would be an anomaly if the woodworking establishment in the place where my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) speaks of is not also brought in; but not otherwise. I cannot conceive of an anomaly where you exempt a whole class unless there is a borderline somewhere. I could perhaps imagine, in the case of stevedoring, that if we had not excluded men working on the wharves, longshoremen, then it might be an anomaly to exclude the stevedores, and you might be able to bring them under the operation of the act. But when you deliberately exclude a whole category of operations, then I am sorry I cannot agree with the Prime Minister that under the section as it is drawn the commission can afterwards bring them in.

Mr. BENNETT: I would direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the anomalies are not with respect to the same class of employment; they are in the operation of the act as a whole.

Mr. POWER: All right; then I will follow the Prime Minister to the logical conclusion. We have laid down then the principle that only those who are employed in occupations which are not seasonal, which are steady the year round, shall be taken in. If that is the principle, let us state it, and then we will say there is an anomaly if some of the persons who come under logging, and so on, are other than seasonal. But we do not do that. We actually violate that principle of steady employment by saying on the one hand that fishermen, loggers and so on, who do not get steady employment shall be exempted; then we turn round and mention the class which possibly is the steadiest in employment—clerks and those employed in financial houses—and exempt them too. So that the principle is not based on steady employment, because I know of no employment which lasts longer than that of persons working in banks and in financial institutions.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason they are exempt.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): "Except" and "exempt" are two different words in the bill.

Mr. POWER: They are all under the same class of exceptions, therefore there is no general principle laid down unless it appears somewhere else in the bill. The general principle is not quite clear. I understood from what the Prime Minister said on the second reading of the bill that the broad principle was that persons employed in seasonal occupations should not enjoy the benefits. But in other sections of the bill we exclude from its benefits, or except or exempt, whatever term you like to use, people who are employed in steady occupations. Therefore I cannot see how there can be an anomaly in these particular trades.

Mr. BENNETT: The anomaly is not with respect to trades it is with respect to the operation of the bill, and if the operation of the bill brings about an anomaly, then there is power given to the commissioners to cure that anomaly.

Mr. NEILL: As of one class against another?

Mr. BENNETT: In the operation of the measure. It is not limited to comparisons of class; it is an anomaly in the operation of the measure as a whole. The hon. gentleman says that the general principle of the measure is to provide that those who have seasonal employment should not be within its provisions. Part I of the first schedule specifies those who are affected by part III of the bill and part II of the first schedule gives the excepted employments. Those that are not excepted are insurable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Except where they are excepted under clause 16.

Mr. BENNETT: That is another matter that comes under the next clause. Let us leave that for the moment. If the committee has any doubt about the matter, I desire that there shall be no doubt and it should be quite clear that the power to which I have referred that is vested in the commission should unquestionably be vested in it in the light of experience and of the knowledge which will be gained when the commission is set up to function. It is not intended to treat it in the sense of making it appear it is one thing when in reality it is another. I have no doubt that clause 15 as it reads makes it possible for the commission to do what I have indicated, but it does not of course give them power to include within the statute those who may work thirty weeks a year at a particular avocation because the very last exception mentioned in the schedule deals with that very detail, that is:

Employment of any class which may be specified in a special order made by the commission, and declared by the commission to apply for the purposes of this act, as being of such a nature that it is ordinarily adopted as subsidiary employment only and not as the principal means of livelihood.

In other words, to follow for twenty weeks the ordinary avocation as means of livelihood and then change for ten weeks to something else and say that is the ordinary avocation or occupation of a person, is not intended by the act. I do not think it is open to doubt, but if the committee feels there is any doubt as to that power being clearly defined and vested in the commission, I would be glad to make it clear beyond peradventure, but I feel the language, having regard to the whole language of the legislation, is clear beyond doubt.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to dwell too long upon the point I raised a few minutes ago, but I have some doubts as to the power of the commission to withdraw from the operation of the act a class of people such as I spoke of a moment ago.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that they could not take any one store.

Mr. EULER: Take the example I gave before: just one store. We find stores of the same general class have the same conditions. The purpose of the legislation is to pay indemnities to people when they lose their employment. If it were found that in a certain class, say of stores, people did not really lose their employment to any extent, then the purpose for which they entered into the operation of the legislation would be lost, I would think, and it might be desirable that they be withdrawn from its operation. Under the clause as I read it, the only condition upon which the class might be withdrawn is because they are anomalies. Surely it would hardly be argued that it is an anomaly because it happens or is the fact that most of the people in this class never become unemployed and therefore there is no necessity for unemployment insurance. Does the Prime Minister say that that could be regarded by the commission as an anomaly in the operation of the measure and therefore empower the commission to withdraw them from the operation of the legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: Undoubtedly if the case mentioned by the hon. gentleman were found; that is, workers in stores or shops having over a period of years had only one person who had been off duty or unemployed and if it were found that that extended throughout the country, that might be claimed to be an anomaly under the operation of the act having regard for the fact that the very purpose for which it comes into being is unnecessary with respect to that class. I say to the hon. gentleman frankly that I cannot think it possible such a condition would prevail except in an extraordinarily well ordered community, if I might use that expression. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might regard his community as being in that class, but I do not think that condition would prevail generally.

Mr. EULER: Probably not.

Mr. BRADETTE: With regard to mining, I wish to speak about the class of prospectors. Some hon. members may think prospectors always work on their own initiative, but it is a branch that belongs to mining and there are to-day thousands of prospectors who are doing pioneer work, opening up new resources in the northern sections of the country, working for corporations, and also on their own initiation. I would ask the Prime Minister to define the status of prospectors under this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I would say that prospectors are not covered by the benefits under it because their employment is not such as comes within the provisions of the insurable class.

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I point out that many of the prospectors referred to by the hon. member for North Timiskaming are employed by the mining companies themselves and are on the payrolls of those companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Then they are included.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Then, in reference to the statement made by the Prime Minister a few minutes ago about fishing and lumbering as seasonal employments, these prospectors can work only during certain seasons of the year. This is true not only of prospectors but of many other men on the payrolls of mining companies who are working in out of the way sections. It would include also labourers who are assisting prospectors. Therefore, according to the right hon. gentleman, the mining companies which are paying them and paying also a very large share to ensure steady employment will not be able to have these men looked after. That is the way in which I understand the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry, but that is not what my answer was. In the one case you have men on their own. In the other you have them employed by a company. The question put to me by the hon. member for North Timiskaming had reference to prospectors on their own. The question now put by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington is with respect to prospectors who are on the pay list of a company. Those are the two classes. I said that the first class, the man on his own, did not come within the operation of the legislation; with respect to the second, if he is on the pay-roll and meets the requirements of the statute so far as time of employment is concerned, he unquestionably comes within the provisions of the statute. The contribution would have to be made by the mining company and deducted from the pay to which the employee is entitled.

Mr. NEILL: The Prime Minister was kind enough to say on the second reading of the bill that he would take the temper of the house in committee in regard to including some of these presently excepted occupations. Now he seems rather to suggest that this will be taken care of under the clause dealing with anomalies. I would suggest that the fewer of these anomaly cases, the better. It would be better to include in the bill such cases as can be agreed upon or are obviously entitled to come in now. It would mean delay or confusion if one industry were to start at one date and another later on under the anomaly clause. In British Columbia, logging and lumbering are distinctly all the year round occupations and stevedoring is the same. Stevedoring is not now a catch-as-can employment as it used to be where one would pick up a man here and there; the stevedores are regularly organized and do nothing but work at that particular employment. I think it would be proper that they should be put in without the trouble of having to make an appeal to the commission later on and proving that an anomaly exists.

Another thing that the Prime Minister might be kind enough to mention when he replies is the question brought up by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie): Will coal miners who work perhaps three days a week be included? The hon. member for Assiniboia said he had a class of miners who work twenty-four to twenty-six weeks a year in the mines, and the remainder of the time on farms and elsewhere. The men I represent do nothing else; when they are not working in the coal mines they are idle and they only work some twenty-five weeks a year. I should like to know what their status would be under this bill.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the last question, I think it is in part dealt with by section 16 and in part by the excepted provisions of part II of schedule 2. A person employed in an occupation which is seasonal and does not ordinarily extend over more than twenty-two weeks in the year, and who is not ordinarily employed in any other occupation which is insurable employment, or who works habitually for less than the ordinary working day, is entitled to a certificate.

Mr. NEILL: These men work the full day but only three days a week.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the question is, does it extend over more than twenty-two weeks in the year.

Mr. NEILL: You cannot find that out until the end of the year.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason the provision is here, to enable these cases to be dealt with on a basis of principle rather than of guess.

With respect to stevedoring, the hon. gentleman realizes that he himself placed the matter properly before the committee when he said that nowadays it is different from what it was. That perhaps is not true in every part of the country, but to the extent to which it is it would enable them to ask to be brought within the operation of the measure.

As to the first question, namely that the temper of the house might be ascertained, I desire to make it clear that I was not going to disarrange the financial structure of the fund by making amendments in that regard. But if there was any doubt or uncertainty on the part of the committee as to the provisions of the statute, making it clear whether in the cases to which attention has been directed the commission has power to bring them in, I would certainly be glad to make it abundantly clear that there is no doubt on the part of the government that that should be so.

Mr. NEILL: But not to put them in now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As we have been discussing fishing, lumbering and logging, part of the excepted employments, I would ask the Prime Minister if it is contemplated that any of those engaged in agriculture shall be included? Could the Prime Minister suggest anybody engaged in that business would come within the operation of the bill?

Mr. BENNETT: The experience has been that farmers do not desire to make the weekly contribution, that is the experience in Great Britain at any rate, and other countries. Apart from everything else, they do not think it desirable.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Granted.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought my hon. friend was a lawyer, not a farmer. The other question, as to whether or not there may be any engaged in agriculture who might come within the provisions of the measure, is one which obviously I would not care to answer, for it would depend on the classification which the farmer had in his occupation. If he were classified as farmer the answer would be no. If, although a farmer, his classification is something within the provisions of the bill, then obviously the answer is yes.

Mr. McKINNON: There is a very large body of men who while they may come under the insurable provision it appears almost impossible that they will ever derive any benefit from the bill. I mean railway shop-men and also men in the running trades. In the running trades there are men with from fifteen to twenty-three years' service, who have spent their lifetime in this work, but who probably get only six weeks' or two months' work each year. Yet this is their ordinary employment. I cannot see how these men would come under the act. Then there is another body of men in the district I have the honour to represent, that is saw and planing mill employees. They are employed five or six months in the year. Of course they are exempted. In the winter these men work in the bush. I feel that they should be included in the benefits, in fact I have a number of resolutions from them asking that they be included. As far as the men employed in the planing mills are concerned they are really year round employees. I should like particularly to have the railroad aspect of the matter further clarified.

Mr. BENNETT: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to suggest that the railroad employees should be excepted from the operation of the act?

Mr. McKINNON: I want to have them included.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, are they not included?

Mr. McKINNON: But obviously it is impossible for them to derive any benefit, because a great percentage of them work only six weeks or two months in the year.

Mr. BENNETT: I just pointed out that by the provisions of section 16 under certain circumstances a certificate would be granted exempting them from liability to contribute. While holding such certificate the men would not be insured under the act.

Mr. EULER: But he wants them insured.

Mr. HEAPS: There are certain sections of railway employees who would not come under the act; those who work two or three months in the year would be barred under the section which says they have to be employed so many weeks in the year before being eligible for benefit. There is another section in a similarly anomalous position, that is the men working in the railway shops. To-day thousands of them are working approximately twenty-five hours a week during the whole year. This you might say is a trifle over three days a week. This has been going on for a number of years now and the twenty-five hour week evidently has become more or less a permanent thing for them. I find it difficult to ascertain what their position is under the bill, because at times these men will be working continuously fourteen days per month, as they are now, and then there are times that they are laid off two or three weeks. They are not continuously employed. I would ask the Prime Minister to tell the committee what the position of these many thousands of railway employees would be.

Mr. BENNETT: It is my personal opinion that the provisions of the bill meet the case to which attention has been directed. If for two years there have been forty weekly contributions made to the fund they would come within that provision. It is true they might not be working six days a week, but working forty weeks they would be making forty weekly contributions to the fund during the preceding two years.

I regret that I did not catch the question as put by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. McKinnon). I thought he was anxious that his friends should be excluded from the operation of the act. I gather that he desires that they should be brought within it.

Mr. McKINNON: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: If they make the forty contributions during the two years they are entitled to benefits, because the benefit sections deal with the conditions under which the payments are to be made. They come later, and if the hon. gentleman will direct attention to this point when we come to that section, I shall be glad to discuss it with him further. I quite follow his point. I thought, as he does, that they should be exempted on the ground that the benefits would not be in proportion to the payments made.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I find it difficult to see how the coal miners will receive very much benefit under this act, even if they can take advantage of it. According to the census figures for 1931 with regard to the coal industry I find that the average number of weeks worked in Ontario was 20·71; in Manitoba, 21·95; in Saskatchewan, 30; in Alberta, 27·31, and in British Columbia, 27·92. Obviously it will be a long time before these men can qualify even if they come under the act, and the benefits they might receive would be very small. I wonder if the Prime Minister has anything more hopeful than that for them.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that they all worked a sufficient number of weeks to qualify for benefits; that is, if they worked twenty-seven weeks in one year that would be fifty-four weeks in two years, and the requirement is forty weeks. The lowest number mentioned was 20·71 weeks; that would make over 41 weeks of employment in two years. The fact that the work is not continuous is what militates against the operation of the act; that is, they are not able to spell out a sufficient number of weeks of continuous employment within the period of time to bring themselves within the operation of the act. But if they once start paying to the fund and make payments continuously of course the provisions of the statute apply. They have made the forty payments; they have made them within two years; they are now unemployed within the statute and claim the benefit. What the hon. gentleman has in mind, I suppose, is that they cannot claim benefits for the periods of time between their employment in one year and the time when they take up employment in the next year.

Mr. NEILL: They never qualify for unemployment relief.

Mr. BENNETT: If they were in and then passed out of the picture for the reasons I have mentioned, they can claim under the statute itself.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Can they make contributions if they are not employed?

Mr. BENNETT: No, they cannot do so. But supposing a man was properly on the fund; he made his contributions in good faith and the general plan of employment was less than the number of days that he had been working per week when he went on the fund; he continued to make his payments regularly and then, at the expiration of two and a half years, we will say, he became unemployed after having been employed for forty weeks during a period of two years, although not for the full time per week. Having made his contributions my reading of the act would bring him within its provisions.

Mr. NEILL: Would the Prime Minister explain the converse, that is, with regard to his claim for unemployment benefits? He has put in his time and made his payments; then he finds that he has been idle for twenty-four weeks in the year, or something like that. He wants the benefit but he cannot get it, because he is never idle for more than three days at a time. Must he pay in and get nothing out?

Mr. BENNETT: The act is based on the assumption that there must be a cessation of employment as a condition precedent to the right of benefit. By "unemployment" is meant unemployment for a period of nine days during which he is without any opportunity gainfully to employ himself.

Mr. HANBURY: Nine consecutive days.

Mr. NEILL: Then he cannot qualify.

Mr. BENNETT: Read subsection 4 of section 20 on page 11.

Mr. NEILL: Apparently he qualifies to pay in but does not qualify for any benefit.

Mr. BENNETT: If the condition under which he can qualify has not arisen.

Mr. NEILL: Pretty tough on him.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the whole problem is based on what constitutes a week's work. In this case, with the eight hour day it would be twenty-four hours a week. I think we should have some definition of a week's work. Then in connection with the payments, I notice in one of the schedules there is a daily payment and a weekly payment, based on one day and a six day week. Where do these men working a three day week fit into the picture? Do they get paid on a weekly or on a daily basis?

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot answer that question; I do not think anyone can.

Mr. MITCHELL: In its practical application it has to be worked out.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then this does not hold out very much hope for a great proportion of the miners in my province. As the Prime Minister knows, very often they have a working period as short as twenty-five or twenty-seven days a year, and several of the mines operate for an equally short time. Many of those operating for longer periods operate spasmodically; perhaps they work for a week in the summer time and a month in the fall, and then lay off until the cold weather comes. There is nothing like steady employment in the coal mining industry in Alberta, and from the explanation given by the Prime Minister I am afraid this act is dead as far as the coal miners are concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: When we come to section 20 I think perhaps the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for East Hamilton will find the answers to many of their questions. I have notations here as to the corresponding sections in the English act, and I think many of the questions which have been asked will be answered when we come to that section, because the points with which we are now dealing really anticipate the section I have mentioned. We are considering unemployment benefits now, and I think if we wait until we come to sections 19 and 20 we will be a little further ahead.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have only this to say in support of the contention made by hon. members this afternoon that certain classes are exempted that should be included. If the Prime Minister's chief argument is the seasonable character of their employment there is no more reason to exclude those employed by fish corporations or companies, or longshoremen or stevedores, than there is to include the miners. These are all extremely seasonal occupations, as I have indicated by the figures I have quoted.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am convinced that we can never have a satisfactory unemployment insurance scheme until all employees are included under the scheme, but undoubtedly there is quite a difference between what we would like to have and what we can have at the present time. A moment ago the Prime Minister said, as I understood him, that bank employees were exempted because their occupation was constant and there was no unemployment. If there are going to be exemptions for that reason I can give the Prime Minister another occupation that is not now excepted from the act; I refer to street railway employees, motormen and conductors. Only this morning I received a protest against these men being included under the act, and I think if one occupation or trade is to be exempted for the reason that there is very little if any unemployment in that occupation, all other occupations in the same category should be exempted as well.

Coming down to section 15 which we are discussing now, or which we began to discuss, under which the commission is allowed certain latitude in including or excluding certain occupations, may I say that personally I believe this is a wrong principle to follow. Under section 7, which we passed yesterday, together with its other duties as administrators of this act the commission is given power to carry on certain investigations. In my opinion the act should be amended by parliament after a report by the commission as to the desirability of bringing other occupations under the act or of excluding occupations that are now under this measure. I say it is leaving to too great an extent power in the hands of the commission to amend the act either one way or the other.

Mr. CAMPBELL: In the constituency I have the honour to represent there are probably more cheese factories than in any other constituency of Canada. Some of the cheesemakers would like to know where they stand in regard to the benefits to be derived under this measure. Some of the factories are owned by large dairy companies which make ice cream and other dairy products. Other factories are owned by local farmers, some who have joined to form joint-stock companies and others who have formed associations. I should like to know where they stand?

Mr. BENNETT: If they can be classified as manufacturers they are employers within the operation of the measure.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What about the factories owned by the farmers themselves?

Mr. BENNETT: If they are entities owned by the farmers the position would be the same.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): And the same with regard to milk drivers?

Mr. BENNETT: The same thing.

Mr. MULOCK: I presume the same regulation would apply to butter as applies to cheese, so far as dairy companies are concerned?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite so.

Mr. MULOCK: We will suppose a farmer on his own farm buys milk from adjoining farmers, and manufactures butter. In that operation he engages men to make the butter. Does he come within the provisions of the measure? I understand if he operates on his own farm the measure would not be operative, but if it were a separate entity, if a corporation were running it, the measure would be effective.

Mr. BENNETT: The one is a case of employment and the other is not.

Mr. HOWDEN: Following up the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River may I say that many thousands of men are working in the railroad shops of Canada, and in most cases they work only fourteen days a month. That condition raises the question as to whether they are casual workers or would come under the measure, and receive benefits. This is a serious matter, so far as the people in the railway shops are concerned, because practically all of them work only fourteen days each month, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if in his opinion these men will come under the measure and receive benefits as being employed for the required number of days.

Mr. BENNETT: As I said a minute ago the matter is dealt with in succeeding sections, particularly section 20. That section deals with the benefits, and the right to claim benefits. The section we are now considering deals with the definition of insured persons, and at page 31 of the bill, part I of the schedule we have a statement indicating who come within the act, and what constitutes employment. Practically every person would come within the definition appearing in part I of the schedule. It is believed that that is the easier way to deal with the matter. Then in part II of the schedule we have the excepted employments, and where an employment comes within the excepted class obviously it is not insurable. That however is subject to the express condition to which I referred this afternoon and shall not repeat. When we reach sections appearing later in the bill, dealing with contributions and the right to claim benefits—especially in section 20—we will find amplification for the point with which the hon. member is now dealing. Nothing further than what I have already said can be said respecting section 15.

Mr. HANBURY: Speaking earlier in the afternoon the Prime Minister said there was authority under the act for the commission to interpret the distribution of benefits under the scheme on a regional basis. I should like to know in what portion of the measure we find power for such regional interpretation?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say it was in the measure; I said distinctly that it was not stated in terms within it, but I had some reason to believe that because of the wording used there might be power to declare that where, as in British Columbia, there is logging and lumbering, occupations which are no longer intermittent or seasonal, it was not in accordance with the general scheme of the measure that they should be excepted, and therefore they should come within its operation.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By regulation.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, within the provisions of the subsection to which I directed attention.

Mr. NEILL: I wish to ask only one further question, and I believe it must be asked at this point because this is the only section referring to part II of the schedule, appearing at page 31. I should like to know why domestic servants, other than those working where a business is carried on, should not be included?

Mr. BENNETT: For the same reason that it has been impossible to find cases, except very exceptional ones, where there has been continual service for a period of two years, which would enable them to make the forty payments. That is the reason.

Section agreed to.

Section 16 (as printed; now section 15), agreed to.

On section 17 (as printed; now section 16)—Contributions by employed persons and employers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I would suggest that we take this section by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Very well; we are now on subsection (1): "Contributions by employed persons and employers".

Subsection (1) agreed to.

On subsection (2)—Rates of contribution.

Mr. BRADETTE: I should like to make a few observations regarding some of the industries in my section of the country. I have in mind particularly the mining industry and permanent industries. May I state at the outset that I have always supported a system of contributory unemployment insurance, but I believe the operation of the present measure would be injurious to the gold mining industry. I have in mind the fact that the Hollinger mine for example has been operating consecutively for twenty-two years, and the McIntyre mine, the Dome mine and others have been worked for long periods of time. Geologists maintain that most of those mines will function for another sixty years at least.

Under the present scheme the employers and employees each contribute a third. For the sake of argument we will suppose that one of those mines operates steadily for the next twenty-five years. We can readily see that the men working in them would receive no compensation for the money they had paid.

In such cases I am convinced there should be a gradual decrease in the contributions made by the employers and employees. For instance, some men have been working in the Hollinger mine seven days each week for twenty-two years, without losing one hour of time. It is fair to assume that many workers will work as steadily in those mines for the next twenty-five years. The present scheme I am convinced would do an injustice to those men and to the corporations affected. They would not be making mere contributions; their insurance payments would be, purely and simply, a tax. I repeat, that so far as these industries are concerned the insurance payments would be a tax. I should like the Prime Minister and the committee to consider inserting clauses in the measure which would provide that contributors making payments for a period of five consecutive years, for instance, who have not lost any time through lack of work would enjoy the benefit of a gradual decrease of 20 per cent each year down to a minimum of five cents per week. Payments could continue at that rate until the close of the mines working period.

Hon. members familiar with gold mining in this country will know that the history of that industry indicates it has been a permanent industrial organization. It has given employment for three shifts each day, seven days a week. This has been going on for the last twenty-two years in the case of some mines. Take some of the mines in the constituency of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, some of the old silver mines at Cobalt, for instance, which have been working consecutively for the last thirty-five years or more, and I believe that the same remark applies just as strongly to our gold mines in northern Ontario at least.

I am making an earnest appeal to this committee to see that no injustice is done to the mining institutions that must be regarded as permanent. Otherwise it would be simply encouraging some other industries which have been highly seasonal in their employment to be more seasonal in future. I have a case in point. I hold no special brief for any of the big owners; I am speaking for the working men, and also the industries, and I say that steady employment has been provided over a long period of years in the gold mines, and these contributions would be simply an added tax on the working men. To illustrate the permanency of some of the mines in Canada I need only mention the Hollinger, McIntyre and the Dome mines, where men started in to work when the mines were first opened and have continued to work there for twenty to twenty-two years, and have now their sons working alongside them in the same mines. I think the committee will be vividly seized of the permanency of employment in some of these mining organizations when I mention that, and again I make this appeal very sincerely, more particularly on behalf of the working men. In the case I have just cited it would be simply direct taxation on the shoulders of the miners to support an insurance scheme from which they will get no benefit whatever.

The committee must also bear in mind that so far as the mining industry generally is concerned there is only a definite amount of ore, a certain amount of minerals, to be taken from the bowels of the earth, and when that is done the life of the mine is finished. I want the committee to study this question very thoroughly so as to be fair to that section of the population. I know the miners and the mine-owners in our section of the country want to be fair to this act. They know that it can be very beneficial in many cases, but I believe that it is not the intention of the Prime Minister to put an added load on people who will receive no benefit from this legislation, but will simply be an additional direct tax on them.

I would like to hear the Prime Minister's views on the case I have presented.

Mr. BENNETT: I have listened to a good many pleas in parliament in my time. My sympathy for these fortunate gold-mine owners is not so great as that of the hon. gentleman. Their inability to make the contribution required under the act does not move me greatly. When I hear the hon. member for Bow River speak of the difficulties and privations which the miners in another industry have to undergo, and then when I hear the hon. member for North Timiskaming speak of the richness of the natural conditions under which other men are working in other parts of Canada, and with no unemployment at all, it indicates the necessity for having a national bill so that the richness of the one part may compensate for the paucity of demand in another section for another deposit that we call coal.

Mr. BRADETTE: I did not mention the word richness.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is what it means. Gold means that. There is just one other point I should like to make. In my lifetime I have not been unfamiliar with the plea that has been set up by the very rich who claim that they should not pay the high taxes because they do not get corresponding benefits from them. That is an old story, as old as time itself. It is the old plea, but it does not go with respect to this bill.

Mr. BRADETTE: They do not want to be excluded. I would ask this question of the Prime Minister. Does he not think it would be fairer to the workers themselves if there was a graded tax, just as insurance premiums are graded and become less after a certain period of years? If you take out automobile or accident or life insurance, after a certain number of years the premium you have to pay is less. The mining companies want to play the game, as they showed in connection with the gold taxation last year. The miners in my section are also willing to help their comrades in other occupations, but surely the committee should be fully seized of this fact, that under this scheme men may be paying contributions all their lives without any chance of receiving benefits whatsoever. I am going to leave that for the consideration of this committee. Would it be fair to ask people to make payments for a long period of time without any expectation of them being able to receive benefits under this scheme? This scheme is not intended to penalize anybody I know, but it would seem to be in the nature of a penalty in the case I have just mentioned. There is no question of richness among the miners in our section. They are receiving fair wages but no riches, and these contributions would be a direct tax on them. It would mean that they would be paying into the fund for years and years without receiving any benefits whatsoever under the present provisions.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask some questions touching the actuarial work that was carried on. Would it be in order for me to do so under this section?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no objection, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VENIOT: With respect to the computation made by the actuaries, am I right in saying that the years they included were from 1922 to 1931 inclusive?

Mr. BENNETT: Might I just say to the hon. gentleman that in view of the suggestion that was made yesterday afternoon I have asked the printers to complete as quickly as possible the printing of the reports of Mr. Wolfenden and Mr. Watson, and I think they will be completed and distributed before six o'clock. One has just come to my hand. If the hon. gentleman will wait until he has these documents before him he will perhaps be enabled to deal with the matter a little more readily.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am personally opposed to the provision for contributions by employees, and I propose to give to the house a few reasons why.

In the first place it is very clear that this act does not propose to apply itself, nor can it be applied, under the insurance principle, to the unemployed. They cannot contribute so they are out.

Then those who are employed may be divided into three classes; first, those who are permanently employed, such as bank clerks; they also are out. It seems to be the view already that those who are permanently employed and are not likely to be unemployed should not against their will be taxed contributions to maintain the operations of this act.

There is the third class, the seasonal class, and the Prime Minister has already used an argument in the house this afternoon to show that they should not be included. So we have left the class in between as the only ones who may be expected, in accordance with the discussion this afternoon, to contribute. Let us take them—no, not them alone; we will take them all.

We find by reference to the figures supplied by the Dominion bureau of statistics showing the average earnings by wage-earners in Canada and the provinces for 1931, that the average earnings of all adult males was $927 per year and of females $560. I emphasize at this moment the very, very meagre annual earnings of all wage-earners in Canada as indicated by those figures. If we subdivide them into some of the more important branches of industry that come under the operation of this bill, we find that in manufacturing the average annual earnings amounted to $1,038 for males fully employed and $542 for females, or an average of $790. In the construction trade the average for males is $709 per annum and the average for females $732. In the vegetable products branch of manufacturing the average for males is $910 and for females $453, while in the animal products branch the average for males is $941 and for females $479. I could go on to cite many more, for instance, the earnings in the coal mining industry. The figures show positively appalling wages, on the basis of which it is not possible to maintain any decent standard of living in this country, much less a comfort standard; and until the wage earner is in receipt of a decent standard of living there should not be exacted from him a contribution for any period of unemployment that may ensue. One of my reasons for that statement is this. The evidence that has come before this house in the past, still on record, the evidence given before the industrial relations committee some years ago with respect to standards of living, as well as the results of investigations by social service councils and other bodies on this continent, have definitely shown the serious effect upon the health and character of the citizens of the country when they are subject to such desperately miserable conditions by reason of lack of income.

The labour bureau, following the example of Paul Douglas, a research student of the United States, undertook for the benefit of the industrial relations committee some years ago to compile for the use of that committee and of members of this house what they called standard of living budgets, taking various levels of living for the basis of their budget. The minimum subsistence level, according to the labour bureau, is $1,077 per annum. May I point out that this is not the minimum subsistence level budget of 1926 or 1930; it is the minimum level brought up to December, 1934. The health and decency level required in December, 1934, was $1,339 and the comfort level was $1,878. Let it be noted that only under the comfort level budget is there any provision for medical or dental care, and only under the health and decency level and the comfort level is any provision made, meagre as it is, for such necessary things as soap and, let us say, a daily newspaper or a magazine or something like that once in a while. In other words, the average standard of living in Canada is far below the minimum subsistence level, which does not enable the average wage earner in the country to indulge in such things as I have mentioned.

To me this is a shocking state of affairs because it must inevitably lead to a health condition that is not good. Great Britain has had in operation for many years an unemployment insurance act, and yet it has been discovered that the benefits under that act are so low, the general standard of living is so miserable that the general health of the country is suffering; and Dr. Kenneth Fraser, the Cumberland school medical officer, in his report for 1932 stated that there were a large number of children then carrying on in Great Britain without adequate food. Precisely the same thing may be said of Canada; for every hon. member knows, as indeed we were told in testimony in the inquiry that took place some years ago, that the income of the earner is low especially among women workers, and they are disposed to scrimp on food supplies and use the little income they receive to buy clothing so that they may have an appearance of decency. The result of the combination of unemployment on the one hand and low standards on the other has led to the discovery in medical circles recently of something that is now coming to be known as depression shock; I think they copied it from the phrase that became current throughout the world after 1915—shell shock. But the effects of these standards are not merely physical. It is not only a question of having enough to put in your stomach, but the mental and moral effects must also be considered, while there is inevitable humiliation and bewilderment. And these mental conditions are just as real as not having your breakfast or not having sufficient clothes to put on your back. It destroys self-reliance and the sense of usefulness, and once these are gone the situation is hopeless for the people.

I know that hon. gentlemen, or some of them, may contend that a non-contributory unemployment insurance would lead to that very lack of self-reliance of which I speak. That is not necessarily so. If you can grant the citizens of the country an element of security in keeping with the richness and the productive capacity of the country then I am satisfied that you will raise their conception of life and create in them a desire for more of the cultural things which they can acquire only by personal effort. It is just as well for the committee to recognize therefore that under the modern trend of the system which the Prime Minister has made popular under the name of capitalism, there is a steady drift of the total income of nations, or the total value of manufactured products in nations, towards those who draw their incomes in the form of dividends, bonuses, profits and so on.

I have here the last monthly survey of the American Federation of Labour, and in a chart they published in a recent statement they show that the wage earner's share in each dollar created by manufacture has steadily contracted. In 1849 the wage earner received 51 per cent of the value created in manufacture, the other class receiving 49 per cent. In 1919 the wage earner received 42 per cent and the others 58 per cent; in 1933 the wage earner received 36 per cent and the others 64 per cent, and so the tendency to contraction in the wage earner's share is continuous. This bill in its present form, with the contributory feature included, simply means that there will be a definite decline in the available amount of purchasing power in the hands of the wage earner. That is inevitable. Every contribution he makes to the trust fund is a dollar or two dollars out of purchasing power, and he needs the money and would spend it. Furthermore, every dollar the employer contributes will be passed on whenever possible—and that is usually possible—in increased cost of goods; for the employer does not take anything of that sort to himself which can be avoided. They make their books annually; they make their budget preparations annually with everything foreseen that can be foreseen; and every foreseen charge is charged into the cost of goods. And so you have a second system by which total purchasing power is limited.

Now you cannot restore the system in Canada by that sort of thing. What the country needs is increased and not decreased purchasing power—certainly an increase in the pockets of the people. Under this scheme the third method, the minor method of securing contributions, is what the state provides. It is fractional. I might at this stage direct the attention of the committee to the fact that though the bill is said to be based on the British act, this government has not accepted the same measure of responsibility in regard to its contribution that the British government has. Under the Canadian proposal there is a contribution of twenty-five cents from the employee, twenty-five cents from the employer, and from the government ten cents plus administration. Under the British act the contributions are eight pence from the employer, seven pence from the employee and seven pence from the government. On that basis the government here might consider twenty-five cents as its contribution in keeping with the contribution of the employee. But I shall be told: We are taking responsibility for the administration costs. Let us examine that. It has been stated that the cost of the operation of the British act is twelve and a half per cent. Twelve and a half per cent of the total of sixty cents that would be collected under the three-way method under this scheme means seven and a half cents, which would then be the maximum cost that the Canadian government would have to pay in administration. In Great Britain the total contribution translated into Canadian money is forty-four cents. Twelve and a half per cent of forty-four cents is only five and a half cents, so this government anticipates that this legislation is going to cost them seven and a half cents and the cost under the British act is five and a half cents. This does not look very good to me, and it is not as bright an act as one would have hoped to come from this government after the radio addresses we heard. Has the government really recognized what is fundamentally wrong with the system? It should not endeavour to finance this scheme by reducing the total volume of purchasing power in the country—and that will be the inevitable effect of the legislation from the beginning—but it should undertake to finance the scheme by a direct issue of currency backed by the national wealth and carry on all that is required of the scheme in that fashion. I make that suggestion as strongly as I can to the Prime Minister. I am definitely opposed to this contributory feature under present low wage levels and will remain opposed to any contributory feature until the wage earner is receiving at least the average income set forth by the Labour department as required for an ordinary healthy and decent living, or an average of $1,339 per annum. Until the wage earner is receiving that on an average I am opposed to the contributory system. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis):

That section 17, subsection 2, be amended by deleting the words "every employed person and."

So that the clause would then read:

Subject to the provisions of this act, every employer of any such person shall be liable to pay contributions in accordance with the provisions of the second schedule to this act.

I move this in order to direct the attention of the members of the committee to this situation, and not because the amendment in itself would do what I have in mind, namely, increase the purchasing power of the people; that must remain a responsibility of whatever administration is in power. If the government is not prepared to make the necessary financial changes in the bill to increase instead of decrease purchasing power, then I tell them that this bill is not worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain why he voted for it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I voted for the principle of unemployment insurance in order that I might have an opportunity at this time of moving just this type of amendment. If the contributory feature is retained in the bill, I shall not support it on third reading.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would like to say a word in reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bow River. If I understand the latest British act which I have before me, the contributions are not such as are indicated by the hon. member. Taking the adult contributions, I find that the government contributes not eight but ten pence per week or, in Canadian money, twenty cents; the employee contributes an equal amount of twenty cents and the company an equal amount of twenty cents.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one word I should say. When the hon. member for Bow River referred to the portion of the earnings of companies that now went to wage earners as compared with what that proportion was in previous times, he should in fairness to this chamber have indicated the amount that now goes for taxes as compared with previous times. When he left the impression that the proprietors of the enterprise received the difference between the proportion that went to the wage earners and the sum total of profits, he was stating something that is fundamentally unsound. The fifty-six per cent or fifty-one or fifty-two per cent that in earlier days went to wage earners has been reduced to as low as thirty-six per cent. The taxes payable by enterprises in these days because of the demands made by the public for social and other services has increased between the date when the rate that went to wage earners was fifty-one per cent and now when it is thirty-six per cent in a far greater ratio than the lessened distribution among wage earners.

I have never been able to follow the figures to which the hon. gentleman referred as the amount necessary to be received on the average by every wage earner in the country to enable him to live in comfort. It is not the first time I have heard these figures used, but although I have not had an opportunity to investigate them, I think they must refer to the average of all wage earners probably including apprentices and youths in ascertaining the sum total of wages, because even those who fish by the sea sometimes receive as much as ten, twelve or thirteen dollars a day and those engaged in many occupations to which reference might be made, receive during the time they are employed, fairly large sums. But that is beside the question. This is a contributory insurance measure. It was for that measure, the principle of which is contributory insurance as has been explained in the house, that the hon. gentleman voted yesterday. Just why beween then and now he has had a change of heart, he has seen a new light, I cannot say. But at any rate he now says that he did that for the purpose of enabling the bill in committee to be amended by striking out the contributory clauses. That is an excellent reason why one should vote against the second reading of it; it is a little difficult to give it as a reason why one should vote for it on second reading and then destroy it in committee. This measure falls if this amendment carries. It falls in its entirety, for it is predicated upon actuarial computation based on contributions being made by the three parties to it: the state, the employer and the employee.

Mr. COOTE: I am sure there are in Canada certain low paid workers who are not in a position now to make any contribution, and it should be possible to provide in the bill for the establishment of a minimum wage line whereby workers receiving wages below that line should not be asked to contribute. The contribution in such cases might come from the industry and the state combined. It might be possible to include in the bill a provision of that kind. I feel strongly there are certain people who will be called upon to contribute under this scheme and whose wages are now so low that it really does not seem proper to compel them to make such contributions.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just a word or two in connection with this amendment. Following the remarks made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), I think we can readily see that the first effect of this legislation will be a reduction in purchasing power and consequently an increase in unemployment. So that when the purchasing power in the hands of the workers is reduced the first result of this measure will be to hasten the day when they are unemployed. It may equalize itself to a degree when they begin to receive benefits, but undoubtedly, as has been pointed out already, the first result will be to increase what it aims to reduce. Then again we found during the investigation by the price spreads and mass buying committee that many of those who are employed had to receive help from the relief departments of the cities in which they lived. If something more is to be taken out of their wages by contributions under this bill that will have to be made up by the municipalities. So I do not think we are getting anywhere by this legislation as long as it remains on a basis requiring contribution from those who are already receiving far less than is necessary for a decent standard of living.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Last year we had an illustration which should have made it clear to the Prime Minister how one can vote for the general principle of an unemployment insurance bill without committing himself to the contributory feature. That was not regarded as the principle of the bill either on second reading or at any time. Last year when the central bank bill was under consideration an attempt was made to move an amendment providing that the central bank should be publicly owned, and the house was informed both by the Minister of Finance and by the leader of the opposition that the principle of the bill was the setting up in Canada of a central bank, not the question whether it was to be publicly or privately controlled. That, they said, was a detail which could be determined in committee. So in this case the contributory or non-contributory feature obviously must be a detail, and was held to be so from the beginning; nothing to the contrary has ever been said.

As to the question whether or not the figures I have given in regard to the distribution of the wage earner's dollar are fair, the Prime Minister is probably as good a judge as I am. I gave the committee exactly what appeared in the monthly survey of the American Federation of Labour. I quote further in order to make it very clear:

> That the workers have taken the "rap" during the depression is graphically revealed by Department of Commerce figures quoted by the "Survey." They show that during 1933 dividend and interest payments were 64 per cent of the 1929 level, while wages were only 41 per cent.
> Even more startling was the statement that workers are getting less and less from the income they create. This is demonstrated by a graph reprinted herewith—

From which I have already quoted.

> On the other hand, profits and overhead during the same period increased from a half to nearly two-thirds of the value created by manufacture. This, the "Survey" pointedly remarks, has steadily decreased the amount of goods workers can buy, with the result that efforts to get back to normal conditions have been halting.

So is it with this bill. This is going to halt recovery instead of advancing it. To the extent that it extracts purchasing power from the people, to that extent it hampers recovery.

Amendment (Mr. Garland) negatived.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want to call the attention of the committee to another feature of this matter. There is no doubt this question has been thoroughly studied in England and elsewhere. When I spoke last year on the resolution of the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) with respect to unemployment insurance I said that the machine should also be taxed. I believe that unless this is done the present bill is going to have the effect of bringing about more rapid industrialization of industry. No one can quarrel with the use of machines in the present industrial order, yet the fact remains that the machine is replacing men in great numbers, and unless it is found possible under this measure to tax to some extent the mechanization of industry it will defeat its own end, for the good reason that industries will try to use more and more machinery. I could give many instances of mechanization so highly advanced in some factories that practically no men are employed. This does not apply so forcibly in the mining and the newsprint industries. I want the Prime Minister to study that question. I am very serious in making the statement that this legislation will operate to encourage higher mechanization, replacing the human worker more and more, and unless something is done towards a graded ratio of taxation on the machine we are going to have more and more people unemployed, because it will simply hasten the natural evolution towards higher mechanization. Some two years ago the civilized world was startled by the famous term "technocracy." It was recognized that machinery was creating an anomalous situation, although perhaps not so serious as some of those American engineers tried to make the world believe; nevertheless the fact remains that at the present time when we are suffering so much from unemployment it is largely due to the fact that man is the servant and not the master of machinery. This has become more and more pronounced in our industrial life. I repeat the statement I made last year, that unless we find it possible to make the machine that is replacing men so rapidly pay something toward the state so as to allow men to remain at their occupations it will not help the functioning of the new social order. No doubt this angle has been studied by different committees, but I believe it would be in order for this committee to establish a ratio, inasmuch as the machine is entering to a greater degree into some industries than others, as a means towards the establishment of an equilibrium in the working population. If this is not done unemployment is going to become more and more pronounced. Anyone who has been studying the industrial evolution of this country for the last twenty-five years can see the stupendous changes that have taken place. These changes should work for the welfare of civilization, but unluckily they have worked to the detriment of the workingman. This bill should provide that highly mechanized industry should be taxed on a higher scale than industries which do not use so much machinery. I make this prophecy, that unless it is found possible to establish an equilibrium so that the replacement of men by machines is made to serve the welfare of the working population as a whole, such legislation as this will defeat its own end.

Subsections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On subsection 5—employer's contribution payable in respect of exempted person:

Mr. BUTCHER: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Subsection 5 says:

> The employer of a person who holds a certificate of exemption under this act shall be liable to pay the like contributions as would be payable by him as employer's contributions if that person were a person insured under this act, and in this act any reference to the employer's contribution shall be construed as including a contribution payable under this subsection.

Section 16 was rather glossed over, but I notice among the exempted persons under subsection (b) we have—> —a person who is employed in an occupation which is seasonal and does not ordinarily extend over more than twenty-two weeks in any year and who is not ordinarily employed in any other occupation which is insurable employment; or

> (c) a person who habitually works for less than the ordinary working day—

I wonder why it is provided that in this case the employer must pay the contribution. Will the Prime Minister explain?

Mr. BENNETT: A certificate of exemption is in certain cases granted to an employee under section 16. By subsection 5 of section 17 the employer must continue to pay in the case of one exempted under section 16 as in all other cases. Therefore the employer must pay, just as if he had not applied for the certificate, so far as the individual employee is concerned.

Mr. BUTCHER: Then the employee would not receive benefits if he became unemployed?

Mr. BENNETT: No, he would not.

Mr. HOWDEN: That covers a large number of employees. Subsection (b) of this section deals with persons employed in seasonal occupations. There must be very many persons who are employed seasonally in the one industry alone.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 16 deals with the case where the person himself applies for and obtains from the commission a certificate. Under subsection (b) he is a person employed in an occupation which is seasonal, which does not ordinarily extend for more than twenty-two weeks in a year, and who is not ordinarily employed in any other occupation which is insurable employment. That is one class; the other is composed of persons who habitually work for less than an ordinary working day. The application is made by the individual, in order to relieve himself of any further interest in the matter. The counterpart of this section will be found in the English act of 1920. If he did not ask for the certificate he would have to pay. By asking for the certificate he is exempt from the opportunity of obtaining insurance in the event of his falling within the provisions of the act concerning benefits, but the employer must continue to pay. It is an arbitrary exercise of power; he continues his payment to the fund.

On section 18 (as printed; now section 17) —Payment by stamps or otherwise.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Might I ask the Prime Minister how these stamps are to be distributed, either through the post office or otherwise?

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the hon. gentleman would ask that, because it is a reasonable question. The government has given some thought to the matter, and my personal view is that this should be the method of distribution. But it is thought that possibly the commission should make its own regulation in order to deal with the matter as it thinks best under the circumstances. My own view, which I believe is shared by a great many persons—I shall have something to say about it in connection with another measure that will be submitted to the house later—is that the post office does offer the facilities to enable the stamps to be distributed.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will they be special stamps?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 19 (now section 18) agreed to.

On section 20 (as printed; now section 19) —Statutory conditions for receipt of unemployment benefit.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this section might be taken by paragraphs. It is a very important section, to which I particularly directed the attention of the hon. member for North Winnipeg and the hon. member for East Hamilton.

Subsections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On subsection (3)—Enlargement of first statutory condition.

Mr. MULOCK: Are the benefits paid regardless of whether or not the person entitled to them remains in Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will remember that in the first part of the first schedule, at page 31, the following words occur:

(b) Employment under the dominion, or under any province of Canada with the concurrence of the province—
(c) Employment outside of Canada, or partly outside of Canada, for the purpose of the execution of some particular work, by persons who were insured contributors immediately before leaving Canada—

So it might be that to a limited extent and under certain conditions payments might be made out of Canada.

Mr. MULOCK: What I had in mind was that if it was cheaper to live in the United States people might draw benefits under this act and spend the money in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: That contingency we know is always a possibility, because in connection with the pensions paid returned men that is so. Perhaps the hon. member for Labelle will permit me to continue without interrupting.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Order, please.

Mr. BENNETT: Thank you. The provisions of the statute in that regard of course could not be made mandatory, for it might well be that one who had made his payments here might in some case receive his benefit outside the country. I do not think it would be possible to make operative any provision prohibiting that.

Mr. MULOCK: I just wanted to draw that point to the Prime Minister's attention, because I understand that at one time there was some difficulty in Great Britain in regard to money being spent in France because of the lower cost of living there. That condition corrected itself over a period of time, when the cost of living in France increased.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to the hon. gentleman, but I know of no method through which by statute the difficulty to which he refers could be adequately met unless it might be thought desirable to say that no benefit should be paid to any recipient of benefits outside of Canada. That would not cover it, either, for he might have the cheque sent to his ordinary address and then have the money sent to him after the cheque was cashed.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would like to ask the Prime Minister why the forty weeks and why it should be confined to two years.

Mr. BENNETT: With which subsection is my hon. friend dealing?

Mr. MITCHELL: Paragraph (i).

Mr. BENNETT: You must have some period of time, and the period that has been selected is two years. Rightly or wrongly the theory is that there must be a period of time in which to allow the fund to accumulate in order that it may be solvent, and a period of time within which the workman must be continuously employed in order that the fund may be available for the payments to be made under it. In other words the solvency of the fund has been determined to be dependent upon these conditions. There is nothing I can possibly say about it beyond the fact that this, arbitrarily, is the time that has been regarded as proper, and the period of service that has been regarded as proper.

Mr. BOURASSA: Hear, hear. Under the principle of contributory insurance the fund accumulated from the contributions of all parties, whether employers, employees or the state, must be sufficient to ensure the payment of the benefit. Unless that is done the contributory principle disappears. That principle obtains throughout all forms of insurance, whether it be fire, life or accident insurance. The benefits conferred by the insurance fund must be supported by the amount of money contributed to that fund by the interested parties.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the principle upon which this measure is founded.

Subsection 3 agreed to.

On subsection 4—Meaning of continuous period of unemployment.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I have one question to ask in connection with this subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the subsection to which I directed the attention of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), who is not now in the chamber. I thought we should deal with it very carefully, because it deals also with the question of mining, to which the attention of the committee was directed by another hon. member.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Subsection 4 states:

> Any three days of unemployment, whether consecutive or not, within a period of six consecutive days shall be treated as a continuous period of unemployment, and any two such continuous periods separated by a period of not more than six weeks shall be treated as one continuous period of unemployment....

Another section of the measure indicates that that man is considered unemployed and entitled to receive benefits only after he has been unemployed nine days. Would three of these periods of unemployment constitute the nine day period mentioned in the other section?

Mr. BENNETT: The paragraph reads:

> Any three days of unemployment, whether consecutive or not, within a period of six consecutive days shall be treated as a continuous period of unemployment.

That is, after six days of the week have passed and a man has been three days unemployed, whether those days have been consecutive or not they shall be regarded as three unemployed days. That is one period. Then, the paragraph states:

> And any two such continuous periods separated by a period of not more than six weeks shall be treated as one continuous period of unemployment.

That means that if within six weeks we have this event happening twice, you have six continuous days of unemployment which go to make up the nine. That is the position.

Mr. BOTHWELL: He has credit for the six days?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: How would that affect the railway shops to which I referred earlier this afternoon? Men are employed on practically a three days per week basis; they are three days off and three days on. Would this clause affect those men?

Mr. BENNETT: It appears to me that the situation described this afternoon by the hon. member who has just spoken creates some difficulty. I had not been fully advised that there were cases in which there were lengths of time such as have been mentioned here. The hon. member said that for a period of a year men worked only three days a week.

Mr. HEAPS: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BENNETT: Under those circumstances I should like to look into that subsection a little farther, because if there is a period as long as a year in which men are employed only half a week, obviously there should be some readjustment of the provisions of the subsection.

Mr. HEAPS: There is another point: Suppose men are working twenty hours a week, spread over a five day week, what would the situation be? The basis of their employment is probably only a half or a third of the total regular weekly employment. I believe there is nothing in the measure which takes care of a situation of that kind, and I am wondering whether men working those hours would come under its provisions.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall look into that point.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister a condition among the coal miners of my constituency. They may be employed on an average of two days a week over a period of several months. That period of employment may drop to one day a week at one time and go up to five days a week at another. This is a bituminous coal mining district. I am wondering whether those miners would be covered by subsection 4 as it now stands.

Mr. BENNETT: I would suggest that subsection 4 be allowed to stand.

Mr. COOTE: If possible I believe this subsection should be redrafted so as to include men who have employment of such a precarious nature. I believe if that were done it would be worth while.

Mr. BENNETT: I have noted on my bill the hon. member's suggestion, and we shall deal with it.

Subsection 4 stands.

Subsections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On subsection 7—Employment which is unsuitable within the third statutory condition.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that we take this subsection by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): We are on paragraph (a), "unemployment due to trade dispute."

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the Prime Minister explain this paragraph and indicate to what it refers? By a "stoppage of work" does he mean a lockout or a walkout?

Mr. BENNETT: Under the measure three statutory conditions must be observed in order to enable the claimant to receive a benefit under the fund. It will be observed, further, that subsection 7 provides:

An insured contributor shall not be deemed to have failed to fulfil the third statutory condition by reason only that he has declined—

That is, he must be ready to work, or to accept work, but he is not bound to accept work if it is—

(a) an offer of employment arising in consequence of a stoppage of work due to a trade dispute.

That is, if there is a strike, or whatever you choose to call it, in connection with any particular work where he could obtain employment he is not said to have declined employment simply because at that time there happens to be a trade dispute. Then he is not said to be in default if he declines—

(b) an offer of employment at wages lower, or on conditions less favourable, than those which he might reasonably have expected to obtain, having regard to those which he habitually obtained in his usual occupation, or would have obtained had he continued to be so employed.

That is, if the only work he could secure was work for which the wages offered were less than those he had been receiving, or the conditions of work were such as to be at variance with those habitually encountered, he could not then be regarded as being in default. Or, he could not be regarded as being in default if he received—

(c) an offer of employment in his usual occupation at wages lower, or on conditions less favourable, than those observed by agreement between employers and employees, or failing any such agreement, than those recognized by good employers.

I realize the words "good employers" are vague, but in actual practice they have been found satisfactory. In other words, a man shall not be punished if he has not been able to find employment because there has been a trade dispute, or because the offer of work is greatly at variance with that to which he has been habitually willing to undertake, both as to wages and conditions; or, even if conditions in his usual occupation are such as to make it unreasonable to expect him to undertake the work at a lesser wage or under less favourable conditions.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

ABSENTEE BALLOT FOR MEN IN UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF CAMPS

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South) moved the second reading of Bill No. 16, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1934.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment to the Dominion Elections Act is similar to an amendment which I moved on the third reading of the bill last year. The purpose of the amendment is to extend the privilege of voting by absentee ballot to the men in the unemployment relief camps. Voting by absentee ballot was not in the Dominion Elections Act up until the act of 1934. The privilege is restricted to lumbermen, miners, sailors and fishermen. The purpose of that provision is to allow men to vote by absentee ballot who are unavoidably away from their polling division or electoral district on election day. The Dominion Franchise Act made provision for the registrating of the men in the unemployment relief camps, and I am quite satisfied that the government had in mind that they should have every opportunity of exercising their franchise. I will read the section dealing with that so that hon. members may have it clear in their minds that there was no intention, so far as the act itself was concerned, to deprive these men of their franchise. Rule 9 of subsection 2 of section 3 of the Dominion Franchise Act reads as follows:

Notwthstanding the provisions of any other of these rules, time spent by a person at any unemployment relief camp, or in any institution or refuge maintained, either by public or private moneys, for the relief of distressed or unemployed persons, shall be deemed to have been spent by that person in temporary absence from his last place of residence as determined pursuant to these rules, and if there be any such place of residence or home, either of himself or of any member of his family, to which he could return, he shall, notwithstanding his presence in such unemployment camp, be registered at such place or residence or home, and moreover no person who is registered as an elector under this act shall merely because of time spent by him at an unemployment relief camp, or in such an institution or refuge, lose his residence qualification in the electoral district in which he is so registered.

I think that makes it quite clear that the government and parliament had in mind that these men should have the opportunity of exercising their franchise. But a peculiar circumstance in connection with the men in the unemployment relief camps is that most of them are away from the constituency in which they are registered. At some of the camps in the interior of British Columbia, for instance, no doubt a great many of the men come from Vancouver or New Westminster or neighbouring constituencies. It is impossible for these men to leave the camp and go into their own electoral districts to exercise their franchise on election day. So that while provision has been made for registering these men presumably for the purpose of allowing them to exercise the franchise, conditions are such that it is impossible for them to do so. They are, as a matter of fact, in just the same position as those for whom provision has been made to vote by absentee ballot. I remember that in the debate on this question last year the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) made this statement:

> It is no crime to have to earn your living away from home and by the methods I have indicated. There is no suggestion that these people are of a low standard because they have to go away to earn their living. Surely they are entitled to a chance to vote.

He was referring at the time to lumbermen, miners, sailors and fishermen. Now I take it that what holds for these occupations holds equally well for the men in the unemployment relief camps. It is no crime at this time to be unemployed. It may be inconvenient, but it certainly is not a crime.

The amendment would apply only to such men as are entitled to vote in the particular province in which they live. That is, if a person in an unemployment relief camp in British Columbia is not ordinarily entitled to vote in the province of British Columbia, and is not registered in any constituency of that province, this amendment will not give him that right. He must be registered in some constituency in the province before he is allowed to vote.

I think it is very important, Mr. Speaker, that we should give every consideration to these men. They are in rather difficult circumstances, and because of their condition they feel that society is, as it were, against them. We should employ every means possible to disabuse their minds of that idea, ideas which they have every opportunity of hearing propagated. I was at a meeting only last week where one of the questions asked was: "How can we change the present order by constitutional means when the men who are now in the camps are disfranchised? And this is only a beginning. Next year we might see more of them disfranchised." Now unless we take steps to see that these men are placed at least on the same basis as those already provided for in the act I believe they will have a good case for the statements that are being made.

During the debate on the elections act last year the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said:

> If people go about and try to raise passions and prejudices by saying that parliament is endeavouring to take away from persons the rights and privileges they enjoy, that argues ill for democracy and for its future.

But people will do these things as long as we give them an opportunity, as long as we leave any loophole for them to do so. I am convinced that if we are to get out of the difficulties we are in now we can only do so through the cooperation of all our people, and that includes the men in the relief camps.

I noticed in the press a few days ago a statement by the Archbishop of York. The church officials were discussing the problem of unemployment, and this is what the archbishop said:

> The great thing is to make the unemployed feel that they still count as members of the community.

I do not know of any better way at the moment to make them feel they are members of the community than to make it as easy as possible for them to exercise their franchise. It is a duty we owe to them, and it will take away any excuse they may have for saying that they have no part in the government of the country. I would therefore ask the house to consider this amendment seriously, to try to see the justice of it, to pass the amendment and extend to these men the privilege which we have already accorded those who are fortunate enough to have employment but are away from their constituency on election day.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): As my hon. friend (Mr. MacInnis) has said, this identical motion was introduced by him last year when the Dominion Elections Act was up for its third reading in this house. Last session a special committee studied the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act and one of the proposals which I think the committee very fully considered was that now put forward in the bill before the house. I think the committee spent two meetings in a discussion of this question, and we unanimously agreed that the men in unemployment camps, while they could not and should not be disfranchised, should not be entitled to vote in the particular riding where the camp happened to be situated. It was pointed out to us, and I think everyone is aware of the fact, that to a very large extent the men in these camps are transients and not residents of the riding in which the camp happens to be located. My hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) who is not in the house, was a member of the committee and he pointed out very forcibly that there was a very large camp in his riding, that the men there were not residents of the riding, and that it would be most unfair to allow them to vote in that particular district where they were merely transients.

Mr. MacINNIS: This amendment does not suggest that they should be allowed to vote in the constituency in which the camp is located, any more than the amendment proposed last year provided that the miners, sailors and fishermen should vote in the constituency in which they were employed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, but these men in the camps were largely transients and provision was made in the bill to permit them to vote in their ordinary residential constituencies, in the place where they were accustomed to reside, and machinery was introduced into the act for that purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was that for voting or registration?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Both.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was arrangement made for transportation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No. On this point the committee was unanimous and we reported the bill to the house. A suggestion was made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that there should be special provision with regard to fishermen, sailors, miners and lumbermen—not for such sailors, fishermen, miners and lumbermen as were in unemployment camps, but men whose business called them away from home and made it very difficult if not impossible for them to reach their homes to vote. A special amendment was introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to allow men living within a radius of fifty miles, I think—

Mr. NEILL: Twenty-five miles.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: —within a radius of of twenty-five miles of their home, to vote by special ballot at the nearest poll, in the event of their not being able to go home.

Mr. NEILL: Living beyond twenty-five miles.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes. Now, when that amendment was before the house—and it was adopted—my hon. friend from Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis), who has moved the second reading of the present bill, made the motion which he has made to-night, and on that occasion a vote was taken. It is recorded in Hansard, and I see his proposal was negatived by a vote of forty-three to ten. It was at the end of the session and there was a small house, but in the committee there was unanimity in regard to this proposal and a certain degree of unanimity also in this house when the vote was taken.

I cannot accede to the request. I think it is going beyond the bounds of common sense. It is not a reasonable request that men from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick or the prairie provinces settling in Ontario, say, should be entitled to vote in a constituency in which their camp happens to be situated. There is nothing to prevent them—

Mr. MacINNIS: The amendment does not ask for that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is nothing in the election act to prevent these men from voting in their own localities. The question of transportation is a serious one, but I am not in favour of the proposal. I was not last year, and the house was against it then, as was also the committee. I must vote against the bill.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) in regard to what took place last year is eminently fair. It is quite correct to say that there was a unanimous understanding in the committee, of which I was not a member, in regard to the special concession in the bill with respect to absentee ballots. At the same time, when my hon. friend from Vancouver South introduced the amendment last year I took the same stand as I take to-night. I see no reason why these men who, through no fault of their own, are compelled to live in unemployment camps, should be deprived, not actually of the franchise through registration, but of the opportunity to register their votes in whatever riding they may be registered. A considerable number of these men have been registered—in our province at any rate some have been registered in more than one riding—but unless the Department of National Defence, in charge of these camps, makes some arrangement for transporting them to the polls when the election is held, these men are inferentially deprived of the franchise, though through the regulations in connection with the Franchise Act they may have been given the opportunity of registering. I am certain that many of these men in the camps in British Columbia will be inferentially deprived of their right to vote unless the government makes some arrangement to transport them to the riding in which they are registered under the procedure adopted last year.

The minister is entirely correct in the statement that there was an understanding by the committee last year, a unanimous agreement as a concession for having inserted the provision with respect to absentee ballots, that it would be limited to the four classes mentioned in the act; and after that agreement my hon. friend from Vancouver South, on the third reading of the bill last year, moved his amendment and ten members of this house supported it. On grounds of equity and justice, I submit that these men in the unemployment camps are entitled to exercise the franchise either by the method suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South or by arrangements made between the government and the proper officials for the transportation of the men to the polls, because they themselves have not the facilities for their own transportation. They are Canadians, and they should be entitled to vote, and for that reason they should be given the proper facilities for registering their votes when the election is held. My hon. friend has suggested one means of enabling them to do so, but there is another way of doing it. That way is to have proper guarantees given by the officials in charge of the election that the necessary facilities will be provided for the transportation of these men.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I think there is perhaps a little misunderstanding regarding both the present bill and the act which was passed last year. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) asks that men within the province of British Columbia working in unemployment camps be given the privilege of voting. Last year when we were discussing this matter it was urged that if a man coming from Ontario were working in a relief camp in British Columbia it would be unfair to ask him to vote in the latter province. Since that time the subject has been discussed from one end of the province to the other. I am going to cite one case. In the constituency of New Westminster there are two camps, both close to White Rock, and in those camps there are four hundred men, mostly returned soldiers. During the registration period one-half of the men gave their address as the city of Vancouver, which is twenty-eight miles from the camp, and if they are going to vote on election day they will have to be transported to that city. The hon. member for Vancouver South is bringing up this question to give to those men the same right as is given under the act to four other classes, and for that reason I support the bill.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I think there is some misunderstanding in regard to the registration, at least as to the ruling given by the commissioner. In my riding there are some twelve to fifteen camps and over four hundred men are registered in them. The commissioner classed the camps as urban districts; registrations took place in them and I believe close to five hundred registered as residents at the camps for the simple reason that they swore that they had no previous place of residence. The commissioner ruled that anyone who had no previous place of residence could register as living in the camp. Thus we have between four and five hundred men who are registered as voters in the camp. I understood and I understand again to-night this is contrary to the provisions of the statute as passed last session.

Mr. C. A. CAMPBELL (Frontenac-Addington): May I add a few words to what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie has said? I should like to relate this incident to the house. In the riding which I have the honour to represent there are two camps with a registration of around seven hundred men. The registration last fall allowed only one hundred and thirty-one men in one camp and forty-seven in the other to be placed on the list; one hundred and seventy-eight men out of the total strength have the privilege of voting in that riding. At the present time there are more than five hundred men in the two camps who will have no vote unless they are allowed that privilege under this bill. I agree with the principle of the bill and should like to support it.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): While, as the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Campbell) said, some hundred men voted, I have before me the list of about three or four hundred—

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I say that I have a list for the coming election—

Mr. ROSS: I think I have the floor. In the camps there are to-day nine hundred in one and two hundred in the other. It is most unfair to the voters in that constituency that eleven hundred men should come in and exercise the franchise there. I have their names before me. In June some of them voted in Kingston City and also voted in the camp. There is no way of controlling the vote; it is a most difficult matter.

An hon. MEMBER: Put them in the penitentiary.

Mr. ROSS: There is a way of controlling them which we are not mentioning at the present time. All a man in the camp had to do was to go into Kingston and exercise his franchise and then return to the camp and take an oath that he had been in that camp for so many months. We have them checked up from the time they entered that camp, and I can give the house hundreds of instances—

Mr. CAMPBELL: I rise to a point of order. I understood the discussion was about an amendment to the elections act of 1934. The matter about which the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) is speaking is with regard to the old elections act.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Kingston City is quite in order.

Mr. ROSS: This is most unfair to the constituents proper. I do not care whether they are in a Conservative or in a Liberal constituency, it is most unfair that by accident a camp is established in some riding and men may gather there from Nova Scotia or British Columbia to a number equal to nine hundred or a thousand and be given the vote, thus offsetting the desire of residents in that constituency who should have the say as to its direction rather than men who happen to be there for a few months. The provision has been unfairly used. This affects not only men in the camps but students in the universities where perhaps two or three thousand may be gathered. Why not give students the vote the same as the men who are gathered in camps? These students have not been given the vote; they are required to be residents so long and they were ruled out. This question affects both parties. It would be most unfair to make an amendment which would apply to constituencies where these camps for unemployed men are situated.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): I have just entered the chamber, but after listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) I am rather of the opinion that the distinction between the franchise act and the elections act is not quite clear in his mind. The matter of giving the franchise to persons in these camps was discussed before the committee which considered the Dominion Franchise Act last year and I think it was pretty generally, almost unanimously agreed that persons who were in these camps should not have the right to be registered on the electoral list of the place where such a camp was situated. That is the point brought up by the hon. member for Kingston City. It would be grossly unfair to colonize any given constituency by opening unemployment camps there and allowing the persons who temporarily are in that camp to have the right to vote in that constituency. It was with this in mind that when the Dominion Franchise Act was passed there was inserted in it a provision dealing with residence, stating, among other things, that no person should be inscribed on the list unless he was a bona fide resident of the constituency in which he wished to be inscribed. I am reading from the franchise instructions issued on August 15, 1934, Dominion Franchise Act, part I, page 46, rule 9. Rule 9 governs the registrar in deciding whether or not a person living in an unemployment camp should be registered—that is, who shall have the right to vote in the constituency in which the camp is situated.

Mr. ARTHURS: When was that issued?

Mr. POWER: August 15, 1934, under the authority of the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934. The rule says:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of any other of these rules, time spent by a person at an unemployment relief camp, or in any institution or refuge maintained, either by public or private moneys, for the relief of distressed or unemployed persons, shall be deemed to have been spent by that person in temporary absence from his last place of residence as determined pursuant to these rules and if there be any such place of residence or home, either of himself or of any member of his family, to which he could return, he shall, notwithstanding his presence in such employment camp, be registered at such place or residence or home, and moreover no person who has registered as an elector under this act shall merely because of time spent by him at an unemployment relief camp, or in such an institution or refuge, lose his residence qualification in the electoral district in which he is so registered.

So that under this rule the registrar and the enumerators at the time of the general registration last summer were not permitted to register persons living in unemployment camps as voters or electors of the constituency in which the camp was situated. But there was nothing to prevent relatives or friends, the wife, employer, or anyone connected with these persons living in the unemployment camps, from registering them in their home town, where they had a perfect right to vote, the place in which they resided prior to taking up residence in the unemployment camp. I understand that in some camps at any rate that was done. In the camp with which I am familiar, that in my own constituency, there were five or six hundred persons, but the enumerators, acting under instructions from the registrar, placed on the list only those who had no other place of residence and who on being questioned stated that they had no home to which they could go. So that out of approximately five hundred, some two hundred I think remained on that list. In Valcartier, in the constituency of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), there were I believe some 1,700 voters. The enumerators there made the mistake of believing that everyone who was in the camp had the right to have his name placed on the list. I happened to see some of those lists, and they registered people somewhat in this fashion; Mr.—inski, Russia; Mr.—oski, Roumania; Mr. So-and-so, England; Mr. So-and-so, Montreal, and so on. Well, it was pointed out to the registrar that in the first place an address in Russia did not give a person the right to the franchise in Canada; neither did one in Roumania, and after a while he understood that and these names were stricken from the list. The next step was to bring to his attention the fact that residence in Montreal did not under any franchise act in force in Canada give the right to vote in the constituency of Quebec. After considerable and careful perusal of the act he came to the conclusion that perhaps that was so, with the result that the 1,700 names on the list at Valcartier camp were eventually reduced to eighteen.

Mr. MANION: Eighteen hundred or eighteen?

Mr. POWER: Eighteen names. So my hon. friend from Quebec-Montmorency will enjoy the pleasure of having eighteen votes in his favour—or let us hope against him—at the next election.

Mr. COTNAM: I wish they came in my riding.

Mr. POWER: Well, he was a very good registrar, appointed I understand on the recommendation of my hon. friends opposite, and he did a good job once he became convinced that the list should be purged.

But that has not much to do with the question now before us, which is this: shall any other persons who came to the unemployment camp afterwards and who are registered in their home towns have the right to the benefit of the provisions of the absentee clauses? The absentee clauses were inserted in the act at the urgent request of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, who stated that in his constituency and a number of constituencies in British Columbia there were persons who registered in their home towns but who, owing to the exigencies of their occupations, were obliged to be absent for long periods of time, such as sailors, miners, loggers and fishermen. He submitted to the committee and to the house that a great injustice would be done if these men were not permitted to vote by the system known as absentee voting. Many members of the house I think were not very keen on beginning what was a new departure, for us in eastern Canada at least, although I understand that absentee voting has been in effect in western Canada; but after some discussion it was agreed that four specific classes could enjoy that benefit. But as was pointed out at the time, no sooner had it been agreed to open the door for four classes than every other class, from gooseberry pickers to commercial travellers, wished to come under this benefit. If the doors be opened widely enough, sooner or later people will not take the trouble to go home to vote; they will expect to be able to vote anywhere. The provisions are of course well known to hon. members: any person in the categories named who on election day happens to be at a polling division in another constituency, or even in his own constituency twenty-five miles from his home, may go to the polling booth, demand a ballot, state his residence and qualification, and swear before the deputy returning officer that he is on the permanent list; and having fulfilled those formalities he is handed a ballot. He votes, and on the night of the election the result of the vote is telegraphed to the proper constituency—

Mr. BURY: It must be within that province, must it not?

Mr. POWER: Within that province. The ballots are afterwards sent on to the constituency in which the voter is registered, and if on checking up it is found to be a bona fide ballot it is counted. That applies at the present time to four categories.

The object of this bill is that a person who through no fault of his own happens to be in an unemployment camp, but whose name is registered in his home town, shall be allowed to go to the poll nearest to that unemployment camp and vote as in his own constituency. Personally I have no strong views on the matter, except that I am rather inclined to share those of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), that if you open the doors still wider, sooner or later the whole effect of the act as to forcing a man to go to the poll nearest his own home, and providing a great many other safeguards, will be defeated. It is perhaps easy enough to provide safeguards for a small number of categories, but if we increase the categories to any great extent there is no telling where we will stop, and we do not know how difficult it may be to provide efficient safeguards for ordinary voters. I think last year I said I was in favour of this principle; I have no objection to it, though I must say that I should be just as glad if there was none of this absentee voting under the act at all.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am and always have been of the opinion that the absentee vote should apply to everyone in Canada, subject of course to the restrictions in the act confining it to the particular province in which the man or woman is domiciled. I was not a bit enamoured of the act we passed last year; I do not think it was an improvement in any way upon the old act which, by and large, gave us a pretty fair deal and provided a ready and convenient means of getting on the list and voting. In the final analysis everyone was protected by the opportunity of swearing himself in on election day. That did away with any possibility of wrongdoing or of people being left off deliberately, yet it provided safeguards so that there was very little abuse.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) introduced that bill he referred to the fact that in many respects it resembled the act that had been in force in British Columbia for a number of years, but as I pointed out at that time unfortunately he did not adhere to the British Columbia act in all particulars and, as the saying goes, that spilled the beans. For instance the British Columbia act provides that the court of revision shall be held every month, whereas under our act it is to be held every year, which makes a very great difference. Again, British Columbia has the absentee vote applying to everyone, while we restrict it to the four classes that have been named. When the resolution was brought in last year I pointed out these facts. I need not read what I said, but I pointed out that if we were going to follow the British Columbia act we ought to take the bitter with the sweet, whereas we appeared to have taken the worst features of the British Columbia act and to have left out the better ones, the safeguards. At all events my opinion, which I urged in the house, was that we should have the absentee vote applying to everyone. It is quite true that if you look at Hansard you will see that, speaking selfishly for my own district and others in the vicinity, I said that it would fall particularly hard on the four classes I named; when the matter came up in committee the minister was good enough to grant my request, and the act was so amended. I was grateful for that; on the principle that I should accept what I could get if I could not get what I wanted, which is always a good principle in politics, I was grateful for that concession, but at the same time I see nothing wrong with the idea that this privilege should be extended to everyone.

The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) indicated that if the privilege were extended everyone would get in, berry pickers and people like that, but why not? It would also allow school teachers to vote, as many of them cannot vote to-day. It would also allow many ministers to vote. Very often they change their stations, as school teachers change their schools, at such times that under our existing system they are not able to vote because they are not permitted the absentee vote. When I was speaking last year I stated that this system would disfranchise hundreds of people in my riding, and my experience since that time amply bears out that statement. The way the act has been carried out, with the list being made up on a fixed date last fall, has worked very much to the prejudice of a great many of the people whom I represent. The enumerator would go to a certain place where he would find ten people. He would put those ten people on the list, but he would not want to put a poll there because ten people would not be enough. That might be so, but by next July there might be 150 people there, or vice versa.

Take the case of a cannery; when the enumerator went there, with the cannery running there might be 150 voters at that point, but when the actual election comes along there may not be ten or even three people there. Under the old system the list was made up within sixty days and it included the people actually at the particular point, not people who might or might not be there. The old system was infinitely preferable, even with the improvement in the new system that has been brought about by giving the absentee vote to these four classes. There are still large numbers of people who are going to be prevented from voting in the district I represent and in the adjacent district of Vancouver island and the lower mainland.

While I am quite willing to vote for this bill as indicating my belief that these people should have the absentee vote, I would very much prefer to have the hon. member who introduced the bill widen it to allow everyone to have that privilege. A great deal of the antagonism that I have found in connection with this absentee vote has come from our friends in the east, simply because they are not familiar with it. I do not think you will find any man from British Columbia who has had experience with this system who will say there is anything wrong with it, or that it lends itself to any kind of manipulation or graft. It does not, or we would have found it out before this. As a matter of fact we did; it was corrected and the leak was stopped, so that now the system cannot be abused at all. I would prefer to see the absentee vote extended to all those who are entitled to vote according to the act.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that for once I must disagree entirely with my deskmate (Mr. Neill) for whom I have so much esteem and consideration. Quite contrary to his opinion, I am not only opposed to this bill but I think we are going too far away from the basic and solid principles of sound democracy, by extending the franchise to many people who should not be allowed to use it to defeat the influence of the people who are really interested in and who compose the mainstay of the state. Under conditions as they exist at present in Canada I believe people who are living at the expense of the state and who give practically no service to the state should not be entitled to vote. I do not think those receiving the dole should vote. I do not think returned soldiers who live at the expense of the state should vote. I think the people who, by their votes, determine who shall govern the country and who shall make our laws, should be the people who pay taxes and support the government of the country. So in that regard I go beyond what the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) stated and in the opposite direction to my good friend and deskmate. I would say that instead of extending we should restrict the suffrage. If we want to save democracy we must put it in the hands of the people who have democracy at stake and not in the hands of those who want to exploit democracy simply to live upon it and make profit by it.

I do not want to say any more about this, but on the eve of an election I think the house generally and some hon. members of it are tempted to flatter as many people as they can and to appeal to the vanity or to the political influence of as many people as possible. I do not make that observation for the benefit of my good neighbour; I know he could be elected by any majority he wished by the constituents in his electoral division. He is a good Scotchman, and no matter what amendments we may pass he would not be affected. But in its closing days parliament is tempted to flatter the masses in electoral and financial matters. Let us appeal to the reason of reasonable people who have something at stake, who do something for the support of the government and for the support of the nation, and who thereby acquire some sense of responsibility. The idea of giving votes to people living in camps at the expense of the state which would equalize the votes of fathers of families or property owners paying taxes, and bearing the load of civic and national responsibility, and the idea of making equal before the law people who are absolutely useless to the nation as compared with people who are most useful, is an unsocial and undemocratic procedure. So far as I am concerned I am prepared to vote against any measure which tends to increase the electoral franchise without giving due regard to the civic and national responsibilities of the people exercising that franchise.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, there are several hundred men in camps in my constituency. I should like to say to you and through you to the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bourassa) that many of those men are real, honest-to-goodness thoroughbreds.

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh, yes.

Mr. MUNN: It is not their fault that they are in the camps; they are there through their misfortune. Despite the fact that they are not revenue producers and are a charge on the state they should have something to say in the affairs of their country, and should have some encouragement to place their views on record. Why keep them down? I believe it is a mistake to view the matter as it is viewed by the hon. member who has just spoken, and I am strongly in favour of giving those men the vote to which they are entitled.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word in explanation of the vote I wish to give. I am in favour of a universal franchise and in favour of the men in question herein having the right to vote, but I am opposed to the method suggested of giving them that vote.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I had not risen because I thought it would be proper to give hon. members an opportunity to vote on the motion before the house. However, as the sponsor of the bill intends, I believe, to close the debate I should like to make some observations along the line of those which have been made by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe).

I do not share the views held by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I believe every Canadian should vote, and that is the stand I have taken on previous occasions in my native city. However, although every Canadian has the right to vote, the law has provided that the exercise of that right shall be attended by certain formalities. Unfortunately the men in the camps cannot carry out those formalities. If by mistake the name of a man living in the very centre of the city is dropped, and he does not take the opportunity offered by law to rectify the mistake, he cannot vote. As a candidate in previous elections and one who is likely to be a candidate at the next election, I say it is difficult enough to follow the votes of those whose names are registered and who will exercise their votes in a proper way, without having to follow a flow of votes through the mail or otherwise. We have had such experiences in the past, and they have not been pleasant. I do not believe in the spreading of votes; I would be in favour of giving everyone an opportunity to register where he resides. In the event of that not being feasible, however, I should rather have a few men disfranchised than have the whole electoral system crippled by the possibility of registering votes in so many different ways. Therefore, although in principle I am in favour of every Canadian having a vote, I am also in favour of the law being strictly followed, and for these reasons I shall not vote for the bill.

[Mr. Munn.]

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) went out of his way to give a wrong impression of the amendments. The term "absentee voter" is very clearly defined in the Dominion Elections Act. Paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 99 states:

> (a) "Absentee voter" means a person, being one of the classes of persons in the next following subsection mentioned, whose name is registered on the list of electors of a polling division of an electoral district and who seeks to vote pursuant to sections 99 to 104, inclusive, of this act.

Before a person may vote as an absentee voter his name must be on the voters' list for some constituency in the province in which he tries to vote. If his name is not on the list he cannot vote. For example, let us take two individuals both registered in the constituency of, we will say, Vancouver Centre, in the province of British Columbia. One obtains employment which takes him more than twenty-five miles outside the city of Vancouver. On election day that man may vote by absentee ballot. The other, however, has not been fortunate enough to obtain employment and has had to go to an unemployment camp. His name, too, is on the voters' list and for that reason he is entitled to vote, but because of the distance between the camp and the city he cannot be in the city on election day. Because he cannot go to the city and because he is not employed he is deprived of his vote. It is not suggested in the amendment that the vote should be extended to transients going from one province to another, but only to those who are on the voters' list of some constituency within the province.

I do not wish to carry the discussion to any greater length, but I am sure that unless we extend this privilege to the men in the unemployment camps—

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that it is now nine o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: —we will be doing an injustice to those men.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN UNEMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, to establish an unemployment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 20 (as printed; now section 19) —Statutory conditions for receipt of unemployment benefit.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): we are on subsection 7, paragraph (b).

Mr. EULER: Before we rose at six o'clock I was going to ask the Prime Minister what means would be adopted to ensure that the beneficiary has complied with the conditions laid down. Is the onus placed upon the man who seeks to come under the provisions of the act to prove that he could not obtain employment, or what safeguards are provided in that regard?

Mr. BENNETT: He makes application for the benefit in the manner prescribed by the act, and the authorities to whom he applies make the usual investigations. It is simply a matter of local machinery, to be dealt with promptly on the spot.

Mr. EULER: But the onus is not placed on the applicant?

Mr. BENNETT: It is merely the same sort of application that you and I would make under a health or accident policy, filling out a form and asking for the benefit.

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

On paragraph (c)—Employment less favourable than observed by agreements between employers and employees.

Mr. MITCHELL: Are these the same as in the British act?

Mr. BENNETT: Substantially they are until you come to lines 25 to 30 on page 12 of this bill. Paragraph (b) comes from the British act, modified by the three acts of 1920, 1924 and 1927, and paragraph (c) from the British acts of 1920 and 1927 modified to meet the situation. When we come to the other it is largely taken from the social security bill for unemployment insurance, being a draft prepared by a committee of the leading authorities in cooperation with the American Association for Social Security. It seemed to meet the situation more equitably, commencing at "provided."

Mr. HANBURY: Referring to the last line of paragraph (c) dealing with a person becoming a member of any association, organization or union of workers, it occurs to me that that should be a recognized union. Otherwise there would be nothing to prevent a small group of men forming some sort of association just to take advantage of the act without, properly speaking, being a national or provincial or local association.

Mr. BENNETT: The question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is not one of easy solution or answer, but it is believed that this is as near as one can approach a solution of the difficulty, and it has been recommended by those who have given it the closest consideration and study. I appreciate the point to which the hon. member refers, but I do not think he would find it easy to substitute anything which might not create greater difficulty than that which he seeks to overcome.

Mr. HANBURY: Unless the Prime Minister cared to insert the words "provincial or national."

Mr. BENNETT: That raises a very distinct difficulty in a national insurance bill.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have a letter with regard to this bill which I should like to put on record. I understand that the Prime Minister has received the same letter, and a copy of it was published in the Stratford Beacon-Herald of the fourteenth of this month. I received this letter with a covering letter from the secretary of Pioneer Lodge, No. 103, International Association of Machinists, of the city of Stratford. It is dated Stratford, February 11, 1935, and reads as follows:

> At the last regular meeting of the above lodge considerable discussion was given to the recent press reports of the unemployment and social insurance bill now awaiting the consideration of the house, and after careful deliberation of the proposed bill, the members present went on record as strongly disapproving the unemployment and social insurance bill in its present form based on the following conclusions.
> If the bill is allowed to remain in its present form will it not create a desire for employers to lay off their part time workers, thereby reducing their contributions to the fund of the bill, at the same time throwing more men out of employment who no doubt will eventually be forced to seek relief to maintain an existence? In any event it was noticed that the part time worker will be forced to contribute to the fund for a considerable length of time before he will be eligible to receive any unemployment benefits due to the fact that forty weekly contributions must be made before he is entitled to any insurance benefits.

Strong objections were taken to the class of workers that are excluded under the proposed bill, such as policemen, firemen, civil servants, etc., and persons receiving an income of $2,000 per year or more, and as a result will be exempted from contributing to the fund, while at the same time certain classes of railway workers who have sacrificed a reduction in their earning power of over 35 per cent in order that more of their fellow-workers might be given employment, and incidentally who also have agreements with the railway companies, through their respective labour organizations whereby with the existing seniority clause the railway worker will derive no benefits from the proposed bill although contributing towards its fund, it becomes apparent that the poorer class of worker is again being called upon to bear the burden, while those who are higher paid and can afford to contribute towards this fund have been exempted.

It was noted that the unemployment and social insurance bill in its present form failed to cover workers employed at seasonable trades such as the mining, lumbering, fishing and agricultural industries employ, inasmuch as the workers in these industries are to a large extent only employed part time (seasonally employed) workers, it was apparent that the workers in these industries would be practically the only workers that would benefit to any extent from the proposed unemployment insurance bill. With this in view it was felt that the proposed bill would have accomplished its purpose to a far greater degree had the bill included workers from the above mentioned industries.

A clause of the bill exception was taken to was that whereby a contributing worker will be disqualified if the loss of employment has been caused through a trades dispute, unless he can otherwise prove that he was not associated with those through whom the trades dispute was brought about; the incorporation of this clause into an act of this nature was it was felt a challenge to organized labour and a discrimination against union membership throughout the dominion.

In general it was felt that unemployment insurance was a benefit only to workers employed seasonally or temporarily, and while it was admitted that such legislation may have covered the situation fifteen or twenty years ago to advantage, it would hopelessly meet the situation existing to-day. What was needed, the members expressed, was a plan enacted that would have as its ultimate object and aim a cure to end unemployment, a promise made to the working people of Canada prior to the last federal election.

With this in view the members of the above lodge present at the last regular meeting instructed me to forward to you their protests and opposition to the proposed unemployment and social insurance bill in its present form, and to assure that they are in favour of, and endorse a non-contributory form of unemployment insurance.

Respectfully submitted on behalf of Pioneer Lodge No. 103 I.A. of M.

Wm. Lyons,
Secretary.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. BOTHWELL: Should not the words:

—to refrain from becoming a member of any association, organization or union of workers ...

—be given some more explicit definition? I refer to the words "association, organization or union of workers." It might be one big union or something of that kind. In a subsequent section of the bill, section 30, subsection 5, paragraph (b), and again in subsection 9 of the same section, a limited description is given of association, organization or union of workers. It seems to me that these words should be more clearly defined.

Mr. BENNETT: Just before the hon. member came in I answered that question in reply to an inquiry by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. It is difficult to meet the situation by the use of any words that might be regarded as apt, and an effort to do so would create greater difficulties than those incidental to the words here. As a lawyer the hon. gentleman will realize that if we began to name organizations we should get into difficulties. One can trust the good sense of those charged with the responsibility of administration to overcome the difficulty to which reference has been made.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 8, paragraph (b)—While following any occupation for remuneration unless outside ordinary working hours.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does that mean that the workman who comes under the benefits of the bill is permitted to earn a dollar a day in addition to the dollar provided for in the bill?

Subsection agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 21 (as printed; now section 20), paragraph (a)—Loss of work due to trade dispute.

Mr. POWER: What is meant by the words "financing or directly interested in the trade dispute"? Why the word "finance"?

Mr. BENNETT: The word I believe is taken from the English act of 1924, No. 2, section 4. I think the reason of it is fairly clear and it was referred to slightly last evening. There might be circumstances under which the employee was actively engaged in promoting a disturbance in the property in which he was employed, for certain reasons, personal or national, as mentioned last night by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. My own view is that the provision is to overcome the possibility of the very circumstance to which reference was made last evening—that is, of anyone finding himself employment for the purpose of destroying rather than helping it, and financing a disturbance. In fact, there was in this country, in the province to which reference was made last evening, some evidence that at one point in lumbering operations financial assistance came from some quarter, I will not say where, for the purpose of creating a disturbance in that particular plant.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (b)—Disqualification on proof by an officer of the commission of neglect by insured contributor to avail himself of opportunity for work.

Mr. POWER: Why the words "by an officer"?

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the only reason the word "officer" is used is that it is convenient; it is someone employed by the commission. I do not know that there is any magic in the word "officer" rather than "employee."

Mr. POWER: Why should it be someone employed by the commission?

Mr. NEILL: I call the attention of the Prime Minister to paragraph (e). We are dealing with claims for benefits. A man thinks he is entitled and asks for benefit, but under paragraph (e) he will not get it if he is in receipt of a pension under the Old Age Pensions Act.

The CHAIRMAN: We are not yet dealing with that paragraph.

Mr. BENNETT: With reference to the question asked by my hon. friend from Quebec South, the equivalent section is section 4 of the British act of 1930. The amendment as to disqualifications for receipt of benefit reads:

> If on a claim for benefit it is proved by an officer of the ministry of labour that the claimant, after a situation in any employment which is suitable in his case has been notified to him by an employment exchange or other recognized agency—

And so on. The provision in this bill is taken from that. There is no note indicating why the word "officer" is used in the British act, and I confess I know of no particular reason except that what appears in this bill has been taken from that act.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may be allowed to refer back to paragraph (a), subparagraph (i), what is the meaning of these words:

> That he is not participating in, or financing or directly interested in the trade dispute. . . .

I can understand it as it affects an employee of the particular concern. But suppose he were an employee of another firm altogether, were out of work, and took part in the strike; would that debar him from the benefits of the act?

Mr. BENNETT: That was the matter tc which the hon. member for Quebec South directed attention a moment ago, and I said that the statement made last evening by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard gave some excellent reasons why such a provision should be inserted. It merely refers to an employee who is in fact an employee but who in reality is working to promote the destruction of employment; he shall not be able to take advantage of it. That is all it means. In view of what we know of in one or two instances in this country it is an admirable provision.

Mr. MacINNIS: This section is rather far-reaching. We know that in the matter of defence certain trades help out others at a time of a strike or a lockout. If there is a strike or a lockout and a person who is participating in this unemployment insurance is a member of another trade which, through contributions form the union, is supporting the strike or lockout, would that person be debarred from the benefits of the act?

Mr. BENNETT: I think not. This is a combination of two sections from two amendments to the British act, section 4 of act No. 2 of 1924—the act was amended twice that year—and the other act to which I have referred. It is provided that the act:

> —shall not apply in any case in which the insured contributor proves that he is not participating in or financing or directly interested in the trade dispute which caused the stoppage of work, and that he does not belong to a grade or class of workers members of which are participating in or financing or directly interested in the dispute. . . .

That was subsequently added to by the act of 1927 in section 6, which is not a long one but which merely clears up any possible difficulty there might be with respect to the original amendment of 1924. The section as amended in the English act of 1927 reads as follows:

> Subsection (1) of section 4 of the Unemployment Insurance (No. 2) Act, 1924, shall have effect as if there were substituted for the words "members of which" the words "of which immediately before the commencement of the stoppage there were members employed at the premises at which the stoppage is taking place any of whom," and as if all the words after "in the dispute" were omitted.

The sense of it is merely to make it clear that because a man has been a member of an organization that is interested in this stoppage, he shall not thereby sacrifice or forfeit his rights, if he proves "that he is not participating in, or financing or directly interested in the trade dispute which caused the stoppage of work, and that he does not belong to a grade or class of workers of which immediately before the commencement of the stoppage there were members employed at the premises at which the stoppage is taking place any of whom are participating in or financing or directly interested in the dispute." That was the provision in the English act of 1927. Subsection (i) stands as it was in 1924 and subsection (ii) comes from the act of 1927, being section 6. I think it is a fair provision and it will be found that in practice it has been.

Mr. HEAPS: Would this prevent any person coming under the benefits of the act from participating in a strike or assisting those who were on strike? Under this clause would he be debarred from assisting either directly or indirectly an organization the membership of which was either locked out or was out on strike?

Mr. BENNETT: The clause with which we are now dealing is one in which there is a prohibition with an exception. The prohibition against benefits is modified by the exception which says that the applicant is still entitled to the benefits if he is not participating in or financing or directly interested in the trade dispute itself; and in the second place, if he does not belong to a grade or class of workers of which immediately before the commencement of the stoppage there were members employed at the premises at which this stoppage is taking place. So I do not see just how the question as put would touch this. This is the case of a worker who under the act would come within the prohibition, but in order that the act might be construed in his benefit there are in the clause two provisions which enable him still to receive his benefit. The first is his, shall I say, non-participation in the dispute, and second, his position with respect to a class of employment in the factory or industry in which he may be engaged.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I can only say that I regard this clause as one of the most ruthless provisions in the whole bill so far as the working people are concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friends laugh rather hollowly when I say that. I wonder why they laugh when they must realize that it has taken the working class generations to build up an understanding in the minds of employers possibly like themselves, that they are entitled to some opportunities to work for better conditions in their industries for themselves as well as for those who are their fellow workers. The first part of the clause reads:

An insured contributor shall be disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit—

(a) if he has lost his employment by reason of a stoppage of work, which was due to a trade dispute at the factory, workshop or other premises at which he was employed.

Supposing, as very often has happened, the employer himself has been guilty of a breach of agreement as between himself and his employees under a trade union agreement; does this mean that that class of people who strike against a breach of agreement on the part of an employer are at once to be disqualified from participation in the benefits under the bill? If so, the bill is a deliberate attempt to destroy the effectiveness of labour organizations in this country. Further, if he participates in, finances or is directly interested in a trade dispute which has caused a stoppage of work, he is to be outlawed. It will be noted that under the subclause of this clause he does not have to be actually in the ranks of the strikers. As the hon. member for Vancouver South suggests, he may belong to another organization altogether, but he may be sympathizing with and assisting those people. I have known for example groups of workers in one union in this country assist another group in another union when they were out on strike. I have in mind some of the strikes in the maritime provinces in connection with the coal industry. There will be more strikes in that industry because conditions in it, both east and west, are positively appalling. Until people go and see the hovels in which these coal miners live, the unsanitary conditions under which they exist and the miserable pittance upon which they live, they will never understand the reasons for what I am now telling the committee. A clause like this disallows not only those men but any others who are endeavouring to do what Britons will always desire to do, that is fight for decent conditions and justice. I think the clause is an appalling one, especially if it is ruthlessly enforced.

Mr. NEILL: Read the next clause.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The next one is just as bad. The Prime Minister, in his quite intelligent analysis over the radio of the prevailing system in this country, has fully justified what I am going to say. He must know just as well as I do that so long as capitalism exists, it will require more than mere regulations by law to compel employers to do justice to their employees. There are exceptions to the rule in all industries. There are some employers who understand the conditions of the workers and who are willing to make mild sacrifices on their behalf; but in the mass there is on the part of the employers nothing but callousness and ignorance of the rights of working people. To insert a clause like this, which has the effect not only of intimidation but of causing these men and their colleagues in other industries to resist in every way even the striving for better conditions, is in my opinion a violation of British justice. I do not like the clause at all.

Mr. BENNETT: In listening to the language of the hon. gentleman one would think his solicitude for those who are unfortunate was born of wide and vast experience.

Mr. DUFF: He heard Tim Buck speaking last night.

Mr. BENNETT: That explains the situation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, he was here with the hon. gentleman wrestling over this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I find the parliament of Great Britain, under governments referred to as socialist or labour and known as national, in the statute of 1934 to which I referred and from which I read, making provision with respect to this very matter. Is there any country in the world in which trade unionism is as powerful as it is in the British Isles? This section having been passed into law by the parliament of Great Britain as long ago as 1920—part of it, and modified and put into its present form in 1934—is it fair to call it ruthless? Is it fair to say that this is an endeavour on the part of capitalists to grind down and destroy their workmen? I do not think it is. I am one who believes that there are many defects in the capitalistic system. I believe that in the main it has functioned very well and that the world owes much of its progress to its functioning as it has. Any system that has lasted for as many thousands of years as has the capitalist system must necessarily have become encumbered with abuses, and some of them it is our duty to endeavour to remove. But a denunciation in wholesale terms of a section of an act that has run the gamut of the parliament of Great Britain, where I think we may say trade unionism has manifested itself as strongly as in any other part of the world, is not in my judgment a fair criticism. In the adoption of this clause from the British act one was following what one regards as a safe precedent. If hon. members of the committee will look at the section they will see that while in the first instance it contemplates the loss of benefits, it also provides, that if the individual concerned does not come within that provision he shall suffer no inconvenience by it. That is the provision, and that is made as fair as it is possible to make it, I think, having regard to the very conditions they had to meet in England. It was proven that in some industries absolute destruction was brought about with great deliberation, not attributable in any sense, as far as could be traced, to the general attitude of mind of the British workers. We know that in this country there have been instances—I do not say they are numerous—in which somewhat similar conditions have obtained. It is to prevent that that the provision was made in England; it is to prevent that that the provision is made here. I cannot think it is going to work a hardship if we adopt a provision that as late as 1934 was crystallized in the legislation of the United Kingdom.

Mr. NEILL: Is this a copy of the provision in the British act?

Mr. BENNETT: Not word for word. I will read it if the hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If trade unionism was giving strike pay to some of its members, would the members so drawing strike pay be regarded as financing a dispute?

Mr. BENNETT: They would be out of the employment under those circumstances, would they not? If they are drawing strike pay they would have to be dissociated from the industry; therefore they would not be receiving pay because they were absent for a cause that does not come within the conditions of the act. Is that not the principle on which they act in England?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let me read a paragraph from one of the standard books on the act. It says:

Further relief is given by the acts in that the disqualification does not apply if the claimant can prove both of the following:

(1) that he is not himself participating in or financing or directly interested in the trade dispute which caused the stoppage of work; and

(2) that the persons who are so participating in or financing or directly interested in the trade dispute do not include any members of his own grade or class who immediately before the stoppage of work were employed at the premises at which the stoppage is taking place. An attitude of sympathy or benevolent neutrality does not amount to participation; but a person who by ceasing work or in some other way actively supports the cause of the disputants is "participating." If a trade union is paying "strike pay" to disputants, every member who ordinarily subscribes to its funds is regarded as financing the dispute; moreover, the members of a trade union are financing a dispute if the union contributes to the funds of a federation which is paying "strike pay."

It seems to me, with all respect to the observations of the Prime Minister, that there is a good deal in what the hon. member for Bow River says. Although this has been in the British act for some time, it seems to me to be a very drastic section. It certainly interferes substantially with the rights of labour in trade disputes, and to my mind amounts to an inferential conscription of labour. We should not, of course, discuss this in the language of extremism, but notwithstanding the fact that the provision is in the British act, if the correct interpretation is that given by the authority I have just quoted it certainly is going very far.

Mr. POWER: Do I understand from the Prime Minister that this particular provision came into the British act as a result of an amendment in 1934?

Mr. BENNETT: No. Section 21 in the first instance is from the British act of 1920, section 8, and section 6 of the British act of 1927. I refer hon. gentlemen also to the evidence taken before the royal commission at page 1200. As to subparagraph (ii)—"and where separate branches of work," etc.—that comes from the act of 1920, section 8. Then we come to (b) on the same page, which comes from the British acts of 1930 and 1934. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked with respect to the exact language. There is some little change in the language to make it conform to the conditions of this country, but as the hon. gentleman has heard it read by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre I think he will agree that it is substantially a statement of the section.

Mr. POWER: I was just wondering if this was not inserted after the general strike in Great Britain. The Prime Minister and many hon. members will recall that ever since the general strike, either when the Conservative party was in power or since the national government has come into power, there has been a distinct tendency to try to take away from trades unions some of the power and authority which they formerly exercised. Legislation has been introduced to prevent them from using their union funds for electoral purposes or for the purpose of electing members to parliament. I suggest, although I have not all the facts before me, that in all probability this clause with respect to participation in or financing of trade disputes was inserted in order to prevent any recurrence of a general strike in Great Britain. If that is so I submit that conditions here are not at all similar and that we do not require any such provision in our act.

Mr. MacINNIS: The further the great reform program advances the less we find there is in it. Now we find that we are not going any further than the Conservative government in Great Britain has gone in regard to unemployment insurance. Regardless of whether or not they call it a national government nothing can hide the fact that it is a Conservative government, dominated by the capitalist class of Great Britain. The capitalist class of Great Britain are no more inclined to be generous with their workers than the capitalist class of any other country. The working class of Great Britain have through the years built up organizations to protect themselves or to minimize to some extent their exploitation. In this section there are very drastic possibilities. I am quite convinced that it could be used in the manner I suggested. Trade unions do help each other in times of strikes. Let us say the moulders' union is on strike; then the carpenters' union may through a levy on their members contribute to that strike. Under this section, just because of that contribution, an unemployed carpenter would be debarred from receiving the benefits of the act. Possibly that would not take place; it would depend largely upon the administration of the act, nevertheless the provision is here and it can be used if it ever becomes necessary to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: The observations made by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) can hardly be supported. Section 8 of the act of 1920, which of course was passed prior to the general strike, if my memory serves me correctly, reads:

An insured contributor who has lost employment by reason of stoppage of work which was due to a trade dispute at the factory, workshop or other premises at which he was employed shall be disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit so long as the stoppage of work continues, except in a case where he has, during the stoppage of work, become bona fide employed elsewhere in the occupation which he usually follows or has become regularly engaged in some other occupation.

The annotator writes:

Apparently if a workman during a stoppage gets other employment he rids himself of the disqualification. If he then becomes unemployed, provided the unemployment does not arise out of a trade dispute, he is entitled to benefit.

That the insurance officer may himself disallow claims for benefit under this subsection, see act of 1930, s. 8 (3) post. As to payment of benefit where claimant not disqualified under this subsection, notwithstanding appeal to umpire pending, see act of 1930, s. 8 (9) post.

Then he proceeds to give the explanations, largely in the sense of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I cannot think there is anything in that section as originally provided that had reference to the general strike, nor do I think it fair to suggest that the act of 1934, which retained and amplified the provisions of the act of 1920 as I have indicated, to make it perfectly clear that the exceptions could be given effect to, can be regarded as an effort of the capitalist class to fasten certain restrictive provisions upon the employees.

I agree with what has been said as to the hovels in which people have been living; it is one of the most regrettable things in a new country like this that this should be so, and the committee appointed the other day proposes to consider certain phases of that question. I do know employers who have expended much time, effort and money in attempting to make conditions for their employees as excellent as possible. Sometimes they have not been even thanked for it, and in many cases the rewards which have been received by labour have been far in excess of any returns received on the capital that has been invested. I know of that in many cases. I know of one very large industry in this country, the directors of which take a very personal interest in all these social problems and endeavour to make living conditions and wages such as to ensure the happiness and comfort not only of the employees but of their families as well. The fact that regrettable conditions have grown up under the capitalist system merely indicates that the collective power of the state has not been awake as it should have been for the purpose of preventing them. Now that they are here it is the duty of the state to do what it can to remedy these abuses. In England it was thought—perhaps improperly, according to what has been said in some quarters—that an unemployment insurance scheme was a means towards that end. It was believed that this was so. All I can say is that the workers in Great Britain attach very great value to it; I think that is a fair way to put it. I believe that is not an exaggeration, that they attach the very greatest value to it. In continental Europe that is also true, as well as in other parts of the world where they are now discussing this question in all its phases. I refer to the discussions now taking place in the United States, notably in the state of Wisconsin, as to how it might be dealt with. This act admittedly is fashioned on the British act—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Part I of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I should say the British act before 1934. The reason for that is obvious; in fact there are two main reasons. One is that they are, shall I say, people who are quite as much interested in the successful operation of a statute of this kind as we are, and therefore they have an outlook similar to our own with respect to the provisions of such a measure. The second reason is the fact that it is of the very greatest value to a new country to have the decisions of courts of the highest competence as to the interpretation to be placed upon the language of the statute. When we can have the language of our statutes construed in the light of expressions of opinion by judicial bodies in Great Britain, we having used the same words that are found in the British statute, it becomes of incalculable value to those charged with administration. I am frank in saying that this section 21, with which we are now dealing, is substantially word for word as it is in the British act, except that there are modifications as between commission and ministry of labour. I can add nothing further to what has been said with respect to that, but I do suggest that it is desirable to have some such provision as this even if we merely base it upon the single instance to which reference was made last evening by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and of which I think the government that has had the responsibility for maintaining a certain measure of peace, order and good government had a very intimate knowledge. Putting it on that ground alone I think it is very desirable to have that section, for remember the section does not prohibit; it only conditionally says the insured shall lose his benefit, but if he desires to do so he can place himself right by coming within the exception named here, and I think it can be fairly said that in most cases he would come within that exception.

The hon. member for Bow River asked why he should not be permitted to strike. Only a short time ago I was reading that the most enlightened and advanced labour leaders in both the United States and Great Britain are agreed that in the long run a strike is the most costly and ineffective method to apply for the purpose of solving difficulties of this kind. The practice of referring to arbitration trade disputes and matters of that kind has grown to such proportions that in the main it may be said that strikes are becoming fewer and fewer. There are no great national strikes in this country such as we once knew. It may be said that this is because of the depression, but that is also true in the United States. There have been small expressions of disapproval which have resulted in men walking out and staying out for a time, until they bargained with the management, but in the main I think it is fair to say that antagonisms between employers and employees have become fewer and fewer, because we have the workmen's compensation acts, old age pensions and unemployment insurance provisions. Men are very anxious to maintain their rights and privileges, and long ago they saw that the most costly and expensive method of settling disputes was to refrain from earning more money for themselves and their families, while the easiest way to settle them was to rely on the common sense, fair judgment and, usually, the support of an enlightened public opinion, which you will find generally not on that side necessarily which has the might or the capital but on that side which commends itself most to the fair judgment of the people of the country. That creates public opinion.

Paragraph (b) agreed to.

On paragraph (c)—Loss of work due to misconduct.

Mr: NEILL: I raised a question previously, and I was told to wait until we reached this section. I should like to revert back to paragraph (b), which contains the words, "if on a claim for benefit." There you have the case of a man who has qualified, after making his payments. He comes along and asks for a benefit, but under paragraph (e), on page 14, he will not get it if he is in receipt of an old age pension.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: That is the section.

Mr. NEILL: At page 32 of the bill, in part II of the schedule, under "excepted employments," we find the words:

Employment otherwise than by way of manual labour and at a rate of remuneration exceeding in value $2,000.

That man cannot come under the operation of the measure, but $2,000 per year is a great deal more than $240. This is not a dole; this is an insurance scheme for which a man has made a stated number of payments, and he comes up to claim a benefit which it seems to me is provided by the act. Why should he be cut out because he is getting only $15 or $20 a month.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member has perhaps overlooked the fact that it is not probable he would be employed if he were in receipt of an old age pension. In order to receive such a pension he would have to negative the condition of employment. It is perfectly clear no one in receipt of an old age pension would be employed.

Mr. HANBURY: No, or he would not be receiving an old age pension.

Mr. NEILL: He might have some technical ability for which he had been given temporary employment.

Mr. BENNETT: Then he would forfeit his old age pension.

Mr. HANBURY: The hon. member has just referred to subsection (e), and that is why I have risen to speak. In many of the provinces we have workmen's compensation acts, and I cannot see in this measure any provision whereby an employee receiving workmen's compensation is to be exempted, although we do exempt a person receiving an old age pension.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two or three reasons I could mention if I were to turn up the section. The distinction between workmen's compensation acts and the Old Age Pensions Act is, of course, very well known to the hon. member. Workmen's compensation is paid by the employers only into a fund, and the payments create a fund out of which an injured workman is entitled to receive benefits, instead of going to court and obtaining a judgment. The reason he is not exempted in this measure is that if he went to court, received a judgment and had payments made to him he would still be in a position to receive his benefits under the unemployment insurance scheme. On the other hand, with respect to old age pensions as the law now stands he is practically bereft of assets before he has the opportunity to receive the benefits of such pension. That is the distinction between the two.

Mr. HANBURY: Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that a workman receiving compensation under a workmen's compensation act would be entitled also to receive insurance under this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt about that. Notwithstanding the fact that he may have received benefits under a workmen's compensation act, if he has been employed and has paid forty contributions in two years before becoming unemployed, and is capable of and available for work and unable to find employment, the fact that he had received money for an injury which he had sustained would not deprive him of his right to benefit any more than the fact that he had saved $1,000 and had it to his credit in a savings bank would so deprive him. That is the construction placed upon it in the English courts.

Mr. HANBURY: If that is the interpretation I believe further consideration should be given the point. I shall not say it is a matter of common practice, but I will say we have known cases where men would deliberately maim themselves in order to take advantage of the workmen's compensation act. If at the same time they would be able to draw insurance under this measure we would be putting a premium on actions of that kind. I do not think it was ever intended that industry in Canada, which is certainly providing a portion of the funds from which insurance payments will be made, and is providing all the funds from which workmen's compensation is paid, should ever be placed in that position. I suggest the Prime Minister should take this matter into consideration and ascertain whether some provision could not be made to take care of the condition I have described.

Mr. BENNETT: I was in error in saying that the recent British act does not make provision in the event of old age pension being paid. It does provide that a person shall not receive the benefit under the act if he does receive old age pension. I did not correctly state the provision in the British act. I believe I can make it plain to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that no one would be receiving compensation under a provision of a workmen's compensation act unless he were free from fraud; the tribunal which deals with these matters has decided that he is entitled to receive it. He receives compensation because of injuries sustained in the course of his employment. Any money he may receive in that way could just as easily have been the result of his having been struck by an automobile and receiving $500 from the owner for the injury sustained. He would put the $500 in the bank, and after his recovery would go to work. Under this measure he would receive his benefits just the same as if no accident had happened to him, provided he had worked the requisite number of days to secure the benefit in question. The fact that an employee through a workmen's compensation act has received compensation for injuries sustained during employment cannot in any sense be said to militate against his right to recover benefits which he has secured to himself by paying his premiums during the period of his employment. Old age pensions, however, are entirely different. That is not something which he has received from an employer, and which he has a right to receive; it is something paid to him by the state after he has turned over to the state any assets he may have within a certain figure to enable him to receive the pension in question.

Mr. SANDERSON: Workmen's compensation acts are, of course, purely provincial, and are not the same in all provinces. I suppose we may assume that this unemployment insurance measure will not in any way interfere with the operation of the workmen's compensation acts in the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: I have explained as clearly as I can that it would not. If I have failed to make the point clear, then I desire to repeat that in my opinion at least—

Mr. SANDERSON: Perhaps the fault is mine.

Mr. BENNETT: It is my fault; apparently I have not succeeded in making it clear that the two statutes cannot in any sense be in conflict.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have in mind the fact that this parliament would have no jurisdiction over the compensation acts controlled by the provincial legislatures, no matter what the provisions of this measure may be. Even if parliament endeavoured to bring down legislation which would interfere with the compensation acts, the provinces would not accept it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The Workmen's Compensation Act in Ontario carries the provision that people who have been injured and who, having received some payments find that although they are better they cannot work, may be put on life pension. Will they be treated the same as people receiving old age pensions, or will they be considered as people receiving benefits under a workmen's compensation act?

Mr. BENNETT: Benefits received from a workmen's compensation act would have no effect upon a person's rights under this measure as now drafted.

Paragraph (c) agreed to.

Paragraphs (d) and (e) agreed to.

Section agreed to.

Sections 22 and 23 (now 21 and 22) agreed to.

On section 24 (as printed; now section 23) —Definition of benefit year.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of this section reads as follows:

(b) also, in the case only of an insured contributor who has exhausted his benefit rights in his last preceding benefit year, that thirteen contributions have been paid in respect of him since the Sunday last before the last day for which he received benefit;

Under section 20, in order to start to receive benefits under this act, a man must have paid forty contributions within the last two years.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the beginning of the operation.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Then after that, once he has qualified for receiving benefits, he can receive benefits in any benefit year if there are thirteen contributions?

Mr. BENNETT: It is a period of twelve months from the date of his last application for benefit. That is the new benefit year. Then he makes his contributions for the period, thirteen I think it is, speaking from memory, and thereupon he has the right to make further claim for unemployment benefits.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The question I am concerned about is this—it may be clear but I have not been able to see the explanation of it. At the end of a man's benefit year he still may have a credit of benefits accruing to him. Even if he has those benefits to his credit, will he still have to make these thirteen contributions before he can receive any further benefits?

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. BENNETT: The act provides that if an applicant has in his benefit year exhausted all his benefit right he must requalify by making thirteen fresh contributions. I will discuss that matter and make it clear when we come later to the section to which I wish to refer. I asked this afternoon that subsection 4 of section 20 stand because I desired to make an explanation; I shall keep my hon. friend's question in mind when I explain subsection 4 of section 20. There are also three or four other matters of that kind that I desire to make perfectly clear.

Section agreed to.

On section 25 (as printed; now section 24) —Special classes of insured persons.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With reference to subsection 4 of this section, will provision be made for tabling the regulations made in pursuance of the various sections of this bill at the next session of parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: Section 42 deals with that matter.

Section agreed to.

Section 26 (now 25) agreed to.

On section 27 (as printed; now section 26) —Determination of questions by commission concerning the rights of persons and appeals to the exchequer court.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am opposed to any appeals to court in connection with legislation of this kind. I have had some experience with workmen's compensation legislation which gives the right of appeal, and where the employer with all his financial resources is pitted against the individual worker. I would rather see the commission itself be the final court of appeal. I think it has been proven conclusively in connection with workmen's compensation legislation in its application in the broadest sense that the employee is distinctly better off when he stays out of court in matters of that kind, and I would suggest to the government that they eliminate this provision which permits either party to appeal to the courts.

Mr. BENNETT: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman?

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: Having regard to the progress which we have made with this measure I propose that we leave the discussion of section 27 and take it up again at the next sitting, and I will move that the committee rise and report progress. That will give the members of the committee an opportunity to consider what is involved in this section. What is involved is whether or not, on questions of law, there should be a determination by a court. There is provision in England with respect to difficult legal questions being settled by reference to a judge, and in this bill the exchequer court has been substituted. With respect to questions of appeal I may say that the other day when the representatives of the Trades and Labour Congress interviewed the government they were very strongly opposed to any provision of this kind. On the ground that there was a risk of the power of the state being pitted against the individual; that is the way it was put by the hon. member for East Hamilton. Perhaps the committee will give a little study to section 27. It may interest hon. members to know that the provisions of the British acts with respect to appeals are found in the statute of 1920, sections 10, 8 and 5; the statute of 1930, in the fifth schedule; and in the second statute of 1924. Hon. gentlemen may desire to give this question some little attention in the meantime, and I hope they will, so that we may be able to arrive at a conclusion founded upon a sound appreciation of just what is involved.

Before moving that the committee rise, Mr. Chairman, I might point out that copies of the reports of the actuaries, Mr. Wolfenden and Mr. Watson, are now on the table and available to the committee, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, in order that we may take up a few items of supply.

Section stands.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Civil Government—
Labour — salaries, $192,972; contingencies, $26,000.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the minister would allow me to draw his attention to a matter that applies to nearly all the departments. I have here the reports for the Department of Labour and also for the Department of Mines, both under the minister's charge, and both these reports cover the fiscal year ending March 31, 1934. I notice that they are signed by the respective deputy ministers, one on April 6, 1934, and the other on May 31, 1934. The point I want to make is this: If these reports are in the hands of the minister on these dates, shortly after the end of the fiscal year ending March, 1934, why cannot they be in our hands before nearly a year later? It is a long time to wait until February, 1935, to get a report which closed in March, 1934. I always understood that it was the delay in getting the material put together, but I find it is ready within a month or two after the date given. Why could not these things be printed and distributed to members in September? On one occasion when the house was called in the fall we did get these reports early, in October if I remember correctly. If they are obtainable in one year why not ordinarily? It would relieve the pressure on printing at this time of the year. I would ask the minister and the Prime Minister as well why these returns cannot be available in the fall.

Mr. BENNETT: The matter, I understand, was not brought to the attention of the minister but I have looked into it. Away back in 1887, I am informed, provision was made whereby the reports might be placed in the distribution office without being laid on the table when the house was not in session, and the Secretary of State has arranged to facilitate the printing of these reports just as soon as the year has ended and the material has been completed. It is proposed to avail ourselves, or I assume that some government will avail itself, of the provisions of the order in council of 1887 to enable the reports to be sent to the distribution office when printed without waiting for the opening of parliament. My attention was directed to the matter some weeks ago, and had it not been that parliament was meeting so soon after that time, the reports would have been sent to the distribution office before being laid on the table.

Mr. NEILL: Will that apply to all reports?

Mr. BENNETT: All that can be made available. The order in council was passed to meet the very situation to which the hon. gentleman refers. The fiscal year at one time ended on October 31.

Mr. NEILL: It will be of great convenience to the public.

Mr. BENNETT: Very great.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the Minister of Labour prepared to give any information in regard to his policy this year with reference to the unemployment situation, or does he intend to discuss the matter under some other item?

Mr. GORDON: That will be taken up under another item later.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under which item of the estimates? We are passing now the labour vote, No. 14.

Mr. GORDON: Yes, civil government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under which item shall we have an opportunity of discussing the government policy with respect to unemployment relief?

Mr. GORDON: With respect to unemployment relief, the whole problem is under consideration by the government and has been and is constantly under consideration, and it is more likely to be brought before parliament in the form of specific legislation than by way of items in the supply of the Labour department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When is the unemployment policy likely to come before the house? A good many hon. members are very anxious to know what it is and when we may expect it.

Mr. GORDON: The policy or plan of immediate relief will be largely determined by the position in which the provinces find themselves and by the representations that they may make to the dominion government for help. Upon their representations will largely depend the course of the government with respect to assistance to them. With regard to works that are purely federal, the plans are under consideration by the government and are not yet in such shape that they can be submitted to the house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My question was as to whether it was possible for the minister to give us some idea when they would likely be submitted to the house. I assume that at the present time matters are being carried on with the provinces without any definite arrangement for any length of time. Is that correct?

Mr. GORDON: No, not at all. Matters are at present being carried on with all the provinces under the relief act of last year, and the time is definitely certain. The relief act expires by the effluxion of time at the end of the fiscal year, and the agreements with the provinces under which we now operate will expire with the close of the fiscal year. Between now and that time, if the representations made by the provinces seem to indicate the necessity for continuing help to them, then that matter will have to be determined by the government, and the policy of the government with respect to it will not be unduly delayed, but will be brought before the house at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If I may say so, that is not much more definite than the minister's last answer. Can he tell us when we may expect to be told what the policy is, because it is a matter in which a great many people are vitally interested at the present time. If it can possibly be avoided, and surely it can, there should not be any delay until the closing hours of the session. I should like to know whether the minister has any idea as to when he is likely to inform the house what his policies are.

Mr. GORDON: At the present time the dominion government, acting under agreements with the various provinces, is lending such support and assistance as would seem to be necessary in order to enable the provinces to discharge their constitutional responsibilities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have lost them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They have none left.

Mr. GORDON: My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre says the provinces have lost all their constitutional rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): During this session.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They have just their liabilities.

Mr. GORDON: Everyone will make up his own mind about that. At the moment we are carrying on under these agreements. With the exception of the province of Quebec, I know of no province that has submitted any plan that would vary the agreements which are now in existence with respect to assistance by the dominion government. The agreements now in existence will continue until the end of the fiscal year. I do not think that even an invitation is necessary to most of the provinces to approach the dominion government with respect to assistance they think they may need to carry through after the end of the fiscal year. But communications will undoubtedly pass before the end of the fiscal year between the provinces and this government with a view to determining to what extent the provinces can discharge their responsibilities, and to what extent if any they may need dominion support. When that is made apparent, then I assume, if the dominion has to come to the aid of the provinces again for the coming year, appropriate legislation will, if it is found necessary, be submitted to the house for discussion and approval.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am very much obliged to the minister for his explanation, but it does not get us very far. As I understand the situation—and I just want to see if I have it correctly—with the exception of Quebec nothing has so far been received from any of the nine provinces as to what they expect their requirements from this government to be for the year that will start about six weeks from now. If I am correct also in my interpretation of what the minister says, he and the other members of the government have at the present time no idea whether relief similar to what has been given for this year will be required for another year, or whether no relief will be required at all. Am I correct in interpreting the minister's statement?

Mr. GORDON: Communications have passed between this government and the provinces concerning mainly the mechanics of the working out of the present agreements, but no request has been received from the provinces, nor has there been submitted to this government by any of the provinces any plan with respect to what they may need after the end of the present fiscal year. Unquestionably I think it will be necessary to consult with the provinces.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I understand the provinces are satisfied with the manner in which the agreement for the current year is being carried out by the dominion government?

Mr. GORDON: In the main, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Do I understand the minister to suggest that the policy of this government is to be based entirely on the nature of the requests received from the various provincial governments in regard to the next fiscal year?

Mr. GORDON: Largely, yes.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The minister told us a moment ago that all the provinces except Quebec were satisfied with the agreement. How much is the government paying per month to Quebec just now?

Mr. GORDON: I may say that under this item I did not anticipate having to meet the questions which have been put to me, but I will do the best I can to answer them and when the proper item or the legislation comes squarely before the house I will go into the matter in greater detail. Under the agreements which at present exist the dominion is paying to the province of Quebec a lump sum per month as a grant in aid, and that lump sum carries with it no restriction other than it be devoted to the relief of those in distress and needing direct or other relief.

Mr. CASGRAIN: How much?

Mr. GORDON: For the months of August and September the amount provisionally was $600,000 per month, and for the remainder of the fiscal year the amount, if my memory serves me correctly—and I think it does—was such as to provide $500,000 per month. That lump sum as a grant in aid is given to the province without any restrictions, leaving it entirely in the judgment of the province as to where the money should be spent, in other words, where the necessity for the expenditure of the money is most acute. The only restriction is that it be devoted to the relief of those in distress and needing direct or other relief.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The minister said that the province of Quebec was not satisfied with that grant. Did he receive a counter proposition from the provincial government for other amounts?

Mr. GORDON: The government received through me an offer from the Premier of Quebec wherein he proposed that the province and the dominion should assume in his province the total burden of direct relief. A few days ago a question was put on the order paper and was answered, and the question was then pursued, if my recollection serves me correctly, by the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville asking that the correspondence be tabled. That correspondence has been tabled; I do not have it under my hand at the moment, but I shall be glad later when these estimates are under discussion to read the correspondence that passed, so that members of the committee may be fully seized of the attitude of the Quebec government and also of that of the dominion government with respect to the matter.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): To make a long story short, what was the proposition of Premier Taschereau of Quebec? Is it true that he offered to pay fifty per cent of all relief to be paid in Quebec, the same proportion to be paid by the federal government?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that we are discussing an item of civil government—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is the administration of the department.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Just a minute; let me finish what I am going to say. We are on an item of salaries, civil government, and in my opinion the matter that is now being discussed is not relevant to the item before the committee. That is the ruling of the chair.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The minister is quite willing to answer. He is not asking the chair for protection.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The question is not one of protecting the minister. In my judgment as chairman the discussion is not relevant to the item before the committee.

Mr. HEAPS: On a question of salaries one can discuss almost anything one wishes. We are discussing the salaries of the Department of Labour and if it is so desired by the committee we can discuss the actions of any of the officials of the department during their whole tenure of office. This item includes salaries of the deputy minister and of other officials, and if the members think fit, the activities of those officials can be reviewed by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The chairman is in the hands of the committee.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, the committee is in the hands of the chairman.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): What I find very strange is that the Minister of Labour, although quite willing to answer, is stopped—

Mr. GORDON: Of course I am willing to answer any question that I can answer, but no minister in charge of estimates of this kind could be expected to be prepared to answer a particular question on relief, such as has been brought up.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You should be after four years.

Mr. GORDON: I will do the best I can. If my answers are not entirely accurate they will be subject to correction later. While it seems strange that an item such as the civil government vote should bring on a discussion of relief matters generally, I am not a bit put out about it. Go ahead and I will give the best answers I can.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): I am perfectly satisfied. The last question I put was whether the proposition of Premier Taschereau was that fifty per cent of relief in the province of Quebec be paid by the provincial government and fifty per cent by the federal government.

Mr. GORDON: The Premier of Quebec wrote to me proposing that he would cause his government to pay fifty per cent of the relief, in the municipalities I believe. Whether that means the organized municipalities or not my recollection does not serve me. He offered that on condition that the dominion government would contribute the other fifty per cent, thereby relieving the municipalities from any obligation as far as the relief was concerned. I gave a great deal of thought to the premier's offer. I felt and still feel that when the Premier of Quebec made that offer he was fairly certain that he would not have to carry out his part of the bargain, because—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANBURY: Because what?

Mr. GORDON: Because I could not consent to it or approve or recommend it. The reasons for that conclusion I think are clearly disclosed in the correspondence tabled a few days ago, to which I will make reference later on when the relief measures are under discussion.

Mr. GRAY: Would the minister be good enough, before he goes into supply on labour again, to bring down and table the correspondence passing between this government and the government of Ontario?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): All the provinces.

Mr. GRAY: In particular that passing between the federal Minister of Labour and the minister of northern development in Ontario. I particularly wish to see the correspondence dealing with the trans-Canada highway, and also any correspondence that has passed relating to the amount finally arrived at as to monthly relief to be paid by the dominion to the province of Ontario—that is since the Hepburn government came into office in 1934.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like the same in regard to British Columbia.

Mr. GORDON: I shall be glad to bring down the correspondence that passed between this government and all the provinces, so that the committee will be fully seized of what has been done and attempted, and the propositions backward and forward dealing with this most baffling problem.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Has the government made any definite decision regarding the matter discussed about the beginning of December between the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and other members of the cabinet, and the Premier of Ontario, regarding the trans-Canada highway? It is a matter of vital importance to us in Ontario, and I feel that a decision should certainly be made soon.

Mr. POWER: Has the minister in his department a system of departmental audit of relief expenditures?

Mr. GORDON: There is no labour department audit as such. Relief expenditures are checked over with respect to the proposals that have been submitted and accepted. With respect to moneys granted or allowed by this government to a province for specific purposes, either under order in council or under the terms of an agreement, audits are made by the auditor general. From time to time situations are disclosed where, mainly through misconstruction of the regulations or misinterpretation of the agreement by the province or municipality, moneys have been misapplied. As those items come to light—some of them through voluntary notification by the provinces, or disclosed by the labour department, or in the reports of the auditor general—the Labour department has experienced little or no difficulty in getting adjustments or refunds made from the various provinces. But a field audit is not made by the Labour department; rather we rely upon the certificate of the provincial auditors as to the correctness of an account and the proper allocation of sums towards which we have contributed. As I say, when such misinterpretations have come to light, we have had little difficulty in arranging refunds, and very large refunds have been made by the provinces to the dominion. Particulars of them I have not before me at the moment.

Mr. POWER: Have any of these disclosures mentioned by the minister, where payments have been improperly made owing to misconstruction of the statute or misinterpretation, come to light owing to the activities of the Labour department or the unemployment branch, or have they all come to light through the audits of the auditor general?

Mr. GORDON: I think I am correct in stating that the major portion of the refunds received have been as a result of checking in the Labour department. I regret that, not having anticipated this discussion on an item such as that now before the committee, I cannot give the figures, but I shall be glad to give them later. However a considerable sum has also been refunded by the provinces by reason of audits made by the auditor general.

Mr. POWER: I have heard complaints that as the audits of the auditor general come in many cases months after the money has been expended, by the time a request for rebate comes nearly all trace of the particular expenditure has disappeared. It has been stated to me that the Department of Labour has a system of audit but that it is not made known to the other party to the agreement, such as the municipality or the province, until such time as the auditor general happens to strike a particular abuse or error or misconception. That causes a great deal of inconvenience, whereas if the department had been more on the job, so to speak, and had followed the work more closely it could have pointed out to the other parties concerned just where the error lay, which would have avoided a great deal of trouble and delay. That is why I ask the minister just to what extent and how closely the accounts are audited by his own department rather than by the auditor general.

Mr. GORDON: I do not know that at the moment I can add much to what I have said already with respect to the checking and auditing of accounts. The procedure followed since 1930 follows the procedure that was adopted in 1922 when the dominion government made similar but very much smaller contributions to the provinces, which in turn disbursed the money to the municipalities, with the exception that the certificates required are very much more in detail. I am not offering this observation as a criticism of what happened in 1922; I am merely saying that, in view of the more serious situation with which the federal government has been confronted, it was thought advisable that we should be perhaps a little stricter than they were in those days. We relied largely upon the certificates of the provincial auditors for the correctness of the expenditures and the disposition of the moneys that we supplied the provinces. I do not know what other system could have been followed. I assume that the provinces in turn largely relied upon the auditors of the various municipalities. It may be said that this was not the proper way to audit accounts of this kind, but what other method could be employed when relief was being granted throughout Canada, trickling right back into the smallest settlements? Could any other machinery be set up and be justified with respect to the expense that would be entailed, other than the machinery already in existence, which consisted of first the municipal officers and second the provinces, who had contact with the municipalities and who would be in a better position than anyone else to place the necessary restraint and check upon the expenditures? I frankly confess that I do not know how it could have been done otherwise, how any machinery could have been set up that would not result in a huge administrative expense that would be entirely unjustifiable. It is true that, as the hon. member for Quebec South has intimated, there has been carelessness or perhaps lack of business ability shown here and there; no doubt there was also cupidity or some other human weakness which would make people forget that their fellow taxpayers were carrying a heavy burden; but in the main I believe I am stating the fact when I say there has been very little money lost through unwholesome activities such as I have mentioned. I believe in many instances the provinces have brought to light cases where the municipalities have not spent the money according to regulation, and rebates have been made. That is going on constantly. I would not say for a moment that there have not been losses in the last four years; of course there have been. It could not be otherwise.

Mr. POWER: May I ask if an audit will be necessary in future with the new system of lump sum payments? Will the federal government still insist on an audit being made?

Mr. GORDON: The lump sum is stated to be a grant in aid for relief purposes, and it is left within the discretion of each province to use the money where it is most needed. At the moment I am not prepared to say that there has been an instance that has come within the notice of the department where any of the money we have granted has been misapplied by any province. I do not think there will be such an instance.

Mr. POWER: In this case this is a lump sum payment, a grant in aid?

Mr. GORDON: Exactly.

Mr. POWER: As I understand it that is the system under which we are now proceeding. Will the federal government or the Department of Labour follow up these grants and see how and where the money voted by the federal parliament is being expended, or will it not?

Mr. GORDON: Undoubtedly the auditor will ask and receive from each province a report as to how and where the money has been distributed.

Mr. POWER: Will those reports be made available to parliament?

Mr. GORDON: Quite. I suggest that this item stand, and perhaps at a later day I can furnish in greater detail the information that has been requested.

Item stands.

RAILWAYS AND CANALS

Printing and Stationery, $5,000.

Mr. MANION: This is merely the revolving item for stationery. I do not ask that the item go through; I merely wish to get my department in, and if the committee is satisfied I will move that the item stand.

Item stands.

MINES

Salaries, $485,910; contingencies, $20,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not sure whether this is the right item, but I should like to ask the minister how much the government has received from the gold tax we imposed last year.

Mr. GORDON: The Department of Mines has no record of the amount of the gold tax. That will have to be obtained from the Department of Finance. If there is to be any discussion I suggest that the item stand.

Item stands.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Item No.—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be unpleasant, but I do not think it is proper to enter into all the departments to-night. I did not object when the Minister of Railways called one of his items. Yesterday however the Prime Minister announced that he would like to take up mines, pensions and national health. Railways and Canals was not mentioned, but I did not raise any objection.

Mr. MANION: Quite correct.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do raise an objection, however, so far as marine is concerned.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps the hon. member for Quebec East would permit me to state that the Prime Minister mentioned the Department of Pensions and National Health, but he had not in mind the fact that that department had already been opened. In the circumstances we thought the committee might substitute another department.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And we took railways instead.

Mr. RHODES: quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think that is sufficient.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It does not matter to me.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What is the amount outstanding in dollars and cents, in connection with loans granted under the Canadian Farm Loan Act, in British Columbia, as at January 31, 1935?

2. How many individual loans were granted: (a) what is the maximum amount; (b) what is the minimum amount?

3. What are the names, addresses, positions and salaries, of the present officials connected with the said act in British Columbia?

Mr. RHODES:

1. As at March 31, 1934 (later figures not available), $1,322,537.

2. 497; (a) $10,000; (b) $400.

Tanner, Saanich, and Walter Paterson, Gordon Head, members of provincial board, $10 per day each when engaged in the business of the board, plus travelling and living expenses, with a minimum remuneration of $250 per annum. W. S. Palmer, Victoria, appraiser, salary $1,890 per annum. Miss M. Pearcy, Victoria, stenographer, salary $1,026 per annum.

In submitting the answer to this question I would observe that the practice in the past has been that information of a detailed nature in respect of the salaries of those in the employ of boards set up under the government has not as a general policy been given. However, in this particular instance I cannot see any objection, in the public interest, to the information sought for being given. At the same time I thought it well to indicate what has been the practice and to point out that it should not be construed as a precedent for general information of this character being given.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I hope the minister will not construe that to be in effect when he takes full control of the farm loan board—when the government of Canada will have full control of all officials.

Mr. RHODES: We can cross that bridge when we come to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I might answer this question orally. The answer to the first inquiry is no; to the second, answered by No. 1; to the third, the intention of the government will be made known if and when a policy is announced.

Anne de Beaupré, in the county of Montmorency, to the extent of $25,000 as mentioned in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936.

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, telegrams, and other documents, in the possession of the Department of Public Works, with reference to the repairs to be done at the wharf at Baie des Rochers, in the county of Saguenay, to the extent of $5,500 as mentioned in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936.

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, telegrams, and other documents, in the possession of the Department of Public Works, with reference to the extension of the protection wall at Baie St. Paul (Rivière du Gouffre), in the county of Charlevoix, to the extent of $8,800 as mentioned in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936.

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, telegrams, and other documents, in the possession of the Department of Public Works, with reference to the wharf extension at Manicouagan, on the north shore of the River St. Lawrence, to the extent of $100,000 as mentioned in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936.

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, telegrams, and other documents, in the possession of the Department of Public Works, with reference to the wharf extension at La Malbaie (St. Etienne), in the county of Charlevoix, to the extent of $39,000 as mentioned in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936.

For a copy of all papers, correspondence, telegrams, and other documents, in the possession of the Department of Public Works, with reference to the reconstruction of the wharf at Hâvre St. Pierre, on the north shore of the River St. Lawrence, to the extent of $75,000 as mentioned in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1936.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As regards Nos. 1 to 6 inclusive of these motions, the question was brought up the other day in the absence of the hon. member. The motions refer to items in the estimates of this year which have not yet been voted and I submit that it is not in accordance with the custom to bring down papers regarding estimates to be discussed in the house this session. The hon. member can ask questions when the estimates are before the house.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I put these motions on the order paper in view of the fact that these estimates will come up for consideration. In order to be in a position to discuss the estimates on their merits, it is necessary to have the information I ask for. I am not asking anything out of the ordinary routine of business; I am just asking for correspondence, documents and letters exchanged with regard to the matters affected. If the papers are not in my possession it may take a longer time to discuss the estimates of the Minister of Public Works when they come up and I shall be obliged to ask him to produce the documents. I shall be within my right in asking him.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It has not been the custom to bring down papers in this house regarding estimates which have not yet even been discussed.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I serve notice on the Minister of Public Works that when the estimates come up I should like to have all these papers.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All right.

Mr. SPEAKER: Nos. 1 to 6 dropped.

CHARLEVOIX-SAGUENAY PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all paylists and accounts for materials in connection with work done by the Department of Public Works in the county of Charlevoix-Saguenay during the years 1933 and 1934.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to point out to my hon. friend that to comply literally with this motion would involve weeks of the time of stenographers. I have made inquiry and in the hon. member's constituency there are more than sixty different works to which this question relates. He is asking for the most complete and detailed information in regard to pay lists, etcetera, in connection with each and every one of those works. In view of the very large number of returns that are asked for, I suggest that my hon. friend if possible limit the scope of this motion, and if he desires details respecting any particular work, we shall be very glad to give him all information available. But I point out to him, as I think he will agree, that this motion involves a very large amount of work which will take a good deal of time and possibly the return might not be ready in time. I suggest that he let the motion stand and endeavour to reduce its scope.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I introduced this motion because last year, the year before and even this year other motions along the same line were passed and at the time no exception was taken to them by the Minister of Public Works or the Prime Minister. There may be sixty constituencies where works were constructed, but in my constituency in 1933 and 1934 there were not many.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I say that there were sixty works in my hon. friend's constituency.

Mr. SPEAKER: Possibly the motion might be allowed to stand until the hon. member consults with the minister.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister allow me to examine all these records in his department if I go there?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I suggest that my hon. friend endeavour to limit the motion to any particular work in which he is interested.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is interesting to know all the works and how all have been carried out.

Motion stands.

Touche & Company, auditors of Canadian National Railways, amplifying and explaining the recommendation of said auditors in their report of 1934 for the writing off of one billion dollars or more of the capital indebtedness of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MANION: May I just inform the hon. gentleman and hon. members generally that I have asked the auditors to send me twenty-five copies of this report for the members of the committee. One copy will be tabled and members of the special railway committee of last year will get the others.

Motion agreed to.

Lévesque, former postmaster at Bagotville, during 1932; also the report of the post office inspector for Quebec, pertaining to the dismissal of Mr. Lévesque.

FISHING INDUSTRY

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN CUSTOMS DUTIES ON INSTRUMENTS OF PRODUCTION

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the best interests of Canada demand that the burden of customs taxation be lessened on the instruments of production in the fishing industry, and to this end all articles required in said industry be free from customs duties.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is in my opinion one of the most important motions that have come before parliament for many years. It purports to deal with a matter affecting one of the greatest natural industries in Canada, an industry which perhaps has been more neglected than any other. For that reason I have no apology to make to the house or to the country for taking a few moments to lay certain matters in connection with this resolution before the government and the house generally. A few days ago the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) moved a similar resolution with regard to agricultural implements, asking this house to express the opinion that it is in the best interests of the agricultural industry that customs duties should be taken off the instruments required in that great industry. My resolution asks that the burden of customs taxation be lessened on the instruments of production in the fishing industry. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) expressed regret that the motion of the hon. member for West Edmonton was moved; he said that while it might be "good party politics" he did not consider it "good national politics." Now, sir, I regret that the finance minister made that statement, because while he, the hon. member for West Edmonton, myself and other hon. members belong to different political parties and while on some occasions we may be termed partisans, yet I think we all come here, being the chosen representatives of the people, to serve not only our own constituency but Canada as a whole. Sir, I mention this because I think perhaps the Minister of Finance on mature consideration will agree with me that a matter of this kind, whether brought up by the hon. member for West Edmonton or by myself, is not a matter of party politics but of national concern, one which we at least consider to be in the interests of the people of this country.

The Minister of Finance in his reply referred also to the fact that negotiations were going on between this country and the United States of America to develop a reciprocal trade arrangement. I do not think I need at this stage dwell long on the fact that for a great many years, not only the thirty or forty years that I have been taking some interest in the public life of this country, but ever since I reached an age of maturity—

Mr. HACKETT: When was that?

Mr. DUFF: I can understand the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) asking such a question; children and some other people do ask questions of that sort.

Mr. HACKETT: Oh, you can do better than that.

Mr. DUFF: I admit I have a good deal to learn from the hon. member for Stanstead and other hon. members, but as far as my fiscal views are concerned I have no apology to make either for introducing this resolution or as to what I have stood for during my public and business life in this country. I have always been in favour of a better trade arrangement with the nation to the south, and therefore I have no regrets for having brought in this resolution, nor do I agree with the Minister of Finance that it might affect the negotiations which are in progress between the leaders of thought in this country, President Roosevelt and his cabinet. I think my attitude a few days ago, when I had a motion on the order paper with regard to a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States, which, generously, may I say, I withdrew after I found that this government was entering into negotiations with that country, shows that I am not open to the accusation of embarrassing either this government or the government of the United States. To use the words of several statesmen in this country, which have been bandied back and forth across the floor of this house, I do not wish to provoke the United States. I remember that the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) in my younger days, perhaps after I had achieved the years of maturity referred to by the hon. member for Stanstead, gloatingly referred to a remark made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he did not wish to provoke the United States. Well, sir, history has a fashion of repeating itself. There is an old saying that birds come home to roost. It is rather strange that in this year of our Lord 1935 we have hon. members on the other side holding up their hands in holy horror and begging us not to do anything to provoke our neighbours to the south. If those negotiations do not reach what I and others of the same views would consider the acme of perfection in regard to a reciprocal trade arrangement, I do not want to be accused of putting any stumbling block in their way. Consequently, sir, I am willing to do any kind of penance in order to bring about a proper trade arrangement with the United States of America relating to certain natural products of this country.

Reading the newspaper on Monday last I was pleased indeed to see the report, which I hope is correct, of a speech made by the Prime Minister in New York last Saturday night. The utopian ideas expressed in that speech gladdened my heart. But after I came to consider them I wondered whether they were utopian ideas or Ethiopian. I wondered whether the Ethiopian could change his skin, or the leopard his spots, or the politically ungodly man change his ways. I remember, sir, that in the years from 1911 to last year the Prime Minister of this country, whenever the matter of better trade relations between Canada and the United States came up, always opposed it. Of course I believe that while the lamp holds out to burn the guilty sinner may return, and I welcome his accession to the Duff Reciprocity Club of Canada. I remember, sir, in 1911 when perhaps the hon. member for Stanstead had not reached years of maturity, the late Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson had come back from the United States with reciprocity agreements applauded by both sides of this house, it was afterwards said by the late Sir George Foster that he did not wish any truck or trade with the Yankees, and I remember that eminent exponent of western ideas, the present Prime Minister, going up and down western Canada saying that if we accepted reciprocity "we would become the back door of Chicago."

Mr. LAPOINTE: He entered parliament by it.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: I heard someone say "hear, hear." Perhaps it is a good thing the Prime Minister is not in his place; he might have some difficulty with the members sitting behind him due to the fact that some years ago, in his youth, the Prime Minister made the statement that he did not want Canada to be the back-door of Chicago.

It was only last year that I introduced my resolution on reciprocity, a resolution which you will remember was introduced also in 1933. If hon. members, especially those on the other side, will look at Hansard for last year at pages 73 and 74 they will see what the Prime Minister said at that time. No doubt you, sir, will remember that the Prime Minister asked us on this side whether we wanted reciprocity in hogs, in cattle, in butter and in eggs, and he went on to try to prove to us that a reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States was not necessary because at that particular moment the prices of hogs, butter and eggs were perhaps as high in Canada as they were in the United States. I am wondering what has come over the Prime Minister in the last few months. In a speech delivered a few days ago he said that he has been in a position to arrange for a conference with the United States government in order to discuss this matter for only a short time, because President Roosevelt only received his power from congress in May, 1934. But let me say, sir, that it is a well known fact—and I do not think I am giving away any political secrets—that even before President Roosevelt was sworn in his liberal government sent a delegate, an emissary or an ambassador to this country in order to approach this government in regard to this very important matter. That was in December of 1932. So while I welcome all converts to the faith, I cannot understand why the Prime Minister and his government, especially my good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), now should be so afraid that if I discuss this resolution or if the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) discusses the question of lowering the tariff—which I have favoured all my life —this will interfere in any way with the negotiations between Canada and the United States which are likely to take place within the next few weeks.

After the Prime Minister made his speech last year, in which he practically said that reciprocity was not necessary, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Golding) referred to the fact that in 1930 this country had sold $15,000,000 worth of cattle to the United States, and I think we can all agree with the Prime Minister who now admits that one of our great markets is the United States of America. A few days ago the Minister of Finance deprecated the fact that the hon. member for West Edmonton had brought in his resolution. May I say to my hon. friend that if the resolutions brought in by the hon. member for West Edmonton and myself, asking for lower tariffs, might affect any reciprocal trade arrangement or understanding between the two countries, does not the minister think he should have disciplined the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) when he brought in a resolution with regard to the Ottawa trade agreements? I can tell my hon. friend that one of the things he is going to be up against when he goes to Washington next month, or whenever he does go—and no one is more qualified to discuss these matters with the President of the United States and his cabinet than is my hon. friend—is this very question of the Ottawa agreements. My hon. friend will not be faced with my resolution, because President Roosevelt knows that the Liberal party, and especially myself, always have been in favour of lower tariffs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: The minister will be faced with the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough, because nothing that has happened in the last number of years has so strained the relations between this country and the United States than have the Ottawa agreements.

The resolution moved by the hon. member for West Edmonton dealt particularly with the duties on agricultural implements. Perhaps the Minister of Finance was quite right when he said to the hon. gentleman that in view of the fact that we import a large volume of agricultural implements from the United States it might be as well if his resolution did not pass. But, sir, my resolution deals with a number of items, not only those which come—and should come in larger volume—from the United States, but also those items needed by the fishermen which are brought from other countries of the world. Consequently my hon. friend cannot accuse me of hindering any reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States, since many of the articles to which I refer, and which the fishermen must use every day, come from Greece, Italy and other European countries as well as from Great Britain.

I should like to give my hon. friend a list of the articles coming from countries other than the United States; I have not time to do so but I want to refer particularly to one item. The fisherman must have certain articles with which to build his boats and fit up his gear, but in addition these vessels must carry certain articles of food when they go to the fishing grounds, and before my hon. friend brings down his budget I should like to show him what an intricate thing the tariff policy of this government has become. In fitting out for the fisheries, either deep sea or shore, a fisherman must secure certain kinds of provisions. Among these provisions is salt beef, which must be carried by every fishing vessel. I do not know whether or not the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough was so anxious to support the government in connection with the empire trade agreements for this particular reason, but nevertheless this is a very important item of food which must be carried by the fishing vessels. This salt beef comes either in 200 pound barrels or 100 pound half barrels. It is true that this beef is packed in Canada; it is also true that salt beef coming from the United States has to pay certain duties and taxation of other kinds. I regret to say that for some reason or other the fishermen prefer the United States brand of beef to the Canadian brand. I hold in my hand a statement from the manager of one of the outfitting and ship chandlery firms in which I am interested, protesting very strongly against the duties and taxes he has to pay on beef brought to this country for the fishermen.

I should not be surprised if the Minister of Finance and other members of parliament reply, "Yes, but beef, pork, lard, kerosene oil and some other articles can be purchased by the fishermen out of bond and consequently free of duty." That is true in connection with vessels of more than 50 tons, but the great majority of the fishermen who use beef sail in vessels of less than that tonnage. I am sure this will be a surprise to the Minister of Finance; I could not believe it myself, when I got it. The figures before me show what it costs to import a barrel of beef for fishing purposes into this country. The value on beef, made up for duty purposes, on one barrel weighing 200 pounds is as follows:

200 pounds at 24 cents.. .. .. ..$48 00
Less $1.80 value for barrels.. .. 1 80
	$46 20
Value of one barrel beef for duty (nearest dollar)..		$46 00
Duty on 200 barrels beef at 6 cents	12 00
Excise tax, 3 per cent on value of beef and duty, $46 plus $12 ($58)	1 74
Value of barrel for duty $2, duty on barrel 25 per cent..	0 50
Sales tax, 6 per cent on value and duty ($2 plus 0.50), $2.50.. ..	0 15
Excise tax, 3 per cent on $2.50..	0 08
50 per cent special duty on total value beef $46; barrel $2 ($48).	24 00
		$38 47

Hon. members will note that on a barrel of beef valued at $46 the duty and other taxes amount to $38.47. I admit I was surprised, and I have no doubt the Minister of Finance will be. I could hardly believe my eyes when the manager of the company in question handed me the statement. A day or two later he produced to me the customs entry form. This paper purports to be a customs entry of the goods out of warehouse, and is headed "Customs, Canada—entry for warehouse", from the port of La Have, Nova Scotia, and dated August 24, 1934. It is a follows:

Number of packages	Description of goods	Quantity	Invoice value in currency of invoice	Value for duty in dollars	Rate of duty or free	Total customs duty	Duty paidvalue	Sales tax 6%	Rate of excise tax	Excise tax	Tariff applied
10	Bbls. pickled beef	2,000	462	462	6c.	120 00	582 00	.....	3%	17 46	General
	Total lbs. value, $480.
	Barrels	10	18	18	25%	4 50	22 50	1 35	3%	0 68
	Special duty, 50%	.....	.....	480	.....	240 00	.....	.....	.....	.....
1	Bbl. pickled pork	200	1,325	13	5c.	10 00	23 00	.....	3%	0 69
	Barrel	1	200	2	25%	0 50	2 50	0 15	3%	0 08
		.....	.....	495	.....	375 00	630 00	1 50	.....	18 91

This customs entry will indicate a total tax amounting to $395.41, made up of a customs duty of $375; a sales tax of $1.50 and an excise tax of $18.91.

If these figures are accurate—and I presume they are, because I have the customs entry before me—then it seems to me, in the interests of the fishermen, I am justified in protesting against the tariffs and the other imposts which they have to pay not only on the food supplies for their vessels, when they go out to the fishing grounds, but on a list of other items which would require fifteen minutes of the time of this house for me to enumerate. If this great industry is to be encouraged the government, and particularly the Minister of Finance when he brings down his budget must see that the fishermen are relieved from this excessive burden of taxation so that they may be in a better position successfully to prosecute their great industry.

For these reasons I have no apology for introducing this resolution, and I hope the minister will believe me when I say that in my action I have had no intention to embarrass him as Minister of Finance, or to embarrass the government in connection with their ordinary duties or any reciprocal trade arrangement they may make—and which I hope they will make—with the United States. May I repeat before taking my seat that there is no man in Canada who has felt more strongly than myself that these tariff barriers between the United States and Canada should not exist. Thousands of our Canadian people hold the same view. I am not flapping the flag, as the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) did the other day. I am not flaunting two flags, the union jack and the flag of Australia as he did. But so far as the trade of Canada is concerned, while I do not believe in flag flapping or wearing my loyalty on my sleeve, yet I must say to the Minister of Finance, to parliament and to the country that Canada will never come into her own until so far as tariffs and trade matters are concerned the union jack and the flag of the United States are entwined, and a proper reciprocal trade arrangement made between that country and this.

My last word to the government and to the Minister of Finance, who may be one of the Canadian delegates arranging a trade agreement would be that we do not want any half-measures, so far as reciprocal trade arrangements with the United States are concerned. The Prime Minister said that we could do nothing until last May, at which time the President of the United States obtained authority from congress to reduce the duties by 50 per cent. That is not going far enough. If the President of the United States has not the authority to go farther than 50 per cent, so far as taking the duty off fish, potatoes, lumber, cattle, and other natural products is concerned, then I beg that when my good friend the Minister of Finance meets President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull he will say to them, "We want a real reciprocity arrangement; we want the whole of the duty taken off fish, potatoes, lumber, cattle and other commodities."

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: The constituency of the hon. member opposite is suffering because the Tory party of the United States put a high duty on butter. He should be the last one to laugh at me when I am seriously discussing a matter of vital importance, a matter which affects the real life blood of this country, and when I say that until such time as we obtain a proper reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States, Canada will never enter into her own.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope it is not necessary for me to reiterate a confession of faith with respect to my attitude regarding trade relations between Canada and the United States. I do, however, wish to say to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) and to the house that I take exception to his suggestion that the Conservative party is now or ever has been opposed to a trade agreement with the United States. I do not purpose interjecting a party flavour into any remarks I may have to make, and I assure the house my observations will be brief, but I cannot permit that imputation to go unchallenged. We may agree to disagree with hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the merits of particular proposals. That is one thing. But it is not for them to say that the Conservative party is opposed, or that it ever has been opposed, to a trade agreement with the United States. I am prepared to say to my hon. friend immediately that I believe he is absolutely sincere in his desire to effect better trade relations with our neighbours to the south, but surely I have the right to expect from him and those associated with him that they will attribute to me and to those who surround me feelings of equal sincerity with respect to that same matter.

Mr. DUFF: I thought I did.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend says he did I am prepared at once to accept his word, but the clear inference I drew from his observations was that there was not that same favourable attitude, to put it euphemistically, on this side of the house as there was on the other with respect to a trade agreement with the United States.

I am going to resist the temptation, although I must admit that it is a very great one, to remind my hon. friend of the fact that during the nine years his government was in power we got farther and farther away from a trade agreement of any kind with the United States than in any similar period in Canadian history, and that the opportunities of effecting a trade agreement with the United States were made more difficult in that period by reason of the attitude of the United States regarding their tariff action against this country. In making that statement I find no fault with our neighbours to the south. They were dealing with their own tariffs in their own way, as they had every right to do. I might elaborate and embroider that attitude to a very considerable extent, but I do not wish to impart a party flavour to this discussion at all. I do, however, submit that it is only fair that I should not accept without question the statements of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) which do not conform to our feelings and beliefs with respect to this matter.

Having said so much I do not think it is necessary, particularly in view of the attitude of the Conservative party towards trade relations with the United States as disclosed by the right hon. the Prime Minister last year, for me to make any further comment upon my hon. friend's suggestion that we are now converts and have changed our attitude in that respect.

My hon. friend alluded to a reference I made the other night to the effect that to discuss this matter at this stage might be good party politics but was not good national politics. That observation arose out of something which had been said by my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), and I can assure my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough and the house that in making that statement I had no desire to impute motives to hon. gentlemen opposite. That was farthest from my thought. All I had in mind was that this was not the proper time to discuss matters of this kind, and that was why I said it was not good national politics at this time.

Let me say to my hon. friend that in suggesting that I had said, even by implication, that we should not provoke the United States he was imputing to me words and thoughts which were neither expressed nor even conceived. I never used the word "provoke."

Mr. DUFF: I did not say you did. I said the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion).

Mr. RHODES: Quite so, but the Minister of Railways was merely quoting a remark of the right hon. leader of the opposition when he was taken to task for not having taken the tariff action which was called for in view of the action of our neighbour to the south.

Mr. MANION: And when no trade treaty was pending.

Mr. RHODES: And when no trade negotiations were in hand. My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough suggests that we were afraid. It is not a question of fear at all. It is simply a question of ordinary, good business sense. I submit that when you sit down to negotiate with your neighbour for the purpose, not of composing necessarily differences, but to arrive at an amicable arrangement that will be mutually advantageous, it would be the height of folly, if not stupidity, to say in advance just what you were going to do. It would tie your hands, if not in the way of final action, certainly with respect to your ability to negotiate. The whole idea of this conference is that we should sit down and negotiate and discuss, and I say it would be only ordinary good business judgment and prudence in those circumstances to leave the situation as it stands, and then after the negotiations have been concluded, successfully or otherwise, discussion of the subject is an entirely different matter. I deprecate any suggestion that in asking the house not to debate these questions at this time the question of provocation arises, and I hope in having said so much my hon. friends opposite will not think I have been provocative, because that is furthest from my mind.

My hon. friend went a very long distance when he suggested that there is any comparison between the attitude taken by the hon. member for Toronto-Scarborough (Mr. Harris) in connection with his resolution and the resolution of my hon. friend. Without discussing the merits of the resolution of my hon. friend from Toronto-Scarborough, which I may say I knew nothing at all about until I saw it on the order paper, may I point out that it reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the operation of the trade agreements concluded at the imperial economic conference held at Ottawa, 1932, merits the approval of this house.

His resolution had to do with the operation of an existing trade arrangement, and that was an entirely different thing from discussing in advance matters you must deal with in negotiations which are immediately pending. I fail to see the slightest comparison arising between the two resolutions.

For reasons which are obvious I do not propose to discuss the merits of the resolution now before the house, much less do I propose to traverse the ground that was covered by my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough in the incidents that he referred to. I do not think for the reasons I have indicated that this is the time to discuss individual items of the tariff which will of necessity have to be dealt with in the negotiations, and much less would it be the part of wisdom for the Minister of Finance to enter even a partial discussion a few days or weeks prior to bringing down the budget when all these matters will have to be dealt with.

I hope my hon. friend will accept my assurance that I yield to no one, not even to him, in a very earnest desire that we may effect a lasting and favourable trade agreement with the United States which will be mutually advantageous to the people of both countries. But in order to achieve that we cannot improve our position by muddying the waters in advance, and in using that simile I hope no offence will be taken because none is meant.

In these circumstances, inasmuch as my hon. friend's resolution is the same precisely in principle as that moved by my hon. friend from West Edmonton, I hope for the reasons which I indicated at that time that my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough will not bring me to the necessity of moving the amendment which I did upon that occasion, but with that magnanimity of spirit which he has asserted, and which at times he exhibits to the utmost degree, he will recognize that it is the part of wisdom and in the interests of all Canada not to proceed with this resolution at this time.

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): I do not think that the fishing industry in Canada has received from this parliament that consideration to which it is entitled. For quite a long time we have had only an acting minister, and in the last ten years we have had fishing problems never known to this country before. We have not a minister devoting his time and attention exclusively to this growing industry, but only acting ministers, and we cannot expect to get the best results from acting ministers. We cannot expect them to study the fishing problem as closely as it should be studied by a minister who is charged with that office. I submit that the industry is important enough to have the exclusive services of a minister.

The mover of this resolution (Mr. Duff) has outlined the handicaps which the Canadian fishermen are working under, and I would bring to the attention of the government an item which is very vital to the modern fishing industry; I refer to the supply of gasoline, crude oil and lubricating oil. These things are absolutely necessary if Canadian fishermen are to compete successfully with the fishermen from the United States. We are also under the handicap of a duty of two cents per pound on fresh fish, and while I am not blaming the government because of this, I do hope that now they are negotiating with the United States that duty will be one of the questions which will be taken into consideration.

As the Minister of Finance has said, this is hardly the proper time to discuss these matters in detail. We have indicated to the government the handicaps under which the Canadian fishermen are working, and I would move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

LAND SETTLEMENT

FIVE YEAR PLAN TO ENCOURAGE AND ASSIST RURAL POPULATION IN FARMING

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government should take into immediate consideration the establishment of a five-year plan for settlement on the land of the young farmers of this country.

He said: I greatly appreciate this opportunity to discuss the basic industry of this country, namely, agriculture, and I think I am justified in taking a few minutes to point out the importance of the proposal I am making. At the beginning of my remarks I might quote that old maxim, that the source of a nation's vitality is in its rural population and that the foundation of its prosperity is its agriculture. In the last hundred years we have seen the industrial state superimposed on agriculture, and there is no doubt whatever that the condition that has resulted has created a burden of responsibilites and taxes which is weighing heavily on the agricultural classes.

I wish to point out some of the phases of the problem facing our rural population and to suggest what in my opinion is the way to solve that problem. The basic industry of all civilized countries is agriculture—such countries as France, the United States, Japan and Russia, and I will not omit England, although England is highly industrialized. But generally speaking the basic industries and wealth of these countries are farming and forest activities. Even in England we have witnessed an agricultural revolution in the last three years. Under the dynamic leadership of the Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Mr. Elliott, Great Britain is trying now to make herself almost self-supporting in regard to agriculture. Whether this is due to the trade agreements adopted in 1932 or whether it is the result of the industrialization of all the civilized countries, I am not prepared to discuss at the moment. The fact remains however that to-day in this country we find ourselves in a situation similar to that which exists in other countries. We are faced with an agricultural problem, and I wish to discuss some phases of that problem.

First of all I would make it clear that not only has the industrial state always to some extent superimposed itself upon agriculture, but governments, whether local or central, have worked to the detriment of the agricultural class. In this country we have on the one side the great industries and on the other the basic industry of agriculture, and though we have not had severe convulsions, we have witnessed a conflict in Canada between the agrarian class and the industrial, so much so that sometimes the conflict has been expressed in party lines. Only a few years ago we had the spectacle in this House of Commons of a very strong agrarian party, which had its rise in the feeling of the farmers, a feeling which they still have, that they were not receiving from the legislative assemblies and from the central government that attention which their problems deserved. And we have the same spectacle to-day. Quite often in the discussions that take place here we have sensed a certain conflict between the two classes. We can see in the far corner the attempt to unify parties under C.C.F.'ism, when my hon. friends try to reconcile the interests of the agrarian and the working classes and they find it impossible to do so.

I think the house must realize that in the industrial development that has taken place, in the mechanization of industry everywhere and in Canada as well, there has been laid on the shoulders of the farmers an added burden. When the present government came into office in 1930 they realized at once, as others had realized in the past, that the even balance between the urban and the rural population had been lost, and that is why we have seen inaugurated by the government the so-called back to the land movement. I am going to be outspoken in regard to that scheme, speaking from the point of view of a man who knows something about farming. During the war the appeals made to men were coloured by patriotic feeling; but to-day there is not very much poetry in the life of the farmer, the man who is trying to make a living out of the soil. We must be sensible, logical and practical in dealing with the problem; for the farmer does not live an arcadian life. For generations the agricultural class has been trying to get a living out of the soil; but generation after generation we have seen all governments working more and more into the hands of the industrial state. We see this in the banking system, in connection with social questions, credit questions, the tariff and all the modern social activities converging towards one end, and working more and more, as I say, into the hands of the highly industrialized state.

It is true that during the present session there has been mention in the speech from the throne of the Natural Products Marketing Act. That was perhaps a debatable matter and perhaps it may prove beneficial to the farmers as a whole.

The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was also mentioned. This is to some extent a step toward a solution of the problem, but from the discussion yesterday and on previous occasions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, I am sure everyone will realize that that measure, although I am and I believe Canada as a whole is in favour of the principle of it, will without doubt prove an added burden to the rural population without any expectation on their part to receive any benefits from it. I was rather astounded a few days ago when the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) said that the employers in industry tried to help their employees while the farmers at this time were trying to get cheap labour on their farms. It is all they can afford to pay their help; they have not the means with which to pay high wages to labourers to help them to till their soil, although they would like to do so.

To come to the back to the land movement, I maintained in the fall of 1930 and again in the year 1931 that unless the central government found it possible to spend large sums of money to make that scheme a real success, it was bound to fail, because in those days the government was claiming that the scheme was a success even if they did not spend a single dollar in placing people back on the land. Since then they have found it possible to make a tripartite arrangement comprising the municipalities, the province and the dominion, each party advancing $200, making a total of $600 per family to take the unemployed from the urban centres and place them on the land. At that time I maintained that even if the scheme were not a complete failure, it would certainly not rectify the unemployment situation. Now, after four years of application of this scheme, I must state that it has not proved a solution of the present unemployment situation in the urban centres, for three simple reasons: first, under that scheme the urban centres tried to unload some of their responsibility on to the rural districts; second, there was no access to the people who were best qualified to take action under the scheme to get some of the land simply because the municipal organization or people in the unorganized rural districts could not claim any of the money under the back to the land movement; third, it was a recognized fact that there was unemployment in every section of the country and when you have unemployment in the cities, naturally you have unemployment in the rural sections. What happened under the scheme was that those in charge were left to their own initiative to find settlers and tne rural population had no access to the back to the land money. The government must find it possible to generalize the idea and not to attach too many strings to it. They have been taking people who have left rural occupations for ten or twenty years, who are in many cases now advanced in years, and are trying to put them back into farming. Such a scheme is bound to fail. I have seen in my section many fine men and women, splendid types of Canadian citizens, trying to carry out the scheme, but I have received visits from tens and hundreds of men; I have visited most of those settlements in northern Ontario and I an convinced that as soon as the industrial situation in the urban centres is rectified quite a number of these people will flock back to the occupations they had in the past. In the meantime, the population best qualified and equipped to take advantage of the scheme has been left severely alone.

In the past we have had many different schemes of colonization and I have before me at present a circular letter from Brigadier General Hornby. I admire his activities, but I say to the house that it is no use for him to try to bring rural immigration into Canada. There is no room for such immigration and we need not fool ourselves in that connection. When I was sitting on the government side of this house some years ago I told the then ministry that it was an anomaly to bring people from Europe and try to put them into agricultural occupations. That situation applies more forcibly to-day than it did then. It is absurd to bring people from the old country and place them on the land under government supervision and on government money, while the rural population, the one that is best qualified, the one that has made farming a profession, the one that is fully equipped to carry on this occupation, is neglected. They should be given the protection and support they deserve.

I want to make my position on this point quite clear, Canada at the present time does not want any new rural immigration. It is fine sometimes to be idealists and to speak in terms of having 100,000,000 people in this country; but we must be realists; we must realize that new centres of population, so far as agriculture is concerned, are pushing back the available land not south, but north, thus meeting certain harder climatic conditions, for instance in the matter of early frosts. This applies not only to northern Quebec or northern Ontario but to British Columbia and the western provinces. I am making a very fervent plea because I speak from experience on this important question. It is absolutely no use at the present time to bring large numbers of people from Europe or even Great Britain and try to place them on the land. What will happen will be the same as occurred five or ten years ago; these people at the first opportunity will flock back to the urban centres. Such a situation should be avoided. I can remember very vividly a year after the war when with the very best intentions and with the close cooperation of the Ontario and federal governments we had the so-called colonization scheme in Kapuskasing. Settlers were placed there, the finest agricultural section in the country, under the guidance and supervision of both governments. They built homes and cleared some land on some of the richest soil there is in Canada. Returned soldiers, mostly from Canada and some from Great Britain went there with the best intentions; they wanted to devote themselves to farming in our section of the country. But what happened? Within only three years at the most, ninety-five per cent of them had gone away, showing that a great proportion of those people were not fitted for, not acclimatized to agricultural pursuits. Such schemes are bound to fail.

That is the reason why I would urge the government to turn their vision, their activities, to something better in the back to the land movement. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), under whose department the back to the land movement is, is not in his seat at the moment, but I know he is willing to listen to suggestions that will work towards a solution of the problem presently facing us. He is also familiar with the fact that that scheme cannot be practicable any longer; we have had experience with it. I remember also only seven years ago, when the Hon. Mr. Finlayson was a minister in the Ontario cabinet, he tried to take some people from the older sections of Ontario where the soil was unsuitable for cultivation and bring them to northern Ontario where the soil was better fitted for agriculture. Most of those people after one or two years left, because they were unused to their new surroundings. The same situation exists at the present time under the back to the land movement. We are studying agriculture from all angles and the same spectacle that was seen in the last hundred years, if not prior to that, will be seen in the future unless we treat the agricultural problem in a rational manner.

To-day what picture do we see so far as the rural population is concerned? We find in most of the agricultural sections of Canada the young sons of the farmers cannot get into their natural occupation, not having the means to establish themselves on the land. Agriculture is more than a profession, a craft; it is an art. A man must love the soil and be fitted to cultivate it, and he must be willing to make a certain amount of sacrifice, because notwithstanding all that may be done for the agricultural class they are bound to have to sacrifice more than other members of the social order. That is why I ask the government to let my resolution go before the agriculture and colonization committee. This is the scheme I have in view; I know it will involve a substantial expenditure, but I want the government to realize that the present unemployment insurance scheme will involve an expenditure of some six or seven million dollars a year for administration purposes only, from which, I repeat, the farmers will not get any direct benefit. They may get some indirectly through the increased buying power of the working class, but no one will deny the statement that the unemployment insurance act will be of no direct benefit to the farmer. I want the government to spend the sum of $20,000,000 in the course of the next five or ten years in placing on the land 20,000 young Canadians. I am basing my figures on these studies; the natural increase in population in Canada is 12 per thousand annually. Out of a total population of 10,700,000 people the natural increase will be 130,000 annually. If you take the division between urban and rural as 50 per cent that gives 65,000 born every year in the rural centres. Then if you take the division between the sexes as fifty-fifty you have 32,500 boys born every year in the rural centres. I believe I know enough of the rural situation to prophesy that if the government found it possible to promise to place on the land—crown land or otherwise—18,000 to 20,000 of these young people between the ages of 16 and 22, who are sons of farmers and whose natural occupation would be farming, and to give them a sum of $1,000 in five payments of $200 a year, requiring them to fulfil provincial regulations as to clearing a minimum of twelve acres in the first three years and building a house of standard size, we should find there the solution of our problems for which we have been looking for so long. Unless something drastic is done to preserve that fine, rural population it will be absolutely impossible for the government to solve the unemployment problem. What will the present unemployment insurance legislation do? It will simply accentuate the drift from the farms and rural centres to the towns and cities. What will happen to our young boys when they come out of the public and high schools and colleges? Those who at present are residing on farms will visualize the actual situation, the grind they will have to go through if they remain in rural occupations. They will realize that legislators are always working to increase the comfort and social advantages of the city population, and those young men and young women will yield to the superior attraction of the towns and cities and will thereby accentuate more and more the lack of balance between urban and rural populations. This scheme would apply to every province.

I know the house fully realizes the seriousness of this situation. I have some of my nephews in northern Ontario, and I know how it appeals to them. Under the present order not one in ten will remain in rural occupations, because our social legislation simply tends more and more to give leisure, comfort and security to the town populations. But we have in Canada the descendants of those who pioneered this country, and who have the same spirit as their ancestors. We have the descendants of the United Empire Loyalists who colonized Ontario and the shore of the St. Lawrence, and the new-comers, and all that the majority of the sons of these people want is a chance to remain in their natural occupation, the occupation their ancestors had; but under the present conditions they find it almost impossible to continue to follow the calling of their fathers. I sincerely believe that if my resolution is given a chance to go before the agriculture committee some rectification of that abnormal situation will be found. The rural population has the same right to comfort and happiness and good living conditions as any other section. The young farmer has the same right to live as a real Canadian as any other section of the population. In considering this problem we must never forget the fact that once people from the rural areas become established in the cities you cannot get them to go back. Can you visualize the sons of farmers who become civil servants, for example, thinking of going back to farming as an occupation? Can you visualize the sons and daughters of professional men taking to farming as an occupation? There is no comeback from the cities to the farms. Unless farming can be made interesting for those young people who have the natural inclination for it we shall not find a solution of our present problems. It must be remembered that the young farmer knows in his early years that if he stays on the farm he will never become wealthy, his name will never be known in his own land; but he does think, in most cases wrongly, that if he goes to the cities he may get riches, and his name become known. There is that great temptation for the rural population to find its way to the cities. I have no quarrel with the industrial state, but there should be closer cooperation between the two parts of the population. Surely we cannot expect to see prosperity back in our midst and a contented and satisfied population unless we make it possible for all sections of the population to be prosperous. We have all read with interest of the great experiment of Russia in her five year plan, trying in five years to industrialize a highly rural population. What happened? Those plans almost failed. Why? Because they forgot one factor, they forgot that agriculture is working with nature and Providence. I venture to prophesy that if Russia does attain to high industrialization it will mean her doom, for we realize to-day that industrialization alone is not sufficient. We have to-day the habitant in some parts and we have farmers in the rest of the country who within the next twenty years, if present tendencies continue, will become a peasant class. Under our present educational system to be called a farmer is in the minds of many almost an ignominy. It is hard sometimes for the son of a farmer to find a wife, just because he is a farmer. Our educational system is at fault in that respect. Canada must necessarily remain primarily an agricultural country and we must preserve that fine population which produces the basic wealth of this country. But you have a new school of thought in this country. Last fall I read an article in Saturday Night which said that Canada was at the crossroads; that it would be much better for the farmers to fold their tents and go back into the cities; that Canada had to cease being an agricultural country, and that its future lay in industrialization. Can any member visualize what would happen to our country within ten or twenty years if such a thing happened to our agricultural population? It would be the doom of our country. Take the history of the past; once agriculture is neglected the country fails. That was true in Persia, Rome and Greece of old; the moment those nations neglected agriculture they reached the end of their civilization. The same problem exists at the present time in almost every country in the world; every country that neglected agriculture is paying the price.

I do not want to speak at any greater length on this important subject, although I will refer to it again when the back to the land movement is under discussion. Again let me say that the back to the land movement, which was inaugurated in all sincerity in an attempt to solve this important question, has practically failed to relieve the situation. Certainly it has not solved the difficulty so far as the equilibrium in population is concerned, and it has done very little to relieve the urban centres. That back to the land movement has not played the game with the population best qualified to remain on the land, and I ask the government to let this resolution go to the committee on agriculture and colonization, where it may be discussed in detail. We want to be fair. In connection with this resolution I ask for the expenditure of $20,000,000 over a period of five or ten years. During this session we will pass one measure, the administration of which will involve the expenditure of $7,000,000, in order to help the workingmen of this country. The farmers have no quarrel with the workingmen; they would be quite satisfied to see the workers better looked after under the new act, but surely the rest of the population should be willing to give a certain amount of relief and attention to those engaged in agriculture, who are ready to play the game with this country.

In conclusion let me say that unless we find it possible to implement this resolution, in part in least, we will not have prosperity in this country. There is no need for conflict between industry and agriculture; rather there is need for the closest possible cooperation between the two, because the happiness and prosperity of all the people are absolutely bound up with the application of this fundamental formula. The agricultural class appreciates the problems of the other sections of the population, but does that class in turn receive the same consideration of its problems? We hear of new deals and new orders of things. Many times these expressions are simply catchwords, sometimes used to blind the vision to reality. We must come to the crux of our problem; no class can prosper to the detriment of another class, and if by our study, our legislation and our effort we can restore prosperity to the primary producers, the farmers, then and only then will the prosperity of the whole country be assured.

Mr. EUSEBE ROBERGE (Megantic) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, the resolution now before us has for its object to help farmers' sons to establish themselves on the land, and it provides for a five year plan. I have on the order paper a similar resolution, but providing for a three year plan. My resolution reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government should study immediately the question of amending the Unemployment Relief Act, in such a way as to enable the Minister of Labour to accept the Vautrin plan in extending the same privileges to the family heads who establish their sons on abandoned farms.

This resolution being pretty far down on the order paper, I shall probably not have the opportunity of discussing it this year. I therefore take the present occasion to offer the observations I would have made in presenting my own motion.

Mr. Chairman, we have in the province of Quebec an act that provides for assistance to the farmer wishing to establish his son on an abandoned farm or on other land purchased by him. This act, which has been in force for three years, has given good results. For the first and second years, the government limited the grant to $300 to ten persons in each county. During the two first years, almost every county in the province of Quebec took advantage of the act, and, in the third year, the grant was made to twenty persons per county.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Last year, as Megantic county was without representation in the Quebec legislature, owing to the appointment of my colleague Mr. Lauréat Lapierre to the post of sheriff of the district of Quebec, all applications from farmers came to me, although I was not in charge of patronage, and I forwarded them to the hon. Minister of Colonization. The popularity of the measure is shown by the fact that in the course of the year I received fifty applications, of which forty came from industrious people and were considered worthy.

Last autumn, the Vautrin plan was approved by the large convention held at Quebec and attended by hundreds of persons who had assembled to discuss the advantages of a colonization plan. The provincial government then raised to ten million dollars its grant for the establishment of farmers' sons and of unemployed men on farms or colonization lots. The limitation of twenty grants per county, fixed by the first act and in force since one year, was withdrawn and to-day the Quebec government makes the grant to any head of a family who wishes to purchase a farm for his sons, providing the farm be registered in the name of the son, that the latter settle upon it and that he be a bona fide farmer.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if the federal government contributed an equal amount to this plan, it would be much more advantageous, in many cases, than to send farmers' sons out to new land far removed from their families. To establish a son in the same parish as his father would cost much less, for many reasons. The first reason is that the son could use all his father's farm machinery. Secondly, he could borrow, during the first year, his father's horses to do his ploughing, seeding and other heavy work. That would make it unnecessary for him to buy farm machinery and would allow him to use his income to purchase a certain number of head of cattle which would make it possible for him to earn his living on his farm from the first year. The third advantage would be to put back into operation the abandoned farms that dot our beautiful Quebec parishes, while making it possible for the sons of farmers to remain near their families. To-day, thanks to improved farming methods, the farmers of the old parishes of the province do not need so much land as formerly. Dwelling in an agricultural county, I am in a position to state that in my own parish, farmers obtain from the same amount of land twice the crop they harvested twenty years ago. My parish, like all the others of my county, still has unoccupied farms.

It is for all these reasons that I urge the federal government to do its share and to contribute as much as the Quebec government towards helping fathers of families to purchase land for one of their sons. With this $300 grant, you will immediately find that farms will sell and that farmers sons, instead of leaving home, will in most cases remain in their respective counties, where they will be much happier near their relatives and friends than they would be in distant colonization districts.

I do not object to the grant the federal government makes to farmers sons settling on colonization lots, but I believe that the scheme I have just submitted deserves to be encouraged as well. For this reason, I ask the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon)—who also administers the Unemployment Relief Act—to have the act amended in such a way as to grant to fathers who wish to establish their sons on farms in our old parishes an amount equal to that granted by the Quebec government. I am convinced that once this scheme is put in operation, our abandoned farms will be occupied once more, farmers sons will settle upon them permanently, the federal and provincial governments will find that it costs less to establish these young men on farms that will provide them with a living from the first year, and that they will have to make only one grant. I repeat that this scheme will be less costly to our governments, for if you establish these young men in colonization districts, you will have to grant them each year ploughing and clearing bounties and even direct relief. There will be everything to build: roads, schools, churches; whereas, in our old parishes all that has already been done.

In my opinion, that would be one of the finest things the government could do to assist the farmers of our province.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of taking up any considerable time, and I can assure hon. members my observations will be very brief. I speak more for the purpose of receiving enlightenment than that of offering any suggestions.

In an able speech the hon. member who sponsors the resolution (Mr. Bradette) gave credit to this government for the many measures it has passed and is now passing which will have the effect of helping the farmers. In addition to the reforms he mentioned he could have mentioned many more. In my view the important point to decide is as to the responsibility shared by the federal and provincial governments, a point which should be determined so that the position of those governments may not be in doubt, and so that calls for grants may not be made upon governments not responsible for such grants.

The hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) holds the view that this government should create new centres of colonization. I had to ask myself the question: How could the federal government create new centres of colonization when in fact it has no land which could be used for that purpose?

An hon. MEMBER: There is plenty of land.

Mr. GOBEIL: There may be some in the west, but none of it belongs to the federal government. All the lands which could be used for colonization purposes belong to the provinces. I would ask every hon. member to answer this question, regardless of party politics: How could the federal government create centres of colonization? If the federal authorities voted money for the purposes the hon. member has mentioned, undoubtedly those moneys would have to be spent by provincial agencies. How could the federal government expect to have coordination or any degree of cooperation when it had to deal with the nine provinces? Human nature being what it is, I believe it is fair to say that a federal government, formed of any political party would not receive the cooperation necessary to carry out a scheme such as has been described. To-day we have in the federal sphere a Conservative government; in the past we have had and again in the future we may have Liberal government. The experience has been the same in each province, and in the light of that fact I believe it is fair to state that no government, whether it be Liberal or Conservative, could expect frank or sincere cooperation from a provincial government that would not be of the same political faith.

I should like some politician or statesman who has had more experience than I have in these matters to answer this question: Whose function is it to colonize our country? Is it the function of the federal government or of the provincial governments? Had colonization been a duty of the federal government it appears to me that the colonization lands would have remained the property of that government. As long as those lands are the property of the provincial governments, it seems to me that the provinces should shoulder the task of colonization for the advantage of settlers.

The hon. member has said he would like to have $20,000,000 spent in the promotion of his scheme. The legislature of the province of Quebec is about to pass a law under which they will spend $10,000,000. If those moneys are well spent—and I trust they will be—the results should be beneficial. However, that is only one province, and there are nine in the dominion. If each province spent a similar amount, on a per capita basis, there would be an expenditure of at least $50,000,000, undoubtedly hon. members will say the federal government should do its share, but in reply I would repeat the question: Is it the function of the federal government to colonize? There are many channels through which the moneys in the federal treasury may flow, and in fact large amounts of those moneys are now being spent for the benefit of the provinces, under the Gordon plan, or the back to the land movement. The federal government is paying subsidies to all the provinces, and it seems to me that some of the money might well be used by the provinces, for purposes of colonization.

I have not very much more to say. If I had any intention of speaking on this question from a political angle I could say a lot more, and the temptation is very great, to say the least, but I shall not do so because I wish to refrain from discussing the subject from a political angle.

It is important that those who have more knowledge of the purposes and jurisdictions of the different governments in this country should try to clear up this matter so that the citizens of the different provinces may be fully seized of the question and know who is to spend the money to settle on the farms our young Canadian boys and girls. I think that is of vital importance, not only from the point of view of its immediate effects, but so that our citizens may understand clearly where to apply when they want to approach their governments, whether federal or provincial.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I was very much impressed with the resolution of the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette). I was not quite sure when he was speaking whether he wanted to rehabilitate upon some other farms the boys who are already on the farm, or to get the boys who have left the farms for the urban centres to go back to the farms. He shakes his head at the latter suggestion.

I agree with this resolution, Mr. Speaker, and not only with what my hon. friend has said as to helping the boys who are already on the farm; I would go a step further and extend help to our boys and girls who have left the farm to try and earn a livelihood in the urban centres. I am in favour of helping to reestablish them on the farm.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gobeil) said that there would be difficulty in getting the cooperation of the provinces in this matter. As I remember immigration in the past, the government had no difficulty in getting the cooperation of the provinces in bringing immigrants from the old country; and surely if the government found no difficulty in getting their cooperation in bringing men to this country from outside of Canada there can be no reason to expect any difficulty in getting the cooperation of the provinces in rehabilitating Canadian boys on the farm.

If it had not been for the fact that I have received many letters from boys in my province asking me whether there is any scheme to help the boys get established who are already on the farm, I might not have taken any part in this discussion. The government has accepted the resolution of my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Church) with reference to a housing scheme and has appointed a committee to go into that matter. Now if the government can launch upon a housing scheme to help people in the cities there is no reason why we cannot launch upon a scheme to help the young men on the farms.

As to bringing young men from other countries to Canada who have had no previous experience in agriculture, and placing them on farms at government expense, I am in agreement with the hon. member for North Timiskaming that we should rather help first those who are already settled in Canada, the sons of our own Canadian farmers, before we help the sons of farmers who do not reside in Canada and are not citizens of this country. I think a scheme of that kind bringing in people from outside this country would not be sound, in the first place, and secondly I could not support it because it would be discriminating against the boys and girls who now live in Canada and who likewise would like to be placed on farms. If I remember correctly, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) in discussing the immigration problem last year, spoke of the many university students from the rural districts who are seeking to be placed in some occupation but who because of the depression are finding it very hard to get into any of the professions, so the only thing that is left for many of them is to be placed on the farm. There are many hundreds, I would say thousands, of these boys in the country at the present time. Why can we not do something to establish these boys on the farms of Canada?

My plea is on behalf of that large number of well trained boys who have lived on the farm all their lives and who now either have no land of their own or else, having it, find the overhead too much to carry and wish to move to newer and less overtaxed districts. As I have said, I have received letters from many parts of Alberta asking me if there is any scheme to help to place Canadians on the farm. If I were to make a synopsis of what these young men have to say, it would be something like this: Before the depression set in the fathers of some of them had made payments on their land, very good land in many cases. They had become established there, but notwithstanding their ability and great economy they had not been able to bear the disproportion between the low prices and the cost of living and burden of taxation, and so had decided to pull out to newer districts such as the Peace River, where homesteads are available and the taxation is lower. These young men and women could go if they could get some help from the government. I know hundreds, yes thousands, of young men who are very much in the same predicament. Imagine how these young men in Canada would feel if they were refused help and boys from outside the country were assisted in the matter of being placed on Canadian farms. It would tend to bring about communism in this country. I think the duty of this government is to help our own citizens before we think of helping others outside. If boys were brought in from outside they would have to be trained and we should have to pay for their training, and even after they had been through some process of artificial education I cannot agree with those who say that they would even then make as good farmers as our own Canadian boys who have been brought up on the farm. The thing is impossible. No boy can make as good a farmer as the boy who has been raised on the farm. There are many families on the farm in this country with six or seven or eight or ten or twelve children, but these young people cannot get established. They cannot buy land contiguous to that of their parents because it costs too much, the taxes are too high; and the only place to which they can go is the newer regions such as Peace River where there is plenty of homestead land. But even that is difficult for these young men because they have not the money to make a start. If the government would only do something to give these young men a start I have no doubt they would make good farmers and would not become a burden upon the taxpayers.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say I am in agreement with the principle of the resolution, and I think the hon. member for North Timiskaming is to be congratulated on bringing it to the attention of the house.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): I have received many letters from young men who are anxious to get a little assistance to start in farming. I think we all agree that farming is the oldest occupation of mankind; all down through the ages it has been the chief occupation of the race, and I certainly think that if assistance is to be given any class of people in the country it should be given to the boys and girls, the sons and daughters of the pioneers, to help them to be self-supporting and to become established.

In the district in which I live there are a great many of these young people who would like to become established and to start up in their immediate localities, and I think that is an important factor that should be kept in mind. They know something of the nature of the soil and of the difficulties to be overcome, and they are in a much better position to fight successfully against the elements, the disasters which are so common in the farming life, than are people who come from distant parts of the country.

We realize that there is a surplus of wheat, of cattle and so on. But many of these people who have been brought up on farms would not go in for mining the land but for making homes; they would go in for mixed farming and would try to provide for themselves nearly all the necessities of life so that they would not add greatly to the surplus and would be at least self-supporting. Surely the people of the country owe something to the young men and women; they owe them the opportunity of fitting themselves for the business or industrial life of the country. It seems to me therefore that steps along this line will help in that direction.

I have in mind the idea of the younger people settling in homes near the places of their birth so that community centres could be established. They would be close together and would be in a position to make use of the churches, the schools, the roads and so on, and medical and hospital attention would be accessible to them as required. In Alberta people have gone to distant districts and located on homesteads, and when they have been stricken in sickness they have cost the province many hundreds of dollars getting them down to some place where they can get relief. They have gone beyond the districts where utilities, roads, schools, bridges and so forth have been established and in that way have put the province to a great deal of expense. I do think that if community centres could be established, if the people born in the district could be helped to establish homes for themselves there, the social life of the farm would be made much more attractive and a great deal would be added to the contentment and happiness of the people who are trying to make a living at this occupation.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I desire to go on record as being entirely in support of the resolution of the hon. member who has proposed it (Mr. Bradette). I know that a great many members of this house do not agree with the sentiment, and a good many of those who are themselves established in agriculture feel that an endeavour of this kind would be futile. But I would say for myself that back in the early stages of this depression, when factories were closing their doors all over the country and businesses were going to the wall, men and women being released into the ranks of the unemployed in hundreds and thousands, I was one of the early ones in the house to advocate a back to the land movement. I felt then, as I feel now, that it is the only movement that offers any remedy, immediate or permanent. We all hope that in the course of months or years, as the depression subsides in some degree, industry in all its branches will be going fully again and our unemployed will be to a large extent absorbed. But certainly it is very much better to have a family residing in the country than idling in the city. You cannot grow potatoes or cabbages on a boulevard; you cannot raise poultry or pigs in the city. But when you have established a family on the land, at least they have cheap shelter and as a rule they can obtain fuel and water; and with a little endeavour they can manage to have milk, eggs and poultry and whatnot without much expense to the state, all of which things have to be paid for one hundred per cent for those families that remain in the city.

I may be right or wrong, but as the matter presents itself to me I believe we shall always have extensive unemployment. It seems that as the years go by manufacturing and other urban industries are releasing more and more men all the time. How they will ever be taken up I have never been able to guess; I have not the remotest idea what we shall ever do with them, because as improvements are made in manufacturing machinery more and more men will be released. We abhor the idea of a peasantry, but this much we must say, that in the days of the peasantry the country was filled with peasants who managed to live and did not demand relief from governments. I think it is fortunate that we have the land, because I believe the time is coming when there will be hundreds of thousands of people back on the land. The advantage we have over the older countries at present is that they have their hundreds of thousands of unemployed, not knowing what to do with them; they have no land to settle them on and no industries that can engage them. In this country we have the land and we hope that the people can go back to it and make a living out of it.

I readily appreciate the fact that the resolution as proposed is on a very much grander scale. It contemplates the expenditure of some $20,000,000, proposing to start each individual off with $1,000. It is rather a large order to think of at the present time, but I sincerely hope that the time will come when it will be easy for the government to engage in such an enterprise. In the interim we in Canada have acres upon acres, sections upon sections of excellent land on which we can establish families, and all the cities are brimming over with bona fide agriculturists who are ready to go back to the land. I do not think we should wait for the time when we shall be able to give them $1,000. I think we had better send a lot of them back and give them what backing we can. It is true that in some parts of Canada the movement has not been a success, but on the other hand, in Manitoba we have established some 300 to 350 families on the land and I believe ninety per cent of the movement in that province has been a success. Most of them are doing well; most of them have taken the movement seriously and have no desire to return to the cities.

I do not know that I have much more to say, but in reply to the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), who was wondering whether it was the business of the federal government to reestablish families or individuals on the land, I think he knows in the matter of the soldier settlement scheme alone the federal government already has an arrangement with the provinces by which men are sent back to the land. Hundreds of families have gone back to the land under this scheme, and when the time arrives there will be no difficulty in the way of this parliament, if it so desires, making an arrangement with any or all of the provinces so as to send unemployed people back to the land.

I sincerely hope the good work which has been commenced will be continued and the wide open spaces which we have for hundreds, if not thousands, of miles in this Canada of ours, will some day be occupied in the profitable manner in which they can be occupied, by having people return to the land.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the sentiments expressed by those who have been participating in this debate. It seems to me that this is another illustration of what I choose to call "swivel chair farmers" advising the farmers. What do we find? We find that the mover of the resolution (Mr. Bradette) is a merchant lawyer. The next speaker is a school teacher; the next, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), a doctor and the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden), another doctor, all probably viewing this question not from their particular professional standpoint, but from the great national point of view. I propose to approach the problem from an entirely different angle; being one of those honest dirt farmers, I propose to deal with the motion as I see it from the farmers' standpoint. Why is a resolution of this character necessary?

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the government should take into immediate consideration the establishment of a five-year plan for settlement on the land of the young farmers of this country.

We admit in that motion that the farm is not attractive enough to keep on it even those who are raised there and we propose to make it a little more attractive. All legislation to-day tends to induce people to leave the farm. All one has to do to realize this is to look through the order paper. For instance, the reform legislation all tends to make the urban centre just a little bit more attractive for all the population of Canada and until you make the farm pleasanter to retain those who are born there, you will always have to deal with this problem.

During the years I have been in Ottawa I have been privileged to visit Montreal and Toronto, and it is amazing to me to find that the great executives of all the large corporations are boys off the farm. In the early years when I was first in the house, when the Manufacturers' Association used to give us little excursions out into various portions of Quebec and Ontario, we invariably found that the men who were and who are to-day the executives of those large businesses were all boys off the farm. The same problem as exists to-day existed then. The farm is not attractive enough for them. What do we find? We find those men who were raised on the farm are to-day advising their sons that the only place to go is back on the land. I was raised in a large industrial centre and I was engaged in industry until I attained the age of twenty-three years. I came on to the farm and for the last, well, twenty-nine years, I have got a living off it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And stayed there.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes. I was rather disappointed when I heard the hon. member for St. Boniface talk about the glorious days when we had a contented peasantry. If one reads the history of agriculture in those countries where they had a contented peasantry, why were they contented? It was simply because they were ignorant. You will not find in any country a contented peasantry where there are the educational standards we have on this continent or even in the British isles. It is education that has created this situation. What is needed now to bring people back to the farm is education, but along a different line. I am in favour of a scheme such as is suggested if it can be worked out, but not only should we do this but we should utilize the facilities we have now under the control of the federal parliament to encourage the boys to stay on the farm. The other night when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) was on his estimates dealing with experimental farms, I suggested that we were not utilizing those institutions to the best advantage. We should take the boys my hon. friend has in mind in bringing down this resolution and give them short courses of instruction in live stock, cereals and other branches of farming. This would make agriculture more attractive and give the boys a better understanding of it. I hope I never live to see and I hope Canada never sees a contented peasantry as it has been known to exist in the past. I would be loath to think Canada would ever have that type of agricultural situation.

Everyone agrees that the day of farming on a large scale is over, and those who are engaged in it realize this. They know the thousands and thousands of acres that have been formerly run as a unit cannot be economically run to-day. Strange as it may seem, when one makes a review of conditions in western Canada one finds so far as farming is concerned that the man contented to stay on his 160 acres of a homestead is to-day, as we say in the argot of the west, at the top of the pile. But the fellow who has been farming thousands of acres now finds himself making application under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. You do not find any farmer with 160 acres making application under that act or to the farm loan board, and this proves that the large farm is not economical to run and is not a sound basis for agriculture. As one who has lived twenty-nine years in western Canada I have come to the conclusion that the day of the big farm is past.

Various schemes have been suggested; the Hornby plan was brought up to-day and I heard the sentiment expressed that those people should not be permitted to come to this country. I think that is a mistake; the Hornby plan should be accepted. I would remind the house, especially hon. members who come from western Canada, that when they look over the west they will find some of the leading, some of the best, agriculturists were not farmers in the old land. Under the Hornby plan it is proposed to take these people on approbation as it were, for a given period of years. If they are not fitted for farming and are not able to carry on without becoming a public charge they go back. One trouble we have had with all British immigration—and I speak as an immigrant—is that immigrants coming from almost any other country in Europe except Great Britain always find some organization to take them by the hand, but I at any rate never found any organization doing anything like that for the Britisher when he came to this country. He has been left to fend for himself. If we are to encourage British immigration it is time that some scheme such as that of General Hornby should be adopted. We can no longer allow promiscuous immigration.

As far as the present resolution is concerned I think it is good. I am faced with this problem right in my own home; I have two boys, and it would be useless to give either of them a farm. To give them $1,000 and set them up on a farm would probably be a mistake, you would be likely to find them in Montreal or Toronto some day. Man's natural occupation is the land, but those of us who stay with the land do so because of a natural bent and love of the soil and farm animals. No matter what money you give to an individual to put him on the farm, if he does not love the land and the stock and all pertaining to farm life you might as well throw your money in the sea. If we are going to adopt this scheme we must educate these young farmers. As I walk along the street I am approached from time to time, as doubtless other hon. members are, by boys asking for two bits or ten cents to get a cup of coffee; this continues in spite of the camps we have set up for unemployed, homeless, single men. I have talked to many of them and I find that most of them were raised on the farm. As I have mentioned to my friend the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Totzke), if when I arrived in Canada conditions had been what they are to-day probably I would be one of these men. If we bring in the immigrant we must take care of him. If we adopt this resolution we must handpick those who are to come under it. Every boy raised on a farm is not a natural farmer, and I speak with some knowledge of the problem. I propose to give this resolution my support, with that proviso that the men are handpicked before the $1,000 or whatever sum it is to be is given to them.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): In considering a resolution of this kind we may well profit by the experience which the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities have had in connection with the land settlement scheme under which $600 per family was advanced, of which $200 was provided by each of the bodies I have named. I have here a statement from a recent issue of the Calgary paper, telling something of Calgary's experience with that plan. I am sure that the city of Calgary in choosing the families which were settled under this scheme took care to see that all of them had had farm experience, that they were not sending out green settlers. But this dispatch says:

> Whether or not the city of Calgary will continue to take part in the joint dominion-provincial farm settlement scheme in 1935 will depend upon action taken at the meeting of the relief committee of the city council this afternoon.
> The 1934 relief committee forwarded to the 1935 committee a resolution advising against further participation in the plan.
> A check-up of farm settlement reports to-day showed that of the 166 families who had been sent back to the land under the plan, 35 had returned to the city and the entire 166 of them were still on relief.

That is whether they were still on the farms or had returned to the city, they were still on relief.

Under the plan, second-year settlers are supposed to receive $100 per year as a subsistence grant. Last year this amount was found to be inadequate and the city was compelled to increase it slightly.

City officials stated to-day that the greatest drawback to the scheme was that the city has no guarantee that the farm settlers will ever get off relief. In the past it was shown that if the settlers could not get along on the amount they were receiving they merely abandon their farm, come back to the city and immediately apply for their regular relief allowance.

I am not saying that under the scheme proposed by the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) the majority of those placed would come back for relief, but I am citing this experience for the information of the house. I am sure that a good deal of care was exercised by the city of Calgary before any of these families were accepted for land settlement. I was told that by an alderman of the city, and was told by a department official of the provincial government in Edmonton that they would not accept any family unless they could prove that they had had a term of fairly successful experience on a farm previous to coming into the city. I believe it would be a splendid thing for Canada to get some of the unemployed in the cities back on the land, but I think they should be put on farms that are now occupied. There are roughly 700,000 farms in Canada. On the average I think I am safe in saying every one of those farms could make good use of the services of another man, but the farmers cannot afford to hire them. If a reasonable degree of prosperity were restored to the farmers I believe that at least one-quarter of them would hire a man, and in that way approximately 200,000 men now unemployed would go back on the farms to help the farmers who are now there. The farmer may be said to be employed to-day, but he has not what may be called an income. I know many farmers who are attempting to farm a whole section of land by their own efforts A man living not more than fifteen miles from me has farmed a section for the last three years without the help of a hired man. I know another case of a man who harvested 8,200 bushels two years ago with the help only of an eight year old boy; he could not afford to hire a man. The solution of the farm problem is to restore farm prices, restore the farmers' income, and when that is done most of these young men will find their way on to farms just in the natural order.

I am not going so far as to oppose this resolution, but I say that if such a scheme is adopted it needs to be handled very carefully and there is no use touching it at all unless a measure of prosperity is restored on the farms. The experience of the soldier settlement board shows that. What is needed is to restore farm prices, bring prosperity back to the farms, and then we shall not have to spend so much time talking about unemployment and farm settlement schemes and things of that nature.

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Acting Prime Minister): The subject which the hon. member for North Timiskaming (M. Bradette) has brought before the house is of great interest to us, and with many of the things which he said I fancy we all agree. He began by telling us that agriculture is the basic industry of this country. No one will deny that; we have all spoken about it in that way ever since I can remember; it admits of no dispute; it is an axiom. I am very glad to join with him in his ideas on that subject. But the house must not imagine that this government has neglected to consider the questions which affect the farm or the interests of the farmer. The hon. gentleman himself referred to the acts that have been passed by parliament since this government came into office for the purpose of assisting the farmers. We have the Farm Loan Act, now being amended and enlarged; we have the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the Natural Products Marketing Act and others, purely for the purpose of assisting the farmer to make arrangements in case he is in trouble, to get better prices for his products and to make farming a more pleasant occupation so that more people will stay on the land.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, this resolution raises a very large question, which has been referred to and discussed by two of the hon. members who have spoken already; that is, the growth of the cities. This is a world problem and a world condition. In the past fifty years Canada has witnessed an accelerated trend in the growth of our urban population in relation to the whole population. The urban population has grown from eighteen per cent to fifty-four per cent of the total, according to the 1931 census. I believe that is one of the great reasons for the depression and these difficulties we have had throughout the world. People have gone to the cities; they have been captured by the movies, the street cars, electric lights and all the comforts of the cities. As the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) well said, the young men do not care to stay on the land. There is no doubt that the captains of industry of this continent came from the farm, in large measure. They were born and brought up there, and they came to the cities with the strength and constitution given by the farm. They succeeded where city boys very likely would fail. But that is not only a Canadian problem; that applies to all the world. Some countries are very much worse off in that respect than we are; Australia is one such country, I believe, but in any case it cannot be called a healthy condition when over half the population of a country lives in the cities.

Some of the farmers of this country have had a very difficult time; all have a hard time, but I think I am safe in saying that on the whole the farmers have been better off during this depression than the people in the cities have been; I believe the farmers have come through in better shape. So far as I am concerned I should like to see anything done that will increase the number of people living on the farms not simply in order to raise some product for sale but in order to make a living from the land. There are no better people in the world than the farmers in the constituency that I have the honour to represent. They are the salt of the earth, and I believe any country would be better off with a larger proportion of the people actually living on the land for the purpose of raising what they need and in order to be self contained, through mixed farming, but I am not able to suggest how this can be brought about. The hon. member for South Battleford said that he did not know how to deal with that difficulty in connection with his own family. You are in difficulties when you come to the problem of how to meet the situation.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the problem raised by the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette) is really a question of unemployment relief, so far as the dominion government are concerned. Settlement of the land in the provinces surely is the duty of the provinces themselves, though as an unemployment relief measure this government have taken steps to assist the provinces in carrying on these so-called back to the land movements, and I repeat that everyone is strongly in favour of those movements which have for their purpose getting back as many people as possible to the land. When this government came into office there were three main immigration agencies, the federal Department of Immigration, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways. There were these three extensive colonization services, but steps were taken to bring them together. The presidents of the two railways were invited to Ottawa in the autumn of 1930, and arising out of that meeting a cooperative back to the land movement or colonization at home movement, as we term it, was instituted. That had for its object the settlement on the land of farmers with a background of practical farm experience and sufficient personal capital to enable at least a modest start to be made. Quite a large number of families went on the land under that arrangement; during the period from October, 1930, to the end of September, 1934, these three agencies were instrumental in settling 14,748 families on farms and in placing 32,603 single men in farm work. That was quite a good result through that method.

I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is not here to-day, because this comes under his department and he is far better able to speak about it than I am. The Minister of Labour representing the government—and the government as a whole, because this question has been discussed by us many times—has been extremely interested in any suggestions put forward by the provinces for getting people back on the land. We have had agreements with the provinces and have paid a portion of the cost under those agreements. Originally eight of the nine provinces entered into settlement agreements with the dominion government; the exception was Prince Edward Island, which really had no unemployment problem. These agreements were renewed this year with seven of the provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, for a further period of two years. So my hon. friend who brought up this question must remember that this government have done everything possible to assist in this movement, but settlement on the land is a provincial matter. This government can only consider it as an unemployment relief measure, and this government have so done.

I might digress for a moment to the question of whether or not these people stay on the land. One hon. member who spoke said the only ones who stayed on the land were those who loved the land. I think probably that was a fair statement, because in this world most of us try to do what we like to do. If a farmer does not like to live on the land, he will make an effort to change. Under one scheme 3,442 farmers went back to the land; 560 more settled, but abandoned their lands. In other words, out of about 4,000 families 560 did not remain on the farms.

I have in my hands a statement which for the information of hon. members I shall place on Hansard:

Relief land settlement (agreement—Dominion and provinces):

							Nova Scotia
Number of families settled	52	588	930	574	585	917	302	3,948

I place these figures on record simply to show that the results of the policy followed by the government have been at all events substantial. It will be noted that the first figures given are those which have arisen as a result of the colonization arrangements made between the railways and the government. Then later in the table are shown the figures which have arisen as a result of agreements between the dominion and the provinces.

As I said before, at the present time the government may act in this matter only in cooperation with the provinces, treating it as an unemployment relief measure. That is the plan which has been put forward by the Minister of Labour, the one which is in operation under the agreements as they exist, and which has been productive of at least substantial results.

The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) said—and I took down his words—"It is better for people to reside in the country than to remain idle in the cities." I entirely agree with that statement, and I believe it would have the approval of every hon. member. I repeat however that this problem is world wide. The question is: How may we stem the tide of people who desire to go to the cities rather than live in the country? During my lifetime life on the farm has been made more pleasant and more comfortable in many ways. Farm communities now enjoy rural mail delivery, rural telephone service, electric lighting and many other improvements. But despite this fact the drift to the cities continues, the glamour of the city still appeals to a great many people. This is a problem the world must face, and one which is common to Canada and all other countries. We must consider the element of human nature and decide how life in the country can be made so pleasant that people will prefer living on the land and raising their own food to living in the cities. That is the practice which has been followed by the habitants of the province of Quebec, and I claim—I know—there are no more contented or happier people than the habitants of that province.

I believe that is all I have to say. I repeat that I am sorry the Minister of Labour is not here, because he is thoroughly informed in matters of this kind. During the last four years he has had such matters under consideration, and could have explained the situation to the house much better than I have done. So far as the government is concerned, however, if hon. gentlemen wish that the resolution be referred to the committee on agriculture, it seems to me there could be no objection to that being done.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, after the remarks of the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) it is my intention—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out that the remarks of the hon. member will close the debate.

Mr. BRADETTE: I appreciate what the acting Prime Minister has said. All hon. members realize that in a forty minute period it is impossible fully to elaborate the points involved. If I understood him correctly, I believe he is content to allow the resolution to be referred to the committee on agriculture. Is that so?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. BRADETTE: Then that is all I wish to say at the present time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member move that the resolution be referred to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. BRADETTE: I would gladly make that motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member could not do that; the resolution already appears on the order paper in his name. However it is not for me to suggest how it should be done.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Who seconded the motion?

Mr. VALLANCE: I did.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the name of Mr. Reid.

Mr. MANION: May I suggest the resolution be withdrawn on the understanding that it will be referred to the committee on agriculture?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. member content?

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes, on the understanding that it will go to the committee on agriculture.

Motion (Mr. Bradette) withdrawn.

SOCKEYE SALMON

PROPOSED RESCISSION OF REGULATION PROHIBITING EXPORT IN FRESH CONDITION

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the section of the special fishery regulations for the province of British Columbia which prohibits the export of sockeye salmon in a fresh condition, is against public policy and should be rescinded.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that this motion has been called, although I have always been ready to go on with it. As this is the last time it can be called this session I would suggest that the minister might have the courtesy to allow the motion to go to the committee on marine and fisheries.

I have just time to put the situation in a few sentences. The regulation to which I object prevents the fishermen from sending fresh sockeye salmon for sale to Seattle or on the American side when the price is higher there; but when the price is lower on the Canadian side it does not prevent the canners from bringing fish in from the American side. It is a very onesided policy. The canners, when the price is low on the American side, freely bring fish in, but when the price is lower in British Columbia than it is on the American side our fishermen have not the privilege of shipping out their fish. That is a gross discrimination against the right of a man to sell his product in the best market.

Many years ago, when this rule was first made, three main arguments were advanced in its favour, all of which have been removed by changed conditions since. The principal one was this: It was argued that because the Americans were allowed to use traps and seines and we in British Columbia below the mouth of the Fraser river were allowed to use gill nets only, it was necessary to have this embargo because theirs was a cheaper method of catching the fish. But both of these conditions have ceased to exist; for last year the United States passed a law prohibiting traps in the state of Washington and adjacent waters, and two years ago in this country we allowed the operation of seines in our section of these waters. So that argument has been totally done away with, and there is nothing left now but the condition that it is a onesided thing. Hitherto the price has always been higher on the American side, but during the last few years the contrary occasionally took place and the canners did not hesitate to bring in fish to the extent of hundreds of thousands of fish, 208,800 fish coming in in 1934, and that cut the price down to our local fishermen; but when the reverse is the case and there is a chance for our fishermen to get a higher price in Seattle, this embargo prevents it. The more or less plausible reasons that were advanced in favour of this embargo at the time it was proposed have been done away with.

As it is almost six o'clock I cannot proceed further with my argument, and I would therefore ask the minister to allow the resolution to go to the fisheries committee where it can be thoroughly threshed out.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I join with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) in suggesting that this question be sent for consideration to the fisheries committee. It is a very important question and time will not permit us now to develop the argument we would like to develop. I hope the minister will therefore accept the suggestion that this be sent to the fisheries committee.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) introduces a resolution which suggests that this house should direct that a certain course be taken with regard to a regulation. That regulation was first instituted in 1894, but it was very considerably modified in 1932 for reasons which then existed. These regulations are due to come up for their annual revision in from two to three weeks' time, and at present suggested amendments are being received from the industry. I question the wisdom of asking the House of Commons after only seven minutes' discussion to give any direction to the Department of Fisheries with regard to what it should or should not do. I have, however, no particular reason for objecting to the suggestion that the matter should be referred to the committee on marine and fisheries. It can be discussed there and the committee can report as it sees fit.

Mr. NEILL: I will amend my motion to refer the matter to the committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not understand that the mover can amend his own motion.

Mr. DUFF: The minister can move an amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot amend his own motion.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat in favour of the resolution that has been moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I think the matter is one that perhaps should be discussed by the committee on marine and fisheries, and I would therefore move that the matter be referred to that committee.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): I beg to second that motion, Mr. Speaker.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

MINING INDUSTRY

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN CUSTOMS DUTIES ON INSTRUMENTS OF PRODUCTION

Mr. C. A. CAMPBELL (Frontenac-Addington) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the best interests of Canada demand that the burden of customs taxation be lessened on the instruments of production in the mining industry, and to this end, mining machinery, and articles required in the said industry be free from customs duties.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the time left before six o'clock will not permit me to place before the house all the facts I have before me. Briefly my reason for moving this motion is, not to embarrass the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) at all but simply to bring before the house the situation at the present time of the mining industry in Canada.

The mining industry in Canada embraces not only gold mining but the mining of all other metals, fuels, oils and gas; non-metallics; also sand, gravel, construction and quarry materials.

The taxes on the mining industry have mounted at such a rate that in some instances it is a question whether the industry can carry on or not. The only reason we have been able to carry on so far has been the advancement that has been made by engineers, research men and operators in the industry, by whose efforts costs have been lowered from year to year.

I should like in the few moments left to place before the house what has happened in respect to the rapid increase in taxes on the mining industry.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 21, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary) presented the first report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations, as follows:

That five hundred copies in English and two hundred copies in French of the minutes of its proceedings, and of the evidence to be taken before it, together with papers and records to be incorporated with such evidence, be printed from day to day; and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. STANLEY moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

*PRICE SPREADS AND MASS BUYING

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland):

Had the Prime Minister seen or was he aware of the contents of the pamphlet entitled "Price Spreads and Mass Buying" issued on July the 27th, 1934, by the Hon. H. H. Stevens, at the time Minister of Trade and Commerce, before it was released for distribution?

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to this question is no, if the words "released for distribution" are used in their ordinary sense; that is, that there were copies of the pamphlet in question in circulation. If, therefore, the words "released for distribution" mean that copies were in circulation, I understand a limited number were, the answer is no.

GOLD HANDLING CHARGES

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo):

What is the amount of all charges collected by the government for assaying, refining or any other charge or fee collected from the producers of gold, during the calendar year 1934?

Mr. RHODES:

The amount collected to cover the cost of melting, assaying, refining and handling, was $337,533.21.

WHEAT SHIPMENTS VIA UNITED STATES PORTS*

Mr. BROWN:

Has there been any understanding arrived at between the governments of Great Britain and Canada, since the Ottawa conference, to the effect that wheat going via American ports should not be accorded the preference?

Mr. BENNETT: This question as framed would seem to indicate that there was necessity for some understanding with reference to the matter referred to. The truth is that all that was necessary under the provisions of the British regulations was that there should be a through transit indicated by the documents accompanying shipments to show that the country of origin was Canada if the grain in question went through the port of New York or any other United States port. So that there is no question of understanding. But I make that statement in order that there may be no difficulty.

Mr. BROWN: If the Prime Minister reads the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) he will see the reason I asked the question.

Mr. BENNETT: I only answered the question according to the facts. I know of nothing else.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

RELIEF CAMPS

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What was the total number of relief camps in Canada and in each province on January 31, 1935?

2. What was the total number of men employed in each of said camps by provinces, on January 31, 1935?

Mr. CAHAN: Return tabled herewith.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—NOVA SCOTIA APPOINTMENTS

2. If so, what are the names of those appointed during each of the said years?

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT—ALBERTA REGISTRARS

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):

What are the names and addresses of the registrars appointed by the federal government in the province of Alberta under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act?

Mr. RHODES: Return tabled herewith.

RADIO COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). It is based on a front page article which appeared on Tuesday in the Toronto Telegram, to the effect that the government proposes to abolish the radio commission and to abandon the field of radio broadcasting entirely to private enterprise. I should like to know whether there is any truth in the report.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If one were called upon in this house to answer every statement made as to what is contemplated by the government one would be constantly engaged in answering questions, not transacting the business of parliament. As far as I know there is no warrant for the statement in question.

Mr. EULER: You ought to know.

FRASER RIVER—SALMON FISHERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I have a question to direct to the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Stirling). Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the announcement made recently in the speech from the throne at Victoria that a reserve for power purposes has been placed on the waters of the Fraser river between Lytton and Quesnel? If so, is the government taking steps to see that the salmon industry is protected, and that no rights are given that would interfere with the spawning of the fish in that river?

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice that he desired to ask a question of this nature. The attention of the department has not been particularly drawn to the matter to which he refers, but in November last the provincial Minister of Lands of British Columbia did write to the Acting Minister of Fisheries explaining that the portion of the Fraser river between Lillooet and Quesnel had been reserved by the lieutenant-governor in council for power purposes. It does not necessarily follow that a dam will be built there. But I draw his attention to the fact that authority for the building of dams across non-navigable waters comes within the purview of the province. The only authority we have under the Fisheries Act is when a dam is being built, or afterwards, to require the construction of a durable and efficient fishway which must be built and maintained by the owner or occupier, the place, form and capacity of which must be approved by the minister. If, however, the dam is of a character to make a fishway not feasible, then the minister may require the owner or occupier of such dam to pay him, from time to time, such sum or sums of money as may be required to construct, operate and maintain such complete hatchery establishment as will, in his opinion, meet the requirements of maintaining the annual return of migratory fish.

EXPORT OF MEAT TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) arising out of a report appearing in the newspapers the last day or two with regard to the bonus that is being given to cattle raisers in Great Britain. I see by the statement that the arrangement is to be continued limiting dominion shippers to no more than the average shipments for the corresponding quarter of the past three years. That I take it is the quarter commencing April 1. I would ask the minister what number has been shipped in each quarter commencing April 1, for the last three years, and to let us know whether this may mean a restriction this year below the number that were shipped last year?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was good enough to give notice that he was going to ask this question. We were unable to get the imports for the corresponding period without cabling to the old land. All we have is our exports. The information I have is this; the suggested quota covering imports of beef, veal and pork into the United Kingdom from Canada for the second quarter of 1935 is:

	Pounds
Beef and veal..	504,000
Pork..	472,640

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): I desire to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) a question. In view of the fact that last year the special committee on railways and shipping did not convene until very late in the session, can he give the house any information as to when that committee will start to sit this year?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): As a matter of fact I was speaking to the whip yesterday in regard to the appointment of the committee. There is no use in the committee sitting until they have something with which to deal. The report of the Canadian National Railways never gets in until some time after the middle of March, and I have information that it will not be any earlier this year. There will be a bill shortly dealing with the estimates, and as soon as that is introduced probably we shall appoint the special committee; in other words as soon as it has something with which to deal.

PRICE SPREADS COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO PRESS REPORTS CONCERNING FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Prime Minister if he happens to have seen what appear to be inspired statements that have been appearing from time to time in the press, concerning what we may expect in the report of the price spreads and mass buying commission, their recommendations and the like. I know that the commission is a law unto itself, but it does seem to me that the matter is one that sufficiently affects the privileges of parliament for the Prime Minister to say a word about it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I can only say to my right hon. friend that the inspiration has not come from me. I have no knowledge of any terms of that report in any way. The commission is to report to the minister in charge of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the report to be laid before the governor in council. It is not a parliamentary committee, although it was at first, and was continued by this parliament in the form of a commission. I suppose to that extent at least this parliament looks to it that the first knowledge that is given should at least come to the governor in council. In this case I am in exactly the same position as the right hon. gentleman; all I know of it is what I have seen in the press. As a matter of fact, when I was out of the city I picked up a newspaper and saw the statement as to what the recommendations were, and on inquiry upon my return I found that no report had been made, nor could I find the basis of the statements to which the right hon. gentleman has referred. I shall make further inquiry. But it is a commission reporting to the governor in council and not to this house or this parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assumed that the Prime Minister would disapprove of the commission giving out any part of its report. Albeit it does not report to the house itself, it ought to make its report to the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I wholly agree with what the right hon. gentleman has said, that any commission appointed by the governor in council should make its report to the governor in council and not give any public intimation of the contents of the report until the governor in council has had opportunity to release the report to the public.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABILITY OF FURTHER AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to direct to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). It bears on the future economic and financial welfare of the soldier settlers throughout Canada. Amending legislation was introduced in August, 1931, May, 1932, May, 1933 and June, 1934. May I inquire whether or not any amending measure will be presented to parliament this session?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, of course I cannot foretell what legislation may come before parliament. If necessity arises and it seems desirable I assume legislation will be introduced, but at the moment I think not.

BRITISH IMPORTS OF RUSSIAN TIMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): A Canadian press cable this morning states that the Hon. Mr. Runciman, president of the British Board of Trade, is to make a statement to the British house with regard to the agreement between Timber Distributors Limited and the Soviet government. It also indicates that the Canadian government has protested the agreement to the British government. Inasmuch as that statement will be made to the British house this afternoon could we also have some statement from the Prime Minister so that we can deal with the matter concurrently?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think on reflection the hon. gentleman will see that his question goes slightly too far. As I indicated the other day the position is that the Canadian government, through its high commissioner, had filed a protest against the inclusion of the fall clause in the contract between the Soviet union and Timber Distributors Limited. The result of that protest has not been made known to the government, and I am not in a position to make any further statement than that already made.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH AN UNEMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, to establish an unemployment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto—Mr. Bennett—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 27 (as printed; now section 26) —Determination of questions by commission concerning the rights of persons and appeals to the exchequer court.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps before we proceed with this section I should answer certain questions that were asked the other day by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff). I have checked with the department of statistics, and the information is that the number of persons over ten years of age gainfully employed in fishing and trapping, according to the actual census figures of June 1, 1931, was 47,917, and the number of persons over ten years of age employed as wage earners in 1931 was 10,421. The explanation given is that on the form of question put by the census enumerator the large number to which the hon. gentleman referred indicated that they had a share or interest in the enterprise.

Mr. VENIOT: That is in fishing?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and they were not employed in the sense in which that term was used by the census bureau. Therefore the answer to the first question was that the total number of persons so employed was 47,917, according to the actual figures given on June 1, 1931, in answer to the request made by the census enumerators, but of those people only 10,421 were employed in the sense in which we have been using that term here.

Mr. DUFF: Certainly there must be something wrong in the answers that have been supplied the Prime Minister by the census commissioner or the bureau of statistics. I hold in my hand the report of the Department of Fisheries for last year, signed by the acting minister, and on page 7 I read:

> The total number of persons employed in the industry was 79,328, of whom 65,391 were engaged in catching the fish and 13,927 employed on shore in canneries and fish curing establishments.

The information given by the Prime Minister a moment ago differs from the information with which he was supplied previously.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is the same.

Mr. DUFF: It differs in one particular. The only information he had previously was that there were only 10,421 people engaged in fishing and trapping. Now he gives us the figure of 47,917. I do not want to be critical because I realize that it is not the Prime Minister's mistake, but I think what has happened is this. It will be noticed that the figure of 10,421 was for fishing and trapping. My belief is that the fishermen referred to here are those in connection with inland fisheries who are commonly known as the Izaak Waltons of the fishing industry; that is, the fishermen who fish by rod as compared with those who fish by net or line either in the great lakes or the ocean. It appears to me that they have classed them together; this number must refer to the men employed in trapping and in fishing by rod, not in the way we fish, by nets or lines, in the great lakes or in the Pacific and Atlantic oceans. It does not make very much difference; I think there is a mistake, and I think that is proven by the report of the Department of Fisheries which gives the number as 79,328. From my own experience I should think that figure would be more correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I expressed the point that the hon. gentleman has referred to, that the report of the department showed nearly 80,000. As far as I could ascertain that included all persons who were in any way associated with the industry, including those who were concerned with canning, curing and matters of that sort in addition to those actually engaged in fishing. The figure 10,421 is repeated in the statement given to me as being a correct indication of the exact number of persons who, on the first day of June, 1931, reported that they were employed as wage earners in fishing. I think the difference lies in the fact that we are dealing only with wage earners as distinguished from those who had either a partnership or a participating interest in the industry itself.

Mr. DUFF: That is quite possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister intimated that he hoped to be able to give me a statement as to the number of employees likely to be appointed under this measure, and also a more definite statement as to the cost. Has he been able to get any further particulars under those two heads?

Mr. BENNETT: That information is not complete as yet. I do not propose to ask that the bill be taken out of committee until that information is available.

Paragraphs (a) to (d) inclusive agreed to.

On paragraph (e)—Proviso: appeal.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is the section to which I raised objection the other evening and the Prime Minister said he would permit it to stand so that both sides of the house could study it. I have not changed my opinion in regard to submitting matters of this description to the courts. I believe that when questions of this character are taken to the courts invariably the workingman is at a distinct disadvantage, because the power and financial position of the employer permits him much easier access to the courts as well as the engagement of skilled counsel. I believe the commission itself should be the final court, but if an appeal is to be made to a court I believe that those making the appeal should appear in person rather than by counsel. I do not believe the employers should be placed in the position of being allowed to appeal from the decision of the commission, and to have counsel to represent them. I think they should be there personally to state their positions so that if necessary they might be cross-examined by the representatives of the workers. There have been many suggestions of appeal boards in connection with workmen's compensation, and the labourers of Canada have always opposed the institution of such boards because the worker would be at a distinct disadvantage and there would be brought into the administration of matters concerning workmen's compensation legal battles which in the judgment of the average working man would be to his distinct disadvantage. I should like to oppose sending appeals to the court, in the practical application of this measure.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. member knows, in Great Britain it was thought desirable to provide for an appeal. His Majesty in council names a judge who shall take the appeals under the employment insurance act. Usually, in practice, a member of the high court has been designated for that purpose. In this country however that would not be possible because it is not a unitary system of government, so far as the judges are concerned, and we might have varying decisions with respect to the same matter, a condition which would be unfortunate. Therefore we thought we were meeting the situation by providing for an appeal to the exchequer court.

A few days ago I listened with great interest to the statement made by the trades and labour council with respect to this matter, and I gathered that they were of the opinion that if the question of appeal were taken away under subsection (i) of the proviso, then the commission itself might refer to the court any question which was of sufficient importance to warrant a reference being made. I am rather inclined to think that that would meet the difficulty the hon. member has raised, and it seems to me it would be fair to all parties. If that suggestion meets with his views we would accept an amendment to delete subparagraph (i) leaving it so that:

The commission may, if they think fit, instead of themselves deciding such question, refer the question for decision to the exchequer court.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would move, in amendment, that subparagraph (i) be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the letters (ii) will be deleted, also.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the Prime Minister if under the measure there is an appeal from a ruling or decision of a regional board? I understand there are provisions for a regional board. If there are appeals, do they appeal to the commission, and will the decision of the commission be final?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member has followed the provisions of the first part of section 27 he will observe that the first point to be determined is whether:

Any employment or any class of employment is or will be such employment as to make the person engaged therein an employed person within the meaning of this act, or whether a person is or was an employed person within the meaning of this act.

That goes to show whether or not the employed person is covered by the statute at all; the commission decides that. It is not a question for a regional board to decide or to deal with. Then we come to paragraph (b):

Whether a person or class of persons is or is not, or was or was not, a person or class of persons to whom a special or supplementary scheme under this act applies or applied.

I endeavoured to make clear the other day that that is one of the provisions that was found in section 20, and this is the section which confers upon the commission the exact power to deal with that point. Then we come to any question arising:

(c) As to who is or was the employer of any employed person.

The difficulty may arise when you have certain types of industry operating under the one roof. Then, subparagraph (d):

As to the rate of contribution payable under or in pursuance of this act by or in respect of any person or class of persons or as to the rates of contribution payable in respect of any employed person by the employer and that person respectively.

That is a question to be decided by the commission. So far as I am at present advised those are the only questions, except the matters of operation and administration, with which they have to deal—and not the appeals from regional bodies. The regional body determines with respect to some of the questions covered by regulations in a subsequent section, which probably the hon. member has read. But these questions are all to be settled by the commission. Then we have the question of appeal, which is now being deleted; but the commission may, if it is thought desirable, state a case. Then it will be observed that subsections 2, 3 and 4 determine the principles upon which the commission act. So that, so far as I can answer the question by memory, and having in mind my memory of the subsequent section, the answer would be no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would not the words "an appeal" in subsections 3 and 4 be deleted? I understand that the appeal provided in the former subparagraph (i) is being abolished. The Prime Minister will observe that in subsections 3 and 4 the expression "an appeal" appears. Strictly speaking, I believe if the appeal has been abolished, and there is only reference for a decision—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The words I have mentioned in subsections 3 and 4 should, I believe, be deleted.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the hon. member is quite right. We had not reached subsection (3), but we will deal with it. First, however, has the hon. member for Bow River any further questions?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes. The view expressed by the Prime Minister respecting paragraph (a), (b) and (c) of section 27 is very clear. Obviously the commission would decide in those cases. I am not quite clear however as to the functions of the advisory board or the regional boards, if the commission itself is to set up the rate of contribution payable and to decide definitely in those matters. Further, I am not satisfied as to whether it will have the final say as to whether a worker was or was not employed. What are the functions of the regional boards? Are they simply to act as agents for the commission? Can an appeal be made to the commission from a decision of a regional board, in connection with these matters?

Mr. BENNETT: My answer to that was no, that the advisory board does not exist for the purpose of deciding in all these matters.

Its functions, as will be observed later, in the section establishing it, are entirely different. As to the regional board, it is what I might call a local or domestic body which exists for the purpose of dealing promptly with problems arising within the region. So far as my memory goes there is no provision for appeal to the commission from a regional board. Rather, the regional board gives any information which may be obtained for the purpose of enabling a decision to be made on any local matters. The decisions are the decisions of the commission and not of the regional board. That is my recollection. However, as we proceed, if I find anything which will change my view I will point it out to the committee.

Then, with respect to subsection 3—

Mr. NEILL: Before the Prime Minister proceeds to discuss that subsection I should like to make some observations. The Prime Minister proposes to strike out subparagraph (i), on the suggestion of the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell). The object the hon. member had in mind, as I understood it, was that of shortening the procedure and preventing undue expense. It seems to me however that the procedure suggested by the Prime Minister will not have the effect of shortening the procedure, but will take away from the worker the privilege of appealing, and will leave the factors of expense and delay. The commission may refer questions for decision to the exchequer court, involving exactly the same delay as if the man himself had appealed. The exchequer court sits only at intervals, and it is 3,000 miles from the Pacific coast, there will be the same trouble and delay to the man, whether he or the commission appeals. I would respectfully suggest that the commission's decision in these matters—matters which after all are mostly of a personal nature, such as that of deciding whom a man's employer may be—should be final. I would suggest that instead of saying as it does in paragraph (ii) that the commission may, instead of themselves deciding such question, refer it for decision to the exchequer court, it should be merely left in such a way that if there is any question of law on which the commission want guidance they can themselves refer it in a general way to the exchequer court. But questions of fact, such as whether Tom Jones is the employer of Bill Smith, should not be thrown into the delays of the exchequer court.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I would also point out that section 28 seems to provide a ready procedure for having any appeal and also what I would call a regulated sequence from one body to the other. So why is it necessary to have a sort of parallel procedure under section 27?

Mr. BENNETT: The question as to whether or not under any circumstances there should be a judicial determination of any issue arising under this act is the question that has to be dealt with. I think it will probably be agreed by all the members of the committee that it is desirable for the purpose of removing doubt and maintaining uniformity that there should be a provision for a judicial determination of certain questions that create difficulties and sometimes are of great moment to the insured. We say that there shall be no appeal from the commission against any of its decisions, thereby meeting I thought the views which were expressed by the trades and labour council and the fears expressed by the hon. member for East Hamilton; that is, that the insured should not be put to the trouble and expense of having to deal with questions of litigation and the employment of counsel. But we do provide that the commission may, if they think fit, instead of themselves deciding such question, refer it for decision to the exchequer court.

Mr. NEILL: That will put the man to the same expense as before in presenting his case before the exchequer court. It makes no difference whether the man initiates the appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: Very much difference, because in that case the commission would assign counsel, if they follow the usual practice, to argue the point, not on behalf of the commission, because the commission has not arrived at any decision, but the question to be decided is how the matter shall be decided. That is a question of law, not of fact.

Under clause 4 we provide that the governor in council may make regulations prescribing the procedure governing appeals under this section and those regulations should provide for limiting the time within which appeal or reference may be brought, and for the determination in a summary manner of any such appeals or references and for requiring notice of any such appeals to be given to the commission. The commission merely makes a reference and I would assume that the course usually followed would be followed in this case; that is, that counsel would argue, not on behalf of one class or the other but as to what should be the interpretation of the law.

Mr. NEILL: That would entirely meet my ideas if it were on a question of law, but when it is a question as who is or was the employer of such and such an employee, is not that a question of fact?

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry it is not. It is a question of law.

Mr. NEILL: As to whether I employed Bill Jones on a certain day or at a certain period?

Mr. BENNETT: It might be a mixed question of law and of fact, but ultimately on the facts it would be a question of law.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It might be either.

Mr. HEAPS: In a bill of this kind I think it is desirable to get away from the court if we possibly can. I think that in a large number of years of experience in the administration of workmen's compensation law it has been found on all sides that it is a desirable thing that the board in charge of the administration of workmen's compensation legislation should always give the final decision, and the board's decisions have usually been accepted by all parties to the case. Now if we are going to appoint a commission which I presume will be comprised of very capable men, I myself would be quite content to allow the commission to be appointed to take full responsibility for the administration of the act, for if we are going to have beyond this proposed commission the exchequer court which is going to give interpretations of law, and possibly decide questions of fact as well, I can see that it is quite possible that the commission as a matter of shelving their responsibility may be only too anxious to pass it on to the exchequer court. So if it were possible I would far sooner see the principle adopted in this act that has been adopted in practically all workmen's compensation acts, and make the commission entirely responsible for the whole administration of this act.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to concur in everything that has been said by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). One member of the commission is to be appointed after consultation with the employers, and another member after consultation with employees or employee organizations. That being the case, the point of view of the two classes is represented. But if there is to be an appeal to the court, although it is generally accepted that the courts of this country are eminently fair, yet after all the employees will feel that they have no particular representative in the courts, and for that reason I am sure it would be much better to leave the final decision except on points of law with the commission. I am sure that that would be much more satisfactory to the employees. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for North Winnipeg many attempts have been made in the past to secure appeals from decisions of workmen's compensation boards, and these have always been opposed by the workers. They have been willing rather to have the compensation board, whether they are composed of men with or without legal training, make the final decision in every case.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Paragraph (ii) which still remains in the bill reads:

> The commission may, if they think fit, instead of themselves deciding such question, refer the question for decision to the exchequer court.

Since we have deleted paragraph (i) it is very clear that the only appellants to the exchequer court under the provisions of this bill will now be the commission itself, and there is a danger that that provision may be misunderstood or misrepresented. I think for the sake of the commission, as well as for the sake of the operation of the act it would be just as well if there were no appeal rather than leave it on a one-sided basis like this because the power of the commission to refer the question for decision to the exchequer court really means that they have power to pass the buck to the exchequer court, and there is no doubt whatever that there will be the greatest temptation in the event of conflict between employer and employee to do just that very thing and escape responsibility. I believe that hon. members who represent labour distinctly in this house have raised a mighty good point, and that all appeals to the exchequer court should be eliminated.

Mr. BENNETT: As the act as printed came to the house it provided that either party aggrieved might make an appeal. The hon. member for Bow River is in error in suggesting that as it now stands, the committee having deleted paragraph (i), the commission would be the appellant. It is to prevent that, that the section reads as it does. It is not an appeal that is taken; it is the statement of a case for the opinion of the court. Under our Summary Jurisdiction Act magistrates have the right to state a case of law for the opinion of the court, and that is frequently done.

Mr. NEILL: On request, is it not?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, on request, and sometimes I think they have the right to exercise their own judgment in the matter. But the question that is at issue is whether there shall be a judicial interpretation of the legal implications of this act. To say that there should not be because there is not in the workmen's compensation acts is to overlook the fact that in many cases actions may be brought for damages regardless of the workmen's compensation act, and in that connection you still have litigation against corporations carried in many instances to the court of last resort to have determination of the law. It would seem to me, if there is any doubt about this provision being against the interests of the workmen, that we might do this. In paragraph (ii) we say that the commission may, if they think fit, instead of themselves deciding such question, refer the question for decision to the exchequer court. He might rewrite that and provide that the commission may refer any question of law for the decision of the exchequer court. That would obviate any difficulty such as that to which the hon. gentlemen have referred. I think the commission should be able to determine any question of fact as well as any other body in the world. If the hon. gentleman will let the rest of that subsection stand I will redraft it and provide that it shall apply only to a question of law, and then the commission themselves will decide whether or not that question of law is of sufficient importance to be referred to the exchequer court for an opinion. That will relieve the workman of having to argue the case either as appellant or as respondent, placing the onus on the commission of bringing to the attention of the exchequer court the point of law at issue, and leaving it to the court to decide what it may be. There is no appellant involved when there is a reference to the court.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I suggest that subsections 3 and 4 stand.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Has the Prime Minister considered the question of costs before the exchequer court? I know it is a somewhat luxurious court.

Mr. BENNETT: In fact, the hon. gentleman knows it indicates that.

Mr. JACOBS: Well, that is a euphemistic way of putting it. If the question arose as to the payment of costs by the insured it would be a case of the game not being worth the candle, because the amount involved in these insurance matters is usually small compared to the costs in a court of that kind, which usually sits in Ottawa where expensive counsel are engaged as a rule, and so on. It does seem to me that if the case is to go to the exchequer court some provision should be made whereby the commission in its quality as such should bear the costs, and not the parties involved.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly the position in which it stands at the moment. The hon. gentleman did not perhaps follow the discussion that has taken place. We have eliminated the appeal of either party and have provided that the commission may state a case in law, if there is such, for determination by the court, which of course involves the commission presenting a case to the court. No costs can be awarded against anyone, and if it is thought desirable by any body of employees that they should be represented, of course the court always provides that they can be heard. As it stands, the very difficulty which the hon. gentleman properly points out will be met. I agree with him, although I have not had the same experience in the luxury of that court which the hon. gentleman has had.

Mr. HEAPS: I suggest that when the Prime Minister reconsiders these clauses the question should be considered whether it would not be wise to abolish all appeals beyond the commission. I say that for this reason. The moment you start to refer questions of law to the exchequer court and questions of fact to the commission there will arise a fine distinction as to what is law and what is fact, and sometimes the line of demarcation is so thin that it is hard to determine which is the one and which the other. There is one other question I would refer to and that is as regards the workmen's compensation act where individuals still have the right to resort to the common law. But it is also a fact that when a person entitled to compensation for injuries sustained resorts to the common law he forfeits all rights through the workmen's compensation act. That is embodied in all the acts. What I wish to impress upon the Prime Minister however is the desirability, when he reconsiders these clauses, of considering the question, after consultation with those who are responsible for the drafting of the bill, of abolishing all appeals beyond the proposed commission.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry I cannot adopt that view. There are three parties to the creation of this fund. It is a national fund created by contributions, enforced by this statute, from the employer, the employee and the state; and on a question of law, involving the question of liability, it is desirable that there should be a determination of that question of law in some instances by a judicial tribunal. In England there has been no modification of that feature since 1920, so far as I can find, and I speak subject to correction; I see no notice given in any of the books of any complaints made with respect thereto. The provision in England is that the question may be decided on appeal by the high court, or that the minister may refer it to the high court, and the other subsections in the English act are provisions that are incorporated in our act except with respect to the terminology that is to be used in dealing with the question of jurisdiction in England as compared with Canada. I cannot conceive that any difficulty could arise or any injustice be done to those who are interested in the proper administration of the act; and now, having removed the possibility of appeal, it seems to me that we have placed the matter on a basis on which every citizen has a right and the state has a right to have the words that are used in the statute judicially interpreted for the purpose of determining exactly what they mean in their context and with relation to other parts of the bill. I am sorry I cannot accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, but I think I have gone a very long way in meeting his views by limiting it to a stated case on a point of law.

Section stands.

On section 28 (as printed; now section 27)—Insurance officers.

Mr. NEILL: It seems to me there is no provision made for paying the insurance officers.

Mr. BENNETT: That is covered.

Mr. NEILL: Section 29, subsection 5, provides that the commission may pay such remuneration to the chairman and other members of a court of referees, and such other expenses, and so on; but I see nowhere any provision that the insurance officers shall be paid. These people are not appointed by the civil service commission and they do not come under section 8.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has overlooked the provision that the commission may employ such officers and clerks as may be necessary.

Mr. NEILL: That is section 8, which provides that such persons shall be under the civil service commission, but these men are not.

Mr. BENNETT: They do not all have to be under the civil service commission. Section 8, subsection (2) provides:

> For the purposes of any investigation, or for any other purpose of this act, the commission may, subject to the approval of the governor in council, from time to time temporarily employ such persons of technical and professional attainments as the commission may deem necessary.

Mr. NEILL: But these insurance officers will not be temporary. They will not be employed by the commission. This section which we are now considering provides that the commission may in each regional division employ such number of persons as the governor in council may approve, to be insurance officers for such division. I submit that they do not come under section 8.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not be necessary to provide specifically for their being paid because the act makes such provision. however, if there is any doubt we can look into it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has any estimate been made of the number of insurance officers that will be required?

Mr. BENNETT: That has not been done yet.

Subsection (1) agreed to.

Subsection (2) agreed to.

On subsection (3)—Umpires, and deputy umpires.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is there one umpire or more than one?

Mr. BENNETT: It is provided in subsection (3) that the governor in council may, from amongst the judges of the exchequer court of Canada and of the superior courts of the provinces, designate an umpire and such number of deputy umpires as may be deemed necessary. There will be one umpire and such deputy umpires as may be necessary for the purposes of the act. This is taken largely from section 12 of the English act of 1920.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will there be one umpire for each regional section or for the whole of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: One for each regional section.

Mr. NEILL: Is it necessary to have a distinction made between umpire and deputy umpire? There does not seem to be a distinction between the duties of the umpire and the deputies.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. gentleman knows, the precaution is taken to provide that in case an umpire is ill he may remain an umpire and a deputy umpire would act. We have such a provision in every office from the highest down to offices of much less distinction in the state. It is always desirable to make provision for maintenance of continuity. A man might not be so ill as to necessitate the relinquishment of his duties, but on the other hand it is desirable to have someone act as deputy during the time he is temporarily incapacitated. That is the general rule.

Mr. NEILL: I could understand that, if the provision were for appointing a number of umpires. But the governor in council is to designate an umpire—that means one—and such number of deputy umpires as may be deemed necessary. if the deputy umpires have to do certain duties and then a report lies from them to the umpire, I could understand the situation, but there is no provision for the umpire doing anything different from the ordinary duties of the deputy umpires. It would seem that the office of the deputy umpire is not necessary. Why not say:

Designate such number of umpires.

Mr. BENNETT: The only explanation I can give, having reference to the English act, is that this is done for the purposes indicated:

The governor in council may, from amongst the judges of the exchequer court of Canada and of the superior courts of the provinces of Canada, designate an umpire and such number of deputy umpires as the governor in council may deem necessary for the purposes of this act, and, subject to the provisions of this act, may prescribe their jurisdiction.

This bill as it stands at the moment, copied from the provisions of the English act, provides for three separate estates in considering claims: the insurance officers; the courts of referees and the umpire. To that extent it follows the general provision of the English act. The number of insurance officers rests with the governor in council depending upon the necessities of the case, and the appointments rest with the commission. That is a case in which the commission makes the appointments. It is the intention that there should be at least one insurance officer at each employment office, one or more at each divisional office, with of course the staff that has to be maintained at the capital where the commission will reside. This staff and machinery we confidently believe will provide uniformity of practice and procedure in dealing with cases and claims that may come, so that we may have the same sort of practice in British Columbia as we have in Nova Scotia. If there is any doubt about the matter—I have looked at the English act and I have looked at my own notes with respect to it—the clause may stand, and if on looking into the matter further there seems to be any necessity for clarification, I shall see that the necessary steps are taken.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is the difference between the duties of the umpire and those of the deputy umpire?

Mr. BENNETT: None whatever.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then, why would it not do just to say:

Designate such number of umpires.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has just been saying, and I said that it follows the English act of 1920, section 12, which provides for the appointment of one or more deputy umpires. Presumably the draftsman has taken that from that section, as my notes indicate. The clause may stand and if there is any reason for change that I have not seen, I will redraft the clause.

Section 28 (now section 27) subsection 3 stands; remainder of section agreed to.

On section 29 (as printed; now section 28) subsection (1)—Court of referees.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many courts will there be? Will there be one in each divisional area or one central court?

Mr. BENNETT: Necessity is usually the governing factor with respect to that. The provisions of the measure are broad enough to permit of the widest possible establishment of courts to enable claims to be dealt with without delay and on the spot so to speak. I use the term "on the spot" in its proper sense.

Mr. HEAPS: These courts of referees will not be a permanent body; they will be appointed from time to time as the occasion warrants. Am I correct in that interpretation?

Mr. BENNETT: I would think the bill as it now stands does not contemplate the changing of the courts of referees as one proceeds; they will have to deal only with cases as they arise. The clause reads:

A court of referees for the purposes of this act shall consist of one or more members chosen to represent employers, with an equal number of members chosen to represent insured contributors, and a chairman appointed as provided in the next preceding section of this act.

That is to enable them to deal with cases that may come before them under the provisions of the measure. I do not think their duties will cease when they have dealt with the number of cases immediately before them, but they will be a continuing body.

Mr. SANDERSON: Will it be a travelling court that will move around from point to point?

Mr. BENNETT: I explained some days ago that the bill contemplated dividing the country into districts and within the districts are established facilities to enable cases to be handled with the greatest promptitude and the least possible delay. If it were less expensive for the court to go to a point where there was a considerable number of cases, the court could do so. There is no limitation on their doing so. That is the shortest way to put the matter.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Am I right in assuming that under the clause there would be a chairman of the court of reference for each divisional district, but there may be as many courts set up in various districts as circumstances require?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I was trying to say.

Subsection (1), agreed to.

On subsection (2)—Panels of members of courts of referees.

Mr. NEILL: What will be the procedure for selecting the panels?

Mr. BENNETT: Once more I would say, having regard to the practice in Great Britain, if a court of referees were fully engaged at one spot, the procedure would be that you would take from the panel an additional number for the purpose of setting up another court to deal with problems that might arise there.

Mr. NEILL: But as to the constitution of the panels themselves?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a matter, as will be seen, between the employers and the insured contributors. The commission sets up the panels after they have arrived, I take it, at conclusions as to those who suitably represent employers on the one hand and insured contributors on the other. That was the purpose as will be observed in every part of this measure. Outside the appeal to which I have referred and which is no longer an appeal but merely a reference to an exchequer court, this measure is simply one administered by the employers and employees, and they themselves determine who shall be their representatives for the purpose of seeing that it is properly administered, the commission of course being the governing body. The duty is thrust upon the commission of seeing that "the panels of persons chosen to represent employers and insured contributors respectively shall be constituted by the commission for such districts," just as the hon member for Swift Current said a minute ago, "for such trades or groups of trades as the commission may think fit, and the members of a court of referees to be chosen to represent employers and insured contributors shall be selected from those panels in the prescribed manner."

The next clause reads:

Subject as aforesaid, the constitution of courts of referees shall be determined by regulations under this act.

That is the next branch. That is where the regulations come in. The provisions as to procedure are only a matter of detail.

Mr. NEILL: I cannot say that I like that system. It seems to lend itself to political influence.

Mr. BENNETT: How?

Mr. NEILL: Because the commission which is a politically appointed body may, to come right down to it, nominate these people. It is all very well to say that they shall represent the employers, but it is not the employers or the contributors who are to do the choosing; it is the commission. The panels are to be constituted by the commission not by the employers and the insured contributors. They are merely some persons who in the opinion of the commission suitably represent the employers.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true.

Mr. NEILL: This seems to me to lend itself to a selection by the commission of such persons as suit them. This may not be on a political basis; it may be simply the class of people who will suit them and still be all right, but it is not left to the employers and the insured contributors to make their choice. If it were left to them, I would be quite satisfied, but it is not.

Mr. BENNETT: I tried to explain a moment ago that the responsibility rests with the commission for the administration of the legislation. If the hon. gentleman approaches the question from the standpoint of assuming that it is a political commission, obviously his conclusions are warranted. If, on the other hand, he concludes, as I think he should, that the commission is appointed by employers on the one hand and employees on the other and just as the representatives that go to the international labour organization, represent employers and employees and the question of politics obviously cannot be a governing factor in the matter, then I submit the commission cannot, with the conditions imposed, make selections for political or any other reasons than that the people selected represent on the one hand employers and on the other employees, called in this measure contributors.

Mr. HEAPS: If I understand this correctly, it would appear employees and employers would both give to the commission a number of names for the regional board and those names so submitted would be called a panel. From this panel the names would be chosen by the proper authorities. Under those circumstances I am not afraid of any political considerations creeping into the appointments of the referees.

Mr. NEILL: But the trouble is that the hon. member is assuming something that is not in the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think there will be any danger of any political interference, because the matter rests squarely on the people involved in the legislation, that is the employers on the one hand and the employees on the other. If I know the employers and the workmen of this country, they will see to it that there is no politics in the administration of this measure, because if politics gets into it, good-night to actuarial soundness. That is so obvious. I think it is one of the most important features of the bill that the employers and employed are given responsiibility for its successful administration.

Mr. NEILL: I admire my hon. friend's confidence.

Subsection 2 agreed to.

Subsections 3 and 4 agreed to.

[Mr. Neill.]

On subsection 5—Remuneration of chairman and members; expenses of persons required to attend.

Mr. DUPUIS: I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he has in mind or if the experts of his department have figured the approximate cost of administration of this act. I understand there will be districts; I do not know if they will correspond to our judicial districts or if they will be smaller. We do not know what will be the salary or indemnity of the insurance officer, referee or umpire. I think it is most important to know what the salaries of all these officers will be, and what the administration of this act will cost.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. member was not in his seat on the occasion when I explained that the English act had involved an expenditure for administration of substantially 12½ per cent of its revenue. They have a population of 40,000,000, and a very large proportion, numbering millions, come within the operation of their act. I indicated that if the sum total of the fund in any one year amounted to $42,000,000, which might be a proper estimate, the administration cost might be as high as 15 per cent in the first years. But as it is now framed it is clear that it will be very much less, because it will take nearly two years for the act to become effectively efficient, if I might use that term. So it is impossible to state with any degree of certainty what the cost of administration will be. It is not intended to indicate in the act what the commission should pay in the discharge of its functions. The amount that might be expended for witnesses, for instance, would be presumably what the witness would usually earn in the day he had to attend this tribunal. That must be left to the commission to determine by regulation. It would be idle for parliament to endeavour to deal with a matter of that kind relating to all parts of Canada, because conditions vary and would affect the terms of the regulation. Obviously there must be a large measure of discretion left with the commission in such matters.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps the Prime Minister could say whether the 12½ per cent in Great Britain relates specifically to that part of the act dealing with unemployment insurance alone, or whether it includes the other forms of insurance in Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the hon. gentleman directed attention to that feature, because the act dealing with unemployment insurance in Great Britain deals also with the matter of assistance. The figure I have given covered broadly and generally the cost of administration of the act before it was amended in 1934. That is my information. It will be recalled that there are special provisions with respect to the expense of administration of other parts of the act down to the first unit and the individual in the parish. From that up there are special provisions in the act. I am talking now of the broad general cost of administration.

Mr. HEAPS: Then I am correct in assuming that the cost of administering the act by itself in Great Britain, apart from any other insurance in Great Britain, was approximately 12½ per cent over the period of five years prior to the amendment of the act?

Mr. BENNETT: That is my information. Has the hon. gentleman any reason to think that the figure is placed too low or too high?

Mr. HEAPS: No, I was asking as a matter of information.

Mr. DUPUIS: Perhaps I might cause the Prime Minister to repeat himself, but is it understood now what the limitation of these districts throughout the country will be? Are they to be the same as the judicial districts? Of course, as I might say before a court of justice, I am asking these questions without prejudice to my belief that this legislation will be of no avail. I discuss it now perhaps in the same spirit as that in which the Prime Minister brings in the legislation, with the thought in the back of my mind that it is unconstitutional, that it will never be put into effect, and that it is only for political purposes. Nevertheless as we have to discuss it, and as we Liberals are ready to let the right hon. gentleman and his followers get out of the difficult situation in which they find themselves, it is proper for us to know in what way such legislation will be applied in the country. The right hon. gentleman said the cost of witnesses could not be dealt with here but should be left to the commission. First, who will appoint the commission? Of course it will be the governor in council, so we might have a suspicion that it will be a little bit partisan. We cannot criticize the government for doing that, it is only human nature and especially the nature of the right hon. Prime Minister. I heard him last year—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): We are on clause 5, will the hon. member confine himself to that.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, I am discussing it very properly I submit. I just want to come to the point. Sometimes it takes a little while to come to the point, especially when we are not as clever as some of those on the other side. Last year, speaking in connection with redistribution, the right hon. gentleman said, "Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that we the Conservatives, are going to make those electoral divisions safe for the Liberals."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Surely the hon. gentleman knows that has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. DUPUIS: So I believe—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am quite in order. I believe and I submit that the commission, being named by the governor in council, naturally will be induced to name partisans of the present government to these positions, and decide what salary will be paid. Surely we ought to know from the Prime Minister, who is one of the members of the privy council, what the salaries of these officers will be. I think he should have a word to say about that; I think the country has a right to know the approximate cost of administration. I do not think that should be given in a lump sum because, as one of the hon. gentlemen to my left has said, the 12½ per cent in England included some other costs with regard to the administration of insurance in general. To say the cost will be 12½ per cent does not give a very definite picture to the house and the country as to the cost of administration. We do not know the total, so we cannot know the percentage. I submit that we should know approximately the cost of administration so far as the wages of these officers are concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUPUIS: The first thing I want to know is what will be the limits of the districts, and the second is what will be the approximate wages of the insurance officers, referees and so on.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be within the memory of those members of the committee who were present when the matter was discussed that this question already has been considered.

Mr. DUPUIS: And decided?

Mr. BENNETT: One of the leaders of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken—apparently he has many—asked whether or not we had formed any estimate as to what might be regarded as a reasonable salary, and I answered that question. There is no salary provided in the bill; such salary will be paid as may be necessary to ensure a competent person for the position of commissioner. Of course I cannot hope to argue the hon. gentleman into a state of mind at variance with his present expressed convictions, but if he will do me shall I say the honour of reading the section of the act he will find that provision is made as to the selection of the commissioners. Whatever may be the rights of the governor in council with respect to the appointment of most commissioners, there is a distinct limitation upon the power of the governor general in council in this statute, a limitation that it seems to me is a very important one, for the two contributing parties, the employer and the employee, are to have representatives on the commission. It is the function or duty of the governor general in council to ascertain from the representatives of those bodies, called the employers on the one hand and the employees on the other, as to who shall be their representatives on the commission. The governor general in council, as representing the state in this instance, will be responsible for the selection of the chairman, or the third member of the commission.

So I have answered this question I think for the fourth time. I am not at all impatient about it, but if hon. gentlemen stay away and after sections have been passed come back and ask that we should review all that has gone before it makes it difficult to transact the business of the house. The other day I pointed out that such numbers of districts would be created as might be necessary for the purpose of administering the act. It would be perfectly useless to create districts in communities where there was no industrial life and no insurance. Equally it becomes necessary to create such numbers of districts in industrial commodities as will serve the interests of those who may be concerned, with the least inconvenience. As to the number of insurance officers, referees, umpires and others who may be necessary efficiently, effectively and promptly to administer the act, to-day no man can answer that question. That must depend upon circumstances such as geography, location, ease of communication and matters of that kind. All these must be taken into consideration, just as in connection with old age pensions it was quite impossible to lay down in detail the method or manner in which an individual living at this point, that point or another point might be dealt with. Those charged with responsibility must be taken as capable of exercising that responsibility in the manner and form by the statute provided. That is all I can say. I have already promised the right hon. leader of the opposition that before the bill is taken out of committee I shall endeavour to give some estimate of the number of employees that might be necessary for the purpose of administering the act, including the labour exchanges to which we attach very considerable importance. Some effort has been made in that direction already and, as I say, before the bill is moved out of committee I trust that I shall be able to furnish that information.

I believe that answers all but one of the questions asked by the hon. gentleman. His other question was whether the boundaries of the districts would coincide with those of the judicial districts. The answer would be that they might or they might not. There is nothing in the act to impose upon the commission the necessity of making the boundaries coincide with those of judicial districts, and on the other hand there is no reason why they might not.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some of us in this corner of the house would like to know if the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville was speaking officially when he said the Liberal party were supporting this act just because they thought it was unconstitutional.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am ready to answer the hon. gentleman. I did not make any such statement. I am speaking for myself, and in doing that I believe I have enough to do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUPUIS: I believe hon. gentlemen on the other side who laugh have too much to do to speak for themselves. But it is my own conviction that the right hon. gentleman is doing this because he knows that the law is unconstitutional.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is compelled to withdraw that observation. I am a very patient person when I am dealing with a bill in committee, but under the rules of this house he is not permitted to say that I know this bill is unconstitutional.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is the opinion the Prime Minister has already stated.

Mr. BENNETT: I have already stated that I believe it to be constitutional; if it were not that I so believe it would not have been submitted to this house. The act does not wait to come into operation; it comes into operation at once, when it is assented to. Therefore I should like the hon. gentleman to conform to the rules of this house and withdraw that observation.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am ready, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw that statement. I submit myself to the rules of the house because I am in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: And I should like to say that if the hon. gentleman feels that way about the bill he should have voted against the second reading of it. I shall endeavour to provide him with the opportunity, on the third reading of the bill, of recording his vote against it.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to ask just one further question with regard to subsection (5). Is the right hon. Prime Minister satisfied that it is wise to leave the remuneration of these subordinate officers to the commission? Would it not be well to retain some control by approval of the governor general in council? Commissions have sometimes been known to get the bit between their teeth and run away with themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a fair question, but it is one that is difficult to resolve in the manner the hon. member indicates. I think he will agree that if we have confidence enough in the commission and place upon them these great responsibilities they must be left with minor responsibilities, under regulations. I think there is power in the regulation clause to limit any possible extravagant exercise of power.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the Prime Minister consider that subsection 3 of section 29 would give the commission power to make regulations regarding the remuneration to be given to employees? I would not understand that to be so. If not, is there any supervisory power over the commission? Should there not be some approval given by the governor in council to the scale of remuneration?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will observe the measure provides that the widest possible powers, in the matter of making regulations, shall rest with the commission. The governor in council must approve of such regulations before they become effective. Therefore I take it any government will see to it that the very difficulty to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has directed attention and about which the hon. member for West Middlesex has now spoken will be met and provided for. That is at least the purpose of the broad provisions made with respect to regulations, namely that the power of the commission to exercise the administrative functions for which it is created shall be exercised with the least possible restraint, and that there shall be restraint with respect to expenditures beyond which they should not go as provided by regulations passed by the governor in council.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is the point. I have read carefully the power given to make regulations, and I question very much if the fixing of the fees to be paid to these various officers coming under the subsection would properly come under the heading of regulations. I do not wish to labour the point but it does seem to me that whatever fees are paid should be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: In his last observation the hon. member directed attention to a matter of some importance. It would be quite impossible to administer the measure effectively if one had to send to Ottawa to get the approval of the governor in council for everything done. Paragraph (j) of section 38 states that the commission may also make regulations "generally for carrying this act into effect." I think the hon. member will agree that the construction placed upon words as broad as those is perfectly clear. I believe we could use the words "anything that may be necessary for the purpose of making the act effective." I have referred to page 28 in the bill, paragraph (j).

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand that, but I would call the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that that does not alter the situation, unless the power to make regulations includes the power to fix the scheduled fees or to pass upon the salaries which will be fixed under subsection 5. I would call the Prime Minister's attention to these words appearing in section 38:

> In addition to the authority otherwise conferred upon the commission to make regulations under this act, the commission may also make regulations;
> (j) generally for carrying this act into effect.

Those are the regulations. But if it is intended to include the power to fix the fees or salaries paid under subsection 5 of section 29 I would suggest that those powers be made subject to the approval of some body, either the governor in council or some other body.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I cannot add anything to what I have said. If this commission is fit to exercise the great powers conferred upon it by this measure, then it surely must be fit to exercise the power conferred upon it by subsection 5 of section 29, and to determine the reasonable fee to be paid in a particular case which may come before it.

Subsection 5 agreed to.

Section 29 agreed to.

On section 30—Claim procedure.

Subsections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On subsection 3—Insurance officer may disallow claim or refer to court of referees.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I assume that when an officer allows a claim, that is final.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 4 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On subsection 10—Decisions of umpire final.

Mr. DUPUIS: Since under the amendment to which the right hon. gentleman agreed there will not be any appeal to the exchequer court therefore there will be no right of appeal, except by the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the hon. member has not quite followed. Perhaps owing to a noise in the chamber he has been unable to hear. The appeal with which I dealt was an appeal to the exchequer court which would be limited to questions of law, arising under the provisions of the section to which we were referring earlier in the afternoon, namely, section 27. As it now stands the limitation is provided that the commission may, if it thinks fit, instead of deciding such a question, refer it to the exchequer court for decision. That however has nothing to do with the provisions of this section which deals entirely with claim procedure. I may say the experience in Great Britain has been that there are now fewer appeals in matters of this kind, because the insurance officers are more familiar with the situation. I do not say they claim as a matter of course, but when conditions are complied with the claim is allowed. If however there is difficulty in allowing the claim it may reach the umpire, and when it reaches the umpire there is no further appeal. That is final. That is not an appeal such as was provided for in section 27, which was an appeal with respect to matters distinctly limited under that section. This section deals only with procedure in connection with the adjustment of claims.

As the hon. gentleman is a member of the legal profession, I shall put it to him this way: If a client came to him with an accident insurance policy containing the usual provision that under a certain arbitral clause that would be a final adjudication, he might avail himself of that clause and dispose of the matter. But on the other hand there might be a question of law as to whether or not the accident in question was an accident contemplated within the provisions of the policy. In such an event, and applying the principle to this measure, we made the provision originally that there should be an appeal. That is now taken away however, and if the commission decides that—going back to the hypothetical case—as a matter of fact the accident in question was an accident contemplated within the terms of the policy, that settles the matter, there is no appeal and the adjustment is complete. But if on the other hand the commission is doubtful as to whether or not this accident—I shall call it an accident—this circumstance did or did not constitute an accident within the policy, then they have a right to submit the question to a judge of the exchequer court for determination of that question of law. That is an analogy, I submit to the hon. gentleman, of what happens in his practice frequently. The question of the adjustment of the amount of loss even under a fire policy is a matter to be settled partly by arbitration, and the question whether or not liability attaches under the policy is a matter of law. In this case, it is not a question to be settled by the commission, it is not a question of appellant or respondent, but it is a question of reference to the court by the commission itself because of uncertainty. This section deals with the procedure necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the amount to be paid to the claimant under the provisions of the statute itself. There are some detailed modifications of the general principle I have indicated, but that is the general view.

Mr. DUPUIS: I thank the right hon. gentleman for his explanation. I understand that all these appeals to the exchequer court will come generally speaking from the commission. The right hon. gentleman may be surprised that I put the question, and perhaps he may come back and say that if I had been here earlier I would not have asked the question, but I do not think it would be proper or right for the hon. gentleman to say that. Another reason why I was led to ask the question was that he speaks so low that sometimes we cannot hear him. It is not one's fault if one is a back bencher, and I had quite a hard time to hear the hon. gentleman's remarks just before he took his seat.

Mr. POULIOT: He swallows his words.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am serious. If I am wrong in my understanding of this question I want the right hon. gentleman to say so, and I believe I am wrong because he laughed when I put the question again. I infer therefore that an appeal will lie not only for the commission but for the insured. If that is so, it will not be very encouraging for an employee who is going to get from six to eleven dollars a week indemnity to have to go as high as to the exchequer court and take the risk of paying the costs of such an appeal. I understand that it is within the competence of the court to decide.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I do not desire the hon. gentleman for one moment to labour under a misapprehension. I only regret that I was unable to make my explanation clear to him. It was when he rose in his place and said, after my explanation, that he understood an appeal could only be taken by the government—

Mr. DUPUIS: By the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: —by the commission, that I realized that I had failed to make clear to him what the explanation was. I was a back bencher myself once, so I sympathize with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DUPUIS: It might be the last chance he has, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only assure the hon. gentleman that my progress forward was never accomplished in the manner he has used today; I can assure him of that. If he did not hear me I desire to make perfectly clear to him what the provisions of the act are. The act deals with the procedure for the purpose of collecting benefits. That section is the section now under consideration. That section provides that the decision of the umpire shall be final, and there is no appeal to the exchequer court or any other court. That is number 1.

Number 2. Section 27, which we were discussing earlier this afternoon, as originally drafted provided for an appeal upon the matters distinctly mentioned in that section, and that appeal was available to the insured or contributor. We have eliminated that, and what is left is not an appeal at all but the right of the commission, if uncertain on a point of law, to refer that matter to the court. I endeavoured by illustration, and I see that I failed in my illustration as well as in my explanation, to make clear to the hon. gentleman, who is a member of the legal profession, that if a client comes to him with a fire policy alleging that his property has been destroyed, the determination of the amount that shall be paid may be done by arbitration without in any sense admitting liability on the part of the company. Then the company has, or I will say it may have, the right to say: We deny liability, and we desire that a case be stated for the opinion of the court as to whether or not under the facts agreed upon there is any liability under this policy in law.

This provision before us enables a reference to be made to a judge of the exchequer court by the commission to settle a point of law by stating that point and referring it to the exchequer court. There is no relation between section 27 and the section we are now dealing with, namely, section 30, which has to do with procedural matters in connection with claims. It will be found that the next section, 31, deals with legal proceedings. I trust that I have made the matter clear to the hon. gentleman.

Subsection 9 agreed to.

Subsections 10 to 13 inclusive, section 30, agreed to.

On subsection 14—References to claims for benefit; construction.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Surely this clause is not necessary at all. It reads:

> In this section references to claims for benefit shall be construed as including references to questions arising in relation to such claims—

Surely that is understood from the previous sections that we have gone over. It continues.

> —and references to allowing or disallowing a claim shall be construed as including references to determining a question in favour of or adversely to a claimant.

It seems to me that that is just a repetition.

Mr. DUPUIS: It would take some effort to explain that clause.

Mr. BENNETT: That is taken from section 22, subsection 2, of the British act of 1920. It may have been that in the early days they were anxious to express themselves with great clearness with respect to these matters. In the British act it is in somewhat vaguer terms than are used in our statute. I will let the clause stand in order to look further into it. I cannot see that it serves any particularly useful purpose, but there may be some purpose in it, and I will look into it and let the hon. gentleman know.

Subsection stands.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Shall section 30, with the exception of clause 14, carry? Carried.

On section 31—Penalty for obtaining benefit or avoiding any payment through misrepresentation.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On subsection 2—Penalty for failure to pay contributions or for contravention of act or regulations.

Mr. BRADETTE: Where there is a penalty involving the alternatives of fine and imprisonment the poorer person is at a disadvantage; he finds it impossible to pay the fine and in consequence is sent to gaol while the person who is better off, who can afford to pay the fine, escapes imprisonment. There are many instances where people who have been sent to gaol under such circumstances would have avoided imprisonment had they been fortunate enough to have the money to pay the fine. Would it not be possible to do away with this discrepancy? It discriminates against the poor man.

Mr. BENNETT: Before proceeding to discuss the point raised by the hon. gentleman, may I refer the hon. member for Swift Current to the provision contained in subsection 11 of section 8 of the English act of 1930, which reads:

> In this section references to claims for benefit shall be construed as including references to questions arising in connection with such claims, and references to allowing or disallowing a claim shall be construed as including references to determining a question in favour of or adversely to a claimant.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It is exactly the same, except as regards the words "in relation to."

Mr. BENNETT: It was as late as 1930 that they put that provision in. I fancy that some very enterprising lawyer raised the question as to jurisdiction of the authorities to inquire into a collateral circumstance in connection with a claim, and this removes doubt in that regard. That is the only explanation I can think of.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It seems to me that this bill is involved enough without adding unnecessary clauses.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree, and that is why I take it that this subsection is inserted, because the hon. gentleman knows how technical lawyers have sometimes become with respect to these matters, and the court feels bound by the exact terms of the statute. This removes doubt. I trust my hon. friend sees no reason why the provision should not stand.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BOTHWELL: I take no exception.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Shall subection 14 of section 30 carry? Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps it will be within the recollection of some members of the committee, of one at least, that there was a statutory inquiry with respect to abuses under the original act passed in England and it became necessary to have very stringent regulations and in some instances severe penalties imposed for the purpose of preventing frauds under the act. This section, which is taken largely from the English act of 1920 and other provisions of it, as late as 1927 and 1934, contemplates imprisonment not beyond a given number of months. That leaves it open for the magistrate to impose a single day; or he may decide to follow the example of a very distinguished English judge and say to the defendant, "You have been in this court since morning, have served your sentence, and are now discharged." That may be the case, but this is put in as a deterrent rather than as a punishment; this provision is intended to deter rather than to punish. That is the purpose of it, and I think that on reflection the hon. gentleman will see that perhaps in an act of this sort it is desirable to follow that course.

Mr. BRADETTE: I readily understand the argument of the Prime Minister, but every hon. member will realize the discrepancy between a fine of $50 and imprisonment for three months. The Prime Minister knows that it is within the jurisdiction of any judge to impose the full penalty and my greatest objection is the fact that while some people may be in a position to pay the fine and escape imprisonment the poor man will have to go to gaol. The Prime Minister must realize that great injustice might be done. I fully appreciate what he has said, and no doubt if he were administering the act himself the same arguments that he has used would appeal to him. But the fact remains that we are arming a judge or a justice of the peace with what might prove to be a dangerous weapon. Everyone knows that very often it is easy to pay a fine of $50 and escape three months' imprisonment. There is no equilibrium between the two penalties and a great danger lies in this provision.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say I appreciate the observations of the hon. gentleman; but may I refer him to the experience of this country during the last two or three years in the matter of relief. The only way in which an adequate deterrent could be exercised was to bring home to those who endeavoured to defraud the country the seriousness of the situation. It is most likely —I think highly probable—that any magistrate or justice of the peace would be particularly anxious not to deal harshly with any person under the act; but the fact that an offender might find himself faced with the punishment of a fine of only $5 or $2 would be to create a very great wrong against his fellows. And it is to deter him from that that this provision is inserted. The very observations made by the hon. gentleman support the view I have expressed, because he himself says that it is a very severe penalty. Now, the whole purpose of the act is not to punish but to deter, and if the hon. gentleman keeps that fact in mind he will have no difficulty, I think, in reconciling this section with his views.

Subsection 2 agreed to.

Subsection 3 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 32—Power to take and conduct proceedings.

Section agreed to.

On section 33—Civil proceedings by employee against employer for neglect to comply with act.

Mr. NEILL: I would direct attention to the latter part of subsection (1), in which it is provided that if an employer has neglected to pay the sums he collected from his employee, and the employee in consequence thereof loses the benefits for which he paid and to which he is entitled, the employee shall be entitled to recover from the employer as a civil debt a sum equal to the amount of unemployment benefit so lost. That would arise only where an employer deducted the money properly from his employee and failed to hand it over, and it would be a rare occurrence; it would almost always happen in some fly by night company on the eve of bankruptcy. In that event liability for a civil debt to the employee would be of no use at all to the employee, and an injustice would be done which would make the act very unpopular among a large section of people to whom it had been heralded. I hesitate to venture into the realm of law, but is there not some provision in connection with chattel mortgages and also the transfer of notes, providing for what is known as the protection of an innocent purchaser? Could not the employee be held to be in the same position, in which event his remedy would not lie in a civil debt against the delinquent employer but he would collect the benefit for which he himself had actually paid, and the commission would either stand the loss or proceed against the defaulting employer? I submit that question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, this does not lessen or abrogate the right to proceed criminally against the employer if he has wrongfully converted to his own use moneys collected. This deals with the case of default that is short of criminality and at the same time lays the foundation for an action to recover the amount. The point made by the hon. gentleman is a technical question, but it would disturb the actuarial basis of the fund if to any substantial extent moneys were paid to a claimant when contributions had been made only by one party, the state, and none by either the employer or the employee. The fact that the employer has stolen the proceeds shall not operate against the employee's recovering them. The commission, I fancy, will exercise under its powers extreme care with respect to matters of that kind. You cannot always guard against the weaknesses of the human element in any of these matters. I think the hon. gentleman has had experience enough to know how extremely difficult if not impossible it is to guard against every contingency of that nature. I think the measure contemplates that the greatest promptness shall be exercised, because we are down to the weekly benefit, the lowest unit which could be used. I quite appreciate the point raised by the hon. member, but I do not think it can be dealt with in the way he suggests.

Mr. NEILL: I was not worrying about the legal aspect or the liability for a criminal offence. It simply means that this man after paying, for months, perhaps for years, believing in the integrity of his employer, claims the benefit and is refused with the statement that he should sue somebody who is a thousand miles away and has disappeared. Such a thing will make the act seem horribly unfair to the people it is supposed to benefit. The Prime Minister says that the actuarial basis of the measure might be disturbed, but such a thing will happen very seldom and it will be quite easy to take that into consideration in drawing up the basis. It is one of those things that will be regarded as grossly unfair to the employee, and it is not going to affect to any substantial extent the financial element in the fund itself.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman by the statement he made just now has answered his difficulty. He said that the man might find, after having paid for months, that his employer had converted the funds to his own use. That could not happen beyond a few weeks because the function of collecting with the lowest unit of time, namely a week, is covered by the bill, and when the assessments are made they must be paid within a reasonable time after that or else the commission is at once after the delinquent for the purpose of finding out why the assessments have not been paid. That is the answer.

Mr. NEILL: But the Prime Minister must admit that this legislation will deal with industries in remote places. The employer has, I understand, to send the payments in weekly.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the unit.

Mr. NEILL: Suppose it is discovered at Ottawa that Bill Jones has not sent in his payments for a certain period; the civil service here does not move very rapidly. It would be a week or two before they would get round to notifying him. The mail service where he lives is only three times a month. In that case months might pass before he was stirred up and by that time it might be found that the man had left the country. I admit this might not go on for years, but it might go on for months.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the hon. member said months.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is this point which the Prime Minister might consider when he is answering the hon. member for Comox-Alberni: why should the employee be obligated to take the civil action? These moneys are due to the commission, to the trust fund, and in my opinion it is the commission that should take the civil action. The employee should not be under any liability in connection with the case at all.

Mr. BENNETT: There is much force in what both the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni have said in that regard, but the reason is obvious. It may be we can overcome the difficulty. The reason is that the person who has suffered by default on the part of the employer is entitled to bring the action because he has actually lost the benefit. If the commission does this, of course it does it not as the loser of the benefit, but as the organization supposed to collect the benefit. I may say to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that the reason why provision is made in this legislation for stamps is to deal with those cases so far remote that it is difficult to keep closely in touch with them quickly. I do not think under the regulations as framed under the bill there will be the slightest difficulty, because they will provide that there shall be some evidence forthcoming to the employee that the employer has made the payment for the week, in remote communities by stamps purchased from the post office. There is always a post office even in the remote sections. That is the safeguard. But I am quite willing that the subclause should stand and I shall look further into the question whether the commission might not bring the action, although it is purely a technical matter in connection with the right of a person to bring the action other than the person who has suffered the loss and is entitled to the benefit. That is purely a matter of law.

Mr. NEILL: To follow up what the hon. member for Bow River has said: would a comparable case not be if I had paid my taxes and the government official who had collected them had absconded with them? I would not be told to go and sue that official.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a great difference between paying taxes to a government official and a contribution to a fund. The question is purely a technical one. If there is any way to overcome the technical difficulty, it will be done.

Subsection 1 stands.

Subsections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 34—Inspection.

Subsections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On subsection 3—Penalty for delay or obstruction of inspection.

Mr. BENNETT: I hear an hon. member say, "severe." This is rather severe. The provisions are drastic, but the committee will recall that in connection with inspection, the international labour organization has expressed the strongest possible opinion, and if we are to make effective the legislation we must clothe the officials with extraordinarily great powers to do so. This follows the provisions of the last modification of the English act so far as may be necessary for that purpose, but there has been little or no change in the English act since 1920.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I see in the English act they have a provision that no one is supposed to give up or submit any documents that might incriminate him.

Mr. BENNETT: I think our act is sufficiently broad without that.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsection 4 agreed to.

Section 34 agreed to.

On section 35, subsection 1—Unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. VENIOT: I suppose it would not be in order under this clause to discuss the matter of the actuarial computation. Is there not another section held over?

Mr. BENNETT: I think I held the section over for the hon. gentleman.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 2—Contributions out of moneys provided by parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If the fund to be created under this act had a deficit would the deficit be made good by vote of parliament in a subsequent year?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is of course touching upon the vital point that gave so much concern in England, and which still is doing so. This act does not contemplate a deficit: that is all I can usefully say. I can answer his question purely as a lawyer by saying that parliament can of course cure any defect in respect to it, and make good any deficit that might arise, whether after or before the fact. Parliament's power would extend that far. But the act is based on the assumption that there will not be a deficit.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is also based on certain insurable employments and certain excepted employments. We had a general discussion the other evening as to whether the commission as such could take any excepted employments and make them insurable. Naturally if that were done it would alter the actuarial basis of this bill. Does the Prime Minister mean to convey that the actuarial basis is sound enough to make the scheme carry itself even if any of the excepted employments were taken in?

Mr. BENNETT: If they were analogous employments that would be so; and it is in the power of the commission to deal with anomalies under the act. If for instance the British Columbia loggers were brought under the act it could not interfere with the solvency of the fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): After the discussion the other evening I looked up the anomalies sections of the British act. There I think they are very much restricted as to how far they can add employments. Of course under the 1934 act practically everyone is included, but before that it was limited. Unless there is some direction from this committee to the commission I am afraid the commission are going to be very much restricted in their power to transfer any employment from the excepted class to the insurable employments. I still think that would affect to a certain extent the financial basis of the fund. The point I want to establish is that if such took place, would application have to be made by the minister to parliament for further funds, in case the present basis were not enough to carry the scheme?

Mr. BENNETT: It is quite obvious that under the terms of this statute as printed the payment into the fund of moneys other than those received from sources one, two and three, the latter being the state itself, is not contemplated. And the limitation imposed in the section now under consideration upon the payments to be made by the state does not of course deal with the costs of administration. There is power to make payments under governor general's warrant, but as the hon. gentleman knows as a former minister, no governor general's warrant can be permitted to stand without having an estimate placed before the house to cover the amount mentioned in the warrant. So I think I must answer his question in the negative.

With respect to the anomalies clause I also looked into it since we were last discussing it. Under the English act the provisions were rather restrictive, and if there is any doubt with respect to some of these matters I propose to make it clear. But it is not contemplated that the commission as such can enlarge the scope of the act except with respect to matters that will not change the actuarial basis. I am advised that the introduction of additional numbers of substantially the same class would have no other effect than that of increasing the number participating.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So that generally speaking any of the excepted classes cannot be brought under the insurable employments clause except by action of some future parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the general principle, yes.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) I think yesterday cited a class of individuals that he said investigation had shown would very seldom ask for any benefits. Consequently I judge that they would be a very desirable class, from the actuarial standpoint, to have in the scheme. The Prime Minister said in that case they could be taken out under the anomalies clause. Would not that upset the actuarial basis?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was not the anomalies clause, if the hon. gentleman will pardon me. There is a special provision to deal with that particular matter. That is the reason that we have had to say firmly that we will not agree to take particular people out of this act, the very reason the hon. gentleman has mentioned. The class that it is desirable to have within the act is the class that will make the fewest claims. Life insurance companies are always anxious to have good risks, with whom the actual length of life far exceeds the expectation on which the computation of premiums is based. That is so in the case of this act as well.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the Prime Minister has stated on several occasions that this bill essentially follows the English act. I find that under the English act the contributions by the employer, the employee and the state are approximately the same. I believe under the last amended act of 1934 contributions by the state, the employer and the employee are ten pence each. Prior to that they were eight pence by the employer, seven pence for the employee, and seven pence by the state. Now according to this clause the government are to pay one-fifth of fifty cents, which is ten cents, and in addition are to assume the total cost of administration. It is true, as pointed out on several occasions, that under the English act the cost of administration is borne out of the total contributions to the fund. If I am right, twelve and a half per cent of fifty cents works out at about six and a half cents which the government will have to contribute as cost of administration. If I take then the ten cents that they are going to contribute plus six and a half cents as the cost of administration, the government's contribution to the scheme will be sixteen and a half cents, or about two-thirds of what employer and employee together are to contribute. If in the main this bill follows the British act, I feel that the government should be just as generous or ready to support the fund in the same ratio as do the government of Great Britain. Their contribution should be equal to that of employer and employee; it should be twenty-five cents at least for persons over the age of twenty-one. I should like to know why, if the British act is to be followed all through, it is not followed in this regard, and the contribution by the state made the same as that of employer and employee.

Mr. BENNETT: I explained a few days ago to the hon. gentleman that the cost of administration that is to be paid by the state comes not out of the fund at all but from money provided by parliament for that purpose. The uncertainty as to the cost of administration governed the determination as to the amount to be paid into the fund by the state. That has been settled at one-fifth of the contribution, and if later experience warrants of course there can be such change as may be necessary, but we must proceed upon the assumption that we are conducting a solvent and safe undertaking. For that reason this has been thought desirable. It cannot be argued that because we have followed the English act in most particulars we should follow it in every particular, because the sums payable here are not the sums payable in England. As I have said, however, in a broad and general sense this statute is founded upon the English act, and whenever I was asked I gave the sections of the English acts from which this act has been drawn. This section, dealing with financial provisions, has engaged very closely the attention of the government, and after very much consideration it has been thought that at the present time it would be undesirable to go beyond what is provided in the act. That is the arbitrary determination of the issue in the experience in Great Britain and our knowledge of conditions in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A few moments ago the Prime Minister said that naturally it was desired to get the best risks. In that connection I desire to read a telegram which I received only to-day:

> Re unemployment insurance we emphatically suggest that such good risks as banking, insurance and financial businesses be included as see no reason why they should not help lighten the burden by contributing to fund. Suggest also that if lumber and fishing are exempt construction industry being equally seasonal should also be exempt otherwise fund would be unfairly burdened.

That is from the Pacific Lime Company of Vancouver. I think there is a certain amount of dissatisfaction that some of these good risks are not included and also that some of the bad risks are.

Mr. BENNETT: I think upon analysis it will be found that the reasons for the non-inclusion of banking and financial institutions are most excellent. According to the investigations made in Great Britain, referred to in the report of the last royal commission, there were no claims against the fund at all from those sources. They had their own scheme on a very large scale, and it was not thought desirable to have two. We are being pressed very strongly every day not to include in these schemes some of those already included on the ground that they have their own arrangements in matters of this kind. We have taken the position that we cannot do that in fairness to the fund itself and those who will receive benefits under it. The position of the financial institutions is different; it was never intended to cover them. They are not industrialists in that sense, and to bring them in just for the purpose of taking money which they are already paying to someone else is not the purpose of the statute. This measure is just what its title indicates; it is created for the purpose of dealing largely with industrial undertakings. That is the whole idea; it is intended to include shops, industries, railway companies and undertakings of that kind. Many of these people press very strongly that they should not be included, and they put their case on the very basis that was outlined by the hon. member for North Waterloo. There must be a determination of this issue, and we have accepted the principle that was adopted in Great Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Do all the banks in Canada provide schemes for the insurance of their employees?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a question I am not in a position to answer, but I can say that I have knowledge of at least four or five schemes of this kind.

Mr. VENIOT: Some do not.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 3—Withdrawals.

Mr. NEILL: Is it proposed that these moneys will be paid weekly or monthly to the beneficiaries?

Mr. BENNETT: Weekly.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsections 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

On subsection 7—Deposits in chartered banks.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there any provision in the Bank of Canada Act that prevents deposits being made with the Bank of Canada?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will perhaps remember that the Bank of Canada does not contemplate checking accounts by anyone. In order to overcome that difficulty and permit the Bank of Canada to be the depository of the fund, subsection 3 of section 35 enables two commissioners to withdraw the money from chartered banks. In order that there may be no question as to the earmarking of the fund that may be credited or deposited in a chartered bank it is provided that, although it is away from the original depository, it still shall be regarded as part of that fund.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 8—Pledging of securities to procure loans.

Mr. BRADETTE: What is the meaning of the words, "any of the securities of the fund"? Would that be actual cash? There would be no notes receivable or things of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: It is contemplated that there may be a fund as large as $40,000,000 in a year. Therefore it is possible that investments may have to be made at one time and that at a later period instead of selling the investments it may be desirable to borrow, pledging with the Bank of Canada any of the securities of the fund. That is the reason for this section.

Subsection agreed to.

On subsection 9—Extension of powers of Bank of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is it the usual practice to amend one act by the insertion of a clause in another? We are really amending the Bank of Canada Act by this subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is quite correct, and it is not the usual practice to amend one statute by the provisions contained in another. But where the amendment is so slight as merely to permit money to be deposited and withdrawn, it was thought undesirable to amend the Bank of Canada Act to that extent. I think the hon. gentleman will agree that with an amendment so slight as that indicated here it serves a useful purpose to do it in this way rather than to amend the other act.

Mr. POWER: May I point out that the Bank of Canada is authorized to do two things? I believe that under subsections 4 and 5 it is really authorized to make the investments. Is that not so?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. POWER: It is not only authorized to accept deposits, but I understand that it is also to have a sort of general supervision of the investment fund.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will observe that under subsection 6 the Bank of Canada shall be employed to carry out transactions authorized by the said committee under the last preceding subsection of this section; in other words they become the fiscal agent of the commission, and the sum standing to the credit of the fund which is not required to meet current expenditure may be invested in obligations, payable in Canadian currency, of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada or any province of Canada, and investments so made may be sold or exchanged. These transactions may be carried on in the manner indicated under subsection 5, and to the extent to which it is possible to utilize the existing machinery—

Mr. POWER: It is not the bank as such; it is the governor?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

On section 36—Establishment of unemployment insurance advisory committee.

On subsection 1.

Mr. HEAPS: As I read this clause I am just wondering whether it is necessary to have such an advisory committee. There may be good reasons for this provision, but I am afraid that if we have too many organizations under the act we are apt to have a division of authority which may militate against its successful operation. Personally I think the powers that are to be vested in the advisory committee might be very easily assumed by the commission that is to be appointed. Let them have the authority. I think the commission will be very able, and it does not appear that the duties of this advisory committee will be arduous. Having in mind the other committees to be appointed under the measure I have the impression that the measure may work considerably better without the committee in question.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, for the purposes of this measure there is no more important section than the one now under consideration. The maintenance of the solvency of the undertaking is of paramount importance. Supervision of the commission is desirable. The method of supervision is a matter for parliament to determine. In Great Britain last year they decided to enact section 17 of their measure to meet the difficulty I have mentioned, and they have provided for the appointment of a committee. Although I have not up to the present been in a position to give the names of the members of the committee, the general idea is that citizens who are interested in the welfare of the country, who are willing to give some little public service, and who have some interest in the maintenance on a proper basis of the undertaking, would constitute an advisory committee so that the solvency might be maintained, so that the functioning of the measure may be assured and the purposes for which it has been created accomplished. I need not say to this committee that the experience in Great Britain in connection with unemployment insurance warranted their taking the steps I have indicated. We are desirous of beginning under such conditions as will ensure the maintenance of the conditions at which we aim, and the advisory committee is to be set up with that in mind. I do not know whether or not the house would be interested in hearing the provisions of the English act in that regard. Some considerable time would be involved in reading it, but for the information of hon. members I shall do so:

17. Establishment of unemployment insurance statutory committee and duties of committee as respects unemployment fund.

(1) There shall be constituted a committee, to be called "the Unemployment Insurance Statutory Committee," to give advice and assistance to the minister in connection with the discharge of his functions under the Unemployment Insurance Acts and to perform the duties hereafter specified in this part of this act; and the provisions of part I of the third schedule to this act shall have effect with respect to the constitution and proceedings of the committee.

(2) The committee shall, not later than the end of February in every year, make a report to the minister on the financial condition of the unemployment fund on the 31st day of December last preceding, and shall also make a report to the minister on the financial condition of the fund whenever they consider that the fund is or is likely to become, and is likely to continue to be, insufficient to discharge its liabilities, and may make a report on the financial condition of the fund at such other times as they think fit.

(3) If the committee at any time report that the unemployment fund is or is likely to become, and is likely to continue to be, insufficient to discharge its liabilities, or is and is likely to continue to be more than reasonably sufficient to discharge its liabilities, the report shall contain—

(a) recommendations for the amendment either generally or in relation to special classes of insured contributors, of the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Acts referred to in part II of the third schedule to this act or of the provisions of any previous order made under this section, being such amendments as in the opinion of the committee are required in order to make the fund, as the case may be, sufficient or no more than reasonably sufficient to discharge its liabilities; and

(b) an estimate of the effect which the amendments recommended will have on the financial conditions of the fund; and, where the committee report that the fund is and is likely to continue to be more than reasonably sufficient to discharge its liabilities, the report may contain recommendations for the application of any sum towards the discharge of the liabilities mentioned in subsection (2) of the section of this act next following.

(4) The committee shall give such notice as they consider sufficient of their intention to make a report under this section and shall take into consideration any representations which may be made to them with respect thereto.

(5) Within the period of two months after the receipt by the minister of any report under this section or, if parliament is not sitting, at the expiration of that period, then, as soon after the expiration thereof as parliament sits, the minister shall lay the report before parliament, and in a case where the report contains recommendations for the amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Acts or of any previous order made under this section, shall after consultation with the treasury lay before parliament—

(a) the draft of an order making such amendments as are duly recommended by the report, or, if and so far as any amendment so recommended is not adopted by the minister, making such amendments (being amendments which the committee had power to recommend) as will in his opinion have substantially the same effect on the financial condition of the unemployment fund as that estimated by the report as being the effect of the amendments recommended; and

(b) if and in so far as the amendments proposed by the draft order differ from the amendments recommended my the report, a statement of the reasons for the difference.

(6) If each house resolves that the draft of an order laid before it under this section be approved, the minister shall make an order in the terms of the draft to take effect on such date as may be specified in the order, and as from that date the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Acts and of any such previous order as aforesaid shall have effect subject to the provisions of the order.

(7) So much of the Unemployment Insurance Acts, 1920 to 1933, as provides for the variation, otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of this section, of the rates of contributions in force at the commencement of this act shall cease to have effect.

(8) This section shall come ito operation on the passing of this act.

Mr. NEILL: I fully appreciate what the Prime Minister has read, but are not the duties and responsibilities he has mentioned those of the commission? In Great Britain the committee were to advise the minister, who operates the act, but we have in Canada a commission to operate our act. By naming a committee we would be putting such committee over the commission, and would be placing them in a position of supervising everything. To me it seems like painting the lily and adorning the rose.

Mr. BENNETT: I think if the hon. member had read the actuarial report he would have observed the importance they attach to this provision. It is a salutary provision to prevent the possibility of the fund falling to a point where it is no longer able to meet the obligations or, on the other hand, to prevent faulty administration with respect to the measure. Auditors will report, of course. But a committee—I hope a committee receiving no salary or remuneration—composed of well intentioned men, men with high ideals of public service, would endeavour to discharge a duty to the state by assisting in the administration of a difficult measure. The fund under the English act fell into debt. If my memory serves me correctly it was in debt to the extent of £90,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): £115,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is correct, yes. Introducing his last budget, Mr. Churchill, chancellor of the exchequer, pointed out that because of what had taken place it was necessary for the state to assume obligations which if capitalized represented the enormous sum of £750,000,000. This is the method devised in Great Britain to insure against a recurrence of such a condition. In this measure I believe the provision now under discussion will have a most salutary effect, and I ask the committee to adopt it as a means of preserving the integrity of the fund and the usefulness of the measure itself.

Mr. NEILL: Is that not a duty of the commission?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is true.

Mr. NEILL: Are we not reflecting upon their ability?

Mr. BENNETT: No, I think not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Listening to the Prime Minister I fail to see how the committee would act as a safeguard to any greater extent than the commission would.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is this: Some of the old banking institutions have a committee composed of high minded and public spirited citizens who pass upon certain matters for the purpose of ensuring, shall I say, the disposition of some of the banks' moneys. In the olden days that used to be a factor with respect to the charitable funds of banks. Hon. members will observe that the section is designed to secure the good will and active participation of people who will give of their wide experience and great knowledge—financial, industrial, social or commercial—to assist the state, through the commission, in the administration of the act. If to-day they had a commission in England, and were not bound by certain conditions, I think I could say that in all probability they would not administer the act through the ministry, the reasons having been given on more than one occasion as to why that would be so. We are endeavouring to divorce this measure (1) from politics and (2) from the pressure which has always been exercised in connection with legislation of this kind, very often rendering it ineffective because of an unfair drain being made upon the resources of the fund through hasty and ill advised action and through a desire to secure a temporary measure of popularity for those charged with responsibility of a political character. This commission is, we think, divorced from that so far as may be humanly possible.

I am not unmindful of my own experience in connection with another commission. Despite the fact that the government selected a commission and left to it the working out of the public ownership of radio, the fact is, and a very evident fact too, that the government is blamed for its administration, and political capital is made of the manner in which it is administered. Now all that a government can do is to endeavour to secure a commission that will administer any public utility or any public act subject to the provisions of the act. When it fails to do so it supplies, shall I say, aid and succour and support to those who are opposed to what has been so often designated as public ownership. For my own part what I said with respect to the public continuing to own the radio I still feel, although I am not unmindful that a very great body of public opinion has grown up in this country entirely at variance with my own opinion.

The question of the administration of this act gave the government a great deal of concern. It had to consider what several hon. gentlemen have suggested: Why not take it over as a department of government and administer it? Well, my reading, scanty as it is, with respect to this has been sufficient to indicate to me clearly that in one country the immediate effort of one party was to secure popular support by promising that they would raise the benefits under the act at the next election, and the other party said: We will go you one better. That position with respect to a fund such as this is deplorable and it cannot but result in disaster. We know the pros and cons, the advantages and the disadvantages, the benefits and drawbacks—although that is hardly the word—that would result from the administration of this act as a branch of the public service, and we came to the conclusion that it was best to create a commission. Having resolved to do so we then looked about for a method to create it that would so far as possible remove it from politics. I had recourse to the provisions of the international labour organization's regulations, and so we dealt with it in that way, the employees being represented through the best means they had of expressing themselves to the government of the day, the employers being represented, and the state making a contribution.

I earnestly ask the committee to think over very carefully the section in question, because I believe that if we can only make these sections really effective it may do much to induce people to take a voluntary interest in public service of the state, which is so characteristic and perhaps reaches its highest development in Great Britain. When I think of the reservoir from which they have to draw, the trained minds of men and women who are always ready and willing to give voluntary service to enable the state the more readily to discharge its duties—and I am amazed at times at the number of such committees and the number of men and women who are always prepared to assist the government of the day, and continuing to function even although there is a change of government—I am hopeful that this may be the beginning of some such attitude on the part of public spirited citizens in this country, and I know of no place in which public service could be better rendered than in giving effect to the provisions of these sections for the administration of this act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How does the type of person likely to be appointed to the advisory committee differ from the type of person to be appointed to the commission? As far as I can see, the only difference is that one set is paid and the other is not paid.

Mr. BENNETT: One is a commission responsible for the administration of the act, and the other is a committee discharging the duties of a critic and endeavouring to assist the commission in the operation of the statute. Such a committee can do a great deal. I know whereof I speak, for I have seen it in actual practice—good will; the desire to help; the desire to make something effective; the desire to offer criticism, not in any carping spirit for the purpose of destroying, but with a view to enabling the thing to be done better than it has been done. Who will deny the value of such a committee?

The selection of this group of men and women is a grave responsibility. Wherein the commission and the committee differ is that in the one case you have responsibility for administration; in the other you have responsibility for observation, analysis, and criticism, for the purpose of promoting the administrative functions and powers of the commission, and above all to see that this fund, which after all is a great national trust fund, is administered so as to prevent it becoming insolvent and thereby bringing sorrow to those who should benefit from it. There is a very clear distinction between the two, and I think upon reflection the hon. gentleman will agree that that is so. A voluntary committee of able men and women is very desirable in checking over the administration of any of the functions of a commission if with good will they desire to assist them in attaining the ends and objects sought by the statute.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In England one member of the advisory committee must be a woman. Has the Prime Minister given consideration to that?

Mr. BENNETT: I have, and the hon. gentleman may have noticed that I twice, in speaking of the committee, said able men and women.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is nothing in this act to make the selection of a woman compulsory.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is thought desirable, that can be done, but I contemplate that one of the members of the committee shall be a woman. It must be remembered that the situation is somewhat different in Great Britain from what it is here, but a provision can be inserted in the measure if it is thought desirable.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Far be it from me to deprive the Prime Minister, the government or the commission of the opportunity of salutary and helpful advice. Personally I am not particularly interested in this clause. I have no objection to it, but it is an extraordinary clause, almost as extraordinary as the speech the Prime Minister has just made about it. If there should be an advisory committee in the case of this commission, why not in the case of the radio commission, which also expends a very large sum of money? Why not in the case of the railway commission? Why not in the case of the civil service commission, involving as it does the welfare of human beings and their appointment to office? Why stop at one commission? The argument made by the Prime Minister in an attempt to make this appear to be similar to the British provision does not upon examination hold water, because everything that this new statutory committee in England has to do now falls within the ambit of the functions of the commission to be appointed under this act. In England they advise the minister, and the minister surely needs advice in the administration of a scheme of this magnitude. If this bill set up only a minister, then certainly there could be no argument against providing an advisory committee to assist him in carrying on his functions. But this advisory committee which the Prime Minister proposes, and the statutory committee in England, are two very different things indeed. This advisory committee is to protect the fund and see that it is not invaded, that sums are not overspent and all the rest of it. And yet we have on the preceding page the provision for an investment committee. While the investment committee's powers under that section would seem to be for the purpose of designating the type of investment for which the fund may be used, surely its powers might properly be enlarged by giving them the right to investigate from time to time the condition of the fund. While I have no objection to the appointment of the advisory committee—not the slightest—on the other hand, if I were on the commission or if I were chairman of the commission, I should feel that the Prime Minister was hardly paying me a very high compliment. There are doubtless many men who would be glad to accept a position on the commission, but anyone who does so now knows that this body of courteous and kindly persons will investigate the daily operations of the commission; otherwise of what value is it if this body is not to watch the operations from day to day? It is a very pleasant thing and I hope the Prime Minister is right when he hopes that the chief purpose will be achieved, namely, the inculcation in some people of a true spirit of public service.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman suggests that the chairman of the commission might feel that he was not being placed in a very sound position because someone else would have the right to look into and investigate the operations of the statute. No judge of first instance ever hesitates to be appointed because he knows that his judgments will be subject to review in another court.

Mr. NEILL: But the other judge does not give advice.

On subsection 3—Not eligible to sit in parliament.

Mr. HEAPS: If this committee is to be honorary, without pay, is there any reason why members of parliament should be debarred from giving their services?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): They ought to develop the sense of public service.

Mr. BENNETT: It is felt it would be unfair to overload them with a sense of public service.

On subsection 4—Members representative of employers and workers.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What method will be followed in the choice of representatives of workers? It says, "after consultation with employers." In connection with the international labour organization there have always been difficulties in view of the provision of the labour part of the peace treaty that the employees' representative should be a member of the organization representing the largest number of workers in the country. The result is that the representative of the employees is always representing the same organization, and the technical adviser representing labour is also always selected by the same organization. Sometimes a representative of other labour organizations is selected to serve; it is a charitable deed: he comes as technical adviser for the government. But they resent it because they want someone to go there as representative of the employees. I want to know whether we shall have the same difficulties in this matter.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows that during his term of office for nine years he had to meet exactly the same difficulty.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I know; that is why I want to avoid it.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite agree with him as to the desirability of endeavouring to avoid it. He knows that we have both endeavoured to avoid the consequences of it, at least with respect to two other employee organizations, by appointing them in the manner he has indicated for the purposes stated. But as the arrangement stands, under the international labour organization, it says the largest number should be the determining, selecting body. We have nothing of that restriction here and—I speak only for myself—an endeavour will be made to see that it is not confined to one particular body. There are at least three large organizations in the country and the difficulty of appointing three is at once apparent, as the hon. gentleman knows. As regards the converse, with respect to the employers, if my memory serves me, the manufacturers association has submitted a list since 1919 or 1920, or whenever it was finally settled, and there has been no change. I am not unmindful of the point to which my hon. friend refers and an earnest effort will be made to try to secure a measure of equity that will be satisfactory all around.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We had some discussion this afternoon in regard to deputy umpires. Are the acting umpires not in the same category?

Mr. BENNETT: I promised the hon. member for West Middlesex that I would look into this matter and satisfy myself as to what the deputy umpires were. The provision in the English act is the same as ours, but it might be desirable to strike them out altogether.

Paragraph (d) agreed to.

Paragraphs (e) to (h) inclusive agreed to.

On paragraph (i)—Penalties.

Mr. NEILL: I protest against the provision giving this commission power, as I said in speaking on the second reading, to start a little criminal code of their own. It is bad enough to give them power to make regulations which may have all the force of separate and distinct laws, but when we allow these people to prescribe penalties and terms of imprisonment, we are going too far. Surely it would be possible to limit them at least to financial penalties and, in default of payment, to terms of imprisonment. I had occasion not long ago to see some of the regulations proposed by one of these marketing boards; I forget the exact nature, but the power they gave to some official to send people to gaol was most extraordinary and unwarranted. People unfamiliar with making laws and who are not even lawyers are not qualified to have unlimited powers to make penalties for the violation of a regulation. If we could see the regulations, the matter would be different, but some of these regulations are very vague and a man might be sent to gaol for a violation of something that no reasonable person would expect him to live up to. I suggest to the Prime Minister that we should at least limit this to fines and, in default of payment, to a term of imprisonment. Under the wording of this provision it would appear that the commission could create an offence of their own and impose imprisonment for it.

Mr. BENNETT: The courts have settled the principle that no regulation is valid that is not based upon some statutory enactment. The power to make a regulation must be conferred by some statute in order that the regulation may be valid. If in the exercise of its power the commission passes regulations any one of which is in excess of the power conferred by the statute, such regulation falls and is not valid. Therefore it is desirable that there should be in the commission some power to deter those who contemplate violation of the regulations which are such an essential part of the legislation. The suggestion made this afternoon by the hon. member for West Middlesex I desire to consider as to whether there should be inserted in the statute itself a provision for regulations respecting the matters to which he called attention, and so this paragraph and paragraph (j) may stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to a question I asked the Prime Minister a day or two ago, there is a provision for presenting reports to parliament within a specified period. Is there any provision for presenting to parliament all the regulations made by the commission?

Mr. BENNETT: They have to be approved by the governor in council, as the hon. gentleman will remember, and published in the Gazette.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Every member would like to be acquainted with the tenor of the regulations made by the commission.

Mr. BENNETT: I appreciate what the hon. member says as to laying them on the table.

Paragraphs (i) and (j) stand.

On section 39.

—Cooperation in matters of health and health insurance.

Mr. MITCHELL: To what extent does this contemplate the provision of a health insurance scheme?

Mr. BENNETT: This clause and the succeeding one will indicate the extent to which it is intended that the commission shall obtain such information as will enable legislation, if thought desirable by parliament at another time, to be submitted for the purposes the hon. gentleman mentions. This does not in itself of course contemplate a scheme; it is only for the purpose of laying the foundations of one. The reason for that is this: it is well known that an earnest effort is being made to coordinate the services of the provinces and the dominion with respect to health matters to the extent that that may be possible, and the minister contemplates bringing together the ministers of health of the provinces to discuss these matters so as to prevent overlapping. When that is done, it will be possible to develop further the scheme that has been put into force in some parts of the empire as well as in foreign countries. I would not undertake to be responsible for any scheme until far more complete information is made available than now exists, and the extent to which the provinces will cooperate and coordinate their efforts with those of the dominion must of course be determined. I can only say that the minister has already taken in hand the question of a conference for the purpose of trying to settle that. Vain efforts have been made to settle it; it is only fair to say that efforts have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, but health policies seem to have an amazing attraction for provinces at one stage and to arouse an amazing dislike at another. If it is possible for provincial authorities to provide the policies and have the dominion provide the money, they are very popular, but if the order is reversed they are not so much in vogue. I agree with an observation made I think this session by the hon. gentleman from Edmonton in regard to efforts of what I describe as private agencies to secure grants from time to time for the purpose of promoting public health; unless there is a more definite relation of their activities to those of the federal authority from whom the money is obtained I have not observed very satisfactory results. Here the report of the actuaries upon the matter is perhaps responsible to some extent, but if the contemplated efforts as indicated by correspondence can be put in the form of a definite arrangement or agreement I think matters will be in a far more advanced position than they are now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand then that this section does not in any way commit the government to the undertaking of a general health policy?

Mr. BENNETT: I thought I made it perfectly clear the other day that this is not an undertaking on behalf of the federal government to pay any sums of money. That is to be dealt with in another way. The section says:

> The duties and powers of the commission under this part of this act shall be exercised, so far as may be found practicable and expedient, in cooperation with any department or departments of the government of Canada—

There being a health and pensions department to which that refers.

> —with the dominion council of health, with any province or any number of provinces collectively, or with any municipality or any number of municipalities collectively, or with associations or corporations.

This goes further than most of the provisions because of the relation between municipalities and industry, the employees of which are insured under the act. It is to relate the question of health to insurance under the act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Prime Minister's contention in regard to this measure of unemployment insurance is correct it is not necessary at all to confer with the provinces. Why may I ask should it be necessary to have these conferences with the provincial ministers in respect to national health? National health is a national subject, and, to use the words of the Prime Minister, the voice of Canada is not the collective voice of the provinces, but that of this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that is correct I do not see the necessity for any conference with the provinces. I must say that personally I favour the idea of conference, and I think that equally there should have been a conference with the provinces in regard to unemployment insurance.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that on a moment's reflection the right hon. gentleman will realize why we have dealt with it in this way. The provinces cannot under any statute that may be enacted by this dominion be released from their obligations with respect to the health of their people. They have their health departments, and expend large sums of money in clinical and other work, for instance dental services. Whether men are insured or uninsured is not a matter of concern to them; their liabilities and obligations are there. That is one of the matters that has engaged the attention of successive governments, because the provinces in carrying on these health activities seek from the dominion sometimes special grants and sometimes merely what you might call propaganda effort. What I said with respect to insurance when I was moving the second reading of the bill had no reference to health, because that now rests with the provincial authority, and is an obligation which they are carrying out in a very clearcut manner. None of the provinces are undertaking responsibility with respect to the matter with which this bill deals. It is believed that this furnishes a unique opportunity to tie the efforts of the provinces and the dominion into one coordinated whole. I may be wrong; my hopes in that regard may be too great, but here you have the insurance officers, the inspectors and everyone connected with the administration of this act dealing with individuals—not all the individuals in a community but the major part of those who are wage earners. They therefore have first hand information with respect to the health of the workmen, questions of sanitation, and the surroundings of the individuals insured, under the inspection clause referred to this afternoon. If that can be correlated to the activities of the provincial health authorities I believe it would be a great step forward, and ensure to a large extent the attainment of the object which we have in mind. For instance it is well known that on this continent the first efforts made by private enterprise to assist the state authorities in connection with health was by life insurance companies which inserted in their policies a provision to enable them to inspect the homes of those who were insured, and see to their surroundings and provide if possible for improved health conditions. The result has been most remarkable. The co-ordination of these organizations with the governmental authorities has had most far-reaching and beneficial consequences. That is what is intended here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Health is largely a provincial matter, I agree. When the federal Department of Health was created the act said that it was for the purpose of looking after the federal activities—

Mr. BENNETT: Propaganda largely.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —in quarantine and such matters, and to cooperate with the provinces. As far as cooperating with the provinces is concerned this part of the present bill is not needed. The present Department of Health Act is sufficient to authorize any investigation of the kind suggested by this provision. But if the right hon. gentleman is correct as to the jurisdiction of this parliament in respect to unemployment insurance, the same view would apply to matters of health. Take the preamble of this bill. If the Prime Minister is right when he says:

> Whereas the Dominion of Canada was a signatory, as part of the British Empire, to the treaty of peace——and that is where he takes his power—> —and by article 427 of the said treaty declared that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance—

—if that applies to a scheme of unemployment insurance surely it would apply as well to a scheme of health insurance. But it does not apply to either.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish to endorse every word my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has said. But I wish to discuss part IV of the bill from another angle. To my mind it is the most useless part of this bill. The powers would be equally strong if sections 39, 40 and 41 were not in the bill. We have here the powers given to the commission in the matter of national health—nothing but a glorified post office and secretarial bureau looking to consultation with provincial health authorities concerning health insurance in Canada. What is there in these sections that actually advances or promotes the cause of national health in Canada? Nothing. The Prime Minister knows as well as I do that certain provinces have at the present time well considered schemes of health insurance actually prepared for most comprehensive investigation. As to the duties and powers to be exercised by the commission through co-operation with the Dominion Council of Health and the various provinces, surely one would expect that to happen automatically. The commission is going to carry on this unemployment insurance scheme and in the main the provinces are charged with the administration of health, with the exceptions mentioned by my hon. friend from Quebec East.

Then section 40 states that it shall be the duty of the commission to collect information and data. I would suggest to my right hon. friend that in my own province we have been collecting information and data from every country in the world for the last two and a half years. We have all the necessary information and data now; we have legislation drafted as the result of a most comprehensive investigation. I really resent this section, because it is nothing but eyewash, the whole part IV of this bill. Here this commission are going to be set up, but they are not being instructed to proceed by way of cooperation with the various provincial health authorities in order to develop a real system of national medicine and health. The objectives of the commission are to become a post office, a secretarial bureau, to cooperate with the existing authorities and then to analyze and make available to any province, corporation or group of persons interested the information collected. It is not now a matter of not having the information; it is a matter of not being able to act upon the information at our disposal, largely through lack of financial resources. This is not what we were led to expect by the tremendous protestations of the Prime Minister in that first fine fervour of atmospheric grandiloquence in which he indulged during the Christmas festivities, when he promised the people of Canada not only insurance against unemployment but also health insurance, invalidity insurance and, insurance against old age. Here, if you please, is his glorious contribution; here is the contribution of his government to the great cause of health insurance in the Dominion of Canada. The Prime Minister knows that I have been very friendly to many of the sections in this bill. I have cooperated to my utmost, because I believe in the principle of unemployment insurance, but when I see this thing, part IV of this bill, as the contribution of this government to the cause of health insurance in Canada, Mr. Chairman, it occasions me the most profound disappointment but very little surprise.

According to section 41 the commission from time to time may submit to the governor in council proposals for cooperation by the dominion in providing any of the benefits enumerated in paragraph (a) of the preceding section, for such action as the governor in council—just listen to this—is authorized to take. I think for the first time that is an admission by the Prime Minister of some other jurisdiction. The section goes on to provide that the commission may undertake special investigations in this regard, subject to the approval of the governor in council concerning the scope and nature of each such investigation. In my humble judgment part IV of the bill is completely useless with regard to the practical application of measures for the development of national health insurance in this dominion. The Prime Minister knows as well as I do that when the Liberal government of England passed that first great bill in 1911, the one scheme effected both national health insurance and unemployment insurance. That joint measure came into effect in England on the first day of July, 1912, with unemployment insurance affecting some 2,250,000 and health insurance affecting some 13,000,000. In 1920 or 1921 unemployment insurance was extended in the old land to cover practically the same number covered by health insurance. But honestly, Mr. Chairman, if there is any merit in this bill, with its limitations, its reservations and its uncertainties, so far as unemployment insurance is concerned, there is absolutely no merit in part IV, because it gives the commission that is to be set up nothing more than the power to consult, to confer, to cooperate, to become a glorified post office, a bureau of information--doing nothing constructive, nothing emphatic and nothing progressive to bring about what we have wanted for years, and what my hon. friend from St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) has been advocating for the last four years, a real scheme of national health insurance in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: I am rather disappointed in part IV of the bill, and I quite agree with some of the remarks made by the previous speaker (Mr. Mackenzie). I do not know why this part was included in the bill, unless it is simply a preface to something of greater importance. But if part IV is to remain in the act could we not amend it in such a way as to give far more power to the commission than they are to have under the present measure?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have none now.

Mr. HEAPS: They have none, as my hon. friend has remarked, but I think some provision should be inserted which would empower the commission to give grants in aid to the provinces or municipalities that have in force health insurance schemes. If British Columbia decided to inaugurate a scheme of health insurance then I think the commission ought to have power under this section to make a contribution to that province in order to further any such health insurance scheme. I think it would be entirely within the jurisdiction of the federal government to do so; I believe on several occasions the Prime Minister has stated in this house that the government have power to make grants to the province if they see fit so to do. As a matter of fact on previous occasions we have given grants to the provinces, I believe, in aid of certain health matters coming under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. I understand that several provinces are considering certain matters pertaining to provincial health insurance measures. If the federal government, through the commission, could set up a standard of health insurance satisfactory to all parties, that might be adopted by the provinces in order to have such legislation as nearly uniform as possible throughout the length and breadth of the dominion, it would be a very great piece of work, and some provision should be placed in section 4 of the act which would empower the commission to make the necessary grants out of the federal exchequer towards health insurance in the various provinces.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But what would be the use of this parliament if any commission is to have the right to grant the people's money as it pleases?

Mr. HEAPS: There may be something in what my hon. friend has said, but I presume these grants would come under the jurisdiction of this House of Commons.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have a minister of health.

Mr. HEAPS: We have a federal minister of health, it is quite true, but he does not consider health the important part of the activities of the Department of Pensions and National Health; to-day he is most concerned with the question of pensions. So far as the grants are concerned, I think items could be put in the estimates each year, as items are put in at the present time for other purposes of national welfare and well being. Perhaps the Prime Minister might consider amending this part of the bill so that parliament or the commission would be able to make grants to such provinces as adopt provincial schemes of health insurance.

Mr. HOWDEN: I am afraid I fail to appreciate the significance of part IV of the bill; certainly it seems to have no application to the health of the Canadian people. One would hardly think it was inserted in the bill for the purpose of leaving the impression that the measure embodies national health insurance, though it may be that this is leading up to that objective. What I should like to point out particularly is that the class of people who will be affected by this insurance are those who will be expected to pay their way, to pay their hospital bills and their medical fees. From the wages they earn, or from the insurance they will be paid, it will be impossible for these people to pay their way in the case of illness. The English act provides certain sickness benefits by way of the payment of the fees of medical men who make calls. Since people of this class are so helpless in a time of illness it seemed only reasonable that some provision should be made for them. It may be that the government has in mind a scheme of sickness insurance, but up to the present time we have heard nothing of it.

In the event of our not having any form of sickness insurance and not adopting any scheme of state medicine, or anything of the kind, it will be impossible for the men affected by this measure to pay their way and to meet their obligations during the periods when they will be unemployed. It seems to me that hon. members who have preceded me have stated the fact when they said that part IV of the bill means nothing. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) said, a stenographer could do all the commission is asked to do, namely gather in a few reports and certain information and pass it on to those who may desire it. It would be more reasonable to have a definite policy with regard to the care of the sick, and particularly those who will be affected by this measure.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In the preamble to the bill I notice the following:

> And whereas it is essential for the peace, order and good government of Canada to provide for a national employment service and insurance against unemployment, and for other forms of social insurance—

And so on. I should like to know what other forms of social insurance are contemplated. So far we have had nothing but unemployment insurance, and yet the preamble to the bill suggests that there are other forms of insurance. The Prime Minister should tell us what the wording of the preamble means. If this section is to be worth anything we should give some meaning to section 40, subsection (a), subparagraph (ii), "compensation for loss of earnings arising out of ill health, accident or disease." If we had such provision in the bill it would be worth something and would be somewhat in harmony with the suggestions made in the radio speeches.

An hon. MEMBER: Suggestions?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, if you wish to call them suggestions—adumbrations of something to come. But unless this provision is carried out I would feel like moving for the elimination of part IV, because, as other hon. members have said, as it stands it is useless and gives a false impression. It leaves the impression that something is being done in this field, where as as a matter of fact, as the Prime Minister has admitted, the government in this measure does not in any way commit itself to the type of insurance now under discussion. That impression ought not to go out in connection with the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A moment ago the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) referred to what he described as a sort of promise made by the Prime Minister in the radio speeches with respect to what was to be done in matters of national health. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has just referred to something respecting health in the preamble of this bill which would seem to amount to a promise. I happen to have in my hand the speech from the throne, and I should like to read therefrom what appears there also as a promise.

Better provision will be made for the security of the worker during unemployment, in sickness, and in old age.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether part IV of the measure covers that extra security for the worker in sickness, or if he intends to bring down during the present session other measures which will have the effect of implementing that part of the speech from the throne and if so, what they are?

Mr. SPENCER: Before the Prime Minister speaks I should like to associate myself with other hon. members in criticizing the very small reference made in the bill to the matter of health. Probably—and I hope it is true—this is not the only reference to health the government intends to make. If it is the only health measure, then I am quite sure a large number of people throughout Canada will be very much disappointed in the government's action. Of course the government's program is not before us, and possibly at this time we are unjust in making any criticism with regard to what it may do in the matter of health measures. I am basing my present remarks on the fact that this is the only reference which has been made concerning national health, and it seems to me if no other reference is to be made the one now before us is, to place the best construction upon it, only a pious hope that the commission will cooperate with other institutions. I pointed out only a few weeks ago that the subject of health has been discussed in this house no less than seven times in only a few years. On three occasions resolutions on the subject have been agreed to. I trust this is not the only reference which will be made to health, and that in the near future the government will bring down a worth while plan for taking care of the health of our people.

Miss MACPHAIL: Mr. Chairman, if nothing more is to be added to part IV it would be better not to have it in the measure at all, because its high flown title, "national health," signifies nothing. When one reads the few sections in this part one may readily realize that it is only a data collecting agency. I am not so sure that that is going to help the people who are ill and need medical care. Unless something more is to be done—and we know that through the years the government has specialized in high flown titles, with little following after them—we might as well eliminate part IV altogether. In the Kingston Whig Standard of February 18 I read the other day about the system of socialized medicine or state medicine, whichever you choose to call it, in Sweden. There are two or three points in the article I should like to place on Hansard. The article states:

The present form of socialized medicine in Sweden was established during the sixties and seventies. Of all the social legislation in Sweden it is the earliest and grew naturally and painlessly out of the older system.

Here are some of the figures showing costs to people under medical care in Sweden:

A patient may lie in a ward at any hospital for as little as 2·50 crowns a day (70 cents), and receive the care of the best specialists without any further charge. This rate is unusually low compared to the private hospitals such as the Red Cross, which takes 20 crowns a day.

Then it goes on to say:

An operation for appendicitis in Sweden costs no more than $8. The clinics operating in connection with all the large hospitals are on the same basis, with a straight rate of 2 crowns or 30 cents for each visit.

Then follows the story of the county hospitals.

Sickness insurance has been established in Sweden since 1891. It is not the obligatory kind which began in Germany in 1883 and found its most inclusive organization in the English law of 1912.

It is clear to any person following the subject that Canada is far behind many other countries in the care we give to the sick. I feel so strongly on the subject that I believe, in the present measure, it would be better to make no reference to it than to insert the words "national health" as though something was being done about it, and then follow that heading by other words which do not seem to have anything but a very indirect bearing upon health matters.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I cannot altogether agree with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) when he says there is nothing definite in the bill. I believe there is something very definite in it, namely that it does not want to do anything, and it wants to do a lot of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): For once we agree.

Mr. MacINNIS: The measure is supposed to be based on unemployment and health insurance measures of the United Kingdom. There seems to be a dread in the Prime Minister's mind that he might in some way or other overstep the provisions of the legislation in Great Britain. Now everyone knows who has had anything at all to do with municipal affairs in Canada that the health situation in this dominion is deplorable, and it is getting worse. It was deplorable even before this depression began, and we all know what its ravages have been since that time. In every city and municipality in this dominion there are countless agencies which have for their purpose the gathering of funds in one way or another by charity, soliciting and begging, to take care of those who are too poverty stricken to take care of themselves. In some of the larger cities in the last few years attempts have been made to co-ordinate these activities, yet after all that amounts to nothing more than a rather more dignified way of begging than they had before. There is no reason in the world why this information gathering bureau should not have been put to work long ago. My hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Spencer) introduced a resolution in this house year after year to that end, and my hon. friend from St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) did the same thing. It was not necessary to wait until now to get some body to gather statistics in regard to health matters.

I should like to read for the information of the committee an article in the Commerce of the Nation, of March, 1932. The article is by Frank G. Pedley, M.D., executive director of the Montreal council of social agencies. He has had considerable experience with the subject matter he discusses. First of all he touches on the difficulty, almost the impossibility, under our present system of giving everyone a wage sufficient to provide him with all the necessities and comforts of life, and he draws attention very definitely to the need of national health services. He says:

One aspect of the problem may be discussed, however, since it has a more strictly medical bearing and is supported by a great body of experience. I refer to the matter of sickness insurance.

When serious illness incapacitates the bread winner of a family a vicious cycle is apt to be established which inevitably leads to ruin, for illness results in loss of time and loss of wages; the curtailment of income debases the scale of living and this prevents the sick man from enjoying an environment suited to his recovery. Perhaps the sequence of things can be more clearly understood in the case of a hypothetical John Jones. Let us say that Jones develops tuberculosis. Jones, of course, does not know that he has tuberculosis at first. He may feel abnormally tired and out of sorts, but he has felt that way before and now that he is married and has some children he thinks twice before incurring a doctor's bill. If Jones lives in a city he can go to a free clinic, but free clinics are usually operated in the day time and it means loss of time and wages to attend one. Jones' $20 or $25 a week—

That was a high wage even in the time of high wages:

—is not sufficient to maintain himself and his family adequately even if he works full time. Jones, therefore, puts off seeing the doctor. We know he does this because most of the people in Jones' circle who die of tuberculosis have put off consulting a physician until within a few months of their death.

He probably carries on for a few months on patent medicines and finally sees his doctor. If the doctor is wise and capable the condition will be recognized and Jones will be advised to stop work and undertake treatment for six months or more. But the doctor might as well recommend a trip to Europe. The butcher and baker must be paid and Jones has not been able to accumulate any money for a contingency like this. It is true that he can apply to a family welfare association, if there is one in his town, but if Jones is an independent, self-reliant individual, of the breed we like to think Canadians are made of, he will refuse to apply to charity no matter how graciously it is offered.

The inevitable day comes when nature compels cessation of work and on that day the dissolution of the family begins in earnest. Mrs. Jones will leave the care of the home to take up casual labour, the children will leave school prematurely and another family will become submerged along with literally thousands of others.

Three things were wrong in Jones' case. His standard of living predisposed him to the development of the condition. He delayed too long in consulting a physician, and he failed to follow his advice when he did consult him. The reason in any event was financial. Medical fees are high in our country, nor is this because doctors get paid too much. The practice of medicine in this country is conducted in the most inefficient way conceivable. The doctor must charge you for the hours he spends waiting for you to consult him, for the hours he devotes gratis in hospitals and for the bills he cannot collect from your neighbour. The few minutes you spend in his office are only an item in the bill.

If a doctor were kept reasonably busy, was sure of most of his accounts and did not have to devote a substantial amount of his time to free work, his fee could be materially lower without any loss to him. However the doctor's fee was not the only barrier to Jones. Even if he had consulted the doctor early he could not have followed the necessary treatment without sinking into a morass of debt.

He goes on to say:

If one compares the case of a Canadian Jones with that of an English one the contrast is very apparent. In England at the first sign of indisposition Jones may consult the physician of his choice. He has paid for that right and there is no question of charity about it. If the doctor advises a holiday Jones can take one and he need not worry about the finances of the family, for a proportion of his wages will be paid at regular intervals and with no more loss of respect to Jones than there is to a woman who collects her husband's life insurance at his death.

Information on all these matters has been available to the Prime Minister for years, yet here we are in a progressive country like Canada dragging along twenty years behind the old country. It is time we kicked out of it and did something worthy of a progressive country.

Mr. BENNETT: Strong language, Mr. Chairman, from a great many hon. gentlemen opposite.

Miss MACPHAIL: Not gentlemen only.

Mr. BENNETT: If there were any exaggeration in this house I am sure the hon. member for Southeast Grey would be associated with it; there is no doubt about that at all—anything either strong or abusive. It is amazingly strange, now that we are aiming to promote a national health policy, that it should thus be assailed. I ask this chamber two questions. I ask hon. gentlemen first to point to any line in any statute of this country that undertakes to deal with national health. That is number one. Number two: Is it possible under existing conditions, with machinery set up in the provinces and municipalities, to deal with the matter on that basis until such time as by the operation of this act arrangements can be made to deal with it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not the Department of National Health deal with some of these problems?

Mr. BENNETT: It does not touch that at all. There are two questions to which attention might be directed. It has been suggested that the Department of National Health may deal with these problems, but the Department of National Health does not deal with them at all. If one will take the trouble to turn up the statute it will be seen that the department is given large powers but they are not powers of action with respect to the provinces. Let us see what we are aiming at. We are aiming at a national health policy. Hon. members who are medical men have pointed that out as desirable ever since I have been in this house. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) has done so. Now a national health policy involves the consideration of several factors, among them being, first, the position of the individual himself—not the question of the municipalities or the provinces, but the position of the individual himself and herself. The provinces have claimed, and I have not disputed it, that in respect to health they are in a better position to deal with individuals than anybody else. Result: in many parts of Canada you have municipal hospitals and you have travelling dental clinics. In many parts of Canada the provinces have established a sort of outpost for the purpose of caring for those who are ill. These are facts. How can you apply the national provisions of this statute with respect to unemployment to that health condition? That is the problem, and we believe we have tackled it in the only way in which it can by any possible chance be successfully tackled. I have heard the hon. member for St. Boniface talk about state medicine; I have heard the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw), the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and the hon. member for Battle River discuss the subject. What do they mean by state medicine? Do they mean state doctors directed by the dominion, or by the provinces, or by the municipalities? Do they propose to deal with panels of doctors under the control of the dominion parliament or under the control of the provincial legislatures? None has said. We are dealing with actualities, with facts, with conditions as they exist, and we are endeavouring to lay the foundation for a national health policy. If any hon. member who has to-night decried these provisions will tell me how the foundation for this edifice can be laid except in the manner indicated I shall be obliged. Can we with one stroke of the legislative pen wipe out of existence all the provisions made by the municipalities and the provinces to deal with this problem—their hospitals, medical service, taxation to maintain them in cities, towns and villages? Take the province of Alberta with its hospitals, its taxation, taxation in the city of Calgary, municipal hospitals: how are these things to be dealt with? Are they to be wiped out with a stroke of the pen? This bill aims at laying the foundation for a national health insurance; that is its purpose. But will any hon. member point out how it can be done except as indicated here?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will.

Mr. BENNETT: I will give the right hon. gentleman full opportunity to do so, and if he desires that I sit down while he does it I will. Let us proceed a step further. This is a national unemployment measure. In the provisions of these sections it deals with the conditions of individual employed persons throughout Canada, and there is no method by which the same definite information of a national kind can be obtained which is at all equal to that provided for in these two sections, 42 and 43. That is what they are there for. We are proceeding to meet a condition and not a theory. If this were new territory, if this were a virgin page we were turning over, as unemployment insurance is, you could say many things that would be just and fair criticism. But when you are dealing with the provisions made for hospitals at the present time, grants in aid, provisions with respect to the maintenance of health, at least in these provinces, and when the statement is made to us by many of the provincial premiers that they propose to deal with a scheme of health insurance, what are we to do? What do we propose to do here? We propose to lay the foundation for a national health measure, and you cannot do that in a night; nor have we in all the departments of the public service the information that would enable any scheme of health insurance to be adopted. The census figures in 1931 were prepared so as to enable us to deal, with some degree of actuarial certainty, with the problem of unemployment insurance, which has been discussed in this country for a considerable time. We now have the information based on that census. But I say to this committee with perfect frankness that we have no such information with respect to a system of health insurance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We have in our province.

Mr. BENNETT: I know what they have there, because they have talked the matter over with us. The preceding government discussed the matter at some length and Doctor Young—I hope he is still living—as long as fifteen years ago was endeavouring to accumulate the information that would enable them to deal with the problem. Now, laying the foundation as we are, we propose to proceed with the accumulation of knowledge that never has been gathered before in the terms in which it will be gathered here; and secondly, not to impose this structure of health insurance upon that body of information. For what would happen if the government brought in a bill dealing with health insurance, having regard to conditions in the provinces and their facilities? What we do propose to do is to follow that to its logical end and, in the first instance, to do what one hon. gentleman suggested—I do not know where he derived his information—give such assistance to the provinces at this time as will enable them to coordinate their efforts with this plan. And I believe that ultimately it will be found that the provinces, in their desire to coordinate and to cooperate, will in all probability place the administration, the broad administration, not the detailed administration, with this commission. But to do it now, without having anything further than we have at the present time, would be ridiculous.

We are endeavouring to attain the very object which members of this house have asked for; we are endeavouring to reach the end which they so much desire; and we are met with this suggestion, "Wipe it out; don't pay any attention to that; we would rather see it taken out of the bill altogether". They do not want to lay the foundation but to build an edifice hanging in the air, to swing in space and fall down. Does the committee seriously consider what is involved? The strong language of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) does not improve the situation. His strong and vigorous and, I think, wholly unwarranted attacks against myself on public platforms are wholly unworthy of a former cabinet minister and a member of the profession to which I belong. But that is not a matter of importance; I mention it to-night only because he has seen fit to talk in his usual—I would not use a harsh term—irresponsible language.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that deliberately, because it must have been irresponsible. Now, you have here an earnest effort to achieve an end; and the thanks we get for endeavouring to achieve it is to be told, "Wipe it out." Why in the name of common sense should you say that because one set of men are endeavouring to grapple with a situation it is wrong, whereas if another set of men grappled with it it would be right? It does seem very strange, does it not? I ask each one of the members opposite me from the various provinces to take these two sections and apply them to the facts in their respective provinces and to ask themselves whether they know of any method by which, honestly administered with the cooperation and aid of the federal authority, both financial and otherwise, you could lay the foundation for a scheme of national health. When the proper time comes, if the minister succeeds in his endeavour to bring about some concerted plan of effort, we will take the necessary steps to assist in seeing that it is carried out—whether through this commission or whether through the provincial health departments, depends entirely upon the attitude of the departments. And the reason this goes no further than to lay that foundation is that we are unable to speak with any degree of authority as to their views. At one time they express one view, at another time another, and on another occasion still another, depending very largely on the political complexion of the governments that express the views. Here you have the purpose of these sections and the reasons for them, and I do assert, and I think I can say I make the assertion in such a way that it will be very difficult reasonably to answer it, that the only logical and effective manner of laying the foundation for a national health scheme is found here, plus the effort of the minister, and the result of his endeavours for coordination, to determine whether or not the assistance to give medical care and attention to those who so much require it shall be made through the commission with respect to those who are injured, and none others, or in the larger sense through assisting the Department of Health to care for all its people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says that the purpose of these sections is an effort to achieve an end, that end being to lay the foundation of a scheme of national health insurance. I said I thought I could show him that in considerable part the foundation had already been laid. I think the real exception that is being taken to what my right hon. friend has in this new bill is that it is all superfluous. What there is that amounts to anything in it has already been enacted. The place one would naturally expect to find the foundation of a scheme of national health would be in an act of this parliament respecting national health. That act I have before me. The original act respecting national health was passed I think fifteen or twenty years ago. I am now quoting from the Department of Pensions and National Health Act which will be found in the Statutes of Canada for 1928, chapter 39. Part II, which deals more particularly with national health, contains the following provision:

The duties and powers of the minister—

That is the minister of national health. We have the Minister of National Health sitting just alongside my right hon. friend at the present moment, and I should think he might be considered the cornerstone of the foundation.

The duties and powers of the minister under this part shall extend to and include all matters and questions relating to the promotion or preservation of the health of the people of Canada over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, particularly the following matters and subjects:—

(a) Cooperation with the provincial, territorial, and other health authorities with a view to the coordination of the efforts proposed or made for preserving and improving the public health, the conservation of child life and the promotion of child welfare.

That is pretty comprehensive; it includes all matters and questions relating to the promotion or preservation of health and cooperation with the provinces, territories, municipal and other health authorities, the object being to coordinate the very thing my right hon. friend says he has in mind in this bill—the coordination of all these effeorts.

Mr. ERNST: For what purpose?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For the purpose of the preservation of the health of the people.

Mr. ERNST: Not for health insurance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A further provision, paragraph (h) is as follows:

Subject to the provision of the Statistics Act, the collection, publication and distribution of information relating to the public health, improved sanitation and the social and industrial conditions affecting the health and lives of the people.

How could anything be more comprehensive than that? If anything more were needed, it is to be found in the next paragraph, which is (i), as follows:

Such other matters relating to health as may be referred to the department by the governor in council.

All my right hon. friend has to do—he is the governor in council—is to refer to the minister the provisions of part II of this unemployment insurance act, namely the sections relating to national health, and the Minister of National Health will have all the power this act gives to anyone. Under the National Health Act he has power now as respects national health to refer to his minister for the purposes of investigation, coordination and collection of information and data any matters relating to health he may wish to refer.

Now to revert to the bill we are considering, there are, under the part dealing with national health, five sections. As indicated by the marginal notes, the first is "cooperation in matters of health and health insurance." That has already been covered by what I have read. The next is "to collect information and data." That also has been covered. The next is "to make information and data available." That has been covered. The next is "to examine and report on proposed scheme." That has also been covered. The last is "proposals to governor in council: special investigation." That has also been covered. Therefore everything that is in part IV of this bill is already in the act which has been on the statute book for nearly a couple of decades and is now in full force and effect under the direction of a responsible minister of the crown.

Mr. HOWDEN: The Prime Minister stated a few moments ago that although a number of members on this side of the house had made speeches on state medicine and health matters, no proposal had ever been submitted to the house for the application of a form of state medicine.

Mr. BENNETT: No measure has been submitted to the house.

Mr. HOWDEN: I have a distinct recollection of having addressed the house on state medicine in 1931, and if I am not badly mistaken I made definite proposals with regard to how state medicine could be applied. The need for medical attention and state medicine or health insurance has never been so great as it is at present and has been for the last number of years. The only reason most of the provinces have not to-day a complete and efficient system of state medicine is that they cannot afford it. I have suggested in this house and have heard others suggest that if this federal authority, as in the case of old age pensions, were to submit to the provinces a proposal offering relief under the stipulation that they should adopt a standard system of health insurance or state medicine, it would be rapidly and readily taken up. Is the health of the Canadian people a matter of no interest or responsibility to this government? If so, then I need say nothing further about it.

Mr. BENNETT: Why "this government"?

Mr. HOWDEN: The federal government; that is what I mean.

Mr. BENNETT: That is better.

Mr. HOWDEN: If it be a matter of interest or responsibility to the federal government, there is no question that if we extend offers of assistance to the provinces with the stipulation that they adopt and agree to a standard of service, they will be ready to take up such a proposition.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose it is unnecessary to remind the committee that nothing has been said touching the question of health insurance, either in the statute from which the right hon. gentleman read, or in the observations made by the hon. member for St. Boniface. If this committee is anxious, as I believe it is, to assist in the discharge of the duties of the state to those who are laid aside by illness, it will realize that here are practically 2,000,000 people affected by this unemployment insurance measure. That means definite, exact information with respect to 2,000,000 people, which we are asking this body to collect. It will depend upon the extent of the knowledge thus ascertained whether and to what degree the federal power may be able to engraft upon this scheme of unemployment insurance, health insurance as well. I am not going to disclose at the moment the extent to which we propose to deal with that in another way later, beyond saying this, that in this country at the present time nine different views are expressed with respect to health. Starting in British Columbia, I recall that at least fifteen years ago a suggestion with regard to health insurance was vigorously asserted in various parts of that province. The financial difficulty is the one that has been set up as preventing the province from carrying this out. In Alberta it has been made a municipal matter, and in Calgary the hospital tax is part of the taxes we pay annually. In outside communities they gather together municipalities for that purpose. In Saskatchewan they have something of the same system. In Manitoba it is slightly different. In Ontario they have specially directed efforts towards ensuring the health of the people through the activities of the health department itself. In Quebec it is much the same, except that the voluntary hospitals are perhaps more numerous. In the lower provinces the situation is something the same, except in Prince Edward Island. I put this again to the committee: This dominion, when the information is adequately in hand, may be able, as incidental to this unemployment insurance scheme, to take care of the health of all those covered by this insurance. That is the reason that part IV is in this bill. Ordinary reading of it, I think, would at once disclose that fact. But inasmuch as the provinces have done what they have, and have not indicated their willingness to lessen in any sense their activities, but only to ask us for money for them, how can you under this statute correlate these activities unless there is some understanding? What is pressed upon us is this—the right hon. gentleman knows; it was pressed upon him when he was Prime Minister—that grants should be made to this institution and to that, to this organization and to that—$10,000, $15,000, $20,000 or more, for the purpose, they say, of enabling them to carry on propaganda with respect to the health of the people. I do not think that will accomplish what is aimed at. It does not touch the sick, except with respect to the social service to which I directed attention last year, on the transfer of the work that was being done by the department that was not able to touch the people to the body that did touch them directly. I put it to the committee whether on reading these clauses carefully they do not realize that the purpose is clear, namely, in the first place to accept responsibility when the responsibility is known, but not to accept it until it is known; and in the next place to exercise such care for the health of those insured under this measure as may be necessary to the discharge of the duty of the federal government with respect to a federal scheme, thereby relieving the provinces of their obligation. That may or may not be acceptable to the provinces which impose taxation upon those who may be receiving the benefits under this statute. That is a matter that will have to be settled, and the minister has been endeavouring to arrange a conference for that purpose. But this house will not have risen before there is an indication of just what is meant in regard to the application of these sections. If the provinces do not express a desire to carry it on themselves in their own way, then a grant for the purpose of enabling the commission to give such medical attention as may be necessary to those insured will appear in the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister says that in the act which I have read there is no reference to health insurance. But there is a reference in the act—I have read several—to all matters and questions relating to health, and health insurance is one. I think, therefore, the Prime Minister will agree that the act is quite broad enough to cover the collection of information with respect to health insurance or any other aspect of health matters.

Mr. LAPOINTE: On he 17th of January last we had the speech from the throne, which said that—

> Better provision will be made for the security of the worker during unemployment, in sickness and in old age.

On the very same day, January 17, President Roosevelt sent a message to congress in which he also recommended the following types of legislation looking to economic security.

> 1. Unemployment compensation.
> 2. Old age benefits, including compulsory and voluntary annuities.
> 3. Federal aid to dependent children through grants to states for the support of existing mother's pension systems and for services for the protection and care of homeless, neglected dependent and crippled children.
> 4. Additional federal aid to state and local public health agencies and the strengthening of the federal public health service. I am not at this time recommending the adoption of so-called health insurance, although groups representing the medical profession are cooperating with the federal government in the further study of the subject and definite progress is being made.

I call attention to the fact that the subjects of the proposals in both messages are exactly the same. Of course it is a happy coincidence that great minds should meet on the same proposals on the very same day, but they do not deal in the same way with the proposals suggested. First, on the question of unemployment insurance, the bill at present before congress is one which will work in cooperation with the states. President Roosevelt, although charged with being dictatorial in his methods, does not go to the extent of making it entirely a federal matter without the cooperation of the states; he works in cooperation with the states. But when it comes to health insurance, although he says he cannot recommend the adoption of so-called health insurance he goes further than my right hon. friend in order to fulfil his pledge. He gives aid to the states in various matters, In the Wagner bill, which is the bill before the Senate of the United States embodying the proposals of President Roosevelt, there are the following amounts as federal aids to the states in matters of health:

	Per year
Mothers' assistance..	$25,000,000
Maternal and child health.. ..	4,000,000
Crippled children..	3,000,000
Child welfare..	1,500,000
Public health..	10.000,000

That is what he is doing by way of subsidy to the various states of the American union. So I say that although by a happy coincidence the same measures presented themselves to the minds of both President Roosevelt and the Prime Minister of Canada, they are not redeeming their pledges in the same way. If it is possible for President Roosevelt, if not to establish a scheme of health insurance at least to give aid to the states in matters of health, the same thing is possible here, and we would not break through the constitution by doing it.

Mr. HEAPS: There is to-day throughout this country a very serious state of things in regard to health. In the large industrial areas thousands upon thousands of men, women and children are unable to obtain medical services. On the other hand, as I know of personal knowledge, quite a considerable number of members of the medical profession are compelled to become recipients of public relief. Such is the case in Winnipeg, and I believe it is the same in other cities. The same condition obtains in agricultural areas. It is almost an impossibility for a farmer to-day to afford medical attention, and the plight of the medical men in the rural areas is almost as bad, I understand, as it is in many large industrial centres. I am glad, however, that the Prime Minister has stated to the committee this evening that the government have under consideration further proposals in regard to health insurance which they intend to submit to the house later in the present session. I hope I have not misunderstood the statement of the Prime Minister. If that is the intention of the government perhaps it will be as well if we wait until the government brings down what the Prime Minister has intimated, a scheme to give assistance to the provinces to provide a more or less national scheme of health insurance.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) has just made observations which I think upon reflection he will see are greatly at variance with those of his leader. I am surprised that there should be such difference of opinion, because only a few weeks ago the right hon. gentleman declaimed very strongly against one body in the state collecting and a different body expending public funds. That is within the memory of every member of this committee, and I am bound to say that there is a very great deal of force in those observations. I have always reckoned with that and have so stated frequently in this chamber. We are endeavouring to escape that very thing. In the United States a message was sent to congress indicating that there was a situation that should be dealt with; then, out of their great riches they simply said, "Divide $25,000,000 among the states for this, $10,000,000 for that and $20,000,000 for that." That was all there was to it; it was very simple. We are endeavouring to conform to these fundamental constitutional views that we have had with respect to expenditures, and we will continue to do so as long as we are here. What we do say is that if the information called for by this bill were available to us to-night we could place in the estimates provision that would enable the federal power to deal with those who are insured under this act, numbering possibly two million people. That, in my judgment, is the first approach to a national insurance scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister could have collected all that information in the last couple of years.

Mr. BENNETT: But as a matter of fact I am pointing out to the right hon. gentleman that this information is not as readily available as he thinks. If he had to try to get it he would realize that. I wonder if he realizes that it was just because of what has been said in this country from time to time by both parties that in the census of 1931 we did provide a column in regard to unemployment, and the whole scheme that we are now submitting to this house has been predicated upon the information thus obtained, as of the first of June, 1931.

Here is the strange anomaly, and I am going to put it to gentlemen who are fair minded. I wonder how many have read the reports of the insurance companies of this country; I wonder how many have observed that our length of life is far greater than the expectation, and that the companies have added greatly to their reserves by reason of the fact that the expectation of life is far more than realized. Never has insurance been so largely bought in Canada as it has been in recent years; I do not say the last year or two, but in recent years. The strange anomaly is that the reports of the insurance companies year after year indicate that their mortality is far less than their expectation, and that as a result their reserves have been greatly increased. If our health condition is as bad as has been asserted, how is it that continuously, according to the mortality tables issued by the provinces, the mortality among children under the age of five and the number of deaths from various diseases, have not shown that increase which one would expect from the tales that are told? I ask medical men on both sides of the house to look at the figures. The vital statistics departments of the various provinces have circulated their figures from time to time, and I must confess that I was greatly surprised by them. The chairman of this committee is a medical man. I do not think it will be any breach of confidence if I say that I was inquiring of him as to what had been the result in the border cities, so far as the health of the people was concerned, of the depression through which they had passed and the sort of diet that had been provided by the authorities. To my surprise I found that what he reported to me as to the health of the people was borne out by experience in other places; that is, the regular diet of good, plain food had given the children in schools an amazing health. I confess that I was surprised also when I saw the figures in regard to the older people.

All this is highly valuable in respect to the determination of many questions with respect to diet, hygiene and matters of that kind. The other day one of the foremost English doctors said the kind of clothes women are now wearing, as compared with those worn twenty-five or thirty years ago, has greatly lengthened their lives.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the difference?

Mr. BENNETT: There is a difference in weight, and matters of that sort. I will leave it to someone else to explain that, but the doctor was pointing out the results.

To get back to this measure, the pensions and public health acts are one thing. This is an effort to tie the information and experience with respect to unemployment insurance to health, based upon actual experience. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that I had said certain things would happen willy-nilly. I said if the provinces were prepared to make it possible we would submit to this house in due season legislation that would deal with the phase of the matter to which I was referring. Beyond that I cannot go.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It does seem to me that although the Prime Minister may have it in mind to bring in something of this kind in the indefinite future, that is not sufficient for us at this time. It is all very well to point out the obstacles that may be raised by the various provinces or that may confront any administration which seeks to correlate the activities that are now going on, but on the other hand large numbers of our people are suffering very severely at the present time. It is all very well to talk about women's clothing to-day lengthening life; it is all very well to talk about the health of our school children improving. That may be all true, but those of us who have had anything to do with municipal affairs know perfectly well that to-day the situation, at least in the western part of this country which I know best, is becoming desperate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, that is not putting it too strongly. It was only a few months ago—and I think my hon. friend from St. Boniface will corroborate this—that the doctors in my own city of Winnipeg threatened what might be called a strike, saying definitely that unless the authorities came to the rescue and provided definite assistance for those who were unemployed and otherwise in need of assistance the doctors would not continue to give any help whatever to the unemployed or needy. In other words, the doctors said they were not going to continue to carry the load. Our municipalities did try to do something in the matter, but the western municipalities are on the verge of bankruptcy and cannot much longer continue to carry this load. There are large numbers of men who are almost desperate. There are large numbers of women whose health is being permanently impaired. I do not know what kind of dresses they wear. It is all very well to talk in a general way, covering long periods of years, but I know that to-day the health of large numbers of women is being permanently impaired because of their inability to undergo operations and to secure proper medical treatment. I know these reports come in from almost all our cities. A year ago Doctor Bates, who was here representing a large dominion organization, presented statistics that clearly demonstrated the conditions existing across Canada. Are we going to wait another five years before we get anything? As the Prime Minister was speaking I thought of the report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations as far back as 1929, six years ago. I am going to take a few moments to read that report. It was the second year this question had been considered by the committee. We had prominent health officials before the committee, including Doctor Grant Fleming of Montreal and Doctor Fitzgerald of Toronto, and this was the report of the committee:

> Your committee would reaffirm the position taken in the final report adopted on June 6 of last session, namely—

That was seven years ago.

> That your committee accept and endorse the principle of unemployment insurance, based on compulsory contributions derived from the state, employer and employees.
> 2. Your committee recognizes that while it is highly desirable that such legislation should be uniform in all the provinces, and while social insurance has a federal aspect, nevertheless, according to the Department of Justice, under our constitution legislative jurisdiction in relation to the establishment of a compulsory system of unemployment insurance is vested exclusively in the provincial legislatures.

This was under a Liberal regime.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is still so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is still the position of the Liberals? Then if my friends the Liberals are going to sit there and take that position, this country may well ask itself whether it should commit its future to a party which refused to take action on one of the most important questions confronting the people of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is not the question at all.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is not the point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It has a bearing on the point, because the Liberals were in power for several years after this report was issued, and so far as I know they took no action whatsoever to implement it. I feel a bit indignant when I find the Liberals of to-day hammering the government because of what the government is attempting to do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What are you doing?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As every hon. member knows, we have only a small group, but we have tried in season and out of season to urge that the interests of the people should be protected.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is the hon. member satisfied with this legislation?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Please address the chair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not satisfied with this legislation. As I have said, I would gladly see this section eliminated because it seems to me that by including the section the government is giving a false impression. That is why I am speaking now. At the same time, I say that the Liberals are not proving very helpful when they are standing pat, as they did before, on purely technical and constitutional questions, and not offering any way out. Let me proceed with this report—

Mr. VENIOT: What is the date?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is the 1929 report.

Mr. VENIOT: You should correct your statement; you said the Liberals were in power several years after the report was issued.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There was one the year before that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This report is dated Wednesday, May 1, 1929.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not "several" years.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one before.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say it was; this report reaffirmed the position taken by the committee in the previous year. It continues:

> 3. Your committee find that the provinces on being consulted by the Department of Labour with regard to their attitude towards the establishment of a general scheme, do not appear to be prepared to take immediate action.

That is the practical difficulty; that is true to-day. The provinces are not prepared to take immediate action.

An hon. MEMBER: Some of them are.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They have come a little nearer to it since 1929.

An hon. MEMBER: British Columbia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: British Columbia is the exception.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Hon. members must address the chair.

Mr. VENIOT: Were you not a member of that committee?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes I was.

Mr. VENIOT: That is a unanimous report.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it is a unanimous report.

Mr. DUPUIS: Very good.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why condemn the report, then?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is condemning the Liberal party.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My point is, as I shall show in a minute if hon. members will have the patience to listen, that the action contemplated by this clause now under discussion was clearly before the country in 1929. The report continues:

> Under these circumstances, your committee submits the following recommendations:
> (a) That with regard to sickness insurance, the Department of Pensions and National Health be requested to initiate a comprehensive survey of the field of public health, with special reference to a national health program. In this it is believed that it would be possible to secure the cooperation of the provincial and municipal health departments, as well as the organized medical profession.

Since Liberals have been interrupting me, I ask them this: Since their government was in power for nearly two years after this report—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): One year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did they take any action towards implementing that report?

Mr. VENIOT: Only one year.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The recommendation was first made in 1928, and then the principle was reaffirmed in the report made the following year.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are reading from the 1929 report.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did they take any action?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, they communicated with all the provinces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let me say to the ex-Minister of Justice that the provinces had been communicated with the year before, and this report was issued after replies had been received from them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But we cannot change the constitution as easily as my hon. friend, or the Prime Minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then we have the following recommendation:

(b) That in the forthcoming census, provision should be made for the securing of the fullest possible data regarding the extent of unemployment and sickness and that this should be compiled and published at as early a date as possible.

If the Prime Minister had desired to do so he could quite easily have included the matter of sickness with that of unemployment. I do not know how far it was included in the census schedules, but there was the same opportunity for securing data with regard to sickness as for securing data concerning unemployment. Then:

(c) That the federal government be requested to bring the subject matter of this reference before the next federal-provincial conference; and your committee suggests, when the agenda for such a conference is being arranged that the provincial governments be invited to send representatives of the employer and employee to discuss the subject matter of this report.

For at least a year after the report was issued—pretty nearly a year and a half—Liberals had the opportunity to do something.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They did communicate with them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was not a question of communicating; they had been communicated with the year before.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was a definite recommendation, which I believe passed the house, to the effect that there should be a dominion-provincial conference, and that at that conference there should be representatives of employers and employees. So far as I know that was not done; I never heard of it. It was not mentioned in the press, and if any action was taken there must have been a secret conference. On the other hand, in the last four years—almost five—there have been various conferences between the dominion and the provincial governments, but apparently these questions of sickness insurance and national health have not been placed on the agenda.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not the hon. member recall that in the supplementary estimates of 1930 a special amount was provided for a dominion-provincial conference to be called for that among other purposes?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not recall it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member will look he will see.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am content to accept the word of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And he supported it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am quite sure I would support it, if it was brought up. I had forgotten about it.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no mention of health.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Social questions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know just what was included.

Mr. ERNST: We have the unusual spectacle of the Liberal Samson glorying in the Delilah of the constitution.

Mr. DUPUIS: Wait your turn.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How long have we to wait? In 1928 the Department of Labour placed in the hands of the members of the committee a small pamphlet dealing with what had been done in other countries. This confirms what the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) said a few moments ago. We are lagging far behind most other countries in the world. The report published by our own Department of Labour states, among other things:

In some countries state aid took the form of granting special status to mutual aid societies, and in many cases providing financial assistance from public funds.

There is nothing in the constitution to prevent that being done.

In other lands compulsory insurance was established.

Voluntary insurance schemes have been adopted in Italy (1886), Sweden (1891), Denmark (1892), Belgium (1894), Finland (1897), France (1898), Spain (1908) and Switzerland (1911).

Compulsory insurance systems were put in force in Germany (1883), Austria (1888), Hungary (1891), Luxemburg (1901), Norway (1909), Serbia (1910), Great Britain (1911), Russia (1911) and Roumania (1912). It may be noted that systems of sickness insurance established since the war have all been compulsory in character. These include Bulgaria (1918), Czechoslovakia (1919), Portugal (1919), Poland (1920), Japan (1922), Greece (1922), Chile (1924), Lithuania (1925) and France (1928). In Australia and South Africa commissions have been appointed to study the question and a bill providing for a system of social insurance is now before the Australian parliament. In Brazil a labour code which will contain provisions for sickness insurance is in course of preparation. In Italy a system of compulsory insurance against tuberculosis is announced as the beginning of a general scheme of sickness insurance.

This information that I give is now old; it goes back to 1928. I do not know what other countries have been doing in the last seven years; at least I have not the information at hand—I happened to have this in my file with my other papers—but all this was done over seven years ago. We in Canada during the past seven years have not moved one inch towards realizing anything of this kind, and now we are being put off by a section in the present employment insurance bill that asks a committee to study the question and secure information. It is not study that we need at the present time; it is action.

Mr. DONNELLY: In the countries my hon. friend has referred to as having sickness insurance, has any of them sickness insurance connected with unemployment insurance, or are the two subjects dealt with separately?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In a number of countries they are closely connected.

Mr. DONNELLY: They are?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is any of those countries of the opinion that unemployment insurance and sickness insurance are better kept separate instead of being treated in one and the same measure?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot give that information. In Great Britain the two subjects are closely connected.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, and very unsatisfactorily.

Mr. HEAPS: Who says so?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some doctors do not like the situation in Great Britain, I know, but a great many of the workers find that it is more satisfactory than what we have in Canada.

There is one other thing. I cannot quite see why the Prime Minister should insist that parliament has jurisdiction in the matter of unemployment and not in the matter of public health. To a large extent he based his plea for unemployment insurance on the treaty of Versailles. In this same document of our own Department of Labour, from which I have already quoted, I find this note:

> The League of Nations international labour organization, at its tenth session held at Geneva in May-June, 1927, adopted two draft conventions and one resolution on the subject of sickness insurance. The first draft convention related to sickness insurance for workers in industry and commerce, and domestic servants; the second draft convention dealt with sickness insurance for agricultural workers; and the recommendation laid down general principles of sickness insurance.

If this government feels called upon to provide unemployment insurance as implementing the treaty of Versailles and to enact it under peace, order and good government, I cannot for the life of me see why it should not provide sickness insurance as well. It seems to me that while we squabble in this house year after year after year—

An hon. MEMBER: Speak for yourself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Somebody says, "Speak for yourself." Does he refer to me? I am speaking for myself and I believe for tens of thousands of people throughout this country who are looking to parliament to do something to relieve their distress. When representatives of the blind appeared this morning before the committee on industrial and international relations I was delighted that hon. members from all sections of this house lent a sympathetic ear to the presentation of their case. I know perfectly well that all of us in this house would like to see the blind cared for, and I know that all in this house would like to see the sick more adequately cared for. I do urge that this should not be made a mere party game.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then if it is not a party game there must surely be some way in which we can get together to provide for the urgent needs of the people. These constitutional questions can be relegated to the background. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) laughs. I do not mean that there is no constitutional question to be dealt with, but I urge that such questions are subordinate to the urgent needs of the people.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why should the hon. gentleman ask that the British North America Act be amended if this can be done in the way he suggests?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We need amendments to the act because of changed conditions; but the present situation is sufficiently urgent to warrant the government in taking emergency action to provide for the needs of the people, and then later we can consider what amendments should be made to the British North America Act permanently to meet the situation. But for the last six or seven years since this report was published, and for many a long year before that, we have been dilly-dallying with these questions. We had reason to hope that the government was going to take a strong line of action as indicated in the speech from the throne and in the Prime Minister's radio addresses, that something was to be done in a large way for the people of Canada, but we now find that we are to be put off with a meagre measure of this kind, and that merely a gesture is being made in regard to public health matters. I do not think parliament should be allowed to prorogue without the house insisting that something be done in the near future to meet the real and urgent needs of the people.

Mr. HOWDEN: I do not want my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre to leave a wrong impression with regard to medical conditions in our part of the country. He stated a little while ago that the medical conditions were appalling. Actually the conditions are not appalling. I do not believe that the people of our country, by and large certainly the people of greater Winnipeg, have ever before in the history of our country been quite so well supplied with medical services as they are at the present time. The difficulty is that the municipalities are having to pay for these services, and the municipalities are nearly all broke. As a matter of fact, the people in our part of the country at the present time are getting medical services such as they never had before. It is the doctors that are getting the worst of it. It is true that we had a near medical strike in Winnipeg. When the depression set in, the medical men of our part of the country were expected year after year to care for indigent people who had not a cent in the world to pay for their services. Eventually the time came when the doctors themselves were faced with the problem of bread and butter, and they had to strike or starve. So they did strike. And now, Mr. Chairman, the condition is this, that we get very small fees in Winnipeg, so small that I hesitate to state them, and it is quite unnecessary to do so at the present time. But I will go so far as to state with regard to these fees that from the several municipalities in what we call Greater Winnipeg no medical man can receive more than $100 a month. He may be doing two or three or five hundred dollars' worth of work for the joint municipalities of Greater Winnipeg, but he cannot collect for that work more than one hundred dollars a month. If a medical man's work consists largely in practice among people on relief, that is the amount of his income; and by the time he pays for his automobile upkeep, telephone, office expenditures and what not, it does not leave him with a very fat living. But let me say that there is not a person in our part of the country at the present time who cannot get medical attention. We have a hospital by-law whereby persons who require hospitalization can go to the hospital and the municipality has to pay that bill also. The difficulty is not with the people; they are getting very good medical attention now. But we need assistance for our municipalities and provinces, and I want to set that matter straight. What the Prime Minister has said with regard to the people is true. Starvation is a fine cure for many maladies in this life. It has been said by one scientist that most men dig their grave with their teeth, and that is true; and with the restricted diet which people at large have had for some time they have fortunately enjoyed a greater degree of health.

I do not believe that the criticism that has taken place to-night has anything to do with the matters that we have been discussing lately; it has been merely levelled at part IV of the bill, which seems useless and of no avail.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member who has just taken his seat took exception to the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that conditions were appalling; but I think his words substantiate that statement, because he said that the doctors, of whom there must be several hundreds in Winnipeg, had either to strike or to starve. If that is true then I certainly think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre was right in describing the situation as appalling. The doctors do not decide to go on strike until things are in very bad shape indeed, and there are thousands of people who, rather than take relief or be unable to pay bills they may incur, put off until the last minute a visit to the doctor. May I remind the commitee that for many years the fee paid a country doctor—it may be less now—was at the rate of $1 per mile, and if a doctor went fifteen miles the fee was $30. If he went to several patients on the same journey a similar fee was put in for each. I do not say that every doctor did that, but at any rate these fees cannot be paid by the people. If the doctors do go on strike—and I cannot blame them if they do—and the expenses are met by the municipalities, it means that the municipalities get further into debt; and as my hon. friend has just said, the municipalities can no longer meet the situation. I do think that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre was right when he said that conditions were appalling. The Prime Minister has told the committee that the departments of health will be consulted and that, if they are willing to cooperate, something will be done, I hope no time will be lost getting the provinces together so that some action can be taken during the present session.

Mr. MITCHELL: I asked the question that started this discussion, and I was interested in the observations of a worthy doctor from one of the Winnipeg constituencies. The greatest problem at the moment is not the provision of medical care but the cost. After all—and I say this in a kindly spirit—the doctors are suffering largely for their sins, and I mean the lack of organization and the high fees charged to those people who make an effort to pay their way. I do not say that for the purpose of being critical; I say it because it comes from my practical experience as a governor for many years of the municipal hospitals in my city. The medical profession stands in the same relationship to the community as did the schools fifty years ago. They are more or less in a state of anarchy, and those who feel that a scheme of this description can be launched over night are simply kidding themselves; we might as well be frank about it. First of all we have to get the medical profession down to earth; they must tell us which way they are going. You cannot boss the doctors around though you can persuade them. I remember the great difficulty they experienced in Great Britain in connection with the panel scheme and the launching of a system of health insurance. The doctors put up opposition to the scheme and threatened to strike against the government because of the low figure at which the panel rates were fixed; but when the scheme was in practical application the greatest defenders of health insurance were the doctors themselves. As a matter of fact the medical practitioners there in the last three months have affiliated themselves with the trade union congress.

I believe that the doctors can do really constructive work in connection with this scheme, using their influence with the provincial and federal governments with a view to setting in motion a system of national health insurance. In my opinion they are the keystone of the arch, and if nothing else has been accomplished to-night we have had the crystallization of the views of the Canadian people's representatives on this question. My hon. friend spoke about the doctors doing $400 or $500 worth of work and receiving only $100 for it. Well, I think it is fair to say that if you get fifty per cent of your bills in the most prosperous times you are not doing so badly. Consider the question of major and minor operations. The average working man who tries to pay his way in this country finds, when he or a member of his family is faced with a major operation, it is almost like buying a house.

Mr. HOWDEN: When I spoke about medical men doing $400 and $500 worth of work at the present time, I was speaking of the reduced fees they now receive—$10 and $15 for a major operation and 50 cents for a call.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish they were down to that figure in my town; I am speaking from practical experience. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that an operation for appendicitis costs around $150.

Mr. HOWDEN: Fifteen dollars to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is about all it is worth. I do not know of any man in Canada who can earn $15 in twenty minutes. I do not say this in any spirit of criticism of the profession, because in my opinion they have made a distinct contribution to the life of the nation. And they have probably suffered more than any of the professional class in Canada through the depression. If this depression will only get people to realize that it is better to have a sound system of health insurance than the condition that exists now, then something useful will have come out of this troubled time. I believe this is a fair thing to say: public ward patients—and I am speaking of my own city—get the best attention; they have a better chance than some of the other patients of coming out of the front door, I might say, than the back one, because the best surgeons in the city are on the staffs of our hospitals, and a public ward patient does not get an operation unless it is needed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: I may be telling tales out of school. I was in England last year for the first time in twenty-five years with the exception of the war. I always had the opinion the British led the world in medicine, surgery and hospitals, but I think they are a long way behind us. I believe our equipment and even our doctors themselves are the equal of the best in Europe, and I had an opportunity of looking over some of the largest hospitals in the city of London, the county and also on the continent of Europe. But I am wandering from the point. What I am most concerned about is this: whether the doctors like this or not, I believe in the next six years we shall have a system of health insurance in this country. This depression has taught them a lesson. It is absolutely unsound that the state should spend the tens of thousands of dollars it does in the education of a medical student and that he should spend thousands of dollars for the first fifteen years of his practice sitting in his office waiting for patients to come along. The most practical approach to the problem is to give the great masses of the people an opportunity to avail themselves of medical and surgical attention under a scheme of national health insurance divorced from the enormous charges—and I am not saying that in a spirit of criticism of the doctors, because this is a product of the system—that prevail for medical attention at the present time. I would like to see a couple of decent teeth put into part IV so as to give this commission power to launch a scheme of that description in cooperation with the provinces and other interested organizations in connection with this legislation.

Mr. GERSHAW: First of all I would like to tell the hon. member for Battle River that a doctor charges his mileage for one way and makes many trips when he does not get the fifteen dollars. Moreover, the doctor who brings a patient through a major operation and gives him the attention he deserves has rendered a service that cannot be paid for by fifteen dollars, as the hon. member for East Hamilton has intimated.

Mr. SPOTTON: What if the patient dies?

Mr. GERSHAW: The Prime Minister mentioned that the average expectation of life had been very greatly increased. It has been increased from around forty years to fifty-eight years, but the increase has been very largely due to better conditions of living and a lessened infant mortality. The stress, strain and worry of these trying years seems to have had a bad effect upon heart and allied conditions, so that sudden deaths from such causes have greatly increased. Money that is well spent for the health of the people certainly brings greater and richer rewards than money spent for any other purpose.

In connection with health insurance Alberta has taken a forward step. The provincial authorities have gathered a great deal of information and are about to set up one or two trial districts in which what is really a state medicine experiment may be tried out. It is valuable to assemble that information, to make sure of the steps that are being taken, and thus work out a system that will endure. The only way in which that can be done is by taking steps gradually, and at the present time much more information is needed before a satisfactory system could be launched. At the same time I would like to stress the need for legislation of this kind and for making progress as rapidly as we safely can.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member for Medicine Hat mentioned my name in reference to the statement I made. The figures I gave as to medical charges were genuine, and I trust similar charges are not made by all doctors. I have seen bills where a mile each way has been charged for, and where more than one patient was visited on the same journey. The doctor who did this is now practising in Edmonton. I sincerely trust other doctors are not charging as high a fee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the commission be prepared to cooperate with one province in which legislation has been drafted or would it wait until conditions are as nearly uniform as possible in all the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall answer the hon. gentleman's question as I proceed. The debate that has taken place on this clause, although it has traversed far beyond the scope of the matter covered by it, has narrowed itself down to a very simple question. I am surprised at the violence of the language used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The question is a very simple one: Shall parliament provide money to enable municipalities, cities and towns, rural and otherwise, to carry out their plans with respect to health and health insurance? The hon. member for St. Boniface was quite frank about the matter. He says: The service is now being rendered. Probably there is in this country no class that has rendered greater service to individual citizens during the hard years through which we have passed and who have received less compensation for their work than has the medical profession. There is no doubt about that. The problem is a simple one; stripped of everything and without this violence of language it narrows down to this: Shall the parliament of Canada provide the money to enable the municipalities to carry out the services mentioned by the hon. gentleman? All the elaboration that can be made does not change that question. The Liberal party—and I agree it is unfortunate that party language was used as it was with respect to that phase of the matter—said: We do not believe in giving money to people to spend that do not raise it by taxation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I consider it is not a right principle.

Mr. BENNETT: As a question of interest it is good; as a question of principle it is bad. John P. Robinson said: Interest is good enough for me. But this is the real issue: you cannot to-night with all the power in the world scrap the provincial services and impose upon them a federal service without the loss of millions of dollars. That is as clear as anything can be. The difference between a national scheme and a provincial scheme at the present time is a very simple one; the hon. member for Vancouver Centre realizes that. The provinces have gone ahead and exercised their jurisdiction with respect to public health, hospitalization and so on; they have built in every part of the dominion plants of great value, have expended millions of dollars on them. How are you to impose on them a national scheme and leave them as they are? Are you to have two schemes or one? Are you to scrap one and maintain the other?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Correlate them.

Mr. BENNETT: But this talk about correlation has been going on for a long time. The provinces have things in being as distinguished from things that are not in being, and as long as the provinces have an existing plan which is functioning they are not willing to surrender it to the federal power. That has been one of the great difficulties in our country. Referring to conferences, I have had the privilege of talking to representatives of all the provinces during the last four years. One province says, "No scheme that can be devised by the wit of man is as good as that which we have in this province for looking after the health of our people." The taxpayers have been paying for it, but now, because the taxpayers cannot provide as they did, they say; Give us some money. That however, is not the theory of a policy of national health or health insurance. It is not the basis of it; it is not the foundation of it. In this bill we have a national scheme of unemployment insurance; it is competent for us to attach to it a national scheme of health insurance qua those who are covered by it, and that is what these provisions are for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is no national scheme.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a national scheme of unemployment insurance. Two million people out of a population of ten and a half millions may be affected by it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the outline of the scheme?

Mr. BENNETT: I see what the right hon. gentleman means. The scheme is not set forth here. This is to get the foundation upon which to lay a scheme, because the provinces have proceeded on the assumption that they are going to conduct this business in their own way. I have investigated the operations of every province in this confederation, and I know no single province that is prepared to say it is willing to forego its position. In British Columbia they have a statutory provision—

Mr. SPENCER: And in Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, in Alberta it is of a limited character, applying, I think only to districts. I may be wrong in that. In British Columbia the proposals were for the whole province; that at least is my understanding. Now we say we are going to introduce a scheme which will be an aid to the health of the people of this country. If on the basis of this measure we are able to make an appropriation to enable the commission to care for the health of those who are insured, we shall then have the commission that is so caring for them directly responsible to this parliament. But a national scheme that merely hands money over is one to which at the moment I cannot give my support. I said that last year and the year before when we were talking about the question of grants in aid. Grants in aid are the basis of the present old age pensions; in fact we are now paying three quarters of them. Grants in aid were established in this country in connection with highways, in connection with agriculture—

An hon. MEMBER: And technical education.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, although technical education was on a somewhat different basis, because in our constitution there is concurrent jurisdiction respecting education. Having elaborated at great length the system that now exists, the provinces say: Let us deal with this—how? No suggestion of any way except the handing out of money. This bill contemplates something different—a scheme based upon exact information applied to exact facts, that is, information supplied as to the two million people who may be affected by this bill, to lay the foundation upon which may be predicated—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where does it say that?

Mr. BENNETT: As I said an hour ago, all this bill does is to enable the commission to gather the information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the foundation, the part that is underground; it cannot be seen.

Mr. BENNETT: The foundation is here; the superstructure will appear in the estimates. That is the way this matter will be dealt with. That is the reason I suggest to the committee that this is an extremely valuable provision, providing for aid in respect to the health of the people of this country. But as the hon. gentleman for East Hamilton said, you cannot do this by just jumping at it and saying: this is the way to do it. You must take cognizance of the fact that each of the provinces, except possibly one, has established a most complete system of care of public health, and some have established health insurance schemes. We propose to deal with it on a national basis in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I must say just a word, since the Prime Minister has undertaken to reprove me for using violent language—

Mr. BENNETT: Far from it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not consider my language violent, but I hope I can use strong terms to describe what I believe to be the actual situation. The hon. member for St. Boniface was inclined to think all in need of medical assistance were being dealt with. I have not intended to make any attack on the doctors; I think they have given valuable service, but I would say to him that all people in need of medical service are not by any means being dealt with, not by any means.

Mr. HOWDEN: They have only to apply.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, much more than that. I have not been in social work in my own city of Winnipeg for many years and travelled throughout the west for the last twenty years without being made acutely conscious of the very serious situation that exists. People who have considered themselves independent frequently put off seeking medical assistance simply because they cannot pay for it. I know scores of such cases. It is these people who are perhaps in the most needy position to-day. The service that they need is not being given. I had a case the other day, not in connection with a medical doctor but a dentist, of a boy who needed a tooth fixed; the regular charge was $65. I submit that charges of that kind cannot possibly be paid by the ordinary people of this country.

Mr. MOORE (Châteauguay): They do not have to be.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am just giving a particular case of which I happen to know, and that was the regular charge.

Mr. MOORE (Châteauguay): Find other dentists who would not charge $65.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It may be possible; I have heard of cut-rate dentists. But I am not discussing medical or dental fees, I desire only to point out that a great many people are in need of medical care who might be looked after by a proper health insurance scheme. The Prime Minister rather implied that I want to scrap the provincial schemes. Nothing is further from my mind. I think the provincial schemes will have to be dealt with, just as I think the constitutional question will have to be dealt with. But these are minor matters compared with the primary responsibility of caring for the needs of the people. I quite agree that at its basis it is a financial matter, for the individual and for the municipalities that have to provide relief. But we have the source of financial strength here in the dominion government, and I think we have suggested one means by which the finances could be provided. My hon. friend from North Winnipeg suggested grants in aid. I do not think there are any provinces which would refuse to accept grants in aid. If any were wealthy enough to refuse it, or if their idea of their constitutional rights was so high as to lead them to decline the grant in aid, such a province need not be included, but the rest of us are sorely in need of something of this kind. The point I tried to emphasize before and that I must continue to emphasize is that there is a very large number of our people who to-day are in sore need of medical attention but who cannot obtain it. I think it is a distinct responsibility of this government to provide more adequately for the health of the people of Canada.

Section agreed to.

Sections 40, 41 and 42 agreed to.

On section 43—Annual report by commission.

Mr. BENNETT: I think section 42 sufficiently meets the difficulty raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. If it does not we shall be glad to make it conform to what the committee thinks desirable, but it provides for the regulations being printed and then laid on the table of parliament.

Section agreed to.

On section 44—Reports transmitted through the minister to the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: That answers the question the right hon. gentleman asked some days ago as to the report being laid before parliament.

Section agreed to.

Section 45 agreed to.

On section 46—Repeal.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Why the optional word "may" in this section?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the term always used with respect to a proclamation by the governor in council.

Section agreed to.

Section 47 (as printed; now section 46) agreed to.

On section 48 (as printed; now section 47)—Act to become operative.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, this is the last section. I have an amendment I should like to suggest to this section, but I think it would be preferable to carry the few sections that have been allowed to stand before dealing with section 48, unless my right hon. friend feels differently. Three or four sections have been held over; perhaps it would be better if they could be dealt with before we take up the last section.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the last section will stand until we have dealt with the other sections that are standing.

Section stands.

On schedule 1—Part I.

Mr. BENNETT: Are there any questions arising out of the schedules? I think they have been discussed during the progress of the general discussion.

Mr. HEAPS: There is one question I should like the Prime Minister to answer if he can. On more than one occasion he has stated in this house that approximately 1,700,000 people would come under the provisions of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the estimate.

Mr. HEAPS: This evening the Prime Minister stated on several occasions that approximately two million persons would be affected by the health insurance proposals. I should like to know if the Prime Minister has more definite information that he can give the committee as to the number of persons employed in industry who will qualify and become insurable under the provisions of the present statute.

Mr. BENNETT: I have already given the information based upon the census, and the computations of the actuaries are based upon the census. In the curves of their computations the actuaries have made allowance for the number of wage earners now employed and that have been employed in Canada.

The hon. member for Gloucester asked me to obtain from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics information as to the number of wage earners in 1932, 1933 and 1934. The figures supplied to me are as follows:

1932	2,476,724
1933	2,452,976
1934	2,578,204

The average number not working some time, as far as ascertainable, was:

1932	664,859
1933	710,190
1934	575,371

The average number with no job, according to the department's figures, was as follows:

1932	571,759
1933	610,763
1934	502,819

The other day, reading from the report made by Mr. Cudmore, I gave the house the figure of 400,000. That date was as of December 1, 1934, while the average number without jobs is as of June 1 for the years in question, so the figure on June 1 was 502,819 and on December 1 the estimate of the department, on the information before it, was 400,000. That is the information supplied.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the Prime Minister give the figures in regard to the number of workers?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman also asked me to obtain the number of workers affected by the bill. Those are given me as follows:

1932	1,733,707
1933	1,717,083
1934	1,804,743

That is applying the census figures to the known figures for those years. The figure of 2,000,000, which I mentioned as the number of workers affected, had reference to 1935. According to the department's figures the average number not working was as follows:

1932	465,401
1933	497,133
1934	402,760

Mr. VENIOT: I wish to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to what appears to be a discrepancy. The number of workers who would have been affected by this bill in 1929 is given as 1,848,493, while that same figure for 1934 is given as 1,804,743. That seems to be a discrepancy.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. VENIOT: There was no unemployment to speak of in 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there was.

Mr. VENIOT: Very little; the best estimate was about 117,000. The number affected by this bill in 1930 would have been 1,874,981, but for 1934 the number is given as 1,804,743.

Mr. BENNETT: I supplied the hon. gentleman with the exact figures furnished me by the department of statistics. I think if he would allow for the increase in population he would find the explanation. The number of workers that would be affected by this bill is usually about seventy per cent of the whole.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not attempting to suggest the Prime Minister is giving anything but what has been handed to him by certain authorities. I know however that in 1928 there were 1,691,719 workers who would be affected by this insurance bill. In 1934, a year of great depression. there was 1,804,743; or nearly 200,000 more affected than in the year 1926, which was one of prosperity.

Mr. BENNETT: That is perfectly true.

Mr. VENIOT: It is true according to those figures, but it cannot be true in fact. There was no depression in 1928.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course the hon. member knows that seasonably there are large numbers of unemployed all the time, in this country. There never has been a time, and I do not suppose there ever will be a time, when that will not be so. The figures supplied by the department are the numbers which will be affected on the basis of the 1931 census, and the information supplied by industrial undertakings reported indicate the number of workers would be 1,733,707 in 1932, whereas in 1933 it had fallen to 1,717,083. Reports from industrial reporting firms indicated much larger numbers of employed, at one time nearly 200,000 more. The figures furnished in this statement signed by the dominion statistician show the figure 1,804,743 for the year 1934.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me draw the attention of the Prime Minister to another point. He mentioned that there are large numbers of unemployed at all times. If he will look at the census returns he will find the census commissioner reported that over a period of ten or fifteen years the annual unemployment never exceeded 140,000 in number. He added that it was generally to be found that the greater proportion of the unemployed were people who were not asking for work and did not want work. The number cannot be as large as mentioned by the Prime Minister when the census return shows that over a period of ten or fifteen years the largest number has been only 114,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I can say only this, that the question put the other evening by the hon. member was submitted to the department. I believe the answers are as correct as they can be made; I believe they are accurate.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not believe they are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the committee is anxious to conclude the discussion of the several clauses of the bill. The Prime Minister has been kind enough to say he would at my suggestion allow the last section to stand. On reflection I believe it would perhaps better suit the convenience of the committee were I to move the intended amendment now. It is one I hope my right hon. friend may perhaps be ready to accept. Mr. Chairman, would you call section 48?

Mr. BENNETT: It stands; it has been called.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I shall move the amendment now. As it stands the section reads:

This act shall come into force when assented to: Provided that no contribution shall be payable or paid under the provisions of part III of this act until a date to be set by the commission of which due notice shall be published in the Canada Gazette and in such other manner as the commission may deem necessary.

The amendment I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is:

That the first line of section 48 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor: This act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council after the question of its validity has been submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada on a reference by the government, and the act has been declared to be intra vires of the parliament of Canada.

My reason for submitting the amendment is this: While the Prime Minister has intimated that in his own mind he is quite confident the measure is intra vires of this parliament, nevertheless he has come to that opinion only within the last few months. I believe I am right when I state that for years past he has held a different opinion. It is not surprising therefore if many of us are in grave doubt as to the competence of parliament's jurisdiction in the matter, and if we have doubts people throughout the country will have equal doubts. A few days ago when I asked the Prime Minister if he had obtained an opinion from the supreme court he replied that he felt the supreme court did not wish to give an opinion on a matter which was not concretely before it. The position now is that in the course of a day or two this bill will have passed the House of Commons and will be sent to the Senate where quite possibly it may be quickly passed. The Prime Minister intimated he thought the lion was out of the path so far as the Senate was concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: I said it was in my right hon. friend's time; I cannot say as to now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I feel the right hon. gentleman knows he has no lions over there which will be in the way. Quite probably the measure will pass quickly through the Senate. In these circumstances I submit the Prime Minister would find it possible to obtain thereafter immediate assent to the measure, after which it could be immediately sent to the supreme court and the opinion of that body obtained even before the prorogation or dissolution of parliament. If I thought the suggested amendment would occasion any delay in bringing the legislation into effect, in the event of its being intra vires, I would not suggest the amendment. I am convinced however that my suggestion should not occasion any delay, and I do believe, assuming the legislation to be intra vires, very serious prejudice of its provisions would be thereby prevented. Unquestionably in the minds of the people throughout the country when the measure is assented to there will remain a grave doubt as to its validity. The provinces will have doubts, employers and employees will have doubts, and when my right hon. friend proceeds to provide the necessary machinery a critical situation may arise. He said the number of employees would exceed 4,000—

Mr. BENNETT: No, I said I did not know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought 4,000 was his estimate. I put it at between 5,000 and 10,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That was the estimate of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is generally conceded that sooner or later this measure will come before the courts for a decision respecting its validity. Should it be declared ultra vires, and the machinery meanwhile were set up with appointments of four or five thousand people made, and all were on a sudden to find themselves without a position, the results would be to say the least unfortunate. It would have, too, a bad effect upon the beneficiaries, the people paying into the fund, and upon the position of industry generally. In these unsettled times, if any further note of uncertainty is thrown into the situation existing between employers and employees, and if any further difficulty is added by way of ascertaining where they stand and what will be expected of them by way of additional taxation and additional burdens to the industries with which they are connected, the situation will be made very serious indeed. It is to avoid the possibility of anything of that nature that I offer the amendment in the hope that my right hon. friend will see his way clear to accept it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I cannot accept the amendment. Section 48 is drawn in its present terms to meet in part the situation to which the right hon. gentleman has directed attention. The commission is to be appointed and the act will at once go into operation. But no contributions shall be levied on either the employees, the employers or the state until such time as the commission concludes that it is desirable to bring part III of the act into force. After listening to the debate which has taken place in the house and in committee I should think it would be extremely difficult for anyone to suggest that this measure would be within the legislative jurisdiction of any of the provinces. If it is ultra vires of a province it must be intra vires of the dominion, without going any further into the matter. So far as making a reference to the court is concerned, I believe that is highly objectionable. In the Scott act case, so called, the act went into force, and there was a prosecution before a police magistrate of a man named Russell in the city of Fredericton which enabled the case ultimately to reach the privy council for decision. It has been so often said that the opinion of the court with respect to the validity of an act is no better than the opinion of the law officers of the crown, but if a concrete case is raised by some person declining to make a contribution and the provisions of the act are brought into force, and the magistrate or court before whom the case is tried decides that the defendant is justified in not paying, the case with all the evidence that may be given as to the surrounding facts will be before the tribunal for adjudication; in other words, a concrete case, and not a number of pages of a statute. It is quite clear that facts must influence law.

Many hon. gentlemen to-night have referred to the question of emergency. It will be recalled what Lord Haldane said with respect to the power of this parliament in dealing with emergencies, that it had powers which under ordinary circumstances it had not at all. The milk case in British Columbia arises out of a definite and distinct case in which the facts would be placed in evidence. One of the factors that I would propose, if I were conducting a case brought under this act, to put in evidence, and which could not be put in evidence otherwise, would be that parliament unanimously voted for the second reading of this bill. That is a fact of great importance in determining its position because it indicates clearly the national character of the legislation. There are other factors to which attention might well be directed and which would be forthcoming under any instructions from the law officers of the crown. I therefore cannot consent to theories being tested by the court. What will be tested will be the concrete operations of this statute.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie King) negatived: Yeas, 21; Nays, 56.

Section 48 agreed to.

On the schedules.

First schedule, Part I, agreed to.

On part II—Excepted employments.

Mr. BENNETT: I think we have discused part II, but if there is any one question to which attention has been directed I shall be glad to see that it stands for consideration.

Mr. VENIOT: I may be a little dull of comprehension, or perhaps it was because of the noise in the chamber that I did not catch the explanation of the Prime Minister on one point. I should like to know how long has a man coming under this act to pay contributions before he is entitled to any benefits whatever?

Mr. BENNETT: Forty payments in two years.

Mr. VENIOT: And only after the expiration of two years does he become entitled to receive benefits?

Mr. BENNETT: No, after the payment of forty contributions, but he is allowed two years in which to make them.

Mr. VENIOT: Oh yes, I see.

Mr. BENNETT: He might make forty payments in forty-five weeks.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand.

Mr. HEAPS: In a certain part of the bill it is provided that a man has to be out of work nine days before he is entitled to benefits. Is that nine consecutive days or nine working days?

Mr. BENNETT: I think I explained that it was nine working days.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think the bill says anything more than nine days.

Mr. BENNETT: It defines that. That section with respect to three days and three days stands. I shall come back to that when we get through with the schedules and also to one other section on which a question was raised by the hon. member for Swift Current.

Mr. MORAND: May I ask what constitutes a full week's work for the purpose of contributions?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the section to which I referred the other day in answer to the hon. member for North Winnipeg and which I am going to discuss at some length because there might be some ambiguity with respect to working three days and missing three. I promised that that ambiguity would be entirely removed from the bill.

Mr. HANBURY: I wish again to call the Prime Minister's attention to representations that have been made by myself and many other members of the house with respect to employees in banking, insurance and similar classifications.

Mr. BENNETT: What similar classifications?

Mr. HANBURY: I have representations with respect to the building and construction trade as being a seasonal trade, the workers of which should be included in the operation of this act. I wish to place that on record before the Prime Minister.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do wish to protest against the large number of classes of workers who are excepted under Part II. The Prime Minister a few moments ago called this a national unemployment measure, yet although agriculture is one of our basic industries it is being left entirely out. A large number of employees in agriculture drift back from the city to the country when there is work to be done on the farm. The old days are gone when there was one class of hired men who devoted themselves entirely to agriculture, and a great many of these workers now spend part of their time in the city and part in the country, or on construction work. It seems to me that this is one of the most needy classes of people and ought not to be left out. The same may be said of these other groups that are excepted, such as fishing, lumbering and logging; these are people who really need the benefits of unemployment insurance. I know perfectly well that lumbering and logging are by their very nature more or less casual. Possibly the risks are not so good, but at least these men should be given the opportunity of contributing to such a scheme. They could then draw out in proportion to what they had paid in. It seems to me that that would tend to stabilize such industries. It is a very serious matter that these men should be left entirely out of the scheme. I have had representations in this regard from logging and lumbering workers out on the coast. Further, I do not know just what is meant by employment in transportation by water or by air, and by stevedoring. That might leave out entirely all engaged in the shipping industry. What about the people in the railway shops? Are they included or not? That is not clear to me. Certainly the shop men are engaged in the transportation service and ought to be included in this scheme.

Mr. NEILL: Transportation by water, it is.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure it does not include railways.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am very glad indeed. Take stevedoring too; that again is one of the most casual of our occupations. The Prime Minister will remember that in England a good many years ago it was very largely regularized. It seems to me that the institution of unemployment insurance would go a long way towards regularizing it in our ports to-day. And then the women workers: surely those engaged in domestic service and nurses ought to be included in a scheme of this kind. I cannot see any reason why they should be left out. I should like to have the Prime Minister tell us, one by one, with regard to at least these four or five categories why these classes of workers have been left out of his plan.

Mr. VALLANCE: Speaking about agricultural labourers, how many men would you get, after they had made forty payments for two years and received $26 a month, who would go back to the farm?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I pointed out that a great many people are not engaged solely in agriculture but spend part of their time at other work in the cities.

Mr. VALLANCE: What about the one who is engaged in agriculture, the labourer engaged all the time? Once he maks his forty payments for two years, will he retire for the rest of the time on $26 a month?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. I shall later endeavour to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.
